[2] 1842, Millward v. Hibbert, 3 Q. B. 120, 139 (to prove a custom of London as to the stowage of goods in regard to general average, a similar custom in other English ports was received); 1863, Falkner v. Earle, 3 B. & S. 360 (to prove a custom of trade between Liverpool and California, after incorporation with the United States, as to discounts on freight, a similar custom as to trade with Texas after incorporation and as to other ports of British North America, etc., was received); 1866, Place v. Allcock, 4 F. & F. 1074 (usage as to a bleaching-lien in Nottingham; usage at Loughborough admitted, by reason of "the vicinity of the places and the interchange of trade"); 1871, Fleet v. Murton, L. R. 7 Q. B. 126, 130, 134, 41 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 49 (action for the price of fruit on a sold-note signed by the brokers only, the dispute being whether in that trade brokers were liable on such notes for the default of principals; the custom of the trade being held to be involved in the contract, evidence was received, with some hesitation, of the custom on the point in the colonial market; Blackburn, J.: "It seemed to be conceded at the trial that the two trades were so far allied to each other that the same usages would be likely to prevail in both, and I thought that upon the question of the liability of a broker, evidence of his liability in a similar trade might be received"); 1863, Barnes v. Ingalls, 39 Ala. 201 (because "there are so many points in common between such an establishment [ambrotype and photograph gallery] and those in which the ordinary mechanic arts are pursued," a custom as to working hours in the latter was admitted to show the same in the former); 1874, Sullivan v. Hense, 2 Colo. 424, 433 (number of feet in a mining claim; length of other claims in the district controlled by similar customs, admitted); 1878, Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Glasscott, 4 Colo. 270 (action to recover the salary of a railroad-conductor; set-off for money collected on the trains from passengers without tickets and never delivered over; the fact that on trains making the same number of trips with substantially the same number of cars at the same rates of fare over the same route the receipts of the sort by another conductor had been much higher, was rejected; because, whether or not the habit of passengers in entering trains in forgetfulness of the prior purchase of tickets was subject to unvarying principles, yet the conditions were too complicated for investigation; this is unsound); 1882, Sexton v. Lamb, 27 Kan. 429 (the fact admitted of the average waste of ice in handling, to show an original stock of ice as calculated from the part sold); 1896, Todd v. Keene, 167 Mass. 157, 45 N. E. 81 (damages from failing to perform a contract to give a theatrical performance of a Shakspearean tragedy, in the profits of which the plaintiff was to share; the cash receipts of similar plays at the same theatre in the same town under the same auspices, rejected, because "there are too many elements of uncertainty and conjecture to make it safe to rely upon" such evidence; unsound); 1877, Reynolds v. Ins. Co., 36 Mich. 131, 142 (to show the extent of the authority of an agent of an insurance company, the extent of authority given by other insurance companies on the same point, was excluded); 1861, Walker v. Barron, 6 Minn. 508 (a custom elsewhere as to a discount in boarding stage-employees, excluded, because not defined as to place or time); 1872, Jones v. Ins. Co., 36 N. J. L. 29, 43 (like Ins. Co. v. Weide, infra; excluded, because the circumstances were not similar); 1834, Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Philip, 13 Wend. 81 (to show that the plaintiff's stock probably did not amount to the value claimed, the value of the largest stock in that business in the city was offered; excluded, as being a mere surmise; unsound); 1847, Howard v. Ins. Co., 4 Den. 507 (similar evidence was rejected on the principle of excluding opinions); 1895, Weatherford M. W. & N. R. Co. v. Duncan, 88 Tex. 611, 32 S. W. 878 (here the manner, not the fact, of the act was in issue, and hence the custom of railroads elsewhere was immaterial); 1870, Insurance Co. v. Weide, 11 Wall. 438 (to show that the value of the stock of goods burned could not have reached the amount claimed, viz. half the value of the annual sales, the fact was received from the defendant that persons in the same city and in the same business had on hand a stock only one fifth the amount of their annual sales; Davis, J.: "It would establish a fact connected with this kind of business, to wit, the uniform relation between the stock on hand and the annual sales"; adding, "it is true there are no reported cases on the subject"); 1894, Keystone Mfg. Co. v. Adams, 151 U. S. 139, 148, 14 Sup. 295 (profits of infringement; the profits made by other users of a patent, excluded); 1897, Anderson v. Mining Co., 16 Utah 28, 50 Pac. 815 (to show the practice of employees in a certain mine, the general custom among miners of the camp under similar circumstances was admitted); 1868, Hine v. Pomeroy, 30 Vt. 103, 104, 106 (whether an attorney had directed a process-server to take receiptors; the practice of other attorneys in the same city, excluded, because "there was no such relation of lawyers to each other, in respect to habits and modes and practice, in the details

§ 380. Same: Customary Rights in Land. The use of other instances to prove a custom of descent or of other right affecting land has not been and is not likely to become common in this country, because here such usages are rare. But this sort of evidence has had frequent use in England, and the precedents on this point well illustrate the general principle. Instances occurring within the same manor, it is clear, will be received, because the original unity of the holding allows each instance to appear as merely one illustration of a general system working uniformly;[1] and the same principle may apply where a township, or other unity likely to involve community of conduct in the matter in question, is a common feature in all the instances.[2] On the same principle, however (though the matter was not clearly settled until Rowe v. Brenton), instances from other manors may be received, provided that, behind their apparent difference of conditions, a unity of some sort can be shown which makes instances from the one equally illustrative of a general system including and operating in the other.[3] The precedents on of professional service in matters of this kind, as to make what is true of some the ground of inference as to what is true of another"). Compare the cases post, § 461, concerning the custom of other railroads, factories, or the like, as indicating the danger of certain apparatus or the reasonableness of certain precautions.

[1] 1810, Doe v. Sisson, 12 East 62 (to prove a custom of descent in the female line, particular instances were received of such descent in other estates of the manor, as well as of a general reputation as to such custom of descent in the manor; the particular instances being, per Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "only so many branches derived from the same root").

[2] 1813, Blundell v. Howard, 1 M. & S. 292 (custom as to tithes; payments by other holdings in the same township, admitted to show its general character); 1842, Jewison v. Dyson, 9 M. & W. 540, 556 (custom of appointing coroners; the appointment of coroners in other places within the same grant, admissible); 1879, Lendrum v. Deazley, 4 L. R. Ire. 635, 639, 645 (usage as to tenant-right in another part of the same estate, the usage on all parts of the estate being the same, admitted).

[3] 1637, Moulin v. Dallison, Cro. Car. 484 (whether an estate descended by custom to the eldest daughter in the manor of S.; after showing that S. was a part of a manor O., and thus establishing a unity of custom, the fact was received of the rule of descent in O.); 1672, Champion v. Atkinson, 3 Keb. 90 (whether in a copyhold estate a fine was due on the death of the lord in certain circumstances; the fact was received of the existence of such a custom in the copyhold estates of adjoining manors; no reason being given); 1725, Somerset v. France, 1 Stra. 654 (whether the tenant for life could collect by custom a fine from the customary tenants of the manor upon the death of the last admitting lord; the fact was received of a similar custom for other tenants of the plaintiff himself in other manors, no reason being given; but the fact of a similar payment by other tenants to other lords of manors was objected to because "each manor hath its particular customs, and they have no relation to one another but by accident"; Fortescue, J., was for admitting, because "it is very proper to enquire what are the qualities which attend other estates which are held by the same tenure"; Raymond, C. J., was opposed, because "I should readily admit that this evidence might be allowed if the customs of tenant-right estates were the same in all manors; but it is plain that the customs of these estates are different in different manors"; yet he yielded to supposed authority); 1778, Furneaux v. Hutchins, 2 Cowp. 807 (action for not carrying off tithes; plea, that they were not properly set out; the fact was rejected of a custom in the adjacent parishes to set them out as the plaintiff had done; Lord Mansfield, C. J.: "Proof of the custom in other parishes is no evidence to affect the parish in question, unless the custom had been laid as a general custom of the whole country"); 1793, Beebee v. Parker, 5 T. R. 26, 31 (descent-custom; Kenyon, L. C. J., speaking obiter, of outside instances: "and the latter has gone so far that the custom of one manor has been given in evidence to show the custom of another, where they are both governed by the Border-law"); 1813, R. v. Ellis, 1 M. & S. 652, 661 (whether a fishery was so connected with land as to be subject to a poor rate; Ellenborough, L. C. J., speaking of Somerset's Case, supra: "I have always thought that . . . this evidence is to be considered rather as evidence of a custom pervading one common district of manors, than as the custom of one manor to show the custom of another"); 1828, Rowe v. Brenton, 8 B. & C. 737, 758 (issue as to the ownership of copper-mines, and the rights of a plaintiff who was a "conventionary lessee" in the copper on his land; there were 17 manors in the duchy, and some of the above tenancies, renewable every 7 years, existed in each manor; evidence was received as to the terms of the customary right of such a tenant in these other manors; Tenterden, L. C. J.: "The same

this point are full of instruction upon the class of evidence dealt with in the preceding topics. It can be only seldom that the proper conditions for the admissibility of such evidence would exist in this country.[4]

§ 381. Same: Other Principles discriminated. Certain aspects, in which the question arises whether the usage of others may be resorted to, are to be distinguished from the foregoing subject.

(1) When the nature of an external object is to be determined, its effect upon others may throw light upon its qualities. Thus, in a railroad accident, the conduct of other persons may show whether the situation was a terrifying and dangerous one; in a plea of breach of quality of an article sold, the patronage of other persons may throw light on its quality; in an issue as to the dangerousness of machinery, the conduct of others in taking precautions may throw light on its dangerous quality. In all these cases, the conduct of others is not offered as instances showing a general custom or habit; such a general custom would be irrelevant; it is offered as showing the effects produced on ordinary persons by the nature of the article, place, or machinery in question (post, § 461).

(2) Where a term of a contract is sought to be imported into it on the score of usage or custom, this usage or custom must be shown to have been known to and impliedly accepted by the party. As a principle of contracts this is clear; and accordingly a Court is occasionally found saying that such a custom must be a local one, — meaning merely that it must be brought home to the knowledge of the opponent. But, this being conceded, it still remains to prove the custom, and for this purpose instances in other districts may be received, as above seen. This evidential use is always allowable, the assumption throughout being that the principle of substantive law, sooner or later, in some way or other, will be satisfied and knowledge of the custom be brought home to the opponent. The local custom, i. e. the custom as character, whatever that may be, belongs to them all. . . . It certainly belongs to all those called 'free conventionaries' in this district. . . . Must we not, then, in fairness, in order to ascertain what are the relative rights of the lord and these tenants in one part of this district, enquire what are their rights in another?"; Bayley, J.: "I am of opinion that the usage which has prevailed in one part . . . is evidence to explain a grant expressed in similar terms as to any other part of the district"); 1842, Anglesey v. Hatherton, 10 M. & W. 218 (trover for coals, limestone, and ironstone, taken from the manors of C. and R.; issue as to the right of copyholders to take minerals; the fact was offered by the defendant of the custom in the adjoining manor of W., after first offering evidence that W. was only a subinfeudation of C. and hence the customs would presumably be the same; excluded; Abinger, C. B.: "It should be established clearly and beyond all controversy that the two manors originally formed one manor. . . . [As to the cases supra of 'border-law'] there prevails throughout those manors a particular species of tenure, called 'tenant-right'; . . . since in those manors all the tenants hold under the same right, if it should happen that in one particular manor no example can be adduced of what is the custom in any particular case, . . . in order to explain the nature of tenure, which is not confined to one manor but prevails in a great number, you may show what is the general usage with respect to that tenure"; and he then approves also of Rowe v. Brenton; Alderson, B.: "If indeed there be some general connecting link between them — as, for instance, if the customs in question be a particular incident of the general tenure which is common to the two manors, then you have a right to show what the custom of one manor is as to that tenure, for the purpose of showing what the custom of the other manor is as to that tenure; but you must begin by showing that there is a general tenure common to them both; that fact fails here").

[4] 1869, Gilman v. Riopelle, 18 Mich. 145, 165 (other instances of a practice among French settlers of giving a possessory right to the eldest son, excluded, in the absence of direct testimony in the case in question).

known to the opponent, is required by the substantive law, but it may be evidenced by instances from other districts, on the principle of § 379, ante.

(3) Whether a custom or usage may thus be imported as a term of a written contract, or may be used to interpret a written contract, concerns the parol-evidence rule (post, §§ 2440, 2464).

(4) Whether testimony to a custom violates the opinion rule (post, § 1955), and whether one witness alone suffices to prove a custom (post, § 2053), are also different questions.

§ 382. Prior or Subsequent Status (Business, Possession, Ownership, Solvency, Coverture, etc.). It has already been seen (ante, § 190) that the prior or the subsequent existence of a quality or condition is evidential of its existence at a given time. This principle is equally applicable in evidencing a habit or cause of conduct. Its use is most frequent for facts which can at first sight hardly be ranked here in any natural classification, — facts roughly to be described as involving a human status or relation to external affairs; for example, possession, ownership, solvency, and the like. The possession or ownership of property, the incumbency of an office, the existence of a debt, of coverture, and such relations, in truth involve a human course of conduct or a human attitude or position regarded as voluntarily and habitually maintained towards outward things and events; and this seems their most appropriate place in any classification of propositions to be proved.

The prior or the subsequent existence of such a fact is always evidential to show its existence at a time in issue, upon the general experience that such facts involve a human attitude more or less continuous and permanent. The probability of continuance depends much, of course, on the nature of the specific fact and the circumstances of each case; and therefore, in setting a limit of time for the range of the evidence, the discretion of the trial Court should control. The principle is illustrated by many sorts of facts. Such evidence is receivable to show the mode of conducting a business,[1] the keeping of liquors illegally,[2] the possession of goods, land, or money,[3] the ownership of

[1] 1792, R. v. Neville, Peake N. P. 91 (nuisance in carrying on the business of a melter of grease; an admission, made at a former place, that the business there was a nuisance, received, to "weigh more or less against him as it shall appear more or less like that where he before resided"); 1857, R. v. Falrie, 8 E. & B. 486 (nuisance; a conviction for a similar nuisance in the preceding year was offered, because the same thing was done in 1856 that was done in 1855, and if that was so, it is important to show that what was done in 1855 was an offence"; excinded, because, per Campbell, L. C. J., "a collateral issue is raised" on the question whether the places were alike; repudiating R. v. Neville; Coleridge, J., accord; Williams, J., uncertain).

[2] 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 162, 19 N. E. 215 (Knowlton, J.: "The illegal keeping of intoxicating liquor with intent to sell it, like keeping a nuisance, is a continuing offence, which may extend over a long or a short period of time. If attention is directed to any point of time during the keeping, there is a probability, from the very fact of keeping then, that the same condition has existed from some previous time, and will continue for some time into the future. And so, as to offences which are in their nature continuing, evidence has often been received of a condition a little before or a little after the time within which the offence must be proved"). Accord: 1871, Com. v. Carney, 108 Mass. 417; 1872, Com. v. Berry, 109 id. 366; 1873, State v. Colston, 53 N. H. 483 (keeping liquor illegally for sale on Dec. 6; the keeping liquor for sale in the same house — a hotel — a short time before, admitted, because "a state of things once shown to exist is presumed to continue until something is shown to rebut the presumption"). Compare the cases cited ante, § 367.

[3] 1817, R. v. Watson, 2 Stark. 116, 137 (treason; the finding of pikes in the defendants' house three months after their arrest, objected to because they might have been placed there by others, admitted; papers, etc., found similarly property,[4] the existence of a debt,[5] the condition of solvency,[6] the condition of coverture,[7] the condition of residence,[8] the incumbency of office,[9] and so on.[10] The occasional repudiation of such evidence in some of the above precedents is not to be taken as a negation of the general principle, but only as a determination that in the case in hand the contingencies of change were too many to allow the prior or the subsequent condition of things to be of probative value.

§ 383. Style of Handwriting or Spelling, as evidenced by Specimens. It has been noted already (ante, § 90) that, in proving a document to have been written by A, two distinct modes offer themselves, — first, testimony by a person who saw A write it, and, secondly, testimony of some other sort. The first mode is not concerned in any way with the character or style of A's

In a room that had been locked by the defendant and not opened in the interval, also admitted; compare the citations ante, § 149); 1898, Com. v. Williams, 171 Mass. 461, 50 N. E. 1035 (possession six months before, allowed); 1845, Wells v. Burbank, 17 N. H. 409 (possession of a tax-warrant by the deputy Secretary of State on June 1, admitted evidence of its possession by him on Sept. 1); 1847, Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 633, 744 (the general principle of the continuance of a state of things once shown, applied to infer a subsequent from an earlier possession of land); 1868, Kennedy v. People, 39 N. Y. 245, 254 (possession of money, and sales of goods, six weeks and six months before, admitted; whether the time is too remote must "depend very much on the circumstances of each case"); 1870, Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172 (bailment of money to an Innkeeper; the bailor's prior possession of such sums of money, admitted).

For the possession of a document, as indicating prior possession, see ante, § 157.

For the use of subsequent possession of money as indicating a prior act of larceny, etc., see ante, § 154.

For the possession or lack of money as involving incapacity to lend and therefore probable non-lending, see ante, § 224.

For the possession or lack of money as indicating a motive to do or not to do something, see post, § 392.

For the possession of goods, etc., as showing a prior larceny or other crime, see ante, §§ 149–153.

[4] 1855, Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Webb, 27 Ala. 618 (ownership of corporation-stock in 1850, held admissible to show ownership in 1853); 1882, Donahue v. Coleman, 49 Conn. 464, 466 (freeholder as eligible to be appraiser; ownership six months before, admitted; the presumption to be "merely one of fact"); 1872, Com. v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 370 (proprietorship of a shop in July, admitted to show proprietorship in December); 1878, Hanson v. Chiatovich, 13 Nev. 395 (recovery of personalty of a testator; ownership at death, inferred from prior ownership).

[5] 1809, Jackson v. Irvin, 2 Camp. 50 (bankruptcy; a creditor's claim having been proved to exist several months before the bankruptcy, its continuance to the latter date was presumed); 1867, O'Neil v. Mining Co., 3 Nev. 141 (a debt due and unpaid, on Oct. 5, inferred to remain unpaid on Oct. 16); 1860, Eames v. Eames, 41 N. H. 177 (assumpsit for two weeks' board; the parties' relations for the previous year, admitted); 1854, Bell v. Young, 1 Pa. 175 (the existence of a note at testator's death, inferrible from its prior existence).

[6] 1873, Body v. Jewson, 33 Wis. 402, 411 (insolvency at time of action, inferred from prior insolvency); 1884, Cozzens v. Holt, 136 Mass. 237 (insolvency a short time before, admitted); 1891, Dunnigue v. Daniels, 154 Ill. 483, 485, 28 N. E. 900 (insolvent's deed; lack of property "at some previous time," admissible "if there was nothing to show a change in this respect"; "his condition as to property at a subsequent time," also, if "not too remote"; the trial Court's discretion to contro' as to time).

For insolvency as involving inability to lend and probable non-lending, see ante, § 224.

[7] 1881, Murdock v. State, 68 Ala. 567 (marriage-relation at the time of a trial for burglary, not evidence of the same relation at the time of the burglary; unsound); 1861, Erskine v. Davis, 25 Ill. 251, 256 (the single state indicates subsequent singleness; coverture indicates subsequent but not prior coverture; unsound).

[8] 1875, Daniels v. Hamilton, 52 Ala. 105 (former residence in a State, as making amenable to process, admitted); 1842, Prather v. Palmer, 4 Ark. 456 (residence as affecting bond for costs; residence 17 years before, admitted); 1854, Swift v. Swift, 9 La. An. 117 (absence from the State during five years after a party's death, inferrible from absence after that period). Compare the citations post, § 1312.

[9] 1849, Barelli v. Lytle, 4 La. An. 557 (office as justice on June 29, 1848; inference of prior incumbency on June 5, 1848, held not allowable).

[10] 1886 Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 108 Ind. 565, 9 N. E. 476 (speed of a train at one place, admitted to show the speed at a place just beyond); 1895, Brown v. Wren, 2 Q. B. 391 (partnership in April, 1892, evidence of its continuance in June, 1893, and Feb., 1894).

handwriting; the witness testifies merely to seeing the act done, just as he would testify to seeing a blow struck or hearing a remark made. By the second mode there is merely a resort to A's type or character or habit of handwriting, and an inference from the type to the genuineness of the disputed writing. This evidential fact, the type of the handwriting, involves an inference from a kind of habit or skill (of handwriting) to an act done (the specific writing), and the nature of that inference has been already explained (ante, § 99). But this skill or style or habit of handwriting has in its turn to be evidenced. This may be done by either testimonial or circumstantial evidence; i. e. by the direct testimony of one who is familiar with A's style of writing, or by separate instances of his writing used circumstantially to show the general type. The former mode concerns the Qualifications of Witnesses to Handwriting (dealt with post, §§ 569, 693). The latter mode is here involved; the general process being the same as that of evidencing any human quality or trait by specific instances of its exhibition.

What are the necessary requirements of relevancy in evidencing a style of handwriting by specific instances?

(1) The first requirement is, of course, that the specimens should be those of the person whose handwriting-style is to be proved, i. e. that they should be genuine. This is rather a necessary preliminary assumption than a principle of relevancy; just as, to prove A's character, it is obviously only A's and not B's conduct that can have any bearing. But it is precisely this preliminary assumption that has vitally affected the history of the law on this subject; for when specimens of handwriting are offered as A's, since they must thus first be shown to be A's, this may introduce new issues which will complicate and prolong the trial, and perhaps thus involve an incidental burden which will cost more than the evidence is worth. These considerations of Auxiliary Policy (§ 43), which are independent of the principle of Relevancy, thus become of radical importance.

(2) The requirement of the principle of relevancy is that the specimens offered shall be such as are capable of affording an inference of the normal and general type or style of the writing. Various considerations might be thought of as affecting this capability. (a) The ex parte selection of the specimens may be improper, as possibly resulting in only one aspect of the style. This suggestion has never found any acceptance; for while the variations of a person's style may be numerous, they are usually not; the difficulty of collecting misleading ones is great; any serious false impression could be easily exposed; and, finally, our whole system of proof is that of an ex parte selection and offering of evidence. (b) The specimens may have been written at a time when there was a clear inducement to deceive, e. g. at the trial. This consideration is usually given much weight, and may suffice to exclude specimens so written. (c) The specimens may have been written so long ago that they do not represent the person's present style. This argument has never been considered as important; for, if the person's present style is different, it can easily be shown. (d) The specimens offered may not be numerous enough to illustrate the average or normal type. But one specimen usually does represent the type with sufficient accuracy; and, if it does not, the opponent may easily show this by counter-specimens. This objection has never prevailed.

Such are the considerations involved in the principle of relevancy. If this alone were involved, there would have been no obstacle to the free use of this mode of proof, and no other limitations than the few simple ones above mentioned. But the considerations of auxiliary policy already specified, as well as others (in particular, the Opinion rule), the survival of certain earlier limitations arising at a time when proof by type of handwriting was looked on with suspicion, and the confusion of usage as to certain ancient and modern terms, all combined to introduce additional restrictions, more or less arbitrary in themselves, and not connected with any principle of relevancy. It would be impossible to understand or to expound the law of to-day without having in mind this historical development and these additional principles. Accordingly, the state of the law as affected by all of them can best be examined in one place, under the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1991–2027).

The collateral considerations above mentioned were seldom thought to apply to such traits as a person's mode of spelling, grammatical use of words, and the like; and not only could such a usage be freely used to show the authorship of a document, but the usage in its turn could be proved by specimens, without the above limitations historically peculiar to specimens of handwriting. For convenience, the precedents are dealt with at the same place with proof of handwriting by specimens (post, § 2024).

SUB-TITLE II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

TOPIC IX: EVIDENCE TO PROVE EMOTION (MOTIVE, FEELING, PASSION).

CHAPTER XIV.

§ 385. Theory of Motive. It has been already observed (ante, § 117) that the term "motive," as commonly used, does not serve to discriminate the two different processes to which it may be applied. (1) It may be attempted, first, to infer, from the existence in A of a desire or inclination to do act X, that this desire, urging him on, probably resulted in the doing of the act; as when it is argued that, because A desired and wished to get rid of B, he probably did do something towards getting rid of B. (2) Secondly, in proceeding in turn to evidence this desire or other emotion, certain circumstances may be offered as tending to show its existence; as when the argument is to the existence of this desire in A (a) from an injury which B has done to A, or (b) from A's outward conduct expressing such a desire, or (c) from the prior or subsequent existence of such a desire. The former process involves the evidencing of a Human Act, and has already been dealt with (ante, §§ 117–119). The latter process involves the evidencing of a Human Quality or Condition, and is the present subject. Under the former head, questions of evidence are rare; the rulings upon evidence are concerned usually with the latter process.

§ 386. Discriminations between Motive and Intent or Design or Character. Whatever the psychological distinctions may be, the discriminations between Emotion and other human attributes or conditions are not always accurately observed practically in judicial language, nor are they easy to observe. At one point the line is not easy to draw between Emotion and Design

(ante, § 237), at another point between Emotion and Disposition (ante, § 192), at another between Emotion and Intent or Belief (ante, §§ 245, 300). Hence, in classifying the precedents it cannot be supposed that they will always be found just where they would be expected; the absence of an accepted terminology, and the difficulties in the application of any terminology, necessarily leave a margin of uncertainty.

§ 387. Kinds of Inference. The modes of inference circumstantially to a human quality or condition, as already pointed out (ante, § 190), may be of three kinds, all of which come into use in the present subject: (a) From circumstances tending to excite, stimulate, or bring into play the emotion in question; (b) From outward conduct expressing and resulting from the emotion in question; (c) From the prior or the subsequent existence of the emotion in question, as indicating its existence at the time in issue. The first of this is a Prospectant indication (ante, § 43); the second is a Retrospectant indication; the third is of both sorts. Each sort of inference has its own dangers and difficulties.

a. Circumstances tending to excite an Emotion.

§ 389. General Principle; Knowledge of the Circumstances. It must be remembered that this mode of argumen' .s equally available in civil as well as in criminal cases. One is perhaps apt to think of "motive" as a matter involved in criminal cases only. But a recollection of the process involved — that of inferring the existence of some emotion, from which in turn the doing of an act is to be inferred — shows that this process may be equally a feature of proof in civil cases, though not as frequently as in criminal cases.

The general inquiry is, What circumstances tend probably to excite a given emotion? Obviously, the whole range of human affairs is here involved. It would be idle to attempt to catalogue the various facts of human life with reference to their potency in exciting a given emotion. Such an attempt would exhibit two defects. It would be pedantic, because it is impossible to suppose that the operation of human emotions can be reduced to fixed rules, and that a given fact can have an unvarying quantity of emotional potency. It would be useless, because the emotional effect of any fact must depend so often on the surrounding circumstances that no general formula could provide for the infinite combinations of circumstances. Courts have therefore always been agreed that in general no fixed negative rules can be made; that no circumstance can be said beforehand to be without the power of exciting a given emotion; and that, in general, any fact may be offered which by possibility can be conceived as tending with others towards the emotion in question:

1850, Parsons, J., in Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 627: "[The commission of the murder by some one having been established,] every ground from which a motive could arise may be proved against him [the defendant.] . . . With regard to the grounds from which a motive may be inferred, we may remark that the law has never limited them and never can limit them in number or kind."

1868, Sanderson, J., in Lyon v. Hancock, 35 Cal. 376: "Malice, like fraud, is generally to be inferred from facts and circumstances. Hence the plaintiff [in this case] is entitled to prove any facts or circumstances which tend, even in the slightest degree, to show malice on the part of the defendant. For the same reason, the defendant is entitled to prove any facts and circumstances which tend, in the slightest degree, to show a contrary motive. No fact or circumstance can therefore be properly excluded from the jury unless the Court is satisfied to a moral certainty that the jury can draw no rational presumption from it."

1854, Parker, J., in Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13, 31: "Considerable latitude is allowed on the question of motive. Just in proportion to the depravity of the mind would a motive be trifling and insignificant which might prompt the commission of a great crime. We can never say the motive was adequate to the offence; for human minds would differ in their ideas of adequacy according to their own estimate of the enormity of the crime; and a virtuous mind would find no motive sufficient to justify the felonious taking of human life."[1]

There is but one limitation that can be thought of as necessary and universal, namely, the circumstance said to have excited the emotion must be shown to have probably become known to the person; because otherwise it could not have affected his emotions:

1897, Dale, C. J., in Son v. Terr., 5 Okl. 526, 49 Pac. 923: "A motive cannot operate to influence until the facts which create the motive exist. The facts upon which a motive is based cannot operate upon the mind until they are known by the party against whom the motive is assigned. If one person should contemplate and undertake a great wrong against another, — such a wrong as would induce in the mind of the person against whom it was directed a motive to kill, — and yet such contemplated wrong was unknown to the party, it cannot be justly said that a motive to kill could exist, because the party wronged had no knowledge of the facts which would be necessary to create the motive."[2]

Nevertheless, Courts are often called upon to rule upon the admissibility of various circumstances. It is to their reproach that they heed the majority of these calls. There is in most of the rulings no reason for the slightest doubt of the propriety of the evidence. The extreme vagaries and the desperate pugnacity of many of those who take on themselves the defence of criminals have raised questions which ought to have been silently ignored by the Courts, — a treatment which would tend much to the discouragement of crime and the lightening of the profession's burden of precedents.[3] The criminality of the circumstances involved in proof of the motive has no doubt often been the ground of objection, the character-rule (ante, § 194) being invoked in exclusion. But it has already been seen (ante, § 216) that

[1] Accord: 1893, Moore v. U. S., 150 U. S. 57, 61, 14 Sup. 26 (approved in the following case); 1895, Goldsby v. U. S., 160 id. 70, 16 Sup. 216 (a watch-charm taken from the robbed person by a companion of the accused).

[2] 1871, Cheek v. State, 35 Ind. 492, 494 (the deceased's plan to help a third person to elope with the defendant's wife, admissible, if known to the defendant, to show hot blood); 1884, State v. Shelton, 64 Ia. 333, 338, 20 N. W. 459 (murder; intimacy between the defendant's paramour and the deceased; knowledge by the defendant required); 1899, Pence v. Com., — Ky. —, 51 S. W. 801; 1900, People v. Morgan, 124 Mich. 527, 83 N. W. 275 (deceased's right to a life-insurance policy; but here the ruling is erroneous on the facts, as Montgomery, C. J., diss., points out); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 176 (murder; an indictment for blackmailing procured by the deceased against the defendant, held inadmissible to show hostility, as the defendant had not known of it); 1898, People v. Fitzgerald, 156 id. 253, 50 N. E. 846; 1899, Barkman v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 105, 52 S. W. 73.

[3] As already commented on ante, §§ 8, 21.

the fact that the circumstance offered involves also another crime by the defendant charged is in itself no objection, if the circumstance is relevant for the present purpose.

A natural arrangement of the precedents would be according either to the various circumstances offerable or to the various emotions to be proved. Practically, however, it is not possible to attempt a consistent grouping on either principle; the precedents are therefore arranged in part on each principle.

§ 390. Motives for Murder. The circumstances which might excite a desire to kill are innumerable. It must be understood that the rulings of the Courts cover only those circumstances which counsel have cared to question, and that nowadays the fact that counsel care and dare to question a circumstance is not necessarily an indication that there is the slightest rationality in the question. The annals of trials illustrate many other circumstances judicially recognized as capable of becoming motives; and the absence of a ruling by a Supreme Court upon a particular circumstance casts no doubt upon its propriety. Among the instances most commonly offered for adjudication, the following may be noted:

Circumstances involving the sexual passion, in one aspect or another, and usually operating through the emotion of jealousy, may lead to a desire to kill:

1894, State v. Reed, 53 Kan. 767, 774, 37 Pac. 1[illegible] (disproving the language of counsel): "It has been universally conceded since David wi[illegible] Joab, 'Set ye Uriah in the forefront of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, [illegible] he may be smitten and die,' that the man who covets his neighbor's wife has a motive for desiring the death of his neighbor."

1863, Thompson, J., in Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 386 (murder of a paramo[illegible] husband): "I agree that a solitary instance of illicit intercourse, especially if at a con[illegible]derable distance in time from the period of the homicide, . . . if received at all, should only be so with great caution, and where a probability existed that it would throw light on the motive of the prisoner. Something must be necessarily left to the discretion of the judge in such a case. But a different case is presented when it is proposed to prove a continuous illegal intercourse down to the death of the slain. . . . He is a poor judge of human motives and impulses who cannot see, in such a relation as is proposed to be proved here between the deceased's wife and the prisoner, that it might lead to the perpetration of the crime charged, or who would deny that it would probably shed light on the motive. History is full of such examples.[1]

[1] Ala.: 1850, Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 625 (wife-murder; the fact admitted that in the preceding year he had attempted to carry on a liaison with an unmarried woman near by); 1899, Gafford v. State, 122 id. 54, 25 So. 10 (deceased's adulterous relations with the defendant's sister, admitted to show the deceased's probable aggression; Tyson and Haralson, JJ., diss.); 1903, Caddell v. State, — id. —, 34 So. 183 (wife-murder; defendant's relations with a paramour, admitted); Ark.: 1879, Edmonds v. State, 34 Ark. 720, 730 (murder of a paramour; violence of the defendant, a few days before, to their child in the deceased's presence, admitted to show his feelings towards the deceased); Cal.: 1895, People v. Gress, 107 Cal. 461, 40 Pac. 752 (the defendant's efforts to induce the deceased's wife to leave the deceased, excluded, because the killing was admitted and self-defence was the issue; this seems erroneous, because on the question whether the defendant was the aggressor, his prior motive to kill the deceased would be useful); 1900, People v. Brown, 130 id. 591, 62 Pac. 1072 (defendant's relations with the deceased's wife, admitted); Conn.: 1831, State v. Watkins, 9 Conn. 47, 52 (wife-murder; the relation of husband naturally suggests an inference of a desire to preserve, not destroy, the wife; to

The expediency of preventing the discovery of a former crime, or of evading an arrest or a prosecution for it, may lead to the desire to kill:

rebut this, the fact is admissible that the husband has been living in adulterous intercourse with another; Hosmer, C. J.: "Love extinguished by adultery gives way to hatred, and a desire to be free from the burden of a wife who is no longer the object of regard"); 1868, State v. Green, 35 id. 203 (wife-murder; the fact was admitted, to rebut the inference of affection, that the defendant was before married to another woman still living, and was therefore not the lawful husband of the deceased; following State v. Watkins); Ga.: 1897, Shaw v. State, 102 Ga. 660, 29 S. E. 477 (train-wrecking; the defendant's illicit overtures to another woman, admitted to show a motive for wrecking the train, on which his wife was); 1901, Robinson v. State, 114 id. 56, 39 S. E. 862 (raped condition of the deceased, admitted); Ill.: 1889, Farris v. State, 129 Ill. 521, 526, 21 N. E. 821 (subsequent rape of a wife, as indicating a motive for killing her husband half an hour before, not admitted; clearly wrong); 1894, Simons v. People, 150 id. 66, 75, 36 N. E. 1019 (murder of paramour; the relations between them, as shown by the defendant's letters, admitted); Ind.: 1877, Binns v. State, 57 Ind. 46, 52 (pendency of a suit for divorce admitted to show a motive in the husband for wife-murder; but the merits of the dispute, as shown in the decree of divorce, excluded); 1893, Pettit v. State, 135 id. 393, 415, 34 N. E. 1113 (wife-murder: the wife's affection, relevant to show his state of mind); 1897, Hinshaw v. State, 147 id. 334, 47 N. E. 158 (wife-murder; the defendant's improper relations with another woman, admitted); Ia.: 1858, State v. Hinkle, 6 Ia. 380, 384 (wife-poisoning; the defendant's illicit relations with another woman, before the wife's death, admitted as indicating that "he would be more likely to desire her death"); 1880, State v. Kline, 54 id. 183, 6 N. W. 184 (assault with intent to kill; the fact admitted that the defendant had seduced the assaulted woman and had solicited her to procure an abortion); Kan.: 1894, State v. Reed, 53 Kan. 767, 774, 37 Pac. 174 (quoted supra); Ky.: 1896, Jackson v. Com., 100 Ky. 239, 38 S. W. 422 (murder of a paramour; the presence of an advanced fœtus, admitted as indicating a motive); La.: 1898, State v. Reed, 50 La. An. 990, 24 So. 131 (the keeping of a paramour, as a source of quarrel with the deceased, admitted); 1904, State v. Brown, 111 La. —, 35 So. 818 (murder; deceased's admissions of adultery with defendant's wife, not admitted, on the facts, to show the deceased's motive for aggression, on a plea of self-defence); Mass.: 1869, Com. v. Madan, 102 Mass. 1, 4 (similar to Binns v. State, supra); Mich.: 1873, Templeton v. People, 27 Mich. 502 (attempt at wife-murder; improper relations between the defendant and another married woman, admitted); Minn.: 1881, State v. Lawlor, 28 Minn. 216, 219, 9 N. W. 698 (an altercation at a drinking-saloon in which the deceased threw beer upon a woman L., and the accused then shot the deceased; the fact that L. was the defendant's paramour, admitted to show a motive for resenting her treatment); Miss.: 1896, Webb v. State, 73 Miss. 456, 19 So. 238 (seduction of the deceased admitted to show a motive for murder); 1901, Ouldas v. State, 78 id. 622, 29 So. 525 (illicit relations with the deceased's wife, admitted); Mo.: 1897, State v. Duestrow, 137 Mo. 44, 38 S. W. 554 (wife-murder; the defendant's possession of a paramour, admitted); 1900, State v. Callaway, 154 id. 91, 55 S. W. 444 (similar); Nebr.: 1879, St. Louis v. State, 8 Nebr. 405, 411, 1 N. W. 371 (wife-murder; criminal intimacy with another woman, before and after the wife's death, admitted); 1896, Dixon v. State, 46 id. 298, 64 N. W. 962 (abortion; the defendant's recent intercourse with the woman admitted, as showing an intimacy rendering the deed more probable); Nev.: 1876, State v. Larkin, 11 Nev. 314, 328 (murder; the relations of the deceased to a certain woman, admitted to show motive); N. J.: 1900, State v. Abatto, 64 N. J. L. 658, 47 Atl. 10 (illicit relations with the deceased's wife, admitted); N. Y.: 1858, People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 71, 115, 128 (murder; the defendant's criminal connection with the deceased's wife, admitted, though she was the defendant's sister and could never marry him; "in case the deceased was effectually disposed of and silenced, their fears of exposure and detection would naturally be lessened"); 1880, Pierson v. People, 79 N. Y. 424, 435 (defendant's marriage to the widow of the murdered man, admitted, as showing the desire to possess her as a motive for the killing); 1893, People v. Harris, 136 id. 423, 437, 449, 33 N. E. 65 (wife-murder; defendant's admission of two former secret marriages, contracted to overcome the scruples of his victims, admitted as showing his motive to conceal the secret marriage with the deceased; adulterous intercourse of the defendant and a plan with his paramour to murder her future husband, admitted to show a motive); 1893, People v. Osmond, 138 id. 80, 86, 33 N. E. 739 (wife-murder; illicit relations of the defendant's wife and her paramour, unknown to defendant, not admitted); 1895, People v. Buchanan, 145 id. 1, 39 N. E. 846 (illicit relations of the defendant with the deceased, admitted); 1897, People v. Scott, 153 id. 40, 46 N. E. 1028 (wife-murder; relations of the defendant with a paramour, admitted); 1897, People v. Sutherland, 154 id. 345, 48 N. E. 518 (murder of a paramour; her letters, received by him, showing her view of their relations, receivable to indicate his motive; Bartlett and Martin, JJ., diss.; the ruling is of course correct, and the dissent is inexplicable); 1899, People v. Benham, 160 id. 402, 55 N. E. 11 (wife-murder; illicit relations with another woman, admitted); 1903, People v. Montgomery, — id. —, 68 N. E. 258 (wife-murder by one having a paramour; the paramour's character for unchastity, excluded; erroneous, because, under the principle of § 68, ante, her character

1896, Bartholomew, J., in State v. Kent, 5 N. D. 516, 67 N. W. 1052 (wife-murder; the alleged motive was a fear that the wife was about to discover the facts of his murder of his first wife 20 years before, his robbing of a bank, and the falsity of his present name and pretensions; proof of these past misdoings was received): "Obviously, this theory of the motive would be greatly strengthened by proof that he had committed the specified crimes in Ohio. While it is true that, in the cases where proof of a collateral crime has been admitted for the purpose of showing motive, the relation between the two crimes was usually such as to indicate that the latter was committed in order to prevent an investigation into and an exposure of the former crime, that it was feared would be followed by prosecution and punished, yet we can discover no reason in principle for the limitation of the rule to that class of cases strictly. Any strong incentive must furnish an equally cogent reason for the admission of such testimony. . . . Whoever reads the record in this case, and particularly Kent's letters, will be irresistibly impressed with the thought that Kent at all times assumed high moral grounds, with an exalted standard of personal purity. There is evidence tending to show that he claimed for himself a higher social position than he was willing to concede to his wife. Under these circumstances, it would be intolerably galling to him to have his wife learn that he was in fact a felon, that he had married her under an assumed name, and that during all these years he had led a life of duplicity and hypocrisy. . . . Nor can we sanction the views of the learned counsel that these collateral crimes were too remote in time to furnish any motive for the commission of the crime here charged. Motive may or may not be affected by the lapse of time. Ordinarily, a man who had committed a murder 20 years in the past would be just as much concerned to prevent exposure and punishment for that crime as though it were but one year in the past. And in this case, if the discovery by Mrs. Kent, at the time of her death, of these dark and criminal spots in her husband's life, would have been just as galling and humiliating to him as if discovered the first year of their married life, then his motive to prevent such discovery would be just as strong at the former time as at the latter."[2] made more probable her adultery with the defendant); Pa.: 1833, Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 386 (quoted supra): 1878, Turner v. Com., 86 id. 54, 70 (adultery by the defendant with the deceased, admitted); Vt.: 1896, State v. Chase, 68 Vt. 405, 35 Atl. 336 (the defendant's adultery with the deceased's wife, admitted); Wis.: 1879, Mack v. State, 48 Wis. 271, 276, 4 N. W. 449 (husband-murder; criminal intimacy with a discharged employee, admitted to show motive). Compare the citations post, § 398.

[2] 1830, R. v. Clewes, 4 C. & P. 222 (the fact was received of the murder of a third person by the deceased and of the defendant's ill-will to the third person, and his hiring the deceased to do the act, as furnishing a motive for destroying the deceased); 1881, Marler v. State, 68 Ala. 580, 584 (the deceased's importance as a witness against the defendant in a pending divorce suit, admitted to show a motive for murder); s. c. 67 id. 55 (admitting also his desire to get rid of his wife by divorce); 1839, Dunn v. State, 2 Ark. 229 (the previous killing of E., whose murderers W. had attempted to discover and bring to justice, admitted as indicating a motive for the killing of W.); 1899, People v. Valliere, 123 Cal. 576, 56 Pac. 433 (that defendant, at the time of the alleged assault upon a jailer, was in jail under conviction, admitted to show motive); 1895, State v. Seymore, 94 Ia. 699, 63 N. W. 661 (that defendant had reason to fear that the deceased, a partner in crime, would inform on him, admitted); 1898, Riggs v. Com., 103 Ky. 610, 45 S. W. 866 (that the deceased had made an accusation against the defendant, admitted; but not the truth of the accusation; this seems unsound); 1861, State v. Mulholland, 16 La. An. 376 (that the deceased was killed while arresting the accused for another killing, admitted); 1896, State v. Fontenot, 48 id. 305, 19 So. 111 (that a person suspected the accused of stealing his wood and had engaged the deceased to watch it, admitted); 1899, State v. Geddes, 22 Mont. 68, 55 Pac. 919 (the deceased's former complaint against defendant for assault, admitted; but not the facts of the assault); 1899, State v. Welch, 22 id. 92, 55 Pac. 927 (same principle applied to the same offence by another defendant); 1881, State v. Morris, 84 N. C. 756, 761 (murder; the fact that the defendant had been indicted for larceny, while the deceased, who was implicated, had been allowed to become State's evidence, admitted); 1897, Son v. Terr., 5 Okl. 526, 49 Pac. 923 (that the deceased was trying to implicate the defendant in certain robberies, admitted); 1899, Barkman v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 105, 52 S. W. 73 (murder; that deceased had testified against the defendant at an inquest on another death, admitted); 1900, State v. Morgan, 22 Utah 162, 61 Pac. 527 (murder of one of a sheriff's posse; defendant's prior commission of robbery, for which the posse were pursuing him, admissible to show motive to resist).

So, also, and sometimes hardly to be discriminated, the conduct of the deceased in opposing or injuring or trying to injure the defendant, may furnish a motive.[3]

The defendant's relations with a third person having a desire to kill the deceased may induce him to coöperate, through the sympathy either of friendship or of domestic ties, or by reason of pecuniary hire or of fraternal pledges.

1868, Sanderson, J., in Lyon v. Hancock, 35 Cal. 372, 376 (the defendant had caused the arrest of the female plaintiff for throwing a brickbat at him from a window; to prove that she was the assailant, he offered the fact of the hostility of the plaintiff's husband and of herself against the defendant): "The presence of Mrs. Lyon in the street, and the absence of all other persons by whom the act might have been committed, were strong probabilities that the brickbat was cast by her. Taking in connection, does the fact, if such was the fact, that her husband entertained towards the defendant feelings of hostility, and had in her presence made threats against him, constitute another probability against her? Would she have been less likely to have cast the brickbat had the relationship between her husband and the defendant been friendly? . . . Suppose, upon coming to the street, the defendant had found two women, instead of one, of equal respectability and character, one of whom must have cast the brickbat, one the wife of his friend, the other of his enemy; would not the friendship of the one and the enmity of the other constitute probabilities to be taken into account in determining which perpetrated the act? Other probabilities being equal, as we have supposed, no one would hesitate to say that the act had been committed by the wife of the defendant's enemy and not by the wife of his friend."[4]

Finally, a most common circumstance is the deceased's possession of money or property, as leading to the accused's desire to kill.[5]

[3] 1877, Commander v. State, 60 Ala. 1, 7 (anticipated litigation as a motive for murder, admitted; but details as to the merits of the dispute, excluded); 1892, Martin v. Com., 93 Ky. 193, 19 S. W. 580 (murder; that the defendant had been indicted for robbery at the deceased's instance, admitted, but not the details of the fact); 1895, Com. v. Gray, — Ky. —, 30 S. W. 1015 (the facts as to a legal dispute existing between the defendant and the deceased, admitted); 1875, Murphy v. People, 63 N. Y. 591 (litigation pending between the defendant and G., and the purpose of it, admitted to show a motive for the murder of H., also concerned in the suit and present with G. at the time of the killing); 1843, Stone v. State, 4 Humph. 27, 35 (murder; the fact admitted that the defendant had maltreated his wife, and that she was harbored by the deceased). It will be noticed that the existence of a previous prosecution or litigation may appear, not merely as involving conduct of the opponent tending to excite the defendant's hostility, but also as involving conduct of the defendant expressing his hostility (post, § 395). Compare the similar principle applied to evidence of a witness' bias (post, §§ 949, 950, 967).

[4] 1883, Bell v. State, 74 Ala. 421 (that others of the defendant's family disliked the injured person, excluded; unsound); 1891, Story v. State, 68 Miss. 609, 629, 10 So. 47 (the defendant never having seen the deceased until the day before, the instigation of a third person was shown as the motive); 1877, Hester v. Com., 85 Pa. 139, 155 (the fact was admitted that the defendant and others concerned were members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, otherwise there known as Molly Maguires, the order being a combination for the purpose of assisting each other in crimes, each member taking an oath to commit any offence ordered; the membership thus supplying a motive for crimes otherwise apparently motiveless; this great trial, published in pamphlet form, illustrates the wide ramifications of motive-evidence); 1879, McManus v. Com., 91 Id. 57, 66 (murder of a miner; the defendant's membership in the Molly Maguires and his subjection to the oath of the society, admitted to show a probable motive).

[5] 1884, R. v. Flannagan, 15 Cox Cr. 403, 411, Butt, J. (insurance-money); 1895, Byers v. State, 105 Ala. 31, 16 So. 716 (possession of money); 1893, Graves v. People, 18 Colo. 170, 32 Pac. 63 (the defendant being in charge of property of the deceased, the fact of his having duly accounted for it was held admissible in explanation); 1881, State v. Crowley, 33 La. An. 782, 785 (possession of money); 1854, Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13, 31 (wife-murder; disappointment with the father-in-law's will, admitted); 1868, Kennedy v. People, 39 id. 245, 254 (possession of money "suggests a motive for

The usual employment of these and other circumstances (as above) is by the prosecution, as evidencing the defendant's probable desire to injure and thus his probable doing of the injury. But where the defendant admits the act, he may wish to offer on his own behalf some of the foregoing kinds of circumstances, as tending to show hot blood, and thus to mitigate the degree of the crime. Here, however, the number and kind of circumstances that might naturally excite hot blood are much more limited.[6] Distinguish from this the effort to show, on a plea of insanity, that the defendant was under an hallucination as to the deceased's conduct (ante, § 228). There, obviously, the argument involves proof that the conduct had no existence, and that no reason existed for the belief in it; here it must be shown, either that it existed and came to the defendant's knowledge, or that he had been told that it existed or otherwise obtained reason to believe in it. The present argument is identical with the one (ante, § 231), admitting circumstances which, when known to a person, tend to bring on insanity.

§ 391. Motive for Other Deeds. The circumstances that may serve as motives for other deeds are innumerable; and the rulings, though naturally few, can hardly be classified except according to the crimes involved.[1] committing a robbery, and so a motive to take the life of the deceased if that would facilitate the theft or contribute to its concealment"); 1893, Moore v. U. S., 150 U. S. 57, 61, 14 Sup. 26 (murder; the deceased's possession of land claimed by the defendant's wife, admitted to show motive); 1901, State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 39 S. E. 676; 1903, Keffer v. State, — Wyo. —, 73 Pac. 556.

Distinguish the mooted question of the accused's lack of money as indicating a motive (post, § 392).

[6] 1881, Combs v. State, 75 Ind. 215, 217 (information to the defendant about rumors as to the deceased's misconduct, excluded, because their tenor was not shown); 1862, Maher v. People, 10 Mich. 212, 217, 224 (to determine whether the killing was done in hot blood, the fact was admitted that the defendant was told, a few moments before, of his wife's adultery with the deceased); 1872, Hurd v. People, 25 id. 405, 412 (immediately precedent assaults by the deceased, admitted, as bearing on the defendant's provocation or fear of harm); 1860, Sanchez v. People, 22 N. Y. 117, 152 (information likely to result in passion reducing the degree of homicide, admitted); 1896, People v. Barberi, 149 id. 256, 43 N. E. 635 (the preceding relations between the deceased and his mistress the defendant, admitted as showing a state of mind on her part consistent with a lesser degree of homicide).

[1] Arson (compare also the citations post, § 392); 1876, Hinds v. State, 55 Ala. 145, 148 (lawsuit as a motive for arson, admitted); 1878, McAdory v. State, 62 id. 154, 158 (hostility to a bailor of property, admitted to show a motive for arson of the bailee's house); 1888, Long v. State, 86 Ala. 36, 38, 43, 5 So. 443 (that the defendant's divorced wife lived in the burned house and associated with its owner, admitted); 1896, Simpson v. State, 111 id. 6, 20 So. 572 (that the owner of the premises had recently refused to rent them to the defendant, excluded; unsound); 1900, State v. Battle, 126 N. C. 1036, 35 S. C. 624 (arson; ill-will towards owner's agent, not of itself admissible to show motive; Clark, J., diss., in a weighty opinion); 1881, State v. Hannett, 54 Vt. 83 (to show the alleged motive, hostility to the defendant's former wife, who had an interest in the building, the fact was rejected of the wife's petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty, and of other stages of the dispute; the fact of hostile feeling was held admissible, but not facts "calculated to inflame the minds of the jury against the respondent").

Suicide (compare also the citations ante, § 144): 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1187 (murder of a woman; to disprove the theory of suicide, the Court allowed the deceased's reputation to be considered, as indicating that she had no shameful reason for destroying herself); 1876, Continental Ins. Co. v. Delpeuch, 82 Pa. 234 (belief in spiritualism, not admitted to show the likelihood of suicide).

Sundry Crimes and Wrongs: 1895, McTeers v. Perkins, 106 Ala. 411, 17 So. 547 (near relationship, as bearing on the good faith of a conveyance, admitted); 1834, Austin v. Austin, 10 Conn. 221, 224 (divorce for adultery; defence, fraudulent connivance with the co-respondent; the husband's harsh feelings towards his wife, not admitted as tending to show the fact of connivance); 1851, Carter v. State, 2 Ind. 618 (on a charge of administering drugs with intent to produce abortion, the fact of the administration of ergot having been introduced, it was held admissible to show that the popular opinion was that ergot would produce abortion, as evidence of the probable purpose of its use); 1886, State v. Schaffer, 70 Ia. 372, 30 N. W. 639 (larceny; the search for and discovery of other stolen goods with the goods in question, admitted as showing the motive for making the search; the sheriff's possession of another warrant against the defendant, admitted as showing a motive for a thorough search for the defendant, the sheriff having testified that the defendant had absconded); 1895, Kennedy v. Hensley, 94 id. 598, 63 N. W. 341 (character of the wife, as indicating the husband's reason for cessation of the affection supposed to have been alienated); 1874, Hays v. State, 40 Md. 633, 650 (abortion; the reputation of the house where the parties went, as one of ill-fame, admissible as indicating the likelihood of such a place being chosen for such an act); 1879, Robinson v. State, 53 id. 151 (burglary of M.'s house; to show the defendant's real motive for presence there, the fact was admitted that M.'s wife was a lewd woman with whom he had formerly had intercourse); 1899, Bengiesdorf v. Hanaway, 90 id. 217, 44 Atl. 1011 (whether a certain statement had been made by plaintiff; that the facts were contrary to the alleged statement, not admissible as indicating that the statement was not made); 1854, York v. Pease, 2 Gray 282 (a quarrel between the defendant and the next friend of the plaintiff, in an action by an infant for slander, admitted); 1871, Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 1, 4, 10 (rape; defendant's statements to the complainant, admitted to show her fear); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 113, 137 (murder; the defendant's theft of butter, admitted to show the officer's reason for arresting).

§ 392. Pecuniary Circumstances as creating a Motive; Poverty, to show a Crime, or negative a Loan; Market Value, to show a Sale-Price. In several ways the pecuniary circumstances, of one or another person or thing, may tend to show the excitement of a motive in some person. It will be convenient to distinguish the situations according as the evidence deals with (1) the pecuniary condition of A as exciting a motive in B; (2) the pecuniary condition of A as exciting a motive in himself; (3) the pecuniary value of a thing as exciting a motive to contract with a person; (4) pecuniary conditions in sundry aspects.

(1) (a) The possession of money by A may tend to show that B desired to rob or to kill him (ante, § 390). (b) The lack of money by A may tend to show that B would be unwilling to trust his promises, and therefore probably did not trust him; in particular, that B would be unwilling to lend A money,[1] or to sell goods to A, or to sell to him as principal,[2] or to sell to him absolutely,[3] or to sell to him in good faith.[4]

(2) (a) The lack of money by A might be relevant enough to show the

[1] 1860, Marcy v. Barnes, 16 Gray 161, 162 (whether the defendant's name was on a note before it came into the plaintiff's hands or was fraudulently put there afterwards; the fact of inquiries made by the plaintiff, before taking the note, as to the standing of the defendant and the other maker, and of his being informed that the defendant was responsible financially but the other maker worthless, admitted, as showing the improbability of the plaintiff's having taken the note without the defendant's name); 1896, Cochrane v. W. D. Co., 64 Minn. 369, 67 N. W. 206 (insolvency of the alleged borrower, admitted).

[2] 1896, Plumb v. Curtis, 66 Conn. 154, 33 Atl. 938 (here the person in question had already bought as agent in similar transactions, and the person's lack of assets was admitted as tending to show that a change in the course of dealings had not occurred); 1858, Lee v. Wheeler, 11 Gray 236, 239 (poverty and lack of credit of W., admitted to show that the defendant gave credit to the defendant, not to W.). Contra: 1821, Wheeler v. Packer, 4 Conn. 102, 106 (money paid on the credit of the defendants; to show that the money was paid, not on their credit but on the credit of the plaintiff's son, the defendants offered to show that the plaintiff's son had sufficient funds to be answerable, while the defendants were "entirely poor and unable to pay any part of it"; excluded, as "too vague" and "leading to interminable inquiries"; ruling unsound).

[3] 1887, Buswell T. Co. v. Case, 144 Mass. 350, 11 N. E. 549 (lack of credit of M., admitted to show that of two orders by him the plaintiff accepted that of a conditional and not an absolute sale).

[4] 1862, Cook v. Mason, 5 All. 212 (writ of entry for land conveyed to the defendant in fraud of creditors; the defendant's bad pecuniary credit at the time of the transfer, admitted to show that it would not "have enabled him to get credit . . . if the sale had been in good faith"); 1875, Sweetser v. Bates, 117 Mass. 466, 468 (same; admitted to show that the grantor would not have conveyed "in good faith in sole reliance upon her [the grantee's] future ability to pay").

probability of A's desiring to commit a crime in order to obtain money. But the practical result of such a doctrine would be to put a poor person under so much suspicion and at such a relative disadvantage that for reasons of fairness this argument has seldom been countenanced as evidence of the graver crimes, particularly of violence:

1863, Bigelow, C. J., in Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 548, 559, 566 (false pretences by representing that the defendant had an order for goods from an undisclosed principal; the fact of the defendant's insolvency at the time, as known to him, was offered): "It is doubtless true that in a large class of cases the poverty or pecuniary embarassments of a party accused of crime cannot be shown as substantive evidence of his guilt. The reason for the exclusion of such evidence is that in those cases there is no certain or known connection between the facts offered to be proved and the conclusion which is sought to be established by it. It does not follow, because a man is destitute, that he will steal, or that when embarrassed with debt and incapable of meeting his engagements he will commit forgery. . . . Evidence of the pecuniary condition of the accused in such a case [as this] is not offered to show that he was under a peculiar temptation to commit the offence, or was more likely to cheat or defraud because he was in embarrassed circumstances, but for the purpose of showing the natural and necessary consequences of his act which the law presumes he intended. . . . If at the time of the transaction he was deeply insolvent, and was cognizant of his condition, the necessary consequence of his act was to deprive the vendor of his property without recompense or the chance of payment, and leads to the just and almost unavoidable inference that it was done with an intent to defraud."[5]

Nevertheless in cases of merely pecuniary crime (such as larceny or embezzlement), and in civil cases where the issue is whether the defendant borrowed money or not, the fact that he was in need of it at the time is decidedly relevant to show a probable desire to obtain it and therefore a probable borrowing or purloining; and there is here not the same objection from the standpoint of possible unfair prejudice:

1849, Bell, J., in Stevenson v. Stewart, 11 Pa. 309 (admitting, in rebuttal of a defence of forgery to a note, the fact that about the time of the alleged date the defendant was trying to borrow money): "Among the most common topics of inquiry is the pecuniary capacity of the supposed lender, and the necessitous condition of the alleged borrower; and these inquiries are legitimate. It is surely competent for the defendant to show . . . that the defendant was himself possessed of money and therefore not driven to the necessity of using his credit. If so, why should not the plaintiff be at liberty to prove that about the critical time the defendant was seeking to borrow? Standing unsupported, neither line of evidence would be sufficient to rebut the adverse allegation; but yet all must feel that in a doubtful case the facts I have supposed to be made out by the defendant would go far in his favor."[6]

[5] Accord: 1896, Reynolds v. State, 147 Ind. 3, 46 N. E. 31 (robbery); 1863, Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 548, 559, 566 (in general; quoted supra). Contra: 1845, Tawell's Trial, Eng., Woodall's Celebrated Trials, I, 188 (admitted; but the editor cites a contrary ruling at another trial shortly before). But when a defendant, under the principle of par. (b), infra, seeks to show that his possession of money deprived him of any motive for crime, the fact may of course be disproved by the prosecution; 1881, Fulmer v. Com., 97 Pa. 503 (larceny; the fact of lack of money, admitted for the prosecution to rebut the defendant's evidence that he had plenty of money).

[6] Accord: 1898, Bridges v. State, 103 Ga. 21, 29 S. E. 359 ("financial embarrassment" as tending to show a motive for embezzlement, admitted); 1877, Harvey v. Osborn, 55 Ind. 535, 545 (which of two persons, joint makers of a note, was the surety for the other; the debt of one to the other admitted as showing him to be

(b) On the other hand, the fact that a person was in possession of money tends to negative a desire to obtain it by crime or by borrowing, and is always admissible, the foregoing objection not being here applicable.[7]

Two inferences, involving other principles, must be here distinguished: (a) The inference that A probably did not lend money to B because A had no money to lend; this is inferring that A did not do an act because he had not the Means or Capacity to do it (ante, § 89); (b) the inference that A probably took money because after the time alleged he had large sums while before it he had little or none; this is inferring an act from the Traces of it (ante, § 154).

(3) The market value of an article bought may be received to show the probable price agreed upon; because the actual value would move the buyer to wish to obtain it for not more than that amount, and hence a serious difference between the actual value and the price alleged by the vendor would throw discredit on the latter's claim. In the same way, where the price is not in issue, but the specific article is, a serious difference between the value of the article in question and the concededly agreed price tends to support an allegation that the article in question is not the one agreed upon:

1841, Putnam, J., in Bradbury v. Dwight, 3 Metc. 31, 33: "The presumption which arises from the uniform conduct of men under a given state of facts enters essentially into almost every cause to be tried. Very few cases are established by positive proof. If the fact, alleged by one party and denied by the other, be unusual, unaccountable, and not warranted by the circumstances which attended the transaction, it will not be likely to obtain credit with the jury. If (to come home to the question) the wood, which was standing on the defendant's lot, was worth far more than $1.25 a cord — and we must now take the fact to be so —, is it reasonable to suppose and presume that he would have sold it at that reduced price? . . . The [below] rejected evidence would indeed only raise a presumption,[8] which might be rebutted by some particular circumstances that might have operated upon the defendant to sell for less than the known value. But this would not affect the admissibility of the evidence."

the principal); 1882, Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352, semble (financial embarrassment of the alleged maker of a note, admissible to show the likelihood of borrowing, the genuineness being disputed; on the other hand, to explain away financial embarrassment as a circumstance indicating a probable borrowing from the plaintiff, the fact of the defendant's ability to borrow at two banks was not received; the latter ruling seems erroneous); 1853, Covanhovan v. Hart, 21 Pa. 495, 502 (deed alleged to be in fraud of creditors; to show that the defendant had really made the advance for which the deed was said to be given in payment, the fact was admitted of the grantor's need of money at the time); 1872, Com. v. Yerkes, Phila. Com. Pleas, 29 Leg. Intell. 60, 12 Cox Cr. 208, 217, 225 (larceny and false pretences, by obtaining a check without consideration; the fact was admitted "that at the time he was sorely pressed for money and therefore had the strongest motive to commit the larceny"; Finletter, J., diss.); 1892, Befay v. Wheeler, 84 Wis. 135, 140, 53 N. W. 1121 (larceny of cash in bank by a bookkeeper; his default to the bank and falsified accounts just prior, admitted to show motive).

[7] 1865, R. v. Grant, 4 F. & F. 322 (indictment for burning the defendant's own house in order to obtain the insurance; the fact admitted, for the defence, of the defendant's easy circumstances, prompt payment of bills, etc.; Pollock, C. B.: "Surely it was material to show that her circumstances were such as not to raise any temptation to the act"); 1861, Stauffer v. Young, 39 Pa. 455, 461, 462 (little need of money, admitted to negative the borrowing of a large amount); 1898, Knopke v. Ins. Co., 99 Wis. 289, 74 N. W. 795 (evidence of a sum lost in a fire should be of a sum large enough to deter from arson to gain the insurance). Contra: 1897, Reynolds v. State, 147 Ind. 3, 46 N. E. 31 (robbery; the defendant's possession of money, excluded, practically overruling Cavender v. State, 126 id. 50, 25 N. E. 875).

[8] I. e. a mere inference.

It is usually said that this evidence is receivable where the price or the identity of the article is disputed, or where the other evidence is conflicting, or where there is no direct evidence. On the whole, however, this limitation seems unnecessary; for either it is superfluous, since the question never can arise unless there is a dispute, or else it is stating the result of other principles (post, § 2430) so far as it means that a written contract could not be varied by such parol evidence.[9]

[9] Ala.: 1901, Timothy v. State, 130 Ala. 68, 30 So. 339 (value of land, admitted to show the probable price agreed on); Ia.: 1877, Johnson v. Hardee, 45 Ia. 677, 679 (price of land sold; value admissible "where there is a conflict in the direct evidence"; it "should be admitted with great caution, and limited to its strictly legitimate province; the danger is that it will be used to affect the sympathy of the Court or jury to secure the release of an improvident party from the trade actually made"); Mass.: 1841, Bradbury v. Dwight, 3 Metc. 31 (the terms of a lost written contract for the sale of timber being in dispute, the value per cord was received to show the probable terms); 1862, Renneli v. Kimball, 5 All. 356, 365 (whether the vendor of a share in a ship had agreed to pay for repairs then making; the value of the vessel at the time, the condition of the repairs, etc., admitted "to show that the plaintiff [vendee] would not have been likely to give so high a price as he did unless the vessel were to be put in good repair without expense to him"); 1865, Parker v. Coburn, 10 id. 82, 84 (value of land sold; general principle affirmed); 1871, Upton v. Winchester, 106 Mass. 330 (same; value of oak plank sold); 1871, Brewer v. R. Co., 107 id. 277, 278 (dispute as to the kind and quality of wood bargained for; value of the kind of wood delivered, admitted to show, as compared with the price agreed on, that such a price would not have been promised for such wood); 1879, Norris v. Spofford, 127 id. 85 (same; dispute as to which of two horses was sold); 1900, Copeland v. R. Co., 177 id. 186, 58 N. E. 639 (principle applied); Mich.: 1875, Campau v. Moran, 31 Mich. 281 (contract to put in piling for $200; upon an issue as to the kind of work called for, evidence of the greater cost of the kind claimed by the defendant was held relevant for that purpose, but not to show that the work was properly done according to contract); 1892, Banghart v. Hyde, 94 id. 49, 51, 53 N. W. 915 (sale of chattels; excess of value over the alleged price, admitted); 1897, Raymond v. Day, 111 id. 443, 69 N. W. 832 (insurance commissions; other pecuniary arrangements between the parties, admitted to show the probable price); 1897, Shakespeare v. Banghman, 113 id. 551, 71 N. W. 875 (legal services; value not admitted on the facts to show the probable price; the rule is not confined to uncorroborated parties' testimony; prior rulings in this State examined); 1900, Stevens v. Beardsley, 122 id. 671, 81 N. W. 921 (rental agreement in dispute; the depreciation of rent of other business houses, admitted, but not the rent paid by another tenant of the same owner for another house); 1901, Grabowsky v. Banmgart, 128 id. 267, 87 N. W. 391 (contract to buy stock; value admitted as evidence of the price agreed on); Minn.: 1862, Knmler v. Ferguson, 7 Minn. 442, 445 (dispute as to the consideration for a conveyance; the value of the land at the time, received); 1875, Schwerin v. De Graff, 21 id. 354 (same principle; value of services in grading); 1875, Miller v. Lamb, 22 id. 43 (same principle; consideration of a conveyance); 1893, Saunders v. Gallagher, 53 id. 422, 55 N. W. 600 (same principle; services in sawing logs); 1894, Zeich v. Hirt, 59 id. 360, 362, 61 N. W. 20 (same principle; condition and value of a horse bought, to show the terms of payment); Nebr.: 1896, Blomgren v. Anderson, 43 Nebr. 240, 67 N. W. 186 (contract of hiring, the compensation alleged by the defendant to be board and lodging only; the fact admitted of the plaintiff's being offered $1.25 a day, as showing that he would not be likely to make such a contract as the former); N. H.: 1860, Swain v. Cheney, 41 N. H. 232, 234 (drawing lumber; "the common price for conveying that precise kind of lumber over the same road and at the same time," admitted); 1869, Moore v. Davis, 49 id. 45, 56 (preceding case approved); N. Y.: 1889, Weidner v. Phillips, 114 N. Y. 458, 461, 21 N. E. 1011 ("When the fact as to the [terms of the] agreement was in dispute, the real value was an element for the jury to consider in determining which version of the story was the correct one"; here, the sale of marble); 1889, Rubino v. Scott, 118 id. 662, 22 N. E. 1103 (same; value of services as broker); N. C.: 1897, Short v. Yelverton, 121 N. C. 95, 28 S. E. 138 (action for goods sold; denial of any purchase; defendant introduced the alleged real purchaser as witness who stated the alleged price; plaintiff offered to prove that he paid as much as that when buying the goods, as showing improbability of selling at the same price; excluded, Clark, J., diss.; the dissent being clearly correct); Oh.: 1871, Allison v. Horning, 22 Oh. St. 138, 142 (excess of value of work over the alleged price, admitted to show the probable price agreed on); Pa.: 1871, Rauch v. Scholl, 68 Pa. 234 ("it is not an unfair presumption that he was to receive no more than the market value of the stone under his contract"); U. S.: 1898, Jefferson v. Burhans, 29 C. C. A. 481, 85 Fed. 952 (agreement for commissions for services; question left undecided); Vt.: 1861, Kidder v. Smith, 34 Vt. 294 (market value of a mare, admitted to show the probable price); Wash.: 1901, Wheeler v. Buck, 23 Wash. 679, 63 Pac. 566 (whether a specific rate of commission for sales was agreed for;

(4) In sundry other ways, not calling for special doubt or discrimination, pecuniary circumstances may properly be admitted as evidencing a motive for some one's action.[10]

§ 393. Legal Duty or Liability as creating a Motive. The existence of a legal duty or liability is often of more or less probative value to show a fulfilment of it, because of the motive for action (or non-action) which it may inspire. But the variety of duties and of their surrounding circumstances is such that no specific rules can be laid down.[1] So far as any definite rule exists for a limited class of cases, it takes the shape of the presumption that official duties and legal proceedings were duly fulfilled (post, § 2534); but even this presumption is of uncertain and intermittent force.

b. CONDUCT EXHIBITING AN EMOTION.

§ 394. General Principle. Every one of the human qualities or conditions with which the foregoing chapters have been concerned may be evidenced by conduct exhibiting it (ante, § 190). The interpretation of that conduct proceeds always from experience as to the inferences to be drawn from particular kinds of conduct. Questions of evidence rarely arise over such inferences, so far as the evidence of Emotions is concerned, probably because these interpretations are fairly plain and indubitable. Courts have done little more than enunciate the general relevancy of Conduct to show Emotion:

1850, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 316: "The ordinary feelings, passions, and propensities under which parties act, are facts known by observation and experience; and they are so uniform in their operation that a conclusion may be safely rate of commissions allowed by other merchants for similar goods to the same party, admitted); 1901, Dimmick v. Collins, 24 Id. 78, 63 Pac. 1101 (work on harvesting a crop; the value and condition of the crop, admitted to show the probable price; "the law assumes that men make fair bargains"; good opinion by Mount, J.); 1901, Coey v. Darknell, 25 id. 518, 65 Pac. 760 (following Dimmick v. Collins); Wis.: 1883, Kvammen v. Mill Co., 58 Wis. 399, 17 N. W. 222 (lath-sawing; evidence of the usual price of services of a different kind, excluded; the general question not decided); 1888, Valley L. Co. v. Smith, 71 id. 304, 305, 37 N. W. 412 (value admitted to show contract-price); 1888, Bell v. Radford, 72 id. 402, 39 N. W. 482 (price agreed for horses; value of the horses, received, there being a dispute as to the price); 1893, Mygatt v. Tarbell, 85 id. 457, 467, 55 N. W. 1031 (same principle; value of shares of stock sold).

For the admissibility of specific sales of other property, as evidence of the value of the property in question, see post, § 463.

[10] 1900, Tarbell v. Forbes, 177 Mass. 238, 58 N. E. 873 (whether a bequest to stepchildren was in a will as executed; the testatrix' inheritance of an estate from her father, not admitted to show the probability of her leaving it to brothers rather than stepchildren; chiefly because of multiplicity and confusion of issues); 1883, Bathrick v. Detroit Post, 50 Mich. 629, 633, 16 N. W. 172 (poverty of the woman as bearing on the probability of seduction, admitted); 1885, Gaston v. Merriam, 33 Minn. 271, 277, 22 N. W. 614 (whether a deed's record was correct; the fact that the grantor did not own the property described but did own other property noted in the "reception-book," admissible).

[1] 1898, Miller v. Dill, 149 Ind. 326, 49 N. E. 272 (general rumor of C.'s pregnancy, admitted, to show probability of defendant's execution of a note said to have been given in compromise of an action for slander by C. against defendant for declaring her pregnant); 1849, Boston v. Weymouth, 4 Cush. 538, 541 (settlement of a pauper; the mere assessment of a tax upon him held no evidence that he paid the tax); 1894, Tremblay v. Harnden, 162 Mass. 383, 38 N. E. 972 (injury at a machine; that a defendant was insured against accidents, not admissible to show that he would be less careful; compare § 949, post); 1899, German-American Bank v. Stickle, 59 Nebr. 321, 80 N. W. 910 (genuineness of accommodation-note-signature disputed; the fact that the defendant had made a previous note, of which this was said to be a renewal, admitted as tending to show execution); 1896, Welch v. Ricker, 69 Vt. 239, 39 Atl. 200 (evidence that the defendant was jointly interested with I. in a farm, received to show the probability of an agreement to become jointly liable with I. for goods furnished the farm).

drawn that, if a party acts in a particular manner, he does so under the influence of a particular motive."

1854, Scott, J., in Austin v. State, 14 Ark. 560: "The jury were sitting in judgment upon an act which in point of law was to be essentially characterized by the motive of the heart which prompted it. These in the order of Providence are hidden and beyond the reach of human law, until developed by acts of commission or of omission which present them to its judgment in determining the quality of the act brought in question. Every act, then, of either class, which in the range of probability could cast a ray of light upon the motive which produced the homicide in question, was legitimately within the range of the investigation, although occurring at an antecedent time or at another place."

Occasionally, specific conduct is passed upon.[1] But the questions that arise in connection with conduct involve usually the principles of the ensuing topics; i. e. prior or subsequent conduct is offered as showing the emotion at that prior or subsequent time, and the then emotion is thus offered as showing emotion at the time in issue; the doubt or objection being not as to the first of the two inferences, but as to the second.

c. Prior and Subsequent Emotion.

§ 395. General Principle. Where an Emotion is offered as evidencing an Act (ante, § 117), it is offered as existing at the time of the act; e. g. that A killed B, is inferred as probable from A's desire at that time to kill B. Where A's emotion is in issue, as in the case of malice in defamation, it is also predicated as existing at a specific time; and this will usually be the case wherever Emotion enters, either evidentially or as in issue. Thus, the existence of the same Emotion at a prior or a subsequent time can enter only as evidential of its existence at the time in issue; and then is presented the question how far it is thus evidentially available. The nature of the inference, it will be seen, is distinct from those of the two preceding sorts (i. e. from extraneous circumstances tending to the excitement of the emotion, and from conduct exhibiting the inward inspiration for the conduct). Here the argument is from an emotional condition once existing to its subsequent or prior prolongation. The peculiar opportunity for error here is that the prior existing emotion may have been brought to an end before the time in issue, and that the subsequent existing emotion may have been first produced since the time in issue.

[1] 1846, R. v. Gandfield, 2 Cox Cr. 43 (to explain his conduct in not disclosing a burglary, the witness, claiming that he had been afraid, was allowed to state his directions to his wife not to tell; Erle, J.: "conversations that explain a man's conduct are admissible"); 1890, Wims v. State, 90 Ala. 623, 8 So. 566 (calling a vile name, admitted); 1858, Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192, 196 (the feelings between testatrix and her sisters being material, a declaration of a sister as to the testatrix, "She is too ugly to die yet," was admitted to show the sister's feelings); 1895, State v. Seymore, 94 Ia. 699, 63 N. W. 661 (that deceased and defendant were not on speaking terms, admitted); 1895, State v. Hutchison, 95 id. 566, 64 N. W. 612 (that defendant, charged with a rape assault, made faces at the child during the trial, admitted); 1886, State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 10, 12 Pac. 318 (a state of despondency or cheerfulness as bearing on the probability of suicide, admitted); 1885, State v. Goodwin, 37 La. An. 713 (maliciously sending a threatening letter; conduct showing a bona fide desire to give the receiver an opportunity to clear himself of the charge threatened to be made, admitted); 1869, Blake v. Damon, 103 Mass. 209 (the defendant's state of mind towards the plaintiff being material, the fact of insulting remarks to the plaintiff was admitted to show the defendant's state of mind); 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 146, 149, 165 (a melancholy disposition more than six years before, admitted to show suicide).

For a testator's conduct and expressions, as evidencing his state of affections and of susceptibility to influence, see post, § 1738.

For a witness' conduct and expressions, as evidencing his bias, see post, §§ 950–952.

Practically this inference is of course usually associated with two others in a way which may obscure the real evidential question. For example, to show that A struck his wife, the fact is offered that he beat her five years before; here three steps of inference are involved: (1) the beating five years before evidences a then violent emotion towards her; (2) the violent emotion five years ago evidences a continuance of the emotion to the time in issue; (3) the violent emotion at the time in issue evidences the realization of the emotion in the act of striking as charged. Now as to the first and the third of these inferences (i. e. the inferences dealt with ante, § 394, and ante, § 117) there is and can be no question; it is as to the second that a question may arise; and it is with that question that we are here concerned. The superficial circumstance that the inference is presented along with others should not prevent us from perceiving its nature however obscured.

§ 396. Hostility in general; Feeling at other Times. Where an emotion of hostility at a specific time is to be shown, the existence in the same person of the same emotion at another time is in general plainly admissible.[1] What that limit of time should be must depend largely on the circumstances of each case, and ought always to be left to the discretion of the trial Court:

1871, Lochrane, C. J., in Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 88, 133: "No general rule can be distinctly traced over this disputed ground of judicial controversy. All we may assert, within the principle recognized, is that there must be some link of association, something which draws together the preceding and subsequent acts, something which presents cause and effect in the transaction. . . . As if A, jealous of his wife, finds B with her, and forbids him speaking to her, and afterwards meets B and her together, though weeks and even months have elapsed, the previous difficulty, though slight, would be proper evidence to go to the jury in case of homicide. But if A afterwards met B, and upon a new cause of quarrel, distinctly separate from the first, the difficulty sprang up, the acts relative to the first ought to be excluded as not throwing light upon the homicide, and the fact of unfriendly feelings existing is all which would be permitted."

Subsequent hostility is equally receivable;[2] that it arose only subsequently is matter for explanation by the opponent. The details of the conduct evidencing the hostility of a defendant should not ordinarily be gone into; they are irrelevant, even if they show that the hostility was justifiable, and they may, if offered against a defendant, cause unfair prejudice.[3] A friendly feeling at another time is equally receivable.[4] No further generalization of rules seems feasible.[5] Distinguish here certain other uses of similar evidence; in

[1] See the cases cited at the end of this section.

[2] Ala., Conn., Or.

[3] Ala., Mass.; but Ky. and La. are contra. Compare the citations post, §§ 951, 952 (details of a quarrel, in impeaching a witness).

[4] Ill., Ia.

[5] The cases are as follows: Ala.: 1860, McManus v. State, 36 Ala. 285, 292 (expressions of hostility against the deceased, half an hour after the fatal blow, admitted to negative sudden passion); 1877, Faire v. State, 58 id. 74, 79 (murder; previous malice admissible); 1877, Commander v. State, 60 id. 1, 7 (murder; previous litigation between the parties, admitted); 1878, Hudson v. State, 61 id.

particular, (1) former threats of a defendant as involving a Design to injure (ante, § 105); (2) former threats of a deceased as involving a Design to injure (ante, § 110) or as creating a Belief in probable aggression (ante, § 247); and (3) previous prosecution or litigation as creating a Motive for injury (ante, § 390).

§ 397. Same: Hostility to Wife or Paramour. The precedents dealing with

333, 337 (arson of a mill; previous quarrels and lawsuits about it, admitted to show motive); 1879, Gray v. State, 63 id. 66, 73 ("previous threats, previous altercations, or prior combats," between the parties, admitted to show ill-will at the time of the killing; but the fact only, not the details of the dispute); 1883, McAnally v. State, 74 id. 17 ("the fact of such difficulty, and its gravity on the contrary," admissible; its merits or the particulars, not; "the tendency would be to divert the minds of the jury . . . to the merits of the former quarrel"); 1884, Tesney v. State, 77 id. 33, 38 (the defendant's prior unwillingness to go to the place where the deceased was later met and killed, admitted); 1904, Spraggins v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 1000 (prior declarations of the defendant, that he would not fight fair, admitted); Ark.: 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 568, 581 (prior expressions of malice against the deceased, admitted); 1889, Billings v. State, 52 id. 303, 306, 310, 12 S. W. 574 (a casual altercation with the deceased some years before, excluded as not connected); Conn.: 1862, State v. Alford, 31 Conn. 40, 43 (assault and battery; defence, that the collision was accidental; to disprove this, the fact was admitted that the defendant and her family, though living in the same apartment-house, did not afterwards visit or inquire after the assaulted person, who was confined to her bed); 1878, State v. Riggs, 39 id. 498, 501 (a hostile feeling on the part of the defendant, not admitted as showing that he was "more likely to be the author of the libel in question"); Fla.: 1898, Rawlina v. State, 40 Fla. 155, 24 So. 65 (threats "within a period not too remote," admissible); 1903, Sylvester v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 142 (merits of a quarrel between deceased and defendant, excluded); Ga.: 1871, Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 88, 123, 133 (murder; the fact that the defendant once refused to speak to the deceased a few months before, excluded); 1897, Daniel v. State, 103 id. 202, 29 S. E. 767 (deceased's hostility at a remote time, not shown continuous, excluded); 1900, Horton v. State, 110 id. 739, 35 S. E. 659 (isolated quarrel about six years before, excluded); Ill.: 1880, Tracy v. People, 97 Ill. 104 (to show that a person's entry into premises was not to avenge an insult, the fact admitted of his friendly presence there shortly before); Ia.: 1878, State v. Westfall, 49 Ia. 328 (murder; the issue being who was the aggressor, the fact that one party had often tried to avoid quarrelling was admitted); 1880, State v. Moelchen, 53 id. 310, 314, 5 N. W. 186 (homicide; a quarrel received); Ku.: 1895, Com. v. Gray, — Ky. —, 30 S. W. 1015 (murder; the deceased and the defendant had compromised a quarrel, and then the quarrel had broken out again; the details of the compromise received to see "which party was in the right and which in the wrong" in the quarrel; unsound); 1896, Tuttle v. Com., — id. —, 33 S. W. 823 (expressions of ill-will to the deceased seven months before; admitted); La.: 1854, State v. D'Angelo, 9 La. An. 46 (murder; former quarrels received); 1856, State v. Jackson, 12 id. 679 (same); 1880, State v. Cooper, 32 id. 1084 (same; particulars may be shown to explain away malice); 1882, State v. McNeely, 34 id. 1022 (same; but here previous threats and the dangerous character of the deceased were admitted); 1884, State v. Birdwell, 36 id. 859, 861 (same); Mass.: 1852, Com. v. Vaughan, 9 Cush. 594 (to show a motive for burning a barn, the fact was received that the same person had before begun a criminal prosecution against the owner; but no counter-explanation of probable cause was allowed, since the fact of ill-will, and not its propriety, was alone involved); 1892, Com. v. Holmes, 157 Mass. 240, 32 N. E. 6 (hatred towards a murdered person; time of the former hatred to be in the discretion of the trial Court); 1901, Com. v. Storti, 177 id. 339, 58 N. E. 1021 (quarrel two years before in Italy, admitted on the facts); Mich.: 1871, Josselyn v. McAllister, 22 Mich. 300, 304 (malicious prosecution; anger of the defendant when arrested in the present suit, not admitted to show malice in the former suit by him); 1871, Druce v. Wheeler, ib. 439, 444 (trespass; other conduct showing malice, admissible as affecting damages); 1896, Tyler v. Nelson, 109 id. 37, 66 N. W. 671 (ill-feeling by defendant, as showing whether his collision with plaintiff was negligent or not; admitted); Mo.: 1899, State v. Hudspeth, 150 Mo. 12, 51 S. W. 483 (murder; p[illegible] of self-defence; defendant's efforts to secure a peaceable settlement of the quarrel, excluded); Or.: 1874, State v. Garland, 5 Or. 216 (defendant's threats to shoot a witness, just after the affray, for inquiring what was the matter, admitted to show malice); Tenn.: 1899, Fitts v. State, 102 Tenn. 141, 50 S. W. 756 (accused's expressions after the killing, admitted); Tex.: 1898, Holley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 301, 46 S. W. 39 (former animosity, admissible, and the language expressing it, but not details of quarrels); W. Va.: 1901, State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 39 S. E. 676 (defendant's expression of feelings towards deceased, after arrest, held admissible).

For the application of the Hearsay rule to an accused's expressions of regret or explanation, see post, § 1732. For the use of prior assaults to show intent, see ante, §§ 363, 364.

instances of hostility to a wife or a paramour form a numerous group by themselves, though the principle and its application are precisely the same as in the foregoing general instances. The limit of time over which the evidence may range depends much on the circumstances of each case, and no fixed rule can be laid down:

1851, Nash, J., in State v. Rash, 12 Ired. 382, 384 (wife-murder): "On behalf of the prisoner it is said that the State was permitted to go too far back for its facts, and by that means the general character of the prisoner was brought before the jury to speak against him. Not so. In the domestic relation, the malice of one of the parties is rarely to be proved but from a series of acts; and the longer they have existed and the greater the number of them, the more powerful they are to show the state of the feelings. A single expression and a single act of violence are most frequently the result of temporary passion, as evanescent as the cause producing them. But a long-continued course of brutal conduct shows a settled state of feeling inimical to the object."

1881, Colt, J., in Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 472 (the fact of a husband's bad treatment of his wife and quarrels with her from 1873 to 1877, to show a motive for killing her in 1880, the two having lived together in the meantime, was excluded): "It is difficult, in dealing with this description of evidence, to define as matter of law, the precise limits which must practically control its admission. . . . [It was proper] to prove such a state of ill-feeling on the part of the husband, existing at the time of the homicide, as would furnish him with a motive for the commission of the crime. But the difficulty is that the ill-feeling here offered to be shown was not of such a character as to afford a reasonable ground for the inference that it existed at the time of the murder. . . . The whole evidence fails to show such deeply seated and enduring hostility on the part of the husband as to lead to the presumption that without further manifestation and under the concealment of kindly relations, it continued to exist and so increase in power as to furnish a motive for the commission of the crime."

Here also, subsequent as well as prior emotion is receivable;[6] and the evidence has application occasionally in civil as well as in criminal cases.[7] No more detailed generalizations present themselves.[8]

[6] Conn., Nev.

[7] Ia., Nev.

[8] The cases are as follows: 1850, Baalam v. State, 17 Ala. 451, 453 (wife-murder; that the deceased and the defendant had quarrelled and separated about a year before, admitted); 1850, Johnson v. State, ib. 626 (wife-murder; cruelty to her by the defendant for a time previous, admitted); 1882, People v. Kern, 61 Cal. 244 (violent domestic conduct a month before, admitted); 1898, People v. Barthleman, 120 id. 7, 52 Pac. 112 (defendant's hostile expressions, received); 1898, People v. Chaves, 122 id. 134, 54 Pac. 596 (prior violence, admitted); 1834, Austin v. Austin, 10 Conn. 221 (divorce for adultery; defence, a luring and connivance by her husband; his relation to her being in itself some evidence against this, the wife offered evidence of his repeated unkindness to her; rejected, as not relevant); 1868, State v. Green, 35 id. 203, 208 (wife-murder; the defendant's marrying again within five weeks after the death, admitted as showing his feelings toward the deceased at the time of her death); 1878, Shaw v. State, 60 Ga. 246, 250 (wife-murder; former quarrels between the parties, admitted); 1893, Painter v. People, 147 Ill. 463, 35 N. E. 64 (murder of a paramour; former quarrels admitted); 1883, Doolittle v. State, 93 Ind. 272, 274 (assault and battery on a wife; previous ill-feeling between them, admitted); 1884, Koerner v. State, 98 Id. 7, 10, 24 (same; previous quarrels, beatings, and threats during several years, admitted to show malice); 1895, Kennedy v. Henaley, 94 Ia. 598, 63 N. W. 341 (prior quarrels, between husband and wife, admitted, to diminish damages in an action for alienation of affections); 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 472 (quoted supra); 1892, Com. v. Holmes, 157 id. 233, 239, 32 N. E. 6 (wife-murder; a course of violent conduct at various times during eight or nine years, admitted; an interval of cessation, or even of reconciliation, does not necessarily exclude the preceding conduct); 1902, Raines v. State, 81 Miss. 489, 33 So. 19 (acts and words of violence, extending over the previous ten years, excluded; grossly erroneous); 1879, State v. Nugent, 71 Mo. 136, 140 (maltreatment of the wife, for the preceding two months, by cutting, shooting, and threatening her, admitted to show deliberateness and malice); 1900,

§ 398. Sexual Passion at other Times. The prior or subsequent existence of a sexual passion in A for B is relevant, on the same principle and to the same extent as in the foregoing topics, to show its existence at the time in issue. The circumstance that the prior or subsequent conduct exhibiting the passion is criminal does not alter the case nor affect the admissibility of the evidence (ante, § 216). But the different ways in which this evidence may be employed need to be discriminated, so that the present principle in its operation may not be confounded with others having different limitations. The precedents may be divided into three groups: (1) cases involving adultery, fornication, criminal conversation, and incest; (2) cases involving seduction, bastardy, and breach of promise of marriage; (3) cases involving rape.[1]

State v. Callaway, 154 Mo. 91, 55 S. W. 444 (murder; former violence, admitted); 1896, Gardner v. Gardner, 23 Nev. 207, 45 Pac. 189 (divorce; husband's cruelty after suit begun, admitted to throw light on his previous acts); 1899, People v. Benham, 160 N. Y. 402, 55 N. E. 11 (wife-murder; quarrels two years before, admitted); 1853, State v. Langford, Busbee 436, 442 (domestic quarrels, admitted); 1851, State v. Rash, 12 Ired. 382 (wife-murder; a long course of ill-treatment, admitted to show hostile feeling); 1879, Sayres v. Com., 88 Pa. 291, 292, 303, 309 (wife-murder by shooting; to show ill-feeling and malice, evidence admitted that the defendant had thrown her down stairs two years before); 1900, Com. v. Birriols, 197 Pa. 371, 47 Atl. 355 (former violence, admitted); 1895, Thiede v. Utah, 159 U. S. 510, 16 Sup. 62 (wife-murder; the fact admitted of the wife having been seen at various times with black eyes, bruises, tears, etc.); 1901, O'Boyle v. Com., 100 Va. 785, 40 S. E. 121 (murder of a paramour; defendant's violence to her in the preceding year, admitted); 1884, Boyle v. State, 61 Wis. 440, 444, 21 N. W. 289 (wife-murder; previous acts of abuse admitted, to "show that his disposition carried him at times to . . . personal violence upon her").

For the use of prior assaults to show intent, see ante, §§ 363, 364.

[1] The precedents are as follows, and will be dealt with in detail in the ensuing sections: Adultery, Bigamy, Criminal Conversation, Fornication, and Incest (the issue is adultery, where not otherwise stated): Eng.: 1692, Duke of Norfolk v. Germaine, 12 How. St. Tr. 943 (crim. con.; at the end of the plaintiff's evidence, L. C. J. Holt: "Do you observe what you have proved? . . . You have not proved any lascivious conversation within these six years." Sol.-Gen.: "Pray, my lord, if your lordship pleases, this is the use we make in giving in evidence some things before, — to show the fact within the six years, their frequent meeting in a lascivious manner; and we make use of that before the sixth year to explain what use we make of it in matters done within the six years." L. C. J.: "For my part, I must declare, that these matters may be given in evidence to explain, but they are not to be given in evidence to any other purpose [i. e. damages]"); 1861, Boddy v. Boddy, 30 L. J. P. M. A. 23 (subsequent living together as showing previous adulterous inclination, admitted); 1900, Wales v. Wales, Prob. 63 (divorce for adultery; cohabitation subsequent to the date of the petition, admitted); Ala.: 1848, State v. Crowley, 13 Ala. 172 (intercourse 18 months afterwards, excluded, as not fairly indicating prior relations; "what are such circumstances [of inference] cannot be laid down universally"); 1852, Lawson v. Swinney, 20 id. 65, 75 (intercourse before the statutory bar and after the date of the indictment, admitted as on the facts sufficiently connected in time); 1860, McLeod v. State, 35 id. 395, 397 (familiarities before the statutory period, admitted); 1875, Alsabrooks v. State, 52 id. 24 (familiarities since the indictment; admissible, after other evidence offered as to the time charged); 1903, Hill v. State, — id. —, 34 So. 406 (adultery; other intercourse before and after, admitted, if an act is otherwise evidenced within the period charged); 1903, Bickley v. Bickley, — id. —, 34 So. 946 (divorce for adultery; illicit relations not long before marriage, admitted); Cal.: 1894, People v. Patterson, 102 Cal. 289, 244, 36 Pac. 436 (incest; prior intercourse for several years, admissible); Fla.: 1886, Brevaldo v. State, 21 Fla. 789, 795 (prior adultery admissible, provided some other evidence of adultery within the time charged is first offered); Ga.: 1897, Bass v. State, 103 Ga. 227, 29 S. E. 966 (fornication; former lascivious familiarities, within "a comparatively recent period," admitted); 1900, Taylor v. State, 110 id. 150, 35 S. E. 161 (incest; intercourse previous to the statutory period, admissible); Haw.: 1896, Republic v. Wsipa, 10 Haw. 442, 445 (adultery; act of intercourse before the date charged, admitted to show their relations); Ill.: 1897, Crane v. People, 168 Ill. 395, 48 N. E. 54 (adultery; prior and subsequent acts of improper familiarity and adultery, in another county, receivable, even before evidence of the substantive act is offered); Ind.: 1859, Lovell v. State, 12 Ind. 18 (incest; subsequent intercourse, excluded as irrelevant); 1884, State v. Markins, 95 id. 464 (incest; prior intercourse, as well as lascivious behavior, admitted, distinguishing the preceding case as involving merely subsequent conduct, and yet approving Thayer v. Thayer, Mass., which admits both), 1891, Lefforge v. State, 129 Id. 551, 29 N. E. 34 (incest; prior acts of familiarity, admitted); Ia.: 1886, State v. Briggs, 68 Ia. 416, 423, 27 N. W. 358 ("the fact that the parties had the disposition, and on previous occasions had been guilty of acts of intercourse, was of the highest importance in determining whether they did indulge at that time [charged]"); 1897, State v. Hurd, 101 Ia. 391, 70 N. W. 613 (incest; former acts of intercourse admitted); 1901, State v. More, 115 id. 178, 88 N. W. 322 (adultery; subsequent undue familiarities, admitted); Ky.: 1901, Smith v. Com., — Ky. —, 60 S. W. 531 (incest; similar act within a few months, admitted); La.: 1903, State v. DeHart, 109 La. —, 33 So. 605 (incest; prior acts admitted); Me.: 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 534 (adulterous intercourse before and after the time charged; admitted in discretion); Md.: 1898, Shufeldt v. Shufeldt, 86 Md. 519, 39 Atl. 416 (prior undue intimacy, received); Mass.: 1833, Com. v. Merriam, 14 Pick. 518 (former improper relations with the defendant, admitted; "a woman who would so conduct herself would be more likely to commit the fact alleged against her than if her deportment had been modest and discreet"); 1854, Com. v. Horton, 2 Gray 355 (subsequent adultery with the same person in another county, excluded; no clear reason given); 1858, Com. v. Thrasher, 11 id. 450 (adultery; prior acts of adultery and improper familiarity, admitted, "with the purpose of showing a disposition in the parties to commit such a crime and as bearing on the probability of its commission on the occasions alleged"; but subsequent acts rejected on the authority of Com. v. Horton); 1858, Com. v. Pierce, ib. 447 (like Com. v. Thrasher); 1859, Com. v. Lahey, 14 id. 92 (attempting to distinguish Com. v. Horton, 2 id. 354, and following Com. v. Merriam); 1867, Com. v. Curtis, 97 Mass. 574 (prior and subsequent acts of sexual intimacy admitted, to show the adultery); 1869, Thayer v. Thayer, 101 id. 111 (divorce for adultery; adultery between the parties since the date of the libel, admitted; overruling Com. v. Thrasher and Com. v. Horton on this point; quoted post); 1873, Com. v. Nichols, 114 id. 288 (adultery in another county, admitted); 1888, Brooks v. Brooks, 145 id. 574, 14 N. E. 777 (divorce for adultery; indecent familiarities and sexual intercourse with the third person before marriage, admitted as "tending to prove sexual intimacy with the same person" after marriage); Mich.: 1858, People v. Jenness, 5 Mich. 305, 319 (incest; other acts of sexual intercourse and of familiarity, for five years preceding, admitted); 1881, People v. Carrier, 46 id. 442, 446, 9 N. W. 487 (enticement of a minor for prostitution, etc.; former illicit relations of the defendant with her, admitted); 1893, People v. Skutt, 96 id. 449, 450, 56 N. W. 11 (incest; prior intercourse during eight years, admitted); 1900, Matthews v. Detroit J. Co., 128 id. 608, 82 N. W. 243 (improper conduct three months later, excluded); Nebr.: 1877, State v. Way, 5 Nebr. 283 (improper familiarities before and after the time charged, admissible); N. H.: 1838, State v. Wallace, 9 N. H. 515 (previous improper conduct admitted, but treated rather as indicating a design); 1857, State v. Marvin, 35 id. 22, 28 (same); 1899, Burns v. Burns, 68 Id. 33, 44 Atl. 75 (prior acts of familiarity, etc., admitted); N. J.: 1899, State v. Snover, 64 N. J. L. 65, 44 Atl. 850 (adultery in another county, admitted); 1900, State v. Jackson, 65 Id. 62, 46 Atl. 767 (other acts of adultery, admitted); 1900, State v. Snover, ib. 289, 47 Atl. 583 (prior adultery in another county, admitted); N. M.: 1902, U. S. v. Griego, — N. M. —, 72 Pac. 20 (adultery; conduct four years before, admitted); N. Y.: 1845, Lockyer v. Lockyer, 1 Edm. Sel. C. 108 (other improprieties admitted); 1859, Stephens v. People, 19 N. Y. 549, 571 (wife-murder; the defendant's improper attachment to a third person being alleged as a motive, evidence of his feelings towards her nearly a year after the wife's death, admitted; "love and jealousy are generally conceded to be enduring passions"); N. C.: 1882, State v. Kemp, 87 N. C. 538 (habitual illicit relations of the same persons more than two years before, admitted, as "shedding light upon the present relations if kept up"); 1883, State v. Pippin, 88 Id. 616 (same); 1897, State v. Raby, 121 id. 682, 28 S. E. 490 ("facts that transpired since the finding of the indictment," admitted); 1899, State v. Beard, 124 id. 811, 32 S. E. 804 (fornication and adultery; other intercourse in another county, admitted); Pa.: 1799, Gardner v. Madeira, 2 Yeates 466 (crim. con.; admitting indecent conduct, etc., provided first some direct evidence is offered of the acts charged at the times specified); 1867, Sherwood v. Titman, 55 Pa. 77, 79 (crim. con.; improper intimacy between the defendant and the plaintiff's wife after the latter had left him, admitted, on the same principle as in Gardner v. Madeira); 1895, Com. v. Bell, 166 id. 405, 31 Atl. 123 (incestuous fornication; prior intercourse, barred by statute, admitted); R. I.: 1899, Rose v. Mitchell, 21 R. I. 270, 43 Atl. 67 (alienation of wife's affections; intimacy of plaintiff's wife with defendant after separation, admitted as indicating prior state of feelings); Tenn.: 1873, Cole v. State, 6 Baxt. 242 (improper familiarities between the persons, before the statutory period and after prosecution begun, held admissible); Tex.: 1870, Richardson v. State, 34 Tex. 142 (cohabitation for a "series of months," admitted); 1893, Burnett v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 86, 22 S. W. 47 (incest; prior and subsequent intercourse, admissible); 1893, Wood v. State, ib. 476, 478, 24 S. W. 284 (slander charging incest; incest a few months before, admitted); 1898, Duncan v. State, 40 id. 591, 51 S. W. 372 (fornication; acts more than two years previous, excluded, except "under peculiar circumstances"; no authority cited): Utah: 1885, U. S. v. Musser, 4 Utah 153, 7 Pac. 889 (bigamous cohabitation; cohabitation with the same women before the date charged, admitted to show "his inclination and disposition to cohabit with the women"); 1886, U. S. v. Groesbeck, ib. 487, 11 Pac. 542 (similar); 1887, U. S. v. Peay, 5 id. 263, 14 Pac. 342 (similar); 1887, U. S. v. Smith, ib. 232, 14 Pac. 291 (similar); 1901, State v. Neel, 23 id. 541, 65 Pac. 494 (illicit intercourse; prior acts of familiarity, admitted in corroboration); Vt.: 1876, State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 209 (adultery; "a great many acts of familiarity and several acts of adultery" within seven years, admitted; also other acts at a subsequent time); 1878, State v. Colby, 51 id. 291, 293, 296 (obscure); 1879, State v. Potter, 52 id. 33, 40 (adultery; acts seven years before, admitted); Wis.: 1858, Ketchingman v. State, 6 Wis. 426 (another adultery admitted, but under a second count); 1895, Porath v. State, 90 id. 527, 63 N. W. 1061 (familiarities, admitted).

§ 399. Same: General Principles. The process of argument here involves (ante, § 395) three steps, namely, (a) from the Emotion to the Act charged,

(b) from a prior or subsequent Emotion to this Emotion at the time charged, and (c) from Conduct to the prior or subsequent Emotion. The evidence as

Seduction and Bastardy: Eng.: 1877, Verdin v. Wray, 2 Q. B. D. 611 (bastardy; acts of familiarity, before the probable time of begetting, with the alleged father, admitted); Ind.: 1890, Ramey v. State, 127 Ind. 243, 26 N. E. 818 (bastardy; acts of intercourse prior to the alleged time of conception, admitted to show "the probability of intercourse having taken place at subsequent times"); Ia.: 1898, State v. Hughes, 106 Ia. 125, 76 N. W. 520 (defendant's statement, a week later, that he was going to the prosecutrix's house for intercourse, admitted); Md.: 1853, Keller v. Donnelly, 5 Md. 213, 219 (seduction; the defendant's relations with the daughter five years later, admitted as throwing light on their relations at the time alleged); Mich.: 1876, People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 115 (seduction; previous acts of intercourse, but not subsequent ones, admitted); 1900, People v. Jamieson, 124 id. 164, 82 N. W. 835 ("acts of intercourse and undue familiarity" before and after the alleged time of conception, admissible); 1902, People v. Elco, — id. —, 91 N. W. 755 (seduction; intimate relations of the parties after pregnancy ascertained, admitted); N. C.: 1897, State v. Robertson, 121 N. C. 551, 28 S. E. 59 (seduction; later intercourse between the parties, admitted); Vt.: 1865, Thayer v. Davis, 38 Vt. 163 (bastardy; intercourse three years before, admitted, as showing a familiarity making the alleged intercourse more probable). Compare the additional cases cited post, § 401.

Rape (the evidence offered is, where not otherwise mentioned, of former intercourse between the parties, to show the woman's probable consent): Eng.: 1870, R. v. Cockcroft, 11 Cox Cr. 410, Willes, J.; 1871, R. v. Holmes, 12 id. 141 (indecent conduct admitted; but not passed upon); 1887, R. v. Riley, 16 id. 191 (Coleridge, L. C. J.: "It renders it more likely that she would or would not have consented"); and cases cited ante, § 200; Ala.: 1887, McQuirk v. State, 84 Ala. 435, 438 (admitted); 1889, Barnes v. State, 88 id. 204, 207, 7 So. 88 (rape; "prior acts of undue intimacy," received to show the complainant's probable consent); Ark.: 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 643 (admitted); Cal.: 1896, People v. Rangod, 112 Cal. 669, 44 Pac. 1071 (question reserved); Ill.: 1873, Shirwin v. People, 69 Ill. 56, 59, semble (admissible); Ind.: 1880, Eyler v. State, 74 Ind. 49, 51 (admissible); 1888, Bedgood v. State, 115 id. 275, 278, 17 N. E. 621 (same); Mich.: 1882, Hall v. People, 47 Mich. 636, 11 N. W. 414 (friendly relations of the parties, not improper, admitted to show that the defendant would probably seek to obtain intercourse by persuasion, not by force); 1888, People v. McLean, 71 id. 310, 38 N. W. 871 (admissible); Mont.: 1898, State v. Bowser, 21 Mont. 133, 53 Pac. 179 (rape; the relationship between defendant and prosecutrix, admitted, to indicate that the latter resisted as much as could be expected); N. H.: 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 N. H. 89 (admissible; put on the ground of character); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 id. 151, 156 (rape; the defendant's indecent solicitations of the prosecutrix six months before, admitted as involving "a motive or passion that would render the commission of the act charged more probable"); N. Y.: 1838, People v. Abbot, 18 Wend. 194 (admissible); 1857, People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398 (same); 1874, Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 516 (same); N. C.: 1846, State v. Jefferson, 6 Ired. 305 (that she had been his concubine, or had suffered him to take indecent liberties, admitted); Oh.: 1858, McCombs v. State, 8 Oh. St. 643, 646, semble (admissible); 1862, McDermott v. State, 13 id. 331, semble (same); Vt.: 1894, State v. Hollenbeck, 67 Vt. 84, 30 Atl. 696 (the complainant's friendliness beforehand, admitted); Wis.: 1893, Proper v. State, 85 Wis. 615, 628, 55 N. W. 1035 (rape; previous indecent assaults upon the complainant, admitted to show a desire to gratify his passions with her); 1902, Banneu v. State, 115 id. 317, 91 N. W. 964 (rape; prior relations of the parties, admitted to show probable consent).

Rape under Age of Consent: 1903, People v. Edwards, — Cal. —, 73 Pac. 416 (rape under age; prior intercourse, and prior and subsequent improper familiarity, between the two, admitted "to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant"); 1902, State v. King, 117 Ia. 484, 91 N. W. 768 (another act of intercourse a week or so later, admitted); 1893, People v. Abbott, 97 id. 484, 486, 56 N. W. 862 (admitted, to show their "relations" and "opportunity"); 1903, State v. Peres, 27 Mont. 358, 71 Pac. 162 (other intercourse with the prosecutrix, admitted); 1900, People v. Flaherty, 162 N. Y. 532, 57 N. E. 73 (intercourse under age of consent; other intercourse admissible only in corroboration, when other evidence of act charged is in the case); 1897, State v. Robinson, 32 Or. 43, 48 Pac. 357 (other intercourse with the prosecutrix, admitted); 1899, Rogers v. State, 40 Tex.

offered takes the reverse order; it consists in conduct, and from this the first inference is to the then emotion, from this next to the emotion at the time charged, and from this to the act charged. All these steps are implied in the offer of such evidence, and questions may arise as to any one of the steps; and, though the second is the only legitimate subject of the present treatment (the first and the third involving respectively the principles of § 117 and § 394, ante), it is convenient to deal with them all in this place.

(a) That a sexual desire of A for B is relevant to show the probability of A's doing that which will realize that desire cannot be and is not questioned; and no evidential difficulties arise at this point:

1869, Colt, J., in Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 113: "The evidence by which the act of adultery is proved is seldom direct. . . . When adulterous disposition is shown to exist between the parties at the time of the alleged act, then mere opportunity, with comparatively slight circumstances showing guilt, will be sufficient to justify the inference that criminal intercourse has actually taken place."

1876, Wheeler, J., in State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 210: "The offence charged in this case cannot ordinarily be committed till the restraints of natural modesty and the safeguards of common deportment and conventionality have been overcome by gradual approaches, and the relations of the parties have been changed from those usually existing between the sexes to the most intimate. . . . Thus it appears that the true relation of the parties to each other in this respect is very material and proper to be shown."

1884, Elliott, C. J., in State v. Markins, 95 Ind. 465: "It is a rule of elementary logic, as well as of rudimentary law, that evidence which tends to establish facts rendering it antecedently probable that a given event will occur, is of material relevancy and strong probative force. It is more probable that lucestuous intercourse will take place between persons who have conducted themselves with indecent familiarity than between those whose behavior has been modest and discreet."

(b) That this desire at a prior or subsequent time is relevant to show the probable existence of the same desire at the time in issue is equally clear:

1799, Hume, B., in Brown v. Smith, Hume (Sc.) 32 (action for fillation of an illegitimate child, the time of intercourse being in doubt): "It is reasonable for the judge to consider the situation and circumstances of the parties at a later period; . . . and if these are still such as to afford them the like temptations and opportunities of meeting, . . . it is natural to presume that such an intercourse once commenced does not cease while those opportunities continue."

1852, Goldthwaite, J., in Lawson v. Swinney, 20 Ala. 76: "The fact to be established by the evidence is that the parties lived together in a certain condition; and if this particular condition of life was proved to exist, both anterior and subsequent to the time alleged in or covered by the indictment, an inference might often be correctly drawn as to the existence of this condition during the intermediate period."

Cr. 355, 50 S. W. 338 (other acts of intercourse between the parties, admissible to show the probability of the offence); 1903, Smith v. State, — id. —, 73 S. W. 401 (subsequent intercourse with the same woman, excluded; repudiating prior contrary rulings; Henderson, J., semble, diss.); 1903, Smith v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 74 S. W. 556 (rape under age; prior intercourse in another county, excluded); 1900, State v. Hilberg, 22 Utah 27, 61 Pac. 215 (subsequent acts are inadmissible; Bartch, C. J., diss. on this point, and properly): 1903, State v. Carpenter, — Wash. —, 73 Pac. 357 (rape on a daughter under age; that the defendant had on several occasions attempted to induce another daughter to have intercourse with him, excluded; unsound; no authorities cited); 1902, Lanphere v. State, 114 Wis. 193, 89 N. W. 128 (rape under the age of consent, the girl being in fact willing; other intercourse admitted).

1869, Colt, J., in Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 113: "It is true, that the fact to be proved is the existence of a criminal disposition at the time of the act charged; but the indications by which it is proved may extend, and ordinarily do extend, over a period of time both anterior and subsequent to it. . . . When once an adulterous disposition in two persons towards each other is shown to exist, a strong inference arises that it has had and will have continuance, the duration and extent of which may be usually measured by the power which it exercises over the conduct of the parties. It is this character of permanency which justifies the inference of its existence at any particular point of time from facts illustrating the preceding or subsequent relations of the parties. . . . The limit, practically, to the evidence under consideration is that it must be sufficiently significant in character and sufficiently near in point of time, to have a tendency 'to lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man' to a belief in the existence of this important fact to be proved. If too remote or insignificant, it will be rejected, in the discretion of the judge who tries the case."

The limits of time over which the evidence may range must depend largely on the circumstances of each case,[1] and should be left to the discretion of the trial Court.[2] A subsequent existence of the desire is equally relevant with a prior one. It is true that the contingencies of error are different; i. e. in the former case, the desire may have been first induced by intervening circumstances, in the latter it may have been ended by them; but the strength of these contingencies is no greater in one instance than in the other. If for example the parties have been intimate during the entire year 1890, and an act of adultery is charged on July 1, an adulterous desire on Dec. 31 carries no less persuasive weight than an adulterous desire on Jan. 1. That there is any distinction is generally repudiated.[3]

(c) The conduct receivable to prove this desire at such prior or subsequent time is whatever would naturally be interpretable as the expression of sexual desire:

1899, Garrison, J., in State v. Snover, 64 N. J. L. 65, 44 Atl. 850: "Adultery, from its inherent stealth, is seldom provable apart from circumstances by which the disposition of the parties towards each other may be judged. This disposition develops gradually, and has a duration and progress that generally, if not always, antedate opportunity. Hence the total proof of adultery is not to be circumscribed by the time and space of a single act, but rather is to be extended as widely as the demonstration of the moral qualities involved may require. The discreet limit of such proof is the character of the conduct sought to be shown, — a point of which time, rather than geography, is apt to be the significant feature."

Sexual intercourse is the typical sort of such conduct, but indecent or otherwise improper familiarities are equally significant.[4] That the intercourse is also itself criminal is no objection.[5]

[1] See instances in Eng., Mass., N. Y., N. C., Tex., Vt.; and the evidence may antedate the statutory period of limitation, as in Eng., Ala., Pa., Tenn.

[2] Mass., quoted supra; Me.

[3] Ala., Me., Md. (seduction), Mass., Nebr. (seduction), N. Y., Pa., Tenn., Vt. Contra, Ind., Mich. (seduction).

[4] As in Eng., Ala., Ind,, Mass., Mich., Nebr., N. H., N. Y., Pa., Vt., Wis.

[5] Colt, J., in Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 113: "[If it were an objection,] evidence tending to establish an independent crime is to be rejected, although all acts which are only acts of improper familiarity are to be admitted in proof. There is no sound distinction to be thus drawn. There is no difference between acts of familiarity and actual adultery committed, when offered for the purpose indicated, except in the additional weight and significance of the latter

§ 400. Same: Discriminations in regard to Adultery and Incest. The foregoing principles apply equally to the sexual desire in all aspects. But for each sort of acts in which it becomes relevant, certain discriminations need to be made.

Where adultery (civil or criminal) or incest is charged, the use of the evidence in question is to show a desire at the time charged, as indicating an act of intercourse, and thus the evidence is predicated of the one charged with that act. This distinction might become important where the sexual desire was evidenced, not by actual intercourse, but by solicitation or familiarities, which might be predicable of one only of the parties.[1]

§ 401. Same: Discriminations in regard to Seduction, Bastardy, and Breach of Promise. Ordinarily, in seduction (whether an action by the parent or a criminal prosecution) and in bastardy, the act of intercourse being in dispute, the sexual desire at other times is offered as showing the probability of that act, and is predicated of the man charged with it; i. e. the use is the same as in the preceding subject, and is resorted to by the plaintiff or prosecutor. But in the statutory action (by the woman) or the criminal prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, the prior willingness of the woman to have intercourse, as shown by acts, may be relevant for the accused to show the probability that she consented, on the occasion charged, without regard to any promise of marriage as an inducement.[1] The prior unchastity of the woman with other persons, as affecting her character and the parent's damages, raises a different question (dealt with ante, §§ 205, 210). So, too, the intercourse of the woman with third persons, in bastardy actions, as showing another paternity (ante, § 133), or as impeaching her testimonial credit (post, § 987).

In actions for breach of promise of marriage, the present principle is more or less frequently involved, in inferring from the state of affections at one time to its state at another.[2] From this distinguish the question (post, § 1770) whether the woman's expressions and conduct of assent, occurring subsequently to the time of the man's alleged offer, are admissible under the verbal-act rule.

fact. . . . There is no one act by which the moral status of the parties is more clearly defined"; see also the full discussion ante, § 216.

[1] For other adulteries of the wife to mitigate damages in crim. con., see ante, § 211.

[1] 1876, People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 116 (Marston, J.: "Where parties thus indulge their criminal desires, it shows a willingness upon her part that a person of chaste character could not be guilty of, and although a promise of marriage may have been made at each time as an inducement, it would be but a mere matter of form, and could not alone safely be relied upon to establish the fact that she would not have yielded had such a promise not been made"); 1876, Bowers v. State, 29 Oh. St. 542, 546 (same). But it seems also to admit occasionally of an opposite inference: 1897, Smith v. Hall, 69 Conn. 651, 38 Atl. 386 (relations of the parties before the alleged promise, while the plaintiff was married to another, admitted, to show the probability of a promise).

[2] 1831, Honyman v. Campbell, 2 Dow. Ch. 265, 282 (conduct of courtship is some evidence of marriage); 1901, Hahn v. Bettingen, 84 Minn. 512, 88 N. W. 10 (prior attentions are admissible even while the defendant was married to another woman); 1840, Carskadden v. Poorman, 10 Watts 82, 85 (penalty for marrying a minor without the parent's assent; preceding favorable attitude of the father to the match, admitted to show probable consent); 1896, Osmun v. Winters, 30 Or. 177, 46 Pac. 780 (breach of promise; malicious letters after suit begun, admitted to show malice in breaking the promise).

§ 402. Same: Discriminations in regard to Rape. (1) (a) Ordinarily, the evidence offered is of the woman's prior improper conduct with the defendant, as showing an inclination on her part to consent to his embraces, and thus negativing an essential element in the crime charged. For this purpose, her submission to improper familiarities may be as significant as her allowance of actual intercourse.[1] (b) From this is to be distinguished the use of the woman's prior friendly feelings toward the defendant, as showing that he would more probably have attempted to obtain his purpose by persuasion than by force;[2] the inference here is really of a different sort (ante, § 389). (c) The fact of the woman's friendly feelings after the supposed rape is conduct in the nature of an inconsistency, and so far as it impeaches her testimony, is admissible (post, §§ 1040, 1134). (d) The woman's prior intercourse with a third person involves the question of character, and has been examined from that point of view (ante, § 200); over such evidence of character there has been more or less controversy; but over the evidence in (a), supra, there has been none.[3]

(2) (a) Former conduct predicated of the man may serve to show a passion, inclining him to attempt further gratification of his passion for this woman; though this use is seldom emphasized, where the conduct consists in voluntary intercourse, the use in (1) (a), supra, being the more important. But upon the same principle, former indecent solicitations by the man, or other conduct short of actual intercourse with the woman, tend similarly to show such a passion, and are receivable;[4] though they would not have been, from the point of view of (1) (a), supra. (b) The defendant's former rape or attempt at rape of the same woman may, like the voluntary intercourse in (2) (a), equally indicate a desire for this woman. But it may also be treated as evidencing a plan or design to obtain intercourse with her, or to throw light on the intent of a proved assault upon her (ante, § 357). (c) The defendant's former rape or attempt at rape of a third person cannot be treated as indicating a passion or desire for the woman in issue, i. e. cannot legitimately involve the present principle; either it indicates a lustful character generally and is thus inadmissible (ante, § 194), or it indicates a plan or intent to rape (ante, § 357).

(3) In rape under the age of consent, the woman's consent is immaterial; the charge is therefore practically one of fornication. The evidence may be dealt with from the point of view of adultery and fornication (ante, § 400), where the intercourse was in fact voluntary; or it may be dealt with from the point of view of rape, where it was in fact forcible.

[1] E. g., Eng., Ala., N. C.

[2] E. g., Mich., Vt.

[3] The following passage shows how the latter may be received, but not the former: 1876, Wheeler, J., in State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 212: "Evidence of like intercourse between them is admissible on an indictment [of him] for rape, and evidence of like acts of intercourse between her and other men is not, . . . not because it is in any wise more lawful for a man to commit rape upon a woman with whom he has had such intercourse, but because from the relations between them it is less likely that the intercourse was forcible."

[4] E. g., N. H., Or., Wis.

§ 403. Defamation: Other Utterances as evidencing Malice. The state of feelings, with reference to malice, of one who has uttered a defamatory statement, may become important, under the substantive law, in two ways: (1) as involving an excess of a privilege otherwise existing; (2) as affording ground for aggravation of damages.[1] The early notion that malice was also important in a third way, namely, as an essential element for the plaintiff's cause of action, is now generally repudiated.

For the purpose of showing this malice at the time of uttering the defamation charged, other utterances of the defendant may be offered; and the question arises whether and on what terms they are admissible. The nisi prius rulings on this subject in England up to the middle of the 1800s fluctuated widely; and though the law was there clearly settled in 1851 by the House of Lords, the varieties of ruling in the previous period furnished no uniform guide for the earlier rulings in this country; so that the numerous different distinctions for which there had been in England some authority were all reproduced here and there with new detailed varieties, in one or another jurisdiction in this country. All these variations rested upon some supposed reason; and it is essential to examine these reasons, as affording the key to the wide difference of rules which is still found in our different jurisdictions, and even in the precedents of a single jurisdiction. There are thus to be considered, first, the considerations of Relevancy, and, secondly, the considerations of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 43).[2]

§ 404. Same: Principle of Relevancy. The probative value of other utterances as showing malice at the time charged rests on a double argument: (a) that the other utterance indicates malice at that time of utterance; and (b) that malice then indicates malice at the time charged.

(a) That the other utterance may indicate malice at that time is clear, on the general principle (ante, § 394) that all conduct, including language, is one of the legitimate sources of inference to the feeling that inspires it:

1863, Sanford, J., in Swift v. Dickerman, 31 Conn. 285, 291: "It conduced to prove a fact from which a legitimate inference regarding the defendant's feelings and motives when he spoke the words now sued for might be fairly deduced. Every uncalled for utterance of a defamatory charge is more or less indicative of the speaker's malice at the time of speaking. . . . His malice then was probable in this suit only for the sake of the inference which it authorized regarding his mental feelings when he spoke the words now declared on."

What are the limitations, if any, that result from this principle?[1]

(1) Expressions of hatred, ill-will, anger, and the like, not in themselves defamatory, are plainly receivable, as all concede.[2]

(2) An utterance in itself defamatory may (not necessarily does) also evidence such feelings, as is generally conceded. The suggestion that such an utterance when privileged is not thus evidential[3] has not been generally accepted, and seems unsound.

[1] But this way is not recognized in New York.
[2] The precedents are collected post, § 406.
[1] The precedents are collected post, § 406.
[3] Parke, B., in Wright v. Woodgate, Eng., Denman, L. C. J., in Simpson v. Robinson, Eng.
[2] N. J.

(3) Whether an unproved plea of justification (i. e. of truth) has such evidential force is questionable. It is certainly a repetition of the defamatory utterance; and, though a bona fide attempt to prove it would dispose of any notion of its malice, yet a total failure to attempt to prove it, coupled with the deliberate retention of it upon the record, may well be taken as at least evidence of malice. The English law came finally to receive for this purpose an unproved and unwithdrawn plea;[4] but perhaps it is wiser to require some additional circumstance strengthening the indication of malice.[5]

(4) The subject-matter of the other utterances is in England not considered to be material;[6] for clearly a defamatory charge of a different tenor may equally evidence a feeling of ill-will or malice. In this country it is generally laid down (with varying phrases) that the other utterance must be upon the same subject.[7] Certainly it must be directed against the plaintiff,[8] or at least against a class of persons including him. But the limitations in the United States may be perhaps based on the doctrine of unfair surprise, to be referred to later.

(b) The second branch of the inference, that malice then indicates malice at the time charged, is merely another and legitimate application of the general principle already dealt with (ante, § 395). There can be and is no question as to the propriety of the argument:

1851, Parke, B., in Barrett v. Long, 3 H. L. C. 395, 414: "We are all of opinion that under such a plea the publication of previous libels on the plaintiff by the defendant is admissible evidence to show that the defendant wrote the libel in question with actual malice against the plaintiff. A long practice of libelling the plaintiff may show in the most satisfactory manner that the defendant was actuated by malice in the particular publication, and that it did not take place through carelessness or inadvertence; and the more the evidence approaches to the proof of a systematic practice, the more convincing it is. The circumstance that the other libels are more or less frequent, or more or less remote from the time of the publication of that in question, merely affects the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence."

1879, Folger, J., in Daly v. Byrne, 77 N. Y. 187: "It would tend to show malice to prove that libellous publications of the same nature were repeated from time to time after the first libel. Such articles, published after the commencement of the action, were not incompetent because of their essential nature, but because of a factitious and incidental consequence that might flow from the reception of them in evidence, to wit, that they might aggravate the damages, etc."

1885, Berry, J., Gribble v. Press Co., 34 Minn. 345, 25 N. W. 710: "We take the rule to be so maintained, not arbitrarily or as a mere matter of precedent, but because it rests upon a common-sense judgment of human nature and a practical knowledge of its motives and its ways. The fact that a given libel has been preceded and followed by others of like tenor from the same source is one from which, as men are constituted, a legitimate inference may be drawn as to the animus, the spirit, with which the given libel was published. It has a fair tendency to show that the given libel was not published by acci-

[4] Simpson v. Robinson, Eng. Accord: Me., Md., Mass., N. Y. Rejected: Mich.

[5] As in Conn. and in the opinion of Mather, Sen., in King v. Root, N. Y.

[6] Wright v. Woodgate, Barrett v. Long, Hemmings v. Gasson, and others passim; contra, Finnerty v. Tipper, which would not be law.

[7] Cal., Conn., Mass., Minn., N. H., N. J., N. Y., Pa. (perhaps), S. C. (qualified), U. S., Vt., Va.

[8] Del., Mass.

dent or mistake, or even under a sudden impulse, or heedlessly, but by design and with a deliberate purpose to injure and persecute the person libelled."

(1) The length of time elapsing between the evidential utterance and that charged may of course affect the strength of the inference. The English Courts treat the lapse of time as never affecting the admissibility of the utterances;[9] but in this country a few Courts have sought to put some rational limitation to it.[10] The matter ought to be left entirely in the hands of the trial Court.

(2) That the evidential utterances occurred subsequent to that charged, and, in particular, after action or trial begun, is equally immaterial, from the point of view of probative value; but a limitation is here suggested by the ensuing considerations of Auxiliary Policy.

Thus the limitations that result from the point of view of Relevancy are merely: That (perhaps) an unproved and unwithdrawn plea of truth is not receivable; that (in this country) the subject of the other utterances must be the same; and that (in this country, perhaps) the evidential utterance must not be too remote in time.

§ 405. Same: Principle of Auxiliary Policy. The real and substantial support of the attempt to exclude the present class of evidence has always been found in certain considerations of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 43). These considerations have apparently at no time succeeded in effecting a total exclusion of the evidence; for it has in no jurisdiction and by no judge been excluded (it would seem) absolutely. But they have resulted in various proposed limitations upon its use, — limitations intended to obviate the supposed evil of one or the other of these objections. The amusing yet confusing feature of their application has been that exactly opposite conclusions have been occasionally deduced from the same reason, so that if all the deductions were sound, the law would be in a paradoxical and unmanageable state. It will be necessary to note the various distinctions, and also to attempt to indicate the condition of the law in each jurisdiction upon each point; the latter effort necessarily assuming (what experience sadly teaches us is not always the fact) that the latest ruling represents the law of to-day.

(a) The first and chief argument is that other utterances, if allowed to go to the jury to show malice, will probably be used by them improperly for awarding additional damages; so that the plaintiff will obtain double damages, either for utterances already outlawed or already recovered for, or for utterances for which he may still sue and be paid as independent causes of action:[1]

1844, Bronson, J., in Root v. Lowndes, 6 Hill 518, 519: "The plaintiff will be allowed to recover damages for an injury when the recovery will not be a bar to another action for the same cause. I know it is said that the judge must tell the jury not to give damages for the words which are not laid in the declaration. But suppose he does give that instruction; everybody knows that it will have little or no effect. However honestly the jury may intend to follow the guidance of the Court, it requires but a moderate acquaintance with the operations of the human mind to see that they will be misled by the introduction of such evidence. If, after proving the words laid imputing larceny, the plaintiff is allowed to prove other words imputing robbery or murder, it is past doubt that the latter words, whatever the judge may say to the contrary, will influence the jury in fixing the quantum of damage. . . . To tell the jury at one moment that the evidence is proper, and at the next that they must disregard it, involves a contradiction; and if the jury is composed of sensible men, they will either think lightly of the law or of those who administer it. But whatever they may think, they will give damages for the words not laid; and thus the defendant may suffer a double punishment for the same fault."

[9] Barrett v. Long, Eng.

[10] Mass., N. H. (the better phrasing).

[1] See this argument also in Defries v. Davis, Symmons v. Blake, Eng.

The answer to this argument is, first, that the jury can be cautioned not to apply the evidence improperly, a well-settled mode (ante, § 13) of dealing with evidence under the principle of multiple admissibility, and no more dangerous in this instance than in any other; and, secondly, that any attempt to carry out this objection logically will result either in a hopeless confusion of rules, or in mere unpractical refinements, or in the entire exclusion of useful and just evidence. The objection has been totally repudiated in England.[2]

(b) The other argument is that of Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues (ante, § 194; post, §§ 1849, 1904), which would exclude all utterances not charged in the declaration:

1844, Bronson, J., in Root v. Lowndes, 6 Hill 518: "When the plaintiff does not go beyond the words laid in the declaration, I see no reason why he may not show that those words have been spoken on a dozen different occasions [because the judgment bars all the instances of utterance and there is no surprise]. . . . But very different considerations arise when we come to actionable words which are not laid in the declaration. To admit the proof of such words must be a surprise upon the defendant. It cannot be supposed that he will be prepared to try a matter of which the plaintiff has not complained. That is not all. If the plaintiff may prove the words, the defendant may justify as to those words, and thus the Court and jury will be led off from the point in controversy as presented by the pleadings, into the trial of an indefinite number of collateral issues." [3]

The answer to this argument is that it does not apply to matters evidential of a state of mind of the defendant relevant to the issue (ante, § 305); that it applies in strictness to character evidence and a few other well-known types; and that otherwise it would exclude any piece of evidence of which an opponent had not been specifically warned. It was early discountenanced in England,[4] and seems to have received little support in this country. The limitations, where they exist, are deduced usually from the preceding objection. What then are these proposed and competing limitations?

(1) It has been suggested that other actionable utterances be excluded,[5] to obviate the first objection above. The answer is that if the jury is bent on disregarding the instructions of the judge, they are just as likely to add

[2] Plunkett v. Cobbett, Rustell v. McQuister, Barwell v. Adkins, Pearsoff v. Lemaitre, Barrett v. Long, pointing out the warning to the jury as the sufficient answer to the objection.

[3] See this argument also in Finnerty v. Tipper, Eng., Shock v. M'Chesney, Pa.

[4] Mead v. Daubigny.

[5] Cook v. Field, Mead v. Daubigny, Defries v. Davis, Eng.; perhaps also in U. S. Fed.

to the damages for a non-defamatory utterance of hatred as for a defamatory one. The distinction has long been discarded in England,[6] and has been expressly repudiated in many jurisdictions here.[7]

(2) It has been suggested that at least other actionable utterances not already recovered for be excluded.[8] The answer is the same, that a jury that will disregard the instructions for the one class of words will do so equally for the other. The distinction did not become law in England,[9] and has not been accepted anywhere in this country.

(3) It has been suggested that just the contrary distinction be adopted, i. e. by excluding other actionable utterances already recovered for.[10] This is equally logical with the preceding one, though absolutely inconsistent with it; it is no less unpractical, and has been nowhere accepted.

(4) It has been suggested, from the same point of view as in (2) above, that actionable utterances not barred by limitation (and thus still available for other actions) be excluded.[11] The answer is still the same, that a jury is just as likely or unlikely to reckon improper damages for outlawed utterances as for others; and the distinction has generally been repudiated.[12]

(5) It has been suggested that just the contrary distinction be adopted, namely, by excluding other actionable utterances barred by limitation.[13] The answer is the same; and such a limitation is generally repudiated.[14]

(6) It has been suggested that subsequent utterances — meaning, usually, utterances after action or trial begun — be excluded, chiefly for the first reason above, that they might be reckoned in the damages, although still available for another action;[15] the distinction being suggested by a confused notion that prior utterances would be barred by the present judgment. The latter notion is of course incorrect, for the judgment would bar only repetitions of the identical charge, if not only those set out in the declaration; and the former notion is unfounded, for the same reason as above, that a jury is just as likely to disregard instructions in the one case as in the other. The distinction seems to obtain in a few jurisdictions,[16] but has been generally repudiated.[17]

(7) It has been suggested that other actionable utterances be excluded

[6] Buller, Scott v. Lord Oxford, Delegall v. Highley, Pearson v. Lemaitre, Barrett v. Long.

[7] Ala., Ind., Ia., Ky., N. H., N. J., N. C., Oh., Pa.; and of course where the broader limitations next mentioned are accepted, the present distinction is by implication abandoned.

[8] Symmons v. Blake, Eng.

[9] Barrett v. Long, and other cases supra.

[10] I. e. because they have been once paid for; advanced but repudiated in Conn.

[11] N. Y.

[12] Ala., Me., N. H., N. J., Oh., Pa., S. C., Va.

[13] Apparently no ruling has accepted this distinction.

[14] Barrett v. Long, Eng.; in this country, Ala., Ind., Me., N. H., N. J., N. Y., Oh., Pa., S. C., Va.

[15] Finnerty v. Tipper, Stuart v. Lovell, Pearce v. Ornsby, Eng.

[16] In this country, in Conn., N. Y., Tenn.; Folger, J., in Daly v. Byrne, 77 N. Y. 187: "[Libellous articles] published after the commencement of the action . . . [are excluded] because they might aggravate the damages found by the jury in this action while they also in themselves gave to the plaintiff the right to another action in which he might get damages again by reason of the publication of them."

[17] Rust[illegible] v. McQuister, McLeod v. Wakley, Chubb v. [illegible]estley, Defries v. Davis, Boyd v. Douglas, Barwell v. Adkins, Hemmings v. Gasson (qualified), Eng.; in this country, Ala., Ind., Ia., Ky., Me., Mass., Mich., N. H., N. J., N. C., Oh., Pa., S. C., Vt., Va., Wis.

entirely, except where the utterance charged is equivocal as to the feeling inspiring it,[18] — the apparent reason involving both of the above arguments, regarded as demanding exclusion except where there is absolute necessity. The distinction is plausible, but in practice would seldom exclude anything; and it is rarely advanced.[19]

The net result, then, of the arguments based on auxiliary policy is that on principle no limitations can be deduced from them, and that, except here and there, the various jurisdictions concur in repudiating all the suggested limitations.

§ 406. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The precedents exhibit a variety of rules, involving the preceding distinctions, in the different jurisdictions. Few Courts have passed upon all of the suggested points.[1]

[18] Stuart v. Lovell, Pearce v. Ornsby, Eng.; in this country, Ind., N. Y.

[19] Barrett v. Long, Eng., practically repudiates it; so also Oh., after originally accepting it.

[1] England: 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 7 ("After he has proved the words as laid, he may give evidence of other expressions made use of by the defendant, as proof of his ill-will towards him. . . . After verdict for the plaintiff and damages intire, where some of the words are not actionable, . . . if the words be in one count, the Court will intend that such as are not actionable were added only to show the malice of the party and that the damages were given for what were actionable"); 1785, Cook v. Field, 3 Esp. 133, Kenyon, L. C. J. (other utterances admitted, so far as not actionable in themselves, to show malice); 1791, Charlton v. Barret, Peake N. P. 22, Kenyon, L. C. J. (the same words at different times, admitted to show malice); 1792, Mead v. Daubigny, ib. 125 (other words admitted; objected to because of the surprise to the defendant; objection overruled, per Kenyon, L. C. J., because "the plaintiff may give evidence of any words used by the defendant, to show the spirit and temper by which he was actuated"; yet the evidence was limited to non-actionable words); 1793, Lee v. Huson, ib. 166, Kenyon, L. C. J. (other libellous writings admitted; objected to on the damages-ground); 1804, Plunkett v. Cobbett, 5 Esp. 136, Ellenborough, L. C. J. (another sale of the same libel to show absence of mistake; the jury being told not to reckon it in the damages); 1807, Rustell v. Macquister, 1 Camp. 49, Ellenborough, L. C. J. (other slanders spoken afterwards; objected to because the jury might consider them in the damages; objection overruled, because the jury could be instructed not to do so); 1808, Scott v. Lord Oxford, Peake N. P. 127, note, Lawrence, J. (other actionable words, admitted to increase damages); 1808, Tate v. Humphrey, 1 Camp. 73, note, Graham, B. (action for perjury; the false charge in another form, admitted to show malice; affirmed by the Judges); 1809, Finnerty v. Tipper, ib. 72, Mansfield, C. J. (other libels from subsequent numbers of the same journal, rejected; partly because of surprise, partly because they did not "so far refer to the subject of the declaration" as to be useful; yet the former precedents, so far as cited, were approved); 1817, Stuart v. Lovell, 2 Stark. 93, Ellenborough, L. C. J. (subsequent libels, held inadmissible, because the animus was not equivocal and they would merely serve to enhance the damages); 1828, Macleod v. Wakley, 3 C. & P. 311 (another libel only two days before the trial, admitted; Tenterden, L. C. J.: "However late anything takes place, it may be evidence of a previous intention as to a previous fact"); 1834, Chubb v. Westley, 6 id. 436, Park, J. (subsequent articles attacking the plaintiff, admitted to show the animus); 1835, Defries v. Davis, 7 id. 112, Tindal, C. J. (subsequent utterances of the same slander, but not of any other actionable words, admitted; "it has been a very usual course of late to restrict the evidence in that way; and there is good sense in so doing, as the jury ought not to mix up the words in question with other words in considering the amount of damages"); 1835, Pearce v. Ornsby, 1 Moo. & Rob. 455 (repetition of the slander after action begun; rejected by Abinger, L. C. B., because improperly tending to aggravate the damages, and because no equivocal phrase needed explanation); 1835, Symmons v. Blake, ib. 477 (other slanders to the same effect, rejected by Patteson, J., on the same grounds; "the damages in this cause may be increased by those words, and yet this record be no evidence in a subsequent action which may be founded upon them"; hence, other slanders are admissible for which damages have already been recovered); 1835, Wright v. Woodgate, 2 C. M. & R. 578, Parke, B. ("conduct or expressions of the defendant showing that he was actuated by a motive of personal ill-will are admissible"); 1836, Bond v. Douglas, 7 C. & P. 627, Abinger, L. C. B. (other libels published of the plaintiff on the same subject within a few days afterwards, admitted, "to show the animus"); 1836, Tarpley v. Blabey, 2 Bing. N. C. 437 (preceding libels on the plaintiff admitted to show animus); 1837, Delegall v. Highley, 8 C. & P. 444, 449, Tindal, C. J. (procuring another publication of the libel, admitted to show malice, though in itself actionable); 1838, Park, J., in Webb v. Smith, 4 Bing. N. C. 379 (admitting "other libels and slanders proceeding from the same defendant"); 1840, Barwell v. Adkins, 1 M. & Gr. 807, C. P. (a subsequent repetition of the charge, admitted to show malice in the original charge; the judge's instructions being sufficient to guard against giving damages for the repetition); 1843, Pearson v. Lemaitre, 5 id. 700, 719, C. P. (repetitions of the libel admitted; Tindal, C. J., noting that "it may be difficult to reconcile all the nisi prius cases": "This appears to be the correct rule, viz., that either party may, with a view to the damages, give evidence to prove or disprove the existence of a malicious motive in the mind of the publisher of defamatory matter; but that if the evidence given for that purpose establishes another cause of action, the jury should be cautioned against giving any damages in respect of it; . . . and that evidence tending to prove it cannot be excluded simply because it may disclose another and a different cause of action"); 1848, Simpson v. Robinson, 12 Q. B. 511 (Denman, L. C. J.: "Acts although subsequent might indicate the existence of motives at a former time; . . . and every other part of his conduct showing the same disposition may equally be laid before the jury, — refusing to make reparation for unjustifiable slander may have that effect"; here the act was the "putting a justification on record which he does not attempt to prove and will not abandon"; approving of Warwick v. Foulkes, 12 M. & W. 507 (1848), where a plea repeating the charge in justification was not attempted to be proved, and where Parke, B., said, "Surely the plaintiff has a right to give evidence to show that the charge was not one lightly made and soon abandoned, but that it was seriously made, and persevered in to the last moment"; but disapproving that case so far as it seemed to allow the repetition to be used for increasing damages or for anything but inferring malice; also in effect overruling Wilson v. Robinson, 7 Q. B. 68 (1845), where the repetition was in an abandoned plea, so far as the Court there, including Lord Denman himself, while repudiating the use of the evidence merely to increase damages, seemed to ignore its use to show malice); 1845, Long v. Barrett, 7 Ir. L. R. 439 (other libels published in the same newspaper, more than six years before, received to show malice, the jury being warned to consider them for that purpose only); 1851, Barrett v. Long, 3 H. L. C. 395, 401, 407, 414 (statutory plea denying actual malice; previous publications by the defendant of the plaintiff, in the same journal, extending over 10 years, admitted; quoted supra); 1852, Camfield v. Bird, 3 C. & K. 56, Jervis, C. J. (other slanderous words, at a time not specified, admitted to show animus); 1858, Hemmings v. Gasson, E. B. & E. 346 (the fact that the defendant, six months after the utterance of a libel, charging a breaking and entering, had publicly charged the plaintiff with dishonoring bills and had called him a rascal, was offered to show malice, but rejected; Campbell, L. C. J.: "We do not say the evidence was inadmissible. . . . But we think that the learned judge should have pointed out more distinctly to the jury the length of time between the writing of the letter charged in the declaration and the subsequent expressions sought to be put in evidence"); Can.: 1838, Rankine v. Clarke, Ber. N. Br. 303 (affidavit in a criminal case still pending, excluded); 1859, Tobin v. Shea, 3 Morris Newf. 257 (subsequent libels, admitted); Ala.: 1845, Teague v. Williams, 7 Ala. 844 (repetition admissible, whether actionable or not, whether barred by statute or after suit begun; the jury not to consider it in giving damages); 1849, Scott v. McKinnish, 15 id. 666 (same); 1873, Sonneborn v. Bernstein, 49 id. 168, 170 (repetition after suit begun, admitted; no precedents cited); 1902, Riley v. State, 132 Id. 13, 31 So. 731 (repetition subsequent to the time of the indictment, held admissible); Cal.: 1875, Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 75, 84 (similar utterances after action begun, admitted); 1888, Stern v. Loewenthal, 77 id. 340, 19 Pac. 579 (statements "at a different time," uttering a charge "of a different nature," excluded); 1892, Harris v. Zanone, 93 id. 59, 28 Pac. 845 ("other utterances of words of similar import," admissible); 1898, Westerfield v. Scripps, 119 id. 607, 51 Pac. 958 (repetition, or charge of similar import, receivable; plea of truth, without attempt to establish it, receivable); 1898, Hearne v. De Young, ih. 670, 52 Pac. 150 (repetition after suit begun, admissible); Conn.: 1786, Holmes v. Brown, Kirby 151 (other utterances after suit begun, excluded); 1837, Mix v. Woodward, 12 Conn. 262, 287, 292 (other utterances, but only of the same libel, admissible, the jury not to give damages for them; the dissent of Waite, J., at 288, did not affect this point); 1839, Flint v. Clark, 13 id. 361, 366 (same point); 1847, Williams v. Miner, 18 id. 464, 472 (same); 1863, Swift v. Dickerman, 31 id. 285, 290 (same; admissible though already recovered for); 1872, State v. Riggs, 39 id. 498, 501 (same as Williams v. Miner); 1879, Ward v. Dick, 47 id. 300, 304 (same; unproved plea of truth not admissible unless maliciously pleaded); Del.: 1854, State v. Jeambell, 5 Harringt. 475, 479 (other defamatory utterances, against the same person, prior to the one charged, admitted, but no others); Ga.: 1857, Adkins v. Williams, 23 Ga. 222 (prior utterances, admitted); 1897, Craven v. Walker, 101 Id. 845, 29 S. E. 152 (repetition after suit brought, admissible); Ill.: 1854, Sloan v. Petrie, 15 Ill. 425 (like the next case); 1866, Harrison v. Shook, 41 id. 141 (plea of justification not filed in good faith may evidence malice; the jury to decide upon good faith); Rev. St. 1874, c. 126, § 3 ("An unproved allegation of the truth of the matter charged shall not be deemed proof of malice, unless the jury on the whole case find that such defence was made with malicious intent"); 1875, Hawver v. Hawver, 78 Ill. 412 (statute applied, construing an instruction); Ind.: 1831, Scott v. Mortsinger, 2 Blackf. 454, 457 (other words admitted, whether actionable or not, and whether after suit begun or not, under the general issue); 1834, M'Glemery v. Keller, 3 id. 489 (same; the sole use being to show malice); 1836, Throgmorton v. Davis, 4 Id. 176 (words barred by statute, admissible); 1842, Burke v. Miller, 6 id. 155 (admissibility of other words implied); 1843, McIntire v. Young, ib. 498 (words since action begun, admitted; but admissibility said to be limited to cases where the malicious intent of the defendant is in doubt); 1844, Schoonover v. Rowa, 7 id. 202 (admissible to show malice only); 1846, Forbes v. Myers, 8 id. 74 (same); 1846, Teagle v. Deboy, ib. 136 (like Burka v. Miller); 1847, Lauter v. McEwen, ib. 496 (admissible, if the intent is equivocal, to show malice only); 1848, Burson v. Edwards, 1 Ind. 164 (like Forbes v. Myers); 1852, Hesler v. Degant, 3 id. 504 (words since suit begun, admitted to show malice only); 1854, Vincent v. Dixon, 5 Id. 270 (rejected, because used in aggravation of damages); 1873, Meyar v. Bohlfing, 44 id. 239 (same); 1876, Downey v. Dillon, 52 id. 442, 450 (admitting defendant's former good feelings, but not for an unreasonable time previous; here conduct "always" exhibited was rejected); Ia.: 1864, Beardsley v. Bridgman, 17 Ia. 292 (words uttered after suit begun, admissible to show malice, subject to a caution to the jury); 1868, Schrimper v. Heilman, 24 id. 505, semble (words uttered after suit begun, admitted); 1874, Ellis v. Lindley, 38 id. 461 (repetition admissible to show malice only); 1877, Prime v. Eastwood, 45 id. 640, 642 (repetition admitted); 1887, Hannars v. McClelland, 74 id. 320, 87 N. W. 389 (obscure); Code 1897, § 3593 ("an unproved allegation of the truth of the matter charged shall not be deemed proof of malice, unless the jury on the whole case finds that such defence was made with malicious intent"); 1902, Zurawski v. Reichmann, 116 Ia. 388, 90 N. W. 69 (assault by defendant on plaintiff, shortly afterwards, held admissible); 1902, Cushing v. Hederman, 117 id. 637, 91 N. W. 940 (utterance of similar words to another person, admitted); Ky.: 1822, Eccles v. Shackelford, 1 Litt. 36 (semble, only words not actionable are admissible); 1837, Allensworth v. Coleman, 5 Dana 315 (obscure); 1859, Letton v. Young, 2 Metc. 561 (admitting any language showing ill-will, actionable or not, after suit begun or not; the jury to be cautioned against including them in the damages); 1880, Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 208 (preceding case approved); 1901, Alcorn v. Powell, 22 id. 1353, 60 S. W. 520 (other similar utterances admitted); La.: 1828, Kendrick v. Kemp, 6 Mart. N. S. La. 500 (other words uttered within one year before suit begun, admitted); Me.: 1839, Smith v. Wyman, 16 Me. 13 (repetition admitted, though after action begun; unproved plea of truth, admissible); 1851, White v. Sayward, 33 id. 322 (subsequent utterances admitted); 1853, True v. Plumley, 36 id. 466, 478 (repetitions since suit begun, admitted); 1878, Harmon v. Harmon, 61 id. 233 (utterance of the same charge at a time barred by statute, admitted); 1893, Conant v. Leslie, 85 id. 257, 27 Atl. 147 (utterance of the same charge, before or after, but not of a different charge, admissible); Md.: 1827, Duvall v. Griffith, 2 H. & G. 30 (another slander, admissible); 1834, Rigden v. Wolcott, 6 G. & J. 413, 419, semble (unproved plea of truth, admissible); 1902, Gambrill v. Schooley, 95 Md. 260, 52 Atl. 500 (other words actionable and forming the subject of a pending action, excluded); Mass.: 1818, Jackson v. Stetson, 15 Mass. 48 (unproved plea of truth, admissible); 1825, Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. 376 (other utterances admissible, provided they involve the same charge; utterances since action begun, admissible); St. 1826, c. 107, § 2 (plea of justification if unproved shall not "of itself be proof of the malice," but the jury "shall decide upon the whole case" whether it was pleaded with malicious intent); 1827, Hix v. Drury, 5 Pick. 296, 302 (the statute refers only to a plea of truth pleaded with a general issue as permitted by the statute; and not to a sole plea of truth); Mass. Rev. St. 1836, c. 100, § 19, Pub. St. 1882, c. 167, § 79 (plea of truth, "though not maintained by the evidence," is not "of itself" to be proof of malice); 1846, Goodrich v. Stone, 11 Pick. 486, 491 (repetition after action begun, admissible); 1848, Watson v. Moore, 2 Cush. 137 (other utterances admissible, if involving the same charge; the mere filing of a complaint in Court, no avidence); 1856, Baldwin v. Sonle, 6 Gray 321 (repetition of the charge, admissible); 1866, Markham v. Russell, 12 All. 574 (prior and subsequent utterances of the same charge, admissible, though no damages could be awarded for them); 1869, Robbins v. Fletcher, 101 Mass. 116 (feeling of the defendant against a third person included in the alleged slander, admitted, as tending to prove its utterance; repetition of the slander, admissible to show malice); 1875, Clark v. Brown, 116 id. 508 (repetition admissible, but the jury should be cautioned not to increase the damages therefor); 1884, Com. v. Damon, 136 id. 449 (other utterances admissible if "of such a nature as to indicate a persistent disposition of hatred or ill-will towards him, or if they appear to be a part of a settled purpose to bring him into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, and are sufficiently near in time to afford a natural inference that the same state of mind existed when the publication complained of was made"); 1888, Sullivan v. O'Leary, 146 id. 322, 15 N. E. 775 (that the defendant had slandered other persons a few years before, excluded); Mich.: Comp. L. 1857, § 4548, Comp. L. 1897, § 10415 ("If the defendant in any action for slander or for publishing a libel shall give notice in his justification that the words spoken or published were true, such notice, though not maintained by the evidence, shall not in any case be of itself proof of the malice charged in the declaration"); 1868, Detroit Post Co. v. McArthur, 16 Mich. 446, 454 ("frequent recurrence of similar libels," admissible to show "recklessness" supporting exemplary damages); 1877, Scripps v. Reilly, 35 id. 371, 384, 393 ("the recurrence of similar libels," apparently held admissible to show such reckless conduct of the defendant's newspaper as would justify punitory damages); s. c. 38 id. 10 (similar evidence held inadmissible; these two opinions are not clear, except in that they take a too liberal attitude towards the publishers of libel); 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 id. 41, 45 (failure to prove a plea of truth, not admissible);

1893, Randall v. News Ass'n, 97 id. 136, 145, 56 N. W. 361 (another charge of same sort, admitted); 1894, Thibault v. Sessions, 101 id. 279, 286, 59 N. W. 624 (subsequent publications on the same subject, after suit begun, admitted); 1896, Botsford v. Chase, 108 id. 432, 66 N. W. 325 (former utterances, admissible); 1899, Jastrzemboki v. Marxhousen, 120 id. 677, 79 N. W. 935 (under the statute, an unsustained plea may still be considered as evidence of malice, though not alone sufficient); Minn.: 1885, Reitan v. Goebel, 33 Minn. 151, 22 N. W. 291 ("other slanderous words of similar import, and so connected with them as to amount to a continuance of the same slander," at least if before suit begun, admissible); 1885, Gribble v. Press Co., 34 id. 342, 25 N. W. 710 ("other publications . . . containing substantially the same imputation as that sued upon, whether made before or after the latter, or after suit brought," admissible only to show malice, and thus give ground for exemplary damages; here an utterance six years before was admitted); 1886, Larrabee v. Tribune Co., 36 id. 141, 142, 30 N. W. 462 (approving the preceding case; the utterances need not be repetitions, if they "refer to the same matter and make substantially the same imputation"); 1895, Frederickson v. Johnson, 60 id. 337, 62 N. W. 388 (prior utterances of the same import, admissible); 1902, Jacobs v. Cater, 87 id. 448, 92 N. W. 397 (words not actionable per se nor imputing the same charge, held inadmissible); Nebr.: 1903, Bee Pub. Co. v. Shields, — Nebr. —, 94 N. W. 1029 (subsequent similar utterances, admitted); N. H.: 1827, Mason v. Mason, 4 N. H. 114, semble (repetition admissible); 1839, Chesley v. Chesley, 10 id. 337 (repetition admissible, even of actionable utterances); 1855, Symonds v. Carter, 32 id. 458 ((1) the other words may have been spoken at any time, "provided they were spoken so near the time of the actionable words or were otherwise so connected with them as to have a legitimate bearing upon the disposition of the defendant's mind at the time of uttering the slander complained of"; (2) they may be actionable words, though semble the judge should instruct the jury not to give damages for them; but (3), semble, they must be concerned with the same subject-matter); N. J.: 1836, Bartow v. Brands, 15 N. J. L. 248 (other words admissible to show malice); 1838, Dayton, J., in State v. Robinson, 16 id. 514 (other defamatory words, "if referring to those charged," admissible); 1843, Schenck v. Schenck, 20 id. 208 (other libels admitted, so far as they relate to the same charge, and even though uttered after suit begun); 1882, Evening Journal Ass'n v. McDermott, 44 id. 430 (previous or subsequent libels admissible, whether barred by limitation or not; the jury to be cautioned against giving damages for them; but a privileged repetition is inadmissible); 1888, Fahr v. Hayes, 50 id. 275, 281, 13 Atl. 261 (approving the preceding case); N. Y.: 1810, Thomas v. Croswell, 7 Johns. 264, 270 (utterances, not libellous, against the plaintiff since action begun, admitted; semble, that libellous utterances would not be admissible, because the damages might be improperly increased); 1826, Matson v. Buck, 5 Cow. 499 (like the next case); 1827, Root v. King, 7 id. 613, 633 (an unproved plea, not withdrawn by an affidavit of falsity, admissible); 1828, King v. Root, 4 Wend. 140 (same case on appeal; doctrine below approved; but Mather, Sen., dissented at 150, with the distinction that the defendant must have so pleaded "knowing it to be false, or from a reckless disregard of consequences without having reasonable cause to suppose he could substantiate it"); 1832, Inman v. Foster, 8 id. 602 (solving the apparent doubt in Thomas v. Croswell, and holding that prior actionable utterances, but only those barred by limitation, could be used); 1838, Kennedy v. Gifford, 19 id. 297, 300 (confining the utterances to the subject of the original charge, and admitting a repetition after suit begun); 1844, Root v. Lowndes, 6 Hill 518 (the use of other utterances limited to the extent indicated by Thomas v. Croswell and Inman v. Foster, with regret that even that much had been conceded; see quotation ante, § 405; the whole use limited to proving malice in excess of privilege); 1846, Keenholts v. Becker, 3 Den. 346 (other utterances, not slanderous, before and after action brought, not admitted to show malice); C. C. P. 1848, § 165 ("whether he prove the justification or not, he may give in evidence the mitigating circumstances"); C. C. P. 1877, § 535 (substantially similar); 1849, Campbell v. Butts, 3 N. Y. 173, semble (action brought for words already used in a former action to show malice, but not then declared on; the practice in the former case impliedly approved); 1850, Fero v. Roscoe, 4 id. 165 (not treating it as a question of malice, but of damages, and admitting an unproved plea of truth, even if bona fide made); 1850, Howard v. Sexton, ib. 157, 161 (slander for charge of perjury; (1) charge at another time, of robbery, excluded; the other utterance must be of the same charge, since the malice to be proved is "not mere general ill-will, but malice in the special case set forth in the pleadings"; (2) such repetition allowed only to show malice in excess of privilege, following Root v. Lowndes, or to explain an ambiguous utterance); 1854, Bush v. Prosser, 11 id. 347, 356, 366 (statute noticed as changing the law for pleas of truth); 1863, Fry v. Bennett, 28 id. 324, 327 (affirming the first point of the preceding case, but apparently violating it in admitting different libels; semble, contra to the preceding case on the second point); 1870, Thorn v. Knapp, 42 id. 474 (repetition after trial begun, admissible; failure to prove plea of truth, admissible); 1870, Titus v. Sumner, 44 id. 266 (prior utterances of the same slander admissible, if barred by the statute; following Inman v. Fowler; semble, contra to Howard v. Sexton on the second point); 1872, Bassell v. Elmore, 48 id. 563, 566 (repetition of the same charge to time of trial, held admissible, without mentioning the limitations of the preceding and the following case); 1875, Frazier v. McCloskey, 60 id. 337 (repetition of the slander after action begun, excluded, because where the words may be the subject of another action, damages might thus be given twice for them); 1877, Distin v.

Rose, 69 id. 122, 127 (total failure to prove a plea of truth may be considered, if the plea was inserted wantonly or maliciously; but need not be so considered; "the Code has made this change in the law, . . . because it seems inconsruous to say that a failure to establish a justification may enhance the damages, and yet the facts proved under it may mitigate them"); 1879, Daly v. Byrne, 77 id. 187 (repetition after action begun, excluded; see quotation ante, § 404); 1892, Enos v. Enos, 135 Id. 609, 32 N. E. 123 (repetition of the same charge in other words, admitted); N. C.: 1829, Brittain v. Allen, 2 Dev. 120, 125 (repetition admissible, even after action begun; whether to be only repetitions, is not considered; the judge to instruct the jury not to give damages for them; "no regard ought to be paid to the old rule, that these words must be such as were not actionable, that rule having yielded to common sense"); 1831, s. c. 3 id. 167; 1859, Lucas v. Nichols, 7 Jones L. 32, semble (utterances after action begun, admissible, but damages not to be given for them); Ohio: 1832, Carter v. McDowell, Wright 100 (words since suit begun, not admissible, except to show the sense of the words charged); 1884, Seely v. Cole, ib. 681 (repetition admissible, semble); 1834, Flamingham v. Boucher, ib. 746 (words barred by the statute, admitted, but the jury cautioned to use them only to find malice); 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 Oh. 418, 424 (other libels admissible only where the intent is doubtful); 1848, Stearns v. Cox, 17 id. 590 (preceding restrictions as to doubtfulness of intent and as to ambiguities, repudiated; other libels, after suit begun, or before the statute bar, actionable or not, held admissible, subject to a caution to the jury); 1855, Van Derveer v. Sutphin, 5 Oh. St. 293, 295 (same); 1871, Alpin v. Morton, 21 id. 536, 544 (approving the preceding cases); Or.: 1893, Upton v. Hume, 24 Or. 420, 436, 33 Pac. 81 (plea of truth, unproved, to be evidence of malice only when the circumstances indicate it; utterance of a distinct charge, not admissible); Pa.: 1799, Shock v. M'Cbesney, 2 Yeates 473 (charge of forgery; only "expressions of the same nature as those complained of" are admissible; "distinct slanders, charging the plaintiff with other distinct offences, should not be received in evidence, because the defendant cannot be prepared to meet them, and they form the subjects of other actions"); 1811, Wallis v. Mease, 3 Binn. 546, 550 (other and different words charging the plaintiff, admissible, whether actionable or not actionable, before or after suit begun, barred by the statute or not; but the jury are to be instructed not to give damages for them); 1816, Kean v. M'Laughlin, 2 S. & R. 469 (admitting the same words spoken since action begun; approving Wallis v. Mease); 1826, M'Almont v. M'Clelland, 14 id. 359, 361 (repetition after suit begun, admitted, because "not a new charge for which a new action could be brought"); 1857, Elliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 65, 68 (words showing malice, but not actionable, were admitted; no rule given nor authority cited); 1878, Barr v. Moore, 87 id. 385, 394 ("other articles of the same tenor and character," admitted); 1893, Com. v. Place, 153 Pa. 814, 318, 26 Atl. 620 (other libellous articles on the same subject, admitted to show malice); 1895, Selp v. Deshler, 170 id. 334, 32 Atl. 1032 (subsequent letters, admitted); 1899, Thompson v. M'Cready, 191 Pa. 82, 45 Atl. 78 ("testimony honestly given in a judicial proceeding of the circumstances connected with the utterances of slanderous words tending to mitigation" is not evidence of malice); S. C.: 1822, Miller v. Kerr, 2 McC. 286 (repetition after action begun, admitted; here malice is "the gist of the action," not merely affecting privileges or damages); 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill S. C. 175 (repetition so long ago as to be barred, and previous to the words laid; the rule held to admit words not actionable, and other actionable words "relating to the same species of crime" either after action begun or previous to the period of limitations; to any broader rule they decline to "yield an unqualified assent"; 1846, Morgan v. Livingston, 2 Rich. 573, 585 ("anterior publications [outlawed by statute], as well as publications after suit brought" of the same charge, admissible); Tenn.: 1812, Howell v. Cheatham, Cooke 247 (repetition admissible, but not after action brought); 1847, Witherspoon v. Richmond, 8 Humph. 475 (repetition since suit begun, admitted as explaining the meaning of the original charge); 1871, Saunders v. Baxter, 6 Heisk. 369, 387 (prior expressions of hatred or ill-will, held admissible, but not subsequent ones, unless as explanatory of the former charge or containing an express admission of malicious intent at the former time); 1899, Russell v. Farrell, 102 Tenn. 248, 52 S. W. 147 (subsequent utterance excluded, unless it involves an explanation or an admission of the former one or of malice in the former one); U. S.: 1836, U. S. v. Crandell, 4 Cr. C. C. 683, 689, 692 (other uttered papers, admitted, "having relation to the libels charged" and not in themselves "substantive ground of prosecution"); 1901, Kansas City Star Co. v. Carlisle, 47 C. C. A. 884, 108 Fed. 344, 356, 362 (plea of justification, admissible if not made in good faith; Sanborn, J., diss. on the ground that the issue of good faith is an improper one); Vt.: 1870, Cavanaugh v. Noble, 42 Vt. 576 (utterances "of a similar character" admissible; here made just before suit begun); 1883, Knapp v. Fuller, 55 id. 311 (subsequent hostile utterance, admitted); Va.: 1839, Lincoln v. Chrisman, 8 Leigh 338, 342, 345 ("slanderous words of the same and like character," though barred by the statute, admitted); 1874, Hansbrough v. Stinnett, 25 Gratt. 495 ("like words antecedent or subsequent," admissible); W. Va.: 1902, Swindell v. Harper, 51 W. Va. 381, 41 S. E. 117 (similar utterances, before and after the utterance in issue, held admissible, if made before action begun); Wis.: 1886, Bradley v. Cramer, 66 Wis. 297, 302, 28 N. W. 372, semble (subsequent utterances, admissible; no rule laid down); 1898, Born v. Rosenow, 84 id. 620, 622, 54 N. W. 1089 (utterances over three years before, admitted).

SUB-TITLE II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

TOPIC X: EVIDENCE TO PROVE IDENTITY.

CHAPTER XV.

§ 410. Other Principles discriminated. In evidencing that proposition commonly spoken of as Identity, there is apt to be a confusion in thought with two other processes which are really not germane.

(1) It is perhaps natural to apply the notion of Identity or Identification to the general process of proving an accused person guilty. He is said to be "identified" as the murderer or the thief; i. e. the whole process of proof and the whole mass of evidence is thought of as involving the "identity" of the accused and the guilty person. From this point of view, all distinctions between the various sorts of evidence heretofore analyzed are merged and become useless. That the accused planned the act, had a motive for the act, bore traces of the act, and so forth, are all merely "identifying" facts; because the real guilty person also must have planned, had a motive, bore traces, and the like. Such an indiscriminate confusion and merger of all sorts of probative elements would render close analysis impossible, and naturally excites suspicion of the propriety of the term "identification" as thus applied. In truth, there is no propriety in it. The very looseness of the term shows that, since the various sorts of evidence thus covered by it may be further analyzed and separated, there would remain no specific need for the term "identity" and no specific class of evidence to which it was distinctively appropriate. If this were the true meaning of the term, it might be discarded altogether as superfluous. The term does have a distinctive application; but this loose and indefinite usage just referred to may be once for all discarded as useless and misleading.

(2) In arguing from subsequent traces of an act to the doing of an act, the argument of Identity sometimes is necessarily involved and needs to be distinguished. Suppose, for example, to prove a murder, evidence is offered that a gun found three days later in the defendant's possession is exactly fitted by a bullet found in the body of the deceased. Here there are two inferences involved: (a) "Because the defendant possessed the gun when found later, therefore he probably possessed it at the time"; this inference is always open to doubt, since the defendant may have borrowed the gun since the killing,

or some third person may have surreptitiously placed the gun on his premises; (b) "Because the gun, thus possessed by the defendant at the time of the killing, fitted the bullet found in the body, therefore the defendant's gun must be the one that shot the deceased"; here the inference is open to doubt because the bullet may fit other guns, i. e. the fitting of the bullet is not a necessary mark of the identity of the gun that shot it. Now the first inference is an inference from subsequent traces to the former act of possession or use of the gun; no question of identity is involved. It is the second inference that involves the element of the identity. This is why much of the evidence herein termed Traces, as pointing back to an Act (ante, §§ 148–177), may incidentally involve a question of Identity. The distinction has been already explained (ante, § 151); and the precedents on that subject are not here to be dealt with.

§ 411. General Principle of Identity-Evidence. Identity may be thought of as a quality of a person or thing, — the quality of sameness with another person or thing. The essential assumption is that two persons or things are thought of as existing, and that the one is alleged, because of common features, to be the same as the other. The process of inference thus has two necessary elements: (1) it is a Concomitant one, in its logical scheme (ante, § 130); and (2) it operates by comparing common marks, found to exist in the two supposed separate objects of thought, with reference to the possibility of their being the same. It follows that its force depends on the necessariness of the association between the mark and a single object. Where a certain circumstance, feature, or mark, may commonly be found associated with a large number of objects, the presence of that feature or mark in two supposed objects is little indication of their identity, because, on the general principle of Relevancy (ante, § 31), the other conceivable hypotheses are so numerous, i. e. the objects that possess that mark are numerous and therefore two of them possessing it may well be different. But where the objects possessing the mark are only one or a few, and the mark is found in two supposed instances, the chances of the two being different are nil or are comparatively small. Hence, in the process of identification of two supposed objects, by a common mark, the force of the inference depends on the degree of necessariness of association of that mark with a single object.

For simplicity's sake, the evidential circumstance may thus be spoken of as "a mark." But in practice it rarely occurs that the evidential mark is a single circumstance. The evidencing feature is usually a group of circumstances, which as a whole constitute a feature capable of being associated with a single object. Rarely can one circumstance alone be so inherently peculiar to a single object. It is by adding circumstance to circumstance that we obtain a composite feature or mark which as a whole cannot be supposed to be associated with more than a single object. The process of constructing an inference of identification thus consists usually in adding together a number of circumstances, each of which by itself might be a feature of many objects, but all of which together can conceivably coexist in a single object only. Each additional circumstance reduces the chances of there being more than one object so associated. The process thus corresponds accurately to the general principle of Relevancy (described ante, §§ 31–33). It may be illustrated by the ordinary case of identification by name. Suppose there existed a parent named John Smith, whose heirs are sought; and there is also a claimant whose parent's name was John Smith. The name John Smith is associated with so many persons that the chances of two supposed persons of that name being different are too numerous to allow us to consider the common mark as having appreciable probative value. But these chances may be diminished by adding other common circumstances going to form the common mark. Add, for instance, another name-circumstance, — as that the name of each supposed person was John Barebones Bonaparte Smith; here the chances of there being two persons of that name, in any district however large, are instantly reduced to a minimum. Or, add a circumstance of locality, — for example, that each of the supposed persons lived in a particular village, or in a particular block of a certain street, or in a particular house; here, again, the chances are reduced in varying degrees in each instance. Or, add a circumstance of family, — for example, that each of the persons had seven sons and five daughters, or that each had a wife named Mary Elizabeth and three daughters named Flora, Delia, and Stella; here the chances are again reduced, in varying degrees, in proportion to the probable number of persons who would possess this composite mark. In every instance, the process depends upon the same principle, — the extent to which the common mark is capable of being associated, in human experience, with more than one object.

§ 412. Test of Admissibility. The only matter that is here of concern is the admissibility of circumstantial evidence of identification; and it will easily be seen that very few questions can arise from this point of view. The usual matter of dispute, when such evidence is offered, is whether it is sufficient to found a presumption, or, as a mass of evidence, to support a verdict; and in this aspect it raises an entirely different question (post, §§ 2490, 2494). So far as there can be any general principle of admissibility, it is perhaps to be stated as follows: A mark common to two supposed objects is receivable to show them to be identical whenever the mark does not in human experience occur with so many objects that the chances of the two supposed objects are too small to be appreciable. But it must be understood that this test applies to the total combination of circumstances offered as a mark, and not to any one circumstance going with others to make it up. The offer must be understood as embracing all the elements combined. On the whole, and in practice, it is seldom practicable and seldom attempted to pass upon the admissibility of identifying circumstances; it is better to wait until all the circumstances have been offered, and then to pass upon them from the point of view of a presumption or the sufficiency of evidence (post, § 2494). If the circumstance has no real probative value, no harm will be done; while if it has such value in combination with other facts, good evidence may be excluded by passing upon it piecemeal; for it usually happens that the whole group of identifying circumstances cannot be put before the Court for a ruling at one point of time. It may be noted that in accordance with the general principle of Explanation (ante, § 34), the party denying the identity may show that there are numerous objects equally possessing the evidential mark offered, so as to show that the chances of the two supposed objects being the same are very small.[1] It may also be noted that a mark of identity may be negative as well as affirmative; i.e. where a certain circumstance would be necessarily associated with an object in issue, the lack of that feature in a particular object offered tends to show that it cannot be the object in issue,[2] — in analogy with the argument from essential inconsistency (ante, §§ 135, 158).

§ 413. Circumstances Identifying a Person. Rulings upon admissibility are for the foregoing reasons comparatively rare.[1] In the reports of celebrated trials are to be found innumerable instances of such evidence;[2] but it is not necessary here either to attempt to analyze the various types of facts or to collate the recorded instances in such trials. Common experience is a usually sufficient test of relevancy in cases of this sort. The precedents in which an express ruling has been called for have dealt with corporal marks,[3] voice,[4] mental peculiarities,[5] clothing,[6] weapons,[7] name,[8] residence, and other circumstances of personal history.[9] The usual question, however, has been

[1] 1859, Cooper v. Stete, 23 Tex. 343 (three sizes of shot being found both in the deceased's body and the defendant's gun, it was shown in explanation that mixed shot was in common use in the neighborhood).

[2] 1895, People v. Thiede, 11 Utah 241, 39 Pac. 837 (where the other man, alleged to have been the real murderer, must have been covered with blood, but was found not to be).

[1] For instances of identifying by Traces circumstantially, see ante, §§ 148–177, and by skill or capacity, ante, §§ 83, 220.

[2] For copious illustrations of the varied circumstances that may be employed to indicate identity, see Hubback, Evidence of Succession, Pt. II, ch. V. (reprinted in the "Law Library," Johnson, Phila., 1845).

[3] 1874, R. v. Castro (Tichborne Case), charge of Cockburn, C. J., II, 1 ff., 307 ff.; I, 670 ff., 718 ff. (tattoo-marks, etc.; but there were no express rulings); 1875, Com. v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 131, 139 (a blow having been inflicted by the left hand, the fact that the defendant is left handed is admissible).

[4] 1903, Patton v. State, — Ga. —, 43 S. E. 533; 1870, Com. v. Williams, 105 Mass. 67; 1866, State v. Shinborn, 46 N. H. 502. Compare the cases cited ante, § 222.

[5] 1850, Webster's Trial, Bemis' Rep. 89 (knowledge of anatomy, as shown in the mode of dissecting the deceased's body, admitted to identify the accused, a medical professor).

[6] 1881, Murdock v. State, 68 Ala. 569, 574 (correspondence of footprints, admitted); 1879, Jones v. State, 63 Ga. 395, 398, 401 (boot-tracks, etc., admitted); 1884 Story v. State, 99 Ind. 413 (clothing of the deceased).

[7] 1895, People v. Yee Fook Din, 106 Cal. 163, 39 Pac. 530 (possession of a weapon excluded, because the weapon was not shown to have been the one used); 1852, People v. Larned, 7 N. Y. 445 (that tools with which a bank was broken had come originally from the defendant's premises, 200 miles away, admitted); 1879, Dean's Case, 32 Gratt. 912, 923 (murder with a gun; "it was proved that upon the examination of a large number of guns within a radius of eight miles of the scene of the murder, none were found of the same bore or which would carry precisely the same ball [as that found in the deceased's body]; two or three only . . . [might have carried it,] but these two or three were accounted for and proved to be where it was impossible the murderer of Fugate could have used them").

[8] Cases cited post, § 2529.

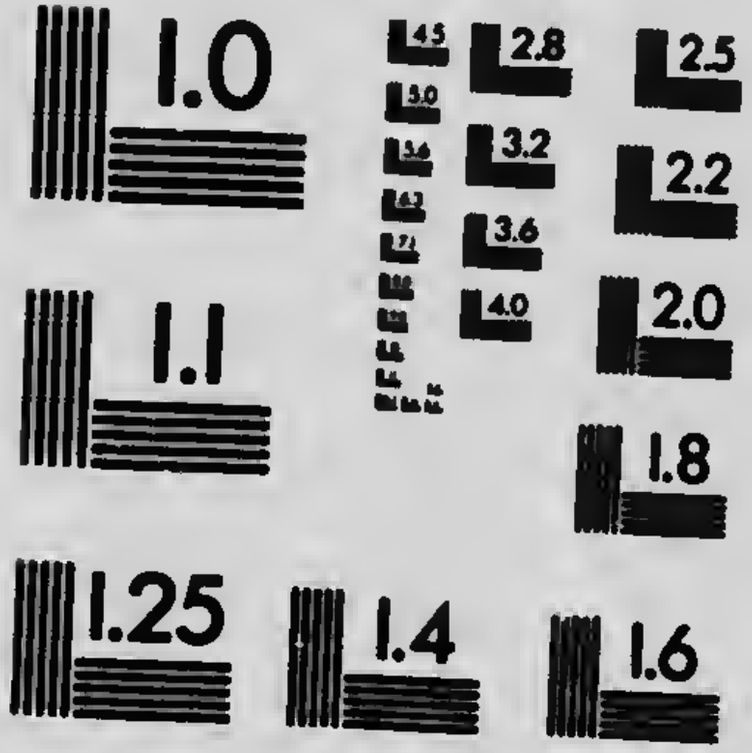
[9] 1885 Lovat Peerage Case, L. R. 10 App. Cas. 763, 775 (statement of deceased members of a family, having no personal knowledge, as to a manslaughter by one of the ancestors, admitted as an identifying tradition, "a story adhering to that Alexander, but not as any evidence of the fact that a fiddler was ever killed by him or by anybody else"); 1876, Com. v. Costello, 120 Mass. 358, 369 (fictitious signature to an appeal bond; name, residence, etc., of the real signer admitted to indicate the fictitious nature of the signer); 1871, Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 224 (that X was known to be with Y and that Y was in a certain place, relevant to show X there); 1875, American Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. 515 (to show that the person whose birth-date was testified to by two persons was the same person referred to by each, the

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

whether some combination of these circumstances is sufficient to support a verdict or raise a presumption (post, § 2529). Additional illustrations may be found in rulings dealing primarily with other principles, — for example, with a person's subsequent belief or conduct as evidence of his past career (ante, § 270), with statements about facts of family history, as an exception to the hearsay rule (post, §§ 1487, 1488, 1501, 1791), and with specimens of spelling as indicating a person's authorship of a writing (post, § 2024). Distinguish the questions whether the opinion rule applies to testimony of identity (post, § 1977), whether a voice may be evidenced by instances of its utterance (ante, § 222), or identified by one who has heard it (post, § 660), and whether a person's identity is sufficiently evidenced by the witness' "belief" or "impression" (post, § 728).

§ 414. Same: Criminality of Act, Immaterial. It has already been seen (ante, § 218) that, where a circumstance is relevant for some purpose, the incidental revelation, in offering it, of other criminal conduct by a defendant is immaterial, and does not stand in the way of receiving the evidence. The principle finds application here as elsewhere.[1] dates of birth of the five other children of the same parents were admitted; here the similarity of circumstances showed that the person referred to was a member of the family in question); 1896, Bryant's Estate, 176 id. 309 35 Atl. 571 (five different sets of claimants asserted the intestate to have been a member of their family, and the identity was ascertained by a careful collation of the facts true of the intestate and the various ancestors alleged).

[1] 1833, R. v. Fursey, 6 C. & P. 83, 3 St. Tr. N. s. 543, 551 (the kind of wound given to a third person by the accused, admitted to identify the weapon); 1836, R. v. Rooney, 7 C. & P. 517 (robbery of W., who was riding with U.; evidence of the finding of U.'s watch on the defendant admitted as identifying him as one of those taking part; "it makes no difference that Mr. U.'s watch is the subject of the next indictment"); 1868, Yarborough v. State, 41 Ala. 405, 407, (disputed identity; the theft of other property, admitted to identify); 1857, People v. Butler, 8 Cal. 435, 439 (a question as to the defendant's business, answered by a statement that he was a gambler, held proper, since it might be relevant to identify the defendant or to test the witness' knowledge of him); 1897, People v. Ebanks, 117 id. 652, 49 Pac. 1049 (murder on Sept. 10; doings of the defendant a few days before, with a pistol and a sack admitted to identify him); 1902, People v. Taylor, 136 id. 19, 69 Pac. 292 (a larceny, admitted to identify); 1874, State v. Folwell, 14 Kan. 105, 109 (larceny of a horse; to identify the defendants, one who saw the wagon-tracks was allowed to say that he knew them because the wagon was his); 1867, State v. Bartlett, 55 Me. 200, 214 (to show a witness' acquaintance with the defendant and ability to identify him, the witness was allowed to say that he was an officer in a State prison; whether he might properly have said that he saw the defendant there was not decided); 1875, Com. v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 123 (three persons found murdered in or about the same house; the fact was admitted that all were killed with the same weapon, at the same time); 1875, Foster v. State, 63 N. Y. 619 (burglary; the taking of another article at the same time, admitted to identify the source of goods found in the defendant's possession); 1880, Hope v. People, 83 id. 419, 423, 427 (robbery of the key of a bank from the cashier; at the time of the robbery of the key, all of the gang of robbers were masked; but upon a showing that the same gang subsequently robbed the bank, the fact was admitted of the defendant's participation in the latter robbery, to identify him); 1881, State v. Wintzingerode, 9 Or. 153, 157 (the identification of a gun used in the murder, and found in the defendant's possession, as one stolen from the deceased, admitted); 1900, State v. O'Donnell, 36 id. 222, 61 Pac. 892 (larceny; possession of other stolen property, not admitted on the facts); 1874, Brown v. Com., 76 Pa. 319, 321, 337 (murder of Annetta K., at her house; the fact was offered of the murder of her husband, Daniel K., at the same time, near the house, with the same weapon, and of the possession of money in the house by the husband and of other circumstances showing that the two murders were committed by the same person; admitted, because "when two persons are murdered at the same time and place, and under circumstances evidencing that both acts were committed by the same person or persons, and were part of one and the same transaction or res gestæ, and tend to throw light on the motive and manner of the murder for which the prisoner is indicted," the second murder is admissible); 1881, Moyer v. Com., 98 id. 338, 349 (similar facts). See additional related instances cited ante, § 218 (inseparable acts).

§ 415. Circumstances identifying a Chattel, Document, or other External Object. The principle applies as well to objects of external nature (a place, book, document, or house) as to human beings. There is no room for the operation of the human will as affecting the validity of the inference, and hence there happens here to be no occasion for the discrimination, otherwise useful, between the second and third sub-titles of the present Title, i. e. evidence to prove a Human Quality or Condition, and evidence to prove a fact of External Nature. The recorded rulings deal with chattels of various sorts,[1] and with documents, written or printed.[2]

§ 416. Utterances used to Identify Time or Place. It often happens that a place or a time is marked significantly by an utterance there or then occurring, so that the identification of it may alone be made, or best be made, by permitting the various witnesses to mention the utterance as an identifying mark. The utterance, not being used as an assertion to prove any fact asserted therein, is not obnoxious to the Hearsay rule (as explained post, § 1791), and may therefore be proved like any other identifying mark:

1865, Colt, J., in Earle v. Earle, 11 All. 1 (the libellant in divorce had called Ellen G. whose testimony tended if unexplained to show that she saw Mrs. E. sitting in the lap of Mr. R. in Mrs. E.'s bedroom; Mr. R. testified that while Mrs. E. was ill in bed in her house Mr. R. on one occasion, at Mrs. R.'s request, took Mrs. E. in his lap to enable Mrs. R. to make the bed, and when Mrs. R. returned after a moment's absence he

[1] 1896, Buchanan v. State, 109 Ala. 7, 19 So. 410 (defendant was charged with larceny from S. of a mixed lot of furnishing goods, ranging from shoe-tacks to shirts; S. had bought from G., who carried a large stock; comparison by the jury of the goods found in defendant's house and the original stock was held improper; no reason given; an absurd ruling); 1896, Crane v. State, 111 Ala. 45, 20 So. 590 (similar to the preceding); 1872, Com. v. Brooks, 109 Mass. 354 (the finding of a watch-ring at a certain place, admitted as evidence that a watch-robbery had taken place there); 1883, Com. v. Collier, 134 id. 203, 205 (to identify a barrel of beer as coming from S., the label of S. on the barrel was admitted; compare § 150, ante); 1888, Com. v. Kendrick, 147 id. 444, 18 N. E. 230 (identity of sampled beer with that possessed by the defendant; evidence "fairly establishing" it in the trial Court's opinion, held sufficient); 1875, DeArmond v. Neasmith, 32 Mich. 232 (gentleness of a heifer); 1882, Keith v. Tilford, 12 Nebr. 276 (11 N. W. 315 (herd of cattle).

For other cases illustrating the principle for stolen goods, compare the citations ante, §§ 148–152, 218.

[2] 1684, Lady Ivy's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 555, 617, 640 (defendant's title-deed shown to be forged because it read, in the recital of date, "the 13th day of November, in the 2d and 3d years of the reigns of our sovereign lord and lady Philip and Mary by the grace of God king and queen of England, Spain, France, both Sicilies, Jerusalem, and Ireland, etc.," although the style of deeds until the next summer, when Philip acceded to the kingdom of Spain, was "king and queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem and Ireland, princes of Spain and Sicily"; this the Court calls "a natural, legal evidence, and a proper evidence in things of this nature to detect a forgery"); 1835, Johnson v. Morgan, 7 A. & E. 233 (libel by a song; to prove the contents of the particular song charged, the paper being lost, it was held sufficient evidence that 1,000 copies of a song had been printed by M., 300 of them put for sale with H., that the song charged had been bought of H., and that it corresponded with one produced which he longed to the 1,000 copies; Coleridge, J.: "There is no rule, respecting the proof of identity, peculiar to the case of a printed paper; the evidence may depend upon correspondence in size, appearance, and other circumstances"); 1900, Carte v. Dennis, 5 N. W. Terr. 32, 45 (infringement of copyright of an opera; a printed copy produced held sufficiently identified); 1849, Com. v. Miller, 3 Cush. 243, 251 (to show that three certain notes were forgeries, thirty others were admitted, as indicating by the identity of marks that they were formed from one pattern by tracing); 1881, Shelden v. Warner, 45 id. 640, 8 N. W. 529 (three similar kinds of ink in each of two documents, used to show an identity of source); 1813, Southwick v. Stevens, 10 John. 443, 446 (the source of a newspaper evidenced by the features of the type).

For other illustrations, see the rulings dealing with opinion testimony to the ink, paper, and other marks of documents (post, §§ 2024–2027), with the production of the original of a newspaper (post, §§ 1234, 1237), and the authentication of printed matter (post, §§ 440, 2150).

said to her that "Ellen had been in"; Mrs. R. testified to a similar effect; to the admission of the statement by Mr. R. to his wife an objection was made): "It was important, as the case stood, for the libellee to satisfy the jury that Mr. and Mrs. R. were testifying to the same occasion. . . . Any circumstance or act occurring at that transaction and remembered by both witnesses would show that they were testifying to the same occasion and would be clearly competent. So we are of opinion that the conversation of the parties or any declarations made at the time are to be regarded as of the nature of verbal acts, and admissible for the purpose of identifying the occasion of which the witnesses speak. Statements used for this limited purpose are admitted without regard to the truth of the fact stated. . . . There is no violation of the rule against hearsay evidence."

This principle is generally accepted; but it is to be understood that the utterance cannot be used as having any assertive value; and some Courts occasionally refuse to allow the specific tenor of the utterance to be stated, where a special danger exists of giving improper credit to it as a hearsay assertion.[1] From this use of identifying utterances by several witnesses testifying to a common time or place, distinguish the following superficially similar uses: (1) mentioning a third person's utterance as a reason for observing a particular fact (post, § 655); (2) mentioning it as a reason for recollecting a particular fact (post, § 730); (3) using one's own prior utterance of a fact to corroborate one's present testimony and repel the suggestion of recent contrivance (post, § 1130).

[1] The principle is illustrated in the following cases: 1846, R. v. Richardson, 2 Cox Cr. 361; Denman, L. C. J., and Alderson, B. (to show the date when a conversation with the accused about poison occurred, the witness was allowed to state a remark which he shortly afterwards made to C. about it, so that by calling C. the time could be fixed; but "of course it could only be used to fix the time of the prisoner's conduct"); 1887, Barrowe v. State, 80 Ga. 194, 5 S. E. 64 (a remark of D. served to mark the time after which a witness obtained certain knowledge); 1899, State v. Dunn, 109 Ia. 750, 80 N. W. 1068 (conversation admitted to fix a date); 1900, Stewart v. Anderson, 111 id. 229, 82 N. W. 770 (similar; left to the trial Court's discretion); 1865, Earle v. Earle, 11 All. 1 (see quotation supra); 1876, Com. v. Piper, 120 Mass. 187; 1877, Com. v. Sullivan, 123 id. 221 (to fix the time of a sale, the fact was admitted of A's testimony to it having been given at a certain time before a magistrate); 1878, Whitney v. Houghton, 125 id. 452 (the time of a sale was in issue; testimony as to the date of a conversation by the defendant in which he mentioned the sale was rejected; if the sale was proved, this seems unsound); 1883, People v. Mead, 50 Mich. 229, 15 N. W. 95 (note that in this Court some of the precedents in §§ 655, 730, post, where utterances fixing one's recollection or attention are held admissible, are used as though they fell under the present head); 1899, Agulino v. R. Co., 21 R. I. 263, 43 Atl. 63 (the fact of A calling B's attention to a circumstance, admitted to corroborate); 1861, Hill v. North, 34 Vt. 616 (time fixed by a remark); 1881, Weeks v. Lyndon, 54 Vt. 640, 647 (similar); 1895, State v. Young, 67 id. 450, 32 Atl. 252 (similar); 1898, Wilkins v. Metcalf, 71 id. 103, 41 Atl. 1035 (similar).

Sub-title III: EVIDENCE TO PROVE FACTS OF EXTERNAL INANIMATE NATURE (EVENTS, CONDITIONS, TENDENCIES, CAUSES, QUALITIES, AND EFFECTS, OF THINGS AND PLACES).

CHAPTER XVI.

INTRODUCTORY.

§ 430. Distinction between this and the preceding Subjects. In the classification of circumstantial evidence, as already observed (ante, § 43), there can be, at certain points, no sharp distinction between a Human Act, a Human Quality or Condition, and a Fact of External Inanimate Nature, with reference to evidencing them as propositions to be proved. Some matters, such as death, may sometimes be viewed in either the first or the second aspect; for other matters, such as the possession of land, it may not be easy to distinguish between the second and the third. The propositions which come to be proved before tribunals of justice embrace every sort of fact in life, and no classification not purely arbitrary can divide them for practical purposes into classes always absolutely distinct. All that can be done is to separate by themselves such facta probanda as are more or less related with reference to the mode of evidencing them and the considerations of probative value affecting the evidentiary facts. The grouping already set forth (ante, § 43) seems to find justifications in such natural considerations. That at the point where the lines of grouping are drawn some obscurity exists is a necessary defect of all such classifications, and does not affect their general validity. The inter-relation of the matters grouped under the first sub-title (evidence to prove a Human Act) has already been seen. Certain sorts of evidentiary facts — Character, Design, Habit, Motive — are specially appropriate and common in proving such matters, and the peculiar restrictions of our law upon the use of character have there constantly to be distinguished from the use of other sorts of related evidence, and make a combined consideration indispensable. The matters in the second sub-title (evidence to prove a Human Quality or Condition) are related with equal closeness. The use of specific instances of conduct, with its appurtenant dangers of unfair surprise, undue prejudice, and confusion of issues, is common to all. The prohibition of character-conduct has constantly to be distinguished from the use of other conduct; and the considerations of probative value and of auxiliary policy which are there applicable must be studied in comparison in order to appreciate their proper significance.

Coming now to the third and present group, we find its distinguishing feature to be the absence of the element of a human will and of the human emotion, reason, and character as affecting conduct. The evidencing of a human act from antecedent or subsequent human attributes, and the evidencing of a human quality or condition from human conduct, involve a class of experience as to the meaning of human attributes and human conduct which is peculiar and distinct. Where the thing to be proved and the evidence to prove it does not contain those elements, the considerations of Relevancy, affecting the inferences to be drawn, are necessarily different, and suggest naturally a distinct grouping for practical purposes. The considerations of Auxiliary Policy, where these human elements are lacking, have also a different force and bearing. Thus, for practical purposes, the third grouping is broadly marked out by considerations essentially connected with the propositions to be proved and the evidence to prove them. While there may easily be doubt and difference of opinion as to the appropriate group for a few topics, the validity of the grouping as a whole is not thereby affected.

The warning must here be repeated (ante, § 43) that for the classification of any evidential question, as well as for the working out of its solution, the only safe and scientific and practical way is to ask perpetually two questions: 1. What is the exact proposition to be proved? 2. What is the evidentiary fact from which the inference is desired to be drawn? With these two data in hand — the abscissa and the coördinate, so to speak, of the problem — most places in the topography of the law of evidence ought easily to be found.

§ 431. General Principles of Relevancy. The general principles of Relevancy, or Probative Value, as already examined, here receive constant and copious illustration. Their application is in some ways more normal and more instructive, because less complicated by the varying considerations of Auxiliary Probative Policy (ante, § 42) which come into play where human conduct is concerned. The exposition of principles (ante, §§ 30–36) will serve as an introduction to the treatment of the ensuing precedents; but specific reference to the various principles is also made, as occasion requires, at the appropriate places.

§ 432. Division of Topics. The kinds of facta probanda may be subdivided, having regard to those propositions evidenced by more or less associated facts and inferences, into four categories or groups:

I. Identity (for example, whether a machine delivered was the same as the one agreed to be delivered);

II. Occurrence of an Event (for example, whether a tree fell, or whether lightning struck a house);

III. Existence, or Persistence, in Time (for example, whether a defect in a street or a house was in existence at the time in issue);

IV. Tendency, Capacity, Quality, Cause, or Effect (for example, whether a place in a sidewalk was dangerous, or whether a gunshot could carry a certain distance).

Here, again, no specific single terms can accurately distinguish the different groups, nor is it possible always to draw the lines sharply between the various groups. The practical justification for the grouping will be best appreciated in consulting the precedents. Under one or another of these heads seem to come all the evidential questions that concern external inanimate nature.

It has already been seen (ante, § 43) that, for the purpose of grouping evidential facts involving similar inferences, it is usually convenient to arrange them according as the inference is Prospectant, Concomitant, or Retrospectant, i. e. according as a view is taken forward in time from the evidentiary fact to the factum probandum, or concurrently at the two, or backward from the former to the latter. This distinction, which has been seen to be practically useful in both the preceding groups of evidential material, is here equally useful in most of the topics.

§ 433. Combination of Different Inferences. A given evidentiary fact may and usually does involve (as already observable in dealing with the other materials) more than one of these processes of inference. For example, in proving a sidewalk-hole to be unsafe, the evidence may be that A fell there two weeks ago; this involves, first, an inference in the fourth group, namely, that the place was then unsafe, and, secondly, an inference in the third group, namely, that its unsafeness two weeks before evidences its unsafeness at the time in issue; and either of these inferences may be rejected as unsound, while the other remains sound. Again, to prove the identity of a bale of goods delivered, its features six months before may be offered; and this involves the soundness of two inferences, one of the first and one of the third sort. Again, the question being whether a tree was lying across a street on January 1, the evidentiary fact that the tree was struck by lightning on July 1 preceding involves two inferences, namely, that the tree fell when struck, and that its fallen condition continued till the time in question, i. e. an inference of the second and one of the third sorts. Again, to show that a dust-explosion occurred in a certain room, the evidentiary fact that a dust-explosion previously occurred in the same room involves two and perhaps three inferences, — first, that there is a tendency in a room thus circumstanced for the dust to explode spontaneously, secondly, that as a result of this tendency an explosion did occur, and perhaps (intervening between these two), thirdly, that the condition at the previous time continued up to the time in question, — inferences, respectively, of the fourth, the second, and the third sorts.

In spite, however, of this incidental resort to two or more of the kinds of inference in one piece of evidence, the kinds of inference, as types, remain distinct. They are governed by distinct considerations and must be studied separately. Without analyzing them and studying them separately, nothing but confusion results. It has already been seen, for instance (ante, § 192), that in offering to prove an immoral act for the purpose of showing the same person to have done an act charged, we cannot neglect to separate the process of thought into its two elements of inference, i. e. (1) A's immoral act indicates probably an immoral trait; (2) this trait indicates the doing of the act in question; for while in general both of these forms of argument are forbidden, yet the prohibition is a limited one only and rests on distinct grounds for each, and thus it may happen that the immoral act offered in the particular case does not come within the prohibition of (1), nor does the immoral trait evidenced by it come within the prohibition of (2) — as, where the intercourse of a rape-complainant with a third person is offered to show the probability of her consent. The same analysis and caution is here necessary in order to avoid being misled by the superficial nature of an evidentiary fact. It is easy to misuse a rule by ignoring the reasons for it.

Topic I: Identity.

§ 434. Identity of one Object with Another. The mode of inference used in proving identity is precisely the same for objects of inanimate nature and for human beings. The principle has been already examined (ante, §§ 411–416), and the precedents upon the present subject have been there considered; so that no further notice of the subject is necessary.

Topic II: Occurrence of an Event.

§ 435. Scope of the Subject. This term (the Occurrence of an Event) may serve as a generalization to cover all cases where a thing is thought of as coming into being or of producing a result, and includes therefore theoretically matters which might perhaps be conceived of also under the category of Existence. For example, if the factum probandum be the destruction of a house, it might ordinarily be conceived of either as an event — the momentary fact of destruction, — or as a condition of existence — the state of being destroyed.[1] For practical evidential purposes, however, the choice of terms is here not important. The distinction between the second and the third groups is the distinction between the mere fact of occurrence or existence as such, and the fact of occurrence or existence with reference to time. In the present group it is asked how to prove the fact of destruction or non-destruction; and, with reference to the evidentiary matters pointing forward as causes of its probable destruction or pointing backwards as effects or traces of its destruction, it is immaterial whether we regard "event" or "condition," "occurrence" or "existence," as the more appropriate term for this category. In the mass of instances the notion of the occurrence of an event is the more appropriate term; and that term (subject to an exception pointed out post, § 437) will be employed as the general one.

§ 436. Occurrence of an Event, as evidenced from Cause or Effect. An event may be evidenced circumstantially by a cause or by an effect. This mode of inference is available in the three forms already mentioned (ante, § 432), — Prospectant, Retrospectant, and Concomitant. For example, the sinking of a ship is evidenced prospectantly by the presence of a storm in the vicinity; the occurrence of a fire is evidenced retrospectantly by the blackened ruins left as its traces; the revolution of car-wheels is evidenced concomitantly, by the motion of the car, to the person riding in it. This type of inference, though perhaps in practice the commonest of all, gives rise, nevertheless, to practically no judicial rulings. One reason for their rarity is that, for the occurrences of external or inanimate nature, testimonial evidence is commonly abundant. Another reason is that, where circumstantial evidence is resorted to, the instinctive logic which suggests the offer of evidence will also suffice to convince the tribunal and the opponent of its propriety; nobody, for instance, would object to the offer of certain blackened and charred wood as evidencing a fire. Still another reason is that, where the desired inference transcends the scope of ordinary instinct and experience, it is offered as the subject of a testimonial knowledge or opinion by an expert witness,— as where a physician testifies that froth in the lungs of a corpse evidences a certain kind of death. Another reason is that most events of external nature are associated with some human act, and hence the proof involves evidence of the act.[1] But a reason the most important for present purposes is that an inference of this type, though in form the first one to be put forward as the main inference, frequently — if not usually — resolves itself into another of a different type, and the evidential question comes to turn upon the other. This feature it is necessary to explain more fully. The process may be examined for each of the three modes of inference in turn,— prospectant (inference from a prior or causal fact), retrospectant (inference from an effect), and concomitant:

[1] "When successive phenomena are in question, these abstracted portions [factum probandum and evidentiary fact] may always themselves be viewed as events, even where so uneventful as hardly to deserve the name in popular language. Thus, where any quality of any thing changes ever so slightly — say, when a thermometer rises one degree —, we have what is here considered an 'event.' . . . It may seem [in these examples] strange to call a large river or a large town 'events,' but here the names are only used elliptically, for the growth of the town and the continued existence of the river." (Sidgwick, Fallacies, 333, 338.)

(1) Prior Cause, as the basis of inference. That a corporal injury will cause a permanent disability to work; that noxious fumes will cause the destruction of herbage; — these are examples of this sort of inference. The evidential offer may be put in this way: The fact of injury is offered as evidence that at a future time there will ensue an inability to work; the fact of noxious fumes is offered as evidence that at a future time there will ensue no herbage. Such evidential offers would unquestionably be recognized as proper. But in practice these offers involving an argument from cause to effect do not raise any evidential questions in the above form, but resolve themselves into others; and this in two chief ways: (a) Where the desired inference is to an unknown or future effect or state of things which it is said the evidential fact will probably cause, the inference rests on an important assumption which in its turn becomes the subject of a new evidential question. To take the second illustration above, and state it more accurately: The fact of these fumes having a tendency to destroy herbage evidences that in future they will probably result in destroying the herbage in question. Now the evidential offer is in this shape unquestionably sound; but this form of statement — while accurately illustrating the present type of argument — brings out the necessity of proving, in its turn, a fact of a new and different category, viz. this assumed tendency of the fumes to destroy herbage; and this fact of tendency (or capacity) is seen to be in reality the probable point of controversy. It is in attempting to evidence this alleged tendency that the troublesome evidential questions arise; and these questions, so numerous in practice, involve a different sort of inference and different considerations both of probative value and of collateral inconvenience (herein dealt with post, §§ 441–464). (b) Where the desired inference is as to the cause of a concededly existing state of things or occurred event, the same situation is usually reproduced. Thus, in the above illustration, where herbage is conceded to have been destroyed, and the dispute is whether the fumes in question were the cause of the destruction, the evidential suggestion that something harmful to herbage was the cause which would probably effect the destruction of the herbage would plainly be proper; its relevancy is apparent. But the real point of controversy here, as in the preceding class of cases, now comes to be this supposed tendency of these particular fumes to destroy herbage; and it is in the process of evidencing this tendency that the evidential difficulties arise; and these, as just noted, involve different principles.

[1] See examples under §§ 148–160, ante, which otherwise might be appropriately dealt with here.

(2) Subsequent Effect, as the basis of inference. That the falling barometer indicates the existence of an atmospheric disturbance; that the derailed car indicates the prior occurrence of a collision or other destructive event; — these are instances of inferences from effect back to the existence of a cause. Such inferences, however, rarely raise evidential questions in practice, for reasons the same as those just explained. Thus, in the illustration above used, the destruction of the herbage is evidently relevant, without question, as indicating the same destructive influence of atmosphere, soil, or the like; but in the further process of fixing on the fumes in question as the precise cause, either we proceed to offer that specific inference through an expert witness, who asserts as a matter of professional experience that the appearance of the herbage indicates specific fumes as the source (in which case no questions of circumstantial relevancy arises), or, in attempting otherwise to fix upon the fumes as one of the probable destructive influences, it must first be shown that they have this tendency to destroy herbage; so that in evidencing this tendency, the argument sets up new auxiliary inferences, and has travelled into the scope of a new category of fact. Thus, in general, the inference from an effect to the existence or operation of a cause is usually so proper as to be unquestionable, or else leads to a new controversy as to whether the supposed cause has any causing tendency of the alleged sort, and this new controversy involves a different sort of inference.

(3) Concomitant Events, as the basis of inference. An event cannot be inferred from its concomitant event except on the assumption that they have a common cause, or unless the inference is really not one of concomitancy but of cause and effect. An example of the latter sort is the inference of fire from smoke, i. e. it is really the inference of fire as a cause from smoke as the effect. An example of the former sort is the inference of revolving wheels from the motion of the car, i. e. there is really an inference, first from the motion to the motive power as a cause, and next, from the motive power to the revolution of the wheels as a common effect of the same cause. In some instances, however, for practical purposes, this latter analysis may be neglected and the inference treated as a single one; these instances are dealt with in the next sections. Otherwise, no separate problem is involved in this form of argument.

Topic III: EXISTENCE (OR, PERSISTENCE) IN TIME.

There is, in strictness, no place for a separate category of mere Existence, as distinguished from Occurrence; for, as already suggested (ante, § 435), the notion of a thing's either coming into being or of its having been in being is an inclusive and single notion, with reference to which inferences from cause or from effect may equally be made. Thus in inferring future disability from corporal injury, it is immaterial whether the former be termed the occurrence of an event or the existence of a condition; the inquiry is merely how far we may infer towards it from something else as its cause or its effect; and the term Occurrence has therefore been employed (ante, § 435) as the one most generally applicable to the factum probandum. Nevertheless, it is convenient to separate, for some purposes, a category of Existence in Time as the factum probandum, i. e. those instances in which the Existence in Time of an object, condition, or quality is to be evidenced by a prior, subsequent, or concomitant existence. The inference may, as usual, be of one of these three general types; but the first two are not dissimilar in their operation, and may be considered together.

§ 437. (1) Existence, from Prior or Subsequent Existence; General Principle, applied in Sundry Instances (Highways, Machines, Buildings, Railway Tracks, etc.). When the existence of an object, condition, quality, or tendency at a given time is in issue, the prior existence of it is in human experience some indication of its probable persistence or continuance at a later period. The degree of probability of this continuance depends on the chances of intervening circumstances having occurred to bring the existence to an end. The possibility of such circumstances will depend almost entirely on the nature of the specific thing whose existence is in issue and the particular circumstances affecting it in the case in hand. That a soap-bubble was in existence half-an-hour ago affords no inference at all that it is in existence now; that Mt. Everest was in existence ten years ago is strong evidence that it exists yet; whether the fact of a tree's existence a year ago will indicate its continued existence to-day will vary according to the nature of the tree and the conditions of life in the region. So far, then, as the interval of time is concerned, no fixed rule can be laid down; the nature of the thing and the circumstances of the particular case must control.

Similar considerations affect the use of subsequent existence as evidence of existence at the time in issue. Here the disturbing contingency is that some circumstance operating in the interval may have been the source of the subsequent existence, and the propriety of the inference will depend on the likelihood of such intervening circumstances having occurred and been the true origin. On landing at New York it can hardly be inferred that the steamer at the next dock has been there for a week; but it may usually be inferred that the dock has been there for some years; while the particular circumstances of appearance and the like will in the last instance affect the length of time to which the inference could be carried back. Here, as with prior indications, the interval of time to which any inference will be allowable must depend upon the nature of the thing and the circumstances of the particular case.

The opponent, on the principle of Explanation (ante, § 34), may always attempt to explain away the effect of the evidence by showing that in the meantime other circumstances have occurred to raise a probability of change instead of continuance.

This general principle that a prior or subsequent existence is evidential of a later or earlier one has been repeatedly laid down, and has even been spoken of as a Presumption (post, § 2530):

1820, Best, J., in R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 124: "I am to presume a thing always [to have been] in the state in which it is found, unless I have evidence that at some previous time it was in a different state."

1847, Sandford, V. C., in Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 744: "It is a rule of evidence, founded on the experience of human affairs, that where a state of things is once established by proof, the law presumes that such a state of things continues until the contrary is shown or a different presumption is raised from the nature of the subject in question."

1867, Bigelow, C. J., in Com. v. Billings, 97 Mass. 405: "Facts and circumstances in their nature continuous may always be shown to exist anterior to the precise period when it is necessary to show their existence, unless the interval is too great to afford a reasonable inference that the same state or condition of things has remained unchanged."

1869, Colt, J., in Thayer v. Thayer, 101 id. 113: "The rule is that a condition once proved is presumed to have been produced by causes operating in the usual way, and to have continuance till the contrary be shown."[1]

That no fixed rule can be prescribed as to the time or the conditions within which a prior or subsequent existence is evidential, is sufficiently illustrated by the precedents, from which it is impossible (and rightly so) to draw a general rule. They may be roughly grouped into two classes, — those in which the evidence has been received without any preliminary showing as to the influential circumstances remaining the same in the interval (thus leaving it to the opponent to prove their change by way of explanation in rebuttal), and those in which such a preliminary showing is required. Whether it should be required must depend entirely on the case in hand, and it is useless to look or to wish for any detailed rules. The precedents show the principle applied to all manner of subjects, — to the condition of a highway,[2] or

[1] The contrary statement, as to subsequent existence, by Gray, C. J., in Chandler v. Aqueduct Co., 122 Mass. 307 (1877), is wholly unsound; and has been repudiated by the next remark in Laplante v. Mills, Mass., infra: "It is said that presumptions do not run backward; but that depends on the case."

[2] 1900, Dean v. Sharon, 72 Conn. 667, 45 Atl. 963 (the sameness of a highway's condition being shown, its condition after the accident was admitted); 1895, Hunt v. Dubuque, 96 Ia. 314, 65 N. W. 319 (condition of a sidewalk a year before, admissible, if substantially unchanged); 1899, Bailey v. Centreville, 108 id. 20, 78 N. W. 831 (subsequent condition, unchanged, of a sidewalk, admitted); 1881, Barrenberg v. Boston, 137 Mass. 231 (condition of a sidewalk as to ice, before and after the time in issue, admitted); 1902, Tobin v. Brimfield, 182 id. 117, 65 N. E. 28 (condition of a highway four or five days after an accident, held not improperly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); 1892, Fuller v. Jackson, 92 Mich. 197, 203, 52 N. W. 1075 (condition of a sidewalk-plank the next morning, admitted); 1898, Hall v. Austin, 73 Minn. 134, 75 N. W. 1121 (rotten condition of planking a week later, admitted); 1895, Link v. R. Co., 165 Pa. 75, 30 Atl. 820, 822 (condition of a sidewalk two days later, admitted); 1898, Potter v. Natural Gas Co., 183 id. 575, 39 Atl. 7

of a bridge[3] or of a railway track, station, or roadbed,[4] or of a stream,[5] or of premises, without[6] or within,[7] or of machinery and apparatus,[8] or of a stock of goods,[9] or of sundry articles,[10] or of the condition of a human

(similar condition of pipe in a road up to a few weeks previous, admitted); 1897, Rosenbaum v. Shoffner, 98 Tenn. 624, 40 S. W. 1086 (condition of the place of an accident next day, admitted); 1902, Bell v. Spokane, 30 Wash. 508, 71 Pac. 31 (subsequent condition of a sidewalk, admitted); 1893, Schwenke v. Pine River, 84 Wis. 668, 677, 51 N. W. 1007 (condition of a highway at a later time, admitted). See also, for this inference in combination with others, the cases cited post, Bailey v. Trumbull, Conn., § 458; Hudson v. R. Co., Ia., § 458; Stone v. Ins. Co., Mich., § 460; Quinlan v. Utica, Gillrie v. Lockport, N. Y., § 458.

[3] 1894, Jessup v. Osceola Co., 92 Ia. 178, 60 N. W. 485 (condition of bridge-planking, etc., a few days afterwards, admitted); 1894, Washington C. & A. T. v. Case, 80 Md. 36, 30 Atl. 571 (decayed condition of a bridge nearly a year after an accident, admitted; but the fact of subsequent need of repairs fourteen months after the accident was excluded).

[4] 1890, Birmingham U. R. Co. v. Alexander, 93 Ala. 133, 136, 9 So. 525 (injury at a railroad track; its condition from one to five months thereafter, admitted, where coupled with evidence that its condition had remained unchanged); 1889, Dyson v. R. Co., 57 Conn. 24, 17 Atl. 137 (the condition of a railroad crossing in winter was shown, the accident having taken place in summer when the trees were in leaf); 1899, Cunningham v. R. Co., 72 id. 244, 43 Atl. 1047 (prior condition of a rail as to elevation above highway, admitted); 1882, Pennsylvania Co. v. Boylan, 104 Ill. 595, 599 (defective planks in a culvert; the lasting capacity of repairs made nine months before, admitted to show whether there was need for repairs at the time); 1885, Hipsley v. R. Co., 88 Mo. 348, 354 (injury by derailment; condition of the roadbed other than at time of accident, excluded); 1887, Stoker v. R. Co., 91 id. 509, 516, 4 S. W. 389 (condition of a culvert, as to overflowing, from one to three years before or after, excluded; but such condition is admissible "within such reasonable time as will from the nature and circumstances of the case induce or justify a reasonable presumption or inference that the condition is the same and unchanged"); 1899, Agulino v. R. Co., 21 R. I. 263, 43 Atl. 63 (lighting of a station; its condition at prior and subsequent times, excluded on the facts as too remote); 1897, Hampton v. R. Co., 120 N. C. 534, 27 S. E. 96 (appearance of the place of an accident more than two years later, after changes had occurred, excluded).

[5] 1873, Lewin v. Simpson, 38 Md. 468, 483 (the overflow of back-water since suit begun, admitted to show the overflow before that time, in connection with a showing that the grade, etc., remained the same); 1873, Brooke v. Winters, 39 Md. 509 (the flow of a mill-stream after suit begun, admitted to show its flow before that time; but subject to the opponent's explanation as to the recent operation of other causes); 1861, Dewey v. Williams, 43 N. H. 384, 387 (diversion of a mill-stream; measurements of water-heights while the conditions "remained substantially unchanged," admitted).

[6] 1894, Osgood v. Chicago, 154 Ill. 194, 41 N. E. 40 (subsequent condition admitted, where the premises taken by eminent domain had changed somewhat between the taking and the trial); 1878, Ulrich v. People, 39 Mich. 245 (rape; condition of the field, where it was said to have occurred, more than a month later, as showing no traces of a struggle, excluded); 1898, Beardslee v. Columbia Tp., 188 Pa. 496, 41 Atl. 618 (place of accident; subsequent condition admissible, if substantial identity is not changed, and changes are pointed out; the trial Court's discretion to control).

[7] 1895, Colorado M. & I. Co. v. Rees, 21 Colo. 435, 42 Pac. 42 (previous open condition of an elevator-door, admitted, to show the defective absence of a lock); 1898, Sievers v. P. B. & L. Co., 151 Ind. 642, 50 N. E. 877 (condition of an elevator after an injury, admitted); 1896, Marston v. Dingley, 88 Me. 546, 34 Atl. 414 (subsequent condition of a habitation, admitted); 1877, Com. v. Powers, 123 Mass. 244 (keeping liquor with intent to sell; the condition of the room on the next day, as to fixtures, etc., admitted); 1900, Barker v. Mfg. Co., 176 id. 203, 57 N. E. 366 (subsequent condition as to the amount of steam in a room, admitted); 1901, Toland v. Paine F. Co., 179 id. 501, 61 N. E. 52 (condition of stairs four hours later, admitted); 1893, Leidlein v. Meyer, 95 Mich. 586, 591, 55 N. W. 367 (condition of premises injured by water, a year later, excluded).

[8] 1898, Rockford C. R. Co. v. Blake, 74 Ill. App. 175, 173 Ill. 354, 50 N. E. 1070 (prior condition of car-brakes, received); 1900, Powers v. R. Co., 175 Mass. 466, 56 N. E. 710 (condition of a locomotive step, some time before and after, lack of change of condition not being shown, held not improperly excluded); 1903, Boucher v. Robeson Mills, 182 id. 500, 65 N. E. 819 (condition of defective machine-belt at time of trial, admitted, though altered by repair); 1903, Hannum v. Hill, 52 W. Va. 166, 43 S. E. 223 (condition of a broken telephone wire some months before and after the time in issue, excluded).

[9] 1896, Scottish U. & N. I. Co. v. Stubbs, 98 Ga. 754, 27 S. E. 180 (an inventory of a stock of goods, made shortly before the fire and while another owned them, admitted).

[10] 1885, Mulliner v. Bronson, 114 Ill. 510, 513, 2 N. E. 671 (timber warranted of a certain quality when delivered; its quality after sawing and while being shipped, admitted; the opponent to show if possible that damage had occurred on the way); 1896, Laplante v. Mills, 165 Mass. 487, 43 N. E. 294 (the condition of a ladder two body [11] or of an animal.[12] The matter should be left entirely to the trial Court's discretion. That the opponent may explain away the inference by other circumstances (as already noted) is also illustrated by the precedents.[13]

These applications of the principle are analogous to the use of the same inference in evidencing, from prior or subsequent condition, a human quality, — habit, possession, ownership, partnership, and solvency (ante, § 382), emotion (ante, §§ 395–406), physical capacity (ante, § 225), insanity (ante, § 233), and character (post, §§ 1617, 1618). In the proof of a place or person by photographs (post, § 792), the principle is frequently applied. Distinguish, however, the prohibition against using the subsequent repaired condition of a place or a machine as an admission of negligence (ante, § 283), and the propriety of using a prior dangerous condition as evidence of notice (ante, § 252).

§ 438. (2) Existence, from Concurrent Existence; the Whole evidenced by the Parts, etc. (Highways, Railway Tracks, Premises, etc.). The process of thought by which one thing concurrently indicates another rests on the assumption that in human experience the one is likely to be found associated with the other. This assumption, then, in one form or another, must underlie any attempt to evidence the latter by showing the concurrent existence of the former. For practical purposes the situations may be grouped under three heads.

(a) Miscellaneous Instances. That the presence of smoke indicates the concurrent presence of combustion; that in coming upon sea-water in its natural place we are likely to come upon fish; that on apple-trees fruit is likely to be found in season, — these are illustrations of the form which this inference most usually takes. This form, however, is but superficially a concurrent indication; almost every apparent inference is in reality a prospectant one, i. e. from cause to effect. That apple-trees are likely to pro-years after the accident, admitted, as involving the permanent and therefore unchanged structure of the ladder; "it is said that presumptions do not run backward; but that depends on the case"); 1865, Yates v. People, 32 N. Y. 512 (the question was whether the street-light would have shown the accused that his pursuer was an officer, and evidence of the light's power just before the trial was excluded); 1875, Linsday v. People, 63 id. 143, 147, 156 (blood-spots on a board; see post, § 451); 1878, King v. R. Co., 72 id. 608 (subsequent condition of a piece of iron, admitted, the circumstances remaining the same); 1894, Foote v. Woodworth, 66 Vt. 216, 220, 28 Atl. 1034 (issue as to the soiled state of jars; test with a piece of paper, excluded, the conditions at the time in issue not being shown the same).

[11] 1893, People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 648, 652, 33 Pac. 791 (murder; vest taken from deceased's body after burial, admitted, after evidence that condition remained the same); 1897, West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Kennedy Cahill, 165 Ill. 496, 46 N. E. 368 (appearance of a person before and after an injury, admitted to show the source of illness); 1885, Williams v. State, 64 Md. 390, 1 Atl. 887 (condition of a human body some time after burial, admitted); 1892, French v. Wilkinson, 93 Mich. 322, 324, 53 N. W. 530 (injury by bite of dog; state of the limb three years later, excluded). Compare the cases cited ante, § 225.

[12] 1874, Kansas S. Y. Co. v. Couch, 12 Kan. 612, 614 (to show the condition of cattle in Kansas in November, the fact of the condition of the cattle in Cherokee in October was rejected; "the fact that a thing is in a certain condition at one time is some proof that it is in the same condition at some subsequent time; but proof of this kind is usually confined to such things as are not liable to change suddenly or rapidly, and it is generally admissible only where better evidence cannot be obtained"); 1875, Freyman v. Knecht, 78 Pa. 141, 143 (a mare with diseased eyes; condition a year after the sale, admitted if the condition in the meantime was also shown).

[13] E. g., Dyson v. R. Co., Conn.; Brooke v. Winters, Md., supra.

duce apples; that fire is likely to produce smoke, — such are the true forms of these arguments upon analysis. There are few, if any, genuine instances of concurrent argument of this sort;[1] and no rules of evidence have had occasion to be laid down. The inference in its true form has already been examined (ante, § 436, par. 3).

(b) Existence of the Whole inferred from a Part, or of one Part from Another. To argue to the whole from a part, or to one part from another, is also, in the last analysis, an argument from one effect of a common cause to another effect. But for practical purposes it is sufficient to treat the inference as an immediate one. The condition of the inference's propriety is that in human experience the whole has been found probably to exist with certain related parts; it is then admissible to use the existence of one of the parts as evidence from which to infer the presence of the whole or of one of the associated parts, — as where, observing a floating iceberg, it is inferred that beneath the water's surface is a larger mass of ice in the proportion usually found associated with such a mass above water; or where on observing, from one side of a locomotive, two driving-wheels, we infer that on the other side there are two similar ones. This sort of inference is common enough in trials, but does not seem to have raised any difficulties requiring rulings.

(c) Condition or Quality in one Place, from Condition or Quality in Another. Logically of the same nature as the preceding, but in practice having a slightly different aspect, is the inference frequently desired to be made from the nature of a condition or quality in one place to the condition or quality at another place, usually in the vicinity. The logical assumption is that by a common cause or causes uniform effects have been produced over a given area, which is thenceforth related to the evidential place as a homogeneous whole to its parts. In practical application, therefore, the requirement is that the two places should be so related that they probably form parts of a homogeneous area including them both; and in such case the condition or quality of the one place is relevant to show the condition or quality of the other. This principle receives frequent application, — to highways,[2]

[1] See Sidgwick, Fallacies, 333, for an exposition of this.

[2] 1875, Taylor v. Monroe, 43 Conn. 42 (rejecting the fact of the safe condition of a place as shown by tests made at a different part where the conditions were different); 1899, Cunningham v. R. Co., 72 id. 244, 43 Atl. 1047 (condition of rail as to elevation above highway at other parts of a street, excluded); 1888, Hoyt v. Des Moines, 76 Ia. 430, 41 N. E. 63 (cited post, § 458); 1891, Riley v. Iowa Falls, 83 id. 761, 50 N. W. 33 (the condition of other planks "along the place of that accident," admitted); 1897, Faulk v. Iowa Co., 103 id. 442, 72 N. W. 757 (defect in a railing at or near the place in question, admitted); 1899, Bailey v. Centreville, 108 id. 20, 78 N. W. 831 (condition of sidewalk 200 feet away, admitted); 1875, Brooks v. Acton, 117 Mass. 204 (injury at a ridge of ice and snow across the highway; to show its height, which was disputed, the fact of the depth of the snow in the adjoining woods was excluded, because the conditions were dissimilar); 1890, Campbell v. Kalamazoo, 80 Mich. 655, 660, 45 N. W. 652, semble (condition of other parts of the sidewalk fronting the same lot, admitted); 1894, Edwards v. Three Rivers, 102 id. 153, 60 N. W. 451 (injury at a sidewalk; "condition of the walk in the vicinity," admitted); 1896, Wiel v. Mendon, 108 id. 251, 66 N. W. 58 (condition of the sidewalk several rods away, admitted); 1897, Canfield v. Jackson, 112 id. 120, 70 N. W. 444 (condition of the sidewalk in the vicinity of the accident, admitted); 1897, Haynes v. Hillsdale, 113 id. 44, 71 N. W. 466 (defects in other parts of the sidewalk built at the same time, admitted); 1902, Styles v. Decatur, — id. —, 91 N. W. 622 ("general char-

to railway tracks, stations, and roadbeds,[3] to machines, buildings, and other structures,[4] to natural growths and formations, weather conditions, and the like.[5] It would be a mistake to attempt to ereet these specific rulings into hard-and-fast precedents; the law should do no more than recognize the general prineiple, leaving it entirely to the trial Court to apply it to each ease. The steam-hammer of the Supreme Court is not needed to erack such nuts.

§ 439. Same: Samples as Evidence of an Entire Lot. It is on the present prineiple that a sample is receivable in evidenee to show the quality or acter and condition of that walk," admitted; 1881, Kelly v. R. Co., 28 Minn. 98, 100, 9 N. W. 588 (cited post, § 458); 1899, Lyons v. Red Wing, 76 id. 20, 78 N. W. 868 (condition of the adjacent sidewalk, admitted); 1894, Emerson v. Lebanon, 67 N. H. 579, 39 Atl. 466 (condition of a highway-railing four years before, excluded on the facts); 1886, Osborne v. Detroit, 36 Fed. 36, 38 (injury at a defective sidewalk; condition at another place near by, admitted, but on the theory that it would have led to notice of the defect in question); 1899, Conrad v. Ellington, 104 Wis. 367, 80 N. W. 456 (highway injury; general bad condition of the road in the vicinity two days before, admitted); 1901, Vieliesse v. Green Bay, 110 id. 160, 85 N. W. 665 (sidewalk-condition "as far as the walk runs lengthwise," admitted); 1903, Hoffmann v. North Milwaukee, — id. —, 95 N. W. 274 (bad condition of a sidewalk across the street, admitted, not to show the condition at the place in issue, but to negative the plaintiff's negligence in going on the latter part).

For the use of such facts to evidence notice, see ante, § 252.

[3] 1885, Cleveland C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Newell, 104 Ind. 264, 267, 3 N. E. 836 (injury by derailment through a broken rail; the breaking of another rail at the same place on the same morning, admitted); 1875, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Fox, 11 Bush 505 (injury by a defective railroad track; the defective condition of other portinns of the same section, excluded as too remote); 1898, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Henry, — Ky. —, 44 S. W. 428 (other holes in a station-platform, excluded; the present principle not noticed); 1893, Turner v. R. Co., 158 Mass. 266, 33 N. E. 520 (to prove that a frog became unblocked, not a short time before the accident, but long before, the fact of others being unblocked in the same vicinity was used, on the ground that they would probably not all have come unblocked at once); 1878, Grand R. & I. R. Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537, 540 (injury by derailment; defects in the track "where it was injured or displaced," admissible, but not "away from the scene of the injury"); 1883, Morse v. R. Co., 30 Minn. 465, 16 N. W. 358 (injury to an engineer, alleged to have happened through a broken rail and a defective switch; the fact was rejected of other defects in the same yard, because they were not shown to be the apparent result of the same causes); 1885, Hipsley v. R. Co., 88 Mo. 348, 354 (injury by derailment; condition of the roadbed other than "at ... place of and the immediate vicinity of" ...cident, excluded); 1887, Sidekum v. R. Co., ... Mo. 400, 405, 4 S. W. 701 (derailment; the preceding case approved); 1871, Reed v. R. Co., 45 N. Y. 574, 576, 580, semble (defective ties, etc.; defective condition of the road half a mile away, excluded).

[4] 1886, Fort Wayne v. Coombs, 107 Ind. 87, 7 N. E. 743 (a neighboring break in a sewer, admitted to show that the materials were defective); 1897, Snyder v. Albion, 113 Mich. 275, 71 N. W. 475 (decayed condition of timber in other parts of the same bridge, admitted); 1899, Rose v. St. Louis, 152 Mo. 602, 54 S. W. 440 (injury from the falling of a cornice-stone alleged to be rotten; condition of other stones in the cornice allowed to be shown); 1879, Plummer v. Ossipee, 59 N. H. 57 (Allen, J.: "The accident happened by the carriage running upon the log at its west end. The east end of the log was admitted to be in the highway. . . . Evidence of wheel marks upon the east end of the log was evidence of an obstruction at that place; and whether it was evidence of an obstruction at the place of the accident depended upon the similarity in size, form, and position, with reference to the travel upon the highway, of the west end of the log with the east end"); 1882, Randall v. Tel. Co., 54 Wis. 140, 11 N. W. 419 (injury by a fallen telegraph line; the fallen condition of the line at other near places and times, admitted to show the defective and negligent nature of the construction and maintenance); 1899, Baxter v. R. Co., 104 id. 307, 80 N. W. 644 (explosion of a boiler; defective part of a flue, admitted; Bardeen, J., diss.).

[5] 1892, Central R. Co. v. Ingram, 98 Ala. 395, 397, 12 So. 801 (absence of fog at an adjacent place where conditions were more favorable for it, admitted, in negative the existence of fog on the track); 1872, Cleland v. Thornton, 43 Cal. 437 (nature of timber burned; "character of the timber for milling purposes in that immediate neighborhood," admitted); 1894, Hart v. Walker, 100 Mich. 406, 410, 59 N. W. 174 (the fact of hot weather in a place 12 miles away from that in issue, admitted); 1873, Stanbaugh v. Smith, 23 Oh. 594 (the existence of coal seams of certain thicknesses and quality upon other lands in a neighborhood, admitted to show the existence, quantity, and quality of coal on the premises in question).

condition of the entire lot or mass from which it is taken.[1] The requirement is merely that the mass should be substantially uniform with reference to the quality in question, and that the sample portion should be of such a nature as to be fairly representative.[2] When the sample is not taken from the very substance or article in issue, but from another one, the only difference in the argument is that another inference is introduced, i. e. the inference of Identity (ante, § 411). It must first be evidenced that substance A is in nature identical, for the purpose in hand, with substance B, and then a sample from B, working through a double inference, evidences the nature of substance A.[3]

§ 440. Same: Sample Copies of Printed Matter. An impression from type (usually known by the unfortunate because ambiguous term copy) is evidence of the contents of another impression from the same type, the required assumption being merely that both were produced by the same type.[1] The easier mode of proof is usually by a witness who offers one impression as representing his recollection of the other (post, § 748). The present principle, however, is to be distinguished from that which is involved when it is attempted from one type-impression to show the authorship, or publication, of another and similar one. Two cases may arise. (a) Where the fact of the person's having printed or published an entire mass or series of impressions is otherwise proved, then his publication of each and every one is shown by necessary implication. But this is the rare case. (b) Where the authorship (or publication) of a single impression is shown, the authorship of another impression exactly similar is not necessarily proved, although it ought at least to be regarded as evidenced, because the printing of one evidences in ordinary experience the probable printing of all others of the same content and appearance (ante, § 376). That question, however, does not involve the present principle, i. e. the nature of the article, but involves the doing of an act, i. e. of authorship or publication.[2]

[1] 1885, Epps v. State, 102 Ind. 539, 1 N. E. 491 (absence of arsenic in another sample from the same package, admitted to show the absence of arsenic); 1888, Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 512, 514, 16 N. E. 280 (another sample taken by the inspector from the defendant's milk-wagon, on same day, at substantially the same time, admitted to show the bad quality of the milk); 1888, Com. v. Kendrick, 147 id. 444, 18 N. E. 230 (quality of liquor shown by samples); 1899, McConnell v. Lewis, 58 Nebr. 188, 78 N. W. 518 (samples of leather, exhibited); 1895, Vietti v. Nesbitt, 22 Nev. 390, 41 Pac. 151 (the quality of ore shown by assays of ore "from the same ore body and near where the ore in question came from but in adjoining mine"). Compare the cases cited post, § 457.

[2] 1895, Fox v. Mining Co., 108 Cal. 369, 41 Pac. 308 (question discussed as to whether "battery-samples" are and "car-samples" are not the better index of ore-values); 1871, Brown v. Leach, 107 Mass. 367 (before testing by sample, the sample must be shown a fair one).

[3] 1864, Jupitz v. People, 34 Ill. 520 (larceny of brass couplings; samples of couplings testified to be similar, admitted); 1867, Com. v. Goodman, 97 Mass. 117 (to show a liquor to have been intoxicating, samples were admitted of liquor taken from one P., contained in barrels having a similar mark, and being also similar in color, flavor, and strength; careful opinion by Bigelow, C. J.); 1899, Golden Reward M. Co. v. Buxton M. Co., 38 C. C. A. 228, 97 Fed. 413 (samples of ore from an ore body of the same general character and forming a continuation of the same ore body, admitted).

For statutory provisions allowing samples to be used, see post, § 445. Compare also § 457.

[1] 1837, R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 308 (contents of a handbill, evidenced by other bills said to be similar). Compare the cases cited under the principle of identity (ante, § 415) and the principle of producing the original (post, §§ 1234, 1237).

[2] Compare the other principles as to authentication of printed matter (post, § 2150).

Topic IV: Tendency, Capacity, Quality, Cause, or Effect.

1. General Principles.

§ 441. Scope of the Subject. It has already been noted (ante, § 436) how, in so many instances of other classes of cases, that which is the main or first apparent inference offered is upon analysis to be resolved into an inference of the present sort, i. e. in which the proposition to be evidenced is a tendency, capacity, or the like. It is thus easy to see why the great majority of the rulings are concerned with this specific sort of inference. Yet it is not to be supposed that the ensuing number of precedents indicates the relative actual frequency of the present sort of inference in trials. It is merely that the evidential difficulties of the subject occur chiefly in connection with the present type of inference, and thus lead naturally to a multiplication of rulings disproportionate to the actual frequency of the part played by this mode of inference.

What, then, is the mode of evidencing circumstantially a tendency, capacity, or quality of external inanimate nature? In general, the inference is from specific instances of observed effects, exhibitions, or illustrations, to the supposed tendency, capacity, or quality producing them. This inference from effects to capacity or tendency to produce those effects furnishes the general form to which all such processes are reducible. For example, the question at issue may be whether the vibrations of factory-machinery have caused a conceded injury in an adjacent house. The main controversy is whether the former is the cause of the latter; but, in searching among the probable causes, the argument is obviously confined to those things which have a tendency or capacity to produce such effects, and thus the real proposition of the proponent now becomes this, namely, that the factory-apparatus has a tendency or capacity to produce such effects. Thus, while one of the ultimate issues for the jury still remains the question whether the factory caused the injury, yet the subsidiary proposition to which the evidence has to be directed is whether the factory has such a tendency or capacity. In short, when it is desired to show broadly the occurrence of an event, or the cause of it, the process of thought usually resolves itself into two inferences, — first, that the capacity or tendency of something to cause the event is evidence that the event did so result therefrom; and, secondly, that something else is evidence of such a capacity or tendency; and it is the second of these inferences which in practice raises evidential questions.[1] The existence of a tendency, capacity, or quality may of course also come into issue independently of any question as to its being a cause, — for example, where the maintaining of a dangerous place is itself an offence. But, however it comes into issue, it is evidenced by using its observed effects.

§ 442. Principle of Probative Value (Relevancy). The requirements for this process of inference are indicated by the logical principles already examined at the outset (ante, §§ 30–36), and a brief re-statement will be sufficient. There is presented, as the factum probandum, a capacity or tendency in X to produce the specific effect B. This means that in the presence of a certain complex of circumstances the introduction of X will result in the occurrence of B; i. e. this alleged tendency or capacity in X is not an abstract and absolute one, but a limited and specific one, namely, a capacity, under the circumstances in which B occurred, to be followed by B. What X's capacity or tendency under other circumstances might be, is immaterial; the single question is whether there was such a capacity or tendency under the circumstances in hand. In looking elsewhere, therefore, to evidence this specific capacity or tendency by observing the same effect elsewhere, the requirement is that the circumstances elsewhere are the same as in the case in hand. Thus, if elsewhere are found similar results, B′ and B″, accompanying X, it cannot be inferred that they are the result of the alleged tendency of X, unless the other circumstances in those cases were similar to that in issue; because otherwise it cannot be known that some other circumstance, Y or Z, was not the cause of B′ or B″. In other words, unless the circumstances are the same, the door is open for other hypotheses that might account for the effects B′ and B″, as well as for B. Thus, if the proposition is that X factory's vibrations have a tendency to injure an adjacent building B, the falling of timbers in other adjacent houses B′ and B″ might not evidence such a tendency if B′ were an old house and B″ were a wooden house, while B was a new brick house; the case B′ would at most indicate a tendency in X to injure an old house, not a new house B; and the case B″ would at most indicate a tendency in X to injure a wooden house, not a brick house B. Or, again, if in a third house B‴, lying on the other side of X factory and next to Y factory also, there is a similar injury, it cannot be inferred that it is the result of a tendency in X to produce such an injury to B, because the factory Y may have caused, partly or solely, the injury to B‴. The general logical requirement is, then, that when a thing's capacity or tendency to produce an effect of a given sort is to be evidenced by instances of the same effect found attending the same thing elsewhere, these other instances have probative value — i. e. are relevant — to show such a tendency or capacity only if the conditions or circumstances in the other instances are similar to those in the case in hand.[1]

[1] For the inference of defective or negligent construction from the single fact of the injury in issue, see post, § 2509 (presumption of negligence from accident).

But this similarity need not be precise in every detail. It need include only those circumstances or conditions which might conceivably have some influence in affecting the result in question. For instance, in the case put above, the circumstance that house B′ was of wood while house B was of brick would conceivably affect the ease and likelihood of injury by vibration; but the circumstance that the inner walls in B′ were papered while those in B were kalsomined, or that the house B′ was painted red while the house B was painted green, or that the occupant of house B′ was a Presbyterian while the house B was occupied by a Methodist, — such a circumstance, though perhaps material in other aspects, could not have any bearing upon the likelihood of injury by vibration. A similarity between the two cases in respect to such circumstances, therefore, would not be required. The similarity that is required is, in short, a similarity in essential circumstances, or, as it is usually expressed, a substantial similarity, i.e. a similarity in such circumstances or conditions as might supposably affect the result in question.

[1] In the foregoing analysis the inference from other instances only is considered. The inference from the instance in issue (i. e. of negligent construction from the mere fact of the plaintiff's injury in an accident) is recognized as a presumption, and is dealt with post, § 2509.

The logical foundation of this principle has been already set forth in another place (§§ 30–33). As applied to the present sort of inference it has constantly received the sanction of the Courts; and whatever are the inconsistencies of its applications, there is substantial unanimity in the general reasoning:

1892, Miller, J., in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mugg, 132 Ind. 168, 31 N. E. 565 (excluding experiments as to the freezing of a boot to a rail on a cold day, the experiments being made on the day of the injury in question): "Unless the experiments are shown to have been made under essentially the same conditions that existed in the case on trial, the tendency is to confuse and mislead rather than enlighten the jury. . . . The appellant did not show that the experiment was made under the same conditions that existed when the injury took place. The time of day was different, and the conditions as to warmth and moisture of the boot exposed may not have been, probably were not, the same."

1892, Miller, C. J., in Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion, — Ind. —, 32 N. E. 874: "During the trial the appellant placed a witness upon the stand, and proposed to show that shortly before the trial a test was made upon the siding on which the accident took place, and at about the same place, by letting a gondola car of the same kind as the one in use at the time of the injury down upon the siding. . . . Evidence of this kind should be received with caution, and only be admitted where it is obvious to the Court from the nature of the experiments that the jury will be enlightened rather than confused. In many instances a slight change in the conditions under which the experiment is made will so distort the result as to wholly destroy its value as evidence and make it harmful rather than helpful. In other cases a principle may be established by experiments made under circumstances quite different from the one under investigation, that will have an important and beneficial effect upon the investigation. . . . In our opinion the circumstances under which the experiment was made were sufficiently similar to the facts surrounding the happening of the accident to make it admissible in evidence for what it was worth." McBride, J., dissenting: "It cannot be certain that the circumstances and conditions were in each case precisely the same."

1862, Merrick, J., in Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 3 All. 410, 417 (the question here being whether the illness of the plaintiffs was caused by gas leaking from the defendant's pipes): "The evidence offered by the plaintiffs to show that, wherever the gas which escaped from the fracture in the defendant's pipe entered any dwelling-house in the neighborhood of the plaintiffs, sickness followed, was properly excluded. . . . The attending circumstances may be so different that the occurrence of sickness in one house would have no tendency to show the cause of illness in the occupants of another."

1864, Chapman, J., in Hunt v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 8 All. 169, 171 (the issue being the same as in the preceding case): "The plaintiffs . . . were permitted to offer evidence that A. H. and his family had been in perfect health up to the time when the gas began to escape into their house, and that, immediately or soon after, every member of the family became seriously ill. . . . The sickness of these persons . . . is admissible merely for the purpose of showing the nature of the gas which came into the house, to the influence of which all the inmates were subjected alike. Evidence that inmates of another house were made sick in consequence of inhaling the gas . . . has been held to be inadmissible. The evidence should be limited to the effect of the gas upon those who have in common and under similar circumstances inhaled it."

1880, Gardner, J., in Baxter v. Doe, 142 Mass. 558, 561, 8 N. E. 415 (to show that the plaintiff's illness on board the defendant's vessel was due to the defendant's failure to supply anti-scorbutic food and medicine, the fact was offered of a similar sickness of others of the crew, on board the ship, about the same time): "It is difficult to find a case where all the conditions and circumstances affecting all the crew were so similar. As suggested by the plaintiffs in their argument, the crew lived together in the same quarters, on the same vessel, for the same length of time, worked in the same employment, were subjected to the same climatic influences, hardships, deprivations, and manner of life, partook of the same food at substantially the same time; and of the crew of twelve, eight were affected at about the same time with about the same symptoms of disease. This evidence . . . tended directly to prove that the provisions served to the crew were unsuitable and insufficient, and that the sickness was occasioned by the want of anti-scorbutics."

1887, Holmes, J., in Reeve v. Dennett, 145 Mass. 28, 11 N. E. 938 (a stockholder alleged that the invention "naboli," for the manufacture of which the corporation was formed, was worthless to effect its represented object, the painless extraction of teeth; the inventor's patients were allowed to testify that it practically prevented pain, where similar operations had formerly been painful): "The objections made to it are . . . that the fact may admit of being explained by other causes than the conclusion sought to be established. In some cases, at least, it would seem that the painful fillings were performed by other dentists, so that it might be argued that the evidence was only a testimony to the skilfulness of the defendant's hand. But . . . when the fact sought to be proved is very unlikely to have any other explanation than the fact in issue, and may be proved or disproved without unreasonably protracting the trial, there is no objection to going into it. If a dozen patients should testify that when the defendant used his naboli, he filled their teeth without hurting them, and that he hurt them a good deal when he did not use it, supposing the testimony to be believed and not to be explained by fancy and a general disposition on the part of witnesses to think well of new nostrums, it would go far towards proving that naboli had some tendency to deaden pain."

1883, Lord, J., in State v. Justus, 11 Or. 182, 8 Pac. 337: "The object of the experiments made on the pasteboard targets which were offered in evidence was to prove by inference that the deceased came to his death by a near gunshot wound at the hands of the defendant . . . [After describing the characteristics of 'near' wounds,] Now it must be manifest that there are here noted so many marked characteristics of near gunshot wounds which could by no possibility be reproduced or represented by experiments upon pasteboard, yet upon which the fact of a near wound is made to depend and often to be determined, that it would be utterly unsafe to apply the inferences sought to be deduced from such experiments to the facts in dispute, unless there can be found, in such experiments and in the subject-matter which it is their object to explain or illustrate, some point of similitude or ground of common resemblance, always present, as a result induced by a similarity of conditions or circumstances. . . . When it is considered how important it is that experiments should be based on conditions and circumstances as nearly as possible like the matter they are intended to illustrate, to avoid the liability of misconception or error from some supposed agreement or resemblance, we should certainly hesitate to admit such experiments," i. e. when made, as here, by non-professional witnesses not skilled in determining the essential appearances of such wounds.

1892, Lord, J., in Leonard v. So. Pac. Co., 21 Or. 555, 559, 28 Pac. 887 (admitting experiments as to whether a rail could have injured a wheel-flange): "There seems to be some hesitation in receiving evidence of experiments or demonstrations, and from the liability to misconception and error there can be no doubt that the experiments or demonstrations should be made under similar conditions and like circumstances. In all cases of this sort very much must be left to the discretion of the trial Court. But when it appears that the experiment or demonstration has been made under conditions similar to those existing in the case in issue, its discretion ought not to be interfered with. In the present case the things used for the purpose of demonstration were similar in size, material, and position, and were operated under conditions similar to the thing sought to be demonstrated."

There is also available here, but not so commonly, the subordinate form of argument known as the method of difference (ante, § 33). In ascertaining whether X is the cause of B, an examination may be made of sundry instances B′, B″, C, D, similar to each other in all other conditions except that X is present or absent; if it is found that wherever X is present, the effect B, B′, B″, is found, and that as soon as X ceases to be present a different effect, C or D, is found, it may be inferred that the difference of effect is produced by the difference in the absence or presence of X; because that is the only causative circumstance which is different in the different instances. The requirement is that the other instances, i. e. of B, B′, B″ not being found, should be similar in all substantial conditions except the absence of X. This mode of evidencing is in judicial investigations not so frequently available, because it is not usually feasible to find instances which fulfil these requirements; but so far as the issue admits of experiments in which the conditions can be thus artificially manipulated, the mode is equally feasible. Occasional instances are found in the precedents, usually in the form of proof of the absence of the harm in question before the alleged harmful act and then the supervening presence of the harm immediately after.[1]

§ 443. Principle of Auxiliary Policy. It has already been pointed out (ante, § 42) that, in ascertaining the principles of circumstantial evidence, the rulings of Courts are found to be much obscured, and the difficulty of clear treatment greatly increased, by the concurrent application of certain principles resting on notions of Auxiliary Probative Policy. The result of their concurrent application is the frequent exclusion of facts that are entirely relevant and would have been admitted if the principles of Relevancy alone were to be applied. It is important to distinguish the rule and the effect due to a principle of Relevancy from the rule and the effect due to a principle of Auxiliary Policy. The fact may be generally relevant, yet in a particular instance obnoxious to some rule of Auxiliary Policy; and if so, it may become proper to use it on some occasion to which the latter rule does not apply. Or the fact may be obnoxious to no rule of Auxiliary Policy, but merely irrelevant; and if so, it is impossible to use it at all, unless the offer can be so changed as to meet the requirements of Relevancy. It is therefore important, when a class of facts is found excluded, to ascertain whether the reason of exclusion is a reason of Relevancy or a reason of Auxiliary Policy. In practice, the Courts almost invariably indicate the reason for exclusion; and the material is plentiful for a correct understanding of the principles intended to be laid down by them.

[1] Folkes v. Chadd, 3 Doug. 157, § 451, post; Kramer v. Messner, 101 Ia. 88, 69 N. W. 1142, § 451; Standish v. Washburn, 21 Pick. 237, § 451.

Of the various considerations of Auxiliary Probative Policy recognized in the law, only two have any application to the present sort of evidence. (1) The reason of Unfair Surprise.[1] The notion here is that the production of various instances to evidence a tendency, capacity, or quality finds the opponent unprepared to answer such evidence, — unprepared to dispute the occurrence of the various instances, unprepared to test or to rebut or to explain away the varied facts thus perhaps for the first time brought to his attention; and that therefore, on account of the danger of relying on evidence thus not open to exposure by rebuttal, it should be excluded. (2) The reason of Confusion of Issues.[2] The notion here is that, in attempting to dispute or explain away the evidence thus offered, new issues will arise as to the occurrence of the instances and the similarity of conditions, new witnesses will be needed whose cross-examination and impeachment may lead to further issues; and that thus the trial will be unduly prolonged, and the multiplicity of minor issues will be such that the jury will lose sight of the main issue, and the whole evidence will be only a mass of confused data from which it will be difficult to extract the kernel of controversy. These reasons, as applied to the present sort of evidence, have been frequently invoked in judicial opinion:

1882, Lord O'Hagan, in Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill, 47 L. T. R. N. S. 29 (speaking for the rejection of evidence of the effects of other hospitals in spreading contagion, offered to show the noxious quality of the one in question): "Without proof as to the state and management of the other hospitals, so as to establish a substantive similarity, any inference drawn from a comparison of their operation with that of the H. asylum might have been quite fallacious and deceptive. But, even without regard to this, . . . it would have involved the jury in a multitude of collateral inquiries, calculated to confuse and embarrass them, and it might have been endlessly prolonged by an indefinite multiplication of objects of comparison. To keep such investigations within reasonable limits, and secure promptitude, precision, and satisfaction in the demonstration of justice, it seems to me that Courts should be very jealous of the admission of such proof."

1877, Ashburn, J., in Insurance Co. v. Tobin, 32 Oh. St. 90 (excluding previous instances of steamboat disasters occurring through snags, etc., and yet without any shock or other coincident warning): "It was calculated to create as many collateral issues as special cases of such loss introduced. In this case the witness [to the former instance] says, 'No one knew anything about it at the time.' . . . This would probably become a disputed question, calling for the testimony of all the persons on the 'Sherman' at the time of the [prior] accident to settle the question of fact as to her case. Here would be a vexed but valueless collateral issue. . . . Very many cases [of similar accidents] were introduced in testimony on the part of the plaintiff. . . . This class of testimony was incompetent because calculated to surprise and take undue advantage of defendant at the trial. Ordinarily he could not be prepared to meet and contest the merits of each particular case of loss from unknown cause introduced. To deprive him of this privilege would be the denial of a legal right, and to admit them would overwhelm the case with collateral issues of fact, distract judicial investigation, leading to no valuable legal result."

1879, Doe, C. J., in Amoskeag Co. v. Head, 59 N. H. 332, 337 (excluding evidence of sums paid for thirty-two other rights of flowage, as indicating value): "How far a trial can justly and reasonably go upon such [additional] issues is often a question of fact. The trial to which parties are entitled is not an endless one, nor one unreasonably protracted and exhausting. There may be a vast amount of evidence, relevant in a certain legal sense, but so unimportant, when compared with an abundance of better evidence easily available, as to be properly excluded. The parties being allowed upon collateral issues an equal range amply sufficient for the purposes of justice under the circumstances of the particular case, they are not necessarily entitled as a matter of law to go further in that direction."

[1] This principle, in its other aspects, is dealt with post, §§ 1849 ff.

[2] This principle, in its other aspects, is dealt with post, §§ 1863, 1904 ff.

1881, Barrows, J., in Mayhew v. Mining Co., 76 Me. 113: "One substantial ground for excluding evidence of collateral facts is that it is seldom that such identity in all essentials is found that a legitimate inference respecting the one case can be drawn from the other, and a host of collateral issues are brought in to distract the attention of the jury from the real point. The fear of this has sometimes, perhaps, produced decisions excluding evidence which might throw light upon the issue."

1887, Cole, C. J., in Phillips v. Willow, 70 Wis. 9, 34 N. W. 731 (excluding the fact that two other persons had collided with the stone by which the plaintiff's sleigh had been overturned): "[Courts have excluded this evidence] because such evidence tends to draw away the minds of the jurors from the point in issue, and to excite prejudice and mislead them; and, moreover, because the adverse party, having had no notice of such a course of examination, is not presumably prepared to meet it. . . . It is apparent that if this testimony was relevant to prove a defect . . ., it would have been competent [in answer] to show that these persons were not driving carefully, or had skittish teams; also that hundreds had passed over this highway in safety with carriages, notwithstanding the alleged defect. So issue after issue would be raised, and facts collateral to the main issue made by the pleadings would multiply; the main issue forming new ones, and the suit itself expanding like the banyan tree of India, whose branches drop shoots to the ground which take root and form new stocks till the tree itself covers great space by its circumference."

The answers to these arguments of policy, however, are not difficult: (1) As to the argument from Unfair Surprise. In the first place, the inconvenience here urged is found in trying almost every issue whatever; for the evidence of an opponent is always to some extent unforeseen, and this is, in general, no valid objection (post, § 1845). In the next place, the risk does not usually exist to any serious extent in the present sort of issue, for the nature of the controversy readily suggests the sort of evidence that will be resorted to. Furthermore, the argument is rarely allowed elsewhere to prevail except to prevent certain modes of impeachment of character (ante, § 194; post, § 979), where otherwise the evidence might range over a whole lifetime; and it is not a serious objection in cases where the unexpected evidence bears directly upon the issue and but covers a small range both of time and of material. Lastly, the evil of shutting out that which is frequently the sole accessible or reliable evidence is much greater than the occasional disadvantage of surprise. The argument of surprise, it should be added, is very rarely pressed in this connection. (2) As to the argument from Confusion of Issues. In the first place, it must be noted that it is by no means universally, perhaps not usually, forceful; for the other instances offered of the tendency or quality are seldom numerous and are not commonly disputed. In the next place, the multiplicity and confusion is usually no greater than that which occurs in the trial of other matters with their numerous minor issues; and it would seem, having regard to the direct bearing of the present sort of evidence on that which is usually a main issue, that the disadvantage cannot be avoided without too great a sacrifice of useful evidence. Finally, and most important, wherever upon minor issues this disadvantage becomes a real and marked one, without compensating advantage from useful evidence, it is unnecessary to take the radical step of excluding such evidence in all cases by a universal rule; because a simple expedient is at hand, by which the evil can be stopped in such cases while the advantage of the evidence is retained for other cases, — namely, the expedient of leaving it to the discretion of the trial Court to draw a line of exclusion wherever the evil of confusion of issues impends. The whole objection in question is mainly (as Mr. Justice Holmes has neatly put it[3]) "a purely practical one, a concession to the shortness of life"; and it would be unworthy of the genius of our law if Courts should feel obliged to lay down a hard-and-fast rule of exclusion when such a simple expedient was at hand for preventing the supposed disadvantages.

§ 444. Discretion of the Trial Court. The true solution of the conflicting considerations, then, is that evidence of the sort, when relevant, should be admitted, unless in the discretion of the trial Court it seems to involve a serious inconvenience by way of unfair surprise or confusion of issues. Such is the solution clearly pointed out by many Courts:

1872, Doe, J., in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 408: "Another cause of confusion [in the rulings] is the mixture of law and fact, and the lack of a distinction, lucidly and emphatically expressed, between what is matter of strict law and what is matter of judicial discretion. Judicial discretion, in its technical legal sense, is the name of the decision of certain questions of fact by the Court; and a close attention to the difference between fact and law, and the difference between an exercise of judicial discretion (unfortunately so called) and a decision of a question of law, will remove much of the obscurity in which the subject of the relevancy of evidence has been involved. . . . [In the Knapp case,[1] where, to show the defendant's extraordinary strength, various instances of his feats of strength were received,] the judge in the exercise of what is called judicial discretion, allowed the parties to go back fifteen years; and if he had allowed them to go back sixteen years, or only fourteen years, no question of law would have arisen as to the proper length of time. . . . The general relevancy of that class of evidence was matter of law. But how far back in the history of his life it was advisable to go for experimental knowledge of his strength was a question of fact, to be determined upon a variety of considerations, some of which are erroneously given in the books as reasons for the exclusion of irrelevant or collateral evidence as a matter of law. The decision of this question of fact was, in the peculiar and technical language of the law, an exercise of judicial discretion. . . . As to the number of experiments or experiences on many points, collateral in a certain sense, but relevant in a legal sense, it is impossible in the nature of the case for a limit to be fixed as a matter of law. But it does not follow that the law excludes all evidence of which it cannot measure a reasonable quantity."

