CIHM
Microfiche Series
(Monographs)

ICMH Collection de microfiches
(monographies)

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproductions / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

Technical and Bibliographic Notes / Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- ☐ Coloured covers/ Couverture de couleur
- ☐ Covers damaged/ Couverture endommagée
- ☐ Covers restored and/or laminated/ Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- ☐ Cover title missing/ Le titre de couverture manque
- ☐ Coloured maps/ Cartes géographiques en couleur
- ☐ Coloured ink (i.e. other then blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- ☐ Coloured plates and/or illustrations/ Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- ☐ Bound with other material/ Relié avec d'autres documents
- ☑ Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/ La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure
- ☐ Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/ Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.

- ☐ Coloured pages/ Pages de couleur
- ☐ Pages damaged/ Pages endommagées
- ☐ Pages restored and/or laminated/ Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- ☑ Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/ Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- ☐ Pages detached/ Pages détachées
- ☑ Showthrough/ Transparence
- ☐ Quality of print varies/ Qualité inégale de l'impression
- ☐ Continuous pagination/ Pagination continue
- ☐ Includes index(es)/ Comprend un (des) index

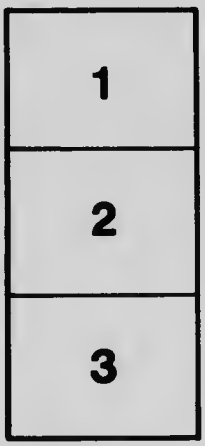
  Title on header taken from:/ Le titre de l'en-tête provient:

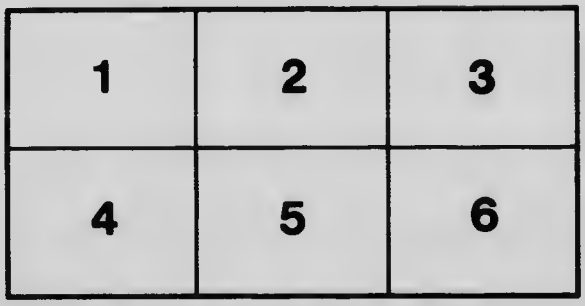
- ☐ Title page of issue/ Page de titre de la livraison
- ☐ Caption of issue/ Titre de départ de la livraison
- ☐ Masthead/ Générique (périodiques) de la livraison

☑ Additional comments:/ Commentaires supplémentaires: Various pagings.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/ Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

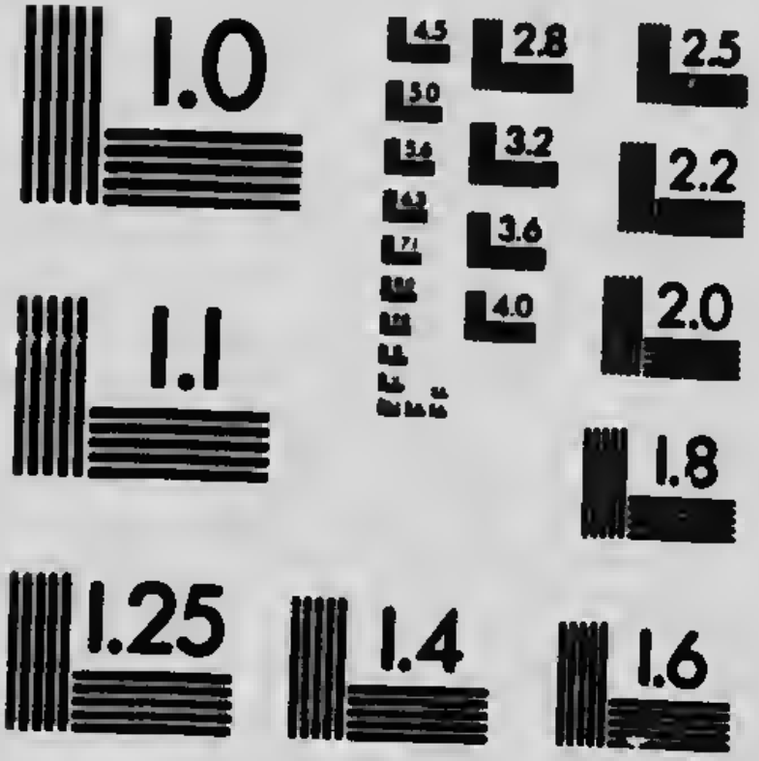
10X	12X	14X	16X	18X	20X	22X	24X	26X	28X	30X	32X
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	✓	☐	☐	☐





MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

A TREATISE

ON

THE SYSTEM OF EVIDENCE IN TRIALS AT COMMON LAW

VOLUME I.

A

TREATISE

ON THE SYSTEM OF

EVIDENCE

IN

TRIALS AT COMMON LAW

INCLUDING

THE STATUTES AND JUDICIAL DECISIONS OF
ALL JURISDICTIONS OF THE
UNITED STATES, ENGLAND, AND CANADA

BY

JOHN HENRY WIGMORE

PROFESSOR OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE IN THE LAW SCHOOL OF NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

IN FOUR VOLUMES

VOLUME I.

CANADIAN EDITION

TORONTO: CANADA LAW BOOK COMPANY
BOSTON: LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY
1905

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, CAMBRIDGE, U. S. A.

TO THE MEMORY OF

THE PUBLIC SERVICES AND THE PRIVATE FRIENDSHIP

OF

TWO MASTERS IN THE LAW OF EVIDENCE

CHARLES DOE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

JUDGE AND REFORMER

AND

JAMES BRADLEY THAYER OF MASSACHUSETTS

HISTORIAN AND TEACHER

1574, Serjeant Plowden, in Eyston v. Studd, Plowden's Reports 465: "Our law, like all others, consists of two parts, viz., of body and soul. The letter of the law is the body of the law, and the sense and reason of it is the soul, quia ratio legis est anima legis. And the law may be resembled to a nut, which has a shell, and a kernel within; the letter of the law represents the shell, and the sense of it the kernel. So you will receive no benefit by the law if you rely only upon the letter."

1783, Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, in R. v. Bembridge, Howell's State Trials, XXII, 155: "The law does not consist in particular instances, though it is explained by particular instances and rules; but the law consists of principles, which govern specific and individual cases as they happen to arise."

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, 2d edition, Preface to Part II: "We all confess, but few adequately perceive, why it is so difficult to recollect a dry rule of practice; and we incorrectly impute to a defect of memory what in reality is attributable to our never having adequately known the subject. The simple truth is that reason or principle is the appropriate food of the mind; and it follows that no position is received with adequate appetite unless it be associated with the reason upon which it is founded."

1897, Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Address at Boston: "A body of law is more rational and more civilized when every rule it contains is referred articulately and definitely to an end which it subserves and when the grounds for desiring that end are stated or are ready to be stated in words."

PREFACE.

In the Ninth Book of the Analects of the Confucian Sage this saying is recorded: "The Master said: 'There are some persons with whom we may pursue our studies in common, yet we shall find them unable to progress to general principles. Or, if they attain to principles, we shall find them unable to accept a common understanding of them. Or, if they reach this common understanding, we find them unable to use the principles with us in their applications.'" This saying comes true, often enough, for our profession of the law. Certainly it is verified in the law of Evidence. There was a stage in the history of its thought (and not so long ago) when it was seldom perceived to involve a system of general principles. When this perception came, in time, hardly any two writers were found to agree on the analysis and grouping of the system; and, sometimes, not even on the statement of the same principle. And to-day, as always, the chief practical difficulty in the law of Evidence lies in the application of it, — in distinguishing the bearings of different principles upon the same evidential fact.

The particular aspiration of this Treatise is, first, to expound the Anglo-American law of Evidence as a system of reasoned principles and rules; secondly, to deal with the apparently warring mass of judicial precedents as the consistent product of these principles and rules; and, thirdly, to furnish all the materials for ascertaining the present state of the law in the half a hundred independent American jurisdictions.

The first of these aims ought not to be the most difficult, possessing as we do in our Reports a thesaurus of judicial expositions, profuse and lucid, of the reasons and policies of our rules of Evidence. And yet it is to the law of Evidence least of all that the profession has been used to look for reasons. Rather (in common opinion) does that law, like Falstaff, yield no man a reason upon compulsion, — though they be indeed plenty as blackberries. Perhaps, to be sure, this is merely a part of the general tendency, induced amid the hurry and pressure of the practitioner's calling, to rest upon a rule of thumb or the latest and nearest case. "The gentlemen of the bar," declared John Horne Tooke, with the hostile sarcasm of a layman, conducting his own celebrated defence against eminent counsel, "are very wise indeed in all the applications of the law — because from thence arise all their fees; but in regard to the cause of the law, they very rarely consider it, — for no gain can arise to them from so doing." And yet the rules of Evidence, over and above others, have come to bear, even within the profession itself, the stigma of technical arbitrariness and obstructive unreason. "My Evidence Bill," said a gentleman of legal attainments to Sir James Stephen, "would be a very short one; it would consist of one rule, to this effect: 'All rules of evidence are hereby abolished.'"

Nevertheless, when all is known and examined, the reproach is not merited. That distinguished legislator, Sir James Stephen himself (and the domination of his thought in our law of Evidence during the past generation has been rivalled only by that of Professor Thayer), was able, after a practical judicial experience second to no man's, to devote his greatest work "to prove the proposition that the English rules of Evidence are not a mere collection of arbitrary subtleties which shackle, instead of guiding, natural sagacity." Nor can it be charged to the judges, or to their declared judgments, that they have failed to supply the materials for a right apprehension of the law's reasoning. "Let all people," said Lord Chancellor Parker, two centuries ago, "be at liberty to know what I found my judgment upon; that so, when I have given it in any cause, others may be at liberty to judge of me"; and it is in this spirit that they have acted throughout the modern development of the law of Evidence. Their reasonings are scattered copiously through the pages of the Reports. It is not that the judges have failed to supply them; it is we who have failed to consider them. When Hobbes' Philosopher reproaches the Lawyer, in their Dialogue on the Common Laws, that "the great masters of the mathematics do not so often err as the great professors of the law," the Lawyer's retort is a just and appropriate one: "If you had applied your reason to the law, perhaps you would have been of another mind." The rules of Evidence, as recorded in our law, may be said to be essentially rational. The reason may not always be a good one, in point of policy. But there is always a reason.

If we are to save the law for a living future, if it is to remain manageable amidst the spawning mass of rulings and statutes which tend increasingly to clog its simplicity, we must rescue these reasonings from forgetfulness. A main attempt, therefore, in the following pages and in the preparation for them, has been to search out and to emphasize the accepted reasons for each rule. As an important aid to their exposition, the method has been employed of setting forth, by excerpts, the most influential, the most lucid, and the most carefully reasoned passages anywhere recorded in judicial annals, — the best things that have been said upon the rules of Evidence. Multa ignoramus, Coke warns us, *quæ non lateren*t, si veterum lectio nobis esset familiaris. The encyclopedic method, compiling in concise form the barren summaries of voluminous originals, may become an inevitable one in our law. But (as a great historian once lamented, in describing the downfall of classical learning in the Middle Ages) such a method is "a usual concomitant of declining literature; for it supersedes the use of the great writers, and effects the oblivion of good models." One of the greatest services (but little mentioned) of Professor Langdell's modern system of case-study in schools of law has been to enlarge and perpetuate, for each new generation of the profession, this familiarity with good models of judicial reasoning. For the law of Evidence, the oblivion of the originals would have the worst consequences. But with these gleanings of the best passages, collated and preserved in form for convenient access, it may be hoped that the reasons of the law will not be buried from daily understanding and that the life of the rules will not be lost.

The second aim of this Treatise — the alignment of the mass of precedents as a consistent product of these principles and rules — would by some be thought to need nothing short of the forcible methods of a Procrustes. The mere mass of these precedents is bewildering. The pronouncements of independent Courts are in constant contrast. The inherent working of the rules of Evidence is to admit or exclude a fact according to the nature of the particular objection brought against it, and thus the very same fact may be found excluded and admitted with seeming inconsistency. These influences have brought the professional use of precedents to a singular pass. A recent President of the American Bar Association has criticised the present conditions in radical language: "A judge may decide almost any question any way, and still be supported by an array of cases. Cases are our counters, and there are no coins. Our legal arguments are for the most part a mere casino-like matching and unmatching of cases, involving little or no intellectual effort. The law is ceasing to be a question of principles, and is becoming a mere question of patterns." What the remedy is, for the profession and for the law at large, is another matter. But for the expounder of the law it is certainly a knotty problem how to exhibit in a treatise such consistency as may be found to exist amidst the mass of precedents. In the following pages, the effort has been made in several ways to emphasize those features which reduce the apparent inconsistencies. For one thing, the independence of the different Courts has been recognized, by arranging the rulings in the alphabetical order of jurisdictions, in chronological sequence within each jurisdiction, and by separating each group (where numerous rulings occur on the same point) by the italicized title of the State or Territory. The fact that there are half a hundred practically independent jurisdictions must be conceded and faced. What is the law? is a question which cannot be answered except as with fifty tongues speaking at once. What the law is in Illinois may well be not the law in Massachusetts or in California. It is time for the profession to discard the amiable pretence that precedents can be cited interchangeably. The treatise, on the one hand, is not to represent that the rule is unsettled because there are inconsistent rulings; for opposition is not inconsistency, and independence of jurisdiction leads naturally to opposition of rules. The practitioner, on the other hand, can often expect not much more of the treatise than to furnish the materials for ascertaining what is the rule in a particular jurisdiction. If this independence of jurisdiction be steadily recollected, three-quarters of the reproach of uncertainty disappears. Still further, much can be done to remove the remaining inconsistency, for the law of Evidence in particular, by the use of copious cross-references. The chameleon-like application of the rules demands this. When Doe's statement, for example, regarding his tenancy of an estate, is offered in evidence, it is perfectly proper to admit it as a hearsay statement against interest, if he is shown to be deceased, or to receive it as a party's admission, if Doe is an opponent or predecessor in title, or to admit it as a possessor's verbal act, if Doe was a possessor; and it may be excluded in one ruling, from one of these points of view, and admitted in another, and excluded in a third, from another of these points of view; and yet there is no real inconsistency, nor any uncertainty, — except for those who do not know the character of their law of Evidence. For those, then, who realize these inherent possibilities in the law of Evidence (and none others should ever attempt to work with it), there is ample succor, through the mist of apparent uncertainties, if constant beacons of multiple reference be placed at every possible cross-roads. In the lack of a uniform nomenclature and of accepted catch-words for every rule, no one can anticipate all the turns of thought that may occur to each practitioner. But a great deal can by this means be done to direct the intelligent searcher to the various plausible aspects of the particular evidential fact which he desires to offer or to oppose.

The third aim of this Treatise — to furnish all the materials for ascertaining the present state of the law in each of the American jurisdictions — is something which has been undertaken, not because it is believed to be feasible in accurate completeness, but merely because it needs to be done, and therefore ought at least to be attempted. Of the particular features of the present attempt, only two of the most important need here be noted. First, under each rule (excepting those now wholly abolished, such as the general disqualification by interest), the early as well as the recent cases have been included. The judicial oblivion of many of the former has done more than anything else to create whatever there is of real uncertainty in the law. For example, in a Court on the Great Lakes, having fifty years of history, and some fourteen precedents under a certain rule, a recent opinion is found to cite two of these only, and yet to invoke needlessly half a dozen from other Courts, ignoring the round dozen of its own, — fortunately without happening to upset them. In an older Court, on the Atlantic, at about the same period, a new limitation of another rule is started, in unconscious disregard of its own prior rulings, and this modern novelty, soon followed elsewhere upon the solid authority of that Court, is set going into several other jurisdictions, and now breeds new controversy and annual uncertainty in a topic where settled peace had once reigned. The cases, then, and all the cases, should be the ultimate aim of one who would bear witness to the present state of the law.

Yet not the cases only; for a second and to-day equally vital part of the material lies in the statutes. How much our judicial law of Evidence has been overlaid and intertwined with statutes is almost incredible, until we come to take deliberate reckoning. In mere numbers, the citations of statutes in the following pages are nearly one-fourth as many as the rulings. In practical significance, the proportion is scarcely less. Blackstone divided statutes into two classes, declaratory and remedial. The American statutes upon the law of Evidence may be included in three classes, — those which were necessary to remedy the common law, those which the legislators erroneously thought were necessary, and those which they knew were unnecessary. The first class includes those in which the common law was changed (and, beyond doubt, in most instances, with good cause); they number something more than a third of all. The second class embraces those which tried to remedy a supposed need, but did no more than the common law could have done without them, — had the legislators but known it. The third includes those codified enactments which were intended merely to declare what every one knew to be and wished to preserve in the law; some of these shafts, by missing the mark, have dealt dole to good law; many others, blunt and harmless, have been quietly pc d by the judges, whose principles have continued to date from the ori al precedents. It is fortunate that no Court has ever conceded to any Code a monopoly of the extant rules. The law of to-day, in any jurisdiction, is a blended mass. Statutes and rulings, old and new, must alike be scanned; and .ie time for a real Code has not yet come.