1894, Knowlton, J., in Bemis v. Temple, 162 Mass. 342, 344, 38 N. E. 970 (admitting evidence of the frightening effect of a flag upon other horses): "The only objection to testimony of the last kind in such a case is that in testing it collateral issues may be raised. Such an objection in many cases is a sufficient reason for excluding the testimony. Whenever a line of inquiry will give rise to collateral issues of such number and difficulty that they will be likely to confuse and distract the jury and unreasonably protract the trial, it should not be permitted. But the mere fact that a collateral issue may be raised is not of itself enough to justify the exclusion of evidence which bears upon the issue on trial. Most circumstantial evidence introduces collateral issues, and ordinarily it is a practical question, depending upon its relations to the other facts and circumstances in the case, whether it should be received. It may be remote from the real issue or closely connected with it, and in many cases its competency depends upon the decision of questions of fact, affecting the practical administration of justice in the particular case, such that a Court of law will refuse to revise the ruling of the presiding judge, but will treat his ruling as a matter of discretion."

[3] In Reeve v. Dennett, 145 Mass. 28, 11 N. E. 938.
[1] 45 N. H. 148, 149, 151; ante, § 219.

This sensible solution has not yet been generally accepted by the Courts, at least in express language. Where the question of Auxiliary Policy has been considered, the evidence has more often been either rejected or accepted as if by a fixed rule, although the natural result has been a lack of uniformity in the rulings of such Courts. It is much wiser and more practical to leave the possible inconvenience to be determined by the tribunal best fitted to determine it, the trial Court, and to sanction the reception of all such relevant evidence subject to this exclusionary discretion based on inconvenience. This attitude is more and more frequently taken by the Courts, and will probably receive general approval as the true mode of dealing with such evidence.

§ 445. Distinction between Experiment and Observation. There are two ways in which the data may be obtained for evidencing tendency, capacity, or quality, on the principle under consideration. One is by using such instances as may be found ready at hand, — instances which have already occurred in the ordinary course of events and happen to be suitable for the purpose. The other is to reproduce artificially and expressly the appropriate conditions and then observe the data obtained by this effort and prearrangement. The former process is the simple one of Observation; the latter is that of Experiment. The former is, in general scientific acceptance, distinctly inferior for most purposes to the latter; because, in taking data just as they come, it is not usually feasible to secure precisely the proper conditions required for the validity or certainty of our inference; while in the latter the conditions may usually be prearranged precisely as they are needed in order to make a sound inference. Indeed, the former source of data, in the modern scientific world, is looked upon as concededly so inferior in probative value, as not to be resorted to except in such situations (for example, geological formations and human diseases) as do not usually admit of artificial prearrangement and control.

But this attitude of modern scientific thought is quite other than that which has been exhibited by many members of the bar and bench. There is a certain mental state which may in lenient moments be termed conservatism, but perhaps deserves to be called juristic narrowmindedness. It is often due to nothing more incurable than an ignorance of precedents and a bigoted fear of everything not technical. This attitude has shown itself, in many quarters, in the form of an alarm at experimental evidence, a disinclination to accept what does not come in the accustomed shapes of certified copies, sealed instruments, and sworn depositions. It is the same spirit that was so reluctant, at the beginning of the 1800s, to resort to expert evidence. It is the same spirit that is willing to doubt the propriety of showing to the jury the very thing whose existence is in controversy, and prefers that the regular and cumbrous indirections should instead be followed (post, § 1151). This spirit has led occasionally to a rejection of experiments offered under the present principle as evidence of a tendency, capacity, or quality. These rulings of rejection are usually to be compared to the shying of a horse,—an instance of instinctive but unreasoning repulsion.

Occasionally there is, to be sure, some independent and plausible reason for questioning the evidence; for example, experiments made in a court-room in the presence of the tribunal may be inconvenient and impracticable (post, § 1160); experiments have also (but improperly) been objected to because they are hearsay or ex parte only (post, § 1385); experiments of some kinds may be objectionable because they violate the privilege against self-crimination (post, § 2265). So far as these considerations apply to experiments, they apply to them in common with other forms of evidence, and may be dealt under the other principles of evidence just indicated. But the present question is the simple one whether data whose relevancy is not questioned are objectionable or inferior because they have been obtained, not by observing merely such casual material as Nature has provided for us, but by carefully arranging the conditions so as to obtain by experiment more trustworthy results. That there should be such a distinction between Observation and Experiment would be unworthy of our law. That there is none has been made clear once for all in a classical passage by one of the greatest of American judges:

1872, Doe, J., in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401: "Was the fright of Fletcher's horse competent evidence on the question whether the lumber was likely to frighten horses? . . . On the independent and general question of the horse-frightening capacity of a certain pile of lumber, what rule of law considers the fright of [the plaintiff's] horse as important and disregards the fright of Mr. Fletcher's horse as of no consequence at all? . . . If the question were, whether the lumber was capable of floating in water, or making a good fire, or being sawed or cut or planed in a specific manner, or supporting horses and wagons passing over a bridge, there could be no legal objection to the trial of an appropriate experiment upon it in the presence of the jury, or to the evidence of experiments that had been tried elsewhere. And there is no reason, outside of the technical rules of law, why its ability to frighten horses should not be tested out of court, and proved in court in the same manner. When we want to know whether a certain horse is skittish or is capable of a certain speed, whether a certain substance is poisonous and destructive of animal or vegetable life, whether certain materials are of a certain strength, whether a certain field or a certain kind of soil is likely to produce a certain kind or amount of crop, whether a certain man or brute or machine is likely to perform a certain kind or amount of work, or whether anything can be done or is likely to be done, one way is to speculate about it, and another way is to try it. The law is a practical science, and when it is appealed to to direct what means shall be used to find out whether a certain pile of lumber is likely to frighten horses, if any one asserts that, on this subject, the law prefers speculation to experience, abhors actual experiment and delights in guesswork, the person advancing such a proposition takes upon himself the task of maintaining it upon some legal rule, distinctly stated by him and well established by the authorities. Such a proposition is not sustained by the reason of the law. It is sustained by nothing that can be justly called a principle. By what technical rule, at war with reason and principle, is it supported? . . . The experience of other persons, equally relevant on that point, has seemed [to some judges] to have an objectionable appearance, because it did not come into the case in the same unobjectionable way as that by which the plaintiff's experience was introduced. . . . The tendency to error has been aggravated by an exception (which is a peculiarity of precedents of English origin) excluding relevant evidence of a defendant's general and notorious disposition to commit such crimes or torts as that with which he is charged, and his habitual commission of crimes or torts of a like kind as proof of such disposition. . . . However much reverence may remain for ancient innovations in behalf of human life under circumstances no longer existing, and however strong may be the inclination derived from that reverence and from habit to adhere to the practice of excluding evidence of human character furnished by experience, the extension of that practice to the rejection of experimental knowledge of the character of inanimate matter ought to stop. . . . It is evident that the exception [of the character-rule, above referred to], not being sufficiently emphasized as an exception and a very peculiar one, has produced much confusion by seeming to countenance the idea that the law has an antipathy against experimental knowledge in general."

There is an increasing judicial tendency to treat evidence of experiments in the spirit of Mr. Justice Doe's utterance; and it can hardly be supposed that the casual erroneous precedents would be regarded as a hindrance. How much more in harmony with the pristine practice of our law is Mr. Justice Doe's attitude, than that of the modern rulings which he justly criticises, may be seen in the following record of one of Sir Matthew Hale's trials, more than two centuries ago:

1665, Witches' Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 647, 697; the children claiming to be bewitched would go into fits, clenching their fists, and then opening them with a shriek when the supposed witch touched them, "which accident would not happen by the touch of any other person." It was suggested that the children "might counterfeit this distemper"; so the judge, Sir Matthew Hale, desired that several gentlemen would test one of the children with Amy Duny, a defendant, in another part of the Court. "They put an apron before her [the child's] eyes, and then one other person touched her hand, which produced the same effect as the touch of the witch did in the Court. Whereupon the gentlemen returned, openly protesting that they did believe the whole transaction of the business was a mere imposture. This put the Court and all persons into a stand."[1]

[1] In the following list are given numerous examples of the different kinds of rulings upon experiments as such; the list includes merely typical cases, and many others may be found in the citations of the ensuing sections. The rulings may be grouped as follows, all the cases named being cited more at length in the ensuing sections: (1) Admitting the experiments offered; (2) Excluding them, but only because the tests of relevancy were not fulfilled in the case in hand, and not because they were experimenta instead of observed data; (3) Excluding them for no appreciable reason; (4) Excluding them because made before the jury (under § 1160, post); (5) Excluding them because ex parte (under § 1385, post); (6) Excluded for sundry peculiar reasons; (7) Left to the trial Court's discretion.

(1) Under this head fall the following cases: Witches' Trial, cited supra; Cowper's Trial, post, §§ 457, 460; R. v. Palmer, § 457; R. v. Heseltine, § 451; Broder v. Saillard, § 451; People v. Hope, § 451; People v. Durrant, § 451; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion, § 451; Brooke v. R. Co., § 458; State v. Cater, § 457; Mo. P. R. Co. v. Moffatt, § 460; State v. Asbell, § 457; Champ v. Com., § 457; Swett v. Shumway, § 451; Eidt v. Cutter, § 451; People v. Morrigan, § 460; Stone v. Ins. Co., § 460; Becket v. Aid Assoc., § 457; Vaughan v. State, § 457; Dillard v. State, § 457; Berckmans v. Berckmans, § 460; Lind-

§ 446. Distinction between Possibility, Capacity, Tendency, and Cause, as the object of Evidence; Evidencing a Possibility. The notion of Causation is by no means easy to analyze correctly; but it is enough to point out here that certain superficially different terms represent essentially the same evidential process. When it is asked, for example, whether certain factory-vapors were the cause of a destruction of herbage, the notion of "cause," simple as it seems, becomes upon analysis somewhat complex and at the same time indefinite. Stated in its broadest form, the notion of cause and effect is merely that of invariable sequence. It is only rarely, however, if at all, that such an abstract assertion can be made in universal terms that will stand examination. Thus, that a bullet shot from a pistol into the heart "causes" — i. e. will invariably be followed by — death, is a seemingly impregnable assertion; and yet not only may it not be true [illegible] bullets of every size, but it may not be true, even with ordinarily la[illegible] ullets, in instances recorded here and there; and, in the future, surgical skill may show that the instances of non-sequence of death might be made even more numerous. The assertion may then be amended by adding limiting conditions, so as to say that, provided this and that and the other be so, a bullet through the heart causes death. In short, instead of an absolute certainty or invariability of sequence, the assertion will be only of a very high probability of sequence. In most instances no one thinks of making an assertion in absolute form, and it is easy to see that an assertion of causation means usually only an assertion of high probability or strong tendency. Thus, the planting of seed in good soil at the right time of the year will probably result in a harvest in due season; but the result is not invariably certain, because no rain may fall or the land may be built upon or other influences may intervene. Though we should feel justified in speaking of the seed as the cause of the harvest, yet it would not be intended to assert anything more than that the seed has a tendency to produce the harvest. Coming now to an example of still weaker probability, suppose it to be asserted that gunpowder may spontaneously — i. e. without human meddling — explode, this is not saying that it will probably so explode, but merely say v. People, § 451; Smith v. State, § 460; Leonard v. R. Co., § 451; Sullivan v. Com., § 457; Boyd v. State, § 457; Byers v. R. Co., § 460; Moore v. State, § 457; Osborne v. Detroit, § 457; State v. Flint, § 460; State v. Ward, § 451.

(2) Under this head fall the following cases: Lou. & N. R. Co. v. Hill, post, § 460; Jones v. State, § 460; Lake E. & W. R. Co. v. Mugg, § 451; Libby v. Scherman, § 458; Painter v. People, § 460; McMurrin v. Rigby, § 460; Com. v. Piper, § 451; Ulrich v. People, § 460; Klanowski v. R. Co., § 460; Justice v. State, § 457; West Pub. Co. v. Coop. Pub. Co., § 460.

(3) Under this head falls the following case: Evans v. State, post, § 457.

(4) Under this head fall the following cases: R. v. Palmer, post, § 457; Jumpertz v. People, § 460.

(5) Under this head belong the cases collected post, § 1385; no such principle of exclusion is recognized.

(6) Under this head fall the following cases: Wynne v. State, § 457; Polin v. State, § 451.

(7) Under this head fall the following cases: State v. Smith, § 451; Ball v. U. S., § 457.

The following English and Canadian statutory rules, quoted post, § 1151, expressly authorize the judge to authorize "experiments or observations" to be made and samples to be taken: Eng. Rules of Court, 1883; Man. Rev. St. 1902, c. 40, Rule 894; N. Sc. Rules of Court 1900, Ord. 37, R. 6; Ont. Rules of Court 1897, § 1096.

that under a rare combination of circumstances it will do so, i. e. it has a capacity to do so. Capacity, then, is a quality representing the same process of thought as tendency; i. e. it represents the possibility of a result as compared with the probability of a result, and above them both is a notion of a still higher degree, rarely realized in experience, — that of absolute certainty of result. All these are in the same category; the difference is that in the highest degree we think of the sequence as occurring under any and every combination of other circumstances, but in the middle degrees under the ordinary combinations only. and in the lowest degrees under rare combinations only. The notion of causation is perhaps most commonly associated with the middle and highest degrees only; i. e. one would naturally enough say, "A bullet through the heart will cause death," and "Sowing seed will cause a harvest"; while in the lowest degree one would either not speak at all of cause or would qualify the statement, for example, by saying, "Gunpowder may cause spontaneously an explosion." The essential thing to note is that all these terms express only varying degrees of certainty or probability or possibility; and that they all belong to the same logical category of thought:

Professor Alfred Sidgwick, Fallacies, 81, 285: "Abstract assertions of succession are commonly made with a large margin for the incalculable. We feel fairly contented in obtaining any hint of 'law,' — any knowledge, that is, which may form a basis for even imperfectly secure inference and proof. The only alternative to 'Chance' is often 'Tendency,' and our gladness to escape from Chance we dignify this as 'Law.' . . . Between mere guesses, hypotheses, theories, empirical laws, and 'laws of Nature,' there are only continuous differences of degree in certainty, according to the nature and number of the tests they have stood and the duration of their past invulnerability. . . . The resemblance in uncertainty between a fanciful guess and a proved law may be less important than the difference in the degree of certainty; but the fact cannot be safely hidden that the resemblance exists. . . . The method of proving laws is one and the same, whether they be the merest wildest supposition or the soundest explanation of the facts of Nature."

In the precedents upon the present subject, then, there is no difference in logic or in legal principle between evidencing a capacity, a tendency, or a certainty of operation or causation. The only difference is as to the practical need or utility of one or the other degree of likelihood in the case in hand. Thus, if the issue is as to a spontaneous explosion of gunpowder, we may appreciably advance our proof by showing merely a capacity, i. e. possibility, of such a result.[1] But, if the issue is as to the destruction of herbage by vapors, the capacity of the vapors to do this would probably be conceded, and the only useful way of advancing the proof will be to show, not merely a capacity, but a strong tendency to produce this effect.[2] Again, if the issue is as to the injury to an adjacent house by factory-vibrations, their tendency to produce some injury would perhaps be easily enough shown or conceded, and the desirable thing would be, in offering evidence of effects elsewhere, to show by them that a fair certainty of injury actually attended the vibrations.[3] Incidentally, however, these differences may bear on the question of admissibility, so far as the evidence is required to have an appreciable value for the particular issue at bar.

[1] Of this sort are some of the precedents in § 460, post, in which the question is whether a person could be distinguished or whether work could be done; and also in § 457, post, in which the question is whether e. g. a pistol could carry from a certain distance.

[2] Of this sort are most of the precedents in § 458, post, where the question is whether a place in a highway was dangerous, i. e. likely to cause injury to passers-by.

§ 447. Number of Instances required. It follows, from what has just been said, that the number of instances offered is immaterial, so far as the logical principle is concerned. The only difference will be as to the practical utility, for the case in hand, of the inference to be drawn. One instance may indicate a capacity to produce the result; but so feeble and indefinite a possibility may practically not advance the cause beyond what would be already conceded or easily accepted. So, too, a limited number of instances might show a tendency or common probability, and yet this tendency might be already beyond dispute and unnecessary to prove, and nothing short of an approach to certainty or universality of operation would advance the cause of the proof. Thus, an offer of one or two instances only might properly be rejected by a Court, if it would tend to show merely a capacity which was already beyond dispute. The jury might be inclined to give too great effect to a single instance; and if the claim of the proponent required for its proper evidencing the existence of a strong tendency or of an approximate certainty of result, the Court might be justified in rejecting an offer of such scanty scope as not to evidence anything more than a capacity or possibility. No Court seems to have rejected evidence on these specific grounds, though they would serve as justifying the rulings in several cases where the rejection of a single instance has been put upon other and insufficient grounds.[1] But usually, where the evidence is regarded by the Court as otherwise admissible, it is received without any criticism as to number of instances.[2] Where the purpose is to show the existence of a mere capacity, so as to negative the impossibility of a thing's occurrence, here a single instance is always admissible.[3]

§ 448. Negative and Affirmative Instances; Evidencing an Impossibility. Whether an instance is to be regarded as affirmative or negative in form depends much on the issue as made by the parties. For example, if it were desired to prove performance of a warranty that a certain substance is calculated to deaden pain in dental operations,[1] instances of the substance having made operations painless are affirmative of the quality alleged by the warranty; but if a patient were suing the dentist for careless use of a substance

[3] This degree of strength of evidence seems never to have been required by Courts.

[1] E. g. Hoyt v. Des Moines, § 458; Hudson v. R. Co., § 458.

[2] E. g. Bailey v. Trumbull, § 458; Tomlinson v. Derby, § 458; Gilmer v. Atlanta, § 458; Darling v. Westmoreland, § 460; Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs, § 458; State v. Isaacson, § 457.

[3] E. g. Broder v. Saillard, § 451; R. v. Heseltine, § 451; Augusta S. R. Co. v. Dorsey, § 460; State v. Delaney, § 451; Davis v. State, § 460.

[1] Compare Reeve v. Dennett, 145 Mass. 28, post, § 457.

calculated to produce pain, the offer of the same instances by the dentist would in form negative the alleged quality, i. e. they would be instances in which pain was not produced.

Assuming, then, that the issue is such that the instances are thus genuinely negative in purpose and form, is there any difference to be noted as to the conditions of their use, as distinguished from affirmative instances? Keeping in mind the principle just examined (ante, § 446), it will be seen that there is no difference of logical principle, though there is practically a difference in availability, according to the object of the evidence:

(1) Suppose that the proponent in the issue is (correctly) offering only to show a capacity — i. e. an occasional possibility — of producing the effect. Obviously, it is here logically of no avail to produce against him instances in which the effect was not produced. They do not meet his point; for it is quite consistent with the capacity or possibility of producing the effect that there should be many instances in which the effect was not produced; for example, if the proponent has evidenced by one or two instances the capacity of a pistol to carry two hundred yards, it is logically of no avail for the opponent to answer with a negative instance (or instances) in which it has not carried thus far. Logically nothing short of a universal negative will suffice.

Nevertheless, even a single negative may on certain conditions be receivable, and in the following way: If the proponent's witnesses to the capacity (or to the instances of capacity) are not to be believed, the opponent's negative instances are logically no answer; but it is impossible to say beforehand whether the jury will believe the proponent's witnesses. Assuming, then, that they do not believe them, and therefore that there is no affirmative instance of the alleged capacity in the field, even a single negative instance may suffice to show the non-capacity or impossibility on one condition, namely, that it is made equivalent to a universal negative. The only way to do this is to take an instance which by allowing for all possible counteracting causes shows that, even where they could not have operated, nevertheless the effect was not produced, i. e. there was an incapacity to produce it. For example, one instance of a pistol's not carrying 200 yards is simply a negative instance showing that it does not always carry that distance; but if we show that the greatest possible charge of powder was put in, the smallest possible bullet was used, and the most skilful marksman possible aimed it, and still it did not carry 200 yards, we have gone far to show that it is utterly incapable of carrying that distance, i. e. to prove a universal negative from a single instance. Where the precautions are thus sufficient to exclude the operation of possible counteracting influences, a single instance may be more trustworthy than a thousand of another kind, because it yields the assurance that if there were under any circumstances a possibility of producing the alleged effect, it would have been here produced. This is an example of the Method of Difference applied to show a negative.[2]

[2] Sidgwick, Fallacies, 275, 282, 339.

In practice, the proponent seldom has occasion to allege merely a capacity, and that case may be neglected. But the opponent may meet the situation by denying even such a capacity, and then the above principles apply on the issue thus formed. So that the opponent may properly, in evidencing an impossibility, offer either (a) a universal negative, i. e. that no instances of such a capacity have occurred; or (a′) one or more instances attended by such precautions or conditions as practically amount to a universal negative. As to (a), note that evidence merely of instances not having been heard of is not sufficient, unless they would have been heard of if they had occurred.[3] As to (a′), note that for purposes of mere admissibility (i. e. not demonstration), only a moderate degree of such precautions could be required.

(2) Suppose, however, that the proponent is aiming to show something stronger than a mere capacity, i. e. a general or usual tendency, and has evidenced this by a few instances; here, obviously, an equal or greater or less number of negative instances or perhaps even a single instance would help to show that no usual or general tendency could be predicated, and thus would be practically available to answer the showing made by the proponent.

(3) But suppose, finally, that the proponent is interested in showing a fair certainty or inevitableness of effect; here even a single negative instance would suffice to dispose of his contention. The proponent cannot claim that an effect is invariably found, if an instance is shown in which the effect is not found; for example, where it is claimed that a near gunshot wound always leaves powder-stains, a single instance will overturn this claim.

In practice, however, there is little discrimination to be made between the use of the negative instances in these three situations. If the distinction between these three possible attitudes of the proponent were sharply marked by the pleadings, then the foregoing discriminations would apply, and the opponent would have to regulate the use of his negative instances accordingly. But there is usually no such sharp demarcation; the proponent alleges the qualities of a certain object as the cause of the alleged effect, but he seldom is restricted to one of the above three purposes; i. e. he will hope to prove a universal or invariable production of the effect, but he will probably be satisfied if he can prove only a general tendency, and he may end by not evidencing any more than a mere capacity. At one and the same time he is making an attempt at all three; and therefore the opponent is entitled to offer whatever would be relevant against any one of the three, and cannot be criticised if his offer would be insufficient against some one, if it is sufficient against another.

To sum up, then:

(1) Where the proponent offers to show merely a capacity, or where the opponent invites the issue by proposing to show a non-capacity or impossibility, the latter's evidence may properly be of either of two sorts: (a) He may show that in all experience with the thing in question, no such effect had ever occurred; (b) He may show one or more instances attended by such conditions as make it probable that no such effect could possibly occur.

[3] Compare § 671, post.

(2) Under the second head above, one or more negative instances are always receivable; but more may be required.

(3) Under the third head, a single negative instance is always receivable.

In general, the rulings are based upon the above principles; though occasionally an unwarranted distrust of negative instance is shown.[4]

§ 449. Explaining away the Proponent's Instances. An opponent who is not supporting his case by bringing in new data of his own, but confines himself to destroying the proponent's data, finds three ways at hand for diminishing their effect. The three ways have been examined already in dealing with Relevancy in general (ante, §§ 34, 35); and a brief notice of their application to the present sort of evidence will here suffice.

(1) The opponent may produce contradictory, or negative, instances; that is to say, the proponent's instances being offered to show a tendency or capacity to produce an effect, the opponent answers by producing other instances in which the effect did not appear, arguing from this that the tendency must be only a limited one and does not produce its effects with any probability. The principles governing this use of negative instances have been considered in the preceding section.

(2) The opponent may show that, while the proponent's instances occurred prima facie under similar conditions, yet there was for one or more of them some attendant condition which was really important and was likely to have been the true source of the effect observed, so that the proponent's instance may or must be attributed to that other and not to the alleged tendency or cause in question. Thus he explains away the proponent's instance by showing that it does not mean what it seemed to mean.[1] Such explana-

[4] The chief cases may be grouped as follows:

I. Negative instances rejected:

1. Because of auxiliary policy, dissimilarity of conditions, or some other independent reason, and not because they were negative.

2. Because they were negative: (1) a. Improperly rejected under (1) a, supra; a'. Properly rejected under the same; b. Improperly rejected under (1) a', supra; b'. Properly rejected under the same; (2) Improperly rejected under (2) supra; (3) Improperly rejected under (3) supra.

II. Negative instances received: (1) a. In the situation of (1) a, supra; b. In the situation of (1), b, supra; (2) In the situation of (2) supra; (3) In the situation of (3) supra.

Not all of the above sorts are represented in the rulings, but all are capable of occurring.

I, 1: Bauer v. Indianapolis, § 458; Branch v. Libbey, § 458; Balt. & Y. T. R. v. Leonhardt, § 458; Balt. & Y. T. R. v. State, § 458; Aldrich v. Pelham, § 458; Lewis v. Smith, § 458; Peverly v. Boston, § 458; Ulrich v. People, § 460; Temp. Hall Assoc. v. Giles, § 458; Polin v. State, § 451; Bloar v. Delafield, § 460.

2, (1) a: Hodges v. Bearse, § 458; (1) a': Balt. & Y. T. R. v. State, § 458; (1) b: no instances; (1) b': Libby v. Scherman, § 458; Ulrich v. People, § 460.

I, 2, (2): Nave v. Flack, § 458 (express repudiation of this class of evidence); Bauer v. Indianapolis, § 458.

I, (3): no instances.

II, (1), a: Crofter v. R. Co., § 458; Tremblay v. Harnden, § 451; Doyle v. R. Co., § 458 (an express sanction of such evidence); Dougan v. Champlain Co., § 458; Baird v. Daly, § 458; Sinton v. Butler, § 458.

II, (1) b: Epps v. State, § 457; Champ v. Com., § 457; Vaughan v. State, § 457; Smith v. State, § 460; Leonard v. State, § 451; Sullivan v. Com., § 457, Boyd v. State, § 457; Byers v. R. Co., § 460; Osborne v. Detroit, § 457.

II, (2): Calkins v. Hartford, § 458; Wilson v. Granby, § 458; Hill v. R. Co., § 460; Salem D. R. Co. v. Adams, § 460; McCool v. Grand Rapids, § 458; Lester v. Pittsford, § 458.

II, (3): Cowper's Trial, § 457.

[1] In § 35, par. 2, ante, this form of argument has been sufficiently illustrated.

tory circumstances are always receivable in evidence.[2] The only limitation is the policy of preventing confusion of issues (ante, § 443),—the fear of which indeed finds its chief justification, so far as it has any, in the necessary propriety of allowing this mode of explanation, when once the proponent is allowed to open the way with particular instances.

(3) The third method takes away the force of the proponent's instance by offering other instances in which the same effect is found, but without the presence of the alleged cause. The absence, in these additional instances, of the thing alleged to have the causing tendency, forces us to look upon its presence in the proponent's instance as merely accidental, and explains that instance away as due not to the alleged tendency but to something else. Thus, to show that an illness following Monday's dinner was not due to the ham eaten, an instance of the same illness following Tuesday's dinner, at which the dishes were the same except that no ham was eaten, indicates that some other dish was probably the common cause on both occasions. The limitations on the use of this form of disproof are that the conditions (otherwise than as to the alleged cause, e. g. the ham) were substantially the same on both occasions; for, unless this is ensured, it might be supposed that the alleged cause — e. g. the ham — might have operated in the one case and some other cause in the other case. It is only by confining the difference of the two instances to the single circumstance in question that the argument is effective to eliminate it as the cause.[3]

(4) The use of the Method of Difference (ante, § 442, at the end) is not to be confounded with the preceding modes of argument. It has in appearance a negative character, and may be resorted to in Disproof; but it does not operate by explaining away the proponent's evidence; it begins a new line of evidence, although that evidence may be directed to proving a negative proposition, i. e. that a certain thing was not a cause.

2. Precedents arranged by Subjects.

§ 450. Principle of Classification. For the practical purposes of study and reference, it is better to consider the precedents in such an order that the rulings upon a given sort of tendency, capacity, or quality, can be found in one place. Each of these tendencies or qualities exemplifies in the rulings more than one of the preceding modes of argument, and in the foregoing examination of the principles the specific typical precedents have been noted in illustration. But it is chiefly desirable to be able to note the state of the law on a given sort of evidence in each jurisdiction. Moreover, other questions, requiring special consideration, incidentally arise under certain subjects, and can only be treated under the particular head of evidence involved.

[2] The process is common, though the precedents are few: Abend v. Mueller, § 451; Pettibone v. Smith, § 451.

[3] The following precedents illustrate it: Standish v. Washburn, § 451; Eidt v. Cutter, § 451; Pinney v. Cahill, § 457; Hoyt v. R. Co., § 458; Haynes v. Burlington, § 451. This form of argument has been examined in § 35, par. 3, ante.

How shall the various precedents be arranged most usefully for the present purpose? The principle involved is the evidencing of a tendency (capacity, or quality) by its effects. The precedents may therefore best be grouped according to the various kinds of tendencies (capacities, or qualities) and the various kinds of effects. A preliminary grouping may be: A. Material effects (for example, marks left by a pistol shot, damage done to houses by smoke, fire set by locomotive-sparks); B. Corporal effects, including animal and human effects (for example, wounds produced by shots, disease produced by poison, injuries by dangerous highways); C. Mental and Moral Effects, i.e. on human conduct (for example, efforts to escape the danger of a railroad collision, time required by a workman for work, precautions required for a dangerous machine). This classification is to some extent arbitrary, as all must be, in the sense that some cases might equally well go in one group or another. But the general lines of division are marked; and the grouping is the most useful, because it enables us to compare the employment of analogous kinds of effects, and to see how far the uses of related kinds of effects throw evidential light on each other.

A. Instances of Material Effects, as Evidence.

§ 451. Miscellaneous Instances (Factories, Railroads, Floods, Gases, Land, Machinery, Tools, Apparatus, Weapons, etc.). The tendency, capacity, or quality, so far as it exists, may show itself through its material effects. Instances of its apparent operation under substantially similar circumstances will serve to evidence it, subject to the foregoing limitations of principle. In this way may be evidenced the existence (or not) of sundry nuisances, by the presence (or absence) of certain effects under similar circumstances (for example, of similar damage by other factories, streams, hospitals, sewers, operating under analogous conditions);[1]

[1] 1839, Tennant v. Hamilton, 5 Cl. & F. 122 (nuisance in injuring the plaintiff's premises by smoke, etc.; evidence on both sides as to the condition of "land similarly circumstanced to those of the party complaining," admitted, per L. C. Cottenham, "for ascertaining what the effect was of the smoke and vapor emitted by this manufactory"); 1857, R. v. Fairie, 8 E. & B. 486, 488 (Coleridge, J., cited a former case in which, on a charge of nuisance, he admitted evidence of the similar effects of the defendant's manufacture carried on at another place, to show "the tendency of the manufacture to produce such effects"; Lord Campbell, C. J., agreed); 1876, Broder v. Saillard, 2 Ch. D. 692 (Jessel, M. R., in an action to restrain a noise-nuisance, admitted "a practical experiment performed by Mr. I'Anson, who actually only put in the stable a piece of wood with a horse's shoe attached, and when that was struck upon the ground he heard it on the second floor front [of the next house]; showing that it is distinctly heard . . ."); 1882, Metropolitan Asylum Dist. v. Hill, 47 L. T. R. N. S. 29 (whether a small-pox hospital was a nuisance in infecting a neighborhood; per Lord Selborne, L. C., evidence was admissible of "any similar or other facts from which the effect, or absence of effect, of other hospitals, and particularly of those at H. and S., on the surrounding neighborhoods, could either positively or approximately be ascertained"; accord, Lord Watson; contra, Lord O'Hagan; quoted ante, § 443); 1899, Hoadley v. Seward & S. Co., 71 Conn. 640, 42 Atl. 997 (nuisance by a factory; effect of defendant's business upon other persons situated substantially the same as the plaintiff, admitted); 1871, Cooper v. Randall, 59 Ill. 320 (Walker, J., for the majority, admitting evidence in a nuisance case that the defendant's mill threw dust, smut, etc., on other houses: "It tended to show that the mill was capable of inflicting the injury complained of by appellant. If the deposit was general in the immediate neighborhood, and large quantities were deposited on other buildings similarly situated, it would be a just inference that the same was true of appellant's house"); 1900, Bradley v. R. Co., 111 Ia. 562, 82 N. W. 996

of the nuisance-nature of a railroad, by its injurious effects upon similar adjacent property, in respect to smoke, noise, vibration, and the like;[2] of the tendency of water, in various forms, by its effect under similar circumstances (for example, in the flowage of streams, the silting of harbors, the breaking of dams, the destruction of bridges);[3] of the tendency of gases, by their injurious effects, on other houses, trees, or water-supplies;[4] of other injurious operations

(condition of grass-roots in adjoining meadow under similar conditions, admitted); 1900, Hughes v. General Electric L. & P. Co., — Ky. —, 54 S. W. 722 (nuisance of smoke, etc.; effect on other dwellings in vicinity, excluded; no authority cited); 1864, Lincoln v. Mfg. Co., 9 All. 181 (alleged poisoning of a stream by copper acids, destroying meadow-crops; that similar effects were produced upon other meadows along the river, excluded, for reasons of confusion of issues and because of the slight probative value; Standish v. Washburn, post, doubted).

[2] 1896, Metropolitan W. S. E. R. Co. v. Dickinson, 161 Ill. 22, 24, 43 N. E. 706 ("physical effects upon adjoining property of an elevated railroad of the same general character as this one in the way of noise, smoke, gases, etc.," not admissible; except that witnesses to value may be asked whether they are qualified by knowing it); 1851, Concord R. Co. v. Greely, 23 N. H. 237, 243 (inconveniences of a railroad on adjoining land, not allowed to be shown by the experience on adjacent lands, because of the collateral issues involved); 1891, Doyle v. R. Co., 128 N. Y. 488, 495, 28 N. E. 495 (damage by the operation of an elevated railroad; evidence received of the effect upon the premises similarly situated and "not too distant"; "the Court may undoubtedly in such case, in the exercise of its discretion, limit the number of witnesses to be called, and may confine the examination of the witnesses to premises in the vicinity, giving a reasonable range"); 1896, Hine v. R. Co., 149 id. 154, 43 N. E. 414 (to show the effect of an elevated railroad upon the light coming to abutting premises, the effect upon premises across the street was admitted).

[3] 1782, Folkes v. Chadd, 3 Doug. 157, Lord Mansfield, C. J. (admitted evidence of the state of other harbors along the same coast where no embankment existed, to show that no such change had occurred as at the harbor in question, where an embankment existed); 1903, Louisville Water Co. v. Weis, — Ky. —, 76 S. W. 356 (flooding of a cellar from a leaking meter; the flooding of other cellars, offered to show that other causes had operated, held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); 1860, Clark v. Water Power Co., 52 Me. 75 (in an action for diverting a stream, injuries to another mill-owner were rejected on the facts, because "there were no elements of comparison offered which could afford any safe or reliable data for the judgment of a jury," and still other evidence, because the conditions "did not present such points of similarity to the plaintiff's mill and privilege as to afford any reliable data for comparison"); 1838, Standish v. Washburn, 21 Pick. 237 (the extent of flowage of meadows; the plaintiff offered to show a change in the quality and quantity of his land-production in the previous ten years as compared with the anterior period; then the defendant offered to show like changes in other lands not flowed; the latter was rejected, so far as the other meadows were distant and presumably not under the same influences); 1872, Hawks v. Charlemont, 110 Mass. 112 (the occurrence of washouts at a previous occasion and a different place by a removal of stones in the same way as alleged against the defendant; the trial Court ruled that "if the plaintiff could show that the localities and all the elements entering into the occurrences taking place at each locality were alike," the evidence might be given; and this ruling was sustained); 1889, Verran v. Baird, 150 Id. 142, 22 N. E. 630 (to show the effect of the breaking of the plaintiff's dam, the fact was offered of the appearance of a gully halfway between the dam and the plaintiff's property; but the other facts "necessary to make the gorge a measure of the volume and force of the water" were wanting, and the evidence was rejected); 1877, Pettibone v. Smith, 37 Mich. 580 (the low water in a stream was explained as the result of a succession of dry seasons, not of the defendant's diversion of water); 1867, Dorman v. Ames, 12 Minn. 451, 456 (overflow caused by a dam; that certain changes observable in the land were also observed in other land, not admitted for defendant); 1903, Roberts v. Dover, — N. H. —, 55 Atl. 895 (back-flow of sewage; that the sewer had at other times flowed back into cellars on an adjacent street, admitted to show the adequacy of the sewer's capacity); 1903, Bullock v. Lake Drummond C. & W. Co., — N. C. —, 43 S. E. 593 (effect of a canal in damaging adjacent property, excluded); 1839, Reed v. Dick, 8 Watts 480, 481 (admitting evidence of the behavior and condition of other vessels, to show the violence of a storm); 1891, Hoffman v. R. Co., 143 Pa. 503, 22 Atl. 823 (illustrating the force of discharge of water by experiment in Court, allowed); 1865, Haynes v. Burlington, 38 Vt. 350, 363 (to show that the setting back of water was not the cause of injury to a building, etc., similar injuries to another building not touched by the water were rejected, because the other conditions did not appear to be "so similar that one would be any fair test for the other").

[4] 1864, Ottawa G. & C. Co. v. Graham, 35 Ill. 348 (Walker, C. J.: "One of the questions controverted before the jury was whether the gas could pass through the earth the distance the well was situated from the tank, so as to affect the water. If it could be shown that it had so affected the water in other wells at the same or greater distance from the tank, and structures affecting the condition of land or buildings by vibration, burning, or otherwise;[5] of the tendency or quality of tools, weapons, vehicles, acids, and other materials, as indicated in their effects upon similar substances under similar conditions;[6] and of the tendency of a machine or apparatus, as shown such evidence" would be admissible); 1879, Eldt v. Cutter, 127 Mass. 522 (whether the gases from the defendant's copperas works had caused the discoloration of the paint on the plaintiff's house; the defendant alleged that the discoloration was due to sewer gas; experiments made with painted boards, etc., were admitted for the plaintiff as showing that under circumstances substantially similar, except that the sewer gas was wanting, the same results were produced; but the matter was admitted as being the grounds of experts' opinions); 1900, Koplan v. Gaslight Co., 177 Mass. 15, 58 N. E. 183 (whether a leak in the defendant's pipes had caused an explosion; testimony to "a smell of gas near the place of the accident at different times within three months previously," admitted); 1895, Evans v. Gas Co., 148 N. Y. 112, 42 N. E. 513 (to show that plaintiff's trees were injured by escaping gas, the fact was admitted of trees in the neighborhood being similarly affected at the time); 1902, Kilbride v. Carbon D. & M. Co., 201 Pa. 552, 51 Atl. 347 (explosion of a gas cylinder: the fact that the defendant had sold 150,000 gas cylinders, only one of which had ever exploded, treated as evidence to show their safety); 1899, Barrickman v. Marion Oil Co., 42 W. Va. 634, 32 S. E. 327 (fire caused by negligent supply of natural gas to plaintiff's house; condition and pressure of gas in neighboring houses governed by same regulator, admitted).

[5] 1868, Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 544 (the effect of the tunnelling of the defendant, as detrimental to adjacent premises other than the plaintiff's, offered to show that the defendant caused the land to crack and settle; excluded on the ground of surprise and confusion of issues); 1882, Abend v. Mueller, 11 Ill. App. 256 (action for injuries to soil and buildings caused by vibrations of the east end of the St. Louis Bridge; (1) evidence was admitted that at the west end the vibrations were more severe and that yet buildings were not injured; "Differences arising from diversity of soil or geological formation, if any, or otherwise, could readily have been ascertained on cross-examination or by the introduction of rebutting testimony"; (2) evidence of cracks, etc., caused in other buildings had been admitted; it was held then proper to show that these injuries were caused by vibrations of an adjacent Belt Railway and not by travel over the bridge); 1898, Sugar C. C. M. Co. v. Peterson, 177 Ill. 324, 52 N. E. 474 (falling of mine-roof in another place, not admitted); 1902, Fitzsimons & Connell Co. v. Braun, 199 id. 390, 65 N. E. 249 (injury to a building by dynamite blasts near by; the fact that adjacent buildings were or were not injured by the same blasting, excluded on the facts); 1900, Seibert v. McManus, 104 La. ..., 29 So. 108 (experiments as to fire-construction, admissible when made under identical conditions).

[6] 1873, R. v. Heseltine, 12 Cox Cr. 404 (arson; to show that the fire could have been set as claimed, experiments made with candles of different lengths, similar to those found in the débris of the fire, were admitted); 1901, Decatur C. W. & M. Co. v. Mehaffey, 128 Ala. 212, 29 So. 646 (experiments two years before, not under substantially the same conditions, to show the swinging of a scaffold, excluded; 1901, Timothy v. State, 130 Id. 68, 30 So. 339 (experiments as to the distance at which powder-marks will be left, held inadmissible); 1874, People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 402 (that a powder possessed by the defendant had destroyed ink-traces in another check written with the same ink as the one alleged to have been altered by the defendant, admitted); 1882, People v. Hope, 62 id. 291, 295 (experiments in Court with burglar's tools, allowed, for an unspecified purpose); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 id. 179, 48 Pac. 75 (fitting a chisel into marks on a door, allowed, the door, etc., being in the same condition); 1881, State v. Smith, 49 Conn. 381 (experiments with pistols by an expert, to see from which one a bullet had been discharged; the trial Court's discretion in refusing, held conclusive); 1884, Tomlinson v. Earnshaw, 112 Ill. 313 (to show that a sandstone having certain iron-spots in it was nevertheless of first quality, testimony was received that all such stones, even of first quality, had such spots); 1902, Jewell Filter Co. v. Kirk, 200 id. 382, 65 N. E. 698 (satisfactory operation of other filters of the same vendor, excluded, the similarity of circumstances not being shown); 1892, Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mugg, 132 Ind. 168, 31 N. E. 465 (experiments as to the freezing of a boot to the rail on a cold day, made on the day of the injury, excluded, because the conditions were not similar; see quotation ante, § 442); 1862, Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion, — Id. —, 32 N. E. 874 (experiments in letting a gondola-car down upon a siding under similar conditions, admitted; see quotation ante, § 442); 1899, Thrawley v. State, 153 id. 375, 55 N. E. 95 (experiments with similar pistol and cartridges to determine carrying distance, allowed); 1900, Bach v. R. Co., 112 Ia. 241, 83 N. W. 959 (defective guard-rail; subsequent derailment under different conditions, excluded); 1869, Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 368 (experiments by a witness as to the strength of similar horn and hoof rings when put together, admitted); 1876, Com. v. Piper, 120 id. 190 (murder by clubbing; experiments on a dynamometer with a bat of substantially the same form and weight as that alleged to have been used were rejected; Morton, J.: "Experiments of this character would tend to confuse and mislead rather than to assist the jury, unless they were shown to have been made under conditions the same as those existing in the case on trial. It was not shown in this case that there was a

by other instances of its operation under similar circumstances, to operate defectively or otherwise (for example, in actions for breach of warranty or personal injury);[7] here the workings of other similar machinery (tools or apparatus) would equally be receivable, provided the conditions were similar and a confusion of issues was not involved; but, in the first place, it should be understood that the other instances are merely evidential of the way the one in question probably worked, and should not be taken as a legal standard of adequate operation (post, § 461); and, in the second place, the issue in the case may be such that the other instances are less likely to be relevant (as where a different contract of operation was made), or that an instance of a special kind only is material (as where one machine is taken as the sample of sale).[8] similarity in the conditions of the two events, and the Court might properly in its discretion reject the testimony"); 1902, Kingman v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 181 Id. 387, 64 N. E. 79 (dangerous operation of a ring in a car at other times on the same day, admitted); 1901, Thiel v. Kennedy, 82 Minn. 142, 84 N. W. 657 (experiments with a wringer under similar conditions, rejected in discretion as involving confusion of issues); 1883, Polin v. State, 14 Nebr. 540, 16 N. W. 898 (whether a revolver would go off at half-cock; an experiment by the sheriff, with the remaining cartridges, under order of the Court, not allowed at the defendant's request, because the Court could not order the sheriff, and because the experiment could have been tried equally well with the empty chambers); 1899, Little v. Head & D. Co., 69 N. H. 494, 43 Atl. 619 (tests of strength of a hook, held not improperly excluded in discretion); 1875, Linsday v. People, 63 N. Y. 143, 147, 156 (tests of blood spots on boards long after the murder, admitted, on evidence that their condition was the same); 1854, Otey v. Hoyt, 2 Jones L. 72 (to show that a will was forged, by chemically removing the ink and writing in its place, a witness testified that "he had just seen an experiment performed whereby legible writing with ordinary ink had been erased and extracted from a piece of paper," which he then held in his hand, by the application of certain chemicals; excluded); 1892, Leonard v. R. Co., 21 Or. 555, 28 N. W. 887 (a scar on the outside of the bottom flange of a rail was alleged to have been made by the wheel of an engine on a rail crossing the first; experiments were received of the rolling of a similar wheel on a similar rail crossing, showing the impossibility of such a result; the experimental wheel was slightly smaller, but an increase of size would only have increased the impossibility; see quotation ante, § 442); 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 153, 17 Atl. 483 (experiments as to the similarity of sleigh-tracks, received); 1900, Hardwick S. B. & T. Co. v. Dreman, 72 id. 438, 48 Atl. 645 (experiments as to adhesiveness of gummed paper, not admitted where similarity of conditions did not appear).

For evidence from the effects of gunshots, drugs, etc., on human bodies, see § 457, post.

[7] 1891, Phillips, J., in Bloomington v. Legg, 151 Ill. 9, 13, 37 N. E. 696 ("Where an issue is made as to the safety of any machinery or work of man's construction which is for practical use, the manner in which it has served that purpose, when put to that use, would be a matter material to the issue"); 1876, Baber v. Rickart, 52 Ind. 594, 597 (whether a ditching machine would work as warranted; its manner of working at another place, admitted); 1894, State v. Delaney, 92 Ia. 467, 61 N. W. 1040 (arson; to show that the fire might have been caused by a leaky gasoline stove, the fact was admitted of a former fire in the same house from the stove); 1880, Brierly v. Davol Mills, 128 Mass. 291 (whether a loom attachment was capable of successful working; its working upon another loom of substantially the same construction and operation, admitted); 1894, Tremblay v. Harnden, 162 Id. 383, 38 N. E. 972 (injury by a machine; that it "worked perfectly before the accident and had worked perfectly ever since," admitted); 1896, Flaherty v. Powers, 167 Id. 61, 44 N. E. 1074 (habit of a machine to spatter, admitted, to show its behavior at the time of the accident); 1897, Roskee v. Pulp Co., 169 id. 528, 48 N. E. 766 (experiments with machinery to test its working, received); 1890, McCarragher v. Rogers, 120 N. Y. 526, 24 N. E. 812 (injury at a machine; prior misworking of the same machine in the same way, admitted, to show "the condition of the machine"); 1893, Findlay Brewing Co. v. Bauer, 50 Oh. 560, 35 N. E. 55 (admitting instances of the previous workings of a machine under another person, to show its defective character); 1896, Baker v. Hagey, 177 Pa. 128, 35 Atl. 704 (other instances of defective working of a plant for breaking steel, admitted to show its defective condition at the time in question); 1898, Taylor v. U. S., 32 C. C. A. 449, 89 Fed. 954 (counterfeiting; whether a machine could do certain work; allowed to be operated before the jury); 1900, Konold v. R. Co., 21 Utah 379, 60 Pac. 1021 (experiments as to cause of explosion, held not improperly excluded in trial Court's discretion); 1898, Perry v. Machine Co., 70 Vt. 276, 40 Atl. 731 (condition of a machine, as to operating, on the day of trial, admitted).

[8] 1880, Blackman v. Collier, 65 Ala. 312 (admitting the operations of similar machinery,

The evidencing of a tendency — e. g. of a machine — by its material effects is to be distinguished from two other matters, one of them involving a wholly different principle: (1) The evidencing of a defective or dangerous machine or highway by the occurrence of previous personal injuries has a special line of other precedents (dealt with post, § 458). (2) The inference to one human act of negligence from another similar act (in using, for example, the same machine or in driving the same street-car) is governed by different principles, and is dealt with under the character-rule (ante, § 199). This distinction is pointed out in the following passage:

1894, Putnam, J., in Central Vt. R. Co. v. Soper, 8 C. C. A. 341, 59 Fed. 870, 890 (in an action for damage caused by spontaneous ignition of dust by heated pulley-bearings, admitting evidence that similar ignition at those bearings had occurred before): "[The facts objected to] relate entirely to the tendency of things, inanimate things, being in this case machinery. The plaintiff in error argued as though they related to the peculiar habits of certain specified human beings. The distinction is a broad one; and, if it is kept in mind, the evidence was clearly admissible for the purpose, not of showing that the employees of the defendant below were negligent, but of showing . . . that it is the tendency of certain parts of rapidly-running machinery to get heated, and of dust in mills where grain is ground or stored to be of a highly inflammable character, . . . both for the purpose of showing a point where the fire might have originated and also of showing the necessity of care to guard that point."

to determine capacity); 1898, Stockton C. H. & A. W. v. Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 Pac. 565 (machines destroyed by fire; to show that they were worthless, evidence by the defendant how other similar machines of the plaintiff had worked, excluded); 1884, McCormick H. M. Co. v. Gray, 100 Ind. 285, 292 (sale of a harvester; defence, that it did not work well; that it ran harder than other machines, excluded, as "a comparison with standards not admitted to be true standards of excellence"); 1885, Nat'l B. & L. Co. v. Dunn, 106 Id. 110, 115, 6 N. E. 131 (sale of a threshing engine; defence, that it was defective; the quantity of work of another engine of the same make and rated power, admitted, as merely showing "the possibilities" of such an engine, and not setting up a standard of quality); 1887, Osborn v. Simerson, 73 Ia. 509, 512, 35 N. W. 615 (sale of a harvesting-machine; issue, its failure to work as represented; the way in which other similar machines worked, excluded, because it would be essential that the other machines should be similar and tried under similar circumstances, and this would introduce too many collateral and unforeseen issues); 1890, Davis' Sons v. Sweeney, 80 Id. 393, 45 N. W. 1040 (showing that a machine was defective by telling what other similar machines would do, allowed); 1897, Kramer v. Messner, 101 Id. 88, 69 N. W. 1142 (to show that a heating-apparatus did not fail because of defects in the building, the fact was admitted of favorable results obtained from another apparatus in the same house under severer conditions); 1831, Bradford v. Ins. Co., 11 Pick. 161 (to prove that damaged blankets were not damaged by sea-water in transit but by wetting in the consignor's factory to increase the weight, the fact was admitted of the receipt by other consignees, in the same year, from the same consignor, by different vessels, of many similar goods damaged in a similar manner); 1886, Gege v. Meyers, 59 Mich. 300, 306, 26 N. W. 522 (contract to sell cutler-woods; the workmanship and materials of others of the same lot shipped to other persons, not received; no authority); 1886, Osborne v. Bell, 62 Id. 214, 218, 28 N. W. 841 (harvesting-machine, alleged to operate defectively; that all the others of 100 sold the same year worked well, excluded, as not tending to show "that the operation of the one in question was in accordance with the promise of the plaintiff"); 1898, Avery v. Burrall, 118 Mich. 672, 77 N. W. 272 (guaranty of boilers' working; working of other similar boilers under similar circumstances, admitted to show that under proper management the boilers would work well); 1899, People v. Thompson, 122 Id. 411, 81 N. W. 344 (explosion of boiler; experiments as to time of raising steam under similar conditions, admissible); 1898, Shute v. Mfg. Co., 69 N. H. 210, 40 Atl. 391 (cause of breaking of a pulley; breaking of another similar pulley, admitted); 1870, Tilton v. Miller, 66 Pa. 388 (refusal to accept gas-burners purchased by sample, because they were not made according to sample; held, that while the maker did not guarantee a particular result or quality of work, and therefore evidence that they did not work well was immaterial, yet to determine whether they were made according to sample, the workings of the sample and the workings of the goods offered might be received for comparison); 1885, Carpenter v. Corinth, 58 Vt. 216, semble (breaking of other horse-bits under similar conditions, admissible).

§ 452. Sparks and Fires, as evidencing the Cause of a Fire; General Principle. There has been some confusion of precedents over the evidencing of the source of a fire (usually, a fire attributed to a railroad locomotive engine) by the fact of the emission of sparks or the setting of fires at other times by the same or other apparatus. The solution of the problem seems not to be difficult if the different issues involved are discriminated. Two issues may come for investigation. (1) The effort may be to prove the cause of the fire in question. The locomotive, or other apparatus (factory or mine chimney), is alleged as the cause; and this is sought to be evidenced by the fact that at other times there were emissions of sparks (i. e. flaming coals) from (a) the same engine or (b) other engines of the same owner. (a) The proposed inference, in the first case, is from the former spark-emissions to the existence of a capacity or tendency to such emissions by that specific engine, and thus to the possibility or probability of such an emission having occurred at the time in question and so having set the fire in question. (b) The proposed inference, in the second case, is to such a capacity or tendency in the class of engines passing over that line, and therefore to its probable existence in a particular engine passing by at the time in question, and thus to the same conclusion as before. (2) In the preceding issue, the effort was merely to show that the defendant's engine caused the fire. But this alone will usually not suffice under the law;[1] it will be necessary further to show some kind of negligence; and this will commonly resolve itself into showing the maintenance of an engine so constructed as to be dangerously likely to emit sparks. This requires much more than a showing of mere capacity for emission. In the former issue the inquiry was merely whether the locomotive did once emit a spark and thus cause the specific fire, and the fact of capacity to do so was merely subsidiary and evidentiary to that; in the present issue the plaintiff proceeds directly to show habitual emission, i. e. a dangerous tendency, as a main element entering into legal negligence; and the showing must be not merely of a capacity to emit sparks, but of a tendency so strong that it may be regarded as negligence to maintain an engine so equipped. Such are the two issues; and the rulings upon the evidence for each may conceivably be different.

§ 453. Same: Discriminations. Before proceeding to examine the application of the present principles to the above issues, it is desirable to discriminate certain other evidential questions which often arise in such litigation but do not involve the present principles. (1) In showing that a particular locomotive set a fire or emitted sparks, evidence is receivable that, shortly after it passed the place in question, stubble along the track was found on fire or live coals were found near the track. Here the inference is from the traces of fire to the origin of fire, — an argument of another kind (ante, §§ 148, 149), and not affected by the present principle. (2) The question whether the mere fact of the setting of the fire in question, if brought home to the defendant, raises a presumption of negligence is a question of Presumptions (post, § 2509). (3) The setting of fires by the same or other engines of the defendant at other times may be admissible to show notice of the defect, if there was one; here is involved the general principle of evidencing notice or knowledge circumstantially (ante, § 252). Practically, there may be a serious difference in this use; since only prior fires could be relevant as indicating this fact of notice. (4) In order to show that a certain kind of spark-arrester or other piece of apparatus is such as a prudent person would use, the usage of other persons as to spark-arresters or like precautions may be offered; this raises a different question (post, § 461).

[1] It might, in a jurisdiction where the railroad owner is by statute liable without negligence for the setting of fire by sparks.

Returning to the two issues stated in the preceding section, the situations thus presented are the following: (1) To show that a given locomotive caused the fire, by having the capacity to emit sparks, evidence is offered of spark-emissions at other times (a) by the same locomotive, or (b) by other locomotives on the same line; (2) To show a dangerously defective (and therefore negligent) construction in the locomotive, evidence is offered of spark-emissions at other times by the same locomotive or by others on the same line.

§ 454. Same: (1) Cause of the Fire, as evidenced by other Spark-emissions (a) by the same Locomotive. Here no difficulty seems to have arisen. The emission of sparks by a locomotive at various times will naturally indicate a capacity to emit such sparks; the capacity rising into a tendency (i. e. the possibility rising towards a probability), in a given case, with the number or character of the instances (ante, § 446). Where the time of the other instances is somewhat removed, it is sometimes thought wise to require a preliminary showing that the condition of the engine had not changed in the meantime (ante, § 437); but the difficulty of such a showing by the plaintiff, and the ease for the defendant of showing such a change if it had occurred, make it much preferable to ignore this requirement and to leave it to the defendant, on the principle of Explanation (ante, § 449) to show such a change if he can. The other instances, moreover, may have occurred either before or after the time in question, for in either case they show the condition of the engine.[1]

[1] To the following precedents may be added those receiving the evidence under (1 b) and (2), post; for the present point, though passed upon in comparatively few jurisdictions, would be regarded as involved in an affirmative ruling on those points: Ala.: 1903, Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Clark, — Ala. —, 34 So. 917 (other emissions at or about the time, received); Col.: 1875, Henry v. R. Co., 50 Cal. 176, 183 (to show that the engine was the cause, other fires set by it are admissible); 1899, Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 125 id. 434, 58 Pac. 55 (previous emission of sparks by the same engine, admitted to show probable setting of a fire); Ill.: 1898, Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Tripp, 175 Ill. 251, 51 N. E. 833 (emission within ten days afterwards, admitted); Ky.: 1901, Carpenter v. Laswell, — Ky., —, 63 S. W. 609 (setting of prior fires from defendant's smokestack, admitted); Mass.: 1863, Ross v. R. Co. 6 All. 87 (sparks by the same engine under similar conditions, admitted to disprove the defendant's proposition that no sparks could reach the plaintiff's building, and thus to show "the physical possibility that fire could be so communicated"); 1881, Loring v. R. Co., 131 Mass. 469 (same); Mich.: 1874, Hoyt v. Jeffers, 30 Mich. 181, 189 (mill-chimney; that it "had been in the habit of throwing sparks and setting fire to buildings, etc., for several years previous," the conditions of use, wind, etc., being the same, admitted to show that the chimney had caused this fire); N. H.: 1888, Haseltine v. R. Co., 64 N. H. 545 (other fires set by the same engine a week later, admitted to show it to be the cause of the fire in question); N. Y.: 1862, Hinds

§ 455. Same: (1) Cause of the Fire, as evidenced by other Spark-emissions (b) by other Locomotives. Here there has been some difference of opinion, which can only be solved by an examination of the principles involved:

(1) Relevancy; (a) in General. The proposed inference, as already noted (ante, § 452), is to the defendant's engine as the possible cause of the fire, i. e. as having the capacity to cause it by emitting burning material. In evidencing that capacity by instances of it, one way — just examined — is to take instances of the specific engine's operation. But another and equally satisfactory way is to take instances of the operation of the class of engines of which it is a member; for what exists in the class is presumably to be found also in the individual, and to evidence such a capacity in the class is to evidence it in any one of the class. The argument up to this point has never been objected to, except in the following passage:

1883, Orton, J., in Gibbons v. R. Co., 58 Wis. 335, 17 N. W. 132: "Evidence that other fires had been set by the fire machinery managed by the company, before or after or about the time of the fire in question, is confined to the same machinery which caused such fire, and which may bear upon the question of the sufficiency of such machinery or its management. . . . [It is said that] such evidence might tend to prove the possibility and consequent probability that some locomotive of the company caused the fire. . . . But it is submitted that a possibility can never establish a probability of a fact required to be proved in order to make a railroad company, or any party, liable in any action whatever; and the proposition is no sounder in logic than in law."

In answer to this argument, two things may be said. First, a given instance or two may show only a possibility; but this is reason only for excluding such slight evidence in that case, and not for excluding all such evidence without regard to the number or significance of such instances. Secondly, even a possibility or capacity is properly relevant (ante, §§ 446, 448). The object is to narrow down the conceivable range of causes by finding out what things were capable of producing the fire, and by then cumulating other evidence upon one of them. If mice had set a fire in the house, but once only, by getting at matches, this would be relevant as showing a possible cause. The statement in the above passage that no one can be made liable upon a mere possibility is of course beside the point; because the possibility is not offered as constituting per se a test of liability, but merely as evidence admissible towards accumulating a preponderance of evidence. The sound

v. Barton, 25 N. Y. 544 (former emission of sparks, admitted to show "the capacity of this particular engine to emit igneous matter a greater distance than that intervening between it and the building" in question); 1888, Collins v. R. Co., 109 id. 243, 249, 16 N. E. 50 (emission six months later; admitted only on a showing that the engine was permanently so constructed as to emit sparks or that it was in the same state of repair as before; no precedents cited; the ruling seems finical and unsound); Pa.: 1876, Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hendrickson, 80 Pa. 182, 189 (sparks and fires by the same engine, just before and after, admitted to show the cause); 1875, Pennsylvania Co. v. Watson, 81 id. 293, 296 (sparks and fires by the same engine, just before and after, admitted); 1891, Henderson v. R. Co., 144 id. 461, 477, 22 Atl. 851 (same; the time limit to be a reasonable one); Va.: 1897, Patteson v. R. Co., 94 Va. 16, 26 S. E. 393 (other sparks by the same engine, admitted); Wis.: 1882, Brusberg v. R. Co., 55 Wis. 106, 12 N. W. 416 (fires on the same trip of the same engine, close by, admitted to show it to be the cause of the fire).

principle, as applied to the present sort of evidence, is expounded in the following passage:

1846, Piggot v. R. Co., 3 C. B. 229 (admitting evidence of sparks on other occasions from the defendant's locomotives); Tindal, C. J. "[The evidence was admissible] to ascertain whether or not sparks such as those described could be emitted, from the engines used by the company, to the distance represented"; Maule, J.: "The evidence objected to was that other engines used on the defendant's line, of the same description as that which was said to have caused the injury here, had on various other occasions been seen to throw particles of ignited matter to a distance from the line as great or greater than the spot in question. The matter in issue was whether or not the plaintiff's property had been destroyed by fire proceeding from the defendant's engine, and involved in that issue was the question whether or not the fire could have been so caused. The evidence was offered for the purpose of showing that it could; and for that purpose it was clearly material and admissible."

1897, Savage, J., in Dunning v. R. Co., 91 Me. 87, 39 Atl. 352: "It is admissible as 'tending to prove the possibility, and a consequent probability, that some locomotive caused the fire,' — language from Railway Co. v. Richardson,[1] which has often been cited with approval. To show a possibility is the first logical step. That other engines of the same company, under the same general management, passing over the same track, at the same grade, at about the same time, and surrounded by the same physical conditions, have scattered sparks or dropped coals, so as to cause fires, appeals legitimately to the mind as showing that it was possible for the engine in question to do likewise. The testimony is illustrative of the character of a locomotive, as such, with respect to the emission of sparks or the dropping of coals. If the possibility be proved, other facts and circumstances may lead to a probability, and then to satisfactory proof."

(1) (b) Similarity of Construction. But the foregoing inference is based on the assumption that the engine in question is one of a class, and what is true of the class is true of the individual engine upon this assumption only. Not all engines are of the same construction or in the same condition with reference to a capacity to emit sparks, and therefore the instancing of such a capacity in some of them does not evidence such a capacity in another unless they belong to the same class with reference to construction, etc.; in short, unless the principle of substantial similarity of conditions (ante, § 442) is fulfilled. Upon this all agree; but the question arises whether the detailed showing of similarity of construction should be required in advance from the plaintiff, or whether the similarity should be assumed in certain cases, leaving it to the defendant, on the principle of Explanation (ante, § 449), to show, if he can, that the construction or condition was not similar. It seems wiser, where the other engines belong to the same owner or run over the same line, to assume this similarity, — first, because it is a probable one, and, next, because it is comparatively difficult for a plaintiff, though comparatively easy for a defendant, to produce the proper evidence. This was long ago pointed out in one of the earlier cases:

1856, Denio, C. J., in Sheldon v. R. Co., 14 N. Y. 220: "It is argued [that the evidence] . . . did not refer to any particular engine, and that it may be that the one which ran past the premises just before the discovery of the fire was quite a different one [from the others. . . . But] it would be practically quite impossible by any inquiries to find out the offending engine, for a large proportion of those owned by the company are constantly in rapid motion. The business of running the trains on a railroad presupposes a unity of management and a general similarity in the fashion of the engines and the character of the operations. . . . it is presumed to be in the power of the company, which has intimate relations with all its engineers and conductors, to controvert the fact sworn to, if it is untrue, or, if true in a particular instance, that it was not so in respect to the engines which passed the place at a proper time before the occurrence of the fire. The effect of the evidence would only be to shift the onus probandi upon the company. . . . [It was in their power] to show that the special facts applicable directly to the occurrence of the fire were such as to overcome the general inference from the plaintiff's evidence."[2]

[1] 91 U. S. 464.

Where the other engines belong to another road, this assumption cannot be made; but upon a showing of such similarity, it would seem that instances of their operation would be receivable.[3]

(1) (c) Time of other instances. The other instances may be either before or after the time in question; though if the time was remote, a preliminary showing that no change had been made in construction would perhaps be proper.

(1) (d) Nature of Sparks. The setting of a fire is plainly an effect indicating a capacity to set fire. But the emission of burning coals of any sort is always regarded as sufficient, because it is clear that such a substance is always capable of setting fire.[4]

(2) Auxiliary Policy. The principle of auxiliary policy (ante, § 443), involving the considerations of unfair surprise and confusion of issues, has never been thought to exclude this sort of evidence;[5] for not only is the evidence of special importance, but it seldom involves any substantial risk of either of those sorts.

(3) Known engine. In Pennsylvania, the notion was early promulgated that the evidence of sparks from other engines is not receivable if the engine that passed at the time and must have been the one (if any) to set the fire is specifically known and identified.[6] It is not easy to see the precise reason for this limitation. The thought perhaps is that when the specific engine is known, there is no need of resorting to instances of the operation of other engines. But in reality the need may be and usually will be just as great; for it does not follow that, because it was known on this occasion, it was therefore known on the other occasions; and it may well be impossible to obtain instances of this particular engine's operation on other occasions. The principle that the operation of a specific machine may be learned from the operations of its class is just as valid in the one case as in the other. A doctrine that proper evidence is always to be rejected because it is sometimes possible to get other and perhaps better evidence is certainty a novelty. This

[2] Accord: Eng., Mo., Nev., N. Y., Or., U. S., Vt. Contra: Ill. (?), N. H. (undecided).

[3] Mass.

[4] Except that in Pennsylvania it is required that the evidence show repeated emission of sparks of unusual size.

[5] It was expressly repudiated in the following cases: 1875, Henry v. R. Co., 50 Cal. 176, 184 (at least for the case in hand); 1874, Hoyt v. Jeffers, 30 Mich. 181, 190.

[6] The earlier cases are cited post, § 456.

limitation about identified engines, which began as a local aberration, has threatened to spread into other jurisdictions, through their apparent ignorance of its purely local character.[7]

Subject to the occasional prevalence of the last limitation, this class of evidence for this purpose is accepted as admissible in almost all jurisdictions.[8]

[7] E. g. Ill., Mo., N. C., S. C., U. S. C. C. A., Wis. (post, § 456).

[8] Eng.: 1846, Piggot v. R. Co., 3 C. B. 229 (the fact of sparks on other occasions from the defendant's engines was offered; it was objected that "it was not competent to the plaintiff in this case to prove the emission of sparks or ignited matter from other engines, passing the spot on other occasions, without showing them to have been under the care of the same driver, driven at the same speed, with the same number of carriages and passengers, and of the same construction as the engine in use at the time of the accident"; admitted in spite of this objection); Ala.: 1901, Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Johnston, 128 Ala. 283, 29 So. 771 (habitual emission of sparks by defendant's engines, admitted; the qualification about identified engines, not decided); Ark.: 1894, Railway Co. v. Jones, 59 Ark. 105, 111, 26 S. W. 595 (other fires by the same railroad's engines, perhaps admissible); Cal.: 1885, Butcher v. R. Co., 67 Cal. 518, 8 Pac. 174 (fires from other engines of the defendant, before and after, admissible "to show the cause of the injury"; two judges dissenting); Ga.: 1897, Brown v. Benson, 101 Ga. 753, 29 S. E. 215 (fires set "at various times before the fire occurred," by engines of the defendant, admissible; if remote in time, the conditions of repair must be shown the same); Ill.: 1866, Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McClelland, 42 Ill. 355 (sparks and fires by the defendant's engines, admitted to show that sparks could be thrown one hundred feet, all the engines being similar); Ind. T.: 1903, St. Louis I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Lawrence, — Ind. T. —, 76 S. W. 254 (admissible, where the engine in question is not identified); Ia.: 1882, Babcock v. R. Co., 62 Ia. 593, 597, 13 N. W. 740, 17 N. W. 909 (another fire set by the defendant's engine in the right of way, not admitted to show that this one also caught there); 1884, Bell v. R. Co., 64 id. 321, 325 (other fires set by the defendant's engines in that region, excluded); Ky.: 1883, Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Barrow, 89 Ky. 643, 20 S. W. 165 ("in the absence of direct evidence as to the condition of that particular locomotive," former fires by other engines were held admissible); 1900, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Samuels, — id. —, 57 S. W. 235 (R. Co. v. Barrow approved); Me.: 1893, Thatcher v. R. Co., 85 Me. 502, 509, 27 Atl. 519 (fires set by the defendant's other locomotives about the same time and in the same vicinity, admitted); 1897, Dunning v. R. Co., 91 id. 87, 39 Atl. 352 (other fires by other locomotives about the same time and in the same vicinity, admitted; the Pennsylvania rule about identity of engine rejected; see quotation supra); Md.: 1873, Annapolis & E. R. Co. v. Gantt, 39 Md. 115, 134 (sparks and fires by other engines of the defendant, shortly before, admitted to show the capacity to cause the fire); Mass.: 1881, Ross v. R. Co., 6 All. 87 (sparks and fires by engines of a similar sort on other roads, admitted to show "the physical possibility that fire could be so communicated," which the defendant had denied); 1900, McGinn v. Platt, 177 Mass. 125, 58 N. E. 175 (emission by other engines on the same road in the vicinity, received); 1901, Bowen v. R. Co., 179 id. 524, 61 N. E. 141 (emission of sparks by engines similarly equipped, received); Miss.: 1903, Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Ins. Co., — Miss. —, 35 So. 304 (emission of sparks by other engines, just before and after, admitted); Mo.: 1893, Campbell v. R. Co., 121 Mo. 340, 349, 25 S. W. 396 (fires by other engines of the defendant, before and after, at different places on the line, admissible); 1897, Matthews v. R. Co., 142 id. 645, 44 S. W. 802 (sparks from another engine of the defendant, admitted; no previous showing of similarity of kind or condition required); Nev.: 1874, Longabaugh v. R. Co., 9 Nev. 271, 284, 288 (sparks and fires from the defendant's engines, within a few weeks, admissible, to show that an engine of the defendant caused the fire; similarity of construction need not first be shown); N. H.: 1860, Boyce v. R. Co., 42 N. H. 97, 100 (sparks and fires by other engines, admitted, to show capacity for setting fire, provided they are all of similar construction, repair, and management); 1862, Boyce v. R. Co., 45 id. 627 (similar evidence admissible; but the above proviso held to be a point undecided); 1884, Smith v. R. Co., 63 id. 25, 29 (fires by the defendant's engines, all of similar construction, admitted "to show that this fire could have been and probably was set in the same manner"); 1903, Gerrish v. Whitfield, — id. —, 55 Atl. 551, semble (that "such a mill as W.'s" had thrown live sparks as far as in the present case, admissible); N. Y.: 1856, Sheldon v. R. Co., 14 N. Y. 218, 220 (sparks from other engines of the defendant on the same track, admitted, "after refuting every other probable cause of the fire," to show that the engines "were so managed as to be likely to set on fire objects not more remote than the property burned"; similiarity of engine-construction need not be first shown; see quotation supra); 1862, Hinds v. Barton, 25 id. 544, 546, semble (approving the preceding case); 1866, Field v. R. Co., 32 id. 338, 346, 348 (live coals dropped at other times from the fire-pan; foregoing cases approved); Or.: 1890, Koontz v. O. R. & N. Co., 20 Or. 3, 23 Pac. 820 (sparks and fire by other engines of the defendant, before and after, admissible, without showing similarity of make); Pa.: 1875, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Stranahan, 79 Pa. 405 (the emission of sparks in unusual quantities by other engines of

§ 456. Same: (2) Defective Construction, as an element of Negligence, evidenced by other Spark-emissions. Here, as already noted (§ 452), the inference is in its nature broadly the same as in the preceding cases, i. e. from the observed operations of the engines to a construction or condition which, under the law of torts and aided by other evidence, may be an element of negligence. But though the process of inference is the same, the present purpose is distinct from and additional to the preceding; and either one may be available without the other, — for example, where a statute makes the setting of fire by a locomotive negligence per se, in which case only the preceding use is required; or where the setting of the fire is conceded, in which case the present use alone is available. The principle is expounded in the following passages:

1858, Bramwell, B., in Vaughan v. R. Co., 3 H. & N. 743, 745, 750 (fires by the defendant's engines at other times were admitted without objection): "It was admitted that, with these precautions, the locomotive was the cause of setting fire to the defendant's banks, not daily but occasionally; so that . . . its use was dangerous, and what had happened on this particular occasion — that is, setting fire to the defendant's grass — was not a particular accident, but one of the habitual incidents to the use of the locomotive."

1891, Clark, J., in Henderson v. R. Co., 144 Pa. 488: "If many of the company's engines, at or about the time, are without sufficient spark-arresters, and frequent fires are kindled in consequence, it may well be inferred, in view of the effectual character of mechanical inventions of this kind, not only that the fire in question originated from this cause, but that it occurred from the habitual negligence of the company in failing to provide sufficient spark-arresters."

1869, Barrett, J., in Clearelands v. R. Co., 42 Vt. 457: "The argument is this: The evidence tended to show, and the fact was not denied, that the fire was set from an engine of the defendants; . . . other evidence tended to show that about the time, and on the day of the fire, and before it occurred, the defendants were running engines by the place in question that did scatter fire to such an extent that fires were set by it. The inference is that, of the defendants' engines, the one by which the fire was set was one the defendant, admitted to show the cause of the fire); 1891, Henderson v. R. Co., 144 id. 461, 487, 22 Atl. 851 (repeated sparks and fires about the same time, set by other engines of the defendant, admitted to show the cause of the fire, provided the engine is not identifiable; otherwise, the evidence of other fires and sparks must be restricted to it); R. I.: 1871, Smith v. R. Co., 10 R. I. 24, 27 (other fires set by the defendant's engines, admissible "to show the possibility of communicating fire by sparks from a locomotive"); U. S.: 1875, Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 458, 470 (sparks by the defendant's engines, during the same summer, admitted to show that an engine of the defendant caused the fire; similarity of construction, etc., need not first be shown); 1892, Chicago S. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 3 C. C. A. 264, 52 Fed. 711, 10 U. S. App. 375, 378 (emission of fire for several weeks previous in the same vicinity, admitted); 1893, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 4 C. C. A. 447, 54 Fed. 474, 10 U. S. App. 629, 631 (similar); 1902, Lesser Cotton Co. v. R. Co., 52 C. C. A. 95, 114 Fed. 138 (the engine being identified, and its spark-arrester being produced, the fact of emission of sparks by other engines of the defendant was held inadmissible, unless it appeared that they were constructed and operated similarly; the opinion does not clearly comprehend the principle); 1902, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Watson, — U. S. —, 23 Sup. 681 (Grand T. R. Co. v. Richardson followed); Vt.: 1894, Hoskison v. R. Co., 66 Vt. 618, 30 Atl. 24 (sparks and fires by other engines of the defendant, admitted to show the capacity of the engines to set fire; the particular engine not being identifiable; similarity of construction need not first be shown); Va.: 1897, Kimball v. Borden, 95 Va. 203, 28 S. E. 207 (sparks by other engines of the defendant near the time, admitted); Wash.: 1902, Abrams v. R. Co., 27 Wash. 507, 68 Pac. 78 (other fires, admitted); 1903, Noland v. R. Co., 31 id. 430, 71 Pac. 1098 (admissible, if the specific engine is not identified); Wis.: 1883, Gibbons v. R. Co., 58 Wis. 335, 17 N. W. 132 (fires set by the defendant's engines at other times, not admissible to show that the engine of the defendant's caused the fire, the engine being identified; where not identified, semble, the same result) that scattered fire. But it is already in evidence that an engine that will do that to such an extent is not of proper construction and suitable repair. The reasoning is direct to the condition of the defendants' engine by which the fire was set."

The general nature of the inference being the same as in the preceding cases, the incidental questions that arise are analogous. (1) It might be supposed, since here the purpose is to show a tendency and not a mere capacity to emit sparks, that a stronger quality of evidence would have been required. This seems not to have been done anywhere;[1] and for these presumable reasons, namely, that even a capacity to emit sparks may in a given case become an element of negligence, and that in any case the distinction (ante, § 446) between a capacity and a tendency (possibility and probability) is impracticable with the object of requiring a higher quality for evidence of the latter. These reasons justify the failure to make such a distinction. (2) The other instances may be received from the same engine or from other engines of the same line; discrimination between the two seems rarely to have been attempted, — a just result, as already noted (ante, § 455). But any Court that might require similarity of construction to be shown in advance[2] would apply the requirement equally in the preceding class of cases and the present. (3) The time of the other instances may be either before or after the time in question; if the time was remote, a preliminary showing that no change of condition had occurred might be required. (4) Where the specific engine is known, the evidence as to other engines is excluded in a few jurisdictions;[3] the impropriety of this limitation has been already considered (ante, § 455).

The state of the law in the various jurisdictions is not as harmonious as upon the foregoing class of evidence. But in no jurisdiction, apparently, is the evidence excluded absolutely; in a few only it is excluded conditionally.[4]

[1] Except that Pa. requires the repeated setting of fires by sparks of unusual size; but this is required equally for the preceding case; see Ia. also.

[2] See note 2 in § 455.

[3] Ga., Ill., Mich., N. C., Pa., Wis., and perhaps others.

[4] The phrase used in some of the ensuing precedents, that the evidence indicates a "negligent habit" is hardly correct; the evidence indicates defective construction of the engine, which may be equivalent to negligence; but that it can be used to indicate a habit or character of the defendant's agents is perhaps doubtful, for the learned Courts using this language would hardly mean to involve the principles of the character-rule (ante, § 199). The precedents are as follows: Eng.: 1841, Aldridge v. R. Co., 3 M. & Gr. 515, 522 (Tindal, C. J.: "If the plaintiff had proved that the engines had frequently set fire to stacks, that would have shown negligence"; but whether by indicating defective condition of the engine, or merely by tending to show a notice of such condition, does not appear); 1858, Vaughan v. R. Co., 3 H. & N. 743, 745, 750 (fires by the defendant's engines at other times, admitted to show the dangerousness of the construction; see quotation supra; the ruling on appeal, in 5 H. & N. 679, 688, probably did not mean to deny this); N. Br.: 1883, Robinson v. N. B. R. Co., 23 N. Br. 323, 332 (that fires frequently occurred along the right of way after the passing of trains, admitted); Ont.: 1883, Canada C. R. Co. v. McLaren, 8 Ont. App. 564, 571 (prior emission of sparks by defendant's engine, admitted to show defective construction, by two judges); 1900, Peacock v. Cooper, 27 id. 128 (prior and subsequent emission of sparks by a steamboat, held admissible to show defective construction; but here the evidence was not sufficient under the rule); Ala.: 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 109 Ala. 500, 19 So. 989 (the mere fact of adjacent fires long before, excluded); 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Malone, ib. 509, 20 So. 33 (that other fires had been set in the neighborhood by the defendant's engines, not admissible if "similar conditions did not exist"); Ark.: 1894, Railway Co. v. Jones, 59 Ark. 105, 111, 26 S. W. 595 (other fires, as evidence of defective condition, must have been set by the same engine); Cal.:

B. INSTANCES OF CORPORAL EFFECTS, AS EVIDENCE.

§ 457. Corporal Effects and Symptoms; Miscellaneous Instances (Proximity, Calibre, or Direction of a Weapon inflicting a Wound; Operation of a Drug, Liquor, Poison, Food, or Disease, on Human Beings or on Animals). So far as legal principle is concerned, no different one is here involved from 1875, Henry v. R. Co., 50 Cal. 176, 183 (other fires by the same engine, admitted to show that its construction was defective); 1885, Butcher v. R. Co. 67 id. 518, 8 Pac. 174 (fires from other engines of the defendant, before and after, admissible to show "negligence in the construction or working" of the engines; two judges dissenting); Fla.: 1891, Jacksonville T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular L. T. & M. Co., 27 Fla. 1, 9 So. 661 ("former fires by the same engine," but not by others, admissible to show "defective condition or construction or improper management"); Ga.: 1892, East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Hesters, 90 Ga. 11, 15 S. E. 828 (in rebuttal of defendant's evidence of the proper condition of engines, the emission of sparks by other engines is receivable); 1900, Akins v. R. & B. Co., 111 id. 815, 35 S. E. 67 (emission by a locomotive not run on the day in issue, excluded); 1901, Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Trammell, 114 id. 312, 40 S. E. 259 (operation of other engines, not to be considered, if the engine setting the fire was identified); Ill.: 1866, Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McClelland, 42 Ill. 355, semble (fires by the defendant's engines, admitted, perhaps to show negligent construction); 1894, Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Middlecoff, 150 Id. 27, 39, 37 N. E. 660 (setting of other fires by the same engine on the same day, admitted, to show negligence); 1898, First Nat'l Bank of Hoopeston v. R. Co., 174 id. 36, 50 N. E. 1023 (other fires by other engines of the defendant, not admissible, where the engine causing the fire is identified; erroneously assuming the Pa. and Wis. rule to represent the weight of authority); Ind.: 1872, Gagg v. Vetter, 41 Ind. 228, 257 (fire attributed to sparks from the defendant's brewery-chimney; evidence that sparks had been seen coming from the chimney at other times, admitted to show that it was not well-constructed); 1900, Pittsburg C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Indiana H. Co., 154 id. 322, 56 N. E. 766 (setting of other fires, admitted to show negligence in the condition of the roadway); Ia.: 1870, Gaudy v. R. Co., 30 Ia. 420 ("the repeated or unusual dropping of coals or excessive and continued emission of sparks, etc.," admissible to show "the fact of negligence"); 1882, Slossen v. R. Co., 60 id. 215, 14 N. W. 244 (other fires set on the same trip of the same engine, admitted to show that it "was not properly constructed or was out of repair"); 1886, Lanning v. R. Co., 68 id. 502, 505, 27 N. W. 478 (same, admitted as evidence of "defects in its construction, or that it was not in proper repair, or was negligently handled"); Kan.: 1873, St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Chase, 11 Kan. 47, 49, 54 (fires set by the defendant's engines within a few weeks, admitted to show "either that they were not properly constructed or that they were out of repair," the conditions in all the engines being similar); 1876, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Campbell, 16 id. 200, 204 (previous fires by the same engine on the same day, with absence of fires from other engines, admitted to show that the former "was badly constructed and managed"); 1897, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Osborn, 58 id. 768, 51 Pac. 286 (fires by other engines, excluded; no authorities cited); Ky.: 1897, Taylor v. R. Co., — Ky. —, 41 S. W. 551 (previous emission of sparks from the same engine, admitted to show negligence); Md.: 1873, Annapolis & E. R. Co. v. Gantt, 39 Md. 115, 134 (sparks and fires by other engines of the defendant, shortly before, admissible to show negligence "in the construction and management of its engines," though the particular engine was identified; distinguishing Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Woodruff, 4 id. 242, 254, 1854, where weaker evidence of the sort was excluded); Mich.: 1890, Ireland v. R. Co., 79 Mich. 163, 165, 44 N. W. 426 (fire by another engine of the company, not admissible to show defective construction, because the engine was identified; but other fires by the same engine are admissible); Minn.: 1885, Davidson v. R. Co., 34 Minn. 51, 24 N. W. 324 (sparks by the defendant's engines, "at or about the date" in question, admitted to show a "negligent habit"; but treated as "a matter not altogether free from doubt"; here the exceptions were the plaintiff's, and were based on the limit of time set, and the question of admissibility was thus not passed upon); Miss.: 1893, Trilette v. R. Co., 71 Miss. 212, 233, 13 So. 899 (emission of sparks by other engines of the defendant, excluded); 1903, Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Ins. Co., — id. —, 35 So. 304 (fires by other engines, admitted, to show a "negligent habit" of the defendant); Mo.: 1870, Fitch v. R. Co., 45 Mo. 322, 324, 327 (frequent fires by one of the defendant's engines, admitted to show defective construction); 1893, Campbell v. R. Co., 121 id. 340, 350, 25 S. W. 936 (fires by other engines inadmissible, where the engine is identified); Nev.: 1874, Longabaugh v. R. Co., 9 Nev. 271, 284, 289 (fires and sparks by the defendant's engines, a few weeks before and after, admitted to show negligent management and construction); N. Y.: 1866, Field v. R. Co., 32 N. Y. 338, 346, 349 (after evidence that it is feasible to construct and manage engines so as to avoid scattering fire, the scattering of fire by other engines on former occasions is evidential that such engines are "out of order or improperly constructed," and thus are negligently managed); 1872, Webb v. R. Co., 49 id. 420, 422, 424 (the dropping of live coals by the same engine for a month or two before, in the t at illustrated in the preceding general group of cases. But it is convenient to consider together the precedents in which the inference is made from the neighborhood, admitted to show defective construction); 1888, Collins v. R. Co., 109 Id. 243, 249, 16 N. E. 50 (the emission of large sparks by the same engine six months later, admitted only after a showing that its permanent mode of construction allowed such emissions or that its condition of repair was the same at the time in question; no authority cited); 1894, Flinn v. R. Co., 142 Id. 11, 19, 36 N. E. 1046 (constant emission of sparks by the defendant's engines, considered, but held not to amount to negligence, but to show that upon the upgrade in question such emission was inevitable; the latter proposition seems to give the locomotive-owner the right to burn houses ad lib.); N. C.: 1900, Hygienic P. L. M. Co. v. R. Co., 126 N. C. 797, 36 S. E. 279 (the Henderson case, in Pennsylvania, followed in the limitation as to identified engines; Douglas, J., diss.); Or.: 1890, Koontz v. O. R. & N. Co., 20 Or. 3, 23 Pac. 820, semble (sparks and fires by other engines of the defendant, before and after, admissible to show "habitual negligence"); Pa.: This inexcusable tangle of rulings is supposed to be unravelled by the Henderson case: 1848, R. Co. v. Yeiser, 8 Pa. 366, 371, 376 (the Court instructed that the fact of other fires by the defendant's engines was "of itself evidence of negligence"; this was disapproved on appeal; "It may be very true that there may be some difficulty in the proof, . . . but there is no reason that every principle of law should be uprooted by requiring no proof of negligence whatever"; thus treating the question as if it were whether the other fires amounted to negligence per se, and not whether they were merely evidence of negligence); 1854, Hayett v. R. Co., 23 id. 374 (distinctly ruling that the setting of other fires by the defendant's engines was some evidence of negligence, and thus removing the obscurity of the preceding case); 1875, Erie R. Co. v. Decker, 78 id. 293 (where the engine causing the fire is identified, the defects of other engines of the defendant are irrelevant); 1875, Pennsylvania Co. v. Watson, 81 Pa. 293, 296 (sparks and fires by the same engine, admitted as "evidence from which the jury may infer an imperfect and inferior spark-catcher, and from this fact negligence"); 1879, Lehigh V. R. Co. v. McKeen, 90 id. 122, 123, 130 (sparks of unusual size, and fires, by the same engine at other times, admitted as evidence of negligence in the apparatus); 1880, Jennings v. R. Co., 93 id. 337, 340 ("evidence to prove defects in other engines of the company was irrelevant," citing R. Co. v. Yerger, 73 id. 121, which does not discuss that question at all; here the evidence was of unusually large sparks; also like the Latshaw case, infra); Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Schultz, ib. 341 (like the McKeen case, supra); Reading & C. R. Co. v. Latshaw, ib. 449 ("the bare fact" of fires after the passing of the engine "was neither negligence, nor evidence from which a jury would be justified in finding negligence"); 1881, Albert v. R. Co., 98 Id. 316, 321 (like the Decker case, supra, excluding sparks by other engines); 1886, Gowen v. Glaser, 3 Centr. Rep. 108 (sparks and fires by other engines, before and after, admitted (1) "to show that they have many engines with insufficient spark-arresters," and thus (2) "to lay the ground for an inference that it was one of these engines with insufficient spark-arresters which did this"); 1888, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Page, 21 W. N. 52 (emission of sparks by engines just before the fire, no evidence of negligence); 1891, Henderson v. R. Co., 144 Pa. 461, 476 (a: the mere fact of fire caused by the defendant's engine is no evidence of negligence, approving the Jennings and Latshawa rulings; the feature of this doctrine is that this Court is constantly confusing three distinct things, namely, (1) evidence admissible, (2) evidence sufficient to go to the jury, (3) facts amounting to negligence per se and thus as matter of law taking the case from the jury; b: the emission of sparks of unusual size and the setting of numerous fires by the defendant's engines may be evidence for the jury; c: where the engine is identifiable, such evidence of the defective action of other engines is irrelevant; otherwise it is admissible, but should be confined to a reasonable time before and after. This case is intended to clear up the conflict of rulings and settle the law); 1897, Thomas v. R. Co., 182 id. 538, 38 Atl. 413 (other fires by the same engine on the same day, near by, admitted); U. S.: 1875, Grand T. R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 458, 470 (sparks by the defendent's engines, during the same summer, admitted to show "a negligent habit of the officers and agents"; similarity of construction, etc., need not first be shown); 1892, Northern P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 2 C. C. A. 446, 51 Fed. 658, 7 U. S. App. 254, 272 (fires by other locomotives, admitted); 1902, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Watson, — U. S. —, 23 Sup. 681 (Grand T. R. Co. v. Richardson followed); Va.: 1881, Brighthope R. Co. v. Rogers, 76 Va. 443, 448 (sparks and fires of the same engine, admitted to show "negligence on the part of the defendant's employees, or, it may be defects" in the engine); 1896, New York P. & N. R. Co. v. Thomas, 92 id. 606, 24 S. E. 264 (fires by the defendent's engines, before and after the time in question, admitted to show "negligence on the part of the defendent's employees, or defects in the defendant's engine, and also for the purpose of showing a negligent habit" of the defendant's agents); 1897, Kimball v. Borden, 95 id. 203, 28 S. E. 207 (sparks by other engines of the defendent near the time, admitted to show "a negligent habit"); Vt.: 1869, Cleavelands v. R. Co., 42 Vt. 449, 456 (sparks and fires by other engines of the defendant, in the same season, admitted to show defective condition); Wis.: 1882, Brusberg v. R. Co., 55 Wis. 106, 12 N. W. 416 (fires on the same trip of the same engine, close by, admitted to show defective construction or management); 1883, Gibbons v. R. Co., 58 id. 335, 17 effects produced on the body, human or animal, to the tendency of a given thing. Thus, the capacity or tendency of a weapon (gun or pistol) may be indicated by the appearance of other wounds, with reference to size of bullet, proximity of weapon, nature of powder, or direction of the shot;[1] the specific tendency of a drug, poison, disease, food, or other substance, by the corporal symptoms or effects in other like situations, either on animals or on human beings;[2] in particular, the intoxicating tendency of a liquor, by its effects

N. W. 132 (fires set by the defendant's engines at other times; "such evidence might have weight in showing the negligence of the company," where the cause is shown to have been some engine of the defendant, but unidentified); 1888, Allard v. R. Co., 73 Id. 165, 40 N. W. 685 (the engine being identified, and its construction as to a screen being shown similar to the others of the defendant, fires set by the defendant's engines generally were not admitted to show defective construction); 1895, Menominee R. S. & D. Co. v. R. Co., 91 Id. 447, 65 N. W. 176 (other fires by the same engine, identified, during preceding months, excluded, because the engine had been repaired in the meantime; other fires by it after the time in question, absolutely excluded; other fires by it during the same month, excluded, because not shown to be from sparks of unusual size or thrown to unusual distance, and therefore not indicating any want of repair or improper management).

[1] 1896, Evans v. State, 109 Ala. 11, 19 So. 535 (experiments with a pistol to ascertain the relative size of the hole and the ball, excluded; no reason given); 1876, Wynne v. State, 56 Ga. 113, 118 (murder; experiments in firing the pistol found on the defendant, not allowed, because they might change the condition of the pistol); 1897, State v. Cater, 100 Ia. 501, 69 N. W. 880 (to show the marks of shooting near at hand, experiments with a revolver of the same calibre were admitted); 1896, State v. Asbell, 57 Kan. 398, 46 Pac. 770 (the effect of a pistol shot fired at human hair from a distance; experiments admitted); 1897, Becket v. Aid Assoc., 67 Minn. 298, 69 N. W. 923 (experiments made with a revolver and similar cartridges, admitted to show the effects of shooting near at hand); 1844, Vaughan v. State, 3 Sm. & M. 555 (evidence considered of experiments to show that the discharge of a gun at the same distance and with the same kind of shot was incapable of taking life); 1880, Dillard v. State, 58 Miss. 386 (to learn whether a wound could have been inflicted from a certain position, experiments were received); 1883, State v. Justus, 11 Or. 182, 8 Pac. 337 (to show that the marks of wounds on the deceased were those of near gun-shot wounds, experiments on pasteboard targets were not received, because the conditions could not be made similar enough; see quotation ante, § 442); 1893, State v. Fletcher, 24 id. 295, 298, 33 Pac. 575 (experiments as to the force of a bullet, with cartridges and pistol found on defendant, excluded because conditions were not shown similar); 1880, Sullivan v. Com. 93 Pa. 288, 296 (experiments were allowed to be described by which the effect, in blackening and tattooing the flesh, of a shot fired at short range, was demonstrated to be such that in the case at bar the deceased could not have committed suicide); 1903, State v. Nagle, — R. I. —, 54 Atl. 1063 (experiments with a pistol, to show the effect on a flesh-wound, admitted); 1884, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea 161, 171 (the allegation being that the deceased had committed suicide with a pistol, the Court admitted experiments made with pistols under similar conditions to show that the results would not be the same as those found upon the body of the deceased); 1896, Moore v. State, 96 Tenn. 209, 33 S. W. 1046 (an experiment, based on the appearances of a wound, to ascertain the relative positions of deceased and defendant, admitted); 1896, Ball v. U. S., 163 U. S. 662, 16 Sup. 1192 (a refusal to allow an experimental firing with the defendant's gun, held within the discretion of the trial Court).

For cases dealing with non-corporal effects of weapons, see ante, § 451.

[2] 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1162 (murder; the body of the deceased was found in the river; the question was whether she had committed suicide or had been killed and thrown into the water; the prosecution advanced the proposition that the absence of water in the stomach showed that the person was dead before entering the water; the defence was allowed to testify to experiments, made by doctors, upon dogs, to show that a drowning person does not necessarily take water into the stomach); 1834, R. v. Webb, 1 Moo. & Rob. 405, 412 (manslaughter by administering noxious pills; to disprove the noxious quality, the fact was admitted of the cure of various diseases by them); 1836, R. v. Salmon, before Patteson, J., Pelham's Chronicles of Crime, ed. 1891, II, 417 (manslaughter by administering noxious pills; on behalf of the defendant, a medicine-vender, "a great many persons were called from all parts of the kingdom, who stated that they had taken large quantities of these pills, with the very best results, as a means of cure for almost every species of malady to which the human frame is subject; one person stated that he had taken no fewer than twenty thousand of them in two years, and that he had found infinite relief from swallowing them in very large doses"); 1856, R. v. Palmer, Annual Register 1856, pp. 403, 422, 473, 475, 509 (to determine the tendency of strychnia to produce certain symptoms, experiments upon dogs and rabbits were described, and the observed symptoms in human beings; but the Court refused to allow dogs to be brought into the courtyard and killed by strychnia before the jury); 1854, Bush v. Jackson, 24 Ala. 274, semble (in a suit on a warranty of a slave, alleged to be subject to chronic pneumonia, the use of evidence of symptoms of other supposed cases of pneumonia was held inadmissible, unless somehow connected); 1893, Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Collier, 112 id. 681, 14 So. 327 (injury to passenger by breaking of fire-extinguisher bottle; experiments in court to test the liquid, rejected on the facts); 1893, Remy v. Olds, — Cal. — , 34 Pac. 216 (whether vines died for lack of water; that others similarly situated died though plentiful'y supplied with water, admitted); 1863, Wallace v. Wren, 32 Ill. 150 (for the purpose of showing that a warranted horse had the glanders, the court permitted the plaintiff to show that a mule which worked with the horse took the disease and died; Caton, C. J.: "There was proof that glanders is contagious, and if that be so, then the proof was undoubtedly pertinent"); 1900, Grand Lodge v. Randolph, 186 Ill. 89, 57 N. E. 882 (injury to ankle; experience of H., similarly injured, as to time of healing, and the exhibition of his ankle to the jury, excluded as confusing the issues); 1885, Epps v. State, 102 Ind. 549, 1 N. E. 491 (absence of injurious effect from the same kind of substance when administered to another person, admitted to show absence of arsenic); 1899, Ware Cattle Co. v. Anderson, 107 Ia. 231, 77 N. W. 1026 (whether cattle failed to fatten because of poor pasture; gain of other cattle in similar pastures, admitted); 1859, Champ v. Com., 2 Metc. Ky. 17, 26 (rape while unconscious from a supposed violent chloroforming; experiments showing unconsciousness to be an impossible result under the supposed circumstances, admitted); 1864, Hunt v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 1 All. 343, 345, 350; s. c. 8 All. 169, 171 (to show the noxious effects of the gas escaping into the house where the plaintiffs were visitors and became ill, the similar illness of all the other inmates of the house at the same time was received; the extent to which the particulars of the illness should be inquired into being left to the trial Court's discretion); 1862, Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 3 id. 410, 417 (see quotation ante, § 442); 1886, Baxter v. Doe, 142 Mass. 558, 561, 8 N. E. 415 (action for sickness incurred through failure of ship-owners to provide the sailors with proper food and anti-scorbutics; evidence of the similar sickness of others of the crew on board the ship about the same time that the plaintiffs were sick, admitted; see quotation ante, § 442); 1887, Reeve v. Denuett, 145 id. 23, 11 N. E. 938 (whether a substance "naboli" was calculated to ensure painless extraction of teeth; the experience in that respect of various persons who had used it, admitted; see quotation ante, § 442); 1894, Shea v. Glendale E. F. Co., 162 id. 463, 38 N. E. 1123 (whether the plaintiff had been poisoned by white lead in the defendant's factory; the similar illnesses of other employees under similar conditions, admitted); 1897, Com. v. Kennedy, 170 id. 18, 48 N. E. 770 (tea drunk by several persons together; effects upon some of them, admitted, to show that it was poisoned); 1882, Tinney v. Cahill, 48 Mich. 586, 12 N. W. 862 (to show that a horse had died not from the defendant's driving but from disease, two previous instances when the horse fell ill while driven by other persons were received); 1897, People v. Holmes, 111 id. 364, 69 N. W. 501 (other cases in which a similar injury caused insanity, not admitted to show a defendant's insanity); 1899, People v. Thompson, 122 id. 411, 81 N. W. 344 (boiler-explosion; charge of manslaughter; the killing and injuring of other persons, admitted, to show the effects; but not their stay at hospitals, etc.); 1899, Proctor v. Irvin, 22 Mont. 547, 57 Pac. 183 (injury to cattle by unlawful driving; comparative increase of plaintiff's cattle in former years, and average increase of other cattle in the same year, admitted); 1895, State v. Isaacson, 8 S. D. 69, 65 N. W. 430 (whether a horse was poisoned; the immediate death of a hen to whom the contents of the horse's stomach were experimentally fed, semble, admissible); 1886, Osborne v. Detroit, 32 Fed. 36 (the plaintiff claimed to have been paralyzed by a fall; to demonstrate this, a pin was allowed to be thrust into her face, arm, and leg, in the presence of the jury); 1897, The T. F. Oakes, 82 Fed. 759 (common symptoms in a crew of sailors during a long voyage, admitted to show lack of proper food as the cause); 1898, U. S. v. Reed, 86 Fed. 308, 311 (master of a vessel withholding suitable food; that every person on board not eating in the cabin had scurvy, admitted); 1881, Weeks v. Lyndon, 54 Vt. 645 (that other persons had cured themselves of hernia, excluded); 1897, Willett v. St. Albans, 69 id. 330, 38 Atl. 72 (illness attributed to sewer-gas; the illness, from sewer-gas, of others living near by, excluded, because of irrelevancy, surprise, and confusion of issues); 1898, Bateman v. Rutland, 70 id. 500, 41 Atl. 500 (illness attributed to sewer-gas; that others living in adjacent houses were not so affected, excluded).

upon others partaking it.[3] In all these precedents, it is to be remembered,

[3] 1885, Knowles v. State, 80 Ala. 9 (Somerville, J.: "The most available mode of testing the nature and properties of a fluid or drug, next to that of chemical analysis, is by its effect on the human system; that a liquor when taken in certain quantities intoxicated or failed to intoxicate the person taking it is as competent to prove or disprove its intoxicating qualities as it would be to prove the poisonous nature of a drug by the effect following its administration"); 1891, Brantly v. State, 91 id. 47, 8 So. 816 (selling spirituous, etc., liquors; the effect of the liquors upon the purchasers, admitted); 1893, State v. Lindoen, 87 Ia. 702, 704, 54 N. W. 1075 (mixing ingredients of a drink before the jury, excluded as not bearing on its intoxicating quality; compare §§ 1159, 1160, post); 1886, State v. Pfefferle, 36 Kan. 90, 91, 12 Pac. 406 (whether a beverage "phœnix" was intoxicating; its any and all of the principles and limitations already examined (§§ 441–449) may be involved; and further reference to them here is unnecessary.

§ 458. Similar Injuries to Other Persons at the same Machine, Highway, Railroad, or Building. If a white powder's tendency to produce illness may be evidenced by the symptoms following its administration, then in the same way the tendency of a projecting spike in a gate to catch and tear the garment of a passer-by may be evidenced by instances of such tearings, and the tendency of a part of a highway to make the feet trip upon it may be shown by instances of trippings. The mass of precedents dealing with the use of other injuries (or "accidents") as evidencing the dangerousness of a place or a machine are concerned with an inference of precisely this form, i. e. an inference as to the harmful tendency or capacity of the machine, highway, building, or track, as indicated by the occurrence of such harm to human beings in other instances.

There is thus no objection from the standpoint of the character rule (ante, § 199); for the object of the inference is not to show previous acts of negligence, nor even (directly and necessarily) a present negligence. The purpose is merely to show the nature of the machine or the place, as having a tendency to produce such human injuries; just as copper acids may have a tendency to destroy herbage or strychnia a tendency to produce convulsions. If it can be shown what that tendency is, it may then be possible to show that the maintenance of a place or machine of that tendency — i. e. likely to cause such harm — is negligence. But this additional conclusion is not necessarily involved in the evidential purpose, which seeks simply the illustration of the nature of the thing or the place by its observed effects. Nor is there any virtue in the suggestion, occasionally heard, that "the jury are trying the merits of this particular accident and none other." This is true enough, but it is beside the point. Just because the "merits of this particular accident" have to be investigated, it becomes necessary to learn the nature of the machine or place involved; and in learning its nature, the evidential view cannot be confined to the precise moment of the accident in question. That nature, being more or less continuous, has exhibited itself at other times and in other instances; and it is both rational and practical to look at other instances from which that nature is to be ascertained. The only principles that can affect the exclusion of such instances are those of Relevancy and of Auxiliary Policy. What is their bearing?

(1) The principle of Relevancy, as already noted (ante, § 442), requires that the other instances of injuries received should have occurred under substantially similar circumstances. The application of this principle has already been sufficiently illustrated. Note, however, that a double inference effect in stimulating and intoxicating various persons, admitted); 1890, State v. Adams, 44 id. 135, 24 Pac. 71 (whether a beverage "cider" was intoxicating; its effect in intoxicating those who drank it, admitted); 1885, Fairly v. State, 63 Miss. 333 (that a person was made drunk by certain bitters, admitted to show that they were spirituous); 1889, Com. v. Reyburg, 122 Pa. 299, 305, 16 Atl. 351 (the effect felt by persons drinking a liquor, admissible to show whether it was spirituous).

usually is necessary, i. e. from the other instances to the tendency or condition at the time of their occurrence, and then from the tendency or condition at that time to its persistence at the time in question. The principle governing the latter inference has also been examined (ante, § 437). But often this double inference is treated by the Court as a single one, and an instance occurring at a remote time is disposed of as not occurring under similar circumstances. Yet there is in reality a second inference involved —, as may be seen where a prior tendency or condition is shown by direct testimony (ante, § 437) and not by instances of its effect, and then the inference is made from the prior to the later condition. It is enough to point out that there do come into play these two inferences, and that hence an instance may be excluded either because the circumstances were not similar or because the time was too remote.

(2) The principle of Auxiliary Policy, as already noted (ante, § 443), requires the exclusion of such instances wherever, by the introduction of many new controversial points, there would result a confusion of issues and an expense of time disproportionate to the usefulness of the evidence. Occasionally a Court is found excluding such evidence absolutely and invariably because of this general possibility of confusion of issues, and without regard to its actual operation in the case in hand. Such a treatment is unnecessary and finical. The rational and practical way is to exclude such evidence when it does in the case in hand clearly involve such consequences, but not otherwise; and to leave its treatment to the discretion of the trial Court, guided by this principle (ante, § 444).

There would probably have been little difference of practice in the use of this class of evidence, if there had not been a series of precedents in Massachusetts, beginning with Collins v. Dorchester, which attempted to cast discredit on the use of this evidence, and laid down an absolute rule of exclusion. That ruling proceeded from the point of view both of relevancy and of auxiliary policy, though without any full consideration of either reason; and, coming at a comparatively early date, served for a long time as a stumbling-block to many Courts whose instinct would have led them to receive such evidence. Its fallacies, from both points of view, were first clearly exposed by Mr. Justice Doe, in his classical opinion in Darling v. Westmoreland;[1] and from that time the tide of rulings began to turn. The ensuing cases show how an absolute rule of exclusion, like that of Collins v. Dorchester, is nowadays rarely attempted; and the two principles of relevancy and auxiliary policy are usually applied anew to each instance, as they ought to be. Strictly as a precedent, Collins v. Dorchester applied only to injuries in a highway, but its influence was to be seen in opinions upon evidence involving other sorts of injuries, and even, to some extent, over this whole group of evidential material. But Mr. Justice Doe's opinion utterly discredited it as an obstacle to the investigation of truth, and even in its own jurisdiction it was gradually narrowed in its effect, until the doubt may now be maintained, whether it would there be followed, even upon its precise state of facts. The precedents, however, in the various jurisdictions still show traces of its misleading influence.[3]

[1] 52 N. H. 401, quoted ante, §§ 444, 445.

[3] All the foregoing principles of §§ 442–449 are here illustrated; in particular, the principle for negative instances (§ 448) is important; Eng.: 1866, Crofter v. R. Co., L. R. 1, C. P. 300 (injury on a defective staircase; evidence from the defendant was admitted without question, that about 43,000 persons had passed over it without injury during the previous year, in which alone it had been used); Ala.: 1872, Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Ashcraft, 48 Ala. 15, 32, semble (that the trains had run off the track seven or eight times in the previous month, admitted, to show its condition); 1891, Birmingham Union R. Co. v. Alexander, 93 id. 133, 9 So. 525 (injury by a wagon striking a car-rail; the fact admitted for the plaintiff that other similar injuries had been thus received, and for the defendant that the rail was constantly crossed in safety; "a knowledge of the experience of others . . . may enable the jury to weigh all the evidence before them in the light of the rule that like causes operating under like conditions produce like results"); 1893, Schlaff v. R. Co., 100 id. 377, 378, 388, 14 So. 105 (former injuries of other persons at a bridge, excluded); 1896, Birmingham v. Starr, 112 id. 98, 20 So. 424 (similar falls at the same place about the same time, e.g. a month before or after, admitted; but not of falls at other times or at times unspecified); 1897, Mayer v. Building Co., 116 id. 634, 22 So. 859 (defective cornice; evidence that one or more persons had stood safely upon another cornice of the same building similarly constructed, excluded); 1899, Southern R. Co. v. Posey, 124 id. 486, 26 So. 914 (another's experience at same guard-rail three weeks before, admitted); Cal.: 1869, Martinez v. Planel, 36 Cal. 578 (fall of another person at the same passageway six weeks before, excluded; following Collins v. Dorchester, Mass.); 1903, Dyas v. Southern P. Co., — id. — , 73 Pac. 972 (prior fall of a derrick, admitted, to show its defectiveness); Conn.: 1863, Bailey v. Trumbull, 31 Conn. 581 (omnibus upset into a ditch by an alleged highway defect; the fact received that on the next morning, before any change in the place, a loaded cart also upset at a place 15 or 20 feet distant, the distance not being such as to destroy the substantial similarity of conditions); 1865, Calkins v. Hartford, 33 id. 57 (injury by a fall on an icy sidewalk; that many persons had passed at the time without inconvenience, admitted; "if the plaintiff had offered evidence to show that a number of people had actually slipped upon it, this would have been strong proof that it was in a slippery and dangerous condition. . . . Men always act on such evidence in deciding whether they will risk their limbs or not. Why then should not proof that a number of persons passed over it and did not slip be admitted as tending to show that it was not in a slippery condition?"); 1875, Taylor v. Monroe, 43 id. 42 (see citation ante, § 439); 1876, Tomlinson v. Derby, 43 id. 562 (that other wagons ran into the same hole in the road, admitted); 1879, Wilson v. Granby, 47 id. 75 (previous similar loads carried over other bridges, admitted to show whether or not they were beyond the capacity of the bridge); Ga.: 1878, Augusta v. Hafers, 61 Ga. 48 (injury by falling into a cellar-door opening on the street; two instances within five or six years of children falling into other such cellars, admitted, as "bearing remotely" on the question); 1886, Gilmer v. Atlanta, 77 id. 688 (injury by tripping over roots of a tree projecting across a sidewalk; the fact of another person having tripped at the same place some days before, admitted); Ill.: 1882, Anrora v. Brown, 12 Ill. App. 131 (Lacey, J.: "The defect claimed in the walk was that it was so smooth that it was dangerous to travel on account of travellers slipping down upon it. How could it be told whether men's feet would slip while passing over it unless by experiment or trial, or to what extent or how badly they would slide? . . . Where it is attempted to be shown what has happened to others simply to illustrate a physical fact before or after the occurrence being investigated, if the conditions are the same, we can see no objection"); 1889, Hodges v. Bearse, 129 Ill. 89, 21 N. E. 613 (that no accident had happened during the 4½ years of an elevator's use, rejected, apparently because the evidence of negligence was strong); 1893, Libby v. Scherman, 146 id. 540, 34 N. E. 801 (whether the taking out of a barrel from a pile of barrels could be done without causing the pile to fall; experiment with similar barrels similarly arranged, in which they did not fall, excluded, partly because it was impossible to secure identical conditions, and because a confusion of issues would occur, partly because the question was not whether the pile would necessarily fall, but whether it was dangerously likely to fall if the single barrel were taken out); 1894, Bloomington v. Legg, 151 id. 9, 13, 37 N. E. 696 (injury at a drinking-fountain; similar injuries admitted to show dangerousness of the place; quoted ante, § 451); 1897, West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Kennelly, 170 id. 508, 48 N. E. 996 (that in a car-accident, others were thrown down in the same car, admitted); 1899, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Treat, 179 id. 576, 54 N. E. 290 (injury at railroad platform; prior injury to another at same place, admitted, after defendant's evidence that no other such injuries had been received); 1902, Taylorville v. Stafford, 196 id. 288, 63 N.E. 824 (that others had stumbled over the same place, admitted, as showing "that the common cause of the accidents is a dangerous and unsafe thing"); Ind.: 1881, Delphi v. Lowery, 74 Ind. 520, 525 (former injuries to other persons at the same bridge, ad-

Distinguish here (1) the use of other injuries to show notice of a defective or dangerous place (ante, § 252); in some of the rulings, both points are mitted; following Darling v. Westmoreland and repudiating Collins v. Dorchester, but not distinguishing between the present principle and that of showing notice to the city, ante, § 252); 1883, Nave v. Flack, 90 id. 205, 209, 214 (injury at the drive-way of grain-scales; the fact that others had passed in safety, excluded, because "men may and do use unsafe places without receiving injury, but this does not show that a place proved to be really dangerous is not so"; but evidence of other injuries there was received to show knowledge; compare § 448, ante); 1884, Bauer v. Indianapolis, 99 id. 56, 60 (injury at a sidewalk; that others had passed the same place in safety, excluded; first, because of the collateral issues involved, following Kidder v. Dunstable, Mass., infra; and, secondly, because the evidence proved nothing, as in Nave v. Flack, supra); 1888, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wright, 115 id. 378, 393, 16 N. E. 145, 17 N. E. 584 (injury at a low bridge on a railway; the former occurrence of three similar accidents at the same place, admitted); 1894, Salem S. & L. Co. v. Griffin, 139 id. 141, 38 N. E. 411 (injury at a mill-tramway, by being caught between a window and a car; another's prior injury in the same way, admitted); Ia.: in this jurisdiction the principle of notice (ante, § 252) is frequently not distinguished from the present principle; 1882, Hudson v. R. Co., 59 Ia. 581, 13 N. W. 735 (a horse caught his foot between rail and plank at a crossing; a similar injury at the same place to another person's horse six months before, excluded, for reasons of auxiliary policy); 1888, Hoyt v. Des Moines, 76 id. 430, 41 N. W. 63 (injury at a sidewalk; the fall of another person on the same sidewalk, excluded, because it did not appear that it occurred at the same place); 1890, Matthews v. Cedar Rapids, 80 id. 459, 45 N. W. 894 (states that the preceding ruling would be doubtful, if the question were an open one); 1890, Brooke v. R. Co., 81 id. 511, 47 N. W. 74 (Granger, J.: "It is also urged that the testimony of K. as to the experiments in placing his foot between the rails, showing where the foot would be caught, and where not, were erroneously admitted. We regard it as clearly competent. A very important fact to be known was whether, with the situation of the rails, a foot could or would be likely to be caught. We can hardly imagine testimony that would better show the fact than such experiments. The shoe that Brooke wore was before the jury, and the witness who made the experiments was there, and the relative size of the shoes worn by each could be known"); 1895, Hunt v. Dubuque, 96 id. 314, 65 N. W. 319 (that other people had stumbled at the part of the sidewalk in question, admitted); 1897, Bryce v. R. Co., 103 id. 665, 72 N. W. 780 (that no accident had occurred at a bridge during its nine years' use, excluded); 1901, Bailey v. Centerville, 115 id. 271, 88 N. W. 379 (sidewalk; that other persons had fallen at the same place, admitted, "for the purpose of calling the witness' attention to the walk"; compare § 655, post); Kan.: 1880, Topeka v. Sherwood, 39 Kan. 690, 18 Pac. 933 (injury by tripping against a projecting plank in December, by tilting it up in passing; the fact received of constant tiltings of this sort from March to December, and of four other falls, three before and one after the fall in question, at the same place but not on the same plank; "the plaintiff must prove that it was unsafe to walk over . . .; the simple fact that there were frequent accidents on this part of the sidewalk would tend to show that it was unsafe; . . . . this walk had been tested by actual use, and this evidence tended to show that it was dangerous and unsafe"; the argument of surprise rejected, for the question was as to the condition of the sidewalk, and the defendant ought to be prepared); Me.: 1855, Hubbard v. R. Co., 39 Me. 506 (injury at a place where the highway was dug away; previous upsettings of carriages at that place, excluded, for the reasons of auxiliary policy and because there were other ways of ascertaining the nature of the place); 1879, Parker v. Publishing Co., 69 id. 173 (fall at an elevator-well; former injuries at the place, excluded, for reasons of auxiliary policy and on the authority of Collins v. Dorchester, Mass.); 1886, Branch v. Libbey, 78 id. 321, 5 Atl. 71 (injury in the highway; that others had driven safely over the same place, excluded, for reasons of surprise and confusion of issues); Md.: 1886, Baltimore & Y. T. R. v. Leonhardt, 66 Md. 70, 78, 5 Atl. 346 (injury on a horse-car; whether an accident had ever before happened in that way, excluded; "the jury was trying the merits of this particular accident and none other"); 1889, Baltimore & Y. T. R. v. State, 71 id. 573, 575, 584, 18 Atl. 884 (injury at a dangerous place in a road; whether during 32 years past there had been any complaint of the dangerousness of this place, excluded, because "it was no answer" if the place was unsafe; no authorities cited and no understanding of the question shown, in either of these two cases); 1892, Wise v. Ackerman, 76 id. 375, 390, 25 Atl. 424 (elevator-injury; similar injury to another employee at a like elevator in the same building, excluded); Mass.: 1850, Collins v. Dorchester, 6 Cush. 396 (injury on a highway, through a supposed failure of a railing; that another person, riding there under similar circumstances, had suffered a similar accident, excluded below, as "a collateral issue," which would "result in testing one point in dispute by another"; this ruling was affirmed; Metcalf, J.: "It was testimony concerning collateral facts, which furnished no legal presumption as to the principal facts in dispute, and which the defendants were not bound to be prepared to meet"; citing Standish v. Washburn, ante, § 451); 1854, Aldrich v. Pelham, 1 Gray 510 (want of a railing as a defect in a highway, when two teams passed each other; the defendant offered to show that various other persons had passed each other at decided; in others, the present principle is ignored; (2) the inference of a defect from the very fact of the injury in issue (ante, § 442), and the related that place in the same way without injury; held, improperly admitted, because "each of these cases would present a distinct issue with all its attendant circumstances, and involve the consequences contemplated in Collins v. Dorchester"); 1858, Kidder v. Dunstable, 11 id. 342 (issue as to the condition of a snowy road; that others had passed in safety, excluded); 1871, Lewis v. Smith, 107 Mass. 334 (action for mules lost by insufficient arrangements on the ferry-boat transporting them; that such a boat had been run for thirty years previously without such an injury, excluded); 1872, Schoonmaker v. Wilbraham, 110 id. 134 (following Collins v. Dorchester, Aldrich v. Pelham); 1884, Peverly v. Boston, 136 id. 366 (injury on a ferryboat through catching the hand in a gate raised by an unauthorized person; issue as to the necessity of protecting the gate; that no accident had ever before happened at the gate, excluded); 1893, Marvin v. New Bedford, 158 id. 464, 466, 33 N. E. 605 (that no injury had ever occurred there before, excluded); 1894, Knowlton, J., in Bemis v. Temple, 162 id. 342, 345, 38 N. E. 970 (referring to these cases as decided on the ground of surprise and confusion of issues, he remarks that "in most of these cases" the applications of the principle to the facts "are generally deemed satisfactory," while "in others . . . apart from authority, it may be" that the fact offered "as a simple experiment might well have been proved"; the majority approve this opinion; see quotation ante, § 444); 1896, Flaherty v. Powers, 167 id. 61, 44 N. E. 1074 (injury at a machine; "the habit of the machine to spatter, down to just before the accident," admitted to show the "behavior of the machine"); 1898, Spaulding v. Lithograph M. Co., 171 id. 271, 50 N. E. 543 (injury by the seat of machinery tipping up; that it had tipped up before, admitted, as "instructive as to what happened to the plaintiff"); Mich.: 1885, McCool v. Grand Rapids, 58 Mich. 41, 46, 24 N. W. 631 (that another person had constantly driven over the same part of the highway without injury, admitted); 1889, Dundas v. Lansing, 75 id. 499, 508, 42 N. W. 1011 (other accidents to other people at the particular place, admissible to show that the place "was not reasonably safe and fit for travel"); 1891, Lombar v. East Tawas, 86 id. 14, 48 N. W. 947 (injury at a hole in a plank in the walk; that others had before fallen into the same hole, admitted, to show the existence and nature of the defect); 1892, Retan v. R. Co., 94 id. 146, 53 N. W. 1094 (injury in a sidewalk-hole; that others had caught their feet in the hole, admitted); 1893, Corcoran v. Detroit, 95 id. 84, 54 N. W. 692 (highway defect; that another person "broke his buggy" at the same place about the same time, excluded; no authorities cited); Minn.: 1877, Phelps v. Mankato, 23 Minn. 276, 279) injury at a post in the street; that "other teams had run into it," admitted to show its "dangerous character"); 1881, Kelly v. R. Co., 28 id. 98, 100, 9 N. W. 568 (injury at a crossing; that "similar accidents occurred by reason of the same defect, as tending to show that the absence of the plank rendered the crossing unsafe," admissible; but an accident at a different place and in a different mode was excluded); 1887, Phelps v. R. Co., 37 id. 487, 35 N. W. 273 (difficulties experienced by other travellers in crossing a place alleged to be unsafe were admitted; Mitchell, J.: "There was evidence tending to show that the highway was in substantially the same condition during this time as on the day of the accident, except that the obstruction was increased. . . . As to the materiality and competence of this evidence there is no room for doubt. . . . It is the practical test of common experience, often the most satisfactory evidence"); 1889, Doyle v. R. Co., 42 id. 79, 82, 43 N. W. 787 (whether a rail was dangerous by being worn out and splintered; that a witness had in 23 years' experience never heard of an injury from a rail so splintered, admitted; "if such evidence [of former injuries] is admissible to show that what is complained of was of a dangerous character, it must be that evidence would be admissible on the other side to show that in a long and constant use of such instrumentalities accidents had been unknown; that would be a proper means of showing that a thing which was not obviously dangerous was not in fact so"); 1895, Burrows v. Lake Crystal, 61 id. 357, 63 N. W. 745 (similar accidents to other pedestrians at the same place in a walk; question reserved; why it should be, if to this Court the principle stare decisis is a consideration of any consequence, is not clear); Mo.: 1885, Hipsley v. R. Co., 88 Mo. 348, 354 (injury by derailment; "other accidents on other parts" of the road, excluded); 1897, Graney v. R. Co., 140 id. 89, 41 S. W. 246 (a boy thrown down by the alleged suction of air from a passing train; the effect of air upon mail sacks thrown from moving trains, excluded as not analogous in conditions); N. H.: 1877, Griffin v. Auburn, 58 N. H. 121 (whether a tree was dangerously near the highway; collisions of other persons with the tree, admitted, in the trial Court's discretion); 1895, Dow v. Weare, 68 id. 345, 44 Atl. 489 (highway injury; similar accident to another person at that place several days before, held admissible in the trial Court's discretion); 1900, Whitcher v. R. Co., 70 id. 242, 46 Atl. 740 (experiments made since the accident, in stepping from cars, admitted); N. J.: 1869, Temperance Hall Ass'n v. Giles, 33 N. J. L. 260 (injury by falling into an area by the sidewalk; testimony of a witness that there had been no such injury there before, though 10,000 persons had passed there yearly, excluded, partly because similarity of conditions was not shown, partly because of surprise and confusion of issues; the opinion, which is not consistent in its language, is often understood by other Courts to go further than it presumption of negligence from the mere fact of injury (post, § 2509); (3) the fixing of the memory of a highway defect by the occurrence of a prior accident does, and next to Collins v. Dorchester it has done most to influence erroneous rulings); N. Y.: 1873, Dougan v. Champlain Co., 56 N. Y. 7 (dangerousness of a place on a steamboat deck; semble, that others had fallen overboard there, or that no accident had before occurred there, admissible); 1877, Baird v. Daly, 68 id. 550 (that a scow, alleged to be unseaworthy, had or had not experienced similar accidents on previous similar occasions, admitted); 1877, Quinlan v. Utica, 74 id. 603, affirming 11 Hun 217 (injury by slipping on a sidewalk; the slipping and falling of others upon it while it was in the same condition, admitted); 1887, Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs, 104 id. 459, 469, 11 N. E. 43 (injury by slipping on snow and ice; that another person had fallen in the same place, admitted); 1890, Hoyt v. R. Co., 118 id. 399, 23 N. E. 565 (a wagon getting into a hole in the street; to show that the wagon was defective, a similar happening to it the next day in another place was received, as showing "that such defect tended in theory and operated in practice to overturn the wagon, and thus put this case in line with that numerous class of cases holding that, where a defect is shown to exist, that fact may be legitimately strengthened by proof of other and similar effects, both before and after the effects were produced which form the subject of the trial"); 1890, Gillrie v. Lockport, 122 id. 403, 25 N. E. 357 (injury in the highway; the fall of another person two years before at the same place, excluded; previous injuries declared generally admissible to show that the place as tested by use is unsafe; but here the time was too remote; see ante, § 437); 1899, Fordham v. Gouverneur, 160 id. 541, 55 N. E. 290 (injury on sidewalk; stumbling of others on the same evening on the same plank, admitted); N. C.: 1900, Raper v. R. Co., 126 N. C. 563, 36 S. E. 115 (accidents at other crossings similarly constructed, admitted); Oh.: 1877, Insurance Co. v. Tobin, 32 Oh. St. 90 (previous instances of steamboat disasters occurring through snags, etc., and yet without any shock or other coincident indication, excluded, on account of surprise and confusion of issues); 1883, Sinton v. Butler, 40 id. 158, 168 (falling of an elevator; that it was "in constant use for well nigh five years without accident," admitted); Pa.: 1879, Mansfield C. & C. Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185, 192 (defective bridge; experience of others in passing over it, admitted to show its condition); R. I.: 1898, Anderson v. Taft, 20 R. I. 362, 39 Atl. 191 (injury in a highway; that no such accident had happened there for 20 years, excluded; following Temp. Assoc. v. Giles, N. J.; ignoring Darling v. Westmoreland); 1899, State v. Mowry, 21 id. 376, 43 Atl. 871 (injury by diversion of uninsulated current; shocks received subsequently by others at the same place, admitted to show the condition as to insulation); S. C.: 1887, Bridger v. R. Co., 27 S. C. 456, 3 S. E. 860 (injury at a turntable; former injuries of others there, excluded, unless brought to defendant's knowledge; no authorities cited, and no appreciation of the nature of the question); 1898, Pearson v. Spartanburg Co., 51 id. 480, 29 S. E. 193 (bridge collapsing under a road-engine; cracking of the bridge at the former passing of such an engine, admitted); U. S.: 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, 524, 2 Sup. 840 (injury on a sidewalk; that other persons had fallen at the same place, admitted; the objection of confusion of issues held not applicable where the evidence was not disputed; a much cited case, and a good opinion); 1886, Osborne v. Detroit, 32 Fed. 36 (injury at a defective sidewalk; a former injury of the same sort at the "same neighborhood" to two other persons, admitted, both to show the defective condition and to show notice to the defendant); 1896, Scott v. New Orleans, 21 C. C. A. 402, 75 F. 373 (injury on a sidewalk; other previous accidents at the same place, admitted); 1897, Patton v. R. Co., 27 C. C. A. 287, 82 Fed. 979 (previous derailments at the same place, received); Utah: 1892, Hurd v. R. Co., 8 Utah 241, 243, 244, 30 Pac. 982 (whether an engine started of itself; similar startings of other engines, excluded, but of the same engine, admitted); 1898, Snowden v. Coal Co., 16 id. 366, 52 Pac. 599 (injury in a mine by the falling of a "clod"; that others had been injured by the falling of this "clod," rejected, on the theory that it was an attempt to use other negligent acts, under § 199, ante; no notice taken of the present principle); Vt.: 1835, Lester v. Pittsford, 7 Vt. 158 (admitting a previous passing over the same road with safety; no question raised); 1860, Kent v. Lincoln, 32 id. 591 (injury by being thrown from a wagon while crossing a water-bar; that others were thrown or jolted at the same place, admitted; such effects would be "in the nature of experiments to show the actual condition of the road"); 1867, Walker v. Westfield, 39 id. 247 (injury by being thrown out of a wagon which got into a mudhole; C.'s similar experience a day or two later, received, as no more irrelevant than "if the witness had testified that he went there the next day and with a measuring rule found the ditch to be three feet wide and two feet deep"); 1900, Sullivan v. D. & H. Canal Co., 72 id. 353, 47 Atl. 1084 (absence of accidents at railroad platform for 30 years, excluded, because the conditions were not shown the same); 1901, Lynds v. Plymouth, 73 id. 216, 50 Atl. 1083 (prior injuries to other persons at the same bridge, admitted); Wash.: 1897, Elster v. Seattle, 18 Wash. 304, 51 Pac. 394 (injuries at the same place in the sidewalk to other persons a week or ten days before, admitted); Wis.: 1887, Phillips v. Willow, 70 Wis. 6, 34 N. W. 731 (a stone obstructing the highway and overturning a sleigh; that others about the same time had collided with the stone, excluded; see quotation ante, § 443); 1894, Barrett v. Hammond, 87 id. 654, 657, 58

(post, §§ 655, 730); and (4) the inference of an admission of negligence from subsequent repairs (ante, § 283).

C. INSTANCES OF MENTAL AND MORAL EFFECTS, AS EVIDENCE.

§ 459. General Principle. There is no reason why the tendency or quality of an object of external nature should not sometimes be as easily ascertainable from its mental or moral (psychological) effects as from its corporal or its material effects. Where the issue is as to the existence of a tendency to produce psychological effects, the tendency can usually best be proved by adducing instances of such effects, if they have attended the use or operation of the thing in question. For example, if on looking out of the window of a comfortable home the persons on the highway are observed to be shuddering and turning up their ulster-collars, a natural inference is that the temperature without is extremely cold. Or, if on looking some distance ahead, as one drives through a street, all the vehicles are observed to be turning aside at a certain apparently vacant spot in the road, a natural inference is made that some obstruction exists, such as a pavement-hole or a broken electric wire. This sort of inference from human or animal conduct is of constant service in daily life, and claims also an important part in the realm of evidence for litigated issues. It is of especial importance and utility, because of the absurd and fantastical extent to which the prohibitions of the Opinion-rule (post, § 1917) are pushed; for if no direct testimony is to be permitted, by persons who can say (for example) whether a place was dangerous or safe, it becomes all the more necessary to grant the largest possible scope to circumstantial evidence by specific instances of the effects produced on human or animal conduct by the use or operation of the thing in question.

A possible objection is found in the Hearsay rule; i. e. in looking to a person's conduct as evidencing the material cause of the conduct, are we not virtually receiving the person's hearsay assertion as to the cause? The Hearsay rule excludes extra-judicial assertions only, i. e. deliberate utterances in terms affirming a fact (post, § 1362); and, although in effect an inference from conduct may be the same in result as an inference from assertion, nevertheless the two are distinct. Nor does the policy or spirit of the Hearsay rule apply; for that policy is to test the assertions of persons regarded as witnesses, by learning the source of their knowledge and by exposing its elements of weakness and error, if possible; and where the evidence is not dealing with a person's assertion as deriving force from his personal character, knowledge, or experience, it is not within the scope of the policy of the Hearsay rule. No doubt the line is sometimes hard to draw between conduct used as circumstantial evidence and assertion used testimonially.[1] Nevertheless

N. W. 1053 (prior injuries at the same place, excluded); 1901, Kreider v. Wisconsin R. P. & P. Co., 110 id. 645, 86 N. W. 662 (prior injuries at a machine, excluded).

[1] One of the difficult cases where the line has to be drawn — the use of Conduct as evidencing Consciousness — has been fully discussed (ante, § 265), and reference may be made to that exposition for a more extended examination of the question, as also to the discussion post, §§ 1362, 1788, under the Hearsay rule.

the difference is a real one; and the preceding topics illustrate amply the acknowledged propriety of using conduct circumstantially.

Another objection that may occur is that the conduct of another person is not to be taken as a standard determining legal duty. This is undoubtedly true; but it is easy to distinguish between the conduct of another person as a standard of duty and the same conduct merely as evidence of the nature of the thing which is the subject of the duty. The importance and sufficiency of this distinction is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 461).[2]

In general, then, the phenomena of others' sensations and conduct — effects psychological, or mental and moral (for the term is immaterial, and no one word expresses the entire notion) — may serve to evidence the tendency, capacity, or quality of a material object of external nature, precisely as corporal or material phenomena may evidence it. The principles of Relevancy and of Auxiliary Policy, as already examined (ante, §§ 442, 443), will determine the admissibility of a given piece of evidence. In general, the former requires that the circumstances under which the other conduct occurs should be substantially similar; the latter allows the exclusion of relevant evidence wherever it would, in the case in hand, involve an unfair surprise or a disproportionate confusion of issues and waste of time.

§ 460. Measures of Time, Space, Light, Sound, Difficulty, or Capacity, as evidenced by Human Sensations or Conduct (Noises heard, Objects seen, Distances walked, Trains stopped, Work performed, etc.). All those material conditions and qualities of material objects in external nature which become effective with reference to the ordinary sense-perceptions and muscular activities of human beings or animals may be evidenced by specific instances of such effects, — used subject to the limitations of the general principles already noticed. Thus, a condition of light may be evidenced by instances of other persons' experience in seeing or identifying under similar circumstances;[1] and this application of the principle includes broadly all cases of

[2] It is here impossible to collect all the cases defining this standard of care; yet many of them indirectly lead to an evidential rule.

[1] 1897, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hill, 114 Ala. 587, 22 So. 169 (whether children could be recognized on a trestle at a certain distance; witnesses placed similar children on the trestle and then observed them from various distances; excluded because the conditions were "too variant"); 1903, Sherrill v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 129 (experiments, as to the possibility of seeing an affray, made afterwards, under conditions not shown to be the same, excluded); 1898, People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 294, 52 Pac. 833 (experiments three months later as to the possibility of distinguishing persons from a certain point, not improperly rejected in discretion, the conditions not being similar); 1846, Sealy v. State, 1 Kelly 220 (whether an object could be distinguished at night at a certain distance; evidence of one who had experimented, in company with another, "between the same hours of a similar star-light night," was rejected, because "the difference in men's visions and the uncertainty as to the exact quantity of light on both nights would render the proof too uncertain"); 1893, Painter v. People, 147 Ill. 444, 459, 35 N. E. 64 (whether from a certain position a person below in the house could be recognized; experiments tried by both sides, "if competent at all," held of little weight, owing to the difficulty of testing the substantial similarity of conditions as to light, etc.); 1880, Jones v. State, 70 Ind. 83, 84 (murder; experiments by sitting at night near the window in a room with a fire and a lamp to see whether a person without could be recognized, rejected; Worden, J.: "The experiments were not made at the house where Pigg was shot, but elsewhere; it would probably be difficult, if not impossible, to make an experiment elsewhere under just the circumstances that existed at the time Pigg was shot, including the extent and situation of the lights in the room, the extent of light or darkness outside, the quality of the window glass, etc."); 1894, Burg v. R. Co., 90 Ia. 106, 116, 57 N. W.

the possibility of mistaken identity, as shown by other instances of mistaken recognition.[2]

A condition of sound may be evidenced by instances of other persons' experience in hearing under similar conditions.[3] The time required for walking or riding a certain distance,[4] or for stopping a train within a certain dis-

680 (tests under similar conditions, to determine whether a person could be seen on a track, admitted); 1899, Richardson v. State, 90 Md. 109, 44 Atl. 999 (experiments in identifying other persons by the light of the same street-lamp under similar conditions, admissible); 1888, Stone v. Ins. Co., 71 Mich. 81, 38 N. W. 710 (death by slipping into an excavation in the sidewalk; the impression received by one approaching it on the next night under the same circumstances, admitted); 1863, Berckmans v. Berckmans, 16 N. J. Eq. 127 (admitting experiments as to the possibility of seeing a certain event testified to); 1900, Cox v. R. Co., 126 N. C. 103, 35 S. E. 237 (experiments as to how far a man could be seen, admitted); 1853, Smith v. State, 2 Oh. St. 517 (the injured person asserted that he had recognized the accused in the dark by the flash of the pistol as it was discharged outside his window at him; evidence of experiments under similar conditions showing the impossibility of such a recognition was declared admissible; Thurman, J.: "It was certainly lawful to disprove this statement by showing the impossibility or natural improbability of its being true. This is not denied, but it is said it could not be done by proof of experiments. If not, how could the proof be made? . . . Again, it is urged that the experiments in question were not made by looking through the same window pane that H. looked through. But does that deprive them of all value? Is there such a difference in common window-glass that the judgment could not in any degree be aided by an experiment made with another pane!"); 1899, Schweinfurth v. R. Co., 60 id. 215, 54 N. E. 89 (experiments with men in a buggy, and an engine and train, made under circumstances similar to those of an injury sued for, and on the spot in the jury's presence, admitted); 1898, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Hellenthal, 31 C. C. A. 414, 88 Fed. 116 (whether a child could be seen on the track; experiments assumed admissible, but whether the similarity of conditions was for judge or jury, left undecided; it need not have been; of course it is for the judge); 1897, Young v. Clark, 16 Utah 42, 50 Pac. 832 (experiments as to the possibility of seeing a child on a railroad bridge, received); 1899, Bias v. R. Co., 46 W. Va. 349, 33 S. E. 240 (experiments made on the railroad-track, in the jury's presence, to show how far a person could be seen, allowed); 1899, Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145 (experiments as to time of disappearance of daylight, not admitted, because not under sufficiently similar conditions).

[2] 1824, R. v. Robinson, Annual Register, 1824, App. 33 (larceny, evidenced by a witness to the act; the defendant, to show mistaken identity, called a witness who "had seen two persons in custody very much resembling the prisoner"; "about six weeks ago he met a young man so much like the prisoner that he was quite surprised at the resemblance"); 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 483 (the witness met the accused's double and was so strongly impressed by the identity that he twice approached him to speak to him as the defendant); 1850, Com. v. Webster, Bemis' Rep. 281, 5 Cush. 295, 302 (murder; after testimony that the deceased had been seen alive on the streets since the time alleged, evidence in rebuttal was offered that other persons had mistaken a certain man for the deceased, the fact indicating the existence of a similar person; excluded, unless the person himself was produced; un-sound).

[3] 1899, People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 56 Pac. 424 (experiments as to hearing of sounds, made under conditions substantially similar, admitted); 1899, Sonoma Co. v. Stofen, 125 id. 32, 57 Pac. 681 (experiments as to the sound produced by kicking a safe-door, admitted, as made under substantially similar conditions); 1900, Starr v. People, 28 Colo. 184, 63 Pac. 299 (whether a conversation could be heard at a certain point; experiments under essentially the same conditions, held admissible); 1896, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moffatt, 56 Kan. 667, 44 Pac. 607 (railway killing at a crossing; to show whether the sound-signals could have been heard, evidence was held admissible from persons who had stood at the spot and listened, "if the test is made at the place and under substantially similar circumstances"); 1902, Gambrill v. Schooley, 95 Md. 260, 52 Atl. 500 (experiments as to the range of hearing of a voice, held admissible); 1899, State v. Smith, 78 Minn. 362, 81 N. W. 17 (whether a voice could be heard, etc., at a certain point; results of experiments, admitted). Compare § 222, ante.

[4] 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1162, 1178 (evidence received of experiments made in walking to the river, to show that it was impossible for the defendant to go and return within a certain time); 1887, Klanowski v. R. Co., 64 id. 279, 286, 31 N. W. 275 (experiments made by proceeding along the same road as the plaintiff just before the same train approached the crossing, to determine whether it could be safely made, excluded, because the distances and other conditions were not shown to be similar; Morse, J., diss.); 1900, People v. Gotshall, 123 Mich. 474, 82 N. W. 274 (time of going a distance; time taken by certain young men experimentally, not admitted to show time taken by an old man who was ill); 1888, State v. Flint, 60 Vt. 304, 308, 317, 14 Atl. 178 (time required to walk a certain distance; experiments in walking it, admitted in spite of partial dissimilarity of conditions).

tance,[5] may be evidenced by other instances under similar conditions. The height of a cattle-guard, with reference to the possibility of cattle leaping it, may be evidenced by instances of what cattle have done with similar fences; or the amount of animal feed, by the quantity consumed by others.[6] In general, when a question arises whether at a certain machine, house, field, mine, or other thing, a certain act can be done, under given conditions of time, strength, skill, or achievement, "one way to do," in the language of Mr. Justice Doe,[7] "is to speculate about it; and another way is to try it"; and it is a crude error to suppose that the law of evidence here "prefers speculation to experience, abhors actual experiment, and delights in guesswork." There is therefore no reason why other instances of observation and experiment should not be received, subject to the foregoing limitations of principle.[8]

[5] 1881, Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 68 Ga. 235 (to show whether an engine could have been stopped in time, the engineer related another instance in which he had done it under similar circumstances); 1895, Byers v. R. Co., 94 Tenn. 345, 29 S. W. 129 (an experiment evidenced that it was impossible to stop a train under the conditions in which the defendant failed to stop the train); 1903, Richmond P. & F. Co. v. Racks, — Va. — , 44 S. E. 709 (time required for stopping cars of a substantially different construction, excluded).

[6] 1886, Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hart, 22 Ill. App. 209 (on the question whether a cattle-guard was of such a construction that domestic animals could readily step over, evidence was offered that cows, heifers, steers, and horses had repeatedly been seen passing over; Baker, P. J.: "A fact that illustrates by experiment the condition of the subject-matter of the issue in controversy is not collateral to that issue, but is direct evidence bearing on it"); 1871, Carlton v. Hescox, 107 Mass. 410 (price of hay fed to the defendant's horse; the quantity fed being in issue, evidence of "how much hay an ordinary horse will eat or consume in a week," excluded, since the horse was with the defendant to be doctored, and therefore not in ordinary condition); 1895, Harwood's Adm'x v. R. Co., 67 Vt. 664, 32 Atl. 720, semble (that other cattle-guards, similarly circumstanced, and of like pattern, had sufficiently restrained cattle, received to show that the one in question was adequate).

[7] Quoted ante, § 445.

[8] 1899, People v. Hill, 123 Cal. 571, 56 Pac. 443 (experiment as to getting over a fence, improper because not shown to be under similar conditions); 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (the defence having alleged that the deceased committed suicide, experiments were made before the jury with screws, ropes, hooks, etc., to test the possibility of the deceased having hung himself in the manner alleged by the accused; the objection was made, among others, that the conditions were not the same. The majority of the Court held that the verdict would not have been reversed for this alone, but declared that such experiments "should be permitted by the Court with great caution"); 1890, McMurrin v. Rigby, 80 Ia. 325, 45 N. W. 877 (experiments as to the possibility of a rape on a stairway as described by the plaintiff; rejected, because "the experiments were not made under such conditions as to size of persons as that the results would prove or disprove the claim of the plaintiff"); 1898, Baltimore C. P. R. Co. v. Cooney, 87 Md. 261, 39 Atl. 859 (to show whether a person could ride on a street-car in a certain way, the fact that persons had ridden or could ride on similar cars of the same line was excluded); 1839, Salem I. R. Co. v. Adams, 23 Pick. 256, 258, 264 (deceit in the sale of shoes; the plaintiff claimed that they were so packed in boxes, and the boxes so arranged, as to induce deception; to disprove this, their apparent condition, etc., as examined about the same time and under the same circumstances by another person, was admitted); 1874, People v. Morrigan, 29 Mich. 5 (a pocketbook had been stolen from a coat-pocket while on the wearer; the fact was admitted of experiments made at a tailor's to determine the possibility of the theft, the coat being then "in the same condition in which it had been at the alleged robbery"); 1878, Ulrich v. People, 39 id. 245 (rape; experiments made in lifting girls over a fence as alleged by the complainant, to show the impossibility of this, excluded, because of liability to unfairness and because the lifting was not material); 1897, Davis v. State, 51 Neb. 301, 70 N. W. 984 (train-wrecking; to answer testimony that it was impossible with a monkey-wrench to remove certain nuts, testimony was admitted of one who had so removed similar nuts, the conditions being similar); 1897, West Pub. Co. v. Lawyers' Coöp. P. Co., 25 C. C. A. 648, 79 Fed. 756 (the issue being whether the headnotes made by the defendant's editors from the plaintiff's reports were merely copied from the plaintiff's headnotes to these reports or were made by original labor and study of the reports, the plaintiff argued that the period of time between the publication of these reports and that of the defendant's headnotes made original study impossible; the defendant's offer to have his editors show their capacity for speed in the master's presence

Compare here (1) the use of other instances of a particular person's strength or skill, to show his individual strength or skill (ante, §§ 220–223); and (2) the propriety, in the present class of cases, of performing the experiments before the jury, instead of proving them by witnesses (post, §§ 1150–1161).

§ 461. Measure of Negligence, Danger, Insufficiency, Unreasonableness, Cruelty, Unskilfulness, or their opposites, as evidenced by Similar Conduct or Habits of other Persons or Animals (Horses' Fright, Passengers' Behavior, Safeguards for Railroads, Highways, and Machines, Commercial Customs, Malpractice, Libel, etc.). If a person is in the house and wishes to know whether he needs to take out his umbrella with him, and the condition of the atmosphere makes it difficult to see whether it is raining, he may look at the passers-by, and observe whether their umbrellas are lifted. If he wished to ascertain whether a hill was too steep to descend in a wagon without a brake, he would learn something by observing whether the brake was applied to others' wagons in descending. If he observed the workmen in a powder-factory wearing felt shoes, he might infer that the tendency of the powder was to explode from the concussion or friction of ordinary shoes, and that felt shoes were necessary with reference to obviating this tendency. In all these cases, he is judging of the nature or tendency of a material object from its effects on the conduct of others. This tendency of the material object is usually not shown (as in the preceding classes of cases) by its direct effects upon senses or muscles — as where a person uses his vision in sighting an object or feels pain upon eating a substance —, but by its indirect effects, i. e. usually, by voluntary conduct, exhibited in avoiding the supposed tendency of the object. Thus, the wearing of the felt shoes is that sort of conduct which the person is forced into in order to avoid the consequences otherwise to be expected; the raising by the traveller of the protective umbrella is what he is put to in order to escape a drenching; and the use of the brake is resorted to for avoiding the danger of slipping down the hill. Nevertheless, the conduct is equally cogent evidentially as indicating the tendency of the material object. The only difference is that it approaches a degree nearer to the line between testimonial and circumstantial evidence, and thus raises more distinctly the question of the Hearsay rule. This possible application of the Hearsay rule was the reason for the exclusion of such evidence in Wright v. Tatham, infra; but this question has already been referred to (ante, § 459), and it is enough to say that the rule has never been thought applicable except in Wright v. Tatham.

was held not improperly rejected in the trial Court's discretion, in view of the conditions being there much more favorable to high speed than at the time of the making of the headnotes in question); 1899, Golden Reward M. Co. v. Buxton M. Co., 38 C. C. A. 228, 97 Fed. 413 (trespass by mining a quantity of ore on the plaintiff's premises; to prove the total amount taken, the defendant offered to prove that the rate of output in its various slopes was the same, and that the total output divided by the total number of workmen, and multiplied by the number of men working in the slopes on the plaintiff's premises, would give the total tons of ore wrongfully taken; excluded, because on the facts confusing, unfair, and unnecessary); 1898, Hayes v. R. Co., 17 Utah 99, 53 Pac. 1001 (whether an engine could pass a shed safely; experiment with another engine under similar conditions, allowed).

The chief difficulty here is of another sort. It arises from the necessity of distinguishing between the use of such facts evidentially and their use as involving a standard of conduct in substantive law. The distinction is in itself a simple one. (1) The conduct of others evidences the tendency of the thing in question; and such conduct — e. g. in using brakes on a hill, felt shoes in a powder-factory, railings around a machine, or in not using them — is receivable with other evidence showing the tendency of the thing as dangerous, defective, or the reverse. But this is only evidence. The jury may find from other evidence that the thing was in fact dangerous, defective, or the reverse, and that its maintenance was or was not negligence, in spite of the above evidence. (2) Meanwhile, the substantive law tells them what the standard of conduct for negligence is; and this standard is a fixed one, independent of the actual conduct of others. To take that conduct as furnishing a sufficient legal standard of negligence would be to abandon the standard set by the substantive law, and would be improper. This conduct of others, then, (1) is receivable as some evidence of the nature of the thing in question, because it indicates what is the influence of the thing on the ordinary person in that situation; but (2) it is not to be taken as fixing a legal standard for the conduct required by law.[1]

This distinction is patent enough, but it is sometimes judicially ignored. Such evidence is sometimes improperly excluded on the erroneous supposition that the mere reception of it implies that it is to serve as a legal standard of conduct. The proper method is to receive it, with an express caution that it is merely evidential and is not to serve as a legal standard. The correct treatment of it is well illustrated in the following two cases from the same jurisdiction:

1867, Colt, J., in Cass v. R. Co., 14 All. 448 (issue as to the care due from a bailee for hire): "What constituted such care [due and ordinary care] was a question of fact to be judged of with reference to all the circumstances, and especially with reference to the degree of care which other persons engaged in similar business in the vicinity were in the habit of bestowing on property similarly situated."

1868, Wells, J., in Maynard v. Buck, 100 Mass. 40 (issue as to the negligence of a drover in losing cattle; an instruction was refused, that "if the defendant did the things that drovers of common prudence, engaged in the same business, ordinarily do, he was not guilty of such negligence as will make him liable"): "This is not the legitimate application of evidence admitted to show the usual practice in similar cases. . . . What had been done by others previously, however uniform in mode it may be shown to have been, does not make a rule of conduct by which the jury are to be limited and governed; it is not to control the judgment of the jury, if they see that in the case under consideration it is not such conduct as a prudent man would adopt in his own affairs. . . . It is evidence of what is proper and reasonable to be done, from which, together with all the other facts and circumstances of the case, the jury are to determine whether the conduct in question in the case before them was proper and justifiable."

It is to be remembered that the principles of Relevancy and of Auxiliary Policy (ante, §§ 442–444) apply with the same limitations as in the preceding topics; i.e. (1) the conduct of others must have occurred under circumstances substantially similar, and (2) there may be an exclusion of relevant evidence where in the case in hand it would, in the trial Court's opinion, involve a confusion of issues and undue waste of time.

[1] For a further consideration of the distinction between evidence of negligence and the legal standard of negligence, see post, § 2552.

In the application of this principle, then, the dangerous tendency of an object to frighten horses may be evidenced by instances of other horses being frightened by it under similar circumstances.[2] So, too, the tendency of an extraordinary situation to frighten human beings (as when in a collision the reasonableness of a person's conduct in jumping or rushing out is in issue) may be evidenced by the conduct of other persons similarly situated.[3]

[2] 1889, Brown v. R. Co., 22 Q. B. D. 391 (a heap of refuse and earth in a highway; to show its tendency to frighten horses, the fact was received of the shying of various other horses than the plaintiff's in passing the heap); 1858, House v. Metcalf, 27 Conn. 631 (fright at a mill-wheel; to show that the wheel in motion was calculated to frighten horses, other instances of such fright were received); 1871, Knight v. Goodyear Mfg. Co., 38 id. 438, 412 (fright of other horses of ordinary gentleness by the same whistle at the same place, admitted to show the whistle's horse-frightening capacity); 1876, Tomlinson v. Derby, 43 id. 562 (that another horse was frightened by a highway-defect, admitted); 1888, Cleveland R. Co. v. Wynant, 111 Ind. 525, 17 N. E. 118 (injury through fright of a horse at a box-car; previous fright of other horses at it, excluded; "it is not a subject to be pleaded or proved, whether a box-car or any other particular object is naturally calculated to frighten horses; this is to be determined by the Court and the jury, as applied to all the facts of the particular case before them"; the mere statement of such a reason is its own refutation); 1897, Topeka Water Co. v. Whiting, 58 Kan. 639, 50 Pac. 877 (fright of other horses at an open hydrant, received); 1867, Hill v. R. Co., 55 Me. 438 (horse's fright at a whistle; fright of other horses at the same whistle, admitted, to show "the usual effect of this whistle on horses of ordinary character"; the defendant might have shown that "no horse had ever been alarmed by it"); 1881, Crocker v. McGregor, 76 id. 282 (whether escaping steam was likely to frighten horses; the fright of other horses, well-broken and ordinarily safe, admitted; "it tends to show the capacity of the inanimate thing to do the mischief complained of"); 1891, Bemis v. Temple, 162 Mass. 312, 38 N. E. 970 (whether a campaign-flag overhanging a street was calculated to frighten horses; the effect of the flag under the same conditions upon other ordinary horses, admitted by the majority; Knowlton, J.: "The inquiry was in regard to the effect of an inanimate object upon an animal acting from instinct; the only way in which knowledge on this subject could be acquired is by observation of the effect of the object or of similar objects upon the animal. . . . The only possible difference in the results of different observations would arise from the difference in the horses," but this possible difference is not substantial); 1886, Smith v. Sherwood, 62 Mich. 159, 28 N. W. 806 (fright of a horse at a hole in a bridge; the shying of other horses at the same hole, admitted); 1903, Nye v. Dibley, — Minn. —, 93 N. W. 524 (fright of other horses of ordinary gentleness, at a pile of stone, admitted); 1872, Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 40 (injury by the fright of a horse at a pile of lumber; previous fright of another horse, admitted; see quotations, ante, §§ 413. 444, 445); 1878, Gordon v. R. Co., 58 id. 396 (whether the noise of steam escaping from a locomotive was likely to frighten horses; the fright of other horses passing under like circumstances, admitted); 1896, Folsom v. R. Co., 68 id. 454, 38 Atl. 209 (fright of other horses "in the same or similar situation," admitted); 1897, Valley v. R. Co., ib. 546, 38 Atl. 383 (conduct of the same horse in passing the same pile of lumber at other times on the same day, admissible); 1898, Potter v. Natural Gas Co., 183 Pa. 575, 39 Atl. 7 (previous fright of another horse at the same noise, admitted); 1899, Stone v. Pendleton, 21 R. I. 332, 43 Atl. 643 (horse frightened by a heap of sand; non-occurrence of fright by other horses at such heaps, excluded because too remote and because the conditions were not the same); 1891, Thomas v. Springville, 9 Utah 426, 430, 35 Pac. 503 (shying of other horses at a hole, admissible); 1887, Bloor v. Town of Delafield, 56 Wis. 273, 34 N. W. 115 (fright of a horse at a box-car; that numerous other horses had been driven past without fright, excluded, on grounds of auxiliary policy; no authorities cited).

[3] 1872, Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Ashcroft, 48 Ala. 31 (conduct of others in jumping from the train, admitted); 1890, Mitchell v. R. Co., 87 Cal. 62, 25 Pac. 245 (conduct of other passengers, admitted to "show what they, being in the same dangerous situation, deemed prudent conduct"); 1899, Atlanta C. S. R. Co. v. Bagwell, 107 Ga. 157, 33 S. E. 191 (screams of other people in a car just before a collision, admitted to show plaintiff's state of mind before jumping); 1855, Galena & C. U. R. Co. v. Fay, 16 Ill. 558, 568 (conduct of other passengers, admitted "as tending to show how the circumstances of apparent danger impressed every one, and . . . vindicate it [the plaintiff's conduct] from rashness and imprudence from undue alarm"); 1899, Leary v. R. Co., 173 Mass. 373, 53 N. E. 817 (that other passengers were frequently confused and got out on the wrong side of the train, left to trial Court's discretion); 1897, Holman v. R. Co., 114 Mich. 208, 72 N. W. 202 (conduct of other passengers in the same car at the time of a collision, admitted as indicating the existence of danger); 1877, Twomley v. R. Co., 69 N. Y. 161 (the issue being the danger of a particular situation and therefore the reasonableness of the plaintiff's conduct in jumping from a train, the action of other passengers was received, "as evidence of what was deemed prudent by those in the same situation, having an interest to take the least and avoid the greater hazard"); 1886, Hallahan v. R. Co., 102 id. 199, 6 N. E. 287 (the plaintiff was injured by a collision between the car and a mail-crane; he was allowed "to show that others in the car heard the noise of the collision of the crane with the car, the confusion being the result of the collision and showing the nature thereof"); 1899, Agulino v. R. Co., 21 R. I. 263, 43 Atl. 63 (whether a plaintiff was negligent in believing that a train had come to a full stop; experience of others on the same train at other times, excluded).

Where the ordinary operation of (for example) a railroad car is in issue, with reference to the care to be used by passengers, employees, or highway travellers, or the possibility of safely riding, standing, passing, coupling, or climbing in a certain manner, the same principle applies, though the risk is greater of the jury's improperly confusing the evidential effect with the legal standard of care.[4] Where the care required of the owner of a railroad is in issue, this sort of evidence may serve in a variety of ways, — to indicate, for example, the adequate construction or operation of tracks, platforms, bridges, cars, turntables, spark-arresters, switches, or any object whose qualities are exhibited by the specific conduct or habitual practice of other persons or other railroads in using it.[5] Thus also may be evidenced the condition of

[4] For this reason, and also because the evidence is frequently offered from the wrong point of view, most of the rulings exclude such evidence: Ala.: 1891, Warden v. R. Co., 94 Ala. 277, 285, 10 So. 276 (brakeman riding on the cross-beam in front of the engine; a custom so to ride, held admissible usually as throwing light on the propriety of conduct, but not admissible where the act was per se negligent, as here); 1892, Kansas C. M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, 97 id. 240, 251, 12 So. 88 (car left near the main line; similar principle laid down); 1892, Andrews v. R. Co., 99 id. 439, 12 So. 432 (similar facts and ruling as in Warden v. R. Co.); 1893, Hill v. R. Co., 100 id. 447, 451, 14 So. 201 (stepping from one street-car to another by the foot-boards, the cars being in motion; a custom of others excluded, for the above reason); 1896, George v. R. Co., 109 id. 245, 19 So. 785 (going between engine and car, while in motion, to uncouple them; same ruling); Ga.: 1893, Metropolitan S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 91 Ga. 466, 470, 18 S. E. 816 (crossing the street in front of a car; "usual custom" of pedestrians, excluded, as "no measure of diligence" for plaintiff); Ill.: 1883, Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Clark, 108 Ill. 118 (usual mode of coupling cars, excluded; the Court not noticing the evidential use of the fact); 1900, North Chicago S. R. Co. v. Knapers, 186 id. 246, 57 N. E. 849 (that other passengers were accustomed to jump on a car in motion, not admitted "for the purpose of establishing a standard of ordinary care"; correct distinction not noticed); Kan.: 1890, Southern K. R. Co. v. Robbins, 43 Kan. 145, 23 Pac. 113 (climbing the ladder of a box-car; the practice of others, excluded as creating collateral issues); Mass.: 1867, Hickey v. R. Co., 14 All. 429 (riding upon a car-platform; a custom of others, excluded as "not tending to show that it was safe"); 1867, Caswell v. R. Co., 98 Mass. 194, 200 (whether the plaintiff was careless in going out on the platform from the waiting-room before the train arrived; the custom of passengers to do this, admissible as evidence); Mich.: 1890, Glover v. Scotten, 82 Mich. 369, 46 N. W. 936 (switchmen riding upon cow-catchers; a custom of others held not to be considered, the act being negligent per se); 1903, De Cair v. Mualstee & G. R. R. Co., — Id. —, 95 N. W. 726 (custom of employees to go in front of moving cars when coupling, admitted to show the plaintiff's care; Hooker, C. J., and Grant, J., diss., on the ground that such a fact is admissible only to show a waiver by the defendant of a rule forbidding such conduct); Tex.: 1882, Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Cowser, 57 Tex. 293, 303 (the usual mode of switching by prudent railroad men under similar circumstances, admitted); Ut.: 1898, Nelson v. South. P. Co., 18 Utah 244 55 Pac. 364 (contributory negligence in passing over the roof of a car; custom for persons to do so under such circumstances, admitted); W. Va.: 1889, Humphreys v. N. N. & M. V. Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. 39 (a locomotive fireman standing out on the tank-spout while watering the engine; a custom of others held not to prevent the act from being negligent per se); Wis.: 1894, Colf v. R. Co., 87 Wis. 273, 276, 58 N. W. 408 (switchman jumping off a moving engine; the practice of employees, excluded, as involving confusion of issues; only one precedent cited, and that erroneously); 1897, Andrews v. R. Co., 96 id. 348, 71 N. W. 372 (custom as to other employees' mode of coupling, admitted, on the issue of contributory negligence).

[5] Can.: 1883, Robinson v. N. B. R. Co., 23

a factory, mine, house, vessel, machine, boiler, or other apparatus, with refer-

N. Br. 323 (railway fire set by sparks; the kind of fuel used on other railways, admitted); D. C.: 1894, Weaver v. R. Co., 3 D. C. App. 436, 448 (injury at a bridge; width of bridges on one other railroad, excluded; general principle undecided); Ill.: 1893, Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Walter, 147 Ill. 60, 64, 35 N. E. 529 (injury at a low bridge; usual height of bridges on other roads, excluded; yet conceding that it "might tend to prove" negligence); 1897, Chicago City R. Co. v. Taylor, 170 Id. 49, 48 N. E. 831 (collision between horse-car and cable-car; the custom as to priority of passage at the time and place, received, but not the custom in another city); Ind.: 1886, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Pedigo, 108 Ind. 481, 484, 8 N. E. 627 (injury at a bridge; the use of tools and methods similar to those ordinarily so used, excluded as immaterial); 1888, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wright, 115 Id. 378, 389, 390, 16 N. E. 145, 17 N. E. 584 (injury of a brakeman at a low bridge on a railway; that on other railways were maintained many bridges equally low, excluded; but semble that a general custom not to exceed that height might have been received); 1892, Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mugg, 132 Id. 168, 175, 31 N. E. 564 (condition of a track; custom of others to maintain a track in the same condition, excluded); Ia.: 1872, Hamilton v. R. Co., 36 Ia. 31, 37 (freight-car loaded with timber; that a mode of loading as "usually and commonly loaded and carried over defendants' and all other railroads" would not be negligent, was denied by the Court); 1888, Hosic v. R. Co., 75 Id. 683, 685, 37 N. W. 693 (absence of a footboard on a freight-car peculiarly loaded; a customary omission of footboards, held not to negative negligence); 1888, Metzgar v. R. Co., 76 Id. 387, 389, 41 N. W. 49 (fire set by a locomotive; evidence that a similar style of smokestack was used on four other railroads, excluded as neither negativing negligence, nor tending "to establish any fact material"); 1894, Miller v. R. Co., 89 Id. 567, 570, 57 N. W. 418 (fireman falling into a tender-manhole; usual construction of a manhole, excluded, because the good construction was conceded; custom of firemen to act as plaintiff did, admitted to show care); 1899, Kelst v. R. Co., 110 Id. 32, 81 N. W. 181 (construction of stock chutes; usual custom on other roads, excluded); Ky.: 1898, Berberich v. Bridge Co., — Ky. —, 46 S. W. 691 (custom of other railroads to give notice to carpenters working on a bridge, admissible); Mass.: 1871, Bailey v. N. H. & N. Co., 107 Id. 497 (absence of a flagman at a railroad crossing, excluded as evidence because the circumstances of other crossings would not be exactly similar and because collateral issues would be raised as to each crossing); Mich.: 1874, Hoyt v. Jeffers, 30 Mich. 181, 191 (negligent mill-chimney; the use of spark-arresters elsewhere for locomotives, steamboats, saw-mills, etc., admissible as showing that there was an effective remedy available; not admissible to show negligence or care, except under similar circumstances; and, semble, not affording a test of legal duty in any event; leading case); Minn.: 1881, Kelly v. R. Co., 28 Minn. 98, 99, 9 N. W. 588 (defective planking at a crossing; the usual mode of planking, admitted, because the care required was "that which men of prudence would usually exercise under like circumstances"); 1884, Kolstl v. R. Co., 32 Id. 133, 134, 19 N. W. 655 (injury at a turntable; similarity of method of securing other turntables, admitted, because "the test is the amount of care ordinarily used by men in general in similar circumstances"; this is clearly wrong in the substantive law, but not the preceding case); 1889, Doyle v. R. Co., 42 Id. 79, 43 N. W. 787 (condition of tracks; the use of old rails being shown, a general custom to do so was admitted as evidence of "care such as ordinary prudent men are accustomed" to use); 1900, Moldenhour v. R. Co., 80 Id. 700, 83 N. W. 881 (condition of headlights on other cars of defendant, under dissimilar circumstances, excluded); Miss.: 1902, Southern R. Co. v. McLellan, 80 Miss. 700, 32 So. 283 (that "other responsible railway companies used slag to ballast their roads," admitted on the issue of negligence); Mo.: 1877, Koons v. R. Co., 65 Mo. 592, 597 (turntable injury; the custom of other railroads to leave turntables locked, excluded, the conduct of others being "no defence"); N. J.: 1899, Exton v. R. Co., 62 N. J. L. 7, 42 Atl. 486 (injury to a passenger by scuffling of two hackmen standing on carrier's premises; former repeated similar conduct of these and other hackmen, admitted "to show the dangers connected with the use of this way to the baggage-room"); N. Y.: 1841, Wilds v. R. Co., 29 N. Y. 315, 326 (injury by a railroad train; that the speed of the train in the city was not negligently fast, was held to be clear, if it was "not greater than that which had been usually practised for a considerable period, with the tacit consent of the community, and without accident"); N. C.: 1900, Raper v. R. Co., 126 N. C. 563, 36 S. E. 115 (mode of construction of other crossings of defendant, not admitted to show a standard of defectiveness); Pa.: 1867, Frankford & B. T. Co. v. R. Co., 54 Pa. 345, 351 (use of similar spark-arresters on other lines, admissible "not as a rule of decision, but as a matter of evidence assisting the jury to judge what sort is ordinarily safe"); R. I.: 1901, Benson v. R. Co., 23 R. I. 147, 49 Atl. 689 (that cars were of a sort in common use on other railroads, allowed); S. C.: 1887, Bridger v. R. Co., 27 S. C. 456, 3 S. E. 860 (injury at a turntable; the practice of other railroads as to locking and guarding, admitted as evidence, but not as constituting a standard of care); Tex.: 1884, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Evansich, 61 Tex. 3, 5 (the custom of other railroads not to lock turntables, held no standard of the defendant's care; also, semble, not admissible because the conditions of other turntables may be entirely dissimilar); 1890, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Compton, 75 Id. 667, 671, 13 S. W. 667 (custom of other railroads as to number of hands for a train, admissible, but not to constitute a standard of care);

ence to the propriety of certain precautions in construction and operation;[5] or of a pavement, ditch, or other part of the highway,[6] with reference to its

1891, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Harriett, 80 Id. 73, 81, 15 S. W. 556 (similar evidence; "the custom of other railroads was legal evidence to go to the jury upon the question of negligence in sending out the train, but it was not conclusive upon the question"); 1894, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith, 87 Id. 348, 357, 28 S. W. 520 (custom of other railroads as to flying switches, not to be made "the absolute standard of judgment"); U. S.: 1875, Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 458, 469 (fire set by locomotives; the defendant's negligence in not having the track properly watched was an issue; that "it was not the usual practice among railroads in that section of the country to employ a man," etc., excluded, because "the standard by which the defendant's conduct was to be measured was not the conduct of other railroad companies in the vicinity"); 1897, Henion v. R. Co., 23 C. C. A. 223, 79 Fed. 903 (injury at a platform by an approaching train; mode of construction of other platforms, excluded, because the platform could show for itself its safety or danger; semble, modes of approach of trains in other companies "possibly" pertinent ordinarily); Vt.: 1884, Bryant v. R. Co., 56 Id. 710, 712 (cutting away brushwood by a railway track; practice of others not allowable as a legal standard, but the Court does not clearly express the principle); 1895, Rainey v. R. Co., 67 Id. 594, 32 Atl. 810 (that the station and track arrangements at other places were the same as at the place alleged to be dangerous, excluded, partly because substantial similarity was not shown); Va.: 1900, Southern R. Co. v. Manzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. 285 (usual practice of loading among railroads in general, admitted, but not the mode used by a single other road).

[5] 1858, Hilders v. McCartney, 31 Ala. 501 (fire set by a torch on a steamer; custom of other steamers to carry such a torch, held not a justification); 1893, Jones v. Lumber Co., 58 Ark. 125, 128, 23 S. W. 679 (whether a boiler was properly tested; usual tests used in the region, admitted, but not the conduct of one other owner); 1893, Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 373, 33 Pac. 916 (hoisting strap; usual mode of construction, admitted, not as a conclusive test, but as evidence of care); 1903, Arrington v. Fleming, — Ga. —, 43 S. E. 691 (agistment; custom of other agisters as to fencing, admitted); 1898, Hartford Deposit Co. v. Sollitt, 172 Ill. 222, 50 N. E. 178 (negligence with an elevator; operating mode of other elevators, excluded; no authority cited); 1899, Taylor v. Star Coal Co., 110 Ia. 40, 81 N. W. 249 (admissible "in certain cases to prove what is negligence," though not "for the purpose of excusing negligence"; here, a custom as to mine-roofing, admitted); 1903, Hamilton v. Mendota C. & M. Co. — Id. —, 94 N. W. 282 (custom of other mines as to entries admitted); 1884, Mayhew v. Mining Co., 76 Me. 100, 111 (that a railing around a ladder-hole in a mine was not customary in other mines, excluded, because custom was no excuse for negligence); 1875, Hill Mfg. Co. v. P. & N. Y. R. Co., 125 Mass. 292, 298, 303 (careless construction of a New York pier with reference to fire; the mode of construction of similar piers in Boston under similar circumstances of risk, held not improperly excluded in the trial Court's discretion as involving collateral issues); 1894, Rooney v. R. & D. R. Co., 161 Id. 153, 161, 36 N. E. 789 (employee injured at machinery; custom of guarding in other factories, excluded, because plaintiff assumed the risk of danger here); 1897, French v. Spinning, 169 Id. 531, 48 N. E. 269 (running-board near shafting; that other mills were differently arranged, excluded, apparently because the plaintiff had assumed the risk); 1899, McMahon v. McHale, 174 Id. 320, 54 N. E. 854 (usual play of part of derrick as elsewhere used, etc., admissible in trial Court's discretion); 1896, Helfenstein v. Medart, 136 Mo. 595, 36 S. W. 863 (negligent running of a grindstone; the rate of speed in other similar factories, excluded, because it "was immaterial, and furnished no defence to the action"; 1898, Belleville Stone Co. v. Condon, 61 N. J. L. 353, 39 Atl. 641 (methods of other quarries as to the use of hanging ropes, admitted as evidence of negligence); 1894, Reese v. Hershey, 163 Pa. 253, 257, 29 Atl. 907 (general mode of use of machine in the trade, admissible); 1901, McGar v. Worsted Mills, 22 R. I. 317, 47 Atl. 1092 (mode of lacing belts in other mills, admitted to show lack of safety); 1903, Fritz v. Tel. Co., 25 Utah 263, 71 Pac. 209 (usual method of providing insulators, stringing wires, etc., admitted); 1894, Congdon v. Scale Co., 66 Vt. 255, 29 Atl. 253 (whether a wheel was properly guarded; the absence of guards on similar wheels in other factories, excluded, because the conditions of use were not similar); 1897, Richmond L. & M. W. v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509 (injury in wheel-moving; the general practice of other such shops, but not of a single other, admissible); 1893, Faerber v. Lumber Co., 86 Wis. 226, 234, 56 N. W. 745 (use of similar burners elsewhere, excluded on the issue).

[6] 1893, Bassett v. Shares, 63 Conn. 39, 43, 27 Atl. 421 (team left unhitched; ordinary practice, excluded; no precedents cited); 1869, Champaign v. Patterson, 50 Ill. 61, 65 (manner of constructing sidewalks, etc., in other cities and towns of similar size, excluded, on the theory that this would be no justification); 1841, Barataria & S. C. Co. v. Field, 17 La. 422 (that many persons had been obliged to quit their houses on account of an overflow, admitted to show its nature); 1868, Maynard v. Buck, 100 Mass. 40 (see quotation supra); 1871, Judd v. Fargo, 107 Id. 264, 268 (the plaintiff's horse was frightened by the defendant's maple-sugar apparatus in the highway; that other persons in the vicinity were accustomed to use the highway in the same manner, excluded); 1893, Marvin v. New Bedford, 158 Id. 464, 466, 33 N. E. 605 (that similar depressions in the side-

proper mode of use; or of money or chattels,[7] with reference to the proper method of loading, warehousing, using, mending, or otherwise handling; and, in particular, of a business, or a stock of goods, with reference to the prudence of carrying it.[8] Whether in medical matters a certain kind of remedy, skill, or treatment is necessary or sufficient, may often be evidenced in this manner.[9] Even in matters more nearly involving moral standards, some light may properly thus be obtained from the conduct of other persons, — as when the propriety of a schoolmaster's or ship-captain's discipline or treatment is evidenced by the practice of others;[10] or when the cruelty of treatment to animals is evidenced by other persons' like methods;[11] or when the propriety walk were common in other cities, excluded as irrelevant and confusing); 1901, Laporte v. Cook, 22 R. I. 554, 48 Atl. 798 (custom of shoring up ditches of like character under similar circumstances, admitted); 1896, Jenkins v. Irrigation Co., 13 Utah 100, 44 Pac. 829 (to show negligence in cleaning out ditches, the practice of other irrigators in the same region was excluded).

[7] 1818, Hatchett v. Gibson, 13 Ala. 587, 598 (like the next case); 1854, Gibson v. Hatchett, 24 id. 201 (whether a warehouse was negligently destroyed by fire; the precautions taken and efforts made for another warehouse, saved from burning, admissible, semble, if the conditions were the same); 1900, Arnold v. Fruit Co., 128 Cal. 637, 61 Pac. 283 (under a contract to handle fruit "in the most approved manner," the methods of the majority of fruit-handlers were allowed to be proved; the issue not being whether these were the best methods); 1885, McPherrin v. Jennings, 66 Ia. 625, 24 N. W. 212 (that no other person in that business had similar arrangements, excluded); 1884, Mayhew v. Mining Co., 76 Me. 112 ("Defendant's counsel argue that . . . 'if one conforms to custom he is so far exercising average ordinary care.' The argument proceeds upon an erroneous idea of what constitutes ordinary care. 'Custom' and 'average' have no proper place in its definition"); 1867, Cass v. R. Co., 14 All. 448 (see quotation supra); 1878, Eastham v. Riedell, 125 Mass. 586, semble (what other persons in the same business do, admitted to evidence care); 1897, Hendrick v. R. Co., 170 id. 44, 48 N. E. 835 (general course of business of defendant in shipping cattle, admissible on the question of negligence); 1891, Isham v. Post, 141 N. Y. 100, 110, 35 N. E. 1084 (action for negligence in lending the plaintiff's money on poor security; custom of other bankers and of the defendant to lend money on similar security, admitted); 1902, Benedict v. Union Agricultural Soc'y, 71 Vt. 91, 52 Atl. 110 (custom of wheelmen as to the manner of riding in a race, admitted on an issue of contributory negligence); 1901, Chase v. Blodgett Milling Co., 111 Wis. 655, 87 N. W. 826 (negligence in shelling popcorn delivered to defendant; to show the fitness of the corn, the fact was admitted that corn of identical quality had been successfully shelled by other persons with similar machines).

[8] 1972, Jones v. Ins. Co., 36 N. J. L. 29, 43 (to throw light on the amount of stock in a store in M. when burned, evidence of a resident of N. as to the prudent proportion of stock to sales in the same business was rejected; the principle of Ins. Co. v. Weide, infra, being conceded, but here, the towns being of very different size, etc., the difference of conditions was so great that "such testimony does not afford any reasonable inference" on the subject).

Distinguish the principle of § 379, ante, where the question is only of the fact, not of its prudence; the following case illustrates the difference: 1870, Ins. Co. v. Weide, 11 Wall. 438 (usual proportion of stock to sales, kept by persons in the same business and same city, received; here the evidence was really used to show a custom or habit, and was properly admissible from that point of view; in Jones v. Ins. Co., N. J., supra, the ostensible purpose of the evidence was to show the "prudent" proportion of stock).

[9] 1857, Wilkinson v. Moseley, 30 Ala. 571 (what prudent planters do in caring for sick slaves, admitted); 1902, Baker v. Hancock, 29 Ind. App. 456, 63 N. E. 323 (malpractice; instances of defendant's successful treatment of other persons for the same ailment, excluded on the facts; the ruling appears unsound); 1881, DeMay v. Roberts, 46 Mich. 160, 163, 9 N. W. 146 (action against a physician for wrongfully bringing a lay assistant; custom of physicians as to calling such assistance, admitted); 1901, Challis v. Lake, 71 N. H. 90, 51 Atl. 260 (malpractice; the treatment of similar cases by other physicians, as offered to be proved by nurses, held properly excluded on the facts). Compare the cases cited ante, § 457.

[10] 1858, Hall v. Goodson, 32 Ala. 287 (whether a whipping was such as masters generally give, allowed); 1824, Boldron v. Widdows, 1 C. & P. 65 (action for slander charging that the boys in the plaintiff's school were ill-fed, etc.; the quality of the provisions in another school, excluded, apparently because this was not the proper test); 1859, Lander v. Goodenough, 32 Vt. 114, 119, 125 (beating given by a schoolmaster; to show whether a rawhide was an instrument unreasonably severe, the fact was admitted that it was used in other schools in the vicinity).

[11] 1877, Murphy v. Manning, L. R. 2 Ex. D. 307, (whether the cutting of combs of fighting-cocks was a cruel ill-treatment under the statute; the custom as to such cutting, received without

of a seditious or libellous utterance,[12] with reference to its keeping within the bounds of fair criticism as demanded by the exigency, is evidenced by a comparison with other persons' utterances whose propriety is conceded.

From the foregoing applications of the present principle, distinguish three questions commonly associated in litigation: (1) Whether (for example) a railroad or a factory is bound to provide the best available appliance, or appliances as good as those used by any one else in the same occupation, or whether a physician is bound to possess the skill commonly possessed in his locality or in the entire profession. These questions arise under the general principle of substantive law already noted (ante, § 459), and relate to the legal standard of duty for the case in hand. There are scores of precedents on this subject, but they have been noted here only so far as they tend to illustrate the distinction between the rule of substantive law and the rule of evidence. Facts rejected under the former may nevertheless be admissible under the latter. (2) The Opinion rule may forbid direct testimony by a witness upon care, prudence, reasonableness, safety, or skill of the conduct or the place or machine in issue (post, §§ 1949–1951); but that rule does not affect the present use of specific instances of conduct as circumstantial evidence. Much may depend, in a given ruling, on the form in which the witness' knowledge is asked for. (3) In actions for personal injury, the known custom of other persons (for example, to trespass on a railroad track) may in substantive law amount to a license or waiver, so as to exonerate the plaintiff from the rule of contributory negligence or assumption of risk. This is distinct from the present rule of evidence.

objection, but treated as not legalizing the operation or showing it a necessary one); 1884, Brady v. McArdle, 15 Cox Cr. 516, 523 (cruelty in dishorning cattle; the practice of so doing, semble, held no excuse); 1885, Callaghan v. S. P. C. A., 16 id. 101, 101 (same charge; extent of the practice and its results, considered, upon the question whether it was a reasonable and necessary one); 1887, Lewis v. Fermor, L. R. 18 Q. B. D. 532 (prosecution for cruelly treating sows; that the treatment was a surgical operation, supposed to increase weight, and practised extensively, was considered, as affecting good faith); 1889, Ford v. Wiley, L. R. 23 id. 203, 221 (prosecution for cruelly dishorning cattle; that cattle were not dishorned in most cattle-districts, considered, as showing by the results that the operation was not necessary for fattening, etc.).

[12] With the following cases compare those cited ante, § 367, concerning sedition and libel: 1817, Hone's Trial (Pamph.) (the defendant, charged with seditious libel, read various publications by eminent men, including the father of Chief Justice Ellenborough, the presiding judge at the trial, to show that utterances of a similar sort were compatible with unquestioned loyalty and propriety of conduct; the defendant's acquittal on three successive trials was the immediate occasion of Lord Ellenborough's retirement from the Bench); 1843, R. v. O'Connell, 5 State Tr. N. s. 1, 533 (sedition by bringing Courts into contempt by encouraging resort to arbitration; rules of the Society of Friends, requiring resort to arbitration, admitted to show "that a vast number of the respectable portion of the community have done the same thing and have universally been considered as acting legally"); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 id. 1, 275 (seditious utterances; former similar utterances of persons of high station and unquestioned loyalty, offered as "acts done by public men on particular subjects"; rejected); 1848, R. v. Duffy, ib. 795, 915 (seditious utterances; other speeches, by persons since in high office, offered to show that defendant "did not go beyond the latitude allowed to political writers"; received on account of the former practice, but not approved on principle).

For examples of the comparison of other utterances by distinguished men, as showing that the defendant's utterance could not be a libel if the others were unaccused, see striking instances in Brougham's Speeches, Works, vol. IX, p. 18 (trial of Hunt), p. 230 (trial of Williams). Compare also the admission of literary usage, to show a standard of meaning, post, § 1699.

The following ruling belongs here: 1904, State v. Ulsemer, 24 Wash. 657, 64 Pac. 800 (circulating obscene pictures; "use of similar pictures in commerce," excluded).

§ 462. Business Patronage, as evidencing the Quality of a Place or Article. Where persons are found avoiding a particular region or repudiating a particular article, their conduct serves to evidence for us some defective or annoying or dangerous or other quality in it. The patronage given to an article (as observed in the number of customers or amount of sales) may thus be resorted to for evidencing its quality;[1] or the patronage given to a place or house may indicate its discomforts.[2] The offer is usually of the difference of patronage before and after the alleged disturbing cause, i.e. a resort to the logical method of differences (ante, § 442). But upon the same principle, a decrease in rental value, as involving a decrease in the patronage of lessees, will also serve to indicate the existence of a defective quality from some disturbing cause.[3] The difference between these and the ensuing cases is merely that here the patronage, as expressed in sales or customers numbered, indicates some particular defect, discomfort, or other quality likely to affect patronage; in the other cases, the money-terms (price or value) indicate the net total effect or sum of all the qualities of the article, for purposes of transfer on the market. The propriety or impropriety of the evidence is the same in both cases; if it is received or rejected in the one, it should be received or rejected in the other.[4]

§ 463. Same: Value or Sales of Similar Land, Chattels, or Services. When the conduct of others indicating the nature of a salable article consists in offering this or that sum of money, it creates the phenomena of value, so-called. For evidential purposes, Sale-Value is nothing more than the nature or quality of the article as measured by the money which others are willing to lay out in purchasing it. Their offers of money not merely indicate the value; they are the value; i.e. value being merely a standard or measure in figures, those sums are that standard. But the evidential question is not concerned with the many subsidiary principles of the law of Damages, or standard of value, that come into play. Whether an unaccepted

[1] The rulings are not all as liberal as they might be: 1810, Holcombe v. Hewson, 2 Camp. 391 (assumpsit by a brewer against a publican for beer contracted to be bought; defence, that the beer was not of a fair merchantable quality; "the defendant afterwards proved that the beer supplied to him by the plaintiff was very bad, and that he had lost almost the whole of his customers before he began to deal with another brewer, since which he has carried on a thriving trade"; the plaintiff was not allowed to show that other purchasers of his beer were satisfied, since "the plaintiff might deal well with one and not with the others," i.e. the article sold might not be the same); 1884, Cunningham v. Stein, 109 Ill. 377 (the difference in sales of beer before and after the opening of the defendant's factory, alleged to have polluted the beer, admitted; "it was not conclusive; it was open to proof that other causes, and what causes, affected the sale of the beer"); 1863, Barton v. Kane, 17 Wis. 37, 43 (contract for cigars; issue as to their quality; "that the plaintiff about the same time forwarded to other purchasers cigars the same in kind as those furnished the defendant, and that those purchasers made no complaint that the cigars received by them were damp, unseasoned, or unfit for use," excluded).

[2] 1887, Drucker v. R. Co., 106 N. Y. 157, 164, 12 N. E. 568 (falling off of customers on account of smoke, noise, etc., of a railway, admitted); 1891, Doyle v. R. Co., 128 id. 488, 497, 28 N. E. 495 (same).

[3] 1891, Kane v. R. Co., 125 N. Y. 164, 187, 26 N. E. 278, semble (to show that the real cause of a decrease of rental value was not the defendant's act, such a decrease in neighboring property not affected by the defendant's act was held admissible); 1894, Cook v. R. Co., 144 id. 115, 118, 39 N. E. 2 (rental values of "similar properties on the same street," used to show the defendant's act to be the cause of decrease; like the Kane case, supra).

[4] Yet in New York a distinction seems to be taken, as noted in the next section.

offer of purchase at a certain figure may be looked to as determining value, or whether the price of a sale or the cost of making may be looked to, — these are questions which arise because value is a test formed by averaging results and because it is necessary to define the range over which the true idea of value permits the estimate to go. That is not an evidential process, but a process of average calculation. So, too, the question whether the value of the article at another time or another place may be resorted to depends on whether, in defining the range of data, it is fair for the purposes in hand to allow marketability at another place or time to be considered; there the process is still one of defining the range of the value-idea. It is true that there may occur here some applications of the principles already considered (ante, §§ 437, 438) for inferring the existence of a thing at one time or place from its existence at another time or place. But these applications of the principles of evidence are in the rulings so bound up with the substantive principles of the standard of value that it would be impracticable to consider them here.[1]

There is, however, one question indirectly involving a rule of evidence, — the question whether the value of another article is receivable in order to show the value of the article in issue. As the price at a sale is, by the law of Damages, conceded to be an element in the test of value (except perhaps in forced sales), this question is usually presented in the form, whether a sale of other property is admissible as evidence of the value of the property in question. In answering this question, it is found that the two leading principles already expounded come into joint application, — the principle of Relevancy and the principle of Auxiliary Policy (ante, §§ 442–444). According to the former, the value or sale-price of the other property is irrelevant unless the property is substantially similar in conditions; according to the second, it may also be excluded, though relevant, if it involves in the case in hand a disproportionate confusion of issues and loss of time. The latter consideration has weighed so much with a few Courts that they have treated it as requiring the absolute and invariable exclusion of such evidence. This view is represented in the following passages:

[1] Examples of these principles are found in the following cases: Whether value at a particular time may be evidenced by value at a prior or subsequent time: 1858, McLaren v. Birdsong, 24 Ga. 265, 270 (stock of goods attached; value some eight months previous, excluded); 1895, Bowden v. Achor, 95 Ga. 243, 22 S. E. 271; 1886, Denton v. Smith, 61 Mich. 431, 433, 28 N. W. 160 (value of a cow a year beforehand, admitted); 1887, French v. Fitch, 67 id. 492, 495, 35 N. W. 258 (sale-price of corporation stock three years subsequently, when business had been abandoned, excluded); 1890, Showman v. Lee, 79 Id. 653, 661 (sale-price of a stock of goods eight months subsequently, excluded); 1895, Johnston v. Ins. Co., 106 id. 96, 64 N. W. 5 (value some years before, admitted, the property having no settled market value); 1869, Kelsea v. Fletcher, 48 N. H. 282 (price of a cow three years later, admitted); 1854, Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 40, 43; 1895, Nelson v. Bank, 16 C. C. A. 425, 69 Fed. 805 (sale by court of an insolvent's assets three years seven months after the transaction; the Court pointing out that where assets are in court custody a sale after a considerable period may well be satisfactory evidence). Whether value at a particular place may be evidenced by value at an adjacent place: 1894, Hudson v. R. Co., 92 Ia. 231, 60 N. W. 608 (beef-cattle; price at South Omaha and Chicago, admitted to show the value at Sioux City); 1871, Gilbert v. Kennedy, 22 Mich. 117, 137 (value elsewhere, admissible so far as it tends to regulate or control the home value); 1895, Blumenthal v. Meat Co., 12 Wash. 331, 41 Pac. 47; 1876, Siegbert v. Stiles, 39 Wis. 533, 536 (hogs; the price in McGregor, admitted to show value in Prairie du Chien).

1861, Thompson, J., in East Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hiester, 40 Pa. 55: "If allowed, each special instance adduced on the one side must be permitted to be assailed and its merits investigated on the other; and thus there would be as many branching issues as instances, which if numerous would prolong the contest interminably. But even this is not the most serious objection. Such testimony does not disclose the public and general estimate, which in such cases we have seen is a test of value. It would be as liable to be the result of fancy, caprice, or folly, as of sound judgment in regard to the intrinsic worth of the subject-matter of it, and consequently would prove nothing on the point to be investigated. The fact as to what one man may have sold or received for his property is certainly a collateral fact to an issue involving what another should receive, and, if in no way connected with it, proves nothing. It is therefore irrelevant, improper, and dangerous."

1891, Parker, J., in Matter of Thompson, 127 N. Y. 468, 28 N. E. 389: "[If such sales are some evidence of value], then prima facie a case may be made out — so far as the question of damages is concerned — by proof of a single sale —, and thus the agreement of the parties, which may have been the result of necessity or caprice, would be evidence of the market value of land similarly situated, and become a standard by which to measure the value of land in controversy. This would lead to an attempt by the opposing party to show, first, the dissimilarity of the two parcels of land; and, second, the circumstances surrounding the parties which induced the conveyance, — such as a sale by one in danger of insolvency, in order to realize money to support his business, or a sale in any other emergency which forbids a grantor to wait a reasonable time for the public to be informed of the fact that his property is in the market, or, on the other hand, that the price paid was excessive and occasioned by the fact that the grantee was not a resident of the locality nor acquainted with real values, and was thus readily induced to pay a sum far exceeding the market value. Thus, each transaction in real estate claimed to be similarly situated might present two side issues, which could be made the subject of as vigorous contention as the main issue, and, if the transactions were numerous, it would result in unduly prolonging the trial and unnecessarily confusing the issues; with the added disadvantage of rendering preparation for trial difficult."

It is enough to note (1) in answer to the argument from Relevancy, that since value is a money-estimate of a marketable article possessing certain definable qualities, the value of other marketable articles possessing substantially similar qualities is strongly evidential and is so treated in commercial life; all the argument and protestation conceivable cannot alter the fact that the commercial world perceives and acts on this relevancy; (2) in answer to the argument from Auxiliary Policy, it may be noted that this objection may or may not exist in a given instance, and that the rational and practical way of meeting it is to allow the trial Court in its discretion to exclude such evidence when it does involve a confusion of issues, but otherwise to receive it, — a solution already considered in its general application to the present subject (ante, § 444).

Except in a few jurisdictions, this class of evidence is received.[2] In Massa-

[2] Ala.: 1899, Ladd v. Ladd, 121 Ala. 583, 25 So. 627 (sales of other lands in the same locality about the same time, admissible, "at least on cross-examination"); Ark.: 1887, Little Rock J. R. Co. v. Woodruff, 49 Ark. 381, 391, 5 S. W. 792, semble (sales of other lands, admissible, in trial Court's discretion); Cal.: 1868, Central P. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247, 262 (sales of "adjoining lands," excluded, on the principle of confusion of issues; but cross-examination to test a value-witness may employ such material); 1899, Crusoe v. Clark, 127 id. 341, 59 Pac. 700 (value of similar services in the neighborhood, admitted); Colo.: 1903, Loloff v. Sterling, — Colo. —, 71 Pac. 1113 (Massachusetts doctrine approved); Ga.: 1898, Western & A. R. Co. v. Calhoun, 104 Ga. 384, 30 S. E. 868 (value of a mare; sales of other horses

chusetts and in New Hampshire the principle of leaving the matter to the trial Court's discretion to determine both the substantial similarity of conditions and of mules, excluded on the facts); Ill.: 1869, White v. Hermann, 51 Ill. 243, 246 (land; value of "other property of equal quality lying near to and similarly situated to this, at or near the date," admissible, or even "property of different quality in its immediate vicinity"); 1871, Cook v. Com'rs, 61 id. 115, 124 (value of adjacent lands, here excluded because too different in situation); 1876, St. Louis V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Hallar, 82 id. 208, 211, semble (other sales allowable); 1880, Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Maronsy, 95 id. 179, 182, semble (land; sale of an adjoining tract, admissible); 1883, Haish v. Payson, 107 id. 365, 371 (legal services; less beneficial results of similar services by others, in settling infringement claims under the same patent, excluded); 1884, Colbertson & B. P. & P. Co. v. Chicago, 111 id. 651, 654 (land; sales of "property in the vicinity and near the time," admitted); 1889, Sherlock v. R. Co., 130 id. 403, 22 N. E. 844 (excluding mere offers of other property); 1891, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wallace, 136 id. 87, 26 N. E. 493 (usual charge for similar legal services, admitted); 1893, Peoria G. & C. Co. v. R. Co., 146 id. 372, 374, 34 N. E. 550 (sales of "other similar property, made at or about the same time," admissible); 1896, Metropolitan W. S. E. R. Co. v. Dickinson, 161 id. 22, 24, 43 N. E. 706 (effect of a similar railroad on values of other property, not admissible; except that witnesses to value may qualify by showing that they know it); 1896, Metropolitan R. Co. v. White, 166 id. 375, 46 N. E. 978 (specific nature of injury to rental values of other property, excluded, except as brought out in showing the source of the witness' qualifications); 1897, Nathan v. Brand, 167 id. 607, 47 N. E. 771 (attorney's services; others' usual charges, admitted as evidence of reasonableness); 1897, Boecker v. Naperville, — id. —, 48 N. E. 1058 (sales of similar property receivable as affecting the value of the witness' testimony); 1900, Chicago Terminal T. R. Co. v. Bugbee, 184 id. 353, 56 N. E. 386 (effect of another railroad on a piece of land four miles away eight years before, excluded); 1902, Chicago v. Jackson, 196 id. 496, 63 N. E. 1013 (value of benefit to other properties by track elevations and depressions, excluded); 1902, Lanquist v. Chicago, 200 id. 69, 65 N. E. 681 (sales of similar property, admitted); Ia.: 1872, King v. R. Co., 34 Ia. 458, 461 (price of a similar right of way through an adjoining tract, excluded; such evidence "is admissible only where it appears that there is a uniformity in the character of the lands thus brought in question with those made a criterion of their value"); 1879, Cherokee v. Land Co., 52 id. 279, 3 N. W. 42, (prices of other lots in the neighborhood, admitted, although not precisely similar in all respects); 1884, Cummins v. R. Co., 63 id. 397, 404, 19 N. W. 268 (prices of other lots in the vicinity, excluded, because "it was not shown . . . that there was any similarity between the lots in question" and the others); 1901, Soper v. McClout, — id. —, 87 N. W. 724 (rental value of other similar farms, excluded); Kan.: 1878, Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Harper, 19 Kan. 529, 534 (colts killed; value of other colts of like appearance and qualities, excluded, as affording an opening for too much uncertainty and as tending to confuse the issues); 1890, Kansas C. & T. R. Co. v. Splitlog, 45 id. 68, 25 Pac. 202 (unoccupied land; value of land in a settled neighborhood, excluded; but a general rule also intimated that, where expert testimony can be obtained, the values of other land should not be considered as evidence); 1891, Kansas C. & T. R. Co. v. Vickroy, 46 id. 248, 250, 26 Pac. 698 (the preceding case approved; but testing on cross-examination allowed, as in the following case); 1892, Chicago K. & N. R. Co. v. Stewart, 47 id. 703, 706, 28 Pac. 1017 (land; values of adjoining land allowed to be asked about to test value-witnesses on cross-examination; the present question left undecided); Ky.: 1901, Paducah v. Allen, — Ky. —, 63 S. W. 981 (sales of similar adjoining property, admissible); Me.: 1842, Warren v. Wheeler, 21 Me. 484, 486, 491 (land; the prices of land "lying in the neighborhood" and also "more remote" in the same town, admitted); 1842, Fogg v. Hill, ib. 529, 532 (tenancy; the rents of "similar tenements in the same neighborhood at and about the same time," admitted); 1882, Norton v. Willis, 73 id. 580 (value of three horses; price paid for six horses, including these three, admitted); Md.: 1854, Moale v. Baltimore, 5 Md. 314, 324 ("the neighboring and contiguous lots may be looked to"); Mass.: 1847, Wyman v. R. Co., 13 Metc. 316, 326 ("other sales between other parties of adjacent lots," admissible; though not compulsory sales nor jury-verdict valuations nor mere opinion-valuations); 1853, Davis v. R. Co., 11 Cush. 506, 509 (actual sales of other land, admissible); 1861, Boston & W. R. Co. v. O. C. & F. R. Co., 3 All. 142, 146 (the preceding cases approved); 1862, Paine v. Boston, 4 id. 168 ("actual sales of lots of land on the same street," admitted; no specific distance is too remote as a matter of law; "it was the province of the judge to determine whether the lots . . . were so similar in their situation, relative position, and other circumstances bearing on their value, as to make a sale of them evidence"; leading case); 1863, Shattuck v. R. Co., 6 id. 115, 117 (other land sales admitted; the trial judge to have discretion as to time and place); 1868, Ham v. Salem, 100 Mass. 350, 352 (rejection of values of other land in trial judge's discretion, approved); 1869, Benham v. Dunbar, 103 id. 365 (other land sales, held not improperly admitted in discretion); Presbrey v. R. Co., ib. 1, 8 (another sale of land condemned for a railroad, held improperly admitted under the circumstances, as including extra damages in the price); 1871, Lawton v. Chase, 108 id. 238, 241 (other sales of similar fallen timber, held not improperly rejected in and the confusion of issues is well carried out. In some jurisdictions its use is limited to the testing of value-witnesses on cross-examination. Even in the discretion); 1873, Green v. Fall River, 113 Id. 262, 263 (other land sales, held not improperly rejected in discretion as too far anterior in time); 1877, Chandler v. Aqueduct, 122 id. 305 (another land sale in a different town and three years later, held improperly rejected in the trial Court's discretion); 1879, Gardner v. Brookline, 127 id. 358, 363 (another sale of land of a peculiar kind in an adjoining town, held not improperly admitted in discretion); 1887, Sawyer v. Boston, 144 id. 470, 11 N. E. 711 (sales of other lots, much smaller, held not improperly admitted in discretion); 1888, Patch v. Boston, 146 id. 52, 57, 14 N. E. 770, 772 (sales a few months later and of improved lots, held not improperly admitted in discretion); 1888, Lowell v. Com'rs, 146 id. 403, 16 N. E. 8 (value of mill water-power in Lawrence, admitted to show value in Lowell, the conditions being the same); 1889, Thompson v. Boston, 148 id. 387, 19 N. E. 406 (the general principle affirmed; but a mere opinion of the value of another lot, excluded, as in Shattuck v. R. Co.); 1895, Amory v. Melrose, 162 id. 556, 558, 39 N. E. 276 (another sale in the same street and vicinity, held not improperly admitted in discretion); Lyman v. Boston, 164 id. 99, 41 N. E. 127 (other land sales admissible in discretion); Bowditch v. Boston, ib. 112, 41 N. E. 131 (same); Pierce v. Boston, ib. 92, 41 N. E. 229 (same); Teele v. Boston, 165 id. 88, 42 N. E. 507 (same; a mere difference in size is not conclusive); 1896, Buck v. Boston, ib. 509, 43 N. E. 496 (the usual principle); Beale v. Boston, 166 id. 53, 43 N. E. 1029 (like Thompson v. Boston); 1899, Manning v. R. Co., 173 id. 100, 53 N. E. 160 (similar); 1900, Old Colony R. Co. v. Robinson Co., 176 id. 387, 57 N. E. 670 (similar; but excluding the opinion of experts as to the conditions of these other pieces of property used in comparison); 1903, Sirk v. Emery, — id. —, 67 N. E. 668 (like the preceding case); Mich.: 1870, Comstock v. Smith, 20 Mich. 338, 346 (the value of one of several wells considered); 1877, Eggleston v. Boardman, 37 id. 14, 18 (amount paid to one lawyer, not admitted to show the value of another's services to the other parties in the same case; intimating that ordinarily such evidence as to "certain commodities" is admissible); Minn.: 1873, Lehmicke v. R. Co., 19 Minn. 464, 483 (sales of adjacent land, admissible); 1880, Stinson v. R. Co., 27 Id. 284, 289, 6 N. W. 784 (sales of other lands, excluded, "unless perhaps in an exceptional case, in which no other evidence can be had"); 1884, Senrer v. Horst, 31 id. 479, 480, 18 N. W. 283 (services; wage-rate of another employee of the defendant, excluded); Miss.: 1899, Board v. Dillard, 76 Miss. 641, 25 So. 292 (experts to value may be cross-examined as to other sales of like land about the same time); 1903, Board v. Nelms, — id. —, 34 So. 149 (admissible, "in weakening opinion values"); Mo.: 1861, Lexington v. Long, 31 Mo. 369, 374 (benefit by betterment to opposite owners, excluded); 1878, Springfield v. Schnook, 68 Id. 394 (damages allowed for other expropriated lands, excluded, because of confusion of issues and uncertainty of the inference); 1893, St. Louis K. & N. W. R. Co. v. Clark, 121 Id. 169, 185, 25 S. W. 192 (land; sales of "similar property made in the neighborhood about the same time," admitted; distinguishing the preceding case); 1895, Forsyth Boulevard v. Forsyth, 127 Id. 417, 30 S. W. 188 (value of similar pieces of land in the neighborhood, received); 1898, St. Louis O. H. & C. R. Co. v. Fowler, 142 id. 670, 44 S. W. 771 (sales must be of similar property); 1902, State v. Meysenburg, 171 id. 1, 71 S. W. 229 (shares of stock; sales of similar shares, admitted); Nebr.: 1894, Kirkendall v. Omaha, 39 Nebr. 1, 6, 57 N. W. 752 (excluding, on the facts, sales of other land); 1897, Thompson v. Gaffey, 52 id. 317, 72 N. W. 314 (reasonable plumbing charges; charges by other plumbers in the same city, excluded); N. H.: 1849, March v. P. & C. R. Co., 19 N. H. 372, 376 (not clear); 1851, Concord R. v. Greely, 23 id. 237, 242 ("sales of other lands, similarly situated, in the vicinity of that in question," and made about the same time, admissible); 1855, White v. Concord R., 30 id. 188, 191, 208 (colt killed; sale of another colt of the same age, sire, etc., admitted; the case of Whipple v. Walpole, 10 id. 131, treated as a precedent, seems hardly to be one); 1858, Ferguson v. Clifford, 37 id. 86, 105 (sales of property "in the vicinity and about the same time, similar" to that in question, admissible); 1860, Carr v. Moore, 41 id. 131, 133 (price of horses of similar age and description, a year later, admitted; "it has been the uniform practice . . . to receive evidence of the price at which other property of like character and condition was actually sold in the vicinity at or about the same time"); 1860, Swain v. Cheney, ib. 232, 234 (services in hauling lumber; prices paid for similar services elsewhere in the neighborhood, admissible according to circumstances); 1861, Dewey v. Williams, 43 id. 384, 387 (prices at "times more or less remote and places more or less distant according to circumstances," admissible); Cross v. Wilkins, ib. 332, 334 (board at a hotel; price at a similar hotel in an adjacent town, admitted; the trial judge's discretion to control); 1862, French v. Piper, ib. 439 (leather; value in Boston, where approximate prices ruled, admitted); 1864, Kingsbury v. Moses, 45 id. 222, 223 (services as carpenter; price paid to the employer-defendant by the customer for the plaintiff's services, admitted; whether the time of such other sales is before or after suit brought does not affect their admissibility); 1869, Kelsea v. Fletcher, 48 id. 282 (that a controversy is pending at the time of such sales does not exclude them); 1872, Haines v. Ins. Co., 52 id. 467, 468 (house and farm; value of another farm, admitted, the question of remoteness in time and place being for the discretion of the trial Judge); 1876, Hoit v. Russell, 56 id. 559, 563 (land; rule affirmed); 1879, Amoskeag Co.

jurisdictions where it is rejected, its force is so far recognized that numerous absurd quibbles become necessary in order to distinguish between that which

v. Head, 59 Id. 332, 337 (flowage; the sums paid to thirty-two other persons for their rights of flowage, excluded, because not important enough to justify confusing the issues and protracting the trial; see quotation ante, § 443); N. J.: 1873, Montclair R. Co. v. Benson, 36 N. J. L. 557 (value of adjoining lots a year later, excluded, on the ground of confusion of issues; but the trial Court's discretion is apparently allowed some influence); 1892, Laing v. R. & C. Co., 54 Id. 576, 25 Atl. 409 (sales of other land substantially similar, admissible, the trial judge's discretion to control); N. Y.: 1873, Gouge v. Roberts, 53 N. Y. 619 (the cost of another ice-house, excluded, "as it raised a collateral issue leading to a comparison between the different structures, and could not legitimately aid" upon the issue); 1874, Blanchard v. Steamboat Co., 59 id. 292, 294, 300 (sunken vessel; value of other vessels excluded; no reason given); 1886, People v. McCarthy, 102 id. 630, 639, 8 N. E. 85 (prices named as consideration in various deeds, not received to show value of lands); 1889, McGean v. R. Co., 117 id. 219, 224, 22 N. E. 957 (land rentals; rental values of "similar property in the same street," allowed to be compared); 1890, Huntington v. Attrill, 118 id. 365, 378, 23 N. E. 544 (values of other seaside property, rejected because of confusion of issues); 1891, Matter of Thompson, 127 id. 463, 470, 28 N. E. 389 (water-power; amounts paid for adjacent water-powers, excluded; see quotation supra); 1891, Roberts v. R. Co., 128 id. 455, 473, 28 N. E. 486 (obiter, proof of "the rental and fee value" of "buildings somewhat similar to plaintiff's" may be used); 1892, People v. Myers, 133 id. 627, 631, 636, 30 N. E. 1150 ("the ordinary rule" excludes "sales of other real property in the same vicinity," first, because of confusion of issues, and, secondly, because of unfair surprise; here, such sales were admitted because no other evidence was attainable, and because on the facts of the case the above objections were obviated); 1895, Jamieson v. R. Co., 147 id. 322, 325, 41 N. E. 693 (rental value "in the vicinity," excluded); 1896, Witmark's Case, 149 id. 393, 44 N. E. 78 (affirming the preceding case: "There is no general or well-defined principle of the law of evidence that enables a party to establish the value of some particular or specific thing by proof of the value of another thing of the same class or general character. . . . Cases may doubtless be found where, in other jurisdictions, and in special statutory proceedings for determining the value of real property, more or less support is given to the contention of the plaintiffs' counsel. But in most, if not all, of them, it will be found that the inquiry was not governed by the rules of evidence that prevail at common law. . . . It will be found, we think, upon careful examination, that in most of these [older] cases the Court simply recognized a situation which the parties themselves had created by the general course of the trial, or by consent or acquiescence, and hence they are in no way in conflict with the decision "in the Jamieson case; this suggestion, that the rule in other jurisdictions has anything to do with a statute, and is not based on a common-law principle, is without foundation); 1901, Lævin v. El. R. Co., 165 Id. 572, 59 N. E. 261 (cross-examination to the value of similar premises, allowed; direct examination to "the general course of values" in the vicinity, allowed); 1901, Shepard v. R. Co., 169 id. 160, 62 N. E. 151 (Jamieson v. R. Co. followed); 1903, Robinson v. N. Y. El. R. Co., 175 id. 219, 67 N. E. 431 (Jamieson's case approved; but, cross-examination to specific instances of sales being allowed, the re-direct examination may take up the instances thus brought out); Pa.: 1859, Searle v. R. Co., 33 Pa. 57, 63 ("the market value is measured by the price usually given for such land in that neighborhood, making due allowance for differences of position, soil, and improvement; . . . [the French law] directs the market value to be ascertained by reference to recent actual sales in the neighborhood"); 1861, East Pa. R. Co. v. Hiester, 40 id. 53, 55 (the Searle case approved as allowing reference to "the selling price of land in the neighborhood"; "there certainly can be no objection to this test"; but it is then said to be available only as forming the basis of the witness' knowledge, and not admissible as an independent fact; see quotation supra; but it may be used on cross-examination to test a witness' qualifications); 1873, Pittsburg V. & C. R. Co. v. Rose, 74 id. 362, 369 (land; particular sales inadmissible, semble); 1873, Hays v. Briggs, ib. 373, 386 (the Hiester case approved); 1883, Vanderslice v. Philadelphia, 103 id. 102, 109 (value of another lot excluded); 1884, Pittsburg & W. R. Co. v. Patterson, 107 id. 461, 464 ("particular sales of alleged similar property under special circumstances," inadmissible; the reasoning of the Hiester case adopted); 1886, Pittsburg R. Co. v. Vance, 115 id. 325, 331, 8 Atl. 764 (same); 1890, Curtin v. R. Co., 135 id. 20, 30, 19 Atl. 740 (same); 1896, Becker v. R. Co., 177 id. 252, 35 Atl. 617 (same); R. I.: 1893, Daigneault v. Woonsocket, 18 R. I. 378, 28 Atl. 346 (value of other remote and dissimilar land, excluded); Tenn.: 1901, Whorley v. Tennessee C. Expos. Co., — Tenn. —, 62 S. W. 346 (sales of similar articles at other places, admitted to show the amount of loss of business); U. S.: 1876, Stanton v. Embery, 93 U. S. 548, 557 ("price usually charged and received for similar services by other persons of the same profession [of the law] practising in the same Court," admissible); 1885, Kerr v. Com'rs, 117 id. 379, 385, 387, 6 Sup. 801 ("Sales of property of like character and quality, similarly situated and affected by the same causes, made under circumstances likely to produce competition among bidders, are sometimes resorted to," but the sales here offered were of land "relatively so different" as not to be evidential; this instruction and ruling were approved); 1886, Lehigh is rejected and that of which common sense compels a hearing. The doctrine of admission, moreover, is sometimes recognized for evidencing the value of services or chattels, when not recognized for land-value.

After instances of such similar sales have been received, it is proper, on the principle of Explanation (ante, § 449), to diminish the force of the evidence by showing the conditions to have been dissimilar in some important points.[8]

§ 464. Same: Other Principles discriminated. (1) For the purpose of testing the opinion of a value-witness, by bringing out facts contradictory of his conclusion, it may be proper for the opponent to ask him on cross-examination about the sale-price of adjacent pieces of property; thus, one who places the value of the lot in question at $5,000 may admit that a similar lot adjoining was sold for $3,000 or for $7,000. The effect of this is to exhibit an apparent error of judgment, for if the lots are really similar, their value should be about the same. This mode of impeachment rests on another principle (post, § 1004). It is conceded in some jurisdictions where the independent use of such similar instances to show value is forbidden.[1] It is occasionally forbidden, apparently on the theory that it involves a contradiction on a collateral point (post, § 1004); but that principle does not properly apply to any inquiry confining itself to cross-examination.[2]

(2) In order that a value-witness may qualify as to knowledge, he must

V. C. Co. v. Chicago, 26 Fed. 415, 419 (land; "sales of similar property in the vicinity," admitted); 1896, Schradsky v. Stimson, 22 C. C. A. 515, 76 Fed. 730 (rentals of other stores, not shown to have similar conditions, excluded); Vt.: 1849, Vilas v. Downer, 21 Vt. 419, 424 ("usual prices charged and received for similar services . . . by other men of the same profession with the plaintiff in the same vicinity and in the same County," admissible); 1897, Davis v. Cotey, 70 id. 120, 39 Atl. 628 (price paid for timber in the vicinity, receivable); Wash.: 1892, Seattle & M. R. Co. v. Gilchrist, 4 Wash. 509, 30 Pac. 738 (price of similar land about same time, admissible); Wis.: 1882, West v. R. Co., 56 Wis. 318, 321, 14 N. W. 292 (sale of adjoining land, admitted); 1883, Watson v. R. Co., 57 id. 332, 349, 15 N. W. 468 (sales of lots "in the vicinity," some of them several years before, admitted, the trial judge's discretion controlling; but the use to test on cross-examination was the one here concerned); 1884, Washburn v. R. Co., 59 id. 364, 377, 18 N. W. 328 (same; such evidence admitted generally, "to test the accuracy of estimates thereof made by the witnesses"; but the other lands must be "similar in character, location, and value [!]," and the sales "not too remote in time"); 1896, Atkinson v. R. Co., 93 id. 362, 67 N. W. 703 (preceding case approved; but mere offers excluded); 1898, Stolze v. Term. Co., 100 id. 208, 75 N. W. 987 (other sales admissible, in the trial Court's discretion, if similar).

[8] 1847, Wyman v. R. Co., 13 Metc. 316, 326 ("open of course to any evidence explanatory of the circumstances attending such sale," and indicating the price as an unfair basis); 1896, Buck v. Boston, 165 Mass. 512, 43 N. E. 496 (witness to the value of land who had spoken to the value of adjacent farms; questions bringing out undesirable elements in the location, admitted).

[1] As in Cal., Kan., supra; so also the following: 1896, Silverstein v. O'Brien, 165 Mass. 512, 43 N. E. 497 (a witness who has valued stock as worthless; question as to his having heard of orders for goods which would make it valuable, admitted).

[2] 1839, Tennant v. Hamilton, 5 Cl. & F. 122 (a witness for defendant, in an action for nuisance by smoke, had testified that adjacent premises A, B, etc., were not injured; on cross-examination he was asked whether G, a place, was injured; having answered "No," he was then asked if he knew that defendant had paid anything to the owner of G as compensation for alleged damage; held, that (1) the answer could not serve to test the correctness of his direct testimony, because he had not testified as to G, and (2) it could not be used to test his credit generally, because the inquiry was "perfectly collateral," and involved "a matter which was not relevant to the subject matter in dispute"; hence, even the question was rejected, because (it would seem) its purpose was to lay the foundation for a contradiction); 1889, Thompson v. Boston, 148 Mass. 387, 389, 19 N. E. 406 (a question as to his former estimate of adjacent land, held not improperly excluded in discretion).

appear to know the value of the article in question (post, § 713); he may therefore be asked on direct examination whether he knows the value of adjacent lands, without naming specific instances;[8] in such a case the present principle is not involved.

(3) Whether an opinion as to value is obnoxious to the Opinion rule involves the general principle elsewhere treated (post, §§ 1940–1944).

(4) The effect of a railroad in injuring the material condition of land, as evidenced by the material condition of adjacent land, depends upon the principle already dealt with (ante, § 451).

[8] E. g. as in Ill. and Pa., supra. Compare the cases cited post, §§ 562, 655.

TITLE II: TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE.

INTRODUCTORY: GENERAL THEORY OF TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER XVII.

§ 475. In Theory a question of Relevancy is involved. The necessity for a distinction between Testimonial or Direct and Circumstantial or Indirect evidence has already been considered (ante, § 25). It was there noticed that a large class of evidence is differentiated from all others as governed by a set of rules of admission peculiar to itself, — a class including human assertions taken as the basis of an inference to the truth of the fact asserted. The process of all evidence is an inference from one fact to the existence of another, — from Evidence to Proposition (ante, § 2); and in the present class of evidence the uniform feature is that the inference is to be made from the fact of an assertion having been made to the truth of the matter asserted. How this inference is in practice constantly combined with the inference from circumstantial evidence, and how nevertheless the detailed principles applicable to each remain distinct and independent in application, has been already suggested (ante, § 25). The rules governing the use of this sort of evidence — testimonial evidence — include mainly the rules prescribing the qualifications of witnesses, together with sundry rules for evidence used to explain away and diminish or to strengthen and restore the effect of testimonial evidence. Is it proper to regard such topics as topics of Relevancy? On principle, it is. The question whether A's assertion (or testimony) that B forged a note can be received to show that B forged is as much a question of relevancy as the question whether the discovery of forgers' tools in B's room, or the flight of B from the city, can be received for the same purpose. Suppose a person to come upon the stand and, without a preliminary question, to assert that B forged the note. The mere fact that some casual person opens his mouth and utters these words has in itself little or no weight whatever; for there is as yet no substantial reason why one should pay any attention to his statements. But the fact that a witness A, being of sound mind and sufficient experience, having had opportunity to see what B did, and well recollecting the circumstances, is willing to assert that B forged the note, is a fact which we shall readily listen to as evidence. Some unknown person's assertion may be worthless; but a specific person's assertion, under certain conditions, acquires sufficient probative value to be at least considered. Any one of several circumstances being definitely lacking, it may have no probative value. If A is insane, for example, his assertion is mere chatter; if A is too young to understand what he is speaking of, his assertion is only an infantile repetition of what his elders have said in his hearing; if A cannot write, he cannot form any opinion as to what B wrote; if A was in St. Louis when B is said to have forged the note in New York, his assertion is idle gossip. In short, it is not every human assertion, as such, that is worth considering as the basis of an inference to the truth of the thing asserted; but only assertions made under certain conditions,— these usually consisting in the presence of certain personal qualities or circumstances in A,— i. e. his testimonial qualifications. Now these conditions and the mental process which induces us to recognize them are the same in essence as in the case of circumstantial evidence. A fact must rise to a certain degree of probative value before it can be considered at all (ante, §§ 32, 38), — that is the root notion of relevancy, as thus far examined; and the same notion is here involved. If it is desired to express the doctrine of testimonial qualifications in terms of relevancy, it may be thus stated: The fact that an assertion is made by a person who is sane, of age, experienced in the subject-matter, acquainted with the circumstances, and so forth, is relevant to show the truth of the fact asserted. The rules of relevancy here, as with circumstantial evidence, will consist in a statement of these conditions under which the fact of the assertion will be received as having probative value. It is true, however, that in stating these conditions the phraseology of relevancy is not commonly employed; nor is there a need that they should be. It is sufficient to deal with the general question in its common form, Under what conditions may Testimonial Evidence be received? — or, as covering most of the same scope, What are the qualifications of witnesses? It is only necessary to appreciate that scientifically the present subject is equally a part of the general topic of Relevancy.

§ 476. Method of Argument; Inductive or Deductive. What has already been noted as to the form of the inference (ante, § 30) applies equally to the present class of evidence. The rules which prescribe the relevancy of a class of evidence are here, as with circumstantial evidence, always in inductive form. It is only in the use of these rules that we find employed chiefly the deductive form. When the Court is asked to agree that testimony of a certain sort is relevant and admissible, it is asked to lay down the rule of law as a proposition reached inductively on the basis of experience. But when the Court has sanctioned this proposition, the counsel's argument then takes the deductive form; i. e. "Testimony of a specific class is by a certain rule admissible; the present testimony offered is of that class; therefore it is admissible."

§ 477. Three General Groups of Rules; Testimonial Qualifications. Impeachment, and Rehabilitation. It follows that the ordinary processes of inductive argument are here appropriate. Practically those which call for use are reduced to three:

First, in offering testimonial assertions and asking the Court to agree that assertions of that class are admissible, the simple question is whether other hypotheses affecting the credibility of the assertion are sufficiently negatived (ante, § 32). When the Court declares that the statement is under the conditions named admissible, it declares by implication that the sanity, the experience, the knowledge, and so forth, of the witness are such that the hypotheses of the assertion being idle chatter, ignorant gossip, or otherwise untrustworthy, are sufficiently negatived prima facie, and that the assertion is prima facie worth listening to. Thus the other forms or requirements — substantial similarity of conditions, sufficient number of instances, and the like (ante, § 31) — do not arise for application at all, as they do in using circumstantial evidence; the simple reason being that the basis of inference here is a single homogeneous variety of evidence (human assertions), and not the myriad varied sorts of facts roughly grouped together under the term "circumstantial evidence." In offering testimonial evidence, then, the judge merely inquires whether experience and precedent have sanctioned certain conditions which must accompany the statement.

Secondly, just as in the use of circumstantial evidence it was observed that there are for the opponent certain ways of diminishing the force of the evidence after it was admitted (ante, § 34), namely, by showing that other hypotheses exist which are equally or more probable, or by adducing contrary instances of the same sort, — so here there is found a group of rules pointing to the analogous ways by which an opponent may diminish the force of testimonial evidence; and here, as there, these ways consist mainly either in explaining away the testimonial statement (as, by showing the witness' bad character for veracity, his inadequate experience or knowledge, his poor recollection, and so on), or in adducing contrary instances of the same sort (in the shape of previous contradictory statements, and the like).

Thirdly, since the new facts offered by way of discrediting the witness may themselves in turn be open to explanation taking away their apparent force of inference, so once more the original proponent of the witness may offer evidence, this time for such explanatory or rehabilitating purpose. In practice the process usually ends here; although in theory it might continue longer.

There are thus three general groups of rules to be considered, which correspond to these three general processes of argument:

I. Admissibility of Testimonial Assertions, i. e. Witness-Qualifications:

II. Impeachment of Testimonial Assertions;

III. Rehabilitation of Testimonial Assertions.

§ 478. Analysis of Elements of a Testimonial Assertion: Observation, Recollection, Narration. Before proceeding to the consideration of these rules, an analysis is desirable of the elements of a piece of testimonial evidence; for upon this analysis will depend the grouping of topics, and from it may be surmised something of the necessary requirements of such evidence.

1. When a witness' statement is offered as the basis of an evidential inference to the truth of his statement — for example, the statement of A that B struck X —, it is plain that at least three distinct elements are present: or, put in another way, that there are three processes, in the absence of any one of which we cannot conceive of testimony. First, the witness must know something, i. e. must have observed the affray and received some impression on the question whether B struck X; to this element may be given the generic term Observation. Secondly, the witness must have a recollection of these impressions, the result of his Observation; this may be termed Recollection. Thirdly, he must communicate this recollection to the tribunal; that is, there must be Communication, or Narration, or Relation (there is no single term entirely appropriate). Now the very notion in using a human utterance as the basis of belief in the truth of the fact asserted impliedly attributes these three processes to the witness, — Observation, Recollection, Communication.[1] Whatever rules, therefore, limit the acceptance of testimonial assertions must have reference to some one or more of these elements.

Moreover, in the function fulfilled by each of the three elements or processes are to be found in general form the fundamental canons of which the various detailed rules will be the applications and from which they are sometimes direct deductions. Thus, the notion of Observation is that the external event has in some way or other impressed itself on the witness' senses, to be now reproduced to us in court. This impression of the witness, then (knowledge, observation, or whatever it be called), should adequately represent or correspond to the fact itself as it really existed or exists; and the practical rules under this head will be found to have, for their common purpose, the object of ensuring the probability of a fairly accurate knowledge on the part of the witness. Again, the function of Recollection is to recall or reproduce the original impressions of observation; and such rules as the law has laid down under this head are usually therefore merely applications of this fundamental notion that Recollection must fairly correspond with or reproduce the original Knowledge or Observation. Finally, the function of Narration or Communication is to reproduce for the apprehension of the tribunal the Recollected results — themselves already reproduced from Observation —; and the common purpose of the varied rules under this head is to ensure that the story as told shall represent with fair accuracy what the witness once observed and now recollects.

2. The rules, thus analyzed, would however deal with the simple question, Does this witness actually know, recollect, communicate with sufficient accuracy? — a question requiring in each instance anew an investigation, and a decision based on the facts discovered. But experience has carved out certain rough rules of convenience which, if applied at the outset, may save the necessity of a detailed investigation as to the sufficiency of actual knowledge, recollection, and communication; for it is obvious that if we find the witness incapable — i. e. lacking in the very power — of acquiring adequate knowledge or of sufficiently recollecting or of properly telling, then further inquiry whether he did in fact know or does in fact recollect or well relate, is useless and may be omitted. For instance, if A is put on the stand to testify to the color of a horse, it will be unnecessary to inquire whether and where and when he saw the horse, if it appears at the outset that he has been blind from birth. So, too, it would be unnecessary to ask B, who is put forward to testify to the results of a post-mortem examination, whether he was present and took part, if it appears at the outset that he knows nothing of medicine or of surgery. When the witness is found to lack the proper capacity or power, it becomes not only unnecessary but improper to consider whether he actually knows, for it is impossible for him to know; we do not trust his statement that he does know. Thus, in addition to the rules defining the requirements as to actual knowledge, recollection, and communication, there arise other rules defining the kinds of incapacity (to know, recollect, and communicate) which exclude the witness at the outset without further inquiry.

[1] 1806, Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 202: "All regard to testimony supposes the general proposition that witnesses, not having any motives for asserting what is false or suppressing what is true, having had an adequate opportunity of observing the subject to which they depose, having actually observed it with adequate attention, and having a distinct and perfect memory with respect to it, relate what they have seen or heard with accuracy and fidelity."

Of this incapacity there are three distinct sorts: First, there is an incapacity affecting the general mental or moral powers, — of which insanity, infancy, dumbness, and the like, are instances. This sort of incapacity may affect the witness' power of knowing or of recollecting or of communicating or of doing all three, and must be examined with reference to each. Secondly, there is an incapacity involving a lack of power to judge rightly on particular subjects, and arising from lack of experience or training. This incapacity extends to particular topics only, not necessarily to the whole subject of litigation. Thirdly, there is an incapacity arising from an emotional relation to the controversy, e. g. from marital relationship or from pecuniary interest in the subject of the suit. This incapacity — nowadays recognized to a limited extent only — is supposed to involve an inability to give any credible testimony on the subject of the particular cause, and, when it exists, affects all three elements alike. As for the names to be applied to these three sorts of incapacity, there are none of general acceptance, nor is it easy to select proper ones. The first may be termed Organic, as affecting mental and moral functions or powers; the second Experiential, as involving a lack of sufficient experience or training; the third Emotional, as involving the dominance of untrustworthy motives.

§ 479. Any Assertion, whether in court or not, may be Testimonial Evidence. The use of the phrase "testimonial" evidence must not be understood as applicable exclusively to assertions made on the witness-stand. Any assertion, taken as the basis of an inference to the existence of the matter asserted, is testimony, whether made in court or not (ante, § 25). Thus, all the statements received under the exceptions to the hearsay rule are genuinely testimony (post, § 1361). Assertions made on the witness-stand are merely the commonest class of testimonial evidence. It follows that the qualifications of a witness are equally essential in the use of extra-judicial assertions. In practice the Court does not always insist on proof of these qualifications beforehand; but many of the rules established for the hearsay exceptions (post, § 1424) are nothing more than applications of the rules of testimonial qualifications to extra-judicial assertions.

§ 480. Order of Topics. In accordance with the preceding analysis, the order of topics under the general title of Testimonial Evidence becomes:

Sub-title I: Qualifications of Witnesses.
  Topic I: Organic Capacity; including
    Sub-topic A: Mental Derangement (Insanity, Disease, Idiocy);
    Sub-topic B: Mental Immaturity (Infancy);
    Sub-topic C: Moral Depravity (Sex, Religion, Race, Infamy).
  Topic II: Experiential Capacity.
  Topic III: Emotional Capacity:
    Sub-topic A: Pecuniary Interest;
    Sub-topic B: Domestic Relationship.
  Topic IV: Observation, or Knowledge.
  Topic V: Recollection.
  Topic VI: Narration, or Communication.
Sub-title II: Impeachment of Witnesses; with further subdivisions (noted post, § 881).
Sub-title III: Rehabilitation of Witnesses; with further subdivisions (noted post, § 1101).

SUB-TITLE I: TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

INTRODUCTORY: GENERAL RULES AFFECTING TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

§ 483. Time of Qualifications. The time of utterance of the testimony is the time when the qualifications must exist, because it is at that time that they are needed. Certain consequences follow from this axiom:

(1) In the case of insanity, an insanity prior to the time of trial is immaterial, unless it affected the person's power of correct observation at the time of the fact testified to.[1] On the other hand, prior insanity may suffice as evidence of the continuing existence of it at the time of observation or of delivering testimony.

(2) In the case of infamy, the disqualifying conviction has of course occurred before the trial; but it is supposed to demonstrate a moral depravity continuing up to the trial. A pardon operates to remove the disqualification;[2] but this, though justifiable only on the ground that the depravity had ceased, is a conclusion that does violence to the general principle. In such an irrational doctrine, however, as that of disqualification by infamy (now almost obsolete) it is unnecessary to look for consistency.

(3) In the case of a deposition, the qualifications are required at the time of its taking; hence, the condition of the deponent at the time of its offering in court is immaterial; his intervening death or disqualification could not affect the trustworthiness of his statement when made. On this point, however, the judicial rulings sometimes have ignored sound principle.[3]

§ 484. Burden of Proof of Qualifications. The preëxistence, in the witness, of the requisite elements of capacity already enumerated (ante, § 478) is in theory required. In the practical enforcement of these requirements, however, it would be pedantic to require that their existence be expressly shown in every respect before the witness is permitted to testify. Experience has led to an arrangement by which the existence of the proper qualifications may in some classes of cases be assumed, until the opposing party proves or the witness betrays their absence; while in certain other classes of cases the qualifications are not assumed to exist, but must first be proved to exist by the party offering the witness. Under the former head fall, in general, the elements affecting Organic and Emotional Capacity; under the latter head, those affecting Experiential Capacity, as well as the qualification of Observation (or Knowledge); for the elements of Recollection and Narration, there is no uniform doctrine. The detailed rules carrying out this general principle can better be examined under the respective qualifications; it is enough to note here that the lack of capacity by insanity or idiocy must be shown as a disqualification by the opposing party;[1] that lack of capacity by infancy must in theory also be shown by him, though the witness' age and appearance usually serve to change the burden;[2] and that interest and relationship must be shown, as disqualifications, by the opposing party;[3] while the witness' experience[4] and observation (or knowledge)[5] must be shown, as qualifications, by the offering party.

[1] Post, §§ 493, 497. [2] Post, § 523. [3] Post, §§ 1408, 1409.

§ 485. Mode of Proof of Qualifications. Four ways are distinguishable for ascertaining the qualifications or lack of qualifications of a witness.

(1) The behavior of a witness, in court during trial, or after being called to the stand but before being sworn or formally questioned, may reveal his incapacity. This, however, would in practice be an available source for the cases only of idiocy, insanity, intoxication, or extreme infaucy.[1]

(2) Before the witness is sworn as such, but after he is called and presented, a preliminary questioning of himself may be had, in order to ascertain by his own answers his condition as to qualifications. This questioning (known as voir dire, when applied to ascertain disqualification by interest) formed originally a distinct stage of the proceeding; and it was perhaps properly so, because the answers of a (supposedly) unqualified person could not form testimony, and because it is convenient to mark definitely the time when the stage of testimony proper begins. But in modern practice (especially under the custom of administering the oath beforehand to the witnesses in mass[2] the separation of the two stages is usually ignored. Moreover, in proving the qualifications of experience and knowledge, it was never practised.[3] The detailed rules in regard to the mode of conducting this provisional examination are noticed later under the respective heads.[4]

(3) Before the witness is sworn as such, but after he is called and presented, other witnesses may be used to evidence the facts of his incapacity. This, the commonest mode of proof, is ordinarily available as complementary to the foregoing two;[5] but, for incapacity by interest, it was allowed only on condition of not using the voir dire,[6] — the exception being due merely to the disfavor which the Courts finally came to show towards that ground of disqualification.

(4) After the witness has been sworn, the progress of his direct examination or cross-examination may disclose his incapacity, and then he may be

[1] Post, § 497.
[2] Post, § 508.
[3] Post, § 584.
[4] Post, § 572.
[5] Post, § 654.
[1] Post, §§ 497, 508.
[2] Post, § 1819.
[3] Post, §§ 560, 654.
[4] Insanity, § 497; infancy, § 508; infamy, § 523; interest, § 583.
[5] Post, §§ 497, 508, 562.
[6] Post, § 585.

stopped and his preceding testimony ordered expunged; or, if merely grounds of doubt are disclosed, a questioning on voir dire, or other persons' testimony, may be resorted to. But at this stage, after the oath's administration, his incapacity will not be examined into in case the opponent has by the delay lost the right to make objection;[7] and this loss of the right might occur at different times for different incapacities.[8]

§ 486. Time of Objecting to Qualifications. Wherever a plain separation is preserved between the preliminary examination or voir dire and the testimony proper, the rule can be strictly enforced that capacity is not to be questioned after the person is once sworn as a witness, except where the opposing party had no prior notice of the disqualifying fact, or where, having notice, he has made due objection but has been unable to prove the fact.[1] But in a court where the witnesses are customarily sworn as such before any opportunity for questioning is given, this rule cannot be applied. Yet its principle may be carried out by requiring the opponent to make objection and offer proof before the testimony of the witness is begun, — so far at least as the opponent then is aware of any specific ground of objection.[2]

When the testimony is offered in the form of a deposition, the same general principle is applied, i. e. the objection, if the facts were known, must have been made at the time of the taking of the deposition, if it could then have been of any avail. Nevertheless, since the officer taking it has no authority to exclude testimony, in some classes of evidence the objection would be at that time without practical consequences, and hence there is no harm in permitting certain questions to be raised at the trial for the first time, provided the party offering the deposition has not been put in an inconvenient position for lack of the prior objection. The specific rules on this point have already been considered (ante, § 18).

§ 487. Judge, not Jury, to determine Qualifications. The orthodox division of function between judge and jury allots, without question, to the judge the determination of all matters of fact on which the admissibility of evidence depends (post, § 2550), and therefore of the facts of a witness' capacity to testify. In this inquiry, on the one hand, the judge is not bound by the ordinary rules of evidence applicable to evidence offered to the jury;[1] and, in particular, he need not permit cross-examination of witnesses called to prove or disprove another's qualifications.[2] On the other hand, when the judge has once determined the admissibility of a witness, by applying the rules of law to the facts found by himself, the witness stands before the jury for them to judge of his credit as they see fit, untrammelled by the rules of law as to his qualifications;[3] it would follow that if they reject his testimony, it should be merely because, all things considered, they do not believe

[7] Post, §§ 486, 586.

[8] The rules about capacity to take the oath do not involve testimonial qualification as such, and are elsewhere examined (post, §§ 1816–1823).

[1] Interest, post, § 586. For the general principle as to the time of making objections to evidence, see ante, § 18.

[2] Interest, post, § 586; insanity, post, § 497.

[1] See instances cited post, § 2550; and under Interest, § 587.

[2] See the cases collected post, § 1385.

[3] See instances cited post, § 861, 1451, 2550.

him, and not because they find him lacking by force of some legal definition of competency;[4] with such definitions the jury have nothing to do.

§ 488. Statutes affecting Qualifications. The rules of the common law respecting the qualifications of witnesses were highly restrictive. In the progress of thought, these restrictions came in many instances to be recognized as illiberal and unnecessary; and legislation has in several important respects abolished them either wholly or in part. The statutes affecting these changes have often embodied in the same enactment the change of diverse rules. In order to have before us in practicable form all the statutory data affecting a given rule, it is necessary to set out in one place the series of enactments or statutory sections dealing with the general subject, and then from time to time in the course of discussion refer to this single collection of data. Accordingly, it is most convenient to set out here in mass, for subsequent reference in detail, the statutes affecting organic and emotional capacity, i. e. insanity, infancy, infamy, interest, and marital relationship, reserving for other places the statutes, easily separable, which affect other rules of testimonial evidence.[1]

[4] An application of this will be fonnd post, § 497.

[1] The editions of collected statutes here referred to will be found enumerated in the Preface:

I. ENGLAND: 1814, St. 54 Geo. III, c. 170 (rated inhabitants of parish, etc., to be competent in certain cases); 1833, St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 42 (removes "disqualification by reason of verdict being usable for or against the witness); 1840, St. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 26 (similar to St. 1814); 1843, St. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, Lord Denman's Act ("Whereas the inquiry after truth in courts of justice is often obstructed by incapacities created by the present law, and it is desirable that full information as to the facts in issue, both in criminal and in civil cases, should be laid before the persons who are appointed to decide upon them, and that such persons should exercise their judgment on the credit of the witnesses adduced and on the truth of their testimony, Now therefore be it enacted, That no person offered as a witness shall hereafter be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime or interest from giving evidence," provided that this shall not render competent "any party to any suit," "or the husband or wife of such persons"); 1846, St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 (in suits in the county courts, "the parties thereto, their wives and all other persons" may be examined); 1851, St. 14 & 15 Vict. c 99, § 1 (St 6 & 7 Vict. repealed as to the proviso about parties); § 2 (parties, and persons on whose behalf a suit is brought or defended, are to be competent and compellable); § 3 (person charged with offence indictable or punishable with summary conviction, not to be affected by statute; neither husband nor wife to be "competent or compellable to give evidence for or against" the other in criminal proceedings); § 4 (action for breach of promise of marriage or in consequence of adultery, not to be affected); 1853, St. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, § 1 ("husbands and wives of the parties" shall be competent and compellable to testify "on behalf of either or any of the parties"); § 2 (but nothing shall render husband or wife competent or compellable to testify for or against the other "in any criminal proceeding or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery"); § 3 ("no husband shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, and no wife shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage"); 1859, St. 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, § 6 (on wife's petition for divorce founded on adultery, coupled with cruelty or desertion, both husband and wife are competent and compellable as to the cruelty or desertion); 1869, St. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68 ("Whereas the discovery of truth in courts of justice has been signally promoted by the removal of the restrictions on the admissibility of witnesses and it is expedient to amend the law of evidence with the object of still further promoting such discovery"); § 2 (parties to an action for breach of marriage promise, competent); § 3 (parties to any proceeding in consequence of adultery, and their husbands and wives, to be competent; but no answer as to a witness' own adultery to be compellable, unless the witness has already testified in disproof thereof); 1877, St. 40 & 41 Vict. c. 14 (on indictment or proceeding to try or enforce a civil right only, the defendant, and the defendant's wife or husband, to be competent and compellable); 1885, St. 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, § 4 (in prosecutions for rape under age, where the girl in question "or any other child of tender years" does not in the Court's opinion understand the nature of an oath, the child's evidence may be given, without oath, if in the Court's opinion the child "is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of the evidence and understands the duty of speaking the truth"; with a proviso requiring corroboration, for which see post, § 2061); 1889, St. 52 & 53 Vict. c. 44, § 8 (similar), 1898, St. 61 & 62

Vict. c. 36, § 1 ("every person charged with an offence, and the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the person charged, shall be a competent witness for the defence at every stage of the proceedings"; the accused thus testifying, "shall not be asked, and if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he has committed or been convicted or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged").

II. CANADA. DOMINION OF CANADA: Rev. St. 1886, c. 106, § 114 (in trials under the Temperance Act, the wife or husband of the accused is compellable and competent); Crim. Code 1892, § 685 (rape under age, and indecent assault; like Eng. St. 1885, c. 69, § 4); St. 1893, c. 31, § 3 ("A person shall not be incompetent to give evidence by reason of interest or crime"); § 4 ("Every person charged with an offence, and the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the person so charged, shall be a competent witness, whether the person so charged is charged solely or jointly with any other person. Provided, however, that no husband shall be competent to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during their marriage, and no wife shall be competent to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during their marriage. 2. The failure of the person charged, or of the wife or husband of such person, to testify, shall not be made the subject of comment by the judge or by counsel for the prosecution in addressing the jury"); § 6 ("A witness who is unable to speak, may give his evidence in any other manner in which he can make it intelligible"); § 25 ("in any legal proceeding" the rule of Eng. St. 1885, c. 69, § 4, is adopted).

BRITISH COLUMBIA: Rev. St. 1897, c. 71, §§ 4, 5 (like Can. St. 1893, c. 31, §§ 3, 4, omitting par. 2 of § 4 and the last clause of par. 1); § 7 (like ib. § 6); § 29 (testimony of certain natives not understanding an oath may be received); c. 62, § 27 (in divorce, the Court may order the examination or cross-examination of the petitioner, who shall however not be bound to answer any question tending to show him guilty of adultery); St. 1900, c. 9, § 3 (repeals R. S. 1897, c. 71, § 24, and substitutes: "[In civil proceedings, the parties] and their wives and husbands shall, except as hereinafter excepted, be competent as witnesses and compellable" as if not parties, etc.; provided that the plaintiff's testimony, in breach of promise of marriage, must be corroborated); § 4 (adds the following section, 50, to R. S. 1897, c. 71: "No husband shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage," and no wife similarly).

MANITOBA: Rev. St. 1902, c. 57, §§ 3, 4, 6 (like Can. St. 1893, c. 31, §§ 3, 4, 6); § 39 (like ib. § 25); c. 62, § 72 (in offences under the Factory Act, the accused shall be competent and compellable); c. 116, § 786 (in offences under the Municipal Act, the accused, and wife or husband, shall be competent and compellable).

NEWFOUNDLAND: Consol. St. 1892, c. 57, § 13 (no person "shall be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime from giving evidence"); § 1 (the parties and their beneficiaries, "and the husbands and wives of the parties" and of the beneficiaries, shall be "competent and compellable," except as otherwise declared; provided that "the party so called to testify may be cross-examined by the opposite party under the rules applicable to the cross-examination of witnesses"); § 2 (no person "charged with the commission of any indictable offence" shall be "competent and compellable to give evidence for or against himself or herself," nor shall any person be "compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself or herself," nor shall any husband "in any such criminal proceeding" be "competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife," nor any wife similarly; but nothing here "shall preclude a defendant or the husband or wife of the defendant from becoming a witness, should he or she think fit, in any summary proceeding of a criminal or other nature"; and "no witness in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, whether a party to the suit or not, or the husband or wife of such party, shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery"); § 3 (marital communications; like Eng. St. 1853, c. 83, § 3); § 4 (breach of promise; like Ont. Rev. St. 1897, c. 73, § 6).

NEW BRUNSWICK: Consol. St. 1877, c. 46, § 2 (no person shall be excluded "by reason of incapacity from crime or interest"; the parties and beneficiaries "and the husbands and wives of the parties thereto" shall be "competent and compellable," except as hereafter stated); § 3 (a person charged with "any offence punishable on summary conviction" shall not be "competent or compellable to give evidence for or against himself," nor any person "compellable to answer any question intended to criminate himself"; nor "any husband competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, nor any wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against her husband, in any proceeding upon summary conviction, or in any civil proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery"); § 4 (marital communications; like Eng. St. 1853, c. 83, § 3); § 5 (the foregoing sections shall not apply to any proceeding in a court of common law or matrimonial Court "instituted in consequence of adultery"); St. 1878, c. 27, §§ 1, 2 (in prosecutions for "any fine, penalty, or imprisonment, it shall be competent for the person against whom the proceedings are taken to testify in his own defence"; but he shall not be compellable); § 3 (the foregoing shall "apply to the husband or wife" of the person); St. 1897, c. 29 ("the disability of any husband or wife to give evidence for or against each other in any civil proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery" is abolished; they shall be competent and compellable); St. 1898, c. 22, § 2 ("the person charged and the wife or husband as the case may be of such person" shall be competent, whether charged solely or jointly; but "no husband shall be competent to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during their marriage," and no wife similarly); St. 1902, c. 19, § 11 (In divorce, the judge may permit the plaintiff's examination or cross examination; see also § 2252, post).

Northwest Territories: St. 1901, c. 10, § 1 (rules of the Canada Evidence Act 1893, as now or hereafter amended, made applicable in this jurisdiction; compare ante, § 6).

Nova Scotia: Rev. St. 1900, c. 163, § 34 (no person shall be incompetent "by reason of incapacity from crime or from interest"); § 35 (the parties and beneficiaries and their husbands and wives shall be competent and compellable; provided that no "opposite or interested party" shall obtain a judgment, in any action against "the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of a deceased person," "on his own testimony, or that of his wife, or both of them, in respect to any dealing, transaction, or agreement with the deceased, or in respect to any act, statement, acknowledgment, or admission of the deceased, unless such testimony is corroborated by other material evidence", compare the statutes post, § 2065); § 36 (the preceding shall not apply to any proceeding "instituted by the husband or wife in consequence of adultery"); § 37 (nothing herein shall render any person compellable "to answer any question tending to subject him to criminal proceedings or to prosecution for any penalty"; nor render any person charged in any criminal proceeding with "any offence under the statutes of the province, or the wife or husband of the person so charged, compellable to give evidence against the person so charged"); § 38 (marital communications; like Eng. St. 1853, c. 83, § 3); c. 100, § 164 (in offences concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors, "the person charged or the husband of such person shall be competent and compellable," saving the privilege against self-crimination); St. 1866, c. 13, § 11, in Rev. St 1900, vol. II, p. 864 (in proceedings for divorce by the wife for adultery coupled with cruelty, husband and wife are "competent and compellable to give evidence of or relating to such cruelty").

Ontario: Rev. St. 1897, c. 73, §§ 2, 3 (neither interest nor conviction of crime is to disqualify, and every person shall be admitted notwithstanding interest or conviction); § 4 (parties and beneficiaries shall be competent and compellable, and also their husbands and wives, except as otherwise declared); § 6 (parties to an action for breach of promise of marriage; like Eng. St. 1869, c. 68, § 2); § 7 (proceedings in consequence of adultery; parties and their husbands and wives shall be competent; "provided that in such case the husband or wife, if competent only under and by virtue of this Act, shall not be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless he or she shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery"); § 8 (marital communications; like Eng. St 1853, c. 83, § 3, omitting "to him" in the first clause); § 9 (in trials under any Ontario statute or on the trial of "any such proceeding" before any justice of the peace, mayor, or police magistrate, "the party opposing or defending, or the wife or husband of the person opposing or defending, shall be competent and compellable to give evidence therein"); St. 1903, c. 19, § 711 (in prosecution under the Municipal Act or by-laws of a council or board of police, "the defendant and the wife or husband of such persons opposing or defending shall also be competent witnesses; and all the said persons shall be compellable to give evidence."

Prince Edward Island: St. 1889, c. 9, §§ 3, 4 (incapacity by crime or interest; like Eng. St. 1843, c. 85, without the provisos); § 5 (parties and beneficiaries, and their husbands and wives, are "competent and compellable," except as otherwise declared); § 6 (privilege against self-crimination reserved for all persons); § 7 (breach of promise; like Eng. St. 1869, c. 68, § 2); § 8 (adultery; like ib. § 3, except that the proviso is made applicable only to "the husband or wife if competent only under and by virtue of this Act"); § 9 (marital communications; like Eng. St. 1853, c. 83, § 3); § 10 (the "party opposing or defending, or the wife or husband of such party, shall be competent and compellable" in any proceeding under an act of this Legislature or before a justice of the peace or stipendiary magistrate when the matter is not a crime).

III. United States. Alabama: Code 1897, § 1794 ("In civil suits and proceedings, there must be no exclusion of any witness because he is a party, or interested in the issue tried, except that no person having a pecuniary interest in the result of the suit or the proceeding shall be allowed to testify against the party to whom his interest is opposed, as to any transaction with or statement by the deceased person whose estate is interested in the result of the suit or proceeding, or when such deceased person, at the time of such transaction or statement, acted in any representative or fiduciary relation whatsoever to the party against whom such testimony is sought to be introduced, unless called to testify thereto by the party to whom such interest is opposed, or unless the testimony of such deceased person in relation to such transaction or statement is introduced in evidence by the party whose interest is opposed to that of the witness, or has been taken and is on file in the cause. No person who is an incompetent witness under this section shall make himself competent by transferring his interest to another"); § 1795 ("No objection must be allowed to the competency of a witness because of his conviction for any crime, except perjury or subornation of perjury; but if he has been convicted of other infamous crime, the objection goes to his credibility"); § 5297 ("On the trial of all indictments, complaints, or other criminal proceedings, the person on trial shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness; and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him, nor be the subject of comment by counsel"); § 5298 ("There shall be no exclusion of a witness in a criminal case, because, on conviction of the defendant, he may be entitled to a reward, or to a restoration of property, or to the whole or any part of the fine or penalty inflicted; such objection is addressed to the credibility, not to the competency, of the witness"); § 5301 ("When two or more defendants are jointly indicted, the Court may, at any time before the evidence for the defence has commenced, order any defendant to be discharged from the indictment, in order that he may be a witness for the prosecution; and such order operates as an acquittal of such defendant, provided he does testify"); § 5302 ("When two or more defendants are jointly indicted, the Court may direct a verdict of acquittal to be entered in favor of any one of them, against whom there is not, in the opinion of the Court, evidence sufficient to put him on his defence; and being acquitted, he may be a witness").

ALASKA: C. Cr. P. 1900, §§ 145, 146 (like Or. Annot. C. 1892, §§ 1361, 1362); § 149 (like ib. § 1365, omitting the last words, following "a right to cross-examination"); § 150 (like ib. § 1366); C. C. P. 1900, § 1033 (like Or. Annot. C. 1892, § 710, omitting the first sentence); § 1034 (like ib. § 711, inserting in the first clause, "the transaction and of"); 1900, § 1035 (like ib. § 712, par. 1).

ARIZONA: Revised Statutes, 1887, § 1863 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify on account of color, nor because he is a party to a suit or proceeding or interested in the issue tried, nor because he has been indicted, accused, or convicted of a crime"); § 1864 ("The husband or wife of a party to a suit or proceeding, or who is interested in the issue to be tried, shall not be incompetent to testify therein, except as to confidential communications between such husband and wife, but neither can be examined for or against the other without the consent of the other, but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"); § 1865 ("In actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered, for or against them as such, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the others as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party or required to testify thereto by the Court; and the provisions of this section shall extend to and include all actions by or against the heirs or legal representatives of a decedent arising out of any transaction with such decedent"); § 2037 ("All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding, are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief: although in every case the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question"); § 2038 ("The following persons cannot be witnesses in a criminal action: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"); § 2039 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a criminal action or proceeding, for a crime committed by one against the other"); § 2040 ("A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but if he offer himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the Territory as to all matters about which he was examined in chief. His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him, nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding"); § 2113 ("either party may be a witness" in divorce proceedings); §§ 1648, 1649 (on joint indictment, the Court may, on prosecuting attorney's application, at any time before defendant has gone into his defence, discharge defendant to testify for prosecution; and when the Court believes that there is not sufficient evidence as to one to put him on his defence, it shall order his discharge, before evidence closed, to be witness for co-defendant).

ARKANSAS: Statutes, 1894, § 2908 ("No person shall be rendered incompetent to testify in criminal cases by reason of being the person injured or defrauded, or intended to be injured or defrauded, or because he would be entitled to satisfaction for the injury, or may be liable to pay the costs of prosecution"); § 2909 ("In all cases where two or more persons are jointly or otherwise concerned in the commission of any crime or misdemeanor, either of such persons may be sworn as a witness in relation to such crime or misdemeanor; but the testimony given by such witness shall in no instance be used against him in any criminal prosecution for the same offence"); § 2910 ("On the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness, and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him"); § 2911 ("When two or more persons are indicted in the same indictment, either may testify in behalf of or against the other defendant or defendants"); § 2912 ("All persons now convicted and sentenced, or who may hereafter be convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary of the State of Arkansas, shall be competent witnesses during and after their term of imprisonment, to testify in all prosecutions, suits, or investigations touching the ill treatment of persons convicted of felony and the unsanitary condition of the penitentiary and camps in which said convicts have been or may hereafter be confined, and of the kind and quality of food furnished such convicts"); § 2913 ("The competency of such convicts to testify shall be limited to the matters set out in the preceding section, unless such convicts are pardoned by the governor of the State"); § 2914 ("In civil actions, no witness shall be excluded because he is a party to a suit or interested in the issue to be tried; Provided, in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statements of the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party; Provided further, this section may be amended or repealed by the General Assembly"); § 2915 ("All persons except those enumerated in the next section shall be competent to testify in a civil action"); § 2916 ("The following persons shall be incompetent to testify: First: Persons convicted of a capital offence, or of perjury, subornation of perjury, burglary, robbery, larceny, receiving stolen goods, forgery, or counterfeiting, except by consent of the parties; Second: Infants under the age of ten years, and over that age if incapable of understanding the obligation of an oath; Third: Persons who are of unsound mind at the time of being produced as witnesses; Fourth: Husband and wife, for or against each other, or concerning any communication made by one to the other during the marriage, whether called as a witness while that relation subsists or afterward, but either shall be allowed to testify for the other in regard to any business transacted by the one for the other in the capacity of agent"); § 2917 ("All other objections to witnesses shall go to their credit alone, and be weighed by the jury or tribunal to which their evidence is offered").