But a word of disclaimer must here be entered against any expectation of absolute completeness of citation in the following pages. Much is missing, — in part by necessity, in part by a choice based on what was feasible. All the material of the substantive law, often miscalled "evidence," is without the present purview, — such as the "evidence" necessary and admissible in burglary, in debt, and the like.[1] For a few rules, wholly created by statute, the judicial interpretations, where unmanageable in bulk and purely local in significance, and attainable in the ordinary annotations to statutory compilations, have been left aside. Certain groups of statutes, merely appurtenant to a statute of substantive law and certain to be discovered by any one having to do with the latter (such as the statutes defining the unlawful killing of game and then declaring possession of the game to be evidence of the killing), have had to be omitted. At the region where the rules of Evidence fade into the rules of procedure (for example, the procedure of taking depositions), or into the rules of substantive law (for example, the officers authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds), all doubts had to be solved against including such materials. In particular, in the last part of the work, where the functions of judge and jury, and kindred border topics, are dealt with, no more than a general survey of the rules, with a portion of the precedents, is attempted. Finally, there lurks, no doubt, at various points a residuum of undiscovered precedents. The excuse of Hallam may herein pardonably be invoked, that "an author who waits till all the requisite materials are accumulated to his hands is but watching the stream that will run on forever; and though I am fully sensible that I could have much improved what is now offered to the public by keeping it back for a longer time, I should but then have had to lament the impossibility of exhausting my subject." To those who reflect upon the difficulties of such a task, it is not necessary to make apology for the imperfections that may be discovered, or to point out the palliating circumstances.

[1] This is the material covered in volumes II and III of Greenleaf on Evidence and Starkie on Evidence; in § 2, in the present work, an explanation of reasons is given.

Perhaps a closing word should be said for those pages given to the criticism of the existing law and to the history of its past. Something of each of these has a proper place. Sir James Stephen once laid down this canon: "A complete account of any branch of the law ought to consist of three parts, corresponding to its past, present, and future condition respectively; these parts are: Its history; A statement of it as an existing system; A critical discussion of its component parts, with a view to its improvement." That our law of Evidence can be improved upon, no one doubts. That the improvement must be gradual, yet unremitting, is equally certain, — at least if we believe, with Carlyle, that "all Law is but a tamed Furrow-field, slowly worked out and rendered arable from the waste Jungle." That the profession is interested, and that all practicable proposals for progress will have to come from or through the profession itself, must be conceded. Lord Ellenborough once disposed (to his own satisfaction) of a mild measure of reform by the argument that, if the rule of law were changed, "a lawyer who was well stored with these rules would be no better than any other man that is without them." No doubt the profession is to-day beyond the power of such a motive. It has shown again and again that its sympathies are rather with the noble sentiment of Erskine: "No precedents can sanction injustice; if they could, every human right would long ago have been extinct upon the earth." To those sympathies is addressed whatever of criticism has been ventured in the ensuing pages. Valeat quantum valere potest.

As for the history of this law, it need hardly be said that a great deal has remained hitherto undescribed, — if not unexplored. Its one master, now passed away, James Bradley Thayer, set the example and marked the lines for all subsequent research in this part of the subject. As rules directly appurtenant to jury trial, he made clear their development down to the 1600s, when the common-law system definitely obtained the upper hand of its rival, the canon-law system; and some of the rules he brought down to the present day. It was a part of the aim in this work to fill out the missing places, accepting the results already reached by him. Portions of this remaining history, as here set forth, had been seen and accepted by him; but a chief and irremediable disappointment has been that the portions later completed (which represented, indeed, a broader survey of the materials) lost the good fortune of his friendly perusal and possible concurrence.

J. H. W.

Northwestern University Law School,
Chicago, September 16, 1904.

CONTENTS.

PART I. — RELEVANCY.

CHAPTER III.

INTRODUCTORY. — GENERAL THEORY OF RELEVANCY.

CHAPTER IV.

TITLE I. — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

INTRODUCTORY. — GENERAL THEORY OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER V.

SUB-TITLE I. — EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT.

TOPIC I. — PROSPECTANT EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER VI.

CHAPTER VII.

TOPIC II. — CONCOMITANT EVIDENCE (OPPORTUNITY, ALIBI, ETC.).

CHAPTER VIII.

TOPIC III. — RETROSPECTANT EVIDENCE (TRACES, — MATERIAL, ORGANIC, AND MENTAL).

CHAPTER XI.

TOPIC VI. — EVIDENCE TO PROVE KNOWLEDGE, BELIEF, OR CONSCIOUSNESS.

CHAPTER XII.

TOPIC VII. — OTHER OFFENCES OR SIMILAR ACTS, AS EVIDENCE OF KNOWLEDGE, DESIGN, OR INTENT.

CHAPTER XIII.

Topic VIII. — Evidence to prove Habit, Status, Course of Business, or Custom.

CHAPTER XIV.

Topic IX. — Evidence to prove Emotion (Motive, Feeling, Passion).

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER XVII.

TITLE II. — TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE.

INTRODUCTORY. — GENERAL THEORY OF TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SUB-TITLE I. — TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

INTRODUCTORY.

CHAPTER XIX.

TOPIC I. — ORGANIC CAPACITY.

SUB-TOPIC A. — MENTAL DERANGEMENT (INSANITY, IDIOCY, DISEASE, INTOXICATION).

CHAPTER XX.

SUB-TOPIC B. — MENTAL IMMATURITY (INFANCY).

CHAPTER XXI.

SUB-TOPIC C. — MORAL DEPRAVITY.

CHAPTER XXII.

Topic II. — Experiential Capacity.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Topic III. — Emotional Capacity.

Sub-Topic A. — Interest as a Testimonial Disqualification.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Sub-Topic B. — Marital Relationship as a Testimonial Disqualification.

CHAPTER XXV.

Topic IV. — Testimonial Knowledge.

CHAPTER XXVI.

TOPIC V. — TESTIMONIAL RECOLLECTION.

CHAPTER XXVII.

TOPIC VI. — TESTIMONIAL NARRATION OR COMMUNICATION.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

TOPIC VI. (continued). — CONFESSIONS OF AN ACCUSED PERSON.

VOLUME II.

CHAPTER XXIX.

SUB-TITLE II.—TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT.

CHAPTER XXX.

Topic I. — Character, Mental Defects, Bias, etc., used as General Qualities to Discredit.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Topic II. — Evidencing Bias, Interest, and Corruption (by Conduct and Circumstances).

CHAPTER XXXII.

Topic III. — Evidencing Moral Character, Skill, Memory, Knowledge, etc. (by Particular Instances of Conduct).

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

TOPIC IV. — SPECIFIC ERROR (CONTRADICTION)

CHAPTER XXXIV.

TOPIC V. — SELF-CONTRADICTION.

1. General Principle.

2. Collateral Matters Excluded.

3. Preliminary Warning Necessary.

4. What amounts to a Self-Contradiction or Inconsistency.

5. Explaining away the Inconsistency.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Topic VI. — Admissions.

1. General Theory.

2. What Statements are Admissions.

3. Vicarious Admissions (by other than the Party Himself).

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SUB-TITLE III. — TESTIMONIAL REHABILITATION.

Introductory.

A. After Impeachment of Moral Character.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

TITLE III.—AUTOPTIC PROFERENCE (REAL EVIDENCE).

PART II.—RULES OF AUXILIARY PROBATIVE POLICY.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

INTRODUCTION.—GENERAL SURVEY OF AUXILIARY RULES.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

TITLE I. — PRELIMINARY RULES.

SUB-TITLE I. — PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTARY ORIGINALS.

A. Introductory.

B. The Rule Itself.

(a) "In proving a writing."

(b) "Production must be made."

(c) "Unless it is not feasible."

(d) "Of the writing itself."

(e) "Whenever the purpose is to establish its terms."

CHAPTER XLI.

Sub-Topic B. — Preferred Reports of Prior Testimony.

Sub-Topic C. — Sundry Preferred Witnesses.

CHAPTER XLII.

Topic II. — Conclusive (or Absolute) Testimonial Preferences.

TITLE II. — ANALYTIC RULES: THE HEARSAY RULE.

CHAPTER XLIII.

INTRODUCTORY: THEORY AND HISTORY OF THE HEARSAY RULE.

CHAPTER XLIV.

SUB-TITLE I. — THE HEARSAY RULE SATISFIED.

TOPIC I. — BY CROSS-EXAMINATION.

In General.

1. Kind of Tribunal or Officer, as affecting Opportunity of Cross-examination.

2. Issues and Parties, as affecting Opportunity of Cross-examination.

3. Conduct of the Cross-examination itself, as affecting Opportunity of Cross-examination.

CHAPTER XLV.

TOPIC II. — BY CONFRONTATION.

1. General Principle of Confrontation.

2. Circumstances of Necessity Dispensing with Witness' Personal Presence.

CHAPTER XLVI.

SUB-TITLE II. — EXCEPTIONS TO THE HEARSAY RULE.

Introductory: General Theory of the Exceptions.

CHAPTER XLVII.

Topic I. — Dying Declarations.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Topic II. — Statements of Facts against Interest.

CHAPTER XLIX.

TOPIC III. — DECLARATIONS ABOUT FAMILY HISTORY (PEDIGREE).

CHAPTER L.

TOPIC IV. — ATTESTATION OF A SUBSCRIBING WITNESS.

CHAPTER LI.

TOPIC V. — REGULAR ENTRIES.

CHAPTER LII.

TOPIC VI. — SUNDRY STATEMENTS OF DECEASED PERSONS.

CHAPTER LIII.

TOPIC VII. — REPUTATION.

VOLUME III.

CHAPTER LIV.

TOPIC VIII. — OFFICIAL STATEMENTS.

CHAPTER LV.

Topic IX. — Learned Treatises.

Topic X. — Commercial and Professional Lists, Registers, and Reports.

Topic XI. — Affidavits.

Topic XII. — Statements by a Voter.

CHAPTER LVI.

Topic XIII. — Declarations of a Mental Condition.

CHAPTER LVII.

Topic XIV. — Spontaneous Exclamations.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER LVIII.

SUB-TITLE III. — HEARSAY RULE NOT APPLICABLE (VERBAL ACTS, RES GESTÆ, ETC.).

CHAPTER LIX.

SUB-TITLE IV — HEARSAY RULE AS APPLICABLE TO COURT OFFICERS (JURORS, JUDGE, COUNSEL, INTERPRETER).

CHAPTER LX.

TITLE III. — PROPHYLACTIC RULES.

SUB-TITLE I. — OATH.

SUB-TITLE II. — PERJURY-PENALTY.

SUB-TITLE III. — PUBLICITY OF TRIAL.

CHAPTER LXI.

SUB-TITLE IV. — SEQUESTRATION OF WITNESSES.

CHAPTER LXII.

SUB-TITLE V. — PRIOR NOTICE, OR DISCOVERY, OF EVIDENCE TO THE OPPONENT.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER LXIII.

TITLE IV. — SIMPLIFICATIVE RULES.

SUB-TITLE I. — ORDER OF PRESENTING EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER LXIV.

SUB-TITLE II. — RULES OF EXCLUSION FOR CONFUSION OF ISSUES, UNFAIR PREJUDICE, OR UNDUE WEIGHT.

CHAPTER LXV.

SUB-TITLE III. — OPINION RULE.

TOPIC I. — GENERAL PRINCIPLE.

CHAPTER LXVI.

Topic II. — Opinion Rule Applied to Sundry Topics.

CHAPTER LXVII.

Topic III. — Opinion Rule, applied to Testimony to Moral Character and Professional Skill.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

TOPIC IV. — OPINION RULE, AS APPLIED TO HANDWRITING-EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER LXIX.

TITLE V. — QUANTITATIVE RULES.

SUB-TITLE I. — NUMBER OF WITNESSES REQUIRED.

TOPIC I. — RULES DEPENDING ON THE KIND OF ISSUE.

CHAPTER LXX.

SUB-TITLE II. — KINDS OF WITNESSES REQUIRED.

CHAPTER LXXI.

SUB-TITLE III. — VERBAL COMPLETENESS.

CHAPTER LXXII.

SUB-TITLE IV.—AUTHENTICATION OF DOCUMENTS.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

PART III.—RULES OF EXTRINSIC POLICY.

TITLE I.—RULES OF ABSOLUTE EXCLUSION.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

TITLE II.—RULES OF OPTIONAL EXCLUSION.

SUB-TITLE I.—PRIVILEGE, IN GENERAL.

CHAPTER LXXV.

SUB-TITLE II. — VIATORIAL PRIVILEGE.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

SUB-TITLE III. — TESTIMONIAL PRIVILEGE.

TOPIC A. — PRIVILEGED TOPICS.

SUB-TOPIC I. — SUNDRY PRIVILEGED TOPICS.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

SUB-TOPIC II. — PRIVILEGE FOR ANTE-MARITAL FACTS (HUSBAND OR WIFE TESTIFYING AGAINST THE OTHER).

1. In General.

2. Who is prohibited as Husband or Wife.

3. What is prohibited as Testimony.

4. What Testimony is Anti-Marital.

5. Anti-Marital Testimony admitted Exceptionally.

6. Exercise of the Privilege.

7. Statutory Changes.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

SUB-TOPIC III. — PRIVILEGE FOR SELF-CRIMINATING FACTS.

1. In General.

2. Kinds of Facts protected from Disclosure.

3. Form of Disclosure Protected.

VOLUME IV.

Topic B. — Privileged Communications.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

Sub-Topic I. — Confidential Communications in General.

CHAPTER LXXX.

Sub-Topic II. — Communications between Attorney and Client.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

BOOK II. — BY WHOM EVIDENCE MUST BE PRESENTED (BURDEN OF PROOF; PRESUMPTIONS).

TITLE I. — GENERAL THEORY.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

TITLE II. — BURDENS AND PRESUMPTIONS IN SPECIFIC ISSUES.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

BOOK III. — TO WHOM EVIDENCE MUST BE PRESENTED (LAW AND FACT; JUDGE AND JURY).

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

BOOK IV. — OF WHAT PROPOSITIONS NO EVIDENCE NEED BE PRESENTED.

TITLE I. — JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. General Principles.

2. Specific Facts Noticed.

CHAPTER XC.

TITLE II. — JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS.

LIST OF STATUTORY COMPILATIONS AND LATEST REPORTS AND STATUTES CONSULTED.

I. Statutes.

The titles and dates of the compilations of statutes referred to in this work, and the years of the latest session laws consulted in its preparation, are shown in the table below. In a few jurisdictions new official revised compilations have been made since the material was originally collected for this work, but the usual (and culpable) lack of a table of cross-references in the new revision to the former numbering has made it impracticable in this work to insert the new numbering in every instance; for Massachusetts, however (where a perfect table is published), and for South Carolina, the citations to the revisions of 1902 have been added. The large number of statutory citations (some nine thousand in all) made any further collation of the new numbering impracticable; and the examination of the session laws, to date of printing, made it reasonably certain that the legislative changes would all be represented, under one or another form of citation:

Jurisdiction.	Title and Data of Compilation Used.	Date of Latest Session Laws Examined.
England	. . . . .	1903
Canada:
Dominion	Revised Statutes 1886	1902
British Columbia	Revised Statutes 1897	1903
Manitoba	Revised Statutes 1902	1903
New Brunswick	Consolidated Statutes 1877	1903
Newfoundland	Consolidated Statutes 1892	1903
Northwest Territories	Consolidated Ordinances 1898	1903
Nova Scotia	Revised Statutes 1900	1903
Ontario	Revised Statutes 1897	1903
Prince Edward Island	[1]	1903
United States: [2]		1902
Alabama	Code 1897	1901
Alaska	Carter's Laws of Alaska 1900 (U. S. St. 1900, March 3 and June 6)	1903
Arizona	Revised Statutes 1887; Penal Code 1887	1903
Arkansas	Sandels and Hill's Digest of Statutes 1894	1903
California	Codes 1872; Deering's Supplements 1889, Pomeroy's edition of 1901 [3]	1902
Colorado	Mills' Annotated Statutes 1891, Supplement 1896, and Code of Civil Procedure 1896	1902
Columbia (District)	Abert and Lovejoy's Compiled Statutes 1894; Code 1901 (U. S. St. 1901, c. 854)	1903
Connecticut	General Statutes 1887	1903
Delaware	Revised Statutes 1893	1903

[1] There being no compilation here, and the Evidence Act of 1889 having codified most of the rules, no complete search was made for statutes prior to 1889, except that those of 1873 and 1887, dealing with evidence, were collated with that of 1889.

[2] The Legislatures in most States meet biennially, so that the laws of 1902 were in such cases sometimes the latest. In Alabama the laws of 1903 had not come to hand in January, 1904.

[3] A note on the validity of the Commission's amendments of 1901 will be found in § 488.

LIST OF COMPILATIONS CONSULTED.

Jurisdiction.	Title and Date of Compilation Used.	Date of Latest Session Laws Examined.
UNITED STATES:
Florida	Revised Statutes 1892	1903
Georgia	Code 1895; Van Epps' Supplement 1900	1903
Hawaii	Penal Laws 1897; Revised Civil Laws 1897	1901
Idaho	Revised Statutes 1887; Constitution 1899	1903
Illinois	Revised Statutes 1874, Hurd's edition of 1898	1903
Indiana	Thornton's Revised Statutes 1897	1903
Indian Territory.[1]
Iowa	Ebersole's Annotated Code 1897	1902
Kansas	Webb's General Statutes 1897	1903
Kentucky	Carroll's Statutes 1899, and Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure 1895, edition of 1900	1902
Louisiana	Saunders' Revised Civil Code 1888; Garland's Revised Code of Practice 1894 and Supplement 1900; Wolff's Revised Laws 1897; Constitution 1898
Maine	Public Statutes 1883, Supplement 1895	1902
Maryland	Poe's Public General Laws 1888; Supplement 1900	1903
Massachusetts	Public Statutes 1882; Revised Laws 1902	1902
Michigan	Miller's Compiled Laws 1897	1903
Minnesota	Wenzell, Lane, and Tiffany's General Statutes 1894.	1903
Mississippi	Thompson, Dillard, and Campbell's Annotated Code 1892	1903
Missouri	Revised Statutes 1899	1902
Montana	Sanders' Codes and Statutes 1895	1903
Nebraska	Brown and Wheeler's Compiled Statutes 1899	1903
Nevada	Baily and Hammond's General Statutes 1885	1903
New Hampshire	Public Statutes 1891	1903
New Jersey	General Statutes 1896	1903
New Mexico	Compiled Laws 1897	1903
New York	Birdseye's Revised Statutes 1896	1903
North Carolina	Code 1883; Long and Lawrence's Amendments 1897	1903
North Dakota	Revised Codes 1895	1903
Ohio	Bates' Annotated Revised Statutes 1898	1903
Oklahoma	Statutes 1893	1902
Oregon	Hill's Codes and General Laws 1892	1903
Pennsylvania	Pepper and Lewis' Digest 1896	1903
Philippine Islands.[2]		1903
Porto Rico.[2]
Rhode Island	General Laws 1896
South Carolina	Revised Statutes 1893; Code 1902	1903
South Dakota	Grantham's Statutes 1899	1903
Tennessee	Shannon's Annotated Code 1896	1903
Texas	Revised Civil Statutes 1895; Penal Code 1895; Code of Criminal Procedure 1895	1903
United States	Revised Statutes 1878, Supplements 1891, 1895	1903
Utah	Revised Statutes 1898	1903
Vermont	Statutes 1894	1903
Virginia	Code 1897, Supplement 1898	1902
Washington	Ballinger's Annotated Codes and Statutes 1897	1903
West Virginia	Code 1891, third edition	1903
Wisconsin	Sanborn and Berryman's Statutes 1898	1903
Wyoming	Revised Statutes 1887	1903