CALIFORNIA: Codes 1872, as amended to 1901 inclusive:[1] Code of Civil Procedure, § 1879: "All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although in every case the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, as provided in section 1847"); § 1880 ("The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. 3. Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons on behalf of whom an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person"; the foregoing sub-sect. 3 was replaced in 1901 by the following Commissioners' amendment: "Upon the trial of an action or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding, a party or a person interested in the event, or a person from, through, or under whom such party or interested person derives his interest or title, by assignment or otherwise, or the husband or wife of any such party or person, must not be examined as a witness, in his own behalf or interest, or in behalf of the party succeeding to his title or interest, or in behalf of his or her husband or wife, against the executor, administrator, or survivor of a deceased person, or the guardian of an incompetent person, or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased or incompetent person by assignment or otherwise, as to any matter of fact occurring during the lifetime of such deceased person, or occurring while such incompetent person was competent"); § 1881 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"; for amendments to § 1881, added by the Commissioners in 1901, see post, under the respective privileges involved, as follows: par. 2, attorney and client, post, § 2292; par. 3, priest and penitent, post, § 2394; par. 4, physician and patient, post, § 2380); § 1882 (added by amendment in 1901, deals with implied waiver of privilege; see quotation post, § 2292); Penal Code, § 675 (imprisonment affecting civil rights does not create incompetency as witness in a criminal case); § 1099 ("When two or more persons are included in the same charge, the Court may, at any time before the defendants have gone into their defence, on the application of the district attorney, direct any defendant to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the People"); § 1100 ("When two or more persons are included in the same indictment or information, and the Court is of opinion that in regard to a particular defendant there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, it must order him to be discharged before the evidence is closed, that he may be a witness for his co-defendant"); § 1102 ("The rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in this code"); § 1322 ("Except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties"); § 1323 (if the accused "offer himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief"; "his neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding").

[1] All the Code Commissioners' amendments of 1901 were held unconstitutional and void (on formal grounds affecting the mode of enactment), in Lewis v. Dunne, 134 Cal. 291, 66 Pac. 478; but they have been left here, because they may later be validly enacted.

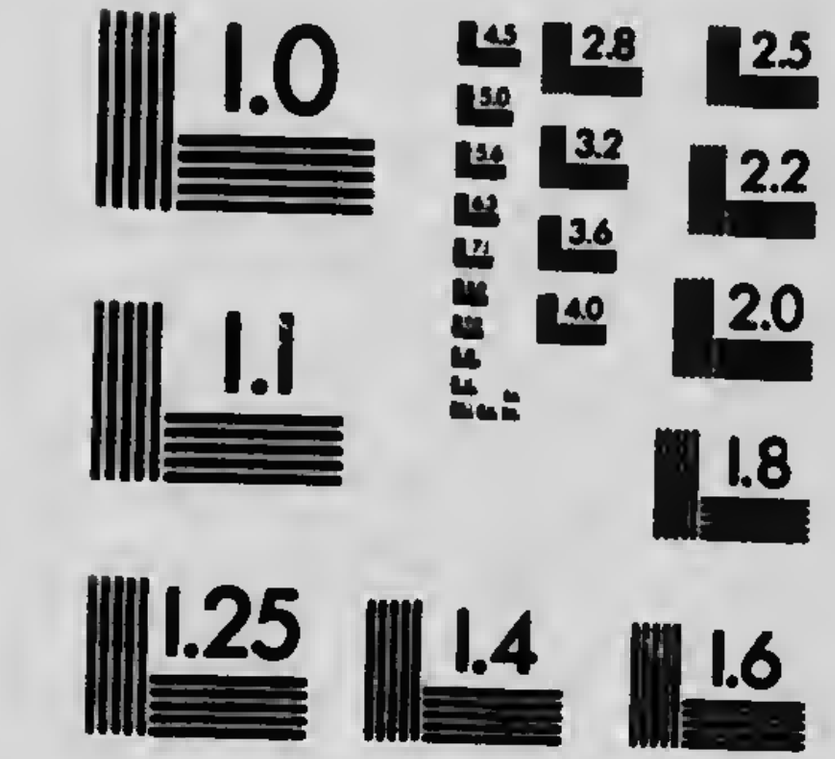
COLORADO: Annotated Statutes, 1891, § 185 (insolvent assignments; debtor's wife may be compelled to testify); § 1168 ("an accessory during the fact shall be a competent witness," unless otherwise disqualified); § 1170 ("The party or parties injured shall in all cases be competent witnesses, unless he, she, or they shall be rendered incompetent by reason of his, her, or their infamy or other legal incompetency other than that of interest. The credibility of all such witnesses shall be left to the jury as in other cases"); § 1171 ("Hereafter in all criminal cases tried in any court of this State, the accused, if he so desire, shall be sworn as a witness in the case, and the jury shall give his testimony such weight as they think it deserves; but in no case shall a neglect or refusal of the accused to testify be taken or considered any evidence of his guilt or innocence"); § 1172 ("Approvers shall not be allowed to give testimony"); § 1173 ("The solemn affirmation of witnesses shall be deemed sufficient"); § 2780 (on preliminary examination, the accused may make statement, under oath or otherwise, "after all witnesses have been heard"); § 3382 (married woman becoming special partner in limited firm "shall be a competent witness for or against her husband, the same as though a femme sole" in all proceedings arising out of partnership); § 4785 ("no person making a claim against the estate of any testator or intestate shall be permitted to prove the same by his or her own oath," except as in § 4782, for uncontested claims); § 4816 ("That no party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, or person directly interested in the event thereof, shall be allowed to testify therein of his own motion, or in his own behalf, by virtue of the foregoing section [now § 4822] when any adverse party sues or defends as the trustee or conservator of an idiot, lunatic, or distracted person, or as the executor or administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee of any deceased person, or as guardian or trustee of any such heir, legatee, or devisee, unless when called as a witness by such adverse party so suing or defending; and also, except in the following cases, namely: First: In any such action, suit, or proceeding, a party or interested person may testify to facts occurring after the death of such deceased person; Second: When in such action, suit, or proceeding, any agent of any deceased person shall, in behalf of any person or persons suing or being sued, in either of the capacities above named, testify to any conversation or transaction between the agent and the opposite party or parties in interest, such party or parties in interest may testify concerning the same conversation or transaction; Third: When in any such action, suit, or proceeding, any such party suing or defending as aforesaid, or any person having a direct interest in the event of such action, suit, or proceeding, shall testify in behalf of such party so suing or defending, to any conversation or transaction with the opposite party or parties in interest, then such opposite party in interest shall also be permitted to testify as to the same conversation or transaction; Fourth: When in any such action, suit, or proceeding, any witness not a party to the record, or not a party in interest, or not an agent of such deceased person, shall in behalf of any party to such action, suit, or proceeding, testify to any conversation or admission by any adverse party or parties in interest, occurring before the death and in the absence of such deceased person, such adverse party or parties in interest may also testify to the same admission or conversation; Fifth: When in any such action, suit, or proceeding, the deposition of such deceased person shall be read in evidence at the trial, any adverse party or parties in interest may testify as to all matters and things testified to in such deposition by such deceased person and not excluded for irrelevancy or incompetency"); § 4818 ("That in any action, suit, or proceeding, by or against any surviving partner or partners, joint contractor or contractors, no adverse party or person adversely interested in the event thereof, shall, by virtue of section one of this act, be rendered a competent witness to testify to any admission or conversation by any deceased partner or joint contractor, unless some one or more of the surviving partners or joint contractors were also present at the time of such admission or conversation"); § 4819 (an assignment or release "made for the purpose of allowing such person to testify" does not make him competent under §§ 4816, 4818); § 4820 (statute is not to affect the law in regard to the settlement of estates of deceased persons, etc., or to the acknowledgment or proof of deeds, or to the attestation of instruments required to be attested); § 4822 ("All persons, without exception, other than those specified in the next three sections, and in the second, third, fourth, seventh, and eighth sections of chapter one hundred and four of the general laws [supra], may be witnesses. Neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event or proceeding shall be excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although in every case the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, as now provided by law; but the conviction of any person for any crime may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of such witness; and the fact of such conviction may be proved like any other fact not of record, either by the witness himself (who shall be compelled to testify thereto), or by any other person cognizant of such conviction, as impeaching testimony or by any other competent testimony"); § 4823 ("The following persons shall not be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined or of relating them truly"); § 4824 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore a person shall not be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband shall not be examined for or against his wife without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent; nor shall either during the marriage or afterward be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"); § 4825 ("If a person offer himself as a witness, that is to be deemed a consent to the examination; also the offer of a wife, husband, attorney, clergyman, physician, or surgeon, as a witness, shall be deemed a consent to the examination within the meaning of the first four subdivisions of the last section"); St. 1893, p. 127, § 3 (in prosecution for failure to support, the wife is competent against the husband without his consent).

COLUMBIA (DISTRICT): Compiled Statutes, 1894, c. 16, § 38 (no person convicted of perjury or subornation of perjury, to be received as witness, unless judgment be reversed); c. 71, § 1 ("The parties thereto, and the persons in whose behalf any such action or proceeding may be brought or defended, and all persons interested in the same, shall, except as provided in the following section, be competent and compellable to give evidence, either viva voce or by deposition, according to the practice of the Court, on behalf of any of the parties to the action or other proceedings"); § 2 ("Nothing in the preceding section shall render any person who is charged with an offence in any criminal proceeding competent or compellable to give evidence for or against himself; or render any person compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself; or render a husband competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, or a wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against her husband, in any criminal proceeding, or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery; nor shall a husband be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, nor shall a wife be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage"); § 5 ("In the Courts of the United States no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried: Provided, that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the Court"); § 7 ("In all judicial proceedings in the District there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color"); § 8 ("In the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, in the United States courts, Territorial courts, and courts-martial, and courts of inquiry, in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, the person so charged shall, at his own request but not otherwise, be a competent witness. And his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him"). The ensuing Code of the District repeals so much of prior statutes as may be inconsistent with it: Code 1901, § 1063 ("Except as herein elsewhere provided, no person shall be incompetent to testify in any civil action or proceeding by reason of his being a party thereto or interested in the result thereof; but if otherwise competent to testify, he shall be competent to give evidence in his own behalf and competent and compellable to give evidence on behalf of any other party to such action or proceeding"); § 1064 ("If one of the original parties to a transaction or contract has since the date thereof died or become insane or otherwise incapable of testifying in relation thereto, the other party thereto shall not be allowed to testify as to any transaction or declaration or admission of the said deceased or otherwise incapable party in any action between said other party, or any person claiming under him, and the executors, administrators, trustees, heirs, devisees, assignees, committee, or other person legally representing the deceased or otherwise incapable party, unless he be first called upon to testify in relation to said transaction or declaration or admission by the other party, or the opposite party first testify in relation to the same, or unless the transaction or contract was made or had with an agent of the said deceased or otherwise incapable party, and the said agent testifies in relation thereto, or unless called to testify thereto by the Court"); § 1066 ("Where any of the original parties to a transaction or contract which is the subject of investigation are partners or other joint contractors, or jointly entitled or liable, and some of them have died, or otherwise become incapable of testifying, any others with whom the contract or transaction was personally made or had, or in whose presence or with whose privity it was made or had, or admissions in relation to the same were made, shall not, nor shall the adverse party, be incompetent to testify because some of the parties or joint contractors, or those jointly entitled or liable, have died or otherwise become incapable of testifying"); § 1067 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify, in either civil or criminal proceedings, by reason of his having been convicted of crime other than perjury, but such fact may be given in evidence to affect his credit as a witness, either upon the cross-examination of the witness or by evidence aliunde; and the party cross examining him shall not be concluded by his answers as to such matters. In order to prove such conviction of crime it shall not be necessary to produce the whole record of the proceedings containing such conviction, but the certificate, under seal, of the clerk of the court wherein such proceedings were had, stating the fact of the conviction and for what cause, shall be sufficient"); § 1068 ("In both civil and criminal proceedings, husband and wife shall be competent but not compellable to testify for or against each other"); § 1069 ("In neither civil nor criminal proceedings shall a husband or wife be competent to testify as to any confidential communications made by one to the other during the marriage").

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

CONNECTICUT: General Statutes, 1887, § 1094 ("In actions by or against the representatives of deceased persons, the entries, memoranda, and declarations of the deceased, relevant to the matter in issue, may be received as evidence; and in actions by or against the representatives of deceased persons, in which any trustee or receiver is an adverse party, the testimony of the deceased, relevant to the matter in issue, given at his examination, upon the application of said trustee or receiver, shall be received in evidence"); § 1097 ("A wife shall be a competent witness against her husband in any action brought against him for necessaries furnished her while living apart from him"); § 1098 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any action by reason of his interest in the event of the same as a party or otherwise, or of his disbelief in the existence of a Supreme Being, or of his conviction of crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credit"); § 1099 (Any party to a civil action may compel any adverse party or "any person for whose immediate and adverse benefit" the action was begun, etc., to testify; but not compel both discovery and testimony from the same party); § 1623 ("Any person on trial for crime shall be a competent witness, and at his or her option may testify or refuse to testify, upon such trial, and if such person has a husband or wife, he or she shall be a competent witness, but may elect or refuse to testify for or against the accused, except that a wife when she has received personal violence from her husband, may, upon his trial therefor, be compelled to testify in the same manner as any other witness. The neglect, or refusal, of an accused party to testify shall not be commented upon to the Court or jury").

DELAWARE: Revised Statutes, 1893, c. 107, § 4 ("In criminal prosecutions, a free negro or free mulatto, if otherwise competent, may testify, if it shall appear to the Court that no competent white witness was present at the time the fact charged is alleged to have been committed; or that a white witness, being so present, has since died or is absent from the State and cannot be produced; provided that no free negro or free mulatto shall be admitted as witness to charge a white man with being the father of a bastard child"); Laws (vol. 11), 1859, c. 598, § 1 ("A party to the record in any action or judicial proceeding, or a person for whose immediate benefit such proceeding is prosecuted or defended, may be examined as if under cross examination, at the instance of the adverse party, or any of them, and for that purpose may be compelled in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness to testify; but the party calling for such examination shall not be excluded [concluded?] thereby, but may rebut his testimony by other evidence"); § 2 ("A party proposing to examine a party adverse in interest may have the same process and means of compelling attendance and response as the law provides in the case of ordinary witnesses"); § 3 ("No person shall be excluded from testifying as a witness by reason of his having been convicted of a felony, but evidence of the fact may be given to affect his credibility"); Laws 1873, c. 550, § 10 ("It shall and may be lawful for husband and wife to testify in all civil actions in which either or both are or may be parties to the suit"); Laws (vol. 16), 1881, c. 537, § 1 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify in any civil action or proceeding whether at law or in equity, because he is a party to the record or interested in the event of the suit or matter to be determined; provided that in actions or proceedings by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment or decree may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party"); Laws (vol. 19), 1893, c. 777, § 1 ("Each and every person accused, or who shall be accused, of any felony, misdemeanor, or offence whatsoever, punishable by the laws of this State, now or hereafter in force, shall, upon his or her trial before any tribunal established by the Constitution or laws of this State, have the right to testify in his or her own behalf, and shall also have the right to testify for or against any other person or persons jointly tried with him or her; provided, however, that a refusal to testify shall not be construed or commented upon as an indication of guilt").

FLORIDA: Revised Statutes, 1892, § 1095 ("No person, in any Court or before any officer acting judicially, shall be excluded from testifying as a witness, by reason of his interest in the event of the action or proceeding, or because he is a party thereto; provided, however, that no party to such action or proceeding, nor any person interested in the event thereof, nor any person from, through, or under whom, any such party or interested person derives any interest or title by assignment or otherwise, shall be examined as a witness in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, insane, or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such deceased person, or the assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic; but this prohibition shall not extend to any transaction or communication as to which any such executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, survivor, or committeeman shall be examined on his own behalf, or as to which the testimony of such deceased person or lunatic shall be given in evidence"); § 1096 ("Persons who have been convicted in any Court in this State of murder, perjury, piracy, forgery, larceny, robbery, arson, sodomy, or buggery, shall not be competent witnesses. Even a pardon of a person convicted of perjury shall not render him competent. Such conviction may be proved by questioning the proposed witness, or if he deny it, by producing a record of his conviction"; see St. 1901, infra); § 1097 ("Testimony as to the general character, and an admission of proof, as provided in § 1096, of the conviction of any witness who shall have been convicted in this State of any crime other than those mentioned in said section, or who shall have been convicted of any crime in any other State, may be given in evidence to affect his credibility"); § 1808 (executor's oath not admitted to prove will, if he is "interested in the estate therein bequeathed, or any part thereof"); §§ 2321, 2322 (disputed ownership of live stock in certain cases, must be proved "by disinterested testimony"); § 2863 ("The provisions of law relative to the competency of witnesses in civil cases shall obtain also in criminal cases"); § 2905 ("Approvers shall not be admitted in any case whatever"); § 2908 ("In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right of making a statement to the jury, under oath, of the matter of his defence or her defence"; see St. 1895, infra); St. 1891, c. 4029 ("In the trial of civil actions in this State, neither the husband nor the wife shall be excluded as witnesses, where either the said husband or wife is an interested party to the suit pending"); St. 1895, c. 4400 ("In all criminal prosecutions the accused may at his option be sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and shall in such case be subject to examination as other witnesses"); St. 1901, c. 4966 ("No person shall be disqualified to testify . . . by reason of conviction of any crime except perjury").

GEORGIA: Code, 1895, § 5198 (1) ("Communications between husband and wife," excluded); § 5268 ("Religious belief goes only to the credit"); § 5269 ("No person offered as a witness shall be excluded, by reason of incapacity for crime or interest, or from being a party, from giving evidence, either in person or by deposition [in any court or proceeding] . . .; but every person so offered shall be competent and compellable to give evidence on behalf of either or any of the parties to the said suit, action, or other proceeding, except as follows: 1. Where any suit is instituted or defended by a person insane at the time of trial, or by an indorsee, assignee, transferee, or by the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor against the insane or deceased person, as to transactions or communications with such insane or deceased person 2. Where any suit is instituted or defended by partners, persons jointly liable, or interested, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor as to transactions or communications solely with an insane or deceased partner, or person jointly liable or interested. 3. Where any suit is instituted or defended by a corporation, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own behalf to transactions or communications solely with a deceased or insane officer or agent of the corporation. 4. Where a person not a party, but a person interested in the result of the suit, is offered as a witness, he shall not be competent to testify, if, as a party to the cause, he would for any cause be incompetent. 5. No agent or attorney-at-law of the surviving or sane party, at the time of the transaction testified about, shall be allowed to testify in favor of a surviving or sane party, under circumstances where the principal, a party to the cause, could not testify; nor can a surviving party or agent testify in his own favor, or in favor of a surviving or sane party, as to transactions or communications with a deceased or insane agent, under circumstances where such witness would be incompetent if deceased agent had been principal. 6. In all cases where the personal representative of the deceased or insane party has introduced a witness interested in the event of a suit, who has testified as to transactions or communications on the part of the surviving agent or party with a deceased or insane party or agent, the surviving party or his agent may be examined in reference to such facts testified to by said witness"; amended by Acts 1900, p. 57, Van Epps' Suppl. § 6200, by adding: "whether such transactions or communications were had by such insane or deceased person with the party testifying or with any other person"); Acts 1897, p. 53, Van Epps' Suppl. § 6222: ("When suit is instituted against joint defendants, one of whom is the representative of an insane or deceased person, the sane or living party defendant shall not be admitted to testify as to any transaction or communication with the insane or deceased party, when his evidence would tend to relieve or modify the liability of the party offered as a witness and tend to make the estate of said insane or deceased party primarily liable for the debt or default"); Code 1895, § 5270 ("There shall be no other exceptions allowed under the foregoing paragraphs"); § 5272 ("Nothing contained in section 5269 shall apply to any action, suit, or proceeding in any Court, instituted in consequence of adultery, or to any action for breach of promise of marriage"); § 5273 ("Persons who have not the use of reason, as idiots, lunatics during lunacy, and children who do not understand the nature of an oath, are incompetent witnesses"); § 5274 ("Drunkenness, which dethrones reason and memory, incapacitates during its continuance"); § 5275 ("No physical defects in any of the senses incapacitates a witness. An interpreter may explain his evidence"); § 5276 ("The Court must, by examination, decide upon the capacity of one alleged to be incompetent from idiocy, lunacy, or insanity, or drunkenness, or childhood"); Criminal Code, 1895, §§ 1010, 1011 ("In all criminal trials the prisoner shall have the right to make to the Court and jury such statement in the case as he may deem proper in his defence. It shall not be under oath, and shall have such force only as the jury may think right to give it. They may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the cause"; but in so making a statement, he is not compellable "to answer any questions on cross-examination, should he think proper to decline to answer"; "no person, who in any criminal proceeding is charged with the commission of any indictable offence, or any offence punishable on summary conviction, is competent or compellable to give evidence for or against himself"); § 1011 (4) ("Husband and wife shall not be competent or compellable to give evidence in any criminal proceeding for or against each other, except that the wife shall be competent, but not compellable, to testify against her husband, upon his trial for any criminal offence committed, or attempted to have been committed, upon her person. She is also a competent witness to testify for or against her husband, in cases of abandonment of his child, as provided for in § 114 of this Code");

§ 114 (as above); § 104 (wife to be a "competent witness," when husband is tried for maltreatment of wife); § 910 (accused's statement before a magistrate, regulated).

Hawaii: Civil Laws, 1897, § 1412 ("No person offered as a witness shall hereafter be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime (perjury or subornation of perjury only excepted) or interest, from giving evidence. . . . But every person so offered may and shall be admitted to give evidence, notwithstanding that such person may or shall have an interest in the matter in question, or in the event of the trial of any issue, matter, question or inquiry, or of the suit, action or proceeding in which he is offered as a witness, and notwithstanding that such person offered as a witness may have been previously convicted of any crime or offence except as aforesaid"); § 1413 (". . . It shall be lawful for such Court or person to receive the evidence of any minor, notwithstanding he may be destitute of the knowledge of God and of any belief in religion or in a future state of rewards and punishments. Provided always, that the evidence of such minor shall be given upon his affirmation or declaration to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, or in such other form as may be approved of and allowed by such Court or person as first aforesaid, and after he shall have been cautioned by such Court or person that he will incur and be liable to punishment if he do not tell the truth. Provided also, that no such evidence shall in any case be received unless it shall be proved to the satisfaction of such Court or such person, that such minor perfectly understands the nature and object of such declaration or affirmation as aforesaid, and the purpose for which his testimony is required"); § 1414 (". . . Parties thereto, and the party on whose behalf any such action, suit, or proceeding may be brought or defended, and the husbands and wives of such parties and persons respectively shall (except as hereinafter excepted) be competent and compellable to give evidence, either in person or by deposition, according to the practice of the Court, on behalf of either or any of the [parties to the (?)] said suit, action or proceeding"); § 1415 ("The defendant in any criminal proceeding may give evidence on his own behalf, and thereupon be subject to cross-examination in like manner as any other witness, but in case any such person shall neglect or decline to offer himself as a witness, no inference shall be drawn prejudicial to such accused by reason of such neglect or refusal, nor shall any argument be permitted tending to injure the defence of such accused person on account of such failure to offer himself as witness"); § 1416 ("Nothing herein contained shall render any person who in any criminal proceeding is charged with the commission of any indictable offence, or any offence punishable on summary conviction, compellable to give evidence for or against himself; or (except as hereinafter mentioned) shall render any person compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself, or shall in any criminal proceeding render any husband competent or compellable to give evidence against his wife, or any wife competent or compellable to give evidence against her husband, except in such cases where such evidence may now be given; provided also that in all criminal proceedings the husband or wife of the party accused shall be a competent witness for the defence"); § 1417 ("No husband shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, and no wife shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage"); § 1955 (in divorce, the Court may in discretion "examine either or both of the parties upon oath, in order to prevent collusion").

Idaho: Revised Statutes, 1887, § 5956 ("All persons without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although in every case the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his character for truth, honesty, or integrity, or his motives, or by contradictory evidence; and the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility"); § 5957 ("The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. 3. Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or an administrator, upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person"); § 5958 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by violence of one against the person of the other"); §§ 7861, 7862 (like Cal. P. C. §§ 1099, 1100); § 8141 ("The rules for determining the competency of witnesses in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions and proceedings, except as otherwise provided in this Code"); § 8142 ("Except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife are competent witnesses for or against each other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties"); § 8143 ("A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding to which he is a party, is not, without his consent, a competent witness for or against himself. His neglect or refusal to give such consent shall not in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding").

ILLINOIS: Revised Statutes, 1874, c. 17, § 6, as amended (in bastardy trials, "the mother and defendant" are competent); c. 38, § 35 (when a witness is released by Court order from liability to prosecution, and compelled to testify, "the defendant shall also at his own request be deemed a competent witness"; but no inference shall be drawn, as in ib. § 426); c. 38, § 426 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal case or proceeding by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his having been convicted of any crime, but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility; provided, however, that a defendant in any criminal case or proceeding shall only at his own request be deemed a competent witness, and his neglect to testify shall not create any presumption against him, nor shall the Court permit any reference or comment to be made to or upon such neglect"); c. 38, § 491, St. 1893, June 17 (the wife to be competent in any case against the husband under the statute punishing abandonment of family, "as to any and all matters relevant thereto, including the fact of such marriage and the parentage of such children"); St. 1901, May 11, § 3 (in prosecutions for abandonment of wife or child, "such husband or wife shall be a competent witness to testify in any case brought against the one or the other under this act, and to any and all matters relevant thereto, including the facts of such marriage and the parentage of such child or children"); Rev. St. c. 51, § 1 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil action, suit, or proceeding, except as hereinafter stated, by reason of his or her interest in the event thereof, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his or her conviction of any crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of such witness; and the fact of such conviction may be proven like any fact not of record, either by the witness himself (who shall be compelled to testify thereto) or by any other witness cognizant of such conviction, as impeaching testimony, or by any other competent evidence"); § 2 ("No party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, or person directly interested in the event thereof, shall be allowed to testify therein of his own motion, or in his own behalf, by virtue of the foregoing section, when any adverse party sues or defends as the trustee or conservator of any idiot, habitual drunkard, lunatic, or distracted person, or as the executor, administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee of any deceased person, or as guardian or trustee of any such heir, legatee, or devisee, unless when called as a witness by such adverse party so suing or defending, and also except in the following cases, namely: — First. In any such action, suit, or proceeding, a party or interested person may testify to facts occurring after the death of such deceased person, or after the wards, heir, legatee, or devisee shall have attained his or her majority. Second. When, in such action, suit, or proceeding, any agent of any deceased person shall, in behalf of any person or persons suing or being sued, in either of the capacities above named, testify to any conversation or transaction between such agent and the opposite party or party in interest, such opposite party or party in interest may testify concerning the same conversation or transaction. Third. Where, in any such action, suit, or proceeding, any such party suing or defending, as aforesaid, or any person having a direct interest in the event of such action suit, or proceeding, shall testify in behalf of such party so suing or defending, to any conversation or transaction with the opposite party or party in interest, then such opposite party or party in interest shall also be permitted to testify as to the same conversation or transaction. Fourth. Where, in any such action, suit, or proceeding, any witness, not a party to the record, or not a party in interest, or not an agent of such deceased person, shall, in behalf of any party to such action, suit, or proceeding, testify to any conversation or admission by any adverse party or party in interest, occurring before the death and in the absence of such deceased person, such adverse party or party in interest may also testify as to the same admission or conversation. Fifth. Where, in any such action, suit, or proceeding, the deposition of such deceased person shall be read in evidence at the trial, any adverse party or party in interest may testify as to all matters and things testified to in such deposition by such deceased person, and not excluded for irrelevancy or incompetency"); § 4 ("In any action, suit, or proceeding, by or against any surviving partner or partners, joint contractor or contractors, no adverse party, or party adversely interested in the event thereof, shall, by virtue of section 1 of this Act, be rendered a competent witness, to testify to any admission or conversation, by any deceased partner or joint contractor, unless some one or more of the surviving partners or joint contractors were also present at the time of such admission or conversation; and in every action, suit, or proceeding, a party to the same, who has contracted with an agent of the adverse party, the agent having since died, shall not be a competent witness, as to any conversation or transaction between himself and such agent, except where the conditions are such, that under the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this Act, he would have been permitted to testify, if the deceased person had been a principal and not an agent"; amended by St. 1899, April 24, by inserting after "such agent," the words, "unless such admission or conversation with the said deceased agent was had or made in the presence of a surviving agent or agents of such adverse party, and then only"); § 5 ("No husband or wife shall, by virtue of section 1 of this Act, be rendered competent to testify for or against each other as to any transaction or conversation, occurring during the marriage, whether called as a witness during the existence of the marriage, or after its dissolution, except in cases where the wife would, if unmarried, be plaintiff or defendant, or where the cause of action grows out of a personal wrong or injury done by one to the other or grows out of the neglect of the husband to furnish the wife with a suitable support; and except in cases where the litigation shall be concerning the separate property of the wife, and suits for divorce; and except also in actions upon policies of insurance of property, so far as relates to the amount and value of the property alleged to be injured or destroyed, or in actions against carriers, so far as relates to the loss of property and the amount and value thereof, or in all matters of business transactions where the transaction was had and conducted by such married woman as the agent of her husband, in all of which cases the husband and wife may testify for or against each other, in the same manner as other parties may, under the provisions of this act. Provided, that nothing in this section contained shall be construed to authorize or permit any such husband or wife to testify to any admissions or conversations of the other, whether made by him to her or by her to him, or by either to third persons, except in suits or causes between such husband and wife"); § 6 ("Any party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, may compel any adverse party or person for whose benefit such action, suit, or proceeding is brought, instituted, prosecuted, or defended, to testify as a witness at the trial, or by deposition, taken as other depositions are by law required, in the same manner, and subject to the same rules, as other witnesses"); § 7 ("In any civil action, suit, or proceeding, no person who would, if a party thereto, be incompetent to testify therein, under the provisions of sections 2 or 3, shall become competent by reason of any assignment or release of his claim, made for the purpose of allowing such person to testify"); § 8 (nothing in this act is to affect the law as to the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, incapables, etc., or the proof of conveyances for record, or the attestation of instruments required to be attested).

INDIANA: Revised Statutes, 1897, § 507 (6) ("Husband and wife, as to communications made to each other," shall not be competent); § 509 ("All persons, whether parties to or interested in the suit, shall be competent witnesses in a civil action or proceeding, except as herein otherwise provided"); § 510 ("The following persons shall not be competent witnesses: First: Persons insane at the time they are offered as witnesses, whether they have been so adjudged or not; Second: Children under ten years of age, unless it appears that they understand the nature and obligation of an oath); § 511 ("In suits or proceedings in which an executor or administrator is a party, involving matters which occurred during the lifetime of the decedent, where a judgment or allowance may be made or rendered for or against the estate represented by such executor or administrator, any person who is a necessary party to the issue or record, whose interest is adverse to such estate, shall not be a competent witness as to such matters against such estate: Provided, however, that in cases where a deposition of such decedent has been taken, or he has previously testified as to the matter, and his testimony or deposition can be used as evidence for such executor or administrator, such adverse party shall be a competent witness for himself, but only as to any matters embraced in such deposition or testimony"); § 512 ("In all suits by or against heirs or devisees, founded on a contract with or demand against the ancestor, to obtain title to or obtain possession of property, real or personal, of, or in right of, such ancestor, or to affect the same in any manner, neither party to such suit shall be a competent witness as to any matter which occurred prior to the death of the ancestor"); § 513 ("When in any case an agent of a decedent shall testify on behalf of an executor, administrator, or heirs, concerning any transaction, as having been had by him, as such agent, with a party to the suit, his assignor or grantor, and in the absence of the decedent; or if any witness shall, on behalf of the executor, administrator, or heirs, testify to any conversation or admission of a party to the suit, his assignor or grantor, as having been had or made in the absence of the deceased; then the party against whom such evidence is adduced, his assignor or grantor, shall be competent to testify concerning the same matter. No person who shall have acted as an agent in the making or continuing of a contract with any person who may have died, shall be a competent witness in any suit upon or involving such contract, as to matters occurring prior to the death of such decedent, on behalf of the principal to such contract, against the legal representatives or heirs of the decedent, unless he shall be called by such heirs or legal representatives. And in such case he shall be a competent witness only as to matters concerning which he is interrogated by such heirs or representatives. When, in any case, a person shall be charged with unlawfully taking or detaining personal property, or having done damage thereto, and such person by his pleading shall defend on the ground that he is executor, administrator, guardian, or heir, and as such has taken or detains the property, or has done the acts charged, then no person shall be competent to testify who would not be competent if the person so defending were the complainant; but when the person complaining cannot testify, then the party so defending shall also be excluded"); § 514 ("When the husband or wife is a party, and not a competent witness in his or her own behalf, the other shall also be excluded; except that the husband shall be a competent witness in a suit for the seduction of his wife, but she shall not be competent"); § 515 ("In all cases in which executors, administrators, heirs, or devisees are parties, and one of the parties to the suit shall be incompetent, as hereinbefore provided, to testify against them, then the assignor or grantor of a party making such assignment or grant voluntarily shall be deemed a party adverse to the executor or administrator, heir, or devisee, as the case may be; Provided, however, that in all cases referred to in sections 276, 277, 278, and 279 of said act — said sections being numbered in the Revised Statutes of 1881, 498, 499, 500, and 501 — any party to such suit shall have the right to call and examine any party adverse to him as a witness, or the Court may, in its discretion, require any party to a sult, or nther person, tn testify, and any abuse of sueh discretion shall be renewnble (reviewable!) on appeal"); § 516 ("In all actions by an executor or administrator on contracts assigned to the decedent, when the assignor is alive and a competent witness in the cnuse, the executor or administrator and the defendant or defendnnts shall be compe'ent witnesses as to all matters which occurred between the assignor and the defendant or defendnnts, prior to notice of such assignment. In all questions nffecting the credibility of a witness, his general moral character may be given in evidence"); [Criminal cases:] § 1889 ("The following persons nre competent witnesses: First. All persons who are competent to testify in civil actions. Second. The party injured by the offence committed. Third. Accomplices, when they consent to testify. Fourth. The defendant, to testify in his own behalf. But if the defendant do not testify, his failnre to do so shall not be commented upon or referred to in the argument of the cause, nor commented upon, referred to, or in any manner considered by the jury trying the same; and it shall be the dnty of the Court, in snch case, in its charge, to instruct the jury as to their duty under the provisions of this section"); § 1895 ("When two or more persons are inclnded in one prosecntion, the Court may, at any time before the defendnnt has gone into his defence, direct any defendant to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the State. A defendant may also, when there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, at any time before the evidence is closed, be discharged by the Court fnr the purpose of giving testimony for n co defendnnt"); St. 1903, c. 39 ("in nl. suits by or against any person adjudged to be a person of unsonnd mind and under guardianship, or against his guardian, founded upon any contract with or demand against said ward, or in any suit to obtain possession of the real or personal property of said ward, or to affect the same in any manner, neither party to said transaction shall be a competent witness to any matter which occnrred prior to the appointment of said guardian; provided however that if the party to said transaction nnder guardianship should be adjudged by the Court competent to testify, then the other party to said suit shall not be excluded; provided further that the provisions of this act shall not apply to any ense where a person has been adjudged to be of unsonnd mind before the taking effect of this act, nor to any contract made or transaction had before the taking effect of this act; also provided that in all cases contemplated by this act either party to such suit shall have the right to call and examine any party adverse to him as a witness, or the Court may in its discretion require any party to sueh suit or other person to testify, and any abuse of sneh discretion shall be reviewable on appeal").

Indian Territory: the statutes of Arkansas, as specified, are declnred to be here in force, by U. S. St. 1890, May 2, 26 Stat. L. 94, § 31.

Iowa: Constitution, 1857, Art. I, § 4 ("Any party to any judicial proceeding shall have the right to nse as a witness, or take the testimony of, any other person, not disqualified on account of interest, who may be cognizant of any fact mnterinl to the case; and parties to suits may be witnesses, as provided by law"); Annotated Code, 1897, § 4601 ("Every human being of sufficient capncity to nnderstand the obligation of an oath is a competent witness in nll cases, both civil nnd criminal, except as herein otherwise declared"); § 4602 ("Facts which have heretofnre caused the exclnsion of testimony may still be shown for the pnrpose of lessening its credibility"); § 4603 ("No person offered as n witness in any netion or proceeding in any Court, or before any officer acting judicinlly, shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event nf the action or proceeding, or becnuse he is a party thereto, except as provided in this chapter"); § 4604 ("No party to any action or proceeding, nor any person interested in the event thereof, nor any person from, through, or nnder whom any such party or interested person derives any interest or title by assignment or otherwise, and no husband or wife of any said party or person, shall be examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the commencement of such exnmination, deceased, insane, or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of sneh deceased person, or the nssignee or guardian of such insane person or lunatic. But this prohibition shall not extend to any transaction or communication as to which any such executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, survivor, or guardinn shall be examined in his own behalf, or as to which the testimony of such deceased or insane person or lunatic shall be given in evidence"); § 4606 ("Neither the husband nor wife shall in any case be a witness against the other, except in a criminal prosecntion for a crime committed by one against the other, or in a civil action or proceeding one against the other, or in a civil action by one agnir a third party for alienating the affections of the other; bnt they may in all civil and criminal cases be witnesses for each other"); amended by St. 1898, 27th Gen. Ass., c. 108, § 1 (by inserting after "affections of the other," the words "or in any civil action brought by a judgment creditor against either the husband or the wife, to set aside a conveyance of property from one to the other on the ground of want of consideration or fraud, and to subject the same to the payment of his judgment"); § 4607 ("Neither husband nor wife can be examined in any case as to any communication made to the one by the other while married, nor shall they, after the marriage relation ceases, be permitted to reveal in testimony any sneh communication made while the marriage snbsisted"); § 5484 ("Defendants in all criminal proceedings shall be competent witnesses in their own behalf, bnt cannot be called as witnesses by the State; and shonld a defendant not elect to become a witness, this fact shall not have any weight against him on the trial, nor shall the attorney or attorneys for the State, during the trial, refer to the fact that the defendnnt did not testify in his own behalf; and should they do so, sueh attorney or attorneys will be guilty of a misdemeanor, and defendant shall for that cause alone be entitled to a new trial"); § 5485 (defendant taking the stand "shall be subject to cross-examination as an ordinary witness, but the State shall be strictly confined therein to the matters testified to in the examination in chief").

KANSAS: General Statutes, 1897, c. 95, § 330 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil action or proceeding by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his conviction of a crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility"); § 331 ("Nothing in the preceding section contained shall in any manner affect the laws now existing relating to the settlement of estates of deceased persons, infants, idiots, or luantics, or the attestation of the execution of last wills and testaments, or of conveyances of real estate, or of any other instrument required by law to be attested"); § 333 ("No party shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by such party with a deceased person, when the adverse party is the executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignee of such deceased person, where they have acquired title to the cause of action immediately from such deceased person; nor shall the assignor of a thing in action be allowed to testify in behalf of such party concerning any transaction or communication had personally by such assignor with a deceased person in any such case; nor shall such party or assignor be competent to testify to any transaction had personally by such party or assignor with a deceased partner or joint contractor in the absence of his surviving partner or joint contractor, when such surviving partner or joint contractor is an adverse party. If the testimony of a party to the action or proceeding has been taken, and he afterward die, and the testimony so taken shall be used after his death in behalf of his executors, administrators, heirs-at-law, next of kin, assignee, surviving partner, or joint contractor, the other party or the assignor shall be competent to testify as to any and all matters to which the testimony so taken relates"); § 334 ("The following persons shall be incompetent to testify: First, persons who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination; second, children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly; third, husband and wife, for or against each other, except concerning transactions in which one acted as the agent of the other, or when they are joint parties and have a joint interest in the action; but in no case shall either be permitted to testify concerning any communication made by one to the other during the marriage, whether called while that relation subsisted or afterward; and provided that in all actions for divorce hereafter to be tried, the parties thereto, or either of them, shall be competent to testify upon all material matters involved in the controversy to the same extent as other witnesses might do"); c. 96, § 59 (parties to be competent in divorce cases like other witnesses); c. 102, § 217 ("No person shall be rendered incompetent to testify in criminal causes by reason of his being the person injured or defrauded, or intended to be injured or defrauded, or that would be entitled to satisfaction for the injury or is liable to pay the costs of the prosecution; or by reason of his being the person on trial or examination; or by reason of being the husband or wife of the accused; but any such facts may be shown for the purpose of affecting his or her credibility; provided, that no person on trial or examination, nor wife or husband of such person, shall be required to testify except as a witness on behalf of the person on trial or examination"); § 218 ("The neglect or refusal of the person on trial to testify, or of a wife to testify on behalf of her husband, shall not raise any presumption of guilt, nor shall that circumstance be referred to by any attorney prosecuting in the case, nor shall the same be considered by the Court or jury before whom the trial takes place"); § 264 (prosecution of two or more; Court may order any defendant discharged to be a witness for the State, at any time before "the defendant" has gone into his defence; when there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, he may be discharged to testify for co-defendant, at any time before close of evidence); St. 1903, cc. 387, 388 (in divorce and alimony, "the parties thereto, or either of them, shall be competent to testify upon all material matters involved in the controversy to the same extent as other witnesses might do"; St. 1897, c. 125, is repealed; the above is substituted for C. C. P. § 651*a* and Gen. St. 1901, § 547).

KENTUCKY: Statutes, 1899, § 1180 (conviction for false swearing or subornation of perjury, or for falsely making certain affidavits and reports, disqualifies "from giving evidence in any judicial proceeding or from being a witness in any case whatever"); § 1645 ("In all criminal and penal prosecutions now pending or hereafter instituted in any of the courts of this Commonwealth, the defendant on trial, on his own request, shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf, but the failure to do so shall not be commented on or be allowed to create any presumption against him"); § 1646 ("The defendant requesting that he be allowed to testify shall not be allowed to testify in chief, after any other witness has testified for the defence"); § 1648 ("If a conspiracy is charged in the indictment and proven to the satisfaction of the Court, then each defendant named in the indictment may testify on his own behalf as above provided"); § 1973 (the person against whom a witness testifies in gaming prosecutions is not competent to prove prior gaming against the witness); § 4838 (no executor to be as such incompetent for or against a will); Civil Code of Practice, 1895, § 605 ("Subject to the exceptions and modifications contained in section six hundred and six, every person is competent to testify for himself or another, unless he be found by the Court incapable of understanding the facts concerning which his testimony is offered"); § 606 ("(1) Neither a husband nor his wife shall testify, even after the cessation of their marriage, concerning any communication between them during marriage. Nor shall either of them testify against the other. Nor shall either of them testify for the other, except in an action for lost baggage or its value against a common carrier, an innkeeper, or a wrongdoer, and in such action either or both of them may testify; and except in actions which might have been brought by or against the wife, if she had been unmarried, and in such actions either but not both of them may testify; (2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section seven of this section, no person shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, or any transaction with, or any act done or omitted to be done by, an infant under fourteen years of age, or by one who is of unsound mind or dead when the testimony is offered to be given, except for the purpose and to the extent of affecting one who is living, and who, when above fourteen years of age and of sound mind heard such statement, or was present when such transaction took place, or when such act was done or omitted, unless (a) the infant or his guardian shall have testified against such person with reference to such statement, transaction, or act; or (b) the person of unsound mind shall, when of sound mind, have testified against such person with reference thereto; or (c) the decedent, or a representative of or some one interested in his estate, shall have testified against such person, with reference thereto; or (d) an agent of the decedent or person of unsound mind, with reference to such act or transaction, shall have testified against such person with reference thereto, or be living when such person offers to testify with reference thereto. (3) No person shall testify for himself against a party who is not before the Court otherwise than by constructive service of a summons. (4) No person shall testify for himself in chief in an ordinary action, after introducing other evidence for himself in chief; nor in an equitable action after taking other testimony for himself in chief; . . . (6) If the right of a person to testify for himself be founded upon the fact that one who is dead or of unsound mind has testified against him, the testimony of such person shall be confined to the facts or transactions to which the adverse testimony related. (7) A person may testify for himself as to the correctness of original entries made by him against persons who are under no disability — other than coverture, or infancy and coverture combined — in an account-book according to the usual course of business, though the person against whom they were made may have died or become of unsound mind; but no person shall testify for himself concerning entries in a book, or the contents or purport of any writing, under the control of himself, or of himself and others jointly, if he refuse or fail to produce such book or writing and to make it subject to the order of the Court for the purposes of the action, if required to do so by the party against whom he offers to testify. (8) No prisoner in a penitentiary of this State or of any other country shall testify; nor shall any person testify for himself against such prisoner. (9) The assignment of a claim by a person who is incompetent to testify for himself shall not make him competent to testify for another. (10) A party may compel an adverse party to testify as any other witness. (11) None of the preceding provisions of this section apply to affidavits for provisional remedies, or to affidavits of claimants against the estates of deceased or insolvent persons, or affect the competency of attesting witnesses of instruments which are required by law to be attested"); foregoing § 606 amended by St. 1898, c. 1, as follows: par. 1, (by substituting " while the marriage exists or afterwards," for "even after the cessation of their marriage"; and by adding at the end, "and except that when a husband or wife is acting as agent for his or her consort either of them may testify as to any matter connected with such agency"); par. 3 (omitted); par. 7 (by substituting for " infancy," the words "coverture, or infancy and coverture combined," and for "account-book," the word "accounting"); par. 8 (omitted); par. 10 (replaced by the following: "A party may be examined as if under cross-examination at the instance of the adverse party, either orally or by deposition as any other witness; but the party calling for such examination shall not be concluded thereby, but may rebut it by countertestimony"); § 607 ("All other objections to witnesses shall go to their credit alone, and be weighed by the jury or tribunal to which their evidence is offered"); §§ 608, 609 (admits party's testimony in rebuttal of new testimony by opponent since deceased or become unsound in mind).

LOUISIANA: Revised Laws, 1897, § 1191 ("No witness in a suit for divorce shall be declared incompetent on account of his being allied or related to either the plaintiff or defendant"); § 1438 ("testimony of convicts for or against each other," admissible); St. 1886, No. 29, § 1 ("The competent witness in all criminal matters shall be a person of proper understanding; provided that the husband cannot be a witness for or against his wife, nor the wife for or against her husband, except in such case as is now provided by law"); § 2 ("The circumstance of the witness being a party accused shall in no wise disqualify him from testifying, provided that no one shall be compelled to give evidence against himself; and provided that if the person accused avails himself of this privilege, he shall be subject to all the rules that apply to other witnesses, and may be cross-examined as to all matters concerning which he gives his testimony; and provided further that his failure to testify shall not be construed for or against him; but all testimony shall be weighed and considered according to the general rules of evidence; and the trial judge shall so charge the jury"; amended by St. 1902, no. 185, by inserting in § 2, after "party accused," the words "or being jointly indicted"); § 2282 ("The circumstances of the witness being a relation, a party to the cause, interested in the result of the suit, or in the actual service or salary of one of the parties, is not a sufficient cause to consider the witness as incompetent"); Code of Practice, 1894, § 482 ("If the witness be objected to on the ground of his having a direct or indirect interest in the event of the suit, the party making the objections may examine such witness on oath as to the existence of such interest, and the witness must be sworn to answer the truth on the questions which shall be put to him on that head; provided, that the competent witness of any covenant or fact, whatever it may be, in civil matters, is a person of proper understanding; provided further, that the husband cannot be a witness for or against his wife, nor the wife for or against her husband, but that in any case where the husband and wife may be joined as plaintiffs or defendants and have a separate interest, they shall be competent witnesses for or against their separate interest therein"); St. 1888, no. 59 ("In all cases where either spouse has acted as agent for the other spouse, such spouse so acting as agent shall be a competent witness as to all transactions arising from, involved in, or connected with such agency. No statement or statements of either party in suits for separation in property and separation from bed and board or divorce shall be received in evidence"); Revised Civil Code, § 2281 ("The competent witness of any covenant or fact, whatever it may be, in civil matters, is a person of proper understanding. The husband [etc. as in Code Pr. § 482]"; amended by St. 1898, no. 190, by adding: "and provided further that in all civil suits for damages instituted by the husband for or on account of personal injuries sustained or suffered by his wife, the wife shall be a competent witness; provided further that in all cases where either spouse has acted as the agent of the other spouse, such spouse so acting as agent shall be a competent witness as to all transactions arising from, involved in, or connected with such agency; but no statement or statements of either party in suits for separation of property or separation from bed and board or divorce shall be received in evidence").

MAINE: Public Statutes, 1883, c. 60, § 2 (in divorce, "either party may be a witness"); c. 82, § 93 ("No person is excused or excluded from testifying in any civil suit or proceeding at law or in equity, by reason of his interest in the event thereof as a party or otherwise, except as hereinafter provided, but such interest may be shown to affect his credibility; and the husband or wife of either party may be a witness"); § 94 ("No defendant shall be compelled to testify in any suit when the cause of action implies an offence against the criminal law on his part. If he offers himself as a witness, he waives his privilege of not criminating himself, but his testimony shall not be used against him in any criminal prosecution involving the same subject-matter"); § 98 ("The five preceding sections do not apply to cases where at the time of taking testimony or at the time of trial the party prosecuting or the party defending or any one of them is an executor or an administrator or is made a party as heir of a deceased party; except in the following cases: 1. The deposition of a party or his testimony given at a former trial may be used at any trial after his death, if the opposite party is then alive, and in that case the latter may also testify. 2. In all cases in which an executor, administrator, or other legal representative of a deceased person is a party, such party may testify to any facts admissible upon the rules of evidence, happening before the death of such person; and when such person so testifies, the adverse party is neither excluded nor excused from testifying in reference to such facts, and any such representative party or heir of a deceased party may testify to any fact admissible upon general rules of evidence, happening after the decease of the testator, intestate, or ancestor; and in reference to such matters the adverse party may testify. 3. If the representative party is nominal only, both parties may be witnesses; if the adverse party is nominal only, and had parted with his interest, if any, during the lifetime of the representative party's testator or intestate, he is not excluded from testifying, if called by either party; and in an action against an executor or administrator, if the plaintiff is nominal only, or, having had an interest, disposed of it in the lifetime of the defendant's testator or intestate, neither party to the record is excused or excluded from testifying. 4. In an action by or against an executor, administrator, or other legal representative of a deceased person, in which his account books or other memoranda are used as evidence on either side, the other party may testify in relation thereto. 5. In actions where an executor, administrator, or other legal representative is a party, and the opposite party is an heir of the deceased, said heir may testify when any other heir of the deceased testifies at the instance of such executor, administrator, or other legal representative"); § 99 ("The rules of evidence which apply to actions by or against executors or administrators apply in actions where a person shown to the Court to be insane is solely interested as a party"); § 105 ("No person is incompetent to testify in any Court or legal proceeding in consequence of having been convicted of an offence; but such conviction may be shown to affect his credibility"); c. 87, § 10 (on suggestion of death of a party, in an action that survives, the survivors if any on both sides may testify); c. 134, § 19 ("In all criminal trials the accused shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness. He shall not be compelled to testify on cross-examination to facts that would convict or furnish evidence to convict him of any other crime than that for which he is on trial; and the fact that he does not testify in his own behalf shall not be taken as evidence of his guilt. The husband or wife of the accused is a competent witness").

MARYLAND: Public General Laws, 1888, Art. 35, § 1 ("No person offered as a witness shall hereafter be excluded, by reason of incapacity from crime or interest, from giving evidence, either in person or by deposition, according to the practice of the Courts, in the trial of any issue joined or hereafter to be joined, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any suit, action, or proceeding, civil or criminal, in any Court, or before any judge, jury, justice of the peace, or other person having, by law or by consent of the parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence; but every person so offered may and shall be admitted to give evidence, notwithstanding that such person may or shall have an interest in the matter in question, or in the event of the trial of any issue, matter, question, or inquiry, or of the suit, action, or proceeding in which he is offered as a witness, and notwithstanding that such person offered as a witness may have been previously convicted of any crime or offence; but no person who has been convicted of the crime of perjury shall be admitted to testify in any case or proceeding whatever; and the parties litigant, and all persons in whose behalf any suit, action, or other proceeding may be brought or defended, themselves, and their wives and husbands, shall be competent and compellable to give evidence in the same manner as other witnesses, except as hereinafter excepted"); § 2 ("When an original party to a contract or cause of action is dead or shown to be a lunatic or insane, or when an executor or administrator is a party to the suit, action, or other proceedings, either party may be called as a witness by his opponent; but shall not be admitted to testify on his own offer, or upon the call of his co-plaintiff or co-defendant, otherwise than now by law allowed, unless a nominal party merely, except in case where the party to such suit, action, or other proceeding has died, or become lunatic or insane, after having testified in his own behalf, then the opposite party shall be a competent witness on his own behalf in such case, notwithstanding the executor or administrator of such deceased person, or committee of such lunatic or insane person, has become a party to such suit, action, or other proceeding, but shall only testify as to matters upon which such deceased, lunatic, or insane person was examined and testified to; provided, that when an executor, administrator, guardian, or committee of a lunatic or insane person is a party to the suit, action, or proceeding, when the cause of action has arisen on a contract made with such executor, administrator, guardian, or committee, or out of transactions between such executor, administrator, guardian, or committee and the other party, or when the executor, administrator, guardian, or committee testifies as to any conversation had with the other party, either party may be examined as a witness as provided for in the other sections of this article; and provided further, that it shall not be competent for any party to the cause, who has been examined therein as a witness, to corroborate his testimony when impeached by proof of his own declaration or statement made to third persons out of the presence and hearing of the adverse party; and provided further, that whenever the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial was made or contracted with an agent, the death or insanity of his principal shall not prevent any party to the suit or proceeding from being a witness in the case; provided such agent shall be living and competent to testify"); § 3 ("In the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes and offences, and in all proceedings in the nature of criminal proceedings in any court of this State, and before a justice of the peace or other person acting judicially, the person so charged shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; but the neglect or refusal of any such person to testify shall not create any presumption against him. In all criminal proceedings the husband or wife of the accused party shall be competent to testify; but in no case, civil or criminal, shall any husband or wife be competent to disclose any confidential communication made by the one to the other during the marriage; and in suits, actions, bills, or other proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery, or for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, or for damages for breach of promise of marriage, no verdict shall be permitted to be recovered, nor shall any judgment or decree be rendered, upon the testimony of the plaintiff alone; but in all such cases testimony in corroboration of that of the plaintiff shall be necessary"); St. 1902, c. 495, amending and replacing Pub. G. L. Art. 35, § 2 ("In actions or proceedings by or against executors or administrators, in which judgments or decrees may be rendered for or against them, and in proceedings by or against persons incompetent to testify by reason of mental disability, no party to the cause shall be allowed to testify as to any transaction had with or statement made by the testator, intestate, or party so incompetent to testify, either personally or through an agent since dead, lunatic, or insane, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or unless the testimony of such testator, intestate, or party incompetent to testify shall have been already given in evidence concerning the same transaction or statement, in the same cause, on his or her own behalf or on behalf of his or her representative in interest; nor shall it be competent for any party to the cause, who has been examined therein as a witness, to corroborate his testimony when impeached by proof of his own declaration or statement made to third persons out of the presence and hearing of the adverse party").

MASSACHUSETTS: Revised Laws, 1902, c. 175, § 20, Pub. St. 1882, c. 169, § 18 ("No person of sufficient understanding, whether a party or otherwise, shall be excluded from giving evidence in any proceeding, civil or criminal, in court, or before a person having authority to receive evidence, except in the following cases: First, neither husband nor wife shall be allowed to testify as to private conversations with each other; Second, neither husband nor wife shall be compelled to be a witness on any trial upon an indictment, complaint, or other criminal proceeding against the other; Third, in the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences, a person so charged shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; and his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presumption against him"); R. L. ib. § 21, P. S. ib. § 19 ("The conviction of a witness of crime may be shown to affect his credibility").

MICHIGAN: Compiled Laws, 1897, c. 282, § 99 ("No person shall be excluded from giving evidence in any matter, civil or criminal, by reason of crime, or for any interest of such person in the matter, suit, or proceeding in which such testimony may be offered, or by reason of marital or other relationship to any party thereto; but such interest, relationship, or conviction of crime may be shown for the purpose of drawing in question the credibility of such witness, except as is hereafter provided");

§ 100 ("On the trial of any issue joined, or in any matter, suit, or proceeding, in any court, or before any officer or person having, by law or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence, the parties to any such suit or proceeding named in the record, and persons for whose benefit such suit is prosecuted or defended, may be witnesses therein, in their own behalf or otherwise, in the same manner as otherwise, except as hereinafter otherwise provided; and the deposition of any such party or person may be taken and used in evidence under the rules and statutes governing depositions, and any such party or person may be proceeded against, and compelled to attend and testify, as provided by law for other witnesses. No person shall be disqualified in any criminal case or proceeding, by reason of his interest in the event of the same as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his having been convicted of any crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility; provided, however, that a defendant in any criminal case or proceeding shall only at his own request be deemed a competent witness, and his neglect to testify shall not raise any presumption against him, nor shall the Court permit any reference or comment to be made to or upon such neglect"); § 101 ("That when a suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assignees, devisees, legatees, or personal representatives of a deceased person, the opposite party, if examined as a witness on his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of such deceased person; and when any suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by any surviving partner or partners, the opposite party, if examined as a witness in his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all in relation to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of the deceased partner and not within the knowledge of any one of the surviving partners. And when any suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by any corporation, the opposite party, if examined as a witness in his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of a deceased officer or agent of the corporation and not within the knowledge of any surviving officer or agent of the corporation, nor when any suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees, or personal representatives of a deceased person against a corporation, shall any person who is or has been an officer or agent of any such corporation be allowed to testify at all in relation to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of such deceased person; provided, that whenever the words 'the opposite party' occur in this section, it shall be deemed to include the assignors or assignees of the claim or any part thereof in controversy"; amended by St. 1901, no. 239, by inserting after "surviving partners," the following: "No person who shall have acted as an agent in the making or continuing of a contract with any person who may have died shall be a competent witness, in any suit involving such contract, as to matters occurring prior to the death of such decedent, on behalf of the principal to such contract against the legal representatives or heirs of such decedent, unless he shall be called by such heirs or legal representatives"); § 102 ("A husband shall not be examined as a witness, for or against his wife, without her consent; nor a wife, for or against her husband, without his consent, except in cases where the cause of action grows out of a personal wrong or injury done by one to the other, or grows out of the refusal or neglect to furnish the wife or children with suitable support within the meaning of Act No. 136 of the Session Laws of 1883, and except in cases where the husband or wife shall be a party to the record in a suit, action, or proceeding where the title to the separate property of the husband or wife so called or offered as a witness, or where the title to property derived from, through, or under the husband or wife so called or offered as a witness, shall be the subject-matter in controversy or litigation in such suit, action, or proceeding, in opposition to the claims or interest of the other of said married persons who is a party to the record in such suit, action, or proceeding; and in all such cases, such husband or wife who makes such claim of title, or under or from whom such title is derived, shall be as competent to testify in relation to said separate property and the title thereto, without the consent of said husband or wife, who is a party to the record in such suit, action, or proceeding, as though such marriage relation did not exist; nor shall either, during the marriage or afterwards, without the consent of both, be examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but in any action or proceeding instituted by the husband or wife in consequence of adultery the husband and wife shall not be competent to testify"); Acts 1887, no. 82 ("Whenever a child under the age of ten years is produced as a witness the Court shall by an examination, made by itself, publicly, or separate and apart, ascertain to its own satisfaction whether such child has sufficient intelligence and sense of obligation to tell the truth to be safely admitted to testify; and in such case such testimony may be given on a promise to tell the truth instead of upon oath or statutory affirmation, and shall be given such credit as to the Court or jury, if there be a jury, it may appear to deserve"); Acts 1897, no. 212 ("A husband may testify for or against his wife without her consent, and a wife may testify for or against her husband without his consent, in all criminal prosecutions for bigamy; provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to permit a husband or wife to testify against the other without the consent of both concerning any communications made by one to the other during the marriage"); § 8652, Howell's ed. (in divorce proceedings, either party may elect to testify, but "such testimony shall not be received in support or in defence of a charge of adultery").

MINNESOTA: General Statutes, 1894, §§ 642,

1191 (inhabitants in city or county, not to be disqualified as such); § 2007 (Indians to be competent in prosecution for unlawful sale, etc., of liquor to Indian); § 2561 (in actions by husband against savings bank for wife's money, wife may be examined as if unmarried); § 5658 ("All persons, except as hereinafter provided, having the power and faculty to perceive and make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses; neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action are excluded, nor those who have been convicted of crime, nor persons on account of their religious opinions or belief; although in every case the credibility of the witnesses may be drawn in question. And on the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences, the person so charged shall at his request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; nor shall the neglect or refusal to testify create any presumption against the defendant, nor shall such neglect be alluded to or commented upon by the prosecuting attorney or by the Court"); § 5659 ("A party to the record of any civil action or proceeding, or a person for whose immediate benefit such action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, or the directors, officers, superintendent, or managing agents of any corporation which is a party to the record in such action or proceeding, may be examined upon the trial thereof as if under cross-examination at the instance of the adverse party or parties or any of them, and for that purpose may be compelled in the same manner and subject to the same rules for examination as any other witness to testify, but the party calling for such examination shall not be concluded thereby, but may rebut it by counter-testimony"); § 5660 ("It shall not be competent for any party to an action, or interested in the event thereof, to give evidence therein of and concerning any conversation with or admission of a deceased or insane party or person, relative to any matter at issue between the parties"; amended by St. 1895, c. 27, by adding: "provided that where the testimony of the party or person since deceased or insane shall have been taken, prior to death or disability, either in form of a deposition or by court stenographer in court, and can be had and read as the testimony of such witness, wherein such party or person shall have testified concerning any conversation with the opposite party or person or concerning admissions made to such party, upon a trial of the issues after the death or disability of such party or person as contemplated in this section, the opposite party may testify fully in reference to conversations and admissions to which the aforesaid deposition or evidence shall relate"); § 5661 ("The following persons are not competent to testify in any action or proceeding: First, those who are of unsound mind or intoxicated at the time of their production for examination; Second, children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined or of relating them truly"); § 5662 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence, and preserve it inviolate; therefore a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: First. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other, nor to proceedings supplementary to execution"; amended by St. 1903, c. 227, omitting the last clause, and substituting "nor to an action or proceeding for abandonment and neglect of the wife or children by the husband"); § 6811 ("A person heretofore or hereafter convicted of any crime is, notwithstanding, a competent witness in any case or proceeding, civil or criminal, but the conviction may be proved for the purpose of affecting the weight of his testimony, either by the record or by his cross-examination, upon which he must answer any proper question relevant to that inquiry; and the party cross-examining is not concluded by the answer to such question"); § 2216 ("Whenever in any action in any court the defendant shall plead or answer the defence of usury, either party to the action may be a witness on his own behalf on the trial, except in actions in which the opposite party sues or defends as administrator or personal representative of a deceased person; except, also, actions in which the opposite party claims as assignee and the original assignor is deceased"); § 7324 (a co-indictee may be discharged to be a witness for the State, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defence); § 7325 (a co-indictee must be discharged, before the evidence is closed, to be witness for defendant, if the Court is of opinion that there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence).

MISSISSIPPI: General Statute Laws, 1892, § 1571 (in divorce suits, "the parties shall be competent witnesses for or against each other"); § 1738 ("Every person, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be competent to give evidence in any suit at law or in equity, and shall not be incompetent by reason of any interest in the result thereof, or in the record as an instrument of evidence in other suits; and such weight shall be given to the evidence of parties and interested witnesses as, in view of the situation of the witnesses and other circumstances, it may fairly be entitled to. Any party may, by subpœna, as in other cases, compel any other party to the suit to appear and give evidence"); § 1739 ("Husband and wife may be introduced by each other as witnesses in all cases, civil or criminal, and shall be competent witnesses in their own behalf, as against each other, in all controversies between them"); § 1740 ("A person shall not testify as a witness to establish his own claim or defence against the estate of a deceased person which originated during the lifetime of such deceased person, or any claim he has transferred since the death of such decedent. But such person shall be permitted to give evidence in support of his claim or defence against the estate of a deceased person which originated after the death of such deceased person in the course of administering his estate"; see St. 1896, infra); § 1741 ("The accused shall be a competent witness for himself in any prosecution for crime against him; but the failure of the accused in any case to testify shall not operate to his prejudice or be commented on by counsel"); § 1743 ("A conviction of a person for any offence, except perjury and subornation of perjury, shall not disqualify such person as a witness, but such conviction may be given in evidence to impeach his credibility. A person convicted of perjury or subornation of perjury shall not afterwards be a competent witness in any case, although pardoned or punished for the same"); St. 1896, c. 99 ("A person shall not testify as a witness to establish his own or assigned claim or defence against the estate of a person of unsound mind, which originated before the ward became a non compos mentis; but this shall not apply to claims or defences which arose in the course of the administration of the estate of such person").

MISSOURI: Revised Statutes, 1899, § 2635 ("No person shall be rendered incompetent to testify in criminal causes by reason of his being the person injured or defrauded or intended to be injured or defrauded, or that would be entitled to satisfaction for the injury, or is liable to pay the costs of the prosecution"); § 2636 ("When two or more persons shall be jointly indicted or prosecuted, the Court may, at any time before the defendants have gone into their defence, direct any defendant to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the State. A defendant shall also, when there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, at any time before the evidence is closed, be discharged by the Court for the purpose of giving his testimony for a co-defendant"); § 2637 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify as a witness in any criminal cause or prosecution by reason of being the person on trial or examination, or by reason of being the husband or wife of the accused; but any such facts may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of such witness; provided that no person on trial or examination, nor wife or husband of such person, shall be required to testify, but any such person may, at the option of the defendant, testify in his behalf, or on behalf of a co-defendant, and shall be liable to cross-examination, as to any matter referred to in his examination in chief, and may be contradicted and impeached as any other witness in the case; provided that in no case shall husband or wife, when testifying under the provisions of this section for a defendant, be permitted to disclose confidential communications had or made between them in the relation of such husband and wife"); § 2638 (the accused's failure to testify "shall not be construed to affect the innocence or guilt of the accused, nor shall the same raise any presumption of guilt, nor be referred to by any attorney in the case, nor be considered by the Court or jury before whom the trial takes place"); § 4652 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil suit or proceeding at law or in equity, by reason of his interest in the event of the same as a party or otherwise, but such interest may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility; provided that in actions where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead, or is shown to the Court to be insane, the other party to such contract or cause of action shall not be admitted to testify either in his own favor or in favor of any party to the action claiming under him, and no party to such suit or proceeding whose right of action or defence is derived to him from one who is, or if living would be, subject to the foregoing disqualification, shall be admitted to testify in his own favor, except as in this section is provided; and where an executor or administrator is a party, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor, unless the contract in issue was originally made with a person who is living and competent to testify, except as to such acts and contracts as have been done or made since the probate of the will or the appointment of the administrator; provided, further, that in actions for the recovery of any sum or balance due on account, and when the matter at issue and on trial is proper matter of book account, the party living may be a witness in his own favor, so far as to prove in whose handwriting his charges are, and when made, and no farther"); § 4654 ("Any party to any civil action or proceeding may compel any adverse party, or any person for whose immediate and adverse benefit such action or proceeding is instituted, prosecuted, or defended, to testify as a witness in his behalf, in the same manner and subject to the same rules as other witnesses; provided that the party so called may be examined by the opposite party, under the rules applicable to the cross-examination of witnesses"); § 4655 (foregoing sections not to affect the law of attestation of instruments required to be attested); § 4656 ("No married woman shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil suit or proceeding prosecuted in the name of or against her husband, whether joined or not with her husband as a party, in the following cases, to wit: First, in actions upon policies of insurance of property, so far as relates to the amount and value of the property alleged to be injured or destroyed; second, in actions against carriers, so far as relates to the loss of the property and the amount and value thereof; third, in all matters of business transactions when the transaction was had and conducted by such married woman as the agent of her husband; and no married man shall be disqualified in any such civil suit or proceeding prosecuted in the name of or against his wife, whether he be joined with her or not as a party, when such suit or proceeding is based upon, grows out of, or is connected with any matter of business or business transaction where the transaction or business was had with or was conducted by such married man as the agent of his wife; provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize or permit any married woman, while the relation exists or subsequently, to testify to any admission or conversation of her husband, whether made to herself or to third parties"); § 4659 ("The following persons shall be incompetent to testify: First, a person of unsound mind at the time of his production for examination; second, a child under ten years of age, who appears incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"); § 4680, Laws 1895, p. 284 ("Any person who has been convicted of a crime is notwithstanding a competent witness; but the conviction may be proved to affect his credibility, either by the record or by his own cross examination, upon which he must answer any question relevant to that inquiry, and the party cross-examining shall not be concluded by his answer").

MONTANA: Codes and Statutes, 1895; C. C. P. § 3160 ("A witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received as evidence for any purpose, whether such declaration be made on oral examination or by deposition or affidavit"); § 3161 ("All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and perceiving can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although, in every case, the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, as provided in § 3123"); § 3162 ("The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"; amended by St. 1897, p. 245, Feb. 19, by adding: "3. Parties or assignees of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator, upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person"); § 3163 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"); P. C. § 1242 (a person "convicted of any offence" is competent); §§ 2075, 2076 (like Cal. P. C. §§ 1099, 1100); § 2440 ("The rules for determining the competency of witnesses in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions and proceedings, except as otherwise provided in this Code"); § 2441 ("Except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties"); § 2442 ("A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but he may be sworn, and may testify in his own behalf, and the jury, in judging of his credibility and the weight to be given to his testimony, may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant, and the nature and enormity of the crime of which he is accused. If the defendant does not claim the right to be sworn, or does not testify, it must not be used to his prejudice, and the attorney prosecuting must not comment to the Court or jury on the same"); § 2443 ("When two or more persons are jointly or otherwise concerned in the commission of an offence, any one of such persons may testify for or against the other in relation to the offence committed, but the testimony of such witness must not be used against him in any criminal action or proceeding").

NEBRASKA: Compiled Statutes, 1897, § 2866 ("either party [to a divorce suit] may be a witness as in other civil cases"); § 5902 ("Every human being of sufficient capacity to understand the obligation of an oath, is a competent witness in all cases, civil and criminal, except as otherwise herein declared. The following persons shall be incompetent to testify: First, persons of unsound mind at the time of their production; second, Indians and negroes who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them intelligently and truly; third, husband and wife, concerning any communication made by one to the other during the marriage, whether called as a witness while that relation subsists or afterward"); § 5903 ("No person having a direct legal interest in the result of any civil action or proceeding, when the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person, shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation had between the deceased person and the witness, unless the evidence of the deceased person shall have been taken and read in evidence by the adverse party in regard to such transaction or conversation, or unless such representative shall have introduced a witness who shall have testified in regard to such transaction or conversation, in which case the person having such direct legal interest may be examined in regard to the facts testified to by such deceased person or such witness, but shall not be permitted to further testify in regard to such transaction or conversation"); § 5905 ("The husband can in no case be a witness against the wife, nor the wife against the husband, except in a criminal proceeding for a crime committed by the one against the other, but they may in all criminal prosecutions be witnesses for each other"); § 5906 ("Neither husband nor wife can be examined in any case as to any communication made by the one to the other while married, nor shall they, after the marriage relation ceases, be permitted to reveal, in testimony, any such communication made while the marriage subsisted"); § 5908 ("The prohibitions in the preceding sections do not apply to cases where the party in whose favor the respective provisions are enacted waives the rights thereby conferred"); § 7199 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal prosecution by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his conviction of any crime, but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility. In the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; nor shall the neglect or refusal to testify create any presumption against him, nor shall any reference be made to, nor any comment upon, such neglect or refusal"); § 7200 ("When two or more persons shall be indicted together, the Court may, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defence, direct any one of the defendants to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the State"; the accused "may also, when there is not sufficient evidence to put him upon his defence, be discharged by the Court," or may demand a verdict, to give evidence "for others" accused with him").

NEVADA: General Statutes, 1885, § 3398 ("All persons, without exception, otherwise than as specified in this chapter, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and perceiving can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses in any action or proceeding in any Court of the State. Facts which by the common law would cause the exclusion of witnesses may still be shown for the purpose of affecting their credibility"); § 3399 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any action or proceeding on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief, or by reason of his conviction of felony, but such conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility, and the jury is to be the exclusive judges of his credibility, or by reason of his interest in the event of the action or proceeding as a party thereto or otherwise, but the party or parties thereto, and the person in whose behalf such action or proceeding may be brought or defended, shall, except as hereinafter excepted, be competent and be compellable to give evidence, either viva voce or by deposition or upon a commission, in the same manner and be subject to the same rules of examination as other witnesses on behalf of himself or either or any of the parties to the action or proceeding"); § 3401 ("No person shall be allowed to testify under the provisions of § 377 [3399] when the other party to the transaction is dead, or when the opposite party to the action or the person for whose immediate benefit the action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, is the representative of a deceased person, when the facts to be proved transpired before the death of such deceased person; provided that when such deceased person was represented in the transaction in question by any agent who is living, and who testifies as a witness in favor of the representative of such deceased person, in such case the other party may also testify in relation to such transaction, and nothing contained in such section shall affect the laws in relation to any instrument required to be attested; provided, further, that when husband or wife is insane and has been so declared by a commission of lunacy, or in due form of law, the other shall be a competent witness to testify as to any fact which transpired before or during such insanity, but the privilege of so testifying shall cease on the restoration to soundness of the insane husband or wife, unless upon the consent of both, in which case they shall be competent witnesses"); § 3402 ("The following persons cannot be witnesses: First, those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination; second, children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"); § 3403 ("A husband cannot be examined as a witness for or against his wife without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage. But this exception shall not apply to an action or proceeding by one against the other"); §§ 4241, 4242 (joint indictees; like Cal. P. C. §§ 1099, 1100); § 4562 ("In the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences, the person so charged shall, at his own request but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; the credit to be given to his testimony being left solely to the jury, under the instructions of the Court"); § 4563 ("Nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling any such person to testify; and in all cases wherein the defendant to a criminal action declines to testify, the Court shall specially instruct the jury that no inference of guilt is to be drawn against him for that cause"); § 4576, as amended by St. 1881, c. 83 ("The rules for determining the competency of witnesses in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions and proceedings, except as otherwise provided for in this Act. The party or parties injured shall in all cases be competent witnesses; the credibility of such witnesses shall be left to the jury, as in other cases. In all cases when two or more persons are jointly or otherwise concerned in the commission of any crime or misdemeanor, either of such persons may be sworn as a witness against another, in relation to such crime or misdemeanor; but the testimony given by such witnesses shall in no instance be used against himself in any criminal prosecution, and any person may be compelled to testify as provided in this section"); § 4577, as amended by St. 1865, c. 403, St. 1881, c. 84 ("Except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties"); § 4734 (in prosecutions for selling liquor to Indians, Indians are to be "competent witnesses" against Chinese, and their testimony "may be taken by the Court or jury for what it may be deemed worth" against white persons).

NEW HAMPSHIRE: Public Statutes, 1891, c. 224, § 13 ("No person shall be excused or excluded from testifying or giving his deposition in any civil cause by reason of his interest therein, as a party or otherwise"); § 16 ("When one party to a cause is an executor, administrator, or the guardian of an insane person, neither party shall testify in respect to facts which occurred in the lifetime of the deceased or prior to the ward's insanity, unless the executor, administrator, or guardian elects so to testify, except as provided in the following section"); § 17 ("When it clearly appears to the Court that injustice may be done without the testimony of the party in such case, he may be allowed to testify: and the ruling of the Court, admitting or r[illegible] his testimony, may be excepted to and [illegible]ed"); § 18 ("When either party of record is [illegible]t the party in interest, and the party whose interest is represented by the party of record is an executor, administrator, or insane, the adverse party shall not testify, unless the executor, administrator, or [illegible]ardian of the insane person elects to testify himself, or to offer the testimony of such party of record"); § 19 ("In an action brought by an indorsee or assignee of a bill of exchange, promissory note, or mortgage against an original party thereto, the defendant shall not testify in his own behalf if either of the original parties to the bill, note, or mortgage is dead or insane, unless the plaintiff elects to testify himself or to offer the testimony of an original party thereto"); § 20 ("Husband and wife are competent witnesses for or against each other in all cases civil and criminal, except that neither shall be allowed to testify as to any statement, conversation, letter, or other communication made to the other or to another person, nor as to any matter which in the opinion of the Court would lead to a violation of marital confidence"; amended by St. 1899, c. 41, by inserting "against the other" after "testify," and by inserting "shall either be allowed in any case to testify" after "nor"); § 24 ("In the trial of indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes and offences, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness"); § 25 ("Nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling any such person to testify, nor shall any inference of his guilt result if he does not testify, nor shall the counsel for the prosecution comment thereon in case the respondent does not testify"); § 26 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify on account of his having been convicted of an infamous crime, but the record of such conviction may be used to affect his credit as a witness").

NEW JERSEY: General Statutes, 1896, "Disorderly Persons," § 18 (wife may be witness in trial of husband deserting family); "Evidence," § 1 ("No person offered as a witness in any action or proceeding of a civil or criminal nature shall be excluded by reason of his having been convicted of crime, but such conviction may be shown on cross-examination of the witness, or, by the production of the record thereof, for the purpose of affecting his credit"); § 2 ("In all civil actions in any Court of record in this State the parties thereto shall be admitted to be sworn and give evidence therein, when called as witnesses by the adverse party in such action; and when any party is called as a witness by the opposite party, he shall be subject to the same rules as to examination and cross-examination as other witnesses; provided, that no party to a suit shall be compelled to be sworn or give evidence in any action brought to recover a penalty or to enforce a forfeiture; and provided, also, that this section shall not apply to suits for divorce"); § 3 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any suit or proceedings at law or in equity by reason of his or her interest in the event of the same as a party or otherwise, but such interest may be shown for the purpose of affecting his or her credit; provided, nevertheless, that no party shall be sworn in any case when the opposite party is prohibited by any legal disability from being sworn as a witness, or either of the parties in a cause sue or are sued in a representative capacity, except as hereinafter provided"); § 4 ("A party to a suit in a representative capacity may be admitted, as a witness therein, and if called as a witness in his own behalf, and admitted, the opposite party may in like manner be admitted as a witness"); § 5 ("In any trial or inquiry in any suit, action, or proceeding in any Court, or before any person having by law or consent of parties authority to examine witnesses or hear evidence, the husband or wife of any person interested therein as a party or otherwise, shall be competent and compellable to give evidence the same as other witnesses, on behalf of any party to such suit, action, or proceeding; provided, that nothing herein shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other in any criminal action or proceeding, or in any action or proceeding for divorce on account of adultery, except to prove the fact of marriage, or in any action for criminal conversation; nor shall any husband or wife be compellable to disclose any confidential communication made by one to the other during the marriage"); § 6 ("The complainant or petitioner in any action, or proceeding of an equitable nature in any Court, shall be a competent witness to disprove so much of the defendant's answer as may be responsive to the allegations contained in the bill of complaint or petition, and any defendant in any such action or proceeding shall be a competent witness for or against any other defendant not jointly interested with him in the matter in controversy"); § 7 ("Upon the trial of any indictment for falsely making, altering, forging, or counterfeiting, or for uttering or publishing as true, any record, deed, or other instrument or writing, no person named in such record, deed, or other instrument or writing, or whose name or any part of whose name is or purports to be written or signed therein or thereto, shall on that account be deemed and taken to be an incompetent witness"); § 8 ("Upon the trial of any indictment, allegation, or accusation of any person charged with crime, the person indicted or accused shall be admitted to testify as a witness upon such trial, if he shall offer himself as a witness therein in his own behalf"); § 12 (surviving party is competent in new trial of action revived after other party's death); St. 1900, c. 150, § 1 (same as Gen. St. Evid. § 1); § 2 (same as ib. § 2); § 3 (same as ib. § 3, omitting the clauses after "sworn as a witness"); § 4 ("In all civil actions any party thereto may be sworn and examined as a witness, notwithstanding any party thereto may sue or be sued in a representative capacity; provided, this section shall not extend to permit testimony to be given by any party to the action as to any transaction with or statement by any testator or intestate represented in said action, unless the representative offers himself as a witness on his own behalf and testifies to any transaction with or statement by his testator or intestate, in which event the other party may be a witness on his own behalf as to all transactions with or statements by such testator or intestate which are pertinent to the issue"; the former § 4 is here repealed); § 5 (like the former § 5, except that the proviso, down to the last clause, is thus re-phrased: "Nothing herein shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other in any action for criminal conversation, except to prove the fact of marriage, or to render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence against the other in any criminal action or proceeding, except to prove the fact of marriage, and except as now otherwise provided by statute, or compellable in any action or proceeding for divorce on account of adultery to give evidence for the other, except to prove the fact of marriage"); § 6 (like former § 6); § 7 (like former § 9; former §§ 7 and 8 are repealed); § 8 (like former § 10); § 10 (like former § 12); St. 1903, c. 216 (in prosecutions for desertion, the accused's wife is admissible against him); Gen. St., "Evidence," § 51 (§ 5, supra, declared to "authorize husband or wife in any criminal action against either, to give evidence to prove the fact of marriage"); § 53 ("In all civil actions in any Court of law or equity of this State, any party thereto may be sworn and examined as a witness, notwithstanding any party thereto may sue or be sued in a representative capacity; provided, nevertheless, that this supplement shall not extend so as to permit testimony to be given as to any transaction with or statement by any testator or intestate represented in said action"); § 54 ("Upon any trial hereafter had, of any indictment of any person charged with the crime of murder or manslaughter, the husband or wife of the person so charged shall be admitted to testify as a witness upon such trial, if he or she offer himself or herself as a witness therein on behalf of the person so charged"); § 57 ("Upon the trial of any indictment, allegation, or accusation of any person charged with crime, the wife or husband of the person indicted or accused shall be admitted to testify as a witness in behalf of such person upon such trial, if he or she shall be offered and produced as a witness therein by the person so indicted or accused"); § 73 ("Any husband or wife may give evidence on their own behalf, or for or against each other, in any proceedings in this State for divorce on account of adultery, any law of this State to the contrary notwithstanding"); St. 1898, c. 237, § 57 ("Upon the trial of any indictment, the defendant shall be admitted to testify, if he shall offer himself as a witness; and upon any such trial, the wife or the husband of the defendant, as the case may be, shall be admitted to testify on behalf of the defendant, if he or she shall offer himself or herself as a witness; and upon any such trial, a married woman shall be admitted to testify against her husband when she is the complainant against him, if she shall offer herself as a witness"); 1903, State v. Zdanowicz, — N. J. L. —, 55 Atl. 743 (the accused is competent for himself under the Crim. Proced. St. 1898, June 14, c. 237, § 57, though the Evidence Revision Statute of 1900, March 23, c. 150, repeals the former § 8, and contains no clause of like effect).

NEW MEXICO: Compiled Laws, 1897, § 3014 ("No person offered as a witness shall hereinafter be excluded by reason of any alleged incapacity from interest, from giving evidence, either in person or by deposition, according to the practice of the court, on the trial of any issue joined, or of any matter in question or on any inquiry arising in any civil suit, action, or proceeding in any court, or before any judge, coroner, justice of the peace, officer, or person having, by law or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence in this Territory"); § 3015 ("Every person so offered shall be admitted to give evidence on oath or solemn affirmation in those cases wherein affirmation is by law receivable; notwithstanding that such person has an interest in the matter in question, or in the event of the trial of any issue, matter, question, or inquiry, or of the suit, action, or proceeding in which he is offered as a witness"); § 3016 ("Hereafter, in the courts of this Territory no person offered as a witness shall be disqualified to give evidence on account of any disqualification known to the common law, but all such common-law disqualifications may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of any such witness and for no other purpose; provided, however, that the presiding judge, in his discretion, may refuse to permit a child of tender years to be sworn, if, in the opinion of the judge, such child has not sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature and obligation of an oath"; amended by St. 1901, c. 58, by inserting: "provided that no person offered as a witness shall be competent to give testimony in any case who shall have been convicted and sentenced for the commission of any felony or infamous crime, unless he shall have first been pardoned and restored to full rights of citizenship"); § 3017 ("On the trial of any issue joined, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any civil suit, action, or other proceeding in any court of law or equity in this Territory, or before any person having, by law or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence, the parties to such proceedings, and the persons in whose behalf any such suit, action, or other proceeding is brought or instituted, or opposed or defended, shall, except as hereinafter excepted, be competent and compellable to give evidence, either viva voce or by deposition, according to the practice of the court, on behalf of themselves or of either of the parties to the suit, action, or proceeding, and the husbands and wives of such parties and persons shall, except as hereinafter excepted, be competent to give evidence, either viva voce or by deposition, according to the practice of the court, on behalf of either or any of the parties to the said suit, action, or proceeding"); § 3019 ("Nothing herein contained shall apply to the trial, in any action, suit, or other civil proceeding, of the question of the adultery of any party, or the husband or wife of any party to such action, suit, or proceeding"); § 3020 ("No husband shall be compelled to disclose any communication made by his wife during the marriage, and no wife shall be compelled to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage"); § 3201 ("In a suit by or against the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of a deceased person, an opposite or interested party to the suit shall not obtain a verdict, judgment, or decision therein, on his own evidence, in respect to any matter occurring before the death of the deceased person, unless such evidence is corroborated by some other material evidence"); § 3431 ("In the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offences, and misdemeanors in the courts of this Territory, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness; and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him"); § 3432 ("Hereafter the husband or wife of any defendant in any trial on a prosecution for crime before any Court or officer authorized to hear or try said prosecution shall be a competent witness to testify in favor of, but not against, such defendant; provided, that such husband or wife shall be a competent witness to testify against any such defendant where the prosecution is for any unlawful assault or violence forcibly committed by the defendant on the person of such witness").

NEW YORK: Constitution, 1895, Art. XIII, § 4 ("Any person charged with receiving a bribe, or with offering or promising a bribe, shall be permitted to testify in his own behalf in any civil or criminal prosecution therefor"); Code of Civil Procedure, 1877, § 828 ("Except as otherwise specially prescribed in this title, a person shall not be excluded or excused from being a witness, by reason of his or her interest in the event of an action or special proceeding; or because he or she is a party thereto; or the husband or wife of a party thereto, or of a person in whose behalf an action or special proceeding is brought, opposed, prosecuted, or defended"); § 829 ("Upon the trial of an action, or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding, a party or a person interested in the event, or a person from, through, or under whom such a party or interested person derives his interest or title by assignment or otherwise, shall not be examined as a witness in his own behalf or interest, or in behalf of the party succeeding to his title or interest, against the executor, administrator, or survivor of a deceased person, or the committee of a lunatic, or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person or lunatic, by assignment or otherwise, concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person or lunatic, except where the executor, administrator, survivor, committee, or person so deriving title or interest is examined in his own behalf, or the testimony of the lunatic or deceased person is given in evidence concerning the same transaction or communication. A person shall not be deemed interested for the purposes of this section by reason of being a stockholder or officer of any banking corporation which is a party to the proceeding or interested in the result thereof"); § 831 ("A husband or wife is not competent to testify against the other, upon the trial of an action, or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding, founded upon an allegation of adultery, except to prove the marriage or disprove the allegation of adultery. A husband or wife shall not be compelled, or, without the consent of the other if living, allowed to disclose a confidential communication made by one to the other during marriage. In an action for criminal conversation, the plaintiff's wife is not a competent witness for the plaintiff, but she is a competent witness for the defendant, as to any matter in controversy; except that she cannot, without the plaintiff's consent, disclose any confidential communication had or made between herself and the plaintiff"); § 832 ("A person, who has been convicted of a crime or misdemeanor, is, notwithstanding, a competent witness in a civil or criminal action or special proceeding; but the conviction may be proved for the purpose of affecting the weight of his testimony, either by the record or by his cross-examination, upon which he must answer any question relevant to that inquiry; and the party cross-examining him is not included by that inquiry"); § 850 ("The Court or officer may examine an infant, or a person apparently of weak intellect, produced before it or him as a witness, to ascertain his capacity and the extent of his knowledge"); Penal Code, 1881 § 714 (substantially like § 832, C. C. P.); § 715 ("The husband or wife of a person [illegible] or accused of a crime is in all cases a [illegible]tent witness, on the examination or trial of [illegible] person; but neither husband nor wife can be compelled to disclose a confidential communication, made by one to the other during marriage"); Code of Criminal Procedure, 1881, § 10 ("No person can be compelled in a criminal action to be a witness against himself"); § 392 (in criminal cases, the testimony of a child apparently under 12 not understanding an oath may be received if it is "of sufficient intelligence"); § 393 ("The defendant in all [criminal] cases may testify as a witness in his own behalf, but his neglect or refusal to testify does not create any presumption against him"); Laws 1876, c. 182, § 1 ("All persons jointly indicted shall, upon the trial of either, be competent witnesses for each other the same as if not included in the indictment"), Laws 1892, c. 689, § 115 (wife may testify in action by husband against savings bank to recover money deposited by wife as hers).

North Carolina: Code 1883, § 1288 (In divorce cases, neither party is competent to prove adultery of the other, nor shall either's admissions be received for that purpose; but in divorce for pregnancy at marriage, either may testify to material facts); §§ 585–587 (these sections, removing in part only the disqualification of parties, are presumably superseded by §§ 1350, 1351, infra); § 588 ("In any trial or inquiry in any suit, action, or proceeding in any court or before any person having by law or by consent of parties authority to examine witnesses or to hear evidence, the husband or wife of any party thereto, or any person in whose behalf any such suit, action, or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, opposed, or defended, shall, except as hereinafter stated, be competent and compellable to give evidence as any other witness on behalf of any party to such suit, action, or proceeding. Nothing herein contained shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other in any criminal action or proceeding (except to prove the fact of marriage in case of bigamy), or in any action or proceeding in consequence of adultery, or in any action or proceeding for divorce on account of adultery (except to prove the fact of marriage), or in any action or proceeding for or on account of criminal conversation. No husband or wife shall be compellable to disclose any confidential communication made by one to the other during their marriage"); § 589 (abolishes interest as a disqualification; see ib. § 1350, infra); § 590 ("Upon the trial of an action, or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding, a party or a person interested in the event, or a person from, through, or under whom such a party or interested person derives his title by assignment or otherwise, shall not be examined as a witness in his own behalf or interest, or in behalf of the party succeeding to his title or interest, against the executor, administrator, or survivor of a deceased person, or the committee of a lunatic, or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person or lunatic by assignment or otherwise, concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person or lunatic, except where the executor, administrator, survivor, committee, or person so deriving title or interest is examined in his own behalf, or the testimony of the lunatic or deceased person is given in evidence concerning the same transaction or communication"); § 1192 ("No person shall be deemed to be an incompetent witness by reason of any interest which a person may have, or be supposed to have, in respect to any deed, writing, instrument, or other matter whatsoever, in support of any prosecution, wherein shall be questioned the fact of forging such deed, writing, instrument, or other matter whatsoever, or the fact of uttering, showing forth in evidence, or disposing thereof, knowing the same to be forged"); § 1350 ("No person offered as a witness shall be excluded by reason of incapacity from interest or crime, from giving evidence either in person or by deposition, according to the practice of the court, on the trial of any issue joined, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any suit or proceeding, civil or criminal, in any court, or before any judge, justice, jury, or other person having, by law, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence; and every person so offered shall be admitted to give evidence, notwithstanding such person may or shall have an interest in the matter in question, or in the event of the trial of the issue, or of the suit or other proceeding in which he is offered as a witness. This section shall not be construed to apply to attesting witnesses to wills"); § 1351 ("On the trial of any issue, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any action, suit, or other proceeding in court, or before any judge, justice, jury, or other person having, by law, authority to hear and examine evidence, the parties themselves and the person in whose behalf any suit or other proceeding may be brought or defended, shall, except as hereinafter provided, be competent and compellable to give evidence, either viva voce or by deposition, according to the practice of the Court, in behalf of either or any of the parties to said action, suit, or other proceeding. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to any action or other proceeding in any court instituted in consequence of adultery, or to any action for criminal conversation"); § 1353 ("In the trial of all indictments, complaints, or other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, the person so charged shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness, and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him. The husband or wife of the defendant, in all criminal actions or proceedings, shall be a competent witness for the defendant, but the failure of such witness to be examined shall not be used to the prejudice of the defence. But every such person examined as a witness shall be subject to be cross-examined as are other witnesses"); § 1354 ("Nothing in this chapter, except as provided in the preceding section, shall render any person, who in any criminal proceeding is charged with the commission of a criminal offence, competent or compellable to give evidence against himself, nor shall render any person compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself, nor shall in any criminal proceeding render any husband competent or compellable to give evidence against himself, nor any wife competent or compellable to give evidence against her husband; provided that in all criminal prosecutions of a husband for an assault and battery upon the person of his wife, or for abandoning his wife, or for neglecting to provide for her support, it shall be lawful to examine the wife in behalf of the State against her husband"); St. 1889, p. 422 (divorce for refusal of intercourse; either party may testify).

North Dakota: Revised Codes, 1895, § 5653 ("No person offered as a witness in any action or proceeding in any court, or before any officer or person having authority to examine witnesses or hear evidence, shall be excluded or excused by reason of such person's interest in the event of the action or proceeding; or because such person is a party thereto, or because such person is the husband or wife of a party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf such action or proceeding is commenced, prosecuted, opposed, or defended, except as hereinafter provided: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent, nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this subdivision does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other. 2. In civil actions or proceedings by or against executors, administrators, heirs at-law, or next of kin, in which judgment may be rendered or order entered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction whatever with or statement by the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party. But if the testimony of a party to the action or proceeding has been taken and he shall afterwards die, and after his death the testimony so taken shall be used upon any trial or hearing in behalf of his executors, administrators, heirs-at-law, or next of kin, then the other party shall be a competent witness as to any and all matters to which the testimony so taken relates"); § 6977 (conviction of perjury or subornation disqualifies the person as a witness in any proceeding "upon his own behalf," and in any proceeding "between adverse parties," against objection, until judgment of perjury, etc., is reversed; but no rights innocently acquired by a person claiming under such proceedings shall be prejudiced by illegal admission of an infamous person); § 8188 ("When two or more persons are included in the same information or indictment, the Court may, at any time before the defendants have gone into their defence, on the application of the State's attorney, direct any defendant to be discharged from the information or indictment, that he may be a witness for the State"); § 8189 ("When two or more persons are included in the same information or indictment, and the Court is of the opinion that in regard to a particular defendant there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, it must order him to be discharged before the evidence is closed, that he may be a witness for his co-defendant"); § 8190 ("In the trial of a criminal action or proceeding before any Court or magistrate of this State, whether prosecuted by information, indictment, complaint, or otherwise, the defendant shall, at his own request and not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; but his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create or raise any presumption of guilt against him; nor shall such neglect or refusal be referred to by any attorney prosecuting the case, or considered by the Court or jury before whom the trial takes place").

Ohio: Annotated Revised Statutes, 1898, § 5240 ("All persons are competent witnesses except those of unsound mind, and children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts and transactions respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"); § 5241 ("The following persons shall not testify in certain respects: 3. Husband or wife, concerning any communication made by one to the other, or an act done by either in the presence of the other, during coverture, unless the communication was made, or act done, in the known presence or hearing of a third person competent to be a witness; and the rule shall be the same if the marital relation has ceased to exist. 4. A person who assigns his claim or interest, concerning any matter in respect to which he would not, if a party, be permitted to testify. 5. A person who, if a party, would be restricted in his evidence under § 5242, shall, where the property or thing is sold or transferred by an executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, heir, devisee, or legatee, be restricted in the same manner in any action or proceeding concerning such property or thing"); § 5242 ("A party shall not testify where the adverse party is a guardian or trustee of either a deaf and dumb or an insane person, or of a child of a deceased person, or is an executor or administrator, or claims or defends as heir, grantee, assignee, devisee, or legatee of a deceased person, except — 1. To facts which occurred subsequent to the appointment of the guardian or trustee of an insane person, and, in the other cases, subsequent to the time the decedent, grantor, assignor, or testator died. 2. When the action or proceeding relates to a contract made through an agent by a person since deceased, and the agent is competent to testify as a witness, a party may testify on the same subject. 3. If a party, or one having a direct interest, testify to transactions or conversations with another party, the latter may testify as to the same transactions or conversations. 4. If a party offer evidence of conversations or admissions of the opposite party, the latter may testify concerning the same conversations or admissions. 5. In an action or proceeding by or against a partner or joint contractor, the adverse party shall not testify to transactions with or admissions by a partner or joint contractor since deceased, unless the same were made in the presence of the surviving partner or joint contractor; and this rule shall be applied without regard to the character in which the parties sue or are sued. 6. If the claim or defence is founded on a book account, a party may testify that the book is his account-book, that it is a book of original entries, that the entries therein were made by himself, a person since deceased, or a disinterested person, non-resident of the county; whereupon the book shall be competent evidence; and such book may be admitted in evidence, in any case, without regard to the parties, upon like proof by any competent witness. 7. If a party, after testifying orally, die, the evidence may be proved by either party on a further trial of the case, whereupon the opposite party may testify to the same matters. 8. If a party die, and his deposition be offered in evidence, the opposite party may testify as to all competent matters therein. Nothing in this section contained shall apply to actions for causing death, or actions or proceedlngs involving the validity of a deed, will, nr codicil; and when a case is plainly within the reason aud spirit of the last three sections, though not within the strict letter, their principles shall be applied"); § 5697 (parties in divorce and alimony cases are to be competent like any other witness); § 7284 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness ln any criminal prosecution by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his conviction of any crime; and husband and wife shall be competent witnesses to testify in behalf of each other in all criminal prosecutions; bnt snch interest, conviction, or relationship may be shown for the purpose of affecting his or her credibility. But husband or wife shall not testify concerning any communication made by one to the other, or act done by either in the presence of each other during covertnre, nnless the communication was made or act done in the known presence or hearing of a third person competent to be a witness, or nnless in case of personal injury by either the husband and [or ?] wife to the other, or in case of neglect or cruelty of either to their minor children nnder ten years of age. And the rule shall be the same if the marital relation has ceased to exist; provided, that the presence or whereabouts of the husband or wife shall not be construed to be an act under this section"); § 7285 ("On the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings, against a person charged with the commission of an offence, the person so charged shall, at his own reqnest, bnt not otherwise, be a competent witness; but his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presnmption against him, nor shall any reference be made to, nor any comment be made npon, snch neglect or refusal").

OKLAHOMA: Statutes 1893, § 2002 (infamy; like N. D. Rev. C. § 6977); § 4209 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil action or proceeding by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, nr by reason of his conviction of a crime; bnt snch interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility"); § 4210 (nothing in the preceding section is to affect the law as to the settlement of estates of decedents, etc., or as to the attestation of wills, etc.); § 4211 ("Any party to a civil action or proceeding may compel any adverse party or person for whose benefit snch action is institnted, prosecnted, or defended, at the trial or by deposition, to testify as a witness in the same manner and snbject to the same rules as other witnesses"); § 4212 ("No party shall be ellowed to testify in his own behalf, in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by snch party with a deceased person, when the adverse party is the execntor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignee of snch deccased person, where they heve acqnired title to the cause of action immediately from snch deceased person; nor shall the assignor of a thing in action be allowed to testify in behalf of snch party concerning any transaction or communication had personally by snch assignor with a deceased person in any snch case; nor shall such party or assignor be competent to testify to any transaction had personally by such party or assignor with a deceased partner or joint contractor in the absence of his snrviving partner or joint contractor, when snch surviving partner or joint contractor is an adverse party. If the testimony of a party to the action or proceeding has been taken, and he afterwards die, and the testimnny so taken shall be nsed after his death, ln behalf of executors, administrators, heirs-at-law, next of kin, assignee, snrviving partner, or joint contractor, the other party or the assignor shall be competent to testify as to any and ell matters to which the testimony so taken relates"); § 4213 ("The following persons shall be incompetent to testify: First, persons who are of nnsound mind at the time of their production for examination. Second, children nnder ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. Third, husband and wife, for or against each other, except concerning transactions in which one acted as the agent of the other, or when they are joint parties and have a joint interest in the action; bnt in no case shall either be permitted to testify concerning any communication made by one to the other during marriage, whether called while that relation subsisted or afterwards"); § 5204 ("When two or more persons are included in the indictment, the Court may, at any time before the defendants have gone into their defence, on the application of the district attorney, direct any defendant to be discharged from the indictment, that he may be a witness for the Territory"); § 5205 ("When two or more persons are inclnded in the same indictment, and the Court is of opinion that in regard to a particnlar defendant there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, it must, before the evidence is closed, in order that he may be a witness for his co-defendant, snbmit its said opinion to the jnry, who, if they so find, may acquit the particnlar defendant for the purpose aforesaid"); § 5206 ("On the trial of all indictments, informntions, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of a crime, offences, and misdemeanors before any Conrt or committing magistrate in this Territory, the person charged shall nt his own reqnest, bnt not otherwise, be a competent witness, and his failure to make such reqnest shall not create any presnmption against him, nor be mentioned on the trial; if commented upon by connsel, it shall be ground for a new trial"); § 5207 ("The rules of evidence in civil cases are applicable also to criminal cases, except as otherwise provided in this chapter"); St. 1895, c. 41, § 29 ("neither husband nor wife shall in any case be a witness against the other, except in a criminal prosecntion for a crime committed one against the otiier, bnt they may in all cases be witnesses for each other, and shall be subject to cross-examination as other witnessee, and shall in no event on a criminal trial be permitted to disclose commnnications made by one to the other, except on a trial of an offence committed by one against the otiier").

OREGON: Codes and General Laws, 1892, § 710 ("All persons without exception, except as otherwise provided in this title, who, having organs of sense can perceive, and perceiving can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action, suit, or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although in every case, except the latter, the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, as provided in § 683"); § 711 ("The following persons are not admissible: 1. Those of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"; amended by St. 1893, p. 134, by permitting a deceased opponent's hearsay statements to be received; see quotation post, § 1576); § 712 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence, and to preserve it inviolate; therefore a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband shall not be examined for or against his wife without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage. But the exception does not apply to a civil action, suit, or proceeding, by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"); § 713 ("If a party to the suit, action, or proceeding offer himself as a witness, that is to be deemed a consent to the examination also of a wife, husband, attorney, clergyman, physician, or surgeon on the same subject, within the meaning of subdivisions 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the last section"); § 1361 ("When two or more persons are charged in the same indictment, the Court may, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defence, on the application of the district attorney, direct any defendant to be discharged from the indictment, so that he may be a witness for the State"); § 1362 ("When two or more persons are charged in the same indictment, and the Court is of opinion that, in regard to a particular defendant, there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, it must, if requested by another defendant then on trial, order him to be discharged from the indictment, before the evidence is closed, that he may be a witness for his co-defendant"); § 1364 ("The law of evidence in civil actions is also the law of evidence in criminal actions and proceedings, except as otherwise specially provided in this Code"); § 1365 ("On the trial of or examination upon all indictments, complaints, information, and other proceedings before any Court, magistrate, jury, grand jury, or other tribunal, against persons accused or charged with the commission of crimes or offences, the person so charged or accused shall, at his own request but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness, the credit to be given to his testimony being left solely to the jury, under the instructions of the Court, or to the discrimination of the magistrate, grand jury, or other tribunal before which such testimony may be given; provided, his waiver of such right shall not create any presumption against him; that such defendant or accused, when offering his testimony as a witness in his own behalf, shall be deemed to have given to the prosecution a right to cross-examination upon all facts to which he has testified, tending to his conviction or acquittal"); § 1366 ("In all criminal actions, where the husband is the party accused, the wife shall be a competent witness, and when the wife is the party accused, the husband shall be a competent witness; but neither husband nor wife, in such cases, shall be compelled or allowed to testify in such case unless by consent of both of them; provided, that in all cases of personal violence upon either by the other, the injured party, husband or wife, shall be allowed to testify against the other").

PENNSYLVANIA: Digest of Laws, 1896 (Pepper & Lewis), "Witnesses," § 1 ("Except upon a preliminary hearing before a magistrate for the purpose of determining whether a person charged with a criminal offence triable in the Court of Oyer and Terminer ought to be committed for trial, and except also upon a hearing under habeas corpus for the purpose of determining whether bail ought to be taken upon a commitment for murder in the first degree, or for the purpose of determining in any case how much bail ought to be required, or for the purpose of determining in any case whether a person committed for trial ought to be further held, and except, also, upon hearings before a grand jury, in none of which cases shall evidence for the defendant be heard, and except, also, as provided in § 2 of this act, all persons shall be fully competent witnesses in any criminal proceeding before any tribunal"); § 2 ("In such criminal proceedings, a person who has been convicted in a court of this Commonwealth of perjury, which term is hereby declared to include subornation of perjury, shall not be a competent witness for any purpose, although his sentence may have been fully complied with, unless the judgment or conviction be judicially set aside or reserved [reversed?], or unless the proceeding be one to punish or prevent injury or violence attempted, done, or threatened to his person or property, in which cases he shall be competent to testify"); § 3 ("Nor shall husband and wife be competent or permitted to testify against each other, or in support of a criminal charge of adultery alleged to have been committed by or with the other, except that, in proceedings for desertion and maintenance, and in any criminal proceeding against either for bodily injury or violence attempted, done, or threatened upon the other, each shall be a competent witness against the other, and except, also, that either shall be competent merely to prove the fact of marriage in support of a criminal charge of adultery alleged to have been committed by or with the other"; see St. 1899, infra); § 4 ("Nor shall either husband or wife be competent or permitted to testify to confidential communications made by one to the other, unless this privilege be waived upon the trial"); § 8 ("In any civil proceeding before any tribunal of this Commonwealth, or conducted by virtue of its order or direction, no liability merely for costs nor the right to compensation possessed by an executor, administrator, or other trustee, nor any interest merely in the question on trial, nor any other interest or policy of law, except as is provided in § 5 [11] of this act, shall make any person incompetent as a witness"); § 9 (provisions of § 2, supra, applied to civil proceedings); § 10 (provisions of § 4, supra, applied to civil proceedings); § 11 ("Nor shall husband or wife be competent or permitted to testify against each other, except in those proceedings for divorce in which personal service of the subpœna or of a rule to take depositions has been made upon the opposite party, or in which the opposite party appears and defends, in which case either party may testify fully against the other, and except also that in any proceeding for divorce either party may be called merely to prove the fact of marriage"); § 12 ("In any proceedings brought by either under the provisions of section three [aliubi] to protect or recover the separate property of either, both shall be fully competent witnesses, except that neither may testify to confidential communications made by one to the other, unless this privilege be waived upon the trial"); § 14 ("Nor, where any party to a thing or contract in action is dead, or has been adjudged a lunatic, and his right thereto or therein has passed, either by his own act or by the act of the law, to a party on the record who represents his interest in the subject in controversy, shall any surviving or remaining party to such thing or contract, or any other person whose interest shall be adverse to the said right of such deceased or lunatic party, be a competent witness to any matter occurring before the death of said party or the adjudication of his lunacy; unless the proceeding is by or against the surviving or remaining partners, joint promisors, or joint promisees, of such deceased or lunatic party, and the matter occurred between such surviving or remaining partners, joint promisors, or joint promisees and the other party on the record, or between such surviving or remaining partners, promisors, or promisees and the person having an interest adverse to them, in which case any person may testify to such matters; or, unless the action be ejectment against several defendants, and one or more of said defendants disclaims of record any title to the premises in controversy at the time the suit was brought and also pays into Court the costs accrued at the time of his disclaimer, or gives security therefor as the Court in its discretion may direct, in which case such disclaiming defendant shall be a fully competent witness; or, unless the issue or inquiry be devisavit vel non, or be any other issue or inquiry respecting the property of a deceased owner, and the controversy be between parties respectively claiming such property by devolution on the death of such owner, in which case all persons shall be fully competent witnesses"); § 15 ("But no person who is incompetent under clauses (a), (b), (c), and (d) [§§ 9, 10, 11, 13, supra; § 13 deals with attorneys' privileged communications] of this section shall become competent by the general language of clause (e) [§ 14, supra]"); § 16 ("Any person, who is incompetent under clause (e) [§ 14, supra] of section five by reason of interest, may, nevertheless, be called to testify against his interest, and in that event he shall become a fully competent witness for either party; and such person shall also become fully competent for either party by a release or extinguishment in good faith of his interest, upon which good faith the trial judge shall decide as a preliminary question"); § 18 ("Hereafter, in any civil proceeding before any tribunal of this Commonwealth, or conducted by virtue of its order or direction, although a party to the thing or contract in action may be dead or may have been adjudged a lunatic, and his right thereto or therein may have passed, either by his own act or by the act of the law, to a party on a record who [re]presents his interest in the subject in controversy, nevertheless, any surviving or remaining party to such thing or contract or any other person whose interest is adverse to the said right of such deceased or lunatic party, shall be a competent witness to any relevant matter, although it may have occurred before the death of said party or the adjudication of his lunacy; if and only if such relevant matter occurred between himself and another person who may be living at the time of the trial and may be competent to testify, and who does so testify upon the trial, against such surviving or remaining party or against the person whose interest may be thus adverse, or if such relevant matter occurred in the presence or hearing of such other living or competent person"); § 21 ("In any civil proceeding, whether or not it be brought or defended by a person representing the interests of a deceased or lunatic assignor of any thing or contract in action, a party to the record or a person for whose immediate benefit such proceeding is prosecuted or defended, or any other person whose interest is adverse to the party calling him as a witness, may be compelled by the adverse party to testify as if under cross-examination, subject to the rules of evidence applicable to witnesses under cross-examination, and the adverse party calling such witnesses shall not be concluded by his testimony; but such person so cross-examined shall become thereby a fully competent witness for the other party as to all relevant matters, whether or not these matters were touched upon in his cross-examination; and also where one of several plaintiffs or defendants, or the person for whose immediate benefit such proceeding is prosecuted or defended, or such other person having an adverse interest, is cross-examined under this section, his co-plaintiffs or co-defendants shall thereby become fully competent witnesses on their own behalf as to all relevant matters, whether or not these matters were touched upon in such cross-examination"); § 22 ("Except defendants actually upon trial in a criminal court, any competent witness may be compelled to testify in any proceeding, civil or criminal; but he may not be compelled to answer any question which, in the opinion of the trial judge, would tend to criminate him; nor may the neglect or refusal of any defendant, actually upon trial in a criminal court, to offer himself as a witness be treated as creating any presumption against him, or be adversely referred to by Court or counsel during the trial"); "Desertion," § 3 (action for maintenance against deserting husband; wife to be competent for Commonwealth, and husband to be competent); St. 1899, April 11, Pub. L. 41 (preamble states purpose to remove existing disadvantages of the wife); § 1 ("In any civil action brought against the husband to recover necessaries furnished to the wife, if the husband makes defence at the trial upon the ground that the wife had left him without justification or excuse before the necessaries were furnished, or upon any other ground which attacks the wife's character or conduct, she shall be a competent witness in rebuttal for the plaintiff"); § 2 ("In any criminal proceeding brought against the husband, if he makes defence at the trial upon any ground which attacks the wife's character or conduct, she shall be a competent witness in rebuttal for the Commonwealth"); St. 1903, no. 32 (In a prosecution for a husband's failure to support, "the wife shall be a competent witness").

Rhode Island: General Laws, 1896, c. 244, § 35 ("No person shall be disqualified from testifying in any action at law, suit in equity, or other proceeding at law or in equity, by reason of his being interested therein or being a party thereto"); § 37 ("In the trial of every civil cause, the husband or wife of either party shall be deemed a competent witness; provided, that neither shall be permitted to give any testimony tending to criminate the other or to disclose any communication made to him or her by the other, during their marriage, except on trials of petitions for divorce between them"); § 40 ("No person shall be deemed an incompetent witness because of his conviction of any crime, or sentence to imprisonment therefor; but shall be admitted to testify like any other witness, except that conviction or sentence for any crime or misdemeanor may be shown to affect his credibility"); § 41 ("No respondent in a criminal prosecution, offering himself as a witness, shall be excluded from testifying because he is such respondent; and neglect or refusal so to testify shall create no presumption nor be used in argument against him"); § 42 ("The husband or wife of any respondent in a criminal prosecution, offering himself or herself as a witness, shall not be excluded from testifying therein because he or she is the husband or wife of such respondent"); St. 1903, c. 1110 (amending Gen. L. c. 244, § 37, by adding: "and trials between them involving their property rights").

South Carolina: Constitution, 1882, Art. I, § 12 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness . . . or be subjected in law to any other restraints or disqualifications in regard to any personal rights than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances"; this does not appear in the Constitution of 1895); Code of Crim. Pr. 1893, § 63, Cr. C. 1902, § 64 ("In the trial of all criminal cases, the defendant shall be allowed to testify (if he desires to do so, and not otherwise) as to the facts and circumstances of the case"); Code of Civil Procedure, 1893, and Civil Code, 1902, under the same numbers; § 391 ("A party to an action may be examined as a witness, at the instance of the adverse party, or of any one of several adverse parties, and for that purpose may be compelled, in the same manner and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness, to testify, either at the trial, or conditionally, or upon commission"); § 397 ("A person for whose immediate benefit the action is prosecuted or defended, though not a party to the action, may be examined as a witness, in the same manner and subject to the same rules of examination as if he were named as a party"); § 399 ("No person offered as a witness shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action"); § 400 ("A party to an action or special proceeding in any and all courts, and before any and all officers and persons acting judicially, may be examined as a witness in his own behalf, or in behalf of any other party, conditionally, on commission, and upon the trial or hearing in the case, in the same manner and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness; provided, however, that no party to the action or proceeding, nor any person who has a legal or equitable interest which may be affected by the event of the action or proceeding, nor any person who previous to such examination has had such an interest, however the same may have been transferred to or come to the party to the action or proceeding, nor any assignor of anything in controversy in the action, shall be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, insane, or lunatic, as a witness against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such deceased person, or as assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic, when such examination, or any judgment or determination in such action or proceeding, can in any manner affect the interest of such witness or the interest previously owned or represented by him. But when such executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, survivor, or committee shall be examined on his own behalf in regard to such transaction or communication, or the testimony of such deceased or insane person or lunatic, in regard to such transaction or communication (however the same may have been perpetuated or made competent), shall be given in evidence on the trial or hearing in behalf of such executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, survivor, or committee, then all persons not otherwise rendered incompetent shall be made competent witnesses in relation to such transaction or communication on said trial or hearing. Nothing contained in section 8 of this Code of Procedure shall be held or construed to affect or restrain the operation of this section. 1. In any trial or inquiry in any suit, action, or proceeding in any court or before any person having, by law, or consent of parties, authority to examine witnesses or hear evidence, the husband or wife of any party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf any such suit, action, or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, opposed, or defended, shall, except as hereinafter stated, be competent and compellable to give evidence, the same as any other witness, on behalf of any party to such suit, action, or proceeding. 2. No husband or wife shall be compellable to disclose any confidential communication made by one to the other during marriage"); §§ 396, 398 (old provisions dealing with parties' testimony; on the present subject they are practically supplanted by §§ 391, 400, supra).

SOUTH DAKOTA: Statutes, 1899, § 6491 (like N. Dak. Rev. Code 1895, § 5653; amended by St. 1901, c. 105, by inserting in par. 2, after "neither party," the words "nor his assignor, nor any person who has or ever had any interest in the subject of the action adverse to the other party or to his testator or intestate"); § 7624 (like N. D. Rev. Code, § 6977); § 8648 (like N. D. Rev. C. § 8188); § 8649 (like N. D. Rev. C. § 8189, except that the Court must submit its opinion to the jury, who may then acquit the person for the purpose); § 8650 (in all proceedings against persons charged with crimes, "the person charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness, and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him"); St. 1903, c. 122, amending P. C. 1903, § 803 ("any person who is serving a term in any penitentiary shall be a competent witness," unless he has been "convicted and be serving a sentence for the crime of perjury or of subornation of perjury").

TENNESSEE: Annotated Code, 1896, § 5592 ("Every person of sufficient capacity to understand the obligation of an oath is competent to be a witness"); § 5595 ("Persons are rendered incompetent by conviction and sentence for the following crimes, unless they have been restored to full citizenship, under the law provided for that purpose, viz.: abuse of female child, arson and felonious burning, bigamy, burglary, felonious breaking and entering mansion house, bribery, buggery, counterfeiting, or violating any of the provisions to suppress the same, destroying will, forgery, housebreaking, incest, larceny, perjury, robbery, receiving stolen property, rape, sodomy, stealing bills of exchange or other valuable papers, subornation of perjury"); § 5596 ("In all civil actions in the Courts of this State, no person shall be incompetent to testify because he or she is a party to or interested in the issue tried, or because of the disabilities of coverture, but all persons, including husband and wife, shall be competent witnesses, though neither husband nor wife shall testify to any matter that occurred between them by virtue of or in consequence of the marital relation"); § 5597 ("It shall not be lawful for any party to any action, suit, or proceeding in any court of this State to testify as to any transaction or conversation with or statement by any opposite party in interest, if such opposite [party] is incapacitated or disqualified to testify thereto, by reason of idiocy, lunacy, or insanity, unless called by the opposite side, and then [only] in the discretion of the Court"); § 5598 ("In actions or proceedings by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgments may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party"); § 5600 ("In the trial of all indictments, presentments, and other criminal proceedings, in any of the courts of this State, the party defendant thereto may, at his own request but not otherwise, be a competent witness to testify therein"); § 5601 ("The failure of the party defendant to make such request and to testify in his own behalf shall not create any presumption against him. But the defendant desiring to testify shall do so before any other testimony for the defence is heard by the Court trying the case"); § 6665 ("in person verbally challenged" to a duel is competent to prove "the fact of such verbal challenge"); § 6859 (when a witness without his contrivance is examined by grand jury as to election offences, "no person against whom his evidence is given" is competent against him for an election offence committed prior to examination); § 7581 (convicts are competent against each other in prosecutions for prison offences).

TEXAS: Revised Civil Statutes, 1895, § 2300 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify on account of color, nor because he is a party to the suit or proceeding or interested in the issue tried"); § 2301 ("The husband or wife of a party to a suit or proceeding, or who is interested in the issue to be tried, shall not be incompetent to testify therein, except as to confidential communications between such husband and wife"); § 2302 ("In actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them as such, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the others as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party; and the provisions of this article shall extend to and include all actions by or against the heirs or legal representatives of a decedent arising out of any transaction with such decedent"); § 2303 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify on account of his religious opinions or for want of any religious belief"); St. 1897, c. 49 (Rev. Civ. St. 1895, § 2979, amended by adding: "In all such suits and proceedings [for divorce from the bonds of matrimony] the husband and wife shall be competent witnesses for and against each other, but neither party shall be compelled to testify as to any matter that will criminate himself or herself"); Penal Code, 1895, § 91 ("Persons charged as principals, accomplices or accessories, whether in the same indictment or by different indictments, cannot be introduced as witnesses for one another, but they may claim a severance; and if any one or more be acquitted they may testify in behalf of the others"); Code of Criminal Procedure, 1895, § 710 (on a prosecution of joint defendants, "when it is apparent that there is no evidence" against one, the jury may be directed to find a verdict as to him, "and if they acquit, he may be introduced as a witness in the case"); § 709 (State attorney may dismiss prosecution as to a defendant jointly indicted, "and the person so discharged may be introduced as a witness by either party"); § 768 ("All persons are competent to testify in criminal actions except the following: 1. Insane persons, who are in an insane condition of mind at the time when they are offered as witnesses, or who were in that condition when the events happened of which they are called to testify. 2. Children or other persons who, after being examined by the Court, appear not to possess sufficient intellect to relate transactions with respect to which they are interrogated, or who do not understand the obligation of an oath. 3. All persons who have been or may be convicted of felony in this State, or in any other jurisdiction, unless such conviction has been legally set aside, or unless the convict has been legally pardoned for the crime of which he was convicted. But no person who has been convicted of the crime of perjury, or false swearing, and whose conviction has not been legally set aside, shall have his competency as a witness restored by a pardon, unless such pardon by its terms specifically restore his competency to testify in a court of justice"); § 770 ("Any defendant in a criminal action shall be permitted to testify in his own behalf therein; but the failure of any defendant to so testify shall not be taken as a circumstance against him, nor shall the same be alluded to or commented on by counsel in the cause; provided, that where there are two or more persons jointly charged or indicted, and a severance is had, the privilege of testifying shall be extended only to the person on trial"); § 771 ("Persons charged as principals, accomplices, or accessories, whether in the same indictment or different indictments, cannot be introduced as witnesses for one another, but they may claim a severance; and if any one or more be acquitted, or the prosecution against them be dismissed, they may testify in behalf of the others"); § 773 ("All other persons except those enumerated in articles 768 and 775, whatever may be the relationship between the defendant and witness, are competent to testify"); § 774 ("Neither husband nor wife shall in any case testify as to communications made by one to the other while married; nor shall they, after the marriage relation ceases, be made witnesses as to any such communication made while the marriage relation subsisted, except in a case where one or the other is prosecuted for an offence, and a declaration or communication made by the wife to the husband, or by the husband to the wife, goes to extenuate or justify an offence for which either is on trial"); § 775 ("The husband and wife may in all criminal actions be witnesses for each other, but they shall in no case testify against each other except in a criminal prosecution for an offence committed by one against the other"); § 777 ("A defendant jointly indicted with others, and who has been tried and convicted, and whose punishment was fine only, may testify for the other defendant after he has paid the fine and costs"); § 782 ("In trials for forgery, the person whose name is alleged to have been forged is a competent witness, and in all cases not otherwise specially provided for, the person injured or attempted to be injured is a competent witness").

UNITED STATES: Revised Statutes, 1878, and Supplements; § 858 ("In the courts of the United States, no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried; provided, that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the Court. In all other respects, the laws of the State in which the Court is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law and in equity and admiralty"); § 1078 ("No witness shall be excluded in any suit in the Court of Claims on account of color"); § 1079 ("No claimant, nor any person from or through whom any such claimant derives his alleged title, claim, or right against the United States, nor any person interested in any such title, claim, or right, shall be a competent witness in the Court of Claims in supporting the same, and no testimony given by such claimant or person shall be used except as provided in the next section [i. e. when taken and offered by the government attorney]"; repealed by St. 1883, infra); § 1977 ("All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to . . . give evidence . . . as is enjoyed by white citizens"); § 2140 ("Indians shall be competent witnesses" in all cases concerning illegal sale of liquor to Indians); § 5392 (every person guilty of perjury or subornation of perjury shall "be incapable of giving testimony" until judgment is reversed); St. 1874, June 22, c. 391, § 8 ("No officer, or other person entitled to or claiming compensation under any provision of this act [against evading customs laws] shall be thereby disqualified from becoming a witness in any action, suit, or proceeding for the recovery, mitigation, or remission thereof . . . [and the defendant may testify]"); St. 1878, March 16, c. 37 ("In the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, in the United States courts, territorial courts, and courts martial, and courts of inquiry, in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, the person so charged shall, at his own request but not otherwise, be a competent witness. And his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him"); St. 1883, March 3, c. 116, § 6 (in cases in the Court of Claims, no person is to be excluded "because he or she is a party to or interested in the same"); St. 1887, March 3, c. 359, § 8 (similar; adding, "any plaintiff or party in interest may be examined as a witness on the part of the government"; § 1079 of Rev. St. 1878, repealed); St. 1887, March 3, c. 397, § 1 ("In any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, a judge, justice or a United States commissioner, or a Court, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution, without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be. And such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law"); St. 1892 (for this and other statutes affecting the Chinese, see post, § 516, Incapacity by race); St. 1903, c. 487, § 7, Feb. 5, 32 Stat. L. 798 (Bankruptcy Act, 1898, § 21, subd. a, amended so as to permit the Court "to require any designated person, including the bankrupt and his wife," to appear for examination "concerning the acts, conduct, or property of a bankrupt whose estate is in process of administration under this Act; provided that the wife may be examined only touching business transacted by her or to which she is a party, and to determine the fact whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt").

UTAH: Constitution, 1895, Art. I, § 12 ("In criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right . . . to testify in his own behalf; . . . a wife shall not be compelled to testify against her husband, nor a husband against his wife"); Revised Statutes, 1898; Code of Civil Procedure, § 3412 ("All persons without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although, in every case, the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his character for truth, honesty, or integrity, or his motives, or by contradictory evidence; and the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility"); § 3413 ("The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination; 2. Children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. 3. A party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, and any person directly interested in the event thereof, and any person from, through, or under whom such party or interested person derives his interest or title or any part thereof, when the adverse party in such action, suit, or proceeding, claims or opposes, sues or defends, as guardian of any insane or incompetent person, or as the executor or administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee of any deceased person, or as guardian, or assignee, or grantee, directly or remotely, of such heir, legatee, or devisee, as to any statement by or transaction with such deceased, insane, or incompetent person, or matter of fact, whatever, which must have been equally within the knowledge of both the witness and such insane, incompetent, or deceased person, unless such witness be called to testify thereto by such adverse party, so claiming or opposing, suing or defending, in such action, suit, or proceeding"); § 3414 ("There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by or against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"); Code of Criminal Procedure, § 5011 ("The rules for determining the competency of witnesses in civil actions shall be applicable also to criminal actions and proceedings except as otherwise provided in this Code"); § 4515 ("The accused shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself; a wife shall not be compelled to testify against her husband, nor a husband against his wife"); § 5014 ("Except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife shall be a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both shall be parties"); § 5015 ("If the defendant offers himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the State the same as any other witness. His neglect or refusal to be a witness shall not in any manner prejudice him, nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding"); § 5016 ("When two or more persons are jointly or otherwise concerned in the commission of an offence, any one of such persons may testify for or against the other in relation to the offence committed, but the testimony of such witness must not be used against him in any criminal action or proceeding"); § 4851 ("When two or more persons shall be included in the same charge, the Court may, at any time before the defendants have gone into their defence, on the application of the county attorney, or other counsel for the State, direct any defendant to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the State"); § 4852 ("When two or more persons shall be included in the same charge, and the Court shall be of the opinion that in regard to a particular defendant there is not sufficient evidence to put him on his defence, it must order him to be discharged before the evidence is closed, that he may be a witness for his co-defendant").

VERMONT: Statutes, 1894, § 1236 ("No person shall be disqualified as a witness in a civil suit or proceeding, at law or in equity, by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise; but such interest may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credit"); § 1237 ("In actions, except actions of book account, where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead, or is shown to the Court to be insane, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor, except to meet or explain the testimony of living witnesses produced against him as to facts or circumstances taking place after the death or insanity of the other party; or upon a question upon which the testimony of the party afterward deceased or insane has been taken in writing or by a stenographer in open court, to be used in such action, and is used thereiu"); § 1238 ("When an executor or administrator is a party, the other party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor, unless the contract in issue was originally made with a person who is living and competent to testify, except as to acts and contracts done or made since the probate of the will or the appointment of the administrator, and to meet or explain the testimony of living witnesses produced against him, as to facts or circumstances taking place after the death of the other party"); § 1239 ("In actions of book account, and when the matter in issue and on trial is proper matter of book account, the party living may be a witness in his own favor, so far as to prove in whose handwriting his charges are and when made, and no further, except to meet or explain the testimony of living witnesses produced against him as to facts or circumstances taking place after the death of the other party"); § 1240 ("No married woman shall be disqualified as a witness in a civil suit or proceeding at law or in equity, prosecuted in the name of or against her husband, whether joined or not with her husband as a party; in actions upon policies of insurance of property, so far as relates to the amount and value of the property alleged to be injured or destroyed; in actions against carriers, so far as relates to the loss of the property, and the amount and value thereof, and to personal injury alleged to have been sustained by the wife in consequence of the wrongful act or neglect of such carriers; in a suit brought against the husband for the maintenance of the wife; Nothing in this section shall authorize or permit a married woman to testify to admissions or conversations of her husband whether made to herself or to third persons"; see St. 1902, infra); § 1241 ("In actions where the husband and wife are properly joined, either as plaintiffs or as defendants, or where either has acted as the agent of the other in business transactions, they shall be competent witnesses, except that neither shall be permitted to testify as to conversations or admissions of the other"); § 1242 ("A married man shall not be disqualified as a witness in a civil suit or proceeding at law or in equity, brought by his wife upon a policy of insurance of property so far as relates to the amount and value of property alleged to be injured or destroyed"); § 1243 ("The libellant and libellee shall be competent witnesses in divorce cases"); § 1245 ("No person shall be incompetent as a witness in any court, matter, or proceeding, by reason of his conviction of a crime other than perjury, subornation of perjury, or endeavoring to incite or procure another to commit the crime of perjury; but the conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude may be given in evidence to affect the credibility of a witness"); § 1246 ("A party to a civil action or proceeding at law or in equity may compel an adverse party, or person for whose immediate and adverse benefit such action or proceeding is instituted, prosecuted, or defended, to testify as a witness in his behalf, in the same manner and subject to the same rules as other witnesses. But the party so called to testify may be examined by the opposite party under the rules applicable to the cross-examination of witnesses"); § 1915 ("In the trial of complaints, informations, indictments, and other proceedings against persons charged with crimes or offences, the person so charged shall, at his own request and not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness, the credit to be given to his testimony being left solely to the jury, under the instructions of the Court; but the refusal of such person to testify shall not be considered by the jury as evidence against him"); § 4089 ("In actions against a savings bank, savings institution, or trust company, by a husband to recover for moneys deposited by his wife in her name or as her money, the wife may be a witness as if she were an unmarried woman"); § 4510 ("[In actions for injury caused by the sale of liquor] . . . nor shall a person be disqualified as a witness therein by reason of the marriage relation"); St. 1902, no. 123 ("a married woman shall be a competent witness against her husband in prosecutions under this section," making criminal the failure to support a family).

VIRGINIA: Code 1887, and Supplement of 1898; § 3345 ("No person shall be incompetent to testify because of interest; or because of his being a party to any action, suit, or proceeding of a civil nature; but he shall, if otherwise competent to testify, and subject to the rules of evidence and practice applicable to other witnesses, be competent to give evidence in his own behalf and be competent and compellable to attend and give evidence on behalf of any other party to such action, suit, or proceeding; but in any case at law, the Court, for good cause shown, may require any such person to attend and testify ore tenus, and, upon his failure to so attend and testify, may exclude his deposition"); § 3346 ("The preceding section is subject to the following qualifications: The competency of husband and wife as witnesses for or against each other during the coverture or after its termination, and the competency of attesting witnesses to wills, deeds, and other instruments, shall be determined by the law in force the day before this Code takes effect [see amendment infra]. Where one of the original parties to the contract or other transaction, which is the subject of investigation, is incapable of testifying by reason of death, insanity, infancy, or other legal cause, the other party to such contract or transaction shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor or in favor of any other person whose interest is adverse to that of the party so incapable of testifying, unless he be first called to testify in behalf of such last mentioned party, or unless some person, having an interest in or under such contract or transaction, derived from the party so incapable of testifying, has testified in behalf of the latter or of himself to such contract or transaction; or unless the said contract or transaction was personally made or had with an agent of the party so incapable of testifying and such agent is alive and capable of testifying"); § 3347

(" But where any of the original parties to the contract or other transaction which is the subject of investigation are partners or other joint contractors, or jointly entitled or liable, and some of them have died or otherwise become incapable of testifying, the others, or such of them as there may be, with whom the contract or transaction was personally had or made, or in whose presence and with whose privity it was made or had, shall not, nor shall the adverse party, be incompetent to testify because some of the partners or joint contractors, or of those jointly entitled or liable, have died or otherwise become incapable of testifying "); § 3348 (" And where such contract or transaction was personally and solely made with an agent of one of the parties thereto, and such agent is dead or otherwise incapable of testifying, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor or in favor of a person claiming an interest adverse to that of the principal or such agent, unless he be first called to testify on behalf of said principal or some person claiming under him, or the testimony of such agent be first read or given in evidence by his principal or other person claiming under him, or unless the said principal has first testified "); § 3349 (" If an original party to such contract or transaction, with whom it was personally and solely made or had, or his agent, be examined as a witness orally or in writing, at a time when he is competent to testify, and he afterwards die or become otherwise legally incapable of testifying, his testimony may be proved or read in evidence, and in such case the adverse party may testify as to the same matters "); § 3742 (" [A person convicted of perjury or subornation of perjury shall] . . . be forever adjudged incapable . . . of giving evidence as a witness "); § 3896 (" Approvers shall not be admitted in any case "); § 3897 (" In any case of felony or misdemeanor, the accused may be sworn and examined in his own behalf, and be subject to cross-examination as any other witness; but his failure to testify shall create no presumption against him, nor be the subject of any comment before the Court or jury by the prosecuting attorney "); § 3898 (" Except where it is otherwise expressly provided, a person convicted of felony shall not be a witness, unless he has been pardoned or punished therefor, and a person convicted of perjury shall not be a witness, although pardoned or punished "); § 3899 (" No person prosecuted for unlawful gaming shall be competent to testify against a witness for the Commonwealth in such prosecution, touching any unlawful gaming committed by him prior to the commencement of such prosecution "); § 3900 (" No person who is not jointly tried with the defendant shall be incompetent to testify in any prosecution by reason of interest in the subject-matter thereof "); § 4187 (" In any such prosecution [against a convict], any convict in the penitentiary shall be a competent witness for or against the accused "); § 3346 a, St. 1897–8, p. 753, § 1 (" Husband and wife shall be competent to testify for or against each other in all civil cases except as is hereinafter provided: First, neither husband nor wife shall be competent to testify for or against each other in any proceeding by a creditor to avoid or impeach any conveyance, gift, or sale from the one to the other on the ground of fraud or want of consideration, but as to said transaction the existing rules of evidence shall remain unchanged; second, where one of the original parties to a contract, matter, or other transaction which is the subject of investigation, is incapable of testifying by reason of death, insanity, infancy, or other legal cause, and the other party to such contract, matter, or transaction is made incompetent to testify by sub-section 2 of section 3346 of the Code of Virginia, then in such case the consort of either party shall be incompetent to testify in relation to such contract, matter, or transaction; and provided, further, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to alter the existing rules of evidence as to proceedings for divorce "); ib., § 2 (" In criminal cases husband and wife shall be allowed to testify on behalf of each other; but neither shall be compelled to testify against the other. If either, however, be examined in any case as a witness in behalf of the other, the one so examined shall be deemed competent to testify in such case as well as against as in behalf of such other, but the failure of either husband or wife to testify shall create no presumption against the accused nor be the subject of any comment before the Court or jury by the prosecuting attorney "); ib., § 3 (" Neither husband nor wife shall without the consent of the other be examined in any case as to any communication made by one to the other while married, nor shall either of them be permitted without such consent to reveal in testimony after the marriage relation ceases any such communication made while the marriage subsisted; provided, that this exclusion shall not apply to a criminal proceeding for a criminal offence committed by one against the other, but as to such proceeding the existing rules of evidence shall remain unchanged "); St. 1901–2, p. 799, § 1 (amending St. 1897–8, by adding at the end of § 1: " except in cases where the suit for divorce is brought on the ground of cruelty or desertion, in which cases the husband or wife may testify "); ib., § 2 (amending § 2 so as to read: " In criminal cases, husband and wife shall be allowed, and subject to the same rules of evidence governing other witnesses, may be compelled to testify in behalf of each other; but neither shall be compelled, nor, without the consent of the other, allowed to testify against the other, provided, however, if either be called and examined in any case as a witness in behalf of the other, the one so examined shall be deemed competent, and, subject to the rules of evidence governing other witnesses, may be compelled to testify against the other; the failure," etc., as in St. 1897–8).

WASHINGTON: Constitution, 1889, § 22 (" In criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right . . . to testify in his own behalf "); Annotated Code and Statutes, 1897, § 5990 (" Every person of sound mind and suitable age and discretion, except as hereinafter provided, may be a witness in any action or proceeding "); § 5991 (" No person offered as a witness shall be excluded from giving evidence by reason of his interest in the event of the action, as a party thereto or otherwise, but such interest may be shown to affect his credibility; provided, however, that in an action or proceeding where the adverse party sues or defends as executor, administrator, or legal representative of any deceased person, or as deriving right or title by, through, or from any deceased person, or as the guardian or conservator of the estate of any insane person, or of any minor under the age of fourteen years, then a party in interest or to the record shall not be admitted to testify in his own behalf as to any transaction had by him with or any statement made to him by any such deceased or insane person or by any such minor under the age of fourteen years; provided, further, that this exclusion shall not apply to parties of record who sue or defend in a representative or fiduciary capacity and who have no other or further interest in the action"); § 5992 ("No person offered as a witness shall be excluded from giving evidence by reason of conviction of crime, but such conviction may be shown to affect his credibility; provided, that any person who shall have been convicted of the crime of perjury shall not be a competent witness in any case, unless such conviction shall have been reversed, or unless he shall have received a pardon"); § 5993 ("The following person[s] shall not be competent to testify: 1. Those who are of unsound mind, or intoxicated at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"); § 5994 ("The following persons shall not be examined as witnesses: 1. A husband shall not be examined for or against his wife without the consent of the wife, nor a wife for or against her husband without the consent of the husband; nor shall either, during marriage or afterwards, without the consent of the other, be examined as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage. But this exception shall not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other"); § 6748 (before a justice of the peace, "a party examined by an adverse party may be examined in his own behalf," but if he testify to new matter, the adverse party may be a witness); § 6940 ("Witnesses competent to testify in civil cases shall be competent in criminal prosecutions; . . . Indians shall be competent as hereinbefore provided [?], or in any prosecutions in which an Indian may be a defendant"); § 6941 ("Any person accused of any crime in this State by indictment, information, or otherwise, may, in the examination or trial of the cause, offer himself or herself as a witness in his or her own behalf, and shall be allowed to testify as other witnesses in such case, and when the accused shall so testify, he or she shall be subject to all the rules of law relating to cross-examinations of other witnesses; provided, that nothing in this Code shall be construed to compel such accused persons to offer himself or herself as a witness in such case; and provided, further, that it shall be the duty of the Court to instruct the jury that no inference of guilt shall arise against the accused if the accused shall fail or refuse to testify as a witness in his or her own behalf"); § 6950 (joint indictees; substantially like Cal. P. C. §§ 1099, 1100, with "may" for "must" in the latter); § 7316 (on a prosecution for sale of liquor to Indians, Indians are to be competent).

WEST VIRGINIA: Code, Third Edition, 1891, c. 130, § 22 ("In any civil action, suit, or proceeding, the husband or wife of any party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf any such action, suit, or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, opposed, or defended, shall be competent to give evidence the same as any other witness on behalf of any party to such action, suit, or proceeding, except that no husband or wife shall disclose any confidential communication made by one to the other during their marriage"); § 23 ("No person offered as a witness in any civil action, suit, or proceeding shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action, suit, or proceeding, or because he is a party thereto, except as follows: No party to any action, suit, or proceeding, nor any person interested in the event thereof, nor any person from, through, or under whom any such party derives any interest or title by assignment or otherwise, shall be examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of examination deceased, insane, or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such deceased person or the assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic. But this prohibition shall not extend to any transaction or communication as to which any such executor, administrator, heir-at-law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, survivor, or committee shall be examined on his own behalf, nor as to which the testimony of such deceased person or lunatic shall be given in evidence"; amended by St. 1897, c. 44, by adding at the end: "provided, however, that where an action is brought for causing the death of any person by wrongful act, neglect, or default under c. 130 of the Code, the physician sued shall have the right to give evidence in any case in which he is sued; but in this event he can only give evidence as to the medicine or treatment given to the deceased, or operation performed, but he cannot give evidence of any conversation had with the deceased"); § 24 ("No person shall be incompetent as a witness on account of race or color"); c. 152, § 17 ("Except where it is otherwise expressly provided, a person convicted of felony shall not be a witness, unless he has been pardoned or punished therefor, but a person convicted of felony and sentenced therefor, except it be for perjury, may by leave of Court be examined as a witness in any criminal prosecution, though he has not been pardoned or punished therefor, but a person convicted of perjury shall not be a witness in any case, although he may have been pardoned or punished"); § 18 (analogous to § 3899, Virginia Code, but covering a number of offences); § 19 ("In any trial or examination in or before any Court or officer for a felony or misdemeanor, the accused shall, at his or her own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness on such trial and examination. The wife or husband of the accused shall also, at the request of the accused, but not otherwise, be a competent witness on such trial and examination. But a failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him or her, nor shall any reference be made to or comment upon such failure by any one during the progress of the trial in the hearing of the jury"); c. 50, § 108 (special rules of competency before justices of the peace); St. 1901, c. 93, § 8 (in gaming offences, "no person against whom such witness shall testify shall be competent as a witness for the State in the prosecution against such witness for the same offence or matter as to which such witness so testified, or to any like offence committed by such witness before the commencement of the prosecution in which he was examined as such witness").

WISCONSIN: Statutes, 1898, § 4068 ("No person shall be disqualified in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise; and every party shall be in every such case a competent witness except as otherwise provided in this chapter. But such interest or connection may be shown to affect the credibility of the witness. Any party to the record in any civil action or proceeding, or any person for whose immediate benefit any such action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, or the president, secretary, or other principal officer or general managing agent of any corporation which is such a party or for whose benefit the action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, may be examined upon the trial of any such action or proceeding as if under cross-examination, at the instance of the adverse party or parties or any of them, and for that purpose may be compelled, in the same manner and subject to the same rules for examination as any other witness, to testify; but the party calling for such examination shall not be concluded thereby, and may rebut the evidence given thereon by counter or impeaching testimony"); § 4069 ("No party, and no person from, through, or under whom a party derives his interest or title, shall be examined as a witness in respect to any transaction or communication by him personally with a deceased person or with a person then insane, in any civil action or proceeding in which the opposite party derives his title or sustains his liability to the cause of action from, through, or under such deceased person or such insane person, or in which such insane person is a party prosecuting or defending by guardian, unless such opposite party shall first be examined or examine some other witness in his behalf to such transaction or communication between the deceased or insane and such party or person, or unless the testimony of such deceased person given in his lifetime or of such insane person be first read or given in evidence by the opposite party; and then, in either case respectively, only in respect to such transaction or communication of which testimony is so given or to the matters to which such testimony relates"; amended by St. 1901, c. 181, by adding the word "party," in the first line, the words "in his own behalf or interest"); § 4070 ("No party, and no person from, through, or under whom a party derives his interest or title, shall be examined as a witness in respect to any transaction or communication by him personally with an agent of the adverse party or an agent of the person from, through, or under whom such adverse party derives his interest or title, when such agent is dead or insane or otherwise legally incompetent as a witness, unless the opposite party shall first be examined or examine some other witness in his behalf in respect to some transaction or communication between such agent and such other party or person; or unless the testimony of such agent, at any time taken, be first read or given in evidence by the opposite party; and then, in either case respectively, only in respect to such transaction or communication of which testimony is so given or to the matters to which such testimony relates"); § 4071 ("In all criminal actions and proceedings the party charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness, and his refusal or omission to testify shall create no presumption against him or any other party thereto"); § 4072 ("A husband or wife shall not be allowed to disclose a confidential communication made by one to the other during their marriage, without the consent of the other. In an action for criminal conversation the plaintiff's wife is a competent witness for the defendant as to any matter in controversy except as aforesaid"); § 4073 ("A person who has been convicted of a criminal offence is, notwithstanding, a competent witness, but the conviction may be proved to affect his credibility, either by the record or by his own cross-examination, upon which he must answer any question relevant to that inquiry, and the party cross-examining him is not concluded by his answer"); § 4085 ("The Court before whom an infant or person apparently of weak intellect shall be produced as a witness may examine such person to ascertain his capacity and whether he understands the nature and obligations of an oath").

WYOMING: Revised Statutes, 1887 (Civil Procedure), § 2588 ("All persons are competent witnesses, except those of unsound mind and children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts and transactions respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly"); § 2589 ("The following persons shall not testify in certain respects: . . . Third, husband or wife, concerning any communication made by one to the other during coverture, unless the communication was made in the known presence or hearing of a third person competent to be a witness; and the rule shall be the same if the marital relation has ceased to exist. Fourth, a person who assigns his claim or interest, concerning any matter in respect to which he would not, if a party, be permitted to testify. Fifth, a person who, if a party, would be restricted in his evidence under § 2590, shall, where the property or thing is sold or transferred by an executor, administrator, guardian or trustee, heir, devisee, or legatee, be restricted in the same manner in any action or proceeding concerning such property or thing"); § 2590 ("A party shall not testify where the adverse party is the guardian or trustee of either a deaf and dumb or an insane person, or of a child of a deceased person, or is an executor or administrator, or claims or defends as heir, grantee, assignee, devisee, or legatee of a deceased person; except, First, to facts which occurred subsequent to the appointment of the guardian or trustee of an insane person, and, in other cases, subsequent to the time the decedent, grantor, assignor, or testator died; Second, when the action or proceeding relates to a contract made through an agent, by a person since deceased, and the agent testifies, a party may testify on the same subject; Third, if a party, or one having a direct interest, testify to transactions or conversations with another party, the latter may testify to the same transactions or conversations; Fourth, if a party offer evidence of conversations or admissions of the opposite party, the latter may testify concerning the same conversations or admissions; Fifth, in an action or proceeding by or against a partner or joint contractor, the adverse party shall not testify to transactions with or admissions by a partner or joint contractor since deceased, unless the same were made in the presence of the surviving partner or joint contractor; and this rule shall be applied without regard to the character in which the parties sue or are sued; Sixth, if the claim or defence is founded on a book account, a party may testify that the book is his account book, that it is a book of original entries, that the entries therein were made by himself, a person since deceased, or a disinterested person non-resident of the county; whereupon the book shall be competent evidence; and such book may be admitted in evidence in any case, without regard to the parties, upon like proof by any competent witness; Seventh, if a party, after testifying orally, die, the evidence may be proved by either party, on a further trial of the case, whereupon the opposite party may testify as to the same matters; Eighth, if a party die, and his deposition be offered in evidence, the opposite party may testify as to all competent matters therein; Nothing in this section contained shall apply to actions for causing death, or actions or proceedings involving the validity of a deed, will, or codicil; and when a case is plainly within the reason and spirit of the last three sections, though not within the strict letter, their principles shall be applied"); § 2591 ("A party may compel the adverse party to testify orally or by deposition, as any other witness may be thus compelled"); (Criminal Procedure) § 3288 ("The defendant in all criminal cases, in all the courts in this Territory, may be sworn and examined as a witness, if he so elect, but shall not be required to testify in any case. If the defendant so elect, he may make a statement to the jury without being sworn, but the neglect or refusal to make a statement shall not create any presumption against him, nor shall any reference be made to nor shall any comment be made upon such neglect or refusal"); § 3295 ("When two or more persons shall be indicted together the Court may, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defence, direct any one of the defendants to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the Territory. An accused party may, also, when there is not sufficient evidence to put him upon his defence, be discharged by the Court, or, if not discharged by the Court, shall be entitled to the immediate verdict of the jury, for the purpose of giving evidence for others accused with him"); St. 1899, c. 81 ("In no case shall the husband or wife be a witness against the other, except in criminal proceedings for a crime committed by one against the other, or in a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, or an action brought by the husband for criminal conversation with or seduction of his wife, or in an action brought by either husband or wife for the alienation of each other's affections; but they may in all civil and criminal cases be witnesses for each other the same as though the marital relation did not exist").

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC I: ORGANIC CAPACITY.

SUB-TOPIC A: MENTAL DERANGEMENT (INSANITY, IDIOCY, DISEASE, INTOXICATION).

CHAPTER XIX.

§ 492. General Principle of Capacity. There was a period (and it has not long passed away) when the lunatic and the idiot, in the superstitious belief of the times, which regarded madness as an infliction sent from Heaven, were treated as incapable of being witnesses at all:

1628, Coke upon Littleton, 246 b: "Non compos mentis is of four sorts: 1. An idiot, which from his nativity, by a perpetual infirmity, is non compos mentis. 2. He that by sickness, grief, or accident, wholly loses his memory and understanding. 3. A lunatic that hath sometime his understanding and sometime not, 'aliquando gaudet lucidis intervallis,' and therefore he is called 'non compos mentis' so long as he hath not understanding. 4. Lastly, he that by his own vicious act for a time depriveth himself of his memory and understanding, as he that is drunken."

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 365: "It makes no difference from which cause this defect of understanding may have arisen; nor whether it be temporary and curable, or permanent; whether the party be hopelessly an idiot or maniac, or only occasionally insane, as a lunatic; or be intoxicated; or whether the defect arises from mere immaturity of intellect, as in the case of children. While the deficiency of understanding exists, be the cause of what nature soever, the person is not admissible to be sworn as a witness."[1]

But this indiscriminate rule of exclusion, since the progress of our intelligence respecting mental derangement, has been modified and rationalized. While it is still attempted to draw a line which prevents certain classes of persons from being listened to at all — a doubtful policy in any case (post, § 501) —, the law endeavors to make its tests fit the purpose. The question being whether the person is trustworthy as a witness, the law now asks whether in each case the derangement or imbecility is such as to make the person untrustworthy as a witness. It no longer excludes absolutely whenever some degree of derangement or imbecility exists; it asks whether the aberration is in the instance in hand sufficient to negative trustworthiness:

[1] Accord: Co. Litt. 6 b; Com. Dig., "Testmoigne," A. 1; 1786, White's Case, 2 Leach Cr. C., 3d ed., 482; 1813, Livingston v. Kiersted, 10 Johns. 362. The only relaxation of this rule was permitted where the proposed witness was, at the time of offering, enjoying a lucid interval.

1851, R. v. Hill, 2 Den. & P. C. C. 254;[2] the proposed witness said: "I am fully aware that I have a spirit, and 20,000 of them; they are not all mine; I must inquire — I can, where I am; I know which are mine. Those ascend from my stomach to my head, and also those in my ears. . . . They speak to me constantly; they are now speaking to me. . . . I know what it is to take an oath; my catechism taught me from my infancy when it is lawful to swear"; he was then sworn, and gave a perfectly connected and rational account of a transaction which he reported himself to have witnessed; he was in some doubt as to the day of the week on which it took place, and said: "These creatures insist upon it it was Tuesday night, and I think it was Monday. . . . The spirits assist me in speaking of the date; I thought it was Monday, and they told me it was Christmas Eve, — Tuesday; but I was an eye-witness"; the defence contended that the witness was non compos mentis, and that as soon as any unsoundness of mind is manifested in a witness, he ought to be rejected as incompetent; the Court of Criminal Appeal negatived this; Campbell, L. C. J.: "It has been argued that any particular delusion, commonly called monomania, makes a man inadmissible. This would be extremely inconvenient in many cases in proof either of guilt or innocence; it might also cause serious difficulties in the management of lunatic asylums. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judge must, in all such cases, determine the competency and the jury the credibility. . . . The rule which has been contended for would exclude the testimony of Socrates, for he had one spirit always prompting him"; Talfourd, J.: "It would be very disastrous if mere delusions were held to exclude a witness. Some of the greatest and wisest of mankind have had particular delusions."

1865, Chapman, J., in Kendall v. May, 10 All. 64: "This is the only rational and just rule that can be adopted. Insanity exists in various degrees. . . . Persons who are affected to such an extent that it is expedient to place them in insane hospitals or under guardianship often possess sufficient knowledge . . . of events that took place in their presence to make them useful and trustworthy as witnesses. A rigid rule that would exclude the testimony of all such persons as untrustworthy witnesses would not be conformable to facts and therefore would not be founded in good sense."

1892, Walker, J., in Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310, 11 So. 72: "One's infirmity may be such as to render it expedient to place him under guardianship, and even to subject him to personal restraints, and yet he may be fully competent to understand the nature of an oath, to observe facts correctly, and to relate them intelligently and truly. A sweeping rule of disqualification which excludes such a person as a witness would be arbitrary and unsupported by sound reason. The true reason for not admitting the testimony of a person non compos mentis in any case is because his malady involves such a want or impairment of faculty that events are not correctly impressed on his mind, or are not retained in his memory, or that he does not understand his responsibility as a witness. When the reason for the exclusion of the witness does not exist, he should be permitted to testify."

This broad and rational principle — that the derangement, in order to disqualify, must be such as substantially negatives trustworthiness upon the subject of the testimony — is now practically everywhere accepted.[3] In three particular respects this rationalization of the rule affects its present content; in two of them the field of competency becomes broader, in one of them narrower. First, the mere fact of derangement does not in itself exclude the witness; the various forms of monomania are no longer treated as equivalent to complete lunacy. Secondly, the inquiry is always as to the relation of the derangement to the subject to be testified about. If on this subject no derangement appears, the person is acceptable, however untrustworthy on other subjects. Thirdly, the mere fact of sanity at the time of trial is no longer sufficient; for derangement at the time of the events to be testified to may make the person untrustworthy. The inquiry looks to the capacity to observe as well as to the other elements, the capacity to recollect and to narrate.

[2] Also reported in 5 Cox Cr. C. 259; 15 Jur. 470; 5 Eng. L. & Eq. 547; 6 Moore P. C. 341.

[3] 1877, Allen v. State, 60 Ala. 19, semble; 1892, Worthington v. Mencer, 96 id. 310, 11 So. 72 (quoted supra); 1892, Walker v. State, 97 id. 85, 12 So. 83; 1893, Clements v. McGinn, — Cal. —, 33 Pac. 920; 1865, Kendall v. May, 10 All. 64 (quoted supra); 1881, Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 436, 8 N. W. 164; 1898, Guthrie v. Shaffer, 7 Okl. 459, 54 Pac. 698; 1893, State v. Weldon, 39 S. C. 318, 17 S. E. 689; 1822, Evans v. Hettich, 7 Wheat. 470; 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521; 1897, Wright v. Express Co., 80 Fed. 85; 1897, Pittsburg & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 82 Fed. 720 (principle of the Armes case applied; the mere fact of being a committed lunatic is not decisive, though it raises a presumption; the Ohio statute excluding persons of "unsound mind" does not change this principle); 1894, Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt.

§ 493. Capacity of Observation. If the inquiry is to deal with the relation of the derangement of each person to his actual trustworthiness, it seems clear that each of the three elements (ante, § 478) must be considered. Therefore, in the first place, an incapacity to observe intelligently at the time of the events to be observed would suffice to exclude the person:

1859, Waldo, J., in Holcomb v. Holcomb, 28 Conn. 179: "The force of all human testimony depends as much upon the ability of the witness to observe the facts correctly as upon his disposition to describe them honestly, and if the mind of the witness is in such a condition that it cannot accurately observe passing events, . . . the story will make but a feeble impression upon the hearer."[1]

But this necessary conclusion does not seem to have been yet generally accepted; the usual attitude is to consider as immaterial a derangement occurring before the time of testifying:

1878, Horton, C. J., in Sarbach v. Jones, 20 Kan. 500: "The existence of such delusions on his part at the time of the occurrences which he is called upon to relate goes to his credit and not to his competency, when he is of sound mind at the time he is called upon to testify. As there can be neither perfect sanity nor perfect insanity, so no witness, not incompetent within the statute, is to be absolutely excluded because he has been insane and is called upon to narrate matters some of which occurred while he is alleged to have been unconscious."[2]

If this absence of limitation can be regarded as a deliberate step towards the doctrine of the future (post, § 501) that all attempts at exclusion for mental or moral incapacity be abandoned and that each witness' testimony be taken for what it seems to be worth, after testing by cross-examination and impeaching by other evidence, then this step to that end is to be welcomed. But the apparent effect of these decisions seems, in some instances at least, to be an inadvertent one. The Courts have been desirous to point out that the fact of insanity is in itself no bar, and have thus declared broadly that any past insanity, merely as such, is no hindrance, if the witness is sane when testifying.

873; 1902, Czareckl v. R. & N. Co., 30 Wash. 288, 70 Pac. 750; and the cases cited in the ensuing notes. Compare the statutes quoted ante, § 488; their precise wording is not usually of importance, as applied in the decisions.

[1] Accord: 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521; 1892, Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310, 11 So. 72; 1897, Wright v. Express Co., 80 Fed. 85, semble.

[2] Accord: 1853, Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 74; 1893, Clements v. McGinn, — Cal. —, 33 Pac. 920 (former commitment for insanity of a person since discharged does not render incompetent): 1859, Carlton v. Carlton, 40 N. H. 20, semble; 1822, Evans v. Hettich, 7 Wheat. 470. The statutes (ante, § 488) founded on the California Code are responsible chiefly for this result.

§ 494. Capacity of Recollection. The capacity to recollect is an essential part of the idea of testimonial qualification (ante, § 478), and is often noted by the Courts in their definitions.[1] But it seldom occurs as the subject of a specific form of disqualifying aberration.

§ 495. Capacity of Communication. The capacity of communication is the third essential requirement (ante, § 478), and is the one most commonly in controversy. It has two aspects. (1) First, it involves a capacity mentally to understand the nature of questions put and to form and communicate intelligent answers.[1] (2) Secondly, does it involve a sense of moral responsibility, of the duty to make the narration correspond to the recollection and knowledge, i. e. to speak the truth as he sees it? It would seem that the clear absence of such a sense would disqualify the witness. The question is complicated by the necessity, in the earlier cases, of inquiring after that religious sense of the oath-obligation which was in former times paramount, and by the difficulty of determining whether the language of the judges was directed to that subject or to the present one. It is important to know whether, since the oath has been abolished or made optional, an independent testimonial requirement exists, in the shape of a sense of moral responsibility to speak the truth. On principle, it seems to exist; and it has often been pointed out as essential with reference to mental derangement.[2]

§ 496. Standard of Intelligence is in Trial Court's Discretion. If it is asked further what shall be the standard by which this capacity to observe, recollect, and communicate is to be judged, the law is found very properly declining to lay down any more detailed rules. The trial Court must determine this capacity.[1] Any more restricted rule, however ingenious, would fail of

[1] 1892, Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310, 11 So. 72; 1810, Swift, Evidence, Conn., 46 ("sufficient memory to retain facts"); 1894, Bowdle v. R. Co., 103 Mich. 292, 61 N. W. 529; 1881, Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 436, 8 N. W. 164 (assimilating statute to common law); 1822, Hartford v. Palmer, 16 Johns. 143 (understanding sufficient to "retain in their memory the events"); 1876, People v. Hospital, 3 Abb. N. C. 251, Ordronaux, C.; 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521; 1874, Coleman's Case, 25 Gratt. 876 (sufficient "to retain in memory the events").

[1] 1892, Walker v. State, 97 Ala. 85, 12 So. 83 ("narrate the transaction in what appears to be an intelligent, rational manner"); 1810, Swift, Evidence, 46, Conn. ("sufficient understanding to relate facts"); 1894, Bowdle v. R. Co., 103 Mich. 292, 61 N. W. 529; 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521; 1874, Coleman's Case, 25 Gratt. 876. The following ruling seems erroneous: 1879, State v. Feltes, 51 Ia. 496, 1 N. W. 755 (insanity at the time of a confession, held not to exclude it).

[2] 1851, R. v. Hill, 2 Den. & P. C. C. 254, 5 Cox Cr. C. 259, semble; 1892, Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310, 11 So. 72 ("understand his responsibility as a witness"); 1810, Swift, Evidence, 46, Conn. ("sense of right and wrong"; where "utterly incapable of any sense of truth," they are excluded); 1865, Kendall v. May, 10 All. 63 ("sufficient knowledge of the nature of an oath"; at this time religious tests had been abolished); 1881, Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 437, 8 N. W. 164 ("possess the ability and appreciate the duty to relate events truly"); 1822, Hartford v. Palmer, 16 Johns. 142; 1874, Coleman's Case, 25 Gratt. 876 ("a sufficient share of understanding to appreciate the nature and obligation of an oath, to distinguish between right and wrong"); 1882, District v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521, semble. Compare the cases cited post, § 1822 (oath-capacity).

[1] 1840, R. v. Hill, 2 Den. & P. C. C. 254, semble; 1841, Armstrong's Lessees v. Timmons, 3 Harringt. 345; 1819, Den v. Vancleve 2 South. N. J. 653; 1865, Kendall v. May, 10 All. 63; 1881, Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 436, 8 its purpose, and would hamper rather than assist the process of procuring trustworthy testimony.

§ 497. Capacity presumed; Methods of Ascertainment; Judge and Jury. (a) The general rule here applies (ante, § 484) that the capacity of the person offered as a witness is presumed; i. e. to exclude a witness on the ground of mental or moral incapacity the existence of the incapacity must be made to appear.[1] What is sufficient in order that the offering party may be put to the necessity of adducing evidence of capacity, and the judge to the necessity of determining the existence of capacity, has not been made entirely clear by decisions. It may be supposed that a mere objection raised and a claim to have a voir dire examination would suffice. Moreover, the offering of any extrinsic evidence whatever would suffice to make it necessary for the judge to record a similar finding; though an upper Court should pay no attention to the lack of such a finding unless the nature of the evidence appeared. But it is generally accepted that the fact that the witness is, at the time of testifying, or was shortly beforehand, a lawful inmate of a lunatic asylum, or an adjudged lunatic, makes it necessary that his capacity should be examined into and an express finding appear.[2] (b) The ways in which the insanity may appear are four: (1) The general behavior of the person, while in court and before taking the stand, may be such as to exhibit the derangement to the judge; (2) The person may be questioned on the voir dire, so that his condition appears at once;[3] (3) Other witnesses to the derangement may be ered before the person's testimony is begun;[4] (4) The examination or cr s-examination may disclose clearly the incapacity, in which case the preceding part of testimony may be struck out; or may disclose grounds of doubt, in which case a voir dire or other witnesses may be resorted to.[5] (c) The pre-

N. W. 164; 1891, Davis v. State, 31 Nebr. 248, 47 N. W. 851; 1895, State v. Meyers, 46 Id. 152, 64 N. W. 697; 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521.

For the degree of mental derangement that impeaches credibility, see post, § 932.

[1] 1856, Formby v. Wood, 19 Ga. 581 (a lunatic's affidavit); 1888, Mayor v. Caldwell, 81 id. 78, 7 S. E. 99 (here the deposition of one afterwards adjudged a lunatic, examined by commission and certified to have been duly sworn, was assumed as competent); 1881, Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 437, 8 N. W. 164.

[2] 1834, Ex parte ——, 3 Dowl. Pr. 161, semble (habeas corpus ad test.); 1871, Spittle v. Walton, L. R. 11 Eq. 420 (in taking an affidavit from an inmate of an asylum, the preliminary inquiry into capacity must appear); 1835, Re Christie, 5 Paige Ch. 241 (petition by adjudged lunatic; officer certifying it must state that capacity has been examined); 1876, Ordronaux, C., in People v. Hospital, 3 Abb. N. C. 252 (witness formerly in asylum); 1897, Pittsburg & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 82 Fed. 720 (cited ante, § 492). In Mayor v. Caldwell, 81 Ga. 78, 7 S. E. 99 (1888), the decision held merely that the trial Court was not wrong in assuming the competency of the insane deponent and in leaving the jury to give the deposition what credit they pleased; there is no attempt to lay down the doctrine that the testimony of a conceded lunatic, if attacked, shall go to the jury without preliminary inquiry as to competency. The apparent doctrine of Clements v. McGlun, — Cal. —, 33 Pac. 920 (1893), that a discharge from a State asylum is prima facie evidence of competency, seems proper, and would render a preliminary examination in such case not indispensable.

[3] 1847, Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, 1 Exch. 95, per Parke, B.; 1876, White v. State, 52 Miss. 216, 223 (defendant may examine as to sanity of prosecution's witness, even though the judge had before trial determined it to his own satisfaction); 1882, District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 521 (the Court may examine).

[4] 1847, Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, supra. Contra, but unsound: 1844, Robinson v. Dana, 16 Vt. 474. In Mayor v. Caldwell, 81 Ga. 78, 7 S. E. 99 (1888), a lunatic's deposition being offered, though the trial Court was held right in refusing to hear impeaching evidence and to determine for itself and in sending all the evidence to the jury to consider, the general doctrine of considering extrinsic evidence was not denied.

[5] 1866, R. v. Whitehead, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 33. Compare the cases cited post, § 1820 (oath).

liminary determination of capacity is for the judge, not the jury (ante, § 487, post, § 2550); and it is therefore an improper practice for the judge to leave the testimony provisionally to the jury, to be rejected by them if found ineligible according to legal standards;[6] the jury have nothing to do with preliminary questions of admissibility. But, after the Court has passed on the witness' capacity, it is still open to the jury to conclude that the witness is not credible and to reject the testimony entirely; and the Court's decision does not necessarily affect the estimate which the jury must make.[7]

§ 498. Deaf-and-Dumb Persons not Idiots. At the time when unscientific ideas prevailed concerning mental derangement, the deaf-and-dumb were so far treated as idiots that they were presumed to be incapable of testifying, until the contrary was shown.[1] To-day this presumption has disappeared:

1845, Jewett, J., in People v. McGee, 1 Den. 21: "[The woman] was of sense sufficient to have intelligence conveyed to her and to communicate intelligence to T. by signs and motions. . . . If she had sufficient reason to have intelligence conveyed to her by T. and to communicate facts to the understanding of T., although she was not able to talk or write, she could have been sworn and testified through him by signs."[2]

No doubt it may sometimes be wise to examine into the capacity of such persons; but ordinarily the only question will be as to the possibility of communicating with them by some certain system of signs.[3] So far as such persons are shown to be weak-minded, the principles applicable to lunatics will govern.[4]

§ 499. Intoxication. It follows from the modern theory of mental derangement (ante, § 492) that intoxication, even habitual, does not in itself incapacitate a person offered as a witness. The question is, in each instance, whether the witness was so bereft of his powers of observation, recollection, or narration, that he is thoroughly untrustworthy as a witness on the subject in hand:

1794, Walker's Trial, 23 How. St. Tr. 1153; re-examination of Thomas Dunn, an informer: Dunn [answering a question, to explain his past behavior]: "I went there when I was intoxicated, the same as I am now." Mr. Justice Heath: "How long have you been intoxicated?" "Not very long; I have my recollection about me, though it may seem to the Court that I may be ill or may not." "Were you intoxicated when you gave your evidence just now?" "I was not. . . . Drunk or sober, I will speak the

[6] Contra: 1894, Mead v. Harris, 101 Mich. 585, 60 N. W. 284, semble. In Mayor v. Caldwell, 81 Ga. 78, 7 S. E. 99 (1888), the decision was merely that the trial Court was not wrong on the facts in declining to withdraw the evidence (a deposition) from the jury.

[7] 1895, Bowdie v. R. Co., 103 Mich. 292, 61 N. W. 529 (McGrath, J., diss., construing Mead v. Harris, supra).

[1] 1680, Hale, Pl. Cr. I, 34; 1786, R. v. Rnston, 1 Leach Cr. L., 4th ed., 408; 1827, Morrison v. Lennard, 3 C. & P. 127; 1769, Bl. Com. IV, 303; 1842, Greenl. Evid. § 366.

[2] Accord: 1896, Ritchey v. Peopie, 23 Colo. 314, 47 Pac. 272 (a deaf-mute, admitted, in spite of difficulty in conducting the examination); 1893, State v. Howard, 118 Mo. 127, 143, 24 S. W. 41 (deaf-mute not assumed mentally incompetent); 1893, State v. Weldon, 39 S. C. 318, 17 S. E. 689; 1882, Quinn v. Halbert, 55 Vt. 228 (admitting the testimony of one who "was bereft of the power of speech, and could not explain any proposition, but only assent or dissent in answer to a direct question by a nod or shake of the head").

[3] For the method of deaf-and-dumb testimony by signs, see post, § 811.

[4] The following decision commits an atrocity in the name of the law: 1901, Lee v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. 285, 64 S. W. 1047 (rape by intercourse with a woman mentally incapable; the incapacity which is essential to the crime, held also to make the woman incompetent to testify).

truth"; Mr. Justice Heath: "I do not know that we can examine a man that is drunk"; the counsel for the prosecution, Mr. Law, proceeded to ask further questions; Mr. Justice Heath: "How can you, Mr. Law, examine him after he has told you he is intoxicated? He has made himself so exceedingly drunk, it is impossible to examine him"; but the cross-examiner, Mr. Erskine, was allowed to proceed.

1854, Chilton, C. J., in Eskridge v. State, 25 Ala. 33: "It does not follow necessarily that, because the party was much intoxicated, his reason was so far dethroned as to disable him from comprehending the effect of his admissions or from giving a true account of the occurrence to which they had reference."

First, then, the capacity of observation (ante, § 478) at the time of the events to be testified to, may be such as should exclude the witness as untrustworthy.[2] Yet here is found a tendency, already noted (ante, § 493), to forget this requisite, and to declare that the time of taking the stand is that which alone is to be considered:

1824, Duncan, J., in Gebhart v. Shindle, 15 S. & R. 238: "The point of inquiry is the moment of examination; is the witness then offered so besotted in his understanding as to be deprived of his intelligence? If he is exclude him; if he be a hard drinker, an habitual drunkard, yet if at that time he is sober and possessed of a sound mind, he is to be received."[3]

Secondly, the capacity of recollection may appear to be so affected that the witness is untrustworthy:

1819, Hartford v. Palmer, 16 Johns. 143: "It is a temporary derangement of the mind; and it is impossible for such men to have such a memory of events of which they may have had a knowledge as to be able to present them fairly and faithfully."

Finally, the capacity of intelligent and truthful narration may appear to be destroyed temporarily. Here regard is to be had only to the time when the person is put on the stand to testify:

1819, Hartford v. Palmer, 16 Johns. 143: "A present and existing intoxication to a considerable degree utterly disqualifies the person so affected to narrate facts and events in a way at all to be relied on. It would, we think, be profaning the sanctity of an oath to tender it to a man who had no present sense of the obligations it imposed."

1845, Rogers, J., in Gould v. Crawford, 2 Pa. St. 90, Rogers, J.: "The Court will not suffer a person to be examined as a witness who is in such a state that he cannot understand the obligation of an oath. . . . Yet such cases must depend on the sound discretion of the Court that hears the cause. There are degrees of intoxication; of which the Court alone can judge."[4]

A confession must be judged with reference to the time of its utterance; but the mere fact of intoxication at the time does not of itself exclude the confession.[5]

[1] Accord: 1880, People v. Ramirez, 56 Cal. 536.

[2] 1883, State v. Costello, 62 Ia. 407, 17 N. W. 605, semble.

[3] Accord: 1874, Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

[4] Accord: 1883, State v. Costello, 62 Ia. 407, semble; 1824, Gebhart v. Shindle, 15 S. & R. 238.

For drunkenness as impeaching credibility, see post, § 933.

[5] 1696, Vaughan's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 507 ff.; 1835, R. v. Spilsbury, 7 C. & P. 187; 1878, Lester v. State, 32 Ark. 730; 1879, State v. Feltes, 51 Ia. 496, 1 N. W. 755; 1898, State v. Berry, 50 La. An. 1309, 24 So. 329; 1857, Com. v. Howe, 9 Gray 112, semble; 1899, Com. v. Chance, 174 Mass. 245, 54 N. E. 551 (recent recovery from delirium tremens); 1881, State v. Grear, 28 Minn. 426, 10 N. W. 472; 1862, Jefferds v. People, 5 Park. Cr. 547; 1898, State v.

§ 500. Disease, Blindness, etc. The capacity of observation may be otherwise so lacking, particularly through blindness, that the witness may be incompetent to testify on the specific subject to which the incapacity relates. The capacity of recollection or of communication may also be so affected by disease or otherwise as to lead to the same result.[1] The discretion of the Court must control.[2]

§ 501. Policy of Abolishing Disqualification through Mental Derangement. The tendency of modern times is to abandon all attempts to distinguish between incapacity which affects only the degree of credibility and incapacity which excludes the witness entirely. The whole question is one of degree only, and the attempt to measure degrees and to define that point at which total incredibility ceases and credibility begins is an attempt to discover the intangible. The subject is not one which deserves to be brought within the realm of legal principle, and it is profitless to pretend to make it so. Here is a person on the stand; perhaps he is a total imbecile, in manner, but perhaps, also, there will be a gleam of sense here and there in his story. The jury had better be given the opportunity of disregarding the evident nonsense and of accepting such sense as may appear. There is usually abundant evidence ready at hand to impeach him when he is truly an imbecile or suffers under a dangerous delusion. It is simpler and safer to let the jury perform the process of measuring the impeached testimony and of sifting out whatever traces of truth may seem to be contained in it. The step was long ago advocated by the English commission of judges, in their proposals of reform,[1] and has been approved by two such distinguished writers on the law of Evidence as Mr. Best[2] and Mr. Justice Taylor.[3]

Cannon, 52 S. C. 452, 30 S. E. 589 (confession under the influence of morphine); 1883, Williams v. State, 12 Lea 212; 1897, Leach v. State, 99 Tenn. 584, 42 S. W. 195 (slight intoxication); 1894, White v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 625, 636, 25 S. W. 784. Drunkenness induced for the purpose of securing a confession should exclude it: Ga. Code 1895, § 5194 (admissions obtained by "drunkenness induced for the purpose" are not receivable); 1903, McNutt v. State, — Nebr. —, 94 N. W. 143 (liquor given by the sheriff, who then questioned the accused; held inadmissible); 1886, McCabe v. Com., — Pa. —, 8 Atl. 54, semble (a confession made under the influence of liquor given by an officer to make the accused talk).

[1] 1876, Isler v. Dewey, 75 N. C. 466; 1885, Hoard v. State, 15 Lea 321, semble (wound in head).

[2] 1861, People v. Robinson, 19 Cal. 40 (confession in sleep); 1893, Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 35 N. E. 1 (person injured by a wound). It has been ruled that the use of opium, as affecting the powers of observation and recollection, cannot suffice to exclude the user: 1895, State v. White, 10 Wash. 611, 39 Pac. 160.

[1] 1853, Common Law Practice Commissioners (Jervis, Cockburn, Martin, Bramwell, Willes, and Walton, all afterwards Judges, except the last), Second Report, p. 10: "Plain sense and reason would obviously suggest that any living witness who could throw light upon a fact in issue should be heard to state what he knows, subject always to such observations as may arise as to his means of knowledge or his disposition to tell the truth."

[2] Evidence, §§ 62, 144.

[3] Evidence, § 1210. It was originally proposed by Bentham: Rationale of Jud. Evid. b. IX, pt. III, c. VI (Works, VII, 427).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC I (continued): ORGANIC CAPACITY.

SUB-TOPIC B: MENTAL IMMATURITY (INFANCY).

CHAPTER XX.

§ 505. General Principle. That with reference to the general capacity to observe, recollect, and narrate, the same principles apply to mental immaturity that are applied to mental derangement, seems undoubted. The question, however, of paramount importance in the earlier common law precedents has been the eligibility of children to take the oath; and the religious sense required for this has usually been the sole subject of argument, to the neglect of the question whether, independently of the oath, any particular degree of intelligence is necessary as a purely testimonial element. It is not always possible to determine whether the language of the Courts is used in view of the oath-test or of an independent testimonial requirement. But this much may be taken as settled, that no rule defines any particular age as conclusive of incapacity; in each instance the capacity of the particular child is to be investigated.[1]

§ 506. Capacity of Observation, Recollection, and Communication. (1) The capacity of observation (ante, § 478) is the first of the essential requirements, and has been occasionally so noted by the Courts.[1] (2) The capacity of recollection is also an essential requirement;[2] though little likely to be called into question, and probably often intended to be covered by the expressions defiuing the next requirement. (3) For the capacity of communication,

[1] 1779, R. v. Brasier, 1 Leach Cr. L. 199 ("There is no precise or fixed rnle as to the time within which infants are excluded from giving evidence; but their admissibility . . . is to be collected from their answers to questions propounded to them by the Court"; said primarily of the oath test); 1902, State v. King, 117 Ia. 484, 91 N. W. 768 ("All modern decisions seem to declare intelligence, and not age, the proper test"). Accord: 1889, McGuff v. State, 88 Ala. 147, 7 So. 35; 1873, Draper v. Draper, 68 Ill. 17; 1866, State v. Ross, 18 La. An 342; 1867, State v. Denis, 19 id. 119; 1903, State v. Williams, 111 La. —, 35 So. 505; 1813, Com. v. Hntchinson, 10 Mass. 225; 1887, Hughes v. R. Co., 65 Mich. 10, 31 N. W. 605; 1819, Den v. Vancleve, 2 Sonth. N. J 653; 1895, Terr. v. DeGutman, 8 N. M. 92, 42 Pac. 68.

The statntory definitions of infants' capacity are collected ante, § 488.

[1] 1874, Wade v. State, 50 Ala. 164 ("intelligent enough to observe"); 1883, Kelly v. State, 73 id. 22 ("of snfficient years and discretion to know what occnrs"); 1867, Flanagin v. State, 25 Ark. 96; 1858, People v. Bernal, 10 Cal. 66 ("sufficient intelligence to receive just impressions of the facts"; compare the phrasing of the California and related codes); 1890, Ridenhour v. R. Co. 102 Mo. 288, 13 S. W. 889 (applying the statntory definition); 1881, State v. Johnson, 9 Or. 459.

[2] 1876, Stephen, Dig. Evid., Art. 107; 1883, Kelly v. State, 75 Ala. 22 ("of sufficient years and discretion . . . to remember what occurs"); 1867, Flanagin v. State, 25 Ark. 96.

as in the case of mental derangement (ante, § 495), there are two elements to be taken into consideration: (a) There must be a capacity to understand questions put, and to frame and express intelligent answers.[3] (b) There must be a sense of moral responsibility, — a consciousness of the duty to speak the truth. Here it is that the difficulty chiefly comes in determining whether the Courts intend to establish a testimonial requirement independent of the oath. It would seem that they do.[4]

§ 507. Standard of Intelligence; Discretion of Trial Court. Agreeably to sound policy, and to the analogy of principle in cases of mental derangement, the trial Court must be the one to determine finally, upon all the circumstances, whether the child has sufficient intelligence according to the foregoing requirements:

1895, Brewer, J., in Wheeler v. U. S., 159 U. S. 523, 16 Sup. 93: "The decision of this question rests primarily with the trial judge, who sees the proposed witness, notices his manner, his apparent possession or lack of intelligence, and may resort to any examination which will tend to disclose his capacity and intelligence, as well as his understanding of the obligations of an oath. As many of these matters cannot be photographed into the record, the decision of the trial judge will not be disturbed on review, unless from that which is preserved it is clear that it was erroneous."[1]

[3] 1680, Hale, Pl. Cr., I, 302 ("of a competent discretion"); 1876, Stephen, Dig. Evid., Art. 107 ("understanding the questions put to him, giving rational answers to those questions"); 1874, Wade v. State, 50 Ala. 164 ("intelligence enough to narrate"); 1883, Kelly v. State, 75 Ala. 22 ("of sufficient intelligence to narrate what occurs"); 1858, People v. Hernal, 10 Cal. 66 ("sufficient capacity to relate facts correctly"); 1894, State v. Douglas, 53 Kan. 669, 671, 37 Pac. 172; 1894, White v. Com., — Ky. —, 28 S. W. 348 ("sufficient intelligence to truthfully narrate facts to which its attention is directed"); 1861, Com. v. Mullins, 2 All. 296 ("the possession of sufficient intelligence to testify in the case"); 1896, Com v. Robinson, 165 Mass. 426, 43 N. E. 121 ("sufficient intelligence"); 1895, Territory v. De Gutman, 8 N. M. 92, 42 Pac. 68 ("sufficient discretion and understanding," "sufficient natural intelligence"); 1881, State v. Jackson, 9 Or. 459.

[4] 1779, R. v. Brasier, 1 Leach Cr. L. 199 ("the sense and reason they entertain of the danger and impiety of falsehood"); 1876, Stephen, Evid., Art. 107, and App. Note XL ("knowing that he ought to speak the truth"); 1810, Swift, Evidence, 45 ("their sense of the obligation to speak the truth, . . . understand the distinction between right and wrong"); 1889, McGuff v. State, 88 Ala. 150, 7 So. 35, semble ("sense and reason they entertain of the danger and impiety of falsehood"); 1878, Johnson v. State, 61 Ga 36 ("the capacity to understand the nature of an oath, — which means, perhaps, the degree of intelligence the child shows, so as to satisfy the Court that she is impressed that she ought to tell the truth on such a solemn occasion rather than a lie"); 1869, Simpson v. State, 31 Ind. 90; 1842, State v. Whittier, 21 Me. 347, semble ("a sense of accountability for moral conduct"); 1813, Com. v. Hutchinson, 10 Mass. 225 ("a sufficient sense of the wickedness and danger of false swearing"); 1896, Com. v. Robinson, 165 id. 426, 43 N. E. 121 ("sufficient sense of the duty of telling the truth"); 1862, Washburn v. People, 10 Mich. 374, 386, semble; 1880, McGuire v. People, 44 id. 287, 6 N. W. 669, semble; 1887, Hughes v. R. Co., 65 id. 10, 31 N. W. 605 ("A child cannot testify unless capable of appreciating the obligation of his oath, if he takes an oath, or his affirmation if that is substituted. . . . He must be able to comprehend it; . . . disposed to tell the truth under some sense of obligation"); 1876, State v. Levy, 23 Minn 108; 1881, State v. Jackson, 9 Or. 459; 1895, State v. Reddington, 7 S. D. 368, 68 N. W. 170; 1895, Wheeler v. U. S., 159 U. S. 523, 16 Sup. 93 ("appreciation of the difference between truth and falsehood, as well as of his duty to tell the former"); 1893, State v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 568, 16 S. E. 803, semble. Compare the precedents cited post, § 1821 (oath). It would seem that, irrespective of theology, the child could be instructed in moral duties, for the purpose of testifying: 1902, State v. King, 117 Ia. 484, 91 N. W. 768.

[1] Accord: 1896, People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 469, 44 Pac. 186; 1897, People v. Baldwin, 117 id. 244, 49 Pac. 186; 1901, People v. Daily, 135 id. 104, 67 Pac. 16; 1902, People v. Swist, 136 id. 520, 69 Pac. 223; 1894, Williams v. U. S., 3 D. C. App. 335, 339; 1873, Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 527; 1896, Minton v. State, 99 id. 254, 25 S. E. 626; 1902, State v. King, 117 Ia. 484, 91 N. W. 768; 1895, Freeny v. Freeny, 80 Md. 406, 31 Atl 304; 1861, Com. v. Mullins, 2 All. 296; 1896, Com v. Robinson, 165 Mass. 426, 43 N. E. 121; 1897, People v. Walker, 113 Mich. 367, 71 N. W. 641; 1876, State v. Levy, 23 Minn. 108; 1890, Ridenhour v. R. Co., 102 Mo. 288, 13 S. W. 889; 1896, State v. Nelson, 132 id. 184, 33 S. W. 809; 1896, State v. Prather, 136 id. 20, 37 S. W. 805; 1895, State v. Sawtelle, 66 N. H. 488, 32

Nevertheless, the Supreme Courts, instead of enforcing this principle rigidly, continue to revise rulings upon the competency of children whom they have never seen or heard.[2] Time should not be wasted on such a task.

§ 508. Capacity Presumed; Method of Ascertainment. In the precedents dealing with the oath-test, the fact of capacity is not presumed but must be shown, where the child is under fourteen years of age,[1] or certainly where it is under seven years of age[2]; and the same rules are commonly applied under the present principle.[3] The methods of ascertainment of children's testimonial capacity are the same as those employed for the oath, and the subject can best be examined under that head (post, § 1820).

§ 509. Policy of Abolishing Disqualification by Infancy. A rational view of the peculiarities of child-nature, and of the daily course of justice in our courts, must lead to the conclusion that the effort to measure a priori the degrees of trustworthiness in children's statements, and to distinguish the point at which they cease to be totally incredible and acquire suddenly some degree of credibility, is futile and unprofitable. The desirability of abandoning this attempt and abolishing all grounds of mental or moral incapacity has already been noted, in dealing with mental derangement (ante, § 501). The reasons apply with equal or greater force to the testimony of children. Recognizing on the one hand the childish disposition to weave romances and to treat imagination for verity, and on the other the rooted ingenuousness of children and their tendency to speak straightforwardly what is in their minds, it must be concluded that the sensible way is to put the child upon the stand and let it tell its story for what it may seem to be worth. To this result legislation must come.[1] To be genuinely strict in applying the existing re-

Atl. 831; 1900, State v. Cracker, 65 N. J. L. 410, 47 Atl. 643; 1881, State v. Jackson, 9 Or. 459; 1813, State v. Leblanc, 1 Tread. Const. (S. C.) 357; 1900, Burke v. Ellis, 105 Tenn. 702, 58 S. W. 855; 1899, State v. Blythe, 20 Utah 378, 58 Pac. 1108; 1903, State v. Bailey, — Wash. —, 71 Pac. 715; 1901, Uthermohlen v. Boggs R. M. & M. Co., 50 W. Va. 457, 40 S. E. 410 (good opinion by Brannon, P.); 1894, State v. Juneau, 88 Wis. 180, 59 N. W. 580.

[2] 1902, Walker v. State, 134 Ala. 86, 32 So. 703 (child of 10 years, held qualified); 1903, Castleberry v. State, 135 id. 24, 33 So. 424 (rape; the child, 8 years old, held competent); 1898, St. Louis I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Waren, 65 Ark. 619, 48 S. W. 222 (statute applied); 1902, People v. Swist, 136 Cal. 520, 69 Pac. 223 (boy 6 years of age, held competent); 1894, Williams v. U. S., 3 D. C. App. 335, 340 (admitting a child of 7½ years as competent); 1896, Gaines v. State, 99 Ga. 703, 26 S. E. 760 (excluded on the facts); 1896, Republic v. Ah Wong, 10 Haw. 524, 528 (child of 5, excluded on the facts; Judd, C. J., diss.); 1902, State v. Wilson, 109 La. 74, 33 So. 85 (rape, the little girl, between 3 and 4 years old, held not sufficiently intelligent); 1901, Com v. Ramage, 177 Mass. 349, 58 N. E. 1078 (child 6 years old, admitted); 1902, People v. Beech, 129 Mich. 622, 89 N. W. 363 (child of 6, held incompetent); 1903, Trim v. State, — Miss. —, 33 So. 718 (child 5 years of age, held competent); 1896, State v. Nelson, 132 Mo. 184, 33 S. W. 809 (child 9 years old, admitted); 1895, Wheeler v. U. S., 159 U. S. 523, 16 Sup. 93 (child 5½ years old, admitted); 1899, State v. Blythe, 20 Utah 378, 58 Pac. 1108 (child 6 years old, admitted). Compare the statutes cited ante, § 488, and the cases cited post, § 1821 (oath).

[1] 1680, Hale, Pl. Cr., I, 302.

[2] 1779, R. v. Brasier, 1 Leach Cr. L. 199; post, § 1821.

[3] 1902, State v. King, 117 Ia. 484, 91 N. W. 768 (child under 14, presumed incompetent); 1903, State v. Frazier, 109 La. 458, 33 So. 561 (a child of 10, whose dying declarations were admitted, presumed incompetent); 1887, Hughes v. R. Co., 65 Mich. 10, 31 N. W. 605, semble (here the child was under 7, and the failure of the trial judge to examine and expressly find sufficient understanding was held erroneous); 1895, Terr. v. De Gutman, 8 N. M. 92, 42 Pac. 68 (child under 14, presumed incompetent); 1893, State v. Michael, 37 W. Va 568, 16 S. E. 803 (stating confusedly that under 14 there is no presumption of competency, and under 6 there is a presumption of incompetency; the effect being that below 14 the offeror must show the child's capacity).

[1] See the Canadian statutes cited ante, § 488.

quirement is either impossible or unjust; for our demands are contrary to the facts of child-nature:

1887, Campbell, C. J., in Hughes v. R. Co., 65 Mich. 10, 31 N. W. 605: "We are compelled to apply the law as we find it, until changed by legislation. But we are greatly impressed with the practical imperfection of the present rules. In France, and probably elsewhere, the Courts refuse to administer an oath to children of tender years, and allow them to be examined without anything more than suitable cautions, leaving their statements on direct and cross-examination to be taken for what they are worth. This seems to be a sensible proceeding, and is probably quite as efficacious as our present system and less likely to abuse. . . . It would be better, we think, to put their testimony on the more rational ground that it is calculated to be of some value, and capable under a proper examination of being reasonably well weighed for what it is worth."

1881, Robert Louis Stevenson, Child's Play (in "Virginibus Puerisque"): "It is when we make castles in the air and personate the leading character in our own romances that we return to the spirit of our first years. In all the child's world of dim sensations, play is all in all. 'Making believe' is the gist of his whole life, and he cannot so much as take a walk except in character. . . . One thing, at least, comes very clearly out of all these considerations, that whatever we are to expect at the hands of children, it should not be any peddling exactitude about matters of fact. They walk in a vain show, and among mists and rainbows; they are passionate after dreams and unconcerned about realities; speech is a difficult art not wholly learned; and there is nothing in their own tastes or purposes to teach them what we mean by abstract truthfulness. . . . Show us a miserable unbreeched human entity, whose whole profession it is to take a tub for a fortified town and a shaving-brush for the deadly stiletto, and who passes three fourths of his time in a dream and the rest in open self-deception, and we expect him to be as nice upon a matter of fact as a scientific expert bearing evidence. Upon my heart, I think it less than decent."

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC I (continued): ORGANIC CAPACITY.

SUB-TOPIC C: MORAL DEPRAVITY.

CHAPTER XXI.

§ 515. General Principle. A quality which affects only the element of Communication (ante, § 478) is Moral Depravity. One who is wholly capable of correct Observation and of accurate Recollection may still be so lacking in the sense of moral responsibility as to be likely to tell his story with entire indifference as to its correspondence with the facts observed and recollected by him. The question is whether any person should upon such grounds be deemed to lack the fundamental capacity of a witness.

There are two objections to any attempt to establish such an incapacity. The first is that in rational experience no class of persons can safely be asserted to be so thoroughly lacking in the sense of moral responsibility or so callous to the ordinary motives of veracity as not to tell the truth (as they see it) in a large or the larger proportion of instances; or, in more accurate analysis, no such defect, if it exists, can be so well ascertainable as to justify us in predicating it for the purpose of exclusion.[1] The second reason is that, even if such a defect existed and were ascertainable, its operation is so uncertain and elusive that any general rule of exclusion would be as likely in a given instance to exclude the truth as to exclude falsities. It is therefore not a proper foundation for a rule of exclusion.

Nevertheless, this conclusion of rational experience is of comparatively modern acceptance. Tradition has handed down to us a number of instances in which certain classes of persons were either excluded or attempted to be excluded on the ground of moral irresponsibility or depravity. In times of more primitive development, such an attitude was not inconsistent with the prevailing social and moral notions;[2] and the abandonment of that attitude has been due to a change in those notions. Some of them never found positive recognition in judicial rulings; they remained merely as unsuccessful attempts. In other instances a definite recognition was given; and the abandonment has come either through judicial disowning or through legislative abolition. The circumstances which were thus once conceived to involve a disqualification may be grouped as five in number: (1) Race or color; (2) sex; (3) religion; (4) infamy (conviction of crime); (5) turpitude of sundry sorts.

[1] The exposition of this has been made by Mr. Bentham, in a passage quoted for another purpose, post, § 519.

§ 516. (1) Alienage, Race, or Color. It is everywhere a deep-rooted instinct to distrust the alien of another nation, — much more the alien of another theology or race or color. The progressive diminution of the strength of this instinct, from the days of primitive commercial interchange between neighboring tribes to the modern solidarity of international commerce, has been almost imperceptibly slow; the last hundred years have probably seen more rapid progress, in European and American spheres, than all the preceding centuries. It is a part of this primitive instinct to distrust the good faith and honesty of the alien. It was a much-mooted question in Christendom, down into the 1600s, whether faith should be pledged or need be kept with infidels, or alien infidels, or alien enemies.[1] The singular inconsistency of such a maxim, in furnishing to the alien equal grounds for charging ourselves with the very fault which forms our pretext for condemning him, both typifies the hypocritical basis of all such rules, wherever persisting, and explains the slowness with which progress is made towards better mutual understanding between alien peoples. They are hypocritical, because they assume a superiority which does not in substance exist; and they obstruct progress, because they perpetuate our blindness to the degree of our own faults and of the alien's virtues.

It is no doubt true that certain races are less strongly moved to constant truth-speaking than are others; and the causes, sociological and physiological, are sometimes not difficult to analyze.[2] But it is by no means certain that the English-speaking peoples are the most veracious; it is probable (according to travellers' reports) that some others excel them; so that the difference becomes merely a question of degree. Moreover, the quality of truth-speaking is only one part of the larger trait of honesty and loyalty in general; and, among the other qualities which go to make up that larger

[2] Compare the history of the rules of number of witnesses, post, § 2032.

[1] Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, b. II, c. 15, § 8; Phillimore, International Law, 3d ed., vol. II, p. 74; Hallam, Literature of Europe, II, 163, 176, 179; Lecky, Rationalism in Europe, II, 111; Hinschius, Kirchenrecht, VI, pt. 1, p. 99, § 364; Coke, in Calvin's Case, 7 Rep. 2 a, 17 a ("All infidels are in law perpetui inimici, . . . for between them, as with the devils whose subjects they be, and the Christian, there is perpetual hostility and can be no peace"). Chief Justice Willes, in 1745, in that great landmark of enlightened legal opinion, the case of Omichund v. Barker (1 Atk. 21), commenting on this doctrine of Coke's as contrary to "common humanity," declared that "the devils, to whom he [Coke] has delivered them [the Pagans], could not have suggested anything worse."

[2] Some of them have been noted by the present writer in an article in the American Law Register, N. s., 1897, pp. 437, 445, entitled "The Administration of Justice in Japan."

trait, there are certainly some in which the Occidental peoples are not much, if at all, superior to some of the Oriental peoples. Again, whatever comparison can be made at all between Occidental and Asiatic or African peoples, as to their standards of veraciousness, ought to be based on the respective practice of each people among its own members, i.e. the Chinese dealing with the Chinese, the German with the German, and so on; because there has everywhere and always been a tendency (rooted in human nature), as between aliens, to abandon reciprocally their own native standards, which they would have observed towards their own people; and thus such dealings afford no criterion for judging the normal standard of their people. Add to this, finally, that the classes of native persons with whom the resident alien comes into contact are usually the less scrupulous and honorable; and it will be understood that such observers have merely the less trustworthy sources for forming a judgment upon the people as a whole, and that thus the reports which they send home are by no means a sound basis for public opinion and legislative enactment.[2] Taking all these considerations together, it may be concluded that any judgment of condemnation for the testimony of aliens in general, or of particular races or peoples, is likely to be, in the first place, absolutely incorrect, as not founded on facts; in the second place, relatively unjust, as assuming a superiority of honesty which can only be hypothetical; in the third place, unwise, as tending merely to perpetuate ill-feeling and misunderstanding; and, finally, unsound in principle, as excluding indiscriminately a mass of testimony which ought rather to be weighed and credited in each individual instance for what it may seem to be worth.[4] Such exclusion of testimony, nevertheless, has existed, at one time or another, in four forms:

(a) Aliens, in general. It would seem that at one time in our history, for some purposes at least, a ban had prevailed against aliens as witnesses.[5]

[2] To offer here the authorities for the above generalizations would be to go too far astray. But the extent of material to support them would probably be surprising to most persons; the following may serve as a single illustration: Hon. C. W. Bradley, LL.D., in a report in H. Ex. Doc. 29, p. 176, 40th Cong., 3d sess.: "It is a mortifying fact that, were a balance to be struck between the aggregate losses suffered by Americans from Chinese pirates, Chinese thieves and debtors, on the one hand, and, on the other, the injuries inflicted on Chinese merchants, tradesmen, compradors, and citizens in the non-payment of debts honestly due them by American merchants, agents, shipmasters, mariners, etc., we should find that balance to our debt in a ratio of full 90 per cent. I speak advisedly. On the score, too, of official fidelity and punctuality in fairly carrying out their treaty obligations as against their own countrymen, I apprehend that the consular officers of America and Europe have been guilty of as many and as serious laches as can be produced against the native magistracy of China in their official shortcomings towards foreigners."

[4] Compare what is said post, § 936, as to the discrediting of a witness by reason of race.

[5] 1571, Duke of Norfolk's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 958, 1002 (Duke: "Is the Bishop of Ross a sufficient witness against me? There be points enough in the law to prove him no sufficient witness. He is a stranger and a Scot; a stranger can be no sufficient witness much less a Scot; . . . If a Scot come into England without a passport, he may be a lawful prisoner. . . . [Bractou saith] they must be legales, lawful men, and so cannot strangers be, as the bishops of Ross and Rodolph"; L. C. J. Catlin: "Bracton indeed is an old writer of our law, and by Bracton indeed I do may be a witness; a stranger, a bondman, may be a witness. Ask you all the Judges here." And the Judges affirmed that he may. . . . Attorney Wilbraham: "This were a strange device, that Scots might not be witnesses; for so, if a man would commit treason, and make none privy but Scots, the treason were unpunishable, and so were a kind of men found out with whom a man might freely conspire treason").

But this primitive notion has long since ceased to have any recognition;[6] except, to be sure, in our Federal naturalization statute.[7]

(b) Negroes. By the laws of the Southern States, before the Civil War, persons of the negro race were disqualified from testifying, either absolutely or only in proceedings against white persons; and even in some of the Northern and Western States the same rule obtained.[8] It does not seem to have been regarded as abrogated by implication through the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution;[9] and such laws existed in at least one Southern State as late as 1876.[10] They now remain no longer in any jurisdiction, except Delaware,[11] and perhaps Nebraska.[12]

(c) Indians. In the course of our "benevolent assimilation" of the Indian race — that process which with all its moral problems need at least not have been shadowed by excessive assumptions of virtuous superiority[13] — there were a number of regions in which testimonial incapacity was by law predicated of the Indian.[14] These have now almost all disappeared in the course of enlightened progress.[15] The traces that remain will probably persist so long as, in any part of the community, that public opinion is recognized which regards the Indian chiefly as an object of selfish exploitation and unscrupulous plunder; for this brutal spirit is likely enough to combine with greed for the Indian's land a distrust of his testimony.

(d) Chinese.[16] No statutory exclusion of the Chinese race as witnesses seems ever to have obtained in any State law except that of California; and this has there disappeared since the Code of 1872. The condition of public feeling in that community against the economic encroachments of Chinese laborers explains and extenuates (while it may not excuse) this blunder in

[6] 1631, Lord Audley's Trial, 3 How. St. Tr. 401, 411 (a person who had not taken the oath of allegiance, held competent); 1634, Coke, Fourth Institute, 279 (says that Bracton's statement "is to be understood of an alien infidell").

[7] U. S. Rev. St. 1878, § 2165, cl. 6, being St. 1816, March 22, c. 32, § 2 (aliens applying for naturalization must prove their five years' residence "by the oath or affirmation of citizens of the United States"); 1892, Fong Yue Ting v. U. S., 149 U. S. 698, 730, 13 Sup. 1016 (statute noted as valid).

[8] In Iowa as late as the Code of 1855, § 2388. These statutes are collected in Appleton, Evidence, App. pp. 271–278.

[9] No authorities on the precise point have been found.

[10] Ala. Code 1876.

[11] Del. Rev. St. c. 107, § 4; quoted ante, § 488.

[12] Nebr. Comp. St. § 5902; quoted ante, § 488. Probably these laws are inoperative in Federal courts under the U. S. Rev. St. § 1977. There is an express prohibition against such exclusion in the following jurisdictions: Ariz. Rev. St. § 1863; D. C. Comp. St. c. 71, §§ 5, 7; Tex. Rev. Civ. St § 2300; U. S. Rev. St. §§ 858, 1078, 1977; W. Va. Code, c. 130, § 24. These statutes are set out ante, § 488.

[13] Here, again, it would be impracticable to cite authorities upon the relative merits of Indian character; the following will indicate how incorrect some of the ordinary notions are: Professor Shaler, "Kentucky," 109: "In the early days, the Indian warfare was singularly humane; they never outraged their women prisoners; and rarely butchered their captives. They had now learned a more brutal warfare from the whites. There can be no question that the Indian customs of war were debased by the example of their enemies."

[14] An early exception may be found in the Massachusetts Colonial Laws (Thayer, in "A Chapter of History," Harvard Law Review, IX, 1).

[15] There apparently remains some sort of disqualification in the following statutes: Nebr. Comp St. §§ 4734, 5902; Minn. G. St. § 2007; U. S. Rev. St. § 5392; Wash. Annot. C. & St. §§ 6940, 7316. But these are probably annulled for Federal courts by U. S. Rev. St. § 1977. Discrimination by reason of race is expressly prohibited in W. Va. Code, c. 130, § 24. These statutes are set out ante, § 488.

[16] Compare the authorities post, § 2054, as to requiring corroboration for Chinese testimony; and post, § 936, with reference to discrediting a witness by reason of his race.

the policy of the testimonial law. But the just and eloquent denunciation which that law once received from a Federal judge[17] seems to have been forgotten; for a similar law, though more restricted in scope, has since made its appearance in a place where it was less to be expected, namely, in the Federal statute-book.[18] Of these statutes it can only be said that they do not come consistently from a Legislature which in this series of enactments was itself breaking solemn treaty-faith with the very nation whose members it thus condemned as oath-breakers; and that the supposed special danger of perjury by Chinese attempting to evade those statutes of exile was precisely what might be expected from the people of any country when an unjust measure is attempted to be enforced by the harshest means.[19]

§ 517. (2) Sex. In spite of the example of some of the surrounding peoples, notably of Scotland,[1] there seems never to have been in the law of England any general testimonial disability based on sex.[2] This failure to discriminate against women is perhaps another illustration of what has been sometimes forgotten, that the oppressive disabilities, so often inveighed against, of women in England, had regard solely to the married state, and not to sex itself.

§ 518. (3) Religion. The religious belief of a witness was of consequence, at common law, chiefly with reference to his ability or willingness to submit to the test of the oath, — a test wholly independent (as pointed out post, § 1823) of his testimonial capacity.[1] But there is an aspect in which the witness' religion may be considered as affecting his testimonial capacity, namely, when the religion sanctions false testimony. Does the belief in such a religion — termed by Bentham "cacotheism"[2] — make its adherent so untrustworthy that he ought not to be listened to at all? Upon the considera-

[17] 1867, Sawyer, J., in People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 573 (where the accused, robbing a Chinaman, had said that it did not matter whether the latter recognized him, since a Chinaman could not testify against him).

[18] U. S. St. 1892, May 5, c. 60, § 6, 27 Stat. L. 25 (Chinese claiming to remain in U. S. must prove the fact of residence prior to passage of the act "by at least one credible white witness"); 1892, Fong Yue Ting v. U. S., 149 U. S. 698, 726, 730, 742, 759, 13 Sup. 1016 (statute held constitutional; three judges dissenting); U. S. St. 1893, Nov. 3, c. 14, § 2, 28 Stat. L. 7, amending § 6 of St. 1892 (a Chinese re-entering as a merchant formerly residing here must prove his mercantile character by "two credible witnesses other than Chinese"); 1900, Li Sing v. U. S., 180 U. S. 486, 21 Sup. 449 (statute applied).

[19] Of the "grievous wrong" of this statute of 1892, Mr. Justice Brewer, himself the son of a missionary, has said judicially (Fong Yue Ting v. U. S., 149 U. S. 698, 744, 13 Sup. 1016): "In view of this enactment of the highest legislative body of the foremost Christian nation, may not the thoughtful Chinese disciple of Confucius ask, 'Why do they send missionaries here?'"

[1] 1705, Captain Green's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 1199, 1292 (Scotland; "in crimes atrocious, occult, and excepted, a woman is never refused").

[2] It is true that, as late as 1627, Coke in the Commentary on Littleton (6 b; see also 29 b, 158 b) says that "in some cases women are by law wholly excluded to bear testimony, as to prove a man to be a villein" (1285, 13 Edw. I, Brooke's Abridgment, De Nativo Habendo). But this likely refers to the even then obsolete process of "trial by witnesses," and not to the witnesses in the modern sense, who had only come into general use a century before Coke's time (post, § 575). The passage from Coke, quoted post, § 575, naming all the grounds of incompetency, does not name sex. For an interesting summary of the disqualifications by sex in the Roman and other foreign systems of law, see Best, Evidence, § 64; Hinschius, Kirchenrecht, VI, pt. 1, p. 98, n. 2, § 364.

[1] The authorities upon capacity to take the oath are collected post, §§ 1815–1829.

[2] Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. III, c. V, § 2 (Bowring's ed., vol. VII, p. 423); b. I, c. XI, § 7 (vol. VI, p. 271); Introductory View of the same, c. XXI, § 3 (vol. VI, p. 106).

tions already noticed under the foregoing topics,[3] it would seem that even in this extreme case it is impolitic to exclude the witness; because he may perhaps tell the truth, and because the ordinary tests of untruth are sufficient to justify us in taking the risk of at least listening. The question is hardly likely to occur in practice; and yet, if the Jesuit, or the Roman Catholic in general, entertained this belief (as was sometimes formerly charged), that the Church in certain situations sanctioned false testimony, the very case would seem to be presented. Nevertheless, at the time when that charge against Papists and Jesuits was generally believed in Protestant England, the Courts steadily refused to make it a ground of exclusion;[4] though it was conceded to discredit the witness.[5] The conclusion is, then, that no rule of exclusion for "cacotheists" (as distinct from theological incapacity to take the oath) has ever been recognized in our law.[6]

§ 519. (4) Infamy, by Conviction of Crime; History and General Policy. The disqualification of a person who has been convicted of crime seems not to have been fully established in our law until well on into the 1600s; although the readiness of the Crown lawyers in treason trials to favor all testimony for the prosecution, however tainted, may serve to explain the earlier instances of its admission in criminal cases as exceptions to a general rule. It is firmly enough established, and some learning about it already exists (though not without marks of novelty), by the end of the 1600s.[1]

The thought underlying this exclusion is nowadays plain enough; the man who has been guilty of a heinous crime cannot be trusted in any respect, therefore cannot be trusted in his testimony. This thought is one which might be supposed peculiar to the social stratification of England, where class degradation was of itself a serious source of untrustworthiness,[2] and where a judicial accusation of crime was in fact a perquisite chiefly of the "lower classes."[3] But the early prevalence of the same notion of incompetency in other systems of law, and its persistence in many of the Southern communities of our own modern democracy, indicate that there is something generic and universal in its origin. At the same time, it may be suggested that this generic feature was confined to the effect of infamy as a punishment for

[3] See also the passage from Bentham, quoted post, § 519.

[4] 1679, Whitehread's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 311, 361, 379 (Witness: "I hope a Roman Catholic may be a lawful witness"; L. C. J. Scroggs: "Yes, I deny it not"); 1685, Oates' Trial, 10 id. 1079, 1192.

[5] Post, § 935.

[6] The only contrary expression was probably used of oath-capacity; 1833, O'Neall, J., in Anon., 1 Hill S. C. 258 ("the belief of a witness that he was not bound on oath to tell the truth would, if coming from his own lips, render him incompetent to be sworn").

[1] 1613, Browne v. Crashaw, 2 Bulstr. 154 (two persons attainted of felony were excluded; for, per Coke, C. J., "he is not a fit person to serve of a jury, nor yet to be an indifferent witness; and by the same reason the testimony of such a one for a witness in all cases is to be rejected"); 1616, Earl of Somerset's Trial, 2 How. St. Tr. 965, 985 (illustrating the practice of using the sworn testimony of a convicted accomplice); 1637, Bishop of Lincoln's Trial, 3 id. 804, 807, 812 (an objection that a witness had been "sentenced in the Star Chamber," was overruled, since it was not "for any matter of perjury, or crime that should take away his testimony").

[2] Post, § 575. Compare our traditional phrase, "of poor but honest parents."

[3] "Most accused persons are poor, stupid, and helpless" (Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 442).

crime, while its moral significance as a source of distrust in testimony was peculiarly marked in English conditions. At any rate, in one respect at least, English social facts affected its scope; for one of its irrational and inconsistent limitations, namely, that the judgment of conviction, and not the actual guilt, caused the disqualification, may be accounted for by remembering the English tendency (noted in other connections also, post, § 982) to ignore social offences so long as they do not bring the offender to the formal ignominy of legal condemnation, i. e. to accept an external, not an internal, standard of guilt. No doubt, this same limitation rested to some extent on the notion of disqualification as a part of the punishment for the crime, i. e. that the degradation, which by these social standards must follow immediately upon public judgment of guilt, should naturally involve an exclusion from equal status in the witness-box. Nevertheless, in whatever degree the disqualification may have been thought of as a part of the punishment of the offender himself, it was obvious that this theory could not of itself justify the incidental punishment of innocent persons who might need the convict's testimony; and hence the justification had ultimately to be founded on some more acceptable reason. Hence, as soon as the rule begins to be reasoned about, we find it placed upon the more plausible theory of actual moral turpitude, i. e. the person is to be excluded because from such a moral nature it is useless to expect the truth, — a notion which at least avoided the fallacy of the punishment-theory, and came finally to be put forward as the orthodox one of the common law:

Ante 1727, Chief Baron Gilbert, Evidence, 139: "The second sort of persons excluded from testimony for want of integrity are such as are stigmatized. Now there are several crimes that so blemish that the party is ever afterwards unfit to be a witness, . . . and the reason is very plain, because every plain and honest man affirming the truth of any matter under the sanction and solemnity of an oath is entitled to faith and credit, . . . but where a man is convicted of falsehood and other crimes against the common principles of honesty and humanity, his oath is of no weight, because he hath not the credit of a witness, . . . and he is rather to be intended as a man profligate and abandoned than one under the sentiments and convictions of those principles that teach probity and veracity."

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 83: "Since the object of the oath is to bind the conscience of the witness, . . . it follows also that the testimony of a person who by the turpitude of his conduct has shown that he is regardless of all laws both human and divine ought not to be received, for it cannot reasonably be expected that such a person would regard the obligation of an oath."

1810, Chief Justice Swift, Evidence, 52: "Persons convicted of crimes evincive of a want of regard for those moral and religious principles that constitute the obligation of an oath are excluded from testifying."

This theory, plausible enough at first sight, and calculated to persist until general social conditions permitted a different sort of reasoning to obtain recognition, sufficed to maintain the common-law doctrine in full force until the time of Bentham. His lucid exposition of its shortcomings and his determined attack upon its fallacies proved irresistible. The almost complete disappearance of this disqualification from Anglo-American law in the last half-century has been due to those arguments, first promulgated by him, of which the following are salient passages:

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. III, c. III (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, pp. 406 ff.): "Improbity, in whatever shape or degree, is still farther [than interest] from being a proper ground of exclusion. . . . Let us begin with perjury. In perjury may be seen by far the strongest case: the case in which the pretence for exclusion on the score of security against deception wears the fairest outside. . . . Perjury, in addition to the prevalence of the ordinary motives on some individual occasion or occasions, indicates the particular species of delinquency into which the individual has thus been impelled; viz. mendacity: the very species by which the most plausible of all pretences for exclusion on the ground of improbity is afforded. In any other case, the argument for the exclusion is no more than this: He has violated the obligations of morality in some sorts of ways; therefore it is more or less probable that he will, upon occasion, violate them in this sort of way. In the case of mendacity it runs thus: He has violated the obligations of morality not only in other sorts of ways, but in this very sort of way, on former occasions; therefore it is more or less probable that so he will on the occasion now in hand. For suspicion, a most perfectly proper ground; for rejection, none whatever. Reasons: those already mentioned [for interest and the like]; to which may be added those which follow. 1. In this line of delinquency, beyond most, if not all others, the scale is lengthy, the degrees are numerous. . . . To all these different levels the eye of judicial suspicion has the power of adjusting itself. Exclusion knows no gradations: blind and brainless, it has but one alternative; — shut or open, like a valve; up or down, like a steam-engine. . . . 2. When the door of the witness-box is shut against a proposed witness on this score, it is generally on the ground of some single transgression of this sort. But a single transgression of this sort, — what does it prove? . . . That on one assignable occasion the convict has been known to fall into that sort of transgression, which every human adult must also have fallen into, more times than one, on occasions assignable or unassignable. 'I said,' says the Psalmist, 'I said in my wrath, all men are liars.' It was in his wrath that the observation came from him; but he need not have wished to retract it in his coolest moments. From a single lie told in the course of ever so long a life, a man may, without any grammatical impropriety, be denominated a liar. . . . Upon the whole, he who considers how few in comparison are the occasions in which any advantage (howsoever impure, and overbalanced by ultimate disadvantage) is to be gained by falsehood, will, I imagine, join with me in the opinion, that, from the mouth of the most egregious liar that ever existed, truth must have issued at least a hundred times, for once that falsehood, wilful falsehood, has taken its place. . . . What I am contending against (let it never be out of sight) is absolute rejection: rejection in all cases: — not suspicion and distrust. [3.] The very repugnance, with which it is but natural the reader should have received the proposition of opening the door of justice to testimony of this tainted kind, is a sort of proof and earnest of the safety of the measure. . . . So broad, so prominent is the stigma — so conspicuous and impressive the warning which it gives, — the danger is, not that the man thus distinguished should gain too much credence, but that he should not gain enough. Fœnum habet in cornu. [4.] Suppose an inexorable door shut against him; or, although open, suppose an inexorably deaf ear turned to him; and observe the consequence: — that crimes, all imaginable crimes, may be committed with impunity, with sure impunity, on his person and in his presence. . . . [5.] Infamy, and (as a visible sign of infamy) exclusion from the sanctuary of justice, . . . one of the instances, which, in but too great number, may be found in the English as well as other established systems, of the sort of punishment which has been called mis-seated punishment: punishment in alienam personam: a sort of punishment which, in this particular application of it, may be styled chance-medley punishment. The punishment does not fall upon the witness who is disqualified, but upon all persons who may have need of his evidence. A certain person has offended, and, to add a sting to his punishment, an unoffending crowd is collected below, and a pailful of punishment is thrown down upon their heads out of a window. An innocent stranger is laid hold of, and a sword run through his body, that with the point of it a useless scratch may be given to the caitiff who has provoked all this vengeance. . . . [6.] If from that modification of improbity which consists in a breach of veracity on the very sort of occasion . question (viz. judicial testimony), no sufficient ground for exclusion can be deduced, — much less (it is evident) can it, from improbity manifesting itself in any other shape. . . . A sample or two must serve instead of a complete list. To judge of offences by punishments, the most detestable of mankind should be found in the class of traitors. . . . During the warfare between the Two Roses, — that is, from generation to g eration, — the good people of England, good and bad together, were alternately loyalists and traitors: consequently, if the men of law were fit to be believed, in all that time scarce a man in the country that was fit to be believed. Look back, as above, to a few hundred years' distance in the track of time, you see a whole nation composed of traitors. Look on to few hundred degrees' distance in the track of space, you may see a whole colony composed of felons: and felons not in posse merely, like the traitors, but in esse, duly converted into that state in due form of law. Upon the evidence of this or that one of those felons, this or that other of them has from time to time suffered death: murdered, thereby, or not murdered, is a question I leave undiscussed for the amusement of those who sent them there. . . . Take homicide in the way of duelling. Two men quarrel; one of them calls the other a liar. So highly does he prize the reputation of veracity, that, rather than suffer a stain to remain upon it, he determines to risk his life, challenges his adversary to fight, and kills him. Jurisprudence, in its sapience, knowing no difference between homicide by consent, by which no other human being is put in fear — and homicide in pursuit of a scheme of highway robbery, of nocturnal housebreaking, by which every man who has a life is put in fear of it, — has made the one and the other murder, and consequently felony. The man prefers death to the imputation of a lie, — and the inference of the law is, that he cannot open his mouth but lies will issue from it. Such are the inconsistencies which are unavoidable in the application of any rule which takes improbity for a ground of exclusion. Take it for a ground of suspicion only, all these absurdities are avoided. . . . If the legislator had his choice of witnesses upon every occasion, and witnesses of all sorts in his pocket, he would do well not to produce any, upon any occasion, but such over whose conduct the tutelary motives exercised despotic sway; in a word, to admit no other men for witnesses than perfect men. But perfect men do not exist: and if the earth were covered with them, delinquents would not send for them to be witnesses to their delinquency. In such a state of things, then, the legislator has this option, and no other: to open the door to all witnesses, or to give license to all crimes. For all purposes, he must take men as he finds them: and, for the purpose of testimony, he must take such men as happen to have been in the way to see, or to say they have been in the way to see, what, had it depended upon the actors, would have been seen by nobody."[4]

There can be, then, no justification for the disqualification of a person by reason of conviction of crime; and legislation has now in most jurisdictions recognized this, with more or less thoroughness, by abolishing the common law rule. In a few jurisdictions, nevertheless, it remains in full scope (though defined by statute), and in many others it is retained for the crime of perjury.[5] These anachronisms ought not to be longer countenanced:

1902, Riddick, J., in Vance v. State, 70 Ark. 272, 68 S. W. 37: "We take this occasion, also, to call attention to the backward state of the law in this State in reference to the competency of witnesses convicted of felony. The statutes which render such witnesses incompetent belong to a class of antiquated laws which suppress evidence, and which the wisdom of modern ages has discredited and shown to be unreasonable and injurious. They are of the same class as the laws which formerly forbade the parties to the suit from testifying, and closed the mouth of the defendant on trial for his life, and should be repealed, as these laws have been repealed, for such matters should go only to the credit or impeachment of the witness, not to the exclusion of his testimony. There is no valid reason why a person who knows anything material to the decision of a case on trial should not be permitted to tell it, whatever may be his character, the jury being allowed to weigh his testimony in connection with his character and antecedents. These statutes not only suppress evidence, but the application of them often presents difficult and doubtful questions, which, being decided in the hurry of trial, frequently result on appeal in reversals, and in this way justice is often thwarted. There are very few States that now retain such laws, and we think our legislators might well consider whether they should not be repealed in this State also."

[4] These arguments will be found epitomized in the treatise of Chief Justice Appleton of Maine, on Evidence (1860), c. III. Similar ones were published (circa 1823) by Mr. Justice Edward Livingston of Louisiana, in his Introductory Report to the Code of Evidence (Works ed. 1872, I. 468).

[5] The statutes are collected ante, § 488.

§ 520. Same: Kind of Crime that Disqualifies.

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 373:[1] "It is a point of no small difficulty to determine precisely the crimes which render the perpetrator thus infamous. The rule is justly stated to require, that 'the publicum judicium must be upon an offence, implying such a derelletion of moral principle, as carries with it a conclusion of a total disregard to the obligation of an oath.'[2] But the difficulty lies in the specification of those offences. The usual and more general enumeration is, treason, felony, and the crimen falsi.[3] In regard to the two former, as all treasons, and almost all felonies were punishable with death, it was very natural that crimes, deemed of so grave a character as to render the offender unworthy to live, should be considered as rendering him unworthy of belief in a Court of Justice. But the extent and meaning of the term, crimen falsi, in our law, is nowhere laid down with precision. In the Roman Law, from which we have borrowed the term, it included not only forgery, but every species of fraud and deceit.[4] If the offence did not fall under any other head, it was called stellionatus,[5] which included 'all kinds of cozenage and knavish practice in bargaining.' But it is clear, that the Common Law has not employed the term in this extensive sense, when applying it to the disqualification of witnesses; because convictions for many offences, clearly belonging to the crimen falsi of the civilians, have not this effect. Of this sort are deceits in the quality of provisions, deceits by false weights and measures, conspiracy to defraud by spreading

[1] This topic, being practically almost obsolete, and destined soon to become entirely so, may be here sufficiently expounded by quoting the words of Professor Greenleaf, which have served to guide our Courts in their rulings since 1842. Those passages, including such notes as are here reproduced, are placed in quotation marks; the scanty modern rulings are added without such marks.

[2] "2 Dods. R. 186, per Sir Wm. Scott."

[3] "Phil. & Am. on Evid. p. 17; 6 Com. Dig. 353, Testmoigne, A. 4, 5; Co. Lit. 6, b.; 2 Hale, P. C. 277; 1 Stark. Evid. 94, 95. A conviction for petty larceny disqualifies, as well as for grand larceny: Pendock v. Macklnder, Willes, R. 665"; accord, for grand larceny, 1899, State v. Clark, 60 Kan. 450, 56 Pac. 767.

[4] "Cod. Lib. 9, tit. 22, ad legem Corneliam de falsis. Cujac. Opera, Tom. lx. In locum. (Ed. Prati, A. D. 1839, 4to, p. 2191–2200); 1 Brown's Civ. & Adm. Law, p. 425; Dig. lib. 48, tit. 10; Heinec. in Pand. Pars vii. § 214–218. The crimen falsi, as recognized in the Roman Law, might be committed, 1. by words, as in perjury; 2. by writing, as in forgery; 3. by act, or deed; namely, in counterfeiting or adulterating the public money, — in fraudulently substituting one child for another, or n suppositious birth, — or in fraudulently personating another, — in using false weights or measures, — in selling or mortgaging the same thing to two several persons in two several contracts, — and in officiously supporting the suit of another by money, &c., answering to the common law crime of maintenance. Wood, Instit. Civil Law, p. 282, 283; Halifax, Analysis Rom. Law, p. 134."

[5] "Dig. lib. 47, tit. 20, l. 3, Cujac. (In locum.) Opera, tom. ix. (Ed. supra) p. 2224. Stellionatus nomine significatur omne crimen, quod nomen proprium non habet, omnis fraus, quæ nomine proprio vacat. Translatum autem esse nomen stellionatus, nemo est qui nesciat, ab animali ad hominem vafrum, et decipiendi peritum: Ib. Heinec. ad Pand. Pars vii. § 147, 148; 1 Brown's Civ. & Adm. Law, p. 426."

false news,[6] and several others. On the other hand, it has been adjudged, that persons are rendered infamous, and therefore incompetent to testify, by having been convicted of forgery,[7] perjury, subornation of perjury,[8] suppression of testimony by bribery, or conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness,[9] or other conspiracy, to accuse one of a crime,[10] and barratry.[11] And from these decisions it may be deduced, that the crimen falsi of the Common Law not only involves the charge of falsehood, but also is one which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud. At least it may be said, in the language of Sir William Scott,[12] 'so far the law has gone, affirmatively; and it is not for me to say where it should stop, negatively.'"

§ 521. Same: Judgment, not Guilt, Disqualifies.

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 375:[1] "We have already remarked, that no person is deemed infamous in law, until he has been legally found guilty of an infamous crime. But the mere verdict of the Jury is not sufficient for this purpose; for it may be set aside, or the judgment may be arrested, on motion for that purpose. It is the judgment, and that only, which is received as the legal and conclusive evidence of the party's guilt, for the purpose of rendering him incompetent to testify.[2] And it must appear that the judgment was rendered by a Court of competent jurisdiction.[3] Judgment of outlawry for treason or felony will have the same effect;[4] for the party, in submitting to an outlawry, virtually confesses his guilt; and so the record is equivalent to a judgment upon confession. If the guilt of the party should be shown by oral evidence, and even by his own admission (though in neither of these modes can it be proved, if the evidence be objected to), or, by his plea of guilty, which has not been followed by a judg-

[6] "The Ville de Varsovie, 2 Dods. R. 174; but see Crowther v. Hopwood, 3 Stark. R. 21." The following crimes have been held insufficient to disqualify: maliciously obstructing railroad cars: Com. v. Dame, 8 Cush. 384; fraudulently disposing of a crop subject to lien: 1897, State v. Green, 48 S. C. 136, 26 S. E. 234.

[7] "R. v. Davis, 5 Mod. 74."

[8] "Co. Lit. 6, b.; 6 Com. Dig. 353, Testm. A. 5."

[9] "Clancey's case, Fortesc. R. 208; Bushell v. Barrett, Ry. & M. 434."

[10] "2 Hale, P. C. 277; Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 46, § 101; Co. Lit. 6, b.; R. v. Priddle, 2 Leach, Cr. Cas. 496; Crowther v. Hopwood, 3 Stark. R. 21, arg.; 1 Stark. Evid. 95; 2 Dods. R. 191."

[11] "R. v. Ford, 2 Salk. 690; Bull. N. P. 292. The receiver of stolen goods is incompetent as a witness; see the trial of Abner Rogers, p. 136, 137. If a statute declare the perpetrator of a crime 'infamous,' this, it seems, will render him incompetent to testify: Phil. & Am. on Evid. p. 18; 1 Phil. Evid. p. 18; 1 Gilb. Evid. by Lofft, p. 256, 257."

[12] "2 Dods. R. 191. See also 2 Russ. on Crimes, 592, 593." Compare the same question as it arises for the use of conviction of crime to impeach a witness, post, § 980: the definition may in that case be somewhat different.

[1] See note 1, § 520, ante.

[2] "6 Com. Dig. 354, Testm. A. 5; R. v. Castel Careinion, 8 East, 77; Lee v. Gansell, Cowp. 3; Bull. N. P. 292; Fitch v. Smalbrook, T. Ray. 32; People v. Whipple, 9 Cow. 707; People v. Herrick, 13 Johns. 82; Cushman v. Loker, 2 Mass. 108; Castellano v. l'eillon, 2 Mart, N. S. 466"; 1901, Yates v. State, — Fla. —, 29 So. 965 (there must be a "judgment or sentence"); 1851, Smith v. Brown, 2 Mich. 161, 163 (verdict of perjury offered against B. to overthrow his answer in equity on the matter for which he was found guilty of perjury; excluded, because pending a motion in arrest of judgment B. had died; cases cited additionally to those above); 1888, Arcia v. State, 26 Tex. App. 193, 9 S. W. 685 (judgment on the verdict, not followed by sentence, held insufficient under local statutory provisions); 1888, Woods v. State, ib. 490, 508, 10 S. W. 108 (contrary result reached, where sentence was lacking, for an offence punishable only by fine); 1893, Jones v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 135, 22 S. W. 404 (following Arcia v. State); 1896, Evans v. State, 35 id. 485, 34 S. W. 285 (same); 1900, Flournoy v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 59 S. W. 902 (same). It would follow that, if judgment appears to have been rendered, the party offering the witness must show that it has been reversed or the offence pardoned: 1878, State v. Howard, 19 Kan. 507, 509; 1899, State v. Clark, 60 id. 450, 56 Pac. 767. But a mere showing that an appeal has been taken should not suffice: 1900, Best v. Best, 22 Wash. 695, 60 Pac. 58 (conviction suffices, though a pending appeal results later in reversal of judgment; yet in such case continuance should be allowed); contra: 1898, Stanley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 482, 46 S. W. 645 (disqualified only after sentence accepted or judgment affirmed); 1898, Foster v. State, 39 id. 399, 46 S. W. 231 (not disqualified pending appeal taken; the objector to show that the appeal had been dismissed).

[3] "Cooke v. Maxwell, 3 Stark. R. 183."

[4] "Co. Lit. 6, b.; Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 46, § 22; 3 Inst. 212; 6 Com. Dig. 354, Testm. A. 5; 1 Stark. Evid. 95. 96. In Scotland it is otherwise: Tait's Evid. p. 347."

ment,[8] the proof does not go to the competency of the witness, however it may affect his credibility." [8]

§ 522. Same: Conviction in Another Jurisdiction.

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 376:[1] "Whether judgment of an infamous crime, passed by a foreign tribunal, ought to be allowed to affect the competency of the party as a witness, in the Courts of this country, is a question upon which jurists are not entirely agreed. But the weight of modern opinion seems to be that personal disqualifications not arising from the law of nature but from the positive law of the country, and especially such as are of a penal nature, are strictly territorial, and cannot be enforced in any country other than that in which they originate.[2] Accordingly it has been held, upon great consideration, that a conviction and sentence for a felony in one of the United States, did not render the party incompetent as a witness, in the Courts of another State; though it might be shown in diminution of the credit due to his testimony." [3]

§ 523. Same: Disqualification removed by (1) Reversal of Judgment; (2) Pardon; (3) Serving of Sentence.

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, §§ 377, 378: "The disability thus arising from infamy may, in general, be removed in two modes; (1) by reversal of the judgment; (2) by a pardon; [and (3) by serving the sentence].

(1) The reversal of the judgment must be shown in the same manner that the judgment itself must have been proved, namely, by production of the record of reversal, or, in proper cases, by a duly authenticated exemplification of it.[1]

(2) The pardon must be proved by production of the charter of pardon under the great seal; and though it were granted after the prisoner had suffered the entire punishment awarded against him, yet it has been held sufficient to restore the competency of the witness; though he would, in such case, be entitled to very little credit." [2] The rule, that a

[8] "R. v. Hinks, 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 84," 2 C. & K. 462.

[6] "R. v. Castel Careinion, 8 East, 77; Wicks v. Smalbroke, 1 Sid. 51; T. Ray. 32, s. c.; People v. Herrick, 13 Johns. 82." Compare the same question in relation to the impeachment of a witness, post, § 980.

Whether the judgment may be proved by asking the witness on cross-examination, i.e otherwise than by a certified copy of the record, depends upon a different principle, examined post, § 1270.

Whether the conviction prevents the use of a deposition taken before conviction or the proof of an attesting signature affixed to a will or deed before conviction, involves other principles, examined post, §§ 1409, 1506.

[1] See note 1, ante, § 520.

[2] "Story on Confl. of Laws, § 91, 92, 104, 620–625; Martens's Law of Nations, B. 3, c. 3, § 24, 25."

[3] "Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 515, 539–549"; proceeding upon (1) the difficulty of raising an issue as to the record, (2) the diversity of ideas as to criminal conduct in different countries, (3) the hardship of disqualifying by old and forgotten offences in other lands, (4) the principle that penal laws have no effect beyond the jurisdiction, (5) the fact that infamy is a punishment as well as a stigma on character. Accord: 1878, Sims v. Sims, 75 N. Y. 466, 468; 1879, National Trust Co. v. Gleason, 77 id. 400, 410; 1891, Logan v. U. S., 144 U. S. 303, 12 Sup. 617. Contra: 1824, State v. Chandler, 3 Hawks 307 (Taylor, C. J.: "As truth and justice are not confined by geographical limits but are coextensive with the concerns and relations of civilized communities, the crime which in reason renders a witness incompetent in one country must do so in all"); 1838, Chase v. Blodgett, 10 N. H. 30; 1880, State v. Foley, 15 Nev. 72. "In the cases of State v. Ridgely, 2 Har. & McHen. 120; Clark's lessee v. Hall, ib. 378; and Cole's lessee v. Cole, 1 Har. & Johns. 572; which are sometimes cited in the negative, this point was not raised nor considered; they being cases of persons sentenced in England for felony, and transported to Maryland, under the sentence, prior to the Revolution."

[1] See note 2, ante, § 521.

[2] "U. S. v. Jones, 2 Wheeler Cr. C. 451."

The rule that a pardon removes the disqualification has been recognized from the beginning, though in the earlier practice there was some difference of opinion whether the burning in the hand was also essential; 1673, Toug's Case, Kelyng 18; 1679, Reading's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 259, 296; 1680, Castlemaine's Trial, ib. 1067, 1083, 1089 (by the K. B. and C. P.; mere pardon for felony does not make competent, unless there was a burning in the hand); 1685, Fernley's Trial, 11 id. 381, 426; 1695, Crosby's Trial, 12 id. 1291, 1296; 1696, Rookwood's Trial, 13 id. 183, 185 (pardoned, but not burnt in the hand; admitted); Earl of Warwick's Trial, ib. 1011–1019 (given benefit of clergy, but the burning in the hand resplted; excluded); 1870, Curtis v. Cochran, 50 N. H. 242; 1880, State pardon restores the competency and completely rehabilitates the party, is limited to cases where the disability is a consequence of the judgment, according to the principles of the Common Law.[3] But where the disability is annexed to the conviction of a crime by the express words of a statute, it is generally agreed that the pardon will not, in such a case, restore the competency of the offender; the prerogative of the sovereign being controlled by the authority of the express law. Thus, if a man be adjudged guilty on an indictment for perjury, at Common Law, a pardon will restore his competency; but if the indictment be founded on the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 9, which declares, that no person convicted and attainted of perjury, or subornation of perjury, shall be from thenceforth received as a witness in any Court of record, he will not be rendered competent by a pardon."[4]

1680, Scroggs, C. J., in Castlemaine's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 1067, 1083: "In this I am clear: If a man were convicted of perjury, that no pardon will make him a witness, because it is to do the subject wrong. A pardon does not make a man an honest man; it takes off reproaches; . . . it is only to prevent upbraiding language, which tends to the breach of the peace. . . . [But otherwise for other felonies]; this I make more doubtful than the other, for a man, maybe, that hath committed a robbery would be afraid to forswear himself; for though one is a great, the other is a greater sin, and that in the subject matter."

(3) Professor Greenleaf, ubi supra: [A] "By Stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, § 3, enduring the punishment to which an offender has been sentenced for any felony not punishable with death, has the same effect as a pardon under the great seal, for the same offence; and of course it removes the disqualification to testify; and the same effect is given by § 4, of the same statute, to the endurance of the punishment awarded for any misdemeanor, except perjury and subornation of perjury.[5] But whether these enactments have proceeded on the ground, that the incompetency is in the nature of punishment, or, that the offender is reformed by the salutary discipline he has undergone, does not clearly appear."

§ 524. Same: Statutory Changes. Acting upon the reasons already set forth (ante, § 519), the Legislatures of almost every jurisdiction have long ago either entirely abolished or narrowly restricted the disqualification by conviction of crime. The earliest statute seems to have been that of England, in 1843. The statutes in the United States, when not providing for entire abolition, usually retain the common law rule for perjury only (including subornation); while a few retain it in its original scope as to kinds of crimes, but apply it in criminal trials only; neither of these limitations has any justification in logic or policy.[1]

v. Foley, 15 Nev. 67, and cases cited; 1891, Boyd v. U. S., 142 U. S. 450, 12 Sup. 292; 1891, Logan v. U. S., 144 id. 303, 12 Sup. 617.

[3] "If the pardon of one sentenced to the penitentiary for life, contains a proviso, that nothing therein contained shall be construed, so as to relieve the party from the legal disabilities consequent upon his sentence, other than the imprisonment, the proviso is void, and the party is fully rehabilitated: People v. Pease, 3 Johns. Cas. 333."

[4] R. v. Ford, 2 Salk. 689; Dover v. Maestaer, 5 Esp. 92, 94; 2 Russ. on Crimes, 595, 596; R. v. Greepe, 2 Salk. 513, 514; Bull. N. P. 292; Phil. & Am. on Evid. 21, 22." Contra: 1895, Diehl v. Rogers, 169 Pa. 316, 32 Atl. 424. "See also Mr. Hargrave's Juridical Arguments, Vol. 2, p. 221, et seq., where this topic is treated with great ability. Whether the disability is, or is not, made a part of the judgment, and entered as such on the record, does not seem to be of any importance. The form in which this distinction is taken in the earlier cases, evidently shows that its force was understood to consist in this, that in the former case the disability was declared by the statute, and in the latter, that it stood at Common Law."

For the same question, arising in relation to the impeachment of a witness, see post, § 980.

[5] "See also 1 W. 4, c. 37, to the same effect."

[1] The statutes have been already set out, ante, § 488; in the following list a rough summary is given, with the local rulings construing the effect of the statutes: Eng. 1843 (abolished); Can. (abolished); 1867, R. v. Webb, 11 Cox Cr. 133, Lush, J. (convict under death-sentence, disqualified, because "under the old law a person attainted and sentenced to death was deemed

§ 525. (5) "Allegans turpitudinem suam"; General Principle. During the 1600s and 1700s there appeared in several quarters of the law of evidence a tendency to recognize as a general principle of disqualification the maxim nemo turpitudinem suam allegans audiendus est. The notion underlying the maxim is that a person who comes upon the stand to testify that he has at a former time spoken falsely or acted corruptly is by his very confession a liar or a villain, and therefore untrustworthy as a witness. Before examining the validity of the principle as a whole for our law of evidence, it will be desirable to notice the specific situations in which it has been invoked. There are five of these, each dealt with in a group of precedents independent of the other and only loosely connected by the general notion of the above maxim.

§ 526. Same: Accomplice, as disqualified by his Guilt. It was frequently urged against an accomplice, during the 1600s and 1700s, that since by his own confession he was guilty of crime, this turpitude thus acknowledged made him as incompetent as if it were proved by conviction for the crime. This argument is only broadly related to the above maxim, and yet this relation is frequently noticed in the opinions dealing with the other instances. It must be distinguished from the argument of disqualification as a co-indictee (post, § 580) and of disqualification by reason of a promise of pardon (post, § 576). The argument, however, was judicially repudiated from the very beginning, — partly on the ground of necessity, partly on the ground that turpitude, though self-confessed, was no hindrance unless there had been a conviction of crime:

civilly dead"); Ala. (abolished, except for perjury or subornation of it); Ariz. (abolished); Ark. (abolished only as to treatment of convicts, unless when pardoned; incompetency retained in civil cases, when convicted of specified offences); Cal. (abolished); Colo. (abolished, in civil cases; semble, retained, in criminal cases); Columbia (abolished, semble, except for perjury); Conn. (abolished); Del. (abolished); Fla. abolished, except for perjury); Ga. (abolished); Haw. (abolished, except for perjury); Ida. (abolished); Ill. (abolished); Ind. (semble, abolished); Ia. (semble, abolished); Kan. (disqualification abolished for civil cases); Ky. (no person convicted of perjury or equivalent offences is to be competent; no prisoner in a penitentiary is competent; all persons are made competent except those expressly disqualified by statute); 1886, Com. v. McGuire, 84 Ky. 57 (disqualification no longer exists except for perjury, etc., under Stats. § 1180); 1890, Com. v. Minor, 89 id. 555, 13 S. W. 5 (same; but the rule is limited to criminal cases, since § 606, Civ. Code, disqualifies convicts in civil cases); 1896, Hancock v. Parker, 100 id. 143, 37 S. W. 594 (admitting in a criminal case a convict in penitentiary for obtaining money by false pretences); La. (abolished for civil cases; convicts' testimony admissible for or against each other); 1889, State v. Mack, 41 La. An. 1079, 1082, 6 So. 808 (held to be in criminal cases abolished); 1890, State v. McManus, 42 id. 1194, 8 So. 305 (same); 1903, State v. Williams, 111 La. —, 35 So. 505; (State v. McManus approved); Me. (abolished); Md. (abolished, except for perjury); Mass. (abolished); Mich. (abolished); Minn. (abolished); Miss. (abolished, except for perjury and subornation of perjury); Mo (abolished); Mont. (abolished); Nebr. (abolished); Nev. (abolished); N. H. (abolished); N. J. (abolished); N. M. (abolished); N. Y. (abolished); N. C. (abolished); N. D. (abolished, semble, except for perjury or subornation, conditionally); Oh. (abolished); Okl. (abolished, except for perjury and subornation of perjury, conditionally); Or. (abolished); Pa. (abolished, except in part for perjury); 1899, Com. v. Clemmer, 190 Pa. 202, 42 Atl. 675 (one under sentence of death, admitted); R. I. (abolished); S. D. (like N. D.); Tenn. (retained for a long list of crimes specified; convicts competent against each other for prison offences); 1887, Morgan v. State, 86 Tenn. 472 (statutory competency as defendant overrides disqualification by former conviction); Tex. (retained, with regulations); U. S. (local law to apply; but perjury or subornation is to disqualify); Utah (abolished); Vt. (abolished, except for perjury or subornation or attempted subornation of perjury); Va. (retained, with modifications); Wash. (abolished, except for perjury); W. Va. (retained, except for other than forgery-convictions in criminal cases by leave of Court); Wis. (abolished); Wyo. (abolished, for civil cases).

1663, Tong's Case, Kelyng 18: "It was resolved that some of those persons who were equally culpable with the rest may be made use of as witnesses against their fellows; . . . and the law alloweth every one to be a witness who is not convicted or made infamous for some crime; and if it were not so, all treasons would be safe, and it would be impossible for any one who conspires with never so many others to make a discovery to any purpose."

1696, Charnock's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 1377, 1403; Defendant (objecting to the witness to treason): "He makes himself a criminal by his own confession, and that of a very heinous crime, and it is equal . . . as if he had confessed it upon an indictment, and then the law can take no notice of him as a good witness"; L. C. J. Holt (charging the jury): "Now, as to that objection, I must tell you, . . . you may consider that traitorous conspiracies are deeds of darkness as well as wickedness, the discovery whereof can properly come only from the conspirators themselves. . . . And though men have been guilty of such heinous offences in being partakers or promoters in such designs, yet if they come in and repent and give testimonies thereof by discovering the truth, great credit ought to be given to them, for such evidence was ever accounted good."

1827, Abbott, C. J., in Thistlewood's Trial (Cato Street Conspirators), 33 How. St. Tr. 681, 921, as reported in Campbell's Lives, IV, 312: "Dark and deep designs are seldom fully developed except to those who consent to become participators in them, and can therefore be seldom exposed and brought to light by the testimony of untainted witnesses. Such testimony is to be received on all occasions with great caution; it is to be carefully watched, deliberately weighed, and anxiously considered. He who acknowledges himself to have become a party to a guilty purpose does by that very acknowledgment depreciate his own personal character and credit. If, however, it should ever be laid down as a practical rule in the administration of justice that the testimony of accomplices should be rejected as incredible, the most mischievous consequences must necessarily ensue; because it must not only happen that many heinous crimes must pass unpunished, but great encouragement will be given to bad men by withdrawing from their minds the fear of detection and punishment through the instrumentality of their partners in guilt; and thereby universal confidence will be substituted for that distrust of each other which naturally possesses men engaged in wicked projects and which often operates as a restraint against the perpetration of offences to which the coöperation of a multitude is required."[1]

§ 527. Same: Witness retracting Former Perjured Testimony. The argument was often urged, during the 1600s and 1700s, and appears to have been generally accepted by the judges, that one who came to the stand to testify that upon a former oath he had sworn falsely was as a self-confessed perjurer incapable of trust:

[1] Accord: 1774, Clarke v. Shee, Cowp. 197 (action for money paid by the plaintiff's clerk from the plaintiff's funds to the defendant for a lottery chance; against the clerk's testifying for the plaintiff, Mr. Bulier, afterwards Judge, argued that the clerk "is a particeps criminis, and therefore clearly incompetent, for no man shall be admitted to prove his own turpitude, as perjury or the like; this man was called to prove himself guilty of a breach of trust in embezzling his master's money and also of a breach of the Act of Parliament; therefore his evidence was inadmissible"; Mr. Davenport, for the defendant, argued that "here the plaintiff is an innocent person, and therefore had a right to call him"; Lord Mansfield, C. J., said that "there can be no doubt but that W. was an admissible witness"; citing the case of a man who had "taken the bribery oath" being called to prove himself bribed); 1775, Shaftesbury Case, 2 Doug. El. C. 2d ed. 303, 308, 315 (voter's confessions of bribery, objected to as not admissible "to invalidate what he had solemnly sworn" by the purging oath at the polls, a ruling of the House to this effect in 1696 being cited; objection repudiated; the reporter cites another House ruling, of 1715, in accord); 1833, Southampton Case, Per. & Kn. El. C. 213, 226 (repudiated). In the United States an early trace of the doctrine appears: 1789, State v. Annice, N. Chipm. 9 (indictment for adultery with E.; E. not admitted "in this case" to prove her own turpitude); 1878, State v. Colby, 51 Vt. 291, 295 (preceding case repudiated).

1685, Oates' Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 1079, 1185; Attorney-General: "Pray acquaint my lord and the jury how you came to swear at the former trial, by whom you were persuaded, and how you varied from the truth"; L. C. J. Jeffreys: "I tell you truly, Mr. Attorney, it looks rank and fulsome. If he did forswear himself, why should he ever be a witness again?" Attorney-General: "'Tis not the first time by twenty that such evidences have been given"; L. C. J. Jeffreys: I hate such precedents in all times, let it be done never so often. Shall I believe a villain one word he says, when he owns that he forswore himself? . . . What good will the admitting him to be a witness do? For either what he swore then or what he swears now is false; and if he once swears false, can you say he is to be believed? . . . We are all of another opinion, that it is not evidence fit to be given." [1]

It is noticeable that this same argument of L. C. J. Jeffreys appears again in another doctrine (post, § 530). But there, as here, it is unsound; the witness may be telling the truth now; whether he is doing so can best be left to the jury to consider under all the circumstance. affecting his credit. To exclude one who now admits a former perjury, much more to exclude one who merely contradicts his former oath, is to shut out a possible source of truth; and to admit him can hardly serve to mislead, since the testimony is of itself open to suspicion. The doctrine by the 1800s came to be entirely repudiated:

1809, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in R. v. Teal, 9 East 307: "Though a person may be proved on his own showing, or by other evidence, to have forsworn himself as to a particular fact, it does not follow that he can never afterwards feel the obligation of an oath; though that may be a good reason for the jury, if satisfied that he had sworn falsely on the particular point, to discredit his evidence altogether. But still that would not warrant the rejection of the evidence by the judge; it only goes to the credit of the witness, on which the jury are to decide."

1847, Shepley, J., in Aiken v. Kearne, 14 Shepl. 252, 261: "In the course of judicial investigations, witnesses are found to testify differently on different occasions and at different times; sometimes [it is] because they have ascertained that they had made a mistake in their former testimony; at other times they exhibit a disposition to suit their testimony to the exigencies of the case; and on other occasions they acknowledge that they were induced to testify falsely at a former time. In no such case can the question of the competency of the witness to testify properly arise, for it cannot be judicially known how far his testimony may conform to or differ from his former testimony. If it could be known, so that the objection to his competency could be presented, it must be overruled, for it is the peculiar province of the jury in an action at law to decide whether the testimony of a witness should be entitled to any and if so to what credit under the circumstances in which it is presented to them." [2]

[1] Accord: 1754, Canning's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 283, 450, 609, 632 (one Virtue Hall, who had recanted her testimony given at the trial of the supposed abductor Squires, was not now called on Canning's trial for perjury at the first trial, because the defendant's counsel, on the authority of Oates' Trial, thought her incompetent, and the trial judges agreed to this; Legge, B.: "I will never admit or suffer a person that will say they have been perjured in another affair"; but he conceded that the custom was contrary in trials for perjury-subornation).

[2] Accord: 1809, R. v. Teal, 9 East 307, 309 (conspiracy to make a false charge of paternity of a bastard; objected against the mother's testimony that she had before sworn to the prosecutor as father, but now was swearing the contrary, and "consequently she was to prove herself forsworn," so that "not only was she incompetent to contradict the fact she had before sworn to," but "she was an incompetent witness for any purpose, on the ground of her acknowledged perjury and infamy" and that "it made no difference whether the infamy were found by verdict, or by the confession of the party tendered as a witness"; objection overruled; see quotation supra); 1816, Rands v. Thomas, 5

§ 528. Same: Attesting Witness contradicting his Attestation. The general notion that a person cannot be heard to repudiate his own formal assertion made on a former occasion was responsible for the attempt, often made during the 1600s and 1700s, to forbid an attesting witness to repudiate his attestation by swearing that, though he did attest the execution, yet in fact he attested falsely. But this doctrine, though repeatedly urged by counsel and though apparently in harmony with popular notions of the time, was as constantly repudiated by the judges.[1] That the propounder of the will may, in spite of the attesting witnesses' denials, prove otherwise the genuineness of execution, involves a different principle, elsewhere considered (post, § 1302).

§ 529. Same: Invalidating one's Own Instrument; Rule in Walton v. Shelly. Closely related to the attesting-witness notion, and almost including it, is the thought that one who by his signature as party has acknowledged an instrument to be valid should not be heard to testify to facts destroying its validity. This notion, involving in part some idea of estoppel as applied to a witness, seems first to have been advanced against the obligor of an usurious bond attempting to prove the usury;[1] though here the controlling

M. & S. 244 (assumpsit for goods furnished to a ship; defendant claimed not to have been owner, and called C. as the real owner to testify that C. had inserted the defendant's name on the register as part owner without the defendant's consent; objected that C. could not "contradict the oath which he had taken at the time of the registry"; held, that C. was competent, following R. v. Teal; repudiating the nisi prius ruling on the same facts in Nickerson v. Thomas, 1 Stark. 85); 1903, Stone v. State, — Ga. —, 45 S. E. 630 (subornation of perjury; the perjurers' admission that they had committed perjury does not disqualify them); 1847, Aiken v. Kilburne, 14 Shepl. 252, 261 (a debtor who had on oath in a petition of bankruptcy averred the contrary, admitted; see quotation supra); 1809, Amory v. Fellows, 5 Mass. 219, 228 (modern principle applied to will-witnesses; their false attestation does not make them not "credible"); 1875, Fitzcox v. State, 52 Miss. 923, 930 (maxim repudiated); 1864, Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 523, 529 (abortion; the principal witness, the woman, admitted that she had sworn falsely before the magistrates; held that an instruction to disregard her testimony entirely was not proper; explaining Dunlop v. Patterson, 5 Cow. 243); 1878, Deering v. Metcalf, 74 Id. 501, 504 (preceding case approved); 1888, People v. O'Neil, 109 id. 251, 266, 16 N. E. 68 (same); 1879, Mack v. State, 48 Wis. 271, 286, 4 N. W. 449 (rule repudiated).

Distinguish the doctrine of impeachment, "falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus" (post, § 1008).

Distinguish the following, resting on the principle of judicial admissions (post, § 2593): 1896, Marvin v. Sager, 145 Ind. 261, 44 N. E. 310 (agreement to use a deposition and not call the witness; the witness cannot be called after using the deposition).

[1] 1683, Hudson's Case, Skinner 79 (two of the three swore that the testator was incapable and that his hand had been guided); 1694, Dayrell v. Glascock, ib. 413 (one of them would not testify that he saw the testator execute); 1696, Blurton v. Toon, ib. 639 (one of the witnesses denied seeing the execution, though admitting his hand; proof by the other's signature was opposed, but allowed); 1700 (?), Austin v. Willes, Buller N. P. 264 ("notwithstanding the three witnesses all swore to its not being duly executed, the devisee obtained a verdict"); 1762, Lowe v. Jolliffe, 2 W. Bl. 365 ("the three subscribing witnesses to the testator's will, and the two surviving ones to a codicil made four years subsequent . . . all unanimously swore him to be utterly incapable of making a will," etc); 1768, Goodtitle v. Clayton, 4 Burr. 2224 (a new trial was granted, because the witnesses had "been admitted to give evidence against their own attestation"; Yates, J., thought this erroneous; Lord Mansfield, C. J., thought that "it is of terrible consequence that witnesses to wills should be tampered with to deny their own attestation"; but it does not appear that such evidence was understood to be prohibited, but merely untrustworthy); 1798, Lord Kenyon, C. J., in Jordaine v. Lashbrook, 7 T. R. 599, 604 (approving Lowe v. Jolliffe); 1812, Howard v. Braithwaite, 1 Ves. & B. 202, 208 (Lord Eldon, L. C.: "their testimony is to be received with all the jealousy necessarily for the safety of mankind attaching to a man who upon his oath asserts that to be false which he has by his solemn act attested as true"); 1895, Johnson v. Johnson, 44 S. C. 364, 22 S. E. 423 (witness who attests delivery, etc., may testify to the contrary); 1903, Ward v. Brown, — W. Va. —, 44 S. E. 488. Contra: 1795, Currie v. Donald, 2 Wash. Va. 58 (attesting witness to a deed cannot contradict its delivery).

[1] 1628, Coke upon Littleton, 6 b ("It was

objection was afterwards accepted to be the doctrine of disqualification by interest (post, § 575), and from this point of view the propriety of such testimony was finally established.[2] The general maxim, however, had long before been given currency by that prolific maker of maxims, Lord Coke;[3] and in the first half of the 1700s there are other indications of a tendency to concede the impropriety of allowing a man to swear against his own deed;[4] the instances being complicated, however, like that of the usurious contract, by the rule as to disqualification by interest. But, finally, the doctrine appeared in a quarter where no objection based on interest could prevail; and the general principle was advanced (in one of those rulings in which Lord Mansfield exhibited his great power of persuading his colleagues into novelties) that a person should not be allowed by his testimony to invalidate any instrument to which he had given credit by his signature as a party:

1786, Walton v. Shelly, 1 T. R. 296; the objection was, when an indorser of notes was offered in defence to prove the usurious consideration of the notes, and thus of a bond given for them, "that he was called to invalidate a security which he had given, and that an indorser of a note, independently of any question of interest," could not do this; Mansfield, L. C. J.: "In this case, it seems to me that the witness had no interest in the present question, for either way he is discharged; . . . therefore, in point of interest, I think there is no objection to his competency. But what strikes me is the rule of law founded on public policy, which I take to be this: That no party who has signed a paper or a deed shall ever be permitted to give testimony to invalidate that instrument which he hath so signed. And there is a sound reason for it; because every man who is a party to an instrument gives a credit to it. It is of consequence to mankind that no person should hang out false colors to deceive them, by first affixing his signature to a paper, and then afterwards giving testimony to invalidate it. . . . The civil law says, Nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus. Now apply this general maxim to the present case. . . . The obligee of this bond trusted to the notes; he gave them up as a consideration for the bond; he trusted to the name of the indorser, and that he knew of no objection to the notes; and yet this same person was afterwards called to say that they were given for an usurious and illegal consideration; therefore, on that ground, I am of opinion that he was an incompetent witness"; Willes, J.: "The present question falls within the general rule that no man shall be permitted to allege his own turpitude in having given credit to a false and illegal security"; Buller, J.: "I have always understood it to be a settled principle that no man shall be permitted to invalidate his own act."