[1] Governed by Federal and Arkansas statutes, and by Indian law, not here considered.
[2] These laws are not here considered, being chiefly of Spanish origin.

LIST OF LATEST REPORTS CONSULTED.

II. Reports.

Most of the citations of decisions rendered since 1893 have been taken from the reports published in the National Reporter System, as they appeared in weekly numbers. For all decisions reported since the beginning of that System, the duplicate citation has been added, to include both the Official Report and the National Reporter, — most of these duplicate citations being furnished through the courtesy of the West Publishing Company, the remainder added by the author from the Blue Books. As the printing progressed, the duplicate citations of the Official Reports appearing from time to time were obtained from the Third Labels and inserted in the proof. Thus it happens that in the earlier parts of the book most of the citations of decisions of 1903 are to the National Reporters only.

The printing of these present volumes began in January, 1904, and occupied a full year; it was therefore desirable to set a definite point of time for the ending of citations (instead of inserting current late cases in the latter portions of the book only), in order that those who use the book may know where to begin in bringing the later citations down to the date of their consultation. The point taken was therefore that volume of the different National Reporters which ended nearest to January, 1904; this ranged (dating by the weekly issues) between November, 1903, and March, 1904. Substantially, then, the citations come down to the beginning of 1904. The latest volumes of Reporters consulted were as follows:

Atlantic Reporter, vol. 55.
Federal Reporter, vol. 125.
Northeastern Reporter, vol. 68.
Northwestern Reporter, vol. 96.
Pacific Reporter, vol. 73.
Southern Reporter, vol. 35.
Southeastern Reporter, vol. 45.
Southwestern Reporter, vol. 76.
Supreme Court Reporter, vol. 23.

and of Official Reports not covered by the National Reporter System:

District of Columbia Appeals, vol. 21.
Hawaii, vol. 13.

The latest volumes of English and C[illegible]n Reports consulted were as follows:

England, Law Reports, 1903.
Canada (Dominion), vol. 32.
British Columbia, vol. 10, pt. 1.
Manitoba, vol. 12.
New Brunswick, vol. 34.
Newfoundland, vol. 5.
Northwest Territories, vol. 5, pts. 1, 2.
Nova Scotia, vol. 35.
Ontario, Law Reports, vol. 5.
Prince Edward Island, vol. 2.

The reports of the Appellate (intermediate) Courts in Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, New York (Supreme Court), and Texas, have not been cited, except on interesting matters for which there is scanty authority; partly because their rulings are not final, and partly because in some jurisdictions they are expressly made not binding as precedents. The trial rulings of Federal District Courts since the creation of the Circuit Court of Appeals have also been left unnoticed to a similar extent.

III. Citation of this Treatise.

Citations of other parts of this treatise are made herein by number of section (§) and number of note. The notes are numbered continuously within each section.

Between the chapters, and between main subdivisions of each chapter, there are from one to five (occasionally more) numbers omitted; so that the series of numbers does not read consecutively at those points. This is not an inadvertence, nor a sign of materials omitted; but merely a mechanical expedient which became indispensable in working upon a bulky manuscript. In the course of inserting the cross-references (some ten thousand), a great number of the references obviously had to be made, during the progress of the work, to portions of the text yet unwritten; and it therefore became necessary to give to these topics reference-numbers beforehand. In order to allow for occasional additions of topics in the course of the work, these blanks were left in the series. A reference to the California Codes will show that this expedient is not without precedent.

EVIDENCE

IN

TRIALS AT COMMON LAW.

INTRODUCTION.

SCOPE OF THE SUBJECT, AND PRELIMINARY DISTINCTIONS.

CHAPTER I.

§ 1. Definition of Evidence; Distinctions between Law and Fact; between Argument and Evidence. In considering the precise scope to be assigned to the subject of Evidence or Proof, it is to be noticed that the general process of vindicating or enforcing legal rights and duties, both public and private, falls naturally into five stages: 1. The procurement of the parties' appearance before the tribunal, i. e. Process, in the narrow sense; 2. The ascertainment of the subject of the dispute, i. e. Pleading; 3. The attempt at demonstration by the parties of their respective positions, i. e. Trial; 4. The determination of the dispute by the tribunal, i. e. Verdict and judgment; and 5. The enforcement of the tribunal's determination, i. e. Execution, and the like. Clearly the present subject lies somewhere in the third stage. At that point (taking for example's sake a civil suit at common law) the parties have arrived at an issue, and it becomes the plaintiff's interest to demonstrate to the tribunal the existence of the legal relation (a right, as to him; a duty, as to the defendant) which he asserts, and the defendant's interest to show its non-existence.

(a) Law and Fact, distinguished. The material on which this claim of the plaintiff rests, if successful, is composite. Given certain facts or groups of facts, and the State predicates a legal relation between A and B, i. e. is ready to lend its force towards a more or less direct realization of that relation. The establishment of a given claim, then, involves the demonstration

(1) that certain facts or groups of facts exist, (2) that to the contingency of their existence the State attaches the legal consequence now asserted by the claimant. He has thus to satisfy the tribunal in two respects, (1) as to these facts, (2) as to the legal consequence asserted to be attached. In one sense, both these matters are "facts," — in the sense that everything in the cosmos is a fact or phenomenon. But the popular distinction between "fact" and "law" is here as accurate as the situation requires. The requirement is for phrases which shall set off in one class the rule that in this or that instance the State sanctions and will habitually enforce a legal relation of a specific content, and in another class the fact constituting the contingency in which the State predicates this relation. In the former class we are dealing with the general body of legal principles; in the latter, with all other phenomena, so far as they may come within the purview of the law.

That many phenomena (events, or facts) may not at first sight be simple to classify, or easy to deal with, does not affect the reality and positiveness of the distinction. For instance, the circumstance that John Doe owns the farm Blackacre, upon analysis, resolves itself as follows: The legal relation of ownership exists as between John Doe and all others, because (a) John Doe's father, owner of Blackacre, died without a will leaving John Doe his only legitimate child, and (b) under such circumstances the above legal relation attaches as between John Doe and all others. Here (b) is clearly a fact of legal rule, while (a) is for practical purposes an ordinary fact, but (a) may be in turn resolved into facts of legal rule (ownership, legitimacy, and the like) in composition with ordinary facts. In judicial practice, and not in theory only, the distinction will be maintained, for the judge will instruct the jury upon the legal rules necessary for them to know and obey in reaching their ultimate determination. Thus, though such a question as ownership may be handed over for determination to the part of the tribunal usually dealing with ordinary facts alone, the distinction is none the less preserved between legal principles and the other phenomena which we ordinarily call "facts." No closer distinction is here necessary for the determination of the general scope of the subject. It is apparent that the claimant has here two classes of material very different for the purposes of his demonstration. To persuade the tribunal of the existence of the asserted rule of law is a process having its own separate rules, not here involved. To persuade the tribunal of the existence of the required state of facts is the process with which the rules of Evidence or Proof, so called, are for the most part concerned.

(b) Argument and Evidence, distinguished. Within this line, however, must be distinguished two separate processes employing different classes of expedients. The claimant may conceivably offer to the tribunal the very phenomenon in its entirety which is to be the basis of the legal rule asserted; but an instance could hardly occur in practice. Ordinarily, the demonstration can be accomplished only by the use of a number of facts, the final logical result being the establishment of the desired conclusion.