The immense influence of Lord Mansfield's name may be seen from the

also agreed by the whole Court [citing Smith's Case] that in an information upon the statute of usury, the partie to the usurious contract shall not be admitted to be a witnesse against the usurer, for in effect he should be testis in propria causa and should avoid his owne bonds and assurances and discharge himself of the money borrowed; and though he commonly raise up an informer to exhibit the information, yet in rei veritate he is the partie"); 1670, Lassels v. Chatterton, T. Raym. 190, per Twisden, J. (to the same effect); 1702, R. v. Sewel, 7 Mod. 118 (obligor may testify to a fact "to invalidate or set aside" an obligation obtained by duress, "where the nature of the thing allows him no other evidence").

[2] 1768, Abrahams v. Bunn, 4 Burr. 2251.

[3] 1634, Coke, Fourth Institute, 279 (maxim cited). Coke, in Professor Thayer's epigram, "seems to have spawned Latin maxims freely."

[4] 1704, Title v. Grevett, 2 Ld. Raym. 1008 ("a man that conveys lands may be a witness to prove he had no title, because that is swearing against himself"); 1741, L. C. Hardwicke, in Man v. Ward, 2 Atk. 228 (the deposition of a grantor, covenanting against incumbrances, was offered against the grantee to prove that the grantor had fraudulently pretended a title; it was admitted, though regarded inadmissible "by the strict rules of law").

vogue which was thus given in this country to the doctrine of Walton v. Shelly;[5] for in almost every American jurisdiction, and for the ensuing fifty years, this doctrine became the subject of repeated judicial discussion and was by many Courts accepted, — although it had been in England doubted and limited almost as soon as it was published[6] and was within a short dozen years completely repudiated. This came about in 1798:

Kenyon, L. C. J., in Jordaine v. Lashbrook, 7 T. R. 603: "The proposition attempted to be established by the plaintiff is this, that for some technical reason, or for some reason of policy, a court of justice must shut its eyes and not suffer facts to be disclosed which may be laid before them by a witness who is not infamous in his character and who has no interest in the cause. If the law be so, there is some novelty in it. . . . The rule contended for by the plaintiff is this, that 'however infamously you (the defendant) have been used, whatever fraud may have been committed on you, whatever may be the rights of others, if I (the plaintiff) the party to the fraud can get on the instrument the name of the person who may be the only witness to the transaction, I will stand entrenched within the forms of law, and impose silence on that only witness, though he be a person of unimpeachable character and not interested in the cause.' But I cannot conceive on what ground such a proposition can be established. It is contradicted by every hour's experience. It would tend to show that a party to an instrument shall not be permitted to contest the validity of it in a court of law, not only by his own evidence, but by any evidence whatever. . . . [It was contended] that policy required that the evidence offered by the defendant should be excluded; but it appears to me that there is at least as much policy in admitting it; for the consequence of admitting such evidence may be only to disappoint a remedy in a civil action, while the consequence of excluding it will be to encourage fraud and to authorize the person who has committed it to rely on his own fraud in a court of justice"; Grose, J.: "Before the case of Walton v. Shelly I never read of this ground of incompetency. The ground is that a man shall not disclose any fact that may invalidate an instrument which he has signed. And why may he not disclose a fact which, if true, it is his duty to the public to disclose? Because, it is said, he has given currency to the bill by putting his name upon it; and he shall not be permitted to impeach his own title. If he has done so, he has done a very illegal and improper act, and committed a fraud upon the public; [yet] if by his assistance the law has been violated and the revenue defrauded, he owes to the public, by way of retribution, a disclosure of the circumstances and the parties, that the scheme to rob the revenue may be frustrated. . . . But it is said: Homo allegans turpitudinem suam non est audiendus. This, as a maxim applied to parties in a cause, may in some cases be true; but there, if both are participes criminis, the rule applies, Potior est conditio defendentis. A man shall not sustain an action upon a ground which proves him guilty of a breach of the law; so a man shall not recover money due upon an illegal consideration, such as usury, gaming, smuggling, or the like. But this rule does not extend to shut the mouths of witnesses guilty of criminal actions; if it did, witnesses daily received in courts of justice, and whom the policy of the law invites to come forward, must be rejected, — such as accomplices, and others concerned in illegal transactions. This class of men, as I said before, the policy of the law invites to disclose all they know, leaving their credit to the wisdom and discretion of the jury."[7]

[5] Compare the effect of his influence in fathering the unsound rules about parents "bastardizing their children" (post, § 2063), jurors impeaching their verdict (post, § 2352), and proof of "marriage in fact" (post, § 2085).

[6] 1789, Bent v. Baker, 3 T. R. 27 (assumpsit on a policy of insurance; for the defendant was called, to disprove liability, a broker who had been employed by the plaintiff to get the policy and had also underwritten it himself after the defendant had underwritten it; besides the objection of interest, it was urged against him that "a party shall not be permitted to give testimony to avoid an instrument which he himself has executed," citing Walton v. Shelly; Lord Kenyon, C. J., noticed this as follows: "Then it has been said that a person cannot be permitted to give evidence to invalidate an instrument which he himself has executed; but I cannot assent to that as a general proposition," citing Lowe v. Jolliffe, supra, § 527; Buller, J., noticing the same objection, said: "The ground of that objection is that it is holding out false credit to the world, and must be confined to negotiable instruments"; to which Lord Kenyon agreed).

This ended the suggested doctrine in England. Perhaps its end would not have been so speedy had not Lord Mansfield's successor been a man determined to overthrow the (to him) pernicious innovations of his great predecessor and intellectual antipathist.[8] But in this country Lord Mansfield's rule obtained for a time considerable vogue. Several Courts retracted, after its utter repudiation in England was pressed upon their notice; and even those retaining it were content to confine it to persons appearing as indorsers (or the like) of negotiable instruments, and to decline applying it to obligors of other contracts or grantors of deeds.[9] Almost nothing has been heard of [7] 1798, Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 T. R. 599 (indorsee of a bill against the acceptor; the latter allowed to call the payee to prove that the bill, though dated at Hamburg, was in fact drawn in London, and therefore inadmissible for lack of a stamp); 1812, Jones v. Brooke, 4 Taunt. 464 (preceding case accepted as law).

[8] For another instance (there less creditable) of the influence upon the law of Lord Kenyon's succession to Lord Mansfield's place, see post, § 1858.

[9] The rulings in the various American jurisdictions are as follows: Ala.: 1827, Todd v. Stafford, 1 Stew. 199 (payee competent to impeach note's consideration; Walton v. Shelly repudiated; White, J., diss.); Ark.: 1847, Tucker v. Wilamonicz, 8 Ark. 157, semble (Walton v. Shelly not accepted); 1852, Caldwell v. McVicar, 12 id. 746, 750, semble (same); 1856, Arnold v. McNeil, 17 id. 179, 187 (grantor of deed of trust, admissible to disprove execution; rule of Walton v. Shelly repudiated); Conn.: 1802, Allen v. Hollkins, 1 Day 17 (defendant, a subsequent lessee, offered the lessor to prove plaintiff's prior lease void; excluded, on the authority of Walton v. Shelly, because "no man should be admitted to swear against his own deed") 1804, Webb v. Danforth, ib. 301 (point argued, but not decided); 1814, Townsend v. Bush, 1 Conn. 260 (drawer of usurious bill competent in action by payee, who has paid indorsee, against acceptor; Walton v. Shelly repudiated; the opinion of Swift, J., is the best of all the learned and sensible opinions on this subject with reference to the application of the doctrine to negotiable instruments); 1839, Jackson v. Packer, 13 id. 342, 359 (preceding case approved); Ga.: 1832, Slack v. Moss, Dudley 161 (payee of first note competent to prove, in action on renewal note, that consideration of first note was gaming; Walton v. Shelly repudiated in an excellent opinion); 1881, McBride v. Bryan, 67 Ga. 584 (attorney confessing a judgment without authority for his client, held "incompetent to invalidate it," because "he committed a crime as a lawyer"); Ill.: 1840, Webster v. Vickers, 3 Ill. 295 (payee-indorser of note competent to prove breach of warranty of goods paid by note); 1841, Bradley v. Morris, 4 id. 182 (indorser of note competent to prove discharge, "although it had been held" that he would be incompetent to prove it void ab initio, except where he indorses without recourse); Ia.: 1840, Strang v. Wilson, 1 Morris 84 (indorser of note competent to prove holder's purchase for value, but, semble, not to "invalidate the instrument"); Ky.: 1823, Gorham v. Carroll, 3 Litt. 221 (payee of note assigning without recourse competent to prove usury); La.: 1821, Shamburgh v. Commagere, 10 Mart. 18 (indorser admissible to prove alteration after indorsement, but, semble, not to invalidate by prior facts) 1826, Cox v. Williams, 5 id. N. S. 139 (rule referred to as "not yet perfectly settled"); Me.: 1826, Deering v. Sawtel, 4 Greenl. 191 (mortgagor not admitted to prove note's usurious consideration, in writ of entry by mortgagee's assignee against mortgagor's grantee; Walton v. Shelly approved; rule confined to negotiable instruments); 1828, Chandler v. Moulton, 5 id. 374 (maker of accommodation note for defendant's benefit, not admitted to prove usury in action by indorsee); 1837, Puck v. Appleton, 2 Shepl. 284 (indorser of note admissible to prove that waiver of notice was written on note after defendant's indorsement, a fact not affecting the note's validity at inception), 1841, Abbott v. Mitchell, 6 id. 354 (indorser without recourse admissible to prove alteration before delivery); 1856, Lincoln v. Fitch, 42 Me. 456, 466 (indorser of acceptance, held not admissible to prove fraud in its inception); Md.: 1810, Ringgold v. Tyson, 3 H. & J. 172 (indorser of note competent to prove payment, in action by indorsee against maker; Walton v. Shelly repudiated; see quotation post, § 531; Earle and Gantt, JJ., diss.); Mass.: 1795, Parker v. Lovejoy, 3 Mass. 565 (payee of note not admitted to prove usury, in action by indorsee against maker; approving Walton v. Shelly); 1807, Warren v. Merry, ib. 27 (indorsee of note against indorser; maker admitted to prove payment, but Walton v. Shelly approved); 1808, Churchill v. Suter, 4 id. 156 (like Parker v. Lovejoy; rule reaffirmed as good policy), 1813, Manning v. Wheatland, 10 id. 502 (rule reapproved); 1814, Stowell v. Flagg, 11 id. 368, 375 (like the next case); 1814, Loker v. Haynes, ib. 498 (grantor of deed admitted to prove fraud the doctrine in the last fifty years, even in those jurisdictions where it was preserved as law. This, however, seems to be due to the belief that the general statutory abolition of disqualification by interest (post, § 576), which went on from 1850 to 1870, carried away with it the rule of Walton v. Shelly.[10] But this supposition is certainly erroneous; and Lord Mansfield himself (as seen above) expressly pointed out that the interest-objection was not involved. It is proper that a Court in which the rule once prevailed should expressly disown it, first, because the maxim allegans turpitudinem suam, on which it rests, has no place in our law,[11] and, secondly, because, so far as the policy of the law of negotiable instruments is involved, that policy makes decidedly against the rule and not for it.[12] It may safely be assumed that the rule of Walton v. Shelly would not to-day be sustained in any jurisdiction.

In deed, in action by grantor's creditor; rule confined "to negotiable instruments alone"); 1819, Fox v. Whitney, 16 Id. 118 (rule not applicable to non-negotiable or non-negotiated paper); 1821, Hartford Bank v. Barry, 17 id. 94 (maker of note not admitted to prove usury in action by indorsee against indorser); 1821, Packard v. Richardson, ib. 122, 127 (rule applied to one signing as agent for maker); 1834, Hudson v. Hulbert, 15 Pick. 423, 426 (like Loker v. Haynes); 1840, Thayer v. Crossman, 1 Metc. 416 ("supposing the rule settled," it does not affect testimony to prove payment of a note indorsed after maturity); 1845, Dickinson v. Dickinson, 9 Id. 471 (rule not applicable to vendor of colt warranting title, in action by true owner against vendee); Mich.: 1846, Orr v. Lacey, 2 Dong. 230, 238 (indorsee against indorser; accommodation acceptor admitted to prove bill void; Walton v. Shelly repudiated in an excellent opinion by Whipple, J.); Miss.: 1832, Drake v. Henly, Walk. 541 (first indorsee admitted to prove facts occurring after indorsement); 1842, Ronth v. Helm, 6 How. 127 (undecided; but rule held not applicable to a maker called for an indorser to prove payment); 1848, Williams v. Miller, 10 Sm. & M. 139 (same; rule not applicable to payee called for maker to prove payment); 1852, Watts v. Smith, 24 Miss. 77, 79 (same; payee suing as nominal plaintiff admitted to prove a note void on behalf of the maker, the title being still legally in the payee); 1870, Partee v. Silliman, 44 Id. 272, 280 (undecided; but rule not applicable to an indorser not impeaching the paper "in its origin or at the time it was indorsed"); Mo.: 1841, Bank v. Hull, 7 Mo. 273, 276 (indorsee against indorser; maker competent; Walton v. Shelly repudiated); 1853, St. John v. McConnell, 19 Id. 38 (Walton v. Shelly repudiated); N. H.: 1817, Houghton v. Page, 1 N. H. 60 (co-maker of note not admitted to prove usury in action by indorsee against maker); 1820, Bryant v. Ritterbush, 2 Id. 212 (indorser admitted to prove payment before indorsement; rule confined to defences which affect purchasers for value without notice); 1830, Haddock v. Wilmarth, 5 id. 181, 187 (grantor admitted against grantee to prove deed void; rule confined to "negotiable securities"); 1840, Haines v. Dennett, 11 id. 180 (indorsee of note against surety; maker admissible to prove alteration after execution and without defendant's knowledge; Walton v. Shelly and Houghton v. Page repudiated, in the best opinion on the subject, next to Mr. J. Swift's); N. J.: 1811, Rosevelt v. Gardner, Penningt. 791 (Walton v. Shelly discussed; no decision); 1818, Ferris v. Saxton, 1 South. 1, 14 (Walton v. Shelly assumed to be law); 1839, Freeman v. Brittin, 2 Harrison 191, 194, 219, 229, 235, 238 (indorser of note, admitted to prove usury in action of indorsee against maker; Walton v. Shelly repudiated, by three judges against two; Ford, J., diss., says the most that has ever been said for the rule); N. Y.: 1802, Winton v. Saldler, 3 Johns. Cas. 185 (payee of note not admissible to prove usury in action by one indorsee against another; by three judges against two including Kent, J.); 1807, Coleman v. Wise, 2 Johns. 165 (Walton v. Shelly approved, following Winton v. Saldler); 1813, Woodhull v. Holmes, 10 Id. 231 (rule not applicable to proof of facts subsequent to execution); 1818, Skidding v. Warren, 15 Id. 270 (preceding case followed); 1819, Powell v. Waters, 17 Id. 176 (same); 1822, Tuthill v. Davis, 20 Id. 285 (Winton v. Saldler doubted); 1825, Stafford v. Rice, 5 Cow. 23 ("Winton v. Saldler is not law"); 1825, Bank of Utica v. Hillard, Ib. 153, 159 (Winton v. Saldler deliberately overruled); 1829, Williams v. Walbridge, 3 Wend. 415 (same); N. C.: 1819, Guy v. Hall, 3 Murph. 150 (Walton v. Shelly repudiated); Oh.: 1833, Stone v. Vance, 6 Oh. 246, 248 (payee admitted to prove facts of assignment, in action between assignee and maker); 1846, Treon v. Brown, 14 Id. 483 (indorser not admitted to prove note void, in action between indorsee and maker; Walton v. Shelly followed); 1849, Rohrer v. Morningstar, 18 Id. 579, 587 (rule not applied in action by indorsee taking after maturity); Pa.: 1791, Clyde v. Clyde, 1 Yeates 92 (contract to divide land bought; one of the parties not allowed to "invalidate or disaffirm his own contract"); 1792, Stille v. Lynch, 2 Dall. 194 (payee excluded, in action between indorsee and maker; Walton v. Shelly cited); 1793, Pleasants v. Pemberton, ib. 196 (rule confined to negotiable instruments; not applied to a receipt); 1802, Balliot v. Bowman, 2 Binn. 162 (Jordaine v. Lashbrooke cited with approval); 1809, Baring v. Shippen, ib. 154, 165 (assignor of bond admitted to prove it fraudulently obtained; Pleasants v. Pemberton approved); 1818, Baird v. Cochran, 4 S. & R. 397 (rule not applied in action by indorsee taking after maturity); 1820, Hepburn v. Cassel, 6 Id. 113 (rule not applied to non-negotiable paper or paper not negotiated in regular course); 1839, Harrisburg Bank v. Forster, 8 Watts 304, 309 (rule recognized; intervening decisions cited); 1842, Davenport v. Freeman, 3 W. & S. 557 (maker inadmissible in action between indorsee and indorser); 1842, Parke v. Smith, 4 Id. 287 (like Baird v. Cochran); 1879, State Bank v. Rhoads, 89 Pa. 353, 357 (rule of Walton v. Shelly, the ground of which was "policy of law, not interest," held to have been abolished by St. 1869, ante, § 488, that "no interest nor policy of law" shall exclude a witness); S. C.: 1796, Payne v. Trezevant, 2 Bay 23, 33 (payee of note allowed to prove usury, in action by indorsee against maker; Walton v. Shelly cited in argument); 1797, Canty v. Sumter, ib. 93 (obligee of bond not admitted to impeach it in action by assignee; Walton v. Shelly cited); 1811, Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desauss. 223 (vendee of chattels admitted to invalidate the sale; Walton v. Shelly, if law, confined to negotiable instruments); 1817, Haig v. Newton, 1 McCord 423, 429, 433 (Walton v. Shelly treated as law; Cheves, J., diss.); 1825, Knight v. Packard, 3 Id. 72 (Walton v.

§ 530. Same: Contradicting one's Own Official Certificate. A notion almost identical with that underlying the rule of Walton v. Shelly has led to the argument that an official who has certified to a specific fact as known to him to have occurred will not be allowed to testify, in contradiction to the certificate, that the facts were otherwise than as certified:

1839, Bullard, J., in Briggs v. Stafford, 14 La. o. s. 381: "A public officer who has given a solemn certificate in his official character and under his seal cannot be listened to as a witness to prove it false. There is a degree of turpitude in certifying as to what the officer does not know to be true, as well as in certifying what he knows to be false. In either case, whatever may be the palliating circumstances in foro conscientiæ, we think the falsity of the certificate ought not to be shown by the testimony of the officer himself. Allegans turpitudinem suam non audiendus."

The notion has no better grounds for support here than elsewhere. If the certificate is not absolutely conclusive (post, §§ 1345–1352) and may be otherwise shown to be incorrect, then the official should be equally competent. The official doubtless should be punished, but not the party needing Shelly definitely repudiated as not law); 1828, Simmons v. Parsons, 1 Bail. 62, 64 (Walton v. Shelly is "entirely exploded"); 1891, Reeves v. Brayton, 36 S. C. 384, 394, 401, 15 S. E. 658 (grantor of deed, not a party, allowed to prove defective execution); Tenn.: 1821, Stamp v. Napier, 2 Yerg. 35 (Walton v. Shelly, and the whole principle of nemo allegans, etc., repudiated; excellent opinion by Whyte, J.); 1853, Smithwick v. Anderson, 2 Swan 573, 577 (Walton v. Shelly treated as law; but not applicable to paper negotiated after maturity); Tex.: 1849, Parsons v. Phipps, 4 Tex. 341, 350 (Walton v. Shelly repudiated); U. S.: 1832, Bank of U. S. v. Dunn, 6 Pet. 51, 57 (Walton v. Shelly approved; intermediate indorser not admitted to prove a note given "under any circumstances which would destroy its validity"); 1834, Bank of the Metropolis v. Jones, 8 id. 12, 16 (drawer not admitted to prove fraud discharging indorser); 1835, Taylor v. Luther, 2 Sumn. 228, 235, per Story, J. (rule held not applicable to deeds); 1837, U. S. v. Leffler, 11 Pet. 86, 94 (rule not applicable to exclude official from proving his surety's bond to have been delivered in escrow); 1838, Scott v. Lloyd, 12 id. 145, 149 (rule assumed to be in force); 1845, Henderson v. Anderson, 3 How. 73, 80 (rule adhered to); 1851, Saltmarsh v. Tuthill, 13 id. 229 (same); 1876, Davis v. Brown, 94 U. S. 423 (action by second indorsee against first indorsees; one of the latter admitted to prove agreement with plaintiff not to hold defendants liable; Walton v. Shelly discredited; Bank v. Dunn qualified to the above extent); 1901, Metropolitan Nat'l Bank v. Jansen, 47 C. C. A. 497, 108 Fed. 572 (Davis v. Brown followed); Vt.: 1826, Nichols v. Holgate, 2 Aik. 138 (Walton v. Shelly repudiated); 1829, Chandler v. Mason, 2 Vt. 193, 197 (Walton v. Shelly approved, but the preceding case held to be a precedent); 1852, Pecker v. Sawyer, 24 id. 459, 462 (Nichols v. Holgate approved; Walton v. Shelly definitely repudiated); Va.: 1825, Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316, 317, 340, 346 (Walton v. Shelly repudiated in excellent opinions by Carr, Green, and Coalter, JJ.).

[10] It was partly on this ground that it was abandoned in Pennsylvania.

[11] See § 532, post.

[12] For masterly expositions of this policy, see the opinions of Swift, J., in Townsend v. Bush, 1 Conn. 260; Gilchrist, J., in Haines v. Dennett, 11 N. H. 180; and Carr and Green, JJ., in Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316.

his testimony. The official is clearly capable of falsification, but the value of his testimony should be left to the jury:

1862, Peck, C. J., in Truman v. Lore, 14 Oh. St. 144, 151: "[The counsel admits that the certificate may be shown to state the facts incorrectly, because it was not made as a judicial act after a judicial investigation], but insists that public policy prohibits a magistrate from disproving a fact to which he has certified. But the argument loses much if not all of its force, when we consider he is not required to certify to any such thing or empowered to make any such investigation. The reasons which would close the lips of the magistrate also apply to the subscribing witnesses. . . . If all were excluded, public policy would be violated rather than promoted by the exclusion."

That such testimony is properly admissible ought not to be doubted, in view of the general denial in modern times of the analogous doctrines already examined, and of the total repudiation in our law of the maxim allegans suam turpitudinem (as noted in § 531, post). Yet the contrary view finds occasional support.[1] The question whether such an official certificate can be contradicted by any evidence whatever is a different one, involving the principle of conclusive testimony (post, § 1352).

§ 531. Same: Allegans suam turpitudinem, as a general Maxim. It is thus apparent that, of the specific instances in which the supposed doctrine of allegans suam turpitudinem has been put forward or for a time accepted, none (except the last) have to-day any recognition as valid doctrines of the law of evidence. The truth is that the whole notion underlying that maxim is unsuited to support rules of evidence.[1] That so many Courts have in so many distinct lines of precedents repulsed the attempts to establish it in one form or another has been due to a general perception that the entire notion

[1] The cases on both sides are as follows: 1902, Parlin & Orendorff Co. v. Hatson, — Ill. —, 65 N. E. 93 (notary may impeach his certificate of acknowledgment); 1858, Wright v. Lundy, 11 Ind. 398, 406 (that a notary may impeach his own certificate, apparently assumed); 1839, Briggs v. Stafford, 14 La. o. s. 381 (notary not admitted to prove that the acts certified in protest were done by his clerk; see quotation supra); 1841, Oakey v. Bank, 17 id. 386 (notary not admitted to "contradict or strengthen" certificate of protest); 1843, Mathews v. Holand, 5 Rob. La. 200 (same); 1844, Peet v. Dougherty, 7 Id. 85 (notary not allowed to testify in contradiction of express statement in certificate of protest); 1845, Follain v. Dupré, 11 Id. 154 (principle conceded; but notary allowed to prove orally facts not provable by defective certificate); 1862, Central Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 305 (magistrate not allowed to impeach his own certificate; citing Harkins v. Forsyth, infra); 1863, Matthews v. Dare, 20 id. 270 (a justice of the peace taking a married woman's acknowledgment of a deed, which recited that he had "fully explained" it to her, was not allowed to show by any evidence that he had not read it over to her; but in this case he was a party and his knowledge of the contents of the deed was material); 1903, Nicholson v. Snyder, — Id. —, 55 Atl. 484 (notary not allowed to impeach his certificate of a bankrupt's oath); 1843, Wood v. Trust Co., 7 How. Miss. 609, 632 (justice certifying a notarial act may not "falsify his own certificate," but may testify to facts rendering it illegal); 1862, Truman v. Lore, 14 Oh. St. 144, 151 (certificate of acknowledgment by justice of the peace; the magistrate's testimony to the acknowledger's feeble state of mind, admitted; see quotation supra); 1821, Stewart v. Allison, 6 S. & R. 321 (notary may impeach his certificate of acknowledgment); 1898, Davis v. Monroe, 187 Pa. 212, 41 Atl. 44 (justice of the peace allowed to impeach his certificate of acknowledgment); 1843, Carpenter v. Sawyer, 17 Vt. 121, 123 (town-clerk allowed to show that a record of advertisements by him was not properly made); 1806, Haring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. 154, 166, 175 (maxim repudiated by one judge, approved by another); 1840, Harkins v Forsyth, 11 Leigh 294, 308 (justice or clerk cannot deny facts certified by "testifying to their own official perfidy"; but here no testimony at all was admissible); 1861, Adams v. Wright, 14 Wis 408, 413 (notary may impeach his certificate).

[1] For a discussion of the maxim in its proper application to estoppels in substantive law, see Baker v. Preston, Gilmer 235 (1821); Laurenson v. State, 7 H. & J. 339 (1826).

has no place in our system. That this is the fundamental reason for the failure of those attempts, and that it is not a question of the unsoundness of a particular set of precedents but of the fallacy of the whole idea, may be seen from the following passages, in which by the most weighty judicial names the maxim is broadly repudiated from the domain of evidence:

1802, Kent, J., in Winton v. Saidler, 3 Johns. Cas. 185, 192: "The maxim nemo allegans, etc., is applicable to parties rather than to witnesses, and it goes no more to the exclusion of witnesses in civil than in criminal cases."

1810, Chase, C. J., in Ringgold v. Tyson, 3 H. & J. 172, 176: "[The rule of Walton v. Shelly] is acknowledged to be a rule of policy, and adopted by the Court in that case in conformity to a maxim of the civil law, Nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus. This as a rule of evidence was unknown in the common-law Courts in England prior to that case. . . . Unquestionably the rule in Walton v. Shelly cannot prevail as a general rule, because, in the cases of wills, deeds, and bonds, the witnesses to them may be examined to impeach their validity, — in the first case, to prove the insanity of the testator; in the second case, to prove the deed was not sealed or delivered; and in the third case, to prove the bond was given on an usurious consideration, or that the obligor was unlettered and that the bond was not read or was misread to him. The witnesses in these cases by their attestations held out there was no legal objection to them and that they will prove those requisites which are essential to their validity. . . . An accomplice is a legal and competent witness against the principal, and in giving testimony must declare his own turpitude and participation in the crime, which is a circumstance that [only] impeaches his credit. The maxim of the civil law, when considered with reference to the common law, may be understood as affecting the credit of the witness and declaring that he stands in that predicament which renders his testimony suspicious and that he ought to be heard with caution."

1814, Trumbull, J., in Townsend v. Bush, 1 Conn. 260, 267: "The maxim of the civil law that no man is to be heard who alleges his own turpitude or crime was never by any Court or judge before Lord Mansfield applied to the inadmissibility of a witness, but only to the rights of the parties in a suit or action. No suitor can support a claim in which the ground or consideration is an unlawful act of his own, nor can any defendant be heard on a defence grounded on his own unlawful act. But an accomplice in a crime, fraud, or any illegal transaction was always an admissible witness, unless immediately interested in the suit;" Swift, J.: "Lord Mansfield, who had borrowed many valuable principles from the civil law and incorporated them with the common law, attempts to support his decision by what he says is a maxim of the civil law, Nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus. But there is no such rule to be found in the civil law as applicable to witnesses; and it is the daily practice in the common law courts to admit witnesses to testify to facts which show they have been parties to trespasses, frauds, and crimes."

1817, Nott, J., in Knight v. Packard, 3 McCord 71, 77: "The great objection that a person shall not be allowed to develope his own shame appears to me to be founded on mistaken principles. It is not a question whether a party shall be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong, but whether a witness may not be required or permitted to disclose a fraud although he may have been a party to it. How far such a circumstance may go to affect the credit of the witness is a distinct question. I am not aware of any rule or law which renders a witness incompetent on account of his having committed a fraud, unless he has been convicted in a court of justice of perjury or some infamous crime."

1823, Green, J., in Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316, 341, 344: "The meaning of the maxim is that a man alledging his own turpitude impairs his own credit more or less, according to the degree and nature of the turpitude; and in this sense it is universally true, as a sensible rule for testing the degree of credit to which a witness is entitled; but has no application to the question of competency or incompetency. . . . The rule as to exclusion for infamy never, until the case of Walton v. Shelly, varied or was doubted. It was confined to cases of conviction for an infamous crime. Before that case, a witness was not rendered incompetent in any case, civil or criminal, by giving evidence of his own fraud, embezziement, perjury, or felony."

1876, Field, J., in Davis v. Brown, 94 U. S. 423: "The maxim was plainly misapplied here by the great Chief Justice [Mansfield]; for it is not a rule of evidence, but a rule applicable to parties seeking to enforce rights founded upon illegal or criminal considerations. The meaning of the maxim is that no one shall be heard in a court of justice to allege his own turpitude as a foundation of a claim or right; it does not import that a man shall not be heard who testifies to his own turpitude or criminality, however much his testimony may be discredited by his character."

Sub-title I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

Topic II: EXPERIENTIAL CAPACITY.

CHAPTER XXII.

1. General Principles.

§ 555. General Theory of Experiential Capacity; Expertness is Relative to the Particular Topic. That sort of capacity which involves, not the organic powers, moral and mental, requisite for all testimony, nor yet the emotional power of unbiassed observation and statement, the skill to acquire accurate knowledge, may be termed Experiential Capacity. The person possessing it is commonly termed an Expert. Since upon some matters accurate understanding can never be attained without special preparation or familiarity, the rules of evidence must recognize this, and must see to it that the testimonial statements offered as representing knowledge are not offered by persons who on the subject in hand are not fitted to acquire knowledge. Such fitness or skill to acquire accurate impressions comes from circumstances which may broadly be summed up in the term "experience." If, at the one extreme, be imagined the babe in arms, practically lacking in any such skill or fitness, and, at the other extreme, the trained professional student of a department of science, in whom the fitness exists in the highest degree, it is seen that this attribution of the source of the fitness to "experience" is sufficiently accurate for purposes of nomenclature. In experience, then, are included all the processes — the continual use of the faculties, the habit and practice of an occupation, special study, professional training, and the rest — which contribute to produce a fitness to acquire accurate knowledge upon a given subject.

Three fundamental principles, involved in the very nature of this sort of capacity, are to be noted:

(1) The capacity is in every case a relative one, i. e. relative to the topic about which the person is asked to make his statement. The object is to be sure that the question to the witness will be answered by a person who is fitted to answer it. His fitness, then, is a fitness to answer on that point. He may be fitted to answer about countless other matters, but that does not justify accepting his views on the matter in hand. Conversely, if he is skilled enough to acquire knowledge on the matters in hand, it is immaterial that he is not skilled upon any or every other matter.

(2) It follows that there are no fixed classes of expert persons, in which a witness finds himself and remains permanently. A person may be sufficiently skilled upon one question, and totally unskilled upon the next. He may be competent to say whether the deceased had gray hair, and incompetent to say what killed the deceased; competent to say whether the deceased was asphyxiated by gas, and incompetent to distinguish between coal-gas and water-gas; competent to say whether a hatchet was sharp, and incompetent to say whether a stain upon it was human blood. Since experiential capacity is always relative to the matter in hand, the witness may from question to question, enter or leave the class of persons fitted to answer, and the distinction depends on the kind of subject primarily, not on the kind of person. It is thus, furthermore, a mistake to think of experiential qualifications as sharply marked off into defined classes. Since the change of a trifling feature in the general fact asked about may render the competent witness now incompetent, it is obvious that an accurate classification of topics with reference to experiential qualifications would involve divisions and subdivisions too numerous to conceive, and not of practical use.

(3) Again, it is a mistake to think of some witnesses as experts and others as non-experts. In a strict sense, every witness whosoever is an expert. In other words, the very fact that he is allowed to speak at all assumes that he is fitted to have knowledge on the subject; though in the vast majority of matters no demonstration of his fitness is needed. It is common and not unnatural to confine the term "experts" to witnesses whose fitness, by reason of the subject-matter, needs to be first shown; but while there is, as will be seen, a practical distinction between the instances in which the fitness must be expressly shown and the instances in which it need not be, that is no reason for ignoring the fundamental principle that every witness whosoever is and must be, by hypothesis, fitted or "expert" in the matter about which he is allowed to give his supposed knowledge. In particular, it is a mistake to suppose that an "expert" must be a person professionally occupied upon the matter to be testified to. This is a mistake having its special origin in the doctrine of Opinion evidence, and can there better be considered.[1] It is sufficient here to note that the only requirement is that the witness must be fitted to acquire knowledge on the matter he speaks about; and, if he is thus fitted, that it is entirely immaterial whether he acquired his fitness by being professionally concerned in such matters.

[1] Post, § 1923.

§ 556. Different Kinds of Expert Capacity. Although (as just noted) there is no difference in principle between what may be termed the highest and the lowest expert, and though the single and uniform principle is that every witness must be sufficiently experienced for the matter in hand, yet it is possible and necessary to distinguish two broad groups of matters with reference to experiential capacity. Between these two the distinction constantly becomes a question of law, because of reasons of practical convenience.

First, there is that class of matters as to which a sufficient experience is possessed by every person of ordinary fortunes in life, — the kind of skill in the ordinary use of the senses which is developed necessarily, in the course of the daily doings, for every mature member of society. To every one who is intelligent enough to take the witness stand at all is attributed a sufficient kind and degree of skill upon these matters. Hence, as the important practical consequence, no express preliminary evidence of the possession of skill in these matters is necessary. The opponent may by cross-examination expose its meagre quantity or poor quality; but that it exists in a sufficient degree in every one upon such matters is taken for granted.

Secondly, there is that class of matters as to which it is only by means of some special and peculiar experience, more than is the common possession, that a person becomes competent to acquire knowledge. Hence, the possession of this cannot be assumed, for an individual witness, but must be expressly shown beforehand. This special and peculiar experience may have been attained, so far as legal rules go, in any way whatever; all the law requires is that it should have been attained. Yet it is possible here to group roughly two classes of experience which are usually, though not necessarily, found separately. (a) There is, first, the so-called "practical" experience, — the kind which is obtained casually and incidentally, yet steadily and adequately, in the course of some occupation or livelihood. From the advertising-agent to the woodchopper there is a long list of occupations in any one of which, and perhaps in that alone, the fitness will be obtained to acquire knowledge on a particular topic. (b) There is, secondly, a systematic training, directed deliberately to the acquisition of fitness and involving the study of a body of knowledge forming a branch of some science or art. This may be termed "scientific" experience. Now the line, if any can be drawn, between these two has no general legal significance. In truth no accurate line can be drawn. Each shades into the other imperceptibly. In some instances the witness will need both; in some instances he may have both, though he does not need both. Neither is generally favored above the other by the Courts. The question in each instance is whether the particular witness is fitted as to the matter in hand. On many points the nature of the subject is such that a scientific training is indispensable; but rulings requiring it made no general discrimination between the two sources of fitness; they simply apply the general principle and require the particular sort of experience which fits the witness to acquire knowledge on the particular matter:

1888, Campbell, J., in Kelley v. Richardson, 69 Mich. 436, 37 N. W. 514: "The phrase 'expert testimony' is not entirely fortunate as designed to cover all cases where a witness may give his opiuions. . . . [First, as to impressions of cold or heat, and the like,] any person can give such impressions without special experience or special intelligence. Beyond these every-day matters, known to all men, are things which most, if not all persons can become qualified to judge by more or less opportunities of observation, local or habitual, but which require no peculiar intelligence. [Secondly,] then, there are branches of business or occupations where some intelligence is requisite for judgment, but opportunities and habits of observation must be combined with some practical experience. This seems to be the beginning or lower grade of what may properly be termed 'experts,' — a word meaning only the acquisition of certain habits of judgment, based on experience or special observation. And the scale rises as the qualifications become nicer and require greater capacity or knowledge and experience, until it reaches scientific observers and practitioners in arts and sciences requiring peculiar and thorough special training."

The fundamental principle, that every witness whatsoever must be expert in the matter he speaks about, is not violated by the recognition of these two broad classes above. That principle is invariable. But the distinction between the two classes stands upon the practical consideration that, in matters of the first class, the skill or capacity, being that which the ordinary course of life furnishes, may be assumed to be possessed by every person offered as a witness and need not be shown beforehand; while in matters of the second class, the skill or capacity required being attainable only by an experience special, peculiar, and out of the ordinary, the possession of that experience by any person who is to speak on that point must first be expressly shown. The distinction is entirely practical, and is in principle sound and simple.

It thus comes about that the rulings of Courts applying the requirements of experiential capacity are broadly of two general sorts, answering the questions:

1. On what matters is that general experience, common to every member of the community, a sufficient qualification?

2. When something more than this general experience is necessary, what shall the requirements be, as to such special experience, for the particular matter to be testified to?

More briefly put: 1. On a particular topic, is general experience sufficient? 2. If not, what sort of special experience is necessary?

The rules of law under these two topics form the legitimate subject of the present principle. But before examining these rules, it is desirable to discriminate two other principles which have no bearing on the present subject, but are apt to be improperly associated with it.

§ 557. Opinion Rule, distinguished. There is a rule of evidence (post, § 1918) which excludes, on the ground of superfluity, testimony which speaks to the jury on matters for which all the materials for judgment are already before the jury. This testimony is excluded simply because, being useless, it involves an unnecessary consumption of time and a cumbersome addition to the mass of testimony. In the majority of instances the testimony thus excluded will consist of an "opinion" by the witness, i. e. a judgment or inference from other facts as premises, and it will be excluded because the other facts are already or may be brought sufficiently before the tribunal. If they are not or cannot be, then the witness' judgment or inference will be listened to. Thus, it will often depend on the special qualifications of the witness whether he can add anything valuable which the jury have not already for themselves. When, for example, the size and appearance of a skull-fracture has been testified to, the witness, if he is a person of only ordinary experience, cannot tell any better than the jury can whether the fracture is such as to have necessarily caused death; while, if he is a medical man, he is capable of adding considerably to the jury's information on that point. In the former case, his judgment, or "opinion," would be excluded; in the latter case, it would be listened to. Thus, in applying this rule about the superfluity of opinions, the experiential qualifications of the witness will be material; and it is because for that rule of law as well as for the present one the question of experiential qualifications is important, that there has often been a confusion of the two subjects. That there are two distinct subjects involved is not always seen. That they are distinct is certain. It is easy to see how in practice the result of the ruling upon the evidence may be very different according to the principle which is being applied. For example, suppose it is desired to show that certain stains on a garment are blood-stains. In applyiug the principle of testimonial expert qualifications, all that is asked is whether the witness, as a person of general experience only, is competent to distinguish blood-stains from other marks. Assume it to be decided that he is; then there comes to be applied the other principle as to the superfluity of opinions which the jury themselves have the material for forming. Here, if the garment is before the jury, the witness' opinion, as a layman, is superfluous (unless perhaps he saw it when the stains were fresher) and will be excluded. Yet, if the witness is specially experienced in such matters, he may be able to add something to the jury's information, even with the garment before their eyes; and he will therefore be listened to. Again, suppose it is a question whether the distance between two points is a rod or a mile. If the jury have seen the place, no help from any one, however expert a surveyor, is needed; and if they have not seen it and cannot, a person of ordinary experience is as useful as a surveyor. But if the issue is whether the distance is eighty rods or seventy-nine rods, then even if the jury cannot see it, and help is needed, the principle of experiential qualifications would perhaps make it necessary to call a surveyor.

Thus, it is essential that the doctrine of experiential qualifications should not be confounded with the doctrine of superfluous opinion-evidence. Each has its legitimate rules, and both often may come into doubt with reference to the same piece of evidence; but they must be kept separate. The whole law of "opinion evidence," so-called, may be and might well be modified or abolished; but that would not affect in the slightest the sound doctrine of experiential qualifications. Practically, the best plan for the advocate is to test each piece of evidence (if it seems to involve these doctrines) by asking himself the two distinct questions: first, Is this a matter upon which this witness is sufficiently qualified by experience? and, if it is, next, Is this a matter upon which the jury are or may be so well furnished with information that this witness cannot help them appreciably?

§ 558. Experience, and Observation or Knowledge, distinguished. It has been seen (ante, § 478), that Observation, or Knowledge, of the matter to be testified to is one of the essential elements of testimonial qualifications; its rules are examined elsewhere in detail (post, § 650). Here it is to be noted that, in practice, the line between experience and observation may sometimes be indistinguishable. It is not that there is any doubt about either being indispensable; that cannot be. It is merely that the circumstances which supply the one often supply the other also; and so the rule which requires or permits a witness of a certain sort to be accepted cannot in such a case be classified as belonging exclusively or certainly under the one or the other principle. This situation arises often with reference to value-witnesses. A ruling, for instance, that knowledge of sales in the vicinity is sufficient to qualify a value-witness, — is it a ruling as to experience or as to knowledge? The uncertainty arises from the fact that observation or knowledge of a thing involves, in these instances, two elements: acquaintance with the object or article itself, and acquaintance with the class of things into which it is desired to put the object. For example, knowledge of the value of a horse involves, first, a knowledge of the values of the different grades of horses, and, secondly, knowledge of the appearance and qualities of the particular horse, and the operation of estimating its value consists in comparing it with the several possible classes or grades and then placing it in one of them. It follows that the observation or knowledge necessary in such cases is twofold, — knowledge of values generally or the conditions affecting values, and knowledge of the thing to be valued. The same twofold process is necessary also in witnesses to identity or resemblance; for the witness must be acquainted with both the thing to be identified and the thing with which the identification is to be made or denied.

Now in this twofold qualification as to knowledge there is in itself involved nothing as to experiential qualifications. But the question may arise whether or not special experiential qualifications are not necessary for acquiring this knowledge of a class of things; and it is here that the practical difficulty of treatment begins. Suppose, for example, a witness is called to the identification of handwriting. Here, as has been already noted (ante, § 99), the process consists in first determining the generic features of a given person's handwriting and then affirming or denying that the piece of writing in issue belongs within that type of writing. Now suppose that testimony to the genuineness of bank-notes is offered on this point from a bank-cashier and a merchant. It will certainly be necessary to show the witness' knowledge of the class, i. e. the genuine notes, by evidence that he has handled and is familiar with the genuine notes; this is purely a question of his opportunities for knowledge of the class. But the further question may arise whether, in spite of such frequent opportunities by handling the notes, the merchant has sufficient skill to form a trustworthy opinion about the genuineness of notes as a class; and here a Court might insist on the witness possessing the peculiar skill which, for example, a cashier would have. Again, suppose a ruling that in order to testify to the value of real property it is or is not necessary that the witness should be a dealer in real estate; is this a ruling as to experiential capacity? It may be looked upon in that way, as holding that special experience is or is not necessary in order to be capable of acquiring intelligent knowledge about such values. On the other hand, it may be looked upon merely as determining that a full and accurate knowledge of such values (i.e. the classes or grades into one of which the property is to be placed) can or cannot be obtained exclusively by one whose occupation gives him a full survey of the field. In the former view, we are establishing a special experiential capacity as necessary; in the latter view, we require no special capacity, but insist on full opportunities for observing the class of things in question. Now the Court may in its opinion reveal which of these views it had in mind; but so seldom is this done and so commonly does the decision furnish merely the rule of thumb, without the principle, that it is practically out of the question to distinguish the two topics in the rulings. So, too, the rulings that (for example) a merchant who has handled genuine bank-notes may be a witness to genuineness are so closely connected in their practical bearings with the rulings about experts' qualifications that it is difficult to treat them separately. In dealing, then, with the subject of expert qualifications as to values, and a few other topics, it will be desirable to examine all the rulings under the head of Knowledge or Observation (post, §§ 687–722), without attempting to distinguish sharply between principles which have not been expressly discriminated by the Courts.

§ 559. First Question: Is General or Ordinary Experience sufficient? The first of the two questions (ante, § 556) to be asked in applying the present principle is, whether, for a particular subject of testimony, the general or ordinary experience of a layman is sufficient. Here a warning needs to be sounded, at the outset, against the too noticeable tendency to be over-strict, and to insist upon special accomplishments, where justice would be better served by a laxer attitude. The witness is not the juror. He does not decide the issue; he merely furnishes a small contribution to the material for decision. He should not be required to qualify as if he were a final arbiter of facts. A stand must be taken, sooner or later, against the undue extension of the topics upon which special experience is to be required for testifying:

1866, Porter, J., in People v. Gonzalez, 35 N. Y. 62: "The affairs of life are too pressing and manifold to have everything reduced to absolute certainty, even in the administration of justice. Some reliance must be placed in the intelligence and good faith of witnesses and the judgment and discrimination of jurors. Microscopes, chemists, and men of science are not always at hand; and criminals are neither anxious to court observation nor careful to preserve the evidences of their guilt."

Can any general canon be employed, in determining whether the topic is one upon which special experience shall be required? The following may be suggested: No special experience shall be required unless the matter to be testified to is one upon which it would clearly be presumptuous, under the circumstances of the case, for a person of only ordinary experience to assume to trust his senses, for the purposes of his own action in the ordinary serious affairs of life.[1]

§ 560. Second Question: What Special Experience is Necessary? (1) Qualification must be Expressly Shown. If for a particular topic the foregoing question is answered in the negative, and special experience is held to be necessary, the second question then presents itself: What sort of special experience is necessary? This will sometimes permit of a general rule, — as when it is laid down that a medical practitioner need not be a specialist in insanity to form an opinion on that subject. Whatever general rules of this sort have been vouchsafed are dealt with under the various topics of testimony (post, §§ 534–571). But commonly there can be no such general propositions for the topic at large. The decision must be a concrete one, i. e. upon the fitness of the individual witness, as shown by the circumstances of his experience. Here two rules of method come into application: (1) The possession of the required qualifications by a particular person offered as a witness, must be expressly shown by the party offering him. This follows from the nature of the situation (ante, § 556), and is universally conceded.[1] It marks a contrast between this and the foregoing sorts of testimonial capacity (ante, § 484).

§ 561. Same: (2) Discretion of the Trial Court. (2) Secondly, and emphatically, the trial Court must be left to determine, absolutely and without review, the fact of possession of the required qualification by a particular witness. In most jurisdictions it is repeatedly declared that the decision upon the experiential qualifications of witnesses should be left to the determination of the trial Court.[1]

[1] Compare the following: 1875, Endicott, J., in Com. v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 122: "[The condition is that] the facts upon which the witness is called on to express his opinion are such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding."

[1] It is therefore seldom expressly ruled upon: 1879, State v. Secrest, 80 N. C. 450, 457; 1867, State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225, 236. This was not allowed to be insisted on in Bishop Atterbury's Trial, 16 How. St. Tr. 494 (1723), but merely because the interest of the State demanded the preservation of the secrecy of such methods (post, § 2367).

[1] Can.: 1888, Preeper v. R., 15 Can. Sup. 401, 408, 410; Ala.: 1900, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sandlin, 125 Ala. 585, 28 So. 40; 1902, White v. State, 133 id. 122, 32 So. 139; Ark.: 1882, Hunnicutt v. Kirkpatrick, 39 Ark. 172; Cal.: 1880, Sowden v. Quartz Mining Co., 55 Cal. 451; Conn.: 1897, State v. Main, 69 id. 123, 37 Atl. 80; 1898, Hygeia D. W. Co. v. Hygeia I. Co., 70 id. 516, 40 Atl. 534; 1900, Barber v. Manchester, 72 id. 675, 45 Atl. 1014; D. C.: 1895, Lansburgh v. Wimsett, 7 D. C. App. 271, 274; Fla.: 1902, Davis v. State, — Fla. —, 32 So. 822; Ind.: 1886, Fort Wayne v. Coombs, 107 Ind. 85, 7 N. E. 743 (conclusive, unless there is no evidence at all of qualifications, or a palpable abuse of discretion); 1895, Jenney Electric Co. v. Branham, 145 id. 314, 41 N. E. 448; Me.: 1883, Higgins v. Higgins, 75 Me. 346; 1885, Fayette v. Chesterville, 77 id. 33 ("in extreme cases, where a serious mistake

Just how far this extends in each jurisdiction is difficult to say. In some, the ruling is not reviewable at all; in others, it is reviewable on certain conditions; in others, the matter is left "largely" to the trial Court's discretion. But the language of the principle varies in different opinions; and, in practice, the rulings below are constantly reconsidered above, under the guise of ascertaining whether the "discretion" has been "abused."[2] But the reform of the future will find in this principle the nucleus for a beneficent extension of the doctrine of judicial discretion. Looking at the complication of facts often entering into a witness' competency and best understood by the trial judge alone, — looking at the comparatively trifling character (in relation to all the issues of a trial) of the topics over which controversy arises, — looking at the ample and sure safeguard of cross-examination to reveal the witness' real qualifications, — looking at the injustice of requir-

has been committed through some accident, inadvertence, or misconception, his action may be reviewed"); 1888, State v. Thompson, 80 Id. 200, 13 Atl. 892; 1896, Marston v. Dingley, 88 Id. 546, 34 Atl. 414 ("unless it is made clearly to appear from the evidence that it was not justified or that it was based upon some error in law"); Mass.: 1850, Lincoln v. Barre, 5 Cush. 591; 1858, Quinsigamond Bank v. Hobbs, 11 Gray, 257; 1860, Marcy v. Barnes, 16 Id. 164; 1869, Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 177; 1869, Gossler v. Refinery, 103 Id. 335; 1870, Com. v. Williams, 105 Id. 68; 1874, Tucker v. Railroad, 118 Id. 548; 1875, Lawrence v. Boston, 119 Id. 132; 1882, Perkins v. Stickney, 132 Id. 217 ("conclusive, unless it appears upon the evidence to be erroneous or to have been founded upon some error in law"); 1883, Com. v. Nefus, 135 Id. 554; 1885, Campbell v. Russell, 139 Id. 279, 1 N. E. 345; 1887, Warren v. Water Co., 143 Id. 164, 9 N. E. 527; 1880, Hill v. Home Ins. Co., 129 Id. 349; 1888, Lowell v. Com'rs, 146 Id. 412, 16 N. E. 8; 1895, Amory v. Melrose, 162 Id. 556, 39 N. E. 276; 1895, Com. v. Hall, 164 Id. 152, 41 N. E. 133; 1901, Toland v. Paine F. Co., 179 Id. 501, 61 N. E. 52; 1901, Bowen v. R. Co., Ib. 524, 61 N. E. 141; 1903, White v. McPherson, — Id. —, 67 N. E. 643; Mich.: 1879, McEwen v. Bigelow, 40 Mich. 217; 1883, Ives v. Leonard, 50 Id. 299, 15 N. W. 463, semble; Minn.: 1896, Blondel v. R. Co., 66 Minn. 284, 66 N. W. 1079; 1897, Beckett v. Aid Assoc., 67 Id. 298, 69 N. W. 923; 1900, Backus v. Ames, 79 Id. 145, 81 N. W. 766; 1901, Yorks v. Mooberg, 84 Id. 502, 87 N. W. 115; Mo.: 1896, Helfenstein v. Medart, 136 Mo. 595, 36 S. W. 863; Nebr.: 1900, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fox, 60 Nebr. 531, 83 N. W. 744; 1901, Omaha L. & T. Co. v. Douglas Co., 62 Id. 1, 86 N. W. 936; 1903, Schmuck v. Hill, — Id. —, 96 N. W. 158; N. H.: 1860, Jones v. Tucker, 41 N. H. 549 (Doe, J.: "whether a witness has a special and peculiar knowledge is as much a question of fact as the question whether a search is diligent and thorough"); 1870, Dole v. Johnson, 50 Id. 459; 1872, Ellingwood v. Bragg, 52 Id. 490; 1881, Goodwin v. Scott, 61 Id. 114; 1888, Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 Id. 576, 15 Atl. 219; N. J.: 1896, New Jersey Z. & I. Co. v. L. Z. & I. Co., 59 N. J. L. 189, 35 Atl. 915; N. Y.: 1877, Nelson v. Ins. Co., 71 N. Y. 460, semble; 1888, Slocovich v. Ins. Co., 108 Id. 62, 14 N. E. 802; N. C.: 1879, Flynt v. Bodenhamer, 80 N. C. 205; 1886, State v. Cole, 94 Id. 964 (explaining State v. Parish, Busbee 239; State v. Secrest, 80 N. C. 450); 1895, Bline v. R. Co., 117 Id. 644, 23 S. E. 275 (collecting previous rulings); 1900, Geer v. Durham W. Co., 127 Id. 439, 37 S. E. 474; 1903, State v. Wilcox, — Id. —, 44 S. E. 625; Or.: 1900, Farmers' & T. N. Bank v. Woodell, 38 Or. 294, 61 Pac. 837; 1902, Ruckman v. Lumber Co., 42 Id. 231, 70 Pac. 811; Pa.: 1869, Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 63 Pa. 152; Sorg v. Congregation, Ib. 161; 1871, Delaware & C. Towboat Co. v. Starrs, 69 Id. 41; 1884, First Nat'l Bank v. Wirebach's Ex'r, 106 Id. 44; 1902, Stevenson v. Ebervale Coal Co., 203 Id. 316, 52 Atl. 201; R. I.: 1860, Howard v. Providence, 6 R. I. 514; 1863, Sarle v. Arnold, 7 Id. 586; 1903, Ennis v. Little, — Id. —, 55 Atl. 884; Tenn.: 1891, Powers v. McKenzie, 90 Tenn. 181, 16 S. W. 559; 1897, Bruce v. Beall, 99 Id. 303, 41 S. W. 445; U. S.: 1888, Stillwell Mfg. Co. v. Phelps, 130 U. S. 527, 9 Sup. 601; 1894, Union P. R. Co. v. Novak, 15 U. S. App. 400, 414, 9 C. C. A. 629, 61 Fed. 573; 1902, Bradford Glycerine Co. v. Kizer, 51 C. C. A. 524, 113 Fed. 895; Ut.: 1897, Wright v. S. P. Co., 15 Utah, 421, 49 Pac. 309; 1899, State v. Webb, 18 Id. 441, 56 Pac. 159; 1901, Budd v. R. Co., 23 Id. 515, 65 Pac. 486; 1902, Garr v. Craney, 25 Id. 193, 70 Pac. 853; Vt.: 1874, Wright v. Williams' Estate, 47 Vt. 232 ("so long as the evidence or facts do not constitute or conclusively show skill, and such skill is matter of fact to be inferred from such evidence or facts, the finding of the Court is not revisable in that respect as being error in law"); 1885, Lamoille Valley R. Co. v. Bixby, 57 Id. 563; Carpenter v. Corinth, 58 Id. 216, 2 Atl. 170; 1886, Bemis v. R. Co., 58 Id. 641, 3 Atl. 531; 1901, Watriss v. Trendall, 74 Id. 54, 52 Atl. 118; Va.: 1897, Richmond L. & M. W. v. Ford, 94 Va. 616, 27 S. E. 509; Wash.: 1902, Czarecki v. R. & N. Co., 30 Wash. 288, 70 Pac. 750.

[2] For the misuse of the term "discretion" in this sense, see ante, § 16.

ing the busy judges of the Supreme Courts to investigate such trifles, — in view of all these considerations, it cannot be doubted that the rule of the future ought to be: The experiential qualifications of a particular witness are invariably determined by the trial judge, and will not be reviewed on appeal.

§ 562. Sundry Principles: (1) Expert Witness Stating his Grounds of Opinion; (2) One Expert testifying to Another's Competency; (3) Method of Securing Unbiassed Experts. (1) An expert witness, like any other witness, may be asked on the direct examination, or may be required, to state the grounds of his opinion, i. e. the general data which form the basis of his judgment upon the specific data observed by him. This is merely an application of the general principle of the knowledge-qualification (post, § 655). Distinguish from this the questions whether a hypothetical question may or must be employed (post, § 672); whether an expert witness may be cross-examined or contradicted as to the grounds of his opinion (post, §§ 938, 972, 992); and whether the statements of a patient to a physician may be offered in evidence under the exception to the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1720).

(2) The experiential qualifications of a witness are usually established by his own testimony reciting the facts of his career and special experience. But in impeachment of his qualifications (post, § 938), or in support of them when impeached (post, § 1104), the general character of the witness as to experiential competency may be testified to. Here the proof may be made by means of reputation (post, § 1621) or by means of another expert witness' personal opinion (post, § 1984), — methods which raise the distinct questions of the Hearsay rule and the Opinion rule.

(3) Much has been declaimed about the partisanship and consequent untrustworthiness of the usual professional man as an expert witness. But it does not appear that the professional man is more biassed or more corrupt than the ordinary lay witness. It is merely that his bias or pecuniary subserviency, when it is discovered, is in a more marked and unpleasant contrast with that ideal of impartiality and trustworthiness which is naturally associated with abstract scientific truth. So, too, the frequent inconclusiveness, uncertainty, and contradiction of expert testimony are not more radical than the same baffling features in testimony founded on ordinary observation by the layman's senses. They merely disappoint more sharply our usual conceptions of the accuracy of scientific knowledge. It is a question whether either of these popular (and natural) ideals is attainable at all. But if they may be, in any degree, it certainly is an important question whether they are attainable, in any greater degree than at present, by any other method of using expert testimony than that of calling expert witnesses like any others. There are serious difficulties to be met with by any other method, — in particular, the expense, the impracticability of classifying experts, the impropriety of interfering with the parties' voluntary choice, and the difficulty of adopting a fixed rule for all classes of cases and all communities. Hitherto no one plan seems to have received any general support either in professional or in public opinion.[1]

2. Rules for Particular Subjects of Experience.

§ 564. Foreign Law. In answering the first question (ante, § 559), as applied to this topic, the main controversy is whether a witness to foreign law must be by profession an advocate, attorney, or judge, or whether a layman, if he claims the knowledge, may be trusted to speak as to the state of the law. The earlier practice in England seems to have been often very liberal,[1] though Lord Ellenborough is reported as having insisted on the necessity of a professional character in the witness.[2] But in the leading cases of Vander Donckt v. Thelusson and the Sussex Peerage it was settled that, besides professional persons, those whose occupation makes it necessary for them to give special attention to legal topics may be listened to upon those topics; the application of this test being left for decision to individual cases:

1844, Lord Langdale, in Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & F. 117–134 (a Roman Catholic bishop, exercising certain judicial functions over marriages, was permitted to testify to the Catholic law of marriage): "The witness is in a situation of importance; he is engaged in the performance of important and responsible public duties; and, connected with them and in order to discharge them properly, he is bound to make himself acquainted with this subject of the law of marriage. That being so, his evidence is of the nature of that of a judge."

1849, Maule, J., in Vander Donckt v. Thelusson, 8 C. B. 812, 824 (a witness to prove Belgian law had been a merchant and a commissioner in stocks and bills of exchange in Brussels, but was now an hotel-keeper in London; the question being as to the legal place of presentation of a note): "The question is whether he is a person having special and peculiar means of knowledge of the law of Belgium with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes, one whose business it was to attend to and make himself acquainted with the subject. I think that, inasmuch as he had been carrying on a business which made it his interest to take cognizance of the foreign law, he does fall within the description of an expert. Applying one's common sense to the matter, why should not persons who may be reasonably supposed to be acquainted with the subject — though they have not filled any official appointment, such as judge or advocate or solicitor — be deemed competent to speak upon it? . . . All persons, I think, who practise a business or profession which requires them to possess a certain knowledge of the matter in hand are experts, so far as experts are required."

As to English law, then, these limits will not be transcended, i. e. there must be an occupation, making necessary a familiarity with law.[3] In the United

[1] For some of the proposed expedients, see the following articles: J. F. Stephen, Esq., in 11 Jur. Soc. Pap. 236; Hon. Willard Bartlett, in 34 Am. L. Rev. 1; Hon. G. A. Endlich, in 32 id. 851; Hon. W. L. Foster, in 11 Harv. L. Rev. 169; Mr. Learned Hand, in 15 id. 53. Compare the English and Canadian Rules of Court as to the use of experts' certificates (post, § 1674).

[1] Cases cited infra.

[2] 1807, Richardson v. Anderson, 1 Camp. 66 ("there ought strictly to be some witness professionally acquainted with it").

[3] 1844, Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & F. 134 (repudiating the ruling of Wightman, J., in R. v. Dent, 1 C. & K. 97 (1843); followed with some hesitation in (1849) Vander Donckt v. Thelusson, 8 C. B. 824); 1903, Wilson v. Wilson, P. 157 (law of Malta proved by a doctor of civil law who had never practised there, but who had made professional researches into that law).

Compare the following early cases: 1795, Lindo v. Belisario, 1 Hagg. Cons. 216 (Hebrew witnesses to the Hebrew marriage law were freely consulted who did not appear to fulfil the above limitations); 1791, Ganer v. Lady Lanes-

States no such special limitation has been laid down; an even more liberal policy has generally been followed. In some Courts it has been distinctly said that the experiential competence is independent of the witness' profession and will depend upon the circumstances of each case.[4] In other Courts special circumstances have led to special rules admitting particular classes of laymen.[5] Further than this, generalization seems impracticable.

(2) In answering the second question (ante, § 560), a number of rulings have passed upon the qualifications of particular witnesses; but they have little or no value as precedents.[6]

§ 565. Same: Custom as equivalent to Law. It has sometimes been necessary to point out that a custom of merchants, or the like, may in effect raise a question of law, and that therefore the witness' qualifications must be examined from that specific point of view.[1] Distinguish, however, the question whether usage may be evidenced by specific instances in other trades or places (ante, § 379); whether a single witness suffices to prove a usage (post, § 2053); and whether such testimony is obnoxious to the Opinion rule (post, § 1955).

§ 566. Same: Other Principles, distinguished. In the proof of foreign law, certain other principles, usually involved in practice, are here to be dis-

borough, Peake N. P. 18 (admitting a Jewess, as to the divorce custom of Hebrews on the continent). By St. 1859, 22–3 Vict., c. 63, § 1, an opinion may be obtained from another British court in a region where a diffarent law prevails, and by St. 1861, 24–5 Vict., c. 11, § 1, from any foreign court of a country with which a convention has been made for the purpose; see post, 1675.

[4] 1852, Pickard v. Bailey, 26 N. H. 170 (a lawyer is not necessary, if the necessary experience otherwise appears); 1806, Kenny v. Clarkson, 1 Johns. 394 (some intelligent person of the country in question suffices); 1829, Chanoine v. Fowler, 3 Wend. 177; 1875, American Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. 515 (any one "who is or has been in a position to render it probable that he would make himself acquainted with it"; here a Catholic dean in Germany, who had the legal custody of the local marriage records, testified as to the law about them); 1871, Bird's Case, 21 Gratt, 801, 808 (a priest or minister may testify to marriage law); W. Va. Code 1891, c. 13, § 4 (a judge may "consider any testimony, information, or argument that is offered on the subject").

[5] 1877, Wottrich v. Freeman, 71 N. Y. 601 ("all residents of a country, of a marriageable age and ordinary understanding, are familiar with the usual and customary forms of marriage"; here it was apparently enough if the customary form was followed); 1840, Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts 161, 170 (here the difficulty of obtaining lawyers acquainted with the early Louisiana Territory laws, and the general notoriety of marriage laws, was regarded as allowing a relaxation); 1877, State v. Cneflar, 47 Tex. 304 ("the practice has long prevailed in our courts of receiving the evidence of intelligent Mexicans who were not lawyers, in reference to the laws of Spain and Mexico, in litigation pertaining to lands").

[6] 1867, McKenzie v. Gordon, 7 N. Sc. 151 (American consul, held not qualified to testify to "a validity of a note without a revenue sta p); 1849, Layton v. Chaylon, 43 La. An. [illegible], 1695, Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 33 Atl. 317; 1856, People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 362 (excluding a constable, who had had some litigation involving the law in question); 1834, Marguerite v. Chonteau, 3 Mo. 540, 562 (early Spanish military official's opinion as to law of slavery of Indians, rejected); 1898, State v. Davis, 69 N. H. 350, 41 Atl. 267 (what "R. L. D." on the U. S. internal revenue office records meant; one who had consulted a circular of the Department held not incompetent); 1870, Barrows v. Downs, 9 R. I. 453; 1870, Armstrong v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 226; Molina v. U. S., lb. 272.

[1] But in most of the rulings the custom does not involve any matter of law. 1878, Third National Bank v. Cosby, 43 U. C. Q. B. 58 (American bank president admitted to testify to the legal currency of the U. S.; "any person, be he a practising lawyer or not, who comes within the description of a person peritus virtute officii" is admissible); 1875, Wilson v. Bauman, 80 Ill. 493 (custom of employing an architect to superintend construction; "anybody who had any experience in the matter was competent"; here, building contractors); 1863, Kermott v. Ayer, 11 Mich. 181 (coinage; admitted); 1866, Phelps v. Town, 14 id. 379 (similar; excluded); 1870, Comstock v. Smith, 20 id. 342 (similar; admitted); 1859, Evans v. Ins. Co., 6 R. I. 47, 53 (meaning of "bar-iron"; "any person connected with the trade" so as "reasonably to be presumed to know the meaning," admissible).

tinguished. (1) Whether the professional witness may have acquired his knowledge by reading only, without practice, and whether he must be a resident of the country whose law is in issue, are questions of the adequacy of his knowledge, rather than of his skilled capacity (post, § 690). (2) Whether, when statutory law is involved, the law may be testified to by an expert witness, instead of by the production of the text, is a question of the rule for producing originals (post, § 1271). (3) Whether the Opinion rule affects the testimony of a witness is still another important question (post, § 1953). (4) Whether the foreign law may be evidenced by certified or printed copies of the statutes, or by legal treatises or by printed reports of decisions, depends upon various exceptions to the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1684, 1697, 1703).

§ 567. Value. It has been already noted (ante, § 558) that, since knowledge of the value of a thing involves knowledge also of the classes of value to which the thing may belong, it is impracticable to distinguish invariably the rulings upon experiential qualification from the rulings upon knowledge; and it is therefore more convenient to examine the law of the subject under the latter head (post, §§ 711-722).

§ 568. Medical and Chemical Matters (Health, Sanity, Poison, Blood, etc.); (1) Whether a Lay Witness suffices. Following the double division already noted (ante, § 559), it may be first inquired what topics there are upon which laymen in their ordinary experience are incapable of acquiring knowledge and forming opinions; and, next, what special training is required or is sufficient for the particular professional witness. (1) When does ordinary experience suffice? The key to the various questions that here arise seems to be this: While on matters strictly involving medical science, as such, some special skill is needed, yet there are numerous matters, involving health and bodily soundness, upon which the ordinary experience of everyday life is entirely sufficient. The line may sometimes be difficult to draw; but there can be no difficulty in determining that a layman may be received to state (for example) that a person was or was not apparently ill. Great liberality should be shown by the Courts in applying this principle, so that the cause of justice may not be obstructed by narrow and finical rulings. The correct doctrine has nowhere been better set forth than in the following passage:

1858, Campbell, J., in Evans v. People, 12 Mich. 36: "The greatest difficulty encountered, in determining questions of competency of testimony on subjects connected more or less with medical science, is in ascertaining how far it is safe to suppose unprofessional observers are able to form a reliable judgment. There are some simple disorders which all persons are familiar with. Others require the very highest degree of medical skill to distinguish them from disorders having some resembling appearances or symptoms. . . . In the view of evidence now entertained by the best authorities, it is settled that a jury should be allowed to have placed before them all the means of knowledge which can be had without involving the danger of leading them to form conclusions not based on solid truth and not reliable as reasonably certain. . . . Circumstances may make whole communities familiar with diseases not known elsewhere, . . . and it often happens that persons having no general skill become very familiar with particular subjects. It would be very unwise to exclude such evidence merely because the range of the witness' knowledge is limited. There are as many grades of knowledge and ignorance in the professions as out of them. The only safe rule in any of these cases is to ascertain the extent of the witness' qualifications, and within their range to permit him to speak. Cross-examination and the testimony of others will here, as in all other cases, furnish the best means of testing his value."

To the modern reluctance of the English bar to dispute over trifling points of evidence must be attributed the absence of English rulings on this doctrine. In our own country, on the whole, narrow objections, though constantly made, are discountenanced, and a policy of considerable liberality is enforced.[1]

[1] Laymen held admissible: Ala.: 1847, Milton v. Rowland, 11 Ala. 737 (the fact of disease, as externally apparent); 1855, Bennett v. Fall, 26 id. 610 (that a person was sick); 1857, Wilkinson v. Moseley, 30 Id. 562 (same); 1859, Blackman v. Johnson, 35 Id. 255 (same); 1859, Barker v. Coleman, ih. 225 (same); 1861, Fountain v. Brown, 38 id. 75 (same); 1861, Stone v. Watson, 37 id. 288 ("looked sick"); 1900, Dominick v. Randolph, 124 Id. 557, 27 So. 481 (that a person is sick, allowable, but not that he has paralysis); Cal.: 1882, People v. Hong ah Duck, 61 Cal. 390 (kind of wound inflicted); 1895, People v. Gibson, 106 id. 458, 39 Pac. 864 (same); 1894, Robinson v. Fire Co., 103 Id. 1, 4, 36 Pac. 955 (a person's healthy appearance); 1896, People v. Barney, 114 id. 554, 47 Pac. 41 (whether there was a hymen; a woman admitted); D. C.: 1894, District of Col. v. Haller, 4 D. C. App. 405, 411 (that the plaintiff was a "strong, able-bodied man" before the injury); Fla.: 1898, Edwards v. State, 39 Fla. 753, 23 So. 537 (where medical experts are not accessible, a layman may testify what would probably cause death); Ill.: 1876, Shawneetown v. Mason, 82 Ill. 339 (whether a juror was sick); 1892, Chicago C. R. Co. v. Van Vleck, 143 id. 480, 485, 32 N. E. 262 (ability to work; state of health); Ind.: 1897, Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Gray, 148 Ind. 266, 46 N. E. 675 (a wife, as to the condition of her husband's health); Ia.: 1901, Suddith v. Boone, — Ia. —, 96 N. W. 853 (that the smell of certain gas made him sick); Md.: 1886, Baltimore & L. T. Co. v. Cassell, 66 Md. 432, 7 Atl. 805 (general healthy appearance); Mass.: 1869, Com. v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 413, 419 (whether hairs were human, and whose they were); 1896, Com. v. Flynn, 165 id. 153, 42 N. E. 562 (apparent physical condition of a person robbed); Mich.: 1863, Evans v. People, 12 Mich. 33 (excluded as to whether a particular epidemic disease prevailed; but admitted as to whether sickness, in general, prevailed); 1874, People v. Olmstead, 30 Id. 433 (cause of an illness); 1884, Peer v. Ryan, 54 Id. 224, 19 N. W. 961 (veterinary surgery); 1889, Harris v. R. Co., 76 id. 229, 42 N. W. 1111 (ability of sick person to work and to use limbs); N. Y.: 1875, Linsday v. People, 63 N. Y. 152 (freshness of a wound); Pa.: 1881, Allen's Appeal, 99 Pa. 198 (a woman who had borne four children was allowed to testify that a child at its birth was fully developed); 1888, United B. Mut. Aid Soc. v. O'Hara, 120 Id. 265, 13 Atl. 932 (that a person had shortness of breath, allowed, but not that he had asthma); Tex.: 1874, Wilson v. State, 41 Tex. 321 (sex of a skeleton); U. S.: 1893, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Rambo, 16 U. S. App. 277, 280, 8 C. C. A. 6, 59 Fed. 75 (appearance of suffering); 1896, Grayson v. Lynch, 163 U. S. 468, 16 Sup. 1064 (whether cattle had symptoms of a disease commonly called Texas fever); 1885, Knight v. Smythe, 57 Vt. 530 (general health appearance); W. Va.: 1892, Lawson v. Conaway, 37 W. Va. 159, 162, 16 S. E. 564 (physical ability); Wis.: 1874, Montgomery v. Scott, 34 Wis. 343 (whether a leg was broken); 1884, Wright v. Howard, 60 Id. 122, 18 N. W. 750 (nature of present suffering; asked of the injured person on the stand); 1885, Baker v. Madison, 62 id. 143, 22 N. W. 141, 583 (capacity to work, etc.); 1887, Smalley v. Appleton, 70 Id. 344, 35 N. W. 729 (general health); 1888, Bridge v. Oshkosh, 71 Id. 365, 37 N. W. 409 (physical and mental condition as outwardly apparent).

Laymen held inadmissible: Ala.: 1849, McLean v. State, 16 Ala. 679 (nature of a disease consisting in "fits"); 1903, White v. State, — id. —, 34 So. 178 (how long a man had been dead when his body was seen); Ark.: 1860, Tatum v. Mohr, 21 Ark. 354, semble (nature of disease); 1861, Thompson v. Bertraud, 23 id. 733 (same); 1897, Redd v. State, 63 id. 457, 40 S. W. 374 (relaxation of muscles after death); Ga.: 1895, Atlanta St. R. Co. v. Walker, 93 Ga. 462, 21 S. E. 48 (by the plaintiff, that his injury would be permanent); 1899, Atlanta C. S. R. Co. v. Bagwell, 107 id. 157, 33 S. E. 191 (whether dancing would injure a woman having "female trouble"); Ky.: 1896, American Accident Co. v. Fidler, — Ky. —, 35 S. W. 905, 36 Id. 528 (whether the deceased had typhoid fever; amputation of limb); Me.: 1835, Boles v. McAllister, 12 Me. 308 (existence of pregnancy); Mass.: 1868, Ashland v. Marlborough, 99 Mass. 47 (disease); 1894, Zimin v. Rice, 161 Mass. 571, 576, 37 N. E. 747 (by a plaintiff, that his pneumonia was due to taking a journey in consequence of an attachment); Mich.: 1896, Lewis v. Bell, 109 Mich. 189, 66 N. W. 1091 (disease of horses; one employed in a stable, excluded); N. Y.: 1903, Gray v. Brooklyn H. R. Co., 175 N. Y. 448, 67 N. E. 899 (by women, that their miscarriages were like the plaintiff's, excluded); Pa.: 1889, Lombard R. Co. v. Christian, 124 Pa. 123, 16 Atl. 628 (various answers permitted and excluded); U. S.: 1886, Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 647, 7 Sup. 696 (infected rags as a cause of illness); Utah: 1898, Murray v. R. Co., 16 Utah 356, 52 Pac. 596 (whether a jolt of a car would hurt a pregnant woman).

On all the foregoing topics of testimony, compare the application of the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1974–1976).

Of the particular topics most frequently arising for decision, it has been generally held that special qualification is not required upon the question whether a stain is of blood.[2] Whether a lay witness may testify to sanity is a question which always occurs in conjunction with the question whether the rule against Opinion evidence should exclude such testimony, and the former question has played but a small part in the settlement of the rule of law in the different jurisdictions. It is conceivable that a Court might regard such testimony as proper under the former principle but improper under the latter. In fact, however, if a Court has excluded it on the former ground it has also excluded it on the latter, putting the chief emphasis on the latter, and if it has received it, has done so on both grounds; so that practically the rule of law stands or falls according to the determination of the latter question. The state of the law on that point is examined under the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1933–1938). The incompetency of the layman to form an opinion has nevertheless entered in part into the grounds of decision for the few jurisdictions which reject such testimony:

1879, Colt, J., in May v. Bradlee, 127 Mass. 421: "That question [of testamentary capacity], as it arises in the courts, is not often presented in a form in which it can be wisely determined by the opinions of unskilled observers, however numerous. There are forms of partial delusion, the influence of which can be detected only by persons of uncommon skill and experience, which defeat a will executed as the result of such a delusion. All forms of sanity and insanity, whether partial or general, are mental conditions which run into each other by insensible gradations, not easily separated and defined. The Courts do not deal with the plain cases only; those which come near the line, or where the disease is partial and limited, are those which most commonly occupy attention and require the application of skill and science."

But the propriety of accepting lay opinions, for what they may be worth, has been defended in the following sensible opinion, which represents the doctrine in all but a few jurisdictions:

1884, Harlan, J., in Connecticut M. Life Ins. Co. v. Lathrop, 111 U. S. 612, 4 Sup. 533: "This position [that an ordinary observer may not state his judgment as to the sanity of one he knows] cannot be sustained consistently with the weight of authority, nor without closing an important avenue of truth in many, if not in every, case, civil and criminal, which involves the question of insanity. Whether an individual is insane is not always best solved by abstruse metaphysical speculations expressed in the technical language of medical science. The common sense and, we may add, the natural instincts of mankind, reject the supposition that only experts can approximate certainty upon such a subject. There are matters of which all men have more or less knowledge, according to their mental capacity and habits of observation, — matters about which they may and do form opinions sufficiently satisfactory to constitute the basis of action. While the mere opinion of a non-professional witness predicated upon facts detailed by others is incompetent as evidence upon an issue of insanity, his judgment based upon personal knowledge of the cir-

[2] 1898, Gantling v. State, 40 Fla. 237, 23 So. 857 (that stains of a certain color were found); 1901, State v. Rice, 7 Ida. 762, 66 Pac. 87; 1875, Com. v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 122 (direction of a stain); 1880, Dillard v. State, 58 Miss. 368; 1893, State v. Robinson, 117 Mo. 649, 663, 23 S. W. 769 (that stains looked like blood); 1866, People v. Gonzalez, 35 N. Y. 62; 1881, Greenfield v. People, 85 id. 83; 1888, People v. Deacons, 109 id. 382, 16 N. E. 676; 1897, People v. Burgess, 153 id. 561, 47 N. E. 889; 1885, People v. Thiede, 11 Utah 241, 39 Pac. 837; 1902, State v. Henry, 51 W. Va. 283, 41 S. E. 439.

cnmstances involved in such an inqniry certainly is of valne; because the natural and ordinary operations of the human intellect, and the appearance and condnct of insane persons, as contrasted with the appearance and conduct of persons of sonnd mind, are more or less understood and recognized by every one of ordinary intelligence who comes in contact with his species. The extent to which such opinions should influence or control the judgment of the Court or jury must depend upon the intelligence of the witness as manifested by his examination, and upon his opportunities to ascertain all the circumstances that shonld properly affect any conclusion reached."[8]

§ 569. Same: (2) What Special Experience is Necessary. (2) When on a medical topic ordinary experience does not suffice, what are to be the requirements of special experience? The chief question that here occurs is whether a general practitioner may testify on matters of a particular department of the science wherein specialists may presumably be had. Here the Courts seem not to have taken a sufficiently firm stand against the narrow objections frequently raised. It is not that the rulings themselves are illiberal, but that narrow doctrines are not repudiated with sufficient positiveness. The liberal doctrine should be insisted on that the law does not require the best possible kind of a witness, but only persons of such qualifications as the community daily and reasonably relies upon in seeking medical advice. Specialists are in most communities few and far between; the ordinary medical practitioner should be received on all matters as to which a regular medical training necessarily involves some general knowledge. This rule has been applied for sundry subjects, chiefly that of poisons,[1] and also for in-

[8] Compare with the following cases, which agree with the opinion qnoted, the citations under § 689, post (qualificatlons as to Knowledge of the person said to be insane) and § 1938, post, (application of the Opinion rule to sanlty), all the admitting cases on the latter point being also anthorities for admission on the present point: 1882, Smith v. Hickenbottom, 57 Ia. 737, 11 N. W. 664; 1871, State v. Reddick, 7 Kan. 149; 1881, Wood v. State, 58 Miss. 742; 1845, Clark v. State, 12 Oh. 487; 1897, Kanfman v. Caughman, 49 S. C. 159, 27 S. E. 16; 1901, Johnson v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. 618, 62 S. W. 756; 1896, Mntual Life Ins. Co. v. Lenbrie, 18 C. C. A. 332, 71 Fed. 843.

The only rulings taking the contrary view on this point have apparently been the following, with May v. Bradlee, supra: 1853, Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 384; 1858, U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 104, 106 (yet the court allowed it at p. 114).

The following ruling falls nuder the principle of § 505, ante: 1902, Collins v. People, 194 Ill. 506, 62 N. E. 902 (child of 13, held incompetent on the facts to testify to her father's mental condition).

[1] Admitting a general practitioner: 1897, Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Ross-Lewin, 24 Colo. 43, 51 Pac. 488 (toxicologist-physician, who had no personal experience with cases of cyanide of potassium poisoning): 1888, Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 579, 32 N. E. 431 (arsenic-poisoning; though the witness never had a case of it); 1858, State v. Hinkle, 6 Ia. 385 (chemical analysis); 1883, State v. Cole, 63 Ia. 698, 17 N. W. 183 (post-mortem examination for poison); 1869, Young v. Makepeace, 103 Mass. 53 (child-birth); 1894, Hardiman v. Brown, 162 Id. 585, 39 N. E. 192 (brain-tumor as a sonrce of disease; witness not familiar with such tumors in practice); 1896, People v. Thacker, 108 Mich. 652, 66 N. W. 562 (a physician having a medical degree and a general practice, held competent to speak of symptoms of arsenic-poisoning in a patient treated by him, though he had had no personal experience in such cases, hnt has studied the subject); 1895, Seckinger v. Mfg. Co., 129 Mo. 590, 31 S. W. 957 (need not be a specialist); 1891, People v. Benham, 160 N. Y. 402, 55 N. E. 11 (poison, murder; general practitioner need not be a specialist in toxicology); 1870, Horton v. Green, 64 N. C. 67 (glanders, and animal diseases generally); 1859, State v. Terrell, 12 Rich. L. 327 (strychnia-poisoning); 1885, Kelly v. U. S., 27 Fed. 618 (need not be a specialist); 1875, Hathaway's Adm'r v. Ins. Co., 48 Vt. 351 (need not be a specialist). Rejecting a general practitioner: 1863, Emerson Gaslight Co., 6 All. 146 (effects of gas on health); 1901, State v. Simouis, 39 Or. 111, 65 Pac. 595 (licensed physician, not allowed to testify to symptoms of arsenions poisoning). A person expert in some other special department only was held incompetent in Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 409 (1862). Compare the cases clted under § 687, post (medical knowledge founded on reading, without practice).

sanity.[2] In various rulings, also, the qualifications of particular physicians are determined, but without laying down general rules.[3] The common law, it may be added, does not require that the expert witness on a medical subject shall be a person duly licensed to practise medicine;[4] but in at least one jurisdiction this requirement has been introduced by statute.[5] Except as an indirect stimulus to obtain a license, such a rule is ill-advised, first, because the line between chemistry, biology, and medicine is too indefinite to admit of a practicable separation of topics and witnesses, and, secondly, because some of the most capable investigators have probably not needed or cared to obtain a license to practise medicine.

§ 570. Handwriting and Paper Money. For the reasons already noted (ante, § 558), it is not always possible to distinguish the application of the

[2] 1880, Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 515 (specialist not necessary); 1871, Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 497 (ordinary practice, plus some reading on insanity, sufficient); 1895, Phelps v. Com., — Ky. —, 32 S. W. 470 (not making a specialty of insanity, but having had cases of it); 1900, Abbott v. Com., — id. —, 55 S. W. 196 (specialist not necessary). Contra: 1884, Reed v. State, 62 Miss. 409 (special study or practice necessary). In Massachusetts the odd rule obtains that a general practitioner may testify if his opinion is based on personal observation, but not if it is based on a hypothetical question: 1856, Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray 78; 1859, Com. v. Rich, 14 id. 336; 1868, Hastings v. Rider, 99 Mass. 624. Compare the citations under § 687, post.

[3] 1847, Tullis v. Kidd, 12 Ala. 648 (admitting a witness who had received a license as a physician, practised one year, then became a lawyer, and for sixteen years had not practised medicine but continued to keep up his medical reading); 1877, Mitchell v. State, 58 id. 419; 1878, Rash v. State, 61 id. 92, 95 (wounds); 1898, Green v. State, 64 Ark. 523, 43 S. W. 973 (physician, as to insanity; one admitted, another rejected); 1881, Noblesville E. G. R. Co. v. Ganse, 76 Ind. 144; 1901, Isenhour v. State, 157 id. 517, 62 N. E. 40 (adulteration of milk); 1877, State v. Cook, 17 Kan. 395 (poison); 1887, Broquet v. Tripp, 36 id. 704, 14 Pac. 227 (sheep disease); 1888, Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Finley, 38 Kan. 560, 16 Pac. 951 (cattle disease); 1897, Dugan v. Com., 102 Ky. 241, 43 S. W. 418 (reduction of weight of fired bullet); 1896, Dashiell v. Griffith, 84 Md. 363, 35 Atl. 1094 (a professional nurse, who had nursed in 20 or 30 cases of bone felon, but not a student of surgery, not allowed to speak as to whether a felon was cut to the bone; a good example of petty and unfruitful interference with the discretion of a trial Court); 1880, People v. Niles, 44 Mich. 609, 7 N. W. 192 (wound of a horse); 1859, New Orleans J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Allbritton, 38 Miss. 246, 273; 1897, People v. Koerner, 154 N. Y. 355, 48 N. E. 730; 1883, State v. Sheets, 89 N. C. 549 (poisoning of an animal); 1882, Olmsted v. Gere, 100 Pa. 131); 1898, Com. v. Farrell, 187 id. 408, 41 Atl. 382 (when rigor mortis sets in); 1855, Allen v. Hunter, 6 McL. 307 (chemical subject); 1872, Masons v. Fuller, 45 Vt. 31 (whether a birth was premature; a professional nurse was allowed to testify); 1828, Meudum v. Com., 6 Rand. 709, 721; 1884, Yates v. Cornelius, 59 Wis. 617, 18 N. W. 474 (diseases of horses); 1902, Allen v. Voje, 114 Wis. 1, 89 N. W. 924 (whether a trained nurse is qualified to speak as to the dangerous significance of a certain temperature, not decided; yet it is difficult to see why such a question should cause protracted doubt).

[4] 1897, Golder v. Lund, 50 Nebr. 867, 70 N. W. 379; 1899, People v. Rice, 159 N. Y. 400, 54 N. E. 48 (admissible if expert, though not licensed to practise or actually not practising); 1886, State v Speaks, 94 N. C. 874 (the State Board examination required before practising is not necessary for testifying).

[5] Wis. Stats. 1898, § 1436 (no person practising physic or surgery shall have the right "to testify in a professional capacity" unless he had "a diploma from some incorporated medical society or college," or since that date received a license from the State medical examiners; but in a criminal case the Court may dispense with proof of incorporation); 1874, Montgomery v. Scott, 34 Wis. 339, 343 (the plaintiff was taken to the house of H., after her injury, and the fracture reduced and dressed; held, that H. might testify whether the leg was broken, though he possessed no diploma; "the question whether a leg is broken is one of fact"); 1890, McDonald v. Ashland, 78 id. 25, 47 N. W. 434 (the diploma and the incorporation of the college may be proved orally by the witness himself, without producing the diploma or a copy of the charter); 1901, McCann v. Ullman, 109 id. 574, 85 N. W. 493 (under St. 1899, c. 82, providing that no person shall be "competent to testify as an expert witness" upon animal diseases unless registered as a veterinary surgeon, an unregistered person was excluded); 1902, Allen v. Voje, 114 id. 1, 89 N. W. 924 (whether the prohibition of the statute applies to those only who require a license for practice, or to all persons called as medical experts, for example a trained nurse, not decided); 1903, Lowe v. State, — id. —, 96 N. W. 417 (Rev. St. 1898, § 585, does not affect the testimonial qualifications of physicians).

present principle from that of the principle of Knowledge (post, § 693). Nevertheless the present one has a real place among the qualifications of a witness to handwriting.

(1) For handwriting in manuscript, the fundamental proposition of our law is that the general experience of the ordinary person is sufficient; in other words, any person able to read and write is competent to form and to express a judgment as to the genuineness of handwriting.[1] So often does the subject of expert qualifications in handwriting come before the Courts that this subject is ordinarily thought of as exclusively one for experts. But a little reflection on every day's practice will demonstrate this error of thought. Where the witness is sufficiently qualified as to knowledge, i. e. where he has seen the person write or the like (post, § 693), no dispute is ever raised as to his experiential competency. Proper familiarity with the standard of comparison is all that is asked for, and no special skill in judging of writings is required. It is accepted law that the general experience of the ordinary person is sufficient, so far as experiential competency goes. Why, then, does the question of expert qualifications in handwriting ever arise? Because, when the specimens to be used are themselves before the jury, they may examine them to form an opinion as to the standard or type of writing, and hence the opinion of a person of ordinary experience only, based upon these specimens, being no better than that of the jury themselves, is not needed, and is excluded by the Opinion rule; and hence the only persons whose aid need be asked in studying these standards are those who have some special experience over and above that of the jury. Thus, under the Opinion rule, the question arises whether the person whose aid is offered is such a one as can contribute some skill not possessed by the jury. This is a different question from the present one of the Experiential Qualifications to be required of all witnesses; and is peculiar to the Opiuion rule (post, § 2012). The only questions that can here arise concern the skill required for something other than the identity of mere handwriting, for example, the kind of paper or ink, or the feasibility of an alteration; and here it may be proper to require special experience.[2]

(2) Bank-notes and Paper Money. Where the genuineness of a bank-note or other paper money involves not merely a signature's identity, but the texture, design, and general appearance of the document, as the basis of an opiuion, may any person, having the proper familiarity with the class of notes in question, form and express an opinion as to its genuineness?

[1] 1893, Salazar v. Taylor, 18 Colo. 538, 544, 33 Pac. 369. Whether the witness need even be able to read and write is perhaps doubtful; for many illiterate persons can distinguish signatures and hands without being able to decipher them in detail. Such a witness was rejected in Russell v. Brosseau, 65 Cal. 607 (1884). Where, however, the handwriting is of a special style, special experience in reading it would be necessary; 1845, Crawford and Lindsay Peerage Cases, 2 H. L. C. 545 (where only a clerk who was familiar with mediæval Latin handwriting was permitted to testify by a copy to the tenor of an old document).

[2] 1854, Otey v. Hoyt, 2 Jones L. 70 (the removal of inks from paper; witness excluded); 1897, Birmingham Nat'l Bank v. Bradley, 115 Ala. 142, 23 So. 53 (whether a check could be chemically altered without leaving traces; expert knowledge required).

This question has been little mooted since the issuing of bank-notes has come into the sole control of the Federal Government. An early line of decisions reached the sensible conclusion that a merchant, not being specially expert as to detecting counterfeits, could testify about the genuineness of a bank-note, provided he had the requisite familiarity with the class of notes in question.[3] Other Courts have since held that a bank-officer may testify to the genuineness of notes,[4] or of coin,[5] or to the fact of an erasure in a note.[6] The principle of Knowledge (post, § 705) is here not always easy to distinguish in its application.

§ 571. Miscellaneous Instances (Interpretation, Speed of a Train, Strength of a Structure, etc., etc., etc.). (1) In answer to the first of the two usual questions (ante, § 559) under this principle, there are a variety of rulings on miscellaneous topics, holding that a lay witness suffices;[1] the topics that seem to have called for frequent decision being those of the speed of a train,[2] and the existence of a condition of intoxication.[3]

(2) In answer to the second of the two usual questions (ante, § 560), there are a variety of rulings determining the qualifications of an individual witness on a particular topic. That of most frequent occurrence is the interpretation of a foreigner's or mute's mode of speech.[4] None of the remaining

[3] Ky.: 1841, Watson v. Cresap, 1 B. Monr. 196; N. C.: 1805, U. S. v. Holtsclaw, 2 Hayw. 379, semble; 1824, State v. Candler, 3 Hawks 398, semble; 1844, State v. Harris, 5 Ired. 291, semble; 1851, State v. Check, 13 id. 120 ("who habitually receive and pass the notes of a bank for a long course of time, so as to become thoroughly acquainted with them"); 1877, Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 149.

[4] 1896, Keating v. People, 160 Ill. 480, 43 N. E. 724 (treasury notes, national bank bills, and greenbacks; a paying-teller admitted to speak to their genuineness); 1873, Atwood v. Cornwall, 28 Mich. 339.

[5] 1860, May v. Dorsett, 30 Ga. 118.

[6] 1864, Dubois v. Baker, 30 N. Y. 361.

[1] 1863, Barnes v. Ingalls, 39 Ala. 200 (admitting members of a family, as able to speak of the likeness of a portrait, but not of its quality of execution); 1897, McDonald v. Wood, 118 id. 589, 22 So. 489, 24 So. 86 (the location of a survey-line, by the owner of the land); 1903, Rardon v. Cunningham, — id. —, 34 So. 26 (whether a mule is blind; expert not needed); 1845, Porter v. Mfg. Co., 17 Conn. 255 (sufficiency of a dam); 1856, Frink v. Potter, 17 Ill. 408 (safety of a road); 1875, Clagett v. Easterday, 42 Md. 629 (existence of a mill-site); 1886, Baltimore & L. T. Co. v. Cassell, 66 id. 430, 7 Atl. 805 (whether a road was safe); 1888, McPherson v. R. Co., 97 Mo. 256, 10 S. W. 846 (draining capacity of culvert); 1896, State v. Punshon, 133 id. 44, 34 S. W. 25 (experiments with a pistol); 1880, State v. Reitz, 83 N. C. 635 (identity of foot-prints); 1881, State v. Morris, 84 id. 761 (same); 1894, Vermillion Co. v. Vermillion, 6 S. D. 466, 61 N. W. 802 (height of a stream of water observed to be thrown from a water-main); 1898, Ochsenreiter v. Elev. Co., 11 id. 91, 75 N. W. 822 (condition of crop; layman in grain-growing country, competent).

[2] 1896, Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Sampson, 112 Ala. 425, 20 So. 566; 1901, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stewart, 128 id. 313, 29 So. 562; 1896, St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Brown, 62 Ark. 254, 35 S. W. 225 (how far a train had gone when it stopped); 1895, Howland v. R. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983 (whether a car could have been stopped); 1900, Johnsen v. Oakland S. L. & H. E. R. Co., 127 Cal. 608, 60 Pac. 170 (regular passengers allowed to testify to speed of cars); 1884, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Shires, 108 Ill. 628 (undecided); 1868, Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99 (but not the speed, in slowing up, necessary to bring to a stop at a given point); 1887, Guggenheim v. R. Co., 66 id. 154, 33 N. W. 161 ("any intelligent man who had been accustomed to observe moving objects"); 1899, Mott v. R. Co., 120 id. 127, 79 N. W. 3; 1881, Nutter v. Railroad, 60 N. H. 485; 1895, Chipman v. R. Co., 12 Utah 68, 41 Pac. 562; 1859, McVey v. R. Co., 46 W. Va. 111, 32 S. E. 1012; 1884, Hoppe v. R. Co., 61 Wis. 369, 21 N. W. 227.

[3] 1887, People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 8; 14 Pac. 373; 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 Ill. 570; 1887, Gallagher v. People, 120 id. 182, 11 N. E. 335; 1870, State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 407; 1868, Castner v. Sliker, 33 N. J. L. 97.

[4] 1900, Central of G. R. Co. v. Joseph, 125 Ala. 313, 28 So. 35 (interpreter speaking both languages, but not reading English writing, held competent); 1870, People v. Gelabert, 39 Cal. 664 (interpreter must understand the languages); 1874, People v. Ah Wee, 48 id. 238 (same); 1886, Skaggs v. State, 108 Ind. 56, 8 N. E. 695 (fair knowledge suffices); 1897, miscellaneous rulings have any real value as precedents.[5] They were a waste of time for the Supreme Courts, and should have been disposed of under the doctrine of the trial Court's discretion (ante, § 561). The application of the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1949–1978) should be compared, upon all these topics.

People v. Constantino, 153 N. Y. 24, 47 N. E. 37 (interpreter held competent); 1893, State v. Weldon, 39 S. C. 318, 17 S. E. 688 (any person able to communicate by signs with a mute is competent); 1867, Kuhlman v. Medlinka, 29 Tex. 392 (interpreter must understand both languages).

For the question when an interpreter may or must be called, see post, § 811. For the question whether an interpreter must be sworn and cross-examined, see post, §§ 1810, 1824.

[5] N. Sc.: 1887, Cain v. Uhlman, 20 N. Sc. 151 (one who was a mill-builder, and was used to taking levels but did not understand how to do so with a theodolite, was allowed to testify); Ala.: 1863, Barnes v. Ingalls, 39 Ala. 198 (the execution of photographic paintings); 1877, Campbell v. Gilbert, 57 Id. 568 (qualities and use of a guano); 1877, Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Blakely, 59 id. 473, 481 (condition of a train, as to means of stopping it); 1878, Nelson v. Wood, 62 id. 175 (tanning); 1900, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sandlin, 126 id. 585, 28 So. 40 (track construction); 1900, Birmingham N. Bank v. Bradley, — id. —, 30 So. 546 (effects of Enreka acid on paper); Cal.: 1866, Blood v. Light, 31 Cal. 115 (dam); Colo.: 1897, Denver T. & F. W. R. Co. v. Smock, 23 Colo. 456, 48 Pac. 681 (condition of a freight-car); Conn.: 1897, State v. Main, 69 Conn. 123, 37 Atl. 80 (destruction of trees affected by a contagious disease; the capacity of a deputy charged with the duty of investigating, assumed, semble, as indicated by his office); Ill.: 1897, Webster Mfg. Co. v. Mulvanny, 168 Ill. 311, 48 N. E. 168 (cause of an explosion); 1898, St. Louis & S. W. R. Co. v. Elgin C. M. Co., 175 id. 557, 51 N. E. 911 (transportation of condensed milk); Ind.: 1837, House v. Fort, 4 Blackf. 295 (defects of a horse); 1877, Hinds v. Harbon, 58 Ind. 123 (sewers); 1880, Indianapolis v. Scott, 72 id. 203 (soundness of timber); 1886, Fort Wayne v. Coombs, 107 id. 86, 7 N. E. 743 (sewers); 1887, Terre Haute v. Hudnut, 112 id. 549, 13 N. E. 686 (injury to a building); Ia.: 1874, Kilbourne v. Jennings, 38 Ia. 537 (construction of a house); 1875, Shulte v. Hennessey, 40 id. 356 (measurement of masonry); 1878, Sheldon v. Booth, 50 id. 210 (machinery); 1895, Kerns v. R. Co., 94 id. 121, 62 N. W. 692 (mode of coupling cars); 1899, Stomne v. Hanford P. Co., 108 id. 137, 78 N. W. 841 (fitness of elevator cable); Kan.: 1882, Sexton v. Lamb, 27 Kan. 429 (ice-handling); 1884, Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Nicholson, 32 id. 666, 5 Pac. 164 (machinery); 1885, Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mackey, 33 Kan. 303, 6 Pac. 291 (duties of a fireman); 1898, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Johnson, 59 id. 776, 53 Pac. 129 (manner of inspecting car-timbers); Ky.: 1897, U. S. Mail Line Co. v. Mfg. Co., 101 Ky. 658, 42 S. W. 342 (manner of breaking of glass); 1898, Williams v. R. Co., 103 id. 298, 45 S. W. 71 (locomotive's effect in starting train); Me.: 1856, Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 207 (milling); Md.: 1856, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Thompson, 10 Md. 85 (disturbance of cattle by railroads, and the effects on their health); 1886, Baltimore Elev. Co. v. Neal, 65 id. 451, 5 Atl. 338 (handling a tug); Mass.: 1847, Vandine v. Burpee, 13 Met. 288 (gardens); 1853, Carpenter v. Wait, 11 Cush. 257 (cattle-weight); 1870, Moulton v. McOwen, 103 Mass. 597 (damage to a building); 1895, Davis v. Mills, 163 id. 481, 40 N. E. 852 (qualities of flour); 1899, Childs v. O'Leary, 174 id. 111, 54 N. E. 490 (blasting); Mich.: 1866, Sisson v. R. Co., 14 Mich. 497 (machinery); 1896, Woods v. R. Co., 108 id. 396, 66 N. W. 328 (machinery); Minn.: 1871, Clague v. Hodgson, 16 Minn. 339 (age of sheep, judged by the teeth); 1884, Koisti v. R. Co., 32 id. 134, 19 N. W. 655 (turntables); 1885, Davidson v. R. Co., 34 id. 54, 24 N. W. 324 (sparks from locomotives); 1890, Armstrong v. R. Co, 45 id. 87, 47 N. W. 459 (care of horses); 1875, Blomquist v. R. Co., 60 id. 426, 62 N. W. 818 (construction of a derrick); 1899, Aultman Co. v. Mosloski, 77 id. 27, 79 N. W. 593 (defects in a threshing-machine); Mo.: 1896, Helfenstein v. Medart, 136 Mo. 595, 36 S. W. 863 (strength and safety-speed of grindstones); Mont.: 1897, Holland v. Huston, 20 Mont. 84, 49 Pac. 390 (horse); Nebr.: 1884, Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Finlayson, 16 Nebr. 587, 20 N. W. 860 (engine-boilers); 1887, Connelly v. Edgerton, 22 id. 87, 34 N. W. 76 (saloon-fixtures); 1845, Woods v. Allen, 18 N. H. 31 (ice-block at a mill); 1846, Wallace v. Goodall, 18 id. 452 (age of marks on trees); 1859, Page v. Parker, 40 id. 59 (soapstone-quarry); 1860, Blodgett Paper Co. v. Farmer, 41 id. 404 (machinery); N. Y.: 1854, Bearss v. Copley, 10 N. Y. 95 (one whose occupation had changed from a tanner to a lawyer, admitted to speak about tanning); 1874, Hoyt v. R. Co., 57 id. 678 (cause of railroad accident); 1881, Ward v. Kilpatrick, 85 id. 415 (workmanship of furniture); 1886, People v. Buddensieck, 103 id. 500, 9 N. E. 44 (photographs); N. C.: 1849, Sikes v. Paine, 10 Ired. 280 (ship-repairs); 1859, State v. Jacobs, 6 Jones L. 286 (negro descent); Or.: 1902, Duntley v. Inman, 42 Or. 334, 70 Pac. 529 (cause of a pulley's breakage); 1900, Farmers' & T. N. Bank v. Woodell, 38 id. 294, 61 Pac. 837 (cultivation of beets); Pa.: 1845, Pittsburgh v. O'Neill, 1 Pa. St. 342 (mode of summary reckoning in bricklaying); 1849, Detweiler v. Groff, 10 Id. 376 (working a mill with a certain height of water); 1869, Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 63 id. 151 (strength of iron); 1889, Shaw v. Boom Co., 125 id. 327, 17 Atl. 426 (cause of ice-jam); 1895, Fraim v. Ins. Co., 170 id. 151, 32 Atl. 613 (effect of gasoline in cleansing in silver-plating); 1899, Haley v. Flaccus, 193 id. 521, 44 Atl. 666 (novelty in a glass-press patent); R. I.: 1858, Buffum v. Harris, 5 R. I. 250 (sufficiency of a drain); 1859, Evans v. Ins. Co., 6 id. 54 (meaning of trade terms); U. S.: 1881, Pope v. Filley, 3 Fed. 69 (meaning of trade terms); 1894, Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 14 C. C. A. 153, 66 Fed. 868 (shrinkage of cattle); Vt.: 1674, James v. Hodsden, 47 Vt. 136 (knitting-machines); 1897, Conway v. Fitzgerald, 70 id. 103, 39 Atl. 634 (capacity of cars for carrying logs); Wis.: 1899, Baxter v. R. Co., 104 Wis. 307, 80 N. W. 644 (tendency of iron to crystallise).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC III: EMOTIONAL CAPACITY.

SUB-TOPIC A: INTEREST AS A TESTIMONIAL DISQUALIFICATION.

CHAPTER XXIII.

§ 575. History of the Rules. The disqualification of parties and interested persons as witnesses on their own behalf is now practically obsolete throughout our law, except for a single situation. That the history of its origin is obscure and not precisely ascertained is therefore not a matter of such serious consequence to our understanding of the law of to-day. Nevertheless, its origin is so connected with other important traits in the history of the law of evidence that a survey is desirable of so much as is known or can be conjectured. The main elements in the development are, first, that this disqualification does not appear for any of the ancient kinds of witnesses under the older modes of trial; secondly, that it did not exist for the modern witness, when that type of person began to be important (in the 1400s); and thirdly, that the disqualification does plainly appear, in the stage of incipiency, in the early 1600s; the problem being, therefore, to account for its introduction during the 1500s. In tracing these stages, we may distinguish, for convenience, the progress of the rule in civil trials at common law, in chancery practice, and in criminal trials.

1. Civil Trials at Common Law. (1) For the first period, it is to be remembered that under the older modes of trial, forerunning trial by jury and surviving for a time alongside of it, the persons who could be thought of as perhaps liable to disqualification after the manner of modern witnesses were of three chief classes, namely, the complaint-witnesses or secta, the compurgators or oath-helpers, who swore in aid of the party's oath or wager of law, and the transaction-witnesses and deed-witnesses, whose oath in certain classes of cases formed a mode of decision. Now for none of these classes does any disqualification appear by reason of partisan interest, dependency, or relationship. On the contrary, these persons were originally and usually taken from none other than the very clansmen, dependents, and other partisans of the plaintiff or defendant. For the secta, it is clear that "they might be relatives or dependents of the party for whom they appeared."[1] For the oath-helpers, it is equally clear that they not only might be, but originally (in some tribes) must be, of the party's clansmen.[2] For the transaction-witnesses and deed-witnesses it can hardly be less doubted that partisanship, in any of its forms, was not recognized as a disqualification;[3] in fact, we are told by the judges of the time, more broadly still, that "witnesses cannot be challenged."[4] When jury trial develops and enlarges in scope, and comes down into the 1400s as the dominant mode of trial, this last sort of "witnesses" — those who were sworn to attest the transactions done or deeds executed in their presence — come to play a frequent part in jury-trial itself;[5] that is, their oath ceases (to that extent) to form a distinct sort of trial. Thus the spectacle is presented of a body of jurors, with whom (yet more or less discriminated) are acting this special class of witnesses. As yet there are no other witnesses (in the modern sense) in jury trials. Thus the most important thing to note, in this stage, is that the only class (substantially) of persons, whose required qualities could have served as a type for the modern witness when he came in, were plainly understood to be not challengeable on any ground of partisanship, and perhaps not at all.

(2) The modern witness — i. e. any person who happens to know something about the facts in dispute and is summoned to inform the jury, and not as one of the jury — begins to be frequent in the middle of the 1400s; but not until another century does he furnish a substantial or major part of the information on which the jury act;[6] up to this time the jury's own knowledge and extra-judicial inquiries have taken the place of our modern witness. Now as to this new sort of witness also, it is also plain that during the 1400s there was as yet no disqualification on the ground of partisanship,[7] and that,

[1] Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 12.

[2] Brunner, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, II, 379; Thayer, ubi supra, 25; Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, II, 598. It is true that, by the custom of London, a non-partisan character came later to be required of these oath-helpers, in trial by wager of law; "they were not to be chosen by the accused himself, nor to be his kinsmen or bound to him by the tie of marriage or any other": Thayer, ubi supra, 27; Pollock and Maitland, ubi supra, II, 633. This possibly came about through the pressure of competition of jury-trial and was added to make the wager of law seem a little less one-sided in favor of defendants. It may also later have contributed a suggestion to the modern doctrine, as noted later.

[3] It is not mentioned in Brunner's list, ubi supra, II, 396, so also not in Thayer, ubi supra, 17–24. Professor Glasson has pointed out (Histoire du droit et des institutions de la France, VI, 547, 1895) that under the earlier feudal system of proof the opponent's right to dispute a witness by judicial combat served as a guaranty against false witnesses, and that only when judicial combat was abolished in 1260, and as a part of the reform of the proof-system, "the challenging of witnesses was replaced by the theory of disqualifications borrowed from the canon law."

[4] Thayer, ubi supra, 100, 103; 1339, Anon., 12 Lib. Ass. pl. 11, 12 (one of the witnesses to a deed was challenged because he was named as disseisor in the brief; but the challenge was not allowed, and "the court said that it had never seen witnesses challenged"); 1349, Anon., Lib. Ass. 110, cited in Thayer's Cases on Evidence, 2d ed., 306 (to prove a release, the witnesses named in it were joined to the jury; "one of the witnesses was challenged as being a relative of the plaintiff; but the challenge was not allowed, for witnesses are not challengeable, because the verdict will not be received from them, but from the jury").

[5] Thayer, Preliminary Treatise, 97–104.

[6] Thayer, ubi supra, 120–134.

[7] Fortescue, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, c. 26 (writing about 1470), makes no note of any limitations; parties may produce "all such on the contrary, the non-partisan witness was a rare figure and was, in the conception of the time, an unnatural one. This appears most plainly in the discouragements to which such a non-partisan person was subjected by the law of maintenance.[8] That law made it a matter of much risk for a truly indifferent person to give testimony to the jury; for unless he had been requested by the Court or jury (a request by the party only was of doubtful effect), he was liable to a charge of maintenance:

Professor James Bradley Thayer, Preliminary Treatise, 126: "A writ of maintenance was brought [in 1433] in the King's Bench against one B, charging that in an assize of rent between the plaintiff and C the defendant had 'maintained' C. B answered that long before C had anything in the said rent he himself owned it; and he had granted it to C. When the said assize was brought against C, the latter came to B, the present defendant, and asked him to come to the assizes with him and bring his evidences relating to the rent; and accordingly B came with these and delivered to C certain ancient evidences to plead in bar against the plaintiff in his discharge of his warranty of the rent; this was all the maintenance. In discussing whether this really constituted maintenance, and if so whether it was justifiable, it was insisted that the defendant should not have come voluntarily, but only by way of voucher to warranty. . . . Hals, J., said: 'In a tort of maintenance, it is a good plea to say that he who is charged came and prayed us, since we were an old man of the region and had knowledge of the title of the land of which he was impleaded, that we would be with him to inform the jury about the title; and so we did, etc. So here it is good.' Cheyne, [C. J.]: 'It will be adjudged a maintenance in your cases, because he has no cause or privity for maintaining the controversy more than the merest stranger in the world, unless the other had cause of warranty against him. . . . And as to what you say of its being a good plea in maintenance that he is an old man of the region and having better knowledge of the right and title of this rent, and his coming with the defendant to declare his right in the said rent, etc., I say that this is a real maintenance; for on such a ground everybody could justify a maintenance, and that would be against reason. But if he had shown a ground of maintenance on which the law presumes him bound to be with the party, then this would not be adjudged a maintenance, — as, if he were with his relation, or came with one because he was his servant or his tenant; he is bound to be with his servant or tenant; but it is not so in other cases.'"[9]

The underlying conception of the law, then, at this time of the 1400s, was something as follows: "Here are the jurors, indifferent persons, who know already more or less about this case; their oaths are to determine the issue; they are the selected ones for the purpose; no other man's oath is wanted; unless the jurors think that they need it, or the Court calls for it, any other man's oath is merely a meddlesome intrusion upon the carefully selected body of triers. To be sure, the party or his attorney may argue and labor with the jury and produce documents, and so also may his privies in title, witnesses as they please or can get to appear on their behalf").

[8] Thayer, Preliminary Treatise, 122–134.

[9] This is from Y. B. 11 H. VI, 43, 36. Add the following, which carries the idea down a century later: 1535, Y. B. 27 H. VIII, f. 2, pl. 6 (a seneschal of a manor, who showed the jury certain leet-court records, held exonerated of conspiracy, i. e. maintenance, because the judges ordered the showing; Englefield, J.: "If a man be present in court, and the justices command him, because he has good knowledge of the jury, to give evidence to the jury, by reason of which he does give evidence to the jury, he is not punishable for conspiracy"; Bromley, of counsel opposing, argued that it was otherwise if he were not sworn; Englefield, J.: "It is all one").

vouchers and the like, or his dependents, stewards, tenants, and such other persons as share his interest in the issue. But beyond this no other person has any call to interfere." In short, so far as ordinary witnesses were coming to be used, they were presumably interested partisans. So far from interest being a disqualification, it was rather the disinterested persons who were likely to be treated as improper witnesses. Such is the state of the law as we emerge into the 1500s, with the modern witness becoming a more and more important functionary of jury trial.

(3) Passing over for the moment the dubitable time of the 1500s, and coming to Coke's time, the early 1600s, we find that, in some way or other, ideas have plainly changed in the interval. Interest is now unquestionably recognized as a disqualification. The modern witness is now the chief source of information to the jury;[10] there is a sharp discrimination between witness and jury; the deed-witness, who was formerly nearer to being a juror, is now almost assimilated to the ordinary witness; and for both sorts, without apparent distinction, rules of disqualification are now beginning to be laid down:

1627, Coke upon Littleton, 6 a: "[As to witnesses to a deed] sometimes, though rarely [objections were allowed], which being found true, they were not to be sworne at all, neither to be joined to the jury nor as witnesses; as, if the witness were infamous, . . . or if the witnesse be an infidell, or of non-sane memory, or not of discretion, or a partie interested, or the like. But oftentimes a man may be challenged to be of a jury that cannot be challenged to be a witnesse; and therefore, though the witnesse be of the neerest alliance, or kindred, or of counsell, or tenant, or servant to either partie, or any other exception that maketh him not infamous or to want understanding or discretion or partie in interest, though it be proved true, shall not exclude the witnesse to be sworne, but he shall be sworne and his credit upon the exceptions taken against him left to those of the jury, who are tryers of the fact. . . . And the Courts in some books have said that they have not seene witnesses challenged, which is regularly to be understood with the limitations abovesaid."

Thereafter, from the middle of the 1600s, the rules about interest appear firmly established and begin to develop in fulness. What was the process of thought by which this doctrine was introduced? How comes it to be absent, and even repugnant, in 1500, and yet present and favored in 1650? Such is the problem.

For one thing, the explanation seems not to lie in any process of adaptation or imitation of the rules for jurors. Those persons were, in fundamental principle, indifferent between the parties; while witnesses proper were originally (as above noted) conceived of as naturally partisans. The juror's disqualification had existed from the beginning, and yet for at least one hundred years (in the 1400s) the two classes had gone side by side without any borrowing; so that it is hardly natural that a direct borrowing should take place in such tardy fashion. It is true that after jurors had come to depend for information chiefly on the witnesses in court (say, by 1600), it would be desirable to seek for unprejudiced persons as witnesses; and this later change in the jury's nature must have helped towards the new rule.[11] But that rule could hardly have obtained its beginning in that mode. Moreover, the traditional rules of qualification for jurors were numerous, and it is not easy to suppose that this particular one was picked out for imitation, while others equally appropriate were omitted.[12] For another thing, the explanation seems not to be that the rules of the ecclesiastical law were adopted or imitated. It is true that this particular disqualification is found long established, by adoption from the Roman law,[13] in the ecclesiastical rules as practised in England.[14] It is true also that the epoch in question was one in which great advances towards domination were being made by the ecclesiastical courts and their system, and that in other respects its rules were sought to be introduced into the common law.[15] Nevertheless, the same objections here occur that have been noted for the jurors' rules. Moreover, the sharp conflict between the two jurisdictions, reaching its height in Coke's time, would tend strongly against any such conscious adoption. Finally, there appear in the precedents no allusions to an express borrowing.

[10] Coke, 3 Inst. 26: "Most commonly juries are led by deposition of witnesses."

What, then, is there to fall back upon as the explanation of the change? Here must be distinguished the two branches of the disqualification, namely, of parties and of other interested persons. The two are no doubt united in principle in the later law; but they seem to have come into being at different epochs.

(a) The exclusion of interested persons not parties does not appear to have begun until after the time of Coke's commentary upon Littleton. This was written by 1627, but was not printed until 1642. From the time of his utterance (above-quoted) there are cases enough, in the reigns of Charles II and James II (1649–1688); but before that time, the Abridgments appear

[11] The juror's disqualification by infamy was, for example, appealed to in this way by Coke as sanctioning such a rule for witnesses; ante, § 519.

[12] Britton, f. 134 (convicts of perjury cannot be jurors; nor "those who have suffered judgment of life and limb or punishment of pillory or tumbrell, nor those who want discretion, nor excommunicated persons, nor lepers removed from society, nor priests or clerks within holy orders, nor women, nor such as dwell away from the neighborhood, nor those who are above 70 years of age, nor allies in blood, nor such as claim any right in the tenement, nor villains, nor persons indicted or appealed of felony, nor those of the household of any of the parties, nor those who are liable to be distrained by either of the parties, nor their lords or counsellors or accountants"); Fortescue, De Laudibus, c. 25 (juror may be challenged "by alleging that the person so impanelled is of kin, either by blood or affinity, to the other party, or in some such particular interest as he can not be deemed an indifferent person to pass between the parties"). The disqualification by affinity or by household dependency never obtained for witnesses (post, § 600); if there was any direct imitation, this would almost certainly have been included.

[13] Digest XXII, 5; Codex IV, 20; Heineccius, Elementa Pandectarum, p. IV, c. 140 ("Quum vero censeatur testis idoneus esse in causa ubi interest ejus alterutrum vincere, consequens est ut nemo admittendus est in causa vel propria vel socii. Ut merito repellantur pater in causa filii, filius in causa patris, aliique potestati vel imperio alterius subjective vel domestici; ut patroni tutores, curatores in causa clientis, pupilli, minorisve sui testimonium dicere non possunt; ut suspecti etiam sint amici et inimici, nec non qui jam ante in eum reum dixerunt testimonium").

[14] Corp. Jur. Eccl., Decr. P. II, Causa III, Qu. V, Causa IV, Qu. II, c. III, § 36 (servants and relations); Decret. Sec. Pars, Causa III, Qu. V ("testes de domo accusatorum prodncendi non sint," including "consanguinei vel familiares"); Decretal. II, 20, de testibus, c. 24; 1726, Ayliffe, Parergon, tit. "Witnesses"; 1738, Oughton, Ordo Judiciorum, c. 99 (the list includes "amici intimi partis producentis, ac inimici capitales partis contra quem producuntur, affectionati, partiales, ac minus indifferentes; infames, criminosi, pauperes, egeni; ac consanguinei, et affines, ac famuli domestici, et de roba ac stipendio partis prodncentis").

[15] Post, § 2032.

to note none.[16] Coke himself concedes that "the Courts in some books have said that they have not seen witnesses challenged." Moreover, as recently as 1613, a deed-witness, palpably interested in the issue, had been deliberately held competent;[17] and as recently as 1606 a statute had apparently been regarded as indispensable to prescribe non-partisanship for witnesses in trials on the Scotch border.[18] The reports of the State trials do not note a disqualification on this ground before 1640.[19] In civil cases, the only precedents of disqualification before Coke's time, if we rely on the industry of the Abridgment-makers, are confined to the parties themselves.[20] Thus everything tends to indicate that the disqualification of interested persons not parties did not appear until the time when Coke wrote; and even then it had not been fully established.

(b) On the other hand, the disqualification of parties themselves seems clearly to have come in long before, that is, at least by the time of Elizabeth, as early as 1582, and to have been at that time a thing well understood and accepted.[21] The succeeding rulings between that time and 1650 seem all to have been instances of the parties themselves being offered as witnesses.[22]

[16] The only case before 1642 appears to be the following: 1630, Mericke v. King, Hetley 137 ("In evidence to the jury, he who had purchased the land in question (it was said by the Court) he shall not be a witness if he claim under the same title"); this is perhaps equivalent to the case of a party. The hitherto existing freedom is shown in the following case: 1535, Y. B. 27 H. VIII, f. 20, pl. 10 (replevin; defendant made connsance as bailiff of Lord Cobham for rent in arrear, and alleged a rent due to the lord; Lord Cobham then "passed out, and gave evidence" as to his seisin of the rent; and no objection to his competency was raised; yet he was an interested person).

[17] 1613, Anon., 1 Bulstr. 202 (witness to a deed of feoffment by livery of seisin, excepted to because afterwards he received an estate at will in the land, "and so by his oath was to make his own estate good"; exception "disallowed by the whole Court, and that he might well be sworn as a lawful witness to prove the executing of a feoffment by livery and seisin, this being in affirmance of the feoffment").

[18] St. 4 James I, c. 1, § 16 (the juries in trials of Englishmen for offences committed in Scotland are authorized "to receive and admit only such good and sufficient lawful witnesses upon their oaths, either for or against the party arraigned, as shall not appear to them or the greater part of them to be unfit and unworthy to be witnesses in that case, either in regard of their hatred or malice, or their favor and affection, either to the party prosecuting or the party arraigned, or of their former evil life and conversation"). On the other hand, seventy years before, in 1535, Parliament had recited, as one of the causes for transferring jurisdiction of piracy from the Admiralty to the common-law courts, the unsatisfactory mode of trial by the civil law in the former court, which required the offence to be either confessed or "directly proved by witnesses indifferent, such as saw their offences committed, which cannot be gotten but by chance at few times." It would seem that a change, or the beginning of it, was marked by the later statute.

[19] Infra, note 38.

[20] Infra, note 22.

[21] 1582, Dymoke's Case, Savile 34, pl. 81 (joint defendants joined "by covin to take away their testimony"; if this appears on the evidence, "the justices may and must receive their testimony").

[22] 1611 (?), Smith's Case, 12 Co. 69 (resolved, by Coke, C. J., that "the parties to the supposed usurious contract shall not be admitted witnesses, for this, that upon the matter they were testes in propria causa, and by their oath shall avoid their bond, etc."); 1617, Howard v. Bell, Hob. 91 (persons claiming tenant-right against the lord of the manor, allowed to join in defence, "by my lord Coke and myself," in the Star Chamber, "and the reason was that since the title was one against all, it was in effect but one's defence, . . . and therefore the courts of justice do every day deny them to be witnesses one for another in such general cases; . . . now as they are acknowledged parties to their prejudice in defence, so it is in reason that they be in like manner allowed for their advantage"; but the Lord Chancellor differed, i. e. from the conclusion); 1624, Anon., Godb. 326 (one of joint defendants against whom plaintiff discontinued, admitted); 1636, Creswick's Case, Clayt. pl. 64 (joint defendant, against whom no proof was made, admitted).

The Star Chamber followed rules of a hybrid sort, chiefly ecclesiastical in procedure; but where their rule is not from the latter law, it

The result, then, on these data, is that the disqualification of parties is recognized at least as early as Elizabeth's time, while that of interested persons at large does not appear till near 1650. From these facts and from Coke's own language (in the passage above quoted), it may be inferred that the latter form of the disqualification came as a development and an expansion of the former. There is little difficulty in accepting this origin of the latter form as the natural and sufficient one. The changed nature of the jury's function, and the contemporary examples, already set, of disqualification by infamy (ante, § 519) and by marital relationship (post, § 600) might have served to aid the result, but the principle of parties' disqualification would have been the direct root of the disqualification by interest in general. In final corroboration of this, it may be suggested that the imitation of any other of the existing bodies of rules against partisanship — namely, those for jurors and those for ecclesiastical witnesses — would necessarily have included the prohibition of family members as witnesses; whereas the common law from the outset repudiated such a doctrine. Now it would be consistent with the gradual development of the party's disqualification to extend it to persons interested in the issue, i. e. quasi-parties, but to fail to extend it to family relationship, which otherwise stood upon the same general principle and was always so treated in other systems. In short, the development indicated by the course of the precedents is precisely that which a priori would have been most natural.[23] Only upon that hypothesis can we plausibly account for the singularity of English law in admitting freely the plainest of partisan witnesses, namely, family members and servants.

There remains, then, but one element to account for, — the parties' disqualification itself, as apparently coming into existence during the 1500s. The explanation of this seems to be near at hand; it is a fruitful one for the rules of evidence, namely, the history of jury-trial as an institution competing with and gradually displacing the other modes of trial. Turning back to the 1400s, we find at that epoch but one of the older modes surviving in any vigor; this was wager of law, the then name for the primitive process of compurgation by the party's oath with oath-helpers. All through the 1400s, and with only gradually decreasing vogue during the 1500s, the defendant could still refuse to be tried by a jury, and demand a decision by his own wager of law, in actions (mainly) of detinue and debt,[24] — almost the com-may be supposed to represent the common law; on the qualification of witnesses in the present respect they clearly had not adopted the church-law (they admitted a son for a father, for example); so that we may assume their rule to represent the contemporary one of the common law; it plainly excluded parties: infra, note 23.

[23] The following passages show how the rule would amplify: 1612, Dr. Manning's Case, 2 Brownl. 151 (Star-Chamber; bill for extortion; "if a man which is not party grieved exhibits bill for offence made to another person as against whom the offence was committed, he [the latter] shall not be allowed as witness, insomuch as he is party grieved, and by that he should be a witness in his own cause"); ante 1635, Hudson, Treatise of the Star Chamber, pt. III, § 21, in Hargr. Collect. Jurid. 205, 203 ("First of all, it is clear that a party can be no witness; . . . but the Court hath lately taken an honorable order to allow the answer and examining of any persons named defendants against whom there is no proof, but only their names put in to take away their testimonies, which is grown exceedingly common"; nothing is said of interested persons not parties).

[24] Thayer, Preliminary Treatise, 29–31.

monest of the original civil actions; in London, this privilege of its freemen extended even to charges of felony.[25] For the maintenance of this privilege defendants struggled long and hard; in 1403, for example,[26] a special statute came to their aid and protected them against evasions of their right by plaintiffs who framed their action fictitiously in account and then appealed to a prejudiced jury and thus cut off the defendant from exonerating himself by oath alone.[27] What is the significance of this long struggle, successful for two centuries at least? It seems to be this, that in wager of law alone, and not in jury-trial, could the party have the benefit of his own oath.[28] Before a jury the parties do not swear. They plead orally, or argue, or allege things "in evidence," — either by themselves or by their counsel;[29] but they do not take an oath. The oath is in that epoch a solemn and determinative proceeding, — a mode of trying and deciding; the oath of jurors is that of triers of the fact; so also the oath of compurgators; so also, originally, that of deed-witnesses and transaction-witnesses, and even in later times (as late as Coke's day) these might go out with the jurors and help to decide by their oaths. The hesitancy in admitting ordinary witnesses to testify was probably due in part to a sense of the incongruity of an oath which had in it no flavor of decisiveness. Hence can be conceived the unnaturalness of admitting the party to his oath before a jury. That would have been another mode of "trial," not to be mixed with trial by jury. A verdict was one kind of "proof"; deed-witnesses might be another kind; and the party's oath was still a different kind; there could not be two kinds of "proof" together, i. e. two ways of testing and settling the truth. The party's oath, then, had no place in trial by jury; its appropriate place was in a distinct mode of trial, wager of law. It can hardly be anything but this contrast which explains the determined struggle to retain the privilege of wager of law; it was the sole proceeding in which a party could have the benefit of his own oath, i. e. virtually, as a modern witness.[30]

If this be so, it is easy to see that, from the very beginning of modern witnesses, the party was incapable of being one. When ordinary witnesses began, in the 1400s, to be called with only slowly increasing frequency, the matter would be of little consequence. But in the 1500s, as witnesses came to be more and more the reliance of the jury and the parties for evidence, the conceded incapacity of the party to take the witness' oath would be more and more noticeable. It would be more worth while for the opponent to

[25] Thayer, ubi supra, 27; Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, II, 632.

[26] St. 5 H. IV, c. 8.

[27] It is not improbable that the contracts found frequently in the 1500s and 1600s, by which the obligor promises to pay if the obligee will make oath that a specific sum is due (Knight v. Rushwood, Cro. Eliz. 469; Bretton v. Prettiman, T. Raym. 153, and many others), came into vogue as a method of ensuring the availability of the obligee's oath, at a time when jury-trial was defeating him of that right.

[28] In 1561, Harwood v. Lee, Dyer 196 b, it is noted as the special custom of London that "the defendant should be affirmed by the oath of the party."

[29] Thayer, ubi supra, 112, 120, 122.

[30] This seems to have been first suggested by Chief Justice Cushing of New Hampshire, in 1876 (King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 334, 367: "the fact of the history of jury trial, that one great purpose of its introduction was the exclusion of the parties as witnesses").

appeal to this rule; and thus it would naturally tend to happen (as we find it happening in fact) that the opponent would seek to disqualify witnesses by joining them as parties. This would not naturally be found, a priori, until some time in the 1500s; and it is in the late 1500s[31] that we find apparently the first reported case.

The result, then, may be summed up in this way: That the party's oath was necessarily excluded in jury trial; that, when modern witnesses came into vogue in the 1400s and 1500s, the party was naturally deemed incapable of being such a witness; that otherwise no rule of disqualification for interested persons was recognized in the earlier days of witnesses; and that finally, after Coke's time and probably under the influence of his utterances, the rule for a party was extended by analogy to interested persons in general.

2. Chancery Practice. In Chancery practice, the problem would seem at first sight to have been a simpler one; for the Chancellor modelled his procedure after the canon (or ecclesiastical) law, and would in all probability have followed those rules substantially, not only in the mode of examination of witnesses (as is well established) but also in the rules of incompetency.[32] Nevertheless, by the end of the 1600s, Chancery is found enforcing the common-law rules of competency, just as through all its later history it professed to follow in general the common-law rules of evidence.[33] There must, then, have been, at some stage, a departure from the canon-law rules for witnesses, and the puzzling thing is that this stage appears to have been at least as early as those common-law rules themselves. In the first place, the disqualification of parties is seen already in the time of Elizabeth;[34] this, however, was consistent enough with the canon law. But, secondly, in the Chancery reporters of the 1500s (chiefly Cary and Tothill) there appear no precedents for the exclusion of interested persons other than parties; this harmonizes with the common-law history, but departs from the canon law. Thirdly, the Chancellors, who sat with other judges in the Star Chamber and presided, did not there fix into its practice the canon-law rules of disqualification by family-relationship.[35] Finally, the Chancery practice is found preserving, from the very beginning of the reports, the canon-law rule for the compulsory examination of parties at the opponent's instance, i.e. negativing any privilege for the party,[36] — a rule in direct discord with the common law; and it is a singularity that the Chancellor, while thus proceeding consistently to adopt the canon-law rules in a matter so radical, should nevertheless have ignored them in other respects in which their difference

[31] Supra, note 21. See also Hudson's Star-Chamber Treatise, quoted in note 23.

[32] A token of the influence is found, for example, in the fact that at common law, up to the 1600s, an objection to a witness was called a "challenge," while in Chancery the canon-law term "exception" was used.

[33] Ante, § 4.

[34] 1580, Hollingworth v. Lucy, Cary 129 (defendant, moving for a commission, alleges that the plaintiff had notified only Smith, another of the defendants, "who is little interested in the cause, but made a party, as the defendant's counsel supposes, to take away his testimony from the other defendants"); and the citations supra, note 22.

[35] Post, § 600.

[36] Post, § 2218.

from the common law was equally radical. The details of the origin of the Chancery rules, and the motives leading to its peculiar combination of methods, remain still to be learned with accuracy.

3. Criminal Trials. It remains to notice the progress of the rule in criminal cases. (1) So far as concerns the prosecution's witnesses, it would seem that no exclusion by reason of interest was attempted before very near the time of Coke's book;[37] and even after that time, little recognition is given to that rule.[38] There was, however, in crown cases in this epoch, especially in the trials for treason, which form most of those that have come down to us, no disposition to concede objections to the crown's testimony;[39] and this sufficiently explains the tardiness in the adoption of the rules in criminal trials; indeed, at no time later was the rule of interest as strictly construed as in civil cases.

(2) The accused himself, like the parties in civil cases, had always, under jury-trial, been allowed to plead his cause orally in person. This in civil cases naturally came to be done usually by the counsel. But, since in criminal causes, the accused was not allowed to have counsel in felony cases (until statute conceded this, for treason in 1695, and for felony in 1836),[40] his statements covered without distinction whatever he had to say of law, of evidence, and of argument. In effect, he furnished evidence, i. e. material which affected the jury's belief; but he was not sworn, he had no standing as a witness, and in theory of the law he therefore gave no evidence. During the period of recorded trials down to the second half of the 1500s this theory appears not to have been emphasized; the accused made an address at the proper stage, and, as witnesses came on, he spoke and was questioned freely, as if his statements counted for something, though he was not sworn.[41] But by the time of James II, just before the Revolution, the Court is found [37] No mention is made of any rule of exclusion as late as 1557, in Staunford's Pleas of the Crown, b. 3, c. 8, and 1565, in Smith's Commonwealth of England, b. 2, c. 26.

[38] 1640, Lord Strafford's Trial, 3 How. St. Tr. 1381, 1434 (a copy of an alleged illegal warrant, testified to by the serjeant claiming to act under the defendant's command, was objected to by the defendant, since "what he swears to my prejudice is to his own advantage; nor can a man, by any equity in the world, be admitted to testify against another in suam justificationem"; and the copy was excluded); 1643, Col. Ficnnes' Trial, 4 id. 185, 212 (court-martial; argued for the prosecution that defendant's father was "but testes domesticus at the best"); 238 (argued for the prosecution that "many of them [defendant's witnesses] are testes domestici, as his brother, kinsmen, servants, footboys; most of the rest his officers and soldiers, against whom we excepted as incompetent"; the Court here went in part on civil law rules of procedure); 1644, Archbishop Laud's Trial, ib. 315, 383, 389, 402 (argued as an objection by the defendant that a witness testified "in his own cause"); 1649, Duke of Hamilton's Trial, ib. 1155 (defendant objected unsuccessfully against a witness' testimony, "he being a party, and now in hazard"); 1649, Lilburne's Trial, ib. 1269, 1342 (similar); 1660, St. 12 Car. II, c. 32 (seizures of goods illegally executed; the person seizing "shall not be admitted or allowed to give in evidence upon his or their oath or oaths"); ante 1680, Hale, Pleas of the Crown, I, 302 ("A man concerned in point of interest is not a lawful accuser or witness in many cases").

[39] Compare the history of the rule for infamy, ante, § 519.

[40] 7 & 8 W. III, c. 3; 6 & 7 W. IV, c. 114.

[41] The following trials illustrate this: 1554, Throckmorton's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 862, 873; 1571, Duke of Norfolk's Trial, ib. 958, 979; 1588, Knightley's Trial, ib. 1263, 1267; 1603, Raleigh's Trial, 2 id. 1, 11; 1615, Weston's Trial, ib. 911, 928; 1649, Duke of Hamilton's Trial, 4 id. 1155, 1161; 1661, James' Trial, 6 id. 67, 79; 1662, Tonge's Trial, ib. 225, 256; 1663, Moders' Trial, ib. 273, 278; 1664, Turner's Trial, ib. 565, 595. Compare Mr. J. Stephen's account of this: Hist. Crim. Law, I, 325, 377, 440.

expressly repudiating the notion that the accused's statements are to be taken as testimony.[42] This, it may be supposed, was in part due to the then recently established principle in civil cases of disqualification by interest.

(3) The accused was at common law not allowed to have any witnesses on his behalf. This (to our eyes) barbarous rule was perhaps not unnatural in the earlier days, when the jurors had so much knowledge of their own. At any rate, as late as the 1400s, it was not an extraordinary thing, seeing that the practice of calling witnesses in the modern sense was only just beginning in civil cases. But, in the next century, when their use in civil cases was common enough, they were still not admitted in criminal trials;[43] not on any theory of disqualification (it was still too early for that), but on the pretext that they were not needed, — the same pretext that forbade the employment of counsel.[44] No doubt also a general disinclination prevailed to concede anything that would weaken the hands of the prosecution. There seems to have been some general support for this rule in the notions of the time, for not until the middle of the 1600s is there any relaxation.[45] Then, first, the accused is gradually allowed to produce witnesses, who speak, however, without oath;[46] next, he is given compulsory process for them;[47] and, finally, by statutes in 1695[48] and 1701[49] he is allowed to have them sworn in treason and in felony. From that time on, the ordinary principle of disqualification by interest, already established for civil cases, is enforced wherever it is applicable to a defendant's witnesses.

§ 576. Interest-Disqualification in general; Policy of the Rule; Statutory Abolition. The theory of disqualification by interest was merely one variety

[42] 1678, Coleman's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 1, 65 (Coleman: "I came home the last day of August"; L. C. J. Scroggs: "Have you any witness to prove that?"; Coleman: "I cannot say I have a witness"; L. C. J.: "Then you say nothing"); 1681, Colledge's Trial, 8 id. 549, 681.

[43] 1554, Throckmorton's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 862, 885; 1590, Udall's Trial, ib. 1271, 1280, 1304.

[44] 1678, L. H. Steward Finch, in Lord Cornwallis' Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 143, 149: "The fouler the crime is, the clearer and the plainer ought the proof of it to be. There is no other good reason can be given why the law refuseth to allow the prisoner at the bar counsel in matter of fact when his life is concerned, but only this, because the evidence by which he is condemned ought to be so very evident and so plain that all the counsel in the world should not be able to answer upon it."

[45] There had been two statutes, of very limited extent, allowing witnesses to the accused, in 1589 (St. 31 Eliz. c. 4) and 1606 (St. 4 Ja. I, c. 1, § 16).

[46] 1645, Lord Macguire's Trial, 4 How. St. Tr. 653, 666 (Macguire: "I was told, when I came into the kingdom [from Ireland], that I might have witnesses"; Judge: "If you had witnesses here, we would hear them; but . . . we cannot protract time [to wait for them]. . . . If you will ask them [the king's witnesses] any questions for your defence, you shall"); 1649, Duke of Hamilton's Trial, ib. 1155, 1157, 1160 (defendant allowed to use some witnesses, but not granted a warrant for others); 1653, Faulconer's Trial, 5 id. 323, 357 (witnesses freely examined for the defendant; here under the Commonwealth); 1660, Hulet's Trial, ib. 1179, 1191 (under the Restoration; witnesses allowed, "but they are not to be admitted upon oath against the king"); 1661, James' Trial, 6 id. 67, 79; 1669, Hawkins' Trial, ib. 921, 933; 1678, Stayley's Trial, ib. 1501, 1508.

[47] Note that this reform comes in under the Restoration and before the Revolution: 1663, Twyn's Trial; 6 How. St. Tr. 513, 516 (L. C. J. Hyde: "Let's know their names, we will take care they shall come in"); 1664, Turner's Trial, ib. 565, 570 (L. C. J. Hyde: "The law will not admit us to summon any witnesses"); 1679, Reading's Trial, 7 id. 259, 278 (L. C. J. North: "There was never any subpœnas denied you; but you might have had them at any time"; and at pp. 288, 289, two witnesses were sworn). Compare the history of compulsory process in general, post, § 2190.

[48] St. 7 Wm. III, c. 3, § 1; St. 1 Anne, c. 9, § 3. Compare the detailed history of the old rule in Thayer, Preliminary Treatise, 157, note, and the shorter account in Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 350–354, 416.

of the general theory which underlay the extensive rules of incompetency at common law. It was reducible in its essence to a syllogism, both premises of which, though they may now seem fallacious enough, were in the 1700s accepted as axioms of truth: Total exclusion from the stand is the proper safeguard against a false decision, whenever the persons offered are of a class specially likely to speak falsely; Persons having a pecuniary interest in the event of the cause are specially likely to speak falsely; Therefore such persons should be totally excluded. This theory may be perceived running through all the authoritative expositions of the doctrine:

1727, Chief Baron Gilbert, Evidence, 110; Lofft's ed. 223: "For where a man, who is interested in the matter in question, would also prove it, it rather is a ground for distrust, than any just cause of belief; for men are generally so short-sighted, as to look to their own private benefit, which is near them, rather than to the good of the world, which, though on the sum of things really best for the individual, is more remote; therefore, from the nature of human passions and actions, there is more reason to distrust such a biased testimony than to believe it. It is also easy for persons, who are prejudiced and prepossessed, to put false and unequal glosses upon what they give in evidence; and therefore the law removes them from testimony, to prevent their sliding into perjury; and it can be no injury to truth to remove those from the jury, whose testimony may hurt themselves, and can never induce any rational belief. If it be objected, that interest in the matter in dispute might, from the bias it creates, be an exception to the credit, but that it ought not to be absolutely so to the competency, any more than the friendship or enmity of a party, whose evidence is offered, towards either of the parties in the cause, or many other considerations hereafter to be intimated; the general answer may be this, that in point of authority no distinction is more absolutely settled; and in point of theory, the existence of a direct interest is capable of being precisely proved; but its influence on the mind is of a nature not to discover itself to the jury; whence it hath been held expedient to adopt a general exception, by which witnesses so circumstanced are free from temptation, and the cause not exposed to the hazard of the very doubtful estimate, what quantity of interest in the question, in proportion to the character of the witness, in any instance, leaves his testimony entitled to belief. Some, indeed, are incapable of being biased even latently by the greatest interest; many would betray the most solemn obligation and public confidence for an interest very inconsiderable. An universal exclusion, where no line short of this could have been drawn, preserves infirmity from a snare, and integrity from suspicion; and keeps the current of evidence, thus far at least, clear and uninfected."

1824, Mr. Starkie, Evidence, 83: "The law will not receive the evidence of any person, even under the sanction of an oath, who has an interest in giving the proposed evidence, and consequently whose interest conflicts with his duty. This rule of exclusion, considered in its principle, requires little explanation. It is founded on the known infirmities of human nature, which is too weak to be generally restrained by religious or moral obligations, when tempted and solicited in a contrary direction by temporal interests. There are, no doubt, many whom no interests could seduce from a sense of duty, and their exclusion by the operation of this rule may in particular cases shut out the truth. But the law must prescribe general rules; and experience proves that more mischief would result from the general reception of interested witnesses than is occasioned by their general exclusion."

The answer to this syllogism is merely that both its premises are unsound, —that pecuniary interest does not raise any large probability of falsehood, and that, even if it did, the risks of false decision are not best avoided by excluding such testimony. The classical expositions of these fallacies are found in the following passages:[1]

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. III, c. III (Bowring's ed., vol. VII, pp. 393 ff.): "Ignoramus has for the purpose of this topic composed his system of psychology. What is it? A counterpart to the learned Plowden's system of mineralogical chemistry: equal as touching its simplicity — equal as touching its truth. Two parent metals, sulphur and mercury: the mother, sulphur; the father, mercury. Are they in good health? they beget the noble metals: are they in bad health? they beget the base. . . . In the view taken of the subject by the man of law, — to judge of trustworthiness, or at least, of fitness to be heard, interest or no interest is (flagrant and stigmatized improbity apart) the only question. . . . Between two opposite propositions, both of them absurd in theory, because both of them notoriously false in fact, the choice is not an easy one. But if a choice were unavoidable, the absurdity would be less gross to say, 'No man who is exposed to the action of interest will speak false,' than to say, 'No man who is exposed to the action of interest will speak true.' Of a man's, of every man's, being subject to the action of divers mendacity-restraining motives, you may be always sure: of his being subjected to the action of any mendacity-promoting motives, you cannot be always sure. But suppose you were sure. Does it follow, because there is a motive of some sort prompting a man to lie, that for that reason he will lie? That there is danger in such a case, is not to be disputed: but does the danger approach to certainty? This will not be contended. If if did, instead of shutting the door against some witnesses, you ought not to open it to any. An interest of a certain kind acts upon a man in a direction opposite to the path of duty: but will he obey the impulse? That will depend upon the forces tending to confine him to that path — upon the prevalence of the one set of opposite forces or the other. All bodies on or about the earth tend to the centre of the earth; yet all bodies are not there. All mountains have a tendency to fall into a level with the plains; yet, notwithstanding, there are mountains. All waters seek a level; yet, notwithstanding, there are waves. . . . Any interest, interest of any sort and quantity, sufficient to produce mendacity? As rational would it be to say, any horse, or dog, or flea, put to a waggon, is sufficient to move it: to move it, and set it a-running at the pace of a mail-coach. . . . Take what everybody understands, money: for precision's sake, take at once £10; the £10 of the day, whatever be the ratio of it to the £10 of yesterday: to the present purpose, depreciation will not affect it. This £10, will its action be the same in the bosom of Crœsus as of Irus? in the bosom of Diogenes, as in that of Catiline? No man will fancy any such thing for a moment: no man, unless, peradventure, it may have happened to him to have been stultified by legal science. . . . In the eyes of the English lawyer, one thing, and one thing only, has a value: that thing is money. On the will of man, if you believe the English lawyer, one thing, and one thing only, has influence: that thing is money. Such is his system of psychological dynamics. If you will believe the man of law, there is no such thing as the fear of God; no such thing as regard for reputation; no such thing as fear of legal punishment; no such thing as ambition; no such thing as the love of power; no such thing as filial, no such thing as parental, affection; no such thing as party attachment; no such thing as party enmity; no such thing as public spirit, patriotism, or general benevolence; no such thing as compassion; no such thing as gratitude; no such thing as revenge. Or (what comes to the same thing) weighed against the interest produced by the value of a farthing, the utmost mass of interest deducible from the action of all those affections put together, vanishes in the scale. . . . For a farthing — for the chance of gaining the incommensurable fraction of a farthing, no man upon earth, no Englishman at least, that would not perjure himself. This in Westminster Hall is science, this in Westminster Hall is law. According to the prints of the day, £180,000 was the value of the property left by the late Duke of Bridgewater. For a fraction of a farthing, Aristides, with the duke's property in his pocket, would have perjured himself. One decision I meet with, that would be amusing enough, if to a lover of mankind there could be anything amusing in injustice. A man is turned out of court for a liar, not for any interest that he has, but for one which he supposed himself to have, the case being otherwise. Instead of turning the man out of court, might not the judge have contented himself with setting him right? Would not the judge's opinion have done as well as a release? The pleasant part of the story is that the fact on which the exclusion is grounded could not have been true. For, before the witness could be turned out of court for supposing himself to have an interest, he must have been informed of his having none: consequently, at the time when he was turned out, he must have ceased to suppose that he had any. Another offence, for which I find a man pronounced a liar, seems to make no bad match with the foregoing: it was for being a man of honour. 'Oh ho! you are a man of honour, are you? Out with you, then — you have no business here.' Being asked whether he did not look upon himself as bound in honour to pay costs for the party who called him, supposing him to lose the cause, and whether such was not his intention, — his answer was in the affirmative, and he was rejected. It was taken for granted that he would be a liar. Why? Because he had shown he would not be one. . . . Exceptions, self-contradictions, spring up everywhere under their feet: exceptions, and, as far as they extend, all reasonable. Reasonable, and why? Because, the rule itself being fundamentally absurd, everything must be reasonable which goes to narrow its extent. . . . V. Exception the fifth: — . . . Question: A man who at the time of his examination has an interest in the cause, — is he an admissible witness, he having had no interest at the time of the supposed fact? Decision in the affirmative. Because he was under no temptation when he had not to speak, therefore, when he is to speak, knowing him to be under temptation, you are to suppose him not to be so. Just as if a pilot were to say in a storm, the vessel among the breakers, Sit still, there is no danger. Why so? Because yesterday it was a dead calm. VI. Exception the sixth: Voire dire. Truth expected, in spite of interest. . . . When a witness produced against you has an interest in the business (meaning always a pecuniary interest), and you cannot get other evidence of it, or do not care to be at the expense, you address yourself to the witness himself, and ask him whether he has or no: if he speaks truth, he is turned out; if he perjures himself, he is heard. This operation is called examining a witness upon the voire dire. Voire dire is, in law French, to tell the truth. A man might look a good while, even in the vocabulary of English law, before he would find so silly a one. 'Come, my honest friend, I am going to put some questions to you. To the first of them, the court expects you to speak truth: to the others, as you please.' "

[1] Mr. Bentham's was of course the first and greatest; the above quotation includes merely a few of the most typical and forcible passages from his argument. The other two quotations represent those which in the history of the law were next most potent in their practical consequences, namely, the utterances of the Commissions in England and America, whose proposals led directly to legislative reform. There were, of course, other admirable expositions, notably Lord Brougham's, in his speeches in Parliament, and Lord Denman's, between 1824 and 1854, in his speeches, pamphlets, and articles. Both of these were Bentham's admirers. Perhaps the most comprehensive and concise, and the most profitable for perusal, next to Mr. Bentham's, are those of Chief Justice Appleton of Maine (a disciple of Bentham's) in his treatise (1860) on Evidence, chaps. I, IV, and Mr. Justice Edward Livingston (circa 1823), in his Introductory Report to the Code of Evidence (Works, ed. 1872, I, 424, 438 ff.); Livingston had read Bentham, probably in Dumont's earlier abridged edition.

1853,[2] English Common Law Practice Commissioners, Second Report, p. 10: "Plain sense and reason would obviously suggest that any living witness who could throw light upon a fact in issue should be heard to state what he knows, subject always to such observations

[2] This Report was ten years subsequent to the abolition of the interest-disqualification; but the passage was useful as confirming by experience the wisdom of the steps so recently taken, and thus made it possible to obtain support for the further reform of abolishing marital incompetency, — a measure which followed immediately in 1854. It was in consequence of the First Report of this same Commission that the incompetency of civil parties had been abolished in 1851.

as may arise as to his means of knowledge or his disposition to the truth. The law o England, however, at least until a recent period, proceeded on a very different principle Acting apparently on a distrust both of the integrity of witnesses and of the discernmen of the tribunals, it sought to protect the latter from the possibility of being misled, by carefully excluding from giving testimony not only the parties to the cause, but any one who had any, even the most minute, interest in the result. Every person so circumstanced, however small and insignificant the amount of his interest, was presumed to be incapable of resisting the temptation to perjury; and every judge and juryman was presumed to be incapable of discerning perjury under circumstances peculiarly calculated to excite suspicion and watchfulness. It is painful to contemplate the amount of injustice which must have taken place under the exclusive system of the English law, not only in cases actually brought into court and there wrongly decided in consequence of the exclusion of evidence, but in numberless cases in which the parties silently submitted to wrongs from inability to avail themselves of proof which, though morally conclusive was in law inadmissible. From the time, however, when the late Mr. Bentham first turned the attention of the public to the defects of the English law of evidence, the system of exclusion has been crumbling away before the power of discussion and improved legislation. . . . [After noting the three general statutes between 1843 and 1851, which had by successive steps removed incompetency for interest,] Such is the gradual progress of opinion and intelligence. A quarter of a century ago such a measure if proposed, would doubtless have been treated as a wild and dangerous innovation altogether unfit to be entertained by the Legislature. The new law has now been in practical operation for eighteen months; and according to the concurrent testimony of the bench, the profession, and the public, is found to work admirably and to contribute in an eminent degree to the administration of justice."

1848, New York Commissioners on Practice and Pleadings,[3] First Report, p. 246: "The rule appears to us to rest upon a principle altogether unsound; that is, that the situation of the witness will tempt him to perjury. The reason strikes at the foundation of human testimony. The only just inquiry is this; whether the chances of obtaining the truth are greater from the admission or the exclusion of the witness. Who that has any respect for the society in which he lives can doubt, that, upon this principle, the witness should be admitted? The contrary rule implies, that, in the majority of instances, men are so corrupted by their interest, that they will perjure themselves for it, and that besides being corrupt, they will be so adroit, as to deceive courts and juries. This is contrary to all experience. In the great majority of instances the witnesses are honest, however much interested, and in most cases of dishonesty the falsehood of the testimony is detected, and deceives none. Absolutely to exclude an interested witness, is therefore as unsound in theory, as it is inconsistent in practice. It is inconsistent, because the law admits witnesses far more likely to be biased in favor of the party, than he who has merely a pecuniary interest. A father may testify for his son; a child living with his father and dependent upon his bounty, may appear as his witness, nay, as his only witness, without question. Is the immediate gain of a dollar, by the result of a cause, so potent to outweigh integrity, while affection, consanguinity, dependence, are put down as dust in the balance? There is not another rule in the law of evidence so prolific of disputes, uncertainties, and delays, as that we are considering. Not a circuit is held, but question after question is raised upon it; nor a term where exceptions growing out of it are not debated. . . . England has outstripped us in this most necessary reform. Five years ago, an act of Parliament obliterated the rule from the laws of that country. . . . Lord

[3] This Commission, appointed through efforts led by Mr. David Dudley Field, consisted of Messrs. Nicholas Hill, David Graham, and Arphaxad Loomis; but, before its labors began, Mr. Hill resigned and was replaced by Mr. Field. Compare with the above Report the Complete Report of 1850, p. 715, note to § 1708; this section, making "all persons without exception" competent, except specified classes, has served as the type for the legislation of a majority of our jurisdictions.

Brougham has spoken of it, in the following language: 'This is certainly the greatest measure that has been carried under the head of judicial procedure, since the statute of frauds, that is, since the Restoration. It places the law of evidence at length upon a rational footing, and makes its provisions consistent with themselves. It protects judges and juries and parties, from the miscarriages, heretofore constantly produced, by the exclusion of important testimony; wisely opening the door to the witness, but reserving the estimate of his credit and the value of his evidence, to those who are to judge the cause. It also sweeps away the numberless nice and subtle distinctions in which the profession was wont to luxuriate; disencumbers our jurisprudence of a heavy load of useless decisions, resting upon refinements and not principles, and abridges the trial of causes, by shutting out those debates that used daily to arise upon the admission of proofs, which the common sense of mankind at once pronounced should be received, and which the law itself did receive in other instances, not distinguishable by the naked eye of plain reason. There have been few greater improvements in our judicial system, than those which are effected by this valuable statute.'"

It is not easy nowadays to appreciate why these plain objections remained so long without recognition. (1) One reason, certainly, is found in the much stronger influence, up to the 1800s, of the emotional element in all human conduct. The belief that a partisan would likely falsify, or at least distort unconsciously the truth, was then much closer than now to the facts of life; because partisanship did then have an influence which has now largely given place to cooler and more rational motives of action. This may be gathered from various features of life in those days. Partisanship then colored the whole existence and committed one to set views and courses of conduct which had no relation to a discriminating choice. Speech and action were more passionate and violent; witness Burke's speeches against Warren Hastings, and the enormous excess of libel actions over their present number, as well as the extremities of abuse which were indulged in between gentlemen; compare the almost incredible vituperation employed against such majestic characters as Washington and Jefferson with the decline of political personalities in the last few decades. Motives then rested more on sentiment; witness the rise of Romanticism in literature and politics, the careers of Byron and Shelley, the vogue of "Paul and Virginia" and "Thaddeus of Warsaw." Note, too, that these features are still found surviving in the traditions of precisely that portion of our community — the South — where we may see with our own eyes that the emotional element — both in its highest and its lowest forms — predominates in the character. During the 1800s this predominance was gradually disappearing; the influence of scientific research and of industrial invention and organization made for a more rational and less emotional life. That influence, no doubt, has in part had its degrading effect in strengthening the calculative, sordid, and commercial standards of action; but it has also had the effect of establishing, in general, cool reason as the orthodox test of conduct. Thus, with the diminution of the control of mere emotion and partisanship over conduct and opinion, the rules of law which were natural enough while that domination existed, ceased gradually to correspond to the facts of life and survived as anachronisms. It became possible to see their fallacies as soon as their moral basis disappeared, but not till then. In short, not before the second half of the 1800s could it have been fairly expected that public opinion would demand or even support the abolition of disqualification by interest; nor yet, perhaps, does that abolition, in a few communities (chiefly in the South[4]), correspond to the facts of life and public opinion, as it certainly does in most.

(2) A second reason perhaps is to be found in that "dead weight of an oath" (in Mr. Justice Stephen's phrase), which in popular probative notions prevailed from primitive times and still is so difficult in some communities to make way against. As long as juries were inclined to give a numerical value to witnesses, to believe that ten witnesses were ten times as probative as one witness, and to treat a sworn assertion on the stand as being good for so much testimony, irrespective of the witness' personal credit, so long might the Legislature well hesitate to admit to the stand persons who in their credit would certainly be weaker than the normal witness and would yet be indiscriminately counted as good witnesses by the jury. In other words, the tribunal's opportunity for a careful weighing of a witness' measure of credit, and the means afforded for doing so by cross-examination and the like, form the safeguards which induce us to take the risk of admitting interested witnesses; we rely on being able to make the proper allowance for the danger; if, then, the tribunal is apt to ignore those safeguards, the reason for admission is much weaker. Some such thought must have operated to prolong the delay in abolishing disqualification by interest.[5] Perhaps the two foregoing considerations sufficiently explain why the reforming legislation dates no earlier than the second half of the 1800s.

In England, the publication (in 1827) of Bentham's great treatise first furnished the arsenal of arguments for transforming public opinion. The weapons were wielded and the forces marshalled by Mr. (afterwards L. C. J.) Denman and Mr. (afterwards L. C.) Brougham).[6] Mr. Denman had indeed, as early as 1824, in reviewing the French edition of Bentham's work,[7] given voice to the new views; he had always been, and never ceased to be, far in advance of public opinion in his measures of reform. By 1843 the result was finally achieved, in the statute 6 & 7 Victoria, chapter 85, known ever since as Lord Denman's Act.[8]

[4] In 1898, Mr. N. J. Hammond, an accomplished and thoughtful member of the bar of Georgia, at one time Attorney-General, said to the writer that the abolition of parties' incompetency had in his opinion been a mistake. Perhaps there exist other doubters still; see Jenkins, J., diss. in Harman v. Harman, 1895, 17 C. C. A. 479, 70 Fed. 926, and ante, § 289.

[5] This consideration is noted, in dealing with the history of the rules of number, post, § 2032.

[6] The campaign of reform in the political field was signalized, within a year after the publication of Bentham's book, by Mr. Brougham's great speech, of Feb. 7, 1828, on the reform of procedure, in which occurred the oft-quoted peroration: "It was the boast of Augustus that he found Rome of brick and left it of marble. But how much nobler shall be the sovereign's boast, when he shall have it to say that he found law dear, and left it cheap; found it a sealed book, — left it a living letter; found it the patrimony of the rich, — left it the inheritance of the poor; found it the two-edged sword of craft and oppression, — left it the staff of honesty and the shield of innocence!" (Hans. Parl. Deb., 2d ser., vol. 18, p. 247.)

[7] Edinburgh Review, March, 1824, vol. 40, p. 176. This French translation appeared before the English edition of the original.

[8] For Lord Denman's speech (then Chief Justice and a peer) in moving the second reading of this bill, see Hansard, Parl. Deb., 3d ser.,

In the United States, the English statutes served as an example, and it was soon followed. The earliest enactment abolishing interest as a disqualification seems to have been that of Michigan.[9] But the broad movement of reform in New York, led by Mr. David Dudley Field, brought results which attracted more general attention; and the legislation of that State, in 1848, was the direct means by which the reform of testimonial rules spread, within the next decade, to most of the other States.[10] The details of the old rule, in its application to the numerous circumstances of pecuniary interest, may therefore be ignored as having no longer any importance.[11] In every jurisdiction under our law interest as a disqualification is expressly abolished.[12]

§ 577. Civil Parties' Disqualification; Statutory Abolition. The notion of interest at common law applied of course to the parties to the suit, for their interest in the event of the litigation was obviously the most marked. That this general principle of disqualifying interest was the real ground of their exclusion from testifying in their own favor is clear; and certain details of the rule rested directly on this theory, — for example, the consequence that a mere titular or nominal party was admissible, or a party against whom judgment had gone by default. The hardship and the anomaly, however, of this ground for exclusion were even more emphatic and apparent than in the case of ordinary interested persons.[1] To this branch of the rule also Mr. Bentham paid special attention in his seathing denunciations:

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. V, c. I (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, pp. 487, 507): "The reason which forbids the admission of the testimony is weaker in this case than in the case of an interested extraneous witness. The real magnitude of the interest being the same in both cases, — in the case of a party the interest is more palpable: the objection created by it is likely to act with greater force upon the judicial faculties of the magistrate: his mind is more surely open to it: the danger of deception is therefore less. If, in so far as it operates in his own favor, the testimony of the party is liable to be drawn aside from the line of truth by the action of this force, which is so obvious even to the most unobservant eye, — in so far as it operates in his disfavor, it possesses, in a degree superior to all other testimony, a claim to confidence. That, in this case, the error, if any there be in the testimony, is not a wilful one — is not accompanied, at the same time, with a knowledge of the falsity of the information, and of the tendency it has to operate to the deponent's prejudice — is a proposition, the truth of which is far more certain in this instance, than it can be in any other. Accordingly, as often as the testimony of a party is received — so sure as it enters into the mind of any one who has to judge of it — so sure is it to be analyzed, and, as it were, divided

vol. 61, p. 208. March 8, 1842. In 1833, a statute of 3 & 4 W. IV. c. 42, had removed this disqualification so far as it depended on the verdict being usable for or against the witness in other litigation; all these statutes are noted ante, § 488. It would seem also that the Admiralty Courts had for some time before these statutes ceased to regard interest as a disqualification: Dr. Lushington, in The Peerless, 1 Lush. 30, 41.

[9] Michigan, Rev. St. 1846, c. 102, § 99.

[10] See note 3, supra.

[11] Except for the rule (post, § 578) excluding survivors from testifying against a decedent. The scope for the application of the old rules is even there, however, so narrow that it will be sufficient to refer the reader to Professor Greenleaf's exposition of them, in his Treatise, §§ 329–430.

[12] The statutes are set forth ante, § 488. In general, the legislation was later in the Southern States than elsewhere.

[1] "When as a boy I read the Pickwick Papers, I was always puzzled to know why Mr. Pickwick did not go into the witness-box, and say that he never promised to marry Mrs. Bardell, and explain how the good lady came to make such a mistake" (W. Blake Odgers, Esq., A Century of Law Reform, 1901, p. 217).

into two parts. To the part which is regarded as operating in the deponent's own favor, the incredulous, the diffident part of the judge's mind, applies itself of course: while the part regarded as operating in his disfavor, commands, on the part of the judge, an almost unlimited share of confidence: in a word, what portion of the mass is understood as belonging to this division, is, by the common sense and consent of mankind, universally regarded as the best evidence. Such is the evidence, of which, on the ideal supposition of extraordinary vexation, the rashness of a certain class of jurists has not hesitated to rob the treasury of justice. A party is not suffered to be examined on his own behalf. Observe the consequence; he is delivered without mercy into the hands of a mendacious witness on the other side. Your adversary, to make evidence for a suit he means to bring against you, sends an emissary to you to engage you in a conversation, that, when called upon as a witness, he may impute confessions to you such as you never made. When the evidence comes to be given at the trial, the witness tells what story he pleases: as for you, you must not open your mouth to contradict him, although, were you admitted to state what passed, it might be in your power to satisfy the judge, that the account given of the conversation by the witness could not possibly have been true. . . . Parties, how numerous soever, being excluded, while, in the character of an extraneous witness, the testimony of a single deponent is sufficient to warrant, and (if clear of contradiction, as well from within as without,) in a manner to command, decision; — a single tongue obtains thus a certain victory over a thousand, that would have sounded in contradiction to it, had they been suffered to be heard. Every defendant is, par etat, by his station in the cause, a liar: a man who, if suffered to speak, would be sure to speak false, and equally sure to be believed. Every defendant is a liar. But every human being may, at the pleasure of every other, be converted into a defendant. Therefore, and by that means, every human being may, at the pleasure of every other, be converted into a liar, and, in that character, his capacity of giving admissible testimony annihilated. The jus nocendi, the power of imposing unlimited burthens by calumnies not suffered to be contradicted, is thus offered constantly upon sale, to every man who will pay the price for it. . . . In principle there is but one mode of searching out the truth: and (bating the corruptions introduced by superstition, or fraud, or folly, under the mask of science) this mode, in so far as truth has been searched out and brought to light, is, and ever has been, and ever will be, the same, in all times, and in all places, in all cottages and in all palaces — in every family, and in every court of justice: Be the dispute what it may, see everything that is to be seen; hear everybody who is likely to know anything about the matter: hear everybody, but most attentively of all, and first of all, those who are likely to know most about it — the parties."[2]

Mr. Bentham had rightly perceived that the incompetency of parties could be treated as a different question from that of interested persons not parties; for, while the impropriety of their exclusion was more marked in rational policy, yet the common-law theory of interest was in their case most strongly applicable and the instinct against altering it would therefore offer more obstinate resistance. And so it did. In England, this stage of reform was not reached until 1851, eight years after the first great step had been taken;[3] and in most of the United States such an interval between the two steps similarly appears.[4]

[2] Compare the arguments of Livingston and Appleton, in the citations ante, § 576, note 1.

[3] St. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, excepting actions for adultery and breach of marriage-promise; this exception was removed in 1869, St. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68. In 1846, St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, an experiment had already been tried, by admitting parties in the county courts.

[4] The earliest statute seems to have been that of Connecticut, in 1849, prior to the English Act. In Alabama, the disqualification by interest generally was removed in 1852, but that of parties not until 1867. But in some jurisdictions, at much earlier dates, statutes had made partial exceptions to the general disqualifications, e. g. in bastardy cases and in actions on book-accounts, suits involving municipal corporations, and suits before justices of the peace. Some of these statutes making parties competent provided, as a condition, that he should

To-day the disqualification has everywhere disappeared,[5] and its details are no longer of any consequence.[6]

§ 578. Survivor's Disqualification against Opponent Deceased, or Incapable. In almost every jurisdiction in the United States, by statutes enacted in connection with or shortly after the statute removing the general disqualification by interest, an exception was carved out of the old disqualification and was allowed to perpetuate within a limited scope the principle of the discarded rule. It does not appear that there was any precedent which could have served as an example;[1] and the almost universal vogue of this modern fragment of the old anomaly is therefore the more remarkable. The scope of this modern rule excludes the testimony of the survivor of a transaction with a decedent, when offered against the latter's estate. The defenders of this rule are usually content to invoke some vague metaphor in place of a reason, but occasionally there is found an attempt at a rational justification:

1873, Brickell, J., in Louis v. Easton, 50 Ala. 471: "This right and privilege [of testifying] must be mutual. It cannot exist in the case of one party and not in the other. If death has closed the lips of the one party, the policy of the law is to close the lips of the other."

1878, Haymond, J., in Owens v. Owens, 14 W. Va. 88, 95: "The law in the exception to the privilege to testify was intended to prevent an undue advantage on the part of the living over the dead, who cannot confront the survivor, or give his version of the affair, or expose the omission, mistakes, or perhaps falsehoods of such survivor. The temptation to falsehood and concealment in such cases is considered too great to allow the surviving party to testify in his own behalf. Any other view of this subject, I think, would place in great peril the estates of the dead, and would in fact make them an easy prey for the dishonest and unscrupulous."

The argument of the latter passage, that a contrary rule "would place in great peril the estates of the dead" sufficiently typifies the superficial reasoning on which the rule rests. Are not the estates of the living endangered daily by the present rule, which bars from proof so many honest claims? Can it be more important to save dead men's estates from false claims than to save living men's estates from loss by lack of proof? The truth is that the present rule is open, in almost equal degree, to every one of the objections which were successfully urged nearly a century ago against the interest-rule in general. Those objections may be reduced to four heads: (1) That the supposed danger of interested persons testifying falsely exists to a limited extent only; (2) That, even so, yet, so far as they testify truly, the exclusion is an intolerable injustice; (3) That no exclusion can be so defined as to be rational, consistent, and workable; (4) That in any case the test of cross-examination and the other safeguards for truth are a sufficient guaranty testify first of the witnesses on his side; see post, § 1869. The old rules may be found in Greenleaf, Evidence, §§ 329–331.

[5] The statutes are set forth ante, § 488.

[6] Except under the statutory rule of § 578, post. For the effect of one of the exceptions to the old rule, namely, that parties might make affidavits to the loss of a document, see post, §§ 1196, 1225.

[1] Except the analogy of some earlier chancery rulings, which however merely required corroboration and did not exclude the witness (post, § 2065). But the expedient was an old one; it is found in several mediæval codes, e. g., "Nulla probatio testimonii de mutuo vel deposito valeat contra defunctos" (Pertile, Storia del diritto italiano, 2d ed., 1900, vol. VI, pt. 1, p. 400).

against frequent false decision. Every one of the first three objections applies to the present rule as amply as to the old and broader rule. The fourth applies with less apparent force, because the opponent's testimony is lacking in contradiction. And yet, upon what inconsistencies is based even this support for the rule! For its defenders in effect declare the lack of this opposing testimony to be the sole ground for an exceptional rule adapted to that particular situation; and yet, since the deceased opponent is a party, he would have been by hypothesis a potential liar equally with the disqualified survivor; so that the rule rests on the supposed lack of a questionable species of testimony equally weak with that which is excluded. There never was and never will be an exclusion on the score of interest which can be defended as either logically or practically sound. Add to this, the labyrinthine distinctions created in the application of the complicated statutes defining this rule; and the result is a mass of vain quiddities which have not the slightest relation to the testimonial trustworthiness of the witness:

1895, Corliss, J., in St. John v. Lofland, 5 N. D. 140, 64 N. W. 930: "Statutes which exclude testimony on this ground are of doubtful expediency. There are more honest claims defeated by them, by destroying the evidence to prove such claim, than there would be fictitious claims established if all such enactments were swept away and all persons rendered competent witnesses. To assume that in that event many false claims would be established by perjury is to place an extremely low estimate on human nature, and a very high estimate on human ingenuity and adroitness. He who possesses no evidence to prove his case save that which such a statute declares incompetent is remediless. But those against whom a dishonest demand is made are not left utterly unprotected because death has sealed the lips of the only person who can contradict the survivor, who supports his claim with his oath. In the legal armory, there is a weapon whose repeated thrusts he will find is difficult, and in many cases impossible, to parry if his testimony is a tissue of falsehoods, — the sword of cross-examination. For these reasons, which lie on the very surface of this question of policy, we regard it as a sound rule to be applied in the construction of statutes of the character of the one whose interpretation is here involved, that they should not be extended beyond their letter when the effect of such extension will be to add to the list of those whom the act renders incompetent as witnesses."

As a matter of policy, this survival of a part of the now discarded interest-qualification is deplorable in every respect; for it is based on a fallacious and exploded principle, it leads to as much or more false decision than it prevents, and it encumbers the profession with a profuse mass of barren quibbles over the interpretation of mere words.[1] If any concession at all is to be made to the considerations of caution underlying the rule, there are two simple ways available, each of them in actual and tried operation, and

[1] The statutes are set forth ante, § 488; the only jurisdictions not recognizing this disqualification are apparently Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Mexico, and Oregon. The interpreting decisions will not be given here, for three reasons; first, they depend largely on the wording of the local statute; secondly, they are extremely numerous, and usually cannot be correctly summarized without a voluminous statement of the circumstances of the case and a comparison with the various parts of the statute, for which the present space does not suffice; thirdly, they are usually accessible to every practitioner in the form of annotations to the statute. This conclusion has been reached only after a full examination of all the rulings in one of the States, and a collection of the current rulings in all the jurisdictions for a period of several years.

each of them able to accomplish the purpose without following the crude, technical, and unjust method of disqualifying surviving witnesses. One of these, adopted in New Mexico and Canada, is to allow no recovery in such cases on the party's sole testimony, without corroboration of some sort.[2] The other, followed in Connecticut and Oregon, is to admit, as well as the surviving party, any extant writings or declarations of the deceased party on the subject in issue.[3]

§ 579. Accused in Criminal Cases; Statutory Abolition. The disqualification of the accused in criminal cases to testify for himself seems not to have been questioned in policy until Bentham's time.[1] But his arguments in this respect took longer for their fruition in legislation than any other of his proposals for abolishing witnesses' incapacities. The order of their abolition almost everywhere was the same; first, that of interested persons, next and in short space, that of civil parties, and then after a long interval, that of accused persons; that of husband and wife came about at varying times in the third interval, and in many communities remains still unachieved. The competency of accused persons was first declared in Maine, in 1864,[2] and was not finally reached in England until 1898;[3] it now remains unaccomplished in Georgia only. It came later, in general, in the Southern States; and it was sometimes there accompanied by the proviso that the accused should testify, if at all, first in order of the witnesses on his own side.[4]

The reason for the general slow arrival at this measure did not apparently lie entirely in a failure to perceive the fairness of giving the accused an opportunity to tell his story in exculpation. This must have been appreciated as soon as any perception was reached of the impropriety of excluding parties and other interested persons. Indeed, before that time, it had become customary in England to allow the accused to make a "statement" to the jury, i. e. to tell his story, not on oath and not as a witness, but in the guise of an address or argument on the testimony and the whole case.[5] A similar practice grew up or was introduced by statute in some of our own jurisdictions,[6] and still obtains in Georgia.[7] That the formal grant of competency,

[2] Post, § 2065.

[3] Post, § 1576.

[1] See the quotations ante, § 577, and post, § 2250. Bentham's arguments are summarized in (1860) Appleton, Evidence, c. VII.

[2] Me. St. 1864, c. 280; said by Professor Thayer (Cases on Evidence, 2d ed., p. 1117) to be "the earliest statute permitting the defendant in a criminal case to testify. In Massachusetts it was allowed in 1866, in Connecticut in 1867, in New York and New Hampshire in 1869, in New Jersey in 1871."

[3] Ante, § 488, where the statutes of the various jurisdictions are collected. There had been several statutes in England before 1898, qualifying the accused in particular issues; they are collected in Best, Evidence, 8th ed., § 622 A; they begin in 1872.

[4] Post, § 1869.

[5] 1838, R. v. Malings, 8 C. & P. 242; 1838, R. v. Walkling, ib. 243; 1844, R. v. Dyer, 1 Cox Cr. 113; 1846, R. v. Williams, ib. 363; 1882, R. v. Shimmin, 15 id. 122 (with a note referring to preceding inconsistent rulings now repudiated); 1885, R. v. Millhouse, ib. 622 (limited to cases where defendant calls no witnesses). The following are good examples of such "statements": 1827, Corder's Trial, Pelham's Chronicles of Crime, ed. 1891, II, 151; 1831, Taylor's Trial, ib. 233.

For this practice, see also the following: 1883, Stephen, Hist. Crim. Law, I, 440; 1893, Lely, editor, in Best on Evidence, 8th ed., § 635 (explaining the construction put on the Prisoners' Counsel Act, 1836, St. 6 & 7 Wm. IV, c. 114).

[6] E. g., 1861, People v. Thomas, 9 Mich. 314.

[7] 1895, Boston v. State, 94 Ga. 590, 20 S. E.

then, was so long withheld was due rather to a hesitation founded on the supposed interest of the accused himself, — partly because his failure to use the right of testifying and his exercise of the privilege of remaining silent would (it was believed) damage his cause more seriously than if he were able to claim that his silence was enforced by law; and partly also, and chiefly, because his exercise of the right to testify would (it was believed), in subjecting him to the ordeal of cross-examination, place him in a situation in which even an innocent man would show at a disadvantage and would injure more than assist his own cause:

1868, Steele, J., in State v. Cameron, 40 Vt. 555, 565: "In the great body of cases, no wise practitioner would permit his client, whether he believed him guilty or innocent, to testify when upon trial on a criminal charge. The very fact that he testifies as if with a halter about his neck, that he is under such inducement to make a fair story for himself, his character and his liberty if not his fortune and his life being at stake, is enough to usually deprive his testimony of all weight in his favor, whether it be true or false. This is the case even when his manner upon the stand is unexceptionable, while his critical condition often creates such apprehension and excitement that his manner is open to great criticism, and if he does make a mis-step after voluntarily assuming the responsibility of testifying, it will naturally be construed strongly against him. In short, his testimony is far more likely to injure him seriously than to help him a little. It is true that a clear intellect and perfect self-possession may enable an unscrupulous rogue to run the gauntlet of a cross-examination and make something out of this privilege; and the same qualities will be still more likely to help an innocent man to some advantage from it; but the true application of the statute [qualifying him] is only to those rare cases, when a word from the prisoner, and him only, will manifestly dispose of what otherwise seems conclusive against him."

1869, Sawyer, C. J., in People v. Tyler, 36 Cal. 522, 528: "The policy of such a statute has been considerably discussed by law writers and others, and, to our minds, the strongest objection that has been urged against it, is, that it places a party charged with crime in an embarrassing position; that, even when innocent, a party upon trial upon a charge for some grave offence may not be in a fit state of mind to testify advantageously to the truth even, and yet if he should decline to go upon the stand as a witness, the jury would, from this fact, inevitably draw an inference unfavorable to him, and thus he would be compelled, against the humane spirit of the common law, to furnish evidence against himself, negatively at least, by his silence, or take the risk, under the excitement incident to his position, of doing worse, by going upon the stand and giving positive testimony."

These apprehensions, as experience has shown, were unfounded, — at any rate, the second of them (the disadvantage of taking the stand); while the first (the disadvantage of claiming silence), protected as it is by the strict law forbidding any inferences to be drawn from such silence,[8] gives at least as much benefit as in common sense can be afforded to the accused who takes the unnatural and suspicious course of declining to testify for himself. That an accused ought to be competent to testify can no longer be questioned.[9]

98, 21 S. E. 603; 1897, Hackney v. State, 101 id. 512, 519, 28 S. E. 1007; 1900, Tiger v. State, 110 id. 244, 34 S. E. 1023; 1900, Sharp v. State, 111 id. 176, 36 S. E. 633; 1900, Knox v. State, 112 id. 373, 37 S. E. 416; 1901, Cochran v. State, 113 id. 736, 39 S. E. 337; 1901, Peavy v. State, 114 id. 260, 40 S. E. 234; 1903, Dunwoody v. State, — id. — , 45 S. E. 412.

For the question whether an accused making such a statement can be impeached, see post, § 892.

[8] Post, § 2272.

[9] For the history of the efforts at reform in England, and specimens of the arguments pro and con, see 99 Law Times, 103; 100 id. 412; 101 id. 582; 103 id. 297; 104 id. 415; 32 Law

The following passage illustrates what can be said for that proposition from the standpoint of judicial experience:

1883, Sir James Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 442: "I am convinced by much experience that questioning [the accused], or the power of giving evidence, is a positive assistance, and a highly important one, to innocent men, and I do not see why in the case of the guilty there need be any hardship about it. It must be remembered that most people accused of crime are poor, stupid, and helpless. They are often defended by solicitors who confine their exertions to getting a copy of the depositions and endorsing it with the name of some counsel to whom they pay a very small fee, so that even when prisoners are defended by counsel the defence is often extremely imperfect, and consists rather of what occurs at the moment to the solicitor and counsel than of what the man himself would say if he knew how to say it. When a prisoner is undefended his position is often pitiable, even if he has a good case. An ignorant, uneducated man has the greatest possible difficulty in collecting his ideas, and seeing the bearing of facts alleged. He is utterly unaccustomed to sustained attention or systematic thought, and it often appears to me as if the proceedings on a trial, which to an experienced person appear plain and simple, must pass before the eyes and mind of the prisoner like a dream which he cannot grasp. I will give an illustration of what I mean. . . . A man was indicted at a Court of Quarter Sessions for stealing a spade. The evidence was that the spade was safe overnight and was found in his possession next day, and that he gave no account of it. He made no defence whatever, and was immediately convicted. When called upon to say why sentence should not be passed upon him, he replied in a stupid way, 'Well, it is hard I should be sent to gaol for this spade, when the man I bought it of is standing there in court.' The chairman caused the man referred to to be called and sworn; the jury, after hearing him, recalled the verdict they had given, and the man was acquitted at once. . . . The propriety of making the parties competent witnesses in civil cases is no longer disputed. It is difficult to say why the same rule should not apply to criminal cases also. One objection to the admission of such evidence rests upon the false supposition that a witness is to be believed because he is sworn to speak the truth. The proper ground for admitting evidence is not that people are reluctant to lie, but that it is extremely difficult to lie minutely and circumstantially without being found out."

§ 580. Same: Co-indictees and Co-defendants. There remains to-day, in spite of the statutory abolition of the accused's incapacity, a group of questions inherited from the common-law rule, and liable still to arise because of the incomplete and careless formulation of the statutes in some jurisdictions. At common law, when two or more persons were tried upon the same charge, each and all were naturally disqualified;[1] only by ceasing to be a party in the cause could one of them become a witness, for or against his co-defendants; and there were precedents concerning the manner in which a defendant could be deemed thus to have ceased to be a party. Now, when legislation came to remove the disqualification of the accused, the statutory phrase ran frequently that he should be receivable "in his own behalf,"— thus omitting in terms to provide for competency on behalf of or against another defendant. However, before this legislation had made the change, statutes had been passed, in many jurisdictions, declaratory of the common-law rules as to the mode of making a co-defendant competent by removing him from the record, or settling some of the details left doubtful in that respect by judicial precedent; and these statutes, appropriate enough while the accused's disqualification continued, were often left upon the statute-book, in spite of successive revisions, after the general statute abolishing the disqualification had been enacted; so that it became necessary to reconcile the latter statute with the former. The result has been some confusion and uncertainty in the state of the law after the statutes' enactment, — an uncertainty wholly unnecessary if proper caution had been taken in framing them. To ascertain the present law, it is therefore necessary to consider what the rule of the common law was, and then to observe the effect of the statutory modification.

Journal, 210; ib. 362; 30 id. 218, 277, 288, 378; 31 id. 140, 151, 189; 1893, Mr. J. M. Lely, editor, in Best on Evidence, 8th ed., § 622 A.

[1] For the question whether the confession of one defendant can be used as an admission against the other, see post, §§ 1076, 1079. For the right to cross-examine a co-defendant who takes the stand in his own behalf, see post, § 2276.

A. Common Law. (1) It is plain that a person not of record a party to the same charge would not be disqualified to testify, either for or against the accused. Hence, in the first place, a person who is merely an unindicted accomplice is as such not disqualified;[2] nor yet a person charged in another indictment.[3] Whether a person charged in another indictment for the same crime, as principal or as accessory, would be disqualified, was left doubtful,[4] though upon principle he was properly not to be treated as a party to the charge.

(2) Furthermore, a person who had been charged in the same indictment, but had ceased to be a party to the charge, by the time his testimony was offered, would cease to be disqualified. This principle was not disputed; the differences of opinion grew out of the question whether the cessation of his party-character should be tested by the technical state of the record or merely by his substantial lack of further interest in the result. In strictness, the former test might be more consistent with the settled doctrine already noted under (1) supra; but, in an enlightened view of the object of the disqualifying rules, the other test was preferable. Accordingly, there was good authority for the rules that a person jointly indicted would be admissible if he had ceased to have an interest in the result by virtue of an

[2] This was hardly even doubted; compare the cases cited post, § 2056. The only question ever seriously made was whether a promise of pardon disqualified the accomplice; and this was universally decided in the negative: 1662, Tonge's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 226, Kelyng 16 (Hale, C. J., and Brown, J., diss.); 1696, Charnock's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 1404, 1454; 1722, Layer's Trial, 16 id. 160 (Solicitor-General: "Suppose, then, for argument sake, that there was a promise of pardon made to a man upon condition that he should give evidence; I apprehend that would not disable him from being a witness"); 1784, Com. v. Fairfield, Mass., Dane's Abr., c. 84, art. 2, § 3; 1898, State v. Reed, 50 La. An. 990, 24 So. 131; 1897, State v. Riney, 137 Mo. 102, 38 S. W. 718; 1897, State v. Magone, 32 Or. 206, 51 Pac. 452. In a few jurisdictions, the trial Court's discretion was said to control: 1827, People v. Whipple, 7 Cow. 708, 713; 1875, Lindsay v. People, 63 N. Y. 143, 153; 1877, Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 344, 348. For a promise of pardon as impeaching the credit of an accomplice, see post, § 967.

[3] 1867, McKenzie v. State, 24 Ark. 636; 1886, Ex parte Stice, 70 Cal. 51, 56, 11 Pac. 459; 1888, State v. Walker, 98 Mo. 95, 102, 9 S. W. 646, 11 S. W. 1133.

[4] 1840, R. v. Lyons, 9 C. & P. 555 (one indicted separately as principal; not decided); 1873, Davis v. State, 38 Md. 15, 47 (one indicted separately as accomplice, excluded); 1898, State v. Stewart, 142 Mo. 412, 44 S. W. 240 (one indicted separately as accomplice, admitted); 1898, State v. Black, 143 id. 166, 44 S. W. 341 (same).

entry of nolle prosequi,[5] or of a formal acquittal or discharge,[6] or of a judgment of conviction on the verdict,[7] or of a judgment of conviction on default,[8] or of a plea of guilty, with or without the passing of sentence or judgment thereon.[9]

(3) Does a severance of trials of persons jointly charged in a single indictment have the same effect in qualifying them as a discharge from the record? In form, it does not; they remain named together as parties. But in substance, it does; for they are tried by different juries, and nothing said by one to the other's jury can either help or hurt his own cause:

1884, Peters, C. J., in State v. Barrows, 76 Me. 401, 408: "The argument against the admission of such evidence does not strike us with much force. It is almost universally admitted that an accomplice separately indicted may be a witness for the State, and any distinction arising between trials on a joint indictment and trials on separate indictments is not readily appreciated. The crime is supposed to be jointly committed in either case; . . . the interest and motives of the witness must be the same whether he is to be afterwards tried under the same or another indictment. As said by Beasley, J., in State v. Brien, [infra] 'The only reason for the rejection of such a witness is that his own accusation of crime is written on the same piece of paper with the charge against the culprit whose trial is in progress.' . . . Stringent as the rule [of interest] was, it did not apply to indictments to its full extent. . . . Courts seemed inclined to regard a co-defendant in a criminal case as not a party unless a party to the issue on trial. . . . To be incompetent to testify, the defendants must be in charge of the same jury."

The better opinion, then, was that an indictee for whom a severance had been granted was receivable, not only for the prosecution,[10] but also on behalf

[5] 1741, L. C. Hardwicke, in Man v. Ward, 2 Atk. 228; 1896, Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501, 43 N. E. 710; 1891, State v. Steifel, 106 Mo. 129, 133, 17 S. W. 227; 1875, Lindsay v. People, 63 N. Y. 143, 153.

[6] 1893, State v. Minor, 117 Mo. 302, 305, 22 S. W. 1085; 1877, Kehoe v. Com., 85 Pa. 127, 137 (excluded, because no judgment was passed).

[7] 1736, R. v. Sherman, Lee cas. t. Hardwicke 303 (discharge, after plea in abatement); 1826, R. v. Rowland, Ry. & Mo. 401; 1857, R. v. O'Donnell, 7 Cox Cr. 337.

[8] Contra: 1804, R. v. Lafone, 5 Esp. 154, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (for the special case of a joint offence); this case, though often cited, seems to stand alone.

[9] The English rulings agreed to this, equally whether the witness was called for or against the co-defendant; 1738, R. v. Fletcher, 1 Stra. 633 (here after fine paid); 1840, R. v. Lyons, 9 C. & P. 555, 558 (here before sentence served); 1841, R. v. George, Car. & M. 111 (here before sentence passed); 1847, R. v. Hinks, 1 Den. Cr. C. 84, 2 C. & K. 462, 465, by all the judges (here before sentence passed); 1849, R. v. Arundel, 4 Cox Cr. 260 (here before sentence passed); 1875, R. v. Gallagher, 12 id. 61 (same). Contra: 1855, R. v. Jackson, 6 Cox Cr. 525 (here allowed only after sentence passed). In the United States, it seems conceded that he may be called for the prosecution: 1847, Com. v. Smith, 12 Metc. 238 (here before sentence); 1891, State v. Jackson, 106 Mo. 174, 177, 17 S. W. 301 (here before sentence); 1900, State v. Young, 153 id. 445, 55 S. W. 82; 1897, State v. Magone, 32 Or. 206, 51 Pac. 452; 1900, State v. Savage, 36 id. 191, 60 Pac. 610. He ought to be equally admissible for the defendant: 1863, State v. Jones, 51 Me. 125 (either before or after sentence); 1875, Lee v. State, 51 Miss. 566, 568, 574. Contra, unless sentence is passed: 1881, Henderson v. State, 70 Ala. 23, 24 (there must be "some order which amounts to an acquittal or a severance"; following R. v. Lafone, supra, note, and ignoring the other precedents); 1859, State v. Young, 39 N. H. 283, 284 (plea of nolo contendere, not sufficient without judgment; the rule being equally applicable to the plea of not guilty); 1871, State v. Bruner, 65 N. C. 499 (nolo contendere); 1877, Kehoe v. Com., 85 Pa. 127, 137.

[10] 1865, R. v. Winsor, 10 Cox Cr. 276, 300, 314, 320, 323, 326 (by all the judges); 1866, Winsor v. Regina, L. R. 1 Q. B. 289, 311, 320, 324, 327, 390, 396; 1891, Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511, 533, 10 So. 106; 1873, State v. Prudhomme, 25 La. An. 522; 1886, State v. Mason, 38 id. 476; 1884, State v. Barrows, 76 Me. 401, 408 (see quotation supra); 1883, Evans v. State, 61 Miss. 157; 1876, Carroll v. State, 5 Nebr. 31, 35; 1868, State v. Brien, 32 N. J. L. 414; 1879, Noyes v. State, 41 id. 418, 429; 1859, Allen v. State, 10 Oh. St. 287, 303; 1869, Brown v. State, 18 id. 496, 509. Contra: 1887, State v. Chyo Chiagk, 92 Mo. 395, 401, 4 S. W.

of the co-indictee himself; yet on the latter point, by some obscure reasoning the majority of Courts were opposed.[11]

B. Statutes. Let us now suppose that a statute has given to the accused person the right to testify, i. e. has removed his disqualification as a party. Such a statute exists, in one form or another, in every jurisdiction but one. This statute is now to be applied to the law as it stood, and the question is, what effect it has had upon the situations in which at common law a co-indictee was disqualified. Those cases were substantially two, (1) a co-indictee, after a severance of trial, called on the defendant's behalf (here by the great majority of Courts excluded), (2) a co-defendant, tried at the same time, called either for or against the defendant (here by all Courts excluded).

(1) Separate trial. The plain object of the statute was to remove the disqualification of the accused as a party; his common-law incompetency as co-indictee was due solely to his being a party in interest; therefore any and every such disqualification has disappeared. This is impregnable logic, if the premises be conceded:

1881, Scholfield, J., in Collins v. People, 98 Ill. 584, 587: "We do not deem it necessary to inquire what was the common law in this respect, since we are of opinion that the question is conclusively settled against plaintiff in error by our statute. It provides 'No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal case or proceeding by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his having been convicted of any crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility; provided, however, that a defendant in any criminal case or proceeding shall only at his own request be deemed a competent witness. . . . If at common law Lacomb would have been an incompetent witness, it must have been because he was interested in the event of the suit, and under the above language it is wholly unimportant whether that interest arose from his being a party or otherwise, for in either event he is rendered competent. The proviso adds force to this view; it shows that it was intended that all defendants should be allowed to testify, for otherwise the proviso was wholly unnecessary. Under that section a defendant is unquestionably entitled to have the benefit, for what it is worth, of the evidence of a co-defendant; and the same right is equally clearly given to the State. The infamy arising from convicted guilt, and the interest resulting from being a party to the same case or proceeding, may now be considered for the purpose of determining what credence should be given to the testimony of the witness, but they no longer furnish any ground for excluding his testimony."

1884, Peters, C. J., in State v. Barrows, 76 Me. 401, 410: "[Our statutory enactments] have weakened, if not abrogated, the argument of public policy. It was, no doubt, the design of the Legislature that the objection to the competency of parties as witnesses should be removed both in civil and criminal cases. In criminal cases the provision is this: 'In all criminal trials the accused shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness.' . . . If the argument for the defendant is sound, then the common-law rule has become reversed; defendants can testify against each other when tried together, and cannot so testify when tried apart. . . . It would present a singular inconsistency in criminal procedure if . . . a co-defendant on trial may be called from the dock to the witness-stand, but a companion in guilt, included in the same indictment, not on trial, be excluded therefrom."

704; 1901, State v. Weaver, 165 Id. 1, 65 S. W. 308.

[11] Pro: 1872, R. v. Payne, 12 Cox Cr. 118, semble; 1881, Henderson v. State, 70 Ala. 23, 25; 1846, Jones v. State, 1 Ga. 610, 617; 1859, Allen v. State, 10 Oh. St. 287, 303. Contra: 1856, Moss v. State, 17 Ark. 327, 330; 1891, Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511, 534, 10 So. 106; 1859, State v. Nash, 10 Ia. 81, 85; 1856, Adwell v. Com., 17 B. Monr. 310, 318; 1873, Davis v. State, 38 Md. 15, 47 (for accessories); 1830, Com. v. Marsh, 10 Pick. 57; 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 449; 1851, State v. Roberts, 15 Mo. 28, 59; 1887, State v. Chyo Chiagk, 92 id. 395, 401; 1813, People v. Bill, 10 Johns. 95; 1838, People v. Williams, 19 Wend. 377; 1877, Kehoe v. Com., 85 Pa. 127, 137; 1853, Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708, 716 (changed here by express statute, as applied in 1894, Smith v. Com., 90 Va. 759, 19 S. E. 843).

This is plain enough, when the witness is called for the prosecution, because at least that much was already conceded at common law;[12] but the reasoning applies equally to the witness called for his co-defendant, so that the common-law rule (as it had been applied by most Courts) must be deemed changed in that respect, by implication of the statute.[13]

(2) Same trial. The reasoning has precisely the same effect in its application to the case of the disqualification (unanimously conceded) at common law, namely, testimony of a co-defendant being tried at the same time. The statute has removed all his incapacity as a party, both in its direct effect upon himself and in its indirect effect upon others:

1900, Shelby, J., in Wolfson v. U. S., 41 C. C. A. 422, 101 Fed. 430, 436: "When any defendant chooses to testify, the statute permits him to do so. It does not matter whether his testimony is for or against himself, or for or against his co-defendant. The only limitation in the statute is that he shall not be made a witness except on his own request. Being sworn as a witness at his own request, he is amenable, generally, to the rules governing other witnesses. He could testify against or for his co-defendant on trial with him, because the only reason why he could not do so at common law was that he was a party to the record and interested in the case. In other words, the only common-law reason for his exclusion was that he was a defendant also on trial. The statute clearly removes that objection. The fact that two defendants were on trial does not prevent the statute applying. There is nothing in it to confine its operation to cases where but a single defendant is named in the indictment."

This result is generally accepted, at least for a co-defendant called for the prosecution.[14] The reasoning applies with equal force to a co-defendant called for the accused,[15] though a few Courts, having perhaps in mind the common-

[12] 1881, Casey v. State, 37 Ark. 67, 83, semble; 1899, Bishop v. State, 41 Fla. 522, 26 So. 703 (pleading guilty but not sentenced); 1900, Williams v. State, 42 id. 205, 27 So. 998; 1881, Collins v. People, 98 Ill. 584, 587 (see quotation supra); 1898, State v. Asbury, 49 La. An. 1741, 23 So. 322; 1901, State v. Slutz, 106 La. 637, 31 So. 179; 1899, Munyon v. State, 62 N. J. L. 1, 42 Atl. 577; 1903, People v. Van Wormer, 175 N. Y. 188, 67 N. E. 299; 1892, Benson v. U. S., 146 U. S. 325, 333, 13 Sup. 60 (explaining U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. 361); 1894, Smith v. Com., 90 Va. 759, 19 S. E. 843; 1891, Edwards v. State, 2 Wash. 291.

[13] 1881, Collins v. State, 98 Ill. 584, 587; 1893, State v. Bogue, 52 Kan. 79, 84, 34 Pac. 410; 1892, Benson v. U. S., 146 U. S. 325, 337, 13 Sup. 60, semble; 1898, McGinnis v. State, 4 Wyo. 115, 53 Pac. 492. Contra: 1885, Foster v. State, 45 Ark. 328.

[14] 1898, People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 Pac. 553; 1888, Conway v. State, 118 Ind. 482, 484, 21 N. E. 285; 1878, State v. Hudson, 50 Ia. 157, 161, semble; 1899, Gilbert v. Com., 21 Ky. 544, 51 S. W. 804; 1882, State v. Smith, 86 N. C. 705; 1896, State v. Smith, 8 S. D. 547, 67 N. W. 619 (co-defendant may testify without limitation; Compiled Laws, § 7381, prevailing over §§ 7379, 7380, which prevailed over § 5260); 1900, Wolfson v. U. S., 41 C. C. A. 422, 101 Fed. 430, 102 id. 134 (Boarman, J., diss.); 1900, State v. Hyde, 22 Wash. 551, 61 Pac. 718.

[15] 1881, Collins v. State, 98 Ill. 584, 587, semble; 1867, State v. Gigher, 23 Ia. 318; 1879, State v. Stewart, 51 Id. 312, 1 N. W. 646; 1896, State v. Smith, 8 S. D. 547, 67 N. W. 619; 1892, Richards v. State, 91 Tenn. 723, 20 S. W. 533; 1900, Wolfson v. U. S., 41 C. C. A. 422, 101 Fed. 430, 436; 1893, McGinnis v. State, 4 Wyo. 115, 53 Pac. 492. Formerly, in Kentucky, a statute (Cr. Code, § 234, as law distinction, or going upon the special words of a statute, have declined to take this last step.[16] There ought to-day to be no further question in any jurisdiction (except Georgia) that there is no limitation whatever on the qualification of a co-indictee or co-defendant to testify either for or against the accused.

§ 581. Testifying to One's Own Intent. Under the influence of some obscure suggestion, not easily traceable, the view has been often urged upon Courts that a person — especially a party — should be disqualified from testifying to his own intent or motive, even where that intent or motive is material to be investigated. The argument is (so far as any has been vouchsafed) that such testimony may be falsified without the possibility of detection, and that therefore it is dangerous to permit an interested person to allege, in effect, whatever he pleases as to his own state of mind.[1] The answers to this argument are various and sufficient. In the first place, there is no precedent for it in the inherited common law; it is an attempt to create a rule without an analogy in the accepted doctrines of the judicial rulings. In the next place, it assumes that there is no counter-evidence available, and yet asks that the only evidence which it assumes to be available shall be excluded, — in other words, asks that a concededly proper issue be submitted to the jury with no evidence at all. In the third place, its assumption is incorrect in fact, namely, that there is no other available and sufficient evidence of intent or motive by which the person's own testimony can be tested and checked; for the evidence from conduct and circumstances and from others' testimony is not only a permissible but a potent source of belief,[2] and is amply sufficient to guard against falsification. Finally, the argument is at least of no higher value than the argument in favor of the unsatisfactory statutory rule against survivors' testimony (ante, § 578), and is merely of a piece with all crude attempts to disqualify a witness by reason of interest, — attempts which to-day must stand discredited by the general repudiation of that species of disqualification (ante, § 576). Some of these answers to the argument are represented in the following judicial utterances disapproving it, — a disapproval which is to-day practically unanimous:

1827, Savage, C. J., in People v. Ferguson, 8 Cow. 107: "It is true, if the voter should swear falsely, you probably cannot convict him of perjury. But are we to reject every witness who comes to swear under such circumstances that if he swears false he cannot amended by St. May 1, 1886) prohibited co-defendants from testifying on each other's behalf in cases of conspiracy; this was abolished by St. March 23, 1894, applied as follows: 1894, Thompson v. Com., — Ky. —, 26 S. W. 1100; 1895, Kidwell v. Com., 97 Id. 538, 31 S. W. 131; 1902, Williams v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 7 (following Kidwell v. Com.).

[16] 1893, Ballard v. State, 31 Fla. 266, 284 (§§ 1095, 2363, 2908, do not abolish the common-law rule); 1899, State v. Angel, 52 La. An. 485, 27 So. 214; 1901, State v. Breaux, 104 La. 540, 29 So. 222; 1898, State v. Franks, 51 S. C. 259, 28 S. E. 908 (C. Cr. P. § 63, does not make a defendant competent for a co-defendant). But the co-defendant is of course competent on his own behalf: 1901, State v. Sims, 106 La. 453, 31 So. 71.

For an exclusion under a special English statute, see the following: 1872, R. v. Payn, 12 Cox Cr. 118 (the reason being that his cross-examination might make him testify against himself).

[1] The argument is set forth in extracts from Alabama opinions quoted post, § 1966.

[2] Ante, §§ 237–242, 300–371, 385–406, post, §§ 661, 1963 ff.

be convicted of perjury? I know of no such rule of evidence. If this principle is to be engrafted upon the law of evidence, we must always inquire, before a witness is sworn, whether he can be convicted of perjury if he swears falsely, and if not, he must be rejected."

1864, Hogeboom, J., in McKown v. Hunter, 30 N. Y. 625: "[The cases] go very far to establish the general principle that where the motive of a witness in performing a particular act or making a particular declaration becomes a material issue in a cause or reflects important light upon such issue, he may himself be sworn in regard to it, notwithstanding the difficulty of furnishing contradictory evidence, and notwithstanding the diminished credit to which his testimony may be entitled as coming from the mouth of an interested witness."

1865, Poland, C. J., in Hulett v. Hulett, 37 Vt. 586: "This was objected to on the ground that a party should not be allowed to swear to his intent or mental purpose, because it is not in the power of the other party to contradict him by similar evidence. Of course . . . he can be contradicted only by his acts and conduct or declarations. But where a party swears to his intent, if his acts and conduct are shown to be wholly at variance and inconsistent with the intent he swears to, his own testimony in his own favor would ordinarily obtain very little credit with the jury; and but little danger need be apprehended from such testimony unless his acts and conduct are consistent with it."

1867, Sanderson, J., in People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 576, 582: "If under the new rule [of competency] parties are to be kept in harness and not allowed to explain their actions and words, when they admit of explanation and when explanation is needed in order to exhibit the whole truth, but half the evil which was felt under the old rule has been removed. It is no answer to say that this enables a party to substitute a false motive for the true one or to convert words spoken in one sense into another. If the argument proves anything it proves too much, and shows that the radical change which has been made is in all respects founded in folly rather than in wisdom. For the truthfulness of the parties when upon the witness stand we must depend, as in the case of other witnesses, upon the obligations of their oath and their reputation for truth and veracity. If these can be relied upon for the truth of statements made in reference to acts and words of which the eye and ear may take notice, they may for the same reason be accepted as guarantees for the truth of statements made in respect to motives and intents of which the mind or inner man alone can take cognizance. Nor is there, in our judgment, any well-grounded reason for apprehending that this rule will obstruct rather than advance the ends of justice. There is no more danger of imposing upon the jury falsehood or pretence in respect of motives and intents than there is of doing the like in respect to visible or external circumstances. The jury can as readily distinguish between the false and the true in respect to the former as to the latter. If the motive or intent assigned is inconsistent with the external circumstances, it must be discarded as false. If on the contrary they are consistent, there is no reason why they may not be true."

1876, Niblack, J., in White v. State, 53 Ind. 596: "Because the intent is a fact which cannot in the nature of things be positively known to others, and is hence a matter about which other witnesses cannot directly testify, does not in our opinion affect the rule." [3]

[3] In all the following cases the testimony was held receivable; Eng.: 1721, Answer of the Judges concerning Fox's Libel Act, 22 How. St. Tr. 296, 300, semble (quoted post, §§ 661, 1962); 1897, R. v. King, 1 Q. B. 214 (false pretences; by the prosecuting witness, as to his belief upon the representation); Cal.: 1899, Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791 (intent in executing a deed mortis causa; grantor's testimony to his intent); D. C.: 1902, Bass v. U. S., 20 D. C. App. 232, 242 (by one charged with false representation, as to his motive and belief); Fla.: 1902, Lane v. State, — Fla. —, 32 So. 896 (accused's belief as to danger calling for self-defence); Ga.: 1902, Acme Brewing Co. v. Central R. & B. Co., 115 Ga. 494, 42 S. E. 8 (by a purchaser, as to his good faith in paying); 1903, Alexander v. State, — id. —, 44 S. E. 851 (murder; by a co-indictee, that he did not intend violence); Ill.: 1866, Miner v. Phillips, 42 Ill. 131 (by a debtor, as to his good faith in making a sale alleged to be fraudulent); 1894, Wohlford v. People, 148 id. 296, 298, 36 N. E. 107 (assault; by defendant, whether he intended to act in self-defence); 1894, Pope v. Hanke, 155 id. 617, 40 N. E. 839, semble (by

It is to be regretted, however, that, by a misunderstanding of the history of the rule, an unnecessary concession has sometimes been made, by a few one buying or selling stocks on a margin, as to his intent to take or give delivery); Ind.: 1864, Zimmerman v. Marchland, 23 Ind. 474 (grantee's intent, properly immaterial, but testimony excluded improperly on the present ground; practically repudiated in the ensuing cases); 1876, Greer v. State, 53 Ind. 420 (by one indicted for assault with intent to rape, as to his intention); 1876, White v. State, ib. 595 (by one indicted for larceny, as to his intention at the time of taking); 1880, Shockey v. Mills, 71 id. 288 (by a debtor, as to his intent in selling property alleged to have been transferred in fraud of creditors); 1881, Bidinger v. Bishop, 76 id. 244, 255 (by the alleged dedicator of a street, as to his intention); 1883, Parrish v. Thurston, 87 id. 440 (by a purchaser, as to his belief in the representations of the seller); 1883, Sedgwick v. Tucker, 90 id. 271, 281 (by a debtor, as to his intent in an alleged fraudulent conveyance); 1885, Over v. Schiffling, 102 id. 193, 26 N. E. 91 (the precise kind of intent does not appear); 1885, Heap v. Parrish, 104 id. 36, 39, 3 N. E. 549 (by the defendant in an action for malicious prosecution, as to his motive in prosecuting); 1888, Ross v. State, 116 Id. 497, 19 N. E. 451 (by one accused of selling liquor unlawfully to a minor, as to his good faith); 1883, Sedgwick v. Tucker, 90 id. 281 (by a debtor, as to his intent in a transfer alleged to be fraudulent); Ia.: 1865, Watson v. Cheshire, 18 Ia. 202, 211 (by an indorser, as to his belief in the truth of his representations); 1878, Selz v. Belden, 48 id. 451 (by a debtor, as to his intent in an alleged fraudulent conveyance, if relevant); 1885, Frost v. Rosecrans, 66 id. 405, 23 N. W. 895 (mortgagee, as to his knowledge of debtor's intent to defraud); 1886, Browne v. Hickle, 68 id. 330, 333, 27 N. W. 276 (general principle; see quotation infra); 1897, Zimmerman v. Brannon, 103 id. 144, 72 N. W. 439 (admissible where intent is relevant; but intent of a promisor in a guaranty is not); 1897, Counselman v. Reichart, ib. 430, 72 N. W. 490 (intent not to make actual purchases, as constituting a gambling contract); 1899, Kruse v. S. & W. Lumber Co., 108 id. 352, 79 N. W. 116 (by a creditor, that he did not accept a note in payment of a claim against the defendant); 1899, Chew v. O'Hara, 110 id. 81, 81 N. W. 157 (extortion; defendant's belief in the charges); 1900, Bartlett v. Falk, ib. 346, 81 N. W. 602 (by a person deceived, as to his reliance upon the false representations); 1902, Flam v. Lee, 116 id. 289, 90 N. W. 71 (by one imprisoned, as to his mental suffering); 1902, McDermott v. Mahoney, 119 id. 470, 93 N. W. 499 (by an intending purchaser, in an action by the broker against his employer for services, whether the witness was ready and willing to buy); Kan.: 1890, Gardom v. Woodward, 44 Kan. 758, 761, 25 Pac. 199 (by a debtor, as to the intent of an alleged fraudulent conveyance; good opinion, by Valentine, J.); 1901, State v. Kirby, 62 id. 436, 63 Pac. 752 (by a defendant, as to the meaning of his remark); La.: 1888, State v. Wright, 40 La. An. 589, 592, 4 So. 486 (accused's intent just before the affray); 1896, State v. Dillon, 48 id. 1365, 20 So. 913 (by a defendant in larceny, as to his intent in taking the goods); Me.: 1836, Corinna v. Exeter, 13 Me. 328 (by an officer, whether an act was done in good faith); 1857, Edwards v. Currier, 43 id. 484 (by a purchaser, as to his motives in a purchase alleged to be in fraud of creditors); 1857, Wheelden v. Wilson, 44 id. 18 (same); 1897, Cushing v. Friendship, 89 id. 523, 36 Atl. 1001 (one's intent in removing, as affecting domicil); Md.: 1875, Roddy v. Finnegan, 43 Md. 490, 501 (by one arrested, as to his intention in the act charged as illegal and as justifying the arrest); 1884, Fenwick v. State, 63 id. 239 (by a defendant, as to his purpose in getting the weapon in question; good opinion, by Yellott, J.); 1902, Gambrill v. Schooley, 95 id. 260, 52 Atl. 500 (intent to resume distilling); Mass.: 1857, Fisk v. Chester, 8 Gray 508 (intent of residence of one whose domicil is in question); 1863, Thacher v. Phinney, 7 All. 149 (by a debtor, as to the intent of a transfer); 1863, Lombard v. Oliver, ib. 157 (intent as to residence); 1870, Reeder v. Holcomb, 105 Mass. 94 (same); 1874, Snow v. Paine, 114 id. 526 (fraudulent transfer); 1876, Safford v. Grant, 120 id. 20, 21, 26 (by a creditor, as to his reliance upon false representations); 1890, Stevens v. Stevens, 150 id. 557, 559, 23 N. E. 378 (by the maker of a deed, as to its delivery with intent to pass title); 1895, Crandell v. White, 164 id. 54, 41 N. E. 204 (by one selling stocks on margin, that he had no intention to take delivery, under a statute making this material); 1900, Pollock v. Morrison, 172 id. 83, 57 N. E. 326 (intent to build a permanent fence); 1900, Faxon v. Jones, 176 id. 206, 57 N. E. 359 (malice as affecting damages); Mich.: 1869, Watkins v. Wallace, 19 Mich. 75 (intent of a debtor as to an assignment alleged to be fraudulent); 1883, People v. Quick, 51 id. 547, 18 N. W. 375 (by a defendant in larceny, as to his intent in touching the owner of the goods); 1885, Spalding v. Love, 56 id. 366, 374, 23 N. W. 46 (by the defendant, as to his own belief and motive, in an action for malicious prosecution); Minn.: 1872, Hathaway v. Brown, 18 Minn. 423 (fraudulent transfer; the Court doubted as to the propriety of receiving the debtor's testimony as to his own intention; but the question was not involved); 1875, Berkey v. Judd, 22 id. 287, 297 (purchase on the faith of false representations; the purchaser, as to his own belief and reliance, admitted; repudiating the doubt in Hathaway v. Brown); 1877, Garrett v. Mannheimer, 24 id. 193 (by a defendant in malicious prosecution, whether he believed his claim valid; approving Berkey v. Judd); 1898, Albion v. Maple Lake, 71 id. 503, 74 N. W. 282 (pauper's intent in residence); 1903, State v. Ames, — id. —, 96 N. W. 830 (receipt of bribe; by the person bribing, as to her purpose in paying money, admitted); Miss.: 1894, Ferguson v. State, 71 judges, to the argument in its favor. This concession is that there once was some sort of a rule by which "the intent must be inferred from the acts and

Miss. 805, 813, 15 So. 66 (by a seduced woman, that she yielded in reliance on a promise of marriage); Mo.: 1878, Van Sickle v. Brown, 68 Mo. 627, 634 (by the defendant in malicious prosecution, as to his good faith and lack of malice in the prosecution); 1881, State v. Banks, 73 Mo. 592, 595 ("A fortiori the rule ought to apply in criminal causes also, where the intent which prompts an act is always vitally important"); Mont.: 1896, Gassert v. Noyes, 18 Mont. 216, 44 Pac. 959 (intention as to non-abandonment of user of a water-right); Nebr.: 1903, Hackney v. Raymond B. C. Co., — Nebr. —, 94 N. W. 1822 (by a creditor, as to his intent in a transfer); 1903, McCormick Harv. M. Co. v. Hiatt, — id. —, 95 N. W. 627 (waiver of breach of warranty; the plaintiff's testimony to his motive in conduct apparently a waiver); Nev.: 1877, State v. Harrington, 12 Nev. 135 (by a defendant, on a trial for murder, as to whether he believed he was in danger); N. H.: 1860, Gale v. Ins. Co., 41 N. H. 175 (general statement); 1860, Blodgett Paper Co. v. Farmer, ib. 402 (intent, as to title and as to good faith to creditors, of parties to a sale); 1861, Severance v. Carr, 43 id. 67 (intent with which property, alleged to have been stolen, was taken); 1864, Graves v. Graves, 45 id. 323 (by a debtor, as to his motive in a transfer alleged to be in fraud of creditors); 1864, Hale v. Taylor, ib. 406 (intent of a buyer in taking away goods which he subsequently refused to accept in satisfaction of the contract of sale); 1868, Delano v. Goodwin, 48 id. 205 (in general); 1880, Homans v. Corning, 60 id. 419 (intent of a corporation officer as to the liability for improvements charged by him on the corporation); 1884, Downes v. Society, 63 id. 152 (intent in a gift); N. J.: 1871, Mulford v. Tennis, 35 N. J. L. 256, 260 (intent as to transfer attacked by creditors); N. Y.: 1827, People v. Ferguson, 8 Cow. 107 (voter's intent; see quotation supra); 1833, Cunningham v. Freeborn, 11 Wend. 244, semble (by a debtor, as to his motive in making a transfer alleged to be in fraud of creditors); 1856, Seymour v. Wilson, 14 N. Y. 567 (same); 1860, Griffin v. Marquardt, 21 id. 122 (same); 1862, Forbes v. Waller, 25 id. 439 (same); 1864, McKown v. Hunter, 30 id. 625 (by a defendant, in an action for malicious prosecution for perjury, as to his belief in the materiality of the testimony said to involve perjury; see quotation supra); 1866, Bedell v. Chase, 34 id. 388 (by a purchaser, as to his motive in a sale alleged to be in fraud of creditors); 1867, Osborn v. Robbins, 36 id. 375 (whether a note was intended to be given to procure release from unlawful imprisonment); 1868, Thurston v. Cornell, 38 id. 287 (a lender, as to whether the charge for the loan was intended as usurious compensation); 1870, Dillon v. Anderson, 43 id. 236 (approving the preceding instances); 1870, Cortland Co. v. Herkimer Co., 44 id. 22 (the motive in removing a pauper, by one who took part in doing so; removal with intent, etc., being penalized); 1872, Fiedler v. Darrin, 50 id. 443 (usury); 1875, Kerrains v. People, 60 id. 228 (defendant, in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, as to his purpose in taking up the weapon); 1876, Turner v. Keller, 66 id. 66 (one's knowledge of his authority as an agent being relevant, his statement as to his belief that he had it was received); 1880, Bayliss v. Cockcroft, 81 id. 363, 371 (usury); 1882, Starin v. Kelly, 88 id. 420 (the general doctrine as to intent affirmed; a purchaser from a debtor allowed to answer as to his intention to defraud creditors, although notice of the debtor's fraud was alone legally necessary, so far as the purchaser was concerned, to avoid the transfer); 1884, People v. Baker, 96 id. 340, 349 (by a defendant, as to his intent, on a charge of obtaining money fraudulently); 1887, Crook v. Rindskopf, 105 id. 482, 12 N. E. 174 (fraudulent transfer); 1890, Hard v. Ashley, 117 id. 617, 23 N. E. 177 (whether a party to a compromise relied on the other's representations); 1899, Davis v. Marvine, 160 id. 269, 54 N. E. 704 (intent as to purpose of an alleged usurious loan); N. C.: 1882, State v. King, 86 N. C. 603, 606 (general principle, applied to accused persons); 1888, Phifer v. Erwin, 100 id. 59, 63, 6 S. E. 672 (by a debtor, as to his intent in an alleged fraudulent mortgage); 1890, Nixon v. McKinney, 105 id. 23, 28, 11 S. E. 154 (similar); 1900, Autry v. Floyd, 127 id. 186, 37 S. E. 208 (by a defendant, as to his lack of malice in prosecuting plaintiff); 1903, Bright v. Tel. Co., — id. —, 43 S. E. 841 (by the addressee of a telegram, that he would have done certain things had he received the message in ample time); 1903, State v. Hall, — id. —, 44 S. E. 553 (by a defendant, as to his purpose in going to the place of the homicide); N. D.: 1903, State v. Tough, — N. D. —, 96 N. W. 1025 (by a defendant, as to his belief of ownership in entering a railroad car having coal of another person); Oh.: 1866, White v. Tueker, 16 Oh. St. 468, 470 (by the defendant in malicious prosecution, as to his belief in the charge made against the plaintiff; good opinion by Day, J.); 1896, Grever v. Taylor, 53 id. 621, 42 N. E. 829 (goods fraudulently bought; by the vendor, as to whether he relied on the false representations); Pa.: 1883, Juniata Bldg. Ass'n v. Hertzel, 103 Pa. 507, 511 (admissible "wherever the character of the transaction depends on the intent of the party"); 1896, Com. v. Julius, 173 id. 322, 34 Atl. 21 (whether a release was signed on the faith of representations); 1896, Weaver v. Cone, 174 id. 104, 34 Atl. 551 ("What induced you to sell for $80?"); R. I.: 1902, Charbonnel v. Seabury, 23 R. I. 543, 51 Atl. 208 (by one suing for deceit, as to his reliance on the representations); S. C.: 1900, McGhee v. Wells, 57 S. C. 280, 35 S. E. 529 (deed in fraud of creditors); Tex.: 1886, Hamburg v. Wood, 66 Tex. 176, 18 S. W. 623 (transfer in fraud of creditors; by the transferee, as to his motive in accepting the property transferred); U. S.: 1872, Bank words of the party," and that its cessation is due to the fact that it is now by implication "removed by the abrogation of the rule which created it," namely, of the party's disqualification.[4] The truth is, however, that even while parties were entirely disqualified the question was presented, in the shape of testimony to his own intent by a third person, not a party, whose intent was material under the issue, — for example, a voter or a debtor, — and that, in that shape, the question was answered plainly in the negative by several Courts.[5] There was, then, already established a doctrine that a person might properly testify to his own intent, whenever it was material. There was, also, no rule that parties in particular might not testify to their own intent, but merely a general rule disqualifying parties altogether; and thus, when the latter rule was abolished altogether, parties became qualified to testify to whatever other persons had been qualified to testify to, including the fact of their own intent. Thus the statutory changes had nothing to do with the validity or origin of the present rule; they simply made it possible to raise, against parties, a question which had no occasion to be raised against them before that time. It had been raised for other persons, and settled; and it now remained merely to raise it and settle it in a particular new application. The statutory abolition of parties' disqualification is not the source of validity for the present rule, but merely explains the subsequent frequency of a ruling which in that application was before that time unnecessary.

In only one jurisdiction has any clear sanction been given to a rule that

v. Kennedy, 17 Wall. 20, 26 (purpose of an advance of money); 1896, Wallace v. U. S., 162 U. S. 466, 16 Sup. 859 (the defendant's belief that the deceased was about to assault the defendant); Utah: 1875, Conway v. Clinton, 1 Utah 215, 221 (by one charged with malicious destruction of property, as to his motive); 1895, People v. Hughes, 11 id. 100, 39 Pac. 492 (accused's intent); Vt.: 1865, Hulett v. Hulett, 37 Vt. 581 (by one whose domicil was in question; see quotation supra); 1886, Stearns v. Gosselin, 58 id. 38, 3 Atl. 193 (by a debtor, as to his intent in an alleged fraudulent transfer); Va.: 1898, Jackson v. Com., 96 Va. 107, 30 S. E. 452 (by a trespasser, as to his malice); 1903, Litton v. Com., — id. —, 44 S. E. 923 (murder; by the accused, as to his intent to shoot, allowed); W. Va.: 1889, State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 424, 425, 10 S. E. 792 (by the accused, as to his belief of the necessity of shooting, and his malice); Wis.: 1874, Wilson v. Noonan, 35 Wis. 321, 355, 363 (libel; malice or intent being material on the question of damages, the defendant may testify on the subject, "wherever the act complained of is not clearly and necessarily inconsistent with the supposition that such bad intent or malice did not or may not have existed"; quære as to this limitation, which ought to apply, if at all, equally to other sorts of evidence); 1881, Sherburne v. Rodman, 51 id. 474, 478, 8 N. W. 414 (by a defendant in malicious prosecution, as to his belief and good faith in his claim); 1885, Plank v. Grimm, 62 id. 251, 22 N. W. 470 (by one sued for assault, as to intent in approaching the plaintiff); 1885, Arnold v. White, ib. 401 (by a debtor, as to the alleged fraudulent intent in contracting); 1894, Commercial Bank v. Ins. Co., 87 id. 297, 303, 58 N. W. 391 (by an insured, as to his intent to defraud in altering books); 1896, Emery v. State, 92 id. 146, 65 N. W. 848 (by a defendant, as to his intent in making a threat); 1898, Fischer v. State, 101 id. 23, 76 N. W. 594 (intent of defendant as to intimidating another person); 1901, Yerkes v. Northern Pacific R. Co., 112 Wis. 184, 88 N. W. 33 (that the plaintiff relied on the defendant's promise to repair machinery, allowed; but that he would not have continued at work except for the promise, excluded on the theory of the opinion rule, — a vain and quibbling distinction). The admission of hearsay declarations of intention (post, §§ 1725 ff.) is another application of the foregoing principle.

In the following rulings, the testimony was excluded, on perhaps the present grounds, but the rulings may be otherwise supported: 1896, Harris v. Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519 (by an alleged promisor, as to his own intent to buy); 1892, Vawter v. Hultz, 112 Mo. 633, 640, 20 S. W. 689 (by a defendant, that he shot to protect his life).

[4] E. g. by Sanderson, J., in People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 576, quoted supra.

[5] As in People v. Ferguson, N. Y., quoted supra, and in other cases cited supra.

parties or other persons are disqualified to testify to their own intent or motive.[6] In all others where the question has been raised there is a general repudiation of that notion in all its aspects.

It remains to be noted that this sort of testimony, or any other whatever, to the fact of a person's intent or motive, is of course receivable only on the assumption that the intent or motive is a fact permissible to be proved under the substantive law involved in the case. This assumption conditions the admissibility of all evidence (ante, § 2) and of this sort in particular. Hence, if for any reason of substantive law the person's intent or motive is not provable at all, it is not provable by such testimony. But rulings of that tenor are not rulings upon a question of evidence:

1886, Reed, J., in Browne v. Hickle, 68 Ia. 330, 333, 27 N. W. 276: "When it is material to determine the motive or intention with which an act was done, the testimony of the one doing the act, as to his motive or intention, is competent evidence. But . . . the questions to be determined [in this case] were whether the parties entered into a contract for the termination of the lease, and, if so, what were the terms and conditions of their agreement. These questions must be determined from the conduct and language of the parties during the agreement. If an agreement was entered into by the parties, the undertaking of plaintiff therein must be determined aloue from what was said and done by him at the time. His secret motives or intentions are entirely immaterial. We think, therefore, that the Court properly excluded the evidence."[7]

From the present question of evidence are also to be distinguished two other questions of evidence: (1) whether a person may testify to another person's intent or state of mind in general; this involves the principle of adequacy of sources of knowledge, examined elsewhere (post, § 691); (2) whether a person's testimony to another's intent or meaning or state of mind in general is excluded by reason of the Opinion rule; this is a question of complicated bearings, and is dealt with under the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1962).

[6] This is in Alabama. The rulings are collected post, § 1966, in order to distinguish them from others concerning testimony to a third person's intent, and the like; the rulings in that jurisdiction on these topics are in hopeless confusion and exhibit an unprecedented narrow artificiality.

[7] The following cases will serve as examples of the various ways in which a rule of substantive law may affect the solution: 1871, Columbus v. Dehn, 36 Ind. 334 (rejecting testimony by the alleged dedicator of a street as to his intention); 1888, Ross v. State, 116 id. 497, 19 N. E. 451 (rejecting testimony as to one's intent to violete the law); 1902, Donovan v. Driscoll, 116 Ie. 339, 90 N. W. 60 (by a son working for his father, as to his own expectation of pey, excluded); 1859, Quimby v. Morrill, 47 Me. 470 (the intention of a promisor to be bound was ellowed to be asked about by the opponent); 1844, Jones v. Howland, 8 Metc. 385 (whether in addition to the fact of knowledge of insolvency by the debtor, a distinct element, the intent to make a preference, need be shown); 1877, Perry v. Porter, 121 Mass. 523 (admitting evidence of a grantor's intent, the issue being whether she had been frandulently misled into signing); 1895, Nash v. Minn. T. I. & T. Co., 163 id. 574, 40 N. E. 1039 (whether one making false representations intended to state a falsity); 1844, Hibbard v. Russell, 16 N. H. 417 (excluding the secret intent of a person promising in words to pay a note); 1860, Gale v. Ins. Co., 41 id. 174 (en uncommunicated intent to choose between two policies covering the same risk, excluded); 1860, People v. Saxton, 22 N. Y. 309 (rejecting testimony, by one casting an ambiguous ballot, as to his intention); 1870, Dillon v. Anderson, 43 id. 236 (excluding en uncommunicated intent, with reference to a contract made). Add to these illustrations the cases which involve the question whether one charged with slanderous or libellous utterances may testify to his meaning intended: 1890, Townshend, Slander & Libel, 4th ed., § 139; 1881, Odgers, Libel & Slander, 1st Am. ed., p. 93; 1898, Newell, Libel & Slander, 2d ed., c. 15, § 22. Compare also the anslogous illustrations erising under the limitations of the opinion rule and the parol evidence rule, post, § 1971, and §§ 2400–2478.

§ 582. Testamentary Attesting-Witness' Competency. Whether the person attesting a will is eligible as such is purely a question of the substantive law applicable to the validity of wills. The object of the statute is not to determine the competency of persons called to testify to the will, but to secure the execution of the will under formalities of a specified sort.[1] The will is required to be contained in writing, to be signed by certain persons, and to be signed in the presence of certain persons; if these rules are followed, the will is valid in form, and no one of the rules is more a rule of evidence than another (post, § 2456).

Certain corollaries ensue from this principle and illustrate it. In the first place the rule of validity, requiring attestation by certain persons, remains to be satisfied, whether or not any one of those persons appears as a witness. For example, the rule that certain of these persons must be called in preference to others to testify (post, §§ 1290) is a rule of evidence independent of the rule of validity, and may be dispensed with while the latter remains in full force. Secondly, if one of them, appearing as a witness on the stand, is entirely qualified at the time of testifying, still his incompetency at the time of attesting renders the will invalid; though this part of the doctrine has been usually changed by statute.[2] Finally, if one of these persons, when called to testify, is incompetent to do so, but was competent under the statute at the time of attesting, the will is nevertheless valid;[3] the statute's object is satisfied when the execution takes places with the specified formalities; i.e. it prescribes a rule of substantive law, not of evidence. The consideration of these statutes, therefore, involving as they do the theory of the substantive law as to the validity of wills, would here be out of place.[4]

§ 583. Voir Dire; Mode of Ascertaining Disqualification: (1) Time of Interest that Disqualifies. The doctrine of disqualification by interest is now of little practical consequence. It is applicable solely, and that only in a modified degree, to the statutory class of persons disqualified as survivors to testify against an opponent deceased or incapable, and even then in some only of the jurisdictions (ante, § 578). So far as the details of the old rule are concerned, by which are determined the time when the disqualifying interest is to exist and the mode in which its existence is to be ascertained, it will therefore suffice, for to-day's purpose, to call attention to the principles already examined (ante, §§ 483–487) for testimonial qualifications in general, and to set forth summarily their application to the present subject by approved passages of exposition from the period when the rules of interest were in full force. And, first, of the

(1) Time of Interest that Disqualifies. Ordinarily, the time when the wit-

[1] This was amply established in an early period of the statute's application, in luminous and classical opinions: 1746, Wyndham v. Chetwynd, 1 Burr. 425; 1765, Doe v. Hindson (Eng.), 1 Day 41, note; 1845, Taylor v. Taylor 1 Rich. L. 531, 534.

[2] Sometimes, as in Arizona, this is done making a real rule of evidence, as by requiring corroboration: post, § 2066.

[3] 1865, Sparhawk v. Sparhawk, 10 All. 155.

[4] The statutes affecting the subject may be found by consulting the citations post, §§ 1290, 1310, 2049–2051. Consult the following opinion: 1903, O'Connell v. Dow, 182 Mass. 541, 66 N. E. 788.

ness is called upon to testify is the time when his qualification must exist. But, in order to avoid the abuse of the rule against interested witnesses, exceptions to that principle were here recognized:

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 418: "It has been laid down in general terms, that where one person becomes entitled to the testimony of another, the latter shall not be rendered incompetent to testify, by reason of any interest subsequently acquired in the event of the suit.[1] But though the doctrine is not now universally admitted to that extent, yet it is well settled and agreed, that in all cases where the interest has been subsequently created by the fraudulent act of the adverse party, for the purpose of taking off his testimony, or by any act of mere wantonness, and aside from the ordinary course of business, on the part of the witness, he is not thereby rendered incompetent. And where the person was the original witness of the transaction or agreement between the parties, in whose testimony they both had a common interest, it seems also agreed, that it shall not be in the power either of the witness, or of one of the parties, to deprive the other of his testimony, by reason of any interest subsequently acquired, even though it were acquired without any such intention on the part of the witness, or of the party.[2] . . . If the subsequent interest has been created by the agency of the party producing the witness, he is disqualified; the party having no right to complain of his own act."[3]

§ 584. Same: (2) Burden of Proving Disqualification. The burden of proving disqualification by interest is upon the party objecting to the witness. This was never doubted.[1] Although the state of the record might of itself serve to show the interest, still, so far as anything whatever needed to be done to make the interest apparent, it must be done by the objector.

§ 585. Same: (3) Mode of Proving Disqualification. So far as a mere reference to the record of the cause does not suffice, the objector finds two sources of evidence available, first, evidence of the ordinary sort (from other persons), and secondly, the witness' own answers, either on his general examination or on a special preliminary examination (voir dire) had for the purpose:

1746, L. C. Hardwicke, in Lord Lovat's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 585, 597, 730: "The party objecting may either put it to the oath of the witness produced or call witnesses to prove it. If he puts it to the oath of the witness produced, then he is concluded as to the point of competency by the answer he gives, unless the other side consents to waive that."

1801, Mr. Peake, Evidence, 186: "When a witness was liable to any objection on account of interest, etc., the old rule was to examine upon the voire dire as to his situation or call other witnesses to prove the fact which rendered him incompetent. The party against whom he was produced had his election which of these modes he would pursue; but he could not adopt both; and if the witness denied his interest, no other evidence could afterwards be produced to prove it, for the purpose of rendering him incompetent."

[1] "See Bent v. Baker, 3 T. R. 27, per Ld. Kenyon, and Ashhurst, J.; Barlow v. Vowell, Skin. 586, per Ld. Holt; Cowp. 736; Jackson v. Rumsey, 3 Johns. Cas. 234, 237."

For a deposition, the time of taking it is the material time, and subsequent interest acquired before trial does not exclude: 1862, Cameron v. Cameron, 15 Wis. 1, 5 (subsequent marriage to a party). Compare the cases cited post, § 1409 (deponent disqualified by interest).

[2] "Forrester v. Pigou, 3 Camph. 381; 1 Stark. Evid. 118; Long v. Bailie, 4 S. & R. 222; 14 Pick. 47; Phelps v. Riley, 3 Conn. 266, 272; R. v. Fox, 1 Stra. 652."

[3] "Hovill v. Stephenson, 5 Bing. 493."

[1] 1843, Densler v. Edwards, 5 Ala. 34 (citing cases); 1886, Hill v. Helton, 80 id. 532, 1 So. 340.

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, §§ 424, 423: "A witness is said to i examined upon the voir dire, when he is sworn and examined as to the fact whether he not a party interested in the cause.[1] And though this term was formerly and mo strictly applied only to the case where the witness was sworn to make true answers such questions as the Court might put to him, and before he was sworn in chief, yet it now extended to the preliminary examination to his interest, whatever may have be the form of the oath under which the inquiry is made. . . . The mode of proving the i terest of a witness is either by his own examination, or by evidence aliunde. But wheth the election of one of these modes will preclude the party from afterwards resorting to t other, is not clearly settled by the authorities. If the evidence offered aliunde to pro the interest is rejected, as inadmissible, the witness may then be examined on the v dire.[2] And if the witness on the voir dire states that he does not know, or leaves doubtful whether he is interested or not, his interest may be shown by other evidence It has also been held, that a resort to one of these modes, to prove the interest of the wi ness on one ground, does not preclude a resort to the other mode, to prove the interest another ground.[4] And where the objection to the competency of the witness is founde upon the evidence already adduced by the party offering him, this has been adjudged n to be such an election of the mode of proof, as to preclude the objector from the right examine the witness on the voir dire.[5] But, subject to these modifications, the rule reco nized and adopted by the general current of authorities is, that where the objecting par has undertaken to prove the interest of the witness, by interrogating him upon the v dire, he shall not, upon failure of that mode, resort to the other to prove facts, the exis ence of which was known when the witness was interrogated.[6] The party, appealing the conscience of the witness, offers him to the Court as a credible witness; and it is co trary to the spirit of the law of evidence, to permit him afterwards to say, that the witn is not worthy to be believed. It would also violate another rule, by its tendency to rai collateral issues.[7] Nor is it deemed reasonable to permit a party to sport with the co science of a witness, when he has other proof of his interest. But if evidence of h interest has been given aliunde, it is not proper to examine the witness, in order to explai it away."[8]

[1] "Termes de la Ley, Verb. Voyer dire. And see Jacobs v. Laybourn, 11 M. & W. 685, where the nature and use of an examination upon the voir dire are stated and explained by Ld. Abinger, C. B."

[2] "Main v. Newson, Anthon's Cas. 13. But a witness cannot be excluded by proof of his own admission that he was interested in the suit: Bates v. Ryland, 6 Alabama R. 668; Pierce v. Chase, 8 Mass. 487, 488; Commonwealth v. Waite, 5 Mass. 261; George v. Stubbs, 13 Shepl. 243."

[3] "Shannon v. The Commonwealth, 8 S. & R. 444; Galbraith v. Galbraith, 6 Watts 112; Bank of Columbia v. Magruder, 6 Har. & J. 172." The Court may hear additional evidence; 1903, White Memorial Home v. Haeg, — Ill. —, 68 N. E. 568.

[4] "Stebbins v. Sackett, 5 Conn. 258."

[5] "Bridge v. Wellington, 1 Mass. 221, 222."

[6] "In the old books, including the earlier editions of Mr. Starkie's and Mr. Phillips's Treatises on Evidence, the rule is clearly laid down, that after an examination upon the voir dire, no other mode of proof can in any case be resorted to; excepting only the case, where the interest was developed in the course of trial of the issue. But in the last editions of those works it is said, that 'if the witness discharge himself on the voir dire, the party who objects, may still support his objection by evidence but no authority is cited for the position. Stark. Evid. 124; Phil. & Am. on Evid. 149 1 Phil. Evid. 154. Mr. Starkie had previousl added these words — 'as part of his own case (see 2 Stark. Evid. p. 756, 1st ed.); and wit this qualification the remark is supported b authority, and is correct in principle. Th American Courts have followed the old Englis rule, as stated in the text. Butler v. Butler, Day R. 214; Stebbins v. Sackett, 5 Conn. 25 261; Chance v. Hine, 6 Conn. 231; Welden Buck, Anthon's Cas. 9; Chatfield v. Lathrop 6 Pick. 418; Evans v. Eaton, 1 Peters C. C 322."

[7] "The question of competency is a collatera question; and the rule is, that when a witnes is asked a question upon a collateral point, hi answer is final, and cannot be contradicted that is, no collateral evidence is admissible fo that purpose. But if the evidence, subsequently given upon the matter in issue, should als prove the witness interested, his testimony ma well be stricken out, without violating an rule: Brockbank v. Anderson, 7 Man. & Gr 295, 313."

[8] "Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cowen 513; Evans Gray, 1 Martin N. S. 709"; 1902, Dowdy v. Watson, 115 Ga. 42, 41 S. E. 266.

For the rule that the original of a documen

§ 586. Same: (4) Time of Making Objection. The general principle (ante, §§ 18, 486) is that an opponent must object at the time of the offering of the witness, and that if he allows this time to go by, though aware of the ground for objection, he should be treated as waiving the objection. This principle, as applied to interested witnesses, seems to have been substantially repudiated in modern times in England, so that no limitation of time remains for the objection, so long at least as the witness is still on the stand. But the orthodox principle was preserved by the American Courts:

1801, Mr. Peake, Evidence, 186: "[The old rule was that] if he appeared to be incompetent, either by his own examination on the voire dire or by other evidence, the objection was immediately made; for if not taken before he was sworn in chief, it was considered as too late after he had been examined by the party calling him and cross-examined by the other side. But the modern practice is to swear the witness in chief in the first instance, and if at any time during the trial it be discovered that he is in a situation which renders him incompetent, it is then time to take the objection."

1843, L. C. B. Abinger, in Jacobs v. Layborn, 11 M. & W. 685, 692: "A counsel who knows of an objection to the competency of a witness may very fairly say, 'I will lie by, and see whether he will speak the truth; if he does not, I will exclude his evidence.' I see no hardship or injustice at all in that course. . . . In other words, an examination on the voir dire may be instituted at any period of the examination."

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 421. "In regard to the time of taking the objection to the competency of a witness on the ground of interest, it is obvious that, from the preliminary nature of the objection, it ought in general to be taken before the witness is examined in chief. If the party is aware of the existence of the interest, he will not be permitted to examine the witness, and afterwards to object to his competency, if he should dislike his testimony. He has his election, to admit an interested person to testify against him, or not; but in this, as in all other cases, the election must be made as soon as the opportunity to make it is presented; and, failing to make it at that time, he is presumed to have waived it forever.[1] But he is not prevented from taking the objection at any time during the trial, provided it is taken as soon as the interest is discovered.[2] Thus, if discovered during the examination in chief by the plaintiff, it is not too late for the defendant to take the objection.[3] But if it is not discovered until after the trial is concluded, a new trial will not, for that cause alone, be granted;[4] unless the interest was known and concealed by the party producing the witness.[5] The rule on this subject, in criminal and civil cases, is the same.[6] Formerly, it was deemed necessary to take the objection to the competency of a witness on the voir dire; and if once sworn in chief, he could not afterwards be objected to, on the ground of interest. But the strictness of this rule is relaxed; and the objection is now usually taken after he is sworn in chief, but previous to his direct examination. It is in the discretion of the Judge to pershowing interest need not be produced on the voir dire, see post, § 1258.

[1] "Donelson v. Taylor, 8 Pick. 390, 392; Belcher v. Magnay, 1 New Pr. Cas. 110"; but see Jacobs v. Laybourn, supra, for the modern English rule contra. For modern American applications of the rule, see the following: 1863 Leslie v. Sims, 39 Ala. 161; 1882, Binford v. Dement, 72 id. 491; 1903, Slattery v. Slattery, — Ia. —, 95 N. W. 201; 1898, State v. Downs, 50 La. An. 694, 23 So. 456; 1903, Summerlin v. R. Co., — N. C. —, 45 S. E. 898; 1892, Benson v. U. S., 146 U. S. 325, 332; 1895, Pillow v. Impr. Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. 32; 1897, Spence v. Repass, 94 id. 716, 27 S. E. 583.

[2] "Stone v. Blackburn, 1 Esp. 37; 1 Stark. Evid. 124; Shurtleff v. Willard, 19 Pick. 202. Where a party has been fully apprised of the grounds of a witness's incompetency by the opening speech of counsel, or the examination in chief of the witness, doubts have been entertained at nisi prius, whether an objection to the competency of a witness can be postponed: 1 Phil. Evid. 154, note (3)."

[3] "Jacobs v. Laybourn, 11 M. & W. 685. And see Yardley v. Arnold, 10 M. & W. 141; 6 Jur. 718."

[4] "Turner v. Pearte, 1 T. R. 717; Jackson v. Jackson, 5 Cowen 173."

[5] "Niles v. Brackett, 15 Mass. 378."

[6] "Commonwealth v. Green, 17 Mass. 538; Roscoe's Crim. Evid. 124."

mit the adverse party to cross-examine the witness, as to his interest, after he has bee examined in chief; but the usual course is not to allow questions to be asked upon th cross-examination, which properly belong only to an examination upon the voir dire. But if, notwithstanding every ineffectual endeavor to exclude the witness on the groun of incompetency, it afterwards should appear incidentally, in the course of the trial, tha the witness is interested, his testimony will be stricken out, and the Jury will be instructe wholly to disregard it.[8] The rule in Equity is the same as at Law;[9] and the principl applies with equal force to testimony given in a deposition in writing, and to an ora examination in Court. In either case, the better opinion seems to be, that if the objec tion is taken as soon as may be after the interest is discovered, it will be heard; but afte the party is in mora, it comes too late.[10] One reason for requiring the objection to b made thus early is, that the other party may have opportunity to remove it by a release which is always allowed to be done, when the objection is taken at any time before th examination is completed.[11] It is also to be noted as a rule, applicable to all objection to the reception of evidence, that the ground of objection must be distinctly stated at th time, or it will be held vague and nugatory."[12]

1877, Staples, J., in Hord v. Colbert, 28 Gratt. 49, 54: "The authorities leave no roo for doubt; they hold that if the party be aware of the existence of the interest, he wi not be permitted to examine the witness and afterwards to object to his incompetency i he should dislike his testimony."

§ 587. Same: (5) Judge, not Jury, to determine Disqualification. Th following passage has no doubt often served to influence judicial rulings:

1812, Professor Greenleaf, Evidence, § 425: "The question of interest, though involv ing facts, is still a preliminary question, preceding, in its nature, the admission of th

[7] "Howell v. Lock, 2 Camp. 14; Odiorne v. Winkley, 2 Gallis. 51; Perigal v. Nicholson, 1 Wightw. 64. The objection that the witness is the real plaintiff, ought to be taken on the voir dire: Dewdney v. Palmer, 4 M. & W. 664; 7 Dowl. 177, s. c."

[8] "Davis v. Barr, 9 S. & R. 137; Schillenger v. McCann, 6 Greenl. 364; Fisher v. Willard, 13 Mass. 379; Evans v. Eaton, 1 Peters C. C. 338, 4 Fod. 559; Butler v. Tufts, 1 Shepl. 302; Stout v. Wood, 1 Blackf. 71; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 11 G. & J. 388. The same rule seems applicable to all the instruments of evidence, whether oral or written: Scribner v. M'Laughlin, 1 Allen 379; and see Swift v. Dean, 6 Johns. 523, 536; Perigal v. Nicholson, Wightw. 63; Howell v. Lock, 2 Campb. 64; Needham v. Smith, 2 Vern. 464. In one case, however, where the examination of a witness was concluded, and he was dismissed from the box, but was afterwards recalled by the Judge, for the purpose of asking him a question, it was ruled by Gibbs, C. J., that it was then too late to object to his competency: Beeching v. Gower, 1 Holt's Cas. 313; and see Heely v. Barnes, 4 Denio 73. And in Chancery it is held, that where a witness has been cross-examined by a party, with full knowledge of an objection to his competency, the Court will not allow the objection to be taken at the hearing: Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 487."

[9] "Swift v. Dean, 6 Johns. 523, 538; Needham v. Smith, 2 Vern. 463; Vaughan v. Worrall, 2 Swanst. 400. In this case, Lord Eldon said, that no attention could be given to the evidence, though the interest were not discovered until the last question, after he has been 'cross-examined to the bone.' See Gresley on Evid. 234–236; Rogers v. Dibble, 3 Paige 238; Town v. Needham, id. 545, 552; Harrison v. Courtauld, 1 Russ. & M. 428; Moorhouse v. L Passou, G Cooper, Ch. Cas. 300; 19 Ves. 433 s. c. See also Jacobs v. Laybourn, 7 Jur. 562 11 M. & W. 685."

[10] "Donelson v. Taylor, 8 Pick. 390. Whe the testimony is by deposition, the objection, the interest is known, ought regularly to b taken in limine; and the cross-examinatio should be made de bene esse, under protest, with an express reservation of the right of objec tion at the trial; unless the interest of the wit ness is developed incidentally, in his testimon to the merits. But the practice on this poin admits of considerable latitude, in the discr tio of the Judge: United States v. One Case of Ia Pencils, 1 Paine 400, 15 Fed. 924; Tel...t Clark, 8 Pick. 51; Smith v. Sparrow, 11 Ju 126; The Mohawk Bank v. Atwater, 2 Paig 54; Ogle v. Pelaski, 1 Holt's Cas. 485: 2 Tidd Pr. 812. As to the mode of taking the objectio in Chancery, see 1 Hoffm. Chan. 489; Gass Stinson, 3 Sumn. 605."

[11] "Tallman v. Dutcher, 7 Wend. 180; Dot v. Wilson, 14 Johns. 378; Wake v. Lock, 5 C & P. 454."

[12] "Camden v. Doremus, 3 Howard 515, 530 Elwood v. Deifendorf, 5 Barb. S. C. R. 398 Carr v. Gale, Daveis, R. 337, 2 Fed. 434."

For depositions, see the additional cases cite under the general principle ante, § 18.

testimony to the Jury. It is therefore to be determined by the Court alone, it being the province of the Judge, and not of the Jury, in the first instance, to pass upon its sufficiency.[1] . . . In determining the question of interest, where the evidence is derived aliunde, and it depends upon the decision of intricate questions of fact, the Judge may, in his discretion, take the opinion of the Jury upon them. And if a witness, being examined on the voir dire, testifies to facts tending to prove that he is not interested, and is thereupon admitted to testify; after which opposing evidence is introduced, to the same facts, which are thus left in doubt, and the facts are material to the issue; the evidence must be weighed by the Jury, and if they thereupon believe the witness to be interested, they must lay his testimony out of the case."[2]

But it is necessary to point out that the doctrine of the last sentence in this passage is unsound. When the judge has ruled upon admissibility, all question of a rule of law is at an end.[3] The jury cannot again apply the rule of admissibility. If they reject a witness' testimony, it is not because they find him to be ineligible by the technical rules of interest, but merely because on the whole they do not believe him. The fallacy of the above doctrine has been elsewhere sufficiently considered in other applications (ante, §§ 487, 497; post, §§ 861, 1451, 2550).

[1] "Harris v. Wilson, 7 Wend. 57."

[2] "Walker v. Sawyer, 13 N. H. 191"; 1902, Dowdy v. Watson, 115 Ga. 42, 41 S. E. 266 (the trial judge on objection, should determine the facts by a preliminary examination, though he may in his discretion submit the question to the jury).

[3] 1843, L. C. B. Abinger, in Jacobs v. Layborn, 11 M. & W. 685, 691 ("When a man is examined on the voir dire, the examination is only to satisfy the conscience of the judge, the jury having nothing to do with it").

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC III (continued): EMOTIONAL CAPACITY.

SUB-TOPIC B: MARITAL RELATIONSHIP AS A TESTIMONIAL DISQUALIFICATION.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1. In general.

§ 600. History of the Rule; No other Family Relationship disqualifies. The history of the disqualification by marital relationship can better be examined at the same time with the privilege based on the same relationship (post, § 2227). It suffices to notice here that the disqualification first comes into notice about or just before the recognition of interest in general as a disqualification, — that is, the time of Sir Edward Coke's First Institute, 1628. It is easy to see that whatever considerations were then moving to create the one disqualification might coöperate to cause the other, — although no directly common origin or association appears in the precedents. But the singularity is that other grounds of disqualification which would naturally be linked with the present one, and were recognized as unquestionably united with it in the two other legal systems of the time, — the Roman civil and the ecclesiastical law[1] —, failed wholly of recognition in any respect in our own law, namely, the ground of filial or paternal relationship and of domestic dependency. That servant and master were admissible for each other was always the law.[2] That father and son, as well as other family relations, were admissible for each other was never doubtful, though the objection was in the beginning frequently raised, upon the analogy (probably) of the civil and the ecclesiastical rules.[3] This anomaly is difficult to explain. It may perhaps be attributable to nothing more than the scholastic reasoning, peculiar to the times, which sufficed for Coke's mind, namely, the legal identity of the two spouses (post, § 601). This theory, which of course did not apply to the parental relationship, assimilated the wife to the husband, and thus made her share the disqualification which he as a party (ante, § 575) already was recognized as suffering.

[1] For these rules, see the quotations ante, § 575, n. They obtained in Louisiana, as a follower of the civil law, under the original code of that State (§ 2260); but have since been abolished; Rev. Civ. C. § 2282, Rev. L. 1897, § 1191.

[2] Citations ante, § 575.

§ 601. Policy of the Rule. In considering the reasons upon which the rule rests and the policy of altering it, the distinction must be kept in mind between the incapacity of the one spouse to testify for the other and the privilege not to testify against the other. This distinction (more amply examined post, § 2228) warns us that we are here considering only the reasons for disqualifying them when voluntarily coming forward in favor of each other, — reasons quite independent of those affecting the privilege of not being compellable or allowable to testify against each other.

(1) The earliest reason to be met is a piece of metaphysical fiction, and calls for no attempt to answer it:

1628, Sir Edward Coke, Commentary upon Littleton, 6 b: "It hath been resolved by the justices that a wife cannot be produced either for or against her husband, quia sunt duæ animæ in carne una."

(2) A second reason, later advanced, was the marital identity of interest, i. e. the same reason that sufficed for interested persons in general:

Ante 1726, Chief Baron Gilbert, Evidence, 133: "The second corollary to this general rule [of exclusion from interest] is that husband and wife cannot be admitted to be witnesses for or against each other; for if they swear for the benefit of each other, they are not to be believed, because their interests are absolutely the same, and therefore they can gain no more credit when they attest for each other than when any man attests for himself."

This reason is a plausible one, and serves well enough for most situations at common law, where the wife's property interests in her husband's estate would place her equally under the disqualification of an interested person, and vice versa. But the theory fails when pushed to extremities; for the disqualification prevailed, by general acceptance, even where their property interests were wholly independent (post, § 603).

(3) There must be, then, some other or further reason; and this, naturally, is the supposed bias of affection, — that partisanship which may ordinarily be assumed from the very existence of the marital relation:

[3] 1630, Moor's Case, Hetley 137 ("Hutton said, there can be no exception to the witness who is cozen to the party, to hinder his evidence in our law; to which all agreed"); Ante 1635, Hudson, Treatise of the Star Chamber, pt. III, § 21, in Hargr. Collect. Jurid. 205 ("The son may be a witness for the father"); Ante 1726, Gilbert, Evidence, 133 ("But no other relation is excluded, because no other relation is absolutely the same as interest. But by the civil law, servants and children were excluded because the parents and masters had absolute power over them, and therefore under that law they swore with manifest interest to themselves"); 1727, Dalton, The Country Justice, 2d ed., c. 164; 1752, R. v. Oakhampton, 1 Wilson 332, Sayer 45, McNally, Evidence, 182 ("Mere relationship, how near soever the relation may be, does not go to the competency of a witness").

1854, Samuels, J., in Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 321, 323: "From the intimate relation between husband and wife, and from the strong bias of feeling towards each other, the law has provided that neither shall be a witness in regard to any subject in which the other is interested."

(4) But still a fourth reason — fantastic enough — has been advanced, analogous to that which has been advanced for the privilege (post, § 2228) and yet different in its origin, namely, the danger of the disturbance of marital peace which might occur if the wife, being available for the husband, should be expected by him to come forward and perjure herself:

1860, Sargent, J., in Kelley v. Proctor, 41 N. H. 139, 142: "We believe that the true reason why a wife should not be allowed to testify either for or against her husband at common law has always been a sort of compound reason, founded partly in interest, to be sure, and the identity of the persons, but partly also upon conditions of public policy. . . . We think that considerations of public policy — the fear of sowing dissensions between man and wife, and of occasioning perjury . . . — are equally satisfactory reasons why they should not be allowed to testify in each other's favor. It is to be feared that in some instances, if not in many, if it were understood that a wife could testify for her husband but not against him, where the husband has the misfortune to be litigious and the still greater misfortune to be unprincipled, that the wife would find herself called upon too often to choose between her duty to her God and the requirements of (not to say her duty to) her husband, — between violating the obligations of her oath and incurring the displeasure of him whom she has promised to love, honor, and obey."

(5) And, finally, since a wife, if called by her husband, must be subjected to a cross-examination which might call for truths unfavorable to his cause, the same danger (whatever it amounts to) here recurs again, with such added and similar dangers (from telling the truth against him) as the privilege (post, § 2228) is designed to forefend.

What, then, of these various reasons? Is there any soundness in them?

As to the first, no one has ever thought it worth either defending or answering. The second does not even adequately explain the law; but, so far as it does, it stands or falls by its prototypes, the reasons for disqualification by interest in general, which are now universally repudiated (ante, § 576). The third reason is nothing more than the second in another variety — i. e. the supposed danger of falsification by a witness subject to the bias of marital affection, instead of the bias of pecuniary interest; and it can hardly be contended that the danger in this form is different enough in degree to override the arguments applicable in opposition to the other form (ante, § 576). In short, the possibility of falsification by wife or husband is no more a reason for exclusion than the same possibility by a person pecuniarily interested; and the objectionable inconsistencies and irrational quibbles which disfigure the rule are as much apparent in the one form as in the other. The fourth argument, based on the ground of possible dissension, is open to the objections, first, that it is a mere apprehension, not worthy of consideration as appreciable; secondly, that it deprives honest causes of upright testimony for the sake of preventing dishonest causes from using false testimony; thirdly, that it attempts to distort the natural rules of testimony for the sake of preventing marital infelicities which either ought to be otherwise and more directly remedied, or else rest upon such deep-seated causes that it is useless to expect to remedy them by legal interference. In other words, where the husband of the supposed unprincipled sort exists, the attempt to regulate his daily domestic tyranny by the casual application of a rule of evidence is ridiculous; and, beyond this, to build up, for all families not so afflicted, a rule of universal deprivation having this abnormal type of masculine Borgia for its basis, is to go to fantastic extremes of caution. Finally, the possibility of adverse testimony on cross-examination is an objection which need not be entertained on behalf of one who has himself — by hypothesis — called his wife in his favor; he desires to use her testimony, and may be therefore supposed to accept the risk of unwelcome results on cross-examination. The law cannot properly refuse him the right to her testimony on account of a risk which he himself is willing to assume. Add to all this, that the rule is equally open to all those general objections which weigh against the rule of disqualification by interest (ante, § 576). In the following passages are expounded the chief of the foregoing objections, in varying phrase:

1852, Erle, J., in Stapleton v. Crofts, 18 Q. B. 367, 377: "If the question may be considered with reference to the interest of truth, it is clear the exclusion of essential information as a means for finding truth is absurd. It is not doubted that wives often possess essential information as to matters within the usual province of a wife, and as to those conducted by her as agent for her husband, and as to those which she happened to witness. If essential witnesses are excluded, there is the certain evil of deciding without knowledge, and there is the probable evil of shaking confidence in the law. . . . The idea that husbands would generally suborn their wives to perjury, and persecute them if they spoke truth, is to my mind unworthy of the time. There is no reason to suppose that wives, if admitted, would be worse treated in respect of their testimony than in respect of any other part of their conduct, or be more prone to untruth than any other class of witnesses; and if, by reason of the exclusion of the wife, the husband has to suffer an adverse judgment contrary to the truth, and [therefore to suffer] the consequent loss, he would dissent with much reason from the zealous declarations that such a mean for protecting the peace of his family and the sanctity of his marriage was better than administering the law according to truth."

1853, English Common Law Practice Commission, Second Report, 11: "The highly satisfactory result of these more enlarged views [represented by the abolition of disqualification by interest in general] induces us to consider whether an exception preserved by the late statute, namely, the exclusion of husband and wife as witnesses for or against each other, may not be abolished. . . . The incompetency of husband and wife to be witnesses for one another is said to rest on three grounds: 1st, Identity of interest; 2d, the consequent danger of perjury; 3d, the policy of the law, which, as it is said, 'deems it necessary to guard the security and confidence of private life, even at the risk of an occasional failure of justice,' and which rejects such evidence, because its admission would lead to domestic disunion and unhappiness. The first two grounds are manifestly no longer tenable, since the parties to suits have been themselves made competent to give evidence. It remains to be considered how far the third ground should be allowed to exclude testimony which may be essential to justice. In the first place, it seems clear that no disturbance of domestic happiness need be apprehended from permitting husband and wife to call one another as witnesses. The evidence may in many cases be indispensable. A wife often keeps her husband's books, conducts his business in his absence, pays or receives money for him. Even in matters in which she may take a less active part, her testimony may be the only one to prove facts essential to the vindication of her husband's rights, or it may be valuable as confirmatory of the evidence of other witnesses: so, the testimony of the husband may be material to the wife in matters relating to her separate estate, to the proof of her coverture, if sued as a feme sole, and the like. It seems difficult to assign any reason why the law should be more tender of the domestic happiness of married persons than they are themselves disposed to be; the only danger that can be suggested is, that evidence might be extracted from the witness, by the adverse party, prejudicial to the interest of the married plaintiff or defendant, and that some bitterness of feeling might arise in consequence; but of the probability of such a result the married couple are themselves the best judges. Should any fact be thus brought to light which would otherwise have remained unproved, the interests of truth will be thereby promoted, and any transient interruption of conjugal harmony from such a circumstance, or from disappointment occasioned by the evidence falling short of what was expected, would be a trifling evil compared to the mischief which must result from the exclusion of testimony essential to the ends of justice and truth."[4]

§ 602. Same: Statutory Alterations. The validity of this misguided rule of the common law could not long have remained unquestioned, as soon as any discussion was raised regarding the propriety of the general rules for competency of witnesses. In England, Bentham launched against the rule his well-merited invectives, and in this country they were presented in the treatises of Livingston and of Appleton. The first step was taken in England as early as 1846, when husband and wife were made admissible in the County Courts.[1] Then in 1853, after parties and interested persons had been made competent,[2] husbands and wives were made admissible in civil cases, except for proceedings founded on adultery;[3] this exception in civil cases was removed in 1869;[4] and finally, the incompetency in criminal cases was abolished in 1898.[5] In the United States, the progress has been, in most jurisdictions, equally slow, and in some even slower. Furthermore, it has been made in very similar stages, — that is, the marital disqualification has usually not been recognized as outgrown until after the disqualification of parties and interested persons had been removed, and the recognition has been given force in civil cases earlier than in criminal cases. These distinctions seem to be somewhere obscurely rooted in the subject, so that the instant apprehension of the unsoundness of all of these limitations has seldom been found. Some jurisdictions, however, have served as notable exceptions, and in them no vestige of these outworn rules now remains. In possibly less than a third of the jurisdictions this is substantially the case. In more than another third, the marital disqualification is still preserved, with large classes of statutory exceptions; and in the remainder, the common law rule is still sanctioned by statute.[6]

[4] The arguments are more fully presented in the following works: 1828, Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, book IX, pt. IV, ch. V, § 4 (Works, Bowring's ed., vol. VII, p. 480); Circa 1823, Livingston, Introductory Report to the Code of Evidence (Works, ed. 1872, I, 452 ff.); 1860, Appleton, Evidence, c. IX.

[1] St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95.

[2] The statute of 1851, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, §§ 2, 3, had been held not to remove by implication the marital incompetency.

[3] St. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, § 1.

[4] St. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, § 3.

[5] St. 61 & 62 Vict. c. 36, § 1. All these statutes are set forth ante, § 488.

[6] These statutes are set out ante, § 488.

It is therefore necessary to consider, under each part of the subject, first, the scope of the rule at common law and, secondly, the effect of statutory alterations.

§ 603. Theory of the Common-Law Rule; Relationship, not Property Interest, excludes. The fundamental theory of the common-law rule was that the relationship, not the pecuniary interest, caused the disqualification; hence, the rule applied even where the witness offered had no interest in the estate of the spouse who was a party to the suit:

1855, Lee, J., in William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372, 383: "Thomas J. Powell is offered as a witness [for his wife's estate] in support of the settlement made by him upon his wife, [which is now sought to be set aside as void against creditors, the husband being insolvent]. For this purpose he was clearly incompetent. . . . That he was not himself personally interested because he was bound for the college debt in any case, or that his interest was the same either way, does not vary the case. The authorities cited show that his incompetency does not rest upon the narrow ground of a personal and direct interest, but upon other and different principles. Indeed, the incompetency has been maintained even where the husband's interest was the other way. Thus, in an action by the trustee for a wife against the sheriff for taking goods which were her separate property, under an execution against the husband, the husband was held to be an incompetent witness for the plaintiff (the wife being regarded as the real plaintiff), although he had an interest on the other side, in having his debt satisfied by the levy of the execution."

This theory was maintained, without dissent, whenever occasion arose.[1] Nevertheless, it was not always consistently carried out to its complete extent. Furthermore, it was applied, not in spirit, but only in technical strictness, i. e. the fact of bias was not looked for anew in each case and the rule applied wherever such bias was to be presumed; but the principle, though placed upon the above ground, was once for all reduced to a rule, framed for the specific and limited case of a wife or husband testifying for the other's interest, and was then enforced on those technical lines. Thus it often admitted persons in situations where such a bias would in fact be equally likely, and excluded them in situations where such a bias would be by no means likely. These peculiarities may be further noticed in dealing with the details.

The classes of questions that arise fall naturally under four heads: Who is excluded as being a spouse? On whose behalf is a spouse excluded?

[1] 1792, Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 T. R. 678 (action for value of goods, seized on execution against L., by executrix of trustee under a marriage-settlement on L.'s wife; L. not admitted for the plaintiff, although he would be liable if his wife's goods were not); 1830, Terry v. Belcher, 1 Bail. 568, 571 ("in law they are identical, notwithstanding any contract that may exist between them"); 1844, Osborn v. Black, Speers Eq. 431, 435; 1860, McDuffie v. Greenway, 24 Tex. 625, 629; 1855, William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372, 382 (see quotation supra); 1873, Murphy v. Carter, 23 id. 477, 488; 1881, Fink v. Deany, 75 Va. 663, 669; 1886, Mills v. Spencer, 81 id. 751, 755. In particular, the husband was disqualified even in suits concerning the wife's separate estate: 1838, Trenton B. Co. v. Woodruff, 2 N. J. Eq. 117, 131; 1835, Warner v. Dyett, 2 Edw. Ch. 497; 1840, Hosack v. Rogers, 8 Paige 229, 242; 1845, Burrell v. Bull, 3 Sandf. Ch. 15, 24. The rule has been applied in other than the ordinary tribunals: 1898, Seaton v. Kendall, 171 Ill. 410, 49 N. E. 561 (wife incompetent, in arbitration proceedings between husband and third person).

What exceptions exist, at common law or by statute? How far have statutes abolished the general rule?

§ 604. Waiver; Sundry Principles discriminated. (1) The doctrine of waiver applies exclusively to Privilege (post, § 2242); a disability cannot be waived. One spouse, therefore, cannot by any attempted waiver be enabled to call for the favoring testimony of the other.[1]

(2) The question of pleading in chancery, whether the answer of wife or husband can be used for the other as co-party, rests on other principles than the present rule of evidence.[2]

(3) The use of hearsay statements of a wife or husband, admissible under recognized exceptions to the Hearsay rule, seems never to have been regarded as limited by the present disqualification.[3]

(4) Whether one may testify to his own marriage involves usually no other question than perhaps the interest-disqualification, and, when that prevailed, was answered in the affirmative.[4]

2. Who is excluded as being a Spouse?[1]

§ 605. Mistress; Bigamous Marriage. The rule excluded such a person only as fulfilled the technical definition of lawful husband or wife. No doubt this was an absurd limitation; because, on the orthodox theory of marital bias (ante, § 603), the existence or absence of the bias would probably not depend on the technical validity of the relation. Nevertheless, it is needless to complain of a minor absurdity in a rule which had its very foundation upon a fallacious notion of testimonial principles.

It followed that a mistress or concubine, being not a legal wife, was admissible.[2] It followed also that, if there had been a bigamy, the first spouse

[1] There cannot be the slightest doubt upon principle, but the few rulings are not satisfactory, partly owing to the usual statutory regulation, in the same section (e. g. Cal. C. C. P. § 1881) of both the disqualification and the privilege, the language of the one being in truth inappropriate for the other: 1852, Barbat v. Allen, 7 Exch. 609 (waiver not allowed, because the consent was not given till after the judge's ruling of exclusion; whether it could have sufficed, if made before, was the subject of difference of opinion); 1898, Falk v. Witham, 120 Cal. 479, 52 Pac. 707 (incapacity of the other spouse to consent does not allow an examination); 1862, Russ v. Steamboat War Eagle, 14 Ia. 363, 375 (waiver allowable under a statute expressly sanctioning a waiver; the rule being applicable in practice to the case of a husband objecting to his co-party calling the wife); 1865, Blake v. Graves, 18 id. 312, 318 (same; by a majority); 1901, Murphy v. Ganey, 23 Utah 633, 66 Pac. 190 (an implied consent suffices, under Rev. St. § 3412). Supposing, however, that by statute the disqualification is removed, the question may arise whether the spouse has waived the right to call the other: 1890, Wolford v. Farnham, 44 Minn. 159, 46 N. W. 295 (wife's objection to husband's being called against her is not a waiver preventing her from calling him later in her behalf).

[2] See Frank v. Lilienfeld, 1880, 33 Gratt. 377, 380.

[3] Examples may be found post, in §§ 1718, 1730 (wife's declarations of affection, etc.), 1747, 1772 ff.

[4] 1736, Stapleton v. Stapleton, Lee temp. Hardwicke 277. For cases where the present principle is genuinely involved, see post, § 607.

[1] The word "spouse" will here be employed, to avoid the cumbrousness, not to say confusion, which the use of "husband and wife" involves. We need such a single word for purposes of scientific legal discussion. It exists in the Continental law and in our own Louisiana law.

[2] 1889, R. v. Nan-e-quis-a-ka, 1 N. W. Terr. 211 (an Indian marriage, held sufficient on the facts); 1867, Flanagin v. State, 25 Ark. 92; 1876, Rickerstricker v. State, 31 id. 207; 1871, Hill v. State, 41 Ga. 484, 496, 503; 1811, Meunier v. Conet, 2 Mart. La. 56; 1854, Johnson v. Melville, 9 La. An. 308, semble; 1870, Dennis v. Crittenden, 42 N. Y. 542, 546; 1872, Birdsall v. Patterson, 51 id. 43, 47.

alone, being the only lawful one, was inadmissible;[3] though here some uncertainty existed as to the extent to which the proof of the first marriage must go in order to qualify the later spouse or disqualify the prior one.[4]

3. On whose behalf is a Spouse excluded?

§ 606. General Principle. Husband or wife is excluded from testifying for the other. What is it, then, to testify for the other? Is it merely to speak favorably for the other in any sense, — for example, by speaking to the other's credit as a witness, or by corroborating his testimony, or by contributing any fact whatever which palpably redounds to the advantage of the other in any respect whatever? If the theory of marital bias (ante, § 603) were to be carried out in the fullest intent, such would be the effect of the principle; for the supposed marital bias would affect any and every topic of testimony. But that theory is not logically carried out. It is limited (as already noted in § 603) by a strictly technical definition of advantage or profit. To speak for another is understood in the narrow sense of speaking for his legal interest in the cause in hand. No other advantage or profit or credit which may be favored by the testimony is regarded as requiring this prohibition. The other person must have an interest in the event of the cause, in order that the sponse's testimony be inadmissible. This limitation was formed in analogy to the general rule disqualifying interested persons (ante, § 576), and it was convenient enough as a test; although a little reflection shows that the adoption of it in the present connection was by no means a necessary logical consequence. In other words, the common law made two distinct assumptions, first, that a specific kind and quantity of interest would probably induce a person to falsify, and, secondly, that precisely the same kind and quantity of interest, no more and no less, must be at stake for that person in order that the person's husband or wife should probably be induced to falsify.

The principle finds application in several aspects:

§ 607. Interest in the Cause; Nominal Party. On the one hand, the fact that the one spouse is interested in the event of the cause, even though not as a party to the record, serves to exclude the testimony of the other spouse.[1]

[3] 1702, Broughton v. Harpur, 2 Ld. Raym. 752 (ejectment; first wife not admitted for defendant to prove a marriage prior to that under which the plaintiff claimed); 1842, State v. Patterson, 2 Ired. 346, 354 (second wife admitted).

[4] 1898, Lowery v. People, 172 Ill. 466, 50 N. E. 165 (if a first marriage is in controversy, a second alleged wife is incompetent); 1899, Clark v. People, 178 id. 37, 52 N. E. 857 (forgery; alleged second wife admissible, on a showing that the first wife was living and undivorced at the time of the second marriage). On these points, consult also the precedents post, § 2230, under Privilege, where the same question arises and the rulings are more numerous.

[1] In the following cases this rule was applied to exclude the witness: 1701, Tiley v. Cowling, 1 Ld. Raym. 744 (carrier's action for trover against person wrongfully taking goods consigned; consignor's wife, not admitted for plaintiff, because the judgment and testimony could be used by the consignor in suing the carrier); 1826, Cornish v. Pugh, 8 Dowl. & R. 65 (wife of defendant's bail, excluded); 1824, Corse v. Patterson, 6 H. & J. 153 (wife not admitted for husband's mortgagee sued in replevin by another person); 1824, Griffin v. Brown, 2 Pick. 303, 308 (action against the sheriff for a debtor's escape; debtor's wife not admitted for the defendant to prove the debtor's insolvency, because the judgment would be conclusive as to damages in the sheriff's action against the debtor); 1866, Young v. Gilman, 46 N. H. 484, 486; 1829, Leggett v. Boyd, 3 Wend. 376 (wife of a special bail, excluded); 1814, Snyder v. Snyder, 6 Binn. 483, 487, 492 (against plaintiff heirs, defendant claimed title by administrator's sale; the husband of one who would obtain dower if the sale was set aside, not admitted for plaintiff; but this was put partly on the ground that the verdict would be used in the probate court in distribution proceedings; Yates, J., diss., because her interest was contingent only); 1819, McComb v. Dillo, 5 S. & R. 305, 307 (wife excluded, under analogous circumstances); 1868, Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281, 288 (administrator's suit; husband of daughter of intestate, not admitted for plaintiff, her interest not being contingent); 1871, Carpenter v. Moore, 43 Vt. 392 (wife of heir is inadmissible in a will contest); 1874, Wheeler v. Wheeler's Estate, 47 id. 637, 646 (an heir in a suit to charge an advancement is a party, though not of record); 1882, Labaree v. Wood, 54 id. 452 (test is whether the judgment can be used for or against the husband; if so, his wife is incompetent; here, the wife of a grantor was excluded in a suit between his creditor and a grantee); 1873, Murphy v. Carter, 23 Gratt. 477, 488; 1878, Warwick v. Warwick, 31 id. 70, 76; 1886, Lindsay v. McCormick, 82 Va. 479, 481, 5 S. E. 534.

On the other hand, the fact of the one spouse being a nominal party to the record, without real interest in the issue, does not exclude the other spouse.[2]

§ 608. Same: Effect of Statutes qualifying Parties and Interested Persons. Suppose, now, that by a statute, which does not expressly affect the disqualification of the spouse offered as a witness,[1] the disqualification of parties and interested persons is abolished; what test remains for determining the matters examined in the foregoing section? The test whether one was attempting to testify for the other was there seen to be whether the other was legally interested in the cause and thus himself was disqualified; since that interest no longer disqualifies the other, and its definition for that purpose is no longer important, shall it nevertheless remain as the test for the present purpose? To preserve it would seem to be anomalous; and yet to invent any other would be hazardous. There is a singular dearth of authority; in one jurisdiction the old test of interest has been preserved — for example, a wife may not testify for a husband who is interested and yet is himself com-

In the following cases this rule was applied to admit the witness: 1670, R. v. Parris, 1 Sid. 431 (information against P. for obtaining a judgment against the wife of L. before her marriage, the execution having been extended upon the husband's estate; the Court set aside the judgment, "and principally on the wife's evidence, quod nota"; probably because the document on which the judgment was based was obtained from her in private at a tavern by P.); 1788, R. v. Claviger, 2 T. R. 263 (pauper settlement; to prove that M. was not J.'s wife, E. was offered as his first wife to prove the marriage; her interest in charging him with her support, held no objection; in effect discrediting R. v. Reading, 1734, Lee cas. temp. Hardw. 79, on this point; compare the rule as to wife's testimony to non-access, post, § 2063); 1870, Parsons v. People, 21 Mich. 509, 513 (adultery with S.; S. admissible for prosecution, though her husband was by statute the necessary complainant); 1830, Richardson v. Learned, 10 id. 261, 268 (trustee for wife's separate property suing for it; husband admitted for the plaintiff, his interest being contingent only); 1833, Coffin v. Jones, 13 id. 441, 445 (action against a deceased administrator's surety; administrator's wife admitted for defendant); 1860, State v. Borden, 6 R. I. 495 (assault and battery on the wife by a third person, the husband being liable for costs as prosecutor; wife admissible for the prosecution); 1857, Rutland & B. R. Co. v. Lincoln, 29 Vt. 206, 209 (admitting the wife of a husband merely liable on a bond for costs); 1806, Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. 154, 157, 164, 171, 172 (wife admissible where her husband, though interested, is not a party nor bound by the result; two judges dissenting).

[2] The principle was applied in the following cases: 1738, Cotton v. Luttrell, 1 Atk. 451 (husband of a wife made party-defendant without being interested in the event, admitted for her co-parties); 1840, Young v. Richards, 2 Curt. Eccl. 371, 374 (wife of an executor, excluded, in probating a will); 1884 Ross v. Ross, Can. Sup., Cassels' Dig. 1893, p. 306 (husband of executrix, in a suit for her removal, not admitted); 1888, Beale v. Brown, 17 D. C. 574, 576 (wife admitted to testify for herself where the husband was joined as a formal party only); 1872, Ruth v. Ford, 9 Kan. 17, 29); 1897, Collins v. Wilson, — Ky. —, 39 S. W. 33 (wife admitted where the husband was only next friend suing for a child); 1861, Donnelly v. Smith, 7 R. I. 12 (husband and wife suing for wages earned by her before marriage; wife not admitted); 1864, Bonet v. Stowell, 37 Vt. 258 (wife of a prochein ami, admitted).

[1] This aspect of these statutes is discussed post, § 619.

petent by statute;[2] in another jurisdiction, the husband must be a party, in order that the wife may be disqualified.[3] On one point, however, all are properly agreed, namely, that so far as interest has been preserved as a disqualification by statute, i. e. in the case of a survivor against a decedent (ante, § 578), there the survivor's spouse is of course disqualified, in direct obedience to the common-law analogy.[4]

§ 609. Co-defendants. Where a person is co-defendant and desires to call for himself the spouse of another defendant, the question arises whether the sponse can be said to be testifying for the other defendant. The latter is a party to the record, and thus ordinarily any testimony given in the cause would be testimony for him. Nevertheless, ways were found at common law for withdrawing him from the record or otherwise removing his actual interest in the issue; and a special group of rules were developed for this situation, where one defendant was desired to be called for a co-defendant. On the general prineiple already examined (ante, § 606), whatever rule defined the other defendant's interest as a disqualifying one would also define the spouse's disqualificaton. The rules for a co-defendant called on behalf of a defendant have been already examined in detail (ante, § 580); it is therefore enough here to note that those rules served equally to determine the admissibility of the spouse.[1]

[2] 1890, Craig v. Miller, 133 Ill. 300, 307, 24 N. E. 431; repudiating the following case: 1882, Lincoln Ave. & N. C. G. R. Co. v. Madaus, 102 id. 417, 419.

[3] 1877, Higbee v. McMillan, 18 Kan. 133.

[4] 1886, Treleaven v. Dixon, 119 Ill. 548, 553, 9 N. E. 189 (explaining prior cases); 1888, Way v. Harriman, 126 id. 132, 137; 1889, Shaw v. Schoonover, 130 id. 448, 455; 1894, Bevelot v. Lestrade, 153 id. 625, 631, 38 N. E. 1056; 1895, Pyle v. Pyle, 158 id. 289, 41 N. E. 999; 1895, Stodder v. Hoffman, ib. 486, 41 N. E. 1082; 1889, Bitner v. Boone, 128 Pa. 567, 18 Atl. 404; 1900, Myers v. Litts, 195 id. 595, 46 Atl. 131; 1886, Kilgore v. Hanley, 27 W. Va. 451, 454; 1896, Valentine's Will, 93 Wis. 45, 67 N. W. 12.

These rulings would depend somewhat upon the terms of the survivor-statutes (ante, § 578); and for the reasons there stated, no attempt is here made to collect them fully.

[1] The rules were applied in the following cases; compare with them the precedents post, § 2236, under Privilege, as to calling the sponse against a co-defendant: 1739, R. v. Frederick, 2 Stra. 1095 (co-defendant's wife excluded, "it being a joint trespass and impossible to separate the cases of the two defendants in the account to be given of the transaction"); 1804, R. v. Locker, 5 Esp. 107 (conspiracy for procuring a ward to marry one of the defendants; the defendant-husband's wife, the ward, not admitted to exonerate the other defendants); 1826, R. v. Smith, Mood. Cr. C. 289 (burglary); 1830, R. v. Hood, ib. 281, 289 (assault); 1843, Hawkesworth v. Showler, 12 M. & W. 45 (joint trespass against S. and B.; the trespass by S. being clearly proved, S.'s wife was not allowed to exonerate B.; "where a person who is the defendant upon the record is entirely removed from it, whether by a judgment by default, or by a verdict pronounced in his favor, or by the jury not being charged with his interest at all at the time, in those cases, and in those only, his wife can be examined as a witness"); 1844, R. v. Bartlett, 1 Cox Cr. 105 (larceny; co-defendant's wife admitted, with hesitation, where "the defence of each is distinct"); 1847, R. v. Denslow, 2 id. 230 (horse-stealing; co-defendant's wife not admitted to prove alibi, because this would benefit the husband by impeaching the prosecutor); 1872, R. v. Thompson, 12 id. 202 (larceny; joint indictment and trial; wife of one excluded); 1895, Holley v. State, 105 Ala. 100, 17 So. 102; 1859, Collier v. State, 20 Ark. 36, 46; 1881, Casey v. State, 37 id. 67, 85; 1883, People v. Langtree, 64 Cal. 256, 30 Pac. 813; 1885, Trowbridge v. State, 74 Ga. 431, 434; 1898, Stephens v. State, 106 Ga. 116, 32 S. E. 13; 1898, Gillespie v. People, 176 Ill. 238, 52 N. E. 250 (co-defendants jointly tried; wife of one, incompetent, unless the grounds of defence are distinct); 1888, Arn v. Matthews, 39 Kan. 272, 18 Pac. 65 (defendant's wife not admitted for co-defendant where defence was joint); 1858, Thompson v. Com., 1 Metc. Ky. 13, 15 (wife of co-indictee not on trial, admissible); 1861, Cornelius v. Com., 3 id. 481, 483 (same); 1849, State v. Worthing, 31 Me. 62 (wife of a co-indictee, not on trial, and defaulted, admitted); 1804, Com. v. Easland, 1 Mass. 15 (assault and battery; wife of co-indictee tried jointly, excluded); 1854, Com. v. Robinson, 1 Gray 555 (burglary; similar ruling); 1843, Pullen v. People, 1 Doug. Mich. 48 (wife of

§ 610. Death and Divorce. (1) If the one spouse is deceased, the other spouse is qualified to testify on behalf of the estate, the heirs, or any other person succeeding to the deceased's interests; because there is no living person interested to whom the witness bears the relation of spouse. The reason is thus not that "those feelings and influences, supposed to exist during the conjugal estate, have ceased,"[1] for they are quite as likely to remain; but merely that the rule of thumb founded on that supposed bias (ante, § 603) has ceased to be applicable:

1846, Rogers, J., in Cornell v. Vanartsdalen, 4 Pa. St. 364, 374: "It is somewhat difficult to understand how the point can arise, when her testimony is offered in favor either of the former husband or of his estate after his death. She may have a strong bias, it is true, but that goes to her credit and not to her competency. But in what respect public policy arising from the domestic relation forbids her to testify is not apparent to my mind."[2] co-indictee tried separately, inadmissible); 1863, Morrissey v. People, 11 Mich. 327, 331, 341 (contra, for co-indictee tried jointly, under the statute of 1861; Manning, J., diss.); 1833, Com. v. Manson, Ashm. Pa. 32, 39 (wife of a co-defendant separately tried, admissible); 1821, State v. Anthony, 1 McC. S. C. 285 (wife of co-indictee, not on trial, admitted for the defendant); 1855, State v. Bradley, 9 Rich. 168, 171 (similar; but testimony that would criminate her husband was excluded); 1866, State v. McGrew, 13 id. 316; 1866, State v. Drawdy, 14 id. 87, 89 (like State v. Anthony); 1881, State v. Workman, 15 S. C. 540, 546 (wife of co-defendant on trial, not admitted); 1881, State v. Dodson, 16 id. 451, 460 (same); 1840, Moffit v. State, 2 Humph. 99 (wife of a co-indictee separately tried, held admissible); 1868, U. S. v. Addatte, 6 Blatchf. 76 ("when trials are separate, the wife may testify in favor of or against any one other than her husband, except in cases where the acquittal of one defendant works the acquittal of the rest, as in cases of conspiracy and the like"); 1854, Schoeffler v. State, 3 Wis. 823 (husband not admitted for wife's co-defendant jointly tried); 1874, Heath v. Keyes, 35 id. 668, 672 (wife of a nominal co-defendant; undecided); 1877, Stewart v. Stewart, 41 id. 624, 626 (wife of co-defendant, excluded unless the wife is otherwise competent for the husband specifically); 1896, Bartlett v. Clough, 94 id. 196, 201, 68 N. W. 875 (mechanic's lien; wife of co-defendant having same defence, excluded).

(2) For the same reason, one whose marital relation has been ended by divorce may be called on behalf of the divorcee.[3]

[1] 1876, Taliaferro, J., in Reilly v. Reilly's Succession, 28 La. An. 669, 670.

[2] Accord: 1808, Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day 37, 39, 55 (widow allowed to testify in suit by administratrix for services rendered by deceased husband); 1873, Deniston v. Hongland, 67 Ill. 265, 268 (widow allowed to testify for the heirs in a bill for specific performance of a contract to sell land to her deceased husband); 1858, Carpenter v. Dame, 10 Ind. 125, 128 (wife of deceased obligee in a bond, admitted for the heirs against the maker); 1876, Reil v. Reilly's Succession, 28 La. An. 669 (widow testifying against a claim of defendant against husband's estate); 1878, Leyman v. Levy, id. 745, 749 (husband testifying to decease wife's claim against himself); 1878, State Ryan, ib. 1176 (widow testifying against charged with murdering her husband); 186 Robinson v. Talmadge, 97 Mass. 171 (similar the next case); 1869, Litchfield v. Merritt, 1 id. 520, 524 (widow admitted for the husband executor suing on a debt to the husband 1872, Spradling v. Conway, 51 Mo. 51, (admitting a widow, in a proceeding for distribution of husband's estate); 1809, Jackson Bard, 4 John. 230, 233 (widow admitted suit to recover lands claimed through her husband); 1809, Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 id. 1 158 (same); 1821, Harrison v. Burgess, 1 Hun 385, 393 ("after his death, she is as competent as any one"); 1833, Hester v. Hester, 4 D 228, 229; 1855, Stober v. McCarter, 4 Oh. S 513, 516 (widow may testify for husband's administrator as to the estate); 1846, Cornell Vanartsdalen, 4 Pa. St. 364, 373 (widow admitted for executor in action against him testator's debt); 1833, Capehart v. Huey, 1 H S. C. 407, semble (widow competent on a against husband's administrators); 1863, Mat e on v. Sergeant's Est., 36 Vt. 142, 1 semble; 1878, White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 78 (widow admitted to prove bona fides husband's grant). Contra: 1871, Reeves Herr, 59 Ill. 81 (wife testifying for husband executor; but this ruling receives countenan from the careless wording of the statute); 18 William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gra 373, 382; 1882, Smith v. Bradford, 76 Va. 7 765; 1886, Mills v. Spencer, 81 id. 751, 755.

[3] 1850, Diekerman v. Graves, 6 Cush. 3 1838, Ratcliff v. Wales, 1 Hill N. Y. 63; 18 Wottrich v. Freeman, 71 N. Y. 601.

4. Exceptions to the Rule.

§ 612. Necessity, as creating Exceptions at Common Law (Injuries to the Wife, Bailments, Account-books, etc.). The rules of interest-disqualification always recognized certain exceptions founded on a supposed necessity (ante, § 576), i.e. the presumed impossibility, in specifically defined situations, of obtaining other witnesses; and this analogy was followed in recognizing certain exceptions to the marital disqualification.

(1) There was an exception of indefinite extent, chiefly confined to actions by the husband for injury to the wife.[1]

(2) There was, in a few jurisdictions, an exception for all cases in which the one spouse could have been admitted, by the necessity-exception to the Privilege rule, to testify against the other, i.e. the exceptions to the two rules were made identical.[2] As the two rules — that of disqualification and that of privilege — were utterly distinct both in reason and in scope, this attempt to assimilate the exceptions by a reversible rule of thumb was purely arbitrary and irrational, and received little recognition.

(3) Wherever the interest-disqualification suffered an exception on the ground of necessity, it would seem that the spouse of the interested person thus admitted became also admissible, — for example, to prove account-books by suppletory oath[3] or to prove the contents of packages bailed and lost.[4] This exception is hardly to be reconciled with the doctrine (ante, § 608) that the removal by statute of the interest-disqualification does not remove the marital disqualification; but consistency in the application of an artificial rule is hardly to be expected.

[1] Compare with these precedents the analogous exception to the Privilege rule, post, § 2239: 1694, Thompson v. Trevanion, Skinner 402 (wife's statements immediately upon an injury, receivable on the principle of the Hearsay exception, § 1718, post; here admitted for the husband suing in trespass for the battery); 1710, Anon., 11 Mod. 224 (husband's action for battery of wife; wife admitted); 1734, R. v. Reading, Lee cas. temp. Hardwicke 79 (filiation order charging defendant with a married woman's bastard; the woman held a sufficient sole witness to prove intercourse with defendant, "which is usually carried on with such secrecy that it will admit of no other evidence," but not to prove her husband's absence and non-access, "whereas this might be made to appear by other witnesses," and "there is no necessity that can justify her being an evidence"); 1752, R. v. Rook, 1 Wilson 340 (same); 1807, R. v. Luffe, 8 T. R. 193, 202 (same); as to this last series of precedents, compare the modern rule as to wife's testimony to non-access, post, § 2063. 1900, Cramer v. Hurt, 154 Mo. 112, 55 S. W. 258 (wife allowed to testify for husband in action for loss of services by defendant's malpractice, where the defendant took the stand); 1903, Turner v. Overall, — id. —, 72 S. W. 644 (fraud in securing a trust deed from the wife; husband admitted).

[2] Compare the corresponding necessity-exception under the Privilege rule, post, § 2239: 1844, State v. Neill, 6 Ala. 685 (wife admitted for the husband, on a charge of assaulting and beating her); 1882, Tucker v. State, 71 id. 342 (same); 1862, Com. v. Murphy, 4 All. 491 (similar); 1857, People v. Fitzpatrick, 5 Park. Cr. C. 26 (similar).

[3] 1845, Littlefield v. Rice, 10 Metc. 287, 290 (wife allowed to make suppletory oath to her husband's account-books kept in part by her).

[4] 1860, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Taylor, 24 Ill. 323 (here, to prove the contents of a lost trunk); 1871, Freeman v. Freeman, 62 id. 189, 191; 1876, Crane v. Crane, 81 id. 165, 171; 1877, Galbraith v. McLain, 84 id. 379, 383; 1846, McGill v. Rowand, 3 Pa. St. 451 (loss of goods by a carrier; plaintiff's wife's testimony to the contents, admitted; "the principle of necessity which alone enables a party under certain circumstances to prove the contents of a box or trunk applies with as much if not greater force to the wife as to the husband; the wife usually packs her husband's trunk and always her own"; no precedent cited).

For another similar exception, in one jurisdiction, on the ground of agency, see post, § 616.

§ 613. Statutory Exceptions: (1) Joint Parties; Effect of Statute making Party Competent. The exceptions carved out of the rule by statute are numerous, and vary markedly in the different jurisdictions. Certain exceptions, however, are common to several jurisdictions, and the judicial interpretation of them may be of service reciprocally.

(1) (a) Suppose the spouse offered as a witness to be also a party, and suppose a statute to have made parties competent, while leaving married persons incompetent or omitting to provide for them; which of these statutory provisions is to override the other? In most jurisdictions, it has been held, without further discrimination, that the statutory qualification of parties was absolute, and by implication made the spouse competent whenever entitled as a party to testify.[1] In some jurisdictions, a more narrow construction has been adopted, and the mere fact of being a nominal party not interested (otherwise if a real party in interest) was held not sufficient to qualify a spouse, on the ground that the interest-statute had not changed the position of such persons.[2] In a few other jurisdictions, a still narrower construction has been followed, by holding in effect that the statute qualifying parties did not entitle a spouse who was a party to testify at all; i. e. if both M and N were real parties in interest, neither could testify; but if M was a nominal party only, M could testify, because at common law (ante, § 607) M was competent; while N could not testify, because M, the other spouse, was a party in interest.[3] Thus is practised the sublimation of repu

[1] For all the statutes here involved, see ante, § 488; Ark.: 1881, Klenk v. Knoble, 37 Ark. 298, 302 (if also a party, the wife "quoad hoc might testify for herself"); 1891, R. Co. v. Amos, 54 id. 159, 163, 15 S. W. 362 (joint action for personal injuries; each competent for self alone); Ill.: 1892, Kusch v. Kusch, 143 Ill. 353, 357, 32 N. E. 267 (consequently, if a bill is dismissed against the wife, during the hearing, when the wife is called, she is incompetent); Ind.: 1872, Beunifield v. Hypres, 38 Ind. 498 (action by husband and wife against husband and wife for slander of the plaintiff wife; each wife allowed to testify as a party in interest; reviewing the prior differences of opinion in Carnie v. Murphy, 28 id. 88; Albaugh v. James, 29 id. 398; Crane v. Buchanan, ib. 570; Ward v. Colyhan, 30 id. 395; Mousler v. Harding, 33 id. 176; Newhouse v. Miller, 35 id. 463); 1874, Rogers v. Rogers, 46 id. 1, 4; 1876, McConnell v. Martin, 52 id. 434, 436; 1880, Clouse v. Elliott, 71 id. 302, 304; 1883, Sedgwick v Tucker, 90 id. 271, 279; Vt.: 1903, Hathaway's Will, — Vt. —, 53 Atl. 996 (the wife of the proponent of a will, held disqualified in probate proceedings; but not the wife of a legatee, who is herself as legatee joined as a party); Wis.: 1862, Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. 240, 246 (husband admitted, in action for wife's injuries); 1863, Hackett v. Bonnell, 16 id. 417, 476 (wife's separate property; husband admitted); 1866, Farrell v. Ledwell, 21 id. 182; 1877, Holmes v. Fond du Lac, 42 id. 282, 285; 1877, Getzlaff v. Seliger, 43 id. 297, 302; 1880, Kaime v. Omro, 49 id. 371, 372, 5 N. W. 838; 1882, Snell v. Bray, 56 id. 156, 160, 14 N. W. 14 (even where nominal party only); 1884, Hoverson v. Nok 60 id. 511, 514, 19 N. W. 382; 1885, Strong Stevens Point, 62 id. 255, 261, 22 N. W. 425

The same result was sometimes reached wh the witness was merely interested and thus to t extent qualified by statute: 1885, Strong Stevens Point, 62 Wis. 255, 262, 22 N. W. (admitting a wife for the husband suing as administrator for death of a child, the two be jointly interested, though she was not a part

[2] Mo.: 1872, Tingley v. Cowgill, 48 291, 296; 1872, Fugate v. Pierce, 49 id. 444; 1873, Buck v. Aahbrook, 51 id. 539; 18 Owen v. Brockschmidt, 54 id. 285, 288; 18 Charles v. R. Co., 58 id. 458, 461; 1874. Ha man v. Stowe, 59 id. 93, 95; 1875, Evers v. Ass'n, 59 id. 429, 433; 1875, Cooper v. Ord, id. 420, 430; 1877, Haerle v. Kreihn, 65 202, 206; 1879, Steffen v. Bauer, 70 id. 3 404 (nor is the witness confined to mat affecting his own interest); 1880, Joice v. Br son, 73 id. 28; 1882, Wood v. Broadley, 7 23, 34; 1885, Bell v. R. Co., 86 id. 599, (Steffen v. Bauer approved); 1889, Harring v. Sedalia, 98 id. 583, 589, 12 S. W. 342; 1 Layson v. Cooper, — id. —, 73 S. W. 472 mitting a wife as real party in interest, but merely as owner of property in controver N. J.: 1867, Metler's Adm'r v. Metler, 18 N Eq. 270, 276; N. Y.: 1867, Maverick v. R. 36 N. Y. 378, 380.

[3] Va.: 1874, Statham v. Ferguson, 25 Gr

sive quibbling, over a series of combinations which have no real relation to the witness' truth-telling probabilities in any of the situations.

(b) In a number of jurisdictions, the matter is made plain by expressly providing that husband and wife shall be competent "where they are joint parties and have a joint interest," or (sometimes) "a separate interest."[4] But this merely perpetuates the spirit of the vain distinctions of the common law.

§ 614. Same: (2) Separate Estate. It is sometimes provided that the one spouse shall be admissible for the other in trials "concerning the separate estate of the wife."[1] The common-law rule in this respect (ante, § 603) is thus directly abrogated.

§ 615. Same: (3) Wife as if Unmarried. It is often provided that the disqualification shall cease in cases where "the wife would if unmarried be plaintiff or defendant,"[1] — a clause which perhaps was intended to cover chiefly actions for injuries to or by the wife, but is in fact to-day of the large scope, if it is liberally interpreted.

§ 616. Same: (4) Agents. A very common exception is that which qualifies husband and wife wherever the transaction in issue was alleged to have been conducted by the wife as agent for the husband, or (sometimes) by either as agent for the other.[1] Under this clause, it seems to be proper

28, 34; 1882, Hayes v. Mutual Prot. Ass'n, 76 Va. 225, 227 (insurance policy); 1884, Burton v. Mills, 78 Va. 468, 470; 1886, Farley v. Tillar, 81 id. 275, 279 (sole trader); 1886, Perry v. Ruby, ib. 317, 323; 1886, Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Prindle, 82 id. 122, 126 (personal injury); 1886, Lindsay v. McCormick, ib. 479, 481, 5 S. E. 534; 1887, Nicholas v. Austin, ib. 817, 825, 1 S. E. 132; 1888, Jones v. Degge, 84 id. 685, 688, 5 S. E. 799; 1890, Crabtree v. Dunn, 86 id. 953, 959, 11 S. E. 1053; 1891, Defarges v. Ryland, 87 id. 404, 406, 12 S. E. 805; 1891, Thomas v. Sellman, ib. 683, 687, 13 S. E. 146.

In West Virginia the same result was reached under a statute expressly preserving the marital disqualification: 1872, Wheeling v. Trowbridge, 5 W. Va. 353; 1877, Hill v. Proctor, 10 id. 59, 83; 1877, Rose v. Brown, 11 id. 122, 133; 1878, Campbell v. White, 14 id. 122, 148; 1880, Lawrence v. Dubois, 16 id. 443, 457; 1881, Zane v. Fink, 18 id. 693, 742; 1883, Anderson v. Snyder, 21 id. 632, 644. But in West Virginia this is now changed by St. 1882, c. 130, § 22.

[4] Compare also the analogous rulings under the Privilege rule, post, § 2235: Kan.: 1881, Jenkins v. Lewis, 25 Kan. 479, 481; 1889, Chicago K. & W. R. Co. v. Anderson, 42 id. 297, 21 Pac. 1059; La.: 1871, Keller v. Vernon, 23 La. An. 164; 1878, Willis v. Ward, 30 id. 1282; 1882, Shantz v. Stoll, 34 id. 1237; 1886, Beltran v. Gautbreaux, 38 id. 106, 111; 1888, Johnson v. Boice, 40 id. 273, 275; 4 So. 168; 1899, Watson v. Lyons, 51 id. 1697, 26 So. 440 (action by father for loss of services of child and on behalf of the child for latter's personal illness; wife held incompetent on the former issue alone; following Lapleine v. R. Co., 40 id. 661, 4 So. 875).

[1] The statute was applied in the following cases: Ill.: 1871, Northern Line P. Co. v. Shearer, 61 Ill. 263; 1872, Biggins v. Brockman, 63 id. 316, 320; 1873, McNail v. Ziegler, 68 id. 224; 1874, Anderson v. Friend, 71 id. 475; 1875, Hawver v. Hawver, 78 id. 412, 414; 1876, Davenport v. Ryan, 81 id. 218, 219; 1879, Pyle v. Ouatatt, 92 id. 209, 216; 1879, Funk v. Eggleston, ib. 515, 532; 1879, Mueller v. Rebhan, 94 id. 142, 148; 1882, Otis v. Spencer, 102 id. 622, 626; 1899, Pain v. Farsou, 179 id. 185, 53 N. E. 579; 1903, Cassem v. Heustis, 201 id. 208, 66 N. E. 283.

[1] The statute was applied in the following cases: Ill.: 1872, Mitchell v. McDougall, 62 Ill. 498, 506; 1872, Krebaum v. Cordell, 63 id. 23, 25; 1874, Anderson v. Friend, 71 id. 475, 477; 1875, Hawver v. Hawver, 78 id. 412, 414; 1878, Pigg v. Carroll, 89 id. 205; 1878, Marshall v. Peck, 91 id. 187, 190; 1879, Mueller v. Rebhan, 94 id. 142, 148; 1882, Otis v. Spencer, 102 id. 622, 626; 1883, Smith v. Long, 106 id. 485, 488; 1893, Francis v. Roadea, 146 id. 635, 642, 35 N. E. 232; Ky.: 1883, Wise v. Foote, 81 Ky. 10, 13; 1888, Howard v. Tenney, 87 id. 52, 55, 7 S. W. 547; 1892, Covington v. Geyler, 93 id. 275, 283, 19 S. W. 741; 1901, Smith v. Doherty, — id. —, 60 S. W. 380; 1902, Board v. Moore, — id. —, 66 S. W. 417.

[1] Ark.: 1899, American Expr. Co. v. Lankford, 35 C. C. A. 353, 93 Fed. 380 (interpreting the Arkansas statute); 1900, Gunter v. Earnest, 68 Ark. 180, 56 S. W. 876; Ill.: 1875, Trepp v. Barker, 78 Ill. 146; 1875, Hayes v. Parmalee, 79 id. 563; 1876, Robertson v. Brost, 83 id.

enough to hold that the person offered under it may also be the one to prove the agency which thus qualifies the witness.[2] This exception was instituted on the general principle of necessity (ante, § 612); and hence, in at least one jurisdiction, it is found developed as an original part of the common law.[3]

§ 617. Same: (5) Sundry Statutory Provisions. The further local variations of statute would be here unprofitable to examine in detail. The tenor of the statutes (ante, § 488) is usually sufficiently clear, and judicial interpretation seems to be needed in only casual instances.[1]

5. Statutory Abolition.

§ 619. Statutory Abolition of Interest-Disqualification does not include Disqualification of Spouse. Since the principle of the common law had fo

116, 118; 1884, Powell v. Powell, 114 Id. 329, 2 N. E. 162; Ind. T.: 1897, American Express Co. v. Lankford, 1 Ind. T. 233, 39 S. W. 817; Kan.: 1878, Fisher v. Conway, 21 Kan. 18, 23; 1887, Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Kuhn, 38 id. 104, 106; 16 Pac. 75; 1888, Pfefferle v. State, 39 id. 128, 130, 17 Pac. 828; 1888, Paulsen v. Hall, ib. 365, 369, 18 Pac. 225; Mo.: 1878, Williams v. Williams, 67 Mo. 661, 663; Vt.: 1861, Eastabrooks v. Prentiss, 34 Vt. 457; 1865, Orcutt v. Cook, 37 id. 515; 1868, Lunay v. Vantyne, 40 id. 501, 503; 1874, Bates v. Cliley, 47 id. 1, 7; 1888, Martin v. Hurlburt, 60 id. 364, 367, 14 Atl. 649; 1891, Pierce v. Bradford, 61 id. 219, 23 Atl. 637; 1892, Bates v. Sabin, ib. 511, 517, 24 Atl. 1013; 1896, Pingree v. Johnson, 69 id. 225, 39 Atl. 202; 1901, Farr v. Bell, 73 id. 342, 50 Atl. 1107.

[2] Contra: Vt.: 1897, Jenne v. Piper, 69 Vt. 497, 38 Atl. 147 (agency must first appear otherwise); Mo.: 1878, Williams v. Williams, 67 Mo. 661, 663; 1882, Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Tinsley, 75 id. 458, 459 (like Williams v. Williams). Accord: Mo.: 1893, Leete v. State Bank, 115 Mo. 184, 204, 21 S. W. 788 (repudiating Williams v. Williams, supra); 1899, Long v. Martin, 152 id. 668, 54 S. W. 473; 1901, Reed v. Peck, 163 id. 333, 63 S. W. 734 (approving Leete v. Bank and Long v. Martin).

[3] Wis.: 1862, Birdsall v. Dunn, 16 Wis. 235, 239 (on the analogy of the similar exception to the general rule of disqualification by interest); 1863, Hobby v. Wisconsin Bank, 17 id. 167, 169 (husband admissible to prove "the contract made by him as the agent of the wife, the receipt or payment of money, or other acts done by him within the scope of his agency"); 1865, Meek v. Pierce, 19 Id. 300, 302; 1867, Mountain v. Fisher, 22 id. 93, 97; 1872, Butts v. Newton, 29 id. 632, 640; 1872, O'Conner v. Ins. Co., 31 Id. 160, 167; 1874, Ainsworth v. Barry, 35 id. 134, 141; 1876, Menk v. Steinfort, 39 id. 370, 375; 1876, Hale v. Danforth, 40 id. 382; 1878, Chunot v. Larson, 43 id. 536, 538; 1878, Marsh v. Pugh, ib. 597, 600 ("probably she is a competent witness to prove the agency"); 1885, Meade v. Gilfoyle, 64 id. 18, 26, 24 N. W. 413; 1896, Hager v. Streich, 92 id. 505, 509, 66 N. W. 720; 1898, Goesel v. Davis, 100 id. 678, 76 N. W. 768.

[1] Can.: 1889, McFarlane v. R., 16 Can. Sup. 393 (assault on a peace officer; defendant's wife excluded); Ill.: 1895, Johnson v. McGregor, 157 Ill. 350, 41 N. E. 750 (admitting the husband for the wife, where she sues, after the statutory period of six months, for the penalty payable by one who wins in gambling, to any person suing); Ky.: 1899, Bright's Ex'rs v. Swinebroad, — Ky. —, 51 S. W. 578 (Civ. C. § 606 construed, as to one or the other, but not both, being admitted); 1903, s. c., 73 S. W. 1031; 1903, Williams v. Williams, — Ky. —, 71 S. W. 505 (under Civ. C. § 606, a husband is not admissible for the contestants of a will where his wife has already testified in her own interest on the same side); N. H.: 1899, Chase v. Pitman, 69 N. H. 423, 43 Atl. 617 (statute applied); Vt.: 1895, Wheeler v. Campbell, 68 Vt. 98, 34 Atl. 35 (wife admitted, where the husband was not a party); Va.: 1899, Ilsley v. Turner, 96 Va. 624, 32 S. E. 291 (statute applied); 1899, Crowder v. Garber, 97 id. 565, 34 S. E. 470 (statute 1897–8, applied); 1901, First National Bank v. Holland, 99 id. 495, 39 S. E. 126 (under St. 1897–8, deceased husband's declarations, made when free from debt, are admissible to prove gift to wife); Wash.: 1899, Speck v. Gray, 14 Wash. 589, 45 Pac. 143 (wife not admissible in crim. con. actions by husband); Wis.: 1900, Miller v. State, 106 Wis. 156, 81 N. W. 1020 (murder; defendant's wife excluded); 1903, Krainer v. State, — id. —, 93 N. W. 1097 (assault on I.; defendant's wife excluded). Under the Michigan clause as to "actions instituted in consequence of adultery," the following rulings have been made: 1870, Parsons v. People, 21 Mich. 509, 515 (statute does not exclude the wife in a criminal prosecution for adultery with her); 1880, Egbert v. Greenwalt, 44 id. 245, 247, 6 N. W. 654 (wife admitted for her husband in crim. con.; no question raised); 1882, Mathews v. Yerex, 48 id. 36, 12 N. W. 489 (wife not admissible for the husband in action for crim. con.); 1883, People v. Lovejoy, 49 id. 529, 531, 14 N. W. 485, semble (admissible in an action for enticement); 1884, Gleason v. Knapp, 56 id. 291, 294, 22 N. W. 8 (husband not admissible in his action for crim. con.); 1890, Carter v. Hill, 81 id. 275, 279, 45 N. W. 988 (same).

its basis the marital bias, and not the bias of interest in the event (ante, § 603), it followed that a statute making interested persons competent could not be construed to make married persons competent by implication. Ultimately, the ground of exclusion was the same, namely, the supposed danger of falsification; but, as specific rules, they rested on distinct sources of such danger, and hence their abolition would be required to be effected by distinct provisions. Such was the result reached by almost every Court before whom the question was raised.[1]

§ 620. Statutory Express Abolition. The statutes expressly abolishing the common-law marital disqualification speak usually for themselves with sufficient plainness; they have been already set forth in full (ante, § 488). From time to time, judicial declarations of their effect have been given, but, owing to the gradual changes of statute in each jurisdiction, these must be weighed in connection with the tenor of the contemporary statute.[1]

[1] Eng.: 1852, Barbat v. Allen, 7 Exch. 609; 1852, Stapleton v. Crofts, 18 Q. B. 367 (Erle, J., diss.); Ark.: 1877, Collins v. Mack, 31 Ark. 684, 688 (repudiating the obiter dictum in Magness v. Walker, 26 id. 470); D. C.: 1886, Holtzman v. Wagner, 16 D. C. 15; 1896, Foertsch v. Germuller, 9 D. C. App. 351, 356; Ill.: 1871, Mitchinson v. Cross, 58 Ill. 366, 368; 1882, Lincoln Ave. & N. C. G. R. Co. v. Madaus, 102 id. 417, 422; Mass.: 1857, Barber v. Goddard, 9 Gray 71; Miss.: 1859, Dunlap v. Hearn, 37 Miss. 471, 474 (overruling Lockhart v. Luker, 36 id. 68); N. H.: 1860, Kelley v. Proctor, 41 N. H. 139, 141; 1862, Smith v. R. Co., 44 id. 325, 334; N. J.: 1862, Handlong v. Barnes, 30 N. J. L. 69; 1862, Bird v. Davis, 14 N. J. Eq. 467, 478; 1865, Marshman v. Conklin, 17 id. 282, 288; 1865, Staats v. Bergen, ib. 293, 303; 1866, Cramer v. Reford, ib. 367, 383; 1868, Yetman v. Dey, 33 N. J. L. 32; N. Y.: 1853, Hasbrouck v. Vandervoort, 9 N. Y. 153, 161; 1868, Hicks v. Bradner, 2 Abb. App. Cas. 362; N. C.: 1869, Rice v. Keith, 63 N. C. 319; Oh.: 1859, Bird v. Hueston, 10 Oh. St. 418, 429; S. C.: 1881, State v. Workman, 15 S. C. 540, 546; Tenn.: 1871, Goodwin v. Nicklin, 6 Heisk. 257; U. S.: 1873, Lucas v. Brooks, 18 Wall. 436, 453; Vt.: 1832, Carr v. Cornell, 4 Vt. 116; 1852, Manchester v. Manchester, 24 id. 649; 1860, Cram v. Cram, 33 id. 15, 20; Wis.: 1866, Farrell v. Ledwell, 21 Wis. 182. Contra: Ala.: 1870, Robison v. Robison, 44 Ala. 227, 233; 1871, Miller v. State, 45 id. 24, 26; 1872, Johnson v. State, 47 id. 7, 33; 1872, Lang v. Waters, 47 id. 624, 636; 1873, Rowland v. Plummer, 50 id. 182, 193; 1874, Sumner v. Cooke, 51 id. 521; 1877, Chapman v. Holding, 60 id. 522, 533; 1888, Hussey v. State, 77 id. 121, 135; Conn.: 1850, Merriam v. R. Co., 20 Conn. 354, 363; 1854, Lucas v. State, 23 id. 18, 20; Ind.: 1879, Hutchason v. State, 67 Ind. 449; Pa.: 1870, Yeager v. Weaver, 64 Pa. 425, 427 (turning on the statute's peculiar wording).

[1] Ark.: Disqualification not abolished: 1877, Collins v. Mack, 31 Ark. 684, 688; 1878, Phipps v. Martin, 33 id. 207, 210; 1878, Berlin v. Cantrell, ib. 611, 621; Conn.: Disqualification not abolished in criminal cases: 1854, Lucas v. State, 23 Conn. 18, 20; Fla.: Disqualification abolished in criminal cases: 1894, Walker v. State, 34 Fla. 167, 169, 16 So. 80; Ind.: Disqualification entirely abolished: 1875, Brown v. Norton, 67 Ind. 424; 1879, Hutchason v. State, ib. 449; 1881, Robert: v. Porter, 78 id. 130, 133; La.: 1896, State v. Pain, 48 La. An. 311, 19 So. 138 (wife is inadmissible in criminal suits generally); Miss.: Disqualification entirely abolished: 1876, Rushing v. Rushing, 52 Miss. 329; 1876, Barry v. Sturdivant, 53 id. 490, 493; 1886, Ellis v. Alford, 64 id. 8, 12, 1 So. 155; 1894, Saffold v. Horne, 72 id. 470, 482, 18 So. 433 (giving a history of the legislation); Nebr.: Disqualification abolished: 1897, Smith v. Meyers, 52 Nebr., 70, 71 N. W. 1006; Oh.: Disqualification abolished for civil cases: 1881, Howard v. Brower, 37 Oh. St. 402, 404, 409; Okl.: Disqualification not abolished for civil cases: 1897, Nix v. Gilmer, 5 Okl. 740, 50 Pac. 131; Pa.: Disqualification abolished for civil cases: 1870, Yeager v. Weaver, 64 Pa. 425, 427; 1874, Ballentine v. White, 77 id. 20, 26; 1893, Evans v. Evans, 155 id. 572, 576, 26 Atl. 755; W. Va.: Disqualification abolished, except for spouse of disqualified survivor: 1889, Kilgore v. Hanley, 27 W. Va. 451, 454.

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC IV: TESTIMONIAL KNOWLEDGE.

CHAPTER XXV.

A. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF KNOWLEDGE.

1. Preliminary Distinctions.

§ 650. Observation, Opportunity to Observe, and Knowledge; their difference, and their practical sameness.

§ 651. Distinction between Experience and Knowledge.

§ 652. Knowledge may rest upon a Hypothetical Basis.

§ 653. Knowledge often a double element, including (1) a class of things, and (2) the thing to be classed.

§ 654. Burden of Proof of Knowledge Qualification.

§ 655. Same: Witness asked to specify the Grounds of his Knowledge.

2. Degree, Quality, and Sources of Knowledge.

§ 656. Judicial Phrasings of the Principle of Knowledge.

§ 657. (a) Knowledge must be founded on Personal Observation by the Senses, not on Hearsay.

§ 658. (b) Knowledge need not be Positive or Absolute; Admissibility of a "Belief," "Impression," "Opinion," or the like.

§ 659. (c) Knowledge must involve Rational Inferences from Adequate Data.

§ 660. Same: Inference of Identity of Person by Voice or Appearance; of Age from Appearance; of Chattels from their Qualities; Miscellaneous Instances of Inadequate Knowledge.

§ 661. Same: Testimony to another Person's State of Mind.

§ 662. Same: Improbabilities in Scientific Testimony.

§ 663. Same: Speculative Testimony to Personal Injuries and to Values.

§ 664. Negative Knowledge; Testimony that a Fact would have been Seen or Heard, had it occurred.

3. Hearsay Knowledge exceptionally admitted.

§ 665. (1) Official Records; (2) Scientific Instruments and Tables (Vacuum Rays, etc.); (3) Expert Learning founded on Books.

§ 666. (4) Execution and Contents of Documents not personally observed.

§ 667. (5) Testifying to one's Own Age; or (6) to Another Person's Name.

§ 668. (7) Conversations through an Interpreter.

§ 669. (8) Information received by Telephone.

§ 670. (9) Testimony of Deceased or Absent Persons under the Hearsay Exceptions.

4. Hypothetical Questions.

§ 672. General Theory.

§ 673. False Theory: "Usurping the Province of the Jury."

§ 674. Actual Observation not necessary; Hypothetical Presentation may be sufficient.

§ 675. Where Personal Observation is had, Hypothetical Presentation is Unnecessary.

§ 676. Where Personal Observation is lacking, Hypothetical Presentation must be used.

§ 677. Personal Observation is not necessary, when Hypothetical Presentation is used.

§ 678. The same Skilled Witness may testify from both Personal Observation and Hypothetical Presentation.

§ 679. Only Skilled Witnesses may be asked Hypothetical Questions.

§ 680. If the Premises fail, the Conclusion must be disregarded.

§ 681. Form and Scope of the Question; (1) Particularization of the Premises to be used; Questions based on Testimony in the Case.

§ 682. Same: (2) Kind of Data that may be assumed in the Question; not All the Facts, but Any Facts of which there is Evidence.

§ 683. Same: (3) Form of Question must be expressly Hypothetical.

§ 684. Hypothetical Questions on Cross-examination.

B. KNOWLEDGE REQUIRED FOR SPECIAL SUBJECTS.

1. Medical Matters.

§ 687. Physician's General Knowledge based on the Study of Books.

§ 688. Physician's Knowledge of Symptoms based on Hearsay of Patients and Others.

§ 689. Layman's or Physician's Acquaintance with a Person Insane or Diseased.

2. Foreign Law.

§ 690. Knowledge of Foreign Law as based on Study alone.

3. Reputation (of Character).

§ 691. Witness must expressly appear Qualified.

§ 692. Knowledge must be based on Residence in the Place of Repute, not on mere Inquiry.

A. General Principles of Knowledge.

1. Preliminary Distinctions.

§ 650. Observation, Opportunity to Observe, and Knowledge; their difference, and their practical sameness. It is obviously impossible to speak with accuracy of a witness' "knowledge" as that which the principles of testimony require. If the law received as absolute knowledge what he had to offer, then only one witness would be needed on any one matter; for the fact asserted would be demonstrated. When a thing is known to be, it is; and that would be the end of inquiry. A witness cannot be assumed beforehand, by the law, to know things; the most it can assume is that he thinks he knows. The law assumes that the matter is in truth of some particular complexion, but also realizes that to determine what its real complexion is the tribunal may have to listen to various persons; the statements of some of these it will reject, and of others it will accept. But from the persons to whom the tribunal will listen the law will attempt to require some qualification which will make them worth listening to. It will not presume to determine beforehand which witness is correct — i. e. which one really knows —, but it will ask that each one offered shall be one prima facie likely to know, — in short, shall have had an opportunity of observing what was or what happened and shall have directed his attention or observation to the matter. This is as far as the law can go. Accordingly, the rules upon the subject in hand are all concerned, not strictly with the witness' knowledge, but with his opportunities of observing and his actual observation. For example, if it is a question of the aggressor in an affray, what the tribunal will ask for is, no persons who really know who the aggressor was, but persons who have bee so situated that they had an opportunity of observing and did observe th affair.

The practical tests, then, and the detailed rules, are in strictness concerne with observation and not with knowledge; they are satisfied by a likelihoo of the witness' having knowledge, and do not require a prior demonstratio of his actual knowledge. Nevertheless, as the ultimate aim often give name to the method, it may be said, roughly but sufficiently, that the qual fication here involved is Knowledge, — at least as distinguished from Exper ence, Sanity, and the other qualifications of capacity to know. Remembering then, that Observation is, accurately speaking, the required element, it wil be convenient to employ the commoner term Knowledge, as equivalent to i for purposes of discussion.

§ 651. Distinction between Experience and Knowledge. Observation o the matters to be testified to is an essential conception in the qualification of every witness without exception (ante, § 478). By Observation is mean that direction of attention which is the source of impressions, and thus o knowledge. The distinction between Experience (ante, § 558) and Observa tion is that the former concerns the mental power or capacity to acquir knowledge on the subject of testimony, while the latter concerns the actua exercise of the faculties upon the subject of testimony. Competency as a witness is inconceivable without the presence of both these elements. Th law of evidence must lay down some rules for the purpose of ensuring a actual observation of and knowledge about the matter in hand.

It is true that the distinction between Experience and Observation is some times lost sight of in the practical tests applicable to certain subjects of tes timony. For example, when a Court adopts the rule of thumb that farmer in the vicinity of a certain piece of land may testify to its value, it is ruling upon both these subjects; it is ruling that farmers are persons of sufficien experiential qualifications, and it is also ruling that persons in the vicinity have sufficient observation or knowledge of the general class of values in question and of the piece of land in question. Again, when a Court rules that a bank-cashier who has handled the kind of notes alleged to be counter feit may testify to the genuineness of the one in question, it is ruling that bank-cashiers are experientially qualified to form an opinion on the matter and it is also ruling that the handling of the notes sufficiently ensures obser vation or knowledge of the general type of note in question. In these in stances, as well as in others, the rule of thumb does not distinguish the two principles. But the practical convenience of such rules need not prevent us from recognizing that two distinct principles are involved, or that the two elements must always exist however obscured.[1]

[1] The following case illustrates the combination of the two: 1871, Clague v. Hodgson, 16 Minn. 339 (where questions were raised both as to the experiential qualifications of the witness and as to the fact of his examination of the sheep whose age was in controversy.

§ 652. Knowledge may rest upon a Hypothetical Basis. The direction of attention which constitutes the source of the knowledge will usually be made upon matters as they present themselves to the senses out of court. But the observation may also be directed to the same matter hypothetically placed before the witness in court. Thus, a physician may examine a patient at his home and observe certain symptoms, whence he reaches the conclusion that a fever exists; but the same symptoms may be stated to him by counsel in court, and he may then reach the same conclusion, and it will be receivable, except that it will rest upon the hypothesis that the symptoms stated to him actually existed. Here the direction of attention to the symptoms is that observation which the law requires before receiving his conclusion as to the nature of the disease; but in the one case the alleged symptoms are learned by his own senses and rest on his own testimonial credit, while in the other case they rest on the hypothesis that other persons will testify them to be true. In §§ 672–684, the theory of the hypothetical question and its detailed rules are examined in full.

§ 653. Knowledge often a double element, including (1) a class of things, and (2) the thing to be classed. In certain subjects the observation must be of a double sort. For example, a witness to the value of a horse must be acquainted with the value-standards for different classes of horses, and must also be acquainted with the particular horse to be valued. A witness to the genuineness of handwriting must be acquainted with the type or standard of the handwriting of the alleged writer, and must also see the disputed writing which he is to say does or does not belong to that type. A witness to the identity of a person, a voice, or anything else, must be familiar with the person or voice or other thing as to which the identity is asserted, and must also see or hear or otherwise perceive the thing to be identified with it. In short, wherever the subject of the testimony consists in classifying or identifying or testing or authenticating, the witness' observation necessarily involves two elements, (1) an observation of the class, type, or standard, and (2) an observation of the thing to be classified or identified. Both elements must be supplied in his testimony. Under the particular topics of testimony, the rules applying this principle may be examined.

It may be noted that here it is not uncommon to supply the second element by hypothetical presentation (post, § 672). Thus, in valuing the cost of a house's construction, the witness may have actual observation of only the value-standards of different sorts of houses, and then the features of the particular house to be valued may be placed before him by hypothetical description. So a witness to the identity of a murdered person with one J. S. may have had actual observation of J. S. but not of the body of the murdered man, and the latter element may be supplied by showing him a photograph assumed to be that of the deceased, and then verifying the photograph as that of the deceased.

§ 654. Burden of Proof of Knowledge Qualification. It has already been noted (ante, §§ 484, 497, 508, 560, 584), that in adults the general Mental Capacity to testify is assumed, and need not be shown beforehand; and that the same is true of that capacity whose absence is indicated by the term Interest; while Experiential Capacity is not assumed, if the subject calls for special experience, and the possession of it must be made to appear beforehand. These differeuces are based on practical convenience and probabilities, for the probability is that the average witness will be sane (and thus sanity may be assumed), and the probability is that the average witness will not have special experience (and thus it cannot be assumed). Analogy would indicate, then, that since the probabilities are all against a particular person, out of all persons, having been one to observe the particular matter in hand, it cannot be assumed that he is one of the few admissible persons, and his qualifications as to observation, or knowledge, must be made to appear beforehand. Such is the generally accepted rule. The witness before he refers to the matter in hand, must make it appear that he had the requisite opportunities to obtain correct impressions on the subject, and the first questions put to him should be and usually are directed to laying this foundation:[1]

1870, Morton, J., in Wetherbee v. Norris, 103 Mass. 564, 566 (approving a ruling, in the trial Court's discretion, that a witness to reputation must be asked beforehand whether he knows the reputation): "The same principle is applicable to the examination of witnesses upon other subjects. It often occurs, in the trial of cases, that the judge is called upon to inquire of a witness whether he has knowledge of the matter of which he is called to testify. If it appears to be doubtful whether the witness understands and appreciates his duty to testify only to what he knows of his own knowledge, or if for any reason there is danger that he may testify to hearsay, it is the right and it may be the duty of the presiding judge to inquire of him if he has knowledge of the matter as to which he is asked to testify. . . . Whether the circumstances of this case required the preliminary question to be put was a matter within the judicial discretion of the presiding judge."

Where this preliminary inquiry is omitted, the opposing counsel cannot afterwards object to it as a technical violation of rules; this is usually placed on the theory that the knowledge may be presumed,[2] but it is more correct to place it upon the rule (ante, § 18) that a failure to make objection at the proper time is a waiver of the objection. Yet where the subsequent course of the examination develops a total lack of opportunity of knowledge, no doubt the testimony may be struck out, on the ground that the waiver was merely of the requirement of the preliminary burden of proof, and not of the substantial qualifications of the witness.

The importance of enforcing this general rule is illustrated in the fol-

[1] 1900, Cleveland T. & V. R. Co. v. Marsh, 63 Oh. 236, 58 N. E. 821 (whether a person was a trainman); 1899, Gorkow's Estate, 20 Wash. 563, 56 Pac. 385 (prior statement of qualifications may be required, in trial Court's discretion).

[2] 1874, Pearson v. Wheeler, 55 N. H. 41 ("Where nothing appears to the contrary it is to be presumed that what the witness stated was within his knowledge, and that his knowledge was derived from proper sources"); 1867, Field v. Tenney, 47 id. 513, 522; 1900, Glauber Mfg. Co. v. Voter, 70 id. 332, 47 Atl. 612; 1874, Fassin v. Hubbard, 55 N. Y. 471 (deposition; if knowledge would at least have been possible, from what appears, it may be presumed).

lowing passage, where the unsuccessful counsel was, in strictness, in the right:

1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 36th day, Times' Rep. pt. 10, p. 18; the Irish Land League and its leaders being charged with complicity in certain crimes, particularly in the Phœnix Park assassination of 1882, certain of the known criminals testified that their body, the Invincibles, had received assistance-money from the League; it had turned out, on cross-examining one of them, that his testimony to the receipt of this money from the League officers was not based on his own knowledge at all, but merely on what he had heard from others; another of these persons was now asked on direct examination as follows: Sir H. James: "Tell me of your own knowledge whether you know of his receiving any money from the Land League"; Sir C. Russell: "My Lords, I would ask my learned friend to be particular as to that question 'of his own knowledge' after the experience we had of Delaney's evidence. 'Did he see any one pay him?' is the proper form of question"; Sir H. James: "I think not"; Sir C. Russell: "With great deference, my Lords, it is. We had a deliberate statement the other day in answer to a similar question put to a witness, 'Did you know this?' and 'Did you know that?' and, afterwards in cross-examination, it turned out that he did not know it of his own knowledge, but it was what had been told him. I want to guard against a repetition of that. The proper form of question as I submit is, 'Did he see any money paid?'" Sir H. James (to the witness): "You understand what I mean — do you know this of your own knowledge?" Sir C. Russell: "I am objecting to the form of the question"; President Hannen: "It is a very usual form of question." Sir C. Russell: "I respectfully say, in view of the reasons I have given, that the proper question is, 'Did he see any money paid?'" President Hannen: "I shall not interfere with the discretion of counsel in asking a question in a manner which is quite usual." Sir C. Russell: "I have pointed out the danger — the great danger — of putting the question in the form in which my learned friend is putting it." President Hannen: "Precisely so; and you have also shown where the safeguard lies, namely, in cross-examination."

§ 655. Same: Witness specifying the Grounds of his Knowledge. The party offering a witness may desire to make plain the strength of the witness' grounds of knowledge and the reasons for trustiug his belief. This is a legitimate purpose. But, in pursuing it, the witness often will naturally state circumstances which may give indirectly some unfavorable impressions against the opposite party, — as where the witness is asked, "What made you notice the defendant's features?" and replies, "Because he was the same man who stole my wagon last year." Or he may relate other persons' utterances which would be inadmissible as hearsay, but for their present utility. Nevertheless, on the principle of multiple admissibility (ante, § 13), the general rule is that the witness may on the direct examination state the particular circumstances which legitimately affected his knowledge or recollection, even though the fact would otherwise be inadmissible; the judge's instruction to the jury must be relied upon for preventing their improper use of the fact:

1856, Green, C. J., in State v. Fox, 25 N. J. L. 575, 602 (in fixing the recollection of a time, the remark of a neighbor was used; "she said, 'Perhaps the man I met on Thursday morning might have had something to do with it'"): "The evidence was not offered or admitted to prove the truth of the facts stated to the witness, but merely to show what it was that called the attention of the witness to a fact stated by her or that fixed the fact in her recollection. Whether the statement of the third person was true or false was perfectly immaterial. The fact that the communication was made, and not its truth falsity, was the only material point. The conversations were not hearsay, within t proper meaning of the term."

1864, Christiancy, J., in Angell v. Rosenbury, 12 Mich. 241, 257: "It was very impo
tant, in determining the credit to be given to the witness' recollection, to know whet any or what reason existed at the time to induce the witness to give particular attentio to the appearance of the notes [then shown to him]. The value of his recollection wou depend entirely upon the degree of attention with which he observed the facts and t reasons which operated upon his mind to excite that attention and to fix the facts in h memory. He should therefore have been allowed to state any facts which had that effec whether relevant to the issue or not." [1]

2. Degree, Quality, and Sources of Knowledge.

§ 656. Judicial Phrasings of the Principle of Knowledge. Courts hav often uttered in broad terms the general principle of the necessity of Ob servation as a source of Knowledge. The following passages illustrate the attitude:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 79, 127: "To render the communication of fac perfect, the witnesses must be both able and willing to speak or to write the truth. It necessary that they should possess, in the first place, the means and opportunity acquiring a knowledge of the facts. . . . A witness who states facts ought to state tho only of which he has personal knowledge; and such knowledge is supposed, if n expressly stated, upon the examination in chief; and upon cross-examination his mea of knowledge may be fully investigated, and if he has not sufficient and adequate mea of knowledge, his evidence will be struck out."

1820, Henderson, J., in State v. Allen, 1 Hawks 9: "The law requires that he wi deposes to a fact should have the means of knowing it."

[1] Accord: 1895, Dickson v. Bamberger, 107 Ala. 293, 18 So. 290 (general principle, but too narrowly stated); 1876, Tomlinson v. Derby, 43 Conn. 562 (reasons for knowing that a highway-defect existed); 1895, Kendall's Ex'rs v. Collier, 97 Ky. 446, 30 S. W. 1002 (reasons for knowing handwriting); 1859, Dickenson v. Fitchburg, 13 Gray 556 (expert; general principle); 1864, Lincoln v. Mfg. Co., 9 All. 192 (same); 1878, Williams v. Taunton, 125 Mass. 40 (same); 1890, Hunt v. Boston, 152 id. 169, 25 N. E. 82 (same); 1896, Com. v. Bishop, 165 id. 148, 42 N. E. 560 (tha witness' reason for identifying defendant was that tha latter had come to him to be treated for a certain disease); 1897, Com. v. Kennedy, 170 id. 18, 48 N. E. 770 (identity of purchaser of poison); 1899, Leslie v. R. Co., 172 id. 468, 52 N. E. 542 (expert; general principle); 1902, O'Malley v. Com., 182 id. 196, 65 N. E. 30 (expert not allowed to state that his opinion was based on a consideration of sales not otherwise evidenced, without specifying them); 1864, Angell v. Rosenbury, 12 Mich. 241, 257 (whether notes produced were tha same as those shown to witness by plaintiff; reasons for noticing them particularly, allowed to be stated; quoted supra); 1868, Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 id. 99, 107 (to indicate the fixing of a witness' attention on the fact of a locomotive bell having been rung or not, the witness was allowed to say that it had been then talked of, but not to state that "people said that the bell was not rung"); 1895, Cole v. R. Co., 105 id. 549, 6 N. W. 647 (words uttered, admitted to show how a thing was remembered); 1900, Grenell R. Co., 124 id. 141, 82 N. W. 843 (similar); 1879, O'Hagan v. Dillon, 76 N. Y. 170, 17 (a witness testifying to the hanging of a lam at the place where an injury occurred, allowed t be asked: "Is your recollection refreshed, o your attention called to that from any circum stance, any accident that happened there?") 1865, Howser v. Com., 51 Pa. 341 (that th witness on arriving home had told to her par ents what she had heard and seen, and tha they replied, allowed); 1903, State v. Nagle — R. I. — , 54 Atl. 1063 ("Whenever th opinion of a person is deemed to be relevant, the grounds on which such opinion is based ar also deemed to be relevant"; here, of experi ments with a pistol as to the appearances o wounds).

Compare a similar use of hearsay utterance to identify a time, place, or person (ante, § 416), to corroborate a witness (post, § 1129), and t exhibit the grounds of a physician's opinion (post, § 1720), or other experts' opinions (ante, § 562). The theory of the Hearsay rule on this point is dealt with post, § 1791. For cross-examination to impeach the witness' sources of knowledge, see post, §§ 991–995, ante, § 463.

1863, 1875, Campbell, J., in Evans v. People, 12 Mich. 35, and Elliott v. Van Buren, 33 id. 52: "The primary rule concerning all evidence is that personal knowledge of such facts as a Court or jury may be called upon to consider should be required of all witnesses, where it is attainable. . . . No one can be allowed to prove what he has never learned, whether it be ordinary or scientific facts."

1870, Doe, J., in State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 413: "A witness cannot testify that in his opinion the defendant was sick, or well, without first showing that he had an opportunity of forming an opinion from facts observed by himself."

§ 657. (a) Knowledge must be founded on Personal Observation by the Senses, not on Hearsay. The first corollary from the general principle of Knowledge is that what the witness represents as his knowledge must be an impression derived from the exercise of his own senses, not from the reports of others, — in other words, must be founded on personal observation. This general rule, to which contrary instances can be only casual exceptions, has long been recognized as fundamental:

1359, Thorpe, C. J., in Y. B. 23 Ass. pl. 11: "Witnesses must testify to nothing except what they are certain of, that is, what they have seen or heard."

1441-2, Newton, C. J., in Y. B. 20 H. VI., 20, 16 (the essoiner was sworn to say whether his principal was in the service of the king, and he said that he was so informed, but he did not dare to say expressly that he was in the king's service): "The essoiner is sworn, and he is not willing to say that the principal is in the service of the king. The statute runs that the essoiner testetur in curia; but this is not testifying."

1656, Bushnell's Trial, 5 [illegible]t. Tr. 633, 641; Bushnell, arguing: "William Pinchin acknowledges himself to be present, and yet he swears [to my unlawful act at Box] as if he had been at Box. I am not so much a lawyer as to know how far forth an oath will extend, or to what it will amount, if a man depose nothing but what he hath received by hearsay. . . . 'He is a false witness, not only he who tells a lie, but also he who testifies a truth whereof he hath not a certain and undoubted knowledge, — that is, if he testify that which he hath neither seen nor heard nor [illegible]th had any experience of.' Which I speak . . . only to evidence thus much unto thee, that, be it true or be it false, yet William Pinchin could be no competent witness of it, because by his own confession he was at the same time at another place about four or five miles off."

1670, Vaughan, C. J., in Bushel's Case, 6 id. 999, 1003, Vaughan 135 (noting the difference between a juryman and a witness): "A witness swears but to what he hath heard or seen, — generally or more largely, to what hath fallen under his senses."

1696, Holt, L. C. J., in Charnock's Trial, 12 id. 1454 (to the jury): "But then, gentlemen, as to what they [the accused] say, that the witnesses do testify by hearsay, — that is not evidence, but what they know themselves, or heard from the prisoners. . . . But whatsoever evidence has been given of any fact done within the witness' own knowledge, . . . that you are to take notice of as good evidence and consider of it."

Ante 1726, Chief Baron Gilbert, Evidence, 152: "The attestation of the witness must be to what he knows, and not to that only which he hath heard, for a mere hearsay is no evidence; for it is his knowledge that must direct the Court and jury in the judgment of the fact, and not his mere credulity, which is very uncertain and various in several persons; for testimony being but an appeal to the knowledge of another, if indeed he doth not know he can be no evidence."

1726, Ayliffe, Parergon, p. 540: "Testimony or evidence ought first of all to be given and founded on some principal corporeal sense of their own, according to the nature and quality of the fact, as on their sight, hearing, touching, tasting, or smelling; and not on the corporeal sense of another person. . . . And thus witnesses ought to depose appositely de proprio suo sensu, and not de sensu alieno."

Upon this principle, the testimony of one claiming to have knowled has constantly been rejected, when it appeared that he had lacked pe sonal observation.[1]

This objection to testimony, however, must be distinguished from the o jection based on the so-called Hearsay rule. Under the present principl the law declines to accept a witness X's statement (for example) that h knows A struck B, because it appears that X had no personal observatio but received his impressions from others' information. But if X were testify, "Y told me that A struck B first,' then he would appear to kno sufficiently the fact of Y's making the assertion, and the question then b comes whether Y's assertion, thus proved, is admissible. Then it is that th Hearsay rule rejects the proof of X's assertion as a statement untested b oath and cross-examination. In other words, so long as it is attempted t argue directly from the witness X's statement to the striking of B by A, th question is one of the sufficiency of X's knowledge; it is only when th assertion of Y, a person not in court, is put forward testimonially that w are concerned with the Hearsay rule in the strict sense. The distinction i more fully examined elsewhere (post, § 1361).

The exceptional cases, under the present principle, when knowledge founde on hearsay may suffice, are later considered (post, §§ 664–670).

[1] 1543, Rolfe v. Hampden, Dyer 53, b (two of the witnesses to a will "deposed upon the report of others," "but the jury paid little attention to the testimony aforesaid"; but this was merely an instance of the old practice for attesting witnesses, noted in Thayer, Prelim. Treat. on Evid. 97); 1881, R. v. Budge, 20 N. Br. 531 (surveyor's measurement of a street, between places pointed out to him by B., who was not called, excluded); 1849, Scales v. Desha, 16 Ala. 317 (purpose of discounting a note); 1901, Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Henry Shoe Co., 69 Ark. 302, 63 S. W. 50 (witness to the amount of timber cut); 1902, Trulock v. State, 70 id. 558, 69 S. W. 677 (testimony to the authenticity of a cartridge, based on what somebody told the witness excluded); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 1845 ("A witness can testify of those facts only which he knows of his knowledge, that is, which are derived from his own perceptions"); 1881, People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 394; 1874, Selma, R. & D. R. Co. v. Keith, 53 Ga. 181 (calculations of another person); 1874, Southern Life Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, ib. 546; 1892, Lamar v. Pearre, 90 id. 377, 17 S. E. 92 (the witness testified that she knew where the money for a purchase came from, yet admitted that at the time of the purchase she was too young to know this); 1884, Perry v. Burton, 111 Ill. 143 (knowledge from orders to an agent); 1852, Brooks v. Hazen, 3 G. Greene, 554; 1858, Williams v. Soutter, 7 Ia. 444; 1898, Lacy v. Kossuth Co., 106 id. 16, 75 N. W. 689 (whether a person was able to pay a bill; testimony by persons who had "made investigations and inquiries," admitted); 1879, Conely v. McDonald, 40 Mich. 152; 1889, Hoffman v. R. Co., 40 Minn. 60, 41 N. W. 301; 1866, Sherwood v. Houston, 41 Miss. 63 (knowledge by hearsay that M. was indebted to the heirs of P.); 1883, Chicago R. Co. v. Provine 61 id. 292 (book-entries); 1844, Chouteau v. Searcy, 8 Mo. 736; Mont. C. C. P. 1895, § 312 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1845); 1903, Quimby v. Ayers, — Nebr. —, 95 N. W. 464 (witness who had merely examined the probate records, held not qualified to testify to the insolvency of a decedent's estate); 1903, Donner v. State, — id. —, 95 N. W. 40 (identifying a shipment of cattle received as from a certain consignor; a weighmaster in the receiving yard, not allowed to testify to the consignor's identity from merely seeing the car-number entry in certain books kept by others); 1860, Rich v. Eldredge, 42 N. H. 158 (book entries); Or. C. C. P. 1892, § 682 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1846); 1867, Wood v. Sawyer, Phillips 276; 1874, Woodward v. State, 4 Baxt. 324 (the witness heard a shot and saw a man running, and when he learned that W. had made threats against the deceased he thought the man running must be W.; excluded); 1881, Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Burke, 55 Tex. 339; 1888, Gilbert v. Odum, 69 id. 673, 7 S. W. 510; 1895, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Reed, 88 id. 439, 31 S. W. 1058 (witnesses testifying without knowledge as to a foreman's authority over railroad hands). The following ruling is peculiar, and rests on the principle of § 654, ante: 1857, Willey v. Portsmouth, 35 N. H. 308 (the witness said that the place at which W. fell was within the highway; but he was not present when W. fell; held, that as he might have learned of the place's identity by admissions of the party's or otherwise in an adequate way, the answer was proper).

§ 658. (b) Knowledge need not be Positive or Absolute; Admissibility of a "Belief," "Impression," "Opinion," or the like. The second corollary of the general principle of knowledge is that the result of the witness' observation need not be positive or absolute knowledge. Such a degree of certainty cannot be demanded, even in theory (ante, § 650); it suffices if he had an opportunity of personal observation and did get some impressions from this observation. But in the attempt to name this quality of knowledge which suffices, the terms available are so loose and indefinite that other principles come naturally to introduce confusion. If positive knowledge is not required, does an "impression" or "belief" or "opinion" suffice? Here the operation of four different principles must be distinguished, because such terms may be criticised from the point of view of all four:

(1) "Belief" or "impression" may signify merely the degree of positiveness of his original observation of the facts. The witness may have had actual observation of the matter in hand, but the result may have been a not very definite or positive impression; for example, he saw a man and "thought" that it was the accused. In such cases there is no legal objection whatever to receiving such impression as the witness gained from his observation. In other words, the degree or quality of his knowledge, so far as there was actual personal observation by him, is no ground of objection.[1]

(2) "Belief" or "impression" may signify the degree of positiveness of the witness' recollection; i. e. may signify that he obtained entirely clear and positive impressions at the time, but that since then his memory has faded, and his recollection to-day is so weak that he is not able to call it more than an "impression" or to say more than "I think." The deficiency comes merely in the quality of his recollection. Here again, the law makes no objection on such grounds. It welcomes whatever quality of recollection he is able to bring. In general, then, where there has been actual observation, the quality of the impression received at the time and the quality of persistence of that impression are no grounds of objection; for the simple reason that Courts must accept the facts of human nature and must not insist on what they cannot fairly expect.

(3) "Belief" or "impression" may signify a lack of actual personal observation; when this is the case, the main principle (§§ 656, 657, ante) excludes such testimony. The shades of meaning in such expressions are often elusive; but if the present meaning appears, there is no question of the judicial attitude against admission:

1820, R. v. Dewhurst, 1 State Tr. N. s. 529, 590; Mr. Raines (cross-examining): "Upon your oath, did you not see something very like that which I have read to you?"; Witness: "I cannot recollect"; Mr. Raines: "Will you swear you do not believe what I have read to you?"; Bayley, J.: "It must be belief from recollection"; Mr. Raines: "I should have thought it was a legitimate question capable of being answered"; Bayley, J.: "it admits of a legitimate answer. It may not; because he might say 'I believe it, becau I have heard people say so.'"

[1] The authorities on this point are examined in dealing with Recollection (post, § 728); because, though the principles are well settled, the rulings do not always distinguish the exact objection involved, and must therefore be marshalled in one place. The rulings in the ensuing note of the present section are only those in which it is clear that the objection was based on a lack of actual personal observation.

1810, Chief Justice Swift, Evidence, 111: "A witness must swear to facts within knowledge and recollection, and cannot swear to mere matters of belief."

1820, Henderson, J., in State v. Allen, 1 Hawks 9: "The law requires that he w deposes to a fact should have the means of knowing it. Grounds of conjecture a opinions are not sufficient."

1839, Weston, C. J., in Clark v. Bigelow, 16 Me. 247: "'Impression,' though it m convey the idea of a certain degree of recollection, is an equivocal term. It may ha been derived from the information of others, or from some unwarrantable deduction the mind from premises not well established, . . . [in which case] it cannot in our jud ment be safely or legally received."

1856, Goodenow, J., in Lewis v. Brown, 41 Me. 451: "In general, the opinion of a w ness is not evidence; he must speak of facts. It may have been derived from so unwarrantable deduction of the mind, from premises not well established."

1859, Sawyer, J., in State v. Flanders, 38 N. H. 332: "An impression may mean understanding or belief of the fact as derived from some other source than personal o servation, — as the information of others"; and this would be not admissible.

1877, Brickell, C. J., in Wood v. Brewer, 57 Ala. 517: "A witness generally must dep to facts within his knowledge, and cannot be permitted to testify upon mere conjectu or belief."

What the Courts repudiate, then, is a mere guess, an exercise of the imagi tion, a suspicion, a conjecture, offered in place of the result of actual perso observation; it is from this point of view only that a "belief" or "opinio or "impression" is not to be received.[2]

(4) A "belief" or "impression" or "opinion" may, though otherwise a

[2] In the following rulings the testimony was excluded, except where otherwise stated: 1821, Redford v. Birley, 1 State Tr. N. s. 1071, 1171 (battery in dispersing a mob; Evans: "Do you believe there was [anybody cut]?"; disallowed; Holroyd, J.: "You must get that fact from a witness who saw the wound inflicted"); 1882, McDonald v. Jacobs, 77 Ala. 525, 527 ("reasons for belief" not amounting to personal knowledge); 1850, Jordan v. Foster, 11 Ark. 142 ("opinion" as a mere guess): 1886, Tait v. Hall, 71 Cal. 152, 12 Pac. 391 ("impression" of conduct, based on a guess from other acts); 1831, Bank v. Brown, Dudley Ga. 62, 65 ("The belief or persuasion of a witness cannot be received as evidence, unless it rests upon a sufficient legal foundation"); 1868, Macon & W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 38 Ga. 436 ("opinion," here based on inference, not sight; but admitted upon the facts); 1891, Terr. v. McKern, 2 Ida. 759, 26 Pac. 123 ("thought" the defendant received an object from another person, but didn't see it); 1834, Jones v. Chiles, 33 Ky. 33 (the witness "understood" that a certain possession existed); 1893, Lovejoy v. Howe, 55 Minn. 353, 354, 57 N. W. 57 (impression based on something heard, not on knowledge); 1846, Tibbetts v. Flanders, 18 N. H. 292 (understood); 1864, Kingsbury v. Moses, 45 id. 225 (impression); 1873, Higbie v. Ins. Co., 53 N. Y. 604 (by a physician, "an impression sufficient to satisfy his own mind, but not enough to h a medical opinion upon"); 1895, State v. Ly 117 N. C. 799, 23 S. E. 476 ("I met a l chunky man; it was dark; he had his back me; I took him to be L.," held admissible; only judged it was L. from the fact that I l heard he had gone up the road that day," h inadmissible); 1898, Farmers' Bank v. Sali 33 Or. 394, 54 Pac. 190 (one who had means observation allowed to state his "understa ing" as to the membership of a firm; " understanding was not based upon hearsay e dence"); 1839, Carmalt v. Post, 8 Watts (impression); 1860, Duvall's Ex'r v. Darby, Pa. 59 (same); 1900, Endowment Rank v. All — Tenn —, 58 S. W. 241 (physician's te mony that "he thought" deceased took overdose of medicine, excluded as "a mere c jecture"); 1879, Atchison R. Co. v. U. S., Ct. Cl. 141; Patten v. U. S., ib. 290 (the e mates of experts, roughly fixing a percentage gross cost or earnings as representing a cert element of the total, were rejected and the ite were carefully reckoned); 1896, Crane Co. Columbus Const. Co., 20 C. C. A. 233, 73 F 984 (an estimate of the cost of pipe-layi "mere guesses, prepared without perso knowledge of the facts," excluded). Comp the cases cited post, § 728, admitting testimo of "impressions."

missible, be obnoxious to the Opinion rule, because all the data on which it is founded may be capable of being stated fully by the witness to the jury, and thus his inferences from them become superfluous. The operation of this rule is examined in detail elsewhere (post, §§ 1962, 1969).

§ 659. (c) Knowledge must involve Rational Inferences from Adequate Data. The third corollary of the general principle of Knowledge (ante, § 656) is that the witness' knowledge (assuming it to be based on personal observation) must not appear to lack adequate data as its basis of inference. For example, when Sherlock Holmes tells his companion that the neatly dressed person who is seen passing on the street is a banker, the father of six children, and a German by birth, the ordinary intelligence will not credit a statement based on such apparently invisible data (or would not credit it from any one but the celebrated detective). Yet if a man passed by in working clothes daubed with lime and brickdust, the ordinary intelligence would admit that any observer had the right to assert positively that the man was a bricklayer. Thus it is that the law may reject testimony which appears to be founded on data so scanty that the witness' alleged inference from them may at once be pronounced absurd or extreme. The law denies to the witness the right, on such data, to assert that he knows.

This principle, however, sound as it is in theory, can seldom have frequent application. When the source of knowledge is so insufficient, Courts will rarely need to pronounce the formal exclusion of the testimony. Its weakness is self-exhibited. The risk of excluding a useful though small item of testimony is greater than the risk of admitting testimony capable of exaggeration. Cross-examination will usually furnish the exposure.

§ 660. Same: Inference of Identity of a Person by Voice or Appearance; of Age from Appearance; of Chattels from their Qualities; Miscellaneous Instances of Inadequate Knowledge. In the application of the foregoing principle, Courts have shown no tendency to follow a narrow policy of exclusion. In most of the instances it needs no argument to perceive that the testimony was at least worth receiving. It has been properly held, for example, that a witness may testify to a person's identity from his voice alone,[1] or from observing his stature, complexion, clothing, or other marks,[2] or

[1] 1660, Hulet's Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1185, 1187 (Counsel: "Did you mark the proportion of his body, or his habit, what disguise he was in?"; Witness: "He had a pair of freeze trunk breeches, and a vizor, with a grey beard"; Defendant: "I desire to know of him how he comes to know that I was there at that time?"; Witness: "By your voice"); 1692, Harrison's Trial, 12 id. 846, 850, 861, 862; 1806, The Threshers' Trial, 30 id. 197, 198, 204, 222; 1805, Picton's Trial, ib. 245; 1874, R. v. Castro (Tichborne Case), Charge of Cockburn, C. J., 4 ff.; 1895, Fussell v. State, 93 Ga. 450, 21 S. E. 97 (a voice heard in the darkness); 1903, Patton v. State, 117 id. 230, 43 S. E. 533 (witness to a voice, held not well qualified on the facts); 1895, Deal v. State, 140 Ind. 354, 39 N. E. 930; 1890, Ogden v. Illinois, 134 Ill. 599, 25 N. E. 755; 1901, State v. Herbert, 63 Kan. 516, 66 Pac. 235; 1870, Com. v. Williams, 105 Mass. 67 (hearing the voice only once before); 1884, State v. Hopkirk, 84 Mo. 288 (voice and motion); 1874, Brown v. Com., 76 Pa. 319, 328, 338 (one who carries on a conversation through the soil-pipe of a prison or through a speaking-tube may form an opinion as to the identity of the person speaking with him; here the witness was familiar with the speaker's voice).

For the cases admitting the sound of a voice as circumstantial evidence, see ante, § 222.

For identification by voice on the telephone, see post, § 669.

[2] 1830, R. v. Shaw, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 116 (mur-

from the sight of the person's photograph;[3] and that a witness may testi to a person's age[4] or intoxication[5] merely from his appearance. So, t chattels may be identified by their appearance and other qualities.[6] In su dry other instances the principle may need to be applied.[7] It may noted that of course the law does not refuse testimony based on artifici experimentation, merely as such.[8]

§ 661. Same: Testimony to Another Person's State of Mind. The arg ment has been made that, because we cannot directly see, hear, or feel t state of another person's mind, therefore testimony to another person's sta of mind is based on merely conjectural and therefore inadequate data. Th der; "a witness was called to prove comparison of shoes and shoe-marks; Parke, J., asked him if he had looked at the soles of the shoes and examined them with the footmarks before he put the shoe in the mark; the witness answered in the negative. Parke, J., desired the jury to reject the whole inquiry relating to the identification by shoe-marks"); 1882, Beale v. Posey, 72 Ala. 332 (mode of walking); 1902, Trulock v. State, 70 Ark. 558, 69 S. W. 677 (mode of walking); 1881, State v. Lucas, 57 Ia. 502, 10 N. W. 868 (a peculiar shrugging of the shoulders); 1872, State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 91 ("The law allows persons to testify to such identity or to such resemblance who have had an opportunity of seeing such persons, if but for an instant"); 1895, State v. Lytle, 117 N. C. 799, 23 N. E. 476 ("I judged it to be L. from his chunky build," held admissible); 1885, Lipes v. State, 15 Lea 125 (any person who had seen the defendant's feet, allowed to testify to their peculiarities).

For identification in general, see ante, § 413.

For the opinion rule, as applied to identity, see post, § 1977.

For the privilege against self-crimination, as applied to compulsory identification by voice or foot-measure, see post, § 2265.

[3] 1883, Brooke v. Brooke, 60 Md. 529, 533; 1886, Marion v. State, 20 Nebr. 240, 29 N. W. 911.

For the use of photographs to identify, see also post, § 792.

[4] 1875, Benson v. McFadden, 50 Ind. 433; 1896, State v. Bernstein, 99 Ia. 5, 68 N. W. 442 (selling liquor to a minor).

For the inference to age from appearance as circumstantial evidence, see ante, § 222.

For inference from a child's resemblance to its paternity, see ante, § 166.

For the exhibition of a person to the jury, as evidencing his age or paternity, see post, § 1154.

[5] 1878, Aurora v. Hillman, 90 Ill. 61.

For other ways of evidencing intoxication, see ante, § 235.

[6] 1887, State v. Rainsberger, 74 Ia. 204, 37 N. W. 153 (identification of a buggy by its rattle, allowed); 1873, Com. v. Aaron, 114 Mass. 255 (seeing sales of liquor which the witness supposes was whiskey and ale; admitted); Com. v. Dowdican, ib. 257 (seeing liquor which "looked like" whiskey, admitted); 1902, Ainsworth v. Lakin, 180 Id. 397, 62 N. E. 7 (identification of a wagon by its rattle, allowe

[7] 1852, Nolin v. Parmer, 21 Ala. 71 (a s veyor's knowledge of land); 1895, People Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697 (t a pistol-shot sounded as though fired insi a building, admitted); 1859, Babcock v. Ban 28 Conn. 306 (knowledge of another's pecunia condition); 1894, Carter v. Carter, 152 Ill. 4 28 N. E. 948, 38 N. E. 669 (testimony to unseen adultery, from sounds heard in an a joining room, admitted); 1864, Messer v. Regi niter, 32 Ia. 313 (surveyor's knowledge of lan 1852, Rich v. Jones, 9 Cush. 337 (goods e amined by an expert had not been identified the plaintiff's); 1866, Hamilton v. Nickerso 13 All. 352 (usage of trade; "such knowled of the practice and course of business as create the belief or conviction of its existence "witnesses who had active and constant e perience of the manner in which the tra was conducted in relation to the matter controversy"); 1872, Com. v. Pease, 1 Mass. 412 (knowledge of the mode of maki an established article several years before 1891, Lynch v. Moore, 154 id. 335 (habits of horse); 1880, State v. Reitz, 83 N. C. 635 (t defendant had lived with the witness three four weeks and had worn an old pair of boots his, twisting them out of shape in using them knowledge of the type of footprints held su cient); 1835, Burns v. Welch, 8 Yerg. 1 (capacity of a saw-mill); 1874, Albright v. C ley, 40 Tex. 113 (basis for estimating the nu ber of cattle in a range); 1898, Northern P. Co. v. Hayes, 30 C. C. A. 576, 87 Fed. 1 (how fast a train was going, by one who w struck by it from behind but did not see it; e cluded); 1849, Hopper v. Com., 6 Gratt. 6 (identity of a garment). The application of t principle should be left to the determination the trial Court: 1888, Stillwell Mfg. Co. Phelps, 130 U. S. 527, 9 Sup. 601; 1890, Mo tana R. Co. v. Warren, 137 id. 353, 11 Sup. 9

[8] 1886, Citizens' Gaslight Co. v. O'Brien, 1 Ill. 180, 8 N. E. 310; 1869, Swett v. Shumwa 102 Mass. 366; 1878, Williams v. Taunton, 1 Mass. 40; 1879, Eidt v. Cutter, 127 id. 524.

For the admissibility of experiments as cumstantial evidence, see ante, § 445. For t propriety of performing experiments before jury, see post, § 1161.

argument is finical enough; and it proves too much, for if valid it would forbid the jury to find a verdict upon the supposed state of a person's mind. If they are required and allowed to find such a fact, it is not too much to hear such testimony from a witness who has observed the person exhibiting in his conduct the operations of his mind:

1791, Answer of the Judges to the House of Lords, concerning Fox's Libel Act, 31 Geo. III, c. 60, 22 How. St. Tr. 300: "Your lordships' fourth question is, 'Is a witness produced before a jury in a trial as above, by the plaintiff, for the purpose of proving the criminal intentions of the writer, or by the defendant, to rebut the imputation, admissible to be heard as a competent witness in such trial before the jury?' . . . [Assuming that the criminal intent is material and allowable to be proved or denied at all, then] cases may be put where a witness is competent and admissible to prove the criminal intention, on the part of the prosecutor; and it may be stated as a general rule, that in all cases where a witness is competent and admissible to prove the criminal intention, a witness will also be competent to rebut the imputation."

1882, Bowen, L. J., in Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, L. R. 29 Ch. D. 459: "The state of a man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion. It is true that it is very difficult to prove what the state of a man's mind at a particular time is; but if it can be ascertained, it is as much a fact as anything else."

1818, Tilghman, C. J., in Delancy v. Little, 4 S. & R. 503 (admitting testimony by Z. of what C. M. intended in locating a tract): "It has been argued that the intention of Charles McCormick, being confined to his own breast, was not a fact to which the witness could swear. This is a very subtle argument; but I cannot say that I feel the force of it. A man's intentions may be manifested by his words or his actions, and, when known, may be sworn to with as much certainty as any other fact. When a witness undertakes to swear to a thing of that kind, the jury who hear the oath will value it at what it is worth."[1]

From the foregoing question, distinguish the questions (1) whether the Opinion rule affects testimony to another person's state of mind (post, § 1962), and (2) whether the Interest rule prevents a witness from testifying to his own state of mind (ante, § 581).

[1] Accord: 1902, Spencer v. Peterson, 41 Or. 257, 68 Pac. 519 (intent as to dedication of a way); 1840, Devling v. Williamson, 9 Watts 311, 316 (a witness to an interview; that "the contract was considered at an end by all parties," admitted); 1885, Plank v. Grimm, 62 Wis. 251, 253, 22 N. W. 470 (by a defendant in assault, as to his belief in the plaintiff's intention in wielding a weapon). Contra, but only more or less unsound: 1903, Durrence v. Northern Nat'l Bank, 117 Ga. 385, 43 S. E. 726 (by B., that D. bought land in good faith and without notice, excluded); 1857, Edwards v. Currier, 43 Me. 484 ("one not a party to the sale could not know the motives of those who were parties"); 1869, Gilman v. Riopelle, 18 Mich. 162 (excluded, "unless the motive was expressed"); 1866, State v. Garvey, 11 Minn. 163 (whether an assailant in firing intended to shoot the witness); 1901, State v. Pierce, 85 Id. 112, 88 N. W. 417 (abortion; the defendant claimed that he was merely treating the woman for a vaginal disease; the woman's testimony as to his purpose in the operation, excluded; such a ruling affronts common sense); 1901, Peterson v. State, 63 Nebr. 251, 88 N. W. 550 (whether the accused believed certain liquor to be intoxicating, excluded); 1897, Rucker v. Bolles, 25 C. C. A. 600, 80 Fed. 504 (whether a person intended to remain a resident of New York; an acquaintance allowed to testify to his conduct only, not his intention); 1897, State v. Carrington, 15 Utah 480, 50 Pac. 526 ("no witness can state with what purpose another performed an act"); 1898, State v. Kilburn, 16 id. 187, 52 Pac. 277 (whether the defendant meant, by certain expressions, that he was going to steal, excluded, from a hearer); 1898, Reese v. Min. Co., 17 id. 489, 54 Pac. 759 (that the deceased knew the facts affecting his danger, excluded).

The Alabama rulings are also contra, and seem to have been the origin of this heresy; but they are so mixed with the application of the Opinion rule that they are placed under that head with the other Alabama rulings (post, § 1966).

§ 662. Same: Improbabilities in Scientific Testimony. The inexpedien of applying the present principle (ante, § 659) in any but rare instances the more apparent when a Court assumes to intrude into the techni domain of the engineer, the physician, and other scientific professional m and to deny the possibilities of knowledge therein, by refusing to listen that which appears, to the lay understanding of the tribunal, as an incredi assertion or an unlikely inference. Sometimes the exclusion has rested, wholly on the impossibility of knowing the matter, nor yet wholly on insufficiency of the particular witness' data of inference, but on mix grounds, amounting to this, that the subject is one in which certain a accurate results are difficult to reach and upon which most persons' opinio will be merely notional and conjectural, so that it is not worth while listen to testimony at all. In other words, the Court claims for the jury exclusive privilege of guessing.[1] The whole theory is of the past, unpracti and ill-founded, and is obnoxious to the modern principle of receiving wh ever light can be thrown upon the issue by competent persons and t leaving their credit to the jury:

1851, Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Clark, 12 Ired. 154: "When professors of the scie swear they can thus distinguish, it would be taking too much on themselves, for pers who like Judges, are not adepts, to say the witness cannot thus distinguish, and on t ground refuse to hear his opinions at all. By such a course the judge would undert of his own sufficiency to determine how far a particular science, not possessed by h can carry human knowledge, and to determine it in opposition to the professors in t science."[2]

§ 663. Same: Speculative Testimony to Personal Injuries and to Valu (1) In comparatively recent years, a few Courts, led by that of New Yo have refused to accept, in personal injury trials, testimony as to the poss time of persistence of the injury or the possible development of certain con quences. As to this, first, the same answer may be made as to the gene attitude already considered. If physicians are willing to estimate cert consequences as probable or possible, it is hardly proper for judges to affi the untrustworthiness of these conclusions. The worthlessness, in cas

[1] The following rulings illustrate various aspects of the tendency: 1857, State v. Knight, 43 Me. 133 (that no such a difference exists between the appearances of the blood of a man and of a sheep as will permit the identification of the former, excluded); 1859, Anon., 37 Miss. 58 (in a bastardy case, testimony that pregnancy from a first coition was highly improbable was rejected by the Court as "too uncertain, indefinite, and hypothetical," "mere speculative opinion"); 1900, Smitson v. S. P. Co., 37 Or. 74, 60 Pac. 907 (Moore, J.: "There may be certain physical facts the proof of the existence of which must necessarily overcome, as a matter of law, all testimony to the contrary. The present is not an age of miracles, and, if testimony be introduced at a trial which transcends the ordinary laws of the universe, the Court, being obliged to take judicial notice of such laws, would probably be compelled to reject such testimony"; appli it to testimony about a railroad accident); 1 McLain v. Com., 99 Pa. 99 (the result of sc tific investigation, that human blood canno distinguished from that of some animals, was sanctioned as binding). Compare the Opi rule, as applied to testimony to possibility probability (post, § 1976).

Distinguish those cases in which a mere sibility is not relevant in the cause: 1873, D v. State, 38 Md. 35 ("a mere possibility, n rational probability"; here the question "what kind of an instrument could have flicted the wounds?", and it was allowed u the circumstances).

[2] Accord: 1870, Horton v. Green, 64 N 67; compare the criticisms of Bentham, tionale of Judicial Evidence, b. V, c. XVI, (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 87).

instances, of the testimony of hired and unscrupulous physicians is no more a reason for rejecting all such testimony indiscriminately than the constant abuse of expert testimony generally is a reason for excluding all expert testimony without distinction. Next, it must be said that the Courts have in many of these rulings proceeded upon a confused apprehension of a legitimate doctrine of the law of Torts, namely, that recovery may be had for such injurious consequences only as are fairly certain or probable, not for merely possible harm. That is, a Court, in holding that the physician may not testify to possible harmful consequences, is not always ruling that testimony to possible consequences is evidentially improper, but is meaning to rule that such possible consequences are as a matter of substantive law not entitled to consideration at all. This is often the real explanation for such rulings.[1] But the evidential doctrine in question has little standing elsewhere,[2] and should not be extended. (2) At one time it was advanced as a reason for rejecting opinions as to value that they dealt with a matter essentially uncertain, speculative, and incapable of definite ascertainment, and hence should not be the subject of testimony at all. The ground of the opponents of value-testimony was soon shifted to the Opinion rule, and the contest has since been settled in that field (post, § 1940); but the present reason, though of little consequence in the law of to-day, was advanced by eminent judges in leading opinions:

1840, Nelson, C. J., in Lincoln v. R. Co., 23 Wend. 434 (rejecting testimony to the probable loss of profits in business): "There may be a tolerable conjecture of the amount of damage, . . . but their opinions can rise no higher than mere conjecture. In the nature of the case no set or series of facts exists to which the application of their peculiar knowledge would naturally lead with anything like mathematical certainty. . . . Assume the whole [of the grounds] to be true, and loss does not follow with anything like the exactness that exists in matters of science and skill, more especially to any given amount. Even with the jury the damage, beyond the actual expenses out, can at best rise but little above conjecture."[3]

§ 664. Negative Knowledge; Testimony that a Fact would have been Seen or Heard had it occurred. In applying the foregoing principle requiring that

[1] Compare especially the second and sixth cases cited: 1872, Filer v. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 45 (whether an inflammation would probably recur, admitted); 1884, Strohm v. R. Co., 96 id. 306; 1888, Turner v. Newburgh, 109 id. 308, 16 N. E. 344 (whether injury caused disease, admitted); 1889, Griswold v. R. Co., 115 id. 63, 21 N. E. 726 (distinguishing future recovery from present harm from the access of a new disease); 1889, McClain v. R. Co., 116 id. 467, 22 N. E. 1062 (same); 1891, Wallace v. Oil Co., 128 id. 580, 27 N. E. 956. Compare the citations under the Opinion rule (post, § 1976).

[2] 1889, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas, 119 Ind. 592, 21 N. E. 968 (probable result of an injury, admitted); 1850, Dupré v. Desmaret, 5 La. An. 591; Dupré v. Prescott, ib. 592; 1860, Paty v. Martin, 15 id. 620 (in these cases the testimony was not rejected; it was merely declared insufficient); 1888, Peterson v. R. Co., 38 Minn. 515, 39 N. W. 485 (probability of recovery, admitted).

[3] Accord: 1837, Norman v. Wells, 17 Wend. 162, Cowen, J.; 1847, Fish v. Dodge, 4 Denio 318. It must be noted that the present reason, though no longer advanced, was quite different from that based on the Opinion rule; and thus it was possible for the same Court to reject value-testimony on the present ground (Lincoln v. R. Co., 23 Wend. 43 [value of business profits) and to admit it when the present objection did not exist (Briil v. Flagler, ib. 356). Moreover, traces of this notion still survive at the present day in some courts and classes of cases, — as where a Court rejects an estimate of what the value of land would have been if a railroad had not passed by (post, § 1943).

the witness' inferences be based on adequate data (ante, § 659), Courts ha often been asked to exclude testimony based on what may be called negati knowledge, i. e. testimony that a fact did not occur, founded on the witness' fa ure to hear or see a fact which he would supposedly have heard or seen if it h occurred. But there is no inherent weakness in this kind of knowledge. rests on the same data of the senses. It may even sometimes be strong than affirmative impressions. The only requirement is that the witne should have been so situated that in the ordinary course of events would have heard or seen the fact had it occurred:

1850, Chilton, J., in Thomas v. Degraffenreid, 17 Ala. 607 (the issue being the title slaves): "The witness C. states his intimacy with the family of A. T. [the alleged owne . . . If his relation to the family was such as he would in all probability have known the existence of a fact ostensible and notorious in its character had it existed, his wa of all knowledge on the subject may be received as some evidence of its non-existence."

1876, Cooley, C. J., in Chambers v. Hill, 34 Mich. 524 (excluding the testimony of neighbor, who had formerly lived a short time in the family, as to conversations in t family about a son's absence): "Had the witness lived in the family at the time, t proposed evidence might have had some value, especially as the subject was one of hi importance to the parties concerned and, if spoken of at all, would have been likely to discussed more or less by all the family. But the fact that a matter of family concern not talked about before the neighbors is no evidence that it is not talked about at all."

1880, Stone, J., in Killen v. Lide, 65 Ala. 508: "Want of knowledge of things open the senses, in a person who had the opportunity of knowing such fact if it existed, is so evidence, though slight, that the thing did not exist."

This sort of testimony, on the conditions above stated, is constantly receive — particularly in proof of the failure to give railroad signals, the loss of chattel, the absence of a witness, the non-existence of a fictitious person, t non-payment of money, and other negative facts.[1] The analogies of th

[1] In the following rulings the testimony was received, except where otherwise noted: Eng.: 1780, Maskall's Trial, 21 How. St. Tr. 681 (a person at a riot, not seeing the accused among the active part of the mob); 1832, R. v. King, 5 C. & P. 123 (fictitious character of a name forged; testimony by a person who was otherwise unacquainted with the locality, but had made special inquiries, was admitted); 1834, R. v. Brannan, 6 id. 326 (clerk in one department of a large commercial house, admitted to prove that no customer of a certain name was known to it); Ala.: 1850, Thomas v. Degraffenreid, 17 Ala. 607 (one who had lived 25 years in the family, who never knew or heard of a certain member being given and having certain slaves); 1853, Gilbert v. Gilbert, 22 id. 533 (relatives of the deceased, living in the neighborhood, who never heard of a will being made, excluded); 1853, Nelson v. Iverson, 24 id. 17 (an intimate friend who lived near by, who never knew of a transfer of a slave); 1857, Pool v. Devers, 30 id. 675 (did not see money given); 1858, Ward v. Reynolds, 32 id. 389, semble (a neighbor of old standing, who never knew or heard of a slave being unsound); 1859, Blakey's Heirs v. Blakey's Ex'x, 33 id. 614, 618 (one who had often boarded with the testator, and had never known of a "serious difficulty" between his wife and hi sell); 1875, Bennett v. State, 52 id. 370, semb (did not see or hear a person leave the room 1880, Killen v. Lide, 65 id. 508 (excluding tes mony that the witness would have known if h friend L. had any money, but believed he ha none); 1884, Tesney v. State, 77 id. 33, 37 (tes mony of a bystander, in a position to hear, th he did not hear the defendant curse); 1897, Ba ton v. State, 115 id. 1, 22 So. 585 (not finding revolver, after searching in the likeliest plac admitted); 1900, Tennessee C. I. & R. Co. Hunsford, 125 id. 349, 28 So. 45 (if in a positio to observe, allowable; here as to the ringing an engine-bell, etc.); Cal.: 1894, People Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 518 (police-off cer's search, held sufficient); 1896, People Sanders, 114 id. 216, 46 Pac. 153 (that a sheri who had searched the whole region had not bee able to find a trace of one J. K., admitted, t show that no such person existed); D. C. 1895, Le Cointe v. U. S., 7 D. C. App. 16 (l a person present, that he heard no loud tones etc.); Conn.: 1849, Abel v. Fitch, 20 Conn. 9 (arbitrators, testifying that they did not see a interlineation in the submission, and did no principle are seen in the rules admitting testimony of inability to find a document, to prove its loss (post, §§ 1196, 1678), or to find an attesting witness, to prove his absence (post, § 1312); of the absence of an entry in a public record (post, § 1633) or in an account-book (post, §§ 1531, 1556), to prove that no such transaction took place; of the absence of repute in a family (post, § 1495), to prove that the event of family history did not occur; and of the lack of traces or news of a person or thing (ante, §§ 158–160) to show circumstantially that the person or thing is deceased, or non-existent, or is absent.

3. Hearsay Knowledge exceptionally admitted.

§ 665. (1) Official Records; (2) Scientific Instruments and Tables (Vacuum Rays, etc.); (3) Expert Learning founded on Books. Under the general principle of Knowledge (ante, §§ 656, 657), testimony founded not on personal observation, but on the information of others, is inadmissible. But this cannot be enforced as a rule of unbending rigidity. There must be exceptions; for the affairs of life often recognize a practical trustworthiness in beliefs not founded altogether on personal observation. The law of evihear the subject of it argued); Fla.: 1900, Gray v. State, 42 Fla. 174, 28 So. 53 (failure of neighbors to see a person about his home); Ga.: 1848, Matthews v. Poythress, 4 Ga. 287, 295 (by a third person, that the plaintiff had never received value for a note); 1853, Johnson v. State, 14 id. 63 (a person working on a road, that he saw no one pass during a given time); 1881, McConnell v. State, 67 id. 635 (in general); 1896, Killian v. R. Co., 97 id. 727, 25 S. E. 384, semble (in general); Ill.: 1857, Coughlin v. People, 18 Ill. 267 (by a bystander, that the defendant did not strike the blow); 1861, Great Western R. Co. v. Hanks, 25 id. 242 (by an agent, that he did not make a purchase alleged); 1865, Rockwood v. Poundstone, 38 id. 201 (by a witness to boundaries, that he did not see a landmark); 1866, Frizell v. Cole, 42 id. 363 (by a bystander, that certain words were not spoken); 1882, Pennsylvania Co. v. Boylan, 104 id. 595, 599 (testimony by a track-workman, as to defective planks, that he did not know of any and would have known of them if there); Ind.: 1882, Burchfield v. State, 82 Ind. 584 (by a bystander, that he did not hear a shot from a certain place); Ia.: 1898, Trimble v. Tantlinger, 104 Ia. 665, 74 N. W. 25 (non-hearing of certain words in a conversation, inadmissible); Mass.: 1824, Com. v. Hershell, Thacher Cr. C. 70, 74 (to disprove that the defendant had sent goods to Charleston, testimony was received of the carter usually employed by him in shipping, that he had carried no such goods for the defendant); 1856, Com. v. Cooley, 6 Gray 352, 354 (by a bystander, that he did not hear anything said); 1898, Walsh v. R. Co., 171 Mass. 52, 50 N. E. 453 (that a passer-by did not hear the locomotive-bell rung); 1899, McMahon v. McHale, 174 id. 320, 54 N. E. 854 (that employees saw no one inspect a derrick); Mich.: 1874, People v. Marion, 29 Mich. 31, 38 (that no such officer existed in the county, the witness having been personally acquainted with all); 1876, Chambers v. Hill, 34 id. 524 (quoted supra); 1882, Marcott v. R. Co., 49 id. 101, 13 N. W. 374 (the question "Could the whistle have blown anywhere near C. station and you not have heard it?" was excluded, because the witness might have been otherwise occupied so as not to notice the bell; this is erroneous); 1884, People v. Sharp, 53 id. 523, 525, 19 N. W. 168 (sheriff's failure to find an alleged subscribing witness, admitted to prove the name to be fictitious); 1894, Edwards v. Three Rivers, 102 id. 153, 60 N. W. 454 (whether a person had been lame, had varicose veins, etc.; that intimate acquaintances had never known of it, admitted); N. H.: 1844, Lyford v. Thurston, 16 N. H. 399, 407 (by a deed's subscribing witness, that he did not see any consideration paid); N. Y.: 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 192, 194 (rape; an occasional resident in a family, not allowed to testify to not seeing any improper liberties said by the prosecutrix to have been taken with her secretly by the defendant); N. C.: Purnell v. R. Co., 122 N. C. 832, 29 S. E. 953 (by persons near cars, that they saw no flagman's light); Or.: 1900, State v. Mims, 36 Or. 315, 61 Pac. 888 (carrying weapons); U. S.: 1897, Rhodes v. U. S., 25 C. C. A. 186, 79 Fed. 740 (whether a person had sore eyes; relatives and fellow-soldiers allowed to testify that they did not see the disease); 1902, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Watson, — U. S. —, 23 Sup. 681 (setting fire to cotton); Vt.: 1875, State v. Phair, 48 Vt. 377 (by a passenger in a midnight train, that he did not see A. on it); Wash.: 1898, State v. Lattin, 19 Wash. 57, 52 Pac. 314 (by one living with the deceased, that he had never seen the latter with a pistol); Wis.: 1873, Ralph v. R. Co., 32 Wis. 181 (that a person did or did not receive an order from the other).

dence must follow the facts of life as closely as is consistent with caution In a number of instances it has recognized exceptions to the rule.

(1) The records of a public office are not personally known by the officia successors to be authentic. But their place of custody is of itself sufficien circumstantial evidence of genuineness (post, § 2158); and for much th same reason the belief of the succeeding incumbents is recognized as com petent knowledge. In this and a few related ways, the testimony of a publi officer, and even of private persons having to do with a mass of records, may be received.[1] So, too, a public officer's certificate or entry of a transactio actually performed by his subordinates, not by himself, may be received. But this is not conceded for the account-books of a private person.[2]

(2) The use of scientific instruments, apparatus, and calculating-tables involves to some extent a dependence on the statements of other persons even of anonymous observers. Yet, on the one hand, it is not feasible fo the scientific man to test every instrument himself; while, on the othe hand, he finds that practically the standard methods are sufficiently to b trusted. Thus, the use of a vacuum-ray machine may give correct knowl edge, though the user may neither have seen the object with his own eye nor have made the calculations and adjustments on which the machine' trustworthiness depends. The adequacy of knowledge thus gained is recog nized for a variety of standard instruments.[4] In some instances the calcu lating tables or statistical results are admitted directly, under an exceptio to the Hearsay rule.[5]

(3) The data of every science are enormous in scope and variety. No on professional man can know from personal observation more than a minut fraction of the data which he must every day treat as working truths Hence a reliance on the reported data of fellow-scientists, learned by perusing

[1] Ala. Code 1897, § 1798 (usury; representative of deceased borrower, on ten days' notice, may testify "by swearing that he believes the contract to be usurious," if plaintiff was lender, unless plaintiff on oath in court denies the facts proposed to be sworn to); 1894, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Keegan, 152 Ill. 413, 418, 39 N. E. 33 (personal knowledge of existence of abstracts, etc., made before the fire of 1871, not required); 1886, Worcester v. Northborough, 140 Mass. 397, 402, 5 N. E. 491 (clerk of adjutant-general's office, of over twenty years' service, allowed to testify to custom of office prior to his incumbency); 1897, Westfield Cigar Co. v. Ins. Co., 169 id. 382, 47 N. E. 1026 (a city engineer, as to the official actions of his office, though really performed by a predecessor, admitted); 1884, Anderson v. Volmer, 83 Mo. 403, 407 (bill of goods sold; witness knowing nothing of it except from his books, excluded); 1897, Southern I. C. Line v. R. Co., — Tenn. —, 42 S. W. 529 (statements as to car mileage, etc., made by the general manager of the plaintiff, admitted, though not based in every detail on his own observation); 1890, Hill v. Kerr, 78 Tex. 217, 14 S. W. 566 (knowledge of the filing and date of filing of surveyor's notes, based in part on their mere presence in the office admitted).

[2] Post, § 1635.

[3] Post, §§ 1530, 1555.

[4] The cases on vacuum rays, which dea chiefly with photographs, are placed post, § 795 other examples are as follows: 1898, More' Estate, 121 Cal. 608, 54 Pac. 97 (counting shee by a registering-machine, verified by the witnes as accurate in its operation, allowed); 1897 Hatcher v. Dunn, 102 Ia. 411, 71 N. W. 34 (a thermometer used in making tests, the varia tions indicated by a certificate of test made a Yale College and attached to the instrument admitted); Oh. Rev. St. 1898, § 1058 (surveyo not to testify to land-survey until he has sworn if required, that his chain or measure was o legal standard); 1901, State v. McDaniel, 39 Or 161, 65 Pac. 520 (fire department secretary allowed to testify from an automatic indicato that no alarm had sounded); 1896, Grayson v Lynch, 163 U. S. 468, 16 Sup. 1064 (veterinar surgeons in the Department of Agriculture allowed to testify to the districts particularly infected with Texas cattle-fever, though they ha not personally been there).

[5] Post, § 1706.

their reports in books and journals. The law must and does accept this kind of knowledge from scientific men. On the one hand, a mere layman, who comes to court and alleges a fact which he has learned only by reading a medical or a mathematical book, cannot be heard. But, on the other hand, to reject a professional physician or mathematician because the fact or some facts to which he testifies are known to him only upon the authority of others would be to ignore the accepted methods of professional work and to insist on finical and impossible standards. Yet it is not easy to express in usable form that element of professional competency which distinguishes the latter case from the former. In general, the considerations which define the latter are (a) a professional experience, giving the witness a knowledge of the trustworthy authorities and the proper source of information, (b) an extent of personal observation in the general subject, enabling him to estimate the general plausibility, or probability of soundness, of the views expressed, (c) the impossibility of obtaining information on the particular technical detail except through reported data in part or entirely. The true solution must be to trust the discretion of the trial judge, exercised in the light of the nature of the subject and of the witness' equipments. The decisions show in general a liberal attitude in receiving technical testimony based on professional reading.[6]

§ 666. (4) Execution and Contents of Documents, not personally observed. (a) A witness who testifies to the execution of a document, not merely to the handwriting,[1] will usually have seen the very act of affixing the signature.[2] Nevertheless, he may have observed circumstances which will suffice in place of this. The sufficiency of such circumstantial evidence is dealt with under the subject of Authentication of Documents (post, §§ 2131, 2148–2154). Moreover, he may have seen and heard the maker's subsequent acknowledgment of the document's genuineness. Such an acknowledgment would, as against the maker himself, be sufficient as an admission (post, §§ 1300, 2131); but, apart from that, it is an act of adoption of the document, equivalent to a reëxecution, and hence is now universally conceded to be a sufficient basis of testimony (post, § 1648). In the case of wills, the execution has been by statute everywhere made a formal act, in which the attesting witness' presence is technically necessary (post, § 2456), so that the ordinary principle

[6] 1879, Central R. Co. v. Mitchell, 63 Ga. 176, 180 (based partly on book-learning; admitted); 1901, New York P. & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 94 Md. 24, 50 Atl. 423 (a private surveyor not allowed to testify that certain marks of the U. S. survey signified the altitude; a singular ruling); 1872, Howard v. Gt. Western Co., 109 Mass. 385 (a witness who had made a study of coals, etc., yet not dealt in them, and testified to a fuel's composition, admitted); 1888, Slocovich v. Ins. Co., 108 N. Y. 62, 14 N. E. 802 (shipping-expert; knowledge founded on Lloyd's books, etc., admitted); 1903, Scott v. R. Co., — Or. —, 72 Pac. 594 (an engineer, not experienced in railroad building, but acquainted with the scientific literature, and otherwise experienced, allowed to testify to the approved slope of a railroad embankment).

For the cases concerning such testimony to medical matters, foreign law, and values or prices, see post, §§ 687, 690, 719.

For a physician's testimony based on the patient's statement of symptoms, see post, § 688.

[1] For handwriting, see post, § 693.

[2] 1869, Filley v. Angell, 102 Mass. 68 (excluded, where the attesting witness was not present at a note's execution). On this point, compare the ancient practice (post, § 1510; Thayer, Prelim. Treat. Evid. 97).

of testimonial knowledge has ceased to operate, and the requirements of the statute are the sole tests.

(b) A witness to the contents of a document may sometimes lack personal observation; but this rule is best examined in dealing with the subject of copies in general (post, § 1277).

§ 667. (5) Testifying to One's Own Age; or (6) to Another Person's Name. (5) Strictly speaking, one cannot know his exact age except upon hearsay information; for he is not capable of knowing this, or anything, until an appreciable time after birth. But practically a person's belief on this point has a satisfactory basis. Courts have commonly preferred to accept this practical certainty rather than to insist on academic nicety.[1] But in any case one may know whether at a particular time he was of one age or another, if the difference is as much as the time that must have brought him to the age of observation.[2] Moreover, a person who does not know the date of another's birth or of his own may know, by the association of events, whether he or the other was over or under a certain age at a certain time.[3] Even if, from the present point of view, testimony to one's own age is not to be received, yet it may be regarded as asserting the family reputation on the subject, and the latter may thus be received under the exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1493).

(6) A person's name is the title by which habitually he calls himself and others call him. To know a person's name, therefore, is to have heard him so called by himself and by others. In strictness, such an utterance is not hearsay (post, § 1772), except where it is made as an assertion of fact. But, though it may be hearsay, as a source of information, yet it is universally relied upon as a source of knowledge. Courts have commonly accepted the testimony founded upon it.[4]

[1] 1896, People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 46 Pac. 915; 1901, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Lewondowski, 190 Ill. 301, 60 N. E. 497; 1892, State v. McClain, 49 Kan. 730, 734, 31 Pac. 790 (seduction; prosecutrix' testimony to her age, admitted, her parents being dead); 1886, Com. v. Stevenson, 142 Mass. 468, 8 N. E. 341, semble; 1898, Com. v. Hollis, 170 id. 433, 49 N. E. 632; 1895, Com. v. Phillips, 162 id. 504, 39 N. E. 109 (rape-prosecutrix under age of consent); 1876, Cheever v. Congdon, 34 Mich. 295; 1892, Houlton v. Manteuffel, 51 Minn. 185, 187, 53 N. W. 541 (action on a note); 1898, State v. Bowser, 21 Mont. 133, 53 Pac. 179 (rape-prosecutrix under age of consent); 1896, State v. Marshall, 137 Mo. 463, 36 S. W. 619 (admitting it; but still intimating that where the witness appears on cross-examination to be speaking from mere hearsay the statement will be excluded; yet all testimony as to one's own age is founded on hearsay); 1897, State v. Marshall, ib. 463, 39 S. W. 63, semble; 1903, Hancock v. Supreme Council, — N. J. Eq. — 55 Atl. 246 (a witness allowed to testify to his own and his elder brother's approximate age; good opinion by Dixon, J.); 1895, Brown v. Mitchell, 88 Tex. 350, 31 S. W. 621 (knowledge of sonship, based in part upon the mother calling him her son); 1876, State v. Cain, 9 W. Va. 569; 1898, Dodge v. State, 100 Wis. 294, 75 N. W. 954. Contra: 1846, Doe v. Ford, 3 U. C. Q. B. 353.

[2] 1879, Hill v. Eldredge, 126 Mass. 234 (whether he was 16 or 21 years old at a certain time).

[3] 1870, Foltz v. State, 33 Ind. 217 (whether another was over 14).

[4] 1744, Heath's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 152 (Mr. Harward, objecting to a statement that the witness saw Lady Altham at Wexford: "This evidence is founded upon a supposition that the lady he saw at Wexford was the lady Altham; he says he was only told it was she, and cannot say it was of his own knowledge"; Witness: "I am pretty certain the lady I saw was lady Altham. I am told, sir, that you are counsellor Harward; am not I to believe you are? I am told that gentleman is counsellor Daly; I am morally assured of it, and I believe it"); 1857, R. v. Toole, 7 Cox Cr. 266 (one who merely saw X sign his name, admitted to prove the name).

Compare the cases cited ante, §§ 270, 413, post, § 2156, some of which apply this principle. Compare also the following: 1848, R. v.

§ 668. (7) Conversations through an Interpreter. When A speaks with B through an interpreter, because of ignorance of B's language, A cannot of his own hearing know what B said; he depends on the interpreter's report. Here no exception has been recognized to the general rule (though it might well have been). The witness A is allowed to testify only to what he heard from the interpreter, and the interpreter must be called to testify to what B said to him.[1] If, however, B is a party, whose admissions can be used, then the interpreter is to be regarded as B's agent, and the agent's statements on B's behalf (being in a language understood by the witness) are usable as B's admissions.[2]

§ 669. (8) Information received by Telephone. When a witness testifies to a conversation heard by him over the telephone, two kinds of questions arise, in which the present principle is involved.

(1) The question of the identity or personality of the antiphonal speaker may arise. How can A know that the person speaking to him was really B? Here the principle of Authentication, with its related applications to letters and telegrams, is involved, and the precedents can best be considered in comparison (post, § 2155).

(2) The question of the tenor of the utterance may arise. Assuming that B was really the speaker, how can A know that B did utter the words? When A and B converse directly at the instrument, A's knowledge is based directly on his sense of hearing, aided by a scientific instrument of accepted correctness, and hence is receivable (on the principle of § 665, ante). But if A, instead of speaking directly, converses with a clerk or operator, and the latter reports B's utterances to A, then A is no longer a witness having personal knowledge. Here three solutions present themselves. (a) The strict rule of personal knowledge (ante, § 657) may be applied, and A's testimony be excluded.[1] (b) Or, an exception to that rule may be recognized, on the analogy of the foregoing exceptions, and of the exceptions to the Hearsay rule for regular entries in the course of business (post, § 1517) and of commercial reports (post, § 1702). (c) In any case, the doctrine of admissions may be invoked, where one of the speakers is a party to the cause, just as it may be for interpreters (ante, § 668). If B had sent his clerk to A to report orally B's orders or agreements, the clerk's statements would unquestionably be used as B's admissions. In the same way, the clerk's or the operator's report may be used against B, on the theory that the latter has O'Doherty, 6 State Tr. N. s. 831, 884 (challenge to array; to prove the religion of a qualified juror, one who had not inquired of the juror himself but spoke from unspecified hearsay, excluded).

[1] The cases are collected under § 1810, post (Hearsay rule). For other principles applicable to interpreters and translators, see post, §§ 811, 1672.

[2] 1773, Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 20 How. St. Tr. 123, Gould, J.; 1903, Meacham v. State, — Fla. —, 33 So. 983 (embezzlement from G.; conversation between G. and defendant, interpreted by W., allowed to be proved against G. by L., a bystander, who heard W., but did not understand Spanish, the language of G.); 1885, Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 489; 1865, Camerlin v. Palmer Co., 10 All. 541; 1892, Com. v. Vose, 157 Mass. 393, 32 N. E. 355 (abortion; defendant spoke English, deceased French, witness French; testimony to the conversation between defendant and deceased through witness, received).

[1] 1888, Wilson v. Coleman, 81 Ga. 299, 6 S. E. 693 (where the plaintiff was informed by his clerk of the answer).

made the former his agent for the purpose of communication. This theory has thus far sufficed for the Courts.[2]

§ 670. (9) Testimony of Deceased or Absent Persons, under the Hearsay Exceptions. Under the exceptions to the Hearsay rule the testimony of the witness deceased or absent must equally be based on personal observation. The testimony is admitted in spite of its not having been given on the stand subject to the test of cross-examination; but still it is testimony, and the person making the statements must have the means of knowledge expected normally of every witness. Nevertheless, there as here, exceptions to this requirement are recognized; for example, in statements of Family History, the person's knowledge is usually based on the family-reputation on the subject (post, § 1486); in Official Documents, the entry of an assessor or the certificate of a recorder of deeds is sometimes based on hearsay (post, § 1635). These exceptions, being peculiar to the kind of statement offered, are better dealt with under the respective subjects of the Hearsay rule.

4. Hypothetical Questions.

§ 672. General Theory. Suppose the facts of an affray are in issue, and it is disputed whether A or B was the aggressor. A witness is asked, "Did you have an opportunity to observe the situation?" He answers, "I did; I was at the place at the time, and saw the affray." Then, "Is it your belief that A or B struck first?" and he expresses his belief. Suppose, again, the issue is as to the mode of a death, and certain indicia are in question. A physician is asked, "Have you considered the matter of a congestion of the windpipe with reference to the cause of death?" Answer, "I have." Then "What mode of death, if any, does it indicate as probable?" Answer, "Death by strangulation." Now in order that this latter answer may be further considered by the tribunal for the case in hand, it is obvious that the circumstance on which it rests, namely, the congestion of the windpipe, must be supplied, as a fact in the case, by testimony. This may be done in one of two ways, — either (1) by the testimony of the physician himself, based on a personal examination of the body, that the windpipe was congested, or (2) by the testimony of some one else who has made such a personal examination. But if the latter method is chosen — and this is the important circumstance — the fact to be considered by the physician must be placed before him hypothetically; it may be assumed for the time being, but must afterwards be supplied by the testimony of another person. If this were not

[2] 1885, Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 487 (to show the plaintiff's admissions, the defendant testified to a conversation over the telephone which an operator received and reported at the time to the defendant; the defendant's statements of what he was told were received; the operator was treated as the agent of the plaintiff to communicate, on the analogy of an interpreter); 1892, Oskamp v. Gladsden, 35 Nebr. 7, 52 N. W. 718 (here the witness received the message from an operator at a way station F., who repeated the message of the plaintiff at O., and served as intermediary; admitted).

Distinguish the following case: 1897, German Bank v. Citizens' Bank, 101 Ia. 530, 70 N. W. 769 (the hearer at a telephone, testifying to what he heard, not allowed to tell what he repeated to a bystander as the tenor of the message; this was of course inadmissible under the principle of § 1124, post).

done, and if the single question were asked, "What in your opinion was the mode of this man's death?", it would be impossible for the tribunal to tell whether to accept the witness' conclusion or not; since, if the tribunal were to find that there had been no congestion of the windpipe, it would be unable to know whether the physician's conclusion had been based on a consideration of that circumstance alone or on a consideration of some other circumstance alone or of both. In other words, the hypothetical question to the physician, as to the data for inference, takes the place of the question to the bystander whether he was in a position to observe the affray.

The reasoning may be explained in the following propositions: 1. Testimony in the shape of inferences or conclusions rests always on certain premises of fact. That which has been called Observation, serving as the basis of belief in matters directly cognizable by the senses — as, the facts of an affray, a conversation, a trespass, and the like — is here replaced by what may be called a Consideration of the Premises. Just as observation of the situation or affair or surroundings is in the one case essential to the formation of a witness' belief based on his senses, so a consideration of specific data is essential to the formation of an inference or conclusion or opinion. If the witness has not considered or had in mind these premises, his inference or opinion is good for nothing. 2. These premises, a consideration of which is essential to the formation of the conclusion or opinion, must somehow be supplied by testimony. The same witness may supply both premises or conclusion; or one witness may supply the premises and another the conclusion. The two are not necessarily connected. 3. If the latter method is chosen, and a witness is put forward to testify to the conclusion, the premises considered by him must be expressly stated, as the basis of his conclusion; otherwise, since his conclusion rests for its validity upon a consideration of the premises, and since the tribunal may later decide that certain premises are not proved and may thus reject them, it must, before accepting his conclusion, have the means of knowing whether it is based on a consideration of premises accepted as true by the tribunal. If those premises are not made to accompany the conclusion, the tribunal might be accepting a conclusion for which the witness had considered premises found by the tribunal not to be true. 4. Hence, the premises must be stated hypothetically in connection with the conclusion; then, by other testimony, the material for determining the truth of the assumed premises may be furnished to the tribunal.

The key to the situation, in short, is that there may be two distinct subjects of testimony, — premises, and inferences or conclusions; that the latter involves necessarily a consideration of the former; and that the tribunal must be furnished with the means of rejecting the latter if upon consultation they determine to reject the former, i. e. of distinguishing conclusions properly founded from conclusions improperly founded. That this is the orthodox and accepted theory of the hypothetical question in our law may be gathered from the following passages, in which practically the principle is indicated in one or another aspect:

1806, Erskine, L. C., in Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 1065 (admitting the results of a calculation by the witness as to the profit made by the defendant from the sums alleged to have been received by him): "If you take away the foundation upon which it is made, which is matter for the Court afterwards, there is an end to the superstructure. All the witness has done is to establish by calculation that such a stock from such a time will produce so much. He does not himself prove any fact, and the calculations he has made must therefore depend upon the facts which are proved by others." A Lord: "The data and facts stand as they did; it is a mere hypothetical question to the witness: If the fact stands so and so, what is the arithmetical result?"

1843, Maule, J., in M'Naghten's Case, 10 Cl. & F. 207 (Question for the Judges: "Can a medical man conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial and the examination of the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, etc.?"): "In principle it is open to this objection, that as the opinion of the witness is founded on those conclusions of fact which he forms from the evidence, and as it does not appear what these conclusions are, it may be that the evidence he gives is on such an assumption of facts as makes it irrelevant to the inquiry."

1851, Curtis, J., in U. S. v. McGlue, 1 Curtis C. C. 1 (to the jury): "[The expert physicians] were, as you observed, not allowed to give their opinions upon the case; because the case, in point of fact, on which any one might give his opinion, might not be the case which you upon the evidence would find; and there would be no certain means of knowing whether it was so or not."

1854, Dean, J., in Lake v. People, 1 Park. Cr. C. 557: "A question in physical science will afford an illustration. A motion which is the result of a combination of different forces invariably changes its direction if but one of the moving powers is withdrawn. Take away half of them, it would be reversed in its course. Experts might be called to prove any given motion; they might also be asked what would be the effect of certain combined forces; but in either case it is manifest that to have the opinion correct, all of the motive powers must be given. . . . To allow [medical testimony to be given on merely such part of the evidence as they heard] would be as dangerous a principle as to permit a juror to sit during a part of the trial and then unite with the rest in rendering a verdict."

1856, Woodbury v. Obear, 7 Gray 468; from the instruction: "The answer of the witness, if given in reply to the proposed interrogatory, might mislead; since it might, unknown to the jury, be founded upon some proposition or statement of facts differing in material particulars from that which appeared to them to be satisfactorily established."

1859, Shaw, C. J., in Dickenson v. Fitchburg, 13 Gray 556: "This objection [of counsel] assumes that the facts will be taken to be true because the witness has stated that he founds his opinion on them. But this is quite a mistake. . . . The question is put to him hypothetically, whether if certain facts testified to are true, he can form an opinion and what that opinion is. The jury will then be instructed, if the truth of any such fact is contested, first to consider whether the fact on which such opinion rests is proved to their satisfaction; if it is, then to give such weight to the opinion resting on it as it deserves; but if the fact is not proved by the evidence, then to give the opinion no weight."

1865, Steele, J., in Wetherbee's Ex'rs v. Wetherbee's Heirs, 38 Vt. 460: "In any case the jury ought to know upon what basis of facts the opinion is founded, for its pertinence depends upon whether they find the facts upon which it rests."

1870, Christiancy, J., in Kempsey v. McGinniss, 21 Mich. 139: "As a collection or state of facts assumed, whether few or many, constitute in the aggregate the basis on which the opinion is asked, if it does not appear that the opinion would be the same with any of those facts omitted, it necessarily follows that if the jury should negative or fail to find any one of the assumed facts, the opinion expressed cannot be treated as evidence, but must be rejected by the jury. From these considerations it necessarily follows that the jury should know just what facts are assumed and enter into the collection or state of facts upon which the witnesses' opinions are based. Otherwise they cannot know whether they ought to treat the opinions as evidence at all, since they can form no opinion whether such assumed facts, or the opinions based upon them, are true or false. . . . If the witness be asked his opinion of a case assuming the testimony of certain specified witnesses to be true, and it appears that he did not hear the whole of their testimony, and it does not definitely appear what facts stated by them he has heard, and what he did not hear, the jury cannot know upon what state of facts he forms his opinion, nor whether the facts he has assumed are true, nor whether his opinion would have been the same if he had heard the whole."[1]

1872, Kingman, C. J., in State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. 288: "It does not appear anywhere what part of the medical testimony [the expert] had heard. . . . [Thus] neither the court, nor the jury, nor counsel, knew on what part of the medical testimony the opinion of the witnesses was founded; therefore the answer formed no criterion of the intelligence of the witness or his capacity to form a correct judgment. . . . It would be as sensible to test a person's knowledge of mathematics by asking him the sum of two and an unknown quantity, at most known only to himself."

1882, Morris, C., in Burns v. Barenfield, 84 Ind. 48 (a medical witness was asked what he thought of a certain kind of treatment, after examining a case): "The answer of the witness was not based upon facts stated by him. What he knew about the case might and doubtless did embrace much more than he had stated to the jury; how much or what he knew about the case was in a great measure unknown to the Court and the jury. It is the clear right and duty of the jury to judge of the truth of the facts upon which the opinion of the expert is based. If his opinion is based upon what he may suppose he knows about the case — upon facts, it may be, although irrelevant and unknown to the jury —, it would be impossible for them to pass upon the truth of the facts upon which the opinion may be based, or to apply the opinion of the expert to the facts. . . . The expert's memory might be deficient in recollecting all the facts testified to; he might have a different understanding of or place a different construction upon the language used by the witness or witnesses upon whose testimony he based his opinion from what the jury would have or place if they were informed upon what facts testified to the opinion was based."

1886, Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 77, 7 Sup. 408 (approving the following charge): "You must readily see that the value of the answers to these questions depends largely, if not wholly, upon the fact whether the statements made in these questions are sustained by the proof. If the statements in these questions are not supported by the proof, then the answers to the questions are entitled to no weight because based upon false assumptions or statements of facts."

1890, Ruger, C. J., in People v. McElvaine, 121 N. Y. 250, 24 N. E. 465: "It would be impossible for the jury [when the opinion is based on 'all the evidence in the case'] to determine the facts upon which the witness bases his opinion, and whether such facts were proved or not. Suppose the jury concluded that certain facts are not proved, how are they in such an event to determine whether the opinion is not to a certain degree based upon such facts? When specific facts, either proved or assumed to have been proved, are embraced in the question, the jury are enabled to determine whether the answer to such question is based upon facts which have been proved in the case or not, and whether other facts bearing upon the correctness and force of the answer are contained therein or have been omitted from it; but in the absence of such a question the evidence must always be to a certain extent uncertain, unintelligible, and perhaps misleading."

1898, McGill, Ch., in Malynak v. State, 61 N. J. L. 562, 40 Atl. 572: "It is plain that the method [of not asking hypothetically] would be valueless in a case where the testimony is conflicting, or is of such character as to be susceptible of more than one interpretation, and hence affords room for different deductions of fact, and where the expert does not make known his findings of fact, because it would be impossible for the jury to gi weight to the opinion, for they could not know whether or not it would be applicable the facts as they find them. In such case the juror of thoughtful mind would reject t opinion as valueless."[2]

[1] See a similar exposition by Campbell, C. J., in 58 Mich. 607 (1886).

§ 673. False Theory: "Usurping the Province of the Jury." This being th plain, logical, and necessary reason for the use of the hypothetical questio it will easily be seen that it is not resorted to from any fear that the witne will "usurp the function of the jury."[1] This bugbear, vigorously denounce with sentimental appeals to the value of jury trial, has been made to ser again and again as the dreadful source of those evils which the hypothetic question enables us to avoid. But the expert is not trying to usurp th function, and could not if he would. He is not trying to usurp it, becau his error, if any, is merely the common one of witnesses, that of presentit as knowledge what is really not knowledge; and he could not usurp it if h would, because the jury may still reject his testimony and accept his opp nent's, and no legal power, not even the judge's order, can compel them accept the witness' statement against their will. That there is no hidde danger to the jury system, and no need of invoking rhetoric in its aid, wi be seen when it is remembered that the necessity for hypothetical questio is exactly the same for a judge sitting without a jury. Whatever the tr bunal, it must separate premises from conclusions, and it must wait till th end of the trial and all the evidence on both sides is in, before it determin what premises are proved and therefore which opinions have a proper basi The usurpation theory has done much to befog bench and bar, and to assi in producing some of the confusion which attends the precedents.

§ 674. Actual Observation not necessary; Hypothetical Presentation ma be sufficient. The first corollary of the theory of hypothetical questio then, is that actual personal observation, hitherto (ante, § 657) assumed as i general necessary for a witness, is not needed where the testimony consis in conclusions drawn from premises, but is replaced by the consideration

[2] The earliest English and American rulings seem to be the following: 1760, Earl Ferrers' Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 943 ("Please to inform their Lordships whether any and which of the circumstances which have been proved by the witnesses are symptoms of lunacy." . . . Earl of Hardwicke: "My Lords, this question is too general, tending to ask the doctor's opinion upon the result of the evidence; . . . if the noble Lord at the bar will divide the question and ask whether this or that particular fact is a symptom of lunacy, I daresay they will not object to it"); 1807, Beckwith v. Sydebotham, 1 Camp. 116 (a witness was called to say whether a ship having on Oct. 12 the defects already testified to could have been seaworthy on Sept. 2 preceding; Garrow pointed out the prejudice that might arise from asking the opinion of a witness on a statement which might be false, and was here ex parte (in a deposition); Lord Ellenborough "held that this was like examining a physician or surgeon to say whether upon such and such symptoms a person whose life was insured cou at the time of insurance have been in a go state of health. . . . As the truth of the fa stated to them was not certainly known, th opinion might not go for much; but still it w admissible evidence. The prejudice alluded might be removed by asking them in cross-e amination what they should think upon t statement of facts contended for on the oth side"); 1824, State v. Powell, 7 N. J. L. 2 (objection overruled that the physician had n made a "personal examination" but was speal ing upon a "mere suppositious case").

[1] 1890, Ruger, C. J., in People v. McElvain 121 N. Y. 250, 24 N. E. 465: "It cann be questioned but that the witness was by t question put in the place of the jury, and w allowed to determine upon his own judgme what their verdict ought to be in the case. . . It substantially allowed him to usurp the fun tions of the jury in deciding the questions fact."

examination of those premises; and this consideration of the premises may be afforded by presenting them hypothetically to the person who is to draw conclusions from them. In other words, the same person need not testify to both premises and conclusion. This general principle is now universally accepted; but it is worth while to mark it at the outset.

§ 675. Where Personal Observation is had, Hypothetical Presentation is Unnecessary. Secondly, since it is the essential nature of conclusions that they are always relative to and dependent upon the premises, is not every offered opinion or conclusion hypothetical in its nature, whether the witness himself supplies the testimony to the premises or whether they are assumed in the question and then supplied by other testimony? This is certainly so. Even though the physician testifies himself to seeing the congestion of the windpipe, and then infers from these premises a death by strangulation, the jury may later decide that there was no congestion, and thus the opinion based on this premise fails also. Thus all opinions or conclusions are in a sense hypothetical. But does it follow that, when the opinion comes from the same witness who has learned the premises by actual observation, those premises must be stated beforehand, hypothetically or otherwise, by him or to him? For example, the physician is asked, "Did you examine the body?"; "Yes"; "State your opinion of the cause of death." Is it here necessary that he should first state in detail the facts of his personal observation, as premises, before he can give his opinion? In academic nicety, yes; practically, no; and for the simple reason that on cross-examination each and every detail of the appearances he observed will be brought out and thus associated with his general conclusion as the grounds for it, and the tribunal will understand that the rejection of these data will destroy the validity of his opinion. In the opposite case, where the witness has not had personal observation of the premises, they are not to be got from him on cross-examination, because he had no data of personal observation; and that is precisely the reason why they must be indicated and set out in the question to him, for thus only can the premises be clearly associated with the conclusion based upon them.

Through failure to perceive this limitation, Courts have sometimes sanctioned the requirement of an advance hypothetical statement even where the expert witness speaks from personal observation:

1878, Marston, J., in Hitchcock v. Burgett, 38 Mich. 507: "Even in cases where experts are called upon to give an opinion based upon their own personal observation or examination, the facts upon which the opinion is founded must all be stated [beforehand]; otherwise the witness might be giving an opinion which would have great weight with the jury, upon a state of facts very different from those found by them in the case on trial."[1]

[1] Accord: 1898, Flannagan v. State, 106 Ga. 109, 32 S. E. 80 (facts observed by a medical man testifying to insanity must be specified); 1885, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 Ind. 418, 3 N. E. 389, 4 Id. 908, semble; 1887, L. N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 id. 553, semble; 1895, McDonald v. McDonald, 142 id. 55, 41 N. E. 346, semble; 1879, Van Densen v. Newcomer, 40 Mich. 119 (excluding "From what you found at the time in examining the patient, from your knowledge of her during the years previous, . . . what produced the condition she was in?"); 1874, Haggerty v. R. Co., 61 N. Y. 624, semble; 1901, State v. Simonis, 39 Or. 111, 65 Pac. 595; 1901, Easler v. R. Co., 59 S. C. 311, 37 S. E. 938 (physician, who had examined the plaintiff, not allowed to testify positively to the cause of her injury); 1898, Foster v. F. & C.

But this fallacy of being too logical in forcing the theory is generally properly repudiated:

1860, Brinkerhoff, J., in Bellefontaine & I. R. Co. v. Bailey, 11 Oh. St. 337 (admitt a question, to an engineer who saw the injury, as to the possibility of avoiding it): " doubtedly, if the witness had been a stranger to the actual facts, it would then have b necessary to assume a state of facts as the foundation of any opinion he might give; no such assumption, it seems to us, is necessary when the witness is or is properly sumed to be himself personally acquainted with the material facts of the case. . . . If expert may give his opinion on facts testified to by others, we see no reason why he not do so on facts presumably within his own personal knowledge; and if his knowle of any material fact be wanting or defective, the parties have ample opportunity to s it by cross-examination and by testimony aliunde."

1868, Dillon, C. J., in State v. Felter, 25 Ia. 75: "If a physician visits a person from actual examination or observation becomes acquainted with his mental conditi he may give an opinion respecting such mental condition at that time. . . . There is more reason why he may not do this than why he might not testify that he saw a cert person at a certain time and that he was then laboring under an epileptic fit or under attack of typhus fever, or had been stricken down and rendered unconscious by apoplectic stroke." [2]

§ 676. Where Personal Observation is lacking, Hypothetical Presentat must be used. Thirdly, though hypothetical presentation is thus not univ sally necessary, it is certainly necessary (for the reason just noted) where premises are not supplied by the witness himself. The premises must brought out in some way. If the witness cannot himself supply them details of his own observation, they must be presented hypothetically.[1]

§ 677. Personal Observation is not Necessary, when Hypothetical Pres tation is used. Fourthly, though the premises must be supplied in one fo or the other, it is not necessary that both be available. If the witnes skilled enough (post, § 679), his opinion may be adequately obtained u hypothetical data alone; and it is immaterial whether he has ever seen person, place, or thing in question:

1873, Gray, C. J., in Miller v. Smith, 112 Mass. 475: "A witness having the requi knowledge and experience may always be examined by hypothetical questions, even if

Co., 99 Wis. 447, 75 N. W. 69 (attending physician; question as to cause of death "from all the evidence you had before you there at that time," excluded); 1898, Green v. Water Co., 101 id. 258, 77 N. W. 722 (expert testifying partly from personal examination as to cause of typhoid fever; hypothetical form required).

[2] Accord: 1855, Bennett v. Fail, 26 Ala. 610 (a trial court was criticised for ignoring this); 1884, Louisville N. A. & C. K. Co. v. Shires, 108 Ill. 631; 1868, State v. Felter, 25 Ia. 75 (quoted supra); 1871, State v. Reddick, 7 Kan. 149; 1896, McCarthy v. Boston Duck Co., 165 Mass. 165, 42 N. E. 568 (the trial Court's discretion controls); 1879, Brown v. Hnffard, 69 Mo. 305 (value of services); 1896, People v. Youngs, 151 N. Y. 210, 45 N. E. 460; 1896, Tullis v. Rankin, 6 N. D. 44, 68 N. W. 187; 1900, State v. Foote, 58 S. C. 218, 36 S. E. 551; 1850, Jones v. White, 11 Humph. 268; 1875, Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 111; 1897, New York El. Eq. Co Blair, 25 C. C. A. 216, 79 Fed. 896; 1 Wells v. Davis, 22 Utah 322, 62 Pac. 3.

[1] 1891, Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Jor 87 Ga. 72, 13 S. E. 202; 1903, Western T. Co. v. Morris, — Kan. —, 73 Pac. 1 1876, State v. Pike, 65 Me. 111 (rejecti question as to how long a post-mortem exam tion should have taken, no premises being sented: "It does not appear that the wit was present at the post-mortem examination the deceased, or that he had any knowledg the case or the kind or extent of the exam tion needed. . . . [The answer] would h been no more than the opinion of one who far as appeared, had no knowledge on which base it"); 1896, Flaherty v. Powers, 167 M 61, 44 N. E. 1074; 1867, Moore v. State, Oh. St. 525.

has not seen the particular subject to which the trial relates and has not heard all the other evidence given in the case."[1]

§ 678. The same Skilled Witness may testify from both Personal Observation and Hypothetical Presentation. On the other hand, no harm is done if the skilled witness has had personal observation. His testimony may be based upon both forms of data. It will not always happen that persons having special skill will be totally devoid of actual observation of the matter in hand; they may have partially observed it, and their opinion may be desired upon premises partly furnished by personal observation, partly remaining to be supplied by hypothetical presentation. That this is permissible follows from the preceding principle.[1]

§ 679. Only Skilled Witnesses may be asked Hypothetical Questions. Fifthly, since hypothetical presentation is proper and necessary only where the witness has not had actual observation, does it follow that to any one whatever, who has not had actual observation, the premises may be presented hypothetically and his conclusion asked upon them? They might, so far as the present principle is concerned, which requires only that the premises must be supplied in at least one form or the other. But by the Opinion rule (post, § 1918) the tribunal will not listen to conclusions or opinions from persons who possess no more skill than the tribunal itself in drawing inferences from the premises, i.e. persons of only ordinary skill. The hypothetical form of presentation is therefore proper for those witnesses only who bring to the consideration of the particular premises in hand a more than ordinary skill. The detailed tests which define an expert witness are a part of the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1923, 1924). It is sufficient to note here the effect of that rule on the use of hypothetical questions.[1]

[1] 1888, Central City Ins. Co. v. Oates, 86 Ala. 558, 6 So. 83 (value of a burned house); 1879, Cook v. Fuson, 66 Ind. 530 (the issue arose on a warranty as to a cellar's dryness, and the witness had never been in the cellar or had any personal knowledge of it, but had lived in a house near by where the cellar had been wet; his testimony that the cellar in question could not be kept dry was rejected); 1875, Lawrence v. Boston, 119 Mass. 130, 132 (land value); 1895, Pierce v. Boston, 164 id. 92, 41 N. E. 229 (land value); 1888, Slocovich v. Ins. Co., 108 N. Y. 64, 14 N. E. 802 (value of a ship); 1859, Mish v. Wood, 34 Pa. 452 (value testimony, based on a description of goods lost); 1894, Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 14 C. C. A. 153, 66 Fed. 868 (shrinkage of cattle). Contra: 1892, State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 757, 761, 15 S. E. 991 ("Are not love and jealousy causes of insanity?", excluded; erroneous); 1896, Schneider Br. Co. v. A. I. M. Co., 23 C. C. A. 89, 77 Fed. 138, semble (opinion on the net value of a machine, the price being fixed and the only material question being the value of the defects, excluded). It has been said that an object that can be produced must be produced, and not described hypothetically; but this seems unnecessary: 1859, Beecher v. Denniston, 13 Gray 355, semble; compare § 1181, post.

[1] 1895, Mullin's Estate, 110 Cal. 252, 42 Pac. 646 (a physician as to his patient's sanity); 1885, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 Ind. 418, 3 N. E. 389, 4 id. 908; 1887, L. N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 id. 553, 14 N. E. 572, 16 id. 197; 1903, Skelton v. R. Co., — Minn. —, 92 N. W. 960; 1896, State v. Wright, 134 Mo. 404, 35 S. W. 1145 (a case hypothetically stated, together with the data of a personal examination, held proper for a physician giving an opinion on sanity); 1878, Pannell v. Com., 86 Pa. 269; 1881, State v. Clark, 15 S. C. 407 (a physician testified partly upon his own post-mortem examination and partly on other testimony); 1865, Wetherbee's Ex'rs v. Wetherbee's Heirs, 38 Vt. 454; 1895, Tebo v. Augusta, 90 Wis. 405, 63 N. W. 1045; 1898, Selleck v. Janesville, 100 id. 157, 75 N. W. 975. Contra, 1893, State v. Welsor, 117 Mo. 570, 581, 21 S. W. 443 (physician's statement, based in part on personal examination and in part on hypothetical data, excluded).

[1] 1900, Ragland v. State, 125 Ala. 12, 27 So. 983; 1858, Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 197.

§ 680. If the Premises fail, the Conclusion must be disregarded. Sixth
It follows as a necessary part of the theory, that if the premises are ul mately rejected by the jury as untrue, the testimonial conclusion based them must also be disregarded. This is plain enough where a witness claimed to have personal observation and is disbelieved. It is only wh his testimony is based on hypothetical data that the same result needs to emphasized.[1] But the failure which justifies rejection must be a failure some one or more important data, not merely in a trifling respect.[2]

§ 681. Form and Scope of Question; (1) Particularization of the Premis to be used. The question of greatest practical difficulty and of most freque occurrence concerns the form and the scope of the hypothetical question. T detailed rules rest on simple considerations, partly of principle, partly practical expediency. The difficulty lies in securing the best results in th application. The fundamental purpose of hypothetical presentation — fu nishing the tribunal with the means of knowing just what premises t conclusion is based upon — requires that the data to serve as premises shou be particularized with sufficient distinctness. Various situations raise que tions under this head:

(a) May the witness be asked, "Upon all the testimony in the case, wh is your opinion on a given point?" The objection to this form of question stated in the following passage:

1890, Ruger, C. J., in People v. McElvaine, 121 N. Y. 250, 24 N. E. 465: "It would th be impossible for the jury to determine the facts upon which the witness bases his opini whether such facts were proved or not. . . . When specific facts either proved or assum to have been proved, are embraced in the question, the jury are enabled to determi whether the answer to such question is based upon facts which have been proved in t case or not."

Accordingly, it is generally accepted that such a question is improper.[1] Y
many Courts, having regard to the reason of the rule, are willing to perm

[1] 1861, Com. v. Mullins, 2 All. 296; 1903, Kersher v. Kersher, — Ia. —, 94 N. W. 346; 1886, People v. Sessions, 58 Mich. 599, 26 N. W. 291; 1884, Loucks v. R. Co., 31 Minn. 534, 18 N. W. 651; 1895, Delaware L. & W. R. Co. v. Roalefs, 16 C. C. A. 607, 70 Fed. 23 ("the opinion of the doctor is indivisible; it must be accepted or rejected as a whole; there is nothing to indicate how much it rests on the declarations [of the patient] and how much on personal observation").

[2] Compare the foregoing cases and the following: 1877, Eggers v. Eggers, 57 Ind. 461; 1885, Epps v. State, 102 id. 554, 1 N. E. 491; 1863, Hovey v. Chase, 52 Me. 313; 1866, Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 135 ("so proved as to resemble as near as may be the case under consideration; the jury can judge whether the case supposed is so far like the one they are considering as that the opinion of the expert on the supposed case is any guide to them"); 1886, Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 76, 7 Sup. 408.

[1] Eng.: 1760, Earl Ferrers' Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 943; 1821, R. v. Wright, R. & R. 4 (uncertain); 1827, R. v. Wright, R. & R. 45 1831, R. v. Searle, 1 Moo. & Rob. 75 (unce tain); 1840, Sills v. Brown, 9 C. & P. 60 1840, R. v. Oxford, 4 State Tr. N. s. 497, 53 Can.: 1870, Key v. Thomson, 13 N. Br. 22 1882, Diffin v. Dow, 22 id. 108; Ala.: 190 Porter v. State, 135 Ala. 51, 33 So. 694; Cal. 1880, People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 350, 19 Pa 161; Ind.: 1871, Rush v. Magee, 36 Ind. 7 Bishop v Spining, 38 id. 144; Ia.: 1868, Stat v. Felter, 25 Ia. 74; 1876, Buller v. Ins. Co. 45 id. 98; 1882, Smith v. Hickenbollon, 57 i 738, 11 N. W. 664; Mass.: 1856, Woodbury Obear, 7 Gray 471; N. H.: 1858, Spear Richardson, 37 N. H. 34, semble; N. Y.: 185 People v. Lake, 12 N. Y. 362; 1890, People McElvaine, 121 id. 250, 24 N. E. 465; S. D. 1896, Aultman Co. v. Ferguson, 8 S. D. 458, 6 N. W. 1801; U. S.: 1855, The Clement, 2 Curt C. C. 369; Wis.: 1883, Bennett v. State, 5 Wis. 86, 14 N. W. 912, semble; 1885, Quinn Higgins, 63 id. 669, 24 N. W. 482, semble.

such a question where that reason does not exist, i.e. where the testimony is not conflicting and hence the witness may assume it all as true and is not obliged to choose (unknown to the jury) between conflicting witnesses.[2] The matter should be left to the discretion of the trial Court.[3] It may be noted, that whenever this form of question is to be allowed, it must appear that the witness has in fact heard all the testimony.

(b) The same objections apply to the question, "On what you have heard of the testimony in this case, what is your opinion?"; with the additional objection that it is here still more difficult to understand the premises actually in the witness' mind, since no one else knows exactly how much he has heard.[4]

(c) The question, "Assuming the truth of the testimony for the plaintiff (or for the defendant), what is your opinion?" is not seriously affected by the reason of the uncertainty of the data; although the witnesses on the same side do not always agree entirely. But the further reason remains, that it is difficult to fix in the mind (whether of witness or of jury) all the facts testified to by a number of witnesses and to associate them with this particular opinion as its premises. There are opposing rulings upon this form of question.[5] The only proper solution is to leave it to the discretion of the trial judge to accept the question when it does fair justice.[6] In any case, the witness must have heard all the testimony he is asked about.

[2] The Courts put this rule in different ways. Some declare admissible a question based on all the testimony, unless it is conflicting; others declare such a question inadmissible, unless the facts testified to are undisputed by the opposite witnesses. There seems to be no practical difference, except that it would be easier to justify the question in the former case: Ala.: 1878, Page v. State, 61 Ala. 18; Ill.: 1895, Pyle v. Pyle, 158 Ill. 289, 41 N. E. 999; Kan.: 1870, Tefft v. Wilcox, 6 Kan. 58; Md.: 1856, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Thompson, 10 Md. 84; 1865, Walker v. Rogers, 24 id. 243; Mass.: 1895, Chalmers v. Mfg. Co., 164 Mass. 532, 42 N. E. 98; 1898, Oliver v. R. Co., 170 id. 222, 49 N. E. 117; Mich.: 1870, Kempsey v. McGinness, 21 Mich. 138; Minn.: 1875, Getchell v. Hill, 19 Minn. 472; 1876, State v. Lautenschlager, 22 id. 521; 1881, Storer's Will, 28 id. 11; Oh.: 1851, Cincinnati Mut. Ins. Co. v. May, 20 Oh. 211, 223; Pa.: 1882, Olmsted v. Gere, 100 Pa. 131, semble; Tex.: 1887, Armendaiz v. Stillman, 67 Tex. 462, 3 S. W. 678; Vt.: 1862, Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398, semble; 1878, Gilman v. Strafford, 50 id. 725; State v. Hayden, 51 id. 304; Wis.: 1849, Luning v. State, 1 Chand. 184; 1883, Bennett v. State, 57 Wis. 81, 14 N. W. 912 (modifying Luning v. State; advising hypothetical questions as a rule; and if the testimony of one or all the witnesses is allowed to be taken, in case of conflict or doubt, the witness should state beforehand his understanding of the testimony he is speaking of); 1886, Gatea v. Fleischer, 67 id. 508, 30 N. W. 674 (applying this liberally); 1888, Krenziger v. R. Co., 73 id. 163, 40 N. W. 657.

[3] 1875, Getchell v. Hill, 19 Minn. 472; 1876, State v. Lautenschlager, 21 id. 521; 1881, Storer's Will, 28 id. 11, 8 N. W. 827.

[4] 1859, Champ v. Com., 2 Metc. Ky. 27; 1896, Connell v. McNett, 109 Mich. 329, 67 N. W. 344; 1898, Malynak v. State, 61 N. J. L. 562, 40 Atl. 572; 1854, Lake v. People, 1 Park. Cr. C. 557; 1860, Sanchez v. People, 22 N. Y. 154. Contra: 1897, Swanson v. Mellen, 66 Minn. 486, 69 N. W. 620 (a part of the testimony only was heard, but as it related to services of a common and uniform kind, an opinion of value based on it was admitted); 1903, State v. Privitt, — Mo. —, 75 S. W. 457 (opinion based on the testimony as he heard it, with a recital of the testimony of the only witness he had not heard, allowed); 1878, State v. Hayden, 51 Vt. 299, 306.

[5] Admitted: 1880, Polk v. State, 36 Ark. 123; 1887, Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 387, 12 N. E. 267; 1895, Pyle v. Pyle, 158 id. 289, 41 N. E. 999. Excluded: 1882, Diffin v. Daw, 22 N. Br. 107 ("Is the statement of the medical case, as given by the defendant in evidence, reconcilable with the facts, assuming them to be true, as given by the other witnesses?" excluded); 1890, People v. McElvaine, 121 N. Y. 250, 24 N. E. 465.

[6] For instance, where the opinion, when expressed, favors the opponent, and could not more favor him upon any supposition, there is no reason for him to object to the scope of the question: 1872, Dexter v. Hall, 15 Wall. 26.

(d) A question assuming the truth of the testimony of several specific witnesses may very well suffice, if the facts they testify to are likely to b definitely in the minds of the witness and the jury. This must depend o the circumstances of the case. There should be no fixed rule excluding suc a question; and in the precedents it can hardly be said that a fixed rule i intended to be laid down.[7]

(e) A question assuming the truth of a single witness' testimony will usuall be proper. Yet here, too, the scope of the testimony may be so extended o so confused that the assumed premises are not clear, and an express rehearsa of the assumed facts should be made.[8] As before, it should rest in th discretion of the trial judge.

(f) Questions in any other way covering a scope which is not clea may always be excluded; much depending on the discretion of the tria judge.[9] From this point of view it may sometimes be necessary to state hypothetically the data gained from the witness' personal observation although in the ordinary case of that sort (ante, § 675) hypothetical pres entation is not necessary.

§ 682. Same: (2) Kind of Data that may be assumed in the Question; not All the Facts, but Any Facts of which there is Evidence. (a) Since the data to be assumed are those which it is expected or claimed by the party the jury will subsequently adopt as true, it is obvious that it is both wasteful

[7] 1870, Key v. Thomson, 2 Han. N. Br. 224, 228 (testimony based on the evidence of other witnesses, excluded); 1857, Wilkinson v. Moseley, 30 Ala. 573 (two witnesses; excluded); 1900, Baltimore City P. R. Co. v. Tanner, 90 Md. 315, 45 Atl. 188 (several witnesses' testimony to undisputed facts; allowed); 1876, Reynolds v. Robinson, 64 N. Y. 595 (the value of services in nursing a cancer patient was in issue, and the witness' opinion was based on hearing the testimony of three witnesses of the plaintiff as to the nature of the services; excluded); 1880, Guiterman v. Steamship Co., 83 id. 366 (several witnesses to a collision; excluded); 1893, Snelling's Will, 136 id. 515, 518, 32 N. E. 1006 (two witnesses; excluded); 1899, Cornell v. State, 104 Wis. 527, 80 N. W. 745 (allowable, for the testimony of a few conflicting witnesses, but not for voluminous and conflicting testimony; the matter to be in the trial Court's discretion). A question involving reference to former testimony was excluded in McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 692 (1881), where the testimony of two witnesses was named; it does not appear whether the Court intended to prohibit all reference to even one witness' testimony; but in Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 id. 672, 8 S. E. 493 (1888), it was said that "the opinion of medical experts founded on testimony already in the case can be given only on a hypothetical case"; in 1891, however, it was expressly held, ignoring Kerr v. Lunsford, in Bowen v. Huntington, 35 id. 694, 14 S. E. 217, for a question based on a reference to three witnesses' testimony, that this form was proper.

[8] Admitted: La.: 1874, State v. Baptiste, 26 La. An. 137; Mass.: 1853, Twombly v. Leach, 11 Cush. 402, 405; 1864, Hunt v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 8 All. 170; N. Y.: 1875, McCollum v. Seward, 62 N. Y. 318; 1879, Seymour v. Fellows, 77 id. 180; Vt.: 1878, Gilman v. Stratford, 50 Vt. 725; State v. Hayden, 51 id. 305; Wis.: 1867, Wright v. Hardy, 22 Wis. 353; 1883, Bennett v. State, 57 id. 81, 14 N. W. 912; 1897, McKeon v. R. Co., 94 id. 477, 69 N. W. 175 (part being heard, the rest read from a stenographic report); 1899, Cornell v. State, 104 id. 527, 80 N. W. 745. Excluded: Conn.: 1893, Barber's Estate, 63 Conn. 393, 408, 27 Atl. 973 (testimony of another witness, with additional data; improper on the facts); Ill.: 1898, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Glenny, 175 Ill. 238, 51 N. E. 896; Ind.: 1883, Elliott v. Russell, 92 Ind. 530 (an opinion as to the results of a hanging "for the time and in the manner plaintiff said he was hung"); 1884, Craig v. R. Co., 98 Ind. 112; Mass.: 1893, Stoddard v. Winchester, 157 Mass. 567, 575, 32 N. E. 918; Mich.: 1899, Detzur v. Brewing Co., 119 Mich. 282, 77 N. W. 948; N. Y.: 1892, Link v. Sheldon, 136 N. Y. 1, 9, 32 N. E. 696; U. S.: 1893, Manuf. A. I. Co. v. Dorgan, 16 U. S. App. 290, 299, 7 C. C. A. 581, 58 Fed. 945.

[9] 1884, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Shires, 108 Ill. 630 (excluding an opinion based on the testimony of witness T. and also a private conversation with him); 1891, Wallace v. Oil Co., 128 N. Y. 580, 27 N. E. 956 ("judging from the whole history of his case and what you have learned of it in all other ways;" excluded).

and misleading to ask a witness to consider data which there is not a fair possibility of the jury accepting. It is wasteful, because the process takes up valuable time without being of any service. It is misleading, because the jury may often, forgetting the data of an opinion, accept the opinion itself when in fact its data are not accepted, and the opinion is therefore really irrelevant. Various practical tests have been proposed for indicating the minimum quality of possibility which the data must possess in order to be taken as the premises of an opinion. No one of them seems preëminently the best; they express the various predilections and experience of different judges as to the safe limits to be set. Sometimes different tests occur in the same opinion; occasionally an extreme strictness or looseness is found, palpably in excess of the general practice.[1]

[1] For cross-examination, see post, § 684; in the cases not especially so noted, no particular rule is laid down: Colo.: 1876, Gottlieb v. Hartman, 3 Colo. 62 ("evidence tending to prove"); 1895, Jackson v. Burnham, 20 id. 532, 39 Pac. 577 ("within the possible or probable range of the evidence"); 1896, Courvoisier v. Raymond, 23 id. 113, 47 Pac. 284 (same); Conn.: 1893, Barber's Estate, 63 Conn. 393, 409, 27 Atl. 973 ("such only as counsel may fairly claim that the evidence tends to justify"); 1898, Porter v. Ritch, 70 id. 235, 39 Atl. 169; Ida.: 1897, Kelly v. Perrault, 5 Ida. 221, 48 Pac. 45 (founded on facts which the evidence "tends to prove," not on "conjecture"); Ill.: 1872, Decatur v. Fisher, 63 Ill. 241; 1897, Grand Lodge v. Wieting, 168 id. 408, 48 N. E. 59 (may range "within reasonable limits"; here held not to violate this rule); 1900, Howard v. People, 185 id. 552, 57 N. E. 441 ("evidence tending to prove"); 1902, Economy L. & P. Co. v. Sheridan, 200 id. 439, 65 N. E. 1070 (facts "within the scope or range of the evidence"); Ind.: 1879, Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 104 ("must be supported by some evidence"); 1880, Nave v. Tucker, 70 id. 18 ("evidence tending to prove"); 1885, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 id. 420, 3 N. E. 389, 4 N. E. 908 (excluding "where there is no evidence at all in support of the facts assumed, or where the question is strictly irrelevant, or where it is merely speculative"); 1888, Conway v. State, 118 id. 490, 21 N. E. 285 (must be "within the range of the evidence"); Ia.: 1878, Hurst v. R. Co., 49 Ia. 78 ("evidence tending to establish"); 1879, Re Ames' Will, 51 id. 603, 2 N. W. 408 (same); 1881, Bomgardner v. Andrews, 55 id. 638, 8 N. W. 48 (same); 1888, Meeker v. Meeker, 74 id. 355, 37 N. W. 973 ("based on evidence"); 1898, Manatt v. Scott, 106 id. 203, 76 N. W. 717; 1901, Pierson v. R. Co., 116 id. 601, 88 N. W. 363; Kan.: 1898, Davis v. Ins. Co., 59 Kan. 74, 52 Pac. 67; 1899, Medill v. Snyder, 61 id. 15, 58 Pac. 962 ("some evidence"); 1900, Roark v. Greeno, 61 id. 299, 59 Pac. 655; Ky.: 1898, Baxter v. Knox, 19 Ky. 1973, 44 S. W. 972 (question held proper on the testimony); Md.: 1901, Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Berry, 93 Md. 560, 49 Atl. 401 (certain questions held improper on the facts); Me.: 1885, Powers v. Mitchell, 77 Me. 369 ("evidence tending to prove"); Mass.: 1898, Oliver v. R. Co., 170 Mass. 222, 49 N. E. 117 ("something must be left to the presiding judge"); 1900, Anderson v. Albertetamm, 176 id. 87, 57 N. E. 215 (trial judge "in many cases must rely to a great extent upon the good faith of counsel in their statements as to what they expect the evidence will be"); Mich.: 1882, People v. Hall, 48 Mich. 489, 12 N. W. 665 (must not be "contrary to positive and uncontradicted facts"); 1886, People v. Sessions, 58 id. 598, 26 N. W. 291 ("evidence tending to establish"); 1886, Mayo v. Wright, 63 id. 43, 29 N. W. 832 (some testimony must have been offered); 1887, People v. Foley, 64 id. 153, 31 N. W. 94; 1896, Rivard v. Rivard, 109 id. 98, 66 N. W. 681; 1897, Holman v. R. Co., 114 id. 208, 72 N. W. 202; 1898, People v. Foglesong, 116 id. 556, 74 N. W. 730 ("any evidence tending to prove"); Minn.: 1886, State v. Hanley, 34 Minn. 433, 26 N. W. 397 (excluded if it covers a single material fact not evidenced); 1888, Peterson v. R. Co., 38 id. 515, 39 N. W. 485 ("any evidence tending to prove"); 1899, Wittenberg v. Onsgard, 78 id. 342, 81 N. W. 14 (facts which "might legitimately be found by the jury from the evidence"); Miss.: 1887, Woolner v. Spalding, 65 Miss. 211, 3 So. 583; 1890, Kearney v. State, 58 id. 238; Mo.: 1871, Tingley v. Cowgill, 48 Mo. 297; 1889, State v. Meyers, 99 id. 121; 1892, Russ v. R. Co., 112 id. 45, 48, 20 S. W. 472 (there must be evidence for all the facts assumed); 1898, Fullerton v. Fordyce, 144 id. 519, 44 S. W. 1053 ("tends to prove"); Mont.: 1899, State v. Peel, 23 Mont. 358, 59 Pac. 169 ("evidence tending to support"); Nebr.: 1883, O'Hara v. Wells, 14 Nebr. 408, 15 N. W. 722; 1886, Morrill v. Tegarden, 19 id. 536, 26 N. W. 202 ("so framed as to fairly reflect facts either admitted or proved by other witnesses"); 1886, Bellard v. State, ib. 613, 28 N. W. 271; N. H.: 1858, Spear v. Richardson, 37 N. H. 34; 1862, Perkins v. Railroad, 44 id. 225; N. J.: 1898, Lindenthal v. Hatch, 61 N. J. 29, 39 Atl. 662 (question on data involving "mere guesswork," excluded); N. Y.: 1876, Harnett v. Garvey, 66 N. Y. 641 ("within the possible or probable range of the evidence");

(b) The question, on principle, need not include any particular number facts; i. e. it may assume any one or more facts whatever, and need not cov all the facts which the questioner alleges in his case. The questioner is e titled to the witness' opinion on any combination of facts that he ma choose. It is often convenient and even necessary to obtain that opinio upon a state of facts falling short of what he or his opponent expects prove, because the questioner cannot tell how much of the testimony th jury will accept; and if proof of the whole should fail, still proof of son essential part might be made and an opinion based on that part is entitled be provided for the jury. For reasons of principle, then, and to some exte of policy, the natural conclusion would be that the questioner need not cov in his hypothesis the entire body of testimony put forward on that point b him or by the opponent, but may take as limited a selection as he pleas and obtain an opinion on that basis. Such is the orthodox doctrine as applie by most Courts.[2]

But there are opposing considerations of policy. The jury are apt, esp cially where there are many expert witnesses and the evidence is voluminou to remember and accept merely the net opinion of a witness, with little or n reference to the special premises on which it was based. Thus, if a couns were to select from the testimony the evidential circumstances most favo able to his party, or those least favorable to the opponent, and obtain a opinion thereon, it is obvious that if the jury forgets the partial nature of th opinion's premises, the opinion may count with them, when perhaps it ough

1882, Stearns v. Field, 90 Id. 641 ("any state of facts which the evidence fairly tends to justify"); 1884, People v. Angsbury, 97 id. 504 ("facts admitted or established by the evidence, or which, if controverted, the jury might legitimately find on weighing the evidence"); 1891, People v. Smiler, 125 id. 717, 26 N. E. 312; 1899, Cole v. Fall Brook C. Co., 159 id. 59, 53 N. E. 670 (excluded if "there is proof sustaining" the data); N. C.: 1897, Burnett v. R. Co., 120 N. C. 517, 26 S. E. 819 (excluded, because no evidence on the point was offered); Oh.: 1876, Williams v. Brown, 28 Oh. St. 552; Or.: 1882, State v. Anderson, 10 Or. 455; Pa.: 1884, First Nat'l Bank v. Wirebach's Ex'r, 106 Pa. 44; 1887, Reber v. Herring, 115 id. 608, 8 Atl. 830 (fluctuates, in excluding, between "facts not supported" and "facts not proved" by the testimony); S. D.: 1894, Vermillion Co. v. Vermillion, 6 S. D. 466, 61 N. W. 802; U. S.: 1895, North American Acc. Ass'n v. Woodson, 12 C. C. A. 392, 64 Fed. 689 (facts of which some evidence has been offered); 1900, Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, 41 C. C. A. 22, 100 Fed. 738 ("any state of facts which the evidence directly, fairly, and reasonably tends to establish or justify"); Utah: 1902, Nichols v. R. Co., 25 Utah 240, 70 Pac. 996 (a question assuming facts which "indisputably had neither been proven nor in truth existed," held improper); Vt.: 1875, Hathaway's Adm'r v. Ins. Co., 48 Vt. 351 ("evidence tending to prove"); W. Va.: 1888, Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 672, 8 S. E. 493 ("evidence tending t prove"); Wis.: 1885, Quinn v. Higgins, 6 Wis. 670, 24 N. W. 482 ("evidence tending t prove"); 1895, Tebo v. Augusta, 90 id. 405, 6 N. W. 1045 ("sufficient evidence on which t base an assumption"); 1900, Werner v. R. Co. 105 Id. 300, 81 N. W. 416 ("tended to prove") not to count at all. Now the law and the judge cannot, of course, be expected to reject legitimate offers of evidence simply because the jury may occasionally fail to perform its duty intelligently. But the Court may well interfere to prevent questions which are under the circumstances practically valueless, and are either intended or fairly likely to mislead the jury. Some Courts, looking at the not uncommon abuse of the hypothetical question, have properly attempted to forbid the putting of questions whenever the abuse of this sort is probable. There are two slightly different forms of the abuse. (1) One consists in asking an opinion as to the effect of facts testified to by a given witness, his testimony being culled and partially stated, so that while in form the opinion deals with a part only, in effect the whole of that witness' testimony is either discredited or approved, as the case may be. The remedy for this is to require a statement of all the material facts testified to by the witness.[3] (2) The other method does not specially mention particular witnesses, but culls certain facts having a bearing particularly favorable for the questioner's side or particularly unfavorable to the opponent's, and then the opinion obtained will, it is hoped, be remembered as absolutely (not conditionally) favorable or unfavorable respectively:

[2] Cal.: 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Ca 179, 48 Pac. 75; 1897, People v. Hill, ib. 562 48 Pac. 711; D. C.: 1899, Horton v. U. S., 1 D. C. App. 310, 324; Fla.: 1903, Williams State, — Fla. —, 34 So. 279; Ill.: 1903 Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Wallace, 202 Ill. 129 66 N. E. 1096; Ind.: 1871, Davis v. State, 3 Ind. 497; 1879, Guetig v. State, 66 id. 101 1884, Goodwin v. State, 95 id. 554; 1887, Louis ville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 id. 554, 1 N. E. 572, 16 N. E. 197; Mich.: 1888, Turn bull v. Richardson, 69 Mich. 413, 37 N. W. 499 Mont.: 1897, Morrill v. Hershfield, 19 Mont 245, 47 Pac. 997; N. Y.: 1882, Stearns v. Field 90 N. Y. 640; Pa.: 1884, First Nat'l Bank v. Wirebach's Ex'r, 106 Pa. 44 (this opinion contains a good exposition); Tex.: 1890, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Compton, 75 Tex. 673, 13 S. W. 667; 1902, Fretwell v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. 501, 67 S. W. 1021 (unless it appears that an opportunity on cross-examination to add the remaining material facts was denied); U. S.: 1902, Swengen v. Bender, 51 C. C. A. 627, 114 Fed. 1; Vt.: 1900, State v. Doherty, 72 Vt. 381, 48 Atl. 658; 1902, McKinstry v. Collins, 74 id. 147, 52 Atl. 438.

1888, Morse, J., in People v. Vanderhoof, 71 Mich. 176, 39 N. W. 28: "I believe that even in a civil case all the undisputed facts of a case must be included in a hypothetical question, both as a matter of sound principle, and of reason and justice. . . . To permit, as was done in this case, a culling of facts to suit the purposes of conviction, to be propounded in hypothesis to the experts, and then to instruct the jury that the only way to contradict the opinion of the experts is by the opinion of other experts, is to deny a fair trial."[4]

But though any efforts to repress the abuses of the hypothetical question at the hands of unscrupulous tricksters should meet with approval, it is improper and unnecessary to lay down any general rule. The trial judge should be given discretion to determine how far the counsel can and must properly limit his questions, and how far the jury may be trusted, with the aid of argument, to discover the conditional nature of the opinion.

(c) There could be no reason in confining the hypothetical question to the undisputed facts, or to the facts "proved." The former expedient is at least conceivably possible; though the latter is not. Both are without the slightest ground of logic or policy. It is singular that Courts have consented to discuss such propositions; but they have several times thought it necessary to negative them.[5]

[3] 1873, Davis v. State, 38 Md. 40, 44; 1879, Hand v. Brookline, 126 Mass. 326. The same situation is also presented where a written contract is to be interpreted; the question must assume terms similar to the contract, and no less or different: 1883, Jewett v. Brooks, 134 Mass. 505.

[4] Accord: 1876, Gottlieb v. Hartmann, 3 Colo. 61 (must cover all the evidence; this goes too far); 1893, Barber's Estate, 63 Conn. 393, 409, 27 Atl. 975 (the omitted data must not leave the others in a false relation); 1888, Petersou v. R. Co., 38 Minn. 515, 39 N. W. 485 (must cover all the material parts); 1901, Schulz v. Modisett, — Nebr. —, 96 N. W. 338 ("All the undisputed pertinent facts"); 1902, Nichols v. R. Co., 25 Utah 240, 70 Pac. 996 (a question omitting material undisputed facts is unfair); 1865, Thayer v. Davis, 38 Vt. 163 (based on notes of counsel; excluded); 1899, Schaidler v. R. Co., 102 Wis. 564, 78 N. W. 732 (a material fact must be included).

[5] 1895, Jackson v. Burnham, 20 Colo. 532, 39 Pac. 577 (not confined to undisputed facts);

(d) On principle, the questioner is entitled (as already noted) to obtain an opinion upon any combination of facts, however few or however numerous. Hence, the mere length of a question of itself is no objection.[6] But, for the same reasons of policy as before, the Court may exclude a question which by its length tends to confuse or mislead the jury without being of appreciable service.[7] This discretion of the trial judge ought to be absolute, and might be exercised much more frequently than it is in excluding tedious and useless questions.

§ 683. Same: (3) Form of Question must be expressly Hypothetical. Policy, as well as principle, require that the form of the question be expressly hypothetical;[1] because otherwise the jury, and perhaps the witness, may be misled by the statement, as a proved or admitted fact, of that which is as yet only an assertion of counsel or of witnesses.[2] But this requirement is capable of being insisted upon with finical and injurious exactness. The harm from its violation can seldom be serious, and Courts should not find fault with omissions to use a formal hypothetical statement where the jury could not have been misled. The question need be only substantially, not in exact form, hypothetical.[3]

For the mode of stating the assumed premises, there is no fixed rule. Where the facts have not yet been testified to at all, there is only one way, — the oral statement of the premises by counsel. But where testimony already offered is taken as the basis, either the testimony of a given witness may be read aloud, an assumption of its truth being then made, or an oral statement by counsel, in impersonal form, of such assumed premises may be used; the judge's discretion determining the choice.[4] Whether a uniform question asked of all the experts need be repeated for each witness, if the witness has already heard it read, will also rest in the discretion of the judge.[5]

§ 684. Hypothetical Questions on Cross-examination. Just as the cross-examination of an ordinary witness may involve questions which test his memory, observation, and bias, so in cross-examining one who takes the 1880, Nave v. Tucker, 70 Ind. 18 (objection that "the hypothesis was not proved," overruled); 1880, Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 470 (question need not state "facts as they exist"); 1882, Stearns v. Field, 90 Id. 640 (objection that it "assumed what was not proved," overruled); 1891, Bowen v. Huntington, 35 W. Va. 686, 14 S. E. 217 (basis need not be facts exactly as they are).

[6] 1865, Mary Harris' Trial, (D. C.) Clephane's Rep. 100 (question of some 3,800 words, allowed to be put); 1881, Guiteau's Trial, (D. C.) II, 1251, 1322, 1720 (question of more than 3,400 words, allowed to be asked); 1886, Mayo v. Wright, 63 Mich. 43, 29 N. W. 832 (mere length is no objection).

[7] 1898, Davis v. Ins. Co., 59 Kan. 74, 52 Pac. 67 (lengthy question held perhaps improper); 1896, Howes v. Colburn, 165 Mass. 385, 43 N. E. 125 ("It might be wiser to exclude such questions altogether, when they are very complicated or involve much detail"); 1886, Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 78, 7 Sup. 408 (trial Court in discretion may exclude).

[1] A classical form is this: 1856, Shaw, C. J., in Woodbury v. Obear, 7 Gray 471: "If certain facts, assumed by the question to be established by the evidence, should be found true by the jury, what would be his opinion, upon the facts thus found true, on the question at issue?"

[2] 1895, Chalmers v. Mfg. Co., 164 Mass. 532, 42 N. E. 98; 1890, Jones v. R. Co., 43 Minn. 281, 45 N. W. 444; 1884, Reed v. State, 62 Miss. 409, semble; 1878, State v. Bowman, 78 N. C. 511, semble; 1886, State v. Cole, 94 Id. 964; 1888, State v. Keene, 100 Id. 511, 6 S. E. 91; 1878, Gilman v. Strafford, 50 Vt. 725.

[3] 1870, Christiancy, J., in Kempsey v. McGinniss, 21 Mich. 139; 1875, McCollum v. Seward, 62 N. Y. 318.

[4] 1860, Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 468.

[5] 1886, Gates v. Fleischer, 67 Wis. 509, 30 N. W. 674.

stand as a skilled witness, his judgment upon germane matters may be tested by assuming premises and asking his conclusions.[1] The modes and purposes are substantially the same as in testing ordinary witnesses (post, §§ 994, 1000, 1018, 1362).

B. Knowledge required for Special Subjects.

1. Medical Matters.

§ 687. Physician's General Knowledge based on the Study of Books. The general principle has already been considered (ante, § 657) that a witness' knowledge must be based upon personal observation of his own senses. It has also been noted that exceptions to this rule are conceded, — in particular, for professional men testifying to a matter of general scientific truth (ante, § 665). It remains to consider the application of the principle to the testimony of physicians concerning truths of medical science. Here it is necessary to distinguish two considerations. Are we objecting to the bookish source of their knowledge (1) because it implies a lack of skill and experience as affecting their expert capacity for judgment, or (2) because it involves accepting, as a knower of a given fact, one who has not really observed for himself but is trusting to others? In other words, is the objection directed against the quality of the witness' Experience or the quality of his Knowledge?

(1) From the former point of view, the result would not be uncertain if we were asking whether a layman who has merely read medical books may express an opinion upon the nature of a particular person's disease; for here the mere perusal of books by a layman would clearly not be a sufficient cultivator of the judgment for diagnosis of symptoms or prescription of remedies. But if, as is usual, the objection is directed against a professional man, because he has merely graduated from a medical school and has never practised, then ordinarily it should not be difficult to negative the objection. According to the older methods, by which a medical training was gained mainly from actual practice under an apprenticeship, an active apprenticeship in practice for a considerable period might be essential. But the modern training of a medical school does not involve merely the perusal of books; it embraces a personal observation of disease and its remedies. The cultivation of judgment which may be attained in such a school ought to qualify without any requirement of a term of subsequent practice. There is little definite authority on the subject; but the matter should rest in the trial judge's discretion.[1]

[1] 1887, People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 246, 15 Pac. 86; 1897, West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Fishman, 169 Ill. 196, 48 N. E. 447 (on cross-examination, "any fact which, in the sound discretion of the Court, is pertinent to the inquiry, whether testified to or not," is usable in testing the expert); 1871, Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 498; 1885, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 id. 415, 3 N. E. 389, 4 N. E. 908; 1885, Geisendorff v. Eagles, 106 id. 41, 5 N. E. 743; 1888, Grubb v. State, 117 id. 284, 20 N. E. 257, 725; 1899, Taylor v. Star Coal Co., 110 Ia. 40, 81 N. W. 249 ("almost any state of facts" may be assumed).

[1] 1850, Pollock, C. B., in Bristow v. Sequeville, 5 Exch. 277 ("In a case depending on medical testimony, would the evidence of a person be admissible who had studied medicine at

(2) The objection from the second point of view is easily answered. T deny the competency of a physician who does not know his facts fro personal observation alone is to reject medical testimony almost in its en tirety. To allow any physician to testify who claims to know solely b personal experience is to appropriate the witness-stand to impostors. Med cal science is a mass of transmitted data; the generalizations are rare whic are the result of one man's personal observation exclusively; and the la cannot expect its petitioners to obtain these rare persons. The law mus recognize the methods of medical science. It cannot stultify itself by estab lishing, for legal remedies, a rule never considered necessary by the medica profession itself. It is enough for a physician, testifying to a medical fac that he is by training and occupation a physician; whether his source o information for that particular fact is in part or entirely the hearsay of hi fellow-practitioners and investigators, is immaterial:

1893, Holmes, J., in Finnegan v. Gas Works Co., 159 Mass. 312, 34 N. E. 523 (receiv ing testimony that after asphyxiation there is a period of conscious suffering befor death, the physician having had no cases of the kind): "Although it might not be ad missible merely to repeat what a witness had read in a book not itself admissible, still when one who is competent on the general subject accepts from his reading as probabl true a matter of detail which he has not verified, the fact receives an authority which i would not have had from the printed page alone, and, subject perhaps to the exercise o some discretion, may be admitted."[2]

§ 688. Physician's Knowledge of Symptoms based on Hearsay of Patients and Others. Here, again, the law cannot afford to stultify itself by refusing to recognize, in testimonial rules, the safe and accepted practices of medical science. When a physician examines a patient to ascertain his ailment and one of the universities but had never practised it?", intimating the negative); 1847, Tullis v. Kidd, 12 Ala. 650 (actual practice is not necessary); 1895, State v. Dixon, 47 La. An. 1, 16 So. 589 (admitting a medical student who had treated similar diseases). The retirement from active practice involves no disqualification: 1874, Roberts v. Johnson, 58 N. Y. 617. A similar question arises sometimes under another principle, i. e. whether a physician of general practice, whose knowledge on a special topic (such as poisoning) is gained by reading only, is of sufficient experience or judgment to testify on that topic (ante, § 569). The rulings do not always distinguish the two points of view, but the result in both classes should be substantially the same.

[2] Admitted: 1888, Preeper v. R., 15 Can. Sup. 401, 404, 408, 410, 416 (medical witness to the indicia of distance in shot-marks on a body, speaking "not from personal experience, but from books," admitted; two judges diss.); 1894, Jackson v. Boone, 93 Ga. 662, 20 S. E. 46; 1901, Boswell v. State, 114 id. 40, 39 S. E. 897 (physicians allowed to testify to the poisonous nature of bluestone, though deriving their knowledge solely from books); 1851, Carter v. State, 2 Ind. 619 (poison; knowledge based on reading); 1901, Isenhour v. State, 157 Ind. 517, 62 N. E. 40 (chemist's knowledge, acquired "wholly from reading, study, and conversations with other physicians"); 1886, State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 16, 12 Pac. 318 (knowledge partly founded on books); 1894, Hardiman v. Brown, 162 Mass. 585, 39 N. E. 192 (reading is sufficient, at least for specialties); 1883, Marshall v. Brown, 50 Mich. 148, 15 N. W. 55 (the effect of a substance on the human system; knowledge based chiefly on books); 1869, Taylor v. Railway, 48 N. H. 306 (founded on study alone); 1873, State v. Wood, 53 id. 495 (same); 1859, State v. Terrell, 12 Rich. L. 327 (strychnia-poisoning; knowledge acquired from "books, lectures, and oral instruction").

Excluded: 1898, Erb v. Popritz, 59 Kan. 264, 52 Pac. 871 (statements as to probable duration of life, by one speaking solely from acquaintance with mortality tables); 1870, Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452, 459 (one who proposed to testify as to the contagiousness of foot-rot in sheep, after having "as editor of a stock-journal read extensively on the subject"); 1888, Soquet v. State, 72 Wis. 666, 40 N. W. 391 (arsenic; testimony based solely on books).

For the right to cross-examine a medical man upon the scope of his reading, see post, § 1700.

to prescribe for it, a portion of his reasons for action must be the patient's own statements. To exclude testimony not wholly independent of this foundation for opinion is, in strictness, to exclude almost always medical testimony based on a personal examination.[1] Yet there are distinctions to be taken. The hearsay source of information may be that of the patient as to (1) present symptoms, (2) past symptoms, (3) cause of the injury or illness, (4) or that of a nurse or other third person.

(1) A diagnosis based in part on hearsay from the patient himself stating present symptoms is generally and properly considered receivable.[2] That it would not be when this was the exclusive source may sometimes be conceded, though such a case can rarely be presented.[3]

(2) As to hearsay from the patient detailing past symptoms, no line can well be drawn between this and the preceding source; the policy of the case is the same for both.[4] Courts seem usually not to take any distinction; but occasionally the principle is expressly spoken of as covering the present case.[5]

[1] It is said that Prince von Bismarck was once ruffled by the number of questions put to him by his medical attendant, an eminent physician of no less individuality and self-possession than the Chancellor. The latter intimated that the physician could do his duty without putting so many intrusive questions. "Very well, Highness," said the other; "but if you wish to be cured without questions asked, you had better send for a veterinary surgeon." Those who object to testimony of the sort here considered must expect to surrender the medical witness-stand to veterinary surgeons exclusively.

[2] Accord, except as otherwise noted: Ala.: 1855, Eckles v. Bates, 26 Ala. 659; Ga.: 1896, Western & A. R. Co. v. Stafford, 99 Ga. 187, 25 S. E. 656, semble; Ill.: 1867, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Sutton, 42 Ill. 440; 1884, Chicago B. & Q. R. Co. v. Martin, 112 id. 17; Ind.: 1885, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 Ind. 419, 3 N. E. 389, 4 N. E. 908; 1887, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 Id. 548, 14 N. E. 572, 16 N. E. 197; 1888, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Snyder, 117 id. 436, 20 N. E. 284; 1892, Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Spilker, 134 id. 380, 392, 33 N. E. 280, 34 N. E. 218; 1893, Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Heaton, 137 Id. 1, 35 N. E. 687; Mass.: 1865, Barber v. Merriam, 11 All. 324 (perhaps overruling Rowell v. Lowell, 11 Gray 420, 1858); Minn.: 1891, Johnson v. R. Co., 47 Minn. 430, 50 N. W. 473 ("an opinion based in part upon statements" by the patient as to his present condition, admissible); N. J.: 1896, Consolidated Traction Co. v. Lambertson, 59 N. J. L. 297, 36 Atl. 100; 1897, Traction Co. v. Lambertson, 60 id. 452, 38 Atl. 683 (physician's opinion, founded "wholly or in part" on inadmissible declarations of patient, admissible where there was other evidence of facts so declared); N. Y.: 1866, Matteson v. R. Co., 35 N. Y. 491; S. C.: 1895, State v. Chiles, 44 S. C. 338, 22 S. E. 340; U. S.: 1894, Union P. R. Co. v. Novak, 15 U. S. App. 400, 414, 9 C. C. A. 629, 61 Fed. 573; Wis.: 1879, Quaife v. R. Co., 48 Wis. 521, 4 N. W. 658; 1895, Block v. R. Co., 89 Id. 371, 61 N. W. 1102. Contra: 1895, Van Winkle v. R. Co., 93 Ia. 509, 61 N. W. 929; 1886, People v. Murphy, 101 N. Y. 130, 4 N. E. 326, semble; 1892, Davidson v. Cornell, 132 id. 236, 30 N. E. 573, semble: 1895, Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Roalefs, 70 Fed. 23, 16 C. C. A. 601, semble (where possibly the Court would have admitted the opinion on the hypothesis of the truth of the statements); 1893, Abbot v. Heath, 84 Wis. 318, 54 N. W. 574 (distinguishing Quaife v. R. Co., supra, partly because that opinion was excluded partly because the statements of the alleged insane person were made too long after the alleged insane act; but the Court confused the present rule, which does not apply to an alleged insane person's conversation (for that is not hearsay, ante, § 227), with the doctrine that insane conduct long after the alleged insane act is not relevant (ante, § 233), which was here the true reason for exclusion). But the following ruling is sound: 1897, People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049 (excluding a hypnotist, who based his testimony solely on the defendant's protestation of innocence).

[3] The following rulings are erroneous, for the reasons noted: 1899, State v. Soper, 148 Mo. 217, 49 S. W. 1007 (physician's testimony to defendant's insanity, founded on defendant's own statements, excluded); 1895, People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 566, 42 N. E. 1045, semble (where the opinion was excluded partly because the statements of the alleged insane person were made too long after the alleged insane act; but the Court confused the present rule, which does not apply to an alleged insane person's conversation (for that is not hearsay, ante, § 227), with the doctrine that insane conduct long after the alleged insane act is not relevant (ante, § 233), which was here the true reason for exclusion). But the following ruling is sound: 1897, People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049 (excluding a hypnotist, who based his testimony solely on the defendant's protestation of innocence).

[4] Though statements of past symptoms may not be independently admissible under the Hearsay exception (post, § 1718).

[5] Accord: Eckles v. Bates, Barber v. Merriam, in note 2, supra. Contra, R. Co. v. Frazier, in the following note. The following ruling seems doubtful: 1825, Gardner Peerage Case, Le Marchant's Rep. 77, 170, 174 (the issue involving the ultimum tempus of gestation, and a physician being called to testify to specific instances of a period exceeding nine calendar months from conception, the physician's state-

(3) As to hearsay from the patient as to the cause of the injury or illn no such necessity exists for accepting the testimony. In the preceding stances, certain data were necessary for the forming of an opinion as to nature of the ailment. Here the physician, in testifying to the cause of would merely repeat what the patient said; but this may be shown by ot evidence. Moreover, the physician's estimate of the cause may be m independently of these statements, and, so far as it is based on them, it i mere repetition carrying no weight of its own. There seems no reason demand the reception of this testimony.[6]

(4) As to hearsay symptoms told by third persons, a diagnosis based sundry information from third persons in general has no claims for adm sion.[7] But where the information is that of an attending nurse or phy cian having personal observation and an interest in learning and describi accurately, there seems every reason for admitting testimony based in p on this. Every physician relies upon it, and there are periods of sleep other unconsciousness or mental incapacity which make it impossible resort to the patient for information. It should be immaterial whether t informant is a professional person, or is the wife or other member of t household, so long as the information is based on attendance and perso observation.[8] The rulings have thus far seldom accepted this view; yet t language of some of their opinions may well seem to a physician a pedan enforcement of legal nicety inconsistent with the needs of practical life.

(5) Distinguish here (1) the inquiry as to the grounds of a physicia knowledge and the admissibility of his answers (ante, § 655); (2) the admi sion of the patient's statements themselves as testimony under the Hears exceptions (post, § 1918); though Courts do not always distinguish the tw

§ 689. Layman's or Physician's Acquaintance with the Person Insane Diseased. According to the principle already examined (ante, § 659), o element of a sufficient means of knowledge is the adequacy of the extent scope of observation. In medical matters (speaking broadly) may be co sidered under this head (1) sundry instances in which health, injury, ment of the date of conversion, based wholly on the woman's statement to him, was excluded; otherwise, of his opinion in general as to the length of the ultimum tempus in general).

[6] Accord: 1867, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Sutton, 42 Ill. 440: 1882, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Frazier, 27 Kan. 463; 1872, Morrissey v. Ingham, 111 Mass. 65. Contra: 1865, Barber v. Merriam, 11 All. 324.

[7] Excluded: 1898, Flannagan v. State, 106 Ga. 109, 32 S. E. 80 (medical man's opinion of insanity, based in part upon what he had heard); 1887, Brown v. Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 315, 32 N. W. 610; 1899, State v. Peel, 23 Mont. 358, 59 Pac. 169 (opinion based in part on hearsay in regard to the crime); 1895, People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 566, 42 N. E. 1045 (like Flannagan v. State, supra); 1868, Rouch v. Zehring, 59 Pa. 78 (opinion of insanity, founded partly on hearsay); 1888, U. S. v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. 732 (same); 1890, Voshurg v. Putney, 78 Wis. 8 47 N. W. 99 (knowledge of the cause of a wound predicated upon indefinite hearsay).

[8] Accord: 1896, Southern K. R. Co. Michaels, 57 Kan. 474, 46 Pac. 938 (history a case given by other physicians to one who wa called in; his testimony, founded on this an on personal examination, not excluded). Contra 1882, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Frazier, 2 Kan. 463; 1858, Heald v. Thing, 45 Me. 39 ("The declarations of the nurse, wife, an attending physician are all clearly inadmissible," and therefore also "the information obtaine from those sources"); 1895, Miller v. R. Co. 62 Minn. 216, 64 N. W. 554 (opinion as to caus of symptoms, based in part on another physi clan's "history of the case," given at the tim of consultation, excluded); 1865, Wetherbee' Ex'rs v. Wetherbee's Heirs, 38 Vt. 454.

disease, are concerned, (2) the condition of sanity or insanity, in which the question may arise as to the extent of the witness' observation, whether a medical man or a layman.

(1) Health, Injuries. Here all that needs to be said is that the witness must appear to have had adequate opportunities of observation of the person, and, if the matter calls for it, to have directed his attention particularly to the particular ailment. The discretion of the trial judge should govern.[1]

(2) Sanity and Insanity. It may here be assumed that laymen, as well as others, may, under the Opinion rule, express opinions as to sanity and insanity (post, § 1933). The inquiry will still remain (since each and every witness must fulfil the requirement of Knowledge) whether the particular person put forward to express the opinion has had an opportunity, by observation of the conduct of the one whose mental condition is in issue, to learn something upon the subject and to form a belief worth listening to. That such an opportunity is necessary, no one has doubted. The doubt comes only as to the exact phrasing of the test to be applied. A precise definition, which shall be at once both flexible enough to meet various situations and exact enough to be a rule at all, is difficult, if not impossible. It has at any rate not been devised to the satisfaction of all the Courts. The truth is that the test should be left in the hands of the trial judge. Neither its exact phrasing, nor its application in a given instance, should be made to occupy the time of the highest Courts. The attempt to invent an all-sufficient form of words is as inexpedient as it is vain:

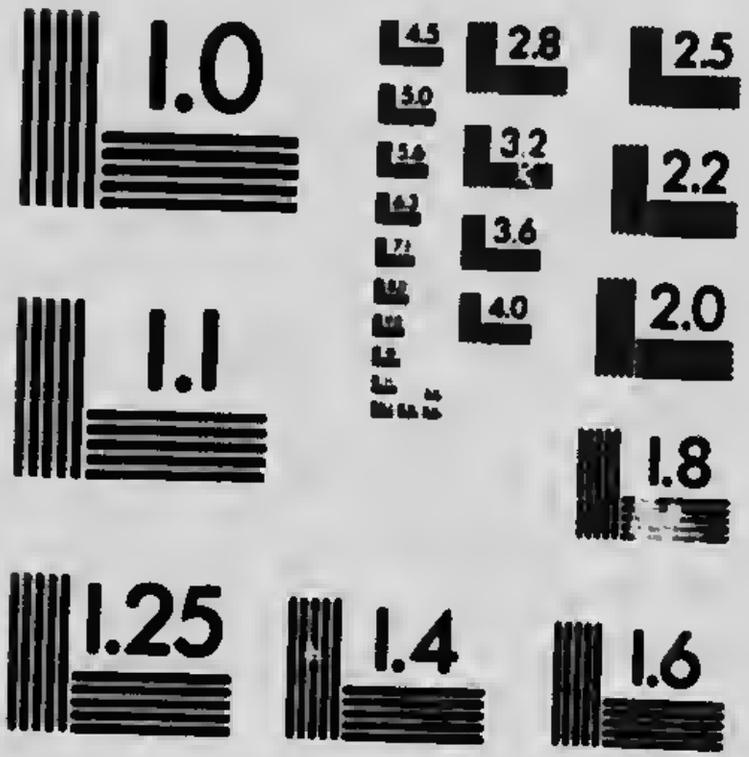
1841, Gaston, J., in Clary v. Clary, 2 Ired. 85: "Unquestionably, before a witness can be received to testify as to the fact of capacity, it must appear that he had an adequate opportunity of observing and judging of capacity. But so different are the powers and habits of observation in different persons that no general rule can be laid down as to what shall be deemed a sufficient opportunity of observation, other than that it has in fact enabled the observer to form a belief or judgment thereupon. . . . It is admissible whether the opportunity for observation has been frequent or rare, . . . the weight of which must depend upon a consideration of all the circumstances under which it was formed."

1854, Goldthwaite, J., in Powell v. State, 25 Ala. 27: "In every case where this question arises, the character of the insanity is a matter of no small importance in determining correctly as to the admissibility of the opinions of witnesses. If the evidence tended to establish that the prisoner, from mental imbecility, was incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, or that his case was one of general insanity, by which we mean madness on all subjects, it is obvious that it would not require the same degree of observation to discover the existence of the disease under such circumstances as in cases of monomania or partial derangement, where the particular delusion might frequently escape the attention of the most acute observer or the most intimate association. . . . It is impossible to lay down any precise rule as to the length or character of acquaintance which

[1] Examples: (1) Health and Illness: 1885, Carthage Turnpike Co. v. Andrews, 102 Ind. 143, 1 N. E. 364; 1874, People v. Olmstead, 30 Mich. 433; (2) Injuries requiring special examination: 1879, Eboe v. State, 34 Ark. 522 (that a head-wound was the cause of death by concussion, though the witness had not opened the skull in his examination; admitted); 1884, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Shires, 108 Ill. 627 (personal injuries; physician-witness who had known the plaintiff before the injury and examined him afterwards, admitted); 1878, Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 542 (excluded on the facts).

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

would render the opinion of a witness admissible on this question. All we can say is that the circumstances must be such as to have afforded the opportunity to form an accurate judgment as to the existence or the non-existence of the disease considered with reference to the character or degree in which it is alleged to exist."

1860, Lumpkin, J., in Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 467: "It has been truly remarked that so different are the powers and habits of observation in different persons that no general rule can be laid down as to what shall be deemed a sufficient opportunity of observation, other than that in fact it has enabled the observer to form a belief or judgment thereon."

1864, Campbell, J., in Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 503: "From the nature of things no rule can be laid down declaring what amount of acquaintance or what opportunities are necessary to enable an observer to become a witness. There are cases of insanity open to the slightest scrutiny, while others defy the keenest search. But no testimony can be of any real value unless it appears the witness had adequate means and opportunities for forming some conclusion."

1892, Temple, C., in Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 414, 29 Pac. 1101 (commenting on the Code restriction to "intimate acquaintances"): "The witnesses are [at common law] only required to have had sufficient opportunity to observe the person whose sanity is in question. Different rulings have been made as to what shall be considered a sufficient showing of opportunity of observation to enable a witness to form an opinion which can be received as evidence; or, expressed in the language of our Code, what degree of intimacy there must be. In general, the idea seems to be that no rule can be prescribed on this subject. . . . Now, when we take into consideration the rule as it exists in most jurisdictions where the common law prevails, we must conclude that our Code has attempted what has been said to be impracticable, — to establish a rule as to what opportunities of observation shall entitle a witness to speak. . . . Since it requires the drawing of a definite line between things which are separated only by degrees of difference, the rule is and must remain more or less indefinite. A very large discretion must be conceded to the trial court."

1895, Boyd, J., in Crockett v. Davis, 81 Md. 134, 31 Atl. 710: "If, for example, a physician were to testify that, in his opinion, a testator was not of sound and disposing mind, capable of executing a valid deed or contract, and would in his further examination say that the only reason he had for such opinion was that the testator used patent medicines, or was a member of some religious or political faith other than his own, such opinion would be based on a foundation so clearly repugnant to right reason that a Court would not hesitate to instruct the jury that it was not sufficient to support a verdict."[2]

[2] In spite of the sensible utterances above quoted, the reports are still cumbered with rulings which should have been left to the trial Court. In this note are given the forms of the various tests proposed; where no quotation follows, the ruling merely illustrates the application of the general principle to a particular witness, with or without the enunciation of some general test; for additional minor rulings in some of the jurisdictions, see post, § 1938, where the Opinion rule is discussed with reference to lay testimony to sanity; Eng.: 1865, R. v. Southey, 4 F. & F. 884; Ala.: 1845, Bowling v. Bowling, 8 Ala. 541; 1849, Norris v. State, 16 id. 778 ("such as from long intimacy or familiar and frequent intercourse, with the party alleged to be insane, are peculiarly fitted to judge"); 1854, Florey v. Florey, 24 id. 247("whose acquaintance with the party has been such as to enable him to form a correct opinion as to his mental condition"); 1854, Powell v. State, quoted supra; 1860, Re Carmichael, 36 id. 514 ("of an intimate character, such as, etc."; a disposition here to lay down a strict test, limiting the trial Court's discretion, and thus departing from Powell v. State, supra); 1868, Stuckey v. Bellah, 41 id. 707; 1882, Ford v. State, 71 id. 397 (going back to the rule of Powell v. State); 1895, Murphree v. Sam, 107 id. 424, 18 So. 264; 1900, Dominick v. Randolph, 124 id. 557, 27 So. 481 (witness here held not to have a sufficiently "long and intimate knowledge"); Ark.: 1855, Kelly's Heirs v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 600; 1860, Beller v. Jones, 22 id. 95 ("those who, from habits of daily or common intercourse with or observation of appellee, could make an intelligent comparison of his mental manifestations with his conduct when he was admitted to enjoy the full use of his natural faculties"); 1895, Shaeffer v. State, 61 id. 241, 32 S. W. 679; Cal.: C. C. P. § 1870 (10) (opinion of "an intimate acquaintance," admissible); this is applied in the trial Court's discretion, according to the following cases: 1882, People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 53; 1887, People v. Levy, 71 id. 623, 12 Pac. 791; 1888, People v. Fine, 77 id. 149, 19 Pac. 269; 1892, Carpenter's Estate, 94 id. 414,

There is one class of witnesses who, by long tradition, have been received to testify to mental capacity and may speak without being qualified in the foregoing manner, namely, persons attesting a will as witnesses. Long before any tests for the general subject were devised, these persons were received, and the tradition seems everywhere to have kept its place, in spite of the change of theory of attestation and of the probable incompetency of a will-witness under modern tests:

29 Pac. 1101; 1893, Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 id. 584, 35 Pac. 317; 1895, People v. Schmitt, 106 id. 48, 39 Pac. 204; 1895, Re Wax's Estate, ib. 343, 39 Pac. 624; 1894, Holland v. Zollner, 102 id. 633, 640, 36 Pac. 930 (one who is not an "intimate acquaintance" may testify to rationality of appearance at the time of acts observed, though not to sanity in general); 1896, People v. McCarthy, 115 id. 258, 46 Pac. 1073 (Code rule does not apply to "rational" appearance at a given time; discretion of trial Court here applied to admit a jailer having the defendant for months in his charge); 1897, People v. Hill, 116 id. 562, 48 Pac. 711; 1898, People v. Barthleman, 120 id. 7, 52 Pac. 112; 1901, Keithley's Estate, 134 id. 9, 66 Pac. 5; D. C.: 1895, Taylor v. U. S., 7 D. C. App. 27, 34 (witness excluded for lack of "adequate opportunity to observe the conduct and appearance of the party"); Conn.: 1831, Kinne v. Kinne, 9 Conn. 103; Ida.: 1895, State v. Hurst, 4 Ida. 345, 39 Pac. 554; 1897, State v. Larkins, 5 id. 200, 47 Pac. 945; 1897, Kelly v. Perrault, 5 id. 221, 48 Pac. 45 (attesting witness to a deed); 1903, State v Shuff, — id. —, 72 Pac. 664; Ill.: 1897, Grand Lodge v. Wieting, 168 Ill. 408, 48 N. E. 59 (one who had a "passing acquaintance" only, held properly excluded); Ind.: 1854, Kenworthy v. Williams, 5 Ind. 379 ("long acquaintance"); 1877, Sutherland v. Williams, 55 id. 349; 1881, Colee v. State, 75 id. 514 ("some knowledge of the acts and conduct of the person"); 1883, Sage v. State, 91 id. 143 ("an acquaintance with the person, or conversations, business dealings, or social intercourse with him"); 1884, Goodwin v. State, 95 id. 558 ("if the witness shows an acquaintance with the accused, if he has had conversation with him, or has had business dealings or social intercourse with him"); 1888, Johnson v. Culver, 116 id. 289, 19 N. E. 129 (need not be "extensive or intimate"; enough if it be "such as to enable the witnesses to form an opinion"); 1888, Gruhb v. State, 117 id. 282, 20 N. E. 257, 725 (admitted, where witness talked 10 or 15 minutes with the defendant); Ia.: 1875, State v. Stickley, 41 Ia. 237 (knowledge long previous; excluded); 1875, State v. Geddis, 42 id. 268; 1887, Re Norman's Will, 72 id. 86, 33 N. W. 374; 1888, Blake v. Rourke, 74 id. 523, 38 N. W. 392 (distinguishing knowledge long before from past knowledge at a past time in issue); 1896, Fenton's Will, 97 id. 192, 66 N. W. 99 (a stenographer who had taken the testator's deposition, occupying two hours, admitted); 1902, Hull's Will, 117 id. 738, 89 N. W. 979; Kan.: 1898, State v. Beuerman, 59 Kan. 586, 53 Pac. 874 ("a fair basis for an opinion"); Me.: 1885, Fayette v. Chesterville, 77 Me. 33 (an expert examining once ex parte, rejected); 1895, Hall v. Perry, 87 id. 567, 33 Atl. 160; Md.: 1848, Brooke v. Townshend, 7 Gill 29; 1852, Stewart v. Redditt, 3 Md. 78 ("facts of such a nature as will enable him to form a knowledge of the party's intellect"); 1872, Waters v. Waters, 35 id. 542 ("an opportunity of forming a rational opinion"); 1895, Crockett v. Davis, 81 id. 134, 31 Atl. 710; Mass. (owing to the exclusion of lay opinions, post, § 1938, the question is rarely presented in this State); Mich.: 1893, O'Connor v. Madison, 98 Mich. 183, 188, 57 N. W. 105 (must have "the means of observation"); Miss.: 1876, Russell v. State, 53 Miss. 379; 1881, Wood v. State, 58 id. 743 ("such acquaintance or such opportunities of observation as are likely to make his opinion valuable"); 1884, Reed v. State, 62 id. 408 ("who has had opportunities of knowing and observing the conversation, conduct, and manners of the person"); Mo.: 1862, Farrell's Adm'r v. Brennan's Adm'x, 32 Mo. 334 ("opportunities for knowing and observing the conversation, conduct, and manners of the person"); 1870, State v. Klinger, 46 id. 227; 1877, Moore v. Moore, 67 id. 195 ("adequate opportunity of observing and judging of his capacity"); 1882, Appleby v. Brock, 76 id. 318 ("adequate opportunity of observing and judging"); 1891, State v. Williamson, 106 id. 171, 17 S. W. 172; Mont.: C. C. P. 1895, § 3146 (10) (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1870); 1888, Terr. v. Hart, 7 Mont. 498 ("acquainted with the defendant and have observed his actions and manner of life"); 1889, Terr. v. Roberts, 9 id. 15, 22 Pac. 132; 1899, State v. Peel, 23 id. 358, 59 Pac. 169 (opinion must relate to time of witness' observation, not time of trial); Nebr.: 1893, Shults v. State, 37 Nebr. 481, 496, 55 N. W. 1080 (must be "of an intimate character and his associations of sufficient duration to justify him in forming a correct judgment"); 1895, Pflueger v. State, 46 id. 493, 64 N. W. 1094; 1902, Clarke v. Irwin, 63 id. 529, 88 N. W. 783; Nev.: 1889, State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 347, 22 Pac. 241 (largely in discretion of trial judge); N. H. (see the citations under § 1938, post; they are complicated by the peculiar history of the Opinion rule in this State); N. Y.: 1901, People v. Krist, 168 N. Y. 19, 60 N. E. 1057 (physician allowed to state his opinion as based on defendant's acts at the very time of the homicide); in this State the question rarely arises, owing to the exclusion of lay opinions (post, § 1938); N. C.: 1863, McDougald v. McLean, Wiust. 120 ("opportunities of knowing and observing"); and other cases under § 1938, post; Or.: C. C. P. § 706 (10) (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1870); 1897, State v. Feister, 32 Or. 254, 50 Pac. 561 (a deputy sheriff who had the defendant in charge four months, admitted); Pa.: 1861, Bricker v. Lightner's Ex'r, 40 Pa. 205 ("opportunities for observing the conduct of the party and the developments of the intellectual faculties"); 1893, Com. v. Buccieri, 153 id. 535, 549, 26 Atl. 228 (one who had seen insane indications months before, but had not seen the defendant for some time, not allowed to speak as to his condition at the time charged); 1899, Com. v. Brown, 193 id. 507, 44 Atl. 497; Tex.: 1874, Thomas v. State, 48 Tex. 65 (acquaintance enabling witness "to form correct opinions of his mental condition"); Holcomb v. State, 41 id. 125 ("good opportu-

1794, Heyward v. Hazard, Bay 349; Per Curiam: "The third requisite is the attestation. The true construction of the law under this head has always been that the act called the attention of the witnesses to the situation of the testator himself, and this particularly relates to his sanity. . . . The business, then, of the persons required by statute to be present at executing a will is not barely to attest the corporal act of signing, but to try, judge, and determine whether the testator is compos to sign."[6]

2. Foreign Law.

§ 690. Knowledge of Foreign Law as based on Study alone. It ought not to be doubted to-day that, so far as a knowledge of our domestic system of law is concerned, it may be adequately gained from a study of the printed sources alone, without any practice whatever in the conduct of litigation. "Two things are established," says Professor Langdell, in a passage of classical value,[1] "first, that the law is a science; secondly, that all the available materials of that science are contained in printed books." From the point of view, then, either of that skill which is required to make an estimate of the state of the law, or of that observation of data which is the necessary foundation of knowledge, practice at the forum is not indispensable:

1844, Coleridge, J., in Baron de Bode's Case, 8 Q. B. 263: "I take it nobody can doubt that a lawyer who, without ever having held a brief or practised out of his chambers, had acquired all his knowledge by readiug, would be as competent to give evidence nities of forming an opiuion"); U. S.: 1815, Lessee of Hoge v. Fisher, 1 Pet. 164; 1903, Queenan v. Oklahoma, — U. S. —, 23 Sup. 762 (a lay witness who had known the accused "for some years," not allowed to say whether "since the killing he had formed an opinion as to the prisoner's mental condition at the time," on the ground that the opinion might, without further specification of its reasons, have been based on improper data); Wis.: 1875, Boorman v. Relief Ass., 90 Wis. 144, 62 N. W. 924 (excluded, where the witness' only grounds were that the person had once become angry with him for supposed misconduct).

[5] 1683, Hudson's Case, Skinner 79; 1848, McCurry v. Hooper, 12 Ala. 827; 1849, Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 335; 1897, Kelly v. Perrault, 5 Ida. 221, 48 Pac. 45; 1854, Kenworthy v. Williams, 5 Ind. 379, semble; 1843, Hunt's Heirs v. Hunt, 3 B. Monr. 577, semble; 1831, Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 55; 1852, Cilley v. Cilley, 34 id. 163 (when the facta observed are also given); 1890, Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 349, 23 N. E. 105 (but relates to time of attestation only); 1864, Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 495, per Campbell, J.; 1859, Carlton v. Carlton, 40 N. H. 17, semble; 1866, Boardman v. Woodman, 47 id. 134; 1853, DeWitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 381, per Mason, J.; 1863, McDougald v. McLean, Winst. 120; 1884, Barker v. Pope, 91 N. C. 168; 1835, Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 331; 1877, Garrison v. Blanton, 48 Tex. 303; 1877, Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584, 626; 1882, Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 Id. 255; 1888, Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 id. 680, 8 S. E. 493. Compare also the cases cited post, § 1511 (attestation as implying a statement of sanity).

See further the citations under § 1936, post, dealing with that detail of the Opinion rule which in some jurisdictions receives the will-witness' opinion without calling for his reasons.

Note that a witness may not be qualified to express an opinion on general sanity; but may yet have observed particular occasions or transactions, and therefore may of course (if otherwise admitted under the Opinion rule) characterize them as rational or not: 1886, People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 352, 12 Pac. 226; 1892, Carpenter's Estate, 94 id. 414, 29 Pac. 1101.

[1] Proceedings at the 250th Anniversary of the Founding of Harvard University, 1886, p. 85. "To put an end to reports," said Edmund Burke, on a great occasion, "is to put an end to the law of England" (31 Parl. Hist. 311).

respecting the state of the English law as if he had been engaged in the most extensive practice. . . . It is, I think, conceded that though the witness should state that all his knowledge is derived from reading a particular book or a particular decision, he still might give us the result of all his knowledge of the state of the unwritten law."[2]

But the case may be different in testing one's acquaintance with a foreign law. From the point of view of the principle of Knowledge, to be sure, little difficulty arises; for the fact that a consideration of text-writers' hearsay enters in part into a study of legal sources is no objection to a knowledge thus founded, since these very opinions go in part to make up the general consensus of interpretation which constitutes a portion of all law. From the point of view of Expert Capacity, however (ante, § 564), it may well be argued that residence, and perhaps practice, in the foreign country is essential to an ability to discriminate between the values of different sources and the standing of different authorities. It may even be argued that a Knowledge of recent possible changes is not to be expected of those who do not by practice or residence have an interest or an opportunity to keep up regularly with such changes. These considerations would hardly apply to the law of a country where the foreign system was germane in its general features to the domestic one — as that of England is to that of the United States —, where skill in the domestic forum would equally equip for an examination of the foreign sources. But for a system foreign in essence as well as in name some such requirements as the above might fairly be demanded as a rule; much being left to the discretion of the trial judge. The decisions reflect, in their conflict, the necessity for some such latitude of rule. On the whole, the English courts have been more strict in this respect than the courts of this country:

1850, Bristow v. Sequeville, 5 Exch. 275; the witness to the law of Cologne, in Prussia, had studied law at the University of Leipsic, in Saxony; Counsel: "Whether that knowledge was acquired by study or practice is only a ground for observation on the value of his evidence"; Alderson, B.: "If a man who has studied law in Saxony, and never practised in Prussia, is a competent witness to prove the law of Prussia, why may not a Frenchman, who has read books relating to Chinese law, prove what the law of China is? Would a person who had never been in England, but had studied the law of England at a foreign university, be competent to prove what the law of England is?"[3]

[3] Contra: 1831, Tindal, C. J., in Collier v. Simpson, 5 C. & P. 74, semble; 1845, Lord Langdale, M. R., in Nelson v. Bridport, 8 Beav. 539, semble.

[2] 1852, R. v. Povey, 6 Cox Cr. 83 (bigamy; to prove a valid first marriage, the woman's sister, who was present at the ceremony in Scotland, was offered to testify that "parties were always married in Scotland" in the form seen by her; excluded; "it may not be necessary in all cases to have a professional person to tell us what the foreign law is"; but "the witness does not profess to know the law"; this ruling well illustrates the distinction between the present principle and that of § 564, ante); 1875, Re Bonelli's Goods, L. R. 1 P. D. 69 (an English lawyer who had studied Italian law in England, rejected); 1878, Cartwright v. Cartwright, 26 W. R. 864, Hannen, P. (an English barrister practising before the Privy Council, held not a competent expert as to the law of those dependencies whence appeals are heard in the Council; this is unsound); 1880, Goods of Dost Aly Khan, L. R. 6 P. D. 6 (Persian minister plenipotentiary, admitted to testify to Persian law, having stated that "all persons in the diplomatic service of Persia are required to be thoroughly versed in the law, and that therefore he had studied and become acquainted with it"); 1901, Barber v. International Co., 73 Conn. 587, 48 Atl. 758 (American lawyer who had spent six months in England, held qualified on the facts); 1903, De Sonora v. Bankers' M. C. Co., — Ia. —, 95 N. W. 232 (an attorney

3. Reputation (of Character).

§ 691. Witness must expressly appear Qualified. When the character of a party or of a witness is to be evidenced by reputation (post, § 1608), the reputation must itself be proved by a witness qualified by an opportunity to obtain knowledge of it. The first rule here consists in an application of the general principle (ante, § 654) that a witness must expressly appear to have had the means of knowledge, before his testimony can proceed:

1870, Morton, J., in Wetherbee v. Norris, 103 Mass. 566: "The ruling of the presiding judge that each of the witnesses called to impeach the plaintiff should be first asked the question, 'Do you know the reputation of the plaintiff for truth and veracity?' is not the subject of exceptions. The practice upon this subject differs in different courts. In this State no practice is established as a rule of law; but it is within the discretion of the presiding judge to require the preliminary question above stated to be asked of each witness, if he shall deem that the interests of justice require it. The same principle is applicable to the examination of witnesses upon other subjects. . . . If the presiding judge sees that there is danger that the witness, in answer to the usual question, 'What is his general reputation for truth and veracity?', may give incompetent testimony," he may require the preliminary question; but this rests in his discretion.[1]

§ 692. Knowledge must be based on Residence in the Place of Repute, not on mere Inquiry. The admissible reputation is that which is built up in the neighborhood of a man's domicile or in the circle where his livelihood is followed (post, § 1615), and it is of slow formation. It is the sum of all that is said or not said for or against him. Consequently, its tenor can be adequately learned only by a residence in the place, not by a mere visit of inquiry, or by a casual sojourn, or by a conversation with a resident who reports the reputation:

held on the facts not qualified to testify to the law of Mexico); 1874, Consolidated Ins. Co. v. Cashow, 41 Md. 79 (a lawyer residing, but not shown to be practising, in the foreign State, held qualified); 1891, People v. McQuaid, 85 Mich. 123, 125, 48 N. W. 161 (to prove that a certain edition of Pennsylvania statutes was there commonly used as correct, a clergyman was admitted who had consulted the statutes of that State in performing his duty for marriage ceremonies and had observed the use of that edition in the courts); 1868, Hall v. Costello, 48 N. H. 179 (New Hampshire lawyers, who as counsel had had special interest and opportunity, admitted with reference to a topic of Canadian law).

Distinguish here certain other questions concerning foreign law: (1) Whether the witness is sufficiently skilled as a lawyer (ante, § 564); (2) where a foreign statute must be proved by copy (post, § 1271); (3) whether printed copies of a statute (post, § 1684), or legal treatises (post, § 1697), or reports of decisions (post, § 1703), may be used; and (4) whether the Opinion rule interposes any obstacle (post, § 1953).

[1] Accord: Ala.: 1898, McClellan v. State, 117 Ala. 140, 23 So. 653 ("ordinarily" the witness' means of knowledge will not be inquired into, if he says that he knows); Ill.: 1859, Crabtree v. Kile, 21 Ill. 183; 1861, Crahtree v. Hagenbaugh, 25 id. 233, 238; 1887, Spies v. People, 122 id. 1, 208, 12 N. E. 865; Mass.: 1883, Com. v. Rogers, 136 Mass. 158 (the judge may inquire whether the witness has any knowledge, but not into its means or extent); Miss.: 1884, Pickens v. State, 61 Miss. 563, 566; 1885, French v. Sale, 63 id. 386, 393 (in effect disposing of the contrary dictum in Powers v. Presgroves, 38 id. 227, 242); N. Y.: 1895, Carlson v. Winterson, 147 N. Y. 652, 42 N. E. 347; N. C.: 1829, State v. Boswell, 2 Dev. 210; 1843, State v. O'Neale, 4 Ired. 88 ("the regular mode is to inquire whether they have the means of knowing the general character"); 1843, State v. Parks, 3 Ired. 296 (the witness must profess to know the general reputation before testifying); 1873, State v. Speight, 69 N. C. 72, 75 ("whether he knew the general character of the witness, and the means by which he had acquired that knowledge," must be asked); 1894, State v. Coley, 114 N. C. 879, 883, 19 S. E. 705; U. S.: 1859, Teese v. Huntington, 23 How. 2, 13.

The following case is apparently no longer law: 1849, Bates v. Barber, 4 Cush. 107 (making the strange statement that "there is no question of competency for the Court to settle, in regard to the knowledge of witnesses . . . to reputation for truth and veracity").

1802, Kenyon, L. C. J., in Mawson v. Hartsink, 4 Esp. 102 (rejecting the question, "Whether the witness in consequence of a trial had made particular inquiries as to the witness' general character?"): "That cannot be evidence. . . . If this was allowed, when it was known that a witness was likely to be called, it would be possible for the opposite party to send round to persons who had prejudices against him and from thence to form an opinion, which was afterwards to be told in court to destroy his credit."

1829, Marcy, J., in Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. 354: "As a general rule, there is much reason to fear that this method [of ascertaining reputation] would prove a very unsafe one. The general character is the estimation in which a person is held in the community where he has resided, and ordinarily the members of that community are the only proper witnesses to testify as to such character. It would be unsafe to depend upon the testimony of the defendant's agent sent into that community, an entire stranger, it may be, to collect information to subserve the defendant's views in the suit. Such witness would not speak of his knowledge of the plaintiff's character, or give his own opinion in relation thereto, but barely state his conclusion upon the information received from others."[1]

How long this residence must have been, or how near to the place of domicile or occupation, cannot be defined by fixed rule. The qualification has varied according to circumstances;[2] and it should be left entirely to the trial Court.

4. Handwriting.

§ 693. General Question defined; Identifying an Illiterate's Mark. The identification of handwriting as genuine involves the double testimonial knowledge already spoken of (ante, § 653), an acquaintance by the witness with the type of handwriting in question, and an observation of the disputed

[1] Accord: 1864, Reid v. Reid, 17 N. J. Eq. 101 (like the above cases); 1817, Kimmel v. Kimmel, 3 S. & R. 336 ("the witness shall not be permitted to say 'he was told' that the person had either a good or bad character in his own neighborhood; but that is a very different thing from knowledge of common report acquired, as in this case, from common report itself"). Contra: 1811, Foulkes v. Sellway, 2 Esp. 236 (where the witness went to the place where the person in question lived, to inquire into her reputation).

[2] Ala.: 1846, Sorrelle v. Craig, 9 Ala. 536, 540 (one who lived 20 miles away, and was ignorant of the other witness' neighborhood-reputation, excluded); 1848, Hadjo v. Gooden, 13 id. 720, 722 (one who lived 12 miles away, but claimed to know the opinion in the witness' neighborhood, admitted); 1853, Dove v. State, 22 id. 23, 39 (excluded, because knowledge not shown), 1854, Elam v. State, 25 id. 53 (knowledge may appear on examination, as well as beforehand); 1859, Dupree v. State, 33 Ala. 388 (persons living more than 20 miles away, admitted); 1889, Holmes v. State, 88 id. 29, 7 So. 193 (excluded, on the facts); 1896, Buchanan v. State, 109 id. 7, 19 So. 410 (witness living 25 miles away, excluded); La.: 1896, State v. Fontenot, 48 La. An. 305, 19 So. 111 (witnesses not residing in the neighborhood for 11 and for 7 years, rejected); Mass.: 1866, Com. v. Lawler, 12 All. 585 (after the impeaching witness had admitted that he had not, as to the other witness' reputation, "heard it talked of a great deal," further questions as to the reputation were excluded); Mich.: 1883, Bathrick v. Post & Tribune Co., 50 Mich. 642, 16 N. W. 172; Mo.: 1899, State v. McLaughlin, 149 Mo. 19, 50 S. W. 315 (resident of town 5 miles distant, admitted); 1900, State v. Hudspeth, 159 id. 178, 60 S. W. 136 (one not living in the neighborhood, nor having an opportunity to learn of the reputation there, excluded); 1901, State v. Hsines, 161 id. 555, 61 S. W. 621 (witness from another State, excluded on the facts); N. H.: 1860, Kelley v. Proctor, 41 N. H. 139 ("whether he is acquainted with the reputation of the former witness for truth, or has the means of knowing the former witness' general character for truth"); S. C.: 1892, State v. Turner, 36 S. C. 539, 15 S. E. 602; Tex.: 1879, Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 65, 77; Wis.: 1879, Dufresne v. Weise, 46 Wis. 290, 297, 1 N. W. 59 (not clear); 1883, Wallis v. White, 58 id. 26, 29, 15 N. W. 767 (one residing in the same city, but not the same ward, admitted). But personal acquaintance with the one bearing the reputation is not necessary; 1817, Kimmel v. Kimmel, 3 S. & R. 336. Compare (1898) Peeples v. State, 103 Ga. 629, 29 S. E. 691 (inquiries as to the length of acquaintance with the person, etc., held proper). The question where the reputation itself must prevail is a different one (post, § 1615).

specimen, the witness comparing the two in his mind and stating whethe the latter is to be regarded as genuinely an instance of the type in questio How to evidence the type of handwriting circumstantially — i. e. by ind vidual specimens — is a different matter, dealt with elsewhere (ante, § 38 post, §§ 2001, 2016). The inquiry here concerns the mode of proving it b testimonial evidence, i. e. by a witness who declares that he is acquainte with the type of handwriting in question. To satisfy this situation the wi ness (1) must observe the specimen in dispute; this we may assume he wi do;[1] and (2) must bring to this examination a knowledge of the type writing with which it is desired to affirm or deny a connection. It is th adequacy of this knowledge which is here to be examined. When may th witness properly claim that his opportunities of observation have been suc as to give him a fair knowledge of the general type or character of th person's hand? That this is the question has always been clearly recogniz by the Courts:

1816, Dallas, J., in Holt N. P. 421: "What are the materials of judgment to which witness has recourse when he says that he believes a particular signature to be the han writing of a particular person? He has seen the person write, and he is presumed have formed a standard in his mind, and with that standard to compare the writing question. This standard will be more or less perfect according as the instances have be more or less frequent."

1839, Bronson, J., in Cunningham v. Bank, 21 Wend. 558: "A witness must in so way have acquired a knowledge of the general character of the party's handwriting befo he can be qualified to testify on that subject."

1840, Gaston, J., in Pope v. Askew, 1 Ired. 16, 20: "The testimony now received that of the belief of a witness as to the identity of character between the writing in qu tion and the exemplar of the party's handwriting in the mind of the witness, whi exemplar has been formed upon previous sufficient means of observation. The enqui is, What does the law hold to be those adequate and sufficient means of observation?"

What, then, are the various recognized modes of obtaining knowledg It must be understood that this does not involve the testimony of one wh saw the very disputed document being written. Such a witness mak no comparison; he saw the act of writing, as he might have seen the a of ploughing a field; and he needs no knowledge of the general charact

[1] For the authorities on the question whether a witness to handwriting may testify to a lost disputed document or whether a deponent must have the document shown to him at the time of taking the deposition, see post, § 1185.

[2] The following opinions also expound the principle: 1852, Brayton, J., in Kinney v. Flynn, 2 R. I. 319, 326; 1872, Boyden, J., in State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 90.

The question has occasionally been raised whether one can testify from this basis to the genuineness of a marksman's mark — i. e. whether there is any constancy of peculiarity in the mark of an illiterate which can serve as a type or standard. There should be no hard-and-fast rule; the discretion of the trial Court should control. Such testimony seems generally to have been treated as allowable; 1830, George v. Surrey, M. & M. 516 (here the mark was an habitu one, and had a certain peculiarity); 1848, Say v. Glossop, 12 Jur. 464; 1849, Pearcy v. Dick 13 id. 997; 1850, Strong v. Brewer, 17 A 706, 710 (good opinion by Dargan, C. J.); 18 Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 155 (here the were two initials as a mark); 1897, State Tice, 30 Or. 457, 48 Pac. 367; 1868, Carso Appeal, 59 Pa. 493, 498, 503 (will); 1842, Fo v. Dennis, 3 Humph. 47 semble. Contra: 182 Carrier v. Hampton, 11 Ired. 307, 311 ("Ge erally, a mark, a mere cross, cannot be ide tified"); 1807, Engles v. Bruington, 4 Yeat 345, 346, obiter; 1851, Shinkle v. Crock, 17 P 159, 161 (inadmissible, where the mark has peculiarity; yet here a witness who said that had was excluded).

of the writer's hand. Excluding this kind of testimony, then, the various possible modes are three: (a) Knowledge obtained by seeing the person write some other documents or signatures, — indicated by the phrase ex visu scriptionis; (b) Knowledge obtained by seeing documents otherwise known to have been written by the person in question, — indicated by the phrase ex scriptis olim visis; (c) Knowledge obtained by an examination, in or out of court, for the express purpose of obtaining such knowledge, of documents said to have been written by the person in question, — indicated by the phrase ex comparatione scriptorum or ex scripto nunc viso. Within one or the other of these modes must fall any source of knowledge. In each of these modes two elements are involved, giving rise to different difficulties and different rules. The witness who says that he has, in one way or another, learned the character of the person's writing by the observation of specimens of it necessarily predicates two things, — (1) first, that specimens of handwriting were considered by him, and (2) secondly, that they were genuinely written by the person in question. The second of these circumstances is as essential as the first; and, under each mode of knowledge, it is to be considered whether both are present.

Before taking up in order the three modes of acquiring knowledge, it may be noted that (on the principle of § 654, ante), the witness must, before proceeding with his testimony, expressly appear to have had the means of knowledge;[3] for the possession of it is not presumed beforehand.

a. Ex Visu Scriptionis (Seeing the Person Write).

§ 694. Number of Times. Whether one could obtain a sufficient notion of the general character of a person's hand by seeing him write once only might well have been doubted. Tradition, however, has handed down a fixed rule that seeing the person write once only is as a matter of law sufficient:

1803, Eldon, L. C., in Eagleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 473: "You called a witness, and asked whether he had ever seen the party write. If he said he had, whether more or less frequently, if ever, that was enough. . . . You might call one who had not seen him write for twenty years, and if he said he believed it was the writing of the person, that evidence might go to the jury."[1]

[3] 1893, Richardson v. Stringfellow, 100 Ala. 416, 419, 14 So. 283 (omission of preliminary question later cured); 1892, Riggs v. Powell, 142 Ill. 453, 456, 32 N. E. 482 (he need not say "in so many words" that he knows it, if he shows knowledge); 1893, State v. Minton, 116 Mo. 605, 614, 22 S. W. 808 (that he is acquainted with the hand is sufficient); 1895, State v. Harvey, 131 id. 339, 32 S. W. 1110. In Georgia, however, it would seem that the statute, literally construed, dispenses with any prior inquiry into the witness' means of knowledge: Ga. Code 1896, § 5246 ("any witness is competent to testify as to his belief who will swear that he knows or would recognize the handwriting. The source of his knowledge is a question for investigation, and goes entirely to the credit and weight of his evidence").

[1] Accord: Eng.: 1801, Garrells v. Alexander, 4 Esp. 37, Kenyon, L. C. J.; 1817, Powell v. Ford, 2 Stark. 164; 1838, Willman v. Worrell, 8 C. & P. 381; 1836, Williams, J., and Patteson, J., in Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 719, 730; 1839, Warren v. Anderson, 8 Scott 384 (with other circumstances); 1806, Evans' Pothier, ii, 160 ("I have known the admission of this evidence carried so far as for an attorney, after the failure of other attempts, to stand up and swear to a knowledge of the writing of the opposite party from having once looked over his

It is true that one may even now be deemed incompetent if, though h saw the act of writing done, he in fact formed no idea of its character;[2] th a tendency is perhaps growing to leave the matter to the discretion of th trial court;[3] and that judges have sometimes expressed dissatisfaction wit a rule of such blind and unquestioning dogmatism. Nevertheless, the rul is a settled one.

§ 695. Length of Time beforehand. The accepted tradition is also that makes no difference how long it was beforehand that the act of writing wa observed:

1836, Williams, J., in Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 720: "Subject to the qualificatio of Lord Eldon [that there must have been formed some belief about the writing], whic seems to be the criterion and to decide the question in each case, I am aware of no rul attempting to prescribe the quantity of knowledge which is requisite to enable a witne to speak to his belief; what degree of freshness and recency in the correspondence t admit, or what antiquity to exclude, may (as the reason of the thing would induce on to expect) in vain be looked for. To the jury it must go, in the language of Lord Eldon from the highest to the lowest."[1]

Here again, modern policy is ignored in the rigidity of a rule which make no allowance for dimness of recollection; but it cannot be said that the judi cial discretion is allowed, as it ought to be, any limits.

§ 696. Quantity of Writing seen. The quantity of writing that was seen is wholly immaterial.[1] It has even been conceded that one who testifies t the genuineness of a signature need only have seen the surname written.[2] Bu shoulder when writing a letter at an alehouse"); Can.: 1899, Marcy v. Pierce, 4 N. W. Terr. 246; U. S.: 1847, Woodford v. McClenahan, 9 Ill. 89, semble; 1873, Burdick v. Hunt, 43 Ind. 386, semble; 1885, State v. Goodwin, 37 La. An. 713, 715; 1849, Smith v. Walton, 8 Gill 82; Edelen v. Gough, ib. 91; 1850, Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 590; 1852, Bowman v. Sanborn 25 id. 110, semble; 1858, Burnham v. Ayer, 36 id. 184, semble; 1873, Hammond v. Varian, 54 N. Y. 400; 1896, Diggins' Estate, 68 Vt. 198, 34 Atl. 696; 1872, Pepper v. Barnett, 22 Gratt. 406. The statement that seeing write once is sufficient has been repeated obiter again and again, and it would be unprofitable to record each time.

[2] 1781, De la Motte's Trial, 21 How. St. Tr. 810, Buller, J., semble; 1849, Hopper v. Ashley, 15 Ala. 462; 1856, McNair v. Com., 26 Pa. 390 (seeing once only suffices, if an impression of the character of the writing was gained). The following ruling goes rather on the principle of § 570, ante, that an illiterate is not expert enough to testify to handwriting at all: 1895, People v. Corey, 148 N. Y. 476, 42 N. E. 1066, by a divided court (an illiterate person who had seen the defendant write once and could practically neither read nor write; the testimony rejected, on the principle that "before a witness should be permitted to testify to the handwriting of another, . . . he should have an intelligent acquaintance with the handwriting of the party, so that he can determine with a reasonable degree of certainty whether the writing offered is his genuine handwriting").

[3] 1889, Wilson v. Van Leer, 127 Pa. 377, 17 Atl. 1097.

[1] Accord: 1803, Eagleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 475, Eldon L. C. (quoted ante, § 694); 1889, Wilson v. Van Leer, 127 Pa. 377, 17 Atl. 1097 (three times, very long before); 1901, Renshaw v. First National Bank, — Tenn. —, 63 S. W. 194 (one who saw the handwriting in 1857–60, admitted); 1896, Diggins' Estate, 68 Vt. 198, 34 Atl. 696 (once, 20 years before, admitted).

[1] 1891, Gibson v. Trowbridge, 96 Ala. 357, 361, 11 So. 365 (one who "saw considerable writing of E.," excluded); 1899, Marchall's Est., 126 Cal. 95, 58 Pac. 449 (knowledge of signature alone, enfficient); 1893, Salazar v. Taylor, 18 Colo. 538, 545, 33 Pac. 369 (bank clerk and attorney, who had often seen the party write his name, admitted); 1895, Kendall's Ex'r v. Collier, 97 Ky. 446, 30 S. W. 1002 (sufficient on the facts); 1895, Com. v. Hall, 164 Mass. 152, 41 N. E. 133 (sufficient on the facts); 1885, State v. Stair, 85 Mo. 273 (sufficient on the facts); 1902, State v. Hall, — S. D. —, 91 N. W. 325 (sufficient on the facts); 1896, Poncin v. Furth, 15 Wash. 201, 46 Pac. 241 (sufficient on the facts).