The process would consist in the presentation of these elemental facts and in the piecing of them together so as to reach the conclusion. This process of presentation is a different one from the process of piecing together. The latter is Argumentation. The legitimate quality of Argumentation is the invocation, by counsel, of ordinary rules of logic and rhetoric in the combination of assumed facts. The rules governing this sub-process in the general process of judicial proof form a separate subject of law. It is sufficient here to note that Argument is to be distinguished from the presentation of Evidence.[1]

(c) Definition of Evidence. It is of little practical consequence to construct a formula defining what is to be understood as Evidence. Nevertheless, its content is capable of being stated. What we are concerned with is the process of presenting evidence for the purpose of demonstrating an asserted fact. In this process, then, the term Evidence represents:

Any knowable fact or group of facts, not a legal or a logical principle, considered with a view to its being offered before a legal tribunal for the purpose of producing a conviction, positive or negative, on the part of the tribunal, as to the truth of a proposition, not of law or of logic, on which the determination of the tribunal is to be asked.[2]

Of the definitions of legal evidence that have been proposed from time to time, some have been framed merely in view of emphasizing partial aspects of the subject, others have been intended to embody some theory or classification or the relation between certain parts of the law of evidence; and a comparison of them can hardly be made upon a common basis. Nevertheless, a collation of the classical definitions is interesting, if only for the singular variety of phrasing exhibited upon a subject apparently so simple and so exempt from practical controversy:

1768, Mr. Justice Blackstone, Commentaries, III, 367: "Evidence signifies that which makes clear or ascertains the truth of the very fact or point in issue, either on the one side or the other."

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, I, 9: "That which is legally offered by the litigant parties to induce a jury to decide for or against the party alleging such facts, as

[1] The distinction between argument and evidence is more precisely examined post, § 1806.

[2] A brief comment on some of these phrases and terms is worth while: (1) "Knowable"; this must be noted, because it is certain that no Court would listen to an attempted presentation of that which it considered not knowable. (2) "Event," "fact," "phenomenon"; it is difficult to choose between these terms; none of them is adequate; "fact" seems on the whole the least unsatisfactory. (3) "Considered with a view," etc.; this must be noted, because, for example, the situation of the counsel who is discussing the testimony of his witnesses with his associate in the office must be distinguished from his situation when he is putting the witness on the stand. (4) "Conviction, positive or negative"; it will be seen, in discussing the Burden of Proof, that the process of proof and disproof may be conceived of either as the establishment by both proponent and opponent of their own assertions, one of a given content, the other of a content exactly negative; or as the establishment by the proponent of conviction as to a given assertion and the destruction by the opponent of any conviction as to that assertion. It is not intended here to choose between those views, but merely to cover the case of both the proponent and opponent in the litigation. (5) "Truth of a proposition"; in judicial proceedings we must assume for practical purposes that the subjective phenomena of existence have an objective reality. With reference to the State's force, which the Court will put in motion, the Court's determination upon a question of fact makes that fact for practical purposes a reality. For the purposes of legal procedure, then, the "truth of a proposition" is the result of the Court's determination.

contradistinguished from all comment and argument on the subject, falls within the description of evidence."

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. I, c. I (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, p. 208): "By the term 'evidence' considered according to the most extended application that is ever given to it, may be, and seems in general to be, understood, any matter of fact, the effect, tendency, or design of which, when presented to the mind, is to produce a persuasion concerning the existence of some other matter of fact — a persuasion either affirmative or disaffirmative of its existence. . . . Taking the word in this sense, questions of evidence are continually presenting themselves to every human being, every day, and almost every waking hour of his life. . . . Hereafter, the only sense in which the word is used, is that in which the application of it is confined to juridical, or say legal, evidence. Under this limitation, then, evidence is a general name given to any fact, in contemplation of its being presented to the cognizance of a judge, in the view of its producing in his mind a persuasion concerning the existence of some other fact — of some fact by which, supposing the existence of it established, a decision to a certain effect would be called for at his hands."

1838, Mr. W. Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 1: "Every conclusion of the judgment, whatever may be its subject, is the result of evidence, — a word which . . . is applied to denote the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved."

1842, Mr. John Bouvier, editor, in Bacon's Abridgment, 1st Amer. ed., III, 242, tit. "Evidence": "Evidence is that which demonstrates, makes clear, or ascertains the truth of the very fact or point in issue; or, it is that which is legally submitted to a court and jury, or to either of them, to enable them to decide upon the questions in dispute or issue, as pointed out by the pleadings, and distinguished from all comments or arguments."

1849, Mr. W. M. Best, Evidence, §§ 11, 33: "Evidence, thus understood, has been well defined, — any matter of fact, the effect, tendency, or design of which is to produce in the mind a persuasion, affirmative or disaffirmative, of the existence of some other matter of fact. 'Judicial evidence' may be defined [as] the evidence received by courts of justice in proof or disproof of facts the existence of which comes in question before them. By facts must here be understood the res gestæ of some suit or other matter to which when ascertained the law is to be applied; for although, in logical accuracy the existence or non-existence of a law is a question of fact, it is rarely spoken of as such either by jurists or practitioners."

1876, Mr. Justice Stephen, Digest of Evidence, Art. 1: "'Evidence' means — (1) Statements made by witnesses in court under a legal sanction, in relation to matters of fact under inquiry; . . . (2) Documents produced for the inspection of the Court or judge."

1823, Mr. Justice Edward Livingston, Draft Code, Book of Definitions (Works, ed. 1872, II, 646): "Evidence is that which brings to the mind a just conviction of the truth or falsehood of any substantive proposition which is asserted or denied. Illustrations and developments of the different parts of this definition: I. A conviction produced by evidence which ought not according to the rules of true reason to have that effect is not a just conviction; the law therefore declares what effect different species of evidence ought to have in producing such conviction, and that evidence in its different degrees is called 'legal evidence.' . . . II. The word 'substantive,' in the definition is intended to exclude all such abstract propositions as can be demonstrated to be true or false by the reasoning power, without having recourse to the establishment of other facts. The propositions intended by the definition are either of fact or of law."

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 1: "The word 'evidence,' in legal acceptation, includes all the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved."

1889, Professor J. B. Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence," 3 Harv. Law Rev. 142: "What is our law of evidence? It is a set of rules which has to do with judicial investigations into questions of fact. . . . These rules relate to the mode of ascertaining an unknown, and generally a disputed, matter of fact. But they do not regulate the process of reasoning and argument. . . . When one offers 'evidence,' in the sense of the word which is now under consideration, he offers to prove, otherwise than by mere reasoning from what is already known, a matter of fact to be used as a basis of inference to another matter of fact. . . . In giving evidence we are furnishing to a tribunal a new basis for reasoning. This is not saying that we do not have to reason in order to ascertain this basis; it is merely saying that reasoning alone will not, or at least does not, supply it. The new element which is added is what we call the evidence. Evidence, then, is any matter of fact which is furnished to a legal tribunal — otherwise than by reasoning or a reference to what is noticed without proof — as the basis of inference in ascertaining some other matter of fact." [3]

§ 2. Distinctions between Factum Probandum and Factum Probans; between Rules of Substantive Law and Pleading and of Evidence; between Materiality and Admissibility; between Facts not in Issue and Facts not Admissible. When A is sitting in his office, pondering over an irregularity in the cashier's books, and B approaches him with an earnest proffer of documents and ore-specimens from a Colorado mine which he desires to prove to be a good investment for A's money, A will doubtless reply, "But I cannot listen to your evidence of the richness of the mine, for I am not at this moment considering any proposal to invest in that mine, or in any other asset. What I am now desirous of establishing is whether my clerk is dishonest or has merely made a blunder; and your proposition about the mine being not before me now, your evidence of it is beside the point." Just such a situation is daily presented in every court. Evidence is rejected, not because of any defect in the evidence, but because the proposition to which it is directed is not before the Court. The distinction thus becomes important between factum probandum and factum probans.

(1) Evidence is always a relative term. It signifies a relation between two facts, the factum probandum, or proposition to be established, and the factum probans, or material evidencing the proposition. The former is necessarily to be conceived of as hypothetical; it is that which the one party affirms and the other denies, the tribunal being as yet not committed in either direction. The latter is conceived of for practical purposes as existent, and is offered as such for the consideration of the tribunal. The latter is brought forward as a reality for the purpose of convincing the tribunal that the former is also a reality. No correct and sure comprehension of the nature of any evidential question can ever be had unless this double or relative aspect of it is distinctly pictured. On each occasion the questions must be asked, What is the Proposition desired to be proved? What is the Evidentiary Fact offered to prove it? Part of the confusion which often is found arises from the circumstance that each Evidentiary Fact may in turn become a Proposition to be proved, until finally some ultimate Evidentiary Fact is reached. For example, to prove the Proposition that a murder was committed by John Doe, the Evidentiary Fact may be offered that John Doe left the victim's house shortly after the murder; to prove this in turn, as a Proposition, the Evidentiary Fact may be offered that John Doe's shoes fit the track left near the house by the murderer; and this again, as a Proposition, may be evidenced by the statement of a witness on the stand who has placed the shoe in the tracks. Here each evidentiary fact in its turn becomes a proposition requiring the marshalling of new evidentiary facts, more or fewer according to its complexity. Any specific matter may be Proposition or Evidentiary Fact, according to the point of view of the moment. In one aspect, then, this distinction needs to be observed in that the significance of a ruling upon an offer of evidence may be otherwise misconceived, — as when, for example (according to our loose and inaccurate use of words), it is said that "evidence of" a person's age is offered; for here it cannot be told by the phrasing whether the age is the Evidentiary Fact or the Proposition.