[2] 1827, Lewis v. Sapio, Moo. & M. 39, Abbott, C. J.; 1849, Smith v. Walton, 8 Gill 83. Contra, 1817, Powell v. Ford, 2 Stark. 164, Ellenborough, L. C. J.

it ought to be remembered, by those Courts which have not ruled on the foregoing topics, that the unwise liberality of these rules is explainable by the history of the law (post, § 1991). It was the product of a time when this mode of knowledge was the only orthodox one, when even the second mode (ex scriptis olim visis) was just obtaining acceptance, and when the third mode (ex scripto nunc viso) was not recognized at all; so that the paucity of recognized modes of proof upon a subject so common and so important forced the judges to concede a looseness in applying the primary and orthodox mode. This laxity the Courts of to-day would do well to abandon, now that the stress of necessity does not exist.

§ 697. Writing post litem motam; After-acquired Knowledge. It is obvious that one who denies the genuineness of a writing which an opponent affirms, or vice versa, will be tempted to form his writing to suit his claim if he writes after controversy for the purpose of showing the type of his writing. It is true that one cannot vary his handwriting entirely at his pleasure; but it is safe, as a rule, to accept no testimony founded on such specimens;[1] though the matter should be left to the trial Court's discretion.[2] But no such objection attaches to specimens thus written at the opponent's request, for here the opponent in effect takes the risk of the hand being feigned, and waives the objection.[3] There is, moreover, no objection to testimony based on an act of writing subsequent to the date of the disputed writing (if no controversy had arisen);[4] the type of writing is always assumed to have been substantially the same, — an assumption forced, but practically necessary.

§ 698. Quality of Witness' Opinion. The witness' belief as to the genuineness or non-genuineness of the disputed writing need not be a positive or unqualified one: it is enough if he "believes" or "thinks" it to be one or the other.[1] But his belief must be founded solely on the type of handwriting as known to him, — not on the person's moral character or other circumstances.[2]

[1] 1890, Dakota v. O'Hare, 1 N. D. 44, 44 N. W. 1003 (since trial begun); 1879, Reese v. Reese, 90 Pa. 93 (during trial).

[2] 1872, Thompson v. Bennett, 22 U. C. C. P. 393, 401 (testimony based on signatures written by the alleged makers in the witness' presence expressly to illustrate their handwriting, received, per Gwynne, J.); 1895, Tucker v. Hyatt, 148 Ind. 471, 42 N. E. 1047 (the mere fact not enough to exclude, if no abuse of Court's discretion appears).

[3] Compare the analogies of § 2009 and § 2018, post.

[4] 1852, Keith v. Lothrop, 10 Cush. 457; 1902, Ratliff v. Ratliff, 131 N. C. 425, 42 S. E. 887 (one who knew the hand after 1873, allowed to testify to the genuineness of a document of 1869).

So, too, the knowledge may be acquired after the witness saw the disputed writing, — a question which becomes important when the original is lost: 1888, Vye v. Alexander, 28 N. Br. 89, 95, 117 (witness to the writing of a lost document may speak from knowledge of the type of handwriting acquired afterwards; "if he can carry down the mental impression . . . and apply it to the paper that is in question and then produced in court, why may he not reverse the process and apply his knowledge of a paper produced in court to the mental impression formed in his mind with regard to the first paper?"); 1889, Alexander v. Vye, 16 Can. Sup. 501 (foregoing case affirmed); 1850, Porter v. Wilson, 13 Pa. 646. That the genuineness of a lost document, not produced, may be proved by testimony to the handwriting, see post, § 1185.

[1] Post, §§ 72[illegible], 727.

[2] 1797, Dacosta v. Pym, Peake N. P. 144 (the witness said the writing "was like to but he did not think it was the plaintiff's handwriting, because he knew the plaintiff to be a man too well acquainted with the world to sign such an account"; Lord Kenyon ruled that the witness

b. Ex Scriptis olim Visis (Seeing known Genuine Documents).

§ 699. General Principle. The difficulties that arise for this mode of tes mony are precisely the opposite of those arising under the preceding mo There the second element of knowledge (ante, § 693) — namely, that t specimen seen was genuinely written by the person in question — gives difficulty, because the very act of writing it was seen, and therefore t witness must necessarily know who wrote the specimen from which knowledge of the type was gained. Here, on the other hand, the doc ment has come to the observation of the witness without his seeing the of writing it. Hence the main source of controversy is the sufficiency of grounds for believing that the person in question was genuinely the writ Taking up first, then, this element, of his grounds of knowledge of the ty the simple question is: Has the witness adequate grounds for believing th the writing he observed was that of the person in question? That this is t real inquiry, and that in this mode of testimony, as distinguished from t preceding one, it is the peculiarly necessary one, has been clearly expound in an early Virginian decision:

1829, Coalter, J., in Rowt's Adm'x v. Kile's Adm'r, 1 Leigh 225: "The reason wh witness must see another write in order to form an opinion of the character of his ha writing is not, I apprehend, because seeing the party write gives you a knowledge of character of his hand; he must see the handwriting itself, after the act of writing is p formed, in order to acquire that knowledge. But when he sees the manual operati himself, he knows that the handwriting which he at the same time or afterwards inspe is the handwriting of the party. He thus acquires a knowledge . . . of a handwriti which he knows to be that of a certain individual. . . . Being accustomed to see operation is only full evidence that the writing, which you have thus seen and the char ter of which is more or less distinctly impressed on your mind according to circu stances, is the character of the manual writing of that individual. [On the other ha in the course of business and correspondence you acquire an equally perfect knowledge the handwriting of the individual. . . . But this writing may have been performed by clerk of the person in whose name it is; and if so, you have no knowledge of the ha writing of that person, though you have of that of his clerk, . . . [and the relevancy such knowledge] would be intirely defeated by proof that the letters were written by clerk, and is weakened in proportion to any doubts that may exist whether the pa whose handwriting is to be proved wrote the letters or not."

This being the reason for the inquiry, there is no special virtue in any p ticular rule as to the nature of the correspondence — whether business otherwise —, or as to the consequences of the correspondence — whether was "acted upon" or not. Nor is it a priori essential that there sho be mutual correspondence at all. The inquiry concerns the sufficiency of t witness' grounds of belief that A was the writer of what the witness receiv under A's name; and this, that, or the other rule must ultimately be test by this general nature of the inquiry:

must consider "the character of the handwriting only").

But this is a different thing from testing them as to the strength of their belief: 1893, Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S. 150, 163, Sup. 288 (question to qualified witnesses handwriting, whether they would act on a n as genuine, allowed).

1839, Bronson, J., in Cunningham v. Bank, 21 Wend. 559: "The authenticity of the specimens may be established by presumptive as well as by direct evidence. . . . [After giving illustrations], other cases might be mentioned where the circumstances will well warrant the inference of authenticity, although there may be no direct evidence to that effect. But in some way the fact that the specimens are genuine must be satisfactorily proved. . . . Standing alone, the fact that the witness has acted on the letters has no tendency to prove them genuine. It only proves, and that merely by inference, that the witness believed the letters authentic. His belief is of no importance unless it is founded upon some good reason, — such a reason as will satisfy the Court and jury as well as the witness. Although the fact that the witness has acted on the letters is, when standing alone of no importance, it may be of great value in a chain of circumstantial evidence."

The use of this class of testimony is comparatively new; its orthodoxy was not established until the last century (post, § 1993). But in the early leading case, Lord Ferrers v. Shirley, decided before the doctrine had become entirely orthodox, the principle now to be examined — the necessity for adequate ground to believe the genuineness of the letters — were clearly brought out:

1731, Lord Ferrers v. Shirley, Fitzgibbons, 195: "Amongst other witnesses was called one J. J., who would have swore to the hand-writing of one J. Cottington, whose name was to the deed [of Robert Earl Ferrers] as a witness, because he had seen several letters wrote by J. Cottington. Thereupon he was asked, whether he had ever seen the said Cottington write; to which he answered, that he never did, nor never saw the person that wrote the said letters; but that his master, to whom the said letters were wrote for the rent of a part of the estate of the late Earl Robert Ferrers, which his said master held, informed him, they were the letters of J. Cottington, the Lord Ferrers's steward, who was the person pretended to have attested the deed in question. Hereupon it was objected to his testimony, because he could not say with any certainty, whether or no the writer of the letters was the same person that attested the deed; for that the J. Cottington, that was supposed to write the letters, might get some other person to write those very letters for him; and the counsel insisted, that in all cases, where a witness would swear to the hand-writing, he must be able to say, that he saw such person write. The Court rejected the said J. J. because he could not ascertain the identity of the person. But my Lord RAYMOND said, that it is not necessary in all cases that the witness have seen the person write, to whose hand he swears; for where there has been a fixed correspondence by letters, and that it can be made out that the party writing such letters is the same man that attested a deed, that will entitle a witness to swear to that person's hand, tho' he never saw him write. PAGE, Justice, said, If a subscribing witness to a deed lives in the West-Indies, whose hand-writing is to be proved in England, a witness here may swear to his hand, by having seen the letters of such person wrote by him to his correspondent in England, because under the special circumstances of that case, there is no other way, or at least, the difficulty will be great, to prove the hand-writing of such subscribing witness. But my Lord RAYMOND differed, and said, that those special circumstances could not vary the reason of the thing."

The various circumstances that may be regarded as affording adequate ground for such a belief may be grouped under three heads: (1) admissions expressly made to the witness by the person in question; (2) implied admissions; (3) other circumstances.

§ 700. (1) Express Admissions as the source of belief. There can be no question that an express acknowledgment by the purporting writer affords an adequate ground of belief in the authenticity of the writing received, and this is generally accepted.[1]

§ 701. (2) Implied Admissions as the source of belief. An implied admission is universally considered as equally satisfactory, — i. e. any conduct which amounts to a recognition by the person in question of the genuineness of the writing received. There is no fixed test; perhaps the most accurate and most flexible is given in the following passage:

1839, Bronson, J., in Cunningham v. Bank, 21 Wend. 560: "The acts done in pursuance of the letters may be followed by such acts of approval or acknowledgment on the part of the supposed author as can only be accounted for on the supposition that he was in truth the writer of the letters; and there can be no doubt that in this way, as well as by a direct admission, the fact of authenticity may be satisfactorily established." [1]

§ 702. (3) Mere Exchange of Correspondence: is this sufficient or must it be "acted upon"? As soon as those sources of belief are reached which

[1] Examples: 1898, Redd v. State, 65 Ark. 475, 47 S. W. 119; 1838, State v. Spence, 2 Harringt. 348; 1822, Hammond's Case, 2 Me. 33; 1860, Woodman v. Dana, 52 Id. 9; 1873, Hammond v. Varian, 54 N. Y. 400. Unnecessary discriminations have sometimes been made: 1880, Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 52 (possible exclusion because the witness gets the admission expressly for the trial); 1840. Pope v. Askew, 1 Ired. 16 (exclusion because the admission was made to another than the witness).

[1] Examples of testimony admitted: 1832, Smith v. Sainsbury, 5 C. & P. 196 (where the witness had merely as counsel seen an affidavit used by the opponent); 1821, Johnson v. Daverne, 19 Johns. 136 (where the witness had received payment of notes purporting to be those of the signer of the disputed document); 1839, Cunningham v. Bank, 21 Wend. 559, semble (same); 1873, State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452 (a jailer who had read letters handed to him by the prisoner as hers and forwarded by him as such); 1849, Gordon v. Price, 10 Ired. 387 ("[notes] established in the mind of the witness to be genuine by the fact that they were so treated by the party from time to time, by paying them"); 1819, Com. v. Smith, 6 S. & R. 571 (where a cashier had habitually made payments and received receipts from another cashier purporting to be the person in question); 1876, Cody v. Conly, 27 Gratt. 323 (where the party had drawn orders on the witness which the latter paid and the former honored).

Examples of testimony excluded: 1828 Creaves v. Hunter, 2 C. & P. 477 (witness to the defendant's hand excluded, who had seen "other papers in the master's office, which were admitted to be of his handwriting by the defendant's attorney," and had acted on them); 1850, R. v. Crouch, 4 Cox Cr. 163 (policeman, who had paid money to the defendant and obtained a receipt, for the express purpose of informing himself, excluded; unsound); 1866, Putnam v. Wadley, 40 Ill. 346, 348 (witness excluded who had seen other documents purporting to be signed by defendant, but not shown to have been "recognized as signed" by the defendant); 1875, Board v. Misenheimer, 78 id. 22, 24 (witness to a surety's signature, who had merely "examined his signature to his reports as guardian" filed in the county clerk's office, and had done so for the express purpose of informing himself, excluded); 1888, Arthur v. Arthur, 38 Kan. 691, 17 Pac. 187 (witness to a wife's signature, who had seen it only on one document bearing a notary's certificate of acknowledgment, excluded on the facts).

The following statutes aim to cover this general principle: Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 1943 (any one who has "seen writings purporting to be his [the author's], upon which he has acted or been charged, and who has thus acquired a knowledge of his handwriting" is qualified); amended in 1901 (by substituting the following: "seen writing purporting to be his and upon which the supposed writer has acted or been charged, or which consists of letters received by the witness in due course of mail in response to letters duly addressed and mailed by him to the supposed writer and who has thus acquired a knowledge of the handwriting of such person"; for the validity of this amendment, see ante, § 485); Mont. C. C. P. 1895, § 3234 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1943, unamended); Or. C. C. P. 1892, § 762 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1943, unamended). In Louisiana, the Code provision for proof of handwriting has been held to exclude testimony founded on knowledge of the present sort: La. C. C. P. § 325, ed. 1901 ("If the defendant deny his signature [to a document in the pleading] in his answer, or contend that the same has been counterfeited, the plaintiff must prove the genuineness of such signature either by witnesses who have seen the defendant sign the act, or who declare that they know it to be his signature because they have frequently seen him write or sign his name"); 1812, Sauvé v. Dawson, 2 Mart. 202 (under the old Civil Code, testimony receivable only from one who saw the writing executed, or from experts appointed by the Court); 1869, Huddleston v. Coyle, 21 La. An. 148 (under C. C. P. § 325, witness speaking from knowledge acquired by paying drafts not disputed by the party, excluded); 1869, Leonard's Succession, ib. 523, semble (same).

do not consist in implied admissions, debatable ground appears. The first matter to be noticed is that source of belief which rests on the certainty of the course of the mails. If A receives a letter purporting to come from B, he cannot be allowed to presume, for testimonial purposes, that it was in fact written by B; this all concede.[1] But if he writes to B and receives a purporting answer from B, intelligently treating the matter and showing an acquaintance with facts such as only B could know, is not this sufficient? Here the controversy begins:

(a) A number of judges have been unwilling to accept this source of belief; they require something more, and that something is that A's belief shall have been further confirmed by circumstances ensuing upon the letter or by his having subsequently found B acting upon it. The language of the judges is not uniform nor definite; but they require at least something more than a mere exchange of intelligent correspondence:

1799, Kenyon, L. C. J., in Batchelor v. Honeywood, 2 Esp. 715: "If persons are in the habit of corresponding, and letters are received from one to the other, upon which any transaction takes place, that may enable the party to swear to his correspondent's handwriting."

1836, Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 705: Coleridge, J.: "[The requirement is that] transactions have taken place between them upon the faith that letters purporting to have been written or signed by him have been so written or signed;" Denman, L. C. J.: "The letters forming one side of a correspondence do not prove the handwriting because addressed to a particular person; that person's evidence may be requisite to show that A had in some way recognized the letters bearing A's signature, and was therefore probably the individual who wrote them; but this is quite different from a knowledge of the handwriting, [i. e. the matter of knowing] whether they proceeded from A or any other."

1889, Campbell, J., in Pinkham v. Cockell, 77 Mich. 272, 43 N. W. 921: "The mere receipt of letters purporting to be from a person never seen, and with whom no subsequent relations existed which were based on them as genuine, has no value as means of knowledge. Where there is no direct knowledge of handwriting, there must be something which assures the recipient of the letters in a responsible way of their genuineness.[2]

Two things must be noted about this form of the rule. (1) In the first place, it is not clear whether the judges mean that the required transaction or act must involve an implied admission known to be B's or merely an

[1] Although that circumstance may be sufficient circumstantial evidence that the letter was at least sent by B's authority: post, § 2153.

[2] Accord, with minor variations: 1825, Thorpe v. Gisburne, 2 C. & P. 22 (witness to the defendant's hand who had "received letters from him, upon which he had acted," received); 1897, Hightower v. Ogletree, 114 Ala. 94, 21 So. 934 (one who merely received letters purporting to come from one who could not write, not competent to authenticate them); 1846, Pate v. People, 8 Ill. 664; 1847, Woodford v. McClenham, 9 id. 89; 1856, McClain v. Esham, 17 B. Mour. 146, 155 (one who had received a letter and answered but received no further letter, not competent); 1860, Chaffee v. Taylor, 3 All. 601, semble; 1873, Nunes v. Perry, 113 Mass. 275 (merely receiving a letter in care, excluded); 1894, Violet v. Rose, 39 Nebr. 660, 672, 58 N. W. 216 (one who had sent and received and acted upon letters, admitted); 1852, Bowman v. Sanborn, 25 N. H. 110, Eastman, J. ("having seen genuine signatures or writings of the person, either in transacting business with him so that the papers have been acted upon and recognized by him as genuine, or by an intimate acquaintance with signatures which have been adopted into the ordinary business transactions of life"); 1858, Burnham v. Ayer, 36 id. 185 (following the preceding case); 1854, Power v. Frick, 2 Grant 307 (not sufficient under the circumstances); 1900, State v. Hall, 14 S. D. 161, 84 N. W. 766 (one receiving a letter "in due course of mail," excluded); 1894, Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. 871 (a correspondence of mere friendship, not involving business transactions acted upon, insufficient).

Compare the cases cited post, § 2153.

implied admission inferred to be his. Thus, if a letter purporting to be B orders a ton of coal and it is delivered and then B comes in person and pay for it, the implied admission is known to be B's. But suppose, instead, tha a check purporting to be B's comes by mail; or suppose that A receives a offer and orders a box of soap from B, and a box of soap then comes in wagon purporting to be B's; these are admissions or recognitions which onl purport to be B's, and personal observation by A is still lacking. Or suppos that A writes to a theatre-clerk inclosing the money for a ticket; the ticke is sent, with a letter of receipt, and A goes to the theatre and is given a se on the ticket; here is an act done by somebody which indicates the genuin ness of the letter, but the admission was not necessarily made by the ticke clerk. Looking at the judges' language, we find some prescribing merel "any transaction that takes place," or "something which assures the recip ent"; while others go further and require that B's letter should be "acte upon and recognized by him," or the transactions should have "taken pla between them," meaning apparently acts by the person known to A to be and not merely acts by a person probably B. It is impossible to say wh are the judicial requirements of this doctrine in that respect.

(2) It has sometimes been supposed (and the language of some judici opinions has naturally induced the error) that the "acting upon" which necessary may be or must be on the part of the witness A. This, however, will be seen, is impossible as a test; the "acting upon" which induces th faith must always ultimately be that of B, the person in question. Thus, a letter purporting to be B's invites an investment, A may "act upon" th by investing a thousand dollars in the offered enterprise; but the extent A's action, however great a faith it shows on A's part, affords no further re son to us for sanctioning the sources of his belief. If, however, interest the investment is regularly received from B's office — in other words, if himself appears to have "acted on" A's answer — then, but only then, have that sort of action which tends to show the genuineness of the origin letter purporting to be B's. It must be remembered, then, that the force subsequent transactions as a ground for belief lies not in A's part in the but in B's part in them. In short, it is B's "acting upon" the correspondenc which furnishes the real and ultimate source of belief.

(b) But the majority of Courts (and this is the orthodox doctrine) pref to be satisfied with something short of this test, and accept an exchange correspondence alone as sufficient to justify belief in genuineness. That when A writes to B and receives in due course an answer purporting to B's, intelligently dealing with the original letter, the composite data of t course of the mails, the accuracy of the directory, the likely conduct of t receiver of a letter, and the improbability of a forger being able to send intelligent answer or series of answers, avail for practical purposes as adequate source of belief. It is of course B's answer to A's letter, and merely a first letter of B (however intelligent), nor an answer by A to it, th can have this effect, — though this discrimination is not always made:

1797, Kenyon, L. C. J., in Carey v. Pilt, Peake Add. Cas. 130: "That evidence was admitted on sound principles; for if, when letters are sent directed to a particular person on particular business, an answer is received in due course, it is a fair presumption that the answer was written by the person whose handwriting it purported to be."

1814, Eldon, L. C., in Wade v. Broughton, 3 Ves. & B. 172: "Where there has been correspondence by letters the contents of which are such as to render it probable that they were received [by the genuine person], perhaps impossible to suppose the contrary, that course of correspondence will do; and that has grown up in modern times."

1836, Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 727: Williams, J.: "I adverted to an expression in frequent use, and which indeed has almost grown into the currency of a proverb upon this subject, that the letter or letters 'must have been acted upon.' If, however, by this expression, it be meant to imply that any business must be transacted, or, in any sense of the word, act done, the observation is without foundation, for nothing of the sort is necessary. . . . Anything, I presume, from which the knowledge of the writer is established may suffice." Patteson, J.: "The knowledge may have been acquired by the witness having seen letters or other documents professing to be the handwriting of the party, and having afterwards communicated personally with the party upon the contents of those letters or documents, or having otherwise acted upon them by written answers producing further correspondence or acquiescence by the party in some matter to which they relate, or by the witness transacting with the party some business to which they relate, or by any other mode of communication between the party and the witness which in the ordinary course of the transactions of life induces a reasonable presumption that the letters or documents were the handwriting of the party."

1820, Taylor, C. J., in State v. Allen, 1 Hawks 8: "Thirdly, by a witness who has received letters from the supposed writer of such a nature as renders it probable that they were written by the person from whom they purport to come. Such evidence is only admissible where there is good reason to believe that the letters from which the witness has derived his knowledge were really written by the supposed writer of the paper in question." [3]

The truth is that this course of correspondence may vary in probative value according to circumstances, and hence probably the disinclination of the Courts first mentioned to be satisfied with that alone. The true solution is to leave the matter to the trial judge's determination. The necessity for this flexibility has been recognized by the Courts in the additional classes of cases which are now to be considered.

[3] Accord, with variations; 1645, Lord Macguire's Trial, 4 How. St. Tr. 653,685 ("he hath written to me many letters"); 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 236; 1763, Gould v. Jones, 1 W. Bl. 384, Lord Mansfield; 1797, Barnes v. Trompowsky, 7 T. R. 265, Kenyon, L. C. J., semble; 1845, Ovenston v. Wilson, 2 C. & K. 1, Pollock, C. B.; 1849, Murieta v. Wolfhazen, ib. 744, semble; 1887, Campbell v. Woodstock Iron Co., 83 Ala. 359, 3 So. 369 (witness admitted who had mailed one or more letters to C., directed to his known place of residence, and received replies purporting to come from that place and to be signed by him); 1874, Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Miller, 2 Colo. 442, 452, 460 (one who had corresponded for 18 years with a person purporting to be a friend of his youth in Germany, admitted); 1878, Pearson v. McDaniel, 62 Ga. 100 (business correspondence, sufficient); 1860, Clark v. Wyatt, 15 Ind. 272 ("from authentic papers derived in the course of business"); 1885, Thomas v. State, 103 id. 429, 2 N. E. 808; 1895, Bullis v. Eaton, 96 Ia. 513, 65 N. W. 395; 1881, Empire Mfg. Co. v. Stuart, 46 Mich. 484, 9 N. W. 527 (where the answer "I have seen letters that came from their office; I have had correspondence with them so that I could know their signature," was held to show sufficient certainty); 1866, Southern Exp. Co. v. Thornton, 41 Miss. 221; 1839, Cunningham v. Bank, 21 Wend. 559, semble; 1820, State v. Allen, 1 Hawks 9 ("in the course of correspondence in which pertinent answers have been received"); 1854, Shitler v. Bremer, 23 Pa. 413, semble (a school teacher receiving and acting on written orders from a director); 1855, Clark v. Freeman, 25 id. 133; 1885, Ullman v. Babcock, 63 Tex. 71; 1897, Redding v. Redding's Est., 69 Vt. 500, 38 Atl. 230; 1829, Coalter, J., in Rowt's Adm'x v. Kile's Adm'r, 1 Leigh 226.

§ 703. Clerks familiar with Accounts, Letters, etc. In part involving the foregoing doctrine, and yet not made to depend upon it, is a line of precedents admitting as qualified a clerk through whose hands his employer's business correspondence or other documents have passed and who has thus become familiar with what purports to be the hand of a customer or of his employer.[1] There seems to be no requirement that an "acting upon" shall be expressly shown, but the doctrine really rests on the quite proper assumption that there must have been numerous and convincing acts of the customer or employer which have verified the genuineness of the documents. On this probability a rule of thumb is based, without requiring special inquiry in each instance. The rule is satisfactory enough; it goes to show that the discretion of the trial judge should be given great latitude.

§ 704. Official Custodians of Predecessor's Records, Family Records. Another class of persons seem properly to possess safe sources for estimating authenticity, though they have not received implied admissions from the supposed makers, namely, persons who, having the custody of official records, have thus become familiar with the official signature of a predecessor in the office, whether a superior or one of the same grade, or, having the custody of family records, thus obtain familiarity with the handwriting. The propriety of the place of custody and the general reliance upon the documents for legal, mercantile, and family purposes, are a sufficient ground for belief in authenticity:

1836, Denman, L. C. J., in Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 740: "In ancient documents, knowledge of an officer's handwriting is frequently obtained by an observation of his signature to papers which he would be called upon officially to sign; and a witness speaking from that knowledge may give an opinion whether any particular writing was made by the same person."

1820, Taylor, C. J., in State v. Allen, 1 Hawks 9: "The only methods of proving the hand-writing of a person, sanctioned by law, are: . . . Fourthly, When a witness has become acquainted with his manner of signing his name by inspecting other ancient writings bearing the same signature and which have been regarded and preserved as authentic documents. This mode of proof is confined to ancient writings, and is admitted as being the best the nature of the case will allow."

1874, McKinstry, J., in Sill v. Reese, 47 Cal. 344 (the witness was custodian of the Mexican archives in California and had consulted several hundred documents bearing the signature of the person in question): "If it can be assumed that the Mexican archives in

[1] 1832, R. v. Slaney, 5 C. & P. 218, Tenterden, L. C. J. (putting the case of a merchant's clerk who has become acquainted with the handwriting of the merchant's correspondents); 1884, Re Stambro, 1 Manit. 263, 267 (one who had examined, as part of his duty, accounts sent in by an agent, held qualified); 1900, Tyler v. Mutual D. M. Co., 17 D. C. App. 85, 93 (the manager of a messenger office, who had seen telegrams and receipt tickets purporting to be signed by Mr. & Mrs. T. and had had correspondence with them, allowed to testify to their signatures); 1850, Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 300, Bemis' Rep. 197, 208 (a writing-master who as such had written diplomas was admitted to speak of the handwriting of the defendant, whose signature he had seen appended to the diplomas of the college in which the defendant was an instructor; Shaw, C. J., "papers have passed under his notice, in a business or official capacity which have given him a long and familiar acquaintance with the defendant's handwriting"); 1847, Reyburn v. Belotti, 10 Mo. 598 (a clerk through whose hands letters came); 1801, Titford v. Knott, 2 Johns. Cas. 214 (a clerk who had become familiar with the person's business correspondence with his employer); 1831, Hess v. State, 5 Oh. 7 (a teller in a bank, who had seen correspondence of the president and the cashier).

the Surveyor General's office are genuine, the man who has read these archives and familiarized himself with the official signatures, several hundred in number, of the person whose signature is the subject of inquiry, has certainly as much knowledge of that person's handwriting as one who has received letters or bills purporting to be in the handwriting of a party whom he has never seen. . . . These documents and records have remained continuously in official custody, and although it is not impossible that in some instances forged papers have been surreptitiously or corruptly placed among them, the presumption that officers have done their duty in preventing such frauds applies. . . . There can be little danger in assuming the genuineness of the signatures from which the witness acquired his knowledge for a collateral purpose like that under consideration." [1]

Upon two points under this principle the law can hardly be said to be settled: (1) whether the witness must be the custodian of the standard-

[1] The witness was admitted, except as otherwise noted: Eng.: 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 236; 1762, Gould v. Jones, 1 W. Bl. 384; 1818, Randolph v. Gordon, 5 Price 317 (where the witness was rejected because his right to assume the genuineness of the probated will, which he had taken as a standard, did not sufficiently appear); 1820, Taylor v. Cook, 8 id. 652 (where the old registers taken as the standard were presumably genuine); 1824, Doe v. Tarver, R. & Moo. 143, semble; 1843, Fitzwalter Peerage Case, 10 Cl. & F. 193 (a family solicitor who had gained his knowledge by repeated perusals of the family title-deeds, etc., kept by him and examined in the course of the business); 1844, R. v. Barber, 1 C. & K. 436 (possessor of old documents); 1847, Doe v. Davies, 10 Q. B. 324 (where a parish-clerk testified to a clergyman's marriage-certificate signature through having seen the same signature at various places in the marriage-register; it was assumed that a necessity must exist, such as the probable death of the curate). U. S.: 1896, White v. Tolliver, 110 Ala. 300, 20 So. 97 (one who had merely seen writing "purporting" to be A.'s, excluded); 1901, Hamilton v. Smith, 74 Conn. 374, 50 Atl. 884 (surveyor, familiar by experience with all the maps in a town-clerk's office and with their premises, allowed to testify to the handwriting of one H., whose signature was on many of the maps); 1849, Smith v. Walton, 8 Gill 86; 1832, Jackson v. Brooks, 8 Wend. 431, 15 id. 113 (old deeds kept in the witness' custody); 1847, Willson v. Betts, 4 Denio 205, 214 (signature to court documents by judge and clerk deceased, the witness not being the custodian); 1820, Stats v. Allen, 1 Hawks 9, semble ("ancient authentic documents"); 1887, Tuttle v. Rainey, 98 N. C. 514, 4 S. E. 475 (where the witness had seen many letters from the writer, his uncle, to his father, dealing with private family matters and a photograph of the uncle, subscribed by him, had been publicly kept in the family; admitted); 1895, Jarvis v. Vanderford, 116 N. C. 147, 21 S. E. 302 (seeing old documents in one's possession, apparently forgotten; excluded); 1826, Vickroy v. Skelley, 14 S. & R. 373 (a deputy county-surveyor, who had seen the writing of a former surveyor; this mode of knowledge was declared not admissible without corroboration, "except in case of public officers, who have been so long dead that better proof could not be expected," and here it was not shown that witnesses who had seen him write were not still alive); 1836, Goddard v. Groninger, 5 Watts 209, 218 (admitting a witness who as surveyor-general, had often acted upon documents purporting to be signed by the person in question as clerk in the receiver-general's office, but the transactions were ancient); 1848, Sweigart v. Richards, 8 Pa. 439 (accepting testimony of an official of the land-office, who had there seen surveys, etc., of a deceased official surveyor; also accepting a son who had seen his father's writing in the family Bible and in letters possessed by his mother; here the Court seems to make it a condition that living witnesses who have seen the person write cannot be had; and also applies to this sort of testimony the Pennsylvania rule of comparison of documents (post, § 2013) that the testimony must be of those who have seen the person write, or else evidence of equal authority); 1822, Cantey v. Platt, McCord 260 (instruments purporting to be signed by a deceased surveyor-general; the antiquity of the writing, and consequent lack of witnesses who had seen the person write, being the special condition of admission); 1870, Rogers v. Ritter, 12 Wall. 320 (a keeper of records); 1899, U. S. v. Ortiz, 176 U. S. 422, 20 Sup. 466 (one employed for many years as clerk, translator, and custodian of Spanish and Mexican archives, held sufficiently acquainted with the signatures of a Mexican Governor and Secretary of 1846 as occurring in those archives); 1892, Tucker v. Kellogg, 8 Utah 11, 12, 28 Pac. 870 (administrator held qualified by seeing signatures on paid checks by the intestate found among his papers after death).

Compare the cases cited post, § 2158 (official custody as circumstantial evidence of genuineness).

The following rulings on signatures used to frank letters must be considered from the point of view of the present principle: 1797, Carey v. Pitt, Peake Add. Cas. 130, Kenyon, L. C. J. (excluding a post-office inspector who had merely seen in his business franks purporting, but not proved, to be the defendant's); 1799, Butchelor v. Honeywood, 2 Esp. 715 (excluding a post-office inspector who had passed Lord T.'s franks but had never seen Lord T. write nor ever received any acknowledgment of their genuineness).

document; (2) whether the documents must be ancient. The rulings of th last century answered the former question usually in the negative, the latte in the affirmative. But there is good reason to-day to lay down precisely th opposite rule. (1) The witness has usually no good ground for believing i the authenticity of the documents unless he has in some way had charge o them and found them genuine by testing them — as, a surveyor in charg of his predecessors' surveys, or a family-solicitor in charge of the family title-deeds. In general, some kind of familiar use would at least be neces sary for the witness. (2) The traditional phrase is usually "ancient docu ments;" but it does not seem essential on principle that the document should have been of a past generation or their author be deceased. A suc cessor in public office or a member of a family may have the requisite know edge of genuineness without either of these facts appearing. They shoul be no more essential here than they are in the case of knowledge resting o correspondence (ante, § 702), for which it is no longer (though it was at firs considered necessary that the correspondent should be abroad or deceased The truth is that the limitation to ancient documents is a perpetuation of a historical anomaly.[2] It was an extension, based on necessity, of the origina class ex visu scriptionis; and it is to this that we owe the phrases in th judicial opinions allowing the testimony only from ancient documents. To day, when testimony ex scriptis olim visis stands on an equal footing wit testimony ex visu scriptionis, there is no propriety in keeping up the old lim itation to ancient writings or to writings of a deceased official or family member.

§ 705. Bank Notes and other Paper Money. The present principle i volves peculiar considerations when the issue concerns the genuineness of bank-note or other paper money. To qualify under the general princip (ante, § 693), the witness must be familiar with the genuine notes of th same type, so as to be able to judge of the one in issue. This familiarity claims because he has seen many of the genuine notes of that class. B how can he know that the notes he has seen were in fact genuine one There are several possible grounds on which he may base his confidenc (1) Some Courts have thought it sufficient if he has merely received a passed away the notes from time to time.[1] These Courts, however, seem be thinking only of his having seen enough specimens to gain a clear impre sion of the general style, and to be forgetting the necessity of his having h some indication of their genuineness. (2) Other Courts have been satisfi

[2] 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 236: "In general Cases, the Witness should have gained his knowledge from having seen the Party write; but under some Circumstances that is not necessary, . . . so where the Antiquity of the Writing makes it impossible for any living Witness to swear he ever saw the Party write"; so also in 1785, Willis v. Singer, Suppl. Viner's Abr. "Evid.," T, b, 48. The history is examined post, § 1993.

[1] 1823, Com. v. Carey, 2 Pick. 48 (officers of a bank who had received and paid out ba notes, to testify to signatures of president cashier on the notes of another bank); 18 State v. Cheek, 13 Ired. 120 (persons "w habitually receive and pass the notes of a ba for a long course of time, so as to beco thoroughly acquainted with them"); 18 Martin v. Com., 2 Leigh 745 (bank-notes pr able by "persons well acquainted with notes of the bank," not necessarily by an offi of the bank).

when it appeared further that the notes so dealt with had passed current and been reputed as genuine. This is a step towards recognizing that necessity, but it rests on no definite theory.[2] (3) The strictest requirement, and the only one which is justifiable in theory, is that none of the notes thus received and passed should have been returned to the witness as counterfeit. This does not necessarily imply an admission of genuineness by the alleged issuers (ante, § 701). It rests on the fact that until the note has gone back to its alleged issuer there can be no fair certainty of its genuineness, since other persons receiving it may be equally deceived with the witness. If, then, sufficient time has elapsed for a fair number of the notes to be re-presented at the alleged issuer's, and none have been returned to the witness, the great probability is that the alleged issuer has treated them as genuine; and anything short of this is insufficient:

1824, Taylor, C. J., in State v. Candler, 3 Hawks 393, 400: "It appears to me that the witness' knowledge of the handwriting, acquired in the way he describes, is as much to be relied upon as if derived from a correspondence, and approaches nearly to that obtained from having seen the party write. It is scarcely possible, in the nature of things, that if any of the notes received by the witness throughout so long a period had been counterfeit, they should not have been returned. Their not returning shows their genuineness."[3]

The witness' source of knowledge may also be (but need not be) an admission, express or implied (ante, §§ 700, 701), by the alleged issuer of the notes.[4] Moreover, one may acquire a knowledge of the type of note from the material, color, design, and the like, apart from the signature; hence testimony to genuineness may be founded on a knowledge of these indicia without reference to the character of the signature.[5] Such witnesses will, however, usually be experts in the narrow seuse, i. e. persons testifying ex scripto nunc viso. The requirement of expertness, as applied to the present subject, has already been considered (ante, § 570).

§ 706. Relative Value of foregoing Kinds of Knowledge. Since the enactment of modern statutes permitting testimony by experts ex scripto nunc viso ("comparison of hands," in the narrow sense), all the established common-

[2] 1822, Furber v. Hilliard, 2 N. H. 483 semble (but here the witnesses were also experts in paper money); 1831, State v. Carr, 5 id. 373.

[3] Approved: 1844, State v. Harris, 5 Ired 291; 1851, State v. Cheek, 13 id. 120 (which also laid down, without distinction, the less strict rule just preceding; see note 1, supra). The Candler case (quoted supra) practically overruled U. S. v. Holtsclaw, 2 Haywood 379 (1805), where the fact of frequent dealings with bank-bills was held sufficient for testifying to the genuineness of the signatures, and also practically overruled the Allen case (infra) so far as the latter intimated that nothing short of correspondence with the signers would suffice. A singular decision is the following: 1895, Kendall's Ex'r v. Collier, 97 Ky. 446, 30 S. W. 1002 (a bank officer, who had already examined and discounted as genuine a note whose genuineness was disputed, was not allowed to state these facts as bearing on the strength of his belief that the note was genuine; there is no good reason for this ruling; compare § 698, ante).

[4] 1859, Johnson v. State, 35 Ala. 378 (bank-bill credited by bank; here the witness was also somewhat expert as to detecting counterfeits); 1820, State v. Allen, 1 Hawks 6 (here it did not expressly appear, as in State v. Candler, that the notes had been passed and not returned); 1842, Allen v. State, 3 Humph. 367 (receiving from and paying to a bank its notes).

[5] 1851, Johnson v. State, 2 Ind. 654; 1859, Jones v. Finch, 137 Miss. 468; 1805, U. S. v. Holtsclaw, 2 Haywood 379, semble (on this point, this case is not to be regarded as having been overruled by State v. Candler, supra); 1842, Allen v. State, 3 Humph. 368.

law kinds of knowledge are of course still proper, when they are availabl
It has been suggested that where a lost instrument is to be authenticat knowledge of one of the weaker sorts is not admissible;[2] but this seem consideration which should affect only the weight of evidence required final decision.[3]

§ 707. Number of Specimens; Writings Post Litem Motam. Little or question ever arises as to the sufficiency of the specimens in themselv to furnish an adequate knowledge of the type of writing, i. e. the number specimens received, the distance of time when they were received, or t quantity of the person's writing contained in them. The liberal rules plied on these points under the foregoing mode of knowledge (ante, §§ 69 697) seem to have been accepted here without question.[1]

§ 708. Other Principles affecting Handwriting, distinguished. In thec any person able to read and write is sufficiently qualified, as to exp capacity, to form an opinion of handwriting (ante, § 570), though perh special considerations apply to the proof of bank-notes and other pap money (ante, § 570). The testimony of "experts" in the narrow sense affected by the Opinion rule; and the question is a different one accordi as their testimony goes to the comparison of handwriting (post, §§ 200 2015) or merely to the appearance of ink, paper, or other materials, w regard to dates, erasures, alteration, and the like (post, §§ 2023–2027). T use of specimens exhibited to the jury involves also the Opinion rule (p §§ 2016–2021).

The expert, however, like other witnesses, must base his knowledge of particular hand upon specimens observed by him; and the application of present principle to that situation remains now to be noticed.

c. Ex scripto nunc viso, or Ex comparatione scriptorum (Expert's Compari of Specimens).

§ 709. General Principle. (1) Where the witness does not testify fr sight of the person writing (ante, § 694) or from writings received or p sessed before the litigation and independently of it (ante, § 699), he may s

[1] 1890, McKay v. Lasher, 121 N. Y. 482, 24 N. E. 711.

[2] In Porter v. Wilson, 13 Pa. 646 (1850), the Court declined to hold that a knowledge acquired after seeing the lost instrument would be insufficient (ante, § 697); but did rule that the knowledge must be positive, "nothing short of actually seeing the party write or an acknowledgment distinctly and clearly made by the party himself"; but it is not clear how far the Court regarded this as limiting the ordinary qualification gained by correspondence.

[3] It was also at one time thought that the person whose hand was alleged to be forged must if available be first called, or may alone be called, and in particular, that the officer of a bank, if available, is alone competent to testify to the genuineness of his signature on its notes. But this notion soon disappeared, sometimes by express statute; persons having the knowle required in other cases are of course equ competent; 1830, State v. Hooper, Bailey and cases and statutes collected post, § 1 (preferred witnesses).

[1] A few casual rulings are to be found: 18 McKonkey v. Gaylord, 1 Jones L. 94 (kn edge of signature only, acquired by correspo ence, is sufficient for identifying a signatu this would seem to be a proper rule to fol to-day for correspondence done in typewrit with the autograph signature only); 1850, Po v. Wilson, 13 Pa. 646 (a correspondence a the date of the disputed document is sufficie As to correspondence post litem motam, it well be not an unfair specimen; this should entirely in the trial Court's discretion; comp §§ 2009, 2018, post.

acquire knowledge of the type of writing by a special examination of specimens expressly laid before him by others. Now the essence of the difference (so far as the present principle of Knowledge is concerned) between this and the other modes is simply a difference in the grounds of belief in the genuineness of the specimens. The witness who saw the act of writing has a sufficient ground of belief in his sight of the person in the act. The witness who received letters, or was custodian of records, had a sufficient ground in other circumstances, often consisting in admissions made to him by the person in question. But in this third mode, both of these grounds of belief are lacking. Yet they must be supplied in some way. An opinion of the type of writing cannot be worth listening to unless the specimens examined appear to have been, with fair probability at least, genuinely those of the person in question. How this may be done, and what difficulties thus arise, can be examined presently. The important truth is that, apart from this, the theory of all three modes is identical; i. e. the witness must have knowledge of the type of handwriting, this knowledge must come from an adequate consideration of specimens, and these specimens must appear to be genuinely those of the person to whom they are attributed. That the process is always the same, and that the theory of the witness' knowledge of handwriting is identical for all modes has often and clearly been pointed out by the Courts:

1822, Sir J. Nicholl, in Saph v. Atkinson, 1 Add. 122, 216: "All evidence as to the handwriting of any party is the mere statement of an opinion formed by the witness, on comparing a writing said to be his [the author's], with some standard."

1836, Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 705; Coleridge, J.: "On either supposition [lay or expert], the witness is supposed to have received into his mind an impression, not so much of the manner in which the writer has formed the letters in the particular instances, as of the general character of his handwriting; and he is called on to speak as to the writing in question by reference to a standard so formed in his mind." Denman, L. C. J.: "I must fairly say that I think the syllogism complete. Opinion is evidence of handwriting, where it is founded on knowledge obtained from inspection of documents proved to be written by the same party. The [expert] opinion tendered here was founded on such knowledge."

1842, Green, J., in Allen v. State, 3 Humph. 368: "All that the rule of law contended for requires is that a witness who is called to prove handwriting shall be able to show that he has had such means of knowledge as to furnish a reasonable presumption that he is qualified to form an opinion on the subject. And the opportunity of acquiring such knowledge, mentioned in the books on evidence — such as having seen the party write, having corresponded with him, or seen writings acknowledged by him to be genuine — are only illustrations of the principle, and are not to be understood as the only means whereby such knowledge can be acquired. If other means of knowledge, in the view of reason and common sense, will equally afford it, there can be no reason why the statement of such means of information shall not be held to be sufficient."

1860, Rice, J., in Woodman v. Dana, 52 Me. 13: "It is contended that all opinion based upon previous knowledge of or acquaintance with handwriting is in reality only the result of comparison, and of comparison made under much more unfavorable circumstances than when the admitted or proved specimens are brought in juxtaposition with that which is controverted; that in one case [of lay testimony] the image of the standard specimen, as it exists in the mind, is compared with the controverted specimen in the hand of the witness; while in the other [of expert testimony] the standard is before the eye of the witness and placed side by side with that which is contested; that in the former the characteristics of the standard are necessarily indistinct, shadowy, and uncertain, while in the latter they show out in all the distinctness of visible characters. . . . In a certain sense the position of counsel for the plaintiff is undoubtedly correct. 'All evidence of handwriting,' says Mr. Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence, 'except where the witness saw the [disputed] document written, is in the nature of comparison. It is the belief which the witness entertains upon comparing the writing in question with its exemplar in the mind derived from some previous knowledge.'"

1872, Valentine, J., in Macomber v. Scott, 10 Kan. 341: "All evidence of handwriting, except where the witness himself has seen the writing done, is in its nature a comparison of hands. It is the belief which the witness entertains upon comparing the writing in question with the exemplar in his mind derived from some previous knowledge of the party's handwriting."

1874, Moses, C. J., in Bennett v. Mathewes, 5 S. C. 484: "They both depend on the same faculty, — that of bringing into actual application impressions made on the mind, in the one case weakened by time, and in the other more vivid and lively because of more recent existence. One [the lay witness] recollects because he has seen the admitted writing before and can therefore now speak of its similarity with the one in question; the other [the expert witness] because by examining the admitted writing he has a present impression which he at once makes the standard of his comparison." [1]

(2) So far, then, as concerns the theory of the testimonial knowledge, the only difference, for expert testimony, consists in the mode of supplying that certainty of genuineness of specimens which in the other two cases rests on the personal knowledge of the witness himself. How may this be done and what difficulties and rules arise in doing it?

(a) It is obvious, first, that as the expert witness does not and cannot offer his own knowledge of the genuineness of the specimens, this element must be made to appear by other persons' evidence. There are three conceivable ways: (1) By an admission in the pleadings or before the court; (2) By testimony directed to the judge, in the nature of ordinary proof preliminary to the admission of any piece of evidence and calling for the judge's decision only; (3) By testimony directed to the jury, like all ordinary evidence, — the jury, on retiring, to use the witness' opinion if the hypothesis of genuineness is proved, and to discard it, like other hypothetical testimony (ante, §§ 672, 680), if the hypothesis is not proved. Now under the second and the third modes, but particularly the third, the objection of multiplicity and confusion of issues immediately arises; and it is from that point of view mainly that the argument has been made against this kind of testimony to handwriting.

(b) There is, however, another consideration, also based on the present principle, i. e. that of the adequacy of the witness' sources of knowledge. The witness to the type of handwriting must have formed in his mind a standard based on the observation of specimens; and the inquiry must naturally be made (ante, §§ 694–698) whether the specimens he has seen have been sufficient in number and in quality. It has been seen that the first sort of witness — ex visu scriptionis — is liberally treated as to the number of specimens seen, while specimens written after litigation begun are in general not acceptable as sources of his belief. It has been seen also (ante, § 707) that for the second sort of witness — ex scriptis olim visis — there is still no objection raised on the score of the number of specimens, while specimens written after litigation begun may equally be open to objection. Now the same questions must come for settlement in dealing with the third kind of witness, the expert. His sources of belief may be objected to (1) because the specimens laid before him are not sufficient in number, or (2) because they have been selected unfairly, for the purpose of aiding a particular view.

[1] So also the following opinions: 1830, State v. Hooper, Bailey 42; 1850, Hitchcock, C. J., in Hicks v. Person, 19 Oh. 441.

Thus the rules for expert testimony based on specimens are largely governed by the present principle of Knowledge. But the Opinion rule, excluding lay testimony under certain circumstances, also has a bearing; and the direct submission of specimens to the jury involves still other principles. The precedents and rules are thus so intertwined that it is impracticable to deal with them in this place; and they are most conveniently examined in detail under the Opinion rule (post, §§ 1991–2021).

5. Value.

§ 711. General Principle. The judicial rulings upon a witness' qualifications to testify to Value are difficult to classify, — because the Court is often called upon to decide at the same time three distinct questions, namely (1) the experiential capacity of the witness, (2) his knowledge of the standard of value, and (3) his knowledge of the object to be valued. The theory of the first of these has already been examined (ante, §§ 558, 567). The theory of the second and the third (explained ante, § 653) rests upon the peculiar nature of the idea of Value, which calls for two acquirements in every witness, namely, knowledge of the class or standard of values, and acquaintance with the object which is to be put into the class or tested by the standard. In a great many rulings no means is given us of knowing whether the Court, in accepting or rejecting the witness, is doing so on the principle of Experiential Qualifications or on the principle of Knowledge. To some extent, then, mere rules of thumb must suffice; but some effort must be made to examine the decisions according to the principles involved. They may be arranged in four groups: 1. Whether special experience is necessary in estimating values, or whether merely ordinary experience suffices; 2. What tests are proper for deciding whether an adequate knowledge of the value-standard exists; 3. How far acquaintance with the object to be valued is necessary; 4. Miscellaneous topics.

§ 712. (1) Experiential Qualifications. The question here is whether (on the principle of § 556, ante) the cultivation of the judgment by special experience is necessary before one can be permitted to form and express an opinion upon values. It is here assumed provisionally that the witness possesses adequate knowledge or opportunity for knowledge of the f the doubt is whether in addition a special cultivation of the judgme necessary before attempting to interpret those facts. For example, a chant has had constant occasion during many years to employ lawyers; he, on that basis alone, attempt to draw conclusions as to the value of services? A lawyer has for two years lived in a metropolitan suburb;

he, merely from knowing what he paid and what others have paid land in the neighborhood, attempt to form estimates of land values i suburb?

Two things are obvious: first, that the answer may be different for d ent things to be valued; and, next, that the answer may depend large the conditions by which the value is determined in commercial Where the exchange of articles has reached such a degree of organiz and control that at a particular place the rate is clearly settled by the cesses of trade and clearly communicated by an accepted mode — as stock or produce exchange —, it is easy to see that any person, by goi the proper source and possessing himself of the facts, may acquire a satisfactory estimate of value, without having had previous special tra Where, on the other hand, circumstances of casual occurrence, of unc influence, and of wide range, may importantly affect that economic at of the community which we call value — as in medical and legal servic it may be out of the question for any one to form an opinion who qualified by special experience to interpret the facts he has observed.

The general tendency of the Courts, however, is towards a broad pri that no special training or occupation is necessary to enable one to es values. Perhaps no Court has attempted to enforce such a rule as u ing; certainly no Court could wisely do so. Nevertheless, there are fre utterances pointing to the broad principle that, in general, knowledge is necessary.[1] The practical effect may be said to be that Courts will to require no special training, except where it seems to be clearly esse

Even where concrete rules are laid down for various kinds of values, is little or no distinction taken between the doctrine of Experiential Q cations and the doctrine of Knowledge; i.e., when a Court rules witness to land values must be a dealer in real estate, the Court do necessarily mean that a dealer's experience is necessary to give exper qualifications; it may be required merely to give adequate knowledge facts of value. All that is given us is a rule of thumb only. Henc practically useless to attempt to distinguish the principles; and the may best be placed together (in the following sections).

[1] Ga. Code 1895, § 5286 (need not be "an expert or dealer in the article"); 1885, Central R. Co. v. Wolff, 74 Ga. 666 (it suffices "if they have any knowledge of such values"); 1890, Central R. Co. v. Skellie, 86 id. 693, 12 S. E. 1017 ("any one possessing sufficient knowledge or information may express his opinion"); 1881, Bowen v. Bowen, 74 Ind. 474 (one who "shows himself acquainted with v
1877, Thompson v. Boyle, 85 Pa. 4 safest course is to permit the examinati having experience in the thing valued their authority to be tested on the examination"); 1890, Montana R. Co.
ren, 137 U. S. 353, 11 Sup. 96.

§ 713. (2) Knowledge of Value-Standard; what tests are proper? A knowledge of the general value-standard of the class of things in question is of course essential (ante, § 653). The difficult question is to determine tests for the various grades and modes of knowledge. The most practical arrangement of the rulings is to consider them first as applied to the various kinds of things to be valued, and then to notice certain general questions arising for all kinds of values alike. It must be repeated that in any case we are here dealing mainly with mere rules of thumb.

§ 714. Same: Land-value. (1) Must the witness be by occupation a dealer in land? The Courts unanimously and sensibly answer this in the negative.[1]

(2) Must the witness himself have made a purchase or a sale of land, or a number of them? This is generally answered in the negative.[2] Yet certainly such a personal participation in sales would be a sufficient qualification.[3]

(3) Must the witness at least have had knowledge, not merely of general value-rumor or the like, but of specific sales made? This, too, is generally regarded as not essential.[4] But certainly such knowledge of specific sales in the neighborhood is a sufficient qualification.[5]

(4) Occasionally all specific limitations or tests are abandoned, and the broad test adopted that "any person having knowledge of" or "acquainted with" the values may testify; the determination of the qualification thus being left open for each case.[6] This is perhaps the most satisfactory and sensible test, provided the application of it is left entirely to the discretion of the trial judge.[7] But it is doubtful if any Court, in spite of its proclama-

[1] Cal.: 1888, San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 76, 20 Pac. 372; Ill.: 1884, Johnson v. R. Co., 111 Ill. 418; 1894, Snodgrass v. Chicago, 152 Id. 600, 38 N. E. 790; 1895, Pike v. Chicago, 155 Id. 656, 40 N. E. 567; Kans.: 1888, Lawrence & W. R. Co. v. Hawk, 39 Kan. 640, 18 Pac. 943; 1889, Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Ehret, 41 Id. 26, 20 Pac. 538; Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Baird, Ib. 69, 21 Pac. 227; Mich.: 1885, Huff v. Hall, 56 Mich. 458, 23 N. W. 88; Miss.: 1903, Beard v. Nelms, — Miss. —, 34 So. 149; Nebr.: 1875, Lincoln & B. H. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 44 Nebr. 526, 62 N. W. 859; 1902, Greeley Co. v. Gebhardt, — Id. —, 89 N. W. 753; N. Y.: 1866, Robertson v. Knapp, 35 N. Y. 92; Pa.: 1876, Philadelphia & N. Y. R. Co. v. Bunnell, 81 Pa. 426; 1877, Hanover Water Co. v. Iron Co., 84 Id. 281, 285. But compare the following: 1881, Green v. Chicago, 97 Ill. 372 ("whose business in life has afforded them opportunities of acquiring information and of judging accurately upon the question").

In addition to the express decisions above given, the same result is of course reached by implication in those rulings in the next notes which accept anything less in the way of a requirement.

[2] 1851, Walker v. Boston, 8 Cush. 279; 1855, Russell v. R. Co., 4 Gray 607; 1869, Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 177; 1888, Northeastern Nebr. R. Co. v. Frazier, 25 Nebr. 54, 40 N. W. 609. The rulings in the ensuing notes imply the same result.

[3] 1855, West Newbury v. Chase, 5 Gray 421; 1859, Brainard v. R. Co., 12 Id. 409; 1869, Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 177.

[4] 1886, Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Blake, 116 Ill. 166, 4 N. E. 488; 1888, Lawrence & W. R. Co. v. Hawk, 39 Kan. 640, 18 Pac. 943; 1889, Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Ehret, 41 Id. 26, 20 Pac. 538; Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Baird, Ib. 69, 21 Pac. 227. The rulings in the ensuing notes imply also the same result.

[5] 1879, Cherokee v. R. Co., 52 Ia. 281, 3 N. W. 42; 1872, Wallace v. Finch, 24 Mich. 255; 1880, Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. v. Robinson, 95 Pa. 428, 432; and the Massachusetts cases in note 3, supra.

[6] E. g.: San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, supra, note 1; Pike v. Chicago, supra, note 1; 1870, Ferguson v. Stafford, 33 Ind. 165 ("the necessary knowledge and information to enable them to form a proper estimate of his value").

[7] The following Courts have professed to do this: 1899, Howland v. Westport, 172 Mass. 373, 52 N. E. 522; 1900, Fossum v. R. Co., 80 Minn. 9, 82 N. W. 979; 1897, Willett v. St. Albans, 69 Vt. 330, 38 Atl. 72.

tion of this broad principle, would consistently enforce it by refusing t multiply rulings based on particular circumstances.

(5) A sufficient qualification is usually declared to exist where the witne is a resident, land-owner, or farmer, in the neighborhood. The phrase diffe in different jurisdictions and in different rulings of the same Court; th notion is that of a person who has both an interest and an opportunity make himself acquainted with land values around him.[8]

(6) The knowledge and experience of a public office — a county commi sioner, or an assessor —, in which it is a part of the duties to become famili with land values, may also qualify the witness.[9]

(7) In numerous rulings the particular witness' qualifications are passe upon, without enunciating any general rule. These can hardly serve precedents.[10]

§ 715. Same: Services-value. The general test, to be gathered from th rulings, is that any one sufficiently familiar with the commercial value such services may testify. Yet, when the services are of the sort general termed professional, it is probable that a member of the same professi would invariably be insisted upon;[1] the practice in this respect is so settl

[8] 1882, Hunnicutt v. Kirkpatrick, 39 Ark. 172 (farmers of the vicinity); 1893, Orange Belt R. Co. v. Craver, 32 Fla. 28, 42, 13 So. 444 (resident); 1884, Bradshaw v. Atkins, 110 Ill. 332 (farmers of the same sort in the vicinity); 1895, Lincoln v. Com., 164 Mass. 368, 41 N. E. 489 (land-owner); 1874, Stone v. Covell, 29 id. 362 (farmers and land-owners); 1873, Lehnicke v. R. Co., 19 Minn. 481 (resident); 1868, Thomas v. Mallinckrodt, 43 Mo. 65 ("property-holders and residents of the neighborhood"); 1896, Union Elev. Co. v. R. Co., 135 id. 353, 36 S. W. 1071 (residents of the city and acquainted with the property); 1888, Northeastern Nebr. R. Co. v. Frazier, 25 Nebr. 54, 40 N. W. 609 (residents); 1898, Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Buel, 56 id. 205, 76 N. W. 571 (farmer familiar with realty-values in vicinity); 1876, Philadelphia & N. Y. R. Co. v. Bunnell, 81 Pa. 426 ("persons living in the neighborhood"); 1877, Hanover Water Co. v. Iron Co., 84 id. 281, 285 ("owned land in the neighborhood and was acquainted with its market value"); 1893, McElheny v. Bridge Co., 153 Pa. 108, 116, 25 Atl. 1021 (any one who knows); 1878, Brown v. R. Co., 12 R. I. 240 (a farmer may testify to farming value of land, but not to general value); 1898, Stolze v. Term. Co., 100 Wis. 208, 75 N. W. 987 (old resident, etc.).

[9] 1863, Fowler v. Middlesex, 6 All. 97; 1869, Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 177; 1878, Chandler v. J. P. Aqueduct, 125 id. 551.

[10] 1878, Hudson v. State, 61 Ala. 339 (mill); 1901, Norris v. Crandall, 133 Cal. 19, 65 Pac. 571 (land); 1891, Jacksonville T. K. & W. R. Co. v. P. L. T. & M. Co., 27 Fla. 157, 9 So. 661 (cost of a building); 1898, Sewell v. R. Co., 177 Ill. 93, 52 N. E. 302 (land); 1899, German-Amer. Ins. Co. v. Paul, 2 Ind. T. 625, 53 S. W. 442 (building); 1895, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Huitt, 1 Kan. App. 788, 41 Pac. 105[illegible] (barn 1897, Baillie v. Assur. Co., 49 La. An. 658, So. 736 (land); 1861, Boston & N. R. Co. O. C. & F. R. R. Co., 3 All. 14 (land); 18[illegible] Whitney v. Boston, 98 Mass. 315 (land); 18[illegible] Bristol Co. Bank v. Keavy, 128 id. 303 (land 1894, Amory v. Melrose, 162 id. 556, 39 N. 276 (land); 1895, Lyman v. Boston, 164 id. 41 N. E. 128 (land); 1895, Teele v. Boston, id. 88, 42 N. E. 506 (land); 1899, Manning Lowell, 173 id. 100, 53 N. E. 160; 1900, Co rane v. Com., 175 id. 299, 56 N. E. 610 (one perienced in business of a bleaching-mill, et allowed to testify to value of land as a site such a mill); 1896, Union Elev. Co. v. R. C 135 Mo. 353, 36 S. W. 1071 (land); 1900, Ste S. C. Co. v. Scott, 157 id. 520, 57 S. W. 1 (stone-quarry); 1896, Chicago B. & Q. R. Co. Shafer, 49 Nebr. 25, 68 N. W. 342 (land); 18 Elvins v. Delaware & A. T. & T. Co., 63 N. J. 243, 43 Atl. 903 (shade-trees); 1880, Woodruf ins. Co., 83 N. Y. 138 (construction of house Spring City G. Co. v. R. Co., 167 Pa. 6, 31 A 368 (land); 1895, Mewes v. Pipe-Line Co., id. 364, 32 Atl. 1082 (land); 1896, Struther R. Co., 174 id. 291, 34 Atl. 443 (land); 18 Howard v. Providence, 6 R. I. 514 (land); 19 Williams v. Hathaway, 21 id. 566, 45 Atl. (trees); 1902, Seattle & M. R. Co. v. Roeder, Wash. 244, 70 Pac. 498 (stone quarry).

[1] 1842, Mock v. Kelly, 3 Ala. 387 (med services); 1888, Turnbull v. Richardson, Mich. 406, 411, 37 N. W. 499 (legal service Kelley v. Richardson, ib. 432, 437, 37 N. 514 (how far an attorney is qualified to va the services of a legal adviser in managing estate); 1896, Howell v. Smith, 108 Mich. 3 66 N. W. 218 (a witness to the value of l services must be an attorney; here a person had employed many lawyers was excluded).

that the question has seldom been raised. For other kinds of services, there seem to be no specific tests; a familiarity with their kind and value is the standard to be applied.[2] Where the testimony is directed not so much to a class of services as to those of a particular person in view of his individual qualities, the testimony of a person who had employed that individual might be receivable, even though he had no general knowledge of such services as a class.[3] It would be a hard rule which would prevent a plaintiff from informing the jury of his own estimate of the value of his services; and the Courts seem inclined to impose no terms as to his general familiarity with the class of services; that he has rendered them justifies listening to his opinion.[4] There are, in addition, numerous rulings passing upon the qualifications of particular witnesses and declaring no general rules.[5]

§ 716. Same: Personal-property value. Here the general test, that any one familiar with the values in question may testify, is liberally applied, and with few attempts to lay down detailed minor tests.[1] The owner of an

[2] 1896, Chamness v. Chamness, 53 Ind. 304 (value of board; receiving one not a boarding-house keeper); 1895, Jenney Electric Co. v. Branham, 145 id. 314, 41 N. E. 448 (value of services in negotiating a sale; familiarity with the "extent and character of the particular service," required); 1885, Alt v. Fig Syrup Co., 19 Nev. 118, 7 Pac. 174 (non-expert received, where the services were rendered in a secret manufacturing process).

[3] 1858, Doster v. Brown, 25 Ga. 25 (a mill-owner who had such work done); 1877, Eagle & P. Mfg. Co. v. Browne, 58 Ga. 110 (employer or co-employee, upon the facts of the cases); 1889, Kennett v. Fickel, 41 Kan. 213, 21 Pac. 93 (one who had hired such work); 1865, Kendall v. May, 10 All. 61, 67 (one who had furnished board to the same person); 1864, Cornell v. Dean, 105 Mass. 435 (pasturing cattle; one who has paid for or rendered such services); 1882, Ritter v. Daniels, 47 Mich. 618, 11 N. W. 409 (previous hiring of the same person); 1881, McPeters v. Ray, 85 N. C. 464 (previous employer of the same person).

[4] 1880, Richardson v. McGoldrick, 43 Mich. 476, 5 N. W. 672; 1895, Foley v. Platt, 105 id. 635, 63 N. W. 520; 1898, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Palmer, 55 Nebr. 559, 76 N. W. 169 (services in nursing); 1901, McCormick H. M. Co. v. Davis, 61 id. 406, 85 N. W. 390 (boarding horses); 1876, Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Y. 58. Contra, semble, that he must be otherwise expert: 1884, Loucks v. R. Co., 31 Minn. 534, 18 N. W. 651 (farm services). Of course, an objection assuming his expertness and directed against a plaintiff's testifying in his own cause, is merely an attempt to argue that interest as a party disqualifies; such an objection has to-day no standing (ante, § 577).

[5] 1896, American Oak Extr. Co. v. Ryan, 112 Ala. 337, 20 So. 644 (cost of cording wood); 1899, Cowdery v. McChesney, 125 Cal. 19, 58 Pac. 62 (services in personal attendance); 1892, Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Bivans, 142 Ill. 401 (services); 1895, Heffron v. Brown, 155 id. 322, 40 N. E. 583 (services); 1881, Board v. Chambers, 75 Ind. 410 (services); 1895, Jenney Electric Co. v. Branham, 145 Ind. 314, 41 N. E. 448 (services in negotiating a sale of machinery); 1898, Clark v. Ellsworth, 104 Ia. 442, 73 N. W. 1023 (customary charges of an attorney); 1899, Allison v. Parkinson, 108 id. 154, 78 N. W. 845 (services of a nurse); 1875, Ottawa Univ. v. Parkinson, 14 Kan. 163 (attorney's services); 1880, Central B. U. P. R. Co. v. Nichols, 24 Kan. 243 (services); 1870, Allis v. Day, 14 Minn. 518 (legal services); 1897, Towle v. Sherer, 70 id. 312, 73 N. W. 180 (cost of a house); 1900, Chapman v. Tiffany, 70 N. H. 249, 47 Atl. 603 (storage); 1898, McLamb v. R. Co., 122 N. C. 862, 29 S. E. 894 (services of a farmer); 1886, Stone v. Tupper, 58 Vt. 411, 5 Atl. 387 (services in a stable). The following case seems contrary to the principle of § 654, ante: 1901, Birkel v. Chandler, 26 Wash. 241, 66 Pac. 406 (sources of knowledge of the value of services need not be stated beforehand).

[1] 1858, Ward v. Reynolds, 32 Ala. 389 (value of a slave; any person may testify); 1886, State v. Finch, 70 Ia. 317, 30 N. W. 578 (one who had never bought or sold a seal-skin overcoat, nor seen one bought or sold, was allowed to testify to the value of such a coat); 1902, Houghtaling v. R. Co., 117 Ia. 540, 91 N. W. 811 (clothing and furniture; "any one familiar with its nature and use" is qualified); 1864, Brady v. Brady, 8 All. 101 (one who had bought and sold horses and wagons was received); 1900, Munro v. Stowe, 175 Mass. 169, 55 N. E. 992 (witness allowed to testify to the value of a lot of household goods, though unable to state the value of each article); 1873, Continental Ins. Co. v. Horton, 28 Mich. 175 (one who buys or is present at buying, received); 1879, Printz v. People, 42 id. 145, 3 N. W. 306 (one who had worn furs and had priced others, received); 1899, Langdon v. Wintersteen, 58 Nebr. 278, 78 N. W. 501 (millinery goods; dealer not required); 1866, article, whether he is generally familiar with such values or not, ought ce tainly to be allowed to estimate its worth; the weight of his testimo (which often would be trifling) may be left to the jury; and Courts ha usually made no objections to this policy.[2] In sundry rulings, the qualific tions of particular witnesses are passed upon, without affording preceden for general rules.[3]

§ 717. Same: Witness must know the Market Value, if there is o Value is, of course, the rate at which an exchange would in fact be made this moment by the purchasing and selling community; hence, a knowled of what an article ought to exchange for is not a knowledge ... lue, — least, in the sense in which Courts regard it. Nor is a know...ge of th various qualities and uses of an article sufficient, if it stops short of includi the exchangeable rate which these qualities actually give it. In short, whe there is a market value, the knowledge of the witness must be of this mark value:

1877, Berry, J., in Berg v. Spink, 24 Minn. 138: "Where the thing whose value is question is of a nature to possess a current price or market value, such current price market value is in law the true value. To entitle a witness to testify to the value of suc a thing, he must therefore be acquainted with the current or market value of things the class to which it belongs. This is a general rule, in the application of which muc must be left to the sound discretion of the trial judge."[1]

Hood v. Maxwell, 1 W. Va. 221, 238 (relation of flour-price to wheat-price; one not in the business was received).

[2] 1885, Tubbs v. Garrison, 68 Ia. 48, 25 N. W. 921 (plaintiff and his wife, owners of household goods); 1895, Thomason v. Insurance Co., 92 id. 72, 61 N. W. 843 (owner of household furniture); 1897, State v. Hathaway, 100 id. 225, 69 N. W. 449; 1895, Shea v. Hudson, 165 Mass. 43, 42 N. E. 114 (owner of a horse and buggy); Mich. Comp. L. 1897, § 10189 (in an action for baggage lost or detained, the owner may testify to its value; but no judgment on such testimony alone shall exceed $150); 1840, Clark v. Spence, 10 Watts 336 (owner of a trunk and contents); 1843, Bingham v. Rogers, 6 W. & S. 501; 1845, Whitesell v. Crane, 8 id. 371 (owner of clothes); 1846, McGill v. Rowland, 3 Pa. St. 452 (same); 1859, Mish v. Wood, 34 id. 452; 1874, Adams Express Co. v. Schlessinger, 75 id. 248, 256; 1900, Gorman v. Park, 40 U. S. App. 537, 100 Fed. 553 (restaurant-keeper allowed to testify to value of tables, etc., used in his occupation).

[3] Ala.: 1857, Winter v. Burt, 31 Ala. 37 (machinery); 1885, Winter v. Montgomery, 79 id. 490 (personalty); 1896, Louisville J. C. Co. v. Lischkoff, 109 id. 136, 19 So. 436 (stock of dry goods, etc.); Cal.: 1858, Polk v. Coffin, 9 Cal. 58 (cattle); Ga.: 1859, Walker v. Fields, 28 Ga. 237, semble (mill-machinery); Ill.: 1901, Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Calumet Stock Farm, 194 Ill. 9, 61 N. E. 1095 (horses); Ind.: 1881, Foster v. Ward, 75 Ind. 594 (hogsfeed); Ia.: 1879, Haight v. Kimbark, 51 Ia. 14, 50 N. W. 577 (mules); 1885, Gere v. Ins. Co., 67 Ia. 275, 23 N. W. 137 (stallion); 1896, Leek v. Chesle 98 id. 593, 67 N. W. 580 (horses); 1901, Cat cart v. Rogers, 115 id. 30, 87 N. W. 758 (cattle Kan.: 1886, Reed v. New, 35 Kan. 730, 12 Pa 139 (horses); Mass.: 1855, Haskins v. Ins. Co 5 Gray 432 (machinery); 1871, Lawton v. Chas 108 Mass. 241 (timber); 1899, Knight v. Roth child, 172 id. 546, 52 N. E. 1062 (fur garments 1899, Vandercook v. O'Connor, ib. 301, 52 N. 444 (bottlers' supplies); Mich.: 1875, Brown v. Moore, 32 Mich. 257 (horses); Minn.: 187 Burger v. R. Co., 22 Minn. 343 (hay); 190 Linde v. Gaffke, 81 id. 304, 84 N. W. 41 (wheat Mo.: 1878, Simmons v. Carrier, 68 Mo. 42 (lumber); 1896, Moffit v. Hereford, 132 id. 51 34 S. W. 252 (shares of stock); Mont.: 189 Emerson v. Bigler, 21 Mont. 200, 53 Pac. 62 (cattle); 1903, Porter v. Hawkins, 27 id. 486, 7 Pac. 664 (hay and barn); Nebr.: 1895, Smith Bank, 45 Nebr. 444, 63 N. W. 796 (dry goods) N. H.: 1839, Whipple v. Walpole, 10 N. H. 13 (horses); N. D.: 1901, Minneapolis Threshin M. Co. v. McDonald, 10 N. D. 408, 87 N. W 993 (threshing machinery); Okl.: 1896, Diebol S. & L. Co. v. Holt, 4 Okl. 479, 46 Pac. 51 (safes); 1903, Choctaw O. & G. R. Co. v. Depe rade, — id. —, 71 Pac. 629 (cattle); Or.: 189 Oregon Pottery Co. v. Kern, 30 Or. 328, 47 Pac 917 (acow); R. I.: 1856, Forbes v. Howard, R. I. 367 (cost of fitting up a theatre); Wash. 1902, Lines v. Alaska C. Co., 29 Wash. 133, 6 Pac. 642 (piano); Wis.: 1867, Noonan v. Ilsley, 22 Wis. 35 (shares of stock).

[1] 1871, Cooper v. Randall, 59 Ill. 320; 1885, Daly v. Kimball Co., 67 Ia. 135, 24 N. W. 756; 1854, Elfelt v. Smith, 1 Minn. 126; 1869,

But not always is there a market value for an article. In such a case the value is the probable exchangeable rate so far as one can estimate it from the various attendant circumstances and conditions which would affect the disposal of the article; and it is with these that a witness must in such a case be familiar.[2]

§ 718. Same: Knowledge must be of Value in the vicinity. Since value is the exchangeable rate accepted by the community, it is obvious that the rate may differ, in passing from one region to another, where different conditions prevail and a different judgment would be formed by the local community. Hence the question arises how far an acquaintance with value-standards in one place will suffice when the value in question is of a thing in another place. The witness' competency must here depend upon whether the conditions of value in the two places are sufficiently similar to render his knowledge of values in one place adequate for estimating them in the other. The application of this principle must depend on the circumstances of each case, and no further detailed rules can be laid down.[1] This question, however, must be distinguished from that of the competency of a witness who, though having his business-quarters in one place, is by reason of his occupation familiar with values of goods in another, — for example, an importer, who is also necessarily acquainted with the values of goods at the foreign port of export; in such a case, his knowledge is sufficient.[2]

§ 719. Same: Knowledge of Value-Standards must generally be acquired by personal observation, not by mere hearsay. Knowledge of value does not necessarily rest on hearsay. It might be supposed that to know value is merely to know what other people say the thing is worth, — merely to have heard them offering and accepting prices. But the answer is that these various instances of offers or acceptances of prices, averaged into a mean or probable figure, are what constitute value. The statements of persons declaring their estimates of the prices they would give or receive are not taken, on the credit of those persons, as trustworthy assertions of the fact of value, but merely as items of conduct which themselves make up that total fact of conduct which we call value. Thus, if A sits in a merchant's office

Brackett v. Edgerton, 14 id. 174; 1889, Russell v. Hayden, 40 id. 90, 41 N. W. 456; 1840, Beard v. Kirk, 11 N. H. 400.

[2] 1876, Burger v. R. Co., 22 Minn. 343.

[1] 1886, Raridan v. R. Co., 69 Ia. 531, 29 N. W. 599 ("the fact that the witness knew the value of stalks in his neighborhood, from six to nine miles from plaintiff's place, did not qualify him to testify to the value of stalks in plaintiff's neighborhood"; a narrow ruling); 1895, Stevens v. Ellsworth, 95 id. 231, 63 N. W. 683 (rejecting a witness not acquainted with attorney's services in that region); 1863, Nejac v. R. Co., 7 All. 328 (admitting one familiar with the use and value of an easement, though not of adjacent land); 1895, Amory v. Melrose, 162 Mass. 556, 39 N. E. 276 (knowledge in a metropolis, held sufficient for suburban values); 1895, Lyman v. Boston, 164 id. 99, 41 N. E. 128 (not necessary that knowledge should relate to the same place); 1873, Greeley v. Stilson, 27 Mich. 155 (knowledge of value elsewhere rejected); 1874, Stone v. Covell, 29 id. 362 (farmer may testify only for land in vicinity); 1881, Kent Co. v. Ransom, 46 id. 417, 9 N. W. 454, semble (knowledge of value of services elsewhere, here held inadmissible); 1882, Fairley v. Smith, 87 N. C. 367 (knowledge of values elsewhere may be sufficient).

[2] 1843, Alfonso v. U. S. 2 Story 426 (Boston merchants testifying to prices at foreign ports); 1891, Central R. Co. v. Skellie, 86 Ga. 686, 12 S. E. 1017 (where a dealer residing in Georgia but receiving daily quotations from New York was held competent); 1894, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Donovan, 86 Tex. 378, 25 S. W. 10 (a Texas dealer receiving quotations from Chicago). Compare the cases in the next section.

and listens to the terms accepted and rejected for a dozen articles, he acquire a first-hand knowledge of value; but if he goes in and asks the merchan to tell him the value of a given article, his knowledge is based on a belie in the truth of the merchant's assertion. In the former case, his knowledg is not based on hearsay.[1] But in the latter case his knowledge is based o the hearsay assertion of another person, and therefore is inadmissible (unde the principle of § 657, ante). The distinction depends upon whether th utterances heard represent in themselves a series of individual offers o transactions, or are merely assertions of the net result of offers or transac tions already made. The distinction is no doubt often difficult to draw i practice; in a newspaper, for example, some of the price-quotations ma purport to represent actual individual transactions, or groups of transac tions, while others may represent merely the editor's report or estimate o the net result of value. A witness may be said to be qualified, or not according as the one or the other of these elements forms the chief source o his knowledge; and no more definite rule can be or ought to be laid down:

1814, De Berenger's Trial, Gurney's Rep. 188; in this celebrated trial for swindling De Berenger, Lord Cochrane, and others were charged with having falsely circulated report of the death of Napoleon in order temporarily to raise the price of stocks and sel on the risen market; it was proved that on the day of the rise the defendants had sol more than £1,600,000 of stocks, recently bought; to prove the prices on those days, witness was called who had been "employed by the House to take the prices of the da at the Stock Exchange." Q. "Where do you get those accounts from?" A. "I collec them from the Stock Exchange." Q. "Do you go about all day long taking the prices?" A. "I collect them at different times in the course of the day." Q. "You go about takin an account from all the persons who are there?" A. "I take them from different per sons who are in the market." On objection by Mr. Serj. Best, Ellenborough, L. C. J. replied: "It is all hearsay; but it is the only evidence we can have; it is the only evi dence we have of the price of sales of any description. I do not receive it as the precis thing, but as what is in the ordinary transactions of mankind received as proper infor mation; and I suppose there is hardly a gentleman living who would not act on this paper."

1873, Rodman, J., in Smith v. R. Co., 68 N. C. 115: "The plaintiff in testifying said that he only knew the value in New York by accounts of sales received from his factors informing him of sums placed to his credit, being the proceeds of sales, by telegrams circulars, and correspondence. . . . The result of all the sales of a day, or of a period shortly before or after, embodied in a reputation among dealers in the article, is the best evidence which the nature of the case admits. The reputation thus formed and circulated by telegrams, commercial circulars, and the prices current in newspapers, is such evidence as is acted on without hesitation by all dealers in their most important transactions."

1875, Wells, J., in Whitney v. Thacher, 117 Mass. 53 (admitting value-testimony of New York prices from brokers in Boston whose knowledge was chiefly obtained from daily price-current lists and returns of sales daily furnished them in Boston from their New York houses): "It is not necessary, in order to qualify one to give an opinion as to values, that his information should be of such a direct character as would make it competent in itself as primary evidence. It is the experience which he acquires in the ordinary conduct of affairs, and from means of information such as are usually relied on by men engaged in business for the conduct of that business, that qualifies him to testify."[2]

[1] 1843, Story, J., in Alfonso v. U. S., 2 Story 423; and the general principle of § 1772, post.

[2] The rulings show how much the result depends upon which source was the chief one for the

§ 720. (3) Acquaintance with the specific object to be valued. It has already been noticed (ante, § 653) that a person making an estimate as to identity, handwriting, or value, must possess a double knowledge, — (1) a knowledge of the classes into one of which the thing is to be put or the standard by which it is to be tested, and (2) a knowledge of the thing itself to be classed or measured or tested. The necessity of this double element of knowledge lies in the very nature of the mental process involved. The former element of knowledge — of the value-standard — has just been considered. The latter element — knowledge of the particular thing to be valued — is equally required by the rules of evidence, as Courts have often pointed out:

1[illegible] Earl, C., in Bedell v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 370: "There is no rule of law, and there can be none, defining how much a witness shall know of property before he can be permitted to give an opinion of its value. He must have some acquaintance with it sufficient to enable him to form some estimate of its value, and then it is for the jury to determine how much weight to attach to such estimate. Here the witnesses were carpenters and had a general acquaintance with the house; they knew its shape, location, external appearance, and, to some extent, its internal condition; and the Court did not err in allowing their opinions of its value to go to the jury for what they were worth."

1886, Clark, J., in Pittsburg V. & C. R. Co. v. Vance, 115 Pa. 332, 8 Atl. 764: "[A witness to the market value of land] should have some special opportunity for observation —, should, in a general way and to a reasonable extent, have in his mind the data from which a proper estimate of value ought to be made. If interrogated, he should be able to disclose sufficient actual knowledge of the subject to indicate that he is in a position to know what he proposes to state and to enable the jury to judge of the probable particular witness: 1896, Little Rock & F. S. R. Co. v. Aliater, 62 Ark. 1, 34 S. W. 82 (cost of excavation; knowledge based on hearsay, excluded); 1875, Thatcher v. Kautcher, 2 Colo. 700, 702 (admitting knowledge obtained by inquiring in the market); 1890, Central R. Co. v. Skellie, 86 Ga. 693, 12 S. E. 1017 (a fruit-dealer in Georgia, who in the fruit season received daily quotations from dealers in New York by telegrams and circulars, was allowed to testify to New York market value); 1900, Armour v. Ross, 110 id. 403, 35 S. E. 787 (testimony to market value from one who had received the price from dealers in the markets elsewhere, admitted); 1894, Hudson v. R. Co., 92 Ia. 231, 60 N. W. 608 (admitting knowledge based on reading market reports); 1898, Walker v. Stilson, 1 Ind. Terr. 688, 43 S. W. 959 (testimony as to a sale, etc., founded on hearsay, excluded); 1860, Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 572 (excluding knowledge of prices obtained by mere inquiry); 1858, Lewis v. Ins. Co., 10 Gray 511 (excluding a knowledge of prices obtained by mere inquiry, not by dealing); 1866, Sissou v. Cleveland & T. R. Co., 14 Mich. 490 (admitting knowledge based on newspaper market reports, telegraphic reports, etc.); 1868, Cleveland & T. R. Co. v. Perkins, 17 id. 296, 301 (testimony to New York market prices of cattle, "derived from the newspapers," admitted); 1870, Comstock v. Smith, 20 id. 342, semble (same); 1872, Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 519 (excluding knowledge of price of oil-lands learned by inquiry); 1875, Sirrine v. Briggs, 31 id. 446 (admitting a clerk in the business, who knew the value of merchandise from price-lists); 1889, Hoxsie v. Lumber Co., 41 Minn. 548, 43 N. W. 476 (admitting knowledge based on commercial reports received in the course of business); 1830, Lush v. Druse, 4 Wend. 317 (admitting knowledge gained by inquiring at a merchant's office); 1878, Harrison v. Glover, 72 N. Y. 454 (admitting knowledge based on price-lists, and letters from dealers); 1882, Fairley v. Smith, 87 N. C. 367 (admitting knowledge based on newspapers; but not where a single newspaper at a remote point was the source), 1894, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Donovan, 86 Tex. 378, 25 S. W. 10 (a person in Texas, receiving daily reports from Chicago, allowed to testify to price of sheep in Chicago); 1865, Cliquot's Champagne, 3 Wall. 141 (admitting knowledge based on "price current" lists); 1885, Railroad Co. v. Bixby, 57 Vt. 564, semble (admitting knowledge based on inquiry of prices); 1899, Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Reeves, 97 Va. 284, 33 S. E. 606 (testimony to value of cattle, based solely on price-quotations in a newspaper and on one price-list, excluded); 1900, Wadley v. Com., 98 id. 803, 35 S. E. 452 (value of bonds; witness who had made inquiries for creditors, "a pretty searching investigation," excluded).

Distinguish the question whether the price-lists or trade-journals themselves are admissible under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1704).

proximate accuracy of his conclusions. . . . J. B. stated in the most unequivocal ner that he was not much acquainted with the land in question; that he had been lower part of it, but that he knew nothing at all about the upper part. . . . It cer does not require much argument to show that B. was an incompetent witness to t on this question; he had not sufficient knowledge of the requisite facts upon wh base an opinion."

This general requirement is constantly enforced.[1] The sufficiency of witness' acquaintance with the thing to be valued should depend the discretion of the trial judge.

As with other kinds of knowledge (ante, § 672), so with knowled values, the place of this element may be supplied by a hypothetical que Thus, where a witness is competent to speak of house-values but ha seen the house in question, the specifications and other particulars ma placed before him hypothetically for an opinion, and then his knowled the value-standard may become available; or, in some cases, his atte may be called to a thing assumed to be substantially similar to th question, and his judgment may be given on the hypothesis of this simil This hypothetical basis is legitimately and frequently employed as a stitute for actual observation.[2]

§ 721. Other Principles, distinguished. The subject of value involve rules of evidence in still other ways not here concerned. (1) Whethe values or sale prices of other things of the same sort are admissible to the value of the article in question, involves a question of circumsta relevancy (ante, § 463). (2) What are the general factors of valu already been briefly noticed (ante, § 463). (3) Whether an estimate of

[1] Ala.: 1858, Ward v. Reynolds, 32 Ala. 390; 1861, Spiva v. Stapleton, 38 id. 174 (land); Cal.: 1868, Central Pacific R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 261 (land); Ill.: 1881, Green v. Chicago, 97 Ill. 372 ("familiar with the subject of inquiry"); 1900, Chicago Terminal T. R. Co. v. Bugbee, 184 id. 353, 56 N. E. 386 (land); Ind.: 1862, Crouse v. Holman, 19 Ind. 38 (land); 1870, Ferguson v. Stafford, 33 id. 165; Ia.: 1879, Cherokee v. R. Co., 52 Ia. 281, 3 N. W. 42 (land); 1888, Pingery v. R. Co., 78 id. 440, 43 N. W. 285 (land); Kan.: 1888, Lawrence & W. R. Co. v. Hawk, 39 Kan. 640, 18 Pac. 943 (land); 1889, Lawrence & W. R. Co. v. Ross, 40 id. 605, 20 Pac. 197 (land); Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Ehret, 41 id. 26, 20 Pac. 538 (land); Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. v. Baird, ib. 69, 21 Pac. 227; Kennett v. Fickel, ib. 213, 21 Pac. 93; Md.: 1895, Wallace v. Schaub, 81 Md. 594, 32 Atl. 324 (a nurse's services); Mass.: 1851, Walker v. Boston, 8 Cush. 279 (land); 1854, Shaw v. Charlestown, 2 Gray 109 (land); 1855, Russell v. R. Co., 4 id. 607 (land); Mich.: 1881, Dyer v. Rosenthal, 45 Mich. 590, 8 N. W. 560 (one who had been within a store but had not inspected the goods whose value was in question, excluded); 1895, Metzger v. Assur. Co., 105 id. 549, 63 N. W. 647 (insufficient examination of a stock of goods); 1899, Michaud v. Grace H. L. Co., 122 id. 305, 81 N. W. 93, semble (ship); Minn.: Lehmicke v. R. Co., 19 Minn. 482 (land ing it, without actually going upon it, m fice); 1876, Burger v. R. Co., 22 id. 34 sonalty); 1883, Sherman v. R. Co., 30 i 15 N. W. 239 (land); 1884, Senrer v. 31 id. 480, 18 N. W. 283 (services); 1889 sell v. Hayden, 40 id. 90, 41 N. W. 45 sonalty); Mo.: 1860, Newmark v. Ins. C Mo. 165 (personalty); 1886, Springfield & Co. v. Calkins, 90 Mo. 543, 3 S. W. 82 quainted with the premises, location, an roundings"); N. Y.: 1888, Slocovich v Co., 108 N. Y. 61, 14 N. E. 802 (excludi who had not seen the ship for several Oh.: 1876, Williams v. Brown, 28 Oh. S (services); Pa.: 1895, Mewes v. Pipe-Lin 170 Pa. 364, 32 Atl. 1082 (land); 1903, S v. R. Co., — id. —, 55 Atl. 769 (land); 1903, Wilson v. Southern R. Co., 65 S. C 43 S. E. 964 (land); U. S.: 1869, C v. Greer, 9 Wall. 734; Vt.: 1858, Laur Vaughn, 30 Vt. 94 (personalty).

[2] 1894, State v. Tennebom, 92 Ia. 5 N. W. 193 (the value of a stock of g 1873, Miller v. Smith, 112 Mass. 475; Johnston Harvester Co. v. Clark, 31 Minn 17 N. W. 111; 1877, Thompson v. Boy Pa. 481.

is excluded by the Opinion rule is dealt with under that head (post, § 1940). (4) The old doctrine of Norman v. Wells, that an estimate of value is too speculative and uncertain to be listened to has already been noticed under the present principle (ante, § 663). (5) Whether market reports and trade journals are admissible to prove value involves an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1704).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC V: TESTIMONIAL RECOLLECTION.

CHAPTER XXVI.

§ 725. General Principle. The second of the necessary elements (a § 478) in every properly qualified testimonial statement is Recollection, the adequate mental reproduction of the impressions obtained by Observation. The element of Recollection thus stands between the element Observation (or Knowledge) which it reproduces, and the element of Communication (or Narration), by which it is in turn reproduced and made apprehensible by others.

The general canon applicable to Recollection is simple: the Recollection should adequately correspond to and represent the impressions originally gained by Observation or Knowledge. Various situations are conceivable in which this essential quality of Recollection may be lacking; and various detailed requirements with reference to curing or avoiding these possible deficiencies are also conceivable. There are, however, in practice, only a few situations commonly calling for judicial rules.

At the outset an important distinction is met between that present actual recollection which a witness on the stand may ordinarily be expected to exhibit (called here Present Recollection), and that recollection which once existed, but now, having irrevocably vanished, requires artificial preservation (called here Past Recollection). The use of the latter sort was for a time little recognized, and is even now often confused with the use of a present recollection. It is convenient to deal with the subject under three heads: I. Recollection in general; II. Past Recollection Recorded; III. Present Recollection Revived.

I. Recollection in general.

§ 726. Quality of Recollection; "Impression," "Belief," and the like. The general principle is (as just noted) that Recollection should adequately correspond to Observation. It is in a qualitative way that the deficiency usually occurs. The witness, it may happen, cannot recollect positively, — is not sure, — "thinks" it was so, — has an "impression," — "believes," or the like. How far is such a degree of recollection satisfactory?

It is a commonplace of judicial experience that testimony most glibly delivered and most positively affirmed is not always the most trustworthy. The honest witness who will not exaggerate the strength of his recollection is well worth listening to because of this very caution. Moreover, to accept such "impressions" and "beliefs" is after all not dangerous, since they carry in themselves a warning of their evidential weakness. The best judicial opinion does not insist on a high degree of positiveness in the recollection, but accepts whatever the witness feels able to present. Much must here be left to the trial Court to determine:

1839, Weston, C. J., in Clark v. Bigelow, 16 Me. 247: "If we are to understand from this language [a 'strong impression'] that the fact is impressed with some strength upon his memory, but that it does not rise to positive assurance, it would be admissible. . . . If no other recollection than that of the most positive character is to be received in a court of justice, the difficulty of verifying facts resting in memory would be greatly increased."

1850, Eastman, J., in Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 588: "Witnesses are not required to give their testimony with absolute positiveness. If the fact is impressed on the memory, but the recollection does not rise to positive assurance, it is still admissible to be weighed by the jury."

1852, Lumpkin, J., in Franklin v. Mayor, 14 Ga. 260: "Every witness must swear according to the impressions on his mind. They are the materials of his knowledge. It is usually only a more cautious mode of expressing their belief. . . . The impressions of

Mr. R., we think, were sufficiently certain and positive to be admissible. I have been satisfied that we are too hide-bound and restricted in our practice with regard to admissibility of evidence. It is high time that the practice should be discouraged."

1857, Legrand, C. J., in Wilson v. Carson, 10 Md. 751 "Opinion is belief, and not more; it is not absolute certainty, nor does the law require it to be so."

1859, Sawyer, J., in State v. Flanders, 38 N. H. 332: "An impression as to a past may mean personal knowledge of the fact as it rests in the memory, though the remembrance is so faint that it cannot be characterized as an undoubting recollection. . . this sense the impression of a witness is evidence, however indistinct and unreliable recollection may be. No line can be drawn for the exclusion of any record left the memory as the impress of personal knowledge, because of the dimness of inscription."

§ 727. Same: Quality of Observation, distinguished; "Impression," "Bel and the like. But it has already been noted (ante, § 658) that there is also and the Courts recognize it — a sense in which the terms "impression," "lief," and the like, may mean, not a faintness of recollection, but a weakn in the original impressions of observation; for example, "I was some tance away, but the person seemed to me to be A."; "I am not certain, bu thought, supposed, judged, at the time, that the hour was about four o'cloc Such expressions indicate a deficiency in the quality of the Observation, of the Recollection; and this sense of the phrases is equally common with preceding one. It will not do to accept mere guesses as testimony. Nev theless, it is clear that the law cannot and does not require absolute certai of observation. A mere deficiency in the quality of observation is of itself good reason for excluding whatever results the observer did actually obta Some men's doubts are better than other men's certainties; and there is h nothing to do but leave to the trial judge to determine when the "impressio is so trivial and faint as to be not worth receiving:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 153: "It has been said that a witness must be examined in chief as to his 'belief' or 'persuasion,' but only as to his knowledge of fact, since judgment must be given secundum allegata et probata.[1] . . . As far as rega mere belief or persuasion which does not rest upon a sufficient and legal foundation, position is correct, — as where a man believes a fact to be true merely because he heard it said to be so. But with respect to persuasion or belief as founded on facts wit the actual knowledge of the witness, the position is not true. On questions of ident of persons and of handwriting, it is every day's practice for witnesses to swear that t 'believe' the person to be the same or the handwriting that of a particular individ although they will not swear positively."

§ 728. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. In examini the authorities, then, it must be remembered that the result depends on t sense of the words used. (1) So far as the terms "impression," "belief," a the like, signify a total lack of original observation, a mere conjecture bas

[1] The position which Mr. Starkie here repudiates was based upon an early and loosely phrased passage of Coke's authorship, which was for a time much relied on: 1621, Adams v. Canon, 1 Dyer 53 b ("In this case much was said about the depositions of witnesses. . . . Secondly, that it is not satisfactory for the w ness to say that he thinks or persuadeth hi self; and that for two reasons: 1st, Because is to give an absolute sentence, and therefo ought to have more sure ground than thin ing").

on rumors, intuitions, prejudices, or the like, such testimony is inadmissible; the authorities in which this sense is unmistakably the one intended by the Courts have already been examined (ante, § 658); (2) So far as these terms signify merely an inferior quality (a) in the observation or (b) in the recollection of the witness, such testimony is receivable, subject to the trial Court's discretion (as just noted in §§ 726, 727). However, in the great majority of rulings to this effect it is either difficult or impossible to learn which of these senses ((a) or (b)) the Court had in mind. Moreover, in rulings rejecting testimony couched in the above terms, it is sometimes impossible to know whether the Court is justly repudiating "impressions" in the sense (1) above, or, contrary to the best opinion and the great weight of authority, is rejecting "impressions" in either of the senses (2) above. The best that can be done, therefore, is to note the different principles involved, and to leave the authorities to be interpreted in that light.[1]

[1] In the following cases the testimony was admitted, except as otherwise noted: Eng.: 1773, Miller's Case, 3 Wils. 428 ("should rather believe"); 1794, Horne Tooke's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 71 (belief as to handwriting); 1801, Garrells v. Alexander, 4 Esp. 37 (handwriting "like" another); Ala.: 1846, Hill v. Hill's Adm'r, 9 Ala. 992 (belief); 1878, Turner v. McFee, 81 id. 0, semble (belief); 1888, Bass Furnace Co. v. [illegible]cock, 82 id. 456, 2 So. 315 ("best judgment"); 1893, Shrimpton v. Brice, 102 id. 655, 666, 15 So. 452 (that handwriting "resembled B.'s"); 1897, Thornton v. State, 113 id. 43, 21 So. 356 (identification "in his best opinion"); Cal.: 1859, McGerrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426, 430 ("to the best of his recollection," by an attesting witness); 1882, People v. Rolfe, 61 id. 540 (identity); 1899, People v. Soap, 127 id. 408, 59 Pac. 771 ("presume," as a statement of best recollection); Conn.: 1831, Lyon v. Lyman, 9 Conn. 60 (certainty not required); Ga.: 1855, Dawson v. Callaway, 18 Ga. 579 ("I do not know positively, but I think" was held properly rejected; but "I saw . . . as I supposed," improperly rejected; the difference being practically a quibble); 1856, Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 20 id. 620 ("best of belief," admitted); 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 id. 751, 777, 12 S. E. 18 (that the witness "thought he glimpsed S. as he fell," admitted as signifying "a direct reference to an immediate perception of the senses"); that a comparatively fainter recollection should be accepted from hostile witnesses is laid down by Walker, J., in Huguley v. Holstein, 35 id. 272 (1866); but compare the same judge's exclusion of "I think" in Morris v. Stokes, 21 id. 570 (1857), and the similar case of Parker v. Chambers, 24 id. 524 (1858); Ill.: 1840, Gorhem v. Peyton, 3 Ill. 364 (that the assignor does not recollect making certain admissions); 1865, Fash v. Blake, 28 id. 364, 368 (belief as to handwriting); Ind.: 1847, Rose v. Louthain, 8 Blackf. 413 ("best of recollection"); Ia.: 1871, State v. Porter, 34 Ia. 133 ("suppose," "took it," "concluded," "inferred"); 1881, State v. Lucas, 57 id. 502, 10 N. W. 868 ("can't positively identify, but am satisfied in my own mind"); 1894, State v. Farrington, 90 id. 673, 677 (that handwriting "looked some like his"; undecided); 1895, State v. Seymore, 94 id. 699, 63 N. W. 663 ("I don't know positive, but am satisfied in my own mind"; "best judgment"); La.: 1846, Bradford v. Cooper, 1 La. An. 326 ("belief" as to handwriting); 1885, State v. Goodwin, 37 La. An. 713, 715 ("best of knowledge and belief," for a witness to handwriting); Me.: 1840, Lewis v. Freeman, 17 Me. 260 (the witness "was confident," but "would not swear" that it was so); 1852, Hopkins v. Megquire, 35 id. 80 ("strong impression," "could not swear"); 1884, Humphries v. Parker, 52 id. 504 ("impression," "I think"); Md.: 1856, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Thompson, 10 Md. 84 ("suppose"); 1862, Fulton v. McCracken, 18 id. 542 ("think"); Mass.: 1866, Hamilton v. Nickerson, 13 All. 352 ("belief" as to the existence of a trade usage); 1897, Com. v. Kennedy, 170 Mass. 18, 48 N. E. 770 ("best of his knowledge, belief, and recollection," as to a person's identity); Mich.: 1895, Johnston v. Ins. Co., 106 Mich. 98, 64 N. W. 5 (one who knew "very near" what the value was); Mo.: 1880, Ferris v. Thaw, 72 Mo. 450 ("thought"); 1881, Greenwell v. Crow, 73 id. 640 (would not swear to it); 1882, State v. Babie, 76 id. 504 (here it was suggested that a closeness of resemblance, something short of an apparently exact identity, would suffice as evidence); 1884, State v. Hopkirk, 84 id. 288 ("looked like"); 1895, State v. Harvey, 131 id. 339, 32 S. W. 1110 (handwriting; "opinion," enough); 1897, State v. Dale, 141 id. 284, 42 S. W. 722 (that goods said to be stolen "resembled" those stolen); 1899, State v. Guild, 149 id. 381, 50 S. W. 909 (that stolen goods "looked like" those found); 1900, State v. Weber, 156 id. 249, 56 S. W. 729 ("belief" as to identity of stolen mare); State v. Cushenberry, 157 id. 168, 56 S. W. 737 (same, as to identity of person); N. H.: 1858, Burnham v. Ayer, 36 N. H. 185

§ 720. Same: Other Senses of "Impression," etc., to which Other Pri ples are applicable. Three distinct senses have now been noted in which terms "impression," "belief," or the like, may call for the application of ferent principles of Testimonial Qualifications: (1) That the witnes merely conjecturing or guessing, never having had any real observation the facts; this evidence being inadmissible; (2) That the witness, tho once possessed of some acquaintance with the facts, is more or less uncert by reason of (a) weakness of the original impression of observation, (b) faintness of the present recollection; this evidence being generally acce able. But there must also be noted at least three other senses, perhaps f involving still other principles, two of them genuinely principles of eviden

(3) In testifying to a conversation or to prior testimony of another witn the witness may attempt to give, not the detailed words or phrases, but "understanding" or "best of recollection" as to the general purport or ef of what was said. Here the Court may insist on applying the principle (belief sufficient; mere impression excluded) 1860, Nute v. Nute, 41 Id. 08 ("I think"); N. Y.: 1877, Carrington v. Ward, 71 N. Y. 361 ("impression"); 1878, Blake v. People, 73 Id. 586 ("think"; "best of my knowledge"); N. C.: 1839, Beverly v. Williams, 4 Dev. & B. 237 (would not swear positively); 1851, McRae v. Morrison, 13 Ired. 48 ("impression"); Oh.: 1851, Crowell v. Bank, 3 Oh. St. 411 ("impression"); Or.: 1889, State v. Chee Gong, 17 Or. 638, 21 Pac. 882, semble (belief); Pa.: 1820, Sigfried v. Levan, 6 S. & R. 313 ("will not swear, but it is like his writing"); 1823, Farmer's Bank v. Whitehill, 10 Id. 112 (belief); 1851, Shitler v. Bremer, 23 Pa. 413 (the handwriting "looks like it; can't say I believe it to be his writing"); 1860, Duvall's Ex'r v. Darby, 38 Id. 59 ("impression"); 1868, Dodge v. Bache, 57 Id. 424 ("belief"); 1886, Pittsburgh V. & C. R. Co. v. Vance, 115 Id. 332, 8 Atl. 764 (less than a certainty in an opinion as to value); Tenn.: 1874, Woodward v. State, 4 Baxt. 324 ("think"); Tex.: 1866, Swinney v. Booth, 28 Tex. 116 ("impression"); U. S.: 1822, Bouldin v. Massie's Heirs, 7 Wheat. 153 ("appeared to be"); 1821, Riggs v. Taylor, 9 Id. 483, 486 ("impression" as to destroying a document); Vt.: 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 187, 17 Atl. 483 ("impression," "I think so"); 1895, State v. Bradley, 67 Id. 465, 32 Atl. 240 ("thought"); Va.: 1893, Combs v. Com., 90 Va. 88, 91, 17 S. E. 881 (identification of stolen corn by opinion and belief); Wis.: 1876, Erd v. R. Co., 41 Wis. 68 (opinion on value).

In the following cases the testimony was held insufficient: Ind.: 1894, Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein, 140 Ind. 61, 39 N. E. 246 ("think"); Ia.: 1878, Simonson v. R. Co., 49 Ia. 88, semble ("thought"); 1895, Orr v. R. Co., 91 Id. 423, 62 N. W. 851 (suppose); Ky.: 1833, Carrico v. Neal, 1 Dana 162 ("impression" of the sole will-witness, held insufficient as sole proof); La.: 1860, Paty v. Martin, 15 La. An. 620 ("conjecture" of medical men); Me.: 1860, Hovey v. Chase, 52 Me. 313 ("could not tell, but presumed"); Md.: 1870, Elbin v. Wil 33 Md. 144 ("impression"); N. Y.: 1 Sanchez v. People, 22 N. Y. 151 (an exp "doubt"); Pa.: 1839, Carmait v. Post Watts 411 (impression excluded, with qua cations); 1897, Fullam v. Rose, 181 Pa. 138 Atl. 197 (that a signature "looks like" excluded); U. S.: 1843, Wilcocks v. Phil Ex'rs, 1 Wall. Jr. 49, 53 ("so far as I kn Vt.: 1873, Guyette v. Bolton, 46 Vt. 232 sufficient recollection). Add also the cases c ante, § 658.

L. C. Eldon, that inveterate distinguishe the undistinguishable, tried once (in 1803, Es ton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 475) to distinguish tween "think" and "believe"; "I doubt authority of the case of Garrels v. Alexande Esp. 37], where if a man will not take upon to say he believes it to be the writing of a son, but says he thinks it like [the writin Lord Kenyon is made to say that is eviden I doubt that. Formerly that would not h been deemed evidence." But modern practi as seen in the above citations, has accepted L Kenyon's opinion.

It was once argued (on the authority Adams v. Canon, cited supra, § 727) tha "belief" could not be received because no dictment for perjury was possible on such a fo of statement. The conclusion does not foll from the premises; but at any rate it was ea settled that a false statement of the sort wo constitute a perjury: 1773, Miller's Case, Wils. 428, semble; 1782, Lord Mansfield Folkes v. Chadd, 3 Doug. 159, semble: 17 R. v. Pedley, 1 Leach Cr. C. 325; 1847, R. Schlesinger, 10 Q. B. 670. But even in mode times the hereay is still not unknown: 18 Maulsby, J., in Hayes v. Wells, 34 Md. 51 "Liability of a witness to the penalties of p jury, if he corruptly misstate facts, is one of t securities for truth which ought not to be moved, unless on necessity; and in proportion opinion is admitted, that liability is removed.

Completeness (post, §§ 2097, 2098), i.e. the details, not the substance, must be given whenever utterances, spoken or written, are concerned. It is not really a question of deficient Observation or Recollection; for, though the witness may sometimes fail to give details because he did not hear all or does not recollect all, the principle would still, if applied, exclude his evidence if, though hearing all or recollecting all, he still did not narrate all on the stand; in other words, it is the principle of Completeness that excludes such evidence (if it is to be excluded), and the deficiency of Observation or Recollection is a mere casual incident which may or may not be present.

(4) There is a general principle excluding opinion testimony whenever the facts are before the tribunal and the witness' judgment or opinion is superfluous. This exclusion has nothing to do with "opinion" as involving the strength of the witness' impressions (the subject of the foregoing sections); it concerns the convenience of the tribunal, which cannot spend its time in listening to wholly superfluous evidence. So far as "opinions" are excluded on this ground, they are elsewhere dealt with (post, §§ 1917–1978). A witness' "opinion" or "understanding" of the effect of a conversation may in this aspect also be open to criticism (post, §§ 1969–1971).

(5) The witness' "understanding" or "supposition" as to the terms of a contract, made by conversation or by letter, will often be wholly immaterial, according to the principle of substantive law which usually determines the effect of legal acts by their outward effect, not by the secret or imperfectly expressed intention of the actor. When a witness "understood" the other party to a contract as saying a certain thing, the substantive law may or may not allow this "understanding" to be regarded. This question — one of a group commonly treated under the Parol Evidence Rule — is dealt with under that head (post, §§ 2413, 2465).

(6) In Alabama, in the course of a confused series of highly unsatisfactory precedents, a witness' statement as to another person's intent or motive (sometimes employing the phrase "understanding" or "belief") has been repudiated, on the ground that no man can say that he knew what another's intent or motive was, i.e. on grounds of the impossibility of knowledge (ante, § 661). This unsound doctrine is dealt with under the Opinion rule (post, § 1966).

§ 730. Witness Specifying on Direct Examination his Grounds for Recollection; Cross-Examination to Impeach Recollection. (1) On the direct examination a witness may properly be asked to specify the grounds for his recollection; because the circumstances which have contributed to fix or to strengthen it may show how the witness is justified in his confidence of assertion, and the party offering him is entitled to the benefit of this.[1]

(2) On cross-examination, the opponent is equally entitled to bring out such circumstances as exhibit the untrustworthiness of the witness' recollection. But here the general principles of Impeachment control this process.[2]

[1] The authorities are for convenience collected ante, §§ 655, 416.

[2] Post, §§ 942, 973, 994, 1259.

II. PAST RECOLLECTION RECORDED

§ 734. General Principle. In dealing with the two sorts of recollecti past and present, it is desirable to consider first the former. The situati is one in which the witness is devoid of a present recollection, and theref desires to use a past recollection. This he proposes to do by employing so record of this past recollection and adopting it as his present stateme Thus, he says: "I made a correct memorandum of this conversation wh my recollection was fresh; I now remember nothing, but can offer my pr recollection as embodied in the memorandum"; or, "I remember nothing sending the notice, but I know from this entry that I must have sent The chief difficulties here to be met have no direct dependence on the pr ciples of Recollection. It must appear that the witness had a good recoll tion when it was recorded, but that is all that is required by the canons Recollection. It is as to the nature of the record and the means of makiu now available that certain restrictions must be applied, and this is a mat of the accuracy and identity of the record, i. e. on principle, of the Narrat or Communication of his evidence. The cardinal principle of Narration (p § 765) will be seen to be this, that it must correspond to the Recollecti the story told by the witness, whether orally or in writing, must repres his knowledge and recollection. Whether or not the record must be by witness himself, whether it may be a copy of the original, whether w used it is itself evidence, and the like, — these seem in strictness to inv the element of Narration or Communication. Nevertheless, for convenie of exposition, the use of such records must be treated under a single outl the detailed rules being examined in sequence; and it will be enough remember that there are after all two underlying general principles invol

Broadly, then, we have to provide, in using a record of past recollection, certain practical tests of the accuracy and identity of the record; furtherm we must require some guarantee that the past recollection thus recorded a satisfactory one, e. g. that it was recorded at or about the time of the eve we may be asked to declare that in any case a present recollection is alw preferable to a past one, and that hence the lack of a present recollec must first be expressly ascertained; and it will also be found that historic there has been much confusion, great delay, and possibly an occasi refusal to allow the use of a past recollection at all. These topics may be taken up in the reverse order, as follows: (a) History of the use of recollection; (b) Preference for a present recollection; (c) Tests to se the adequacy of the past recollection and the accuracy and identity of record of it.

a. History of the Use of Past Recollection Recorded.

§ 735. History in England and the United States. The use of a p or other memorandum as an aid to recollection was recognized at an e stage in the history of reported trials. But the distinction between a past and a present recollection seems hardly to have been appreciated at first:

1660, Scroop's Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1034, 1039; murder of King Charles I, the defendant being charged as one of the judges sitting to condemn him; Carr: "Amongst others that were judges of that Court, as was printed in a paper which I then had in my hand, I found the name of Mr. A. Scroop, who I saw did there sit and appear" (Mr. Carr looked in that paper when he gave his evidence); Scroop: "I hope you will not take any evidence from a printed list"; Counsel: "The manner of his evidence is, he saith, this: that he had this printed paper in his hand when the names of that Court were called, and marking the persons in that paper who were present, and that you were one of them who did appear"; Scroop: . . . By your favour, I do suppose there is no witness ought to use any paper or look upon any paper when he gives evidence"; Sol. Gen.: "Ask him the question without the paper; yet nothing is more usual than for a witness to make use of a paper to help his memory."

So far as any distinction was at this time observed, it was merely between referring to a paper from time to time and reading it outright;[1] and the refusal to permit the latter process was practically a repudiation of the use of past recollection. But by the middle of the 1700s the legitimacy of the latter process is found fully conceded; the only distinction being (post, § 749) that the original must be produced in Court:

1756, Tanner v. Taylor, quoted by Buller, J., in Doe v. Perkins, infra: The witness proved delivery of goods from an account which he had in his hand, a copy from his day-book which he left at home; it was objected that the original should be produced; Legge, B.: "If he would swear positively from [present] recollection, and the paper was only to refresh his memory, he might make use of it. But if he could not from recollection swear to the delivery any further than as finding them entered in his book [past recollection], then the original should have been produced."

1790, Doe v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 754; the witness had gone about with a rent-collector and made entries in a book; the book was in court, but the witness spoke from extracts made by himself, having "no memory of his own of those specific facts"; this was objected to on the ground of "the known distinction between cases [1] where the witness swears from his own [present] knowledge of the facts, though his memory may be assisted by memoranda, and [2] where he does not speak from any recollection which he has, but merely from such memoranda; in the latter case it has always been required that the original minutes should be produced, because of the great door which might otherwise be opened to fraud and concealment"; and the Court approved the objection.

[1] 1660, Downes' Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1209, 1213 (Downes: "I have an unhappy memory; I have slipt many things; L. C. B. Bridgman; "Remember yourself by papers, if you have any; no man will hinder you"); 1662, Sir Henry Vane's Trial, 6 id. 119, 149 (an under-clerk used the Commons Journal to prove Vane's attendance, "and said, though he will not take upon himself to say when Sir Henry Vane was there and when he was absent, yet he said positively that, at what time soever he is set down in the Journal to have acted or reported anything, he was there"); 1678, Stayley's Trial, ib. 1501, 1504 (witness testifies to the defendant's remarks, from a paper in which he "writ them down presently"); 1679, Knox's Trial, 7 id. 763, 789 (a justice wished to read his examination of an informant; "because my memory is bad"; Recorder: "No, that can't be; you must not read them, but only refresh your memory by them"); 1680, Cellier's Trial, ib. 1043, 1047 (similar); 1684, Lady Ivy's Trial, 10 id. 555, 582 (notes allowed to be used to refresh memory, but not otherwise); 1696, Friend's Trial, 13 id. 1, 21 (Witness for prosecution; "All that I can say to this business is written in my paper, and I refer to my paper"; Att'y-Gen'l: "You must not refer to your paper, Sir, you must tell all what you know"; L. C. J. Holt: "He may look upon any paper to refresh his memory"); 1754, Canning's Trial, 19 id. 488 (witness allowed to use a memorandum which he would not have recorded unless correct); 1754, L. C. Hardwicke, in Anon., 1 Ambl. 252 ("There is no certain rule how far evidence may be admitted from notes; some judges had thought, and he was inclined the same way, that the witness might speak from notes which were taken at the time of the transaction in question, but not if they were wrote afterwards").

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 176: "The law goes further, and in some instances, permits a witness to give evidence as to a fact although he has no present recollection of the fact itself. This happens, in the first place, where the witness, having no longer any recollection of the fact itself, is yet enabled to state that at some former time, and whilst he had a perfect recollection of a fact, he committed it to writing. If the witness be correct in that which he positively states from a present recollection, viz. that at a prior time he had a perfect recollection and, having that recollection, truly stated it in the document produced, the writing, though its contents are thus but mediately proved, must be true."

The reports show a constant use of this past recollection in the English courts from that time until the present.[2] There was more or less delay and doubt in settling some of the conditions of its use; yet it does not appear that any of the judges ever had any doubts as to the radical question of using it all. It is true that the bar for a long time did not seem to grasp the distinction;[3] and as late as 1834 the Court was called upon to reaffirm the legitimacy of the use, against a strong argument which cannot be supposed to have been made (in England, and in those days) by a counsel who really knew better:

R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; the witness looked at a memorandum of a lease; "he had no memory of these things but from the book, without which he should not of his own knowledge be able to speak to the fact; but on reading the entry he had no doubt the fact really happened"; Counsel, opposing this: "Even supposing this to be a mere memorandum such as the witness might refresh his memory from, still his evidence does not go far enough. He says, after looking at the memorandum, that he has no doubt, but that he has no memory of these things; so that his memory, after being refreshed, does not supply the proof"; Taunton, J.: "When a bond is put into the hands of an attesting witness, and he says that he does not recollect attesting, but that, from seeing his name there, he has no doubt that he did, is not that proof of his attestation?" Counsel, replying: "A naked fact may be so proved: but here the question was as to the proof of the contents of an instrument, or of particulars appearing from those contents only." But the Court unanimously rejected his claim.

That there should have been misunderstanding is not strange, in view of the loose use of the term "refreshing the memory" to cover both the revivi-

[2] The order of cases to 1850 is as follows: 1773, Miller's Case, 3 Wils. 420, 427; 1795, Digby v. Stedman, 1 Esp. 328; 1801, Jacobs v. Lindsay, 1 East 460; 1806, Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 916, 996; 1809, Burrough v. Martin, 2 Campb. 112; 1810, Mayor of Doncaster v. Day, 3 Taunt. 262; 1826, Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 332; 1828, Maugham v. Hubbard, 2 M. & Ryl. 5; 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; 1834, Burton v. Plummer, ib. 341; 1836, Howard v. Canfield, 5 Dowl. 417; 1844, Topham v. McGregor, 1 C. & K. 320; 1848, Beech v. Jones, 5 C. B. 696. In Scotland, in 1795, the judges were still divided as to the propriety of using a past recollection: Kinloch's Case, 25 How. St. Tr. 934–938 (Lord Eskgrove: "If a man comes to this bar as a witness, he is to swear to what he now remembers, not to what he formerly remembered"; Lord Justice Clerk, contra: "If a witness does not recollect any circumstance, he has a right to look at his notes, and then if he says, upon the great oath which he has taken, that these are facts, they ought to be received in evidence"; a majority rejected the evidence).

[3] There are some instances in which, when actual recollection failed, no attempt was made to use past recollection: 1820, Catt v. Howard, 3 Stark. 3. There are others in which, though there was apparently no recollection, the memorandum was used but the point not noted: 1796, Vaughan v. Martin, 1 Esp. 440; 1803, Rambert v. Cohen, 3 id. 213.

fication of a present actual memory and the adoption of a past recorded memory. This unfortunate parsimony of phrase is mainly responsible for the conflict of views still often found in prescribing the conditions of using a present recollection. It was left for an Irish judge, at a comparatively late date, to point out this impropriety of language:

1864, Hayes, J., in Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. C. L. 213: "['To refresh the memory of the witness'], that is a very inaccurate expression; because in nine cases out of ten the witness' memory is not at all refreshed; he looks at it again and again, and he recollects nothing of the transaction; but, seeing that it is in his own handwriting, he gives credit to the truth and accuracy of his habits, and, though his memory is a perfect blank, he nevertheless undertakes to swear to the accuracy of his notes."

In the United States the legitimacy of employing a past recollection was early apprehended by the Supreme Court of South Carolina, and its views were carried into effect in a series of decisions which have ever since served as the leading precedents:

1817, Cheves, J., in Pearson v. Wightman, Mills' Const. Ct. 344 (the witness had no recollection of witnessing a will, but recognized his handwriting): "I hold it not to be necessary that a subscribing witness should recollect the time and occasion when he subscribed the instrument as a witness. It is enough if he recognizes his handwriting and is perfectly assured in his own mind that he never subscribed an instrument as a witness without having seen it executed or acknowledged as the nature of the act requires. . . . Such testimony was better evidence than an adventurous and unaided recollection."

1817, Colcock, J., in Haig v. Newton, ib. 423 (the clerk of a notary testified from a minute-book, having no actual recollection): "If a witness is not allowed to recur to a memorandum book of such transactions as these in a large and populous city, there would be many instances of a defect in testimony, even where notices had been duly given. . . . Can it be supposed that one engaged in such an infinite number of cases, all of the same nature, could retain in his memory an exact account of the day and place and manner of giving the notice?"

1820, Nott, J., in State v. Rawls, 2 N. & McC. 333 (the witness, having no positive recollection, referred to an affidavit of the facts): "The propriety of the rule . . . may be inferred from its necessity. And the occurrences of every day furnish abundant proof that the ordinary transactions of life could not be carried on upon any other principle."[1]

On many occasions since then, the Courts of this country have emphasized the distinction between the use of a present and the use of a past recollection, and have vindicated the legitimacy of the latter as well as the former:

1836, Shaw, C. J., in Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 558 (the witness had used a book of notices to indorsers and makers of notes): "It is very obvious to remark that if such evidence is not sufficient, it would be extremely difficult to prove such acts done. . . . The witness may testify to other facts which with the aid of the memorandum will afford a very satisfactory inference that the act was done, — such as his usual practice and habit, his caution never to make such a memorandum unless the acts were done, and his consciousness of the importance and necessity of accuracy in this particular. In this respect it is like the testimony of an attesting witness to an instrument. He recognizes his handwriting, he knows he put his hand there, he testifies that he believes he would not have put it there if he had not seen the instrument executed ; but he has no present recollection of the fact other than that derived from the recognition of his handwriting."

[1] Three other corroborative rulings were made at an early date: 1818, Columbia v. Harrison, 2 Mills Const. Ct. 213; 1823, Nicholson v. Withers, 2 McC. 429; 1834, Cleverly v. McCullough, 2 Hill 445.

1857, Selden, J., in Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 N. Y. 485: "The efforts of memory are seldom equal to the task of recalling after any considerable lapse of time even the exact substance of words and phrases. . . . To exclude such a record, when honestly made, would be to reject the best and frequently the only means of arriving at the truth."

1859, Tuck, J., in Martin v. Good, 14 Md. 398 (the witness did not remember, but would not have signed a paper which did not contain the true account): "If more were required in such cases, memoranda to refresh the memory would be of little use, because few men could undertake to relate the particulars of such transactions independent of the paper, and the purposes of judicial tribunals, in promoting the ends of justice, would be defeated."

1871, Strong, J., in Insurance Co. v. Weides, 14 Wall. 379: "And why should they not be [received]? Quantities and values are retained in the memory with great difficulty. If at the time when an entry of aggregate quantities or values was made the witness knew it was correct, it is hard to see why it is not at least as reliable as is the memory of the witness."

1879, Stone, J., in Acklen's Executors v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 498: "The law recognizes the right of a witness to consult memoranda in aid of his recollection under two conditions: First, when after examining a memorandum made by himself, or known and recognized by him as stating the facts truly, his memory is thereby so refreshed that he can testify, as matter of independent recollection, to facts pertinent to the issue. In cases of this class the witness testifies to what he asserts are facts within his own knowledge, and the only distinguishing difference between testimony thus given, and ordinary evidence of facts, is that the witness, by invoking the assistance of the memorandum, admits that without such assistance his recollection of the transaction he testifies to had become more or less obscured. . . . In the second class are embraced cases in which the witness after examining the memorandum cannot testify to an existing knowledge of the fact, independent of the memorandum, — in other words, cases in which the memorandum fails to refresh and revive the recollection and thus constitute it present knowledge. . . . [If the witness] testify that at or about the time the memorandum was made he knew its contents and knew them to be true, this legalizes and lets in both the testimony of the witness and the memorandum. The two are the equivalent of a present, positive statement of the witness, affirming the truth of the contents of the memorandum."

1880, Simpson, C. J., in Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444: "The rule upon this subject, in its broadest outline, embraces two classes of cases ; first, where the witness, after referring to the paper, speaks from his own memory and depends upon his own recollection as to the facts testified to; second, where he relies upon the paper and testifies only because he finds the facts contained therein."

1884, Rowell, J., in Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426: "Nor was it necessary that the witness should have had an independent recollection. . . . The old notion that the witness must be able to swear from memory is pretty much exploded. All that is required is that he be able to swear that the memorandum is correct. There seem to be two classes of cases on this subject: 1. Where the witness by referring to the memorandum has his memory quickened and refreshed thereby, so that he is enabled to swear to an actual recollection ; 2. Where the witness after referring to the memorandum undertakes to swear to the fact, yet not because he remembers it, but because of his confidence in the correctness of his memorandum. In both cases the oath of the witness is the primary, substantive evidence relied upon; in the former the oath being grounded on actual recollection, and in the latter on the faith reposed in the verity of the memorandum."

§ 736. History and Local Anomalies in Particular Jurisdictions. It cannot be doubted that the use of a past recollection (under the conditions to be examined later) now occupies a firm and unassailable place in our practice and doctrine. This is none the less a fact because the Courts of a few jurisdictions may not have ruled upon the subject, or because in a few others its place, if it has one, is uncertain, or because in these, as well as in some jurisdictions where its use is now orthodox, the history of the earlier precedents is confused and perplexing. It is worth while, however, to notice briefly the course of precedents, and some of the local anomalies here and there appearing, in certain of the jurisdictions of the United States. (1) In Pennsylvania, it is difficult to say whether there is in this jurisdiction a definite and settled acceptance of past recollection, as distinguished from present recollection.[1] (2) In New York the use of memoranda of past recollection is now firmly established, after some early vicissitudes;[2] but a local limitation persists,

[1] 1808, Pigott v. Holloway, 1 Binn. 436 (attesting witness to a letter of attorney, who found his seal and signature there, and thence was convinced of the fact of execution; admitted); 1811, Miles v. O'Hara, 4 id. 108 (judge's notes of testimony; if the judge had appeared and sworn that they were correct, they would have been admissible); 1818, Lightner v. Wike, 4 S. & R. 203 (counsel's notes; he "believed he had taken down what E. had said, as it fell from him," but had no present recollection; excluded); 1819, Juniata Bank v. Brown, 5 id. 226 (entries in a day-book offered by one of the firm; excluded, but it does not appear that the present question was raised); 1823, Cornell v. Green, 10 id. 14 (counsel, after refreshing memory from notes, could not remember sufficiently; excluded, but "it seems, however, singular that instead of trusting to Mr. F.'s recollection, the plaintiff did not offer his [F.'s] notes in evidence, against which, when properly authenticated, there could be no sort of objection"); 1824, Smith v. Lane, 12 id. 80 (issue as to flour delivered to the plaintiff; the books of the mill where it was ground were offered, the bookkeeper swearing to their correctness; Tilghman, C. J., rejected them (1) because they recorded flour ground, not flour delivered, (2) because they were not always made up at the time; Duncan, J., rejected them on mixed grounds, partly because the bookkeeper's recollection was not really revived; Gibson, J., was for admitting them, because (1) the amount ground was a real issue, and (2) the bookkeeper's swearing to the entries' correctness would suffice; the rule about parties' and third persons' account-books was confused with the question of using past recollections; the opinions show singular unfamiliarity with the precedents; and the confused thinking in this case has done much harm); 1828, Chess v. Chess, 17 id. 409 (counsel's notes admitted, following Cornell v. Green); 1829, Farmers' & M. Bank v. Boraef, 1 Rawle 152 (bank-clerk's verification of an entry, admitted; he had no present recollection); 1865, King v. Faber, 51 Pa. 392 (memorandum, apparently of past recollection, allowed to be used); 1866, Selover v. Rexford's Ex'r, 52 id. 308 (memorandum; how treated does not clearly appear); 1888, Long v. Regen, 119 id. 403, 13 Atl. 442 (memorandum, apparently of past recollection, admitted as "a statement prepared by the witness fixing the several quantities delivered at the dates designated respectively"); 1886, First Nat'l Bank of D. v. First Nat'l Bank of W., 114 id. 7, 6 Atl. 366 (bank-book entries allowed to be used for the purpose of "fixing dates with accuracy"; no precedents referred to).

[2] 1810, Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns. 375 (notary's testimony to his habit of giving notice and his certainty of belief; no actual recollection; admitted); 1822, Halliday v. Martinet, 20 id. 174 (past recollection rejected); 1829, Hart v. Wilson, 2 Wend. 515 (like Miller v. Hackley); 1830, Lawrence v. Barker, 5 id. 301 (memorandum excluded, except so far as it actually revived memory); 1833, Feeter v. Heath, 11 id. 486 (similar ruling); 1836, Clark v. Vorce, 15 id. 193 (witness allowed to use notes of the testimony of a deceased witness at a former trial, upon swearing to their accuracy; no actual recollection); 1837, Merrill v. R. Co., 16 id. 595 (entries of work, held admissible if "attested by the man who makes them," "though he remembered nothing of the facts which they record"); 1837, Clute v. Small, 17 id. 237 (witness to contents of a letter; "he could speak either from positive recollection, or from seeing the letter and knowing it to be his own statement"); 1852, Huff v. Bennett, 6 N. Y. 337 (use of past recollection apparently affirmed); 1854, Cole v. Jessup, 10 id. 96 (bank-teller's entries used; no actual recollection; the Merrill case followed); 1857, Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 id. 485 (counsel's notes of testimony used; past recollection distinctly sanctioned); this and the Merrill case put the question beyond doubt in this jurisdiction; and the two opinions give a careful survey to the whole subject; the subsequent cases accept the general principle as settled); 1858, Russell v. R. Co., 17 id. 134; 1860, Guy v. Mead, 22 id. 462; 1864, Marcly v. Shults, 29 id. 346; 1871, Downs v. R. Co., 47 id. 87; 1872, McCormick v. R. Co., 49 id. 303; 1875, Gilchrist v. Assoc., 59 id. 499; 1875, Squires v. Abbott, 61 id. 535; 1876, Flood v. Mitchell, 68 id. 509; 1876, Mandeville v. Reynolds, 68 id. 528, 537; 1879, Howard v. Mcrefusiug the use of past recollection until the lack of present recollection made to appear (post, § 738). (3) In Massachusetts, after some early flu tuation, the use of past recollection has been placed beyond doubt;[3] yet it apparently limited to regular entries in the course of business (post, § 747 (4) In Illinois the use of a past recollection is undoubtedly intended to sanctioned; but much confusion has existed as to the scope and grounds the rule.[4] (5) In the remaining jurisdictions, the precedents are fewer, b a general recognition is accorded and no special anomalies have developed.[5]

Donough, 77 id. 592; 1886, Mayor v. R. Co., 102 id. 572, 7 N. E. 905; 1889, National Ulster Co. Bank v. Madden, 114 id. 280, 21 N. E. 408.

[3] 1828, Glover v. Hunnewell, 6 Pick. 222 (witness had no present recollection, and was not allowed to use a schedule which he believed correct); 1829, Russell v. Coffin, 8 id. 143 (a subscribing witness identified his hand and the grantor's, but had no recollection; the proof of handwriting was deemed sufficient); 1836, Shove v. Wiley, 18 id. 558 (book of notices to indorsers; past recollection sanctioned); 1838, Alvord v. Collin, 20 Pick. 430 (certificate of notice of sale; past recollection sanctioned); 1844, Bunker v. Shed, 8 Metc. 153 (a lawyer's docket-entry, admitted). Subsequent cases (showing not always a true appreciation of the grounds of admission) are as follows: 1855, Smith v. Johns, 3 Gray 517 (certificate of taking possession); 1857, Crittenden v. Rogers, 8 id. 452 (same); 1858, Perkins v. Ins. Co., 10 id. 323 (certificate of marine surveyor); 1860, Briggs v. Rafferty, 14 id. 525; 1860, Parsons v. Ins. Co., 16 id. 463; 1866, Dugan v. Mahoney, 11 All. 572; 1867, Morrison v. Chapin, 97 Mass. 72; 1869, Adams v. Coulliard, 102 id. 173; 1872, Cobb v. Boston, 109 id. 444; 1882, Costello v. Crowell, 133 id. 352; 1891, Com. v. Clancy, 154 id. 128, 27 N. E. 1001.

[4] 1859, Mineral Point R. Co. v. Keep, 22 Ill. 20 (counsel's notes, verified by him as correct, accepted); 1867, Elston v. Kennicott, 46 id. 205 (tax-collector's entry of "paid"; no actual recollection; rejected); 1870, Chicago R. Co. v. Adler, 56 Ill. 345 (inconsistent language and nothing left certain; "the witness must be able to state that he remembers the facts" in their substance, e. g. that a bell was not rung, but he may refer for dates to his memorandum, provided he knows they were true and correctly entered at the time); 1873, Chicago & W. Coal Co. v. Liddell, 69 id. 639 (same fault; the witness, using a memorandum, "testified from his own memory," yet "he knows the items to be correct because they were true when made"); 1875, Wolcott v. Heath, 78 id. 434 (sales-book entries; use of past recollection sanctioned); 1875, Brown v. Luehrs, 79 id. 575 (stenographer's notes, verified as correct, admitted; whether past or present recollection does not appear); 1884, Clifford v. Drake, 110 id. 135 (reporter using newspaper copy; admitted); 1887, Bonnet v. Glatfeldt, 120 id. 166, 11 N. E. 250 (copy of book-entries, admitted); 1899, Overtoom v. R. Co., 181 Ill. 323, 54 N. E. 898 (stenographer using notes without actual refreshment; culpably left undecided; why throw additional doubt the preceding rulings?). If Courts would rig ously consult their own precedents, the state doctrine might sometimes be better ascerta able; in the second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seven and eighth of the preceding cases, none of th preceding were referred to.

[5] The following list is intended to include o the salient cases leading to the establishment the general doctrine: Alabama: In Vastbin v. Metcalf, 3 Ala. 101 (1841), a past recollect was not recognized; but this was set right, on authority of Professor Greenleaf, in Bonduran Bank, 7 id. 830 (1845), since followed frequent Alaska: C. C. P. 1900, § 665 (like Or. An C. 1892, § 836); Arkansas: 1895, Woolruff State, 61 Ark. 157, 32 S. W. 102 (admitte California: 1854, Treadwell v. Wells, 4 C 263 (apparently employed); 1859, People Elyea, 14 id. 144 (apparently sanctioned); C. P. 1872, § 2047 (admissible if made "at the ti when the fact occurred, or immediately th after, or at any other time when the fact fresh in his memory, and he knew that the st was correctly stated in the writing"); 18 Burbank v. Dennis, 101 Cal. 90, 35 Pac. (shorthand-reporter; verified notes read as dence); 1897, People v. Ammerman, 118 id. 50 Pac. 15 (shorthand transcript admitte 1897, People v. Mayne, ib. 516, 50 Pac. 654 mother identified an entry in a family Bibl hers, but the entry was excluded, with sing failure to notice the application of the pres principle); Connecticut: 1842, New Haven B v. Mitchell, 15 Conn. 224 (admitted); D ware: Declared admissible in Redden v. Spr 4 Harringt. 265 (1845); practically overrul Fitzgibbon's Adm'r v. Kinney, 3 id. 319 (184 Georgia: 1849, Williams v. Kelsey, 6 Ga. (sanctioned); Code 1895, § 5284 ("A wit may refresh and assist his memory by the us any written instrument or memorandum, vided he finally speaks from his recollection t refreshed, or is willing to swear positively f the paper"); 1900, Akins v. R. & B. Co., id. 815, 35 S. E. 671; Idaho: Rev. St. 1 § 6078 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047); India 1853, Clark. v. State, 4 Ind. 156 (reject 1866, Prather v. Pritchard, 26 id. 67 (accep not mentioning Clark's case); 1888, Johnso Culver, 116 id. 290, 19 N. E. 129 (sanctio with the qualification, "he cannot testify tirely from the writing, . . . but for . . . ing accuracy to his statements he may refe it"); 1893, Bass v. State, 136 id. 165, 168 N. E. 124 (stenographer may read his n

§ 737. Other Principles applicable to certain Kinds of Memoranda, distinguished: (1) Notes of Testimony; (2) Regular Entries in the Course of Business; (3) Notary's Certificate; (4) Will-Witness' Attestation. There are four sorts of memoranda in which the applicability of the present principle was aloud, though not able to recollect without them); 1901, Higgins v. People, 157 Id. 57, 60 N. E. 685 (shorthand notes of testimony used by the taker); Iowa: 1864, Morris v. Sargent, 18 Ia. 95 (sanctioned); 1870, McKivitt v. Cone, 30 id. 457; 1871, Borland v. Walrath, 33 id. 132; 1874, Moore v. Moore, 39 id. 461, 463 (stenographer referring to notes; obscure); 1875, Adae v. Zangs, 41 id. 536; 1896, State v. Smith, 99 id. 26, 68 N. W. 428 (shorthand notes, used by the maker); 1897, State Bank v. Brewer, 100 id. 576, 69 N. W. 1011 (apparently held improper to testify without actual refreshment; no authorities cited); 1897, O'Brien v. Stamlach, 101 id. 40, 69 N. W. 1133 (n reference's notes of testimony taken before him); Kansas: 1885, Solomon R. Co. v. Jones, 34 Kan. 444, 8 Pac. 730 (admitted); 1886, State v. Baldwin, 36 id. 15, 12 Pac. 318 (sanctioned); 1897, Wright v. Wright, 58 Id. 525, 50 Pac. 444 (stenographic report of testimony); Kentucky: 1815, Allen v. Trimble, 4 Bibb 21 (accepted, from a subscribing witness); 1821, Calvert v. Fitzgerald, 1 Litt. Sel. Cas. 388 (rejected); Louisiana: 1826, Bullard v. Wilson, 5 Mart. N. S. 196 (admitting the past recollection of a notary, in a record of a protest-notice); Maine: 1835, Wheeler v. Hatch, 3 Fairf. 389 (subscribing witness, admitted); 1843, Welcome v. Batchelder, 23 Me. 85 (notes of testimony, admitted); 1847, Chamberlain v. Sands, 27 id. 465 (admitted; apparently past recollection); Maryland: 1831, Flack v. Green, 3 G. & J. 474 (admitted); 1833, Owings v. Low, 5 id. 134 (admitted); 1837, Pocock v. Hendricks, 8 id. 426 (admitted); 1848, Bell v. Bank, 7 Gill 226 (sanctioned); 1852, Lewis v. Kramer, 3 Md. 287 (admitted); Michigan: 1875, Raynor v. Norton, 31 Mich. 209 (admitted); 1882, Mason v. Phelps, 48 id. 126, 11 N. W. 413, 837 (sanctioned); 1895, Hooker, J., in People v. Considine, 105 id. 149, 63 N. W. 196 (minutes of former testimony); 1897, Lucker v. Liske, 111 Mich. 683, 70 N. W. 421 (similar); Minnesota: 1889, Hoffman v. R. Co., 40 Minn. 60, 41 N. W. 301 (sanctioned); 1897, Davis v. State, — id. —, 70 N. W. 984 (record of passing trains; allowed); Mississippi: 1881, Cooper v. State, 59 Miss. 267 (admitting the use of a memorandum where a part only was actually recollected); Missouri: 1874, Smith v. Beattie, 57 Mo. 281 (the hearsay exception for regular entries was apparently used to admit records of past recollection; 1887, Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 id. 525, 6 S. W. 253 (past recollection sanctioned); Montana: C. C. P. 1895, § 3375 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047); Nebraska: 1886, Lipscomb v. Lyon, 19 Nebr. 522, 27 N. W. 731 (sanctioned); 1897, Davis v. State, 51 id. 301, 70 N. W. 984 (same); 1901, Johnson v. Spaulding, — id. —, 95 N. W. 808 (same); Nevada: 1877, McCausland v. Ralston, 12 Nev. 217 (admitted); 1883, Pinschower v. Hanks, 18 id. 104, 1 Pac. 454 (sanctioned, semble); New Hampshire: 1840, Haven v. Wendell, 11 N. H. 112 (sanctioned); 1846, Hall v. Ray, 18 id. 126 (cashier's entries); 1849, Seavy v. Denrborn, 19 id. 357 (notary's record of protest); 1855, Webster v. Clark, 30 id. 253 (admitted); New Jersey: 1795, Ryerson v. Grover, 1 N. J. L. 459 (sanctioned); 1899, Myers v. Weger, 62 id. 432, 42 Atl. 280 (same); North Carolina: 1835, Kello v. Maget, 1 Dev. & B. 414, 423 (doctrine of past recollection denied, "if after this help he obtains no remembrance of the facts distinct from the memorandum"; except for a verified copy or abstract of another document); 1855, Jones v. Ward, 3 Jones L. 24, 26 (notes of former testimony received, though the witness had no present recollection); 1858, Ashe v. De Rossett, 5 id. 300 (same); 1883, State v. Lyon, 89 N. C. 568 (reference to a newspaper copy of a libel, admitted); 1884, State v. Pierce, 91 id. 606 (notes of testimony, admitted); 1886, Bryan v. Moring, 94 id. 687 (same); Ohio: 1869, Mead v. McGraw, 19 Oh. St. 55 (sanctioned, semble); 1871, Moots v. State, 21 id. 653 (admitted, but possibly on hearsay-exception principles); Oregon: Annot. Code 1892, C. C. P. § 836 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047); 1892, Friendly v. Lee, 20 Or. 202, 25 Pac. 396 (sanctioned, under the Code); Rhode Island: 1855, State v. Colwell, 3 R. I. 132 (admitted); South Carolina: cases cited ante, § 735, and the following: 1888, State v. Jones, 29 S. C. 226, 7 S. E. 296 (coroner's notes of testimony at an inquest, admitted; but the Court confuses the question with that of the exclusive use of the coroner's record, and that of the hearsay exception for official statements); 1896, Springs v. R. Co., 46 id. 104, 24 S. E. 166; Tennessee: 1823, Rogers v. Burton, Peck 108 (judge's notes, admitted); 1838, Beets v. State, Meigs 106 (same); 1846, Bank v. Cowan, 7 Humph. 70 (notary's entry, admitted); Texas: 1855, Hamilton v. Rice, 15 Tex. 384, semble (admitted); 1881, R. Co. v. Burke, 55 id. 342 (admitted); 1885, Davie v. Terrill, 63 id. 106 (admitted); United States: 1869, Insurance Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 681 (admitted); 1871, Insurance Co. v. Weides, 14 id. 379 (admitted); 1878, Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 695 (notes of testimony used), 1884, Maxwell v. Wilkinson, 113 id. 656, 5 Sup. 691 (sanctioned); 1886, Vicksburg R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 id. 99, 7 Sup. 118 (sanctioned); 1893, Bates v. Preble, 151 id. 149, 14 Sup. 277 (a confusing opinion, which has done much to unsettle the law in that jurisdiction; it lacks acquaintance with the nature of the problems involved, and should be avoided in any study of the subject); Vermont: 1833, Glass v. Beach, 5 Vt. 175 (notes of testimony, admitted; the witness must "swear to their accuracy"); 1844, Mattocks v. Lyman, 16 id. 113 (admitted, but "a general recollection of the transaction" is required); 1849, Marsh v. Jones, 21 id. 378 (like the Mat-first seen and is still most commonly exemplified. But the scope of th present principle, in its relation to them, must be distinguished from oth principles.

(1) When a stenogra ˈher's notes of former testimony are used, the prese principle is simple. The stenographer cannot commonly revive an actu recollection, and will therefore read his notes as a memorandum of pa recollection;[1] the only usual questions under the present principle will whether the stenographic original must be used (post, § 749), and wheth the witness himself, not the stenographer, may use it (post, §§ 748, 76 But other distinct principles may come into play. If the stenographer not called to the stand, the question occurs whether the notes can none th less be read as a correct report, under an exception to the Hearsay ru (post, § 1669). Moreover, the witness whose testimony it is must be a counted for as deceased or otherwise unavailable (post, §§ 1401–1413); th parties and issues must be the same (post, §§ 1386–1388); and in crimin cases a special question of constitutionality arises (post, § 1398). Throug the failure to note which of these principles is involved, many rulings a obscure and useless.

(2) When the memorandum is one of a series of regular entries in the cour of business, it would be admissible without calling the entrant, if he we deceased or otherwise unavailable, under a settled exception to the Hearsa rule (post, §§ 1517–1561). But when the entrant himself comes with th entry to the stand, then the present principle alone (or that of present reco lection) is involved. In this aspect, it is wholly immaterial that the ent was one of a regular series (post, § 747); neither that nor any other of th limitations to the Hearsay exception has here any application. Yet the te dency to confuse the two is inveterate.

(3) A notary's certificate may be admissible, without calling the notary the stand, under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1675). But whe the notary testifies in person, he uses his certificate under the principles past or present recollection. Here the peculiar service of this class of mem randa has been to show that the habit of being consciously accurate is of itse a sufficient foundation for the witness' verification of his memorandum (po § 747).

(4) An attesting witness commonly verifies his signature just as a nota does, i. e. from his confidence that he would not have signed if he had n verily seen what he attests (post, § 747). If the witness is not available person, then his signature is proved, and his attestation becomes virtually hearsay statement, admissible by a settled exception (post, § 1505).

tocks case); 1852, Downer v. Rowell, 24 id. 243 (same); Virginia: 1854, Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 546 (surveyor's notes, admitted); West Virginia: 1883, Vinal v. Gilman, 21 W. Va. 309 (sanctioned); Wisconsin: 1883, Rounds v. State, 57 Wis. 52, 14 N. W. 865 (sanctioned); Washington: 1903, State v. Douette, 31 Was 6, 71 Pac. 556 (hotel register; principle rec nized).

[1] A number of instances of this ordinary u are collected ante, § 736.

b. Preference for a Present Recollection.

§ 738. New York Doctrine; Present Recollection must first appear to be Lacking. The principle on which the use of a past recollection rests (as appears from the passages quoted ante, § 734) is clearly that of necessity. "To reject such a record would be to reject the best and frequently the only means of arriving at the truth"; such is the notion, in various phrasings, expressed in those opinions and in many others. But this necessity, on further analysis, is open to two interpretations, the less satisfactorily of which has been adopted and emphasized in the modern New York rulings. Is the use of past recollection necessary (1) because in the case in hand there is not available a present actual recollection in the specific witness, or (2) because in the usual case a faithful record of a past recollection, if it exists, is more trustworthy and desirable than a present recollection of greater or less vividness? The latter view, it would seem, is more in harmony with general experience, as well as with the attitude of the judges who early vindicated the use of past recollection. A faithful memorandum is acceptable, not conditionally on the total or partial absence of a present remnant of actual recollection in the particular witness, but unconditionally; because, for every moment of time which elapses between the act of recording and the occasion of testifying, the actual recollection must be inferior in vividness to the recollection perpetuated in the record.

Nevertheless, the first of these differing interpretations of the principle seems to have become established in New York. It is there required that the absence of a present recollection must first be expressly shown as a preliminary to the use of the past recollection. Whether this failure shall be total or partial, whether it shall affect merely the substance of the transaction or even details, — these are the additional questions which do not seem to have been settled, but they illustrate the practical unwieldiness and undue technicality of this doctrine:

1858, Russell v. R. Co., 17 N. Y. 134: "It is an indispensable preliminary to the introduction of such memoranda in evidence . . . that the witness is unable with the aid of the memorandum to speak from [present] memory as to the facts." [1]

This exceptional doctrine has been followed in the Federal Courts [2] and in a few States.[3] But it must be regarded as an inferior and local qualification, unknown to the orthodox doctrine.

[1] So also: 1864, Marcly v. Shults, 29 N. Y. 346; 1875, Squires v. Abbott, 61 id. 535; 1876, Flood v. Mitchell, 68 id. 509; 1889, National Ulster Co. Bank v. Madden, 114 id. 280, 21 N. E. 408; 1896, People v. McLaughlin, 150 id. 365, 44 N. E. 1017 (on the facts this ruling is a mere quibble). Accord, in the Supreme Court: 1868, Philbin v. Patrick, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 284; 1868, Brown v. Jones, 46 Barb. 410; 1868, Meacham v. Pell, 51 id. 65; 1877, Kennedy v. R. Co., 67 id. 182. Contra, 1868, Townsend Mfg. Co. v. Foster, 51 id. 346; 1878, Morrow v. Ostrander, 13 Hun 219, semble.

[2] 1886, Vicksburg R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 7 Sup. 118; 1900, Gurley v. MacLennan, 17 D. C. App. 170, 180.

[3] 1884, Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 243; 1886, State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 15, 12 Pac. 318; 1903, State v. Menard, 110 La. — , 35 So. 360; 1887, Weaver v. Bromley, 65 Mich. 214, 31 N. W. 839; 1898, Stahl v. Duluth, 71 Minn. 341, 74 N. W. 143 (spoken of as "the general rule"; but no authority cited; and see contra, semble, 1872, Chute v. State, 19 Minn. 277); 1890, Friendly v. Lee, 20 Or. 205, 25 Pac. 396; 1900, Susewind v. Lever, 37 id. 365, 61 Pac. 644;

§ 739. Written Copies, as preferred to Oral Recollection. Parallel with the doctrine of the New York Court (ante, § 738), that a present recollection is preferred to a recorded past recollection, and yet looking in precisely the opposite direction, is a doctrine that for some purposes a recorded past recollection is preferred to a present recollection. This question is presented when a witness offers to testify orally to the contents of a document to be proved. Here his testimony is based solely on his present recollection of the document as he perused it at a prior time. But if, instead, he offers a copy examined by him with the original, he virtually offers a written record of his past recollection as it existed instantly upon the perusal of each word. The contract is thus between his past recorded and his present recollection.

There can be no doubt that the former is a more trustworthy source of testimony for the contents of documents whose original is lost or otherwise unavailable. But shall there be a rule of preference, i. e. a rule requiring a written copy to be used, if it can be procured? This question is, by some Courts and for some classes of documents, answered in the affirmative; but the details can best be examined in considering the other rules affecting the use of copies (post, §§ 1265–1275).

c. Rules to secure Adequacy of Past Recollection and Accuracy and Identity of Record.

§ 744. Past Recollection must have been Written down; Exception for Former Oral Identification. It is commonly assumed, as a fundamental condition of using a past recollection, that the thing recollected must have been written down as recollected. The ensuing rules are all corollaries of this assumed axiom.

Yet in theory this is not essential. The tenor of the fact recollected may conceivably be preserved without writing. In practice there is one situation which not only illustrates this theoretical possibility but also demonstrates the wisdom of recognizing it, as an exception to the general rule. That situation is the former oral identification of a person, name, place, or signature whose identity is now forgotten. The fact recollected being a simple one, it suffices if the witness now knows that he did once orally verify it, even if he did not then preserve in writing the circumstance. The typical illustration is that of the identification of an accused person at the time of arrest:

1847, Lefroy, B., in R. v. Burke, 2 Cox Cr. 295 (the witness could not certainly identify the accused as K., one of the robbers, but said that he had identified a man positively at the police-station, and "at the time he was sure it was the right man"; witnesses were then allowed to prove that the accused was the same person formerly identified by the witness): "I remember a case in England in which that kind of assistance was given; a man had shorn off his whiskers, and evidence was allowed to be given of his being the man whom the witness had identified. I acted in the same way in several cases three years ago at Nenagh, having first consulted with my brother judge upon the subject. It is simply an imperfect identification of the prisoner." [1]

1901, Coxe v. Milbrath, 110 Wis. 499, 86 N. W. 174 (New York doctrine adopted; no precedents cited).

[1] Accord: 1778, Captain Baillie's Case, 21 How. St. Tr. 319 ("I desire to know whether you heard any such words as those come out o

§ 745. (1) Recollection must have been fairly Fresh when Recorded. In order that the past recollection may be one worth trusting, it must have been sufficiently fresh and vivid to be probably accurate. When a present recollection is used, it may be sufficient (as noticed ante, § 726) to admit an "impression," or a "belief"; the witness tries to give "the best of his recollection," and the tribunal may well take what it can get, and not exclude it for want of more that is unattainable. But where the witness goes back to a past recollection, which can less easily be tested by cross-examination, he may properly be asked for something more decided, — something of a quality satisfactory in itself and not merely the best available. This quality the law has attempted to define, and even to test by an arbitrary rule. There is found, first, a general principle that the recollection, when recorded, should have been fairly fresh, — each instance being dealt with on its own circumstances; and, secondly, there is, more commonly, an arbitrary test defining the recollection as one recorded at or near the time of the events.

(1) That the first is the preferable form for the law need hardly be argued; it exemplifies the excellent policy of leaving the law flexible and rational and not chilling it into rules more or less arbitrary:

1795, L. J. Clerk (for the minority) in Kinloch's Case, 25 How. St. Tr. 937: "It is admitted . . . that a witness may make use of notes taken at the time the fact happened. Now where is the difference though they are ex post facto, if he is ready to swear that he took them down with a good recollection?"

1880, Allen, J., in Chamberlin v. Ossipee, 60 N. H. 212 (admitting a memorandum "made at a time when the facts written down were fresh in the mind of the witness and known by him to be as recorded"): "The question of the sufficient accuracy of the memorandum, depending upon its nearness or remoteness in time to the date of the facts written there, was one of fact for the referees."

1881, Elbert, J., in Lawson v. Glass, 6 Colo. 134: "Much must be left in such a case to the judgment of the nisi prius Court, who sees the witness and hears him testify; and the witness having testified that he remembered the items of labor when he wrote them down, the lapse of time was [in this case] not such, considering the nature of the account, as to forbid the Court in the exercise of its discretion allowing the witness to use the account to refresh his memory."[1]

(2) But the common, though less proper, rule is that the recollection recorded must have been "at or near the time" of the events in question. This phrasing has been generally used, even where it was not required for the deci-

my mouth? . . ." "I certainly did not; it is now a great while since, [so] that I should not depend upon my memory; but your lordship did call upon me at the next general court and then I said there were no such words"); 1853, R. v. Blackburn, 6 Cox Cr. 338, Talfourd, J. (like R. v. Burke, supra); 1826, Jackson v. Thompson, 6 Cow. 178, 179 (an aged will-witness, not able to see to read, could not identify the will in Court, but had formerly seen it elsewhere and "then read and recognized his signature as genuine"). Contra: 1903, State v. Houghton, — Or. —, 71 Pac. 983 (like R. v. Burke, excluded). Compare the doctrine of corroboration by similar statements (post, § 1130), which might sometimes be availed of in such a situation. Compare also § 751, post.

[1] Accord: 1834, Burton v. Plummer, 2 A. & E. 341 (L. C. J. Denman phrased the test, "when the transaction could not but be fresh in his memory, so that he must have been able to verify the correctness of his entry"); Cal. C. C. P. § 2047 ("at the time when the fact occurred, or immediately thereafter, or at any other time when the fact was fresh in his memory"); 1884, Paige v. Carter, 64 Cal. 489, 2 Pac. 260 ("at any time when the fact was fresh in his memory"); so also the Codes cited ante, § 736.

sion of the case.[3] Two things must be noted, however, about this rule: (a) T recollection must in fact have been fresh (i. e. adequate), even though not "near the time";[3] (b) the phrases "near the time" or "shortly afterward really furnish no accurate test, and in their application the probable freshn of the recollection must after all be the ultimate test. It may be added th In some rulings the language mentions both the first and the second tests the alternative.[4] In most rulings, the decision turns upon the circumstan of the particular case.[5]

§ 746. (2) Accuracy of Record; General Principle. It has already be noted (ante, § 734) that, so far as adequacy of Recollection is concerned, is enough to require that at the time of making the record the Rec lection should have been fresh, i. e. the event recent. But, having gain this assurance that the Recollection was adequate, it remains still for t law to make sure of certain other things which (in strictness) depend the element of correct Narration or Communication (post, § 766). In t first place, it must make sure that this Recollection was accurately represent in the record or memorandum then made; here several situations prese themselves for solution. Next, it must make sure that the statement n offered as testimony by the witness is in fact identical in tenor with t record or memorandum formerly made; here, again, several different sit tions arise. Finally, it has to consider the testimonial status of the reco when thus used.

For the first of these steps — that of making sure that the record or men

[2] 1825, Jones v. Stroud, 2 C. & P. 196 ("near the time"); 1879, Achlen's Ex'r v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 498 ("at or about the time"); 1845, Williams v. Kelsey, 6 Ga. 374 ("at the time"); 1870, Chicago R. Co. v. Adler, 56 Ill. 344 ("noted at the time"); 1826, Bullard v. Wilson, 5 Mart. N. s. La. 196; 1886, Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 556 ("at the time or about the time of the occurrence"); 1867, Morrison v. Chapin, 13 All. 72 ("contemporaneously"); 1849, Seavy v. Dearborn, 19 N. H. 357 ("at the time"); 1855, Webster v. Clark, 30 id. 253 ("at the time or immediately after the occurrence . . . if the witness . . . would have sworn to them from recollection a short time afterwards"); 1837, Merrill v. R. Co., 16 Wend. 595 ("immediately after they were set down"); 1857, Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 N. Y. 485 ("at the time or almost immediately afterwards"); 1853, Russell v. R. Co., 17 id. 134 ("at or about the time"); 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 id. 592 ("at the time or soon after"); 1880, Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444 ("contemporary"); 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426 ("contemporary").

[3] So the following phrases: 1809, Burrough v. Martin, 2 Camp. 112 ("while the occurrences were recent, and fresh in his recollection"); 1884, Maxwell v. Wilkinson, 113 U. S. 653, 5 Sup. 691 ("at or shortly after the time of the transaction and while it must have been fresh in his memory").

[4] 1864, Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. L. 213 ("at the time of the transaction, or shor afterwards, when the facts were fresh in recollection"). In Chamberlain v. Sands, Me. 465 (1847) the broad test was used, "fa as known to him at the time."

[5] 1839, Horne v. Mackenzie, 6 Cl. & F. 6 (recorded two days before trial, admitted); 18 R. v. Philpotts, 5 Cox Cr. 329 (recorded "alm immediately," admitted); 1852, Anderson Whalley, 3 C. & K. 54, Talfourd, J. (a log-ent a week after the events, while they were fresh his mind, admitted); 1864, Fraser v. Fraser, U. C. C. P. 70 (made the same day, admitte 1857, Auld v. Walton, 12 La. An. 137 (made election officers the day after the election, mitted); 1859, Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. Riley, 15 Md. 54 (made 5 months after, cluded); 1882, Swartz v. Chickering, 58 290 (made 16 months after, excluded); 18 Watson v. Walker, 23 N. H. 496 (made 3 ye after, excluded); 1896, Jones v. State, 54 Oh. 42 N. E. 699 (made a few months before t trial and many years after the event, excluded 1815, O'Neale v. Walton, 1 Rich. 234 (cluded); 1852, Ballard v. Ballard, 5 bl. 4 (made 2 weeks later, excluded); 1893, Bates Preble, 151 U. S. 154, 14 Sup. 277 (rejecti memoranda made at a time unknown); 18 Pinney v. Andrus, 41 Vt. 648 (made just bef trial, admitted).

randum, when made, represented the Recollection of the time with fair accuracy —, the requirements of principle may be summed up thus: (a) The witness must be able now to guarantee that the record accurately represented his knowledge and recollection at the time of making. (b) But, this testimonial guarantee of accuracy being all that is needed, it will therefore be generally immaterial that the witness was not the person actually writing or printing the record, provided the witness can give this guarantee; (c) except that in particular instances the circumstance that another person had prepared the record may justify the Court in doubting the witness' guarantee and rejecting the record. These various details may now be examined.

§ 747. Same: (a) Witness must Guarantee Accuracy. The witness must be able now to guarantee that the record accurately represented his knowledge and recollection at the time. The usual phrase requires the witness to affirm that he "knew it to be true at the time."[1] It is obvious that the witness' readiness to affirm this may rest on one of two reasons: (1) He may distinctly recollect his state of mind at the time of making or first seeing the record and may thus now remember that he then passed judgment upon and knew the record's accuracy. Or (2) he may now actually recollect nothing of the occasion of making the record and of his then state of mind; nevertheless he may know, from his general practice in making such records, or from other indications on the paper, that he must have passed judgment upon and known the correctness of the record; here he none the less knows that he did know the record to be correct, although he has no present recollection of the specific state of mind.

(1) As to the former of these two ways of verifying the record, no difficulty arises.[2] If the witness can say, "I distinctly remember that when I made or saw this memorandum, about the time of the events, I was then conscious of its correctness," his verification is satisfactory. (2) But if he relies, not on a present recollection of his past state of mind, but on other indications, such as a habit, a course of business, a check-mark on the margin, or merely the genuineness of his handwriting, then the certainty is of a lower quality, though still satisfactory for most practical purposes. In general, it is conceded that when the witness' certainty rests on his usual habit or course of business in making memoranda or records, it is sufficient.[3]

[1] 1879, Acklen's Ex'rs v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 499 ("knew its contents and knew them to be true"); 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cassibery, 109 id. 697, 19 So. 900; Kling v. Tunstall, 109 id. 608, 19 So. 907; 1860, Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 572; 1880, Misner v. Darling, 44 Mich. 439, 7 N. W. 77; 1903, Titus v. Gunn, — N. J. L. —, 55 Atl. 735; 1858, Russell v. R. Co., 17 N. Y. 134 ("knew it to be correct when it was made"); 1875, Gilchrist v. Assoc., 59 id. 499; 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 id. 592 ("which he intended to make correctly and which he believes to be correct"); 1871, Insurance Co. v. Weides, 14 Wall. 379 ("at the time knew it was correct"); 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426 ("able to swear that it is correct, . . . because of his confidence in the correctness of his memorandum"). These are merely illustrations of the differing phraseology; nearly every decision mentions the requirement. For English cases, see post, note 5.

The witness must of course have had personal knowledge of the facts: post, note 8.

[2] Except, perhaps, in Massachusetts and Delaware; see note 6, post.

[3] 1810, R. v. Benson, 2 Camp. 508 (a master in chancery testified to having sworn the defendant to an answer, not by actual recollection, but because "unless on very particular occasions, he is always present when answers are sworn"); 1879, Acklen v. Hick-

Other peculiar circumstances, specially intended or calculated to indica correctness, may be satisfactory.[4] Is it enough that the witness (as is usu with attesting witnesses to a document) merely recognizes his handwriting an knows that he would not have written or signed without believing the reco to be correct? Here the witness is really calling to his aid, not his specif business custom, but his general moral attitude; but, as a rule, the indicatio should be and is treated as sufficient.[5]

It is possibly the rule in Massachusetts that only regular entries, n mere casual memoranda, can be used, — apparently on the notion tha this regularity is the only satisfactory guarantee of correctness.[6] Bu

man, 63 Ala. 494; 1886, Hancock v. Kelly, 81 id. 378, 2 So. 281; 1897, Howard v. R. Co., 11 D. C. App. 300, 309 (passenger agent, allowed to testify to the contents of a lost round-trip ticket from a single-trip ticket of the same form-number, after testifying that the form was known by him to be identical); 1849, Williams v. Kelsey, 6 Ga. 374 ("uniform practice to make the entries truly . . . and farther that he has no doubt from such practice that the entry is correct"); 1895, Leonard v. Mixon, 96 id. 239, 23 S. E. 80 (habit of a collector in notifying of claims); and cases cited infra. A notary's practice in sending out only correct copies of protested documents, or in recording only the correct time, etc., of the protest, is always taken as sufficient: 1878, Arnett v. Griffin, 60 Ga. 348; 1864, Morris v. Sargent, 18 la. 95; 1871, Borland v. Walrath, 33 id. 132; 1849, Seavy v. Dearborn, 19 N. H. 357; 1855, Webster v. Clark, 30 id. 253; 1810, Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns. 375; 1829, Hart v. Wilson, 2 Wend. 515; 1854, Cole v. Jessup, 10 N. Y. 96; 1846, Bank v. Cowan, 7 Humph. 70; and cases passim infra; compare the following statute: N. J. Gen. St. 1896, Prom. Notes, § 12 (notary or justice may refer to his record of protest "for his own satisfaction"). Similar customs in banks have been held sufficient: 1842, New Haven Bank v. Mitchell, 15 Conn. 224; 1848, Bell v. Hagerstown Bank, 7 Gill 226; 1887, Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 Mo. 525, 6 S. W. 253. Examples of this use of stenographer's minutes and of ordinary account-books will be found, ante, § 736, and post, passim. Compare also the admission of the notary's or clerk's habit or practice as independent circumstantial evidence (ante, § 93), and also of habit in general as circumstantial evidence (ante, §§ 94–99).

In Maryland the propriety of using this kind of knowledge has been denied in two cases: 1832, Flack v. Green, 3 G. & J. 474; 1837, Pocock v. Hendricks, 8 id. 426; but there are instances of its being sanctioned: 1848, Bell v. Bank, 7 Gill 226 (bank notices); 1833, Owings v. Low, 5 G. & J. 134 (sales-book). The similar denial in U. S. v. Watkins, 3 Cr. C. C. 441, 566 (1829), is equally unsound.

[4] 1835, Wheeler v. Hatch, 12 Me. 389 (sundry circumstances); 1887, Owens v. State, 67 Md. 307, 10 Atl. 210, 302 (a check placed at each item); 1885, Davie v. Terrill, 63 Tex. 1 (sundry circumstances).

[5] 1817, Pearson v. Wightman, 1 Mills Cons Ct. 344 ("I hold it not to be necessary that subscribing witness should recollect the tim and occasion when he subscribed the instrume as a witness. It is enough if he recognize hi handwriting and is perfectly assured in his ow mind that he never subscribed an instrument a a witness without having seen it executed o acknowledged as the nature of the act requires"). Recognition of the handwriting and consequen certainty of accuracy was so treated as follows 1828, Maugham v. Hubbard, 2 M. & Ryl. 5 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; 1864 Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. C. L. 213, pe Hayes, J.; 1845, Graham v. Lockhart, 8 Ala. 9 22; 1815, Allen v. Trimble, 4 Bibb 21; 1824 Brown v. Anderson, 1 T. B. M. 198; 1859 Martin v. Good, 14 Md. 398; 1857, Crittende v. Rogers, 8 Gray 452; 1840, Haven v. Wen dell, 11 N. H. 112; 1837, Clute v. Small, 1 Wend. 237, semble; 1808, Pigott v. Holloway 1 Binn. 436, 442 (certainty of correctness of at testation held sufficient on the facts); 1831 Collins v. Lemasters, 2 Bail. 141, 144; 1855 Verdier v. Verdier, 8 Rich. 135, 141 (that h would not have signed the will without a re quest, sufficient). Contra, 1860, Parsons v. Ins Co., 16 Gray 463; but this is perhaps a resul of the Massachusetts doctrine noticed infra.

For the doctrine that proof of an absent wit ness' signature is evidence of all the requisite of execution, see post, § 1511.

[6] The question was expressly reserved i Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 558 (1836). It i sufficient to notice that this regularity was ap parently treated as requisite in some cases 1858, Perkins v. Ins. Co., 10 Gray 323; 1882 Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352; but in other as not requisite: 1838, Alvord v. Collin, 20 Pick 418, 430; 1885, Smith v. Johns, 3 Gray 517 1857, Crittenden v. Rogers, 8 id. 452; 1860 Parsons v. Ins. Co., 16 id. 463; 1866, Dugar v. Mahoney, 11 All. 572; 1869, Adams v. Cou illiard, 102 Mass. 173; 1872, Cobb v. Boston 109 id. 444.

In Delaware a somewhat similar principl was laid down in Redden v. Spruce, 4 Harring 215 (1845), admitting the use of "inventorie and schedules, precise dates, particular words and other matters," but not beyond this.

this limitation is absolutely without ground, either of principle or of policy.[7]

It may be added that the witness must of course have had personal knowledge of the facts (ante, § 657) in the first instance; he cannot guarantee the correctness of the paper as a record of facts which he himself never observed.[8]

§ 748. Same: (b) Witness need not himself be the Writer. But, this testimonial guarantee of accuracy being all that is needed, it is generally immaterial whether the witness was or was not the person who actually wrote or printed the record. If the witness, having once seen it and found it to be correct, can thus guarantee the accuracy of the record, all that is essential is secured. It may have been manually prepared by another; but from the moment when the witness saw it and passed judgment upon its correctness, it became for him a correct record. As the mere fact of his writing it would count for nothing in itself, so the mere fact of his not having been the writer is immaterial:

1800, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in Burrough v. Martin, 2 Camp. 112 (the witness used a log-book; he had not made the entries himself, but he had examined them while the events were recent and had found them accurate): "If the witness looked at the log-book from time to time, while the occurrences mentioned were recent, and fresh in his memory, it is as good as if he had written the whole with his own hand."

1864, O'Brien, J., in Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. C. L. 213 (the witness was using a copy made by K., examined and found accurate by the witness): "[The use of memo-

[7] In Massachusetts the usage appeared historically as a development from the hearsay exception of regular entries (Shove v. Wiley, supra), — a peculiar local line of thought to which alone the above limitation, if it there exists, is due. The heresy was expressly repudiated in Guy v. Mead, 22 N. Y. 462 (1860), by Denio, J.; and it is unfortunate that in Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 7 Sup. 172 (1886), it should have been elevated to the dignity of a doubtful question; it has also been apparently followed in Master v. Marsh, 19 Nebr. 458, 466, 27 N. W. 438 (1886; bastardy; to prove the date of delivery of wheat, a book-keeper of V. was offered, who testified to an entry of a delivery as to which he had no present recollection; the testimony was excluded on the theory that party's account-books alone were admissible; no acquaintance with the present subject appears); and in Third Nat'l Bank v. Owen, 101 Mo. 585, 14 S. W. 632 (1890), there is language looking towards the limitation in question as proper. The following cases negative this heresy: Mandeville v. Reynolds, 68 N. Y. 528, 537 (letters of an attorney stating the contents of a lost judgment roll, and known by him at the time to be correct, admissible); 1899, Dunlap v. Hopkins, 37 C. C. A. 52, 95 Fed. 231 (letter to a friend).

[8] 1892, Bolling v. Fannin, 97 Ala. 619, 621 (cashier's entry usable by him only to prove cash received, not facts of a sale by B. producing the cash); 1896, Norwalk v. Ireland, 68 Conn. 1, 35 Atl. 807 (the witness must have had personal knowledge); 1895, Orr v. W. & C. Co., 97 Ga. 241, 22 S. E. 937 (the witness cannot adopt a book of entries of whose correctness he knew nothing); 1901, Phenix Ins. Co. v. Hart, 112 id. 765, 38 S. E. 67 (list of articles checked by H. and X., H. alone testifying but not being able to distinguish his marks from X., excluded); 1903, Lenney v. Finley, — id. —, 45 S. E. 317 ("he should at some time have had personal knowledge of the correctness of the memoranda"); 1897, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Osborn, 58 Kan. 768, 51 Pac. 286 (a joint memorandum made by a number of persons who had investigated the destruction by a fire to crops; use of it held improper so far as any one of them adopted the matters known only to others); 1898, Stewart v. Morris, 32 C. C. A. 7, 88 Fed. 461 (merely finding the facts recorded on a memorandum, held insufficient, by the law of Illinois); 1896, Pingree v. Johnson, 69 Vt. 225, 39 Atl. 202 (memorandum by witness' wife, not known by him as correct, excluded). Compare the cases cited post, § 751. Of course where a clerk of court produces depositions which witnesses have signed before him, and he proceeds to read them, this is not a case of using his past recollection for the facts of the testimony; the paper is the witness' statement, not the clerk's, and the clerk has merely authenticated it; he reads it just as counsel would read it, i. e. as A's statement in writing, and not as an adopted memorandum of his own; this the Court had to point out in Stephens v. People, 19 N. Y. 573.

randa made by the witness himself] has been extended to the case of entries which, th not in the witness' handwriting, were either made in his presence and read by him a time of the transaction, or were read and examined by him shortly afterwards when facts were fresh in his recollection and when he was enabled to ascertain that the stated in the entry were true."

1860, Le Grand, C. J., in Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 573: "What was supposed t the ancient rule has been relaxed by more recent decisions; and now it is held to be necessary that the memorandum should have been made by the witness, but the witness having then seen it and recognized it as containing the truth, of which still convinced at the time of the trial, he may be examined in regard to it."[1]

[1] Accord: Eng.: 1795, Digby v. Stedman, 1 Esp. 328 (if "the witness saw it soon after it was made, and the entry corresponded with what he had himself then observed, such was tantamount to an entry made by himself"); 1801, Jacob v. Lindsay, 1 East 460 (the plaintiffs had a book containing entries of sales to defendant; a clerk who had not made either the sales or the entries went to the defendant and got his admission for each sale entered; the clerk was then allowed to use the book, in spite of defendant's objection that "the entries were not made by the witness himself"); 1834, Burton v. Plummer, 2 A. & E. 341 (the witness was allowed to use a copy, made by the plaintiff, of entries in a book kept by the witness, the copying having been done in the presence of the latter, who checked off the items at the time as correctly copied); 1844, Topham v. McGregor, 1 C. & K. 320 (the witness used a newspaper article, the original of which he had written); 1851, R. v. Philpotts, 5 Cox Cr. 329 (a solicitor, giving a deceased witness' testimony, used notes made by his counsel as the witness stood by and read over by him soon afterwards); 1852, Anderson v. Whalley, 3 C. & K. 54 (like Burrough v. Martin, supra); 1876, R. v. Langton, L. R. 2 Q. B. D. 296 (the witness was pay-clerk and paid out wages according to days and amounts read off by L. from a book made up by a third person from L.'s report; the witness, having seen the entries at the time of L.'s reading off, was allowed to use them as representing the amounts paid out); Ala.: 1892, Thompson v. State, 99 Ala. 173, 175, 13 So. 753 (testimony before a grand jury); 1897, Torrey v. Burney, 113 id. 496, 21 So. 348 (a bill of exceptions, dictated partly by the witness, partly by his associate counsel, but all afterwards gone over by the witness, admitted); 1899, Anderson v. English, 121 id. 272, 25 So. 748 (memorandum of entries made by several persons, and known by each to be correct, used by each); Cal.: C. C. P. 1872, § 2047 ("written by himself or under his direction"; this is too narrow, and is not always observed in the rulings); 1884, Paige v. Carter, 64 Cal. 489, 2 Pac. 260; 1896, McGowan v. McDonald, 111 id. 57, 43 Pac. 418 (a bank pass-book, with entries of deposits made by the teller and entries of drafts made by the bank bookkeeper; the customer allowed to use it because he had inspected the entries at the time and known that they were correct); 1898, Grant v. Dreyfus, — id. —, 52 Pac. 1074, semble (entries made under the witness' direction by his son, used); Conn.: 1895, Curtis v. Bradley, 65 Conn. 99, 31 591; Kan.: 1885, Solomon R. Co. v. Jone Kan. 444, 8 Pac. 730; 1888, Phenix Ins. v. Sullivan, 39 id. 451, 18 Pac. 528 (an ney who heard the deceased witness' testi and assisted in preparing the bill of e tions, which embodied it); Me.: 1847, C berlain v. Sands, 27 Me. 458, 465 (a drawn up by another person more than 20 after the events, but then recognized by witness, having a fresh recollection of the ev to be correct); Md.: 1860, Green v. Caull Md. 556 (in effect overruling Lewis v. Kra 3 id. 287); 1887, Owens v. State, 67 id. 10 Atl. 210, 302 (C. kept the poll-book election, and checked off all voters; during absence, F. and H. kept the book, H. chec and F. watching the process; C. and F., out H., were allowed to testify by the bo 1893, Billingslea v. Smith, 77 id. 504, 514 Atl. 1077; Mich.: 1899, Union Cent. L. I v. Smith, 119 Mich. 171, 77 N. W. 706 (i ance books); Nebr.: 1896, Kearney v. The son, 48 Nebr. 74, 66 N. W. 996 (ar destroyed by a flood; the paper known a time to be correct, though made by anot N. H.: 1855, Webster v. Clark, 30 N. H. 1856, Pillsbury v. Locke, 33 id. 96 (the wi noted amounts on a slate, and his wife o daughter copied these into a book, which witness examined and verified); N. Y.: Merrill v. R. Co., 16 Wend. 595, semble; Clark v. Bank, 164 N. Y. 498, 58 N. E. 659 tries made by bookkeeper of items furnishe the witness, and seen two days later by the wi and then known to be correct, admitted); N 1883, State v. Lyon, 89 N. C. 568 (a newsp copy of a libel); Or.: 1899, Oyler v. Da 36 Or. 357, 59 Pac. 474 (typewritten mem dum, known correct by the witness); U 1899, Pacific Coast S. Co. v. Bancroft-Wh Co., 36 C. C. A. 135, 94 Fed. 180; Vt.: Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426 (assessors here tax-lists not made in their own handwriti Va.: 1853, Wormeley's Case, 10 Gratt. 665, semble (a deposition read over to, corrected signed by the witness); 1854, Harrison v. dleton, 11 id. 546 (a diagram of courses distances, made by the plaintiff, but use the witness and verified while making the vey); Wis.: 1869, Riggs v. Weise, 24 Wis (made by the wife); 1896, Hazer v. Strele id. 505, 66 N. W. 720 (made by a clerk i presence); 1901, Bourda v. Jones, 110 id 85 N. W. 671 (inventory of personalty)

Nevertheless, that in particular instances the circumstance that another person had prepared the record may justify the Court in doubting the witness' guarantee and rejecting the record. The very object of the rules is to secure the record's accuracy, and if, though ordinary tests are fulfilled, the Court in the particular circumstances finds the record untrustworthy, the rule should bend to the case:

1845, Butler, J., in O'Neale v. Walton, 1 Rich. L. 234 (about two weeks after a conversation between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff drew up a memorandum of its terms and had it signed by three persons who heard it; one of these, having forgotten the facts, proposed, but was not allowed, to read from the paper): "Here the memorandum was drawn up by one of the parties to the suit, and if not in view of lis mota, it was to perpetuate evidence obtained ex parte and for his own benefit. It was obtained by a prepared and leading examination, the statement of a suspected witness. . . . The facts must be noted at the time they are occurring, by a witness actiug under the self-direction of his own mind snd for the purpose of perpetuating evidence. . . . When third persons, and those who are interested, prepare the memorial, suspicion will assail and justice should repudiate it." [2]

§ 749. (3) Original required, if Available. It remains to make sure that the record which the witness now puts forward as a record of his prior knowledge is in fact the genuine embodimen' of his past recollection. While the witness' guarantee of its accuracy may be accepted, the law may well insist on the production of his guaranteed paper, not merely as verifying the fact of its existence, but also as insuring the correctness of his story, as throwing additional light on his veracity, as affording a means of testing him, and as the best proof of what was really recorded. In short, the original record itself must be used in testifying, if it is procurable. This rule (which merely applies the general priuciple of § 1179, post) is almost universally recognized. If the original is lost or otherwise unavailable, a copy may then be used.[1]

also the cases under § 750, post, in which newspaper copies were used.

Contra: The requirement that the memorandum shall be made hy tbe witness himself is nsnally a loose obiter dictum: 1900, Wellman v. Jones, 124 Ala. 580, 27 So. 416; 1879, Schmidt v. Wambacker, 62 Ga. 323; 1895, Orr v. F. A. W. & C. Co., 97 id. 241, 22 S. E. 937 (where the book was made up by H. from memoranda of L., the witness, who had afterwards checked off the entries as correct); 1898, Evaus v. Murphy, 87 Md. 498, 40 Atl. 109; 1867, Morrison v. Chapin, 97 Mass. 72; 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592. The correct doctrine was stated in tbe following cases: 1853, Coffin v. Vincent, 12 Cush. 98; 1881, Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 66; but witnesses there actually refreshed recollection.

[2] Similar instances are: 1849, Alcock v. Royal Exchange Assurance, 13 Q. B. 292; 1898, Wager L. Co. v. Sullivan L. Co., 120 Ala. 558, 24 So. 949 (memorandum made hy another, and not known to wituess to be correct, excluded); 1892, Hematite M. Co. v. R. Co., 92 Ga. 268, 272, 18 S. E. 24 (memoranda of ahipment made partly by another person and not known to witness to be true, excluded; and because the several entries were indistinguishable, all excluded); 1852, Ballard v. Ballard, 5 Rich. L. 495. Compare also tbe casea cited ante, § 747, where personal knowledge was lacking.

[1] According to tbe ordinary rules of § 1179, post, a copy may be used where the origiual cannot be had · and this condition is usually understood as applying when the Courts demand an original. In the following citations the Courts either expressly affirm or imply this: Eng.: 1756, Tanner v. Taylor, 3 T. R. 754; 1790, Doe v. Perkins, ib. 754 (must be produced "because of the great door which might otherwise be opened to fraud and concealment"); 1825, Jones v. Stroud, 2 C. & P. 196; 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; 1839, Horne v. Mackenzie, 6 Cl. & F. 628 (the original was not produced because consistiug of complicated calculations); 1844, Topham v. McGregor, 1 C. & K. 320 (the original was not produced because lost); 1864, Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. C. L. 213; Can.: 1891, Taylor v. Massey, 20 Ont. 429, 437; Conn.: 1899, Clark v. Holmes, 71 Conn. 749, 43 Atl. 194 (stenographer's nse of transcript of notes of testimony, excluded, the original not being accounted for); Fla.: 1896, Adams v. Board, 37 Fla. 266, 20

It is true that the use of a copy lacks certain advantages; but this defec is no greater than in the ordinary instance of a contract or a deed which can not be produced, nor is the importance of using the original here any greater

§ 750. Same: Copy made and Verified by Another Person. It is obviou that the process of guaranteeing the accuracy of the record (ante, § 746) an that of identifying and producing the record are separable. Since in com mercial practice there is constantly such a separation of these function among different persons, there seems to be no reason why the law should no accept and sanction it. Thus, when a witness makes a memorandum and the guarantees on the stand that it was accurate, the process of proving its term by making and producing a copy of it may often be feasible only with th aid of another person, — as where the original is lost and the only copy wa made, not by the original writer, but by another person. What differenc can it make, if a copy is allowable at all, whether it is verified on the stand by the original maker and witness or by another person? If both take the stand one guaranteeing the accuracy of the original, and the other verifying the correctness of the copy, this procedure seems entirely proper both on principle and of practical necessity. This result the Courts have generally accepted:

1866, State v. Shinborn, 46 N. H. 503: A hired man, as well as M. and his son, le horses and entered their doings on a slate; M. and the son then copied these into a book the book was produced and all three testified to the accuracy of their respective doings Bellows, J., admitting the book: "On proving it to be correctly transferred to the book, the entry stands substantially as if all was done by the same person." [1]

So. 266; 1903, Volusia Co. Bank v. Bigelow, — id. —, 33 So. 704; Ill.: 1884, Clifford v. Drake, 110 Ill. 135 (reporter, using the printed copy of his notes); 1887, Bonnet v. Glatfeldt, 120 id. 166, 11 N. E. 250 (copy from account-books); 1901, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. American Strawboard Co., 190 id. 268, 60 N. E. 518 (certain "stack-sheets" made from temporary memoranda, admitted as originals); Ia.: 1876, State v. Maloy, 44 Ia. 115, semble (stenographic notes; original required); 1880, Case v. Burrows, 54 id. 682, 7 N. W. 130 (same; undecided); Kan.: 1903, Smith v. Scully, 66 Kan. 132, 71 Pac. 249 (official stenographer's report of testimony; stenographic original not required); Ky.: 1899, Moore v. Beale, — Ky. —, 50 S. W. 850 (tally kept on piece of paper, thrown away when soiled, after copy taken; use of copy allowed); Me.: 1860, Stanwood v. McLellan, 48 Me. 475 (copy from account-books); 1900, Pierce v. R. Co., 94 Me. 171, 47 Atl. 144 (memorandum-book made up on the same afternoon from shingle-marks, held sufficient); Md.: 1860, Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 572 (also excludes absolutely a copy of a copy); 1869, Thomas v. Price, 30 id. 484; Mass.: 1836, Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 563; 1881, Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 66, semble; Minn.: 1899, Amor v. Stoeckele, 76 Minn. 180, 78 N. W. 1046 (stenographer's use of transcript of notes of testimony, excluded, the original not being accounted for); Mo.: 1897, Banking House v. Darr, 139 Mo. 660, 41 S. W. 227 (entries excluded because not produced in court); N. H.: 1851, Watson v. Walker, 23 N. H. 477, 496, semble; N. J.: 1795, Ryerson v. Grover, 1 N. J. L. 459; N. Y.: 1857, Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 N. Y. 485; 1864, Marcly v. Shults, 29 id. 346 (copy of a copy); 1871, Downs v. R. Co., 47 id. 87; 1872, McCormick v. R. Co., 49 id. 303 (doubtful language); Oh.: 1869, Mead v. McGraw, 19 Oh. St. 55; N. C.: 1883, State v. Lyon, 89 N. C. 568 (newspaper copy of a libel which the witness had seen); Pa.: 1902, Edwards v. Gimbel, 202 Pa. 30, 51 Atl. 357 (typewritten copy of a memorandum, allowed to be used); S. C.: 1880, Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444; Tenn.: 1823, Rogers v. Burton, Peck 108; 1838, Beets v. State, Meigs 106 (notes of a dying declaration); U. S.: 1869, Insurance Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 677 (an abstract of destroyed inventories); Vt.: 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 420; Va.: 1854, Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 547; 1871, Pidgeon v. Williams, 21 id. 251, 261 (a bank-book seen by the witness at a previous occasion but not brought into court); Wis.: 1902, Nehrling v. Herold Co., 112 Wis. 558, 88 N. W. 614 (copy by witness, made on a sheet, from separate slips now destroyed, received); compare also the cases cited in the ensuing notes.

Notwithstanding the rulings cited above, a copy was held receivable without accounting for the original in the following cases: 1899, Anderson v. English, 121 Ala. 272, 25 So. 748; 1870, Chicago R. Co. v. Adler, 56 Ill. 344; 1875, Brown v. Luehrs, 79 id. 575.

[1] Accord: 1892, Birmingham v. McPoland, 96 Ala. 363, 11 So. 427 (copy by third person;

§ 751. Same: Bookkeeper's Entry of Salesman's Oral Statement; Stenographer's Report of Interpreted Testimony. If a copy by another person of a statement originally written is receivable, why is not a copy receivable of a statement originally oral? The situation is the same as in the preceding instance, except that the salesman, workman, or foreman, instead of handing the bookkeeper or clerk a written statement of the transaction, makes an oral statement, which is then and there copied as before. Here the salesman will on the stand testify that the statement made by him was an accurate embodiment of his recollection; while the bookkeeper will verify the correctness of his entry, — which is none the less in fact a copy, though it reproduces an oral statement. To receive the memorandum supported by the joint testimony of the two is in perfect accord with legal principle, and is certainly demanded by all considerations of mercantile convenience. This result may now be regarded as generally accepted:

1857, Dewey, J., in Harwood v. Mulry, 8 Gray 250 (one person delivered the goods and reported it, and the other made the charge in the books): "It is proper to introduce as witnesses all those persons who are thus connected with the transaction, and whose testimony is necessary to establish those facts which would be required to be proved by a single person."

1886, Andrews, J., in Mayor v. Second Ave. R. Co., 102 N. Y. 572, 7 N. E. 905 (a foreman W. made entries of oral reports by a sub-foreman M. of merchandise delivered; W. and M. both testified):[1] "Business could not be carried on and accounts kept, in many cases, without great inconvenience, unless method of keeping and proving accounts is sanctioned. . . . If the witnesses are believed, there can be but little moral doubt that the book is a true record of the actual fact."[2] usable if verified by him, or if known by the user to be a correct copy); 1901, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. American Strawboard Co., 190 Ill. 268, 60 N. E. 518 ("sheets" made from memoranda of weights of straw, admitted, the weighers verifying their memoranda and the transcribers of the memoranda verifying the correctness of their copying); 1903, Trainor v. German H. S. L. & B. Ass'n, — id. — , 68 N. E. 650 (books kept by M., from entries of payments received by S., held not sufficiently verified by M. and S. on the facts); 1857, White v. Wilkinson, 12 La. An. 360 (nurebssing-clerks and bookkeeper); 1831, Smith v. Sanford, 12 Pick. 140 (party's books; one partner made memoranda of sales, the other entered; both testified); 1831, Holmes v. Marsden, ib. 171, semble (party's books; copies made by a second person, who testified); 1849, Morris v. Briggs, 3 Cush. 343 (party's books; workmen made memoranda, plaintiff entered); 1852, Barker v. Haskell, 9 id. 218 (party's books; slate entries by one partner, copied by the other); 1902, Stephan v. Metzger, — Mo. App. — , 69 S. W. 625 (plaintiff read off an account, and her daughter wrote it down; the original being destroyed, the copy was allowed to be used upon verification by their joint testimony); 1894, Chicago Lumbering Co. v. Hewitt, 12 C. C. A. 129, 64 Fed. 314 (tallies of logs by F., book-entry copies by M.); 1895, The Norma, 55 id. 553, 68 Fed. 509 (foreman and bookkeeper). The contrary doctrine is enforced in Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569 (1884), where L. made memoranda of sums received and the plaintiff copied them; the originals being lost, the joint testimony of L. and the plaintiff was rejected. It is a sufficient criticism of this opinion to say (1) that the fundamental error pervades it that no copy at all could be received, and (2) that the Court which could go as far as it did in Mayor v. Second Ave. R. Co. (post, § 751) could not consistently repeat the ruling in Peck v. Valentine.

The following ruling is correct: 1883, Chicago R. Co. v. Provine, 61 Miss. 288, 292 (entries made by bookkeepers from reports made by other persons not having personal knowledge of the transactions or a duty to do them, excluded).

[1] The Court here applied the further local restriction (ante, § 747) that the original reports must be in the regular course of business or duty.

[2] Accord: 1881, Stettauer v. White, 98 Ill. 77 (shipper and entry-clerk); 1857, White v. Wilkinson, 12 La. An. 360, semble (bookkeeper and salesman); 1845, Littlefield v. Rice, 10 Met. 289 (party's books; plaintiff worked, and his wife made entries as told by him); 1854, Kent v. Garvin, 1 Gray 150 (drayman read off memoranda and clerk entered them); 1887, Miller v. Shay, 145 Mass. 163, 13 N. E. 468 (driver of a cart marked on it the number of loads and afterwards reported it to plaintiff, who entered it); 1877, Shear v. Van Dyke, 10 Hun 529 (one

§ 752. Same: Salesman Deceased or otherwise Unavailable. The iarly difficult situation is that in which the original observer who mad oral or written statement — salesman, shipper, or drayman — is, by reas death or absence, unattainable as a witness. In that case, may the p who copied the statement — the bookkeeper or shipping-clerk — by his mony alone make the use of the record possible? Here it is clear tha original statement of the absent person comes as hearsay — i. e. untest the production of the witness in court for cross-examination, and is the prima facie unreceivable. It must come in, if at all, under the hearsa ception for Regular Entries. The rules for this situation are therefore examined elsewhere (post, §§ 1530, 1555).

§ 753. (4) Record must be Shown to Opponent on Demand, for Inspe and Cross-examination. The fundamental purpose of the rule requiring use of the original is to protect against fraud and to give the oppone opportunity to verify the exact nature of the document and to ascertai value (post, § 1179). Even where a copy is permitted, there is still a ne fairness for the opponent to see the document, in order to prepare to tes witness upon its contents (on the principle of § 1861, post). Thus it necessary implication that the document used, whether an original or a when produced in court, shall be shown to the opponent on his reque inspect and to employ in cross-examination:

1834, Patteson, J., in R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210: "If he could not recolle facts independently of the writing, the original writing ought to have been in co order that the other party might cross-examine; not that such writing is to be mad dence itself, but that the other party is to have the benefit of the witness refreshi memory in every part."

1870, Mullin, J., in Tibbetts v. Sterberg, 66 Barb. 201: "If the witness cannot be pelled to produce it, he might use documents made for him by the party calling hi the accuracy of which he knows nothing. . . . The right of a party to protection a the introduction against him of false, forged, or manufactured evidence, which he permitted to inspect, must not be invaded a hair's breadth."

witness had told another person at the time how many loads of hay were taken in but could not now remember; and the other person then testified to the number thus reported); 1823, Ingraham v. Bockins, 9 S. & R. 285 (delivery-clerk and bookkeeper); 1834, Jones v. Long, 3 Watts 326, semble (same); 1831, Clough v. Little, 3 Rich. 353 (same); 1850, Thomas v. Porter, 4 Strob. Eq. 65 (same); 1894, Chicago Lumbering Co. v. Hewitt, 12 C. C. A. 129, 64 Fed. 314, semble (tallies of logs orally reported, and taken down by a bookkeeper); 1895, The Norma, 55 C. C. A. 553, 68 Fed. 509. Contra: 1901, Snow Hardware Co. v. Loveman, 131 Ala. 221, 31 So. 19 (memorandum by B., at L.'s dictation, of transaction by L., both testifying on the stand, excluded); 1892, Tupper v. International B. & T. Co., 24 N. Sc. 256 (book made by copying from tally boards of lumber delivered, one person making the former, and another the latter, excluded); 1852, Lewis v. Kramer, 3 Md. 286 (notary and clerk). The same situation sented where an interpreter's rendering deceased witness' testimony is presented by ographer's minutes. If both take the stan minutes should be received. This seems sanctioned in the following cases: 1871, Sc v. Harber, 36 Ind. 541; 1880, People v. L 54 Cal. 529; 1880, People v. Ah Yute, 56 i So, too, for any report of words uttered: Green v. Cawthorn, 4 Dev. L. 409 (the issue whether offensive words of the plaintiff ha communicated to the defendant, E. testifie he had told them to the defendant as re to him by M. but now forgot the words, a testified what the words were as he heard from the plaintiff and reported them to 1903, People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 4 Pac. 568 (witness at a former trial permit testify by reference to and reliance upo official transcript of his testimony verified reporter). Compare the cases cited ante, §

The importance of this expedient is well illustrated in the following episode from a celebrated trial:

1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 12th day, Times' Rep. pt. 3, pp. 182–184; the Irish Land League being charged with complicity in outrages and agrarian crime, it became necessary to prove the connection of certain individuals with the League; and the testimony of the constables, bailiffs, etc., was often open to the suspicion of being partisan and even manufactured; among these, one Honan, a magistrates' clerk, had produced a list of names said to have been taken down by him at the time, and the untrustworthiness of his list was exposed in the following way; on direct examination he had been asked: Q. "Have you watched the persons going in to the committee meetings?" A. "Yes." Q. "Are these the names of the members of the committee you have seen?" (holding up a paper). A. "Yes." . . . The witness was then cross-examined by Mr. Lockwood. Q. "When did you take this list of names?" A. "In March, 1884, or April." Q. "But it is written on a piece of paper which contains a communication to you or some other officer, and has the date July, 1885. Does that enable you to fix the date more accurately?" A. "I took it from the names I took in 1884." Q. "I understood you to say you took them down on that piece of paper?" Witness took the paper, looked at it, and said, "It is all right." Mr. Lockwood. "That is satisfactory, no doubt; but it will not do for me." . . . President Hannen. "The paper bears the date July 6, 1885, and the words 'Prospect Hill.' That is in a different handwriting." Mr. Lockwood. "Did you or did you not write that down at the time you say you saw the persons attending the committee?" President Hannen. "On that paper — that very paper?" A. "Yes, my Lord." . . . Mr. Lockwood. "Did you see the words on that paper, 'Complied with July, 1885'? Whose writing is it?" A. "The head constable's." Q. "Do you suggest the head constable wrote that after you wrote the names on the other side in March, 1884?" A. "That is a copy of the names I took down in 1884." Q. "You had forgotten that, had n't you? Now, I am very anxious to see the original document. Where is it?" A. "I have not got it. I knew the names of the committee." Q. "You wrote from your memory?" A. "Yes, I knew the names." Q. "When did you write it, last week?" A. "Oh, no, Sir." Q. "The week before?" A. "No, Sir." Q. "When? Some time in 1885? Some time after July?" A. "Yes." Q. "From memory?" A. "No. When they were going in." Q. "Was the document written by you from memory in July, 1885?" A. "It was written at the time I saw them going in." . . . Q. "You swore to me distinctly that you wrote that in March or April, 1884?" A. "That is a mistake of mine." Q. "Did you write that document at the time you saw the men going into the committee-room?" A. "No; I wrote in pencil and then copied in ink." Q. "Did not you swear to me just now that you wrote it in the street in pen and ink?" A. "It was a mistake of mine." Q. "Another mistake! Have you made any more mistakes in your evidence?" A. "No." Q. "You are sure of that?" A. "Yes."[1]

§ 754. (5) Record goes as Testimony to the Jury. If by verifying and adopting the record of past recollection the witness makes it usable testi-

[1] In the following cases this requirement was recognized: 1794, Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 824 (allowing the witness to paste up the parts sworn to be irrelevant); 1836, Howard v. Canfield, 5 Dowl. Pr. 417; 1848, Beech v. Jones, 5 C. B. 696; Cal. C. C. P. § 2047; and other codes cited ante, § 736; 1903, Volusia Co. Bank v. Bigelow, — Fla. — , 33 So. 704; 1870, McKivitt v. Cone, 30 Ia. 457; 1875, Adae v. Zangs, 41 id. 536; 1836, Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 563; 1875, Rayuor v. Norton, 31 Mich. 209; 1872, Chute v. State, 19 Minn. 277; 1846, Hall v. Ray, 18 N. H. 126; 1884, Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569; 1823, Nicholson v. Withers, 2 McCord 429; 1823, Rogers v. Burton, Peck 108; 1838, Beeta v. State, Meigs 106; 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426; 1854, Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 547.

The limits to the inspection by the opponent of a series of such entries and their use in cross-examination must depend on the facts of each case; in general the whole of the material portion can be used: 1826, Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 332; 1860, Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 578; and cases cited post, § 2116.

Compare the general rule for showing to the opponent any document about to be offered (post, § 1861).

monially, and if by this verification alone can it become so usable, it follows that the record thus adopted becomes to that extent the embodiment of the witness' testimony. Thus, (a) the record, verified and adopted, becomes a present evidentiary statement of the witness; (b) and as such it may be handed or shown to the jury by the party offering it.

The first part of this proposition deals with the theoretical status of the memorandum; nevertheless, as the proper usage noted by the second part depends on the theory adopted, it is not a matter of mere words or phrases. The language of the Courts varies, but is clear as to the principle:[1]

1871, Per Curiam, in Moots v. State, 21 Oh. St. 653: "The entry in the book and the oath of the witness supplement each other. The book was really a part of the oath, and therefore admissible with it in evidence."

1879, Earl, J., in Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592: "After the witness has testified, the memorandum which he has used may be put in evidence, — not as proving anything of itself, but as a detailed statement of the items testified to by the witness. The manner in which the memorandum in such a case may be used is very much in the discretion of the trial judge."

1882, Cooley, J., in Mason v. Phelps, 48 Mich. 126, 11 N. W. 413, 837: "After she had testified that she knew it to be correct, she might have read the entries or repeated them as her evidence. Showing the book was no more than this."

1886, Smith, C. J., in Bryan v. Moring, 94 N. C. 687: "The memorandum thus sup-

[1] In the following cases, some speak merely of the theoretical aspect; others expressly permit the handing to the jury; all accept in effect the general proposition above: Eng.: 1801, Jacob v. Lindsay, 1 East 46; 1826, Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 332; 1896, Birchall v. Bullongh, 1 Q. B. 325 (a note used as a record of past recollection as to borrowing money; allowable, although itself inadmissible because unstamped); Ala.: 1860, Mims v. Sturtevant, 36 Ala. 630 ("a part of his evidence"); 1879, Acklen's Ex'r v. Hickman, 63 id. 498; Ill.: 1859, Mineral Point R. Co. v. Keep, 22 Ill. 20; Ia.: 1897, State v. Brady, 95 Ia. 410, 69 N. W. 290 ("Such documents are admissible in evidence, and the Court will not go through the useless ceremony of having the witness read a document relating to a fact of which he had no present recollection, etc."; noting the conflict of earlier rulings); Kan.: 1885, Solomon R. Co. v. Jones, 34 Kan. 443, 8 Pac. 730; 1897, Wright v. Wright, 58 id. 525, 50 Pac. 444 ("The two [witness and memorandum] are the equivalent of a present positive statement on the witness affirming the truth of the contents of the memorandum"); 1900, Garden City v. Heller, 61 id. 767, 60 Pac. 1060; Me.: 1885, State v. Lynde, 77 Me. 561, 1 Atl. 687 (an examined or sworn copy becomes evidence); Mass.: 1872, Cobb v. Boston, 109 Mass. 444 (to be read in the discretion of the Court; not "of itself evidence"); Mich.: 1882, Mason v. Phelps, 48 Mich. 126, 11 N. W. 413, 837; Miss.: 1902, Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Sol Fried Co., 81 Miss. 314, 33 So. 74; N. H.: 1840, Haven v. Wendell, 11 N. H. 112; 1869, Kelsea v. Fletcher, 48 id. 282 ("evidence to go to the jury"); 1874, Watts v. Sawyer, 55 id. 40; 1883, Pinkham v. Benton, 62 id. 687; N. Y.: 1857, Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 N. Y. 485 ("read to the jury in connection with the oral testimony"); 1858, Russell v. R. Co., 17 id. 134 ("in connection with and auxiliary to the oral testimony"); 1864, Marcly v. Shults, 29 id. 346 ("evidence of the fact"); 1872, McCormick v. R. Co., 49 id. 303; 1876, Flood v. Mitchell, 68 id. 509; 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 id. 592 ("may be put in evidence, not as proving anything of itself, but as a detailed statement of the items testified to by the witness"); 1884, Peck v. Valentine, 94 id. 569 ("read in evidence in connection with and as auxiliary to his testimony"); 1889, National Ulster Co. Bank v. Madden, 114 id. 280, 21 N. E. 408 ("read in evidence"); N. C.: 1886, Bryan v. Moring, 94 N. C. 687; Pa.: 1829, Farmers' M. Bank v. Bornef, 1 Rawle 152; S. C.: 1817, Haig v. Newton, 1 Milla Const. 423; 1818, Columbia v. Harrison, 2 id. 212; S. D. 1898, Mt. Terry M. Co. v. White, 10 S. D. 620, 74 N. W. 1060 (opponent allowed to put it in on cross-examination); U. S.: 1869, Insurance Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 677 ("not evidence per se," but satisfactory when verified); 1871, Insurance Co. v. Weides, 14 id. 379; 1878, Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 695 ("put in evidence"); 1899, Dunlap v. Hopkins, 37 C. C. A. 52, 95 Fed. 231; Vt.: 1862, Lapham v. Kelly, 35 Vt. 198; 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 id. 426; 1892, Bates v. Sabin, 64 id. 511, 520, 24 Atl. 1013; 1892, Williams v. Wager, ib. 326, 328, 336, 24 Atl. 765 (same; but not as "independent evidence"); Va.: 1854, Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gratt. 547 ("being a part of the evidence").

ported and identified becomes part of the testimony of the witness, just as if without it the witness had orally repeated the words from memory."

A few decisions declare that the writing is not "independent evidence" or "in itself evidence";[2] but this is to be construed as meaning merely — what no one could deny — that without being verified and adopted (ante, § 747) it is without standing. A few others expressly refuse to allow it to be "read in evidence"[3] or "given in evidence."[4] But these must be regarded as unsound in principle.[5]

III. Present Recollection Revived.

§ 758. General Principle: Any Writing may be used to Stimulate and Revive a Recollection. Since the Narration or Communication should represent actual Recollection (post, § 766), it becomes necessary to forbid the use of various artificial written aids which may be misused so as to put into the witness' mouth a story which is in effect fictitious and corresponds to no actual Recollection.[1] Under pretext of stimulating the witness' recollection, if an actual present recollection results, of the quality sufficient for testimony (ante, § 726), the process and the result are legitimate. But these expedients for stimulating recollection may be so misused that the witness puts before the Court what purports to be but is not in fact his recollection and knowledge. Such a result cannot be accepted as testimony; and it is to

[2] 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; 1900, Baird Lumber Co. v. Devlin, 124 Ala. 215, 27 So. 425; 1886, Lipscomb v. Lyon, 19 Nebr. 521, 27 N. W. 731; 1893, Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 154, 14 Sup. 297; 1883, Vinal v. Gilman, 21 W. Va. 309. If such a verification is lacking, the paper of course cannot be handed in or used: 1893, Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 391, 399, 34 Pac. 863; 1896, Imhoff v. Richards, 48 Nebr. 590, 67 N. W. 483 (excluded because not offered as a part of any one's testimony).

[3] 1897, Republic v. Toyotaro, 11 How. 195; 1883, Rounds v. State, 57 Wis. 52, 14 N. W. 865.

[4] 1857, People v. Elyea, 14 Cal. 144; 1889, Hoffman v. R. Co., 40 Minn. 60, 41 N. W. 301.

[5] In Massachusetts both theory and practice seem unsettled: 1857, Crittenden v. Rogers, 8 Gray 452; 1866, Dugan v. Mahoney, 11 All. 572; 1869, Adams v. Coulliard, 102 Mass. 173; 1875, Field v. Thompson, 119 id. 151; 1882, Costello v. Crowell, 133 id. 352. So too in Iowa and a few other jurisdictions: Ia.: 1875, Adae v. Zangs, 41 Ia. 536; 1897, State v. Brady, Ia., cited supra; 1897, Tyler v. R. Co., 102 id. 632, 71 N. W. 536 (an inspection-book of engines used by one of the entrants, as to his entries; but whether it could be "offered in evidence," not decided, apparently upon some confusion with the Hearsay exception, post, § 1517; Taylor v. R. Co., 80 id. 435, doubted); Ark.: 1896, Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Amusement Co., 63 Ark. 187, 37 S. W. 959 (must be read, and not put in as evidence); Pa.: 1866, Selover v. Rexford, 52 Pa. 308; U. S.: 1893, Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 149, 155, 14 Sup. 277 (witness verified her memorandum-book, but did not use it for actual refreshment, and it was laid before the jury; Brown, J., making no distinction between past and present recollection, concedes that a party's own account-books may be "admitted in evidence," but doubts whether "memoranda made by a witness contemporaneously" are admissible, "elementary writers and courts being about equally divided upon the subject"; and declines to decide the question; it may be said, that if this refers to the subsidiary question whether the memoranda are a part of the witness' testimony, and thus evidence, the whole discussion is misleading; while if it is meant to say that Courts are equally divided as to the propriety of the use of past recollection, this is an error; in general, the opinion fails to consider any of the usual distinctions of the subject, and is without weight); 1898, Stewart v. Morris, 32 C. C. A. 203, 89 Fed. 290 (obscure). In Payne v. Ibbotson, 27 L. J. Excb. 341 (1858), and Waters v. Waters, 35 Md. 539 (1872), the use of the writings in evidence was denied apparently for other reasons. In Connecticut the sound doctrine is accepted, but on the incorrect fiction that "the paper is the witness'": 1895, Curtis v. Bradley, 65 Conn. 99, 31 Atl. 591, Hamersley, J.

[1] Compare the other rules directed to the same end, against other false aids than writing (post, §§ 769, 786).

prevent this misuse of expedients legitimate enough in themselves that restriction may be necessary:

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. III, c. XI (Bow ed., vol. VI, p. 446): "If on the part of the witness the testimony be the product imagination, instead of the memory, — incorrectness is, in so far, the quality given If, for want of such helps which on the particular occasion may happen to be sary, recollection fail to bring to view any such real facts as with these helps migh would have been brought to view, — incompleteness in the mass of the evidence result. But, by the same suggestions by which, in case of veracity, memory alone be assisted and fertilized, it may also happen that invention (which, where testim in question, is synonymous with mendacity) shall also be set to work, and rendere ductive. To administer assistance to recollection, to veracity — to administer, not ance, but obstruction, to invention, to mendacity, — in these we see two opposite, a first view, irreconcilable, pursuits. How then to reconcile them? or, at any rate, what is possible to be done towards it? In this question may be seen a probie solution of which is no less conspicuous for its difficulty than for its importance.
first point to be considered is the natural opposition between the two ends.
instance of any arrangement by which recollection is assisted, how natural, if not sary and unavoidable, it is, that mendacious invention should receive assistance lik
In the instance of any arrangement by which mendacious invention is obstructe natural, if not necessary, it is, that recollection should be subjected to interr likewise?"[2]

The purpose being to allow the legitimate use of written aids, whil venting their misuse, it would seem that no hard-and-fast rules can b down for invariable application. That which is suspicious and reprehe in one instance may be entirely trustworthy in the next. No un marks of impropriety can be named absolutely. It follows, therefore any writing whatever is eligible for use, while, on the other hand, any ing whatever may, in the circumstances, become improper.[3] This has well put in the following passage:

1835, Sir G. A. Lewin, Note to Lawes v. Reed, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 152: "Where the is to revive in the mind of the witness the recollection of the facts of which he o knowledge, it is difficult to understand why any means should be excepted to w that object may be attained. Whether in any particular case the witness' mem been refreshed by the document referred to, or he speaks from what the docume him, is a question of fact open to observation, more or less according to the stances. If in truth the memory has been refreshed, and he is enabled in consequ speak to facts with which he was once familiar, but which afterwards escaped cannot signify, in effect, in what manner or by what means these facts were rec his recollection. Common experience tells every man that a very slight circum and one not in point to the existing inquiry, will sometimes revive the history of action made up of many circumstances. . . . Why, then, if a man may refresh hi ory by such means out of court, should he be precluded from doing so when he examination in court?"[4]

[2] Compare also Bentham's other passage: ib. b. III, c. II (Bowring's ed., vol. VI, p. 386).

[3] It is worth while, therefore, to note that none of the rules just examined for past recorded recollection have any bearing on the present subject. The confounding of the two has led to many erroneous rulings.

[4] Accord: 1810, Henry v. Lee, 2 Ch ("any document"); 1843, Dunlop v. Scam. 327 ("this or any other paper"); Miner v. Phillips, 42 Ill. 131 ("the wit the right to refresh his memory by ref this or any other paper"); 1893, Mc Duff, 50 Kan. 488, 492, 31 Pac. 1061 (

§ 759. Writing not made by Witness himself. That the paper was not written by the witness himself is therefore no essential fault in it. The witness may or may not, in a given instance, with propriety make use of it; but the aid may equally be a legitimate one even though another person prepared the writing:

1810, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitty 124: "If upon looking at any document he can so far refresh his memory as to recollect a circumstance, it is sufficient; and it makes no difference that the memorandum is not written by himself, for it is not the memorandum that is the evidence, but the recollection of the witness."

This concluding expression of Lord Ellenborough's concisely states the principle, and has become a classic phrase in judicial quotation [1]

But, though the witness' authorship is not essential to the use of the paper, it is obvious that papers prepared by others may, under circumstances specially dangerous, be excluded from use. This was the case in one of the oldest precedents:

1753, L. C. Hardwicke, in Motion of Noel, quoted in 3 T. R. 752 (the witness referred frequently to six sheets transcribed by her from a digest by her solicitor of notes furnished by her; the witness had made alterations in his manuscript, but its use was forbidden): "Whether there has been any tampering or not I know not; but I know there has been a great mistake. . . . Should the Court connive at such proceedings as these, depositions would really be no better than affidavits. . . . I might as well let the attorney draw an affidavit for her and use that instead of a deposition." [2] book or memoranda," whether admissible or not in themselves); 1804, Livingston, J., in Steinbach v. ins. Co., 2 Caines 131 ("the papers to which he alluded, or any other"); 1852, Huff v. Bennett, 6 N. Y. 337 ("any written instrument"); 1880, Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444. In the following cases the writings were held to be properly used under the circumstances: 1872, Waters v. Waters, 35 Md. 539 (counsel consulting his notes); 1878, State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 238 (a diary in a shorthand known to the witness only); 1901, Smith v. Hawley, 14 S. D. 638, 86 N. W. 652 (an inadmissible document). Compare the citations post, §§ 786–788, which rest upon practically the same principle.

[1] Accord: 1776, Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 619; 1796, Vaughan v. Martin, 1 Esp. 440, semble; 1835, Lawes v. Reed, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 152 (witness used notes of counsel made at former trial); 1843, Dunlop v. Berry, 3 Scam. 327 (a pleading); 1866, Miner v. Phillips, 42 Ill. 131 (a newspaper); 1854, State v. Lull, 37 Me. 246 (made by witness' clerk); 1903, Com. v. Burton, 183 Mass. 461, 67 N. E. 419 (telegram); 1878, Cameron v. Blackman, 39 Mich. 108 (entries copied by others); 1893, Culver v. Lumber Co., 53 Minn. 360, 365, 55 N. W. 552; 1852, Huff v. Bennett, 6 N. Y. 337 (newspaper report); 1872, McCormick v. R. Co., 49 id. 303 ("made by himself or by any other person"); 1883, Bigelow v. Hall, 91 id. 145 ("whether made by himself or another"); 1845, O'Neale v. Walton, 1 Rich. 234; 1857, Berry v. Jourdan, 11 id. 67 (copy of deed, prepared by counsel); 1880, Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444 ("without regard to by whom made"); 1881, State v. Collins, 15 Id. 373 ("not material that the witness did not himself make the record"); 1901, Breese v. U. S., 45 C. C. A. 535, 106 Fed. 680 (bank-books); 1864, Hill v. State, 17 Wis. 675 ("it matters not whether the memorandum was made by the witness or another"); 1877, Folsom v. Log-driving Co., 41 id. 602. So also all the instances cited post, § 761, where a deposition or former testimony was used.

In many cases it is impossible to say whether the case was one of refreshing present recollection or of adopting past recollection.

In a few cases, the paper has been required at least to have been written under the witness' direction or known by him to be correct; but this is generally due to a confusion of this subject with the subject of past recollection (ante, § 748); 1827, Meagoe v. Simmons, 3 C. & P. 75; 1879, Ackien's Ex'r v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 498; 1898, Walker v. State, 117 Ala. 42, 23 So. 149 (memorandum not known to be correct, excluded); Cal. C. C. P. § 2047; 1853, Coffin v. Vincent, 12 Cush. 98; 1857, Davis v. Allen, 9 Gray 322; 1878, State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 238; 1899, Burks v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 167, 49 S. W. 389, semble.

[2] Accord: 1842, Layer v. Wagstaff, 5 Beav. 462 ("I cannot consider it a right thing for any solicitor to prepare depositions for a witness before examination. . . . If he goes before him [the examiner] with the depositions already prepared, it is a reason for suppressing them"). Add the citations post, §§ 786–788, which rest upon the same principle.

§ 760. Writing not Original, but a Copy. That the paper is a copy, n original, is also no essential fault. The only question is whether in fact genuinely calculated to revive the witness' recollection; and for this pu a copy may conceivably be entirely satisfactory. The radical differen principle between this use and that of a copied record of past recolle (ante, § 749) is plain; there is here no necessity of accounting for the ori in any way:

1843, Shields, J., in Dunlop v. Berry, 5 Ill. 327 (the witness refreshed his mem to the contents of a return by looking at the copy of it in the declaration): "It wa petent for him to use the declaration or any other paper for the purpose of refreshi memory upon the subject."

1852, Jewett, J., in Huff v. Bennett, 6 N. Y. 337 (the witness used a newspaper re "It is well settled that he is permitted to assist his memory by the use of any w instrument; and it is not necessary that such writing should have been made by hi or that it should be an original writing, providing after inspecting it he can speak facts from his own recollection."

1877, Cole, J., in Folsom v. Log-driving Co., 41 Wis. 602 (the witness, testifying amount of damage, used a copy made recently by K. from a copy of original conte rary memoranda; the other papers having become defaced): "This kind of evide open to more or less suspicion, because . . . it may lead him to suppose he recalls when he really does not. But this affects the credibility rather than the competen the testimony." [1]

§ 761. Writing not made at the Time of the Event; Depositions Former Testimony. That the paper was not drawn up about the time of events is not an essential fault. The recollection may be equally refres by a recent note as by some contemporaneous record. It might, in fact argued that there was less danger of reliance upon the record itself more probability of actual refreshment where the paper was one confesse having no value as a contemporaneous record of past recollection.

[1] Accord: 1756, Tanner v. Taylor, In 8 T. R. 754 (copy of account-book entry); 1776, Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 619; 1790, Doe v. Perkins, Ib. 749; 1821, R. v. Edmonds, 1 State Tr. N. s. 785, 827 (the original here being lost); 1825, Gardner Peerage Case, Le Marchant's Rep. 65; 1827, Anon., 1 Lew. Cr. C. 101 (copy of account-book entry); 1853, R. v. Williams, 6 Cox Cr. 343 (deposition); 1881, Lawson v. Gloss, 6 Colo. 134; 1885, Erie Preserving Co. v. Miller, 52 Conn. 444 (copies of way-bills); 1891, Finch v. Barclay, 87 Ga. 393, 13 S. E. 566 (copy from account-books); 1855, Iglehart v. Jernegan, 16 Ill. 513 (extract from copy of testimony in bill of exceptions); 1870, Chicago R. Co. v. Adler, 56 id. 345; 1878, Davie v. Jones, 68 Me. 393 (copy of account-book entry); 1900, Pierce v. R. Co., 94 Id. 171, 47 Atl. 144; 1875, Bullock v. Hunter, 44 Md. 425; 1853, Coffin v. Vincent, 12 Cush. 98 (copy of printed form); 1903, Com. v. Burton, 83 Mass. 461, 67 N. E. 419 (telegram); 1878, Cameron v. Blackman, 39 Mich. 108; 1883, Hudnutt v. Comstock, 50 Id. 596, 16 N. W. 157 (copy of account-book entry); 1878, Clough State, 7 Nebr. 336 (extracts from witness' of records); 1852, Huff v. Bennett, 6 N. Y. (newspaper copy); 1864, Marcly v. Shults Id. 346; 1872, McCormick v. R. Co., 49 303; 1901, Haines v. Cadwell, 40 Or. 229, Pac. 910; 1902, Welch v. Greene, — R. I. 54 Atl. 54; 1857, Berry v. Jourdan, 11 R 67, 78 (witness to lost deed, allowed to u copy); 1899, Sloan v. Pelzer, 54 S. C. 314, S. E. 431; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Bu 55 Tex. 342; 1891, Watson v. Miller, 82 285, 17 S. W. 1053; 1883, State v. Hopkins Vt. 258; 1854, Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Gr 530, 547 (copy of field notes). Contra: 1 Hopper v. Beck, 83 Md. 647, 34 Atl. 474 (a le copied from a daybook copied from another bo rejected). In a few cases the writing was ap ently treated and used as a record of past re lection, and hence the question of original was material: 1884, Clifford v. Drake, 110 135; 1887, Bonnet v. Glatfeldt, 120 id. 166, N. W. 250; 1881, Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 6

There is adequate authority for the result thus required by principle.[1] Yet the greater number of decisions, and most of the obiter dicta, announce as a requirement that the memorandum used must have been made "contemporaneously or nearly so" with the events, "at or near the time," with the same varying phrases used in the rule for Past Recollection (ante, § 745). These authorities fall into two groups. (1) A very few declare on principle that no real revival of recollection can be had from a paper not made at the time.[2] Their reason seems amply discredited by every-day experience. (2) The greater number simply adopt the rule established for Past Recollection (ante, § 745), without observing the radical difference between the purposes of the two sorts of papers. The confusing use of the phrase "refreshing the memory," for both classes of recollection, has contributed to this result; yet it is singular that the discrimination between the two should have been clearly perceived in the topics of the two preceding sections, and not in the present instance.[3]

The instance which is at once the plainest test of principle and the most common in practice is that of a deposition or report of prior testimony. Here the document was certainly not made at or near the time of the events observed; but orthodox practice has always conceded that the witness may refer to it to refresh his memory, either on direct examination or on cross-examination.[4] The rulings in which this has been refused have apparently

[1] 1880, Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444 ("without regard to when or by whom made"); 1877, Folsom v. Log-driving Co., 41 Wis. 602, and the authorities cited under the general principle (ante, § 758); also a number of cases referred to in the preceding sections, which, it will be seen, must have involved the use of papers made long after the event and sometimes just before the trial.

[2] 1878, State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 238 ("must be contemporary with the event noted, otherwise it would not necessarily be associated with the state of mind that existed when the impression on the memory was made"); 1869, Pinney v. Andrus, 41 Vt. 648 ("It is obvious that a memorandum made from recollection merely, and so long after the transaction to which it refers, would not be likely to aid the recollection of the witness").

[3] 1838, Steinkeller v. Newton, 9 C. & P. 313; 1849, Whitfield v. Aland, 2 C. & K. 1015; 1884, Paige v. Carter, 64 Cal. 489, Cal. C. C. P. § 2047; 1889, Sanders v. Wakefield, 41 Kan. 11, 20 Pac. 518; 1895, Johnston v. Ins. Co., 106 Mich. 96, 64 N. W. 5; 1883, Bigelow v. Hall, 91 N. Y. 145; 1884, Maxwell's Ex'rs v. Wilkinson, 113 U. S. 657, 5 Sup. 691.

[4] Eng.: 1682, Coningsmark's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1, 32 (showing to the witness his examination before the magistrate); 1835, Lawes v. Reed, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 152 (refreshing from notes of counsel); 1837, R. v. Edwards, 8 C. & P. 26, 31 (the witness was shown the depositions and asked to refresh his memory from them; this was allowed without question; then when it appeared that he could not read script, an officer of the Court read it over to him); 1839, Smith v. Morgan, 2 Moo. & R. 257 (witness allowed to use his own deposition to a limited extent); 1848, Wightman, J., in R. v. Mullins, 3 Cox Cr. 526, 528; 1850, R. v. Barnet, 4 Cox Cr. 269; 1851, R. v. Watson, 3 C. & K. 111 (allowing any one who heard testimony to refresh from the written deposition); 1851, R. v. Ford, 5 Cox Cr. 181 (quoted post, § 764); 1853, R. v. Williams, 8 Cox Cr. 343 (on direct examination, the witness' deposition was allowed to be put into his hands, "on the ground of refreshing the memory of the witness"; on his answering the question still unfavorably, the counsel was allowed to put a leading question; Williams, J., observing that he had before ruled thus and been sustained by the Queen's Bench, and that it "was not new law"); 1863, R. v. Quin, 2 F. & F. 818 (calling his attention to his former deposition); 1867, R. v. Wiggins, 10 Cox Cr. 562 (similar); U. S.: 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 568, 589 (refreshing by a deposition); 1903, People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 481, 7[illegible] Pac. 568 (refreshing by a copy of former testimony); 1855, Iglehart v. Jernegan, 16 Ill. 513 (refreshment from certified copies of bill of exceptions containing testimony at another trial); 1872, Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 519 (reading aloud her former testimony to one who could not read); 1884, Johnson v. Gwinn, 100 id. 466, 474 (reading over the witness' preceding testimony on the subject at his request); 1887, Stanley v. Stanley, 112 id. 145, 13 N. E. 261 (calling attention of witness to his former testimony); 1880, State v. Kremling, 53 Ia. 209 (witness looked at the minutes of his testimony been influenced more or less by the apprehension that thereby the couns when a cross-examiner, might evade the rule (post, § 1018) which forbi the witness' prior contradictory statements to be introduced as independe testimony, or that the counsel on a direct examination might evade the ru (post, § 902) against impeaching one's own witness by his contradictory sta ments.[5] But neither of these rules in themselves interpose any obstacle. an evasion of them is really being attempted, with the refreshment of rec lection as a mere pretext, then the judge may interpose. But it is a singul proposal to forbid a legitimate proceeding by a uniform rule, merely becau of a possible evasion, which can be dealt with adequately whenever it attempted.

§ 762. Writing must be Shown to the Opponent, on Demand, for Inspecti and Cross-Examination; Memoranda used before Trial. On a general pri ciple (post, § 1861), having in view the risk of imposition and false ai against which the opponent is entitled to the means of protection, the writi must be shown to him on request. Furthermore, as by having an opp tunity of inspection the opponent is guarded against imposition clearly a parent, so by cross-examination based on the paper he may further det circumstances not appearing on the surface, and may expose all that detra from the weight of testimony:

1794, Eyre, L. C. J., in Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 824: "It is always usual a very reasonable, when a witness speaks from memorandums, that the counsel should h an opportunity of looking at those memorandums, when he is cross-examining t witness."

1827, R. v. Ramsden, 2 C. & P. 603; the witness gave a date as six months befo when the counsel put a paper in his hand, he then named the date as nine months befo the opposing counsel demanded to see it; Witness' counsel: "I submit my friend no right to see it, unless he will read it in evidence." Tenterden, L. C. J.: "You put before the grand jury); 1864, Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 459, 485 (the counsel's minutes were allowed to be read to him; "the precise modes of recalling a witness' memory to facts which he has forgotten cannot be arbitrarily restricted; and if suspicious means should ever be used, the remedy is to be found in cross-examination and comment"); 1894, State v. Staton, 114 N. C. 813, 815, 19 S. E. 96 (by memorandum of former testimony); 1896, State v. Finley, 118 id. 1161, 24 S. E. 495 (using a deposition); 1889, Williams, J., in Hurley v. State, 46 Oh. St. 323, 21 N. E. 645 ("The repetition of the statement itself, referring to the circumstances of its utterance, would be the most likely means of awakening the recollection of the witness"; here using the witness' former testimony). Compare § 764, post.

[5] 1850, R. v. Stokes, 4 Cox Cr. 451, Williams, J. (witness not allowed to have memory refreshed on cross-examination, by a deposition, because not contemporaneous); 1859, Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 211, semble (reading former testimony on cross-examination, forbidden); 1858, Com. v. Phelps, 11 Gray 73 (the district-attorney had asked his witnesses "to recu their own minds to their testimony before grand jury, and then state when and how oft they had bought liquor; this was held proper; Shaw, C. J.: "To ask what he testi to before the grand jury has no tendency refresh his memory"); 1892, U. S. v. Cross, D. C. 377 (a witness' memory cannot be freshed by re-stating his former oral testimo The Federal Supreme Court has unfortunat in Putnam v. U. S., 162 U. S. 687, 16 Sup. (1896), complicated a very simple question added the weight of its authority to the that is wrong both in history and in princi by ruling that this refreshment by such a re ence to former testimony cannot be made, si the reference is based on a non-contemporane record. It ought to have been obvious even if there were a rule against refreshing non-contemporaneous papers, that rule could apply where the refreshment was by oral q tions of the counsel, and not by the witness of a paper. But the opinion in Putnam v. U also proceeds on a radical misunderstandin Melhuish v. Collier, post, § 902.

paper into the witness' hands to refresh his memory. It is very usual for the opposite counsel to see it and examine upon it, and I think he has a right to see it."

1854, Kindersley, V. C., in Lord v. Colvin, 2 Drewr. 205: "If a paper is put into the hands of a witness to refresh his memory, if after that nothing comes of it, if nothing more be done, then the other party has no right to look at it. But if anything further is done, if the witness is asked and answers questions about the document or the facts refered to in it, then at law the party on the other side has the right to see the document. . . . If I were to follow my own opinion as to what would be just and right, I should say every document whatever ought to be produced; . . . every document produced should, I think, be shown to both sides."

1876, Cooley, C. J., in Duncan v. Seeley, 34 Mich. 369: "The other party had a right to know what the memorandum was on which he relied, and whether it [1] had any legitimate tendency to bring the fact in controversy to mind. It would be a dangerous doctrine which would permit a witness to testify from secret memoranda in the way which was permitted here. . . . The defendant was entitled to see it at the time in order to test the candor and integrity of the witness." [2]

Clear as the justice of this would seem to be, there are Courts which deny it, and others which seem to.[3] They are led away, in most instances, by perceiving the general distiuction between a record of past recollection and a paper reviving present recollection, and by concluding that, because the rule about producing originals applies to the former (ante, § 749) but not to the latter (ante, § 760), therefore it is unnecessary to produce and show the paper to the opponent. These decisions, however, are in a small minority, and have no principle to support them. Just how much of the document may be examined by the opponent (for example, when it is a book of accounts) depends much on the circumstances of each case;[4] in general, the parts relative to the subject of testimony, not merely the parts used by the witness, may be seen.

The rule should apply, moreover, to a memorandum consulted for refreshment before trial and not brought by the witness into court; for, though there is no objection to a memory being thus stimulated, yet the risk of imposition and the need of safeguard is just as great.[5] It is simple and feasible enough for the Court to require that the paper be sent for and exhibited before the end of the trial.

[1] Misprinted as "he" in the original.

[2] Accord: 1824, Sinclair v. Stevenson, 1 C. & P. 582; 1833, Gregory v. Taverner, 6 id. 281; 1858, Palmer v. McLear, 1 Sw. & Tr. 149; 1879, Acklen's Ex'r v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 498; 1870, McKivitt v. Cone, 30 Ia. 455; 1856, Com. v. Fox, 7 Gray 585; 1866, Com. v. Haley, 13 All. 587; 1866, Com. v. Lanman, ib. 563 (discretion of Court); 1882, Com. v. Jeffs, 132 Mass. 5; 1873, Com. v. Burke, 114 Mass. 261 (allowable after, not before, direct examination); 1882, People v. Lyons, 49 Mich. 78, 13 N. W. 365; 1890, Manufacturing Co. v. Platt, 83 Mich. 419; 47 N. W. 330; 1846, Hall v. Ray, 18 N. H. 126; 1870, Peck v. Lake, 3 Lans. 134; 1870, Tibbetts v. Sterberg, 66 Barb. 201; 1878, State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 238.

[3] 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210, semble; 1854, Addington v. Wilson, 5 Ind. 133; 1851, State v. Cheek, 13 Ired. 114; 1886, Davenport v. McKee, 94 N. C. 330 (doubtful); 1886, First N. Bank of D. v. First N. Bank of W., 114 Pa. 8, 6 Atl. 366 (doubtful); 1881, State v. Collins, 15 S. C. 373.

[4] 1833, Gregory v. Taverner, 6 C. & P. 281; 1872, Burgess v. Bennett, 20 W. R. 720; 1866, Com. v. Haley, 13 All. 587; 1882, People v. Lyons, 49 Mich. 78, 13 N. W. 365. Compare the rules of §§ 2116, 2125, post.

[5] 1900, People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776, semble; 1869, White v. Allen, 3 Or. 103, 110; 1855, Hamilton v. Rice, 15 Tex. 382, 386. Contra: 1899, State v. Magers, 36 Or. 38, 58 Pac. 892 (but otherwise for a record of past recollection). But where the testimony is wholly independent of such a memorandum, its production is not necessary: 1900, Nabors v. Goldforb, 77 Miss. 661, 27 So. 641.

§ 763. Writing used to Revive Recollection is not part of Testimony; yet the Jury may see it, to determine the Propriety of its Use. It follows from the nature of the purpose for which the paper is used (ante, § 758) that it is in no sense testimony. In this respect it differs from a record of past recollection, which is adopted by the witness as the embodiment of his testimony and, as thus adopted, becomes his present evidence and is presentable to the jury (ante, § 754). Nevertheless, though the witness' party may not present it as evidence, the same reason of precaution which allows the opponent to examine it (ante, § 762) allows him to call the jury's attention to its features, and also allows the jurymen, if they please, to examine it for the same end. In short, the opponent, but not the offering party, has a right to have the jury see it:

1810, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitty 124: "It is not the memorandum that is the evidence, but the recollection of the witness."

1833, Gurney, B., in Gregory v. Taverner, 6 C. & P. 281: "The memorandum itself is not evidence, and particular entries only are used by the witness to refresh his memory. . . . The defendant's counsel may cross-examine on the entries already referred to, and the jury may also see those entries if they wish to do so."

1882, Endicott, J., in Com. v. Jeffs, 132 Mass. 5: "The opposite party is entitled to cross-examine the witness in regard to it; and it may be shown to the jury, not for the purpose of establishing the facts therein contained, but for the purpose of showing that it could not properly refresh the memory of the witness."

That the offering party has not the right to treat it as evidence, by reading it or showing it or handing it to the jury, is well established.[1] That the opponent may do this, or that the jury may of its own motion demand it, is equally conceded.[2]

§ 764. Cross-Examiner's Use of Writing to Revive Recollection. Where the effort to refresh the witness' memory comes originally from the cross-examining party, several distinct questions may arise. (1) Must the witness accede to the request and see if his memory is refreshed by the paper handed him? It seems entirely proper to require him, in the trial judge's discretion, to do this.[1] (2) When this is done, the paper so used must in fairness be

[1] 1803, Hedges' Trial, 28 How. St. Tr. 1367; 1858, Payne v. Ibbotson, 27 L. J. Ex. 341; 1879, Acklen's Ex'rs v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 498; 1895, Curtis v. Bradley, 65 Conn. 99, 31 Atl. 591; 1900, Palmer v. Hartford D. Co., 73 id. 182, 47 Atl. 125; 1898, McCormick v. Cleal, 12 D. C. App. 335, 338 (need not be offered in evidence); 1885, Elmore v. Overton, 104 Ind. 548, 555, 4 N. E. 197; 1899, Western Assur. Co. v. Ray, 105 Ky. 523, 49 S. W. 326; 1900, Wilson v. Com., — id. —, 54 S. W. 947; 1856, Com. v. Fox, 7 Gray 585; 1881, Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 66; 1901, Kipp v. Silverman, 25 Mont. 296, 64 Pac. 884; 1874, Watts v. Sawyer, 55 N. H. 40; 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592; 1890, Friendly v. Lee, 20 Or. 202, 25 Pac. 396; 1901, Hicks v. R. Co., — S. C. —, 38 S. E. 725, semble; 1867, Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187, 224. Contra: 1855, Iglehart v. Jernegan, 16 Ill. 513 (where the rule for a record of past recollection was applied). In Bigelow v. Hall, 91 N. Y. 145 (1883), in an obscure opinion, it was ruled that the paper might be read out, yet not treated as evidence. In Pease Piano Co. v. Cameron, 56 Nebr. 561, 76 N. W. 1053 (1898), the Court took the queer course of compelling books of accounts to be put in and then of refusing to let the witness refresh his memory from them because he would be giving "secondary evidence of the contents of the books."

[2] Acklen's Ex'rs v. Hickman, Com. v. Fox, cited supra; and cases quoted supra in the text; 1897, Smith v. Jackson, 113 Mich. 511, 71 N. W. 843 ("The right to cross-examination included a right to see and have the jury see it").

[1] 1838, Chapin v. Lapham, 20 Pick. 472.

read aloud or shown to the jury.[2] (3) A paper thus desired to be used will usually be one containing a prior inconsistent statement of the witness; in this case, the rules will apply that the inconsistent statement is not equivalent to independent testimony (post, § 1018), and that the paper containing it must (in the jurisdictions following The Queen's Case) first be shown to the witness before asking him upon its contents (post, § 1259). (4) The propriety of thus refreshing a hostile witness' recollection by his deposition or former testimony, not being a contemporaneous paper, has already been noticed (ante, § 761).

[2] 1851, R. v. Ford, 5 Cox Cr. 184 (the witness had formerly given a deposition; on the trial, after he had made a certain statement, was asked by the opponent to read the deposition and see whether he would then adhere to his statement; this was held improper; Campbell, L. C. J.: "The deposition should either be read to the witness at the time of the cross-examination and before the questions as to its contents are put, or should be given in evidence by the cross-examining counsel in the usual course as a part of his own case"; Alderson, B.: "If the deposition is not put in evidence, it is impossible to tell whether it contains the same or a different statement from that which the witness makes in court, and a false impression may be produced upon the jury by the cross-examination. The two statements may be precisely the same, and yet this line of cross-examination would lead the jury to suppose that they were different)." Compare the principles of §§ 780, 1861, post.

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

TOPIC VI: TESTIMONIAL NARRATION OR COMMUNICATION.

CHAPTER XXVII.

§ 766. General Principle. The third element forming an essential part o all testimony (ante, § 478) is the process of laying before the tribunal th witness' results of his Observation (ante, § 650) and his Recollection (ant § 725), i. e. the process of Narration or Communication. In this element, a in the other two, there are many opportunities for defects fatal to testimonial trustworthiness. As with the elements of Observation and of Recollection, so here also, experience has shown that certain dangers are to be looked for, and that certain restrictions should be imposed in order to prevent them. What these dangers and defects are depends upon the specific virtue which this element of Narration or Communication ought to possess.

Its office is to make intelligible to the tribunal the knowledge and recollection of the witness, whatever that may amount to, affirmative or negative, useful or trivial. Its prime and essential virtue, then, consists in accurately reproducing and expressing the actual and sincere Recollection.[1] We may assume that the witness' Recollection fairly represents and corresponds to his Observation (ante, § 725); if, then, his Narration or Communication fairly represents and corresponds to his Recollection, and is intelligible by the tribunal, the indispensable elements of testimonal value are complete, and the statement presented to the tribunal is testimonially relevant; but not otherwise. When the statement is found plainly or probably lacking in either of these respects, namely, in correspondence to recollected knowledge or intelligibility, then it should be rejected. Most of the usual defects occur in the former respect, i. e. an absence, actual or probable, of this correspondence between the witness' uttered statement and his conscious recollection which he ought to be stating. In the other respect, i. e. intelligibility to the tribunal of the witness' utterance, comparatively few questions arise.

It is, however, practically not feasible to examine the various problems directly with reference to the above two canons to be fulfilled. To satisfy them is always the underlying purpose of the specific rules. But these rules are more easily grouped according to the superficial features with which they are associated, and they can best be studied in those associations. For the purpose of grouping these various rules, it may be remembered that the simplest form of testimonial statement (from which others may be conceived of as deviations) is an (1) uninterrupted narrative (2) expressed in words (3) uttered orally (4) and intelligible directly by the tribunal. In any one of these features, there may be a variation from this simple and natural type; the inquiry therefore concerns the rules which become necessary when there is such a variance in one or another of the four respects. That is to say, testimony may be (1) furnished upon systematic interrogations, and not as a spontaneous utterance; or (2) it may be non-verbal, i. e. expressed dramatically, in conduct or gestures; or (3) it may be furnished in writing, not orally; or, finally, (4) it may require interpretation, before it becomes intelligible to the tribunal. Various rules will arise according as the deviation lies in one or another of these four features; and these rules may now be taken up under those four heads.

[1] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, 79 ("To render the communication of facts perfect, the witnesses must be both able and willing to speak or to write the truth. It is necessary that they should possess . . . in the second place, the power and the inclination to transmit them [the facts] faithfully").

A. TESTIMONIAL INTERROGATION.

§ 768. Direct and Cross Examination. When a witness' testimony i obtained by requiring answers after questions, instead of by permitting continuous uninterrupted narrative, certain special opportunities for abus may arise from adopting the former method of extraction. Some of thes opportunities are peculiar to the direct examination (by the party calling th witness) and some to the cross-examination (by the opponent). What is t be noted at the outset is that we are concerned here only with the danger of error that arise from the putting of questions, as contrasted with the process of extraction without questions. There are several other principles which affect the use of both direct and cross examination, but they have n concern with the present inquiry, namely, the defects and dangers peculia to an interrogational method. These distinct principles are elsewhere considered in their proper place, and are as follows: (a) The order of direct and cross examination is a matter of the Order of Evidence in general (dealt with post, §§ 1882 ff.); (b) A cross-examination, being that of a hostile party, in marked contrast to the direct examination of the party calling the witness, has a special object and value; the art of cross-examination (post, § 1368) depends upon this object; the indispensable advantages of a cross-examination make it a matter of absolute right, and the lack of cross-examination may be ground for excluding the testimony, under the Hearsay rule (dealt with post, §§ 1367–1393); (c) The kind of facts that may be inquired into on cross-examination, though forbidden to be proved otherwise by the opponent, involves the admissibility of certain kinds of evidence, in particular, of character-evidence (dealt with post, §§ 878, 946, 977 ff.); (d) One's own witness may not be impeached, and hence the inquiry may arise whether by cross-examining a witness he is made one's own so as to prevent impeachment (dealt with post, §§ 911–918). All these are distinct principles, and have no concern with the present question, namely, the restrictions desirable for an interrogational system per se.

In this inquiry, moreover, only rules of law are here to be examined. The rules and suggestions of tact and skill, which serve to guide the judgment of the examiner in obtaining the desired information, are a subject of the greatest consequence, and their study and practice is that of a fascinating pursuit, — involving as it does one of the highest forms of dialectic art, which has been chronicled in the experience of the most celebrated forensic leaders for two thousand years. But the rules of law, and not the art of applying them, must here set the limits of investigation.[1]

[1] In the following authors will be found some of the most celebrated and most useful passages of advice upon the proper method of examining witnesses on the stand: Quintilian, De Institutione Oratoria, lib. V, c. VII; 1835, Joseph Chitty, General Practice (or, Practice of the Law), III, 844; David Paul Brown, Golden Rules (reprinted in Chamberlayne's Best on Evidence (1893), Appendix); 1852, Edward Cox, The Advocate, cc. 32–35; 1885, John C. Reed, Conduct of a Lawsuit, cc. 9–11 (this, it may be suggested, is the most sensible and systematic modern book of its kind, and should be read and re-read by every aspiring young lawyer); 1892, Richard Harris, Hints on Advocacy, 9th ed., cc. 2–7, 12; 1894, Byron K. and

§ 769. Leading Questions; (1) General Principle. On the direct examination, i. e. by the counsel of the party in whose favor the witness is called, the most important peculiarity of the interrogational system is that it may be misused to supply a false memory for the witness,—that is, to suggest desired answers not in truth based upon a real recollection. The problem is to discriminate between the forms of questions which will too probably have that effect and those which will not. Questions may legitimately suggest to the witness the topic of the answer; they may be necessary for this purpose where the witness is not aware of the next answering topic to be testified about, or where he is aware of it but its terms remain dormant in his memory until by the mention of some detail the associated details are revived and independently remembered. Questions, on the other hand, which so suggest the specific tenor of the reply as desired by counsel that such a reply is likely to be given irrespective of an actual memory, are illegitimate. The essential notion, then, of an improper (commonly called a leading [1]) question is that of a question which suggests the specific answer desired. It will be seen that a collusive or conscious intention of the witness to answer as desired is here not a necessary assumption. That is a usual danger, but not the only one; for the known principles of human nature tell us that a witness may also unconsciously accept the suggestion of a question. It is therefore not necessary to attribute a corrupt intention either to witness or to counsel; since the danger has larger aspects than that.[2]

The essential test of a leading question as an improperly suggestive one is plainly expounded in the following passages:

1813, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in 25 Hans. Parl. Deb. 207: "I have always understood, after some little experience, that the meaning of a leading question was this, and this only: That the judge restrains an advocate who produces a witness on one particular side of a question, and who may be supposed to have a leaning to that side of the question, from putting such interrogatories as may operate as an instruction to that witness how he is to reply to favor the party for whom he is adduced."

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, III, 892: "The assigned reason in support of the rule is that a witness usually has a strong feeling in favor of the party who has subpœnaed him, and is disposed to swear anything that he thinks will serve that party, and that a leading question in effect suggests to the witness the answer that he is desired to give and invites misrepresentation. This reason imputes to the counsel an unworthy motive, and to every witness a supposition that he would be guilty of perjury; but perhaps the better and more comprehensive reason is that many witnesses, either from complaisance or indolence, are too much disposed to assent to the proposition of the counsel and answer as he may suggest, instead of reflecting and answering after an exertion of their own memory."

1840, McLean, J., in U. S. v. Dickinson, 2 McLean 331: "A question shall not be so propounded to a witness as to indicate the answer desired."

1860, Fowler, J., in Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 63: "A question is leading which in-

W. F. Elliott, General Practice, cc. 23–27; 1900, Joseph F. Daly, Preparation for Trial (in "The Brief," vol. III, pp. 1 ff.); 1903, Francis Wellman, The Art of Cross-Examination.

[1] This term goes far back in our annals: 1634, Coke, 4th Inst. 279 (interrogatories in depositions); 1684, Rosewell's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 147, 190.

[2] Compare the exposition of Bentham: 1827, Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. III, c. III (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, p. 392).

structs the witness how to answer on material points, or puts into his mouth words to be echoed back, as was here done, or plainly suggests the answer which the party wishes to get from him."

1897, Liddon, J., in Coogler v. Rhodes, 38 Fla. 240, 21 So. 109: "The proper signification of the expression is a suggestive question, — one which suggests or puts the desired answer into the mouth of the witness."

1860, Chief Justice Appleton, Evidence, 227: "The end proposed in extracting testimony is the obtaining the actual recollection of the witness, not the allegations of another person, suggested to and adopted by the witness and falsely delivered as his. . . . The real danger is that of collusion between the witness interrogated and the counsel interrogating, that the counsel will deliberately imply or suggest false facts with the expectation on his part and with an understanding on the part of the witness that he will assent to the truth of the false facts thus suggested."

This being the broad nature of the evil to be avoided, and the end to be secured, there can be no invariable test for the impropriety, merely so far as the form is concerned. Any question may be or may not be suggestive. The form is immaterial.[3]

§ 770. Same: Discretion of the Trial Court. It follows, from the broad and flexible character of the controlling principle, that its application must rest largely, if not entirely, in the hands of the trial Court. So much depends on the circumstances of each case, the demeanor of each witness, and the tenor of the preceding questions, that it would be unwise, if not impossible, to attempt in an appellate tribunal to consider each instance adequately. Furthermore, the harm in a single instance is inconsiderable and more or less speculative, and the counsel's repetition of an impropriety can be so easily controlled by the trial Court, that no favor is shown in the appellate tribunals to objections based merely on the form of the question.[1] From the beginning, and contiuuously, it has been declared that the application of the principle is to be left to the discretion of the trial Court.[2] In differeut jurisdictions this rule is enforced with differing vigor;

[3] 1863, Steer v. Little, 44 N. H. 616. ("There is no form of question which may not be leading, the Court being constantly compelled to look beyond the form to the substance and effect of the inquiry"); 1878, Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Bair, 87 Pa. 127.

[1] 1815, Nicholls v. Dowding, 1 Stark. 81. (Ellenborough, L. C. J.: "In general no objections are more frivolous than those which are made to questions as leading ones"); 1841, Towns v. Alford, 2 Ala. 381 (Collier, C. J.: "Objections to questions on the ground that they are leading are generally captious and not intended to subserve the ends of justice").

[2] Eng.: 1801, Peake, Evidence, 189; 1824, Clarke v. Saffery, Ry. & Moo. 126, Best, C. J.; 1837, R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 306, Coleridge, J.; 1855, Lawder v. Lawder, 5 Ir. C. L. 38; 1874, Ohlsen v. Terrero, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 128, 129 (conceding to an examiner in Chancery the judicial discretion to treat a witness as hostile: repudiating Wright v. Wilkin, 4 Jur. N. S. 804, 1858); Ala.: 1841, Towns v. Alford, 2 Ala. 380; 1845, Blevins v. Pope, 7 id. 374 (trial judge need not state his reasons); 1847, Watson v. Anderson, 11 id. 43, 45; 1848, Donnell v. Jones, 13 id. 507; 1850, Johnson v. State, 17 id. 618, 626; 1859, Sevre v. Durwood, 35 id. 247, 252; 1875, Gassenheimer v. State, 52 id. 313, 317; 1892, Birmingham v. McPoland, 96 id. 363, 11 So. 427; 1898, McDonald v. State, 118 id. 672, 23 So. 637; Alaska: C. C. P. 1900, § 664 (like Or. Annot. C. 1892, § 835); Ark.: Stats. 1894, § 2957 (allowable "under special circumstances, making it appear that the interests of justice require it"); Cal.: C. C. P. 1872, § 2046; 1883, People v. Ah Fook, 64 Cal. 381, 382; 1 Pac. 347; 1888, People v. Goldenson, 76 id. 349, 19 Pac. 161; 1890, White v. White, 82 id. 427, 23 Pac. 276; 1899, Kyle v. Craig, 125 id. 107, 57 Pac. 791; Casey v. Leggett, ib. 664, 58 Pac. 264; 1901, People v. Harlan, 133 id. 16, 65 Pac. 9; Fla.: 1878, Coker v. Hayes, 16 Fla. 368; 1901, Myers v. State, — id. —, 31 So. 275; 1903, Sylvester v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 142; Ga.: Code 1895, § 5283, Cr. C. § 1019; 1856, Heisler v. State, 20 Ga. 153, 155; 1871, Statham v. State, 41 id. 507, 509; 1874, Ewing v. Moses, 51 id. 410, 419; 1876, Burrus v. Kyle, 56 id. 24, 27; 1884, in some the discretionary ruling is sometimes revised in an extreme case, while in others the objection is not even entertained for consideration; but the principle is universally conceded.

Cade v. Hatcher, 72 Id. 359, 363; 1884, Farkas v. Stewart, 73 id, 90; 1889, Parker v. G. P. R. Co., 83 Id. 539, 546; 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Id. 751, 794; 1892, Howard v. Johnson, 91 id. 319, 322, 18 S. E. 132; 1895, Welch v. Stipe, 95 id. 337, 22 S. E. 681; 1898, Keller v. State, 102 id. 506, 31 S. E. 92; 1901, Cochran v. State, 113 id. 736, 39 S. E. 337; 1903, Rusk v. Hill, — id. —, 45 S. E. 42; Ida.: Rev. St. 1887, § 6077 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2046); 1902, McLean v. Lewiston, — Id. —, 69 Pac. 478; Ill.: 1875, Doran v. Mullen, 78 Ill. 145; 1881, Coon v. People, 99 id. 369; 1895, Cassem v. Galvin, 158 Id. 30, 41 N. E. 1087; 1901, Daugherty v. Heckard, 189 Id. 239, 59 N. E. 569; Ind.: 1880, Shockey v. Mills, 71 Ind. 291; 1881, Blizzard v. Applegate, 77 id. 516, 529; Ia.: 1875, Lowe v. Lowe, 40 Ia. 223; 1879, Reddin v. Gates, 52 Id. 214, 2 N. W. 1079; 1895, State v. Bauerkemper, 95 Id. 562, 64 N. W. 609; 1899, Gross v. Feehan, 110 Id. 163, 81 N. W. 235; 1900, State v. Petersen, 1b. 647, 82 N. W. 329; 1903, State v. Burns, — Ia. —, 94 N. W. 238; Kan.: 1874, Gannon v. Stevens, 13 Kan. 457 (unless gross abuse); Ky.: C. C. P. 1895, § 595 (allowable "under special circumstances making it appear that the interests of justice require it"); 1883, Wise v. Foote, 81 Ky. 13; Me.: 1831, Woodman v. Coolbroth, 7 Greenl. 181; 1854, State v. Lull, 37 Me. 249; 1854, Parsons v. Huff, 38 id. 143; 1859, Bliss v. Shuman, 47 id. 253; 1874, State v. Benner, 64 id. 280; Mass.: 1835, Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498; 1854, York v. Pease, 2 Gray 284; 1858, Com. v. Thrasher, 11 id. 59; 1862, Green v. Gould, 3 All. 466; 1888, Com. v. Chaney, 148 Mass. 8, 18 N. E. 572; 1890, Francis v. Rosa, 151 id. 534, 24 N. E. 1024; 1896, Smith v. Smith, 167 id. 87, 45 N. E. 52; Mich.: 1897, Fowler v. Fowler, 111 Mich. 676, 70 N. W. 336; 1898, People v. Root, 117 id. 578, 76 N. W. 91; 1899, Webb v. Feathers' Est., 119 id. 473, 78 N. W. 550; Minn.: 1896, Couch v. Steele, 63 Minn. 504, 65 N. W. 946; Miss.: 1847, Turney v. State, 8 Sm. & M. 110 (in narrow limits); 1853, Stringfellow v. State, 26 Miss. 160; Mo.: 1860, Smith v. Hutchings, 30 Mo. 384; 1869, Meyer v. People's Railway Co., 43 id. 523, 526; 1872, King v. Mittalberger, 50 id. 182, 184; 1874, St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. v. Silver, 56 id. 265; 1897, State v. Duestrow, 137 id. 44, 38 S. W. 554, 39 S. W. 266; 1899, State v. Whalen, 148 id. 286, 49 S. W. 980; 1899, Coats v. Lynch, 152 id. 161, 53 S. W. 895; Mont.: C. C. P. § 3374 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2046); Nebr.: 1889, Obernalte v. Edgar, 28 Nebr. 70, 44 N. W. 82; 1892, Insurance Co. v. Gotthelf, 85 id. 357, 53 N. W. 137; 1896, Baum Iron Co. v. Berg, 47 id. 21, 66 N. W. 8; 1897, Perry v. Bank, 53 id. 89, 73 N. W. 538; 1898, Harvard v. Stiles, 54 id. 26, 74 N. W. 399; 1900, Welsh v. State, 60 id. 101, 82 N. W. 368; 1901, Dinsmore v. State, 61 id. 418, 85 N. W. 445; 1901, Hiersche v. Scott, — id. —, 95 N. W. 494; 1903, Hackney v. Raymond B. C. Co., — id. —, 94 N. W. 822; N. H.: 1855, Hucklns v. Ins. Co., 31 N. H. 247; 1855, Severance v. Carr, 43 id. 67; 1863, Steer v. Little, 44 id. 615 (naming certain limits); 1869, Wells v. Iron Co., 48 id. 540; 1884, Gerrish v. Gerrish, 63 Id. 128; N. J.: 1849, Chambers v. Hunt, 22 N. J. L. 552, 562; 1897, Trenton R. Co. v. Cooper, 60 id. 219, 37 Atl. 730; N. Y.: 1830, People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 247; 1841, Williams v. Eldridge, 1 Hill 255 (but not for depositions); 1859, Walker v. Dunspaugh, 20 N. Y. 171; 1886, People v. Druse, 103 id. 655, 8 N. E. 733; N. C.: 1857, Gunter v. Watson, 4 Jones L. 456; 1897, Crenshaw v. Johnson, 120 N. C, 270, 26 S. E. 810; 1902, State Bank v. Carr, — id. —, 41 S. E. 876; Okl.: 1896, Ellison v. Bennabia, 4 Okl. 347, 46 Pac. 477; Or.: C. C. P. 1892, § 835 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2046); 1889, State v. Chee Gong, 17 Or. 639, 21 Pac. 882; 1901, State v. Ogden, — id. — , 65 Pac. 449; S. C.: 1895, State v. Johnson, 43 S. C. 123, 20 S. E. 988; 1897, State v. Green, 48 id. 136, 26 S. E. 234; 1898, Spencer O. M. Co. v. Johnson, 53 id. 533, 31 S. E. 392; 1901, Latimer v. Sovereign Camp, — id. —, 39 S. E. 155; 1901, State v. Marchbanks, — id. —, 39 S. E. 187; Tex.: 1899, International & G. N. R. Co. v. Dalwigh, 92 Tex. 655, 51 S. W. 500; U. S.: 1893, St. Clair v. U. S., 154 U. S. 134, 150, 14 Sup. 1002; 1894, Northern P. R. Co. v. Urlin, 158 id. 273, 15 Sup. 840; 1899, Peters v. U. S., 36 C. C. A. 105, 94 Fed. 127; 1903, Rainey v. Potter, — id. — , 120 Fed. 651; Utah: 1902, Rio Grande W. R. Co. v. Utah N. Co., — Utah — , 70 Pac. 859; Vt.: 1840, Hopkinson v. Steel, 12 Vt. 584; Wis.: 1860, Carlyle v. Plumer, 11 Wis. 96, 109; 1863, Barton v. Kane, 17 id. 37, 42, semble; 1875, McPherson v. Rockwell, 37 id. 162; 1883, Rounds v. State, 57 id. 53, 14 N. W. 865; 1884, Wright v. Fort Howard, 60 Id. 121, 18 N. W. 750; 1886, Coggswell v. Davis, 65 id, 191, 203, 26 N. W. 557; 1893, Proper v. State, 85 id. 626, 55 N. W. 1035; 1895, Porath v. State, 90 id. 527, 63 N. W. 1061; 1897, McDermott v. Jackson, 97 id. 64, 72 N. W. 375; 1898, Kohler v. R. Co., 99 id. 33, 74 N. W. 568; 1902, Goodwin v. State, 114 id. 318, 90 N. W. 170; 1902, Banneu v. State, 115 id. 317, 91 N. W. 107, 965.

In the following rulings certain questions were ruled upon according to the circumstances, but the rulings are of no service as precedents: 1896, Yoch v. Ins. Co., 111 Cal. 503, 44 Pac. 189; 1901, King v. Westbrooks, 114 Ga. 307, 40 S. E. 262; 1902, Sivell v. Hogan, 115 Id. 667, 42 S. E. 151; 1895, Springfield R. Co. v. Welsh, 155 Ill. 511, 40 N. E. 1034; 1896, State v. Fontenot, 48 La. An. 220, 19 So. 112; 1854, Lee v. Tinges, 7 Md. 233; 1896, Goeschel v. Fisher, 108 Mich. 212, 65 N. W. 965; 1858, Spear v. Richardson,

The entire regulation of the procedure, furthermore, is attended by n fixed rules. For example, when an improperly suggestive question has bee put but ruled out, it may be allowed to be phrased in proper form and pu again,[1] although presumably the harm has been irretrievably done; or, th witness in such a case may be prevented from answering at all on the subjec of the question.[2] The proper consequence to be applied is peculiarly a matte for the trial Court's discretion.[3] Nevertheless, there are certain canons o guidance which may be formulated for the trial Court as the general foundi tion for its discretionary rulings. They are none the less rules of law, eve though their application may not be the subject of an appeal. They are o two sorts, answering the two questions, (a) when must questions be forbidde because of the danger of improper suggestion? and (b) when, though suc danger exists, may the questions nevertheless be permitted by way of excep tion? This distinction is sometimes ignored; but it is a real one. When i is said, for example, that a hostile witness may be asked a leading question this form of stating the rule is erroneous, because the determination really i that there is no danger of false suggestion, i. e. that the question is not lead ing at all. On the other hand, when a witness' memory is exhausted and he is therefore allowed to be led, the leading question is allowed, but by way o exception. There is a distinction, then, between holding a question to be al lowable because it is not suggestive and holding it to be allowable though it i suggestive.

§ 771. Same: (2) Kinds of Leading Questions; Assuming a Controverted Fact. A question which in part assumes the truth of a controverted fact may lead a witness to reply without taking care to specify that his answer is based on that assumption, and may thus commit him to an assertion of the assumed fact, though in fact he may not desire or be able to do so. This is obviously a danger to be prevented:

1863, Bell, C. J., in Steer v. Little, 44 N. H. 616: "[A question is leading] where the question assumes any fact which is in controversy, so that the answer may really or apparently admit that fact. Such are the forked questions habitually put by some counsel if unchecked; as, What was the plaintiff doing when the defendant struck him? the controversy being whether the defendant did strike. A dull or a forward witness may answer the first part of the question and neglect the last."

1890, Bleckley, C. J., in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 794 (the issue being whether the insured was really deceased or had fraudulently pretended to be drowned, questions of the following sort were held improper: 'State what was the nature of the 37 N. H. 31; 1896, People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 317, 43 N. E. 853; 1814, Snyder v. Snyder, 6 Binn. 490; 1824, Wogan v. Small, 11 S. & R. 143; 1867, Trammell v. McDade, 29 Tex. 361; 1898, Parker v. Brown, 29 C. C. A. 357, 85 Fed. 595; 1849, Hopper v. Com., 6 Gratt. 686.

[1] E. g.: 1900, Allen v. Ins. Co., 72 Conn. 693, 45 Atl. 955.

[2] E. g.: 1898, Burks v. State, 120 Ala. 386, 24 So. 931; 1856, Heisler v. State, 20 Ga. 153, 155 (refusing to authorize the witness to be prevented from answering: "this remedy would be worse than the disease; it is one which so far as we know has never been applied in practice; if a remedy known to law, yet whether it shall be applied in any case is a matter which, like that as to the asking of leading questions, is for the discretion of the Court presiding; . . . a little wholesome punishment inflicted upon the counsel that indulge in such questions would no doubt soon stop the practice").

[3] For the general doctrine of judicial discretion, see ante, § 16.

For leading questions by the judge, see post, § 784.

current at the point where Sheppard fell in'): "This sort of assumption is one of the most pernicious forms in which the vice of leading questions can make its appearance, its tendency being to induce the witness to adopt the theory of the facts propounded by the examiner, and shape his testimony in a way to lend support to that theory. Even an honest and well-meaning witness may sometimes be drawn by this device into coloring the letter if not the spirit of his evidence more highly than the exact truth, so far as his knowledge of it extends, would warrant."[1]

§ 772. Same: Calling for Answer 'Yes' or 'No'; Alternative Questions. (1) A question admitting of being answered by a simple 'yes' or 'no' is regarded as generally a leading and improper one.[1] Nevertheless, it is obvious that such a question carries its suggestion more in the tone of voice than in the form of words. The particle 'not' (as in, "Did you not say that you refused the offer?") does indeed convey in itself the suggestion that an affirmative answer is desired; but the opposite form ("Did you say that you refused the offer?") by no means betrays in form such a suggestion, and depends almost wholly upon the intonation for suggestion;[2] in other words, it may or may not be leading. This is peculiarly a case for the principle (ante, § 770) that the trial Court's determination controls.

(2) The alternative form of question ("State whether or not you said that you refused," "Did you or did you not refuse?") is free from this defect of form, because both affirmative and negative answers are presented for the witness' choice. Nevertheless, such a question may become leading, in so far as it rehearses lengthy details which the witness might not otherwise have mentioned, and thus supplies him with full suggestions which he incorporates without any effort by the simple answer, "I did," or "I did not." Accordingly, the sound view is that such a question may or may not be improper, according to the amount of palpably suggestive detail which it embodies:

1891, Gaines, J., in Lott v. King, 79 Tex. 202, 209, 15 S. W. 231 (the question being 'state whether or not you ever sold and conveyed the headright certificate of John B. Bulrese for one league and one labor of land to said Barnes Parker'): "It does not properly admit of an answer 'yes' or 'no'. . . . Whether a question in that or a similar form be leading or not depends upon the determination of the inquiry whether it suggests any particular answer; and we think questions in that form which have been held leading are not such as inquire into a single fact, but such as enable the witness to state in two words, such as 'he did' or 'he did not' a series or group of facts. . . . As to the question now

[1] Accord: 1897, Re Hine, 68 Conn. 551, 37 Atl. 384; 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 794, 12 S. E. 18; 1900, Franks v. Gross Lumber Co., 111 Id. 87, 36 S. E. 314; 1858, Carpenter v. Ambroson, 20 Ill. 172; 1879, Hewitt v. Clark, 91 id. 608; 1847, Turney v. State, 8 Sm. & M. 110; 1879, Davis v. Cook, 14 Nev. 287; 1857, Willey v. Portsmouth, 35 N. H. 307.

Compare the analogous impropriety of misleading questions on cross-examination, post, § 780.

[1] 1815, Nicholls v. Dowding, 1 Stark. 81, and cases in notes infra; 1899, International & G. N. R. Co. v. Dalwigh, 92 Tex. 655, 51 S. W. 500. Doubted: 1856, Mathis v. Buford, 17 Tex. 155.

[2] In Latin, on the contrary, the particles 'nonne' and 'an' were both distinctively suggestive. An amusing illustration of the suggestive uses to which such questions in Latin could be put is related by Lord Brougham (12 Law Rev. 114, cited by the writer in a note in 1 Harv. Law Rev. 297): "When I was attending lectures on the civil law in Edinburgh, they were all in Latin. A set of Latin questions were proposed after the lecture to the students. Very difficult indeed, some of them might be to answer, if a proper answer were required; but all we had to do was, if the question commenced with 'nonne,' we said 'etiam,' and if with 'an,' we replied 'non.'"

under consideration, we think it would puzzle the astutest lawyer who is uninformed as to the issues in the case to determine from the question alone whether the examiner desired to prove that the witness had or had not transferred the certificate."

Three attitudes are represented among the Courts: (a) Most Courts treat such a question as depending upon the circumstances, in the manner above stated;[3] (b) a few Courts seem to treat it as always proper;[4] (c) while a few seem to treat it as necessarily improper.[5]

§ 773. Same: Opponent's Witness under Cross-Examination. The typical situation in which the witness' presumable bias removes all danger of improper suggestion is that of an opponent's witness under cross-examination. The purpose of the cross-examination is to sift his testimony and weaken its force, in short, to discredit the direct testimony; thus, not only the presumable bias of the witness for the opponent's cause, but also his sense of reluctance to become the instrument of his own discrediting, deprive him of any inclination to accept the cross-examiner's suggestions unless the truth forces him to. Accordingly, it is well settled that on cross-examination of an opponent's witness, ordinarily no question can be improper as leading:

1820, Wilson's Trial, 2 Green (Sc.) 119: Mr. Murray: "I am surely entitled to lead in cross-examination?"; Lord President: "No; I never heard that with us"; Mr. Murray: "I remember hearing a judge in England, upon that being stated to him, saying, 'Good God, what a country!'"

1874, Appleton, C. J., in State v. Benner, 64 Me. 279: "Cross-examination of an opponent's witness [in leading form] is allowable. Why? Because, being called by him [the opponent], it has been imagined that there was some tie of sympathy or interest which would induce partiality on the part of the witness in favor of the party who called him."[1]

[3] 1897, Coagler v. Rhodes, 38 Fla. 240, 21 So. 109; 1895, State v. Wickliff, 95 Ia. 386, 64 N. W. 283; 1879, McKeown v. Harvey, 40 Mich. 228; 1856, Bartlett v. Hoyt, 33 N. H. 165; 1858, Spear v. Richardson, 37 id. 26; 1860, Page v. Parker, 40 id. 63; 1863, Steer v. Little, 44 id. 616; 1862, Tinsley v. Carey, 26 Tex. 350, 352; 1891, Lott v. King, 79 id. 292, 299, 15 S. W. 231 (see quotation supra).

[4] 1867, Adams v. Harrold, 29 Ind. 200; 1859, Peiamourges v. Clark, 9 Ia. 18.

[5] 1877, State v. Johnson, 29 La. An. 718; 1830, Marcy, J., in People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 248; 1840, U. S. v. Dickinson, 2 McLean 331 ("the form laid down in some of the books, 'do you or do you not know, etc.,' is a leading question, and may be so emphasized as to indicate in the strongest terms the desired answer").

[1] 1836, Parkin v. Moon, 7 C. & P. 409; Alaska C. C. P. 1900, § 666; Ark. Stats. 1894, § 2957; Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 2048; Ga. Civ. Code 1895, § 5283, Cr. C. § 1019 (leading questions are "generally allowed in cross-examinations," but the Court in discretion may forbid them); 1884, Cade v. Hatcher, 72 Ga. 359, 363; Ida. Rev. St. 1887, § 6079; Ky. C. C. P. 1895, § 595; 1888, Townsend's Succession, 40 La. An. 67, 73, 3 So. 488; 1874, State v. Benner, 64 Me. 279 (see quotation supra); 1835, Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498; Or. Annot. C. 1892, § 837; 1820, Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 582; 1840, U. S. v. Dickinson, 2 McLean 331 ("the witness having been called by one party, may not be equally willing to disclose all he knows that shall be favorable to the other"); 1901, Hempton v. State, 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596. Compare § 915, post.

Unnecessary doubt has sometimes been thrown on this subject by misunderstood passages. A cross-examination was objected to as using leading questions in the Seven Bishops' Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 310 (1688), and the judge says: "You must answer any questions that are not ensnaring questions"; but the same objector afterwards gives as his reason that the questions were asked "only to enflame, and to possess people with foolish notions and strange conceits," i. e. the matter implied dishonorable conduct to the King and the prosecution wished to avoid the subject; but no further principle seems to have been brought out. The remarks in Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 659 (1794), in which Mr. Erskine was told by L. C. J. Eyre, "You are not to put the very words in his mouth, even on a cross-examination," were said of a witness manifestly favorable to the cross-examiner, and were not intended to be applied to the ordinary case of a hostile witness.

That leading questions are not usually to be asked on cross-examination is maintained by Mr. Joseph Chitty, in Practice of the Law, III, 892, because the reason above quoted from him

Yet, where the reason ceases, the rule ceases also; thus, when an opponent's witness proves to be in fact biassed in favor of the cross-examiner, the danger of leading questions arise and they may be forbidden.[2]

(a) Distinguish the question whether a counsel may ask about the facts of his own case on cross-examination. The majority of Courts in this country, departing from the orthodox rule, refuse to allow it; a few of them, however, allow it on the condition that leading questions be not asked. The two rules, however, have nothing in common, and ought not to be so connected; the distinction is dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 915, 1891).[3]

(b) Distinguish also the misleading question on cross-examination (post § 780); the form of question is sometimes identical, but the purpose is opposite,—in the one instance, of colluding with a favorable witness, in the other, of tricking a hostile witness.

§ 774. Same: Witness Hostile, Biassed, or Unwilling. A similar situation arises where the witness, though called by the party examining, is in fact biassed against his cause and is thus indisposed to favor it by accepting suggestions of desired testimony. Here a question cannot be objectionable as leading:

1682, Mr. Williams, arguing, in Coningsmark's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1, 37: "There is a great deal of difference, I find, where you examine a man with the hair and where you examine him against the hair. Where you find it difficult to make a man answer, you will pump him with questions and cross-interrogate him, to sift out the truth."

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 228: "This unwillingness is commonly to be decided by the judge, according to his impression of the demeanour of the witness, upon the trial. The situation of the witness, and the inducements which he may have for withholding a fair account, are also very proper circumstances to be taken into account in forming this decision. A son will not be very forward in stating the misconduct of his father, of which he has been the only witness; a servant will not, in an action against his master, be very ready to acknowledge the negligence committed by himself."

1874, Appleton, C. J., in State v. Benner, 64 Me. 279: "If the witness is from any cause adverse to the party calling him, the same reason which authorizes and sanctions cross-examination, more or less rigorous, equally requires it when the party finds that the witness whom the necessities of his case have compelled him to call is adverse in feeling, is reluctant to disclose what he knows, is evasive or false. Important as interrogation may be, if the witness is friendly, to remove uncertainty and indistinctness and to give fullness and clearness, doubly important is it, if the witness be dishonest and adverse, to extract from reluctant lips facts concealed from sympathy, secreted from interest, or withheld from dishonesty. Cross-examination may be as necessary to elicit the truth from one's own as from one's opponent's witness."

This situation includes not only the case of witnesses hostile, biassed, or interested, in their sympathies with the opponent's cause,[1] but also of wit-

In § 769 applied equally in this case; but he probably had in mind the sort of misleading questions noted infra, § 780.

[2] 1874, Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 140, 25 Pac. 816; 1335, Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498.

[3] For the related question as to using an opponent's deposition, as affected by the present rule, see post, § 912.

[1] 1824, Clarke v. Saffery, Ry. & Moo. 126, Best, C. J.; 1838, R. v. Chapman, 8 C. & P. 559, Abinger, C. B.; 1839, R. v. Ball, 8 C. & P. 745, Erskine, J.; 1874, Ohlsen v. Terrero, L. R. 10 Ch. 129, Lord Cairns, L. C.; 1841, Towns v. Alford, 2 Ala. 380; 1841, Blevins v. Pope, 7 id. 374; 1832, Stratford v. Sanford, 9 Conn. 283; 1892, Rosenthal v. Bilger, 86 Ia. 246, 247, 53 N. W. 255; 1854, Parsons v. Hull.

nesses unwilling for any other reason to tell all they may know;[2] though the two classes are not different in principle, nor always distinguished by the Courts.

§ 775. Same: Preliminary Undisputed Matters. When a witness is asked about matters preliminary to the main topics of controversy — matters essential to be brought out, and yet not themselves in controversy —, such as the witness' name, age, residence, relationship to the parties, and the like, it is obvious that there is usually no danger of improper suggestion, simply because there is no motive for it:

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 226: "The good sense of the rule is perfectly manifest with respect to all cases where the question propounded involves an answer immediately bearing upon the merits of the cause, and indicating to the witness a representation which will best accord with the interests of the party. But where the questions are merely introductory, where the mere answer of yes or no will leave the point of the case precisely as it found it and can only be material as laying the foundation for a further inquiry, the reason of the objection does not occur, and the objection itself appears to be ill-founded; and the making it can only proceed from a captious and petulant disposition to interrupt the course of examination."

1830, Marcy, Sen., in People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 247: "If the question relate to introductory matter and be designed to lead the witness with more expedition to what is material to the issue, it is captious to object to it, even if it be leading."[1]

§ 776. Same: (3) Exceptions allowed; Trial Court's Discretion. In spite of the danger of suggestion by questions, there arise situations in which these dangerous questions become a necessity, — situations in which the risk of losing useful testimony outweighs the risk of false suggestion. Whether such an exceptional situation exists on the facts is a question for the determination of the trial Court.[1] Nevertheless, there are one or two common

38 Me. 142; 1874, State v. Benner, 64 id. 279 (see quotation supra); 1835, Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498; 1886, McBride v. Wallace, 62 Mich. 453, 29 N. W. 75; 1897, People v. Gillespie, 111 id. 241, 69 N. W. 490; 1830, People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 247; 1893, St. Clair v. U. S., 154 U. S. 150, 14 Sup. 1002; 1896, Putnam v. U. S., 162 id. 687, 16 Sup. 923. The bias of the witness may be presumed from his situation as to interest or relationship, before it is disclosed in his testimony; 1824, Clarke v. Saffery, Ry. & Moo. 126, Best, C. J. (one creditor of a bankrupt against another). In one ruling the doctrine as a whole has been denied: 1825, Anon., 1 Lew. Cr. C. 322 ("Bayley, J., refused to allow an adverse witness to be led, although, as he said, he was aware some Judges differed from him in opinion. His reason was that it afforded an opportunity for collusion between the parties and their witnesses, and that a witness might be instructed to give certain answers in order to make him an adverse witness and thereby enable his counsel to put leading questions to him)." This fantastic reasoning proposes to handicap all honest counsel because a few may practise dishonestly; moreover, if a witness were as cunning as the one imagined by the learned judge, he would certainly be cunning enough to fulfil his plot without the aid of leading questions.

[2] 1836, Parkin v. Moon, 7 C. & P. 409, Alderson, B.; 1837, R. v. Murphy, 8 id. 306, Coleridge, J.; 1841, Towns v. Alford, 2 Ala. 380; 1845, Blevins v. Pope, 7 id. 374; 1832, Stratford v. Sanford, 9 Conn. 283; 1882, Bradshaw v. Combs, 102 Ill. 434; 1895, People v. Caldwell, 107 Mich. 374, 65 N. W. 213; 1849, Walsh v. Agnew, 12 Mo. 525; 1840, U. S. v. Dickinson, 2 McLean 331.

[1] Accord: 1874, Gannon v. Stevens, 13 Kan. 457; 1864, Hall v. Taylor, 45 N. H. 407; Or. C. C. P. § 835 ("unless merely formal or preliminary" questions); 1889, Hausenfluck v. Coun., 85 Va. 707, 8 S. E. 683.

Nevertheless, in accordance with the general principle (ante, § 769), if such a matter — e. g. name or age — should be the subject of real controversy, a suggestive question would be improper.

[1] The cases on this point are collected ante, § 770. It is common to say judicially that "leading questions are allowable in the trial Court's discretion," and it is often impossible to say whether this applies to the definition of such a question or to the exceptional allowance of it.

classes of cases in which a canon of guidance (ante, § 770) has been laid down.

§ 777. Same: Witness' Recollection Exhausted. Where the witness is unable without extraneous aid to revive his memory on the desired point — i. e. where he understands what he is desired to speak about, but cannot recollect what he knows —, here his recollection, being exhausted, may be aided by a question suggesting the answer. The trial Court's discretion must be relied upon to prevent imposition:

1854, Per Curiam, in State v. Jeandell, 5 Harringt. 475, 478 (the witness being asked as to the time of a fact): "The rule is plain; its application is not always evident. You are first to test the witness' own knowledge or recollection of the time by questions necessary for that; if his memory is at fault, you may suggest cotemporaneous events, with a view to stimulate or fix his recollection."[1]

§ 778. Same: Witness not Understanding; Children, Invalids, Illiterates, Decedents. Where there is as yet no exhaustion of memory, but the witness merely does not appreciate the tenor of the desired details and thus is unable to say anything about it, a question calling attention specifically to the details may be allowable, when other means have failed.[1] It may not be necessary to name all of the details; the mention of one or more of them may suffice by association to stimulate the recollection of the remainder. The common situation of this sort, running perhaps throughout the person's entire testimony, is that of a child,[2] or of an illiterate or alien adult.[3] A related situation is that of a person too ill or too feeble of speech to be able to articulate sentences; here the sentences may be framed for him suggestively, leaving him as little as possible to articulate and yet avoiding the danger of a misunderstood signal of assent or dissent.[4]

§ 779. Same: Proving a Contradiction. Where a witness is called to prove the prior self-contradictory statement of another witness, the tenor of the words in question become important. Moreover, the utterance proved must be substantially the same as that upon which the other witness has already

[1] 1807, Courteen v. Touse, 1 Camp. 43, Ellenborough, L. C. J.; 1815, Acerro v. Petroni, 1 Stark. 100, Ellenborough, L. C. J.; 1882, Herring v. Skaggs, 73 Ala. 453; 1854, State v. Jeandell, 5 Harringt. 475, 478 (see quotation supra); 1854, Parsons v. Huff, 38 Me. 142; 1835, Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498; 1855, Huckins v. Ins. Co., 31 N. H. 247; 1861, Severance v. Carr, 43 id. 67; 1879, O'Hagan v. Dillon, 76 N. Y. 173; 1885, Toomey v. Kay, 62 Wis. 107, semble, 22 N. W. 286.

[1] 1815, Nicholls v. Dowling, 1 Stark. 81 (Ellenborough, L. C. J., "it is necessary to a certain extent to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of the inquiry"); 1881, De Haven v. De Haven, 77 Ind. 240; 1875, Lowe v. Lowe, 40 Ia. 223; 1872, Bullard v. Hascall, 25 Mich. 136; 1853, Stringfellow v. State, 26 Miss. 160; 1850, Stewart v. State, 19 Oh. 397; 1852, Loug v. Steiger, 8 Tex. 462.

[2] 1879, Coon v. People, 99 Ill. 369 (but pointing out that sometimes leading questions should specially be avoided with children); 1903, Johnson v. People, 202 Ill. 53, 66 N. E. 877 (similar); 1890, State v. Watson, 81 Ia. 380, 383, 46 N. W. 868 (youthful witness in a rape charge); 1835, Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 498.

[3] 1875, Dorn v. Mullen, 78 Ill. 345 (ignorant person); 1899, Kruse v. S. & W. Lumber Co., 108 Ia. 352, 79 N. W. 118 (one not well understanding English); 1899, State v. Yellow Hair, 22 Mont. 33, 55 Pac. 1026 (witness illiterate and testifying by an interpreter); 1901, Carlson v. Holm, — Nebr. —, 95 N. W. 1125.

[4] 1899, State v. Burns, — Ia. —, 78 N. W. 681 (deaf-mute); 1893, Belknap v. Stewart, 38 Nebr. 304, 310, 56 N. W. 881 (one so affected by paralysis as to be able to utter only monosyllables).

The case of the dying declarant is the subject of some controversy, and is dealt with under that head, post, § 1445.

been questioned (post, § 1029). Hence, as it is often practically impossible to inform the witness of the subject of his testimony without suggesting the details of the statement, such a suggestion has been commonly allowed;[1] and so also for the impeached witness' explanation of his statements.[2]

§ 780. Misleading Questions by Cross-examiner. (a) A question which assumes a fact that may be in controversy is leading, when put on direct examination (as noted ante, § 771), because it affords the willing witness a suggestion of a fact which he might otherwise not have stated to the same effect. Similarly, such a question may become improper on cross-examination, because it may by implication put into the mouth of an unwilling witness a statement which he never intended to make, and thus incorrectly attribute to him testimony which is not his:[1]

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, 2d ed., III, 901: "It is an established rule, as regards cross-examination, that a counsel has no right, even in order to detect or catch a witness in a falsity, falsely to assume or pretend that the witness had previously sworn or stated differently to the fact, or that a matter had previously been proved when it had not. Indeed, if such attempts were tolerated, the English Bar would soon be debased below the most inferior of society."

1794, Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 754; Mr. Erskine, cross-examining a witness to the proceedings of an alleged seditious meeting: "Then you were never at any of those meetings but in the character of a spy?" — "As you call it so, I will take it so." — "If you were not there as a spy, take any title you choose for yourself, and I will give you that"; L. C. J. Eyre: "There should be no name given to a witness on his examination. He states what he went for, and in making observations on the evidence, you may give it any appellation you please." After a repetition of the practice, Mr. Gibbs: "I am sorry to interrupt you, but your questions ought not to be accompanied with those sort of comments; they are the proper subjects of observation when the defence is made. The business of a cross-examination is to ask to all sorts of acts, to probe a witness as closely as you can; but it is not the object of a cross-examination to introduce that kind of periphrasis as you have just done"; Mr. Erskine: "But, on a cross-examination, counsel are not called upon to be so exact as in an original examination; you are permitted to lead a witness"; L. C. J. Eyre: "I think it is so clear that the questions that are put are not to be loaded with all the observations that arise upon all the previous parts of the case; they tend so to distract the attention of everybody, they load us in point of time so much; and that that is not the time for observation upon the character and situation

[1] 1807, Courteen v. Touse, 1 Camp. 43; 1820, Edmonds v. Walter, 3 Stark. 8; 1884, Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Meog, 78 Ala. 310; 1882, People v. Ah Yute, 60 Cal. 95; 1857, Gunter v. Watson, 4 Jones L. 457; 1878, Farmers' M. F. Ins. Co. v. Bair, 87 Pa. 128; 1896, Union P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 161 U. S. 451, 16 Sup. 618; 1895, Norton v. Parsons, 67 Vt. 526, 32 Atl. 431; 1857, Ketchingman v. State, 6 Wis. 426; 1883, Rounds v. State, 57 id. 53, 14 N. W. 865; compare the citations ante, § 761. Contra: 1839, Hallett v. Cousens, 2 Moo. & Rob. 238 (Erskine, J., would not let the counsel "read from his brief the very words which the [other] witness had so denied having used"; that method being allowable only when it was necessary to keep out "parts of the conversation which are not evidence").

[2] 1894, Farrell v. Boston, 161 Mass. 106, 36 N. E. 751 (to correct a mistake on cross-examination, reference was allowed to the supposed contrary occurrence); 1888, Stone v. Ins. Co., 71 Mich. 81; 1873, Bullard v. Pearsall, 53 N. Y. 230; 1889, People v. Kelly, 113 id. 647, 21 N. E. 122.

[1] The following anecdote neatly illustrates this trick of a "loaded" or "forked" question: "Sir Frank Lockwood was once engaged in a case in which Sir Charles Russell (the late Lord Chief Justice of England) was the opposing counsel. Sir Charles was trying to browbeat a witness into giving a direct answer. 'Yes,' or 'No.' 'You can answer any question yes or no,' declared Sir Charles. 'Oh, can you?' retorted Lockwood 'May I ask if you have left off beating your wife?'" (Green Bag, vol. XII, p. 671).

of a witness is so apparent that as a rule of evidence it ought never to be departed from."

1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 19th day, Times' Rep. pt. 5, p. 221; the "Times" having charged the Irish Land League with complicity in crime and outrage, a constable testifying to outrages was cross-examined by the opponents as to his partisan employment by the "Times" in procuring its evidence; Mr. Lockwood: "How long have you been engaged in getting up the case for the 'Times'?" Sir H. James: "What I object to is that Mr. Lockwood, without having any foundation for it, should ask the witness 'How long have you been engaged in getting up the case for The Times?'" Mr. Lockwood: "I will not argue with my learned friend as to the exact form of the question, but I submit that it is perfectly proper and regular. If the man has not been engaged in getting up the case for The Times he can say so;" Sir H. James: "I submit that my learned friend has no right to put this question without foundation. Counsel has no right to say 'When did you murder A. B.?' unless there is some foundation for the question. In this same way he has no right to ask 'How long have you been engaged in getting up this case?' for it assumes the fact." . . . President Hannen. "I do not consider that Mr. Lockwood was entitled to put the question in that form and to assume that the witness has been employed by The Times." [1]

(b) Another improper way in which, by insinuation, testimony may be incorrectly attributed to a witness is that of asking him to refresh his recollection by a paper and then say whether he still persists in his first statement; this has been already noticed (ante, § 764). (c) So also the prohibition of impeaching questions as to prior misconduct is sometimes based (post, § 983) upon the opportunities which they offer to fraudulent insinuations of misdeeds which the counsel has in reality no reason to suppose were ever committed.

Distiuguish (1) the rule that a cross-examiner need not state the purpose of his question (post, § 1871); the objection in such a case is not that the witness is deceived as to the ultimate purpose of the question, for it is immaterial whether or not he understands that, and it is enough if he is not deceived as to its actual tenor; the objection to a cross-examiner's not disclosing his purpose is that the relevancy of the facts inquired about may otherwise not appear, and the rule permitting such concealment is merely a necessary exception to the general rule requiring relevancy to appear at the time of asking; (2) the rule that a counsel may not state as a fact a matter upon which no evidence has been offered, nor discuss offered evidence in the jury's presence (post, §§ 1806, 1808); this is merely an application of the general rule against hearsay; (3) the rule requiring a writing, proved merely as to its execution, to be shown to the opponent before the witness retires (post, § 1859) is a rule designed to prevent unfairness, but does not concern the present principle; (4) the rule that a cross-examination cannot go beyond the scope of the direct examination; this is sometimes trickily used by confining the

[1] Accord: 1900, Hand v. Soodeletti, 128 Cal. 674, 61 Pac. 372; 1885, State v. Labuzan, 37 La. An. 489, 491 (question assuming that the witness had testified as he had not in fact, excluded; "such questions have a tendency to irritate, confuse, and mislead the witness, the parties, and their counsel, the jury and the presiding judge, and they embarrass the administration of justice"); 1903, State v. Williams, 111 La. —, 35 So. 521 ("witnesses should not be cross-examined on the assumption that they have testified to facts touching which they have given no testimony").

direct examination to a few safe topics; the unsoundness of this rule (which involves a different principle) is considered elsewhere (post, § 1887).

§ 781. Intimidating and Annoying Questions by Cross-examiner. An intimidating manner in putting questions may so coerce or disconcert the witness that his answers do not represent his actual knowledge on the subject. So also questions which in form or subject cause shame or anger in the witness may unfairly lead him to such demeanor and utterance that the impression produced by his statements does not do justice to his real testimonial value. These are two of the notorious abuses of cross-examination, and always have been, both in the early period when it was still chiefly used by judges only, and also since the time of its mature elaboration, more than a century ago, as the greatest weapon of truth ever forged. In the following noted passages of fiction its inveterate abuse has been satirized:

1837, Mr. Charles Dickens, The Pickwick Club, c. XXIV: "'Nathaniel Winkle!' said Mr. Skimpin. 'Here!' replied a feeble voice. Mr. Winkle entered the witness-box, and having been duly sworn, bowed to the judge with considerable deference. 'Don't look at me, sir,' said the judge,[1] sharply, in acknowledgment of the salute; 'look at the jury.' Mr. Winkle obeyed the mandate, and looked at the place where he thought it most probable the jury might be; for seeing anything in his then state of intellectual complication was wholly out of the question. Mr. Winkle was then examined by Mr. Skimpin, who, being a promising young man of two or three and forty, was of course anxious to confuse a witness who was notoriously predisposed in favor of the other side, as much as he could. 'Now, sir,' said Mr. Skimpin, 'have the goodness to let his Lordship and the jury know what your name is, will you?' And Mr. Skimpin inclined his head on one side to listen with great sharpness to the answer, and glanced at the jury meanwhile, as if to imply that he rather expected Mr. Winkle's natural taste for perjury would induce him to give some name which did not belong to him. 'Winkle,' replied the witness. 'What's your Christian name, sir?' angrily inquired the little judge. 'Nathaniel, sir.' 'Daniel, — any other name?' 'Nathaniel, sir — my Lord, I mean.' 'Nathaniel Daniel, or Daniel Nathaniel?' 'No, my Lord, only Nathaniel — not Daniel at all.' 'What did you tell me it was Daniel for then, sir?' inquired the judge. 'I did n't, my Lord,' replied Mr. Winkle. 'You did, sir,' replied the judge, with a severe frown. 'How could I have got Daniel on my notes, unless you told me so, sir?' This argument was, of course, unanswerable. 'Mr. Winkle has rather a short memory, my Lord,' interposed Mr. Skimpin, with another glance at the jury. 'We shall find means to refresh it before we have quite done with him, I dare say.' 'You had better be careful, sir,' said the little judge, with a sinister look at the witness. Poor Mr. Winkle bowed, and endeavored to feign an easiness of manner, which, in his then state of confusion, gave him rather the air of a disconcerted pickpocket. 'Now, Mr. Winkle,' said Mr. Skimpin, 'attend to me, if you please, sir; and let me recommend you, for your own sake to bear in mind his Lordship's injunctions to be careful. I believe you are a particular friend of Pickwick, the defendant, are you not?' 'I have known Mr. Pickwick now, as well as I recollect at this moment, nearly' — 'Pray, Mr. Winkle, do not evade the question. Are you, or are you not, a particular friend of the defendant's?' 'I was just about to say, that' — 'Will you, or will you not, answer my question, sir?' 'If you don't answer the question, you 'll be committed, sir,' interposed the little judge, looking over his note-book. 'Come, sir,' said Mr. Skimpin, 'yes or no, if you please.' 'Yes, I am.' 'Yes, you are. And why could n't you say that at once, sir? Perhaps you know the plaintiff too — eh, Mr. Winkle?'

[1] The name "Stareleigh," given by the novelist to this judge, is supposed to have signified Mr. J. Gaselee.

'I don't know her; I've seen her.' 'Oh, you don't know her, but you've seen her? Now, have the goodness to tell the gentlemen of the jury what you mean by that, Mr. Winkle.' 'I mean that I am not intimate with her, but that I have seen her when I went to call on Mr. Pickwick, in Goswell Street.' 'How often have you seen her, sir?' 'How often?' 'Yes, Mr. Winkle, how often? I'll repeat the question for you a dozen times, if you require it, sir.' And the learned gentleman, with a firm and steady frown, placed his hands on his hips, and smiled suspiciously at the jury. On this question there arose the edifying brow-beating, customary on such points. First of all, Mr. Winkle said it was quite impossible for him to say how many times he had seen Mrs. Bardell. Then he was asked if he had seen her twenty times, to which he replied, 'Certainly, — more than that.' Then he was asked whether he had n't seen her a hundred times — whether he could n't swear that he had seen her more than fifty times — whether he did n't know that he had seen her at least seventy-five times — and so forth; the satisfactory conclusion which was arrived at, at last, being, that he had better take care of himself, and mind what he was about. The witness having been by these means reduced to the requisite ebb of nervous perplexity, the examination was continued. . . . Tracy Tupman and Augustus Snodgrass were severally called into the box; both corroborated the testimony of their unhappy friend; and each was driven to the verge of desperation by excessive badgering."

1857, Mr. Anthony Trollope, The Three Clerks, c. XL: "Mr. Chaffanbrass was one of an order by no means yet extinct, but of whom it may be said that their peculiarities are somewhat less often seen than they were when Mr. Chaffanbrass was in his prime. . . . Those who most dreaded Mr. Chaffanbrass, and who had most occasion to do so, were the witnesses. A rival lawyer could find a protection on the bench when his powers of endurance were tried too far; but a witness in a court of law has no protection. He comes there unfeed, without hope of guerdon, to give such assistance to the State in repressing crime and assisting justice as his knowledge in the particular case may enable him to afford; and justice, in order to ascertain whether his testimony be true, finds it necessary to subject him to torture. One would naturally imagine that an undisturbed thread of clear evidence would be best obtained from a man whose position was made easy and whose mind was not harassed; but this is not the fact; to turn a witness to good account, he must be badgered this way and that till he is nearly mad; he must be made a laughing-stock for the court; his very truths must be turned into falsehoods, so that he may be falsely shamed; he must be accused of all manner of villany, threatened with all manner of punishment; he must be made to feel that he has no friend near him, that the world is all against him; he must be confounded till he forget his right hand from his left, till his mind be turned into chaos, and his heart into water; and then let him give his evidence. What will fall from his lips when in this wretched collapse must be of special value, for the best talents of practised forensic heroes are daily used to bring it about; and no member of the Humane Society interferes to protect the wretch. Some sorts of torture are as it were tacitly allowed even among humane people. Eels are skinned alive, and witnesses are scarified, and no one's blood curdles at the sight, no soft heart is sickened at the cruelty. To apply the thumbscrew, the boot, and the rack to the victim before him was the work of Mr. Chaffanbrass's life. . . . On the whole, Mr. Chaffanbrass is popular at the Old Bailey. Men congregate to hear him turn a witness inside out, and chuckle with an inward pleasure at the success of his cruelty."[2]

The remedy for such an abuse is in the hands of the judges. The disgrace of these occurrences is even more theirs than that of the offending counsel; for the former have not the temptation of partisanship to sway them, and their duty to interfere is easier to fulfil than the counsel's duty to refrain. The slack sense of duty thus so often exhibited becomes the more blamable in contrast with the scrupulous sentimentality which will be exhibited in insisting on the tender quiddities of the law that favor guilty persons, — such as the rules for confessions and the privilege against self-crimination. For the probably guilty, when brought to book, there is often an abundance of protection, while for the unimplicated and innocent witness, coming to serve justice and truth, there is scanty assistance. The sport is of more interest than the victim. Such judges, as well as counsel, were justly pilloried by the great novelist; and his pen expressed only the widespread feeling of dread and disgust among the laity for the abuses of the witness-box. Those abuses, it is true, are, as a whole, probably less to-day than they formerly were; but they are in many places still not uncommon. They are too frequent when they occur at all. The just denunciations of high-minded judges have sometimes stigmatized these practices as they deserve;[3] and there can be no doubt that the law sanctions the power and establishes the duty of the trial judge to use a proper discretion to prevent and rebuke them:

[2] Mr. E. Manson's "Cross-examination — a Socratic Dialogue" (8 Law Quart. Rev. 160), is a neat satire, after the manner of the Platonic dialogue, on the abuses of cross-examination. There is good reading in the letter of rebuke written by Smollett to a counsel who had wantonly abused him (Foss' Memories of Westminster Hall, I, 235).

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, in his Notes to Pothier, II, 229: "The abuses to which this procedure is liable are the subject of very frequent complaint, but it would be absolutely impossible, by any but general rules, to apply a preventive to these abuses without destroying the liberty upon which the benefits above adverted to essentially depend; and all that can be effected by the interposition of the Court is a discouragement of any virulence towards the witnesses which is not justified by the nature of the cause, and a sedulous attention to remove from the minds of the jury the impressions which are rather to be imputed to the vehemence of the advocate than to the prevarication of the witness. Whatever can elicit the actual dispositions of the witness with respect to the event, — whatever can detect the operation of a concerted plan of testimony, or bring into light the incidental facts and circumstances that the witness may be supposed to have suppressed, — in short, whatever may be expected fairly to promote the real manifestation of the merits of the cause, is not only justifiable but meritorious. But I conceive that a client has no right to expect from his counsel an endeavour to assist his cause, or what is a more frequent object, to gratify his passions, by unmerited abuse, by embarrassing or intimidating witnesses of whose veracity he has no real suspicion, or by conveying an impression of discredit which he does not actually feel; and that where such expectations are intimated, there is an imperious duty upon the advocate, who, while the protector of private right, is also the minister of public justice, which requires them to be repelled. Considering the subject merely as a matter of discretion, the adoption of an unfair conduct in cross-examination has often an effect repugnant to the interests which it professes to promote. . . . But however unfavourable an injudicious asperity of cross-examination may be to the advancement of a cause, it, for the most part, is congenial to the wishes of the party; the neglect of it is regarded as an indifference to his interests and a dereliction of duty; and the practice of it is one of the surest harbingers of professional success."

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. II, c. IX, b. III, c. V (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, pp. 338, 406): "Under the name of brow-beating (a mode of oppression of which witnesses in the station of respondents are the more immediate objects) a practice is designated, which has been the subject of a complaint too general to be likely to be altogether groundless. Oppression in this form has a particular propensity to alight upon those witnesses who have been called upon that side of the cause (whichever it may be) that has the right on its side; because the more clearly a side is in the right, the less need has it for any such assistance as it is in the nature of any such dishonest arts to administer to it. . . . Brow-beating is that sort of offence which never can be committed by any advocate who has not the judge for his accomplice. . . . Rule 1. Every expression of reproach, as if for established mendacity: every such manifestation, however expressed — by language, gesture, countenance, tone of voice (especially at the outset of the examination) — ought to be abstained from by the examining advocate. If the tendency of such style of address were to promote the extraction of material truth, at the same time that the action of it could not be supplied to equal effect by any other plan of examination, — the vexation thus produced (how sharp soever) not being of any considerable duration, the liberty might be allowed, with preponderant advantage for the furtherance of justice. But, on a close investigation, no advantage, but rather a disadvantage, even in respect of furtherance of justice, seems to be the natural result of an assumption of this kind. . . . By reproachful and terrifying demeanour on the part of a person invested with, and acting under, an authority thus formidable, it seems full as natural that an honest witness should be confounded, and thus deprived of recollection and due utterance, and even (through confusion of mind) betrayed into self-contradiction and involuntary falsehood, as that a dishonest witness should be detected and exposed. The quiet mode above described is not in any degree susceptible of this sort of abuse: the outrageous mode seems more likely to terminate in the abuse than in the use. . . . Rule 2. Such unwarranted manifestations, if not abstained from by the advocate, ought to be checked, with marks of disapprobation, by the judge. In the presence of the judge, any misbehaviour, which, being witnessed at the time by the judge, is regarded by him without censure, becomes in effect the act, the misbehaviour, of the judge. On him more particularly should the reproach of it lie; because, for the connivance (which is in effect the authorization) of it, he cannot ever possess any of those excuses, which may ever and anon present themselves on the part of the advocate. The demand for the honest vigilance and occasional interference of the judge will appear the stronger, when due consideration is had of the strength of the temptation, to which, on this occasion, the probity of the advocate is exposed. Sinister interests in considerable variety concur in instigating him to this improper practice. . . . Rule 3. When, on the false supposition of a disposition to mendacity, an honest witness has been treated accordingly by the cross-examining advocate (the judge having suffered the examination to be conducted in that manner, for the sake of truth) — at the close of which examination all doubts respecting the probity of the witness have been dispelled, — it is a moral duty on the part of the judge to do what depends on him towards soothing the irritation sustained by the witness's mind; to wit, by expressing his own satisfaction respecting the probity of the witness, and the sympathy and regret excited by the irritation he has undergone. . . . Under the spur of the provocation, I remember now and then to have observed the witness turn upon the advocate in the way of retaliation. On an occasion of this sort, I have also now and then observed the judge to interpose, for the purpose of applying a check to the petulance of the witness. For one occasion in which, under the spur of the injury, the injured witness has presented himself to my conception as overstepping the limits of a just defence, — ten, twenty, or twice twenty, have occurred, in which the witness has been suffering, without resistance and without remedy, as well as without just cause, under the torture inflicted on him by the oppression and insolence of an adverse advocate. Scarce ever, I think, had I the satisfaction of observing the judge interpose to afford his protection to the witness, either at the commencement of the persecution, for the purpose of staying or alleviating the injury, or at the conclusion, for the purpose of affording satisfaction for it, — such inadequate satisfaction as the nature of the case admits of."

[3] "Mr. Baron Alderson once remarked to a counsel of this type, 'Mr. ——, you seem to think that the art of cross-examination is to examine crossly'" (Serjeant's Ballantine's Experiences of a Barrister's Life, 105).

1843, Lord Langdale, M. R., in Johnston v. Todd, 5 Beav. 601: "Witnesses, and particularly illiterate witnesses, must always be liable to give imperfect or erroneous evidence, even when orally examined in open Court. The novelty of the situation, the agitation and hurry which accompanies it, the cajolery or intimidation to which the witness may be subjected, the want of questions calculated to excite those recollections which might clear up every difficulty, and the confusion occasioned by cross-examination, as it is too often conducted, may give rise to important errors and omissions."

1857, Lowrie, J., in Eliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 66: "It is entirely natural that in the public trial of causes the earnestness of counsel should often become unduly intense; and it is not possible to prevent this without such an attribution and exercise of power as would be entirely inconsistent with that freedom of thought that is necessary to all thorough investigation. The remedy for it is to be found in inner rather than in outer discipline. Those who are zealously seeking the truth cannot always be watchful to measure their demeanor and expressions in accordance with the feelings or even with the rights of others. This zeal, even when inordinate, must be excused, because it is necessary in the search of truth; and generally it is not possible to condemn it as misguided or excessive until its fault has been proved by the discovery of the truth in the opposite direction; and possibly its very excess may have contributed to the discovery. When the presiding judge is respected and prudent, a hint kindly given is generally all that is needed to restrain such ardor, when it does not arise in any degree from habitual want of respect for the rights of others and for the order of public business. Witnesses often suffer very unjustly from this undue earnestness of counsel, and they are entitled to the watchful protection of the Court. In the court they stand as strangers, surrounded with unfamiliar circumstances, giving rise to an embarrassment known only to themselves; and in mere generosity and common humanity they are entitled to be treated, by those accustomed to such scenes, with great consideration, — at least until it becomes manifest that they are disposed to be disingenuous. The heart of the Court and jury, and all disinterested manliness, spontaneously recoil at a harsh and unfair treatment of them, and the cause that adopts such treatment is very apt to suffer by it. It is only where weakness sits in judgment that it can benefit any cause. Add to this that a mind rudely assailed naturally shuts itself against its assailant, and reluctantly communicates the truths that it possesses."[4]

The following instance illustrates for orthodox practice the dividing line between propriety and impropriety:

[4] The principle, in one or another form, is recognized in the following statutes and cases: Alaska C. C. P. 1900, §§ 662, 676 (like Or. Annot. C. 1892, § 833, 848); Ark. Stats. 1894, § 2955 ("The Court shall exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation, so as to make it rapid, distinct, as little annoying to the witness and as effective for the extraction of the truth as may be"); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 2044 ("The Court must exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation, so as to make it as rapid, as distinct, as little annoying to the witness, and as effective for the extraction of truth, as may be; but, subject to this rule, the parties may put such pertinent and legal questions as they see fit"); § 2066 ("It is the right of the witness to be protected from irrelevant, improper, or insulting questions, and from harsh or insulting demeanor"); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75 (after an answer, "Yes, I have seen him," the question, "That is, you imagine you have?" was held properly excluded); Conn. Gen. St. 1887, § 768 ("during the trial of a cause, witnesses shall not be interrupted except for the purpose of having notes of their testimony taken by the stenographer"); Ky. C. C. P. 1895, § 593 (Court is to exercise a "reasonable control" over interrogation, so as to make it "as little annoying to the witness and as effective for the extraction of the truth as may be"); 1901, State v. Prendible, 165 Mo. 329, 65 S. W. 559 (a merely abusive cross-examination, held improper); Mont. C. C. P. 1895, §§ 3372, 3402 (like Cal. C. C. P. §§ 2044, 2066); 1872, Haines v. Ins. Co., 52 N. H. 470 (questions intended to intimidate or embarrass the witness, held improper; questions asking explanations should be made "in mild and brief terms, and in a civil manner"); Or. C. C. P. 1892, §§ 833, 848 (like Cal. C. C. P. §§ 2044, 2066); Utah Rev. St. 1898, § 3432 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2066).

For intimidation by the opponent in the court-room, see post, § 1399. For intimidation to obtain a confession, see post, §§ 831 ff.

1820, Ings' Trial, 33 How. St. Tr. 957, 999; Mr. Adolphus, cross-examining an alleged accomplice: "I think you told us some things then [Monday, at another trial for the same plot] that did not come to your recollection to-day?" A. "That may be. I will not pretend to say, that the next time I come up here I can communicate everything as I have done to-day." Q. Certainly not; there are people that proverbially ought to have a good memory?" A. "Yes, certainly." Q. "You make your evidence a little longer or shorter, according as the occasion suits?" A. "Yes, I mention the circumstances as they come to my recollection." . . . Mr. Gurney: "That is observation, and not question." Mr. Adolphus: "I am asking him a question." . . . L. C. J. Dallas: "You should not now observe on the evidence." Mr. Adolphus: "This about the digging entrenchments you did not state on Monday?" A. "No, I forgot that." Q. "The next time there will be a new story?" Mr. Gurney: "I must interpose, my lord." L. C. J. Dallas: "All these observations are certainly incorrect." Mr. Adolphus: "He has said it himself; 'when next I come into the box, I shall recollect other things,' and upon that I put the question, whether he would tell another story the next time he comes." L. C. J. Dallas: "Ask him the question if you wish it." Mr. Adolphus: "Shall you tell us a new story the next time?" A. "No. If anything new occurs to my mind when I come to stand here, I will state it."

Resting upon the same principle that forbids intimidating questions is the rule excluding confessions made under menaces (post, §§ 831 ff.); and it is in part for a similar reason that a rule is enforced, in most jurisdictions (post, § 983), against cross-questioning a witness to an unnecessary extent upon his past misdeeds.

§ 782. Repetition of Questions. The repetition of a question or a topic may or may not be objectionable, according to its purpose.

(1) Repeating an unanswered question upon an inadmissible point, already ruled out by the Court, is of course an impertinence to the Court; and, while it may sometimes become desirable and allowable to renew an offer of testimony in approximately the same form, in order to secure its admission after obviating its original defects (ante, § 17), this attempt, made in good faith, is to be distinguished from a merely persistent effort to elude the vigilance of opponent and judge by repeating precisely the same forbidden offer, for this is at once useless, wasteful, and disrespectful.[1]

(2) Repeating an allowable question already once answered, or covering the same ground of facts in other questions, on the direct examination, is ordinarily superfluous and therefore improper. Nevertheless, circumstances may arise which make it desirable to emphasize certain facts anew; and the trial Court's discretion should control.[2] This situation, however, so far as the questions are repeated on a re-direct examination, concerns rather the repetition of the evidential facts than of the mere questions about them, and hence is governed by the principles as to Order of Evidence (post, §§ 1883 ff.).[3]

(3) Repeating the same testimonial matter of the direct examination, by questioning the witness anew on cross-examination, is a process which often becomes desirable (on the principle of § 995, post) in order to test the witnes capacity to recollect what he has just stated and to ascertain whether he fal easily into inconsistencies and thus betrays falsification. In spite of its fr quent tedium and unskilful handling, this process often proves useful; an the discretion of the trial Court must suffice to fix its limits:

[1] 1893, Jones v. Stevens, 36 Nebr. 849, 852, 55 N. W. 251 (repeating after objection sustained; excluded in discretion).

[2] 1900, Singer & T. S. Co. v. Hutchinson, 184 Ill. 169, 56 N. E. 353 (excluded on the facts); 1876, Ulrich v. People, 39 Mich. 245, 251; 1885, Simon v. Home Ins. Co. 58 id. 278, 25 N. W. 190.

[3] For recalling a witness to make a correction, see also post, § 786.

1872, Christiancy, C. J., in O'Donnell v. Segar, 25 Mich. 367, 371: "The defendants h a clear right, on cross-examination of this witness, to put any question calculated, not on to test his credibility and the extent and means of his knowledge, but to draw out any fa which might tend either to contradict, weaken, or explain any one of the particular stat ments made by the witness or to weaken any inference from the whole or any part of h testimony in chief in support of either of the main facts essential to the plaintiff's cas And since, if a question on cross-examination relates to the subject to which the dire examination related, . . . the Court cannot usually say, before the question is answere whether the answer will elicit anything tending to contradict, weaken, or explain any the facts or the inference from any of the facts stated in the direct examination, or test the credibility or the extent or means of knowledge of the witness, the only safe ge eral rule upon cross-examination is to allow the party cross-examining to go over t whole subject or subjects to which the direct examination related, and to give him th chance to draw out as far as he may be able any fact which (within the principles and fo the purposes above explained) he has the right to elicit on cross-examination. . . Cross-examination is the great test of the knowledge as well as of the veracity of wi nesses. The right to pursue it may sometimes be abused; and when it is sought to b abused, as when the counsel insists upon going over the same ground again and agai or when it is apparent that the witness has already fully answered without any appea ance of evasion, and it is evident that the counsel is merely pushing the witness fo sake of annoyance or for any illegitimate purpose, it is competent for the Court in i discretion to put an end to it. But we see no evidence of an attempt at such abuse i this case."

1891, Champlin, C. J., in Zucker v. Karpeles, 88 Mich. 424, 50 N. W. 373: "We kno of no rule of practice that prohibits an attorney from requesting a witness to repeat wha he has testified to upon a particular point in his direct examination. He has a right t have it repeated, for the purpose not only of testing the recollection of the witness, bu of ascertaining whether he makes a statement at variance with what he testified to i chief. Of course it would not be permissible for an attorney to pass through the whole c the direct examination and ask the witness to repeat it; and such was not the case her The attorney had not abused his privilege, nor, as it appears from the record, unneces sarily consumed the time of the court in a fruitless attempt at cross-examination."[4]

(4) Repeating precisely the same objectionable question on cross-examination, i order by sheer moral force to compel a witness to admit the truth, after a original false answer or refusal to answer, is a process which not only savor of intimidation and browbeating, but also tends to waste time. Accordingly it is not doubtful that the trial Court has discretion to refuse or to allow this as seems best under the circumstances.[5] Nevertheless, when used sparingly

[4] 1902, People v. Rader, 136 Cal. 253, 68 Pac. 706; 1903, Mathis v. State, — Fla. —, 34 So. 287; 1883, Winklemans v. R. Co., 62 Ia. 11, 17; 1850, Odiorne v. Bacon, 5 Cush. 185, 191 (allowable in discretion; here by asking the witness to re-state his knowledge on a certain point).

For other instances of testing the recollection on cross-examination, see post, §§ 994, 1006.

[5] 1875, Wesley v. State, 52 Ala. 182, 188 1869, Schwartze v. Yearly, 31 Md. 270, 276 1890, Brown v. State, 72 id. 468, 475, 20 At 186; 1874, Demerritt v. Randall, 116 Mass. 33 ("how many times the same question should b repeated on cross-examination [when the witnes declines to express an opinion in answer], an how far the witness should be compelled t answer, were matters within the discretion o and against a witness who in the cross-examiner's belief is falsifying, there ought to be no judicial interference; for there is perhaps none of the lesser expedients (that is, ranking after Cross-examination and Sequestration) which has so keen and striking an efficacy, when employed by skilful hands, in extracting the truth and exposing a lie. Simple as this expedient seems, it rests on a deep moral basis; and the annals of our trials demonstrate its power. In the following passages, ranging over three centuries, some of the most notable illustrations will be found:

1682, Count Coningsmark's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1, 55 (the Count, charged with murder, was said to have absconded in disguise; and a Swedish fellow-countryman of his, at whose house he had changed his clothes, was called): Q. "Pray, what did the Count say to you about his coming in disguise to your house?" A. "He said nothing, but that he was desirous to go to Gravesend; . . . I helped him to a coat, stocking, and shoes." Q. "Then I ask you, what did he declare to you?" A. "Why, he did desire to have those clothes." Q. "You are an honest man, tell the truth." A. "He declared nothing to me." Q. "Did he desire you to let him have your clothes because he was in trouble?" A. "He desired a coat of me, and a pair of stockings to keep his legs warm." Q. "I do ask you, did he declare the reason why he would have those cloaths was because he would not be known?" A. "He said he was afraid of coming into trouble." Q. "Why were you unwilling to tell this?"

1768, Lord Baltimore's Trial, Gurney's Rep. 77 (abduction and rape of Sarah Woodcock; the testimony showed plainly that the case was in truth one of willing seduction, although the complainant testified flatly to the use of force and coercion; her evidence was suspiciously inconsistent, and, on her cross-examination by the accused himself, the following answers were elicited): Q. "How old are you?" A. "I am twenty-seven." Q. "Will you swear you are no older?" A. "I will swear I am twenty-eight." Q.: "Will you swear you are no older?" A. "I will swear I am that." Q. "Will you swear you are no older?" A. "I do not know I need tell; I am twenty-nine, and that is my age; I cannot exactly tell." Q. "To the best of your belief, how old are you?" A. "I believe I am thirty next July; I cannot be sure of that, whether I am or no."

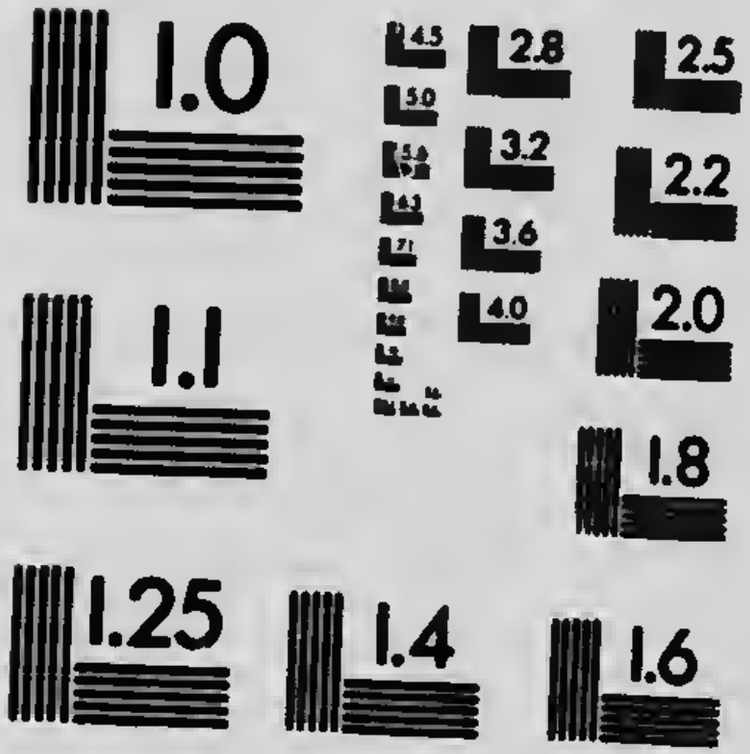
1784, Horton's Trial, Sel. Crim. Trials at Old Bailey, I, 456 (the accused, aged 11, was indicted for felonious larceny; and one Isaac Barney, a patrolman, swore to a confession by the boy when under arrest that he had watched while two men entered the house; the following comprised the entire cross-examination of this witness): Counsel: "You had frighted this poor child out of his senses?" Witness: "I do not think he was afraid." Counsel: "Do you know what reward there is for the conviction of this poor infant?" Witness: "Upon my oath I do not know." Counsel: "Do you mean to say that you, a patrol, do not know?" Witness: "I am sure it is a thing I never had." Counsel: "You shall not slip through my fingers so." Witness: "Upon my word and honor I do not know." Counsel: "Upon your oath, sir?" Witness: "I do not." Counsel: "Did you never hear that there was a reward of forty pounds upon the conviction of that child?" Witness: "I never knew any such thing." Counsel: "But you have heard it?" Witness: "I never heard any such thing." Counsel: "Come, come, sir, it is a fair question, and the jury see and hear you. Upon your oath, did you never hear that you would be the presiding judge"); 1888, Gutsch v. McIlhargey, 69 Mich. 377, 37 N. W. 303; 1898, Stern v. Stanton, 184 Pa. 468, 39 Atl. 404; 1888, Railway v. Pool, 70 Tex. 715; 1893, Shaw v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 155, 169, 22 N. W. 588; 1897, Middlesex B. Co. v. Smith, 27 C. C. A. 485, 83 Fed. 133 (exclusion of third or fourth repetition, held proper); 1897, McMahon v. Waterworks Co., 95 Wis. 640, 70 N. W. 829. The following case, so far as it denies a discretion, is clearly unsound: 1896, People v. Barberi, 149 N. Y. 256, 43 N. E. 635 ("we are wholly unable to perceive any such element of improbability in her direct narrative . . . as to warrant such a wide and unusual departure from the ordinary and usual methods"; here the accused was asked the same questions six or eight times in succession).

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

entitled to forty pounds as the price of that poor infant's blood?" Witness: "Your honor, I cannot say." Counsel: "But you shall say before you leave that place." Witness: "I have heard other people talking about such things." Counsel: "So I thought; and with that answer I leave your testimony with the jury."

1820, Queen Caroline's Trial, Linn's Ed., I, 48, 78; in attempting to prove an act of adultery at Naples, between the Queen and her servant Bergami, one of the material facts alleged by the prosecution was that the Queen's sleeping-room adjoined Bergami's, with only a corridor and a cabinet intervening, and that there was no access from the Queen's room to Bergami's except by that passage; to this the servant Majocchi, who for a time slept in the cabinet mentioned, testified as follows, on being asked by Mr. Solicitor-General Copley (afterwards L. C. Lyndhurst) whether there was no other intervening passage: "There was nothing else. One was obliged to pass through the corridor, from the corridor to the cabinet, and from the cabinet into the room of Bergami. There was nothing else." Then, on his cross-examination, Mr. Brougham asked as follows: "Will you swear there was no passage by which her Royal Highness could enter Bergami's room, when he was confined with his illness, except going through the room [i. e. cabinet] where you slept?" Majocchi: "I have seen that passage; other passages I have not seen." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear there was no other passage?" Majocchi: "There was a great saloon, after which there came the room of her Royal Highness, after which there was a little corridor, and so you passed into the cabinet. I have seen no other passage." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear there was no other passage?" Majocchi: "I can not swear; I have seen no other but this; and I cannot say there was any other but this." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear that there was no other way by which any person going into Bergami's room could go, except by passing through the cabinet?" Majocchi: "I cannot swear that there is another; I have seen but that; there might have been, but I have not seen any, and I cannot assert but that alone." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear that if a person wished to go from the Princess' [i. e. Queen's] room to Bergami's room, he or she could not go any other way than through the cabinet in which you slept?" "Majocchi: "There was another passage to go into the room of Bergami." Mr. Brougham: "Without passing through the cabinet where you slept?" Majocchi: "Yes."[6]

1880, Parnell Commission's Proceeding, 26th day, Times' Rep. pt. 7, pp. 137, 147; the Irish Land League was charged with complicity in crime and agrarian outrage; the fact of crime and outrage it admitted, but denied any complicity, and placed the responsibility on certain lawless secret societies of local origin; the issue turned largely on the identity of these societies with the League; many witnesses testified to meetings of lawless societies, and the inference, expressed or implied, was that these were Land League branches; the murder of Lord Mountmorres was under inquiry, and one Michael Burke, a shifty witness, having a bad record, testified to the concocting of the murder at such a meeting held in one Pat Kearney's house. "I know Pat Kearney; he keeps a public house at Clonbur; he was secretary to the Land League, I believe. The Land League meetings were held in his house sometimes." Q. "Before Lord Mountmorres was murdered, was there a meeting held at Pat Kearney's house?" A. "There was a kind of a meeting held, sir." Q. "Just tell us what the talk was?" A. "It was spoken of that he [Lord Mountmorres] should be done away with." This was direct enough that the local Land League branch had at a meeting plotted Lord Mountmorres' murder; but on cross-examination, Sir Charles Russell, after bringing out the witness' bad record and involving him in several shifty answers, finally returned to the meat of the testimony, namely, whether the meeting was a Land League meeting at all; after getting the witness to admit that he was not sure whether the meetings were League meetings, the cross-examiner continued: Q. "Now, tell me, will you swear there was a Land League at all at Clonbur in 1880?" A. "I will not swear whether there was or not, but I was told

[6] See another good example, ib. I, 48, 115.

there was by several people." Q. "Who told you?" A. "Several people." Q. "Who told you there was a Land League branch in Clonbur?" A. "I was told by several people, but I could not swear by whom." Q. "Will you swear there was any branch of the Land League at all in Clonbur before Lord Mountmorres' death?" A. "I was told there was." . . . Q. "Who told you there was a Land League in Clonbur?" A. "I can only —" Q. "Attend to me; who told you there was a Land League in Clonbur?" A. "Several people, Sir." Q. "Attend; who — if anybody — told you there was a Land League branch before Lord Mountmorres' murder?" A. "I can only —" Q. "Will you swear anybody told you?" A. "I could not swear what were the men's names, but I was told by several people." Q. "Attend to me; will you swear you were told by anyone before Lord Mountmorres was murdered that there was a Land League branch at Clonbur?" A. "There was some kind of branch; I could not swear what branch it was. I know there was a branch." Q. "Will you swear, on your oath, that anyone told you there was a branch of the Land League in Clonbur, before Lord Mountmorres was murdered?" A. "I was told, but I do not know the name of the man." . . . Q. "Attend to me, I will have an answer." A. "Not to that question, because I cannot answer it; I have said all I know." Q. "Attend to me." A. "I am attending as well as I can." Q. "Will you swear anyone told you before Lord Mountmorres was murdered that there was a Land League branch at Clonbur?" A. "I was told there was a branch, but I could not say what it was; I could not say whether it was a Land League branch or not." Q. "Why did you not tell me so before?" [7]

§ 783. Multiple Examiners; Length of Examination. (1) It has long been a tradition that but one counsel should question during a single stage in the examination (direct or cross or re-direct) of a single witness; and this tradition rests on a wise policy of protecting the witness from undue and confusing interrogation, as well as of securing system and brevity by giving the control of the interrogation into a single hand:

1809, Doe v. Roe, 2 Camp. 280: "There were two counsel for the plaintiff; the junior having called a witness who seemed disposed to shuffle and prevaricate, the leader interposed, and was proceeding to examine him; the counsel on the opposite side contended that this was irregular, and that although, where there were several counsel on the same side, they might arrange among themselves by whom the witnesses should be examined, yet that when the examination of a witness was begun by one gentleman, the others had no right to put a question; they might privately suggest questions proper to be put, but could not address any directly to the witness; if this rule were not adhered to, a witness might be subject to the examination or cross-examination of as many barristers as were retained for the plaintiff or defendant, much time would be wasted, and great confusion would be introduced into proceedings at Nisi Prius. Ellenborough, L. C. J.: 'Convenience certainly requires that the examination of a witness should be carried on entirely by the gentleman who begins it; and several counsel clearly cannot be permitted to put questions to the same witness, one after another, in the manner apprehended. But I think the leading counsel has a right, in his discretion, to interpose, and to take the examination into his own hands. Very unpleasant consequences might follow if this were not allowed. If a gentleman, it being his first appearance in a court of justice, should be much embarrassed in the course of examining a witness, it would be hard if it were in the power of the opposite party to prevent his leader from stepping in to his relief. And other occasions may be imagined when it may be very important that the gentleman who conducts the cause should have the privilege of putting questions to a witness originally called by a co-adjutor. In the present state of the bar, there is no danger of this privilege being abused.'"

[7] Another example is found in the same trial, 61st day, Times' Report, pt. 15, p. 149. An instance of the same expedient by that great cross-examiner, Daniel O'Connell, occurs in Kennedy's Trial, p. 6 (Mongan's Celebrated Trials in Ireland). Still another good example is R. v. Bernard, 8 St. Tr. N. S. 887, 958 (1858).

This rule has been recognized in judicial rulings generally, and also in a few statutes;[1] doubtless, also, in many local rules of court. It is of course subject to reasonable exceptions allowable in the trial Court's discretion;[2] moreover, it ought not to apply to the examination of another witness, nor of the same witness at another stage or by a separate party in the same stage,[3] nor to any process but that of putting the questions to the witness.[4]

(2) The length of time occupied in questioning may of course fitly be the subject of reasonable limits, fixed beforehand if possible;[5] and a mutual agreement as to time is often made.

§ 784. Questions by the Judge. The sporting theory of the common law,[1] in which litigation was a game of skill, to be conducted according to specific rules and to be decided by the combined effects of skill, strength, and luck, tended to place the judge primarily in the position of the umpire of a game, whose duty it was to interfere only so far as needed to decide whether the rules of the game had been violated. This tendency never dominated (so far as the judge's functions were concerned) in the orthodox English practice; the judge there has never ceased to perform an active and virile part as a director of the proceedings and as an administrator of justice. Nevertheless,

[1] 1815, Chippendale v. Masson, 4 Camp. 174 (two defendants, relying on the same defence; Gibbs, C. J., said, "The interests of the defendants being the same, I can only hear one counsel; . . . the witnesses are to be examined by the counsel successively, in the same manner as if the defence were joint and not separate"); 1835, Mason v. Ditchbourne, 1 Moo. & Rob. 460, 462 (same ruling by Lord Abinger, C. B., as to addressing the jury); 1836, Chitty, General Practice, 2d ed., III, 891 a ("After one counsel has brought his examination to a close, no other counsel on the same side can put a question to the same witness"); 1882, Walker v. McMillan, 21 N. Br. 31, 44, 6 Can. Sup. 241, 245 (two defendants, pleading the same defence by the same attorney and counsel, allowed to cross-examine by one counsel only); 1900, Kasson's Est., 127 Cal. 496, 59 Pac. 950 (right of cross-examination exists for each party appearing and making claim or answer; here, cross-examination by one claimant as heir allowed to cover the same ground as that covered by another claimant; the trial Court's discretion to prevent useless repetition); Ga. Code 1895, § 5691 ("In all cases in which more than one attorney is retained on either side, the examination and cross-examination shall be conducted by one of the counsel only; and at the opening of the case both parties shall state to the Court to which attorney the examination and cross-examination of witnesses is confined"); Ia. Code, 1897, § 3700; N. Mex. Comp. L. 1897, § 2990 ("But one counsel on each side shall examine the same witness").

[2] 1809, Doe v. Roe, 2 Camp. 290 (see quotation supra); 1875, Tilton v. Beecher, N. Y., Abbott's Rep. I, 552 (one of defendant's counsel, after cross-examining for two days the plaintiff's chief witness, fell ill, and under the circumstances the remainder, occupying five days, was allowed to be completed by another counsel); 1902, Citizens' Bank v. Fromholz, 64 Nebr. 284, 89 N. W. 775 (trial Court's discretion controls).

[3] 1834, Ridgway v. Philip, 1 C. M. & R. 415, 417 (cross-examinations by counsel for separate parties, allowable); 1874, State v. Bryant, 55 Mo. 75 (rule of Court forbidding more than one counsel on either side to examine; held ineffective to prevent counsel for one co-defendant from cross-examining in addition to counsel for the other co-defendant); 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 25, 7 N. W. 444 (the same attorney may be required to complete a single examination of the same witness, unless in exceptional cases; but no reasonable rule can require "the same attorney who took part in the examination in chief to conduct the cross-examination").

[4] 1887, Baumier v. Antiau, 65 Mich. 31, 31 N. W. 888 (under a court rule that "one counsel only on each side shall examine and cross-examine witnesses," another counsel may "make objections and move to strike out testimony and argue his objections").

[5] 1900, Munro v. Stowe, 175 Mass. 169, 55 N. E. 992 (cross-examination of a single witness held limitable in discretion to three hours). For the limitation of the number of witnesses, see post, § 1907.

For the length of a hypothetical question, see ante, § 683.

[1] Post, § 1845.

in the United States the degenerate tendency has steadily been towards the domination of the function of umpire presiding over contestants in a game; not only has public opinion pressed towards this end, but the judiciary as a whole has often not resisted, but rather abdicated. Several reasons, unnecessary to analyze here, have contributed to this; chief among the illustrations of the tendency is, perhaps, the ill-advised yet almost universal legislative prohibition against comments by the judge upon the evidence in his charge to the jury.[2]

One of the natural parts of the judicial function, in its orthodox and sound recognition, is the judge's power and duty to put to the witnesses such additional questions as seem to him desirable to elicit the truth more fully. This just exercise of his function was never doubted at common law; the judge could even call a new witness of his own motion,[3] and could seek evidence to inform himself judicially;[4] much more could he ask additional questions of a witness already called but imperfectly examined. Fortunately, in spite of the strong but subtle tendency to force the purely judicial function into the background, the tradition of the common law has never been lost; the right of the judge to interrogate as he thinks best has always been preserved in theory. It has, however, been necessary more frequently to maintain and vindicate it and to resist encroachment upon it; although, in coming down to the present day, a note of faintheartedness can be heard in these defensive utterances:

1794, Mr. Edmund Burke, Report of Committee on Warren Hastings' Trial, 31 Parl. Hist. 348: "It is the duty of the Judge to receive every offer of evidence, apparently material, suggested to him, though the parties themselves through negligence, ignorance, or corrupt collusion, should not bring it forward. A judge is not placed in that high situation merely as a passive instrument of parties. He has a duty of his own, independent of them, and that duty is to investigate the truth. . . . If no prosecutor appears (and it has happened more than once), the Court is obliged, through its officer the clerk of the arraigns, to examine and cross-examine every witness who presents himself; and the judge is to see it done effectively, and to act his own part in it."

1855, Lumpkin, J., in Epps v. State, 19 Ga. 118; "We know of no limit to the right which belongs to the Court of interrogating witnesses, either in civil or criminal cases, especially the latter. The life or death of a man may hang upon a full development of the truth. The presumption that this liberty will not be honorably and impartially exercised is not to be tolerated for a moment. When they see, therefore, that a material fact has been omitted which ought to be brought out, it is not only the right but the duty of the presiding judge to call the attention of the witness to it, whether it makes for or against the prosecution; his aim being neither to punish the innocent nor screen the guilt, but to administer the law correctly."

1882, Bickwell, C. C., in Huffman v. Cauble, 86 Ind. 591, 596: "A circuit judge presiding at a trial is not a mere moderator between contending parties; he is a sworn officer charged with grave public duties. In order to establish justice and maintain truth and prevent wrong, he has a large discretion in the application of rules of practice. . . . There is nothing wrong in the Court's asking the witness any question the answer to which would likely throw any light upon the testimony."

1898, Harrison, C. J., in Bartley v. State, 55 Nebr. 294, 75 N. W. 832: "It is undoubtedly necessary that the judge who presided should acquire as full knowledge of the facts and circumstances of the case on trial as possible, in order that he may instruct the jury, and correctly, to the extent his duty demands, shape the determination of the litigated matters, that justice may not miscarry, but may prevail; and doubtless it is allowable at times, and under some circumstances, for the presiding judge to interrogate a witness. The exact extent or [times] when the exigencies may warrant an exercise of this right are matters which are not capable of very precise statement, but it may be said that the right here in question is one which should be very sparingly exercised, and, generally, counsel for the parties should be relied on and allowed to manage and bring out their own case. The actions of the judge in this respect should never be such as to warrant any assertion that they were with a view to assistance of the one or the other party to the cause." [1]

[2] Post, § 2551. Compare also the doctrine of new trials, ante, § 21.
[3] Post, § 2484.
[4] Post, § 2569.

It follows that a judge's questions may be leading in form, simply because the reason for the prohibition of leading questions (ante, § 769) has no application to the relation between judge and witness:

1813, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in 25 Hansard Parl. Deb. 207 (answering criticisms on the procedure of a Commission inquiring into the charges against the Princess of Wales): "Folly, my lords, has said that in examining the witnesses we put leading questions. The accusation is ridiculous; it is almost too absurd to deserve notice. In the first place, admitting the fact, can it be objected to a judge that he put leading questions? Can it be objected to persons in the situation of the Commissioners that they put leading ques-

[1] The questioning was held proper, except as otherwise noted: Eng.: 1894, Coulson v. Disborough, 2 Q. B. 316; Ala.: 1847, Milton v. Rowland, 11 Ala. 737; 1877, Sparks v. State, 59 id. 82, 87 ("It is also his duty to propound to the witnesses such questions as he may deem necessary to elicit any relevant and material evidence"); 1903, Real v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 58; Colo.: 1874, Kansas P. R. Co. v. Miller, 2 Colo. 442, 452, 470; Conn.: 1901, Barlow B. Co. v. Parsons, 73 Conn. 696, 49 Atl. 205 (held improper on the facts; unsound opinion); Ga.: 1855, Epps v. State, 19 Ga. 111 (see quotation supra); 1856, Kelly v. State, ib. 425; 1860, McGinnis v. State, 31 id. 236, 261; 1885, Varnedoe v. State, 75 id. 181, 186; 1895, Bowden v. Achor, 95 id. 243, 22 S. E. 271; 1897, Kearney v. State, 101 id. 803, 29 S. E. 127; 1898, Gordan v. Irvine, 105 id. 144, 31 S. E. 151 (judge may interrogate, but not so as to cast discredit upon the witness); Ill.: 1902, Featherstone v. People, 194 Ill. 325, 62 N. E. 685; Ind.: 1876, Ferguson v. Hirsch, 54 Ind. 337; 1881, Lefever v. Johnson, 79 id. 554, 556; 1882, Huffman v. Cauble, 86 id. 591, 596; Ia.: 1897, State v. Spiers, 103, Ia. 711, 73 N. W. 336; Mass.: 1852, Palmer v. White, 10 Cush. 321, semble; Mo.: 1902, State v. Lockett, 168 Mo. 480, 68 S. W. 563 (but "provided this were done within such bonnds as control attorneys in similar interrogations," which seems an unsound restriction); Nebr.: 1887, Fager v. State, 22 Nebr. 332, 338 (held improper, except in necessary cases of a witness being obtuse, etc.); 1901, Nightingale v. State, 62 id. 371, 87 N. W. 158, 1903, South Omaha v. Fennell, — id. —, 94 N. W. 632; N. C.: 1879, State v. Lee, 80 N. C. 483, 485; Okl.: 1895, DeFord v. Painter, 3 Okl. 80, 41 Pac. 96; S. C.: 1890, State v. Atkinson, 33 S. C. 100, 107, 11 S. E. 693 (judge's course in "taking the cross-examination of several of the witnesses out of the hands of the solicitor," held not error of law); Tenn.: 1849, Butler v. Boyles, 10 Humph. 155 (holding the same for an arbitrator); 1870, Sharp v. Treece, 1 Heisk. 446, 448 (judge's question as to defendant's irrelevant political acts, reproved); 1880, Hill v. State, 5 Lea 725, 731 ("a judge is not a mere figure-head"; pertinent questions held not improper); 1890, McDonald v. State, 89 Tenn. 161, 164, 14 S. W. 487; 1891, Graham v. McReynolds, 90 id. 673, 692, 18 S. W. 272; 1900, State v. Hargroves, 104 id. 112, 56 S. W. 857; Tex.: C. Cr. P. 1895, § 772 (the Court may interrogate to ascertain the competency of an offered witness); Vt.: 1898, State v. Noakes, 70 Vt. 247, 40 Atl. 249 (trial Court in discretion may ask questions or suggest them to counsel); Wis.: 1903, Lowe v. State, — Wis. —, 96 N. W. 417 (allowable "when necessary to elicit the truth").

Occasionally, the subject is expressly treated from the point of view of the statutory or constitutional provision (above noted) against charging the jury upon the effect of the evidence: 1889, People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752 (question held improper as expressing an opinion upon defendant's guilt); 1902, Leo v. State, 63 Nebr. 723, 89 N. W. 303 (similar); 1898, Wilson v. R. Co., 52 S. C. 537, 30 S. E. 406 (judge's interrogation is not a violation of the constitutional prohibition). Compare Bentham's comments: 1827, Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. II, c. IX (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, p. 343).

tions? I have always understood, after some little experience, that the meaning of a leading question was this, and this only: That the judge restrains an advocate who produces a witness on one particular side of a question, and who may be supposed to have a leaning to that side of the question, from putting such interrogatories as may operate as an instruction to that witness how he is to reply to favor the party for whom he is adduced. The counsel on the other side, however, may put what questions he pleases, and frame them as best suits his purpose, because then the rule is changed; for there is no danger that the witness will be too complying. But even in a case where evidence is brought forward to support a particular fact, if the witness is obviously adverse to the party calling him, then again the rule does not prevail, and the most leading interrogatories are allowed. But to say that the judge on the bench may not put what questions and in what form he pleases can only originate in that dullness and stupidity which is the curse of the age."[2]

§ 785. Continuous Narration without Questions; Deposition-Interrogatories, and Responsive Answers. (1) May not the witness narrate his knowledge in a continuous form and without the interruption of questions? It is obvious that this method, on the one hand, has often the advantage of preserving continuity and clearness of thought for the witness himself and of saving time for all parties concerned; and, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of risking the witness' interjection of irrelevant matter without any opportunity for the opponent to know beforehand in time to object and to prevent it. It would seem that, so far as any rule of evidence is concerned, the discretion of the trial Court should be left to direct the proper mode for each witness. So far as it is a question of fact and judgment, for the examining counsel, it is not within the present purview. The following passages illustrate the principles applicable:

1682, Lord Grey's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 127, 176; Lady Henrietta Berkeley, apparently because of the hectoring of coarse tyrannical parents, had run away from home and hidden herself and secretly married a Mr. Turner; and the father preferred an indictment for her seduction and debauchery against Lord Grey, his son-in-law and her brother-in-law, who had concerned himself on her behalf; Lady Henrietta, whose character her mother had already blackened, took the stand for the defendant, and testified that she had left home alone and voluntarily, and was then told by the Court to sit down; L. Henrietta: "Will you not give me leave to tell the reason why I left my father's house . . ' Counsel for defendant: "We do not think fit to ask her any such question; she acquits us and that is enough." L. Henrietta: "But I desire to tell it myself; . . . will you not give me leave to speak for myself?" Mr. J. Dolben: "My lord, let her speak what she has a mind to; the jury are gentlemen of discretion enough to regard it no more than they ought;" Mr. J. Jones: "You are, madam, to answer only such questions as are asked you pertinent to the issue that the jury are to try; and if the counsel will ask you no questions, you are not to tell any story of yourself."[1]

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, III, 894: "It is certainly the practice, when the time and place of the scene of action have once been fixed, to desire the witness to give his own account of the matter, directing him, when not a professional person, to omit as he proceeds any account of what he has only heard from others and not seen or heard himself, and which he is too apt to suppose is quite as material as that which he himself has seen. . . . If his attention be first drawn to the transaction by asking him when and where it happened, and he be told to describe it from the beginning, he will generally proceed in his own way to detail all the facts in the due order of time. In each particular case, however, it is in the discretion of the Court to regulate the mode in which a witness in chief shall be examined, in order best to answer a purpose of justice; and there is no fixed rule which binds counsel to a particular mode of examining him."[2]

[2] 1855, Epps v. State, 19 Ga. 111 ("any legal question he pleases"); 1876, White v. State, 56 id. 385; 1878, Harris v. State, 61 id. 359 (but a question intimating an opinion as to guilt was held erroneous); 1898, Dunn v. People, 172 Ill. 582, 50 N. E. 137, semble (occasionally proper in discretion); 1882, Huffman v. Cauble, 86 Ind. 591, 596; 1852, Com. v. Galavan, 9 All. 272, 274; 1882, People v. Stevens, 47 Mich. 413, 418, 11 N. W. 220. Contra: 1900, State v. Crotts, 22 Wash. 245, 60 Pac. 403 (held improper on the facts).

[1] Whether here the facts desired to be given by the witness in explanation were relevant, is another question, depending partly upon the principles of §§ 1100 ff., post.

In a deposition it has always been customary to elicit the testimony by questions, and this is usually prescribed in the statutes authorizing the taking of depositions.[3] Where the deposition is taken by commission, the commissioner conducting the examination, and the parties' attorneys not being present, it is obvious that specific interrogatories, written out beforehand, are indispensable, because otherwise the opponent could not know accurately upon what facts he should cross-examine, and his cross-examination, being necessarily prepared before the despatch of the commission, would otherwise be perhaps futile. The necessity for specific interrogatories thus rests here on the right of adequate cross-examination and the rules for securing it (post, § 1392).

(2) Where the witness, either in a deposition or on the stand, goes beyond the scope of the question, and makes an answer not responsive, there is here nothing per se wrong. If the answer includes irrelevant facts, they may be struck out, and the jury directed to ignore them (ante, § 18); if it furnishes relevant facts, then they are none the less admissible merely because they were not specifically asked for:

1612, Peacock's Case, 9 Co. Rep. 70 b; Peacock, being examined on commission "would have declared the whole truth, which J. H. being a commissioner chosen by the plaintiff would not suffer him to do, but held him strictly to the interrogatories, so that the truth could not appear"; held a great misdemeanor, by the Lord Chancellor, the two Chief Justices, Chief Baron, and the whole Court of the Star-Chamber, "for it is the murdering of truth and right"; commissioners "are not strictly tied to the words of the interrogatories, but to everything also which necessarily ariseth thereupon for the manifestation of the whole truth concerning the matter in question. . . . If the truth should be by such means suppressed, and falsely certified in the examinations, so the innocent would be oftentimes punished or the guilty escape punishment, and justice and right would be utterly subverted; for as is commonly said, the suppression of truth is the oppression of the innocent."[4]

[2] 1896, Thresher v. Bank, 68 Conn. 201, 36 Atl. 38 (interrogation not needed where the party-witness is his own counsel: in this case, he was also a member of the bar); 1892, Northern P. R. Co. v. Charless, 2 C. C. A. 380, 51 Fed. 562 (trial Court's discretion controls).

[3] These statutes may be found from the citations collected post, §§ 1380 ff. In a deposition taken by oral interrogatories, the witness may testify in narrative form; 1868, Pralus v. Pacific G. & S. M. Co., 35 Cal. 30.

[4] 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173, 185; 1854, Streeter v. Sawyer, 28 N. H. 555, 559 ("The question is not so much how the evidence came there, as whether, being there, it is proper for consideration"); 1855, Willis v. Quimby, 31 id. 485, 489; 1870, Bundy v. Hyde, 50 id. 116, 121 ("It is well settled that such an objection will not be entertained at all, if the answers are competent and material; the object of evidence in the cause is to ascertain the whole truth material to the issue"); 1879, Plummer v. Ossipee, 59 id. 55, 57; 1900, Glauber Mfg. Co. v. Voter, — id. —, 47 Atl. 612.

The only ground of complaint for non-responsive answers is that, in the case of a deposition (for the reason above noted), such an answer may entitle the opponent to additional cross-examination on the new matter, — a rule dealt with elsewhere (post, § 1392).

§ 786. Improper Suggestion other than by Questions. Upon the general principle controlling Testimonial Narration or Communication (ante, § 766), it should represent so far as possible the sincere expression of his Recollection and Observation. Any and all forms of suggestion or instruction, therefore, which appear in fact to deprive his statement of this fundamental quality, may be forbidden. "A good witness should say from his heart, 'Non sum doctus nec instructus.'"[1] The regulations which prevent an improper use of written memoranda to aid recollection (ante, §§ 734, 758) and of counsel's leading questions (ante, § 769), have already been examined. But there may be other ways in which the principle may be violated. Any method may be prevented, according as it does or does not, in the case in hand, seem to supply the witness with ready-made statements not being the genuine expression of his present belief.

(1) Remaining in court during the other witnesses' testimony may teach a witness how to shape his own testimony falsely to the best advantage of his own party's case; this may be prevented by sequestering the witnesses, — an expedient examined elsewhere (post, §§ 1837–1842). So, also, remaining in court during a discussion of the admissibility of the witness' intended evidence may be equally availed of improperly; this may be prevented by a similar expedient.[2]

(2) A witness may, after listening to other testimony, desire to take the stand again to make a correction of his former testimony. Whether this is a sincere effort on his part to tell the exact truth as he believes it, or a false effort to shape his testimony in consistency with what he has heard, is often difficult to determine; and this consideration must enter into the Court's decision. But in form the question is whether a witness may be recalled after closing his testimony, and this is dealt with (post, §§ 1896 ff.) in considering the order of Evidence.[3]

(3) The mere fact that a witness has become aware beforehand of another witness' intended testimony is, of itself and apart from the above situations and expedients, no objection to his testimony;[4] any attempt to control testimony in such respects would be futile. At the same time, any communication, made to the witness within the court, may in a given case be improper and be treated as such.[5]

[1] 1629, Coke, Fourth Institute 279.

[2] 1837, R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 307 (Coleridge, J.: "It is almost a right for the opposite party to have a witness out of court while a discussion is going on as to his evidence"); 1839, R. v. Gaynor, 1 Cr. & D. 142, 145 (objection because the offered witness "was present in court when the questions were raised and partly discussed;" Torrens, J. "exercising a sound discretion" refused to allow his examination).

For the exclusion of the jury during such an argument, see post, § 1808.

[3] Compare also the principles affecting an impeached witness' explanation of a prior inconsistent statement (post, § 1044) or of an expression of bias (post, § 952), or of other impeaching facts (post, § 1112 ff.).

[4] 1833, R. v. Fursey, 3 State Tr. N. S. 543, 564; 1859, Horne v. Williams, 12 Ind. 326.

[5] 1867, New Jersey Express Co. v. Nichols,

(4) In identifying persons or material objects, it is of course more effective if the thing to be identified is so placed with others that the witness' selection appears to be unaided. Nevertheless, no rule has ever required this,— partly because of its frequent impracticability, partly because the lack of such a precaution plainly enough detracts from the value of the testimony, and partly because the witness has usually had so many prior opportunities of private verification that such a public test would often give a false appearance of spontaneous and unaided selection.[6]

§ 787. Same: Prepared Deposition; Answer by Reference. (5) Since the witness' statement must correspond spontaneously to his actual recollection, it is plain that to permit him to commit to writing beforehand certain statements and then to read them or hand them in as his testimony would be to abandon all safeguard against fabrication and to make possible any manner of pretended testimony. This mode of furnishing testimony is universally prohibited. It is of course to be distinguished from the use of writings which genuinely revive a present recollection (ante, § 758) or record a past recollection (ante, § 734). Indeed, the object of the restrictions placed upon those two uses of writing is chiefly to ensure that they are not writings of the prohibited and improper sort. The distinction is a clear one, namely, between writings which frankly purport to be used to aid memory (in which they are to be tested by the appropriate restrictions) and writings which do not purport to be so used; the latter falling within the present prohibition.

The present prohibition applies of course equally to oral testimony as well as to written depositions. Nevertheless, its application has been more usual in the case of depositions, because there the temptation to use written preparations is greater, and the impropriety is less glaring; for, when testimony is about to be immediately written down and the witness' demeanor as observable by a jury plays no part, there is a natural inclination to facilitate progress by having precise written answers ready, and the contrast between the writing thus prepared and the writing ensuing from the officer's hand is less 32 N. J. L. 166 (private interview between deponent and counsel during examination; testimony not excluded, because no inquiry was made by the opponent at the time as to the reason for conversing); 1861, Pratt v. Battles, 34 Vt. 391, 395, 401 (at the examination "great wrangling and confusion" occurred, the defendant's agent interfaring "to suggest or dictate the answers which the witnesses should give"; excluded); 1867, Nauman v. Zoehrlaut, 21 Wis. 466 (plaintiff sued for medical services, and, on cross-examination as to the nature of his treatment, declared that it was a secret; he was then allowed to consult with counsel as to answering the question, in order to determine whether to forego a demand for the special treatment instead of exposing his secret); 1883, Rounds v. State, 57 id. 50, 14 N. W. 865 (the district attorney privately spoke with a witness on the stand as to what he had already testified in the case; held improper).

For the propriety of counsel's consultation with a witness sequestered from the court-room, see post, § 1840. For intimidation by the opponent in the court-room, see post, § 1399.

[6] 1817, R. v. Watson, 2 Stark. 128 (in identifying prisoners, an objection that "the attention of the witness was too directly pointed at them" was overruled, since "the prosecution might ask in the most direct terms whether any of the prisoners was tha person meant and described by the witness"); 1898, Names v. Ins. Co., 104 Ia. 612, 74 N. W. 14 (schedule of proof of loss, identified in detail, receivable); 1854, State v. Lull, 37 Me. 248 (showing stolen goods and asking to identify, instead of requiring an unaided description, held not improper). Compare the use of unaided identification as a corroborating circumstance, post, § 1130, and ante, § 744.

apparent. Nevertheless, the opportunity and the danger of fabrication are none the less real; and Courts unite in emphasizing the importance of freeing a deposition from the vice of being a mere copy of a prior concocted statement:

1808, Eldon, L. C., in Shaw v. Lindsey, 15 Ves. Jr. 380, 381: "Upon general principles nothing is more clear than that a witness before commissioners cannot be examined in such a manner that the effect is, not his testimony given in answer to interrogatories, but (as it is termed) filing an affidavit. . . . All courts of justice are extremely anxious to secure the pure examination of witnesses by not permitting that mode of examination which could lead to infinite mischief. Many instances have occurred of a witness coming into court holding in his hand an answer which he has conscientiously framed as his answer to interrogatories, with the substance of which he may be acquainted, — the answer of an honest, conscientious man, and the value of his testimony perhaps not diminished by his anxiety to be correct. Yet courts of law and equity, with the view of excluding general mischief, concur in refusing to allow it. . . . The habitual practice of law, upon an examination viva voce, is not to permit any suggestion to the witness by the attorney, counsel, or any other person; the same strictness prevails in this court, where the extent of mischievous management that would ensue, if a witness should be permitted to go before commissioners with a prepared deposition, is obvious."

1817, Kent, C., in Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 339, 346: "He went before the examiner with a prepared deposition. This is against the course and policy of the court, and it would lead to the most dangerous practices. The witness should go before the examiner, as Lord Coke observes, 'untaught and without instruction.' He should be free to answer the sifting interrogatories that are framed for the issue in that case, instead of merely filing an affidavit ready drawn."[7]

[7] 1740, Bland v. Armagh, 3 Brown P. C. 620, 626 (deposition made in terms of prior voluntary affidavits, not suppressed on the facts); 1754, Anon., 1 Ambl. 252 (deposition excluded because the attorney "had wrote down the whole in the exact form of the deposition before it was taken; . . . the attorney had methodised and worded it, and [it] is therefore no more than an affidavit"); 1808, Shaw v. Lindsey, 15 Ves. Jr. 380 (see quotation supra); 1839, Att'y-Gen'l v. Nethercote, 10 Sim. 311 (reading over a former deposition, altering the date, and re-signing it, held improper); 1849, Alcock v. Ass. Co., 13 Q. B. 292, 305 (the witness referred to an alleged copy of an alleged deposition, "which I now confirm"; this "swearing by reference" held improper); 1898, Dreyspring v. Loeb, 119 Ala. 282, 24 So. 734 (answers to depositions prepared beforehand and repeated orally by deponent, suppressed); 1809, U. S. v. Smith, 4 Day 121, 127 ("the substance of this deposition had been copied by the deponent from another paper which he had written at Suffield about 10 days before"; excluded); 1833, Randel v. Chesapeake & D. C. Co., 1 Harringt. 233, 285, 289 (the deponent, being ill with pulmonary consumption, and unable to speak much, wrote down his answers, and the writing was then read aloud to him; he assented and corrected them, and they were then taken down by the clerk; Per Curiam: "The general rule is that a witness shall not be permitted to bring his deposition ready prepared; like all general rules, it must have its exceptions . . . if ever there was a case in which a prepared deposition would be allowed, this is such a case"); 1809, Amory v. Fellowes, 5 Mass. 219, 227 ("the appellee prepared and wrote the depositions in the absence of the commissioners"; excluded); 1817, Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 339, 346 (deponent "copying his deposition in the original cause," admitted exceptionally; see quotation supra); 1854, Commercial Bank v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 203, 210 ("one of the attorneys conversed with the witnesses prior to their examination, and at their request wrote down for them the substance of the facts' for several answers; held not fatal on the facts); 1818, Bovard v. Wallace, 4 S. & R. 499, 500 (the witness testifying in a second deposition, adopted the prior last one by copying it entire in the second one, without being questioned anew on it; excluded); 1825, Summers v. M'Kim, 12 S. & R. 405 (deposition drawn up by counsel, sent to the magistrate, and there sworn to; excluded); 1837, Armstrong v. Burrows, 6 Watts 266 (deposition written out beforehand, then sworn to; excluded); 1839, Carnalt v. Post, 8 id. 406 (similar); 1839, Grayson v. Bannon, ib. 524, 529 (deposition written by party's agent and afterwards sworn to, excluded); 1892, Greening v. Keel, 84 Tex. 326, [illegible]3, 19 S. W. 435 (deponent being aged and of infirm memory, the taker of the deposition had him answer privately certain questions, before the taking and unknown to the opponent; the interrogatories at the deposition asked the deponent to examine these private answers, and he testified that they were correct and annexed them; deposition ex-

(6) An analogous impropriety, in which opportunity is furnish fabrication by adopting a prior statement without resort to actual re tion of details, consists in questioning by reference to another person's ment and seeking what may be termed an "indorsing" answer verifyi other statement by adoption. Such a question is plainly to be disapp for such an answer may be merely a mechanical one:

1811, Washington, J., in Richardson v. Golden, 3 Wash. C. C. 109 (witness asked if an ex parte certificate of facts prepared by some of them "contained the t "The mode pursued in this case is calculated to produce perjury. It is worse than questions, or telling the witness what to say, because he is here reminded of the n of swearing to what he has before stated or of suffering in his credit."

1860, Fowler, J., in Eames v. Eames, 41 N. H. 177, 179 (the witness having merely asked at the trial whether he agreed with or differed from the testimony to a transaction): "The credit of the witness before the jury, and the greater confidence he secures with them, often depend very much on the manner in wh relates the details of the transactions about which he testifies, the intelligence with he groups the various circumstances surrounding them, the general capacity and in tion he exhibits in relation to the subject-matter of his testimony, and the accurac which he is able to remember and state minute and apparently trivial and unimp incidents connected therewith. . . . If either party insists upon it, he is entitled t the witness state fully all the details of his testimony upon the stand."[8]

On cross-examination, however, there being no danger of suggesti mechanical indorsement, this form of question is allowable;[9] at leas objection to it rests upon a totally different ground, namely, the Op rule; for while this question may properly serve to emphasize a cont tion on a specific point between witnesses on the same side,[10] or to e the witness' vacillation or uncertainty, it should not be used as a mo improperly extracting one witness' opinion on the general credibili another (post, §§ 1964, 1985).

§ 788. Same: Prior Conference with Attorney; Knowledge of Ques (7) How far any attempt can be made judicially to prevent improper gestion furnished out of court by mere conference with the attorney cluded); 1894, Blum v. Jones, 86 Id. 492, 495, 25 S. W. 694 (cross-interrogatories as to the "manner in which his answers had been prepared and taken down," allowed); 1900, Rice v. Ward, 93 Tex. 532, 56 S. W. 747 (deposition excluded where the officer taking it used to some extent in framing the answers a memorandum of desired testimony furnished by one of the parties); 1898, Emerson Co. v. Nimocks, 88 Fed. 280 (patent-expert testifying from typewritten sheets prepared by counsel, not from witness' notes but revised and corrected by the witness; held improper, but not stricken out under the circumstances).

For the impropriety of the officer who takes the deposition being an agent or kinsman of the party, see post, § 803. See also the citations as to prepared expert testimony, etc., post, § 788. Distinguish also the ordinary use of memoranda of a past recollection, ante, § 745, under which would come most memoranda by experts.

[8] Nevertheless, on direct examination, the witness has once answered a question tail, he may for a subsequent question co the same ground refer back to his first a 1861, Black v. Black, 38 Ala. 112 (depos on cross-examination, however, the cr aminer may oblige him to repeat his testimony in detail: supra, § 782, par.

[9] 1888, Parnell Commission's Proce 21th day, Times' Rep. pt. 7, p. 76 (ask whether, if X has said so-and-so, it is inc allowed; contra, semble, 31st day, pt. 8, p. 1900, State v. Taylor, 56 S. C. 360, 34 939 (witnesses may be told, "either correc incorrectly, what another witness on the side has testified to, with a view to test th rectness of the memory or the honesty of th ness"; here the question was allowed, "If husband says . . . is he telling the truth falsehood?").

[10] Post, § 1838.

obtaining prior knowledge of the tenor of his questions, is a difficult problem, which has been solved by declining to lay down any rules. The absolute necessity of such a conference for legitimate purposes is conceded; no cautious attorney ought to put forward a witness whose testimony in at least its general tenor is unknown to him; and a personal conference is the best method of obtaining such information accurately. This right may be abused, and often is; but to prevent the abuse by any definite rule seems both undesirable and impracticable. It would seem, therefore, that nothing short of an actual fraudulent conference for concoction of testimony could properly be taken notice of; there is no specific rule of behavior capable of being substituted for the proof of such facts. The judicial attitude towards this problem may be gathered from the following passages:

1617, Lord Keeper Coventry, in Bishop of Lincoln's Trial, 3 How. St. Tr. 769, 802 (the Bishop being charged with tampering with witnesses): "Now it may be said, said he [the defendant], 'May not a man meddle nor question with a witness?' Yes; but with certain limitations, for else, if witnesses be made and corrupted, the jurors and judges both of them may be abused; and if that witnesses may be led and instructed by questions, or the like, it comes to all one as subornation. A solicitor may warn witnesses to come in, he may incite them, and enforce them, and one as well as the other. . . . But a solicitor must not instruct a witness, nor threaten him, nor carry letters to him, to induce him this way or that. Yet he may discourse with him, and ask him what he can say to this or that point, and so he may know whether he be fit to be used in the cause or no; by which means this Court is freed from the labor of asking many idle questions of the witnesses to no end, if they can say nothing to them and so spend good time to no end nor purpose. Yet he may not persuade him or threaten him to say more or less than he of himself was inclined unto and was by his conscience beforehand bound to deliver as truth."

1842, Lord Langdale, M. R., in Sayer v. Wagstaff, 5 Beav. 462, 467: "It is right for a solicitor to communicate with a witness to know what he can depose. That is a thing necessary to be done before the interrogatories can be prepared; and I do not mean to say that it is at all improper for a solicitor to take down from a witness what he can depose to, or that it is improper for both parties to see a witness to inquire what he can depose to. But what was done here? A witness had been examined and communicated with on behalf of the plaintiffs, not as to what he could say on the whole question, but as to what had been prepared for him to say on behalf of the plaintiffs; A. B., [nominated commissioner, but secretly also acting as defendant's solicitor,] goes to the solicitor of the plaintiffs, who shows him drafts of depositions ready for the witnesses to depose to. I think this was not a right thing to do."

1867, Moncure, J., in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187, 223: "A witness ought not to write his deposition or his answers beforehand, nor ought they to be written for him beforehand by counsel or any other person; but he ought to answer the questions orally and from memory as they are propounded to him. Parties or their counsel may, orally or by writing, previous to his examination, direct his attention to the facts in regard to which he is intended to be examined, and he may refresh his memory in regard to such facts by examining books and papers, and make memoranda from them and otherwise, especially of dates and amounts."

1877, Cole, J., in Allen v. Seyfried, 43 Wis. 414, 418: "The practice of allowing a witness to read or to know, previous to examination, what questions will be asked him, is doubtless liable to abuse, and may sometimes almost destroy the value of a cross-examination. A hostile or dishonest witness, knowing in advance what questions were to be asked, would be put upon his guard, and might so prepare his answers as to suppress the truth, conceal his bias, or avoid self-contradiction. This is all very evident. But sti it is absolutely necessary, in certain cases where a witness is to be examined in referen to a transaction which was the subject of correspondence, or which involved numero items or dates, that he should be informed beforehand of the nature and scope of t questions he will be called upon to answer, in order that he may be prepared for t examination; for it is obvious that without some previous preparation to refresh h memory in such cases, his testimony would be nearly or quite valueless. We think, ther fore, to lay down a rule that it is sufficient ground for suppressing a deposition, if appear that the witness was allowed to read and examine the direct and cross interro atories before he gave his evidence, would be inconvenient and dangerous as a rule practice."[1]

B. NON-VERBAL[1] TESTIMONY.

§ 789. Dramatic Communication (Gesture, Dumb-show, etc.). Man does n communicate by words alone; and it may occur that words become inferi to action as a mode of communicating a correct impression of a scene o served. Certainly, in an appropriate case, it is proper and customary for th trial Court in its discretion to sanction a departure from the ordinary or ve bal medium and permit the witness to make clearer his own observed da by representing them in gesture, dumb-show, or other dramatic mode Whether it is more useful to do so must depend much on the circumstance of the case. The only general and disfavoring consideration to be noted that the witness' dramatic expression may be calculated to give unfair em phasis and create improper emotional effects;[3] but this can rarely occur.

[1] Accord: 1835, Kelly v. French, Ll. & Goo. 166 (Ire.; L. C. Plunket; copies of interrogatories sent beforehand to deponent, who pencilled marginal notes as to his intended replies, not suppressed, because it was the solicitor's duty to ascertain beforehand from witnesses "the extent of their information"). Compare § 786, par. 3, 5, ante. The admissibility of expert testimony got by ex parte consultation and investigation is not to be doubted on the present ground; its admissibility from another point of view is dealt with post, § 1385.

For the admissibility of statements of physical pain, made to an expert when qualifying himself for testimony, see post, § 1721.

For suggestion in general as a reason for excluding Hearsay statements post litem motam, see the various Hearsay exceptions.

For impeachment on the ground of bias through money or other favors furnished before trial, see post, §§ 949, 961.

[1] "Verbal" is here used to signify "expressed in words"; "oral," to signify "spoken, not written."

[2] 1897, Linehan v. State, 113 Ala. 70, 21 So. 497 (held improper for counsel to walk across the room and ask the witness if the deceased walked as fast as that in advancing on the defendant; this is clearly unsound); 1895, People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697 (illustrating on a wall or door in the court-room the location of a bullet-mark; left to Court's discretion); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 id. 175, 48 Pac. 75 (murder; draping the clothing of the murdered woman upon a dress-frame, for better identification, allowed); 1888, Tudor Iron Works Weber, 31 Ill. App. 312 (wearing clothes worn at the time of an accident, allowed); 189 State v. Ellwood, 17 R. I. 763, 769, 24 Atl. 78 (burglar's mask, etc., used to describe appearance of burglar); 1898, Louisville & N. R. C v. Ray, 101 Tenn. 1, 46 S. W. 554 (article placed in court-room to illustrate testimony In the trial of O'Connell, 5 St. Tr. N. S. 1, 24 (1843), is an amusing cross-examination of witness who endeavored to represent the treason able significance of one of the great orator's pauses! There is certainly one great historic pause which could never again be reproduced i its effect: "Caesar had his Brutus, — Charle the First, his Cromwell, — and George th Third — ['Treason,' cried the Speaker] — may profit by their example!"

The cases cited post, § 790 (models and diagrams), and post, § 1152 (autoptic proference or "real evidence"), are sometimes difficult t distinguish from those falling under the presen head. For additional and interesting instance of the present sort, occurring at nisi prius, se a series of articles by Mr. Irving Browne, i 5 Green Bag, passim.

[3] 1862, People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261, 26 (the child, the alleged subject of a rape, burs into tears when testifying; "unless we ca trust to the intelligence and integrity of juries to withstand such influences, we must dispens with the use of juries as a part of the machinery for the administration of justice"); 1898, Sel

§ 790. Models, Maps, Diagrams, Photographs; General Principle. It would be folly to deny ourselves on the witness-stand those effective media of communication commonly employed at other times as a superior substitute for words. If a simple line-plan of a house is more satisfactory than a mass of alphabetical letters arranged in words, as a mode of communicating the relative position of the house-rooms as observed by us, then this method of communication is equally proper to be resorted to in a witness' communications to a jury. There can be no dispute upon this point; and no necessity for judicial elaboration of it would have been necessary, except for the peculiar danger and fallacy that lurks always in the use of writings and other materials of non-oral expression. This is considered more fully in another connection (post, § 2130); it is, briefly, that a material object, particularly a writing, when presented as purporting to be of a certain origin, always tends to impress the mind unconsciously, upon the bare sight of it, with the verity of its purport. Does it purport to be a contract signed by A and B? We immediately assume it to be such; though it may be the merest forgery. Does it purport to be a picture of the place of a murder? We look at it with an interest based on the unconscious assumption that it is that house. In short, we unwittingly give the document the credit of speaking for itself; though no human being has yet spoken for it. Now this tendency has to be sternly repressed; and as it is in the present relation that this tendency finds one of its most frequent manifestations, so it is here that the tendency has so frequently to be struck at by judicial rulings.

We are to remember, then, that a document purporting to be a map, picture, or diagram, is, for evidential purposes simply nothing, except so far as it has a human being's credit to support it. It is mere waste paper, — a testimonial nonentity. It speaks to us no more than a stock or a stone. It can of itself tell us no more as to the existence of the thing portrayed upon it than can a tree or an ox. We must somehow put a testimonial human being behind it (as it were) before it can be treated as having any testimonial standing in court. It is somebody's testimony, — or it is nothing. It may, sometimes, to be sure, not be offered as a source of evidence, but only as a document whose existence and tenor are material in the substantive law applicable to the case, — as where, on a prosecution for stealing a map or in ejectment for land conveyed by deed containing a map, the map is to be used irrespective of the correctness of the drawing; here we do not believe anything because the map represents it.[1] But whenever such a document is offered as proving things to be as therein represented, then it is offered testimonially, and it must be associated with a testifier.

Two consequences plainly follow. On the one hand, the mere picture or leck v. Janesville, 100 Wis. 157, 75 N. W. 975 (plaintiff's testimony taken as she lay ill on a lounge; not improper).

Compare the application of the same consideration to autoptic preference, or "real evidence" (post, § 1157), and the principle forbidding indecent testimony (post, § 2180).

[1] 1884, People v. Muller, 32 Hun 210 (charge of selling or showing indecent photographs); 1893, U. S. v. Pagliano, 53 Fed. 1001 (charge of importation of women for prostitution; possession by defendant of photographs of the women imported, admissible).

map itself cannot be received except as a non-verbal expression of the testimony of some witness competent to speak to the facts represented. On the other hand, it is immaterial whose hand prepared the thing, provided it is presented to the tribunal by a competent witness as a representation of his knowledge. These consequences remain to be more fully considered. It is sufficient to note at this point that, by universal judicial concession, a map, model, diagram, or photograph, takes an evidential place only as a non-verbal mode of expressing a witness' testimony:

1864, Willes, J., in R. v. Tolson, 4 F. & F. 103 (admitting a photograph to prove identity of person): "The photograph was admissible because it is only a visible representation of the image or impression made upon the minds of the witnesses by the sight of the person or the object it represents, and therefore is in reality only another species of the evidence which persons give of identity when they speak merely from memory."

1857, Tenney, C. J., in State v. Knight, 43 Me. 132: "It would be very difficult for an expert of the most accurate and extensive observation to exhibit in language with precision, so as to be understood, those delicate appearances which are appreciable only by the sense of vision. Nothing short of an exact representation to the sight can give with certainty a perfectly correct idea to the mind."

1873, Peters, C. J., in Shook v. Pate, 50 Ala. 92: "A diagram . . . is at best an approximation, and in this sense it is indifferent by whom it is made. . . . A witness may as well speak by a diagram and linear description, when the thing may so be described, as by words. . . . It is enough if it serves the purpose of the witness in the explanation of the lines and localities he is seeking to exhibit."

1881, Folger, C. J., in Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 478: "A witness who speaks to personal appearance or identity tells in more or less detail the minutia thereof as taken in by his eye. What he says is a description thereof by one mode of signs, by words orally uttered. If his testimony be written instead of spoken and is offered as a deposition, it is a description in another mode of signs, by words written; and the value of that mode, the deposition, depends upon the accuracy with which his words uttered are put into words written. Now if he has before him a portrait or photograph of the person, and it shows to him a correct copy of that person, if it produce to his view a correct description, which he testifies is a likeness, why may not that be given to the jury as a description of the person by the witness in another mode of signs?"

1897, Clark, J., in Hampton v. R. Co., 120 N. C. 534, 27 S. E. 963: "A map not made under the order of the Court is really only the declaration, so to speak, of the party making it. Its reliability depends entirely upon his accuracy and conscientiousness, and is therefore only admissible as his evidence, and because it may convey to the eyes of the jury somewhat more accurately the description which the witness was endeavoring to convey to their ears by his oral testimony."

1899, Valliant, J., in Baustian v. Young, 152 Mo. 317, 53 S. W. 921: "[Photographs] are of the same character of evidence as diagrams and pictures drawn by hand; not necessarily carrying the same degree of probative force, but still of the same character; not in themselves evidence at all, but representing to the eye what the witness declares was the real appearance of the things at the times he saw it. Diagrams, drawings, and photographs are resorted to only because the witness cannot, with language, as clearly convey to the minds of the Court and jury the scene as the light printed it on the retina of his own eye at the time of which he is testifying."

§ 791. Same; Instances of Models, Maps, and Diagrams. The use of models, maps, and diagrams, as modes of conveying a witness' knowledge, is illustrated in manifold rulings,[1] as well as in the daily practice of trials.

One or two discriminations only needed to be noted. (1) The map or diagram, as testimony, must come in on the credit of some witness (post,

[1] Maps, drawings, diagrams: Eng.: 1817, Watson's Trial, 32 How. St. Tr. 125 (Mr. Gurney: "I believe on the next day you made a sketch of the waggon [with the people standing in it]?" Mr. Wetherell: "I object to the description in writing; it is matter of verbal description"; Mr. Attorney-General: "My lord, I cannot conceive the objection"; Lord Ellenborough, to witness: "Go on, go on. Can there be any objection to the production of a drawing, or a model, as illustrative of evidence? Surely there is nothing in the objection"; the witness produced his drawing of the waggon, with a flag at each end and the banner in the centre; it was handed to the jury, and ther Mr. Wetherell); Ala.: 1852, Nolin v. Parm 21 Ala. 71 (diagram); 1853, Campbell v. State 23 id. 83 (map); 1882, Humea v. Bernstein, 74 id. 546, 553 (map); 1889, East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Watson, 90 id. 41, 45, 7 So. 813 ("it might properly be considered by implication as a part of the witness' testimony, and therefore aa in evidence"); 1894, Burton v. State, 107 id. 108, 127, 18 So. 284 (map of place of homicide); 1895, Wilkinson v. State, 106 id. 23, 17 So. 457 (diagram); 1897, Burton v. State, 115 id. 1, 22 So. 585 (map of locality of a murder); Fla.: 1898, Rawlins v. State, 40 Fla. 155, 24 So. 65 (map verified by aurveyor and used by witnessea); Ga.: 1882, Moon v. State, 68 Ga. 695 (diagram); 1896, Western & A. R. Co. v. Stafford, 99 id. 187, 25 S. E. 658 (diagram of place of a railroad accident); Ill.: 1890, Kankakee & S. R. Co. v. Horan, 131 Ill. 303, 23 N. E. 621 (map); 1903, Lake St. Elev. R. Co. v. Burgess, 200 id. 628, 66 N. E. 215 (sketch of a railroad car); Ia.: 1893, Goldsborough v. Piddnck, 87 Ia. 599, 601, 54 N. W. 431 (surveyor's map illustrating hia teatimony); Me.: 1857, State v. Knight, 43 [illegible] 130 (chart of human skeleton; see quotation supra); Md.: 1889, County Com'rs v. Wise, 71 Md. 54, 18 Atl. 31 (river-bank after flood); Mass.: 1833, Smith v. Strong, 14 Pick. 133 ("The copy of the plan annexed to the deposition . . . was in truth by reference made a part of the deposition"); 1870, Clapp v. Norton, 106 Mass. 33 (plan); 1871, Com. v. Holliston, 107 id. 233 (plan); 1871, Paine v. Woods, 108 id. 168 (plan); 1885, Barrett v. Murphy, 140 id. 143 (plan); Minn.: 1888, Bennison v. Walbank, 38 Minn. 313, 37 N. W. 447 (diagram of accident); Mo.: 1872, Williamson v. Fischer, 50 Mo. 198, 200 (map; "as a part of the testimony of Mr. C. it should have gone to the jury with his oath; its correctness, like his other testimony, being left to them"); Nebr.: 1898, Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Buel, 56 Nebr. 205, 76 N. W. 571 (map); N. H.: 1870, Ordway v. Haynes, 50 N. H. 159 ("any chalk, whether engraved or more roughly sketched, whether made with a pen, a pencil, a paint brush, a coal, or a piece of chalk"); N. Y.: 1890, McKay v. Lasher, 121 N. Y. 477, 483, 24 N. E. 711 (expert witness to handwriting may illustrate his testimony by the blackboard); 1893, People v. Johnson, 140 id. 350, 354, 35 N. E. 604 (murder; sketches of premises, blood-stains, etc.); N. C.: 1887, State v. Whiteacre, 98 N. C. 753, 3 S. E. 488 (diagram); 1888, Dobson v. Whisenhaut, 101 id. 647, 8 S. E. 126; 1889, Burwell v. Sneed, 104 id. 120, 10 S. E. 152; 1895, Riddle v. Germanton, 117 id. 387, 389, 23 S. E. 332 (map); 1895, Tankard v. Railroad, ib. 558, 565, 23 S. E. 46 (diagram of railroad crossing); 1900, Arrowood v. R. Co., 126 id. 629, 36 S. E. 151; 1903, State v. Wilcox, — N. C. —, 44 S. E. 625 (surroundings of a homicide); Pa.: 1890, Com. v. Switzer, 134 Pa. 388, 19 Atl. 681 (map); 1901, Hagan v. Carr, 198 id. 606, 48 Atl. 688 (diagram of theory of handwriting); 1903, Geis v. Rapp, — id. —, 55 Atl. 1063 (model of a scaffold); S. C.: 1893, Rapley v. Klugh, 40 S. C. 134, 146, 18 S. E. 680 (map); Tex.: 1888, Griffith v. Rive, 72 Tex. 187, 12 S. W. 168 (map); U. S.: 1897, Bunker Hill Co. v. Schmelling, 24 C. C. A. 564, 79 Fed. 283 (diagram of a mine); 1899, Western Gas C. Co. v. Danner, 38 id. 528, 97 Fed. 882 (diagram); 1900, Southern Pacific Co. v. Hall, 41 id. 50, 100 Fed. 760 (place of railroad accident); 1902, Chicago v. Le Moyne, 56 id. 278, 119 Fed. 662 (sketch of proposed buildings to show a method of avoiding damage by eminent domain appropriation, allowed to be excluded in discretion); Wash.: 1898, State v. Hunter, 18 Wash. 670, 52 Pac. 247 (map of premises of rape-assault); W. Va.: 1893, State v. Harr, 38 W. Va. 58, 63, 17 S. E. 794 (diagram of distance); 1893, Poling v. R. Co., ib. 645, 657, 18 S. E. 782 (scene of injury by railway mail-crane); 1899, King v. Jordan, 46 id. 106, 32 S. E. 1022; Wis.: 1857, Vilas v. Reynolds, 6 Wis. 214, 224 (plat).

Models: 1895, Davis v. Power Co., 107 Cal. 563, 40 Pac. 953; 1898, People v. Searcy, 121 id. 1, 53 Pac. 359 (showing the jury boot-tracks artificially made in a box of sand, allowed); 1895 Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Kelly, 156 Ill. 9, 40 N. E. 938; 1895, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Berry, 96 Ky. 604, 29 S. W. 449; 1887, Earl v. Lefler, 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 807 (impression of a horse's mouth, in wax or plaster); 1902, Moran Bros. Co. v. Snoqualmie F. P. Co., 29 Wash. 292, 69 Pac. 759 (model of a regulator-box for a power-plant).

Many additional instances, never reaching an appellate tribunal, might be collected, — such as the use of manikin bodies in the Borden trial (Mass. 1893), of a church-model in miniature, in the Durrant trial (Cal. 1897).

§ 793); yet this witness need not always be in court testifying; for, by exceptions to the Hearsay rule, a map of an official surveyor (post, § 1665) or of any deceased person made in the regular course of business (post, §§ 1523, 1570), may be received on certain conditions. In such a case the document must be authenticated as genuinely the work of the person purporting to make it (post, §§ 2129 ff.).

(2) The map or diagram may be offered as a part of a constitutive document — such as a deed or contract, and not as testimony; or a party's admission may make the map receivable; with such uses the present principle is not concerned.

(3) When the map or diagram comes in as a part of testimony, it is evidence, like any other part of the witness' utterance.[2] Whether it should go to the jury-room with other documents depends upon the general rule applicable to that question (post, § 1913); perhaps not all written testimony may be taken to the jury-room, but the map is none the less written testimony.

§ 792. Same: Instances of Photographs. A photograph, like a map or diagram, is merely a witness' pictured expression of the data observed by him and therein communicated to the tribunal more accurately than by words. Its use for this purpose is sanctioned beyond question.[1] Certain

[2] This is sufficiently illustrated by the remarks quoted in some of the citations in the preceding note. There has, however, been here and there a tendency to confuse the subject, as illustrated in the following passage: 1853, Chilton, C. J., in Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, 83: "The rule is that a witness may use a plat, diagram, or map, made in any way, to explain or make himself intelligible to a jury, though it cannot go to them as evidence; it amounted to no more than if the witness had written down his testimony to aid his memory on the examination, and no one would contend that such memorandum as a matter of right could be taken by the jury [into the jury-room]." Here the fallacy consists in treating the question whether written testimony may be taken to the jury-room (a question of trial procedure) with the question whether a duly verified map is written testimony; and also in invoking the false analogy of a paper reviving recollection, which is of course (ante, § 763) not testimony.

[1] In the following cases photographs were declared admissible, except where otherwise noted: Eng.: 1862, R. v. United Kingdom El. T. Co., 3 F. & F. 73, 74 (electric-wire posts as highway-obstructions); 1864, R. v. Folson, 4 id. 103, 104 (personal features); 1874, R. v. Castro (Tichborne Case), charge of C. J. Cockburn, I, 640 (grotto), I, 672, II, 59 (personal features); 1876, Durst v. Masters, L. R. 1 P. D. 378 (premises); Ala.: 1875, Luke v. Calhoun Co., 52 Ala. 118 (personal features); 1889, Kansas City M. & B. R. Co. v. Smith, 90 id. 27, 8 So. 43 (train-wreck); Cal.: 1889, Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 418, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742 (personal features); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 id. 179, 48 Pac. 75 (deceased while alive); 1899, People v. Phelan, 123 id. 551, 56 Pac. 424 (place of homicide); 1899, People v. Crandall, 125 id. 129, 57 Pac. 785 (scene of a crime); Conn.: 1889, Dyson v. R. Co., 57 Conn. 24, 17 Atl. 137 (railroad-crossing); 1899, McGar v. Bristol, 71 id. 652, 42 Atl. 1000 (premises); 1899, Cunningham v. R. Co., 72 id. 244, 43 Atl. 1047 (condition of rails; photograph not testified to as correct, excluded); 1900, Harris v. Ansonia, 73 id. 359, 47 Atl. 672 (highway and premises; held not improperly rejected in discretion); 1901, Wetherell v. Hollister, ib. 622, 48 Atl. 826 (weight of photographs as to correctness is for the jury); 1902, State v. Cook, 75 id. 277, 53 Atl. 589 (condition of horses as to flesh; admissible in discretion); Fla.: 1891, Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511, 538, 10 So. 106 (in general); 1892, Ortiz v. State, 30 id. 256, 265, 11 So. 611 (a hotel and a tree near by, excluded because misleading as to material matters of distance, etc.); Ga.: 1882, Franklin v. State, 69 Ga. 42 (wound); 1889, Shaw v. State, 83 id. 102, 9 S. E. 768 (representing persons in the situation of the defendant and the deceased at the time of the killing); 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 id. 790, 12 S. E. 18 (personal features); Ill.: 1881, Rockford v. Russell, 9 Ill. App. 233 (bridge); 1892, Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Monaghan, 140 Ill. 483, 30 N. E. 869 (admissible in discretion of Court; here the inaccuracy arose from the picture having been taken two months after the injury, and the witness taking it and verifying it was not acquainted with the original features of the place); 1901, Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Wilson, 189 id. 89, 59 N. E. 573 (railroad-track); 1901, Iroquois F. Co. v. McCrea, discriminations, however, which may affect its admissibility from other points of view, need to be made.

191 Id. 340, 61 N. E. 79 (photograph of a dump pile, excluded because not shown to represent the condition at the time in issue); 1902, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Corson, 198 id. 98, 64 N. E. 739 (photograph of the place of an accident, taken nine months later, when the surroundings had changed, excluded); Ind.: 1877, Beavers v. State, 58 Ind. 530, 535 (deceased's personal features); 1889, Keyes v. State, 122 id. 529, 23 N. E. 1097 (premises); 1891, Miller v. R. Co., 128 Id. 97, 27 N. E. 339 (railroad crossing); Ia.: 1877, Locke v. R. Co., 46 Ia. 110 (trainwreck); 1879, Reddin v. Gates, 52 id. 213, 2 N. W. 1079; 1883, German Theol. School v. Dubuque, 64 id. 737, 17 N. W. 153 (flooded premises); 1885, Barker v. Perry, 67 id. 148, 25 N. W. 100; 1895, State v. Windahl, 95 id. 470, 64 N. W. 420 (deceased after he was shot); 1902, State v. Hossack, 116 id. 194, 89 N. W. 1077 (body of deceased); Kan.: 1895, Shorten v. Judd, 56 Kan. 43, 42 Pac. 337 (personal features); Me.: 1897, State v. Hersom, 90 Me. 273, 38 Atl. 160 (room); Md.: 1880, People's P. R. Co. v. Green, 56 Md. 93, semble (railroad car); 1896, Dorsey v. Habersack, 84 id. 117, 35 Atl. 96 (building); Mass.: 1864, Hollenbeck v. Rowley, 8 All. 475 (premises); 1875, Blair v. Pelham, 118 Mass. 421 (place of highway injury); 1882, Randall v. Chase, 133 id. 213; 1889, Verran v. Baird, 150 id. 142, 22 N. E. 630 (place of flood); 1892, Com. v. Campbell, 155 id. 537, 30 N. E. 72 (personal features as to wearing of whiskers); 1893, Turner v. R. Co., 158 id. 261, 265, 33 N. E. 520 (railroad tracks, to show the absence of blocks in the frogs); 1893, Com. v. Morgan, 159 id. 375, 377, 34 N. E. 458 (personal features as to wearing of whiskers); 1894, Farrell v. Weitz, 160 id. 288, 35 N. E. 783 (bastardy; likeness of alleged father, a third person, not allowed to be shown by photograph); 1894, Gilbert v. R. Co., 160 id. 403, 36 N. E. 60 (questionable, in showing condition of physical health and the like); 1894, Com. v. Robertson, 162 id. 90, 38 N. E. 25 (premises); 1898, Harris v. Quincy, 171 id. 472, 50 N. E. 1042 (sidewalk; rejectible in trial Court's discretion as not instructive); 1898, Carey v. Hubbardston, 172 id. 106, 51 N. E. 521 (highway; trial Court's discretion to determine as to exclusion because uninstructive); 1899, Wilcox v. Forbes, 173 id. 63, 53 N. E. 146 (alleged insane person; trial Court's discretion allowed to exclude); 1899, Dolan v. M. R. F. Life Ass'n, ib. 197, 53 N. E. 398 (insured person; admissible in trial Court's discretion); Mich.: 1887, Brown v. Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 315, 32 N. W. 610 (personal features); 1894, Bedell v. Berkey, 76 id. 440, 43 N. W. 308, semble (premises); 1893, Leidlein v. Meyer, 95 id. 586 591, 55 N. W. 367 (premises injured by water, a year before taking; excluded as of no assistance); 1901, People v. Carey, 125 id. 535, 84 N. W. 1087 (personal features); 1903, Sterling v. Detroit, — id. — , 95 N. W. 986 (place of an injury); Minn.: 1890, State v. Holden, 42 Minn. 354, 44 N. W. 123 (personal features; the prosecution offering one photograph of the deceased to show that a likeness of the deceased's brother, identified by a witness for the defence as like the deceased, was not in fact like him); 1893, Cooper v. R. Co. 54 id. 379, 383, 56 N. W. 42 (the plaintiff as injured and suffering); 1899, Stewart v. R. Co., 78 id. 85, 80 N. W. 855 (condition of track of railroad as reproduced by artificial arrangement of original conditions; held not improperly rejected); 1901, Attix v. Minnesota S. Co., 85 id. 142, 88 N. W. 436 (photograph of a mill yard, taken seven months after an accident, held not improperly received, on the facts); Mo.: 1895, State v. O'Reilly, 126 Mo. 597, 29 S. W. 577 (scene of a murder, the persons being replaced in their original positions); 1899, Baustian v. Young, 152 id. 317, 53 S. W. 921 (sidewalk); Nebr.: 1886, Marion v. State, 20 Nebr. 240, 29 N. W. 911 (deceased's corpse); 1893, Omaha S. R. Co. v. Beeson, 36 id. 361, 364, 54 N. W. 557 (land taken by railroad); 1903, Lamb v. State, — id. — , 95 N. W. 1050 (murdered man); N. H.: 1898, Pritchard v. Austin, 69 N. H. 367, 46 Atl. 188 (testator and his wife); N. J.: 1897, Goldsboro v. R. Co., 60 N. J. L. 49, 37 Atl. 433; N. Y.: 1866, Cozzens v. Higgins, 1 Abb. App. Cas. 451, 33 How. Pr. 436 (premises); 1871, Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213, 224 (personal features); 1881, Cowley v. People, 83 id. 477 (personal features; see quotation supra); 1886, People v. Buddensieck, 103 id. 487, 500, 9 N. E. 44 (premises); 1887, Archer v. R. Co., 106 id. 598, 603, 13 N. E. 318 (premises); 1888, People v. Jackson, 111 id. 370, 19 N. E. 54 (place of homicide; here received by consent); 1889, Alberti v. People, 118 id. 77, 88, 23 N. E. 35 (injured limbs); 1890, People v. Smith, 121 id. 581, 24 N. E. 852 (personal features); 1891, People v. Fish, 125 id. 147, 26 N. E. 319 (premises and corpse-wounds); 1893, People v. Webster, 139 id. 73, 83, 34 N. E. 730 (deceased, to show his appearance to the defendant when acting in self-defence); 1896, People v. Pastolka, 149 id. 570, 43 N. E. 548 (place of a homicide); the following are some of the instances in the intermediate courts: 1887, Wilcox v. Wilcox, 46 Hun 38 (personal features); 1891, Glazier v. Hebron, 62 id. 144, 16 N. Y. Suppl. 503 (place of injury in road); 1892, Roosevelt Hospital v. R. Co., 21 N. Y. Suppl. 205, 66 Hun 633 (premises); 1893, People v. Webster, 68 Hun 17, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 634 (personal features); 1894, Nies v. Broadhead, 27 N. Y. Suppl. 52, 75 Hun 255 (premises); N. C.: 1897, Hampton v. R. Co., 120 N. C. 534, 27 S. E. 96 (photograph of the locality of an accident, excluded simply because the place had been altered at the time of taking; Clark, J., diss.); Okl.: 1902, Smith v. Terr., 11 Okl. 669, 69 Pac. 805 (body of deceased, and its wounds); Pa.: 1874, Udderzook v. Com., 76 Pa. 340, 352 (photograph of G. shown to a witness, who identified it as that of a man known to him as W.); 1893, Com. v. Connors, 156 id.

(1) There may be an objection, not to the photographic testimony as su but to the relevancy of the fact testified to; if the fact to be evidenced by t photograph is itself not admissible, obviously it cannot be proved by pho graph or otherwise. This objection of irrelevancy is commonly either th the condition of a place or person at the time of taking the photograph not evidence of the condition at the time in issue (ante, § 438);[2] or that t outward appearance of a person is not evidential of his inward conditi (ante, §§ 226, 228, 229);[3] or that the features of a child are not evidence, resemblance, of a particular person's paternity (ante, § 166).[4] These obje tions are seldom favorably considered by the Courts; but it is obvious th the decision in any case rests on principles of relevancy of the fact pi tured, and does not affect the propriety of evidencing a relevant fact by photograph.

(2) There may be an objection, not to the photographic testimony as suc
but to the reproduction of a corporal injury or other object calculated undu to excite sympathy for one party and unfair prejudice against the other;[5] th objection is identical with that considered (post, §§ 1157, 1158) for autop tic proference (or, real evidence), and a similar application of principle woul be made.

(3) The objection that a photograph may be so made as to misrepresent th object is genuinely directed against its testimonial soundness; but it is of n validity. It is true that a photograph can be deliberately so taken as to con vey the most false impression of the object.[6] But so also can any witnes

147, 151, 27 Atl. 366 (accomplice in a robbery); 1898, Beardslee v. Columbia Tp., 188 id. 496, 41 Atl. 617 (place of accident); 1899, Com. v. Keller, 191 id. 122, 43 Atl. 198 (size of deceased); R. I.: 1892, State v. Ellwood, 17 R. I. 763, 771, 24 Atl. 782 (accused shortly after arrest, to identify him); S. C.: 1896, State v. Kelley, 46 S. C. 55, 24 S. E. 60 (a room and window where J. had been shot, J. occupying the same position as on the day in queation); Tenn.: 1900, Livermore F. & M. Co. v. Union S. & C. Co., 105 Tenn. 187, 58 S. W. 270 (machinery); Tex.: 1891, Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. Moore, — Tex. —, 15 S. W. 714 (railroad crossing, showing the distance at which an approaching train could be seen); 1895, Taylor, B. & H. R. Co. v. Warner, 88 id. 642, 32 S. W. 868 (personal appearance two years before death); U. S.: 1896, Scott v. New Orleans, 21 C. C. A. 402, 75 Fed. 373 (a sidewalk-defect); 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895 (the deceased, on a charge of murder); 1900, Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, 41 C. C. A. 22, 100 Fed. 738 (railroad accident); 1901, Considine v. U. S., 50 id. 272, 112 Fed. 342 (photographs taken over four years before, identified as being good likenesses at the time of the burglary in question); 1902, Southern P. Co. v. Huntsman, 55 id. 366, 118 Fed. 412 (train-wreck); Utah: 1896, Dedericks v. Salt Lake, 14 Utah 137, 46 Pac. 656 (locality of a railroad accident); 1897, State v. McCoy, 15 id. 136, 49 Pac. 420 (deceased person); Wis.: 1872, Church v. Milwaukee, 31 Wis. 512, 519 (premises); 1899, Baxter v. R. Co., 104 id. 307, 80 N. W. 644 (plaintiff's injured appearance admissible in discretion); 1899, Selleck v. Janesville, 1b. 307, 80 N. W. 944 (injured foot, excluded as unnecessary and prejudicial, on the principle of § 1158, post); 1902, Hupfer v. Distilling Co., 114 id. 279, 90 N. W. 191 (vat hoops; Marshall, J. diss., on the ground that photographs were insufficient without other evidence when available); 1903, Panlson v. State — id. —, 94 N. W. 771 (premises).

Distinguish the question of the sufficiency o a photograph, as sole source of proof, from its mere admissibility: 1896, Frith v. Frith, Prob. 74 (in divorce causes, a photographic identification will not alone auffice, unless in special circumstances).

For handwriting photographs, see post, § 797.

For cathode-ray (X-ray, Roentgen-ray) photographs, see post, § 795.

[2] As in Verran v. Baird, Mass., Hampton v. R. Co., N. C., supra, and in other similar cases; as well as in the cases of a reproduced grouping of the partiea to an affray, and of the featurea of a person photographed long before his decease.

[3] As in Gilbert v. R. Co., Wilcox v. Forbes, Mass., Cooper v. R. Co., Minn., supra.

[4] As in Farrell v. Weitz, Mass., supra.

[5] As in Cooper v. R. Co., Minn., Selleck v. Janeaville, Wis., supra.

[6] The most striking illustrationa of this may be found in an article by Mr. Fitzgerald, "Some Curiosities of Modern Photography," in the lie in his words. A photograph can falsify just as much and no more than the human being who takes it or verifies it. The fallacy of argument occurs in assuming that the photograph can come in testimonially without a competent person's oath to support it (post, § 793). If a qualified observer is found to say, "This photograph represents the fact as I saw it," there is no more reason to exclude it than if he had said, "The following words represent the fact as I saw it," which is always in effect the tenor of a witness' oath. If no witness has thus attached his credit to the photograph, then it should not come in at all, any more than an anonymous letter should be received as testimony. There can be no middle ground between these two consequences. Occasionally a Court is found excluding a photograph as being misleading;[7] but this is a begging of the very question which the jury have to decide; it would be as anomalous as if the judge were to order a witness from the stand because he was believed by the judge to be lying. Perjury cannot be thus determined in advance by the judge, — not more for photographic than for verbal testimony. There is a Massachusetts doctrine[8] that the trial Court may in its discretion reject a photograph as being under the circumstances not sufficiently "instructive"; in other words, the Court rules that cumulative testimony, by superfluously adding a pictured description to a verbal description, is on the facts not needed. Such a rule may be justified as an application of the general principle (post, § 1907) permitting the rejection of cumulative testimony; but not otherwise. The judge may properly warn the jury as to the peculiar deceptive possibilities of photographs, just as he may remind them of the possibilities of perjury for interested witnesses and others; but this is all; and this sufficiently protects the opponent, since he has an equal if not a greater opportunity of exposing photographic perjury than of exposing other sorts.[9]

§ 793. Verification of Maps, Photographs, etc.; General Principle. The use of maps, models, diagrams, and photographs as testimony to the objects represented rests fundamentally (as already noted in § 790) on the theory that they are the pictorial communications of a qualified witness who uses this method of communication instead of or in addition to some other method. It follows, then, that the map or photograph must first, to be admissible, be made a part of some qualified person's testimony. Some one must stand forth as its testimonial sponsor; in other words (as commonly said), it must be verified. There is nothing anomalous or exceptional in this requirement of verification; it is simply the exaction of those testimonial qualities which are required equally for all witnesses; the application merely takes a different form. A witness must have had observation of the data in question (ante, § 650), must recollect his observations (ante, § 725), and must correctly ex-

"Strand Magazine" for January and February, 1895, and in the "Curiosities" appendix and in the articles in the same magazine before and since that date; so also in a quotation from the London "Tidbits," in an article by Mr. Irving Browne, 5 Green Bag 62.

[7] As in Ortiz v. State, Fla., supra.

[8] See the cases collected supra.

[9] For the objection to ex parte photographs on the ground of lack of cross-examination, see post, § 1385.

press his observation and recollection (ante, § 766). Here, then, is a form expression ready prepared pictorially; he must supply the missing element in brief, it must appear that there is a witness who has competent knowledge, and that the picture is affirmed by him to represent it. The latt element may be implied from his very oath;[1] the former must appear fro his preliminary statements. The deductions from this general principle ma now be examined.

§ 794. Same: Anonymous Pictures; Personal Knowledge; Calling th Maker; Official Maps. (1) A map or photograph cannot be received anony mously; it must be "verified" by some witness.[1] So also specific additions marks or legends, borne on the document but not verified in particular, mus similarly be sponsored.[2] Where the map is offered as an official one, withou calling the officer (post, § 1665), the official authentication of it amounts c course to a verification.

(2) The witness thus standing sponsor must be qualified by observatio (ante, §§ 650, 657) to speak of the matters represented in the picture. Whether this requirement is properly fulfilled should be left to the deter mination of the trial Court.[4]

(3) The witness thus using the map or photograph as representing hi knowledge need not be the maker of it.[5] He affirms it to represent his obser

[1] The practical rule laid down in the following case ought to be extended to all these modes of testimony: 1856, Green, C. J., in State v. Fox, 25 N. J. L. 602: "A model is a copy or imitation of the thing intended to be represented; and when the witness states that he exhibits a model, it is to be inferred, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, that the model is [sworn to be] correct."

[1] This requirement is made, expressly or impliedly, in nearly every one of the rulings cited ante, §§ 791, 792, and no repetition of them is needed.

[2] For example: 1891, Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511, 538, 10 So. 106 (a map bearing the ma. "1. S.'s route," etc., was handed in after I. S had testified, counsel having made the marks; this was declared improper). In a radical ruling in New Hampshire (Ordway v. Haynes, 50 N. H. 159) it was said that when an illustration is offered in a medical book, even through a witness on the stand, "that makes it at once improper as evidence, because that gives it an undue importance with the jury; the jury should not know that it was in a medical book or a law book, or what the book was that contained it." The notion here is that the chart really thus receives a testimonial verification from some one, the book-author, not on the stand. But this seems an over-cautious and unpractical ruling.

[3] 1852, R. v. Mitchell, 6 Cox Cr. 82 (excluding a map certified by a surveyor but also containing such inscriptions as "place where the can of milk was spilt," etc., as to which he was not a competent witness); 1882, Humes v. Bernstein, 72 Ala. 546, 553 (map prepared from insufficient data); 1899, People v. Hill, 123 Cal 571, 56 Pac. 443 (diagram verified by witness who knew of the place only by hearsay, excluded); 1892, Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Monaghan, 140 Ill. 483, 30 N. E. 869 (see citation supra, § 792); 1876, Rippe v. R. Co., 23 Minn. 22 (map); 1903, State v. Smith, 68 N. J. L. 609, 54 Atl. 411 (furniture in a room at the time of a homicide).

[4] 1892, Ortiz v. State, 30 Fla. 256, 265, 11 So. 611 (see citation supra, § 792); 1892, Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Monaghan, 140 Ill. 483, 30 N. E. 869 (see citation supra, § 792); 1894, Farrell v. Weitz, 160 Mass. 288, 35 N. E. 783; 1893, Carey v. Hubbardstown, 172 id. 106, 51 N. E. 521; and other cases in this jurisdiction cited supra, § 792; 1898, Pritchard v. Austin, 69 N. H. 367, 46 Atl. 188; 1903, Hupfer v. National Distilling Co., — Wis. —, 96 N. W. 809 (identity of the object photographed is largely for the trial Court's determination; here, certain vat-hoops).

[5] Maps and Diagrams: 1853, Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 83 (map); 1898, Fuller v. State, 117 id. 36, 23 So. 688 (diagram); 1898, Jordan v. Duke, — Ariz. —, 53 Pac. 197 (map of land used by witness to illustrate his testimony, even though not otherwise proved correct); 1901, People v. Figueroa, 134 Cal. 159, 66 Pac. 202 (diagram made by counsel and verified by witness, received); 1903, State v. Forbes, 111 La. —, 35 So. 710; 1899, Hall v. Ins. Co., 76 Minn. 401, 79 N. W. 497 (map); 1887, State v. Whiteacre, 98 N. C. 753, 3 S. E. 488 (diagram); 1863, Wood v. Willard, 36 Vt. 82 (map); 1876, Hale v. Rich, 48 id. 224 (map); 1900, Hyde v. Swanton, 72 id. 242, 47 Atl. 790 (map, made

vation; and this is the essential element. Even the maker could not use it without such a guarantee; and it may equally represent others' observation as well as his own. Indeed, if it is a correct representation, it will naturally be equally representative for all observers.

(4) A map or survey need not be an official one.[6] The hearsay statement of an officer is admissible only as an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1665), and is therefore, if anything, the inferior sort of testimony. Moreover, there are in general no preferred classes of testimony (post, § 1286), and in particular there is no preference for official certificates or reports (post, § 1335); so that no principle can justify the demand for an official map or survey in preference to one verified by a qualified witness on the stand. It is only when a government map has by adoption in a deed become a constitutive document that it is required; and here the same result would ensue for any map so adopted.

§ 795. Same: Personal Knowledge exceptionally dispensed with; Magnifying Lens; Vacuum-rays. It is obvious that, in using certain mechanical instruments based upon the science of physics, we obtain a representation of things not perceivable by the ordinary senses; for example, in looking through a magnifying lens, we are presented with details which are invisible to the naked eye. Upon the principles, then, of testimonial Knowledge (ante, §§ 657, 665), can it be said that we have personal knowledge? Our impression is not received by the unaided senses, but depends for its verity upon the correctness of the intermediate instrument or process. It would by engineer knowing nothing of the places with reference to the issue, but identified by other testimony, admitted). Contra, but unsound: 1898, Tome Institute v. Davis, 87 Md. 591, 41 Atl. 166 (map used by a witness to illustrate the position of objects, excluded because not otherwise shown correct).

Photographs: 1875, Luke v. Calhoun Co., 52 Ala. 118 (the photograph of a man L. was identified by the plaintiff as that of her husband); 1899, McGar v. Bristol, 71 Conn. 652, 42 Atl. 1000; 1877, Locke v. R. Co., 46 Ia. 110 (the witness was shown a photograph taken by another, and declared it to be correct); 1890, State v. Holden, 42 Minn. 354, 44 N. W. 123 (showing a likeness and identifying it); 1887, Archer v. R. Co., 106 N. Y. 598, 603, 13 N. E. 318 (the witness was asked whether a photograph offered him was a fair representation of the locality; he answered that it was, but it appeared that he had not taken the photograph and knew nothing of the mode of its taking; Danforth J.: "If a fair representation of the premises, it was admissible as an aid in the investigation, as much so as a map or other diagram, and served in like manner to explain or illustrate and apply testimony"); 1888, People v. Jackson, 111 id. 370, 19 N. E. 54 (the witness was present at the taking, and had placed certain persons in the position occupied by them at the time of the homicide, the witness having seen the homicide); 1887, Wilcox v. Wilcox, 46 Hun 438 (witness who knew the person identifying a photograph); 1892, Roosevelt Hospital v. R. Co., 21 N. Y. Suppl. 205, 66 Hun 633 (identification of photograph by witnesses familiar with the premises); 1894, Nies v. Broadhead, 27 id. 52, 75 Hun 255 (same); 1893, Com. v. Connors, 156 Pa. 147, 151, 27 Atl. 366 (showing a photograph to one who has seen the person); 1901, New York S. & W. R. Co. v. Moore, 45 C. C. A. 21, 105 Fed. 725; 1902, McGovern v. Smith, — Vt. —, 53 Atl. 326 (the photograph-taker, if he can identify the place, need not be an expert photographer); and a few other cases already cited supra, § 792. Contra, expressly or impliedly: Kansas C. M. & B. R. Co. v. Smith, Ala., Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Monaghan, Ill., People's P. R. Co. v. Green, Dorsey v. Habersack, Md., Hollenbeck v. Rowley, Mass., cited supra, § 792; but these cases cannot be supported. A professional photographer is not needed: 1903, Mow v. People, — Colo. —, 72 Pac. 1069.

[6] 1876, Bridges v. McClendon, 56 Ala. 327, 335; 1879, Clements v. Pearce, 63 id. 284, 293; 1898, Justen v. Schaaf, 175 Ill. 45, 51 N. E. 695; 1872, Williamson v. Fischer, 50 Mo. 198, 200; 1886, Justice v. Luther, 94 N. C. 793, 795; 1898, Andrews v. Jones, 122 id. 666, 30 S. E. 19 (used for cross-examination); 1894, Turner v. U. S., 13 C. C. A. 436, 66 Fed. 280; 1899, King v. Jordan, 46 W. Va. 106, 32 S. E. 1022.

seem plain, however, that the situation is the same as if our senses had be abnormally enlarged in scope or capacity, and that we may here also clai to have knowledge, in the ordinary sense, provided only that the instrume or process is known to be a trustworthy one. That trustworthiness may b based upon gener[1] experience as to the class of instrument in questio together with a kn[illegible]edge of the mechanism of the particular instrument one constructed according to the trustworthy type. What is needed, the in order to justify testimony based on such instruments, is merely prelim nary professional testimony to the trustworthiness of the process or instru ment in general (when not otherwise settled by judicial notice[1]), and to th correctness of the particular instrument; such testimony being usuall available from one and the same person. Any process or instrument, fu nishing abnormal aid to the senses, may thus be employed as a source testimonial knowledge.

It will be seen that, after all, the real question is one of the proper source of a witness' knowledge (under the principle of §§ 657, 665, ante), and not o his mode of communicating it, under the present principle; because, if th source of knowledge is a proper one, the mode of communicating it is th usual one of words. It is true that in a single instance — namely, that o the vacuum or X rays — the process of observation may be united with th process of communication, i. e. the rays may at the same time make visibl the otherwise invisible and also by photograph register the impression. Bu this is not an essential union, — any more than the astronomer's automati photography by telescope is necessarily united with the process of telescopi observation; in either case a special additional apparatus of photography i used, and in either case the situation is virtually as if the observer had firs looked through the telescope or the vacuum-machine, had seen the detail with his own eyes, and then had verified the photograph as representing what he had seen with this artificial assistance. In practice, indeed, it is perhaps no more common to employ the photographic record in using vacuum-rays than in using the astronomical photograph for certain kinds of work. The process or instrument of observation, then, being duly testified to as trustworthy, it follows that a photograph of its images would always be receivable like any other photograph.

What kinds of abnormal processes or instruments are there, by which such artificial aids to the senses may be obtained and trusted? It may be premised that though, on the principle above noted, any such process or instrument must be preliminarily found to be a trustworthy one, yet if the appropriate science or art has advanced to a certain degree of general recog- nition, this trustworthiness may be judicially noticed (post, § 2581) as too notorious to need evidence. The various processes that have been from time to time employed and sanctioned are chiefly processes aiding the sense of vision:

(1) The magnifying lens (whether as microscope or telescope) is no doubt

[1] Post, § 2581.

an available instrument. Its general trustworthiness would be judicially noticed, though the quality and power of the particular instrument should in strictness be testified to.[2]

(2) The refracting lens, in the special form of the spectroscope, revealing chemical constituents by color-bands, should equally be sanctioned, and is in fact constantly used by professional investigators as the source of their testimony.[3]

(3) The cathode-ray (vacuum-ray, X-ray, Roentgen-ray) is also an available process; and it would seem that its general trustworthiness ought to be judicially noticed.[4]

(4) If scientific testimony should declare that the retina of a dead person's eye does (as the superstition now runs) preserve under certain circumstances a correct image of the object last seen by the deceased, then the use of this impression would be sanctioned by the present principle.

(5) The sense of hearing is enlarged by telephony, so that sounds electrically transmitted are known to have had existence at a distance whence they would ordinarily be inaudible. No question is ever made on this ground, and the difficulties arise from other principles (discussed ante, § 669, post, § 2155).

(6) If scientific testimony should ever declare that in a telepathic condition (hypnotism, mind-reading, and the like) the senses are trustworthily enlarged and made capable of precisely knowing things otherwise unknowable by that person at the time and place in question, then that source of knowledge should be accepted testimonially.

§ 796. Producing the Original of a Photograph; in General. By the gen-

[2] In only one instance (Frank v. Bank) does the present principle seem to have been carried out by a witness' use of the instrument; but the principle is not different where the tribunal itself uses the instrument; 1885, Barker v. Perry, 67 Ia. 148, 25 N. W. 100 (jury using magnifying glasses); 1857, State v. Knight, 43 Me. 131 (diagram used of blood as seen through microscope); 1879, Frank v. Bank, 13 Jones & Sp. 459 (an expert testified that a magnifying glass was correct and gave the multiple of its power, and the referee then examined the alleged erasures, etc., with it); 1872, Kannon v. Galloway, 2 Baxt. 232 (microscope used by jury). See additional instances under § 797, post (photographs of magnified handwriting).

[3] It was used, for example, in the Luetgert trial, Chicago, 1897.

[4] 1899, Jameson v. Weid, 93 Me. 345, 45 Atl. 299 (vacuum-ray photograph; admissible in trial Court's discretion); 1901, De Forge v. R. Co., 178 Mass. 59, 59 N. E. 669 (X-ray photographs of injured feet, taken by a medical expert in the process, admitted; "while a picture produced by an X-ray cannot be verified as a true representation of the subject in the same way that a picture made by a camera can be, yet it should be admitted if properly taken"); 1902, Geneva v. Burnett, — Nebr. —, 91 N. W. 275 (X-ray photographs of an injured foot, verified by the physicians taking them, admitted); 1902, Carlson v. Benton, — id. —, 92 N. W. 600 (X-ray photograph held admissible, upon due verification of the process by a competent taker); 1897, Bruce v. Beall, 99 Tenn. 543, 41 S. W. 445 (vacuum-ray photograph, admissible; if offered by a person properly skilled; here it purported to show the overlapping bones of a broken leg; "Naw as this process is, experiments made by scientific men, as shown by this record, have demonstrated its power to reveal to the natural eye the entire structure of the human body, and that its various parts can be photographed as its exterior surface has been and now is. And no sound reason was assigned at the bar why a civil court should not avail itself of this invention, when it was apparent that it would serve to throw light on the matter in controversy"); 1901, Sias v. Consol. Lighting Co., 73 Vt. 35, 50 Atl. 554 (X-ray photograph admitted; the ruling sanctions a petty quibbling objection to one part of the testimony of the expert); 1901, Miller v. Dumon, 24 Wash. 648, 64 Pac. 804 (use of X-ray photograph in testimony by the physician taking it, allowable); 1901, Manch v. Hartford, 112 Wis. 40, 87 N. W. 816 (X-ray photographs taken by an expert and verified by him, received).

eral principle elsewhere examined (post, § 1177), the original of a thing m be produced in specie to the tribunal, instead of receiving testimonial e dence about it. But this rule is usually regarded (post, §§ 1181–1183) not applicable to any objects but writings or at least to chattels not bearin written inscription. So far, then, as concerns objects not writings, a pho graphic representation could be used without accounting for the origin Nevertheless, where the object photographed is some place of land, a vi might be had (post, § 1162), and Courts have occasionally intimated tha view ought to be had in preference to testimony by photograph;[3] yet th seems no reason why such a rule, if valid at all, would not be equally pro for testimony in words.

§ 797. Same: Handwriting. Whether a photograph of handwriting m be used depends chiefly upon the principle requiring production of the ori nal of a writing (post, §§ 1177 ff.); but it is more convenient to consid together the practical effect of that principle and the present one.[1]

(a) In the first place, the question arises whether, for the purpose studying and identifying handwriting, photographic copies may be used at a The argument against their use has been thus expressed:

1871, Hutchings, Sur., in Taylor's Will, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 318: "When we reflect that placing the original to be copied obliquely to the sensitive plate, the portion nearest the plate may be distorted by being enlarged, and that the portion furthest from t plate must be correspondingly decreased, while the slightest bulging of the paper up which the signature is printed may make a part blurred and not sharply defined, we c form some idea of the fallacies to which this subject is liable. . . . The refractive pow of the lens, the angle at which the original to be copied was inclined to the sensiti plate, the accuracy of the focussing, and the skill of the operator, would have to be inve tigated to insure the evidence as certain. The Court would be obliged to suspend examination as to the question of the genuineness of the signature . . . and in fact inquire into the whole science of photography."

1880, Folger, C. J., in Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 51: "Somewhat, for exact lik ness, will depend upon the adjustment of the machinery, upon th atmospheric cond tions, and the skill of the manipulator. And in so delicate a matter as the reaching judicial results by the comparison of writings through the testimony of experts, it ough to be required that the witness should exercise his acumen upon the thing itself whic is to be the basis of his judgment. . . . The certainty of expert testimony in these cas is not so well assured that we can afford to let in the hazard of errors or differenc in copying, though it be done by howsoever a scientific process."

But this argument is nothing more than which may be urged (as alread noted in § 792, par. 3) against photographs in general, namely, their capa bility of falsifying; and the answer to it is the same, namely, that a photo

[1] But where the photograph is not used as testimony to an original but as the thing itself in issue (ante, § 790, note 1), the rule of production might apply to the photograph as itself the original (1884, People v. Muller, 32 Hun 210); though this result would be still open to doubt on the principle of § 1181, post, cited above.

[3] 1894, Bedell v. Berkey, 76 Mich. 440, 43 N. W. 308 (suggesting that a view may often be better, where premises are concerned); 189 Omaha R. Co. v. Beeson, 36 Nebr. 364, N. W. 557 (photograph of premises, admissibl where a view of them would be impracticable).

[1] The rules in general as to the use of spec mens to evidence the type of handwriting (pos §§ 2003 ff.) and of testimonial qualifications fo handwriting (ante, §§ 569, 693 ff.) have of cours equal application here.

graph represents what a witness affirms to be a correct reproduction, and therefore that provisional credit must be given to the witness' affirmation, unless we are prepared to go the length of maintaining that exact reproduction of handwriting in photography is in the nature of things impossible. No doubt especial care should be taken to secure positive testimony to the accuracy of reproduction; just as, upon another principle (post, § 2097), precise verbal accuracy is sometimes required for testimony to a person's words orally uttered. But this is no more than may be deduced from the general principle (ante, § 790), and falls far short of declaring such accuracy unattainable. The state of the photographic art does not admit of such an assertion; all that can be said is that a photograph of a writing may be made to falsify, like other photographs and like other kinds of testimony, and that a qualified witness' affirmation of its exactness suffices to remove this danger, —as much as any such testimonial danger can be removed. Accordingly, it seems generally conceded that a photographic copy of handwriting may be used instead of the original, so far as the accuracy of the medium is concerned.[2]

(b) Assuming, then, that testimony by photographic copy is in itself a proper mode, the application remains to be considered of the general principle (post, § 1177), requiring production of the original.

(1) If the original is obtainable but has not been produced, then the general rule applies and there is no excuse for resorting to copies of any sort; a photograph is therefore inadmissible.[3]

(2) If the original is not obtainable, then a copy may be used; hence, a photograph is admissible. Under what conditions the original may be said to be not obtainable depends upon the general principle and the specific rules for all documents (post, §§ 1192 ff.); in the present application a liberal construction is commonly given to them.[4]

[2] Accord: 1860, Marcy v. Barnes, 16 Gray 163 ("Under proper precautions in relation to preliminary proof as to the exactness and accuracy of the copies produced by the art of the photographer, we are unable to perceive any valid objection"); and all the cases in the ensuing notes. Contra, the two obiter dicta above quoted, and the following 1873, Tome v. R. Co., 39 Md. 93 (where the decision also excludes comparison of handwriting in any form). Undecided: 1896, Geer v. M. L. & M. Co., 134 Mo. 85, 34 S. W. 1099 (question reserved; but a verification of exact likeness held at least essential; here a custodian's certificate that it was a "true and literal exemplification" was held insufficient).

[3] 1883, Maclean v. Scripps, 52 Mich. 218, 17 N. W. 815, 18 N. W. 209, and the cases in the ensuing notes.

[4] 1874, Re Stephens, L. R. 9 C. P. 187 (it was intimated that photographic copies could be used in sending out of the jurisdiction a de bene commission, the originals not being allowed to leave the court; here the authenticity of the signature seems not to have been in question); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, §§ 1307, 1317, as amended in 1901 by the Commission (in probate of a will, the Court "may authorize a photographic copy of the will to be made and to be presented to such [absent attesting] witness on his examination," who may be examined on it as if it were the original; for the validity of these Commissioners' amendments, see ante, § 488); 1883, Duffin v. People, 107 Ill. 113, 119 (photographic copy of signature to note, admitted to show the words written, the original having faded and become illegible; whether a photograph could have been thus used to show the handwriting, not decided); 1876, Foster's Will, 34 Mich. 23, semble (see citation infra); 1883, Maclean v. Scripps, 52 Id. 218, 17 N. W. 815, 18 N. W. 209, semble (principle conceded); R. I. Gen. L. 1896, c. 210, § 14 (original will lost; on proof and decree, photographic copy filed in records may be used as original); 1877, Eborn v. Zimpelmann, 47 Tex. 519 (the general principle was recited that the copy may be used if the original signature is unavailable; but the fact that the witnesses to the signature were in another State and the original signature to be

(3) When the original is produced, but it is desired also conveniently collate specimens by photographic groupings (as by placing many specimen in juxtaposition on a single sheet), the original is not literally unavailab (post, § 1192), in the sense of being tangibly beyond procurement. Neve theless, there is still lacking and unproduced to instantaneous perception th minute resemblances and differences which appear upon close juxtapositio and fade from memory in the operation of passing from one document to th others. Hence, the photographic juxtaposition does, in strict sense, "produce these otherwise unavailable minutiæ, and such a grouping is therefore allow able without even any deviation from technical principle.[5]

(4) So also, the original being produced, a photographic enlargemen through a magnifying lens, may properly be employed.[6] The minute featur of the writing — particularly those which indicate an erasure or a tracing — are often in their full detail invisible to the naked eye, and hence are u available in the liberal sense of the term; the case is in effect the same that of an illegible document, which it is conceded (post, § 1229) may proved by copy.

C. WRITTEN TESTIMONY.

§ 799. Oral and Written Testimony, in general. In the common-law cou the traditional method of delivering testimony is to utter it orally, not testified to was in the files of the Court did not constitute unavailability sufficiently to allow the use of a deposition taken in the other State and founded on photographic copies sent to the witness for examination); 1883, Houston v. Blythe, 60 id. 508, 509, 510 (photographs of archives not able to be produced were rejected, apparently unconditionally; yet claiming to follow Eborn v. Zimpelmann; here the signature to be used was a specimen only); 1889, Howard v. Russell, 75 id. 171, 12 S. W. 525 (originals out of the jurisdiction and contained in public or other archives; photographs received); 1890, Ayers v. Harris, 77 id. 113, 114, 115, 13 S. W. 768 (here archives, not able to be produced, were photographed); 1890, Buzard v. McAnulty, ib. 447, 14 S. W. 138 (general statement requiring a showing that it was "not in power of the plaintiffs to produce" the original, which was the disputed document); 1899, Grooms v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 319, 50 S. W. 370 (forgery of deed; photographs of the deeds in the case, refused to be produced by defendant after notice, admitted); 1868, Daly v. Maguire, 6 Blatchf. 137 (an exhibit of printed slips from newspapers, needed for a commission de bene, was allowed to be sent away on condition of substituting photographic copies; here the authenticity of no signature was involved); 1875, Leathers v. Wrecking Co., 2 Wood 682 (photographs allowed of documents in the government archives); 1893, Owen v. Mining Co., 13 U. S. App. 248, 270, 9 C. C. A. 338, 61 Fed. 6 (photographic copies of printed Mexican archives, themselves unavailable, used by experts in determining genuineness).

As to the necessity of having the original placed before an absent witnes [illegible] tion, see post, § 1185.

[5] 1859, Luco v. U. S., 23 How. 531 (genui and false signatures and seals were allowed to conveniently grouped on a single photograph sheet, the originals being also at hand); 18 Crane v. Horton, 5 Wash. 481, 32 Pac. 223 (disputed signature was at hand, and no spec need of the photographic grouping offered seem in this case to exist; rejected).

[6] 1892, Riggs v. Powell, 142 Ill. 453, 4 32 N. E. 482 (enlarged photographic copy disputed writing used); 1901, Howard v. Illin T. & S. Bank, 189 id. 568, 59 N. E. 1106 (plicate photographs of an original produc excluded as superfluous; but photographic largements admitted as useful); 1860, Marcy Barnes, 16 Gray 163 (similar); 1876, Fost Will, 34 Mich. 23, semble (allowable for the puted writing; left to the Court's discretio 1880, Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 51 (cluding photographs when alone; but imply that as enlargements accompanying the dispu writing they would be acceptable); 1899, U. v. Ortiz, 176 U. S. 422, 20 Sup. 466 (enlar photographs of standard and disputed writi admitted with the originals); 1887, Rowell Fuller, 59 Vt. 695, 10 Atl. 853 (allowing it disputed writing and standards); 1893, Cran Horton, 5 Wash. 131, semble (allowab Contra: 1871, Taylor Will Case, 10 Abb. N. S. 318 (see quotation supra).

This expedient has sometimes been brou into service by writers of fiction, as in Mr. J. Holland's "Sevenoaks." For the use of let press copies of handwriting, as the basis of c parison, see post, §§ 2010, 2019.

writing; in the chancery court, on the other hand, the traditional mode is the written one. There can hardly be any doubt as to the superiority of the former over the latter method, and for two reasons: first of all, the latter method leads naturally to the taking of testimony out of the presence of the tribunal of decision, and the whole benefit of the demeanor of the witness as affecting his credibility (post, §§ 947, 1395) is lost; secondly, the tedious process of recording the words as uttered tends to discourage full and thorough questioning and almost emasculates cross-examination; and the many failures of justice in courts-martial must be attributed in part to their adherence to the antiquated method of writing down the questions and answers in longhand. The oral method has no doubt some disadvantages, particularly in the facilities which it affords for intimidation by cross-examination (ante, § 781), as well as in the dependence of the tribunal upon mere recollection for a deliberate survey of all the testimony in a complicated case; but in the latter respect the modern practice of reporting the testimony in shorthand has partly eliminated this drawback. On the other hand, the rigor of the chancery rule has been almost everywhere modified by statutes permitting viva voce delivery of testimony in discretion.

So far as expediency and effectiveness are concerned, the modified practice of the common-law courts is to-day on the whole as satisfactory as can be in any system. Nevertheless, in theory the common-law principle remains, namely, that all testimony is delivered orally to the jury; so that, even where a part of the testimony is in fact contained in writing, it is formally put in by an oral reading aloud on the part of witness, clerk, or counsel.[1] This technicality, however, may be here disregarded, and, looking at the actual medium of the testimony, we may inquire what special rules arise in consequence of the testimony, or a part of it, being virtually in writing. For this purpose, the various uses of writing fall into four sorts, (1) records of a past recollection; (2) copies of writings; (3) depositions; (4) absent witnesses' testimony admitted ad hoc; (5) official certificates, reports, and registers, and private writings, received under exceptions to the Hearsay rule or as opponent's admissions.

§ 800. Records of Past Recollection. When a witness uses in his testimony a record or memorandum of his past recollection, he virtually adopts it as part of his present deliverance; it becomes a written statement of his present assertion, and as such it may be read and shown to the jury (ante, § 754). The requirements which must first exist for these memoranda have already been considered (ante, §§ 745 ff.). On the other hand, when a paper is used merely to revive a present recollection, the oral utterance prompted by the revived recollection is alone the testimony; the writing becomes no part of the testimony and therefore cannot be put in or read such (ante, § 763), though the opponent or the jury may obtain inspection it as a safeguard against fabrication (ante, § 762).

[1] 1851, Withers, J., in Kuhlman v. Brown, 4 Rich. L. 479, 486 ("The idea that testimony by deposition is a written document, that should go before the jury as such, seems to present no difficulty; for in ordinary cases a deposition in English is read to the jury and reaches them through the ear only, as all evidence derived from the mouth of a witness does"); 1862, People v. Dyckman, 24 How. Pr. 222, 226 (a witness producing a document may be compelled to read it aloud; good opinion).

§ 801. Copies of Writings. So far as recollection is concerned, a copy in effect the commonest variety of a record of past recollection (ante, § 74 so far as mode of communication is concerned, it is a merely anonymo piece of paper until it has been adopted and verified by some qualified w ness, precisely as a map or photograph must be (ante, §§ 790, 793). T application of these principles to copies is however more conveniently treat in connection with the rule requiring Production of the Original Writi and the rules are there examined (post, §§ 1277–1281). There are al certain rules of Preference applicable to the choice of one kind of copy rath than another, and these are considered in the same (post, §§ 1264 f The principle of Completeness also prescribes rules, plicable to writt copies, for the degree of fulness with which the original must be reproduc (post, §§ 2094 ff.). Copies authorized to be made by public officers may used without calling the copyist to the stand; but this involves an exceptic to the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1677 ff.).

§ 802. Depositions, in general. The term "deposition," which former was applied to include testimony orally delivered, is now confined in mea ing to testimony exclusively delivered in writing, i. e. testimony which legal contemplation does not exist apart from a writing made or adopted b the witness. It is virtually of two sorts, namely, testimony which is nev of any legal significance until it is completed in writing — as, the ordina deposition de bene taken by a commissioner, — and (in occasional use of t term) testimony which may first sufficiently exist orally, but upon bei reduced to writing is regarded as exclusively or prima facie contained in t writing, — as, the oral examination taken before a magistrate on a preli nary criminal trial. What difference there is in the legal conclusiveness the writing is noticed later (post, § 805). So far as the present principle concerned, the question is, What special rules arise for securing accuracy narration because of the departure from the oral form and the reduction in writing? If the witness himself wrote out the statement entire, no speci question would arise. But in practice he usually does not, since the writte form is that peculiar to testimony delivered out of court before a commi sioner authorized by the court to receive and transmit it, and this commi sioner is legally authorized to act and usually does act as the transcriber the oral utterance; so that it is an intermediary who makes the writi which becomes the testimony, and thus it becomes specially necessary t secure that this writing shall represent precisely the statement for which t witness stands sponsor.[1] The special elements of the situation which ma thus be a source of error and must be guarded by special rules are thre namely, the personality of the official writer, the verbal accuracy of his tra scription of the witness' utterance, and the witness' deliberate and knowing indorsement of the transcription as completed. These three may be considered in order.

[1] "An artful or careless scribe may make a witness speak what he never meant, by dressing up his depositions in his own forms and la guage": 1768, Blackstone, Comm. III, 373.

§ 803. Same: Officer not to be Party's Agent or Kinsman. The writing becomes the testimony; the writer is to be trusted to reproduce exactly the witness' oral utterances; and the opportunities for serious mispresentation, by deliberate fraud or unconscious effort, are too great to allow the writing to be made by a person open to plain suspicion of bias or interest for one or the other of the parties. Accordingly, it has always been the rule that the commissioner, or other officer taking the deposition, shall not be a person united to either party by near kinship or important pecuniary interest:

1824, Hosmer, C. J., in Allen v. Rand, 5 Conn. 322, 324: "The law will not trust an agent to draw up a deposition for his principal, as by the insertion of a word the meaning of which is not correctly understood, or by the omission of a fact that ought to be inserted, the testimony thus garbled and discolored will be false and deceptive. Nor is there a possible argument in favor of such a proceeding. The deponent may write the deposition, or procure it to be written by a disinterested person, or it may be drawn up by the magistrate who takes it, or the parties may agree on a fit person for this purpose. . . . As the witness ought to be disinterested, so must the evidence be impartial, comprising the whole truth and nothing but the truth; and this can never rationally be expected when a deposition is drawn up by an attorney or agent, or, what is little less exceptionable, by the party himself. Sickness constitutes no reason for the relaxation of this rule, as it produces no actual necessity; and if it did, it would make no difference, as no such exception to the general rule is admissible. It is much preferable that in particular instances the party should even be deprived of testimony than that a principle leading to widespread mischief should be adopted; as private disadvantage is a less evil than general inconvenience."

1825, Tilghman, C. J., in Summers v. M'Kim, 12 S. & R. 405, 410: "The counsel of the party producing the witness is the last person who should be permitted to draw the deposition, because he will naturally be disposed to favor his client; and it is very easy for an artful man to make use of such expressions as may give a turn to the testimony very different from what the witness intended. I know that depositions are sometimes taken in this manner by consent of parties; and when the counsel on both sides are present, the danger is not great; but in the present case there was no consent nor was the counsel of the plaintiffs present. The rule of court is that the deposition shall be taken 'before a justice.' It ought therefore to be reduced to writing from the mouth of the witness in the presence of the justice, though it need not be drawn by him; and in case of difference of opinion in taking down the words of the witness the justice should decide."

1840, Gilchrist, J., in Whicher v. Whicher, 11 N. H. 348, 353: "The duty of a magistrate in taking a deposition is essentially judicial in its character. He has other duties to perform than that of administering an oath to the deponent. He has a discretion to exercise in regard to the treatment of a witness, that he may not be induced by leading questions to state facts more broadly than the truth will warrant, and that he should not be brow-beaten nor terrified into the suppression of facts within his knowledge. . . . And he is to exercise such a general supervision over the examination, as will tend to elicit the truth, in a legal and proper manner, which, particularly in the case of timid or illiterate witnesses, is one of the most delicate and difficult parts of judicial duty. These duties are, in practice, too often overlooked by a careless or inefficient magistrate, or wilfully disregarded by a prejudiced one. A party selects his own magistrate, and, having this power of selection, he is naturally more anxious to seek a friendly, than a hostile, or even an impartial tribunal. Under such auspices, the examination proceeds as might be ticipated. The opposing party, not unreasonably distrustful of the magistrate selected his antagonist, is often dissatisfied with the course of the examination; and the instan are numerous, where, rather than submit to the injustice of hearing what he believe partial statement of facts read to the jury, he incurs the expense of summoning the w ness to attend the trial, that the deposition may not be used. . . . Now to hold tha magistrate, invested with such varied powers, and whose improper conduct may lead such evil results, should not be as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit, is to ap to him a rule which never obtains in any other case, where men are appointed to dec upon the rights of others."

This general rule, more or less indefinite in its application, originated early chancery practice,[2] but has also been adopted, in one form or anoth in most of the statutes authorizing depositions to be taken by courts common law.[3] It does not, of course, prevent the officer from having t

[2] Circa 1600, Tothill's Reports, App. p. 21, Proceedings of the High Court of Chancery; 1612, Peacock's Case, 9 Co. Rep. 70, b ("Commissioners to examine ought to be indifferent"); 1613, Forteseue & Coake's Case, Godb. 193 ("one who had been a solicitor in the cause is not a fit person to be a commissioner in the same cause"); 1730, Fricker v. Moore, Bunb. 289 (deposition before party's solicitor, suppressed); 1779, Selwyn's Case, 2 Dick. 563 (same); 1818, Gordon v. Gordon, 1 Swanst. 166, 170 (commissioner a solicitor to a party in another cause between the same parties; not decided); 1842, Sayer v. Wagstaff, 5 Beav. 462, 464 (commissioner subsequently acting as party's solicitor, disqualified); 1843, Mostyn v. Spencer, 6 id. 135 (nephew and agent of plaintiff, held improper).

[3] Ala.: 1848, Scott v. Baber, 13 Ala. 182, 189 (commissioners being nephews of both parties, held not improper); 1849, Bryant v. Ingraham, 16 id. 116, 119 (brother-in-law of party, held improper); 1850, Jordan v. Jordan, 17 id. 466, 469 (kinsman held improper); Alaska: C. C. P. 1900, § 653 (must be written by the officer or the witness or some disinterested person); Conn.: Gen. St. 1887, § 1070 (deposition written, drawn up, or dictated by party, attorney, or person interested, not admissible); Fla.: Rev. St. 1892, § 1129 (commissioner is not to be "of kin to, nor the attorney nor the agent of either party, nor interested in the result"); Ga.: Code 1895, § 5303 (deposition not to be written by person "incompetent as a juror on account of relationship or as a witness on account of interest," nor by attorney or his clerk, or paid agent, of party); 1848, Tillinghast v. Walton, 5 Ga. 335, 339 (clerk of party's counsel, held improper; good opinion); 1861, Williams v. Rawlins, 33 id. 117, 121 (attorney not in the cause, held proper); Ida.: St. 1899, Feb. 10, § 12 (deposition shall be written by the officer, the deponent, or some disinterested person); Ill.: Rev. St. 1874, c. 51, § 33 ("The party, his attorney, or any person who shall in any wise be interested in the event of the suit, shall not be permitted to dictate, write, or draw up any deposition"); Ind.: Rev. St. 1897, § 438 (deposition must be written by officer, or deponent, or "some disinterested p son"); Kan.: G. S. 1897, c. 95, § 361 (offi taking deposition "must not be a relative attorney of either party, or otherwise interes in the event"); Me.: 1824, Smith v. Smi 2 Greenl. 408 (magistrate who had forme during the same cause acted as party's attorn held improper); Mass.: P. S. 1882, c. 169, § Rev. L. 1902, c. 175, § 33 (deposition shall written "by the justice, commissioner, dep ent, or by a disinterested person in the prese and under the direction of the justice or co missioner"); 1832, Wood v. Cole, 13 Pick. (one temporarily attorney in a former stage the cause, and again retained after the deposit taken, held not improper); 1833, Coffin v. Jon ib. 441, 445 (friend assisting the party at ot depositions, held not incompetent on the fact 1833, Chandler v. Brainard, 14 id. 285, (party's son-in-law, held not incompetent, statute not expressly prohibiting kinsme Mich.: Comp. L. 1897, § 10136 (commissio not to be "of counsel or attorney for either the parties, nor interested in the event of cause"); Minn.: Gen. St. 1894, § 5676 (like Mississippi statute); Miss.: Annot. Code 18 § 1754 (deposition to be written by commissio or witness, or "some disinterested person 1880, Groves v. Groves, 57 Miss. 658, 660 (p ty'a uncle, held improper); Nebr.: Comp. 1899, § 5950 (officer taking deposition "m not be a relative or attorney of either party, otherwise interested in the event of the proce ing"); N. H.: Pub. St. 1891, c. 225, § 7 person to write the deposition who would be d qualified as juror except by exemption); 18 Bean v. Quimby, 5 N. H. 94 (party's une improper); 1840, Whicher v. Whicher, 11 348, 351 (one acting as attorney to questi deponent at a prior atage, incompetent; thou the statute made no express prohibition of a one; see quotation supra); N. J.: Gen. 1896. Evidence, § 25 (depositions to be writt "only by the officer" or by the deponent; also ib. § 66); § 59 (may be taken by sworn ste ographer); N. C.: Code 1883, § 1357 (co missioner taking deposition, to be "of kin neither party"); N. D.: Rev. C. 1895, §§ 567

manual act of writing done under his direction by an assistant;[4] but this assistant, acting for the officer, must equally be a person free from any connection of bias or interest of the above sort.[5]

§ 804. Same: Transcription in Witness' Words. No Court seems ever to have insisted on a perfectly literal reproduction of the witness' very words. Perhaps no writer not a stenographer could give an exactly verbatim rendering, and the failure would be evidentially immaterial unless it were of serious extent. Nor can accuracy be regarded as a quality necessary to be expressly shown by other testimony, since the officer certifies that he has accurately transcribed, and faith must prima facie be given to his statement. Nevertheless the danger exists to be guarded against; there is ever an inherent possibility of error, no matter how impartial or careful the officer:

1843, Lord Langdale, M. R., in Johnston v. Todd, 5 Beav. 601: "When the witness is illiterate and ignorant, the language [of an affidavit] presented to the Court is not his; it is and must be the language of the person who prepares the affidavit; and it may be,

5680 (like Okl. Stats. §§ 4240, 4244); Oh.: Annot. Rev. St. 1898, §§ 5271, 5275 (like Okl. Stats. §§ 4240, 4244); Okl.: Stats. 1893, § 4240 (officer "must not be a relative or attorney of either party, or otherwise interested in the event of the action or proceeding"); § 4244 (deposition must be written "either by the officer, the witness, or some disinterested person"); Or.: C. C. P. § 824 (deposition in the State and upon oral interrogatories out of the State must be written by officer or witness "or some disinterested person"); S. D.: Stats. 1899, §§ 6518, 6522 (like N. D. Rev. C. §§ 5675, 5680); Tenn.: Code 1896, §§ 5637, 5657 (person taking deposition not to be interested in the cause nor of counsel to either party nor of kin within the sixth degree as computed by the civil law); Tex.: 1866, Floyd v. Rice, 28 Tex. 341, 342 (surety on appellee's bond, held an improper person); 1894, Blum v. Jones, 86 Tex. 492, 495, 25 S. W. 694 (notary being "an employee in a mercantile establishment belonging to one of the parties," held an improper person); U. S.: Rev. St. 1878, § 863 (officer not to be "of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, nor interested in the event of the cause"); 1868, Ship Norway, 2 Ben. 121 (witness' wife, appointed on the facts for a deposition in the East Indies); Vt.: St. 1894, § 1271 (no agent, attorney, or person interested in a cause, to write a deposition); 1802, Heacock v. Stoddard, 1 Tyler 344 (party's son-in-law, held competent, under a statute forbidding persons "interested in the cause"; Tyler, J., diss.); Wash.: Code & Stats. 1897, § 6025 (must be written by the officer, the witness, "or some disinterested person"); Wis.: Stats. 1898, § 4089 (officer not eligible who "is the attorney or of counsel for any party or person interested, or is himself otherwise interested in the action," except by written consent); § 4105 (deposition to be written by officer or witness or "some disinterested person"); Wyo.: Rev. St. 1887, §§ 2619, 2623 (like Oh. Rev. St. §§ 5271, 5275). Compare also the citations in the next note but one.

[4] Whether such an officer may delegate his function of presiding at the taking is a different question — one of judicial powers — which is without the present purview.

[5] Some of the improprieties noted in the following cases are hardly to be distinguished from the impropriety of a prepared deposition (ante, § 787); the statutes on the present point have been placed in note 3, supra: 1687, Newton v. Foot, 2 Dick. 793 (clerk of party's solicitor, held improper); 1819, Cooke v. Wilson, 4 Madd. 380 (same); 1844, Steele v. Dart, 6 Ala. 798 (deposition in party's handwriting, rejected); 1849, Bryant v. Ingraham, 16 id. 116, 119 (deposition in party's brother's handwriting, suppressed); 1824, Allen v. Rand, 5 Conn. 322 (deponent being too ill to write, a person requested by the defendant wrote it out for her at her house and it was afterwards sworn to before the magistrate; excluded); 1875, Snyder v. Snyder, 50 Ind. 492, 493 (party's attorney may write questions, but not answers); 1866, Hurst v. Larpin, 21 Ia. 484 (party's attorney as scrivener, held improper); 1813, Logan v. Steeles, 3 Bibb 230 (deposition in the handwriting of a nephew of the party, written in the absence of the magistrate, excluded); 1831, Donoho v. Petit, Walker Miss. 440 (party's attorney as scrivener, not ipso facto improper); 1864, Cushman v. Wooster, 45 N. H. 410, 413 (under a statute requiring the magistrate to write the answers, an indifferent person may act as clerk under the magistrate's control; but the practice "should not be encouraged"); 1804, Mosely v. Mosely, N. C. Confer. 522 (deposition taken by plaintiff's attorney "under the view and control of the commissioner in the presence of the defendant," excluded); 1849, Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Woods, 11 Pa. 99 (party's attorney writing the deposition, allowable when consented to); 1853, Wertz v. May, 21 id. 274, 279 (deposition taken down by the defendant's counsel, the plaintiff's counsel present and consenting, admitted).

and too often is, the expression of that person's erroneous inference as to the meanin
the language used by the witness himself; and, however carefully the affidavit ma read over to the witness, he may not understand what is said in language so diffe from that which he is accustomed to use. . . . [Thus] testimony not intended by hi brought into the Court as his."

The solution reached by the Courts seems to be, properly enough, that deposition will not be rejected on this ground unless on its face (and perh together with circumstances otherwise shown) it appears clearly to be language which the witness could not have used.[1]

The act of writing should of course be done immediately, not afterwa from recollection.[2] The use of stenography in taking depositions, the tr lation being made afterwards, removes the substance of this danger; but would seem that the translation into longhand ought to be made before consummation of the taking, since otherwise there would be no check u possible errors.[3]

§ 805. Same: Reading Over and Signing. (1) Since the writing is to sta as the witness' own words, and since there is always an indefinable coefficie of error in transcription, there should be given a final opportunity for corr tion by the reading over to or by the witness, of the writing as completed.
has been customary in statutes to make special provisions for this.[1]

(2) The witness' signature may be regarded either as necessary to constitu the writing his by adoption, or as symbolically equivalent to a knowing asse to its tenor (thus dispensing with the reading over), or as an additional mea of identifying the person of the witness. Whatever the legal theory, it is us ally treated as a technical requirement indispensable under the statutes.[2]

(3) Supposing that the technical requirements of reading over and signi are not fulfilled, a difference then arises between a deposition in the str sense (i. e. testimony taken de bene before a mere commissioner for later u

[1] The following rulings deal with affidavits, but the principle is the same: 1811, Fowler v. State, 5 Day 82 (a complaint, signed by the prosecuting witness, and praying for inquiry by the grand jury; excluded, because drawn up by a justice of the peace in legal language, and therefore not fairly representing the witness' own statements); 1877, State v. Elliott, 45 Ia. 486 (deponent made affidavit before a justice of the peace; but, as two-thirds of it appeared to be in the language of the justice and it was not read over to the deponent before he signed it, the Court rejected it).

[2] 1822, R. v. Sexton, Chetwynd's Suppl. to Burn's Justice, quoted in Joy, Confessions, 19 (confession not taken down by the officer from the lips of the accused, but written out afterwards from recollection; excluded).

[3] 1899, Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791 (notary's having the deposition taken in shorthand and then written out in longhand before signing, held proper).

[1] These statutes depend so much on detailed provisions that it is impracticable to reproduce them here; a guide to their place in the statute-books will be found in the citations post, §§ 1380–1383. For the same reason, the rulings up them, depending on local wordings, can profitably be examined here; the following ca illustrate their method: 1902, Louisville & R. Co. v. Carter, — Ky. —, 66 S. W. 5 (press-copy of unsigned deposition taken in other case, verified by the notary, excluded; h improperly, because the deposition was offe only as an admission, under the principle § 1075, post); 1836, People v. Moore, 15 We 419, 421 (the statute does not require a readi over to a witness, because it must be signed him, and hence the failure to read over mer discredits, and does not exclude such a depo tion; but the statute requires a reading over an accused, because it need not be signed him, and hence a reading over must be shown 1898, Zehner v. Lehigh C. & N. Co., 187 P 487, 490, 41 Atl. 464 (longhand translati must be read over and signed by the witness 1893, Moller v. U. S., 13 U. S. App. 472, 47 6 C. C. A. 459, 57 Fed. 490 (same); 189 Shepherd v. Snodgrass, 47 W. Va. 79, 34 S. 879 (similar).

[2] See note 1, supra.

in a trial) and testimony before a committing magistrate in criminal cases. In the former instance the testimony is exclusively to be found in the writing, because a deposition is the creature of the statute or order granting the judicial officer's authority, and thus, if the writing fails in the above requirements, it never becomes testimony, and there is no testimony of that witness (post, § 1331). In the latter instance, on the other hand, the oral utterance was already testimony in that stage; it might become written testimony if a writing of the required sort was consummated; but, if not, then at least it remained oral testimony. Hence, it could be proved as such, by any ordinary and proper evidence. This might be done by calling a person who heard it (post, § 1330), or by accepting (under the exception to the Hearsay rule) the magistrate's official report of the testimony (post, §§ 1326 ff., § 1667), or by accepting the stenographer's testimony, either speaking on the stand with the notes as a record of recollection (ante, § 736) or certifying officially to it under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1669). Moreover, even a deposition, imperfectly taken as such, may by the party's adoption of it become his own admission (post, § 1075).

§ 806. Same: Other Principles discriminated. (1) For depositions, the rules as to leading questions are in general the same as for oral testimony (ante, §§ 769 ff.).

(2) Whether the interrogatories must be specific and the answers responsive involves the question of adequacy of opportunity for cross-examination (post, §§ 1393, 1394).

(3) The prohibition of a prepared draft of answers has been already considered in dealing with the general rule against improper suggestion (ante, § 787).

(4) The authority of the officer and the technical formalities of caption, certificate, and the like involve questions of procedure, beyond the present purview; they are briefly noted under the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1376, 1676).

(5) The authentication of the deposition also involves statutory details of trial procedure not within the present purview; but so far as the evidential principle of authentication is concerned, its rules are dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 2129 ff.).

(6) The requirement of cross-examination, or notice and opportunity thereof, as indispensable to the use of a deposition, is a question of the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1377 ff.).

(7) The necessity of showing the deponent deceased, absent, or otherwise unavailable, in order to resort to his deposition, involves the rule of Confrontation (post, §§ 1401 ff.).

(8) The treatment of a deposition as an admission by the party using it at a former trial involves the doctrine of Admissions (post, § 1075).

(9) The time of making objections to testimony in a deposition depends upon the general rule for Objections (ante, § 18).

§ 807. Absent Witness' Testimony admitted. The testimony of an absent witness may be admitted by the opponent's consent in order to prevent a postponement on behalf of the party desiring to call him. The admis may be either that the alleged testimony is true, or merely that it w have been delivered as alleged; the statutes differing in their provisi The alleged testimony, forming the subject of the Admission, is of co usually presented in written form, either as an affidavit of the witness l self or as a stipulation agreed to by counsel. It appears in the cause so by virtue of the opponent's judicial admission; no question of the pre principle therefore arises; and the subject is dealt with under the hea Judicial Admissions (post, § 2595).

§ 808. Official Statements and Private Writings, under Hearsay Exceptio Opponent's Admissions. Under the various Exceptions to the Hearsay statements in writing are often admissible. So far as any questions u the present principle arise, they can be more conveniently examined u the respective Exceptions to that rule (post, §§ 1420–1797).

An opponent's extrajudicial admissions are frequently in written fo such questions as arise for them under the present principle are dealt under Admissions (post, §§ 1070–1075).

D. INTERPRETED TESTIMONY.

§ 811. Deaf-Mutes, Aliens, Inaudible Witnesses; Interpreters and Tra tions. The mode of communication will usually be in words or other sym directly intelligible to the tribunal. If the witness cannot employ a m thus directly intelligible, some intermediary may and must be sought can interpret the witness' mode into the ordinary one:

1851, Withers, J., in Kuhlman v. Brown, 4 Rich. L. 479, 485 (admitting a trans deposition): "Upon general principles it is contended that our law exacts the En tongue as its only language. This is true as to the pleadings, and it is also true th speaks that language to the jury. But is it true that it hears no other? Every da perience testifies the contrary. Any language is heard in court where a foreign wi must be used there. And what is the office that the law performs? It requires means shall be furnished by the actor on that occasion, or in some manner provid convert the testimony, clothed and adduced in a foreign tongue, into that which jury who are to estimate it comprehend. . . . It is enough to remark that ever pedient should be favorably regarded, and that most favorably, the tendency of w gives the strongest promise of an intelligible transmission of the evidence to the through a medium capable, unbiassed, faithful."

It is clear that testimony will not be allowed to fail if some process o terpretation is available. The conditions under which it is to be resorte are the simple dictates of cautious common sense:

(1) Interpretation is proper to be resorted to whenever a necessity exists not till then:[1]

[1] The following anecdote illustrates the need of caution: O'Regan's Memoirs of John Philpott Curran, 29: "An Irish witness, Mr. Curran said, was called on the table to give evidence, and having a preference for his own language (first, as that in which he could best express himself, next, as being a poor Celt he loved it for its antiqnity, but above all other reasons, th could better escape cross-examination b and wishing to appear mean and poor and fore a mere 'Irish,' he was observed on c into court to take the buckles cunningly his shoes. The reason of this was ask counsel, and one of the country peopl

1858, O'Brien, J., in R. v. Burke, 8 Cox Cr. 45, 47: "The value of this test [cross-examination] is very much lessened in the case of a witness, having a sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand the questions put by counsel, pretending ignorance of it, and gaining time to consider his answers while the interpreter is going through the useless task of interpreting the question which the witness already understands."

Whenever the witness' natural and adequate mode of expression is not intelligible to the tribunal, interpretation is necessary. Whether the need exists is to be determined by the trial Court.[2] There are three general classes of persons for whom such a necessity may exist: (a) persons organically unable to use words, and obliged to communicate by ordinary gestures or by a systematic sign-language, i. e. most commonly, deaf-mutes;[3] (b) persons speaking exclusively or more naturally a language alien to that used by the tribunal;[4] (c) persons unable, through diffidence or illness, to speak loud enough for the tribunal to hear distinctly.[5] opponent in the suit, cried out, 'The reason, my lord, is that the fellow does not like to appear to be master of two tongues!'"

[2] 1858, R. v. Burke, 8 Cox Cr. 45, 55, 56, 60, 61, 64; Cal. C. C. P. § 1884 ("When a witness does not understand and speak the English language, an interpreter must be sworn to interpret for him"; "any person a resident of the proper county" may be summoned by the judge to act); 1895, People v. Young, 108 Cal. 8, 41 Pac. 281 (applying the statute); 1903, People v. Morine, 138 Id. 626, 72 Pac. 166; 1871, City Fire Ins. Co. v. Carrugi, 41 Ga. 660, 665, 672, semble (interpreter is not needed for a deposition, if the commissioners understand both languages); Ind. Rev. St. 1897, § 508 ("interpreters may be sworn to interpret truly whenever necessary"); 1886, Skaggs v. State, 108 Ind. 57, 8 N. E. 695 (here in examining a deaf-and-dumb person it became desirable to appoint another deaf-and-dumb person as a second interpreter through whom the first communicated; held, that the number, etc., was in the trial Court's discretion, under the statute); 1889, State v. Severson, 78 Ia. 653, 43 N. W. 533 (interpreter allowable in trial Court's discretion); Tex. Rev. Civ. Stats. 1895, § 2285 (commissioner taking deposition, "when he shall deem it expedient," may have an interpreter "to facilitate the taking").

[3] 1881, Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 478 (Folger, C. J.: "A deaf-mute . . . is now taught to give ideas to his fellow-men by signs, and his deprivation of some of the common faculties of humanity does not exclude him from the witness-box. The signs he makes must be translated by an interpreter skilled and sworn"). Accord: 1786, Ruston's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 4th ed., 408; 1827, Morrison v. Lennard, 3 C. & P. 127, Best, C. J.; Can. St. 1893, c. 31 (quoted ante, § 488), and the other Canadian statutes there quoted; 1830, State v. DeWolf, 8 Conn. 98; 1840, Snyder v. Nations, 5 Blackf. 295; 1817, Com. v. Hill, 14 Mass. 207; 1893, State v. Howard, 118 Mo. 127, 144, 24 S. W. 41; 1845, People v. McGee, 1 Denio 21. So also for one made mute by physical violence: 1899, Roberson v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 49 S. W. 398 (witness injured by violence, and able to testify only by nods or shakes of the head or by writing; allowed); and the cases cited post, § 1445, under Dying Declarations. The difference in these cases is that, while the witness uses an abnormal mode of communication, yet it does not need a special interpreter. It was said in Morrison v. Lennard, supra, that the deaf-mute, if he can, should by preference write, instead of using signs. This does not seem sound, and is denied in State v. DeWolf, State v. Howard, supra; he should be permitted the most fluent and natural mode. For the testimonial capacity of a deaf-mute, see ante, § 498.

[4] Whether the witness is sufficiently fluent in the language of the tribunal is a question for the trial Court: cases cited in note 2, supra.

For an anecdote of Lord Eldon's, illustrating the results that may befall from allowing question and answer in any but the orthodox language, see Twiss' Life of Eldon, I, 175.

When the jury is taken de medietate linguæ, it would seem that a necessity usually exists for interpreting all the testimony, because one or the other set of jurymen will not understand some of the witnesses. In Chief Justice Martin's History of Louisiana (p. 345) is described a situation, in early times in that State, which nearly amounted to a disregard of this principle, and illustrates the possibilities of novel questions in a region of mixed races. Courts of justice were furnished with interpreters versed in the French, Spanish, and English languages; and these translated the evidence and the Court's charge, but not the arguments of counsel. The case was often opened in the English language, and those of the jury not familiar with it were allowed to retire to the gallery. The defence being in French, a similar privilege was then allowed to those jurymen who did not understand that language. The jury then retired, and, each contending that the argument he had heard was conclusive, a verdict was finally reached as best they could.

[5] 1691, Lord Mohun's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 990 (a boy-witness could not speak loud enough;

(2) If interpretation is necessary, and no adequate means of securi is practicable, the testimony is lost, for without adequate communic (ante, § 766) there can be no testimony.[6]

(3) What sort of person is a proper one to be interpreter, is a que depending much on the circumstances,[7] and should be determined by trial judge.[8]

(4) The form of interpretation will ordinarily be oral; and ever letters or other documents offered to the jury, it may be oral,[9] on the ciple of § 799, ante; though a written translation is customarily empl For depositions, however, which in the modern legal theory exist onl writing (ante, § 802), the translation must equally be in writing; and utes sometimes prescribe this. The time of translation must for ordi oral testimony to the jury be immediate; but for depositions it would that this is not essential, at least where (as is usual) the Commissioner ing it understands the witness' language and the translation is needed for the trial-tribunal.[10]

§ 812. Same: Other Principles discriminated. (1) By the Hearsay every witness must be subject to the opportunity of cross-examination and the defendant requested that "one of the officers of the court may come down to the bar, and repeat from his mouth to the Court what he saith," which was done); 1716, Earl of Wlutoun's Trial, 15 id. 804, 861 (the accused speaking very low and inaudibly, a person was sworn and stood by him repeating his words, but the accused was directed to speak loud enough for the prosecuting counsel to hear); 1857, Spollen's Trial, Ire., pamphl. p. 47 (similar, for a child speaking low); 1858, Conner v. State, 25 Ga. 521 (words of a witness too ill to speak above a whisper may be communicated to Court and jury by another person sworn for the purpose).

[6] 1660, Peters' Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1116, 1128 (Dr. Mortimer sworn: "Me Lar, me ha serd de king etc."; Court: "We cannot understand a word"; Counsel: "He is a Frenchman, my lord"; Court: "Pray let there be an interpreter"; one Mr. Young was sworn to interpret truly his evidence; but it being afterwards found difficult and troublesome, the counsel waived his evidence, and prayed another witness might be called; Dr. Mortimer: "Me Lar, me can peak Englis —"; Counsel: "No, no, pray sit down"). In R. v. Whitehead, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 33 (1866), is an example of failure of testimony mainly through inability to communicate. The traditional anecdote of the Irish judge addressing the inaudible witness ("Witness, for the sake of God and your expenses, speak up!") hints also that incomprehensibility is equivalent to incompetency.

For the exclusion of the direct examination, because cross-examination has failed through illness or contumacy, see post, § 1391.

[7] 1682, Coningsmark's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1, 37 (witness speaking both English and French allowed to repeat his testimony in French to those of a jury de medietate linguæ who d understand English; but on further obj an interpreter was used); 1899, State v. — Ia. —, 78 N. W. 681 (friend allow act as deaf-mute's interpreter); 1900, Jac State, 42 Tex. Cr. 353, 59 S. W. 1111 (w sequestrated may be brought in as interpr 1895, People v. Thiede, 11 Utah 241, 39 837 (a juror may be an interpreter); 1896, v. Thompson, 14 Wash. 285, 44 Pac. 533 (son who was a witness and related to the cutrix, held not proper to be an interprete

For the qualifications of an interprete reference to skill in the alien language, see § 571.

[8] Supra, note 2.

[9] 1867, Kuhlman v. Medlinka, 29 Tex. [10] 1821, Atkins v. Palmer, 4 B. & Al (depositions need not be "translated at th they are taken"; here the sworn interp translation of Italian depositions made six later, and annexed to them, was received the commissioners may require translati the time); 1851, Kuhlman v. Brown, 4 L. 479, 485 (deposition need not be tran by interpreter before the commission, n companied by a translation; but may be translated when used; best opinion); Cavasos v. Gonzales, 33 Tex. 133 (depo need not be written in the domestic lan but may be translated on offering it). are sometimes prescribed by statute; e. g. Rules of Court 1897, § 507.

The following ruling is sound: 1898, v. Rothe, 13 D. C. App. 97, 102 (a notary down a deposition, and skilled enough witness' language to translate as he writes need not be sworn as an interpreter; good lon by Morris, J.).

interpreter is a witness to the other witness' words; hence, the interpreter's report of the other witness' testimony cannot be used at another trial without calling or accounting for the interpreter (post, § 1810). Whether a party is entitled to the interpretation of the testimony against him involves also the right of cross-examination (post, § 1393).

(2) By an exception to the Hearsay rule, official statements lawfully authorized may be used without calling the officer; under this principle, an official interpreter's translation may sometimes be used without calling him (post, § 1669).

(3) A person conversing with a third person through an interpreter is not qualified to testify to the other person's statements, because he knows them only through the hearsay of the interpreter. Ordinarily, therefore, the third person's words cannot be proved by any one except the interpreter himself (ante, § 668).

(4) A party may make an interpreter his agent to communicate; when this has been the case, the interpreter's statements are virtually the extra-judicial admissions of the party's agent, and thus are receivable, from any one who heard them, without calling the interpreter (ante, § 1078, post, § 1810).

TOPIC VI (continued): TESTIMONIAL NARRATION:

CONFESSIONS OF AN ACCUSED PERSON.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

§ 815. Rule applicable to Confessions of an Accused only, not of a Witness or a Civil Party. Among the circumstances that may be fatal to the trustworthiness of a testimonial narration is the fact that it is uttered under the direct and palpable pressure of an inducement to substitute something else than the truth. The statement thus presented may appear so likely to be the result of such an influence that it will be rejected as testimony (on the general principle of § 766, ante). The influence which might thus affect it would be some advantage directly conditional on the substitution of a fictitious for the truthful statement. This advantage will be, in general, either the definite acquisition by the witness of money or other valuable (as compared with his remaining without this acquisition), or his escape from a disadvantage now threatening; though these two (as will be seen) are in effect reducible to one. The situation of a person charged with crime is obviously peculiar with reference both to the circumstances under which these advantages will be presented, as well as to their nature and force; and thus, in history and in principle, statements in the nature of confessions of guilt by an accused person stand somewhat apart and call for a separate treatment in the law of evidence.

The development of the principle of confessions has been largely due (as may be later noticed) to the spirit of consideration for accused persons, which grew up during the latter half of the 1700s and the first part of the 1800s, and was generated as a natural reaction from the harshness and unjust severity prevailing in penal administration up to that time. We should consequently not expect to find the principle recognized outside the scope of criminal prosecutions. The policy and the history of the rule alike dictate its limitations; so that in civil cases no rule would be looked for which excluded the opposing party's acknowledgment of a debt or other claim because of its extortion by duress.[1] Since admissions are never conclusive,

[1] The authority, oddly enough, is scanty: 1814, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, 4 Camp. 10 (improper examination before bankrupt commissioners; held admissible, irrespective of the mode of obtaining it, though "he will not be bound by it" if obtained by duress or imposition); 1859, Fidler v. McKinley, 21 Ill. 308, 309, 316, 318 (breach of promise of marriage; the defendant's admissions of a promise of marriage, made while under arrest on a charge of bastardy, to the woman's father who was angry and held a weapon, admitted; Breese, J., diss.); 1854, Newhall v. Jenkins, 2 Gray 562 ("The rule excluding confessions made under undue influence applies only to the confessions of a person on trial in a criminal case"; here admitting testimony of convicts, given under inducements by the prison warden); 1896, McGahan v. Crawford, 47 S. C. 566, 25 S. E. 123 (by consent in a deposition de bene, admissible; semble, also, even if under compulsion; McIver, C. J., diss.); 1855, Birchard v. Booth, 4 Wis. 67, 72 (plea of guilty in a criminal prosecution, admitted in a civil action for the same battery). Contra: 1898, Hamersley, J., in State v. Willis, 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820 ("The proposition that confessions obtained under compulsion are inadmissible expresses a well-established prin-

but may always be explained away and discredited by their maker as to his inadvertence or mistake (post, § 1085), there is no necessity for exclusionary rule based on theory of duress. All analogies suggest that party's admission be received, subject to his proof of the threats or other cumstances of duress which may have extorted it. It would follow, th that in a civil case the admissions of an opponent, when offered, are not to tested or excluded by any rules of confession applicable to the accused i criminal case.

For duress of a witness, not being a party, the same considerations wo prescribe that there be no exclusion on the ground of extrajudicial thre or other form of coercion; and this is in practice universally assumed to the law;[2] for, in the first place, the facts could be brought out on exa nation (post, § 949) and given due weight; in the next place, the judic power must be assumed sufficient to protect the witness from any serious prehension of physical harm; and, finally, the existence of any rule of exc sion on this ground would conflict with the laudable tendency of the p two generations to admit testimony as freely as possible and trust to t examination to disclose its weaknesses. As for that form of duress wh arises from the intimidating manner and words of the examining counsel, effective prohibition is within the control of the judge; and it is of cou more properly dealt with by the prevention of the act of coercion when is attempted (ante, § 781) than by any general rule of exclusion for t testimony.

§ 816. Admissions, Confessions, and Hearsay Statements against Intere distinguished. Confessions are merely one species of admissions, namely, th species which consists in a direct acknowledgment of guilt in a crimin charge (post, § 821). For that particular sort the danger of untrustworth ness exists, and a special rule, based on the general testimonial principle trustworthiness of narration (ante, § 766), becomes applicable. That ru satisfied, the confession occupies the status of an ordinary admission; its lation to other rules of evidence is therefore determined by its quality as admission. For example, as an extrajudicial statement, it would ordinarily obnoxious to the Hearsay rule; but admissions are not within the prohibiti of that rule, because they are virtually the party's own statements inconsiste with his present claim in his pleadings and evidence, and are therefore usab against him like a witness' self-contradictions used in impeachment; th being the ground for receiving admissions in general (post, § 1048), it suffic also for confessions.[1] Again, vicarious admissions, i. e. those of agents a ciple of evidence. It applies to admissions as well as to contracts, or to any act whose probative force depends on intent or assent"); Ga. Code 1895, § 5194 (admissions, if obtained "by constraint, or by fraud, or by drunkenness induced for the purpose," are inadmissible).

[2] The following rulings also bear on this question: 1854, Newhall v. Jenkins, 2 Gray 562 (cited supra); 1899, State v. Geddes, 22 Mont. 68, 55 Pac. 919 (threats to accomplic no ground for excluding his testimony for t State).

[1] It is true that confessions could also ha entered under the Hearsay exceptio for sta ments of facts against interest (post, § 145 the accused not being a qualified witness. could to-day be so regarded, where the accuse not being compellable, fails to take the stan other persons, are often receivable (post, §§ 1069–1087); and here the principles which determine what persons' admissions are receivable — e. g. agents, co-conspirators, co-defendants, and the like — are equally applicable to confessions (post, §§ 1076-1079). Again, some sorts of admissions, being usually weak in probative value, are deemed to require corroboration before final acceptance by the jury; and hence certain rules of corroboration, applicable to a few other sorts of admissions as well as to confessions, are by some Courts recognized (post, §§ 2067, 2070, 2086).

What we are here concerned with, therefore, is a special and restrictive testimonial principle in its application to a particular species of admissions called confessions; in all other aspects, confessions are included under the generic title of admissions and the other principles applicable thereto. Those principles are dealt with under Admissions (post, §§ 1048–1087).

1. History of the Rule.

§ 817. Different Stages of the Doctrine. There may be noted four distinct stages in the history of the law's use of confessions. In the earliest stage (going for present purposes no further back than the times of the Tudors and the Stuarts) there is no restriction at all upon their reception. In the next stage, comprising the second half of the 1700s, the matter begins to be considered, and it is recognized that some confessions should be rejected as untrustworthy. In the third stage, comprising the 1800s, the principle of exclusion is developed, under certain influences, to an abnormal extent, and exclusion becomes the rule, admission the exception. In the last phase a reaction sets in here and there, but it represents a future rather than a present movement, and little is accomplished in the way of changing the law or the practice. The rulings of the courts of the United States reflect the last two stages only, and involve no special development. These several stages we may now notice; for here, as in other instances, some of the confusion and uncertainty has arisen from a failure to perceive the differing values which the historical perspective confers upon different precedents.

§ 818. Confessions in the 1500s and 1600s. What we notice in the first period is that there is no doctrine about excluding "confessions" in the modern sense; that is, all narratives avowing guilt are accepted in evidence without discrimination, and particularly without question as to their proceeding from hope of promises or from fear of threats, even of torture. It is true that the term "confession" appears, and that there are doctrines about it; but in the one case the term is used in a different sense, and in the other the doctrine relates to the conclusiveness, not the admissibility, of the evidence. Perhaps the simplest method of explaining the state of the law

But this theory is not necessary to lean upon, although it has in judicial thought often been suggested (post, § 866). Moreover, it failed to be applied when tested for confessions of a third person; for these, not being receivable as a party's admissions (post, § 1076), were also not received under the Hearsay exception (post, § 1476).

is to describe first these two doctrines, and then to indicate the ab of any other and exclusionary rule.

(1) "Confession" as a plea of guilty. The technical sense of "confes then, in the earlier usage, is a plea of guilty. It was affected by a r practice of not receiving or recording such a plea under certain circumsta but it was not understood as including extrajudicial narrative avowals of offered as evidence, and the rule about it did not affect such statement short, it dealt with a matter of criminal pleading, not a matter of evi
This will be plain enough from the following passages in the earliest tre on criminal law:

1607, Staundford, Pleas of the Crown, b. 2, c. 51: "If one is indicted or appea felony, and on his arraignment he confesses it, this is the best and surest answer th be in our law for quieting the conscience of the judge and for making it a good an condemnation; provided, however, that the said confession did not proceed from menace, or duress; which if it was the case, and the judge has become aware of ought not to receive or record this confession, but cause him to plead not guilty an an inquest to try the matter."

1680, Hale, Pleas of the Crown, Emlyn's ed., 225: "Concerning the plea of the pr upon his arraignment, and first of his confession of the fact charged and approving
When the prisoner is arraigned, and demanded what he saith to the arraignment, he confesseth the indictment, or pleads to it, or stands mute and will not answer.
confession is either simple, or relative in order to the attainment of some other adva That which I call a simple confession is where the defendant, upon hearing of his ment, without any other respect confesseth it; this is a conviction; but it is usual court, especially if it be out of clergy, to advise the party to plead and put himself his trial, and not presently to record his confession but to admit him to plead. I but an extrajudicial confession, tho' it be in court — as where the prisoner freel the fact and demands the opinion of the Court whether it be a felony, — tho' up fact thus shown it appear to be felony, the Court will not record his confession but him to plead to the felony 'not guilty.' A confession in order to some other adv is either where the prisoner confesseth the felony in order to his clergy, or where h fesseth the offence and appealeth others thereof, thereby to become an approver, and upon to obtain his pardon if he convict them."[1]

Notice here, first, that a "confession," in the language of Lord Hale, conviction," or, in Serjeant Hawkins' phrase, "the highest conviction tha be made." There is no question of evidence; it is matter of record man as guilty, because he has pleaded it, and no resort to evidence (no "t is needed. Notice, next, that the unwillingness to make the record of s plea is a general and indiscriminate one, according to Hale ("it is usua the Court"); but according to the others, the circumstance causing hesit is that the accused is overpowered by "fear, menace, or duress," or by ' menace, or duress, or from weakness or ignorance." This test is one w appropriate to the situation, and not at all coincident with the modern and yet these authorities have undoubtedly served in part for preceder the later stages.

(2) "Confession" as dispensing with the two overt-act witnesses in tre

[1] So also (1716) Hawkins, Pl. Cr., b. II, c. 31, §§ 1-3.

The same notion of "confession" as a plea of "guilty," and in itself a "conviction," reappears in the statutes of the 1500s and 1600s, requiring two witnesses to an overt act of treason. It is obvious that when a requirement was established as to the quantity of evidence (two witnesses), the requirement would naturally not apply in a case where no resort at all to evidence was needed, i. e. where the accused pleaded guilty, that is, "confessed." This was evidently the notion in the statutes of Edward VI, dispensing with the requirement in such a case:

1547, St. 1 Ed. VI, c. 12, s. 22: "No person . . . [shall be indicted or convicted of treason, unless he] be accused by two lawful and sufficient witnesses, or shall willingly and without violence confess the same."

1554, St. 5 & 6 Ed. VI, c. 11, s. 8: the same, "unless the said party arraigned shall willingly without violence confess the same."[2]

Now the statute was construed to give this dispensatory effect to confessions other than those made upon arraignment at bar. Thus:

1664, Tong's Case, Kelyng 18: "The judges all agreed that if a conspirator be examined before a privy counsellor or a justice of the peace, and upon his examination without torture confess the treason, if after at his trial he deny it, and two witnesses to prove that confession, are good evidence against him that made that confession at his examination aforesaid; and in that case there needs no witness to prove him guilty of the treason, for that confession puts it out of the statute, which requires two witnesses to prove the treason unless the party shall without torture confess the same; and the confession there spoken of is not meant a confession before the judges at his trial, but a confession upon his examination."[3]

It was apparently to remedy the effect of this forced construction and restore to the statute its intended restrictions that the act of 7 Wm. III changed the phraseology of the dispensing clause:

1695, St. 7 Wm. III, c. 3: No indictment or trial for high treason shall be had except on the testimony of two lawful witnesses, "unless the party indicted and arraigned or tried shall willingly without violence in open court confess the same, or shall stand mute, etc."

This phrasing, it would seem, should have settled the matter. But, such was the pressure to use summary methods towards treasonable efforts, that even this statute permitted a difference of opinion to arise as to the dispensatory effect of a confession made out of court.[4] The pretext of those who

[2] These statutes were, by some judges, believed or claimed to have been repealed, as to trials, by 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 10 (1554), which enacted that all trials of treason should from thenceforth be held "according to the due order and course of the common law"; see e. g. Tong's Case, Kelyng 18, 49 (1664); and this contention practically prevailed during the Stuart period (post, §§ 1364, 2036). But the question of its interpretation in the present connection was still a living one.

[3] Coke had advanced the same opinion a century before, in Ralston's Case, 3 Inst. 25; so, also, Anon., 2 Anderson 66.

[4] This broader effect was upheld in Francia's Case (1716), as reported in East Pl. Cr. I, 133, and Foster, Discourse on High Treason, c. III, § 8 (Foster Cr. C. 241); and in Berwick's Case (1746), Foster Cr. C. 10. On the other hand in Willis' Trial (1710), 15 How. St. Tr. 623, it was conceded that the confession, to be sufficient of itself, should be "in a court of record." Mr. J. Foster, in his Discourse (241), approved the latter doctrine, and thought that the former cases should not be extended beyond their facts, i. e. the case of an examination before a magistrate. Chief Baron Gilbert, in his Treatise on Evidence (p. 137; ante 1726) had taken the view of Willis' Case.

gave it such an effect seems to have been that such a confession was i overt act, and therefore was enough if proved by two witnesses. The were still unsettled in 1793; and the following passage shows how the question was from that of the mere admissibility of confessions:

1793, Anon., Discourse on High Treason, 145 (printed in Kelyng's Rep., ed. 187 to the confession, there have been doubts whether the statute requires a confess the arraignment of the party, or a confession taken out of court by a person au to take such examination. Evidence of a confession proved upon the trial by nesses has been held sufficient to convict without farther proof of the overt a 1746). This point is, however, not clearly settled. But such confession out o evidence admissible, proper to be left to a jury, and will go in corroboration evidence to the overt acts."[5]

(3) Confessions in general as admissible. These, then, were th doctrines about "confessions" up to the middle of the 1700s. The involved the notion of "confession" as a plea of guilty and therefore pensing with the necessity of evidence; and they dealt with the co under which the effect of immediate conviction was to follow such a sion. That, apart from these doctrines, there were no others as to sions, appears not merely from the general lack of record of such do but from several other circumstances. In the first place, the re trials, down to the middle of the 1600s at least, show the tribunal q ing the accused, and proceeding, without let or hindrance, upon w they could get from him by way of confession.[6] In the next place, that, up to the middle of the 1600s at least, the use of torture to extr fessions was common, and that confessions so obtained were employ dentially without scruple;[7] and it is clear that such a practice is inco with the slightest recognition of the modern doctrine about the admi of confessions. In the third place, the doctrine of receiving approve fessions against themselves was nominally in full force during all this and was not in effect abolished until Rudd's Case,[8] in 1775. This d too, could not possibly co-exist with any semblance of the modern

[5] In 1803 we find Mr. East (Pl. Cr. I, 132) combating Mr. J. Foster's opinion, and agreeing with the view of the Francia case. Yet he seems at times to confuse the mere admission of a confession and its sufficiency to convict.

[6] Cases cited post, § 2250 (history of the privilege against self-crimination).

[7] 1836, Jardine, Use of Torture in the Criminal Law of England, 58 ff. Mr. Jardine says, further: "The last instance of torture in England, of which I can find any trace, occurred in the year 1640"; and this result seems to be adopted in the acute and interesting articles on the subject by Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, "Judicial Use of Torture," 11 Harv. L. Rev. 293. Yet in 1664, in Tong's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 259, the defendant is found saying, "I confess I did confess it in the Tower, being threatened with the rack." In Scotland, it was applied even much later: 1676, Mitchel's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 1207, 1232; 1680, Gordon's Trial, 1684, Semple's Trial, ib. 985; 1684, Trial, 10 id. 687; 1688, Standsfield's id. 1371, 1387; 1689, Renwick's Tr 569, 576; 1690, Pain's Trial, 10 id. Walter Scott, in "Old Mortality," d as of 1679, the examination and tort Cameronian preacher Macbriar (ch. fessedly relies in part for his authorit very trial of Mitchel, supra. In the it was known at as late a time as M mentions: 1642, Bradford's History outh Plantation, 473; 1641 and 16 Body of Liberties, c. 45 (quoted post For the history of the abolition of modern times on the Continent, se Storia del diritto italiano, 2d ed., 190 pt. 1, p. 449.

[8] Post, § 819.

about confessions; for it used as evidence (and evidence sufficient in itself) a confession obtained by a promise of pardon, more or less contingent, to be sure, but still definite and probable enough to be fatal to the modern use of the confession.[9] In the fourth place there are many recorded trials in which such opportunities were offered that, if there had been any doctrine limiting the admissibility of confessions, it must have been mentioned by judges or by counsel; yet it was not.[10] Finally, in the treatises of Hale[11] and Buller,[12] where the doctrine would naturally be mentioned, there is in the original edition no such mention; while Hawkins[13] expressly declares the admissibility of confessions without limitation; and the passage of Gilbert,[14] which has a limitation, was apparently intended to apply only to "confessions" in the old pleading-sense already described.[15]

[9] The theory and process is clearly set forth by Lord Hale (1680), Pleas of the Crown, 225: "Before any man shall be admitted to be an approver, he must confess the indictment in open court, and pray a coroner to be assigned him. . . . Upon confessing the felony and praying a coroner to be assigned, the court doth these things: 1. They assign him a coroner to take his appeal; . . . 3. He shall be removed out of the strait custody, and make his appeal before the coroner, that he may not have any just pretence to say it was by duress or constraint, and, therefore, if upon the coming back of the approver into court he will waive his appeal, as being made by duress and against his will, the coroner shall be examined touching it upon oath, and if he affirm it was made de bon grée, the appeal shall stand, but the approver shall be hanged. . . . If the approver be vanquished and kild upon the place in the battle, or if the appellee be acquitted by verdict, yet a judgment must be entred upon his [the approver's] confession; for his bare confession of the felony is a conviction, it is true, but not an attainder til judgment given quod suspendatur per collum, which is not presently entred upon his becoming approver, but when either by trial or for any other cause before shewn, the court thinks not fit to spare his execution. . . . If the appellee be convict by verdict or battle, or slain upon the field, . . . in that case, altho' the life of the approver is saved, yet he shall be banished unless he obtain the king's pardon; lord Coke saith he shall have a pardon ex debito justitiæ."

[10] E. g.: 1664, Tong's Case, Kelyng 18 (the judges differed as to admitting against one defendant the testimony of another given under promise of pardon; "but they all advised that no such promise should be made, nor any threatenings used to them in case they did not give full evidence"); 1710, Willis' Trial, 15 How. St. Tr. 623 (a peculiar but absurd point was raised under the St. 7 Wm. III, supra, that it excluded all extrajudicial confessions, and during the discussion the judges made such remarks as the following: Tracy, J.: "I never knew it disputed but a man's confession might be given in evidence"; Lord Chief Baron: "To say it shall not be given in evidence, there is no ground for it"); 1716, Francia's Trial, ib. 920 (a promise by the Secretary of State not to use the confession was alleged to have been broken; no argument of the modern sort was advanced); 1722, Woodburne's Trial, 16 id. 62; Layer's Trial, ib. 21; 1736, Bacon, Abridgment, tit. "Evidence" (I), p. 313 ("The confession of the defendant himself, whether taken on examination . . . or spoken in private discourse, has always been allowed to be given in evidence against the party").

[11] Ante 1680.

[12] Ante 1767, Trials at Nisi Prius, 236; Buller's term "confessions," though used of an answer in chancery and of letters, evidently signifies admissions in civil causes.

[13] 1721, Pleas of the Crown, b. II, c. 46, § 3 ("It hath always been allowed to be given in evidence against the party confessing; but not against others").

[14] Ante 1726.

[15] Two instances will illustrate how the texts of the 1700s have by editorial interpolation been made to bear testimony in modern times to law which the authors would hardly have recognized. In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, b. II, c. 46, § 33, 8th ed., there is a passage: "A confession being the strongest proof of guilt, requires the highest authority"; this, in earlier editions, was a note, with the addition: "and this confession must be without menace or undue terror"; the passage did not appear at all in the original edition; and it applies merely to the old sense of confession, i. e. pleas of guilty. Again, the following sentimental rhetoric: "As the human mind under the pressure of calamity is easily seduced and liable, in the alarm of danger, to acknowledge indiscriminately a falsehood or a truth, as different agitations may prevail, a confession, whether made upon an official examination or in discourse with private persons, which is obtained from a defendant either by the flattery of hope or by the impressions of fear, however slightly the emotions may be implanted, is not admissible, for the law will not suffer a prisoner to be made the deluded instrument of his own conviction," after being interpolated by editors into Gilbert's and Hawkins' treatises, was widely copied (in Swift's treatise, for example, p. 132), and

§ 819. Confessions in the Second Half of the 1700s. During the time the Restoration of 1660, and in the course of the gradual, though slow timid improvement in the methods of criminal trials, there must have some extension, in the minds of bar and bench, to the usage for extra cial confessions, of the phrases and notions originally peculiar to confess at bar upon arraignment.[1] It has left few direct traces in the reports;[2] by 1775–1785 we find its results coming to the surface. In 1775 in R Case,[3] where the accused had applied for release in consequence of ha confessed under an assurance of pardon to be received as an accomplice t fying for the Crown, Lord Mansfield, in discussing the practice of using prover's confessions, seemed to see nothing unlawful in it; but at the s time he made the first judicial utterance limiting the admissibility of ordi confessions: "The instance has frequently happened of persons having m confessions under threats or promises; the consequence as frequently been that such examinations and confessions have not been made us against them on their trial." He was here, clearly, thinking only of per "being drawn by promises and assurances to answer to an examination to swear to it on oath," and not of confessions in general; moreover he not intimate that anything more than a common practice (not a rule) isted. But in 1783, in Warickshall's Case,[4] before Nares, J., and Eyre the modern rule received a full and clear expression, and confessions entitled to credit because of the promises or the threats by which they been obtained were declared inadmissible in evidence. From this time the history of the doctrine is merely a matter of the narrowness or broad of the exclusionary rule.

At this stage, then, the doctrine is a perfectly rational one. Confess apparently untrustworthy as affirmations of guilt are excluded. Under principle very few were in fact excluded. Doubts about situations wh subsequently become questionable were never heard of. Confessions w thought of in general as "the highest evidence of guilt"; and there was general sentiment against them, — no prima facie doubt of their propriet

§ 820. Confessions in the 1800s. By the beginning of the 1800s, has helped largely as an authority to support one of the modern heresies. Mr. Joy thinks it the work of Gilbert's editor, Lofft; but there are circumstances which point strongly to Leach, the reporter of Crown Cases, and a leading counsel in criminal practice in the late 1700s.

[1] It seems, however, to have been the custom, from the time of the trials of the 1500s, in offering the depositions of accomplices (and perhaps of accusers not strictly accomplices or co-principals), to state, in favor of their credit, that the deposition was given voluntarily without torture or compulsion: 1551, Duke of Somerset's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 515, 520; 1571, Duke of Norfolk's Trial, ib. 958, 978, 1009, 1020; 1586, Babington's Trial, ib. 1127, 1131; 1600, Blunt's Trial, ib. 1409, 1419 (of the accused); 1645, Lord Macguire's Trial, 4 id. 653, 675.

[2] The following case seems to have the liest direct indication of such a doctrine: 1 White's Trial, 17 How. St. Tr. 1085 (the cused's examination before a magistrate b offered, the clerk was asked whether it was untarily given; Mr. Recorder, presiding: "T is an improper question; unless the pris had insisted and made it part of his case his confession was extorted by threats or dr from him by promises; in that case, indeed would have been proper for us to inquire what means the confession was procured"). this case and Goodere's Trial, ib. 1054, it pears to have become the custom to entitle report of the accused's examination as "the untary examination of A. B."

[3] 1 Leach Cr. C. 135.

[4] Ib. 298.

whole attitude of the judges has changed, through influences which we may attempt later to estimate. There is a general suspicion of all confessions, a prejudice against them as such, and an inclination to repudiate them upon the slightest pretext. This attitude continued for half a century, when an effort to harmonize the accumulated and inconsistent precedents, and the improvements that had taken place in criminal procedure, brought clearly before the profession some of the absurdities of the results reached. That a confession should be excluded because it was made upon a promise to give a glass of gin; because the prosecutor said, "If the prisoner would only give him his money, he might go to the devil if he pleased"; because a handbill, offering a few pounds reward for evidence, was posted in the magistrate's office; because the prisoner was told that "what he said would be used against him"; — that such results, chronicled in the reports of the first half of the 1800s, could be reached in the name of the investigation of truth seems almost incredible, until we understand the explanatory circumstances. This explanation, lying as it does in collateral conditions indirectly affecting the attitude of the judges, may be here postponed (post, § 865). In the meantime, the foregoing history will enable us to examine the orthodox principle of exclusion and the details of the rules laid down in the precedents.

2. Principle of the Exclusion of Confessions.

§ 821. What is a Confession? Denials, Guilty Conduct, and Self-Contradictions, distinguished. A confession is an acknowledgment in express words, by the accused in a criminal case, of the truth of the main fact charged or of some essential part of it. It is to this class of statements only that the present principle of exclusion applies. In this sense, therefore, there are in particular three things which fall without the meaning of the term "confession," and are thus not affected in any way by the present rules, namely, (1) guilty conduct, (2) exculpatory statements, and (3) acknowledgments of subordinate facts colorless with reference to actual guilt.

(1) The conduct of an accused person falls clearly without the present principle, which rests on the theory that the trustworthiness of the accused's assertions is destroyed or weakened by circumstances supplying a motive for false assertion (post, § 822). That which is not an assertion, in some form or another, can therefore not be within the scope of such a principle; its probative use is not testimonial but circumstantial; and the frequency of its employment, free from the present rules, may be seen by perusing the numerous rules of circumstantial evidence (ante, §§ 272–284) which apply to such evidence. The accused's conduct, therefore, consisting in fleeing from arrest, concealing the traces of crime, fabricating evidence, suppressing testimony, and other behavior indicative of a guilty consciousness, falls without the present rules:

1895, Bean, J., in State v. Reinhart, 28 Or. 466, 38 Pac. 825: "The defendant contends that, inasmuch as the only evidence tending to show the embezzlement is the false entries in the books of the firm kept by himself in the course of hi ployment, such entries are extrajudicial statements in the nature of a confession not sufficient to convict him unless corroborated by other evidence. But we c concur in this position. A 'confession' in a legal sense is restricted to an acknow ment of guilt made by a person after an offence has been committed, and does not to a mere statement or declaration of an independent fact from which such guilt m inferred. The entries of the defendant in the books of account which he was requi keep are not confessions or admissions of guilt, but are perfectly innocent in themse and it is only because they are shown to be false and fraudulent that the inferen irresistible, from the manner in which they were made, that they were intended to up his misappropriation." [1]

(2) Exculpatory statements, denying guilt, cannot be confessions. ought to be plain enough, if legal terms are to have any meaning and if spirit of the general principle is to be obeyed:

1846, Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Broughton, 7 Ired. 101: "It is altogether a mista call this 'evidence of a confession by a prisoner.' It has nothing of that character was not an admission of his own guilt, but on the contrary an accusation of an person. That it was preferred on oath in no way detracts from the inference that be drawn from it unfavorably to the prisoner, as being a false accusation against an and thus furnishing with other things an argument of his own guilt."

1862, Rice, J., in State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 225: "The declarations of accused pe are not necessarily confessions, but generally, on the other hand, they are denials of and consist in attempts to explain circumstances calculated to excite suspicion."

1895, De Witt, J., in State v. Cadotte, 17 Mont. 315, 42 Pac. 857 (the accused the stand to explain how in self-defence he killed the deceased; the State offered va previous explanations of his, showing self-contradictions): "The other objection that a portion of this testimony was a confession by the defendant, and it was not sh that such confession was made freely. . . . We are satisfied that the statements o defendant sought to be proved were not confessions at all. Instead of being confes of guilt, they were statements of his self-defence, statements in which he admitte killing, and endeavored to show that he was obliged to kill to save his own life. were admissions, to be sure, of the killing, but self-defending statements as to the s And this was precisely the position he occupied upon the trial. He relying on defence for acquittal, it was competent to attack his credibility by proving statem made out of court as to the self-defence, contrary to those which he made as a witne the trial."

1899, Granger, J., in State v. Novak, 109 Ia. 717, 79 N. W. 465: "Inaccurate u such words as 'confessions,' 'admissions,' and 'declarations' has led to some c sion in the cases; but, on authority and reason, there is a clear distinction between a

[1] The authorities dealing with this class of evidence (ante, §§ 272-284) sufficiently show that it is admitted without regard to the confession-rules. In the courts of Texas alone, it would seem, the heresy prevails that conduct may be treated as a confession (but note that in that State a peculiar statutory rule — post, § 831 — has affected the general doctrine): 1883, Nolen v. State, 14 Tex. App. 474, 479 (but here the gesture was virtually a statement in answer to a question); 1887, Carter v. State, 23 id. 508, 5 S. W. 128 (refusal to tell his name); 1890, Fulcher v. State, 28 id. 465, 472, 13 S. W. 750 (defendant's agitation and paleness when arrested; prior cases explained). Nevertheless, even this extension of the term is not ma include conduct and utterances used as evi on the issue of sanity: 1895, Adams v. Sta Tex. Cr. 470, 31 S. W. 372; 1897, Hurst v. — id. —, 40 S. W. 264 (but otherwise i words are in form a direct confession); Burt v. State, 38 id. 597, 40 S. W. 1000, 43 344; 1898, Barth v. State, 39 id. 381, 46 S 228. Compare the Texas citations under pa infra. Compelling an accused, out of cou submit to a measurement of his foot, is confession, within the Texas statute: Thompson v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 74 S 914.

fession and an admission or declaration, unless the admission or declaration has within it the scope and purpose of a confession, in which its distinctive feature, as an admission or declaration, is lost in the broader term 'confession.' A confession is a voluntary admission or declaration by a person of his agency or participation in a crime. . . . To make an admission or declaration a confession, it must in some way be an acknowledgment of guilt. . . . The manifest purpose of [the defendant's] statements was to show himself innocent, and, if his statements are true, he is innocent of the crime charged; so that by no possibility could he have been induced, because of the promise of secrecy, to relate what was untrue, to his prejudice."

This necessary meaning for the term "confession" is generally conceded.[2] Nevertheless, it is in practice not always strictly obeyed; and in some of the

[1] 1895, Pentecost v. State, 107 Ala. 81, 18 So. 146 (statements denying guilt, admitted as contradictions); 1903, Meadows v. State, 136 id. 67, 34 So. 183; 1896, People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 45 Pac. 175; 1897, People v. Ammermann, 118 id. 23, 50 Pac. 15 (the confession-rule not applied to a statement denying the alleged larceny, but admitting the possession and accounting for it; "the term [confession] is restricted to acknowledgments of guilt"); 1897, People v. Ashmead, ib. 508, 50 Pac. 681 (burglary; declarations admitting possession of the goods, but explaining it; rule not applicable); 1893, Mora v. People, 19 Colo. 255, 262, 35 Pac. 179 (denial of guilt and exculpatory story, held not a confession); 1810, Swift, Evidence, Conn., 133; 1897, Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9, 29 S. E. 309 (murder; killing admitted, self-defence set up; a statement that "his conscience did not bother him about killing R.," held not a confession of guilt); 1897, Shaw v. State, 102 id. 660, 29 S. E. 477 (statement disclaiming knowledge, but pointing out the place where the tools of the crime were hidden, held not a confession; yet these two rulings seem to have been ignored by the same Court in the following case: 1900, Fuller v. State, 109 id. 809, 35 S. E. 29; exculpatory statements; left undecided); 1900, State v. Spillers, 105 La. 163, 29 So. 480 (denial, held not a confession); 1893, Taylor v. State, 37 Nebr. 788, 56 N. W. 623 (statements not acknowledging guilt, held not confessions; here statements as to subsequent events, made to a sheriff in jail, admitted); 1901, State v. McDowell, 129 N. C. 523, 39 S. E. 840 (denial, held not a confession); 1852, State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 400, 402 (the accused's statement about his doings, in trying to exculpate himself, proved false; admitted); 1902, Goodwin v. State, 114 Wis. 318, 90 N.W. 170 (statements in denial or exculpation are not confessions).

In the Federal Supreme Court this doctrine is ignored: 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 621, 16 Sup. 895 (here exculpatory assertions were admitted, yet after a discussion of the principles of confession): 1897, Bram v. U. S., 168 id. 532, 18 Sup. 183 (a statement in which the defendant exculpated himself by asserting that a witness B. could not have seen the defendant do the act, and that he thought the witness B. did it, excluded as a confession; this Bram case, in this as in other respects, reached the height of absurdity in misapplication of the law).

In Texas, the sound doctrine, originally accepted, seems to have been ignored later, under the influence of the peculiar local statute (quoted post, § 831): 1891, Quintana v. State, 29 Tex. App. 401, 407, 16 S. W. 258 (exculpatory explanation, held not a confession); 1892, Ferguson v. State, 31 id. 93, 100, 19 S. W. 901 (larceny; exculpatory statement that he bought the horse from F., offered to contradict his testimony that he bought it from K., held admissible; "instead of being an admission or confession of his guilt, it was intended as a denial of that fact"; Hurt, P. J., diss.); 1899, Bailey v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 150, 49 S. W. 102 (prior statement that he knew nothing of the killing, offered as a contradiction to his testimony, excluded; the statute held to cover not merely "a technical confession," but any statement made while under arrest; Ferguson case ignored).

It will be noticed that the exculpatory statements thus admitted, in the above line of precedents, were employed usually either (by showing them to be fabricated) as circumstantial evidence of guilty consciousness (under the principle of § 278, ante) or as self-contradictions impeaching the credit of the accused as a witness when he took the stand (under the principle of § 1018, post). But when the accused's statement is really a confession, i. e. an acknowledgment of guilt, it cannot be used in the latter manner, if it is by the confession-rule inadmissible as such, for the confession-rule must always be applied to confessions, even when it is desired to use them merely in testimonial impeachment of the accused, and even though (post § 891) the accused as a witness may be impeached like other witnesses: 1898, Butler v. State, — Miss. —, 24 So. 316; 1894, Shepard v. State, 88 Wis. 185, 186, 59 N. W. 449. Contra: 1903, Smith v. State, — Ala. —, 34 So. 396; 1903, Angling v. State, — id. —, 34 So. 846; 1895, Logan v. Com., — Ky. —, 29 S. W. 632; 1876, Com. v. Tolliver, 119 Mass. 312, 315 (statements by a defendant "while unduly and improperly influenced by promises or threats made to him by officers and others," first excluded as confessions, but afterwards admitted to contradict the defendant's testimony on the stand); 1895, People v. Case, 105 Mich. 92, 62 N. W. 1017; 1903, State v. Broadbent, 27 Mont. 342, 71 Pac. 1.

cases noted in the ensuing sections no attention was paid to this limita
A due enforcement of it would help materially to remove some of the al dities in the present practice, especially in the treatment of confessions under oath (post, §§ 842–852).

(3) An acknowledgment of a subordinate fact, not directly involving guil in other words, not essential to the crime charged, is not a confession; bec the supposed ground of untrustworthiness of confessions (post, § 822) is a strong motive impels the accused to expose and declare his guilt as price of purchasing immunity from present pain or subsequent punishm and thus, by hypothesis, there must be some quality of guilt in the acknowledged. Confessions are thus only one species of admissions; and other admissions than those which directly touch the fact of guilt are w out the scope of the peculiar rules affecting the use of confessions:

1796, Eyre, L. C. J., charging the jury, in Crossfield's Trial, 26 How. St. Tr.
"Gentlemen, those declarations [relating to the invention of a deadly weapon and utt before the deed charged] have been as it seems to me improperly called 'confessions'; are not properly 'confessions,' which import a particular charge first made and a knowledgment of that charge. . . . According to the rules of evidence, what a pris has said respecting a particular fact is admissible evidence, not in the nature of a co sion, but as evidence of the particular fact."

1866, Currey, C. J., in People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 157: "The word 'confessions not the mere equivalent of the words 'statement' or 'declarations.' The defen made statements to several of the witnesses, as they testified, respecting the departur Holmes [the murdered man] for San Francisco, and of their appointment to meet at place, etc.; but it is nowhere to be found in the testimony of the witnesses that he mitted or confessed to any participation in the homicide."

1875, McKinstry, J., in People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 637: "The statement of the def ant [not admitting the offence charged] to K. did not constitute a 'confession,' ad sible only after proof that it was made voluntarily. A confession is a person's declara of his agency or participation in a crime. The term is restricted to acknowledgment guilt. An admission of a fact not in itself involving criminal intent is not to be rejec as evidence (without the preliminary proof) merely because it may, when connected other facts, tend to establish guilt."

1897, Wolverton, J., in State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964: "We take it that admission of a fact, or of a hundle of facts, from which guilt is directly deducible, which within and of themselves import guilt, may be denominated a confession, but so with the admission of a particular act or acts or circumstances which may or may involve guilt, and which is dependent for such result upon other facts or circumstances to established. It is not necessary that there be a declaration of an intent to admit gu it is sufficient that the facts admitted involve a crime, and these import guilt, or, as by Mr. Wharton, '"I am guilty of this"; and this imports the admission of all the constituting guilt.' It is necessary, however, that the accused should speak with animus confitendi, or an intention to speak the truth touching the specific charge of gu and when he, with such intention, narrates facts constituting a crime, the guilt becon matter of inference, a resultant feature of the narration without an explicit declarati to that effect. So that we conclude that whenever the statements or declarations of accused, voluntarily made, are of such facts as involve necessarily the commission o crime, or in themselves constitute a crime, then the facts admitted import guilt, and su admissions may properly be denominated confessions."[3]

[3] Accord: Cal.: 1866, People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151, 157 (admissions as to an appointment with the deceased, etc., held not confessio see quotation supra); 1898, People v. Mill § 822. Principle of Exclusion is the Untrustworthiness of the Testimony under certain conditions. The principle upon which a confession is treated as sometimes inadmissible is that under certain conditions it becomes untrustworthy as testimony. The principle is the same as that upon which statements based on memoranda, or testimony given while intoxicated, or testimony given upon the suggestion of a leading question, are treated as dubitable and may under circumstances be excluded. In criminal charges, the higher degree of caution always exercised by the law in favor of the accused prompts to a greater strictness in excluding suspicious testimony, and the degree of likelihood of its incorrectness need be much less than in other instances; yet the principle is the same.

The ground of distrust of confessions made in certain situations is, in a rough and indefinite way, experience. There has been no careful collection of statistics of untrue confessions, nor has any great number of instances been even loosely reported;[1] but enough have been verified to fortify the conclusion, based on ordinary observation of human conduct, that under certain stresses a person may falsely acknowledge guilt. This possibility arises wherever the innocent person is placed in such a situation that the untrue acknowledgment of guilt is at the time the more promising of two alternatives between which he is obliged to choose; that is, he chooses any risk that may be in falsely acknowledging guilt, in preference to some worse alternative associated with silence. What are the circumstances which may make such an acknowledgment preferable? They are usually described as involving either a promise or a threat. Thus a promise of certain pardon, when attached to a confession, may conceivably make a confession irrespective of its truth, seem more desirable than silence with its contingencies; or a threat of instant hanging by a mob, unless a confession is forthcoming, may conceivably make 122 id. 84, 54 Pac. 523 (libel; admission of newspaper's ownership, not a confession); Ga.: 1879, Dumas v. State, 63 Ga. 600 (an admission of presence at the place and time, held not a confession); 1887, Covington v. State, 79 id. 687, 690, 7 S. E. 153 ("When a person only admits certain facts from which the jury may or may not infer guilt, there is no confession"); 1892, Fletcher v. State, 90 id. 468, 471, 17 S. E. 100; 1897, Lee v. State, 102 id. 221, 225, 29 S. E. 261 (larceny; defendant's surrender of the goods and declaration that he wanted no trouble about them and would make them good, held not a confession); 1900, Suddeth v. State, 112 id. 407, 37 S. E. 747; 1902, Johnson v. People, 197 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 286; Ia.: 1871, State v. Jones, 33 Ia. 9, 11 (statements in regard to escaping); 1878, State v. Knowles, 48 id. 598 ("A confession implies that the matter confessed is a crime"); 1879, State v. Glynden, 51 id. 463, 465, 1 N. W. 750 (admissions of presence at the time and place, held not confessions); 1879, State v. Feltes, ib. 495, 498, 1 N. W. 755; 1880, State v. Red, 53 id. 69, 74, 4 N. W. 831 ("A confession of guilt is an admission of the criminal act itself, not an admission of a fact or circumstance from which guilt may be inferred"); Minn.: 1879, State v. Mims, 26 Minn. 183, 186, 2 N. W. 491, 683 (embezzlement; admissions of the receipt of the money, held not confessions); Or.: 1897, State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964 ("the old man run towards him [defendant], and he [defendant] shot him"; held a confession); S. C.: 1898, State v. Taylor, 54 S. C. 174, 32 S. E. 149 (ambiguous language); Tex.: 1880, Eckert v. State, 9 Tex. App. 105 (assault; defendant's admission that he "shot after the man that rode his horse," held not a confession); 1888, Willard v. State, 26 id. 126, 130, 9 S. W. 358 (larceny of a cow; defendant's promise to pay for the cow, held not a confession); U. S.: 1895, Ballew v. U. S., 160 U. S. 187, 16 Sup. 263 ("We are unable to reach the conclusion that Ballew's mere statement to a witness that the pensioner had given his son the check was a confession, or in the nature of a confession. It had no tendency to establish his guilt, or to operate to his prejudice"); Wash.: 1893, State v. Munson, 7 Wash. 239, 240, 34 Pac. 932, semble.

[1] Instances are cited post, § 866.

the contingencies of a confession more desirable than the certain consequ of silence. It is in this way that a confession of guilt may become un worthy as testimony.

The principle, then, upon which a confession may be excluded is that under certain conditions, testimonially untrustworthy. What circumst may make it so, and what degree of untrustworthiness is sufficien further questions; but the essential feature is that the principle of excl is a testimonial one, analogous to the other principles which exclude n tions as untrustworthy (ante, §§ 768–788). This theory, while devel different and inconsistent practical tests at the hands of various Courts, s to have been generally accepted as the underlying and fundamental prin since the first introduction of any doctrine about the inadmissibili confessions:

Ante 1726, Chief Baron Gilbert, Evidence, 137: "This confession must be voi and without compulsion; . . . pain and force may compel men to confess what the truth of facts and consequently such extorted confessions are not to be dep on."

1783, Nares, J., and Eyre, B., in Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. C., 3d ed., "It is a mistaken notion that the evidence of confessions and facts which have obtained from prisoners by promises or threats is to be rejected from a regard to faith. No such rule ever prevailed. . . . Confessions are received in evidence or re as inadmissible under a consideration whether they are or are not intitled to credi free and voluntary confession is deserving of the highest credit, because it is presum flow from the strongest sense of guilt, and therefore it is admitted as proof of the to which it refers. But a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope the torture of fear comes in so questionable a shape when it is to be considered a dence of guilt that no credit ought to be given to it, and therefore it is rejected."[2]

1834, Editors' Note, 6 Carrington & Payne, 353: "The principle upon which al class of cases is founded is that by an inducement being held out to the prisoner, in be led to suppose that he will be more mercifully dealt with if he confesses, and th may therefore be induced to confess himself guilty of an offence he never committ which instances we believe have occurred)."

1856, Campbell, L. C. J., in Scott's Case, 1 D. & B. 58: "It is a trite maxim tha confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing, must be volun but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, be under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say that which true, and the supposed confession cannot be safely acted on."

1881, Williams, J., in R. v. Mansfield, 14 Cox Cr. 639: "It is not because the afraid of having truth elicited that these confessions are excluded, but because the jealous of not having . . truth."

1886, Wilson, C. J., in R. v. Doyle, 12 Ont. 351: "The reason the confession in a case is not admissible is that in law it cannot be depended upon as true; for one in a case may say, and is likely to say, that which is not the truth if he thinks it to h vantage to do so."

1792, McKean, C. J., in Com. v. Dillon, 4 Dall. 116: "If such declarations are tarily made, all the world will agree that they furnish the strongest evidence of im guilt. . . . The true point for consideration, therefore, is whether the prisoner has f declared himself guilty of a capital offence."

1852, Withers, J., in State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 400: "The foundation of all

[2] See another report of this leading opinion in Sel. Crim. Trials at Old Bailey, I, App. 23 upon this subject rests upon an anxiety to exclude confessions that are probably not true; and therefore to exclude those that are not voluntary because such are probably untrue."

1851, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Morey, 1 Gray 462: "The ground on which confessions made by a party accused, under promises of favor or threats of injury, are excluded as incompetent is, not because any wrong is done to the accused in using them, but because he may be induced, by the pressure of hope or fear, to admit facts unfavorable to him without regard to their truth, in order to obtain the promised relief or avoid the threatened danger, and therefore admissions so obtained have no just and legitimate tendency to prove the facts admitted."

1855, Dean, J., in People v. Thoms, 3 Park. Cr. 268: "The foundation of this species of evidence is the innate selfishness of man's nature. Hence, all declarations made when the declarant is induced to speak from threats of punishment or offers of impunity are rejected, because it is known (so great is this desire of self-preservation) that men to secure it will often tell what is not true, even against their own innocence, if it but contributes to their safety."

1873, Wells, J., in Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 210: "The reason uniformly assigned for the exclusion of confessions extorted by promises or threats is the unreliable character of confessions delivered under such influences. That the Courts pay no attention to the indecency of subjecting an unfortunate person accused of crime to flattery, torture, or artifice, in order to induce inculpatory statements is well established, — the rule resting solely upon the supposed probability of the untruth of the confessions."

1883, Cooley, J., in People v. Wolcott, 51 Mich. 615, 17 N. W. 78: "No reliance can be placed upon admissions of guilt so obtained [by promises of favor on confessing], for the very obvious reason that they are not made because they are true, but because, whether true or false, the accused is led to believe it is for his interest to make them."

1893, Morton, J., in Com. v. Myers, 160 Mass. 530, 532, 36 N. E. 481: "Confessions are . . . [excluded] only where the circumstances are such, under which they are made, that a reasonable presumption arises that they may have been induced by a promise or threat from one in authority, and consequently are open to the objection that they may not be true."

1898, Hamersley, J., in State v. Willis, 71 Conn. 283, 41 Atl. 820: "[The conditions affecting the use of confessions] are the liability of accused persons, after their arrest, upon promise of favor from those having control of the prosecution, to untruly admit guilt, or misstate criminatory acts, for the purpose of securing immunity through the promised favor; and the liability of inferior police officers to report untruly or inaccurately the chance expressions or conversations of prisoners in their charge. . . . And the word 'voluntary' is used, not merely as contrasted with compulsory, but with a technical meaning, indicating certain surrounding circumstances. The question is, shall this evidence, admissible as relevant, be excluded because, in the opinion of the judge, the conditions of the declaration came within those conditions that make such an admission too unreliable to go to the jury?"

1899, Granger, J., in State v. Novak, 109 Ia. 717, 79 N. W. 465: "The reason for the rule excluding involuntary confession is not based on the thought that truth thus obtained would not be acceptable, but because confessions thus obtained are unreliable. The rule is in the interest of safe and reliable evidence. . . . The essence of the rule is that when the confessions are made the conditions as to hope or fear are such as to make them unsafe as evidence." [a]

[a] So, too, the following opinions, among others: 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 432, 446; 1874, Peyton, C. J., in Garrard v. State, 50 Miss. 151; 1892, Bleckley, C. J., in Cornwall v. State, 91 Ga. 277, 283, 18 S. E. 154 ("The reason why confessions made under the influence of hope are excluded is the danger of their being false"); 1900, Depue, C. J., in Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, 47 Atl. 62. So, too, the following writers: 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I, 52; 1842, Joy, Confessions, 51; 1860, Appleton, Evidence, c. XI, p. 174.

§ 823. Other Theories not sanctioned; Self-Crimination Privilege, distinguished. This principle of testimonial untrustworthiness being the foun tion of exclusion, it follows that the exclusion is not rightly rested on cer other possible and occasionally plausible theories.

(a) A confession is not excluded because of any breach of confidence o good faith which may thereby be involved. This has been accepted f the beginning:

1783, Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 298; a confession was obtained promise of favor; "it was contended by her counsel that as the fact of finding the st property in her custody had been obtained through the means of an inadmissible co sion, the proof of that fact ought also to be rejected; for otherwise the faith which prosecutor had pledged could be violated, and the prisoner made the deluded instru of her own conviction"; Nares, J., and Eyre, B.: "It is a mistaken notion that the dence of confessions and facts which have been obtained from prisoners by prom or threats is to be rejected from a regard to public faith; no such rule ever prevai The idea is novel in theory, and would be as dangerous in practice as it is repugnan the general principles of criminal law. Confessions are received in evidence, or reje as inadmissible, under a consideration whether they are or are not entitled to credit."

1842, Mr. Joy, Confessions, 50: "This does not make the confession admissible (i. e oath or promise of secrecy], although a confidence is thus created in the mind of the p oner and he is thrown off his guard. The true question seems to be, Does such co dence render it probable that the prisoner should be thus induced untruly to con himself guilty of a crime of which he was innocent?"