[3] The same author repeats substantially this definition in his Preliminary Treatise, 263, published in 1898.

(2) In a more important way the distinction is again frequently lost sight of by stating a ruling of substantive law or of pleading as if it were a ruling upon a question of evidence. For example, in an action of battery, upon a plea of not guilty, the defendant offers evidence to prove that the plaintiff used insulting words to the defendant before the attack, and this is rejected; here the ruling is in truth that insults constitute no excuse or no ground for mitigation of damages, — a ruling of substantive law; or, perhaps, that such a defence is not available upon a plea traversing the battery, — a ruling of pleading. It is certainly not a ruling upon a question of evidence; it is a ruling that the proposition desired to be proved is either not tenable, by the substantive law, or not issuable, by the law of pleading. The contrast is indicated by the terms Materiality and Admissibility, the former defining the status of the Proposition in the case at large, and the latter defining the relation of an Evidentiary Fact to some Proposition. The two problems are wholly distinct, and yet the inaccuracy of our usage tends constantly to confuse them. Although in some legal treatises the confusion has been perpetuated, yet the most careful modern writers have repeatedly called attention to the impropriety and the harmfulness of this inveterate error:

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. VI, c. V (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 560): "The question, on what facts the decision turns, is a question, not of evidence, but of the substantive branch of the law: it respects the probandum, not the probans: it does not belong to the inquiry, by what sort of evidence the facts of the case may be proved; it belongs to the inquiry, what are the facts of which the law has determined that proof shall be required, in order to establish the plaintiff's claim. This circumstance, obvious as it is, might easily be overlooked by one who had studied the subject only in the compilations of the English institutional writers; who, not content with directing that the evidence be confined to the points in issue, have farther proceeded, under the guise of laying down rules of evidence, to declare, on each occasion, what the points in issue are. One whole volume out of two which compose Mr. Phillipps's treatise on the Law of Evidence, — with a corresponding portion of the other treatises extant concerning that branch of the law, — is occupied in laying down rules concerning the sort of evidence which should be required in different sorts of actions or suits at law. But why should different forms of action require different sorts of evidence? The securities by which the trustworthiness of evidence is provided for, and the rules by which its probative force is estimated, if for every sort of cause they are what they ought to be, must be the same for one sort of cause as for another. The difference is not in the nature of the proof; it is in the nature of the facts required to be proved. There is no difference as between different forms of action, in reason, or even in English law, in respect of the rules relating to the competency of witnesses; nor, in general, to the admissibility or the proof of written documents; nor in respect of any other of the general rules of evidence. What Mr. Phillipps (I mention him only as a representative of the rest) professes, under each of the different forms of action, to tell you, is, what facts, in order to support an action in that form, it is necessary that you should prove. . . . But, to enumerate the facts which confer or take away rights, is the main business of what is called the civil branch of the law; to enumerate the acts by which rights are violated — in other words, to define offences — is the main business of the penal branch. What, therefore, the lawyers give us, under the appellation 'law of evidence,' is really, in a great part of it, civil and penal law. . . . Under the title Burglary, Mr. Starkie begins by saying, that on an indictment for burglary, it is essential to prove, 1st, A felonious breaking and entering; 2dly, of the dwelling-house; 3dly, in the night time; 4thly, with intent to commit a felony. He then proceeds to inform us, that there must be evidence of an actual or constructive breaking; for if the entry was obtained through an open door or window, it is no burglary. . . . Who does not see that all this is an attempt — a lame one, it must be confessed (which is not the fault of the compiler), but still an attempt — to supply that definition of the offence of burglary which the substantive law has failed to afford?"

1881, Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Common Law, 120: "The principles of substantive law which have been established by the courts are believed to have been somewhat obscured by having presented themselves oftenest in the form of rulings upon the sufficiency of evidence. When a judge rules that there is no evidence of negligence, he does something more than is embraced in an ordinary ruling that there is no evidence of a fact. He rules that the acts or omissions proved or in question do not constitute a ground of legal liability, and in this way the law is gradually enriching itself from daily life, as it should. Thus, in Crafton v. Metropolitan Railway Co.,[1] the plaintiff slipped on the defendant's stairs and was severely hurt. The cause of his slipping was that the brass nosing of the stairs had been worn smooth by travel over it, and a builder testified that in his opinion the staircase was unsafe by reason of this circumstance and the absence of a handrail. There was nothing to contradict this except that great numbers of persons had passed over the stairs and that no accident had happened there, and the plaintiff had a verdict. The Court set the verdict aside, and ordered a nonsuit. The ruling was in form that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury; but this was obviously equivalent to saying, and did in fact mean, that the railroad company had done all that it was bound to do in maintaining such a staircase as was proved by the plaintiff. A hundred other equally concrete instances will be found in the text-books. On the other hand, if the Court should rule that certain acts or omissions coupled with damage were conclusive evidence of negligence unless explained, it would, in substance and in truth, rule that such acts or omissions were a ground of liability or prevented a recovery, as the case might be. Thus, it is said to be actionable negligence to let a house for a dwelling knowing it to be so infected with small-pox as to be dangerous to health, and concealing the knowledge."

1898, Professor J. B. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 511–514: "A great portion of these rules [of evidence], as laid down by the Courts and by our text writers, are working a sort of intellectual fraud by purporting to be what they are not. To the utter confusion of all orderly thinking, a Court is frequently represented as passing on questions of evidence when in reality it is dealing with some other branch, either of substantive law or procedure. . . . What is the result of this? Utter confusion of thought, and frequent injustice in decision. Of course when in reality men are discussing a question in the law of partnership, agency, or bankruptcy; or the ground and scope of equity jurisdiction in dealing with fraud, mistake, trusts, or the reforming of documents; or the rules for the construction and interpretation of language; and yet, out of an imagination that they are dealing with rules of evidence, go on to clothe their ideas in the phraseology of that subject; although a right result may be reached, it is not rightly reached, and bewilderment attends the process. . . . This error is deeply ingrained in our cases; and it is a subtle one. But you cannot possibly deal thoroughly and scientifically with this part of our law until the error is cast out, until it is purged of that mass of substantive law, and of mere rules of procedure, and reason, and logic which overloads it. There was a time when all that was said or read to the jury was spoken of as said en evidence al jury. The contrast in mind, when this was said, was between saying something to the Court, in pleading (in the days of oral pleading), and saying it to the jury. But now, for two or three centuries, we have been discussing the admissibility of what is offered in evidence, under a new branch of law, called the rules of evidence; as contrasted with its admissibility under the law of pleading and practice, and the substantive law. . . . It is then fundamental that not all determinations admitting or excluding evidence are referable to the law of evidence. Far the larger part of them are not. An innumerable company of questions, of the sort just alluded to, very often — more often than not, nay, much oftener than not — are dealt with in our text-books and cases as belonging to the law of evidence, when in real truth they ought to be carried to the border line of this subject and respectfully deposited on the other side."

[1] L. R. 1 C. P. 300.

(3) The question, therefore, "Of what Propositions may Evidence be offered?" is not answered by the law of evidence, except in a subordinate way. The answer to it is made in four parts. Evidence may be offered of such Propositions of fact as

(a) Are material by the substantive law to any right or duty, claim or defence;

(b) Are issuable in the case at bar by the terms of the pleadings under the rules of pleading;

(c) Are effective to relieve a party from the establishment of one of the preceding propositions;

(d) Are admissible by the law of evidence as evidentiary facts, and thus may become in turn Propositions to be proved.

The first and the second of these classes clearly do not involve the law of evidence. The third class is concerned with judicial admissions and their congeners;[2] such are really equivalent to a pleading, because they formally waive proof; they are therefore no part of the law of evidence except for the necessity of distinguishing them from other things miscalled admissions. The fourth class alone concerns intrinsically the law of evidence. It rests on the self-evident corollary that, since any Evidentiary Fact may in its turn become a Proposition (supra, par. (1)), evidence to prove it may then be offered. Thus the law of evidence is legitimately concerned solely with the relation between Evidentiary Facts and Propositions; how a given Proposition comes to be eligible for proof is not a part of the law of evidence.

§ 3. Topical Analysis of the System of Evidence. The Propositions of which evidence may be offered being thus given by the rules of substantive law and of pleading, and the law of evidence concerning itself solely with the relation between Evidentiary Facts and such Propositions, the settlement of that relation involves obviously four distinct questions:

[2] These are dealt with in Book IV, post.

I. What Facts may be presented as Evidence? This is the question of Admissibility.

II. By whom must Evidence be presented? This is the question of Burden of Proof, and, incidentally, of Presumptions.

III. To whom must Evidence be presented? This involves the relation of function between Judge and Jury, as respectively deciding upon Law and Fact.