Thus, so far as a promise, whether of secrecy, of favor, or of other acti or a misrepresentation of facts, has been the means of obtaining the conf sion, the exclusion that might ensue would in no way rest on the mere f that a promise has been broken, a confidence violated, or a deception delib ately planned and carried out.[1]

(b) A confession is not excluded because of any illegality in the method obtaining it or in the speaker's situation at the time of making it.[2] The g cral principle — that the illegality of the source of evidence is no bar to reception — is well established (post, § 2183), and it is not for any such r son that confessions are rejected.[3] Occasion seldom arises, however, for t illustration of the principle as applied to confessions.

(c) Finally, a confession is not rejected because of any connection wi the privilege against self-crimination. The circumstances that this privile protects against a disclosure which is compulsory, and that one of the te for a confession is whether it is voluntary or not, have naturally led to t occasional use of both arguments at once by counsel in opposing the use such a confession; but the Courts have properly kept the two principl distinctly apart. Thus, where a compulsory disclosure is offered, it may

[1] This has been emphasized in repeated decisions, cited post, § 841.

[2] A seeming exception is found in the exclusion of confessions by an accused on oath contrary to the statutes for the examination of accused persons; but this can be otherwise explained (post, § 849).

[3] 1857, Seiden, J., in People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 386 ("It is because it [a sort of conf sion] is in its nature unreliable, and not on count of any impropriety in the manner obtaining it, that the evidence is excluded 1880, Andrews, J., in Baiho v. People, 80 499 ("The fact that the arrest was illegal h no relevancy, if the confession was voluntary admissible so far as the privilege against self-incrimination is concerned, and yet the question of its propriety as a confession may be raised;[4] while it may be inadmissible on both grounds.[5] Moreover, where the privilege has been violated, there is no need of resorting to confessional principles to exclude it, since the theory of the privilege itself suffices to prevent the use of evidence obtained in consequence of such a violation.[6] Finally, that the theory of confessions has no connection with the theory of this privilege is shown by the prevailing doctrine that testimony obtained by the violation of the privilege cannot be objected to as such unless it is being used against the person thus disclosing.[7] The sum and substance of the difference is that the confession-rule aims to exclude self-criminating statements which are false, while the privilege-rule gives the option of excluding those which are true. The two are complementary to each other, in that respect, and therefore cannot be coincident. Their separateness has more than once been judicially pointed out:

1854, Selden, J., in Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 33: "If by 'voluntary' is meant 'uninfluenced by the disturbing fear of punishment or by flattering hopes of favor' the expression may be accurate. But it is liable to mislead, because it suggests the idea that the rejection of what are termed involuntary confessions flows from that principle of the common law which is supposed mercifully to exempt persons from all obligations to criminate themselves, and which is expressed by the maxim nemo tenetur prodere seipsum. It might, I think, be shown . . . that the principle embodied in it has its foundation in the uncertain and dangerous nature of all evidence of guilt drawn from the statements of a party conscious of being suspected of crime. But, however this may be, it is certain that the statements of an accused person made under oath are never excluded on account of any supposed violation of the immunity of the party from self-crimination."[8]

§ 824. Practical Tests resulting from the above Principle: (a) Was the Inducement sufficient, by possibility, to elicit an untrue Acknowledgment of Guilt? While no one seems to have questioned the fundamental principle of the exclusion of confessions, there has been a decided difference of practice in the kind of test used in applying the principle. First may be consid-

[4] E. g. R. v. Sloggett, post, § 850.
[5] E. g. R. v. Garbett, post, § 850.
[6] Post, § 2270.
[7] Post, § 2270.
[8] So, also, the same judge's longer exposition in People v. McMahon (1857), 15 N. Y. 386; and that of Hamersley, J., in State v. Willis (1898), 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820. Compare Thompson v. State, Tex., cited ante, § 821, note 1. That the two rules should be supposed to have something of a common principle or spirit is a not unnatural error. But that history should be rashly tampered with by asserting any common origin is inexcusable. The following passage, by reason of its exalted source, must be specially repudiated: 1897, White, J., in Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 182: "In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States commanding that no person 'shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.' . . . A brief consideration of the reasons which gave rise to the adoption of the fifth amendment, of the wrongs which it was intended to prevent, and of the safeguards which it was its purpose unalterably to secure, will make it clear that the generic language of the amendment was but a crystallization of the doctrine as to confessions, well settled when the amendment was adopted." Of this it must suffice to say that no assertions could be more presumptuously unfounded. The history of the two rules, as set forth ante, § 818, post, § 2250, shows that there never was any connection or association between the constitutional clause and the confession-doctrine. As to the difference in principle and rule, it is further pointed out in § 2266, post.

ered that test which is orthodox in the sense that it is correct on princi though not in the sense that it is adopted by the majority of Courts.

(1) It has been seen that the reason for distrusting a confession ari when the person is placed in such a situation that an untrue confession guilt (more correctly, a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsi has become the more desirable of two alternatives between which the per was obliged to choose. Thus, the essential features of the situation are, fi the fact that the alternative is presented between present silence (or ass tion of innocence) and some other prospect held out by and associated ind pensably with the confession of guilt; and, secondly, the relative advantage this confession, with its consequences certain or contingent, over silence, w its consequences certain or contingent. The exact situation is perhaps to be obscured by the ordinary phrase designating "a promise of benefit o threat of harm" as the circumstances availing to exclude. The truth is th this duplicate form of statement is not essential; it indicates merely sup ficial features; and the situation is always reducible to the single form abo stated. Thus, where a promise (for example, of pardon) is the inducem for a confession, its effect is to make the certain freedom which will acco pany false confession more attractive at the moment than the mere pos bilities of freedom, coupled with temporary restraint, which attend silen Again, where a mob's threat of hanging has induced a confession, the alt native of present certain and future possible safety proves naturally mo attractive than present certain death. Thus in both cases — a promise a a threat — the confession is untrustworthy because it has been associat with an attraction too strong to resist. The form of statement "a prom or a threat" is misleading because the two terms are not really correlativ
i. e. a promise is always attached to the confession-alternative, while threat is always attached to the silence-alternative; thus in the one ca the person is measuring the net advantage of the promise, minus the gene undesirability of a false confession, as against the present unsatisfacto situation; while in the other case he is measuring the net advantage of t present satisfactory situation, minus the general undesirability of confessi against the threatened harm. The measurements and the balances may very different in the two instances, and the coupling of the terms "a promi or a threat" is thus improper in the same way that it would be improp to compare the opposite terms of two equations. Modern usage therefo generalizes by employing the term "inducement" to cover all modes influence.

The term "a promise or a threat," as well as the term "voluntary," are al misleading in another way; for they obscure the fact that (even when threa are used) the situation is always one of choice between two alternatives, either one disagreeable, to be sure, but still subject to a choice. As betwe the rack and a false confession, the latter would usually be considered th less disagreeable; but it is none the less voluntarily chosen. The ter
"voluntary," then, as describing the absence of the vicious element whi

excludes a confession, is, in ultimate exactness, unsound. All confessions are and must be voluntary; and that which may impel us to distrust one is not the circumstance that it is involuntary, but the circumstance that the choice of false confession is a natural one under the conditions. The choice of false confession is voluntary, but the false confession is associated with a prospect (namely, of escape from present harm) so tempting that it is not in human nature to resist it.

In general, then, the position of the confessing person which causes our distrust is that of being compelled to choose between two alternatives, one of which involves a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsity. Each instance presented may be thus stated: What were the prospects attending confession (irrespective of its truth) to be weighed by him against the prospects of non-confession? The test of exclusion thus would be: Human nature being what it is, were the prospects attending confession (involving the equalization or averaging of the benefit of realizing the promise or the benefit of escaping from the threat, against the drawbacks moral and legal of furnishing damaging evidence), as weighed at the time against the prospects attending non-confession (involving a similar averaging), such as to have created, in any considerable degree, a risk that a false confession would be made? Putting it more briefly and roughly, Was the inducement such that there was any fair risk of a false confession?

It is this test which must be taken as on principle the orthodox one. It is not the test most commonly applied; but, in one phrasing or another, it has from time to time received the support of eminent judges so frequently that it may fairly be put forward as having claims as satisfactory on precedent as on principle:

1836, Littledale, J., in R. v. Court, 7 C. & P. 486: "The object of the rule relating to the exclusion of confessions is to exclude all confessions which may have been procured by the prisoner being led to suppose that it will be better for him to admit himself to be guilty of an offence which he really never committed."

1836, Coleridge, J., in R. v. Thomas, 7 C. & P. 346: "The only proper question is, whether the inducement held out to the prisoner was calculated to make his confession an untrue one."

1843, R. v. Holmes, 1 C. & K. 248; the magistrate told the accused to be sure and tell the truth, or it would be used against him; Mr. Greaves, for the prosecution: "The only proper question is, whether the words said to the prisoner had any tendency to induce him to make a false statement. . . . The case of R. v. Court is expressly in point"; Rolfe, B.: "I am glad to find that there is such an authority; there are some previous cases the other way."

1843, Coleridge, J., in R. v. Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr. 54: "Before any such evidence is received, it must be seen that his mind is entirely free from every false hope or fear that would be likely to operate upon his mind and induce him to say that which is not true. That is the principle upon which all these cases are decided. Has anything been said to the party to induce him to state that which is not true, under a hope that he shall thereby benefit himself? . . . [Whatever is said must] leave his mind in an unprejudiced state to tell only the truth."

1848, Erle, J., in R. v. Garner, 1 Den. Cr. C. 331: "I think in every case it is for the Judge to decide whether the words were used in such a manner and under such circumstances as to induce the prisoner to make a confession of guilt whether such sion were true or no."

1872, Keating, J., In R. v. Reason, 12 Cox Cr. 229: "The real question is w there has been any threat or promise of such a nature that the prisoner would be to tell an untruth from fear of the threat or hope of profit from the promise."

1847, Withers, J., in State v. Kirby, 1 Strobh. 387: "[It is erroneous] to const rule to be irrespective of the reason upon which all rules upon this whole subj based. . . . The object of the rule is to exclude any admission that may have be cured by the prisoner's being led to suppose that it would be better for him to himself guilty of an offence of which he is innocent, — whether the inducement h to him be calculated to make his confession untrue."

1857, Lewis, C. J., in Fife v. Com., 29 Pa. 437: "It is impossible to reconcile th sions on this branch of the law; and the reason seems to be that reporters and elem law writers do not always bear in mind the true test on which the admission or ex of such evidence depends. In 1792, when Chief Justice McKean was presidin Supreme Court of this State declared that 'the true point for consideration is w the prisoner has falsely declared himself guilty of a capital crime.' In decidi point, the chief question is whether the inducement held out was calculated to ma confession an untrue one."

1881, Hammond, J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. R. 232, 241, 256: "The real ques whether there has been any threat or promise of such a nature that the prisoner wo likely to tell an untruth from fear of the threat or hope of profit from the promise."

1893, Haralson, J., in Beckham v. State, 100 Ala. 15, 17, 14 So. 859: "The cont inquiry is whether there had been any threat of such a nature that from fear of prisoner was likely to have told an untruth. If so, the confession should not be adm Its exclusion rests on its connection with the inducement; they stand to each ot the relation of cause and effect. If it is apparent that no such connection exists, t no reason for the exclusion of the evidence." [1]

§ 825. Same: (b) Was the Confession induced by a Threat or a Pro by Fear or Hope? Not all questions involving confessions would neces bring into prominence the accurate test just described; and naturally en many Courts fell into the habit of describing the excluding circums more briefly, though less accurately, as "a threat or a promise," or (the thing in effect) as "fear or hope." In this form the test lacks any mod tion as to the measure of the force which the threat or the promise, the or the hope, might have in causing falsity of confession. It is based, sure, upon the general principle, already examined (§ 822), that confes are excluded when untrustworthy; but it is not an accurate deduction t from. Nevertheless, it is constantly employed as a rule of thumb, wit

[1] The same principle has been more or less definitely expressed in the following rulings: 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 430, 444, per Campbell, L. C. J. and Parke, B.; 1866, R. v. Gilles, 11 Cox Cr. 73, per Keogh, J.; 1853, Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 38; 1881, Yonng v. State, 68 id. 575; 1897, Williams v. State, 63 Ark. 527, 39 S. W. 709 ("whether there has been any threat or promise of snch a nature that the prisoner would be likely to tell an nntrnth from the fear of the threat or hope of profit from the promise"); 1810, Swift, Evidence, Conn., 131; 1830, Com. v. Knapp, 9 Pick. 503; 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 Gray 191; 1871, Com. v. Cuffee, 108 Mass. 288; 1869, State v. Staley, 14 Minn. 113; 1861, Frank v. State, 39 Mis 1881, State v. Patterson, 73 Mo. 706; State v. Phelps, 74 id. 136 (quoting Keati in R. v. Reason, supra); 1888, State v. son, 96 id. 249, 9 S. W. 636; 1881, State rick, 16 Nev. 128; 1883, People v. McGl N. Y. 246; 1868, State v. Mitchell, Phili 449; 1868, Price v. State, 18 Oh. St. 419; State v. Motley, 7 Rich. L. 337; 1853, ridge v. State, 1 Sneed 79; 1878, U. S. v. 14 Blatch. 387; 1883, Hopt v. Utah, 110 585, 4 Snp. 202; 1853, Smith's Case, 10 737; 1858, Shifflet's Case, 14 id. 661, 665; State v. Walker, 34 Vt. 302.

referring back to the living principle on which it depends. By the middle of the 1800s the phrase had come to be regarded, by the greater number of judges, as in and for itself sufficient; and the rule was frequently laid down that any threat or promise, any fear or hope, would exclude a confession made in consequence of it, — that is, would exclude the confession irrespective of any attempt to measure its influence to cause a false confession:

1822, R. v. Gibney, Jebb Cr. C. 15, by all the Judges: "If hope has been excited or threats or intimidation held out, it shall not be received."

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, II, 36: "A confession can never be received in evidence where the defendant has been influenced by any threat or promise."[1]

1852, Parke, B. (for eight Judges), in R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 525: "Perhaps it would have been better to have held that in all cases the Judge was to decide that point upon his view of all the circumstances, including the nature of the threat or inducement and the character of the person holding it out together. But a rule has been laid down in different precedents, by which we are bound, and that is, that if the threat or inducement is held out actually or constructively by a person in authority, it cannot be received, however slight the threat or inducement."

1797, State v. Long, Haywood 455: "Its admissibility is made to depend on its being free of the suspicion that it was obtained by any threats of severity or promises of favour, and of any influence, even the minutest."

1876, Stone, J., in Bonner v. State, 55 Ala. 245: "Any inducement of profit, benefit, or melioration held out; any threat of violence, injury, increased rigor of confinement; or any other menace which can inspire alarm, dread, or the slightest fear, is enough to exclude the confession as not voluntarily made."[2]

Another phrase generalized the above terms, and declares that "any inducement" is sufficient to exclude the confession.[3] Occasionally an effort was made to apply this test with reference to the living principle, — that is, to ask whether the fear or the hope, the threat or the promise, was strong enough to produce a false confession;[4] but these efforts are casual; and sometimes there appears deliberate breaking with the original and fundamental principle, and the rule of thumb is applied in plain disregard of the question whether the confession is possibly untrue.[5]

[1] So also: 1814, Phillipps, Evidence, 11. The broad statements of these treatise-writers helped greatly to popularize this form of the test, especially in the United States; but their statements exaggerate the extent to which it had at that time become accepted, and in that aspect were incorrect. Mr. Starkie's statement, for example, was made on the authority of Warickshall's Case (quoted ante, § 822), which, instead of sustaining it, is quite consistent with the orthodox test. The only early case taking his extreme view was apparently R. v. Cass, 1 Leach Cr. L., 4th ed., 293, note (1784).

[2] Other examples are: 1878, McAdory v. State, 62 Ala. 161; 1835, State v. Brick, 2 Harringt. 530; 1895, Bartley v. People, 156 Ill. 234, 40 N. E. 831; 1858, State v. York, 37 N. H. 183; 1902, State v. Bates, 25 Utah 1, 69 Pac. 70; 1895, State v. Coss, 12 Wash. 673, 42 Pac. 127.

[3] 1833, R. v. Enoch, 5 C. & P. 539, Parke, J. ("an inducement by one having in custody"); 1833, R. v. Mills, 6 C. & P. 146, Gurney, B. ("an inducement"); 1837, R. v. Drew, 8 C. & P. 140, Coleridge, J. ("an inducement"); 1839, R. v. Taylor, ib. 734, Patteson, J. ("some inducement"); 1856, R. v. Toole, 7 Cox Cr. 244, Pigot, C. B. ("some influence acting upon his mind").

[4] 1852, R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 525, Parke, B. ("One element in the consideration of this question as to their being voluntary is, whether the threat or inducement was such as to be likely to influence the prisoner"); 1870, Cady v. State, 44 Miss. 341.

[5] 1893, R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 12, 17 ("A simple test, . . . Was it preceded by any inducement to make a statement, held out by a person in authority?"; that the inducements were "calculated to elicit the truth" is "entirely immaterial"); 1856, Jordan v. State, 32 Miss. 386 ("It is no answer to say that the confession was true; the question, and the only question, which can be considered is whether the confession was voluntary, extorted by threats or violence, or induced by the hope of reward or immunity from punishment").

§ 826. Same: (c) Was the Confession Voluntary? Probably as early historical usage,[1] and more common in modern judicial opinions, is the phr "voluntary," as indicating that quality in a confession which sanctions reception. Here, again, though the test rests ultimately for its validity u the fundamental principle already examined (ante, § 822), yet it has com be employed in judicial parlance as sufficient in itself, independent of living principle beneath it. But, unlike the preceding test, it is not serviceable as a rule of thumb, for its significance is so indefinite and l that it does not of itself supply a solution for the various situations v their graduated differences; hence it is often, perhaps usually, found in c bination with the preceding test in one form or another, the latter servin explain and make it more specific; thus:

1801, Mr. Peake, Evidence, 14: "The confession of a felon voluntarily mad evidence against him on his trial; but if any threats or promises have been mad induce him to confess, no evidence of such confession is admitted."

1881, Coleridge, L. C. J., in R. v. Fennell, L. R. 7 Q. B. D. 150: "A confessio order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however sl nor by the exertion of any improper influence."

1893, Cave, J., in R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 17: "A simple test, . . . Is it pr affirmatively that the confession was free and voluntary, that is, Was it preceded by inducement to make a statement held out by a person in authority?"[2]

In the case of the present test, however, it is employed usually — oft than the preceding one — in a purely subsidiary way, i. e. as merely a re test for determining the trustworthiness of the confession; the living p ciple being oftener kept in mind; thus:

1874, Pearson, C. J., in State v. Whitfield, 70 N. C. 356: "No confession of guilt be heard in evidence unless made voluntarily; for if made under the influence of e hope or fear, there is no test of its truthfulness."[3]

[1] Ante 1726, Gilbert, Evidence, 137 ("This confession must be voluntary and without compulsion, . . . pain and force may compel men to confess what is not the truth of facts, and consequently such extorted confessions are not to be depended on"). It had been the custom, long before this, in offering the deposition of an accomplice or accuser, to state that it was "voluntary and without torture or compulsion": ante, § 818.

[2] Examples of this test in American opinions are as follows: (1) Using "threat or promise" as the secondary test: 1873, Nicholson v. State, 38 Md. 153; 1874, State v. Jones, 54 Mo. 479; 1871, Barnes v. State, 36 Tex. 362; 1839, U. S. v. Nott, 1 McL. 501; 1839, State v. Phelps, 11 Vt. 121. (2) Using "hope or fear" as the secondary test: 1870, State v. Brockman, 46 Mo. 568; 1827, State v. Roberts, 1 Dev. 259; 1874, Rufer v. State, 25 Oh. St. 469.

Other sundry examples of this test are the following: 1897, Newell v. State, 115 Ala. 54, 22 So. 572; 1897, Holland v. State, 39 Fla. 178, 22 So. 298; 1898, Gantling v. State, 40 id. 237, 23 So. 857; 1898, Hecox v. State, 105 Ga 31 S. E. 592; 1900, Fuller v. State, 109 id 35 S. E. 298 (to sheriff); 1900, State v. nair, 52 La. An. 1921, 28 So. 273; 1895, v. Sheehan, 163 Mass. 170, 39 N. E. 791; People v. Taylor, 93 Mich. 638, 641, 53 777; 1895, People v. Parsons, 105 id. 1 N. W. 69; 1897, Hunter v. State, 74 Mis 21 So. 305; 1902, Blalack v. State, 79 id 31 So. 105; 1895, Basye v. State, 45 Neb 63 N. W. 811; 1898, Snider v. State, 56 i 76 N. W. 574; 1900, State v. Abatto, 64 N 658, 47 Atl. 10; 1900, State v. Baker, 58 111, 36 S. E. 501; 1896, Wilson v. U. S U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895 (Fuller, C. J.: "th test of admissibility is that the confess made freely, voluntarily, and without comp or inducement of any sort"); 1900, Jack U. S., 42 C. C. A. 452, 102 Fed. 473.

[3] Other examples of this sort are as fo 1875, Sampson v. State, 54 Ala. 243; Levison v. State, ib. 524; 1877, John State, 59 id. 39; 1881, Young v. State, 575; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 id. 259;

3. "Person in Authority."

§ 827. Introductory. After thus considering the various theories and tests by which confessions are governed, it is now feasible to examine the different specific situations and the state of the rulings thereon. Since the inadmissibility of a confession depends on the relative strength of the inducement to confess falsely, as measured against the prospects attached to non-confession, it is obvious that the various situations can best be grouped according to the nature of the inducement. But as the strength of the inducement must depend more or less upon the power of the person offering it, the rule of law must first specify the kinds of persons from whose mouths the inducements may be regarded as having any value. Most of the inducements being favors offered or disadvantages threatened in the way of legal proceedings, the question is usually one of the legal authority of the person promising the favor or threatening the harm. The general topic may properly be described by the phrase, "Person in Authority."

§ 828. Threats or Promises in general. Unless the person attempting to obtain a confession has the power (apparently to the confessor) to carry out the threat or the promise, there is no reason for treating the inducement as likely to produce an untrue confession. It is in such a case not due to the inducement, but to the confessor's own discretion; for he has no real alternative. The simple cases of this sort are those of threats of physical violence. Thus, a master threatening to beat or otherwise ill-treat a slave is clearly a person having such power; so, too, a mob having possession of the accused and threatening to hang or to beat him has such power.[1]

§ 829. Threats or Promises connected with Legal Immunity or Relief. Here there has been more or less uncertainty and difference of practice. The situation is that in which the confessor has been promised, if he confesses, a release from arrest, a cessation of prosecution, non-action towards prosecution, or the like. On principle, such a promise should be of no consequence unless the promisor was one having (apparently) the power to arrest or prosecute. But for some time in England there was more or less uncertainty in the practice at Nisi Prius. This came about, probably in part, because the class of persons commonly accused before the judges came largely from a population which was accustomed to comport itself with submission before those of a "superior" class, and was inapt to discriminate about the authority of such persons to employ threats or promises. Most of the exclusions can be supported upon even the narrowest definition of "person in authority"; but during the first half of the 1800s no agreement had been reached as to the propriety of that test.[1] The older and more usual

State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 177; 1871, Yonng v. Com., 8 Bush 370; 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 Gray 190; 1856, Brown v. State, 32 Miss. 450; 1847, State v. Cowan, 7 Ired. 244.

[1] No decisions expressly involving the question seem to have been made; but in the rulings in § 833, post, will be found situations illustrating the application of the principle.

[1] 1811, R. v. Hardwick, 1 C. & P. 98, note (the constable's wife; excluded); 1823, R v. Gibbons, ib. 97 (a bystander; admitted); 1823, R. v. Tyler, ib. 129 (a bystander; admitted); view was that the inducement, to exclude, must have been held out person having a legal interest or authority in the arrest and prosecut but the view also obtained currency that an inducement by any p whatever would exclude.[3] The case of an inducement by a master mistress to a servant was the troublesome one, for there no legal inter the prosecution might exist, and yet the relation involved in one sen "authority," i. e. an actual control which might affect by its pressur mind of the servant. Finally, in 1852, the earlier view was confirmed the existence of a legal interest in the prosecution was taken as the te not the mere existence of actual control or influence growing out o social or commercial relations of the persons:

1852, R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 522; Mr. Creasy, for the accused: "We mu look at the case as lawyers, but consider what would be the natural result of an i ment by such a person. The test is not, it is submitted, Who is the party to set in motion? but, Who is most likely to have influence? Who is most natural th prisoner should look to?" Parke, B., for the eight judges: "Perhaps it would hav better to have held (when it was determined that the judge was to decide wheth confession was voluntary) that in all cases he was to decide that point upon his ow of all the circumstances, including the nature of the threat or inducement, and th acter of the person holding it out, together; not necessarily excluding the confess account of the character of the person holding out the inducement or threat. But has been laid down in different precedents by which we are bound, and that is, threat or inducement is held out, actually or constructively, by a person in autho cannot be received, however slight the threat or inducement. And the prosecutor, trate, or con ble, is such a person; and so the master or mistress may be. If n out by one in authority, they are clearly admissible. . . . But it is only whe offence concerns the master or mistress that their holding out the threat or the p renders the confession inadmissible. . . . In the present case, the offence of the pr in killing her child or concealing its dead body, was in no way an offence agai mistress of the house; she was not the prosecutrix then, and there was no probabi herself or the husband being the prosecutor of an indictment for that offence."

1834, R. v. Shaw, 6 id. 372 (a fellow-prisoner; admitted); 1834, R. v. Simpson, 1 Moody Cr. C. 410 (the mother of the prosecutor's wife, in the latter's presence; excluded); 1836, R. v. Upchurch, ib. 465, by ten Judges (the prosecutor's wife, who helped manage the business; excluded); 1836, R. v. Ponntney, 7 C. & P. 302, Alderson, B. (the landlord of the inn to which the accused was taken in custody, a constable being present; held doubtful); 1839, R. v. Taylor, 8 id. 734 (the wife of the prosecutor and mistress of the accused, held "a person in authority over the prisoner"); 1846, R. v. Croydon, 2 Cox Cr. C. 67 (an attorney endeavoring to find evidence for a prosecution; excluded); 1848, R. v. Garner, 1 Den. Cr. C. 331 (a medical man in the presence of prosecutrix and accused's husband; excluded); 1848, R. v. Millen, 3 Cox Cr. C. 507 (a fellow-prisoner in the presence of the arresting constable; excluded); 1851, R. v. Warringham, 2 Den. Cr. C. 447 (the wife of one of the prosecutors, concerned in the management of their business; excluded).

[2] 1809, R. v. Row, R. & R. 153, by nine Judges (advice by bystanders having nothing to do with the arrest; admitted, "becau advice to confess was not given or sanc by any person who had any concern business"); 1836, R. v. Gibbons, 1 C. & Park, J., and Hullock, B. (any person any office or authority, as the prosecutor, ble, etc."); 1839, R. v. Taylor, 8 C. & Patteson J., speaking of his opinion as senting the judges; 1839, Lewin, note to Cr. C. 125 ("The cases seem to establ principle that where a confession is o through the medium of a suggestion m a person from whom the prisoner ca nothing to hope or to fear, it ought received").

[3] 1831, R. v. Dunn, R. v. Slaughter, P. 543, Bosanquet, J. ("any person te prisoner that it will be better for him to will always exclude any confession m that person"; here a fellow-workman, person to whom the stolen article was for sale); 1837, R. v. Spencer, 7 id. 776, B. (held doubtful, because the judge divided in opinion).

Thus the prosecutor or the prosecutrix (or a person likely to be such), or a person so employed about such a one's affairs as to be able to exercise his authority for him, or a person acting under his express or implied sanction, would be one whose inducements involving benefits connected with the legal proceedings might exclude the confession; but no other person's inducements (of that character) could do so.[4] It must be added that a constable or other police officer, or a magistrate, has always been regarded as a person in authority with reference to inducements involving release from arrest or cessation of prosecution, irrespective of the technical limits of such a person's legal powers in the premises.[5]

§ 830. Same: United States Doctrine. The course of the law in the United States has tended towards the denial of the foregoing strict distinction, by reason of two circumstances. First, in the learned treatise of Professor Greenleaf, published several years before R. v. Moore (above quoted) was decided, it was intimated that the current of authority was against that doctrine, and his own weighty opinion favored that result;[1] and this opinion was widely circulated. Secondly, and chiefly, our system of public prosecution does not admit of such a sharp and easily handled distinction. In England, the person injured by the crime may and (at least in its primary stages) usually must himself institute and manage the prosecution.[2] But in the United States he has no such power; the official prosecutor alone has it. Confessions made to such officials are in this country the commoner class. At the same time, the injured person may practically be in a position (by a failure to testify) which gives him actual power to affect the result favorably to the accused. To draw the line absolutely, therefore, at those who alone had legal control over the prosecution would be to omit many who might conceivably under certain conditions hold out inducements of a palpable strength. It thus happens that three distinct rules are found applied in the jurisdictions of the United States:

(1) The English rule that the injured individual (with us, the prosecuting witness merely) is to be deemed a "person in authority" has occasionally been recognized.[3]

[4] Subsequent rulings in England are as follows: 1853, R. v. Luckhurst, 6 Cox Cr. 243 (one who put questions in the prosecutor's presence; excluded); 1853, R. v. Sleeman, Ib. 245 (a married daughter of the accused's master, not in his household; admitted); 1861, R. v. Parker, 8 id. 465 (a fellow-prisoner in the presence of prosecutor and constable; admitted); 1872, R. v. Vernon, 12 id. 153 (a woman deputed by the constable to guard the accused temporarily; admitted).

[5] 1852, R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 526; and cases cited supra, passim.

[1] 1842, Greenleaf, Evidence, § 223.

[2] 1883, Stephen, Hist. of Crim. Law, I, 493 ("In England, and, so far as I know, in England and some English colonies alone, the prosecution of offences is left entirely to private persons, or to public officers who act in their capacity of private persons and who have hardly any legal powers beyond those which belong to private persons. . . . [When there is a private prosecutor], he can and does manage the whole matter as he might manage any other action at law; he employs a solicitor, who may or may not instruct counsel, and who takes the proofs of witnesses, brings them before the committing magistrate and the grand jury, instructs counsel at the trial, and, in a word, manages the whole of the proceedings just as he would in a civil cause. . . . Every private person has exactly the same right to institute any criminal prosecution as the Attorney-General or any one else").

[3] 1899, Sullivan v. State, 66 Ark. 506, 51 S. W. 828 (owner of stolen property, held a person in authority); 1870, State v. Brockman, 46 Mo. 570.

(2) The opposite extreme — ignoring the inducements of all persons ex those having official authority — has also received sanction:

1881, Hammond, J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 260 (admitting a confession to a pr detective employed by the owner of stolen goods): "At common law, some person erally the party injured, though it might be another person, must be named as prosec except in special cases; and without this there could be no prosecution. . . . It is thr this semi-official relation to the prosecution that a private prosecutor becomes a pers authority in this matter of evidence of confessions. But under our federal practice the earliest times, and by force of the statute, the district attorney is the only prose known to our law, and as a matter of fact, in this court at least, no private prosecuto ever been recognized. . . . It is impossible therefore for any one to occupy the place private prosecutor in this court, or make any promises of immunity that will avai accused in that capacity. It was otherwise at common law; for generally if the injured refused to prosecute, there could be no prosecution. With us the district atto alone can give such assurances. . . . [Thus,] the determination of the question of thority depends upon the relation of the person to the criminal prosecution for th done by the accused. . . . The person must have some authority over the prosecuti that particular offence, whether he be an officer of the law or not. The mere fact he is an officer does not answer the purpose; he must be connected with the prosecu and have authority through that connection over the prisoner."

(3) A middle way is that which most Courts seem to have adopted. injured person, or the master of a servant, is not regarded as necessa having a control sufficient to vitiate confessions made by his inducem nor is he regarded as entirely incapable of holding them out. Each cas decided upon its own circumstances, and the actual state of the relation tween him and the confessor is inquired into with reference to the prob strength of the inducement. This seems the wisest rule, and it is in acc ance with the recommendation of Professor Greenleaf, often quoted by judges:

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 224: "Promises and threats by pri persons, not being found so uniform in their operation [as those by persons in of authority] perhaps may with more propriety be treated as mixed questions of law fact; the principle of law that the confessions must be voluntary being strictly adh to, and the question whether the promises or threats of the private individuals who ployed them were sufficient to overcome the mind of the prisoner, being left to the cretion of the judge under all the circumstances of the case."

1854, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Morey, 1 Gray 463: "Of course such inducement m be held out to the accused by some one who has, or is supposed by the accused to h some power or authority to assure to him the promised good or cause or influence threatened injury."

1879, Brickell, C. J., in Murphy v. State, 63 Ala. 3: "[The improper inducement come from] any one connected with the accused who may, considering his relations condition, be fairly supposed by him to have the power to secure him whatever of be is promised or to influence the threatened injury."

The precedents illustrate the flexibility (or perhaps the looseness) of t rule.[4] It may be added that some of them seem to indicate that a modificat

[4] 1846, State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 178 (a friend, admitted); 1870, State v. Darnell, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 322 (a bystander; admitted); 1895, Freeman v. Brewster, 94 Ga. 1, 21 S 128 (a fellow-prisoner; excluded); 1871, Kamakana, 3 Haw. 313, 315 (an officer not has also been made in the English rule for police-officers; so that such a person would not necessarily be a "person in authority."

4. Nature of the Inducement.

§ 831. Competing Rules; Statutory Definitions. "There is no branch of the law of evidence," said Chief Justice Sherwood, a generation ago,[1] "in such inextricable confusion as that relative to confessions." This confusion is due chiefly to the competition of the different tests and the judicial fluctuations between them. The current rules or tests, for determining what kind of inducement suffices to exclude, are three (ante, §§ 824–826): (1) The first is, Was the inducement of a nature calculated under the circumstances to induce a confession irrespective of its truth or falsity? (2) Another is, Was there a threat or a promise, a fear or a hope? (3) The third test, Was the confession voluntary? is practically colorless and unserviceable when the nature of the inducement is in question, and is almost always translated secondarily, before application, into terms of one of the other two tests. It has been seen (ante, § 824) that the first test is, upon principle, the only rational and correct one. It will now be found that the varying and inconsistent results reached for similar situations are mainly explainable by the difference of the tests applied by the different Courts. It is particularly to be remembered that the hopeless inconsistency of the English rulings is due chiefly to the fact that the rulings were virtually in different jurisdictions, — that is, by single judges sitting in different circuits and living in different generations, and therefore not necessarily harmonious with the rulings of their colleagues or their predecessors.

In several American jurisdictions, the Legislature has dealt with the subject of confessions by adopting some definition of the inducement which is to exclude them;[2] but these statutes seldom do more than accept some comnected with the prosecution, held a person in authority); 1871, Young v. Com., 8 Bush 370 (one in whose house the accused, fleeing from pursuit, was sleeping; admitted); 1896, State v. Griffin, 48 La. An. 1409, 20 So. 905 (requested by a reporter; admitted); 1898, State v. Caldwell, 50 id. 666, 23 So. 869 (encouragement by a friend of the accused, that the prosecutor would help; admitted); 1842, State v. Grant, 22 Me. 171 (a friend urging the accused to save his brother, jointly accused; admitted); 1878, Ulrich v. People, 39 Mich. 249 (a friend of accused's father who rode to jail with the accused and the arresting officer; admitted); 1883, People v. Wolcott, 51 id. 614, 17 N. W. 78 (persons visiting the prisoner in jail with implied official authority; excluded); 1895, State v. Smith, 72 Miss. 420, 18 So. 482 (an employer whose factory had been burned; excluded); 1900, Hamilton v. State, 77 id. 675, 27 So. 606 (accused's employer, held on the facts a person in authority); 1900, State v. Bradford, 156 Mo. 91, 56 S. W. 898 (a prison guard; admitted); 1903, State v. Force, — Nebr. —, 95 N. W. 42 (a father urging a confession from a minor son, held a person in authority, on the facts); 1881, State v. Carrick, 16 Nev. 128 (the bondsmen of defendant urging him to say whether he had defaulted; admitted); 1898, Com. v. Wilson, 186 Pa. 1, 40 Atl. 283 (confession of crime made in order to procure admission to a supposed band of outlaws by proving his hardihood, etc., admissible); 1875, Beggarly v. State, 8 Baxt. 526 (following Greenleaf); 1853, Smith's Case, 10 Gratt. 737 (a master, but here the injured person was not the master; held not inadmissible merely because made to the master); 1858, Shifflet's Case, 14 Id. 657 (a member of the jailer's family and staff; admitted); 1890, Early's Case, 86 Va. 927, 11 S. E. 795 (a private detective who had secured evidence against the accused, admitted).

[1] 73 Mo. 705.

[2] Ga. Cr. Code 1895, § 1006 ("To make a confession admissible, it must have been made voluntarily, without being induced by another, by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury"); § 1007 ("The fact that a confession is made under a spiritual exhortation, or a promise of secrecy, or a promise of a collateral benefit, shall not exclude it"); Haw.

mon-law rule, and cannot be said on the whole to have effected any ch much less any improvement; except that in Hawaii, Indiana, and Was ton the radical step of desirable reform (post, § 867) has been taken, an traditional rules are practically abolished; and that in Texas the ru exclusion is made even stricter than before.

§ 832. Advice that "it would be better to tell the truth," or its equiv
On principle, the advice by any person whatever that it would be bett tell the truth cannot possibly vitiate the confession, since by hypothesi worst that it can evoke is the truth, and there is thus no risk of acce a false confession (ante, § 822). The confessor is not obliged to c between silence and a false confession having powerful advantages advantages are attached to the utterance of the truth; and, however te ing we may suppose them to be, there is nothing in the nature of temptation to make the statement untrustworthy; for if it has availe all, it has availed to bring out the truth.

Nevertheless, judges have been found with such extraordinary scrupul as to exclude confessions following such advice.[1] The practical result

Civil Laws 1897, § 1427 ("No confession which is tendered in evidence on any trial, shall be rejected on the ground that a promise or threat has been held out to the person confessing, unless the Judge or other presiding officer shall be of opinion that the inducement was really calculated to cause an untrue admission of guilt to be made"); 1895, Republic v. Hang Cheong, 10 Haw. 94 (statute applied); Ind. Rev. St. 1897, § 1893 ("The confession of a defendant made under inducement, with all the circumstances, may be given in evidence against him, except when made under the influence of fear, produced by threats"); Minn. Gen. St. 1894, § 5766 ("A confession of a defendant, whether made in the course of judicial proceedings, or to a private person, cannot be given in evidence against him, when made under the influence of fear produced by threats"); N. Y. C. Cr. P. 1881, § 395 (confession, "whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person," is admissible, "unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats, or unless made upon a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefor"); Or. C. Cr. P. 1892, § 1368 ("A confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, cannot be given in evidence against him, when made under the influence of fear produced by threats"); Tex. C. Cr. P. 1895, § 789 ("The confession of a defendant may be used in evidence against him if it appear that the same was freely made without compulsion or persuasion, under the rules hereafter prescribed"); § 790 ("The confession shall not be used if at the time it was made the defendant was in jail or other place of confinement, nor while he is in custody of an officer, unless such confession be made in the voluntary statement of the accused, taken before an examining court in accordance with law, or be made voluntarily after having been first cautioned that it may be used against him, or unless in connection with such confession he statement of facts or of circumstances t found to be true, which conduce to establi guilt, such as the finding of secreted or property or instrument with which he sta offence was committed"); Wash. C. & 1897, § 6942 ("The confession of a def made under inducement, with all the c stances, may be given as evidence agains except when made under the influence produced by threats"); 1895, State v. H 13 Wash. 5, 42 Pac. 527 ("the former rul excluding confessions made under induc does not obtain in this State, in consequ this statute").

[1] In the following cases the confessi excluded: England: 1833, R. v. Enoch, 5 539, Parke, J. (by a constable, "she had tell the truth or it would lie upon her"); R. v. Hearn, C. & M. 109 ("if she did n the truth, he would send for a constable her"); 1846, R. v. Laugher, 2 C. & K. 2 the accused's husband in the presence arresting constable; told "to tell the t excluded on mixed grounds); 1848, Garner, 1 Den. Cr. C. 329, Maule and Pa JJ.; 1852, Pollock, C. B., in R. v. Baldry 441; 1861, R. v. Parker, Leigh & C. 42; R. v. Bate, 11 Cox Cr. 686, Smith, J.; R. v. Dogherty, 13 id. 23 (Ire.), Whi C. J.; 1881, R. v. Fennell, 7 Q. B. D 1893, R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 16, 18, C semble. Pollock, C. B. in R. v. Baldry, distinguished between "tell the truth" "you had better tell the truth"; but thi dity seems not to be elsewhere advanced. Can.: 1889, R. v. Romp, 17 Ont. 567 truth would go better than a lie"; excl United States: 1898, Hurdin v. State, 6 53, 48 S. W. 904 (by the sheriff, that to t truth would save the defendant from the penalty); 1874, People v. Barrie, 49 Ca 1890, People v. Thompson, 84 Id. 605, 2

such rulings is a false and artificial interpretation, justly reproved by Mr. Justice Willes:[2] "It seems to have been supposed at one time that saying 'tell the truth' meant in effect 'tell a lie.'" Sound opinion refuses to exclude a confession induced by such exhortation; and the weight of authority in this country, though not in England, repudiates such an exclusion:

1836, Littledale, J., in R. v. Court, 7 C. & P. 486 (the magistrate had told the prisoner to be sure to tell the truth): "It can hardly be said that telling a man to be sure to tell the truth is advising him to confess what he is really not guilty of."

1867, Judge, J., in King v. State, 40 Ala. 321: "The admonition to say he was innocent, if such was the truth, was just as strong as to say he was guilty, if that was true. . . . Confessions, as already stated, which may have been procured by the prisoner's being led to suppose that it will be better for him to admit himself to be guilty of an offence which he really never committed, should be excluded. But it can hardly be said that telling a man to speak the truth is advising him to confess that of which he is not guilty."[3]

384; 1902, People v. Gonzales, 136 id. 666, 69 Pac. 487; 1902, West v. U. S., 20 D. C. App. 347, 351 ("You have been telling me a pack of lies; now you had better tell the truth"; excluded); 1898, State v. Auguste, 50 La. An. 488, 23 So. 612 ("You must tell the truth"; excluded on the facts); 1867, Com. v. Curtis, 97 Mass. 577 (by an officer, "as a general thing it was better for a man who was guilty to plead guilty, for he got a lighter sentence"); 1897, Ford v. State, 73 Miss. 101, 21 So. 524 (by a police officer); 1900, Hamilton v. State, 77 id. 675, 27 So. 606; 1901, State v. Hagan, 164 Mo. 654, 65 S. W. 249 (that it "would be better" for him to make a "statement"); 1858, State v. York, 37 N. H. 175 ("if she had set the building on fire, she had better own it"); 1874, State v. Whitfield, 70 N. C. 356 (by a master to a slave, "I believe you are guilty; if you are you had better say so; if you are not you had better say that"); 1846, Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. St. 269 ("If you do not tell the truth, I will commit you"); 1903, State v. Nagle, — R. I. —, 54 Atl. 1063 (that "the truth ought to be told"; excluded here, because the circumstances were such that "the prisoner might naturally have understood it as recommending a confession"); 1847, State v. Kirby, 1 Strobh. 378 (complicated facts); 1897, Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 182 (the defendant was under arrest and was called into the office of the chief of police; "'When Mr. Bram came into my office, I said to him: "Bram, we are trying to unravel this horrible mystery." I said: "Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office, and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder." He said: "He could not have seen me. Where was he?" I said: "He states he was at the wheel." "Well," he said, "he could not see me from there." I said: "Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. But," I said, "some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders." He said: "Well, I think, and many others on board the ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it"'"; in a labored argument, this was held improperly admitted; it is enough to say that the ruling takes its place among those which have reached the highest pitch of irrationality in this subject, and have done most to reduce the law of evidence to a mass of mediæval scholasticism and to put it in a condition to favor criminals; Brewer, J., with Fuller, C. J., and Brown, J., dissent, saying "To support this contention involves a refinement of analysis which, while it may show marvellous metaphysical ability, is of little weight in practical affairs"). Compare the cases cited post, § 838 ("You had better confess").

[2] 1872, R. v. Reeve, L. R. 1 Cr. C. R. 363.

[3] In the following cases the confession was admitted: England: 1842, R. v. Hewett, Carr. & M. 534 (by the prosecutor, "she would forgive the accused if she told the truth"); 1852, Erle, J., in R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 523 ("As a universal rule, an exhortation to tell the truth ought not to exclude a confession"); 1867, R. v. Jarvis, 10 Cox Cr. 574, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 96 (by a prosecutor, advice to answer truthfully); 1872, R. v. Reeve, 12 id. 179, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 362 ("you had better as good boys tell the truth," by accused's mother in the constable's presence); United States: 1861, Aaron v. State, 37 Ala. 106 (Stone, J., writing an effective opinion); 1876, Meinaka v. State, 55 id. 47; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 id. 239, semble; 1901, Huffman v. State, 130 id. 89, 30 So. 394; 1846, State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 178, semble; 1842, State v. Harman, 3 Harringt. 567, semble; 1852, Stephen v. State, 11 Ga. 234 ("tell the truth if you say anything"); 1856, Rafe v. State, 20 id. 62, 68 (by a sheriff, "if he did do it, he had better acknowledge it; if not, not to acknowledge it"); 1886, Valentine v. State, 77 id. 472, 479 (by the prosecutor, "it would be better to tell the truth if he was g[illegible] to tell anything"); 1893, Hardy v. U. S., 3 D. C. App. 35, 39 (promise that if he had not done the act charged, they would do what they could for him; admitted, on the circumstances); 1896, Minton v. State, 99 id. 254, 25 S. E. 626 (here the defendant himself first made the inquiry of the other person); 1900, State v.

In coming now to the inducements which may on principle be prop repudiated, it is best to take them up approximately in the order of strength;[4] and first, therefore, of a § 833. Threat of Corporal Violence (Rack, Whip, Lynching, "Sweat-bo A threat of corporal violence is the clearest case of an inducement that vitiate the confession. To escape the disagreeable consequences of silenc whip, gallows, or rack —, the threatened person naturally prefers to s what his tormentors desire to hear, — a confession. He trusts to chanc enable him to repudiate his untrue avowal and vindicate his innocence; or haps, under the violent pain of the rack, he thinks of nothing but the pre relief from agony which his confession will gain him. Yet not every th of violence is necessarily sufficient to cause distrust of the confession wh follows it; "I shall put you out of my house unless you confess you guilty of this murder" has obviously no tendency to cause a false confess But the typical cases of such violence in legal annals — the rack of the quisitor, the whip of the slave-owner, and the slip-noose of the jail-bre ing mob — serve as the clearest and usually the least questionable insta of an inducement which vitiates a confession for evidential purposes.

That a confession obtained by the rack, or a threat of the rack, is inadm sible was apparently never judicially decided;[1] that it would be inadmiss is of course unquestioned to-day. Confessions obtained from slaves under whip, or a threat of the whip, have usually been excluded, upon the circu

Kornstett, 62 Kan. 221, 61 Pac. 805; 1873, Nicholson v. State, 38 Md. 153 ("I want you to tell me the truth and make a clean breast of it"); 1854, Com. v. Morey, 1 Gray 462 ("it was better for all concerned in all cases for the guilty party to confess"); 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 id. 191, semble (it was pointed out that the promises must be made to induce the accused to make a confession of guilt); 1875, Com. v. Mitchell, 117 Mass. 432 (by an officer, "the more lies told in such cases, the deeper one gets in the mud"); 1876, Com. v. Smith, 119 id. 307 ("tell the whole truth"); 1883, Com. v. Nott, 135 id. 269, semble; 1869, State v. Staley, 14 Minn. 111; 1841, Hawkins v. State, 7 Mo. 192, semble; 1891, State v. Patterson, 73 id. 69; 1888, State v. Anderson, 96 id. 249, 9 S. W. 636; 1893, State v. Robinson, 117 id. 649, 654, 660, 23 S. W. 1066 (by the sheriff after arrest, "It will be better to tell the truth about this matter"; "it will be a relief to you"; "whatever you say to me will probably be used against you"); 1901, State v. Lipscomb, 160 id. 125, 60 S. W. 1081 (by the mayor, "better tell the straight truth"); 1902, State v. Armstrong, — id. —, 66 S. W. 961; 1899, People v. Kennedy, 159 N. Y. 346, 54 N. E. 51 (by a police-sergeant, that "he could just as well tell him the truth, as it would save the former a lot of trouble"); 1827, State v. Cowan, 7 Ired. 243 ("unless you can account for your possession of the watch, I shall have to commit you for trial"; construed as not requiring a confession of guilt); 1857, Fouts v. State, 8 Oh. St. 107; 1856, State v. Gossett, 9 Rich. L. 428 ("it is a bad scrape have got into; you had better tell the truth 1846, State v. Kirby, 1 Strobh. 155 ("if confess you may be pardoned, but do not if you are innocent"); 1902, Grimsinge State, — Tex. Cr. —, 69 S. W. 583 ("the you can do is to tell the truth," by a m trate); 1864, State v. Carr, 37 Vt. 192, semble ("if you are going to tell anything, the truth, tell it just as it was"). Compare citations post, § 838 ("You had better confes

The advice "you had better tell the tru may under the circumstances be interprete advice to avow guilt, and in such a case confession should be excluded, if in that ju diction the advice "you had better confe (post, § 838) is regarded as vitiating the co sion. This has been pointed out by Pierpo J., in State v. Walker, 34 Vt. 302: "But i said that these were only inducements to tel truth, and had no tendency to induce a confes that was not true. This is true to the ear of respondent, but it is not so to his understand . . . The prisoner understands that, whether is innocent or not, it will in some way better condition to tell a different story." Many the excluding decisions above noted are perh to be explained on this theory.

[4] Mr. Best's classification (Evidence, §§ 5 572) is based on the kind of the motive; this is more useful psychologically than lega the probable strength of the inducement is important element.

[1] Ante, § 818.

stances of the case presented.[2] Confessions made in fear of a mob are usually made under circumstances calculated to educe a false confession; and in almost all the instances brought before the Courts they have been excluded, usually with propriety upon the facts of the case.[3] Other instances of violence or physical intimidation seem to be rare.[4] The "sweat-box" of the police, so far as it may signify direct physical intimidation, by starvation or otherwise, would invalidate a confession; but the term is often exaggeratedly applied to any form of solitary confinement and does not then signify such intimidation as would exclude a confession.[5]

§ 834. Promise of Pardon. A promise of pardon is usually made directly conditional upon the furnishing of evidence for the Crown or the State.

[2] In all the following cases, except as noted, the confession was excluded: 1847, State v. Clarissa, 11 Ala. 257 (under a whipping and threats of whipping, a slave was asked to confess guilt); 1850, Spence v. State, 17 Id. 197 (here a slave was merely tied; the usage of the master to tie before whipping might indicate the fear of whipping as the controlling influence); 1854, Wyatt v. State, 25 id. 12 (intimation to a slave by a master that a confession of guilt would make the matter better); 1855, Brister v. State, 26 id. 107, 129 (whipping of a slave to make him confess); 1863, Joe v. State, 38 id. 422 (intimation to a slave, by a master who had tied him to a log and was about to whip him, that his punishment would be lighter if he would confess); 1852, Van Buren v. State, 24 Miss. 512 (here after two whippings a slave finally confessed); 1861, Frank v. State, 39 id. 710 (here another slave was whipped, for some unspecified cause, near the accused at the time of confession; admitted); 1829, Hector v. State, 2 Mo. 166 (here a slave was lashed all night and then confessed in the morning).

[3] The confession was excluded, except as otherwise noted: 1881, Young v. State, 68 Ala. 576 (a crowd of men took the accused from the jail and to the scene of killing, where they confessed but not under any express threats); 1881, Redd v. State, 69 Id. 258 (the sheriff, after a mob coming to lynch the accused had been dispersed, told him that in such cases it was sometimes best to plead guilty, and he confessed); 1903, Hunt v. State, 135 Id. 1, 33 So. 329 (an officer's promise to protect the accused from the violence of persons desiring revenge, held not an improper inducement); 1866, Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 457 (a mob hung the accused repeatedly, to make him confess); 1897, Taylor v. Com., — Ky. —, 42 S. W. 1125 (confession made to deputy sheriff under promise to protect from impending mob violence, excluded); 1897, Dugan v. Com., 102 id. 241, 43 S. W. 418 (confession during public excitement, admitted on the facts); 1882, State v. Revells, 34 La. An. 384 (the accused was in the hands of an armed body, but they were merely taking him back after capture in fresh pursuit, made no threats, and expressly cautioned him that his statements would be used); 1899, State v. Young, 52 id. 478, 27 So. 50 (confession to private captors, with a rope around his neck, and in danger of lynching); 1844, Peter v. State, 4 Sm. & M. 36 (a mob threatening hanging); 1894, Williams v. State, 72 Miss. 117, 16 So. 296 (confession to a mob); 1903, McMaster v. State, — id. —, 34 So. 156 (confession in jail, under fear of a mob, and a promise to "help you out"); 1901, State v. Moore, 160 Mo. 443, 61 S. W. 199 (threat of mob violence); 1871, Terr. v. McClin, 1 Mont. 396 (the sheriff gave the advice to confess, and a mob at the time surrounded the jail threatening a hanging if a confession was not made); 1875, State v. Dibly, 72 N. C. 327 (violence used); 1880, State v. Drake, 82 id. 593 (same; a poor decision); 1853, Denthridge v. State, 1 Sneed 76 (threats to take life); 1867, Warren v. State, 29 Tex. 369 (threats to hang if confession was not made); 1871, Barnes v. State, 36 id. 356 (the accused was taken from the jail at night by persons in disguise and threatened with hanging); 1870, Thompson's Case, 20 Gratt. 731 (made under fear of a mob surrounding the accused).

[4] 1824, R. v. Thornton, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 27 (conduct held on the facts not to exclude, though intimidating in its nature); 1835, R. v. Wild, ib. 452 (same); 1893, Beckham v. State, 100 Ala. 15, 17, 14 So. 859 (threat construed as implying violence and inducing fear; excluded); 1895, State v. Brittain, 117 N. C. 783, 23 S. E. 433 (husband threatening to abandon wife, to make her confess incest with her father; excluded). Of course threats of violence made after the confession are of no consequence: 1803, State v. Jenkins, 5 Vt. 379.

[5] 1895, State v. Watt, 47 La. An. 630, 17 So. 164 (the mere fact that firearms were in the room for the use of defending the accused against release, held not to exclude); 1898, State v. Albert, 50 id. 481, 23 So. 609 (confession extorted by violence by sheriff, excluded); 1902, Ammons v. State, 80 Miss. 592, 32 So. 9 (confession made in a "sweat-box," six feet by eight, under exhortation that "It would be better to tell the truth," the custom being to let a prisoner out of the box when he confessed what the police "thought that he ought to," held inadmissible); 1897, State v. McCullum, 18 Wash. 394, 51 Pac. 1044 (the defendant was put in a dark cell in order to make him confess; excluded). That the mere state of being arrested or confined in jail does not exclude, see post, §§ 847, 851

Whether the confessing person fulfils his engagement or not, it is obv that such a confession, made as it is on the faith of a complete immu from everything but the moral and social consequences of acknowle guilt, may well be treated as untrustworthy. The stronger the appa case against the accused, the greater the temptation, even to the inno to accept a sure legal immunity (weighted though it may be with unplea consequences of an indefinite sort), in order to escape probable legal cond nation. Yet it was only by the 1800s that the doctrine can be said to been fully established. It has already been seen[1] that the doctrine of u approvers' confessions against themselves was sanctioned as late as Mansfield's time; and in Francia's Trial, in 1716,[2] a confession obta apparently by a direct promise of favor was allowed to be used, the acc having failed, it was said, to disclose all that he promised. Moreove Rudd's Case, in 1775,[3] although Lord Mansfield declared that the confes even of an accomplice who had not revealed the whole truth would "b no prejudice to her on the trial," and although there are two other repo instances in the same century of the exclusion of accomplices' confess thus induced,[4] this doctrine does not seem to have become established some time —, at least, for accomplices who broke their faith by failin furnish the promised disclosures; for Mr. Starkie, on the authority of a otherwise unreported[5] was able to state the practice of 1824 as recei such a confession.[6] Undoubtedly, however, though no subsequent Eng decision exists, any confession obtained by a promise of pardon would t to-day be excluded; and the principle has been well expounded in an I decision:

1866, O'Hagan, J., in R. v. Gillis, 11 Cox Cr. 69: "I think the question must be thus: Was the prisoner induced by a person in authority to make the informa criminating himself by the hope of obtaining the immunity of an approver? I t he was. . . . He became a Crown witness in the reasonable expectation that he w escape punishment as a return for his accepted services in bringing other offende justice."[7]

In the United States such promises have always been regarded as vitia the confession.[8] But it must be remembered that neither this nor any o

[1] Ante, § 818.
[2] 15 How. St. Tr. 920; ante, § 818.
[3] 1 Leach Cr. C., 3d ed., 135; ante, § 819.
[4] 1783, R. v. Warickshall, 1 Leach, 3d ed., 298 (an accessory's confession obtained "by promise of favor"; excluded); 1790, R. v. Hall, 2 id. 636, note (where the witness to the confession had been asked by the defendant to ask the justice to admit him as Crown's evidence).
[5] 1818, Burley's Case (where after confession the accused had declined to testify against the other person).
[6] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, II, 13 ("The admission of the party as a witness amounts to a promise of recommendation to mercy, upon condition of his making a full and fair disclosure of all the circumstances of the crime. . . . By a breach of the condition, the accomplice forfeits his claim to favor, and is liable to be tried convicted upon his confession").
[7] Three of the nine judges here dissente the facts of the case; Burley's Case was tre as not involving this point. There is an Irish ruling: 1841, Berigan's Case, 1 Ir. Cir 177 (the accused had been confined with ano who had turned Queen's evidence, and th cused, in confessing, had this in mind, but cautioned against hoping; Crampton. J., mitted the confession, because, whatever th pectations might have been, they had not induced by any one in authority).
[8] 1830, Com. v. Knapp, 9 Pick. 499 (a ca peculiar circumstances); 1878, State v. John 30 La. An. 881; 1849, Conley v. State, 12 470, semble: 1875, Beggarly v. State, 8 520, 526; 1864, State v. Carr, 37 Vt. 191.

inducement can on principle exclude a confession where the agreement is merely to tell the truth (and not necessarily to avow guilt).[9]

Here may be noted the absurd inconsistency of receiving against another person the story of an accomplice who on a promise of immunity turns State's evidence (ante, § 580) while rejecting the accomplice's confession when offered against himself. The promise of pardon is held to vitiate the story so far as it affects himself, but not so far as it affects others; although the natural instinct against false self-incrimination furnishes as good a guarantee of the truth of the former as the natural readiness to sacrifice others furnishes reason for distrusting the latter. That Courts accept the latter sort of testimony against the person charged demonstrates the hollowness of the sentimentalism on which the rejection of the former is based.

Leaving these genuinely untrustworthy inducements, we come now to a class of promises and threats which on principle can be supposed to vitiate a confession by only a severe stretch of the most sentimental imagination; and yet they are constantly treated by the Courts as effecting an exclusion of the confession; and first, of

§ 835. Inducements involving a Lighter Punishment, Milder Treatment in Prison, or a Reward of Money. It is scarcely conceivable (except in a case of extraordinary circumstances producing the blackest and most hopeless case against the accused) that an innocent man would confess falsely upon the inducement of a mere diminution of punishment, but a few Courts have reached that result, and it would in all probability everywhere be followed.[1] Equally inconceivable is it that a mere difference in treatment while confined could be an effective temptation to false confession.[2] Nor can we imagine that liberty or life would be voluntarily bartered by an innocent person for the money reward to be obtained by giving evidence; yet this result has sometimes been reached.[3] It is of course true that the lesser offences are often committed by persons lacking food and shelter, in order to be housed and fed for a time in the jail; and doubtless instances of the false

[9] On this principle the following ruling is correct: 1869, State v. Staley, 14 Minn. 112 ("the one of you that tells the straightest story shall have the privilege of turning State's evidence"; admitted).

[1] Excluded, except where otherwise noted: 1871, People v. Johnson, 41 Cal. 453 (that there was enough evidence to convict, and a confession would make the punishment lighter); 1893, State v. Jordan, 87 Ia. 86, 91, 54 N. W. 63 (defendant offered to "hand back the stuff," if the owner "made it easy for him"; admitted); 1902, State v. Jay, 116 id. 264, 89 N. W. 1070 (that "it would go easier for him if he would tell about it"); 1867, Com. v. Curtis, 97 Mass. 577 (hope of a lighter sentence); 1895, State v. Smith, 72 Miss. 420, 18 So. 482 (promising the use of influence to mitigate punishment); 1896, Harvey v. State, — id. —, 20 So. 837 ("might go easier"); 1893, State v. Drake, 113 N. C. 624, 626, 18 S. E. 166 (by an officer, "It might be easier for you").

[2] Accord (admitting the confession): 1834, R. v. Green, 6 C. & P. 655, Bosanquet and Talfourd, JJ., semble (when first apprehended, the accused said, "If the hand-cuffs are taken off, I will tell"); 1792, Com. v. Dillon, 4 Dall. 116 (various intimations of harsher treatment while confined for trial on a capital charge); 1878, State v. Tatro, 50 Vt. 490 (promise to take the accused from solitary confinement while waiting for trial).

[3] Excluded: 1846, R. v. Horner, 1 Cox Cr. 364, Tindal, C. J. (where a handbill offering a reward for accomplice's testimony was shown to the accused); 1853, R. v. Blackburn, 6 id. 337 (where the handbill offering a reward for evidence was hung up in the magistrate's office and its contents were known to the accused, who was desirous of giving evidence). Admitted: 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 219 (on the ground that the reward should at least appear directly to have influenced the confession.)

confession of such offences for such a purpose have occurred. But that reason for assuming that ordinarily, or in even an appreciable proporti cases, there is such force in the offer of a loaf of bread or of a sum of m as to cause us to distrust and to reject absolutely a confession so ind Where the circumstances of a case show that a false confession was pro thus induced, let it be excluded. But to erect a fixed and unvarying ru the basis of so unusual a contingency is to eliminate rationality from th of evidence.

§ 836. Promises of other Favorable Legal Action (Cessation of Prosec Release from Arrest, Abstention from Arrest). Coming under the same ciple as the preceding class are those promises of other favorable legal a which stop short of promising complete immunity in the shape of pa but offer hopes or assurances, definite or indefinite, implying a cessati prosecution, a recommendation to mercy, or the like.

(1) A promise in any way implying a cessation of prosecution or a r from arrest has usually been held to exclude the confession thus indu

[1] England: 1784, Cass' Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 328, note (by the injured person to the accused in custody, "if you will tell me where my goods are, I will be favorable to you"; Gould, J.: "The slightest hopes of mercy . . . are sufficient to invalidate a confession"); 1809, R. v. Jones, R. & R. 152 (by the prosecutor, "If the prisoner only gave him his money, he might go to the devil if he pleased"); 1834, R. v. Simpson, 1 Mood Cr. C. 410 (the prisoner was told by one in authority that if she would confess to the crime she would have her liberty); 1833, R. v. Cooper, 5 C. & P. 535 (by a magistrate, a promise to do all he could); 1836, R. v. Partridge, 7 id. 552, Patteson, J. (by the prosecutor, "if you will not tell, we of course can do nothing [for you]"); 1836, R. v. Upchurch, 1 Moody Cr. C. 465, before ten judges ("if you are guilty, do confess; it will perhaps save your neck"); 1891, R v. Mansfield, 14 Cox Cr. 639, Williams, J. (an implied promise of forgiveness by the prosecutrix); Canada: 1886, R. v. McCafferty, 25 N. Br. 396 (the policeman thought that S. would not prosecute if he got his goods back, excluded; two judges diss.); United States: 1858, Bob v. State, 32 Ala. 566 (promise to a slave that he would be sold away and not hung); 1860, Mose v. State, 36 id. 211, 226 (promise by a master to get the slave out of the State if he confessed to a killing); 1876, Porter v. State, 55 id. 101 (the accused was told that there was proof enough to hang him anyhow, and he would be saved if he would confess the crime); 1873, Ward v. State, 50 Ala. 120 ("whether the confession was true or false, he was to be turned loose"); 1895, Gregg v. State, 106 id. 44, 17 So. 321 (promise to end the prosecution); 1901, White v. State, 70 Ark. 24, 65 S. W. 937 (by the injured person, "If you will tell me, I won't bother you"); 1867, People v. Hoy Yen, 34 Cal. 176 (promise to set free); 1845, State v. Bostwick, 4 Harr. 563 (by a mistress, "I do not expect to do anything with you"); 1858, Smith v. State, 10 Ind. 106 (promise to try and stay prosecution); 1869, A v. People, 51 Ill. 238 (the accused sig agreement to confess and to have the dropped); 1878, State v. Von Sachs, 30 1 942 (promise to release from jail, if the property was returned); 1804, Com. v. bock, 1 Mass. 144 (promise of favor prosecutor); 1850, Com. v. Taylor, 5 Cus (promise by officers to use influence favor); 1883, People v. Wolcott, 51 Mic 17 N. W. 78 (assurance that he would " easier"); 1874, Garrard v. State, 50 Mi (by a magistrate, "I suspect you and yo better tell all about it if you want to get 1899, Branghn v. State, 76 Id. 574, 25 S (promise not to prosecute); 1849, Cor State, 12 Mo. 470, semble (promise by portant witness not to appear); 1873, S Hagan, 54 id. 192 (promise to set free) State v. Brown, 73 id. 632 (promise not to cute); 1903, State v. Force, — Nebr. N. W. 42 ("If you tell all about the you will get clear," excluded); 1828, S Guild, 10 N. J. L. 163, 178 (the evidence entirely clear as to the offers made; they i a setting free); 1872, State v. Lowho N. C. 638 (abandonment of prosecution) Boyd v. State, 2 Humph. 40 (promise to have prosecution dropped, if accused wou fess that he did the alleged malicious in frolic only); 1871, Rice v. State, 3 217, 223 (promise not to prosecute); 183 v. Phelps, 11 Vt. 121 (favor to be shown) State v. Brierly, 34 id. 302 ("if B. [an plice] should get the start of you [in conf it may go hard with you").

In the above citations, some of the ments are perhaps specific enough to br cases under one of the two foregoing s But no hard-and-fast classification can be for the situations and the inducements sh closely into one another. Nor would i service. The chief things to be noted that the clear tendency of the Courts is

If many of these rulings do not commend themselves to common sense, it is not so much because the advantage held out may not conceivably be in a given case a sufficient temptation to false confession, as because the manner of offering it is so indefinite, the assurance so slight and halting, that it cannot be considered as exciting that certain faith in the confessing person which alone could induce him to violate natural instincts and incur sure risk in confessing that of which he is innocent. These are just the inducements which might educe an avowal from a guilty one, but they are too slight to overpower innocence, however weak and ignorant it may be. If, to be sure, the law adopts Mr. Justice Gould's test,[2] that "the slightest hopes of mercy" suffice to exclude, the result is unimpeachable. But that is not a rational nor a practical test.

(2) A threat to arrest, or a promise not to arrest, is perhaps sometimes equivalent to the promise of a general release from legal proceedings, i. e. practical immunity. Taken strictly, however, it could not be an inducement of any consequence; for the benefit of merely temporary liberty can hardly be so great as to induce a false confession with all its ultimate risks. Nevertheless such a threat or promise has usually been assimilated to the preceding more weighty ones, and has availed to exclude the confession.[3]

§ 837. Assurance that "What you say will be used for you," or "used against you." (1) The policy of wholesale exclusion, "however slight the inducement," had gone to such an extent in England, in the first half of the 1800s, that the advice of one in authority, promising that "what you say will be used for you" was regarded by a number of judges as excluding an ensuing confession.[1] But in 1852 the question was fully argued before the Court for Crown Cases, and these rulings were repudiated,[2] and some check was thus put to the extravagant policy of exclusion.

similate slight and indefinite inducements to strong and specific ones, and to exclude all alike; (2) that some of these rulings are less open to dispute than others.

Of course the form of the inducement is immaterial; i. e. whether the assurance is, "If you confess, you may get off more easily," or "if you do not confess, it may go hard with you"; for in each case the situation is that of an advantage being attached to confession.

A promise to set free if a certain crime is confessed would not exclude a confession of a different crime: 1876, State v. Fortner, 43 Ia. 495.

[2] Cass' Case, cited supra.

[3] 1763, Thompson's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 325, Hotham, B. (by the injured person, "unless you give me a more satisfactory account, I shall take you before a magistrate"); 1831, R. v. Parratt, 4 C. & P. 570 (by the master of ship, accused being a sailor); 1832, R. v. Richards, 5 id. 318 (by a mistress of the accused, her servant, charged with poisoning her); 1353, R. v. Luckhurst, 6 Cox Cr. 243 (that he would be given in charge if he did not tell what he was doing in a certain stable); 1873, Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 189, 203 (a threat to arrest unless he confessed, and promise to release if he confessed).

[1] 1837, R. v. Drew, 8 C. & P. 140 (Coleridge, J.: "I cannot conceive a more direct inducement to a man to make a confession than telling him that what he says may be used in his favour at the trial"); 1838, R. v. Arnold, ib. 622, Denman, L. C. J., semble; 1843, R. v. Morton, 2 Moo. & Rob. 514, also reported as R. v. Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr. 55 (Coleridge, J.: "Upon reflection, I approve of my decision in Drew's Case. . . . [The principle is,] has anything been said to the party to induce him to state that which is not true, under a hope that he shall thereby benefit himself? . . . Now in Drew's case the man is told that what he says will be used for him; is this not raising a hope that if he told his story, whether true or false, it might benefit him?"); 1827, State v. Roberts, 1 Dev. 259 (statement that a confession could not be used against him; excluded).

[2] 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 430 (Lord Campbell, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., Erle and Williams, JJ., disapproving the Drew and Morton cases. Pollock, C. B., distinguished in one passage between "what you say" and "whatever you say"; but he subsequently

(2) The same earlier tendency to excessive caution had produced (based on the Drew case) that even "what you say will be used you" would exclude the confession;[3] but this remarkable result overturned by the Baldry decision.[4]

§ 838. Assurance that "You had better confess." Is it conceiva the indefinite and elusive assurance of advantage contained in the
"you had better confess" is in any degree calculated to induce a fa fession? What tangible attraction is there in it? It is an exhort be sure, which might turn the balance, in the breast of a guilty between silence and confession; but, with an innocent man, tha extraordinary a supposition to justify any evidentiary rule of ex Nevertheless, this has always been held (under circumstances of gr less unreason) to be a vitiating inducement,[1] — upon the rule, of cour abandoned the distinction, and it has no significance whatever).

This decision has always been regarded as representing the sanest policy reached in treating confessions; and it contains some of the best utterances on the subject. But its significance is diminished by the fact that in the very same year the same Court, speaking through Parke, B., in R. v. Moore (quoted ante, § 829) maintained that "however slight the threat or inducement," it would exclude a confession. The vacillation and want of coherence that mark the rulings on this entire subject are nowhere better illustrated than by the inconsistency between this proposition and the ruling in R. v. Baldry, supra, that "what you say will be used for you" does not exclude a confession.

[3] 1843, R. v. Furley, 1 Cox Cr. 76, Maule, J. (where the caution was that what she said "would be used against her at the trial," and the curious result reached that this guaranteed the use of it, and therefore the use for as well as against the accused); 1844, R. v. Harris, ib. 106, Maule, J. (to the same effect).

[4] 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 430 (Lord Campbell, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., Erle and Williams, JJ., disapproving the Furley case). Single rulings to the same effect had preceded the Baldry decision: 1843, R. v. Holmes, 1 C. & K. 248 (by a magistrate, "he sure you say nothing but the truth, or it will be taken against you"); 1851, R. v. Attwood, 5 Cox Cr. 322, Erle, J. The Furley ruling has been once followed in this country: 1873, Self v. State, 6 Baxt. 249 (an extravagant decision, in which a defendant under arrest and confronted with proofs of guilt was told "nothing you can say will do you any good," and an ensuing confession was rejected). But the Baldry case would presumably be now accepted as sound: 1901, Com. v. Storti, 177 Mass. 339, 58 N. E. 102 (telling him that it will be used for him, if favorable, or against him, if unfavorable, does not exclude); 1898, Roesel v. State, 62 N. J. L. 216, 41 Atl. 408 ("whatever you say may be used for you or against you"; admitted).

[1] England: 1803, East, Pl. Cr. II, 659 ("it would be worse for him if he did not confess, or better for him if he did"); 1830, R. v. Kingston, 4 C. & P. 387, Parke and Littl
(by a surgeon attending deceased); 1 Walkley, 6 id. 175, Gurney, B. (by a specified); 1834, R. v. Simpson, 1 M C. 410 ("It will he better for you and worse for you if you do not";
apparently, "you will go free if you c
1834, R. v. Thomas, 6 C. & P. 353, P
(by a person not specified, "you h split, and not suffer for all of them
R. v. Shepherd, 7 id. 579, Gaselee, J. stable, "you had better not add a crime of theft"); 1841, R. v. Moody, 2 347, Torrens, J. ("If any other perso do in the case, it is better you shou this perhaps falls under the class of § 8
1846, R. v. Croydon, 2 Cox Cr. 67,
("you may as well tell me"); 18 Collier, 3 id. 57, Williams, J. ("becaus
save him the shame of a search-w 1851, R. v. Warringham, 2 Den. Cr Parke, B. ("it would be best for h would tell how it was transacted");
v. Cheverton, 2 F. & F. 833, Erle, C.
R. v. Coley, 10 Cox Cr. 536, Mellor liams, JJ. (by a constable, "if you do it will be the worse for you"); 185 Thompson, 2 Q. B. 12, 18 (by the p
"It will be the right thing for M. t clean breast of it"); 1887, Banks v.
Ala. 430, 4 So. 382 (by an officer, "It best for him to tell all about it"); 189
v. State, 88 Ga. 516, 15 S. E. 10 (by
"if you know anything, it may be bes to tell it," and with the accused's professions that his story was voluntar Dixon v. State, 113 id. 1039, 39 S. E. fession upon an officer's advice that knew anything she had better tell it two rulings perhaps should be classe § 832, ante); 1848, State v. Nelson, 3 499 ("It would be better to tell what done"); 1903, State v. Alexander, 109 33 So. 600 (by a police officer, "If you anything to say, you had better say it 1883, Com. v. Nott, 135 Mass. 269 (by an 1879, Flagg v. People, 40 Mich. 706 (th was repeated and the prisoner was in i was furnished with liquor, and an inte

§ 825), that "any inducement, however slight," is sufficient to exclude. In a given case the exclusion may occasionally not be improper under all the circumstances;[2] but that such a phrase, or its equivalent, should in itself and as a rule operate to vitiate the confession is wholly bad on principle and in common sense.

§ 839. Sundry Phrases and Inducements. A number of phrases and inducements, not falling into any of the foregoing commoner classes, have from time to time been judicially passed upon. It is settled that a question merely involving an assumption of guilt does not, as such, exclude the answer;[1] and the mere expression of a wish, by the prosecutor or any other person, has never been held to exclude.[2] Other rulings, of more or less propriety, upon sundry assurances or threats, give rise to no general rule.[3]

§ 840. Influences of a Religious or a Moral Nature. Owing to the ruling in R. v. Radford,[1] in 1823 the question was able to be raised whether the force a confession had been expressed by the officer); 1898, Mitchell v. State, — Miss. —, 24 So. 312; 1870, State v. Brockman, 46 Mo. 569 ("it would be better for him to own up," with an express refusal to promise immunity); 1836, People v. Ward, 15 Wend. 231; 1895, State v. Winston, 116 N. C. 990, 21 S. E. 37 ("best to tell"); 1899, State v. Davis, 125 Id. 612, 34 S. E. 198 (by an arresting officer, "he had as well tell all about it"); 1867, Vaughan's Case, 17 Gratt. 580 ("you had better tell all about it"; the court erroneously taking Shifflet's Case, 14 Gratt. 661, as authority for exclusion). All the rulings (cited ante, § 832) excluding the inducement "you had better tell the truth" are also authorities for exclusion in the present instance.

The only rulings sanctioning a confession produced by the present sort of inducement seem to be the following: 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 Gray 192 (where such a phrase was shown not to involve any promise of favor); 1893, Willis v. State, 93 Ga. 208, 19 S. E. 43 (by an officer, that it was best for the accused to give himself up).

[2] In the foregoing note, R. v. Simpson and Flagg v. People are instances in which the accompanying circumstances give to such a result at least a plausibility. On the other hand, the rulings in R. v. Croydon and State v. Brockman expose the doctrine in all its naked absurdity.

[1] 1872, R. v. Vernon, 12 Cox Cr. 153 ("How came you to do it?"); 1853, Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 38; 1867, People v. Wentz, 37 N. Y. 307; 1883, People v. McGloin, 91 id. 245; 1885, McClain v. Com., 110 Pa. 269, 1 Atl. 45 (unless it is calculated to entrap).

The following inconsistent rulings deal with a situation very similar to the foregoing: 1830, Wright's Case, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 48 (by a magistrate, that "his wife had already confessed, and there was quite case enough against him to send a bill before a grand jury"; admitted); 1833, R. v. Mill, 6 C. & P. 146, Gurney, B. (by a constable, "it is no use to deny it, for there are two who will swear they saw you do it"; excluded).

[2] 1834, R. v. Shaw, 6 C. & P. 372 (by a fellow prisoner, "I wish you would tell me"); 1878, Com. v. Sego, 125 Mass. 210 (by a prosecutor, "I should like to have you make a clean breast of this matter").

[3] Threats: 1839, Calu's Case, 1 Cr. & D. 37 (indictment for concealing the birth of a child; the medical witness threatened to examine the accused, if she did not answer, and she then confessed; admitted; the constable, upon the prisoner's denial at her house, said, "I shall search for the child, so you had better tell me where it is"; she then told; this confession was excluded); 1872, R. v. Reason, 12 Cox Cr. 228 (by a constable, "I must know more about it"; admitted); 1895, People v. Clarke, 105 Mich. 169, 62 N. W. 1117 (a threat that, unless a confession was made before twelve o'clock, it would not be received; excluded).

Promises: 1822, R. v. Sexton, in Chetwynd's Suppl. to Burn's Justice, quoted in Joy, Confessions, 17 (the accused said to the constable: "If you will give me a glass of gin, I will tell you all about it"; and he was given two; the confession was excluded; Mr. Joy's comment is: "It seems a violent presumption that two glasses of gin would induce a prisoner untruly to charge himself with a capital felony"); 1834, R. v. Lloyd, 6 C. & P. 393 ("if you will tell, you shall see your wife"; admitted); 1884, Re Stambro, 1 Manit. 263, 268 (certain inducements as to resuming employment, held not to exclude); 1903, Meadows v. State, 136 Ala. 67, 34 So. 183 (promise not to prosecute if he would pay for damage done; confession admitted); 1899, State v. Novak, 109 Ia. 717, 79 N. W. 465 (agreement by arresting officer not to disclose confession until a certain time; admitted); 1890, Com. v. Flood, 152 Mass. 529, 25 N. E. 971 (an offer by a physician to assist in procuring an abortion upon a woman with whom accused had lived in adultery, the offer conditioned on the latter's telling the facts; admitted); 1868, State v. Mitchell, Phillips, N. C. 448 (confession made in asking advice of a fellow-prisoner; admitted).

[1] R. v. Radford, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 197 (where

use of exhortations invoking the terrors of punishment predicated by t logical beliefs could be regarded as vitiating a confession. It is obvious in their ordinary aspect, the influence of religious considerations makes tirely for truth in a confession, and not against it. Mr. Joy's expositio this point can never be improved upon:

1842, Mr. Joy, Confessions, 51: "It seems difficult to imagine that a man spiritual convictions and the influence of religious impressions would therefore co himself guilty of a crime of which he was not guilty; or that a man under a strong of his spiritual relations with God could hope to please God by a falsehood; that a fidence created' between him and his pastor, or the 'being thrown off his guard' b confidence, should induce him, not to confess (that it might naturally do if he guilty), but induce him to confess falsely. Such spiritual convictions, or spiritual e tations, seem from the nature of religion, the most likely of all motives to produce
They are therefore of a class entirely different from those that exclude confession confession is excluded because the motive which induces it is calculated to produc truth, because it is likely to lead to falsehood. If temporal hopes exist, they may to falsehood. Spiritual hopes can lead to nothing but truth."

A case might be presented, however, in which the use of such exhorta approached so near the line of intimidation that some plausibility migh given to the argument that the confession was not voluntary. Such
R. v. Gilham, in which as strong a case as possible for such an argu existed; but the argument was once and for all repudiated:

1828, R. v. Gilham, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 186, before all the judges except one absent Moody, for the accused: "The case states a continuous series of religious terro pressed on the prisoner's mind, with a view to obtain a confession —, in the first in by the gaoler, in placing before him religious books with that subject put promi before him; and in the second instance by the chaplain, whose whole languag exhortation unceasingly dwelt on the duty of confession as a condition of forgi with God, and accompanied with the terrors of God's vengeance put forward, not with the force expressed in the commination service, but with all the additional which the personal authority and manner of the chaplain would of necessity pro
. . . Looking therefore to the whole tenor of the chaplain's conversation, and state of mind produced, the necessary conclusion is that this confession was made duress"; Mr. Follett, for the Crown: "Unless it is believed that a confession given religious impressions is not entitled to credit, but springs from motives that are lik lead to falsehood, these confessions were properly received. But who can possibly pose that a man under the influence of a deep sense of religion, as it is admitte prisoner was, would confess an atrocious murder of which he was not guilty, and th could hope to please God by a falsehood?" "The judges present were unanimou opinion that the confessions were properly received."

No exhortations, then, of a moral or a spiritual nature, have ever (since Radford) been regarded as vitiating a confession,[2] — a result comme alike by principle and by common sense.

the clergyman had "dwelt on the heinousness of the crime charged and the denunciations of the Scripture against it," Best, C. J., thinking "it would be dangerous, after the confidence thus created, which would throw the prisoner off his guard, and the impression thus produced," to receive the confession). But it does not appear how far the argument of a clergyman's privilege (the existence of which was the is still a mooted point; post, § 2394) e into the result.

[2] 1822, R. v. Gibney, Jebb Cr. C. 15, the Irish Judges (where the constable and said "What a terrible thing to murder you child!"; admitted, on the principle that fear to be produced must be of a tempo

§ 841. Confession induced by Trick or Fraud; Confession while Intoxicated. (1) Since the exclusion of confessions is not due to any principle of public faith or of private pledge of secrecy (ante, § 823), it follows that the use of a trick or fraud (however reprehensible in itself) does not of itself exclude a confession induced by means of it. So far as the trick involved a promise which would tend to produce an untrue confession, it would operate to exclude, — not, however, because it was a trick (i. e. because the representations were false) but because even if true its tenor would have stimulated a confession irrespective of guilt. This principle is and always has been universally conceded.[1]

(2) A confession made while intoxicated is governed by the general principle of testimonial capacity, and is therefore usually held admissible (ante, § 499); it is only where the intoxication is produced by a person desirous of obtaining a confession that its trustworthiness becomes really doubtful.[2]

ture, and in this case there was no such threat or intimidation, nor any fear of a temporal nature produced; any terror that might have been excited was as to what might happen in the next world"); Ante 1828, R. v. Hodgson, cited in 1 Wood. Cr. C. 203 (by the accused's mistress, that the former "would never be easy in her mind till she had confessed"); 1835, R. v. Wild, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 452 (the accused was fourteen years old; a person in charge, "said 'Now you kneel down by the side of me and tell me the truth'; . . . I hoped he would tell me the truth in the presence of the Almighty"; the Judges (eight present) "were unanimous that the confession was strictly admissible, but they much disapproved of the mode in which it was obtained"); 1853, R. v. Sleeman, 6 Cox Cr. 245, by six Judges (an urging, "Don't run your soul into more sin, but tell the truth"); Ga. Cr. Code 1895, § 1007 ("spiritual exhortation" does not exclude); 1808, Com. v. Drake, 15 Mass. 161 (penitential confession to fellow-members of the church). There is one possible case in which a moral consideration might under circumstances properly vitiate a confession, namely, where it appears to have been made in the spirit of self-sacrifice for the purpose and with the certainty of shielding or saving one in whose life or liberty the confessor is deeply interested; but in the only ruling on the subject the confession was received: 1858, Shifflet's Case, 14 Gratt. 665 (confessing to save a mother from the charge of complicity). Compare the instances of such self-sacrifice cited post, § 867.

[1] 1826, R. v. Derrington, 2 C. & P. 418 (letter handed to the turnkey, who violated his promise to post it); 1867, King v. State, 40 Ala. 319 (by letting the accused think that a supposed accomplice had been shot); 1895, Stone v. State, 105 id. 60, 17 So. 114 (by pretending to be an accomplice); 1895, Burton v. State, 107 id. 108, 18 So. 284 (by a detective pretending to be a fellow-prisoner); 1870, State v. Darneil, 1 Honst. Cr. C. 322 (made in confidence); 1892, Cornwall v. State, 91 Ga. 277, 282, 18 S. E. 154 (to an officer who pretended to help his escape); Ga. Cr. Code 1895, § 1007 ("promise of secrecy" does not exclude); 1901, Sanders v. State, 113 Ga. 267, 38 S. E. 841 (sheriff's "bad faith," in opening a letter sent by accused from jail); 1853, Gates v. People, 14 Ill. 436 (by deception a letter was obtained); 1890, Com. v. Flood, 152 Mass. 529, 25 N. E. 971 (pretending to be ready to assist in a planned crime and having persons concealed hear the answer of the accused); 1874, State v. Jones, 54 Mo. 481 (a trick); 1881, State v. Phelps, 74 id. 136 (showing to the accused his engagement ring and telling him that the woman had "gone back on him"); 1887, State v. Brooks, 92 Id. 542, 576, 5 S. W. 257, 330 (murder of Preller in St. Louis by suffocating him in a trunk; a detective was by connivance of the prosecution arrested on a fictitious charge of forgery and imprisoned with the defendant and obtained a confession under pretence of friendly assistance); 1886, Heldt v. State, 20 Nebr. 492, 30 N. W. 626 (detective pretending to be a fellow-prisoner); 1903, People v. White, — N. Y. —, 68 N. E. 630 (pretences to be the accused's friend); 1868, Price v. State, 18 Oh. St. 418 (a false statement that an alleged accomplice had confessed); 1857, Fife v. Com., 29 Pa. 435 (the accused was falsely told that accomplices had confessed); 1898, Com. v. Goodwin, 186 id. 218, 40 Atl. 412 (confession to a woman, the interview being ostensibly in secret, according to the sheriff's promise, but eavesdroppers being stationed near by; letter given to the sheriff on a promise to deliver it, but retained by him; admitted); 1899, Com. v. Cressinger, 193 id. 326, 44 Atl. 433 (confession obtained by pretending that murderer's knife was discovered; "the object of evidence is to get at the truth, and a trick which has no tendency to produce a confession, except in accordance with the truth, is always admissible"); 1900, Jackson v. U. S., 42 C. C. A. 452, 102 Fed. 473, 483 (approving the preceding case).

Compare the cases cited post, § 2183 (illegality of means, as no ground of exclusion of evidence), § 2286 (confidence in general, as not privileged), and § 2302 (communications to a pretended attorney).

[2] So, too, of a confession made during sleep or during hypnotic influence (ante, § 500).

5. Nature of the Inducement (continued): Confessions on Examination b a Magistrate or in other Legal Proceedings.

§ 842. Orthodox Principle. The question is here presented: Is there thing in the fact of arrest, as such, or in the fact of presence before a m trate, as such, or of examination on oath, as such, which tends to produ untrue confession of guilt? We now assume the absence of any of the kinds of inducements anywhere deemed fatal; we assume that no thr promises, assurances, urgings, or other inducements sufficient in themselv exclude, have been held out; we are to consider merely the effect of the facts in themselves. Remembering this, and applying the test already cated as the othodox one (ante, §§ 822, 824), "Was the inducement such there was any fair risk of a false confession?" there can be on principle bu answer, namely, no such risk exists, and the confession is admissible. Fo circumstances of arrest and of presence before a magistrate, no argument be necessary; and even for the extreme case of an answer under oath, it be obvious that so far as any answer at all is thereby compellable, it is cording to the terms of the oath, to be a true answer; that is all th demanded or compelled.[1] There is on principle not the vestige of an ment for excluding a confession merely because of such a circumstance; as a matter of history, such an exclusion was not thought of until the judicial attitude of the present century gave it a partial sanction and op the way for that misuse of precedents by which extreme results have reached in a few jurisdictions.

But we find also in use, and competing for recognition, certain other t which are all derived from the phrase "voluntary," but as applied and wo out for the situations now in hand have a meaning and effect very diffe from the ordinary one as already expounded (ante, § 826).

§ 843. Principle of Voluntariness: (1) Common Form. The common f in the present application, consists in taking the phrase "voluntary," co ering it without any reference to promises or threats, and erectiug it int absolute and final test, — in short, in translating it as "spoutaneous." notion is a broad one, and is in effect: Was the situation such that the son had to speak, felt obliged to speak, or was it a matter of pure choice him to speak or not? The radical difference here, it will be observed, is we no longer care whether his speaking involves a false avowal of guilt; thing is that a speaking not voluntary cannot be received, and hence speaking is excluded irrespective of the danger of falsity. If, then, we the phrase "voluntary" and treat it as the final and self-sufficient test,

[1] 1838, Morton, J., in Fannce v. Gray, 21 Pick. 245 ("The fact that it was made under oath cannot diminish its force or render its competency questionable. If it contain a trne narrative of facts, justice requires that they should be admitted. And no man will be likely to make false admissions against himself, because he has been sworn to tell the truth"); S C. J., in Wood v. Weld, Smith N. H. 367, ring to a similar examination on oath ("V hardship is it to be obliged to tell the tr No means [were] used to produce anythin the truth"); and see R. v. Scott, post, § and U. S. v. Kirkwood, Utah, post, § 852.

if thus we discard the fundamental theory of confessions (ante, § 822) — that our object is to exclude those which may be false — and conceive our purpose as that of excluding confessions as such (even though true) unless they are "voluntary," we thus have good reason to consider how far under such a canon the fact of arrest or of presence before a magistrate or of examination on oath may prevent the confession from being in the above sense "voluntary"; for it may at least be argued that either of these circumstances may in a given case make the confession practically compulsory. Now this is the form of principle which was unsuccessfully championed by many English judges during the first half of the 1800s, and thus was introduced into our rulings; and it is under this form that the questions we are now to consider have been able to be raised. It is not the best principle; but it is at least superior to those we have later to examine, which to-day also compete for recognition. Different Courts apply the doctrine in differing spirits of strictness or liberality; the difference often practically shows itself in the circumstance whether the giving of a caution (or notice not to answer except voluntarily) is deemed to admit the answer; a Court of narrow tendencies will not even then admit it, since (it is said) the moral compulsion remains; but with most Courts a caution removes the reason for exclusion.

Types of the foregoing form of test and the arguments expounding it are found in the following passages:

1852, Pollock, C. B., in R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 441: "The true distinction between the present case and a case of that kind ['you had better tell the truth'] is that [here] it is left to the prisoner a matter of perfect indifference whether he should open his mouth or not."

1864, Hayes, J., dissenting, in R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 60, 83: "All that the common law requires is that the confession in pais [meaning other than in court or before a magistrate] be voluntary. Upon this principle it is that . . . a confession will be rejected if it appears to have been extracted by the presumed pressure and obligation of an oath, or by pestering interrogatories, or if it had been made by the party to rid himself of importunity, or if, by subtle and ensnaring questions, as those which are framed so as to conceal their drift or object, he has been taken at a disadvantage and thus entrapped into a statement which, if left to himself, and in the full freedom of volition he would not have made. . . . I am not aware of any law which declares, as an abstract proposition, that a confession is undeserving of that character [of voluntariness] if it has been made in answer to questions fairly put, while the party has been left at full liberty to answer or not, as he may think right. These principles will apply to the confession in pais, whether it has been made by a person at liberty or under arrest. But it is manifest to every one's experience that from the moment a person feels himself in custody on a criminal charge, his mental condition undergoes a very remarkable change, and he naturally becomes much more accessible to every influence that addresses itself either to his hopes or fears. . . . [To counteract this influence a caution is customary; yet the presence or absence of a caution is not in itself decisive; it is merely a circumstance for the judge. But from the moment of arrest, the person must be assumed to be acting under pressure.] On the whole of the case now before us, I am of opinion that the statement to the constable, having been made at a time when the party neither was a prisoner nor felt or supposed herself to be a prisoner, and not appearing to have been obtained by any threat or promise or other undue or unfair means, was properly receivable in evidence. But on the other hand, I am of opinion that if the defendant had at the time of that conversation felt herself to be in custody on the criminal charge, then her statements in answer to the questions would not have been receivable, unless prefaced by a caution."

1862, Rice, J., in State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 223: "Does it follow that because a statement is made upon oath in a proceeding where the circumstances of the commission of the crime are being investigated, and the person making such statements is a suspected or accused person, that it must necessarily be involuntarily made? . . . The argument is that the impressiveness of obligation and the solemnity of the occasion would have a tendency to wring from the party thus situated facts and circumstances which he is not bound to disclose, and therefore can in no just sense be said to be voluntary. As a general proposition this may be true, especially if the party is uninformed with regard to his rights. But when he is fully apprised of his rights and informed that he is under no legal obligation to disclose any facts prejudicial to himself, or to give evidence against himself, and then deliberately makes statements under oath, no good reason is perceived why such statements should not be given in evidence against him. . . . If it be said that, though a party in such a situation may be under no legal constraint, he may nevertheless feel under a degree of moral compulsion, and from that cause feel impelled to make self-incriminative statements, the answer is that this moral pressure bears with no greater force upon him when on the stand voluntarily than in other situations. A party who finds himself surrounded with circumstances calculated to cast suspicion on him will undoubtedly feel the necessity of making explanations. But such considerations have never been deemed good cause for excluding declarations which he may choose voluntarily to make."

1879, Chalmers, J., in Jackson v. State, 59 Miss. 312, rejecting an examination as witness after a caution: "The principle is that no statement made upon oath in a judicial investigation of a crime can ever be used against the party making it, in a prosecution of himself for the same crime; because the fact that he is under oath of itself operates as a compulsion upon him to tell the truth and the whole truth, and his statement, therefore, cannot be regarded as free and voluntary."

The first answer to this test is of course (1) that the fundamental question for confessions is whether there is any danger that they may be untrue (ante, § 822) and that there is nothing in the mere circumstance of compulsion to speak in general, or of the use of oath-compulsion in particular, which creates any risk of untruth.[1] (2) Another answer is that the privilege against self-crimination assumes that if the person chooses to give such testimony on the stand or in custody, it will be received, and there would have been no need for such a privilege if this rule had existed for confessions; that privilege assumes in its very existence that statements made without using it are admissible, and answers all the purposes which the above doctrine is aiming

[1] This answer is well set forth in the opinion of Lord Campbell, C. J., for four judges (Coleridge, J., dissenting on another ground), in R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47 (1856): "We will consider the several grounds on which the defendant's counsel has argued that it [the examination] is not admissible. The first is that the examination of the defendant was taken after making a declaration tantamount to an oath, and that if on oath it would have been inadmissible. But in the case referred to in support of this objection [R. v. Britton, supra], the oath had been improperly administered without authority; and if the examination is taken under an oath administered by proper authority, there is no reason for saying that it is less likely to be true than if it had been without an oath or any similar solemnity. The next objection is that the examination was compulsory. It is a trite maxim that the confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing, must be voluntary; but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, because under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say what is not true, and the supposed confession cannot be safely acted on. Such an objection cannot apply to . . . a lawful examination in the course of a judicial proceeding." See also the epigrammatic passages from Morton, J., in Fannce v. Gray, and Smith, C. J., in Wood v. Weld, quoted ante, § 842.

at.[2] (3) There is, however, a third way of dealing with this doctrine; and that is to accept its principle — i. e. that a statement not voluntary is to be excluded, irrespective of its truth or falsity, — but to deny that there can be any compulsion in the mere facts of custody or of examination upon oath, because the person is always at liberty to refuse to speak. This answer may still leave open to dispute the question whether at least a "caution" (or notification to the person of his privilege) is not essential; but the theory that the person must be supposed to know that he need not answer (as argued in State v. Vaigneur, infra) would practically repudiate such a requirement.[3]

§ 844. Same: (2) Modern English Form. In the last half of the 18th century there appears a tendency on the part of English judges to revive this test in an altered form, for a certain class of cases at least. The notion is fundamentally the same, i. e. Was the situation such that the person had to speak? But it proceeds by a different test, namely, Was the speaking obtained by asking questions of a person while in custody? In other words, statements are deemed not voluntary and therefore inadmissible when they have been made in answer to questions put while in custody. Moreover, it thus becomes immaterial whether the answers amount to a confession or not. The attitude is illustrated by the following passages:

1883, A. L. Smith, J., in R. v. Garin, 15 Cox Cr. C. 656: "When a prisoner is in custody, the police have no right to ask him questions. Reading a statement over, and then saying to him, 'What have you to say?' is cross-examining the prisoner, and therefore I shut it out. A prisoner's mouth is closed after he is once given in charge, and he ought not to be asked anything."

1864, Lefroy, L. C. J., dissenting, in R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 66: "The law of England, since the time of Judge Jeffreys, is against any kind of extraction of evidence from a prisoner, not only by torture, but by anything that could be calculated to excite the prisoner to confess; any answer given under such circumstances is not admissible.... Ought we not to say that the law of England does not allow evidence to be obtained by questioning a prisoner, except in the particular way prescribed by the statute? ... There appears to have been a new current of opinion setting in after the passing of 14 & 15 Vict."

This attitude can by no means be taken as the prevailing one in modern English Courts; it is merely a tendency, though a marked one. It is doubtless partly due to a feeling (unfounded, as we shall see, in the law) that the statute of 1850 (considered later) should be treated as in spirit excluding all

[2] This argument is suggested in the following passage: 1878, Benedict, J., in U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 386: "The reason why a sworn witness is permitted to decline answering is because his answers under oath can be used as evidence against him"; compare also § 823, ante, § 2266, post.

[3] 1852, Withers, J., in State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 403 (after dealing with other objections): "There remains nothing but the supposed duress of an oath, administered by a power capable (as is said) of applying a sanction that shall exact an answer. Now in reality there is no power, in any tribunal known to the common law, to exact an answer that may implicate a witness in or tend to expose him to a criminal charge. ... Mr. Joy ... [assigns the reason] that one in his capacity of witness might refuse to answer a question that has a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge; hence an answer to such becomes a voluntary statement, since he might refuse to make any. This appears to be a sound legal theory. It cannot be met by the circumstance of a particular case that a witness may not know the extent of his personal security under the law, for ignorance of the law excuses no one").

evidence from accused persons in custody not obtained by the statute-sa tioned method. Partly, also, it is due, as the preceding form is, to a confus of confession-law with the privilege against self-crimination; the privile of course, does not affect statements not made on the stand but made wh in custody (post, § 2263); and in applying the law of confessions to the lat situation, the judges have modified it by an infusion of the spirit of the ab privilege; so that we find presented under the head of confession-law notion excluding statements made merely in answer to questions by a c todian,[1] — a result which would be natural enough as an extension of t privilege against self-crimination, but is quite anomalous in the law confessions.

§ 845. Same: (3) Selden's Principle of Mental Agitation. Another fo of test derived from the phrase "voluntary" is still broader in its excludi effect, and differs radically in one point from the preceding two. Like the (1) it takes "voluntariness" as a final standard; but (2) it does not disca but retains, the fundamental notion of confession-law that a probable untru is that which we are seeking to reject; and furthermore (3) it includes, the second does, under "confession" anything and everything said by t person, whether an avowal of guilt or an assertion intended to exculpate a to demonstrate innocence.[1] Its peculiar different result arises from applyi the idea (2) to the statements included in (3). Thus, it argues: Persons s pected wrongly of a crime, especially when officially charged with it a questioned about it, are apt, particularly when the circumstances are strong inculpatory and demand explanation, to make the first explanation th occurs to them, to deny incriminating facts, and, in short, to assert and t to prove their innocence by inventing false stories, which if true would sh their innocence; hence, statements so made cannot fairly be trusted, a should be rejected. The chief representative statements of this theory s found in the following passages:

1854, Selden, J., dissenting, in Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 33: "The mental d turbance produced by a direct accusation, or even a consciousness of being suspected cri. e, is always great, and in many cases incalculable. The foundation of all up human testimony is that moral sentiment which universally leads men, when not un some strong counteracting influence, to tell the truth. This sentiment is sufficien powerful to resist a trifling motive, but will not withstand the fear of conviction for cri Hence, the moment that fear seizes the mind, the basis of all reliance upon its manif tations is gone. . . . The mind, confused and agitated by the apprehension of dang cannot reason with coolness, and it resorts to falsehood when truth would be safer, and hurried into acknowledgments which the facts do not warrant. Neither false statemen nor confessions, therefore, afford any certain evidence of guilt when made under the citement of an impending prosecution for crime."

1864, Pigot, C. B., dissenting, with Lefroy, C. J., and O'Brien, J., in R. v. Johnston,

[1] 1867, Kelly, C. B., in 10 Cox Cr. C. 576 ("I have always felt that we ought to watch jealously any encroachment on the principle that no man is bound to criminate himself, and that we ought to see that no one is induced either by a threat or a promise to say anything of a criminatory character against himself"; utter confusion of two things distinct in hist and in principle).

[1] A notion whose fallacy has already b examined (ante, § 821).

Ir. C. L. 60, 121: "It must be shown to the satisfaction of the judge that the statements have been purely voluntary statements of the prisoner. . . . The danger to be guarded against is not, in the far greatest number of cases, that an innocent man will fabricate a statement of his own guilt, although instances of this have occurred, too well attested to be doubted. The danger is that an innocent person, suddenly arrested, and questioned by one having the power to detain or set free, will (when subjected to interrogatories, which may be administered in the mildest or may be administered in the harshest way, and to persons of the strongest and boldest or of the most feeble and nervous natures) make statements not consistent with truth, in order to escape from the pressure of the moment. . . . The process of questioning impresses on the greater part of mankind the belief that silence will be taken as an assent to what the questions imply. The very necessity which that impression suggests, of answering the question in some way, deprives the prisoner of his free agency, and impels him to answer from the fear of the consequences of declining to do so. Daily experience shows that witnesses, having deposed the strict truth, become on a severe or artful cross-examination involved in contradictions and excuses destructive of their credit and of their direct testimony. A prisoner is still more liable to make statements of that character under the pressure of interrogatories urged by the person who holds him in custody; and thus truth, the object of the evidence of admissions so elicited, is defeated by the very method ostensibly used to attain it. This relative position of the parties does not, therefore, tend to truth as the result of the inquiry. It does tend in the strongest way to make the statement of the prisoner the reverse of voluntary. . . . In my judgment, the relative positions of the constable who has custody of the prisoner and of the prisoner who is in custody of the constable negative the fact that the prisoner is a free agent. It rebuts any presumption that the prisoner's statement is voluntary, and furnishes the strongest presumption that it is not."

Now, (a) conceding this argument to be good so far as it goes, what it shows is that statements professing innocence, and calculated to prove it, are not trustworthy; it does not show that a plain avowal of guilt is untrustworthy; on the contrary, the whole underlying notion is that an innocent person will lie to prove his innocence and explain away apparent guilt. Therefore, when we find him confessing guilt, it is obvious that it cannot be under the influence of any such motive as the above, and is totally inconsistent with the presence of that motive.[2] Thus, by the Courts adopting this principle, a reason which applies exclusively to assertions of innocence is made to support a rule excluding confessions of guilt. That is the first fallacy; and it must be clearly appreciated, because its insidious error is concealed in a triple process, namely, first, taking a principle fundamentally appropriate to the confession-rules (that they are excluded because of the risk of falsity), secondly, working out its reason for a totally different class of statements (assertions intended to show innocence),[3] and thirdly, going back to confessions, and testing them according to the rule thus borrowed.

(b) The further answer to this principle is found in the denial that the

[2] This answer is represented in the following passage: 1878, Benedict, J., in U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 387 ("To say that the administering of an oath to one under suspicion of crime will of necessity cause a mental disturbance that must render unreliable the sworn admission of the crime and raise the legal presumption that the statement is untrue, is going further than I can go, unless compelled by authority. I know of no authority binding upon the Courts of the United States, which compels the holding that an arrest, or a charge of crime, or being sworn, or all three combined, are sufficient to exclude a confession that otherwise appears to have been freely made, without the influence of threat or promise").

[3] Ante, § 821, "What is a Confession."

principle has any validity even for the class of statements, namely, as tions of facts showing innocence, as to which it is worked out. In t department of evidence such a principle is without precedent, and is in c flict with all analogies. The conduct of a suspected person, in concea or destroying incriminating evidence or in fleeing from justice, has alw been admitted, subject to any innocent explanation that can be made (a §§ 273–276), and his false assertions of an alibi and other false explanat of conduct have always been admitted (ante, §§ 277–278); yet if the al principle were good, it would necessarily exclude all conduct and statem while under suspicion, and not merely while in custody or on the st Thus the principle is without precedent or analogy, and is unworkabl practice [4]

§ 846. Present Status of the above Principles. The first of the above t principles is less recognized to-day, though it gains ground steadily. second is that which prevails in most jurisdictions, though it is not unifo nor consistently applied, and it rather loses ground. The third can ha be said to prevail completely in any jurisdiction, its chief function ha been to throw precedents and principles into confusion, to unsettle the co of decision, and to suggest confusing arguments while not commanding plete adherence. It was first judicially advanced by the eminent Mr. J. den,[1] in 1854, in the Teachout Case in New York, at nearly the same that it was being repudiated by the English judges, in 1856, in Scott's C it was subsequently championed by the dissenting judges in the Irish ca R. v. Johnston, in 1864; but it has not obtained any further footing in land or Ireland, and had vogue as a determining doctrine in only a American jurisdictions. Apart from its lack of precedent, the false bas supposed principle by which it is reached, and its conflict with analogi is workable simply and consistently up to a certain point only, i. e. qui far as Mr. J. Selden and the Irish judges wished to carry it. But it is cally different from and opposed to the other principles; and the unfortu thing has been, for many Courts, that they have not seen this, that they thought to recognize it partially, but not wholly, and in connection

[4] This answer is represented in the following passage: 1869, Woodruff, J., in Teachout v. People, 41 N. Y. 11 ("If the declarations made under consciousness of suspicion are for that reason unreliable, they must be unreliable whenever and wherever made . . . and equally when the suspected party encounters that suspicion while fully at large among third parties, as when called as a witness to state if he sees fit what he knows of the cause of the death. And if consciousness of suspicion renders proof of his declarations unreliable, so also should it render proof of his acts unreliable, and they should be equally excluded. And yet it has not, I think, been doubted that proof of the acts of the party under the very pressure of suspicion is competent. . . . [Flight, concealment, etc.] may be proved as some indication of conscious guilt, and yet it is consistent with innocence, and may be the mere result of fear, and the pressure cumstances may lead the innocent man t to this as a measure of safety. This is q true as that suspicion will lead a man t statements for the same purpose. There be some limit to the rule excluding declar short of the test that they be made whe under no consciousness that he is und picion; else the whole conduct of the from the moment he is apprised that he pected, must be declared to be too unreli be made the subject of any inference whate other principles, — an unfortunate thing, because this test is not reconcilable in any degree with either of the other tests (except in part the last preceding one) and cannot coexist with them in the same body of law, and because the result of this laudable endeavor to carry water on both shoulders is that neither vessel maintains its equilibrium, to the confusion of the Courts and the law. The best interests of the law of confessions would be served by a clear recognition on the part of the Courts that one of those three principles must be selected and logically carried out and the other two be repudiated; thus we should have at least consistency, instead of a tangle of rulings guided now by one principle, now by another, and leaving the law in a state of desperate uncertainty.

[1] It had already been advanced, howe counsel, Mr. Dundas, in 1838, in Wheater' post; and Mr. J. Selden probably found it But a spurious passage, much quoted, bert's Evidence and Hawkins' Pleas Crown also served as a source; this pas examined ante, § 818.

Owing to the state of the decisions, it is necessary to consider them by jurisdictions; for this alone will furnish an opportunity for examining the state of the law with reference to the various competing principles; and the English precedents, as furnishing the original distinctions and illustrating the history of the theories, must first be taken by themselves. In applying each of the principles, there are four kinds of situations, involving distinctions about which the controversy within each principle has chiefly turned. These four are: 1. Under arrest as accused; 2. Examined before a magistrate as accused, without oath; 3. Examined before a magistrate or on trial as accused, under oath; 4. Testifying on oath as a witness. Confessions made in these four different situations may be differently treated even under the same principle, and the course of the law must be examined separately for each.

§ 847. English Practice: (1) Confessions while under Arrest. It was for a long time the clear and unquestioned law in England that the mere circumstance of arrest, even when combined with the circumstance that the confession was made in answer to questions put by the custodian, did not exclude the confession. This was taken for granted and expressly asserted as unquestioned by Mr. J. Grose, in 1791, delivering the opinion of the twelve judges in Lambe's Case.[1] The next two landmarks of the rule are Thornton's[2] and Gilham's[3] Cases, also decisions in banc. These were followed, in the next ten years, by other rulings,[4] among which Wild's Case, a decision in banc, became the leading one. Such was the law at this period that Mr. Joy was able correctly to say, in 1842:[5]

[1] 1791, Lambe's Case, 2 Leach Cr. C., 3d ed., 625; see the quotation post, § 848. So also before that time: 1722, R. v. Woodburne, 16 How. St. Tr. 62 (to police-officer); 1746, Berwick's Case, Foster's Cr. C. 10 (officers of a rebel garrison after capture, giving their rank to the official inspectors while in prison).

[2] 1824, R. v. Thornton, 1 Moody Cr. C. 27, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 49, by seven judges against two (the accused, fourteen years old, was in custody and severely questioned by the police: held admissible, because "no threat or promise had been used").

[3] 1828, R. v. Gilham, 1 Mood Cr. C. 186, 191, before all the judges but one (in jail, to the jailer: admitted).

[4] 1831, R. v. Swatkins, 4 C. & P. 549, Patteson, J., semble; 1832, R. v. Richards, 5 id. 318, Bosanquet, J. (to a constable, in custody on the way to jail); 1833, R. v. Long, 6 id. 179, Gurney, B. (just after arrest, after hearing the charge); 1835, R. v. Wild, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 452 (in custody in an inn); 1837, R. v. Kerr 8 C. & P. 177, Park, J. (to a policeman, searching the accused's room, questioning her and about to arrest her).

[5] Confessions, 38, 46.

"It may be proper that the police authorities should forbid the practice of que
ing a prisoner by a constable, and it might reasonably induce caution, and perhap picion, and a scrutinizing jealousy in jurors, in investigating the credit of a witne obtains a confession through such means; but the cases before the twelve judges, b England and Ireland, already cited, seem to establish that statements made in ans questions put, without any caution and by a person who has no authority to questi prisoner, are admissible in evidence. . . . Such confession, if voluntary and free, missible, although it appears that he was not cautioned."

It is to be noticed (1) that from the point of view of the "threat or ise" test (ante, § 825) the result was a necessary one, because by hypo no threat or promise was employed; (2) that in the absence of a threa promise, the test of "voluntariness" was regarded as satisfied; (3) th caution was required; and (4) that the rule was repeatedly affirmed in

In the meantime, in Ireland, the same result had been reached in Gi
Case, by all the judges.[6] But some twenty years afterwards came a se Irish rulings by individual judges excluding such confessions;[7] the r being variously given. The uncertainty of practice thus introduce finally settled in 1864 by the great case of R. v. Johnston,[8] and the o and orthodox view was maintained by the majority, that confessions under such circumstances were not in themselves inadmissible, and be tested, like other confessions, according to the presence or absence o other and specific inducement in the way of a threat or a promise.

[6] 1822, R. v. Gihuey, Jebb Cr. C. 15, by all the Irish judges (statements in answer to questions by a constable, while under arrest on the way to jail, with a crowd about him asking questions; no caution given; "they held the rule to be well established that a voluntary confession shall be received in evidence, but if hope has been excited, or threats or intimidation held out, it shall not," and admitted it here). This was followed in 1842: R. v. Hughes, quoted in Joy, Confessions, 39 (a statement had been made while in custody, in answer to a constable's questions; Crompton, J., "had frequently had occasion to decide this question, and all these [cases cited] had been before him. The confession of a man, to be admitted, is not to be extorted by fear nor educed by flattery; but where a prisoner voluntarily gives it, it may be received, whether the questions be put to him by an authorized or unauthorized person. Wherever the declaration is voluntary, he would receive it, and the doctrine in Wild's Case was the true one").

[7] 1839, R. v. Hughes, 1 Cr. & D. 13, Doherty, C. J. (an authorized person visiting the accused in jail, and questioning him; excluded, on the ground that no caution was given, and that on magistrates' examinations a caution is always given); 1840, R v. Doyle, ib. 396, Bushe, C. J. (a constable visiting the accused in jail, and questioning her, after a caution); 1841, R. v. Devlin, 2 id. 151, Burton, J., and Brady, C. B. (a police inspector questioning the accused in jail; excluded); 1856, R. v. Toole, 7 Cox Cr. C. 244; Pigot, C. B., and Richards, B. (statement in answer to a police-inspector while under arrest, after caution; excluded, the co ference of opinion among the judg noted); 1861, R. v. Hassett, 8 id. 51 tian, J. (similar facts; evidence reques withdrawn as doubtful); 1863, R. v.
8 Ir. Jur. N. S. 340, Pigot, C. B. (sta answer to a question by a constable wh arrest, after caution; excluded, becau bies "ought to abstain from asking qu

[8] 1864, R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. eleven Irish judges (the accused m ments in answer to the police, just af of the charge, but before arrest, no c ing given; Deasy, B., with whom Hughes and Fitzgerald, BB., Monal and Fitzgerald, Ball, and Keogh, JJ. statement admissible because of the threat or inducement; Ball, J (10 general result of the foregoing cases be that from the year 1822 down to t time — that is, for a period of upwar years — it has been recognized as the land, both in England and Ireland, t sions or statements obtained from through the instrumentality of ques police constables, without any previo are admissible in evidence against vided that such admissions or statem voluntary acts of the prisoners, not either hope or threat operating minds"). The views of Hayes, J., C. J., dissenting, represented the te ante, the view of Pigot, C. B., and dissenting, represented the test of see the quotations in those sections.

Meantime, in 1850, a statute (post, § 848) had prescribed a new method of examining accused persons for commitment, and in the opinion of Lefroy, C. J., its spirit had contributed to the opposing result reached by him in this case. But the supposed spirit of the statute had not affected the English judges, who continued to rule as before.[9] But about the same time as R. v. Johnston the other form of test (described ante, § 844), made its appearance in England;[10] i. e., any answers obtained by questions put by an officer to a person in custody were excluded. It has not yet been given a standing by a Court of appeal, but it certainly is a candidate for supremacy.

§ 848. English Practice: (2) Confessions as Accused without Oath on Examination before a Magistrate. The examination of an accused person before a magistrate, for preliminary investigation and for commitment if necessary, was at common law taken without putting the accused upon oath, because as accused he was not competent to testify (post, § 2250, ante, § 575). Furthermore, the proceeding was for some three centuries regulated by a statute (widely copied in this country) the material provisions of which are as follows:

1554, St. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13, § 4: "Justices of the peace . . . shall before any bailment or mainprise take the examination of the said prisoner and the information of them that bring him, . . . and the same, or as much as may be material thereof to prove the felony, shall be put in writing before they make the bailment; which said examination, together with the said bailment, the said justices shall certify at the next general gaol-delivery. . . ." St. 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 10: "The said justice, or justices, before he or they shall commit or send such prisoner to ward, shall take the like examination of the prisoner and the information of those who bring him, and shall put the same in writing within two days after the said examination, and the same shall certify," etc.

Now the propriety of receiving confessions made at such a time, never questioned (from the present point of view) until the end of the 1700s,[1] was then settled, both as a common-law question and under the statute, in a decision so clear and emphatic that its exposition must be quoted:

1791, Lambe's Case, 2 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 625; the accused was arrested and examined before a magistrate, and on having the written examination read over to him for signing, he said: "It is all true enough," but would not sign it. Whether it was admissible apart from the statute, was the first question; Grose, J., for the twelve judges: "The general rule respecting this species of testimony is that a free and voluntary confession, made by a person accused of an offence, is receivable in evidence against him, whether such confession be made at the moment he is apprehended, while those who have him in custody are conducting him to the magistrate's, or even after he has entered the house of the magistrate for the purpose of undergoing his examination. But in the present case the confession of the prisoner was made not only in the presence of the [9] 1853, R. v. Sleeman, 6 Cox Cr. 245 (in custody in a private house; admitted); 1862, R. v. Cheverton, 2 F. & F. 833, Erle, C. J., and Wightman, J. (statement to a police-superintendent, while under arrest, in answer to questions, without caution; admitted).

[10] 1863, R. v. Mick, 3 F. & F. 822, Mellor, J. (statements to the police, under arrest, answering a question, but after a caution; admitted, but the method disapproved); 1885, A. L. Smith, J., in R. v. Gavin, 15 Cox Cr. C. 656 (quoted ante, § 844). No doubt such a decision is apt to be reached through the influence of other considerations: as where Cave, J., in 1893, R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 18, frankly expresses doubts as to the credibility of police-officers producing alleged confessions in doubtful cases.

[1] 1741, White's Trial, 17 How. St. Tr. 1085; Goodere's Trial, ib. 1054; and other cases in § 2250, post.

magistrate, bnt whiie he was nndergoing a judicial examination. . . . First, th consider this question as it is governed by the ruies and principles of the commc Confessions of guiit made by a prisoner, to any person, at any moment of time, and place, subsequent to the perpetration of the crime and previous to his examination the magistrate, are at common law received in evidence as the highest and most s tory proof of guilt, because it is fairly presnmed that no mau would make such a sion against himseif if the facts confessed were not trne. It may, however, be s opposition] that this rule oniy applies to confessions by paroi, and not to con (as in the present case) rednced into writing and afterwards admitted by parol true. Bnt surely if what a man says, though not reduced into writing, may b in evidence against him, a fortiori what he says when reduced into writing is sibie, for the fact confessed being rendered iess doubtful by being reduced int ing, it is of course entitled to greater credit, and it would be absurd to say t instrument is invalidated by a circumstance from which it derives additionai streng authenticity. And for this reason it is clear that the present confession havin taken by a magistrate under a judiciai examination can be no objection to receivi evidence, for it gains stiii greater credit in proportion to the solemnity under w was made. . . . [He then points out that the statute methods were not intended place all others by exciusion, but merely to add a new and acceptabie form, thus aii other proper ones stiii admissible, even though the statutory form could not be of.] "[The examination] is more authentic on account of the deliberate ma which it is taken, and, when it contains a confession, is admitted, not by force statutes, but by the common law, as strong evidence of that fact; . . . and it is ci what a prisoner confessed before a justice of the peace, previous to the reign of Ph
Mary, if not induced by hope or extorted by fear, whether rednced into writing or if reduced into writing, whether signed or not, if admitted by the prisoner to was and is as good evidence as if made in the adjoining room previous to his havi carried into the presence of the justice, or after he had ieft him, or in the sam before the magistrate comes, or after he quits it."

This ruling was emphasized in an opinion delivered a few years late 1794, R. v. Thomas, 2 Leach Cr. L. (3d ed.) 727; Grose, J. (the facts being to those of Lambe's Case, supra: "There can be no doubt but that these minutes read in evidence. . . . In Lambe's Case, which in its circumstances was precisely present, the judges were of opinion that if such written examination were to be a not admissible, this monstrous proposition wouid foiiow, that whatever a priso when not before a magistrate would be admissibie, though depending on the fa memory; but that the moment a prisoner gets before a magistrate it wouid not b sible, thongh taken down in writing under circnmstances of the greatest solemni

It will thus be seen that confessions so made were declared to be equ missible (1) at common law, (2) under the statute, and (3) when intende taken under the statute, but not successfully so taken. Furthermore be observed, there is no intimation that it is of any consequence (a) w the accused was cautioned or not, or (b) whether his statements wer spontaneously, or in answer to a general inquiry as to what he had or in answer to repeated specific questions. Finally, it is clear that sions made in such a situation were treated on exactly the same foo any others, i. e. the only question would be as to the influence of son tive threat or promise; the mere situation did not affect the result stitute an inducement.

The admissibility of such a confession was subsequently reiterated in a series of rulings extending through the next half-century ;[2] and Mr. Joy adds his authority as to the practice at the end of that time.[3] In the meantime, only one contrary ruling, R. v. Wilson, had appeared;[4] but it served to keep alive the possibility of controversy. It will be noted that, in the cases confirming the orthodox doctrine (of which R. v. Ellis and R. v. Gilham are most frequently cited), some of the confessions received were given under a caution and some were made without questions preceding; but neither of these circumstances seems to have been treated as essential to their reception. The doctrine of R. v. Wilson,[4] however, came to the surface once again in 1850.[5] But in the preceding year a statute had entirely revised the method of conducting such examinations;[6] the effect of which was to raise the question whether its methods were to exclude entirely and to forbid the common-law methods, and thus to leave an opportunity still to inquire judicially what methods were receivable at common law.[7] Of the various questions

[2] 1790, R. v. Hall, quoted in 2 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 635; 1799, R. v. Magill, McNally on Evid. 37, Chamberlain, J. (statement as accused before a magistrate; no caution); 1826, R. v. Ellis, Ry. & Moo. 432, Littledale, J. (a statement as accused on examination before a magistrate, without threat or promise, but upon questioning and after refusal to allow counsel; following an unreported ruling of Holroyd, J., and disapproving Wilson's Case of 1817, in the next note but one); 1828, R. v. Gilham, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 186, 191, before all the judges but one (on examination before a magistrate after a caution; admitted); 1830, Wright's Case, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 48 (on examination as accused before a magistrate; admitted); 1831, R. v. Fagg, 4 C. & P. 566, Garrow, B. (examination as accused before magistrate; disapproved because taken before all evidence for prosecution was in; but admitted); 1831, R. v. Bell, 5 id. 162, Gaselee, J., and Lord Tenterden, C. J. (statement as accused before magistrate, without questions; admitted, and Garrow, B.'s objection, supra, disapproved); 1831 (?), Anon., ib., note, Lord Lyndhurst, C. B. (same point); 1832, R. v. Green, ib. 312, Gurney, B. (statements as accused before a magistrate, after a caution); 1836, R. v. Court, 7 id. 486, Littledale, J. (statement as accused before magistrate in answer to question); 1836, R. v. Rees, ib. 569, Lord Denman, C. J. (statement as accused before magistrate in answer to questions); 1837, R. v. Bartlett, ib. 832, Bolland, B. (same); 1838, R. v. Arnold, 8 id. 622, Lord Denman, C. J. (advising a caution; but omitting to say whether it is essential). There were also other rulings indicating clearly, though indirectly, an acceptance of this practice: 1833, R. v. Tubby, 5 C. & P. 530, Vaughan, B., semble; 1835, R. v. Rivers, 7 id. 177, Park. J., semble; 1838, R. v. Wheeley, 8 id. 250, Alderson, B., semble.

[3] 1842, Joy, Confessions, 40.

[4] 1817, R. v. Wilson, Holt N. P. 597, Richards, C. B. (a statement as accused on examination before a magistrate, without threats or promises, but without caution and upon questions; "an examination of itself imposes an obligation to speak the truth; if a prisoner will confess, let him do so voluntarily"). There is another and earlier, sometimes quoted to the same effect; but it has no bearing: 1793, R. v. Bennet, 2 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 627 (where the accused had refused to sign the examination before the magistrate, though acknowledging his guilt; this acknowledgment the Court rejected, because the prisoner had the right "to retract what he had said, and to say that it was false"; yet here the accused did not say that it was false; he admitted his guilt).

[5] 1850, R. v. Pettit, 4 Cox Cr. 164, Wilde, C. J. (examination as accused before magistrates, upon questioning; excluded, the decision being independent of the statute: "I reject it upon the general ground that magistrates have no right to put [such] questions to a prisoner. . . . The law is so extremely cautious in guarding against anything like torture that it extends a similar principle to every case where a man is not a free agent in meeting an inquiry; . . . the accused might think himself bound to answer for fear of being sent to gaol").

[6] 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, § 18; enacted for Ireland in 12 & 13 Vict. c. 69, § 18, and again in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, § 14. The statute of Philip and Mary had already been revised without materially affecting the portions concerned with the present question, in 7 G. IV (1826), c. 64, §§ 2 and 3 (for Ireland in 9 G. IV, c. 54, §§ 2 and 3).

[7] The statute's peculiar features were: (1) It required two cautions to be given; and (2) it apparently sanctioned all confessions previously admissible: 1849, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, § 18 ("After the examination of all witnesses on the part of the prosecution, . . . the justice . . . shall say to the accused these words or words to the like effect: 'Having heard the evidence, do you wish to say anything in answer to the charge? You are not obliged to say anything unless you desire to do so, but whatever you say will be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence against you upon your trial'; . . . Provided always, that the said justice or justices, which have arisen in applying this statute,[8] three only need here concern u

(1) Did it exclude a confession before admissible at common law? That does not, has been decided in England;[9] and very properly, since in the fa of the language of its last clause any other interpretation would have left impossible to believe that words can mean anything. (2) Was a cautio necessary at common law? This also has been settled in the negative, ar the orthodox doctrine already described has been affirmed and perpetuated
(3) Finally, does it matter that the statement was called forth by specif questions put by the magistrate about the offence? This has not bee authoritatively answered since the passing of the statute. It had alread been settled at common law, as we have seen, that the putting of questio was immaterial; but some individual rulings since the statute[11] have e cluded statements so obtained, on the principle already described (in § 84 ante), that the very putting of questions is improper and involves a compu sion. It is apparent how little this view is sanctioned by precedent; and is difficult to see how the argument of Lefroy, C. J., that "questioning is no allowed, except in the way prescribed by the statute," can be accepted, unles we believe (as he does) that the statute introduces an exclusive method; bu this view is expressly repudiated, as we have seen, by the Sansome decision and the deduction of such a view from the mere spirit of the statute amount to nothing less than an overturning of the common law without any expres authority.

§ 849. English Practice: (3) Confessions as Accused, under Oath, on Ex amination before a Magistrate. Under the statutory provisions of the 1500 before such accused person shall make any statement, shall state to him and give him clearly to understand that he h.. nothing to hope from any promise of favor and nothing to fear from any threat which may have been holden out to him to induce him to make any admission or confession of his guilt, but that whatever he shall then say may be given in evidence against him upon his trial, notwithstanding such promise or threat; provided, nevertheless, that nothing herein enacted or contained shall prevent the prosecution in any case from giving in evidence any admission or confession or other statement of the person accused or charged made at any time, which by law would be admissible as evidence against such person"); Can. Crim. Code 1892, §§ 591, 689 (the accused's statement made before the magistrate may "if necessary" be introduced against him).

[8] That the statute has presented some difficulties will hardly serve as a moral against statutory revision and codification; for, whether owing to the statute or to other reasons, it is certain that the proportion of rulings upon confession-law in that field after and before the statute is as one to ten.

[9] The statute is not exclusive; all confessions formerly admitted are still admissible: 1850, R. v. Sansome, 4 Cox Cr. 207, before five judges; disposing of the doubts of Coleridge and Cresswell, JJ., in R. v. Kimber, 3 Cox Cr. 223, and approving the ruling of Erle, J., in R. v. Steel, 13 Inst. P. 606. A similar opinio was expressed by a majority in the Irish case 1864, R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 82, 89, pe Deasy, Hughes, Fitzgerald, BB., Fitzgerald an Keogh, JJ., against Hayes, O'Brien, and Bal JJ.

[10] The question arises, it will be seen, whe the statutory caution has been omitted, and thu the confession is not receivable under the statute this was the case in R. v. Sansome, supra, th decision being as above; the same opinion wa expressed by the majority in R. v. Johnston supra; a subsequent English ruling confirm the result: 1856, R. v. Stripp, 7 Cox Cr. 9 (interpolated remarks, made before evidenc ended). It may be added that under the statut it has been held that the omission of the secon caution does not exclude the confession: 1850 R. v. Sansome, 4 Cox Cr. 207; 1850, R. v Bond, ib. 231, 241, Alderson, B.; 1867, R. v Kalabeen, 1 Br. C. pt. I, 1: 1878, R. v. Soncl 17 N. Br. 611 (statement before the magistrate admitted, though no caution was given; R. v Sansome followed).

[11] 1854, R. v. Berriman, 6 Cox Cr. 388 Erle, J.; 1863, R. v. Mick, 3 F. & F. 822, Mei lor, J., semble. In the Irish case this view wa repudiated by the majority: 1864, R. v. Johns ton, 15 Ir. C. L. 82, per Deasy, Hughes, and Fitzgerald, BB., and Fitzgerald and Keogh, JJ. against Lefroy, C. J., Pigot, C. B., O'Brien and Ball, JJ.

the examinations of the witnesses, but not of the accused, were to be upon oath. This was construed (and not improperly) as a practical prohibition against putting an oath to the accused.[1] It might well follow that, if an oath was put, his examination under it should not be received; and as a matter of practice such an examination was always rejected.[2] But the reason was, not that there was anything fatal in the oath as such (as will be seen in the next section), but simply that the statute forbade the administration of the oath, and by implication prevented the admission of statements obtained in the way thus specifically forbidden. It was thus not the oath, but the specific statutory illegality of its application, that prevented the admission; for there was no method of enforcing the prohibition except by rejecting the statement so obtained.[3] This it is essential to keep in mind; for in the controversy (dealt with in the next section) which arose as to the use of a mere witness' statements on oath, the fact that the statements of an accused person before a magistrate were admissible, if mere unsworn statements of the ordinary sort (as noted in § 848), but inadmissible if sworn, seemed to many to furnish a strong analogy, and led them to the deduction that it was the oath as such which produced the difference of results.[4] It was not, in truth; but this misleading circumstance undoubtedly helped to create the opinion (i. e. adverse to receiving witness' statements) which for a time threatened to prevail.

§ 850. English Practice: (4) Confessions by a Witness upon Oath. This

[1] 1767, Buller, Trials at Nisi Prius, 242: "But the examination of the prisoner shall be without oath, and of the others upon oath." This passage is often cited for the statement that an examination of the accused on oath is inadmissible; but that is not its purport.

[2] 1817, R. v. Wilson, Holt N. P. 597, Richards, C. B (statement on oath as accused before a magistrate); 1830, R. v. Haworth, 4 C. & P. 256, Parke, J., semble (examination on oath as accused before magistrate); 1831, R. v. Webb, Ib. 564, Garrow, B. (examination on oath as accused before magistrate, excluded); 1833, R. v. Tubby, 5 id. 530, Vaughan, B. (same); 1833, R. v. Lewis, 6 id. 162, Gurney, B., semble (same); 1835, R. v. Rivers, 7 id. 177, Park, J. (same); 1838, R. v. Wheeley, 8 id. 250, Alderson, B. (same); 1838, R. v. Wheater, 2 Moody Cr. C. 45, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 157, semble (same); 1842, Joy, Confessions, 62. There are few decisions, simply because the inadmissibility was conceded.

[3] That this was the reason is clearly shown by the language of Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering the judgment of the Court (Coleridge, J., dissenting on another ground) in R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47 (1856): "The first [objection] is that the examination of the defendant was taken after making a declaration tantamount to an oath, and that if on oath it would have been inadmissible. But in the case referred to in support of this objection the oath had been improperly administered without authority; and if the examination is taken under an oath administered by proper authority, there is no reason for saying that it is less likely to be true than if it had been without an oath or any similar solemnity." This is the explanation accepted in the following ruling, and in other American cases post, § 852; 1878, Benedict, J., in U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 387: "I am aware that statements taken under oath, by committing magistrates of this State, are not admitted in evidence. But the statute of the State forbids the taking of statements under oath by committing magistrates, and by implication the use of such illegal statements as evidence is forbidden." In Wheater's Case, Lord Abinger had gone even further, and thought even such a statement admissible on principle; but his language at least adds to the proof that it was the illegality, and not the oath, which excluded: 1838, R. v. Wheater, 2 Moody Cr. C. 45, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 157, before all the judges, except Park, J., and Gurney, B.; Mr. Starkie, for the prosecution, conceded that "a prisoner's examination taken on oath is inadmissible"; and Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "I understand, if a prisoner's examination be on oath it shall not be received in evidence, without reference to a duress or threat; I see no reason for it; in principle, the answer may be quite voluntary"; the other judges expressed no opinion.

[4] Mr. Starkie's language may serve as a specimen of the misunderstanding which grew up about this rule: 1824, Starkie, Evid. II, 38: "The prisoner is not to be examined upon oath, for this would be a species of duress, and a violation of the maxim that no one is bound to criminate himself."

case presents the most difficult situation of the four, because it inv not only the effect of the oath as involving compulsion, but also the sity of distinguishing the different bearings of compulsion as disapprov confession-law and of compulsion as opprobrious to the privilege a self-crimination. That conflicting and confused views were from ti time put forth is not unnatural.

Remembering the results already reached — that, at common law (p cally unquestioned until the 1800s and repeatedly maintained durin first half of the 1800s), neither the fact of custody nor the fact of magis examination in custody and without caution excluded a confession, and the exclusion of a sworn examination was due solely to the statutory bition, — it is natural enough to find the judges, at the opening o century, treating the confessions of a witness upon oath as not in them objectionable. Down to 1816 we find no exclusion. Between that tim 1840 occurs a long and tangled series of rulings, representing conf views and furnishing a fruitful source of later misunderstanding.[1] C

[1] 1803, Collett v. Lord Keith, 4 Esp. 212, Le Blanc, J. (defendant a witness in a former cause; objected to as not voluntary; admitted); 1806, R. v. Walker, 6 C. & P. 162, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (affidavit in Ecclesiastical Court; admitted); 1807, Smith v. Beadnall, 1 Camp. 30, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners, upon questions, without caution or counsel, but without objection by him; admitted; he "is like any other witness called to give evidence by virtue of a subpœna; he speaks at the peril of the examination being turned against himself"); here the privilege of self-crimination did not exclude the use of the answer, because no claim was made for it); 1814, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, 4 id. 10, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners; "if he was imposed upon when he signed it, or was under duress, he will not be bound by it," or if the examination was not lawful; but here it was assumed to be lawfully taken); 1816, R. v. Smith, 1 Stark. N. P. 242, Le Blanc, J. (examination on oath as witness before magistrate; rejected because on oath); 1818, R. v. Merceron, 2 id. 366, Abbott, J. (examination as witness before Commons Committee; objected to as therefore not voluntary, but admitted; afterwards said by Abbott, J., in 1 Moo. Cr. C. 203, not to have been taken on oath, and so have been admitted for that reason only; the Commons afterward disapproved of the ruling in a Resolution quoted in 2 C. & K. 483, note); 1828, Tucker v. Barrow, 7 B. & C. 624, Littledale, J. (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners; "I am disposed to say that an admission obtained under compulsory examination is not evidence of an account stated"); 1828, Robson v. Alexander, 1 Moo. & P. 448, Common Pleas (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners, without caution; claimed to have been taken in excess of authority; admitted; Lord Ellenborough's language in Stockfleth v. DeTastet adopted); 1830, R. v. Haworth, 4 C. & P. 255, Parke, J. (examination as witness for prosecution before magistrate; admitted; "he might as a witness have chosen to answer any questions which might have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge, and not having done so, his deposition is evidence against him"); ante 1830, Anon., note to reporter, ib., note, Parke, J. (examination as witness, before suspicion, by coroner; rejected); 1833, R. v. Tubby, 5 id. 530, Vaughan, B. (statement upon oath as witness, not suspected, admitted, "as no suspicion attached to the witness at the time; the question is, Is it the statement of a prisoner upon oath? Clearly it is not, for he was not a prisoner at the time when he made it"); 1833, R. v. Lewis, 6 id. 161, Gurney, B. (examination as witness by magistrate, not suspicion, but witness committed at end of examination; Tubby's Case approved, but being taken "at the same time as all the depositions on which she was committed, on the very same day on which she was committed, I think it is not receivable; I think this examination was perfectly voluntary"); 1833, R. v. Davis, ib. 178, Gurney, B. (examination as witness before magistrate concluded; "if, after having been a witness, make her a prisoner, nothing of what was said can be admitted as evidence"); 183 Britton, 1 Moo & R. 297, Patteson and son, JJ. (balance-sheet of bankrupt proceedings offered to prove the pet creditor's debt on an indictment for co effects, etc.; objected to as having bee on oath; excluded for other reasons, J., explaining in 1 Moo. Cr. C. 51, above objection was not approved b 1838, R. v. Wheeley, 8 C. & P. 250, A B (examination before coroner, as a but under arrest; excluded); 1839, R. 9 id. 84, Williams, J. (examination as before coroner, but under arrest; on W Case being cited, "since that, there ha reaction in opinion, if I may be allo things, however, appear definitely enough, upon a careful examination in chronological order.

(1) In a great number of the excluding rulings, i. e. those cases where the witness had been examined before a coroner while in custody or under suspicion, the simple reason for the exclusion was that the witness' position was thought to be assimilated to that of an accused person, and thus the case came within the statutory prohibition (treated in the preceding section) against examinations of accused persons taken under oath.[2] It was not the oath, but the statutory prohibition, that excluded them. These rulings were the supposed foundation of the Selden theory of mental agitation (described ante, § 845); but it will easily be seen, in the light of the law of the times, how far these judges were from proceeding upon any such far-fetched and unprecedented theory. It has no foundation whatever in these rulings; and the circumstance of suspicion or of custody was material in their minds merely as bringing the person within the statutory prohibition, and not as producing mental disturbance; as is also seen from the fact that these same judges were accepting at the same time the confessions of persons in custody or on examination without oath before a magistrate (ante, §§ 847, 848). The Selden theory, then (the third of the spurious forms, described ante, § 845), has no support in the extremest rulings of this period.

(2) It is clear, secondly, that the second spurious form of theory (described ante, § 844) had not then appeared at all; it is distinctly a modern notion, and is applied peculiarly to the case of an accused person questioned in custody.

(3) It appears, thirdly, that the first spurious form of test (described ante, § 843, as the "common form") had made its appearance and gained some headway. The theory of this test — so far as any was offered — was that the oath involved a compulsion, and a compulsory disclosure was inadmissible. Now (a) this theory, in its broadest and most sweeping form, regards the oath as necessarily involving a compulsion, and ignores the choice which the witness has to use his privilege and decline to answer; by this theory, the mere fact of the administration of the oath, in spite of the giving of a caution, excludes his statements.[3] But (b) in this form it was disowned by the greater number of judges in these rulings;[4] for, as was pointed out, the witness had a choice between disclosing and keeping silent; in the words of expression"; admitted); 1840, same case, postponed, ib. 238, before Gurney, B. ("I am not aware of any instance in which an examination on oath before a coroner or a magistrate has been admitted as evidence by the person making it; I have known depositions before magistrates, made by prisoners on oath, and they have been uniformly rejected"; after the nisi prius ruling in Wheater's Case, post, he admitted its conflict, but still excluded the evidence).

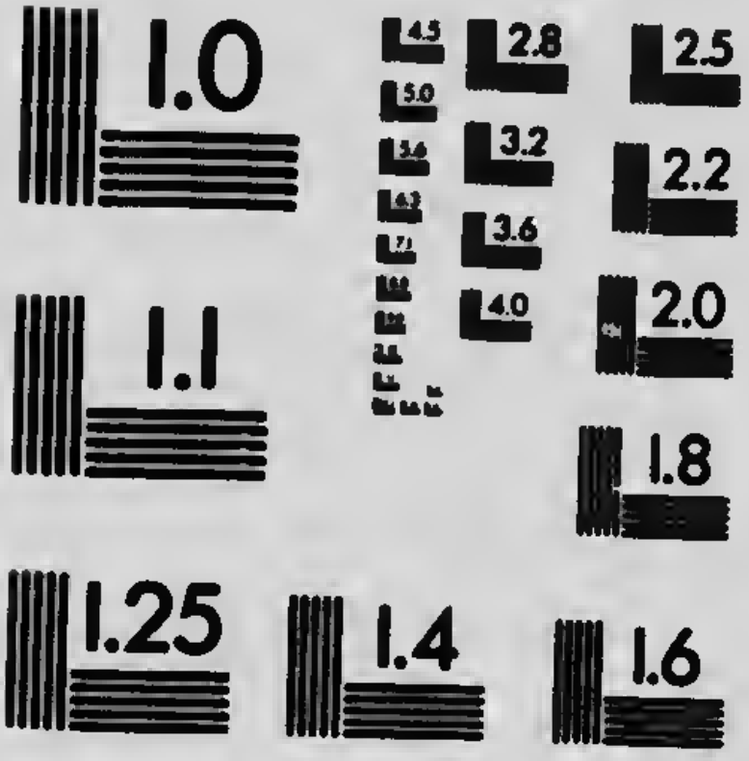
[2] Such is the explanation of the following cases: Lewis', Davis', Wheeley's, and perhaps Owen's before Gurney, B. In Tuhby's Case and Owen's Case before Williams, J., the admission amounted to saying that the prohibition applied strictly to persons then charged as accused, and to no others.

[3] Such seems to be the notion in the following cases of the preceding list: Smith's (introducing the doctrine), Mercerón's, Tucker v. Barrow, Anon., and perhaps Owen's before Gurney, B.; see its theory fully stated in the quotation from Jackson v. State, ante, § 843.

[4] Such were the following cases: Collett v. Keith, Walker's, Smith v. Beadnall, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, Robson v. Alexander, Haworth's, Tubby's, Britton's, and Owen's before Williams, J.

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

Parke, J., "he might as a witness have objected to answer any questions which might have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge; and not having done so," there was no compulsion. But the significance of this answer (b) is that it accepts the principle of (a), but denies the propriety of its application; i. e., it concedes that an answer actually compelled from the witness would be inadmissible, but it denies that there is in truth any compulsion in such cases. Thus, of course, this theory (more liberal though it is than the first) contains within itself the germ of a further difference of opinion; i. e. (b') one attitude prefers, as the test of compulsion, to ask whether there was de facto in the specific case a feeling of compulsion, — in other words, to take the subjective standard of the witness; while (b'') the other prefers, as its test, to ask whether the law actually used compulsion, — in other words, to take an objective or external standard. The practical effect of the former attitude is seen in rulings which hold that unless the witness appears clearly to have known of his privilege he must be supposed to have thought himself compelled to answer;[5] while the practical effect of the latter attitude is seen in rulings which hold that his answer will be supposed to be voluntary unless it clearly appears that he was compelled to answer after a refusal under claim of privilege.[6] Now, reverting to the English rulings of Parke, J., and others just mentioned, it is clear that, so far as any of them go upon this principle (b) at all, they adopt the more liberal form just described as (b''). Thus, in none of them does it appear that a caution was given or that the witness was otherwise informed of his rights, while in Smith v. Beadnall, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, and R. v. Haworth it clearly appears that the Court thought that he should have expressly claimed and been refused his right in order to make the answer really compulsory.[7]

(4) The majority of these rulings, then, in this period, at least repudiate the principle (a) and adopt the more liberal one (b''). But a little reflection will show that they were not impossibly proceeding upon a still more liberal principle, which may be designated as (c), — in short, the orthodox one, already described (ante, § 842). This principle is that a compelled confession is not necessarily and ipso facto a false one, and that therefore, in the absence of any threat or promise tending to produce an untruth, the mere fact that the answer was compelled — i. e. in spite of his express refusal and wish not to answer — does not exclude it. Now it is impossible to tell, in these cases just dealt with (Stockfleth v. De Tastet, Britton's, Haworth's, and the others

[5] This again offers further opportunity for distinctions; for some Courts are satisfied with nothing short of a caution from the judge, while others are satisfied if the witness was warned or presumably warned by counsel, — a distinction illustrated in the American cases post.

[6] In other words, the witness' ignorance of his choice either will not be assumed or will be treated as his own loss, — an attitude illustrated in State v. Vaigneur, quoted ante, § 843, note.

[7] This was treated by Mr. Joy as the better and prevailing principle of his time: 1842, Joy, Confessions, 62: "A statement, not compulsory, made by a party not at the time a prisoner under a criminal charge, is admissible in evidence against him, although it is made upon oath. There are conflicting opinions of judges at nisi prius on this point, but the proposition appears to be established by high authority. The principle seems to be that the party in his capacity as witness might refuse to answer any question that has a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge; any statement, therefore, which he makes is a free and voluntary statement and is receivable in evidence."

in that list), whether they proceed on this principle (c) or on the preceding one (b″); and the reason for this ambiguity is an important one; it is that, though it was conceded that answers ordered in spite of a claim of privilege against self-crimination would have been inadmissible, the violation of the privilege would be a sufficient ground for their rejection. An answer ordered in spite of a legitimate claim of privilege is rejected because that is the significance of the privilege, which otherwise would amount to nothing;[8] and this would amply suffice to justify such an exclusion without any reference to the law about confessions. It is thus obvious that, when we are trying to discover the principle on which the judges acted in such cases, there is just one situation which will inevitably disclose it, — one situation in which no lawful privilege against self-crimination is violated, and in which, therefore, if a confession is ordered after an expressed desire not to answer, the exclusion of that answer must mean the adoption of the confession-principle (b) above, while the admission of the answer must mean the rejection of that confession-principle and the adoption of the principle (c). That situation occurs when the privilege against self-crimination is abolished by the Legislature (as it may be in England) for a certain class of cases, and a witness is thus no longer entitled to refuse to answer; if then he is ordered, after protest, to answer a question involving an avowal of guilt, and that answer is offered against him in a subsequent case, a question is squarely presented which necessarily involves the adoption of either one or the other of the above principles for such confessions. But that peculiar situation had not at this time presented itself; and that is the significance of this period and this series of rulings; some things had apparently been settled — for instance, that principle (b) would prevail against principle (a), — but the important question whether principle (c) — i. e. the orthodox theory of confessions — should prevail over both the others had not been answered.

Nor did a clear answer come for nearly twenty years. The first opportunity had presented itself in 1838, in Wheater's Case;[9] here the argument of counsel presented the question squarely enough; but, as no opinion was [8] 1856, R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47, before Campbell, L. C. J., and four others ("Where evidence is unlawfully obtained, and the witness objects, no doubt it cannot be admitted"); 1873, R. v. Coote, 12 Cox Cr. 557, 563 ("this exception depends upon the principle nemo tenetur seipsum accusare"); post, § 2270.

[9] 1838, R. v. Wheater, 2 Moo. Cr. C. 45, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 157, before all the judges except Park, J., and Gurney, B. (an examination before bankruptcy commissioners as to certain bills of exchange, after the committing magistrate had refused to hold him on a charge of forging them; the counsel had informed him of his privilege, and where he claimed it, an answer was not forced; other objections were overruled, and he was compelled to answer in those cases; Dundas, for the accused: "The evidence was inadmissible, inasmuch as it was a compulsory answer upon oath. . . . When therefore it is recollected that the prisoner himself considered that he was compelled to answer, and that his objections, however erroneous they might have been, had been overruled, can it be said that his examination was voluntary? It is submitted that he was under duress, his mind disturbed by the extraordinary situation in which he found himself placed, and called on in the midst of these trying circumstances to weigh and consider the nature of each question and the consequences of his answers; and if so, the law cannot estimate the exact degree of influence of the duress upon the human mind. . . . I submit, therefore, on these grounds, — first, that the examination was in its nature compulsory, and likely to operate so as to disturb the mind of the prisoner; and, secondly, that it was an examination upon oath, — that the evidence was inadmissible." "The judges present were all of opinion that the evidence was properly received, and the conviction was good, except Lord Abinger, C. B., and Littledale, J.").

published, the exact principle of the decision remained undisclosed. One thing is clear from it, that the Selden theory of mental agitation (ante, § 845; here advanced by the counsel Dundas) was again and permanently repudiated for England; but, though we may well infer that the principle (c), supra, was the controlling reason, yet principle (b'') would suffice on the facts to account for the admission, since the specific answers accepted had not been objected to on the score of privilege, i. e. as the witness had not chosen to refuse when he might have done so, the answers must be taken to have been voluntary. The next opportunity offered in 1847, in Garbett's Case;[10] but here the answer was obtained by an unlawful violation of privilege, and that alone would suffice to exclude it, and seems to have been the reason for exclusion; the only indication to the contrary being the use of the ambiguous word "compulsion" in the reporter's brief statement of the opinion. A third opportunity seemed to present itself in R. v. Sloggett, in 1856,[11] but here, too, the important question was not settled, since the witness (it was held) might have refused to answer, and, since he did not, was treated as acting voluntarily. But the ruling at least enforces the principle (b'') in its most liberal extent.

Meantime, in the same year, but by different judges (except one), the important question was being decided. In R. v. Scott[12] there was the fullest acceptance[13] of the principle (c) as the controlling and orthodox principle.

[10] 1847, R. v. Carbett, 2 C. & K. 474, 1 Den. Cr. C. 262, 2 Cox Cr. 448, before the fifteen judges (examination as witness in a civil suit, the Court having told him, after his declining to answer, that he must answer; Chambers, for the defence, argued that "in the present case, the impression on the mind of the witness was that he must answer, and that after trying to evade the questions and to exert his privilege, and finding both hopeless, he made the confession" under compulsion; Martin, for the prosecution, was asked by Parke, B.: "If a judge was clearly wrong, — as, if he said to a witness, 'Did you commit that murder?' and added, 'I will commit you if you do not answer,' and the witness then confessed it, — would that confession be afterwards receivable?" and answered: "I should say it would. . . . I submit that if the witness does answer, there is no rule to exclude what he says from being evidence afterwards"; nine of the judges were for excluding the evidence on the ground that, where a witness is obliged to answer, notwithstanding a lawful claim of privilege, "what he says must be considered to have been obtained by compulsion"; and six were for receiving it, on various grounds unspecified). Two other individual rulings had intervened between this and Wheater's Case; but these are explainable also on principle (b'') and are not conclusive for principle (c): 1841, R. v. Sandys, C. & Mar. 345, Erskine, J. (examination as witness before coroner; received, and question reserved, but never decided); 1844, R. v. Goldshede, 1 C. & K. 657, Lord Denman, C. J. (answer in Chancery on oath as defendant; objected to as compulsory and upon oath; both arguments rejected and the answer received).

[11] 1856, R. v. Sloggett, 7 Cox Cr. 139, before Jervis, C. J., Coleridge, J., Cresswell and Erle, JJ., and Martin, B. (examination as bankrupt on oath before bankruptcy commissioners, without claim of privilege against incrimination; at a certain stage he was told to consider himself in custody, and the examination up to that point was offered; whether the privilege was destroyed by the Bankruptcy Act, and compulsion to answer would therefore have been lawful in any case, was disputed by counsel; the judges unanimously held that the matters were covered by the privilege and hence his answers made without claim of privilege were voluntary and admissible; but whether, if the matters had not been privileged and he had been lawfully compelled after objection to answer, the answers would be inadmissible as not voluntary, was left undetermined, and was the question in the ensuing case of R. v. Scott).

[12] 1856, R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47, before Lord Campbell, C. J., Alderson, Coleridge, Willes, and Bramwell, JJ. (examination as bankrupt before Bankruptcy Court; the magistrate secured answers by threatening to commit (as he had a right to do under the Bankruptcy Act) for failing to answer completely; but no claim of privilege was made; the Act had abrogated the privilege for bankrupt's examinations; admitted).

[13] It is true that Coleridge, J., dissented, but this was on the ground (denied by the others) that the Bankruptcy Act had not abrogated the privilege against self-incrimination, and hence

It is true that as no claim of privilege was in fact made by the witness, the decision might have been reached without this; but if we are looking for the reasons regarded by judges as indicating the law and actually controlling their rulings, a full and deliberate expression of those reasons must be the highest evidence, even though the ruling might by possibility be reached without such an expression.[14] The language is direct and clear:[15]

Campbell, L. C. J. (after declaring that, as for the oath in itself, "there is no reason for saying that it [the answer] is less likely to be true than if it had been without an oath or any similar solemnity"): "The next objection is that the examination was compulsory. It is a trite maxim that the confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing, must be voluntary; but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, because under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say what is not true, and the supposed confession cannot be safely acted on. Such an objection cannot apply to . . . a lawful examination in the course of a judicial proceeding."

In short, mere compulsion in itself is nothing, so far as any confession-principle is concerned; for that is taken care of by the rule against being compelled to criminate one's self; an objection on that score alone must invoke that privilege, and the question then arises whether that privilege covers the case in hand, — a question which in the opinion above the judges next addressed themselves to, and which they treated as entirely distinct from any confession-question. For a correct understanding of the total separation between the two, and an antidote to the confusing expressions of a few modern English judges,[16] a perusal of this opinion may be recommended.

The result, then, of Scott's and Wheater's Cases in England was: (1) that the Dundas-Selden theory of mental agitation was entirely repudiated; (2) that as between the theories (a) and (b), ante, the former was equally repudiated, and the liberal form of (b') was the only one that could by possibility be maintainable; (3) while by Scott's Case the orthodox theory (c) was given the deliberate sanction of at least one English Court. Since that time (1856) Scott's Case has been repeatedly treated as law in England.[17] the answers were obtained by a violation of the privilege. On the other question, his well-known views leave us no reason to doubt that he agreed with his colleagues.

[15] The case is strengthened by the circumstance (above noted) that the magistrate had threatened to commit the witness (as he might lawfully) if he persisted in his refusal; this was properly explained by Lord Campbell as "merely an explanation of the enactment of the legislature upon the subject."

[16] Quoted more fully ante, § 843.

[16] E.g., ante, § 844

[17] 1859, Skeen's Case, Bell Cr. C. 97, 127, 129 (R. v. Scott treated by the minority of the judges as perhaps not unimpeachable); 1867, R. v. Robinson, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 80, 10 Cox Cr. 467 (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners; no caution and no claim of privilege; the answers were compellable and without privilege; three judges declared R. v. Scott to be the law, and two decided upon other grounds); 1872, R. v. Widdup, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 3, 12 Cox Cr. 557 (same; R. v. Scott followed by all five judges, though the reasons of Kelly, C. B., were perhaps peculiar); 1873, R. v. Coote, 12 Cox Cr. 557 (Privy Council; answers as witness before fire-marshal without caution and without objection, admitted; R. v. Scott followed); 1896, R. v. Erdheim, 2 Q. B. 260, 267 (bankrupt's examination on oath, admissible; following R. v. Scott); 1902, R. v. Pike, 1 K. B. 553 (bankrupt's compulsory "statement of affairs" on oath, held admissible in a prosecution for unlawful appropriation). The indications of its sanction in Ireland are doubtful; 1857, R. v. McHugh, 7 Cox Cr. 483 (information on oath as witness, while under arrest as a joint accused; the magistrate thought that the informant was to turn Crown witness; excluded,

The lessons to be drawn as to our own use of the English precedents are three: (1) that it is impossible to use them indiscriminately and measure them by mere numbers; they mean little apart from the principle controlling the Court or the judge that makes them; (2) that whatever principle is selected should be logically and consistently carried out; and (3) that all the doubts and confusion are of comparatively recent creation, and that the orthodox and settled practice of the early 1800s entertained no doubts upon any of the four classes of situations we have been considering, and treated them as amenable to exactly the same tests as confessions of any other sort, except that a statement on oath as accused before a magistrate was excluded because of the implied statutory prohibition.

§ 851. Rulings in the United States: (1) Confessions made under Arrest. In this country, the orthodox English and Irish doctrine, declining to consider the mere fact of arrest as sufficient to exclude a confession, has been universally accepted.[1] It is to be noted that of course this result could not partly because the informant was not cautioned as an accused); 1866, R. v. Gillis, 11 Id. 69 (statement as witness to magistrate; O'Hagan, J., all the judges agreeing or not dissenting: "I do not consider the fact of their being made on oath would render the informations inadmissible, provided they were made voluntarily and spontaneously").

In Canada, the following authorities are found: Dom. St. 1893, c. 31, § 5 (quoted post, § 2252); 1896, R. v. Douglas, 11 Manit. 401 (deposition of the accused taken as a witness in a civil case in Quebec, admitted); 1901, R. v. Clark, 3 Ont. L. R. 176, 179 (one answering on oath as a witness, without claim of privilege; his answers received; prior cases, before Can. St. 1893, c 31 as amended, now superseded); 1877, R. v. McLean, 17 N. Br. 377, 384 (statements of an insolvent on examination at a creditors' meeting, admitted).

[1] Ala.: 1856, Franklin v. State, 28 Ala. 9; 1875, Sampson v. State, 54 id. 343; 1881, Redd v. State, 68 id. 498; 1881, Spicer v. State, 69 id. 163; 1892, Goodwin v. State, 102 id. 87, 98, 15 So. 571; 1895, Burton v. State, 107 id. 108, 18 So. 284 (a boy of fourteen arrested, kept in jail without counsel; no threats or promises; admitted); 1898, Fuller v. State, 117 id. 36, 23 So. 688; 1902, White v. State, 133 id. 122, 32 So. 139; 1903, Stevens v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 122; Cal.: 1880, People v. Ramirez, 56 Cal. 536 (with or without warrant); 1901, People v. Miller, 135 id. 69, 67 Pac. 12; 1903, People v. Walker, — id. —, 73 Pac. 831; Del.: 1898, State v. Trusty, 1 Pen. 319, 40 Atl. 766; Fla.: 1898, Green v. State, 40 Fla. 191, 23 So. 851 (in prison and to an officer); Ga.: 1896, Nobles v. State, 98 Ga. 73, 26 S. E. 64; 1902, Price v. State, 114 id. 855, 40 S. E. 1015; Ida.: 1898, State v. Davis, 6 Ida. 159, 53 Pac. 678: Ind.: 1876, Harding v. State, 54 Ind. 366; 1893, Walker v. State, 136 id. 663, 668, 36 N. E. 356; Ia.: 1876, State v. Fortner, 43 Ia. 495 (in jail); 1900, State v. Petersen, 110 id. 647, 82 N. W. 329; 1900, State v. Penney, 113 Id. 691, 84 N. W. 509; 1901, State v. Storms, ib. 385, 85 N. W. 610; La.: State v. Nelson, 3 La. An. 499; 1893, State v. Nash, 45 Id. 974, 13 So. 265; 1893, State v. Chambers, ib. 36, 37, 11 So. 944 (statements in prison to trial judge, after warning, admitted); 1895, State v. Johnson, 47 Id. 1225, 17 So. 789; 1895, State v. Jones, Ib. 1524, 18 So. 515 (to a jailer); 1898, State v. Berry, 50 Id. 1309, 24 So. 329; 1902, State v. Edwards, 106 La. 674, 31 So. 308; 1903, State v. Robertson, 111 id. —, 35 So. 375; Md.: 1899, Rogers v. State, 89 Md. 424, 43 Atl. 922; 1900, Young v. State, 90 id. 579, 45 Atl. 531; Mass.: 1871, Com. v. Cnffee, 108 Mass. 287 (where officers examined the accused in prison at night for two hours, but no threatening language was used); 1875, Com. v. Mitchell, 117 id. 432; 1876, Com. v. Smith, 119 id. 311; 1895, Com. v. Preece, 140 id. 276, 5 N. E. 494 (young boys); 1896, Com. v. Robinson, 165 Id. 426, 43 N. E. 121 (and that no caution was given is immaterial); 1897, Com. v. Bond, 170 id. 41, 48 N. E. 756 (confession to a fire-marshal when under arrest, held voluntary on the facts); 1898, Com. v. Williams, 171 id. 461, 50 N. E. 1035; 1902, Com. v. Devaney, 182 id. 33, 64 N. E. 402; Mich.: 1895, People v. Warner, 104 Mich. 337, 62 N. W. 405; Mo.: 1874, State v. Carlisle, 57 Mo. 104; 1893, State v. Moore, 117 id. 395, 399, 402, 22 S. W. 1086; 1895, State v. Murray, 126 id. 611, 29 S. W. 700; 1897, State v. McClain, 137 id. 307, 38 S. W. 906; 1899, State v. Shackelford, 148 Id. 493, 50 S. W. 105; 1903, State v. Jones, 171 id. 401, 71 S. W. 680; Nebr.: 1901, George v. State, 62 Nebr. 669, 85 N. W. 840; 1901, Reinoehl v. State, 62 id. 619, 87 N. W. 355; 1902, Meyer v. Menter, 63 id. 427, 88 N. W. 662 (to a penitentiary warden); N. J.: 1901, State v. Hill, 67 N. J. L. 626, 47 Atl. 814; 1902, State v. Young, 67 id. 223, 51 Atl. 939; 1902, State v. Hernia, 68 Id. 299, 53 Atl. 85; N. M.: 1892, Faulkner v. Terr., 6 N. M. 464, 30 Pac. 905; N. Y.: 1857, People v. Rogers, 18 N. Y. 13; 1875, Murphy v. People, 63 id. 597 (to an officer while in custody, upon questions asked); 1880, Balbo, People, 80 Id. 496 (even an unlawful arrest here an arrest made in another State without be reached under a strict and logical application of the Selden theory of mental agitation (and such confessions were therefore expressly declared inadmissible by him in the McMahon Case, post, and by the dissenting Irish judges in Johnston's Case, ante); but to-day that theory is nowhere allowed to have this natural and consistent effect.

§ 852. Same: (2), (3), and (4); Confessions made as Accused before a Magistrate, with or without Oath, or as a Witness on the Stand. Owing to the casual adoption of one and then another of the various competing principles, it cannot be said that the rulings in this country represent any marked attitude. On the whole, they are liberal in spirit; and the occasional legislation has also been liberal.[1] The rulings in New York are of warrant); 1880, Cox v. People, ib. 515 (to a police-officer, while in custody); 1883, People v. McGlolu, 91 id. 242, 245; 1899, People v. Kennedy, 159 id. 346, 54 N. E. 51; 1900, People v. Meyer, 162 id. 357, 56 N. E. 758; 1903, People v. Egnor, 175 id. 419, 67 N. E. 906; N. C.: 1902, State v. Flemming, 130 N. C. 688, 41 S. E. 549; Or.: 1901, State v. McDaniel, 39 Or. 161, 65 Pac. 520; Pa.: 1846, Com. v. Mosler, 4 Pa. St. 264; 1899, Com. v. Eagan, 190 id. 10, 42 Atl. 374 (to a district-attorney); 1899, Com. v. Shew, ib. 23, 42 Atl. 377 (same); R. I.: 1903, State v. Nagle, — R. I. —, 54 Atl. 1063; S. C.: State v. Cook, 15 Rich. L. 29; 1900, McGhee v. Wells, 57 S. C. 280, 35 S. E. 529; U. S.: 1878, U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatch. 386, Benedict, J.; 1895, Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 55, 15 Sup. 273 (in Irons); 1896, Pierce v. U. S., 160 id. 355, 16 Sup. 321; 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 id. 613, 16 Sup. 895; Vt.: 1895, State v. Gorham, 67 Vt. 365, 31 Atl. 845 (under arrest, without counsel, admitted); 1895 State v. Bradley, ib. 465, 32 Atl. 238; Va.: 1878, Wolf's Case, 30 Gratt. 836, semble; Wash.: 1893, State v. Munson, 7 Wash. 239, 240, 34 Pac. 932; Wis.: 1897, Connors v. State, 95 Wis. 77, 69 N. W. 981.

In Texas, an exceptional rule prevails that a caution must have been given: C. Cr. P. 1895, § 790 (quoted ante, § 831); 1898, Unsell v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 330, 45 S. W. 1022 (admissible only if cautioned according to statute; warning that it could be used for him, improper); 1898, Barth v. State, ib. 381, 46 S. W. 228 (confession must be within such time after caution that confession was made under its recollection); 1899, Gallaher v. State, 40 id. 296, 50 S. W. 388; 1899, Pryor v. State, 40 id. 643, 51 S. W. 375; 1902, McColloh v. State, — id. —, 69 S. W. 141 (rule applied to letters of the accused); 1903, Connell v. State, — id. —, 75 S. W. 512 (the test of arrest is subjective; the confession of one who is actually detained, yet is not aware of it, is admissible); 1903, Glover v. State, — id. —, 76 S. W. 465 (that the statements would be used "for or against him," held not a sufficient warning).

[1] Where no oath is mentioned, it is understood that the statement was not on oath. The term "magistrate" means the committing judge, not including the coroner. Where "the statute" is mentioned, the reference is to the local statute regulating the mode of examining an accused person before the committing judge: the citations of these statutes post, § 1326, will usually suffice to find them: New York: 1854, Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13 (examination as witness before coroner, not under suspicion or charge, but not cautioned; admitted; Parker, J.: "I do not see how, upon principle, the evidence of a witness, not in custody and not charged with crime, taken either on a coroner's inquest or before a committing magistrate, could be rejected. It ought not to be excluded on the ground that it was taken upon oath. The evidence is certainly none the less reliable because taken under the solemnity of an oath. . . . Nor can the exclusion of the evidence depend on the question whether there was any suspicion of the guilt of the witness lurking in the heart of any person at the time the testimony was taken; that would be the most dangerous of all tests, as well because of the readiness with which proof of such suspicion might be secured, as of the impossibility of refuting it. . . . The witness may refuse to answer, and his answers are to be deemed voluntary unless he is compelled to answer after having declined to do so; in the latter case only will they be deemed compulsory and excluded"; Selden, J. (language already quoted, ante, § 845) dissented solely on the ground that the testimony was given under suspicion; Gardiner, C. J., thought that on the facts the examination had been purely in the character of a witness, but would have excluded his oath as unlawful, had he been substantially an accused person; the majority conceded that an examination on oath as accused before a magistrate would have been inadmissible, because the putting an oath to the accused was forbidden by the statute); 1857, People v. McMahon, 15 id. 384 (the Court's membership having almost entirely changed; examination as witness before coroner, but in custody without warrant, charged as the offender, rejected; Selden, J.: "[The word 'voluntary' in judicial examinations means] proceeding from the spontaneous suggestion of the party's own mind, free from the influence of any disturbing cause. . . . It is considered that a judicial oath, administered when the mind is disturbed and agitated by a criminal charge, may have that effect [of preventing free and voluntary mental action], and hence the exclusion. . . . [Hence, such an ex-

first importance, because the comparatively early promulgation there of the Selden theory in the Hendrickson and McMahon Cases, and its repudiation amination under oath is not to be rejected] unless that oath was administered in the course of some judicial inquiry in regard to the crime itself for which the prisoner is on trial; . . . (while it is also necessarily admissible) if at the time it was made the prisoner was not himself resting under any charge or suspicion of having committed the crime"; as for examinations of accused persons on oath, Selden, J., for the Court, adopts the theory "that the evidence is too uncertain to be safely relied upon," and rejects the theory that "a mere arbitrary rule, which prohibits magistrates from taking the examination of prisoners charged with crime upon oath, has been violated"); 1869, Teachout v. People, 41 id. 7 (examination as witness before coroner, while under suspicion and after notice of probable arrest; a caution being given by the coroner, held by the majority, per Woodruff, J., that the single fact that the witness was under suspicion was not sufficient to exclude the testimony, expressly repudiating the reasoning of McMahon's Case and the dictum therein as to the effect of suspicion (language quoted ante, § 845), but holding that "declarations made under the influence of a charge of guilt, under actual arrest or under examination with such a charge impending, should be excluded, except where a careful obedience to the statutory precautions is observed"; thus adopting the English theory of statutory prohibition as the basis of that exclusion, though taking a liberal view of the cases coming within its application, like the rulings ante in § 850; Grover and Lott, JJ., dissenting, following McMahon's Case and its theory); 1878, Abbott v. People, 75 id. 602 (schedules put in by the debtor in bankruptcy proceedings; admitted); C. Cr. P. 1881, § 395 (quoted ante, § 831); 1883, People v. McGloin, 91 id. 242 (examination under oath before a coroner while under arrest charged with the crime in question, the coroner having been summoned to the police station and not acting officially; the conflicting theories of the preceding rulings were mentioned, and it was held (1) that the fact of the oath having been administered was not illegal so as to exclude, since only examinations taken under the statute could be so objected to, and this was not under it; and (2) that the examination was not compulsory, the theory of McMahon's Case being thus impliedly repudiated; (3) that under the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1881, § 395, "a confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, can be given in evidence against him, unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats, or unless made upon a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefor," the confession was equally admissible); 1886, People v. Mondon, 103 id. 213, 8 N. E. 496 (examination on oath before coroner, under arrest without a warrant, on suspicion of the crime in question, without counsel, not cautioned; excluded on the authority of McMahon's Case, and the Code provision supra held (overturning McGloin's Case) "not to apply to any but voluntary confessions, nor to change the statutory rules relating to the examination of prisoners charged with crime"; "the mere fact that at the time of his examination he was aware that a crime was suspected, and that he was suspected of being the criminal, will not prevent his being regarded as a mere witness," and his testimony may be used; but "if he is in custody as the supposed criminal, he is not regarded merely as a witness, but as a party accused," and the examination is excluded, unless in conformity with the statute as to preliminary examinations); 1890, People v. Chapleau, 121 id. 266, 24 N. E. 469 (examination at his own request, while in custody, before the coroner, after a caution; the preceding cases were reviewed and treated as harmonious (1), and the examination admitted as being "in all respects and however viewed, the voluntary and uninfluenced statements of the individual"; no solution of the difficulties being offered, except, perhaps, that the voluntariness of the confession, in view of "their nature and the circumstances under which made," is to be the final test in such case); 1892, People v. Wright, 136 id. 625, 632, 32 N. E. 629 (examination before coroner, received; following the Chapleau Case); 1901, People v. Molineux, 168 id. 264, 61 N. E. 286 (testimony given at an inquest as witness under subpœna, by one suspected but not arrested or charged, held admissible; People v. Chapleau approved). As a result of this series of decisions it may be said: (1) that the theory of statutory prohibition as the reason for excluding the examination of accused persons on oath has been clearly recognized in all the cases except McMahon's; (2) that apart from this nothing has been clearly settled; (3) that by the Mondon decision a coach and four was driven through the Penal Code, which had been intended to settle the controversy, and was so taken in the McGloin Case, and which (if properly and naturally interpreted) accepts fully the orthodox principle of Scott's Case in England; (4) that it is impossible to foretell the next decision, not merely because the Court has changed its principles so often, but (more than all) because in the later cases it ignores the irreconcilable conflict in the precedents and treats them as harmonious, — a complaisant attitude which is found in no other Court dealing with them; Alabama: 1852, Seaborn v. State, 20 Ala. 15, 17 (examination as accused before magistrate without caution; admitted, because voluntary upon the facts); 1875, Sampson v. State, 54 id. 241, 243 (statement as accused on examination before magistrate, admitted); 1882, Kelly v. State, 72 id. 244 (statement on examination before magistrate, after questioning; inadmissible "unless a prisoner comprehends his rights fully and is informed by the Court" that a refusal to answer is lawful and will not be taken against him; also partly because no questioning by the magistrate was expressly authorized by statute; preceding cases ignored); 1896, Wilson v. State, 110 id. 1, 20 So. 415 (sworn as witness before in the Teachout Case, greatly influenced the discussion in the other jurisdictions, in most of which the controversy is comparatively recent, — a coroner, not charged or arrested, but suspected; excluded, apparently on the theory that the oath involved compulsion); 1899, Jones v. State, 120 Id. 303, 25 So. 204 (testimony as witness before the coroner, not under arrest or suspicion, admitted); 1903, Jones v. State, — Id. —, 34 So. 681 (an admission of an accused made "on the preliminary trial," received); 1901, Angling v. State, — id. — , 34 So. 846 (testimony on the preliminary trial, admitted, as a "judicial confession"); Alaska: C. Cr. P. 1900, § 312 (like Or. Anuot. C. 1892, § 1599); California: 1873, People v. Kelley, 47 Cal. 125 (examination under oath before magistrate as accused; admitted, as voluntary; distinguishing People v. Gibbons, 43 Id. 551 (1872), because under the statute at that time (since changed) such examinations upon oath were unlawful; "if his voluntary, unsworn statement may be proved against him as a confession, his voluntary testimony under oath, given in a proceeding in which he elects and is authorized to testify, ought to stand upon at least as favorable a footing"); 1881, People v. Taylor, 59 id. 650 (examination as accused before coroner, apparently on oath; admitted, since "T. could not have been compelled to testify; . . . the statement having been voluntary, the evidence was admissible, whether made in a judicial proceeding or any other"); 1893, People v. Weiger, 100 id. 352, 357, 34 Pac. 826 (defendant's examination on oath, when cited in his own voluntary proceedings in insolvency, admitted); 1901, People v. Sexton, 132 Id. 37, 64 Pac. 107 (accused's testimony as witness before grand jury, admitted; but here not a confession); 1901, People v. Chrisman, 135 Id. 282, 67 Pac. 136 (defendant's testimony at the preliminary examination, admitted); Colorado: 1894, Torris v. People, 19 Colo. 438, 36 Pac. 153 (affidavits to procure witnesses, voluntarily made by defendant, received); Columbia (District): Comp. St. 1894, c. 20, § 29 (like U. S. Rev. St. § 860); Florida: 1892, Ortiz v. State, 30 Fla. 256, 283, 11 So. 611 (examination as accused on oath at trial by his own offer, admissible); 1895, Jenkins v. State, 35 id. 737, 18 So. 182 (before grand jury; the caution had been given as to his privilege, but he was told he was under suspicion; admitted); 1898, Green v. State, 40 id. 474, 24 So. 537 (plea of guilty before magistrate, after warning, admitted); 1903, McNish v. State, — id. — , 34 So. 219 (plea of guilty before the committing magistrate, without caution, excluded); 1903, Ferrell v. State, ib. — , 34 So. 220 (bigamy; defendant's sworn testimony in a suit by him against the first wife for divorce, admitted); Georgia: 1875, Cicero v. State, 54 Ga. 156 (examination as accused before magistrate; excluded, because the magistrate put questions to get contradictory statements); 1889, Woolfolk v. State, 81 id. 564, 8 S. E. 724 (under arrest as accused before the coroner, but without oath; admitted); 1895, Henderson v. State, 95 id. 326, 22 S. E. 537 (testimony given as a witness without compulsion is admissible); Hawaii: Civil Laws, 1897, § 1427 ("nor shall any confession which is tendered in evidence on any trial be rejected on the ground that it purports to have been made on oath, if proof can be given to the Judge or other presiding officer, that in fact it was not so made"); 1867, R. v. Paakaula, 3 Haw. 30, 37 (plea of guilty before the magistrate, admitted); Illinois: 1869, Austine v. People, 51 Ill. 236, 239 (admission made at the time of pleading as accused before a magistrate, excluded; but on the ground of being induced by a promise to drop the prosecution); Indiana: 1866, Anderson v. State, 26 Ind. 89 (examination as witness in another cause; admitted as voluntary); 1893, Davidson v. State, 135 Id. 254, 260, 34 N. E. 972 (statements "voluntarily" made and signed at inquest as witness, admitted); 1903, Ginn v. State, — id. — , 68 N. E. 294 (confession, when taken before a justice, to one not in authority, admitted); Iowa: 1886, State v. Briggs, 68 Ia. 416, 424, 27 N. W. 358 (plea of guilty on preliminary examination; admitted, even though not told by magistrate of his right to counsel); 1892, State v. Carroll, 85 Ia. 1, 51 N. W. 1159 (testifying before grand jury as witness, while under arrest on the charge; caution by foreman; admitted); 1892, State v. Clifford, 86 Id. 550, 553, 53 N. W. 209 (statute requiring disclosure of testimony before grand jury does not admit an otherwise inadmissible confession there made); 1897, State v. Van Tassel, 103 Id. 6, 72 N. W. 497 (voluntary appearance at the inquest, admitted); Kansas: 1893, State v. Sorton, 52 Kan. 531, 539, 34 Pac. 1036 (preliminary examination as defendant on oath, received); Kentucky: C. Cr. P. 1895, § 64 (witness' statement before committing magistrate not "of itself" to be "evidence for any purpose"); Louisiana: 1873, State v. Garvey, 25 La. An. 191 (examination as witness before coroner, while under arrest on a charge of the crime, but made at his own request; excluded, because made as an accused); 1900, State v. Robinson, 52 id. 616, 27 So. 124 (before coroner as witness; not decided); Maine, 1862, State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 206 (examination as witness on oath before coroner, after knowledge of suspicion, but a caution given; admitted, because the statements were voluntary, "the manifestation of his own free will"; quoted ante, § 843); 1873, State v. Bowe, 62 id. 174 (plea of guilty before the lower Court; admitted, as not appearing to have been obtained "by threats or promises"); Massachusetts: 1838, Faunce v. Gray, 21 Pick. 245 (admissions by an administrator in a civil examination on oath, admitted; the fact that it was made on oath, held immaterial; quoted ante, § 842); 1855, Judd v. Gibbs, 3 Gray 539, 543 (examination of an insolvent before commissioners, admitted; but his oath taken not as a part of the examination, excluded, apparently because it could not be used as against the present parties); 1857, Com. v. King, 8 id. 503 (examination as witness at fire inquest; no caution; admitted; whether caution was essential, was expressly not decided); 1866, Com. v. Lannan, 13 All. 563, 569 (special plea in bar, further testimony, perhaps, to the unnaturalness and heterodoxy (shown also by the early English practice) of any controversy at all. No attempt held bad by the Court below; not admitted, chiefly because drawn by the attorney, and thus inadmissible by statute)]; 1877, Com. v. Reynolds, 122 Mass. 455, 458 (examination as defendant at a former trial of the same charge; admitted, because "they were voluntary . . . and it is immaterial when or where they were made"); 1896, Com. v. Wesley, 140 id. 248, 252 (testimony of the defendant at an inquest, sworn, but not summoned, and warned; admitted, as "appearing to have been made voluntarily, and not under threat or duress or in consequence of any inducement"); 1897, Com. v. Hunton, 168 id. 130, 46 N. E. 404 (testimony before an investigating committee at the City Hall, admitted); Michigan: 1890, People v. Lander, 82 Mich. 109, 46 N. W. 956 (testimony on oath before a grand jury cannot be afterwards used); Mississippi: 1860, Josephine v. State, 39 Miss. 626, 650 (examination as witness on the trial of another person for the same charge; excluded); 1879, Jackson v. State, 56 id. 312 (examination as witness on the trial of another person jointly indicted for the same offence, after a caution; excluded, because the oath itself involves a compulsion); 1883, Farkas v. State, 60 id. 847 (on oath as a witness before the coroner, but under arrest on suspicion; excluded); 1897, Ford v. State, 75 id. 101, 21 So. 524 (a thirteen-year old negro boy, sworn as defendant on a preliminary examination, without caution; excluded); 1898, Powell v. State, — id. —, 23 So. 266 (testimony for the State on a prior trial of a co-defendant, excluded; but testimony on preliminary examination before the magistrate in the present proceedings, semble, admissible); 1899, Steele v. State, 76 id. 387, 24 So. 910 (one voluntarily offering himself as witness before the coroner and before a committing magistrate; his testimony admitted because given voluntarily; whether otherwise for one examined as an accused, not decided); 1903, McMasters v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 302 (voluntary testimony as accused at the first trial, admitted); Missouri: 1859, State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 218, 228 (examination as accused before magistrate, after caution; admitted); 1893, State v. Young, 119 id. 495, 507, 517, 24 S. W. 1038 (ignorant German boy, under suspicion, summoned as witness before coroner, and examined on oath without warning; excluded); 1894, State v. Wisdom, ib. 539, 546, 551, 24 S. W. 1047 (accused under arrest, on oath, before the coroner, but of his own motion; admitted; the fact of oath is immaterial; the test is whether the statement was voluntary); 1895, State v. David, 131 id. 380, 33 S. W. 28 (the witness attended the inquest voluntarily and testified without subpœna; admitted); 1896, State v. Punshon, 133 id. 44, 34 S. W. 25 (accused before the coroner on oath, after caution, but under a promise that the statements would not be used against him; admitted); 1901, State v. Hagan, 164 id. 654, 65 S. W. 249 (testimony before a coroner as witness, apparently held inadmissible); 1903, State v. Jones, 171 id. 401, 71 S. W. 680 (confession under oath at the preliminary trial of another person jointly charged, after warning, admitted); Montana: 1896, State v. O'Brien, 18 Mont. 1, 43 Pac. 1091, 44 Pac. 399 (testimony before coroner, in what capacity does not appear, but without caution; excluded); Nebraska: 1878, Clough v. State, 7 Nebr. 320, 340 (on oath as a witness before the coroner, and not accused; admitted); New Hampshire: 1814, Wood v. Weld, Smith N. H. 367 (answers on oath by the defendant to interrogatories put by an administrator in a Court of Probate on a complaint for concealing the intestate's goods, received in an action between the same parties for money had and received, covering the same concealment of goods; notes of Smith, C. J.: "What hardship is it to be obliged to tell the truth? No means used to produce anything but the truth"); 1863, Carr v. Griffin, 44 N. H. 510 (deposition irregularly taken; not inadmissible as involuntary); New York: see supra, at the beginning of the list; North Carolina: 1846, State v. Broughton, 7 Ired. 96 (examination as witness before grand jury; held inadmissible, if it had involved a confession, as within the spirit of the statutes against imposing oaths on accused persons, "because the statute intended to have the party free to admit or deny his guilt, and the oath deprives him of that freedom"); 1847, State v. Cowan, ib. 239 (examination as accused before a magistrate, without oath, after a caution; admitted, as "free and voluntary," though the magistrate warned him that he would be committed unless he accounted for his possession of the stolen property); 1873, State v. Patterson, 68 N. C. 292 (examination as accused before magistrate, without oath, but after caution, the caution not being as full as the statute prescribed; admitted); 1893, State v. Rogers, 112 id. 874, 876, 17 S. E. 297 (accused on oath at preliminary examination, after warning, admitted; warning need not be in words of statute; shackling of the accused not in itself fatal); 1893, State v. De Graff, 113 id. 688, 693, 18 S. E. 507 (accused on oath before magistrate, after warning, admitted); 1897, State v. Melton, 120 id. 591, 26 S. E. 933 (accused at preliminary examination, after asking to testify and being cautioned; admitted); 1903, State v. Parker, 132 id. 1014, 43 S. E. 830 (examination as accused before the magistrate, under oath contrary to the statute, excluded); 1903, State v. Simpson, — id. —, 45 S. E. 567 (examination of a prosecutor on oath as a witness in another trial, after caution, admitted; examination as accused having counsel, on his own behalf before the magistrate, after specific caution, admitted); Ohio: 1883, Jackson v. State, 39 Oh. St. 37, (as a witness for himself before the magistrate on the charge in question, after being cautioned but insisting on his right to testify; admitted); Oregon: Annot. C. 1892, § 1599 (the statement of a defendant before a committing magistrate made according to statute after caution, etc., competent testimony to be laid before the grand jury, and may be given in evidence against the defendant on the trial"); 1896, State v. Hatch

is worth while to label in detail the exact variety of principle which a given ruling represents, because a comparison of it with the preceding discussion

29 Or. 309, 44 Pac. 584 (defendant before magistrate, without caution; excluded, because by statute, § 1598, the caution is required); 1897, State v. Robinson, 32 id. 43, 48 Pac. 357 (before the grand jury, in what capacity not stated, but voluntary; admitted); 1899, State v. Andrews, 35 id. 388, 58 Pac. 765 (statements by an Indian at examination as accused before magistrate without caution, excluded); Pennsylvania: 1846, Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. St. 269 (examination upon oath as accused before magistrate, without caution, and under threats and promises; excluded, as "a gross outrage upon the accused"); 1857, Williams v. Com., 29 Pa. 102, 105 (examination as witness before coroner, not suspected nor charged; admitted, because "he might have declined to testify," and it thus "was a voluntary statement"); 1890, Com. v. Clark, 130 Id. 641, 650, 18 Atl. 988 (examination on oath before magistrate, but not under the statute, after a caution, while under arrest on the charge; the accused said "he was making it of his own free will"; admitted, as a voluntary statement; the fact of the oath being improperly administered was held immaterial); South Carolina: 1852, State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 395, 402 (examination as witness before coroner, not arrested nor suspected, and not cautioned, but arrested after his testimony; admitted, because he might have refused to answer; quoted ante, § 843); 1879, State v. Branham, 13 S. C. 389 (examination before magistrate as accused, without caution; admitted); 1890, State v. Senn, 32 id. 392, 11 S. E. 292 (on oath as a witness before the coroner, not charged with the crime; excluded by two judges to one); 1891, State v. Merriman, 34 id. 38, 12 S. E. 619, semble (preceding case approved); Tennessee: 1875, Beggarly v. State, 8 Baxt. 521, 525 (examination before magistrate, after caution; admitted, because he was "not so intimidated as to prevent his acting freely"); Texas: C. Cr. P. 1895, § 790 (see quotation ante, § 831); 1874, Alston v. State, 41 Tex. 40 (examination before magistrate on a charge against another person, not arrested and not cautioned, but knowing herself to be suspected; admitted, because voluntary upon the facts); 1894, Bell v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. 163 (former testimony in a civil case, admitted); 1901, Wisdom v. State, 42 Id. 579, 61 S. W. 926 ("before the grand jury, after being warned"; admitted; Henderson, J., diss. on another ground); 1902, Grimsinger v. State, — id. — , 69 S. W. 583 (testimony before the grand jury, while under arrest, held admissible, following Wisdom v. State); 1903, Twiggs v. State, — id. — , 75 S. W. 531 (rule of warning, applied); United States: 1799, U. S. v. Fries, Whart. St. Tr. 482, 535, 595 (accused's confession on examination before magistrate, after caution given, admitted; "whatever objections, then, there may be as to confession in general, it does not apply in this case, because it was voluntarily given"); Rev. St. 1878, § 860 ("No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture"; except that this shall not exempt from prosecution for perjury therein); 1878, U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 381, 385 (examination under oath before a special agent of the Treasury Department, the witness having been notified that he was suspected and having consented to be examined; admitted, on the grounds that (1) mere suspicion or charge of crime is not sufficient to exclude (repudiating McMahon's Case); (2) mere arrest is not sufficient; (3) mere administration of an oath is not sufficient; (4) all three together are not sufficient; quoted ante, §§ 843, 845, 847); 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895 (accused, without oath, but not warned nor furnished with counsel; admitted; the result being partly based on the distinction that the statements were not confessions of guilt, but exculpatory assertions); 1902, Hardy v. U. S., 186 id. 224, 22 Sup. 889 (statements made to a magistrate, before and after a preliminary examination, admitted on the facts); 1902, U. S. v. Kimball, C. C., 117 Fed. 156 (testimony of witnesses before a grand jury, the witnesses being "men of affairs," who had consulted counsel, held admissible on the facts); Utah: 1886, U. S. v. Kirkwood, 5 Utah 124, 127, 13 Pac. 234 (examination as witness before grand jury investigating the charge against him; his appearance was voluntary, and he was cautioned; admitted; "If of his own choice, after being warned, he takes an oath which the law provides that he may take, and makes a confession, we are unable to understand why such a confession is not as voluntary as if made not under oath; it certainly is as reliable, for the obligations of an oath are usually an incentive to speak the truth"); Vermont: 1840, Smith v. Crane, 12 Vt. 491, 493, per Redfield, J. (witness' statement under oath, admissible); Virginia: 1830, Moore v. Com., 2 Leigh 702, 704 (examination as accused before magistrate; admitted, because no threats or promises were made); Code 1887, § 3901 (in criminal prosecution, except for perjury or action on penal statute, a statement made "as witness upon a legal examination," unless made when examined as witness in his own behalf, is not admissible against the maker as accused); 1898, Hite v. Com., 96 Va. 489, 31 S. E. 895 (voluntary statement to justice, admitted); Washington: 1895, State v. Hopkins, 13 Wash. 5, 42 Pac. 627 (testimony at a civil trial as then defendant, admitted); 1903, State v. Carpenter, — id. — , 73 Pac. 357 (statements at the close of the preliminary examination as accused, admitted); West Virginia: Code 1891, c. 152, § 20 (in criminal prosecution, except for perjury, evidence shall not be given against accused of "any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination"); 1893, State v. Hobbs, 37 W. Va. 812, 818, 17 S. E. 380 (statements to coroner before of the English cases will show where it stands, — so far as that may be ascertainable. It will be noticed that, through the influence of the Selden theory, mere exculpative statements are often improperly treated as confessions; this fallacy has been already examined (ante, § 821).

6. Existence of the Inducement (Subsequent Ending, etc.).

§ 853. General Principle. Where an inducement sufficient to exclude any confession obtained by it has been offered, the question often arises whether a confession subsequent in time to the inducement was in fact presumably influenced by it. The exclusion of a confession necessarily assumes (1) that the inducement, if it operated at all, was likely to produce a false confession, and (2) that it did in fact operate upon the mind of the person. The questions arising under the first of these elements — the nature of the inducement — having been examined, it remains to notice those arising under the second, — the existence and operation of the inducement.

It must be remembered that no attempt is ever made to investigate the actual motives of the person confessing, or the part played by the inducement among other motives. The whole theory of inducements rests on the probable effect, not the actual effect, upon the person. If while that inducement is held out a confession is made, no inquiry is ever made into the exact share of influence which the inducement had in evoking confession. Nevertheless, though there is no inquiry into the actuality of the operation of the inducement, and though it is assumed that if it was there it operated, we may often have to inquire whether in fact it was there at all, i.e. present to the mind of the person confessing. There are two kinds of cases in which the question may be raised. In the one kind, the inquiry is: Did the inducement, for the person in hand, ever come into existence at all? In the other kind, the inquiry is: Was the inducement, for the person in hand, brought to an end before the confession was made?

§ 854. Did the Inducement come into Existence at all? Very few cases of the first sort are presented for decision. The inducement is almost always addressed to the person in question, and thus becomes known to him as a promise or a threat directly bearing on his situation. It was intended to be accepted by him, and no doubt arises as to its existence for him as an inducement. But where the inducement was not directly addressed to the person, but mediately through another person, how are we to determine whether it swearing witnesses, admitted); Wisconsin: 1854, Schoeffler v. State, 3 Wis. 823, 839 (examination before coroner as witness, while under suspicion, and without caution; admitted because voluntary; (1) the oath not excluding, (2) the suspicion not excluding, (3) the absence of a caution not excluding, because "ignorance of the law is no excuse"; (4) a possible exception reserved for a witness so circumstanced that his position was "equivalent to an actual arrest"; (5) examination on oath as accused before magistrate, conceded to be inadmissible); 1879, Dickerson v. State, 48 Id. 288, 4 N. W. 321 (examination as witness before magistrate on a charge against another person, but while under arrest on suspicion of complicity; admitted, as voluntary); 1880, State v. Glass, 50 Id. 218, 221, 6 N. W. 500 (voluntary examination on oath as accused before the magistrate; the privilege to refuse "removes from the testimony so given all element of compulsion"; good opinion by Lyon, J.). Compare the cases cited under the privilege against self-crimination (post, §§ 2266, 2276, 2281, 2282).

was in fact present as an inducement? This will of course be a pure question of fact for the judge, and no ruling can serve as a precedent; the conduct and language of the person will show whether he had the inducement in mind. The important thing to note, however, is that unless the inducement was held out, directly or indirectly, to the person in question, it cannot exclude the confession; in such a case that person has himself chosen to allow it to affect him, and to hope that it will be applied to him by the promisor, and thus he is himself responsible by free choice for its effect, and not the promising person, who cannot be said to have held out any inducement to him.[1]

§ 855. Was the Inducement brought to an End? Here five questions may arise. (1) Must it be shown clearly that an improper inducement, once offered, was brought to an end? (2) Are there any situations in which this showing will be regarded as impossible, and thus the inducement, once made, vitiates any future confession of that person? (3) Can the same person who has offered the inducement possibly put an end to it so as to make admissible a confession afterwards made to himself? (4) Are confessions made subsequently, but to a person different from the one offering the inducement, to be treated as not made under the inducement, or must it be shown to have been negatived by the second person? (5) What suffices, in general, to end an inducement?

(1) The first of these questions has always been answered affirmatively; the general principle is universally conceded that the subsequent ending of an improper inducement must be shown; i.e. it is assumed to have continued until the contrary is shown.

(2) There is nothing permanently irrevocable in an improper inducement; whether it has been brought to an end is, as all concede, always open to inquiry.

(3) Yet it seems never to have been decided specifically whether the same person may thus put an end to an inducement of his own creating. There is no reason why he cannot.

(4) There is on principle no reason for assuming that a promise or a threat made by one person will be treated by the accused as equally to be attributed to some other person who has had no share in the other's conduct and shown

[1] The case is that of a person who hears of a fellow-prisoner being offered an inducement and conceives the hope that it will be applied to him also; this would not exclude the confession: 1849, R. v. Jacobs, 4 Cox Cr. 54. So also a promise to set free if a certain crime is confessed would not exclude the ensuing confession of a different crime: 1876, State v. Fortner, 43 Ia. 495.

It is obvious that this is an artificial limitation, for if an inducement really calculated to educe a false confession had operated, the confession would be untrustworthy, and it would be unreasonable to trust it simply because the person was not justified in assuming that he would benefit by it. For example, in Shifflet's Case (ante, § 840), if the accused really thought to save his mother's life by a false confession, it ought to be immaterial whether the authorities promised it or whether he conceived the hope of his own motion. Nevertheless, so absurd are most of the rulings about improper inducements that any limitation, however artificial and unreasoning, is welcome. But the doctrine has never been applied to those inducements which employ threats of immediate violence to procure a confession, — as where a mob has hung a fellow-prisoner and the confession is made in the fear of similar treatment, or where a fellow-slave has been whipped, and similar treatment seems impending; see the cases ante, § 833.

no power or inclination to corroborate his promise or threat. Nevertheless, the inducement may on the facts prove to be in effect the second person's as much as the first one's. It should thus be a question to be determined in each case; no general rule can be laid down.

(5) The circumstauces which make it clear that the inducement had been entirely negatived must of course vary with the facts of each case. It is, in the words of an English judge, "merely a question of degree." It is impossible to lay down a general rule, and it is useless to employ individual rulings as precedents.[1]

[1] The way in which the circumstances of each case affect the answers to the last two questions is illustrated in the English rulings that follow. A brief outline of their facts has been given, as they are so frequently cited; but it would be unprofitable and it has not been attempted here even to summarize the facts in the American rulings; they illustrate chiefly the last two questions: England: 1797, Carty's Trial (Ire.), 26 How St. Tr. 889 (confession to one person after an inducement by another; held a question of fact, on the circumstances, whether it had operated); 1800, R. v. Bell, McNally, Evidence, 43 (made to one magistrate, after menaces and promises by another; excluded); 1823, R. v. Tyler, 1 C. & P. 129 (hopes by an unauthorized bystander; subsequent confession to a constable; admitted); 1830, R. v. Clewes, 4 id. 223 (caution by a coroner after hopes held out by a magistrate; admitted); 1832, R. v. Richards, 5 id. 318 (a promise not to arrest; after arrest, the inducement held to have been destroyed by necessary implication; admitted); 1833, R. v. Cooper, ib. 535 (a magistrate used improper inducements and next day a confession was made to the turnkey, who had given no caution; excluded); 1834, R. v. Howes, 6 id. 404 (a constable promised acquittal, but the magistrate afterwards warned him a confession would do him no good; admitted); 1834, R. v. Bryan, Jebb Cr. C. 157 (magistrate's caution sufficient on the facts); 1838, R. v. Sherrington, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 123 (inducement by master; constable's caution not sufficient on the facts); 1841, Berigan's Case, 1 Ir. Circ. R. 177, 182 (caution by magistrate deemed sufficient in fact to dispel previous hopes); 1842, R. v. Hewett, C. & M. 534 (inducement by prosecutrix, not removed by constable at interview two days later); 1843, R. v. Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr. 54; 1846, R. v. Horner, ib. 364 (inducement by a constable, removed by magistrate's caution); 1848, R. v. Collier, 3 id. 57 (to the same person, but after a caution intervening; admitted); 1862, R. v. Cheverton, 2 F. & F. 833 (admitted on the facts; made to one police officer after improper inducement by another). It should be added that, under the statute of 11 & 12 Vict. (quoted ante, § 849), the second caution there provided for is properly treated as in itself and invariably sufficient to end any previous improper inducement and render it immaterial to affect the confession thereafter made to the magistrate: 1850, R. v. Sansome, 4 Cox Cr. 206, Alderson, B.; 1850, R. v. Bond, ib. 235, 238, Alderson, B.; 1871, R. v. Bate, 11 Id. 686, Smith, J. United States: Ala.: 1854, Wyatt v. State, 25 Ala. 12 (slave); 1858, Bole v. State, 32 id. 566 (slave); 1860, Mose v. State, 36 id. 211, 226 (slave); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 id. 525; 1876, Porter v. State, 55 id. 101; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 id. 260; Ark.: 1901, Williams v. State, 69 Ark. 599, 65 S. W. 103; Colo.: 1873, Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 203; Conn.: 1846, State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 177; 1898, State v. Willis, 71 Id. 293, 41 Atl. 820 (confession to second officer unconditionally, after inducement by first, admitted); Ill.: 1895, Dunne v. Park Com'rs, 159 Ill. 60, 42 N. E. 375 (a written confession to the district attorney under promise of release was not satisfactory to him, and the accused subsequently made another oral one to him; excluded); Ky.: 1896, Langhlin v. Com., — Ky. —, 37 S. W. 590; 1903, Whitney v. Com., — id. —, 74 S. W. 257; Mass.: 1871, Com. v. Cuffee, 108 Mass. 288 (statements to an officer different from the one making threats or promises are admissible, but the jury must be told to reject them if they think the improper influence had not ceased); 1872, Com. v. Cullen, 111 Id. 437 (similar); 1894, Com. v. Myers, 160 id. 530, 533, 36 N. E. 481 (that the confession is to the same person is not fatal); Miss.: 1844, Peter v. State, 4 Sm. & M. 36; 1900, Whitley v. State, 78 Miss. 255, 28 So. 852; 1903, McMaster v. State, — id. —, 34 So. 156; Mo.: 1874, State v. Jones, 54 Mo. 479; Nebr.: 1903, State v. Force, — Nebr. —, 95 N. W. 42; N. J.: 1828, State v. Guild, 10 N. J. L. 163, 179; 1900, Bullock v. State, 65 id. 557, 47 Atl. 62 (total removal of the inducement must be shown); N. C.: 1858, State v. Gregory, 5 Jones L. 315; 1858, State v. Scates, ib. 420; 1872, State v. Lowhorne, 66 N. C. 638; 1880, State v. Drake, 82 Id. 596; 1893, State v. Drake, 113 id. 624, 628, 18 S. E. 166; Oh.: 1883, Jackson v. State, 39 Oh. St. 37, 40; Pa.: 1900, Com. v. Sheets, 197 Pa. 69, 46 Atl. 753; Tenn.: 1865, McGlothlin v. State, 2 Coldw. 223; 1872, Maples v. State, 3 Heisk. 408; 1873, State v. Frazier, 6 Baxt 540; 1875, Beggarly v. State, 8 Id. 520; Tex.: 1871, Barnes v. State, 36 Tex. 356; Va.: 1858, Shiffiet's Case, 14 Gratt. 665; 1870, Thompson's Case, 20 id. 731; 1890, Early's Case, 86 Va. 927, 11 S. E. 795; Vt.: 1864, State v. Carr, 37 Vt. 191.

7. Confirmation by Subsequent Facts, as curing the Defect.

§ 856. General Principle. It has already been noticed (ante, § 822) that the fundamental theory upon which confessions become inadmissible is that when made under certain conditions they are untrustworthy as testimonial utterances. A very slight probability of untruth, to be sure, is sufficient to exclude (a probability much less than that which supports other testimonial exclusions), and the tests worked out are often more or less artificial; but this principle underlies the whole body of rules. If now a circumstance appears which indicates that the law's fear of untrustworthiness is unfounded, and counteracts the significance of the improper inducement by demonstrating that after all it exercised no sinister influence, the confession should be adopted. This is the theory of Confirmation by Subsequent Facts, which has been in vogue ever since there has been any doctrine about excluding confessions. That theory is that where, in consequence of a confession otherwise inadmissible, search is made and facts are discovered which confirm it in material points, the possible influence which through caution had been attributed to the improper inducement is seen to have been nil, and the confession may be accepted without hesitation.

This theory has always been accepted, at least in the abstract:

1780, Mr. Leach, Crown Law, 3d ed., I, 301, note: "But it should seem that so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered by it may be given in evidence; for the reason of rejecting extorted confessions is the apprehension that the prisoner may have been thereby induced to say what is false; but the fact discovered shows that so much of the confession as immediately relates to it is true."[1]

1803, Serjeant East, Pleas of the Crown, II, 657: "This [finding of the stolen goods as described], it is said, does away the reason upon which the general rule that confessions so improperly obtained cannot be received in evidence is founded; because the reason being to guard against the possibility of an innocent person being from weakness seduced to accuse himself in hopes of obtaining thereby more favour or for fear of meeting with worse punishment, that reason is done away if such confession be substantiated by an actual finding of the goods accordingly in the place described, which could not probably be known to the party if he were not privy to the felony."

1817, R. v. Garbett, 2 C. & K. 490; Mr. Martin, for the prosecution: "Even in those cases [of improper confessions] the confession of a theft is received if the property be found in consequence"; Denman, L. C. J.: "Because it leads to the inference that the party was not accusing himself falsely."

1852, Withers, J., in State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 404: "So much of such confession as relates strictly to the fact may be received in evidence, and this is on the principle that so much of the confession is established to be true; and the foundation of the whole doctrine is that the jury ought to hear whatever is true, and are entitled to look for truth through any and every medium that may be calculated to reveal it."

§ 857. Admission of the Part Confirmed, or of the Whole? It will be observed that, in Mr. Leach's phrase, "so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered by it" is to be received; in other words, the confirmation admits the part confirmed, and that only. Now this falls something short of the logic of the case; for a confirmation on material points produces ample persuasion of the trustworthiness of the whole. It can hardly be supposed that at certain parts the possible fiction stopped and the truth began, and that by a marvellous coincidence the truthful parts are exactly those which a subsequent search (more or less controlled by chance) happened to confirm. Such a differentiation is purely artificial, and corresponds to no actual mental processes, either of the confessor or of the hearer. If we are to cease distrusting any part, we should cease distrusting all. This logical and common-sense result is accepted by a few Courts, though it is not clear how far they would carry it in a given case.[1] Other Courts follow Mr. Leach's limitation and admit that part only to which the confirming facts directly relate;[2] but as in most of these instances the inquiry relates to a larceny, there is little practical difference in the result, since the admission of that part relating to the stealing is the admission of the substantial part of the confession.

[1] Citing R. v. Butcher, MS., 1798.

§ 858. Prevailing Doctrine; No Part of the Confession received, but only the fact of Discovery in consequence of Accused's Information. But the sound result more or less fully accepted by the foregoing Courts (representing a majority in this country) was not that of the English courts. The original practice (while able to produce such clear expositions of the theory as Mr. Leach's and Serjeant East's) stopped short of allowing any part of the confession, as such, to be received. The confession, i. e. the expressed avowal of the accused's acts, was entirely excluded;[1] and only this much effect was given indirectly to the underlying principle, namely, it could be shown that certain facts had been discovered by a search made in consequence of a statement made (or "something said" or "information given") by the accused. No principle appears ever to have been offered to justify or to explain this distinction; but it became the settled law of England, and was followed without question in some of our own jurisdictions.[2]

[1] 1855, Brister v. State, 26 Ala. 128; 1835, State v. Brick, 2 Harrlugt. 530; 1867, Warren v. State, 29 Tex. 369 (under the Code, quoted ante, § 831; but the facts must be relevant to the case in hand); 1867, Selvidge v. State, 30 id. 64; 1899, Parker v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 119, 49 S. W. 80 (confession that the deceased was shot with slugs; subseqnent exhumation showed this to be true; confession admitted); 1899, Winfield v. State, — id. —, 54 S. W. 584; 1900, Campbell v. State, 42 id. 27, 57 S. W. 288; 1902, Johnson v. State, — id. —, 71 S. W. 25 (confession admissible when thus tested, even though the statutory warning was omitted); 1903, Whitney v. Com., — Ky. —, 74 S. W. 257.

[2] Ala.: 1879, Murphy v. State, 63 Ala. 4; 1887, Banks v. State, 84 id. 431, 4 So. 382; 1889, Lowe v. State, 88 id. 8, 7 So. 97; 1895, Gregg v. State, 106 id. 44, 17 So. 321 (finding the body of a child confessed to have been killed); 1896, Pressley v. State, 106 id. 44, 20 So. 647; Ark.: 1886, Yates v. State, 47 Ark. 174, 1 S. W. 65; Ga.: 1895, Hinkle v. State, 94 Ga. 595, 21 S. E. 595 (money); N. C.: 1880, State v. Drake, 82 N. C. 596 (stolen goods); 1895, State v. Winston, 116 id. 990, 21 S. E. 37 (stolen goods); Pa.: 1877, Laros v. Com., 84 Pa. 209 (concealment of money); S. C.: 1852, State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 404, semble; Tex.: 1875, Strait v. State, 43 Tex. 488 (stolen goods); Vt.: 1803, State v. Jenkins, 5 Vt. 379 (stolen goods); W. Va.: 1869, Fredrick v. State, 3 W. Va. 697 (stolen goods).

[1] 1783, Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach, 3d ed., 300 (Nares, J., and Eyre, B); 1784, Mosey's Case, ib., note (all the Judges); 1803, East, Pl. Cr. II, 657; 1804, Peake, Evidence, 14.

[2] Eng.: 1784, R. v. Mosey, 1 Leach, 3d ed., 301, note (all the Judges); 1803, East, Pl. Cr. II, 657 (after the passage quoted supra, he admits that the more common practice is to receive "the fact of the witness having been directed by the prisoner where to find the goods, and his having found them accordingly, but not the acknowledgment of the prisoner's having stolen or put them there"); 1822, R. v. Jenkins, R. & R. 492 (the accused took the officer to a house as that of his confederate having the property stolen; the property was not found; the fact of

There is however apparently an explanation for it. In the case of a confession of stealing goods and their subsequent discovery as described (almost the only situation over which this question arises), there is just one hypothesis on which the jury may stop short of believing the confession after this confirmation, namely, the accused may know of the stealing and of the place of hiding, but he may still not be the thief. Now we may determine to ignore the improbability of the latter consequence, but we cannot ignore the former. That his confession of stealing is true may be hard to avoid, but that he knew where the stolen goods were (and must have been in some way "privy to the felony," in Serjeant East's phrase) is impossible to avoid. We shall admit, then, what as rational beings we are obliged to admit, but we shall stubbornly draw the line there; that seems to be the rationale of the above distinction. The result is, that so far as the discovery shows that the person knew where the stolen goods were, we are to hear about it; but we are to hear nothing more. Now, in thus accepting whatever bears on his knowledge, the line becomes hard to draw. There may be several places to draw it. (1) The law may admit merely the fact that the discovery was made, and that it was made in consequence of a statement by that person.[3] Or (2) it may go further and admit the details of the accused's conduct in that he went to the place and pointed out the goods, etc.[4] Or (3) it may go still further and admit the words of his statement describing the property and the place, exhibiting as they do a detailed knowledge on his part, and yet falling short of a confession of the stealing.[5] All these show knowledge and only knowledge. The distinction, then, while it is artificial and against common sense, has at least a certain intelligibility beneath it. But its weakness is well exposed in the following opinion:

1873, Wells, J., in Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 211: "If the exclusion of the confession rests altogether upon the probability that the confession is untrue, as we have seen, then, if the prosecution produce evidence tending to show and sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that it is true, it ought to be received, for in such case the reason of the exclusion is done away. All the Courts recognize the propriety of this reasoning, but illogically decline to pursue it to its legitimate results. If one accused of larceny, being put to torture, confess the crime and produce the goods from his own possession or disclose the place his having pointed out such a house was rejected, because there was in fact no corroboration); 1839, R. v. Cain, 1 Cr. & D. 37 (indictment for concealing a birth; the fact of searching for and finding the child, after information by the accused, was admitted); 1840, R. v. Gould, 9 C. & P. 364, Tindal, C. J., and Parke, B. (but here with the details of that statement); 1854, R. v. Berriman, 6 Cox Cr. 388, Erle, J. (without details); Can.: 1886, R. v. McCafferty, 25 N. Br. 396, 398 (two judges diss.); 1886, R. v. Doyle, 12 Ont. 350, semble; Ga.: Cr. Code 1895, § 1008 ("any material facts discovered by a confession" are provable, "and the fact of its discovery by reason of such information"); Miss.: 1858, Belote v. State, 36 Miss. 96, 116 (the Court reserved the question of admitting the words of the confession); 1874, Garrard v. State, 50 id. 151 (practically the same reservation); Nev.: 1900, State v. Simas, 25 Nev. 432, 62 Pac. 242; Pa.: 1877, Laros v. Com., 84 Pa. 202, 209; S. C.: 1854, State v. Motley, 7 Rich. L. 337; Tenn.: 1853, Deathridge v. State, 1 Sneed 80; 1879, Clemons v. State, 4 Lea 25; 1865, McGlothlin v. State, 2 Coldw. 230; 1871, Rice v. State, 3 Heisk. 223; 1872, White v. State, ib. 341.

[3] As in R. v. Berriman, supra. The American cases there cited in the preceding note seem to take this form.

[4] As in R. v. Jenkins, supra.

[5] As in R. v. Gould, supra. The following American rulings seem to use this form: 1886, Yates v. State, 47 Ark. 173, 1 S. W. 65; 1862, People v. Ah Ki, 20 Cal. 179; 1867, People v. Hoy Yen, 34 id. 176; 1873, Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 203; 1878, State v. Mortimer, 20 Kan. 97; 1876, State v. Garvey, 28 La. An. 925.

of their concealment, and they are afterward found in the place indicated, you may, it is agreed, give in evidence the fact of the finding of the goods conformably to information given by the prisoner; but you may not in the same case, according to the received doctrine, give in evidence the prisoner's statement that he deposited the goods in the place where they were found, or that he stole them. . . . But, I assert, in the case supposed the finding of the goods at the place indicated not only tends to corroborate the declaration of the prisoner that they will be found there, but also his declaration that he stole them and concealed them at that place, if he make this statement. . . . In other words, the received doctrine involves this absurdity, that while, in passing upon the primary question whether the evidence shall be received, the Court notwithstanding the corroborating circumstances shall find the confession probably untrue and therefore exclude it, the jury, considering the same evidence [that the place of concealment was disclosed by him], may find the very fact confessed to be absolutely true."

§ 859. Discovered Facts themselves always admissible. It was once contended that the impropriety of the inducement to the confession tainted the facts discovered in consequence of it, and that they also, as well as the confession, should remain inadmissible. Such a doctrine needs only to be stated to expose its equal lack of logic, principle, and expediency. It was fortunately repudiated at the outset in an opinion which leaves nothing to be said:

1783, Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 298; a confession of stealing had been made, and in consequence of it the property was found concealed in the lodgings of the accused; but the confession itself was otherwise inadmissible; "it was contended by her counsel that as the fact of finding the stolen property in her custody had been obtained through the means of an inadmissible confession, the proof of that fact ought also to be rejected," as obtained by a breach of faith; the Court, Nares, J., and Eyre, B. (after the passage quoted ante, § 823): "This principle respecting confessions has no application whatever as to the admission or rejection of facts, whether the knowledge of them be obtained in consequence of an extorted confession or whether it arises from any other source; for a fact, if it exist at all, must exist invariably in the same manner, whether the confession from which it is derived be in other respects true or false. Facts thus obtained, however, must be fully and satisfactorily proved without calling in the aid of any part of the confession from which they may have been derived; and the impossibility of admitting any part of the confession as a proof of the fact clearly shows that the fact may be admitted on other evidence; for as no part of an improper confession can be heard, it can never be legally known whether the fact was derived through the means of such confession or not."[1]

8. Other Principles applied to Confessions.

§ 860. Burden of Proof; Must the Prosecution show that no improper Inducement existed? Looking at the general principles of admissibility (ante, § 484) and the comparative rarity of untrustworthy confessions, as well as the contingent nature of the dangers supposed to flow from improper inducements, the more practical rule would be to receive confessions without question, unless they are shown to have been improperly induced, — especially since a contrary rule may involve the difficulty of proving a negative.

[1] 1785, R. v. Lockhart, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 430 (a witness obtained through the confession); 1784, Mosey's Case, ib. 301, note (all the Judges); 1863, Duffy v. People, 26 N. Y. 590; 1874, State v. Graham, 74 N. C. 648, semble; 1839, U. S. v. Nott, 1 McL. 502.

On this question five distinguishable attitudes are found represented in the rulings.

(1) The original English rule was that the prosecution (offering the confession) must show that it was made voluntarily, i. e. without any improper inducement from the person receiving the confession; and this rule is accepted in most American jurisdictions.[1]

(2) The English judges occasionally went still further, with a rule that where the accused had been in charge of a person in authority other than the one to whom the confession was made, the prosecution must show the absence of an inducement from the former as well as from the latter.[2]

(3) The view has also found representatives that the prosecution must, not merely in the above circumstances, but in all cases, show the absence of an inducement from any one else and not merely from the person receiving the confession.[3] This is an absurd extreme.

(4) A few jurisdictions regard confession as prima facie admissible, and require the defendant to show that the alleged improper inducement existed.[4] This is the practical and natural rule; for if there is any reason to object to the confession, no one can know it better than the defendant.

(5) A modern English ruling takes a middle path, and seems to receive the confession unless attacked by evidence of an improper inducement, and then in case of doubt leaves upon the prosecution the burden of convincing the Court of the admissibility.[5]

§ 861. Judge and Jury; Whether the Confession is Voluntary, is a question for the Judge. The admissibility of the confession, as affected by the foregoing rules, is a question for the judge, in accordance with the elementary principles defining the functions of judge and jury:[1]

1881, Hammond, J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. R. 256 (naming, as the excluding facts, the nature of the threat or promise, and the authority of the person confessed to): "The elements entering into the preliminary inquiry by the judge are [the foregoing]. Both these questions being answered in the affirmative, the evidence is excluded as a matter of

[1] Eng.: 1783, Thompson's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 328, semble, Hotham, B.; 1851, R. v. Warringham, 2 Den. Cr. C. 447, Parke, B.; 1893, R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 12, 18; U. S.: 1866, Miller v. State, 40 Ala. 58; 1876, Bonner v. State, 55 id. 245; 1898, McAlpine v. State, 117 id. 93, 23 So. 130; 1899, Curry v. State, 120 id. 366, 25 So. 237 (hnt a confession not made while nnder a charge need not be first shown volnntary); 1899, People v. Castro, 125 Cal. 521, 58 Pac. 133 (to a sheriff); 1873, Eberhart v. State, 40 Ga. 608 (holding that the State must first show the attendant circnmstances, bnt the statement is admissible unless it appears to be not voluntary); 1878, State v. Johnson, 30 La. An. 881; 1882, State v. Davis, 34 id. 352 (holding that an objection not made at the time is ineffective); 1857, Cain v. State, 18 Tex. 390; 1883, Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 587, 4 Snp. 202, Harlan, J.; 1870, Thompson's Case, 20 Gratt. 731

[2] 1840, R. v. Conrtenay, 2 Cr. & D. 62 (under arrest, after a constable, who was not prodnced, had been with the accnsed; held donbtfnl); 1831, R. v. Swatkins, 4 C. & P. 549 (confession to one constable jus[illegible]er an interview with another); 1873, State [illegible]vey, 25 La. An. 193, semble. Contra: 188[illegible]t v. Utah, 110 U. S. 585, 4 Sup. 202.

[3] 1876, State v. Garvey, 28 La. An. 925 (that the prosecntion must negative compulsion, not only of B., but of any one else).

[4] 1867, R. v. Paakaula, 3 Haw. 30, 34; 1897, Hank v. State, 148 Ind. 238, 46 N. E. 127, 47 N. E. 465 (a written confession, stating it to be made freely, assumed to be voluntary); 1902, State v. Grover, 96 Me. 363, 52 Atl. 757; 1878, Com. v. Sego, 125 Mass. 213; 1879, Com. v. Culver, 126 id. 464; 1874, Rufer v. State, 25 Ob. St. 469.

[5] R. v. Thompson, 1893, 2 Q. B. 12, 18, Cave, J. ("in case of doubt").

[1] Ante, § 12 (admissibility and weight); § 487 (determination of testimonial admissibility); post, § 2550 (judge and jury).

law, the judge trying the facts as in other cases of mixed questions of law or either being answered in the negative, the evidence goes to the jury, and there try this as they do all the other facts of the case, giving such weight to the con they see fit. All evidence of confessions does not pass through this ordeal of tri judge, except to determine whether it belongs to the one class or the other."

1895, Coleman, J., in Burton v. State, 107 Ala. 108, 18 So. 285: "Whether vo made or not, we hold, is a question of law, to be determined by the Court from as a condition precedent to their admission. Having been declared competen missible, they are before the jury for consideration. The jury have no authority them as incompetent. But the jury are the sole judges of the truth and weig given confessions, as they are of any other fact. In weighing the confessions, must take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding them, and und they were made, including those under which the Court declared, as matter of l were voluntary. In weighing confessions, the jury necessarily consider those fa which their admissibility, as having been voluntarily made, depends. While the power in the jury to reject the confessions, as being incompetent, there is no pow Court to control the jury in the weight to be given to facts. The jury may, ther the exercise of their authority, and within their province, determine that the con are untrue, or not entitled to any weight, upon the grounds that they were not rily made. The Court passes upon the facts merely for the purpose of determini competency and admissibility. The jury pass upon the same facts, and in con with other facts, if there are other facts, in determining whether the confessions and entitled to any, and how much, weight. The Court and jury each have a well and separate province. It follows that, although the jury may come to the con that the confessions were not voluntary, yet if, from extrinsic evidence, or fro character and the circumstances, the jury are satisfied that they are true, the jury not upon them. The statement in the opinion of the case of Goodwin v. State, th the 'duty' of the jury to discard and reject the confessions altogether, if they are ion that the confessions were not voluntarily made, although they may believe the true, is herein modified in so far as it conflicts with the opinion in the presen Charge 67 requested by defendant is not full enough. The jury consider whether sions were voluntary, in passing upon their weight, but the jury is not authorized termine their admissibility. The charge was calculated to mislead. Charge properly refused, as invading the province of the jury. It required the jury to rej confessions absolutely, if, in their opinion, they were not voluntarily made. It wa duty to consider them, and their province to give them such weight as they saw pro

This orthodox principle is well recognized in the majority of jurisdict
But in comparatively recent times the heresy of leaving the question jury has made rapid strides. To say that it is a question for the jury mean one of two things. It may mean that the confession goes in case to the jury to accept or to reject or to give such weight as the chooses; this practically abolishes all the foregoing limitations, and be in this aspect a desirable rule. But it may and commonly does

[2] Ala.: 1876, Bonner v. State, 55 Ala. 246; 1881, Young v. State, 68 id. 578; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 id. 260; 1895, Stone v. State, 105 id. 60, 17 So. 114; 1895, Burton v. State, 107 Ala. 108, 18 So. 285 (quoted supra); 1900, Brown v. State, 124 id 76, 27 So. 250; 1901, Huffman v. State, 130 id. 89, 30 So. 394; 1902, McKinney v. State, 134 id. 134, 32 So. 726; Fla.: 1897, Holland v. State, 39 Fla. 178, 22 So. 298; Ky.: 1897, Dugan v. Com., 102 Ky. 241, 43 S. W. 418; Mass.: 1830, Com. v. Knapp, 10 Pick. 495; Com. v. Culver, 126 Mass. 464; Mo.: Hawkins v. State, 7 Mo. 192; 1876, S Duncan, 64 id. 265; 1898, State v. McKenz id. 40, 45 S. W. 1117; Oh.: 1874, Rufer v. 25 Oh. St. 469; Pa.: 1857, Fife v. Com., 437; S. C.: 1852, State v. Vaigneur, 5 Ri 400; 1856, State v. Gossett, 9 id. 435; 1857, Cain v. State, 18 Tex. 390; Va.: Smith's Case, 10 Gratt. 737.

that the jury may be allowed to measure it by the foregoing legal tests, and to reject it as a judge would if the tests are not fulfilled. This is decidedly improper; first, because it violates the fixed principle (ante, §§ 12, 487) that all questions of admissibility are questions of law for the judge only; secondly, because, in particular, the confession-rules are artificial, based on average probabilities or possibilities only, and do not attempt to measure the ultimate value of a given confession, and the tribunal which is to weigh all evidence finally ought not to be artificially hampered by them; thirdly, because the jury is not familiar enough with them to attempt to employ them. Nevertheless, many Courts to-day hold that, after the judge has applied the rules and admitted the confession, the jury are to apply them again, and by that test may reject it.[3] This unpractical doctrine fails to appreciate the elementary canon of admissibility, and in that aspect its judicial extension is a discouraging circumstance.

In determining admissibility, (1) the judge must hear the defendant's evidence (including evidence from cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses) upon the issue of voluntariness;[4] although under the heterodox rule this could logically be dispensed with;[5] (2) the jury, during the hearing of this evidence, may be withdrawn,[6] as is proper during all proof and arguments upon questions of admissibility (post, § 1808); (3) but, when a confession is ruled to be admissible, the same evidence and all other circumstances affecting the weight of the confession may be introduced for the jury's ultimate consideration.[7]

[3] Ga.: 1902, Price v. State, 114 Ga. 855, 40 S. E. 1015; Ia.: 1901, State v. Storms, 113 Ia. 385, 85 N. W. 610 (if the Court is in doubt); Mass.: 1894, Com. v. Burroughs, 162 Mass. 513, 39 N. E. 184 (where the judge upon a conflict of evidence feels unable to decide); 1897, Com. v. Bond, 170 id. 41, 48 N. E. 756; 1903, Com. v. Antaya, — id. —, 68 N. E. 331 (and they may be left to decide what part, if any, was made after the improper inducement); Miss.: 1874, Garrard v. State, 50 Miss. 152; Mo.: 1903, State v. Jones, 171 Mo. 401, 71 S. W. 680 (confession held to be properly submitted to the jury to find); Mont.: 1903, State v. Tighe, 27 Mont. 327, 71 Pac. 3; Oh.: 1896, Burdge v. State, 53 Oh. 512, 42 N. E. 594 (if the Court is in doubt); N. J.: 1900, Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, 47 Atl. 62; N. Y.: 1900, People v. Zigouras, 163 N. Y. 250, 57 N. E. 465 ("It was the defendant's right to have it submitted to the jury whether the statement was a voluntary one"); 1900, People v. Meyer, — id. —, 56 N. E. 758; 1903, People v. White, — id. —, 68 N. E. 630; Pa.: 1899, Com. v. Epps, 193 Pa. 512, 44 Atl. 570 (after Court's ruling on admissibility, if there is a contradicting evidence, question of voluntariness is to be left to the jury, who are to reject if not voluntary); S. D.: 1902, State v. Vincent, — S. D. —, 91 N. W. 347; 1898, Hamlin v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 579, 47 S. W. 656; 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895. Undecided: 1902, State v. Young, 67 N. J. L. 223, 51 Atl. 939 (question expressly left undecided, in spite of obiter dicta in prior rulings). Compare the similar heresy for dying declarations (post, § 1451).

[4] 1879, Com. v. Culver, 126 Mass. 464; 1890, People v. Fox, 121 N. Y. 449, 24 N. E. 923 (written confession; the judge's rejection of the defendant's evidence until the defendant's own case was introduced, under a promise to strike out the confession if then found to be inadmissible, held erroneous).

[5] 1893, Brady v. U. S., 1 D. C. App. 246, 248 (trial judge held to have had the discretion, after hearing evidence, to admit the confession without receiving the defendant's own testimony to prove the improper inducement); 1893, Hardy v. U. S., 3 id. 35 (preceding case approved; here the trial Court had refused to allow further questioning of a police-witness as involving confusion of issues); 1868, Com. v. Morrell, 99 Mass. 542; 1899, Com. v. Epps, 193 Pa. 512, 44 Atl. 570; 1902, State v. Haworth, 24 Utah 398, 68 Pac. 155 (defendant not allowed to cross-examine; but here the facts desired to be examined on would not of themselves have excluded the confession).

[6] 1902, State v. Gruff, 68 N. J. L. 287, 53 Atl. 88; 1900, Kirk v. Terr., 10 Okl. 46, 60 Pac. 797 (as a preferable practice).

[7] 1881, Young v. State, 68 Ala. 578; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 id. 260; 1900, Kirk v. Terr., 10 Okl. 46, 60 Pac. 797 (if held admissible, the jury may hear the circumstances of confession, "not for the purpose of passing on its competency, but in order to determine the weight and credibility").

§ 862. Discretion of the Trial Judge. No plain tendency has appeared, i this department of the law, to leave anything to the final determination c the trial judge (ante, § 16). This is a policy worthy to be favored, but in few instances only have the Courts of appeal really carried out their nomina adherence to it by refusing to review the trial Court's determination.[1]

§ 863. Other Principles applicable to Confessions (Proving all the Part Reduction to Writing by a Magistrate, Confessions of Third Persons and Co Conspirators, Sufficiency for Conviction when Uncorroborated in Homicide Bigamy, and Divorce). The foregoing rules are all that depend upon th general principle of Testimonial Qualifications as applicable to confessions But, as with all evidential material, other principles not peculiar to confession occasionally come into play. (1) How far all parts of the confession may b or must be used involves the general principle of Completeness (post, §§ 2097 2115). (2) How far mere silence when charged, or other conduct not employing words, amounts to a confession, involves a general principle of Admissions (post, § 1071). (3) When a confession is reduced to writing before a magistrate, the question arises whether the written report of the magistrate is to be the exclusive testimonial proof of the confession (post, §§ 1326, 1349). (4) In the same situation, the proof of the execution of the writing is often provided for by a statutory method, as in the case of many other writings, and involves the principles of Authentication (post, §§ 1667, 2164). (5) Why the confession of a third person is not admissible as a Declaration against Interest, under the exception to the Hearsay Rule, is discussed under the Hearsay Rule (post, § 1476). The confession of a co-conspirator or co-defendant is receivable, if at all, under the general principle of Admissions (post, §§ 1076, 1079). (6) Certain kinds of confessions are sometimes held not sufficient for conviction without corroboration, — in particular, in criminal cases generally (post, § 2070), in proof of the corpus delicti (post, § 2073), in bigamy (post, § 2086), and in divorce for adultery (post, § 2067).

9. Status of the Doctrine of Confessions.

§ 865. Explanation of Sentimental Excesses in the Law of Confessions. That absurdities have disfigured the law of the admissibility of confessions,

[1] Ark.: 1873, Runnells v. State, 28 Ark. 121; 1897, Williams v. State, 63 id. 527, 39 S. W. 709; Colo.: 1899, Fincher v. People, 26 Colo. 169, 56 Pac. 902 ("to some extent"); Conn.: 1898, State v. Willis, 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820; 1900, State v. Cross, 72 Id. 722, 46 Atl. 148 (the trial Court's determination is final as to the facts, and perhaps also to a further extent); D. C.: 1893, Hardy v. U. S., 3 D. C. App. 35, 46; 1895, Travers v. U. S., 6 id. 450, 459; Fla.: 1897, Holland v. State, 39 Fla. 178, 22 So. 298 (the trial Court's discretion controls in finding the facts, but not as to the rule applicable); Ill.: 1895, Bartley v. People, 156 Ill. 234, 40 N. E. 831; Ia.: 1901, State v. Storms, 113 Ia. 385, 85 N. W. 610; La.: 1902, State v. Edwards, 106 La. 674, 31 So. 308; Me.: 1902, State v. Grover, 96 Me. 363, 52 Atl. 757; N. J.: 1898, Roesel v. State, 62 N. J. L. 216, 41 Atl. 408; N. C.: 1869, State v. Davis, 63 N. C. 580; 1880, State v. Vann, 82 id. 632 (whether hope or fear existed is a question of fact for the trial court to decide; but what constitutes an excluding hope or fear is a question of law, on which the decision below is not final); 1900, State v. Page, 127 id. 512, 37 S. E. 66; Pa.: 1857, Fife v. Com., 29 Pa. 437 (trial Court's discretion will be reviewed only in an extreme case); S. C.: 1895, State v. Derrick, 44 S. C. 344, 22 S. E. 338; 1897, State v. Cannon, 49 id. 550, 27 S. E. 526; Vt.: 1895, State v. Gorham, 67 Vt. 365, 31 Atl. 845 (trial Court's ruling is final, if evidence is conflicting); Wis.: 1897, Connors v. State, 95 Wis. 77, 69 N. W. 981.

that the excessive caution in listening to them has given an appearance of sentimental irrationality to the law and has obstructed the administration of justice, cannot be denied, and has often been conceded by judges. "I confess," said Baron Parke,[1] "that I cannot look at the decisions without some shame when I consider what objections have prevailed to prevent the reception of confessions in evidence; and I agree with the observation of Mr. Pitt Taylor, that the rule has been extended quite too far, and that justice and common sense have been too frequently sacrificed at the shrine of mercy"; and Mr. J. Erle added: "I am much inclined to agree with Mr. Pitt Taylor; and, according to my judgment, in many cases where confessions have been excluded, justice and common sense have been sacrificed, not at the shrine of mercy, but at the shrine of guilt."

In the middle of the 1800s the perversion of normal reasoning had gone so far that counsel were able to advance seriously the argument that "the law assumes that a man may falsely accuse himself upon the slightest inducement."[2] No limits were fixed to the apparent influence of this attitude; and it even came to be urged that an accused person should be dissuaded from confessing, so that this notion had to be rebuked from the bench.[3] The spirit that thus tended to prevail in the law has been properly described "as a weak sentimentalism towards criminals,"[4] and it assuredly had unfortunate results. But no policy and no institution is without its reasons and its explanation; and before we can understand how to deal with this spirit in our law and what to expect of it in the future, we must ask what the explanation of its existence was.

(1) A first reason certainly was the character of person usually brought before the judges on charges of crime. In all countries having the social cleavages and the feudal survivals of England in the 1700s and early 1800s, the offenders against the criminal law come in the far greater proportion from what are known as the "lower classes." This was especially the case (down to the era of the Reform Bill, when nearly two hundred capital crimes were swept from the statute-book) at the time when the great multitude of grave offences involved merely those petty forms of property-crime which may be the natural result of only hopeless poverty and not necessarily of an abandoned life or a professional profligacy. Furthermore, the same social

[1] R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 445; so also Kelly, C. B., in 12 Cox Cr. 180: "The cases including confessions on the ground of unlawful inducement have gone too far for the protection of guilt"; Hayes, J., in 15 Ir. C. L. 85: "an exhibition of morbid sensibility towards criminals." So also, Phillips, Evidence, 10th ed., 1852, p. 543; McLean, J., in U. S. v. Nott, 1 McLean 501; Wells, J., in Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 211, 213; Hammond, D. J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. R. 255, 256, 262; Harlan, J., in Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 584, 4 Sup. 202; Lee, J., in Smith's Case, 10 Gratt. 739; Moncure, J., in Shiflet's Case, 14 id. 659.

[2] Mr. Mills, arguendo, in R. v. Baldry, supra.

[3] Gurney, B., in R. v. Green, 5 C. & P. 312 (1832): "He ought not to be dissuaded from making a perfectly voluntary confession, because that is shutting up one of the sources of justice."

The absurd artificiality developed under this judicial attitude is illustrated by the instance of a British constable, who when asked at the trial whether the prisoner had not made a statement, replied, "No; he was beginning to do so; but I knew my duty better, and I prevented him" (Forsyth, Hortensius the Advocate, 3d ed., 292).

[4] Paxson, C. J., in Com. v. Clark, 130 Pa. 650, 18 Atl. 988 (1890), uttering a rebuke similar to that of Gurney, B.

cleavage is also accompanied, in all countries, with a subordination, a submission, half-respectful and half-stupid, on the part of the "lower classes" towards those in authority, — an attitude especially marked, though not solely found, among the peasantry and towards the squires and other landed superiors on whose will hangs the tenant's fortune. The situation of such a peasant charged by his landlord with poaching and urged to confess, the situation of the maid urged and threatened by her mistress to confess a petty theft, involves a mental condition to which we may well hesitate to apply the test of a rational principle. We may believe that rationally a false confession is not to be apprehended from the normal person under certain paltry inducements or meaningless threats; but we have here perhaps a person not to be tested by a normal or rational standard.[5] It is useless to attempt to measure a priori what allowance should be made; and we do not find that the law ever did make any exact allowance explicitly based on such a consideration. But if we put ourselves in the place of those judges (at the end of the 1700s, when a motive of decency and humanity in the criminal law began to make itself effective), we may easily understand that, as they found before them in the ordinary case persons of the above sort, one of the first suggestions of these new notions would be to refuse great weight to the utterances of such persons made under the influence of their social superior.
This, then, was certainly one of the reasons why, in one way or another, on principle or without principle, many judges came to set themselves against the use of confessions, and to exclude them on pretexts which were in themselves trifling and irrational but in fact represented a fixed judicial sen-ment. It is not easy for us, to-day, and in most parts of this country, realize this attitude; but it had a very real influence.

(2) Another reason is found in the absence at that time of the right appeal in criminal cases, and the practical creation of the law of confessi by isolated judges at Nisi Prius without consultation and on independ responsibility. In order to solve any doubts which might arise in his m the Nisi Prius judge was obliged to consult casually-accessible colleague to reserve the question for a meeting of all the judges; and the natural inclination to such a delay, to becoming the source of trouble to his pr sional associates, and to bringing perhaps upon himself the reflectio having had unnecessary doubts, made this course always a disagreeable and a last resort.[6] The result was that the judges commonly preferre eliminate the questionable evidence altogether, to try the case on wha other evidence could be mustered, and to solve all questions that were arguable (whether the judge himself had doubts or not) in favor o accused.[7] As the exact distinction was not always preserved between [5] "Most persons accused of crime are poor, stupid, and helpless" (Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 442).

[6] There are twenty reported Nisi Prius rulings on confessions for every full-bench decision. Nor did the creation of the Court for Crown Cases (in 1865) much improve for it contained less than half (five) of judges (so that its authority was not sentative), and the reservations of quest it do not seem to have been more freqn

[7] Said Baron Parke, in 1852, com ing a confession because it was clearly inadmissible and rejecting it merely because a possible objection existed, the law of confessions came to be built up out of rulings which were strictly not precedents at all, but merely expressions of the cautious attitude of a careful Nisi Prius judge, and not fitted to be taken as precedents. That this was their true place may be seen by a comparison of the Nisi Prius rulings with the full-bench decisions; for the leading judgments of the full bench — in such cases as Gibney's, Moore's, Wheater's, Scott's, Baldry's — are precisely those in which rational principles are most clearly supported and the narrow hesitation of the Nisi Prius rulings repudiated and their tendency from time to time checked. To the natural influence, then, of the badly-constructed system of judicial organization we must attribute much of the apparent irrationality that disfigured the law of confessions.

(3) A third reason, and one amply sufficient in itself to account for the narrowness of confession rulings, and for much besides, was the extraordinary handicap placed upon the accused at common law in the shape of his inability either to testify for himself or to have counsel to defend him. The right to have the aid of counsel was not granted as a general one until 1836;[8] and although as early as 1750 it had become customary to allow counsel to cross-examine for the accused and to do everything but address the jury,[9] this custom was by no means unbroken and fell far short in efficiency of being equivalent to a right. The competency to testify on his own behalf was for long withheld from the accused person;[10] and the unsworn address to the jury, which he was allowed to make, was very different from the right to testify in his own behalf, and was probably not of great consequence as furnishing testimonial material.[11] In view of the apparent unfairness of a system which practically told the accused person, "You cannot be trusted to speak here or elsewhere in your own behalf, but we shall use against you whatever you may have said," it was entirely natural that the judges should employ the only makeweight which existed for mitigating this unfairness and restoring the balance, namely, the doctrine of confessions. They tried to restore the balance by excluding confessions upon every available pretext. There was a definite doctrine which legitimately applied to confessions and might rationally exclude them in certain rare cases, and on this doctrine the judges inclined to lay violent hands, and to use it as a weapon for that general exclusion which commended itself to their sense of fairness. In itself, however, it had very narrow limits, utterly insufficient to accomplish the purposes which fairness dictated; and the result was that, while the purpose was a good one, it overbore the principle, which was thus wrested beyond its legitimate use. Hence an irreconcilable conflict between the normal and on the state of the law, in R. v. Baldry (2 Den. Cr. C. 436): "We all know how it occurred. Every judge decided by himself upon the admissibility of the confession, and he did not like to press against the prisoner, and took the merciful view of it."

[8] 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 114, § 1.

[9] Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 425.

[10] Until 1898, St. 61 & 62 Vict. c. 36.

[11] Compare § 579, ante.

accepted theory or principle for excluding confessions, and the abnormal use practically made of it for ulterior purposes. Damage was done to legal principle; but fortunately not damage so serious that it cannot be cured, now that the conditions leading to it have in part at least disappeared.

In view of these considerations, it is easy to see why the law of confessions came to develop what seem to us, in another country and in other times, absurd and dangerous sentimentalities, and why there is no necessity whatever for our retention of the distortions and irrational excrescences which, as handed down to us in the English rulings of the early 1800s, have served to obscure the correct and entirely rational principle of exclusion applicable to confessions. No one of these three considerations above pointed out applies to our conditions. The spirit of the community, whether we choose to call it by the name of liberty or by the name of anarchy (and it has certainly the evil as well as the good savor), is a spirit of fearlessness of superior social and political power; of restiveness and struggling against bonds, not of orderly submission; of bold (if superficial) readiness to claim "rights," not of ignorant surrender to demands; and, in general, of keen appreciation of the possibilities of evading justice, rather than of cowed obedience to any authority however oppressive. Furthermore, the power of revision of confession-law on appeal to the higher tribunal is universal. Finally, the accused person may everywhere testify for himself,[12] and has the fullest assistance of a bar not remarkable for its scrupulousness in criminal cases. All those circumstances are thus wanting which explain and excuse the unnatural development of the law of confessions in the hands of the English judges of a past generation. There is for us no such explanation and no such excuse. The perpetuation here of the Nisi Prius doctrines of the first part of the 1800s is now nothing but sentimentalism, a false tenderness to criminals, and an unnecessary deviation from principle.[13] The orthodox principle, that a confession may be excluded when the inducement was such as probably to produce an untrue confession, is amply fair and cautious, and should be applied in its original and pure form.

§ 866. Value of Confessions; Explanation of Conflicting Opinions. But, it may be asked, even after eliminating all these explanatory considerations of an extrinsic nature, are there not, after all, inherent weaknesses in confessions, even under the most favorable social and legal conditions, which should induce their exclusion on grounds of caution? If not, how do we account for the repeated utterances of the best authorities pointing out the dangerousness of accepting confessions and urging great caution? Does not this opinion count for something?

It is true that there exists a decided conflict of opinion, at first sight inexplicable, as to the evidential value of confessions. On the one hand, we find writers and judges of wide experience affirming the slender value of confes-

[12] Except in Georgia, where the accused makes a "statement."

[13] The most notable example, of course, of this unreasonable perpetuation, in present times of these inappropriate doctrines, is the Federal case of U. S. v. Bram, 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 183.

sions and urging the greatest caution in their use;[1] some of these declarations, however, being merely the reproduction of a classical predecessor's language.[2] On the other hand, we find persons of equal authority offering, in equally positive and unqualified language, that confessions are the highest kind of evidence.[3] There must be some key to this conflict. How plausible each side of the controversy is, and how forcible the impression its influence may produce for the moment, appears when we see the same judge — Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell) — in almost the same year expressing opinions diametrically opposed.[4]

Of course a partial explanation is — as Mr. Joy has observed[5] — that confessions vary in value according to the circumstances in which they are made. Some are clearly trustworthy; others are worthless. This will account for the hasty indignation or the favorable comment which a judge might express in general terms when he had in mind only the concrete instance of weak or strong evidence that happened to be before him. But it hardly explains the constant use of general terms of satisfaction or disapproval by the representatives of both views.

The real explanation lies in the mixture of good and bad qualities likely to be present in all attempts to use confessions. We must separate (1) the confession as a proved fact, from (2) the process of proving an alleged confession. (1) Now, assuming the making of a confession to be a completely proved fact — its authenticity beyond question and conceded, — then it is certainly true that we have before us the highest sort of evidence. The confession of a crime is usually as much against a man's permanent interests as anything well can be; and, in Mr. Starkie's phrase, no innocent man can be supposed ordinarily to be willing to risk life, liberty, or property by a false confession. Assuming the confession as an undoubted fact, it carries a per-

[1] E. g. Foster, High Treason, c. III. sect. 8 ("Hasty confessions, made to persons having no authority to examine, are the weakest and most suspicious of all evidence"); Burn, Justice of the Peace, I, 566, quoted in Joy, Confessions ("Magistrates cannot be too cautious in receiving confessions, as they very rarely flow from a conscientious desire to offer reparation for the injury committed, but are generally made either under an implied or express promise of favour, if not extorted by threat or through fear"; Chetwynd, Supplement to above: "This kind of evidence I have always found, in the words of that truly learned judge, Sir Michael Foster, to be the most suspicious of all testimony"); Sir William Scott, in Williams v. Williams, 1 Hagg. Cons. 304 ("The court must remember that confession is a species of evidence which, though not inadmissible, is regarded with great distrust. There is a canon particularly pointed against them, which says, Nec partium confessioni fides habeatur").

[2] Blackstone, Commentaries, IV, 357 ("The weakest and most suspicious of all testimony"); but here he is evidently copying Foster, supra.

[3] Grose, J., in Lambe's Case, 2 Leach, 3d ed., 629 ("the highest and most satisfactory proof of guilt"); Sir Wm. Scott, in 3 Hagg. Cons. 315 ("I need not observe that confession generally ranks high, or I should say, highest in the scale of evidence. Habemus confitentem reum is demonstration; unless indirect motives can be assigned to it"); Starkie, Evidence, I, 52 ("One of the surest proofs of guilt"); Nott, J., in Columbia v. Harrison, 2 Mills Const. 215 ("A voluntary confession is in most cases the highest evidence that can be given" Swift, Evidence, 133 ("the most conclusive evidence)"; so, also, Putnam, J., in 9 Wendell, 507; Rothrock, C. J., in 48 Ia. 384; Harlan, J., in Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 584, 4 Sup. 202.

[4] In Johnson v. People, 197 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 288 (1902), is an example of the confusion which arises from an indiscriminate mingling of these two generalities in instructions to a jury.

[5] Joy, Confessions, 109: "It appears inaccurate to give all kinds of confessions the same confidence or to treat them alike with distrust. Like all other kinds of admissions, they admit of all shades of certainty and probability, from a solemn estoppel by matter of record to the slightest presumption arising from the most casual, suspicious, or doubtful expressions."

suasion which nothing else does, because a fundamental instinct of human nature teaches each one of us its significance. (2) But how do we get to believe in the fact of a confession having been made? Always and necessarily by somebody's testimony. And what is our experience of that sort of testimony on which we are asked to believe that a confession was made? A varying and sometimes discouraging experience. Paid informers, treacherous associates, angry victims, and overzealous officers of the law, — these are the persons through whom an alleged confession is often, perhaps oftenest, presented; and it is at this stage that our suspicions are aroused and our caution stimulated. Suppose a judge is offered from the lips of a single witness a detailed and complete avowal of guilt, attributed to the accused, and suppose the accused denies absolutely the fact of confession; suppose the judge now to think to himself, "Here is a confession which, if authentic, would make this man's guilt clear beyond doubt. But do you expect us to take it as authentic, against his denial, on the word of this man alone, who has such and such strong motives for inventing it or for misinterpreting what was said? Must we not listen to him with the greatest doubt and suspicion?" Then, would it not be natural for the judge, in commenting on such evidence to the jury, to say: "What you have heard here from this man about a supposed confession is to be taken with caution; for that is the weakest and most suspicious kind of evidence?" This is a natural and proper attitude, and it is precisely that of the authorities above quoted. They were thinking, not of the confession as evidence of the act, but of the testimony to the alleged confession. Take, for instance, the phrase above of Mr. Justice Foster's, which has been quoted again and again (with and without acknowledgment) in the records of the profession for a century and a half, in the mangled and misleading form that "confessions are the weakest and most suspicious of all evidence." Why did he so regard them? Not because of their own evidential weakness; but for the following reasons:

> "Proof may be too easily procured; words are often misreported — whether through ignorance, inattention, or malice, it mattereth not to the defendant, he is equally affected in either case; and they are extremely liable to misconstruction; and withal, this evidence is not in the ordinary course of things to be disproved by that sort of negative evidence by which the proof of plain facts may be and often is confronted."

In other words, the suspicion that he has found it necessary to entertain is directed entirely to the work of proving an alleged confession. This is the reason above suggested as the real cause of the distrust; we are ready enough to trust the confession if there really was one, but we are going to doubt and suspect for a long time before we accept it as a fact. Mr. J. Erle touched the kernel of the subject when he said:[6] "I am of opinion that when a confession is well proved, it is the best evidence that can be produced." Furthermore, it is precisely because the confession, if a fact, is so weighty and produces such a close approach to complete persuasion, that we are inclined to hesitate and demand the most satisfactory testimony before we accept that as a fact which, if believed, will practically render other evidence superfluous.

[6] 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 446.

This seems to be the simple explanation of the apparently contradictory views; if we distinguish the confession as evidence from the evidence of the confession, we find that few have ever really doubted that the first is in itself of the highest value, while the second is always to be suspected. The moral is that the proper course lies, not in distorting the legitimate principles of confession law, but in exacting more, in the way of quantity and quality, of the testimony by which alleged confessions are presented.[7]

§ 867. Future of the Doctrine. In conclusion, two considerations not often kept in mind must be emphasized.

In the first place, the only real danger and weakness in a confession — the danger of a false statement induced by an important advantage — is of a slender character, and the cases of that sort are of the rarest occurrence. No trustworthy figures of authenticated instances exist; but they are concededly few.[1] Now if it were a question of receiving the confession as conclusive, i. e. as equivalent to a plea of guilty, we might well prefer to be extremely cautious (as under the early traditional practice already described), and let the trial take its ordinary course. But as it is a mere matter of giving or not giving one more piece of evidence to the jury, and as the accused has ample opportunity of offering any facts affecting the weight of the confession, it is entirely unnecessary to bar out all confessions whatever by broad and artificial tests, merely on account of this slender, impalpable, and rare risk of falsity. To employ an anomalous occurrence as the basis of indiscriminate exclusion is not reasonable.[2] It is simply, in the language of [7] Whether an instruction should be given on the value of confessions is considered in the following cases: 1903, Burnett v. People, — Ill. —, 68 N. E. 505; 1903, Horn v. State, — Wyo. —, 73 Pac. 705.

[1] The following are the most notable in English and American annals: 1660, Perry's Case, 14 How. St. Tr. 1312 (one of two brothers confessed that he, his brother, and his mother had murdered his master; they were executed, but two years afterward, the master returned home, and explained that he had been kidnapped and sold to the Turks; it was never understood why Perry falsely confessed); 1666, Hubert's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 807, 821 (Hubert voluntarily confessed that he had set the great fire in London Sept. 2, 1666, "yet neither the judges nor any present at the trial did believe him guilty, but that he was a poor distracted wretch weary of his life and chose to part with it in this way"); 1810 (?), Wood's Case, Life of Sir S. Romilly, 3d ed., II, 42 (court-martial for mutiny; here the accused "had applied to another man to write a defence for him, and he had read it, thinking it calculated to excite compassion"; the man was executed before the falsity was discovered); 1833, Sharpe's Case, Annual Register, Chronicle, p. 74 (murder in Chelsea; one Sharpe gave himself up for it, confessing his complicity; shortly afterwards he retracted it; "I made my confession through jealousy; some time ago three of my children died, and it preyed on my mind; and one night I gave myself up for murdering them, when it was all false; and on another occasion I gave myself up for a robbery"; this was confirmed; and as no other evidence of his connection with the murder was discovered, he was discharged from custody); 1819, Boorn's Case, Vt., Greenleaf, Evid., 15th ed., § 214 note, 10 North Amer. Review 418 (confession of murder, made at the advice of friends, in the face of damaging evidence, and in the hope of a recommendation to mercy). For additional instances, mostly from foreign annals, see the citations of the following writers: Chitty, Criminal Law, I, 85; Wharton, Criminal Law, 315; Best, Evidence, §§ 559–572; Monck, "Confessions of the Innocent" (not accessible at this writing). Compare also what is said post, § 2070, in examining the rule for corroboration.

[2] 1847, Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Cowan, 7 Ired. 246: "It is not sufficient to impugn the principle established by these cases that there have been instances in which men have charged themselves with offences which they did not commit or which had never been perpetrated; for that argument would destroy all confidence

Chief Justice Paxson already quoted, an exhibition of sentimentalism toward criminals.

Again, the notion that confessions should be guarded against and discouraged is not a benefit to the innocent, but a detriment. A full statement of the accused person's explanations, made at the earliest moment, is often the best means for him of securing a speedy vindication.[3] The circumstances of suspicion may often be disposed of by a simple explanation, so clear and convincing that immediate release follows as a matter of course; while the clues which the innocent accused may be able to furnish will be equally serviceable in securing that evidence against the real culprit which a delay may frequently render unavailable. When the officers of justice find confessions indiscriminately discouraged and rebuked by the judge, the effect of an enforced silence on the part of accused persons is likely on the whole to be to the disadvantage of the in[illegible].

The policy of the future, then, should be to receive all well-proved confessions in evidence, and to leave them to the jury, subject to all discrediting circumstances, to receive such weight as may seem proper. The advent of a fourth stage in the history of confession-law may be thought to be indicated in the repeated protests, already quoted, against the excesses of the bygone practice.[4] The tendency they represent shows as yet a promise, rather than an achievement, of reform. But it has helped to provide the opportunity, whenever the inclination shall come; for it has emphasized, particularly in some of the later American opinions, the correct theory of exclusion; and this orthodox theory, so much departed from in the last century, is amply sufficient to readjust beneficially, without any change of legal principles, the practice of the future.

in evidence, circumstantial or direct, since by each human tribunals have been or may be misled. But the administration of justice cannot depend upon such nice possibilities. It may safely, and indeed must necessarily, proceed upon the common experience of men's motives of action and of the tests of truth. Now few things happen seldomer than that one in the possession of his understanding should of his own accord make a confession against himself which is not true. Innocence or weakness is therefore sufficiently guarded by the rule which excludes a confession unduly obtained by hope or fear." So also Scott, J., in State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 231; Story, J., in U. S. v. Gibert, 2 Sumn. 19, 28.

[3] Compare Pollock, C. B., and Erle, J., in R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 443, 445.

[4] Lord Campbell, C. J., in R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 457 (1852): "If the matter were res integra, I should perhaps have doubted whether it might not have been advisable to allow the confession [in general] to be given in evidence, and let the jury give what weight to it they pleased."

This attitude, based on the above considerations, has expressly been taken, since the above passage was first printed, by Emery, J., in State v. Grover (1902), 96 Me. 363, 52 Atl. 757.

END OF VOLUME I.