IV. Of what Propositions in issue need no Evidence be presented? This includes the topics ordinarily termed Judicial Notice and Judicial Admissions. The former (as will be seen) is in essence nothing more than a rule of burden of proof. The latter (as already noted in § 2) is in effect equivalent to a rule of pleading.

All of the last three topics verge towards the border line of what is in strictness the law of evidence. They involve and rest upon certain larger aspects of procedure which are independent of the evidential material. The question who has the burden of proof, for example, is of a piece with the questions who shall open and close the argument and whether certain allegations require an affirmative or negative pleading. They form a part of a treatise on evidence merely because their material is chiefly evidential material and because their problems have constantly to be discriminated from the strictly evidential problems.

There are, indeed, still other topics which, because their material is partly or chiefly evidential, might by a broad treatment be included in a system of evidence. For example, the rules of procedure in preparation for trial may raise the question whether an expected witness may be detained or bonded before trial begun, or whether testimony can be preserved by deposition taken before trial, or whether documents needed for evidence can be prevented from being carried out of the jurisdiction. So far as any of these rules of procedure affect the subsequent admissibility of the evidence, they plainly belong here; but as rules of procedure — i. e. telling whether a thing can or cannot be done before trial — they are in strictness not rules of evidence.[1] Again, the deliberations of the jury are governed by certain rules, prescribing the place of retirement, the behavior during retirement, the form of the verdict, and the like. Among these rules may be some which prescribe what effect of persuasion is to be attached to different sorts of evidence, and how the total strength or sufficiency of the jurors' persuasion is to be measured. All these rules belong together, and it is only incidentally that some of them concern evidential material.[1] Still again, a verdict and judgment may on appeal be set aside for various errors and defects; some of these errors may involve the circumstance that improper evidence has been considered. But only as a part of the general system of appeal and revision can such rules be satisfactorily dealt with. They are a part of that system and not of the system of evidence.[2]

[1] These various incidental aspects of evidence are for practical reasons considered, more or less fully, in the appropriate places in the ensuing pages.

In these several ways, then, evidential material may be involved incidentally in various other parts of the system of procedure as a whole; but the admissibility of evidence — that is, the relation between Evidentiary Facts and given Propositions — is in strictness the boundary of the system of evidence intrinsically considered.

§ 4. Distinctions between Trials in Chancery and at Law; between Civil and Criminal Trials; between Ex Parte and Responsory Proceedings; between Interlocutory and Adjudicatory Proceedings. (1) Chancery and Law. The system of evidence in the Chancellor's court would form of itself a subject of broad scope. As a historical system it is independent of that of the common law in jury trials. It was built upon the ecclesiastical or canon law, and thus involves the whole story of Continental systems of proof. Down to the middle of the 1700s, the relation between the chancery and the common law systems seems not to have been questioned, — not so much because their independence was conceded, as because the common law until that time was hardly conscious of possessing a system. With the appearance of Chief Baron Gilbert's treatise on Evidence — the first of its kind — abont 1726, that consciousness becomes more apparent, and the question of the relations of the two begins to arise. But it seems to have been conceded or professed from the first by the court of chancery (according to its maxim that equity follows the law) that it accepted the rules of the common law as to the admissibility of evidence.[1] Its own methods of taking evidence continued, as of course; but it recognized the bindingness of the common law rules, and professed to apply them except so far as the method of written deposition made modification necessary. There was in truth comparatively little field for controversy, partly because the rules of evidence at common law were then not yet numerous, and partly because criminal cases and many civil issues which might raise common questions of evidence were wholly withdrawn from the cognizance of chancery. The orthodox and broad proposition, then, always was and has continued to be that the rules of evidence at common law trials obtained also in chancery.[2]

But a comprehensive and accurate statement of the practice of chancery would show important qualifications of this. The variances in chancery

[2] See note 1, supra.

[1] 1740, Henley v. Phillips, 2 Atk. 48 (said of witnesses).

[2] 1817, Grant, M. R., in Wood v. Strickland, 2 Meriv. 461, 464 (said to be in general the same; here slightly different as to notice to produce a document, because the depositions had already showed its need); Circa 1846, Mr. C. P. Cooper, Notes to Reports of Lord Cottenham's Cases in Chancery, I, 509 ("Conclusions drawn by the author from the various authorities in the books: Conclusion 1. That what is evidence in a court of law is evidence in a court of equity, and that evidence which is admissible in a court of law is admissible in a court of equity. Conclusion 2. That when it is said in some of the cases that the Court rejected evidence or held evidence to be inadmissible which would have been received or would have been held admissible at common law, it must not be understood that such evidence was absolutely rejected or was held entirely inadmissible, but only that it was laid aside, that it was put out of consideration, as regarded any decree or order binding the interest of the party against whom it was adduced").

practice may be classed under four heads. (a) The required mode of taking testimony in writing, instead of orally, was of course in itself a totally contrary rule.[3] Further, it led to several effects upon other rules, — in particular, as to the mode of taking objections to evidence (by motion to strike out an answer to an interrogatory), as to the rule of impeachment (by forbidding it after publication of the depositions), and as to the mode of cross-examination (by requiring the cross-interrogatories to be framed before the answers to the direct interrogatories, or even the interrogatories themselves, were known, — thus emasculating the cross-examination). (b) The chancery court enforced the tradition of the canon law requiring two witnesses to every material allegation; and this not only gave rise to the general rule about overcoming the defendant's oath, but also led to a few specific rules for characteristic chancery issues, such as divorce bills and wills of personalty. So, too, it perpetuated the canon law rule concerning confessions in divorce suits. (c) The court of chancery radically parted from the common law courts in granting discovery before and during trial, i. e. in denying the common law privilege of a party-opponent to refuse to testify personally or (substantially) to disclose any of his evidence at any time. In this important rule lay the chief characteristic contribution of Chancery to our law of evidence. In a few minor respects also it adopted a concededly different rule, — as when it required the summoning of all the attesting witnesses to a will of land, or when it occasionally admitted a deposition without cross-examination. (d) Finally, there were a few variant rules, often spoken of as rules of evidence, but really rules of procedure or of substantive law, — as when in chancery parol evidence was admitted to reform a deed.

The rules of evidence in Chancery, then, as a part of a system of procedure, are without the present purview. But it will be necessary from time to time to notice those rules, first, in so far as they may contradict a particular common law practice, secondly, in so far as the transfer of ecclesiastical and chancery jurisdiction has added to our system rules peculiar to their classes of litigation, and thirdly, in so far as statutes have improved the common law system by adopting for it the chancery rules.

(2) Civil and Criminal Trials. The rules of admissibility are in general the same for the trial of civil and of criminal causes. Not only in practice, but in principle and in spirit, there is no occasion for a distinction. The relation between an Evidentiary Fact and a particular Proposition is always the same, without regard to the kind of litigation in which that proposition becomes material to be proved. It is true that certain rules of admissibility are applicable in criminal cases only, — such as the rule of corroboration in perjury; but this is because the issues thereby evidenced arise in criminal cases only. It is also true that certain rules are modified or created for certain kinds of criminal issues, — such as the rules for admitting and corroborating an accused's confession, the rule for corpus delicti, the rule for bigamous marriage, and the rule for a party's character; but these are few in number, and are due to special considerations affecting a particular issue or a particular sort of evidence, rather than to general policy involved necessarily or usually in criminal cases. Still further, it is true that in the related branches of procedure concerned chiefly with evidence, particularly the burden of proof and the measure of the jury's persuasion, a different policy obtains for criminal cases in general; but this does not affect the rules of admissibility.

[3] A masterly analysis and contrast of the canon law and chancery methods is given in Professor Langdell's Equity Pleading, §§ 1–56.

There are, then, by no means two systems of rules, distinct in history and in method, as was the case with the chancery practice. There is but one system of rules for criminal and for civil trials. This is the more worth emphasizing, because the occasional appearance, in works on the law, of the title "Criminal Evidence" has tended to foster the fallacy that there is some separate group of rules or some large number of modifications. On the contrary, much is lost in utility by attempting a separate treatment; for most of the large principles of evidence are equally illustrated in both kinds of trials, and cannot be adequately followed, either in theory or in authority, if the precedents in either class of cases are ignored. The fallacy, however, is an inveterate one, and has had repeatedly to be repudiated by judicial utterances:

1806, Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 746; prosecntion for the misapplicatlon of public funds as Treasurer of the Navy; certificates were offered, signed by the paymaster, the defendant's subordinate, acknowledging the receipt of £45,000 from the Exchequer; these were objected to as not competent in a criminal case to affect the defendant with responsibility; Mr. Serjeant Best, for their reception: "We must first prove that the money has been received, and after we have satisfactorily proved that, then comes the evidence to prove what has been its application after it has been received. . . . The learned counsel have endeavored to distinguish between civil and criminal cases. . . . There is a considerable distinction between civil and criminal cases, bnt that distinction consists rather in the number of facts to be proved than in the manner of proving any of them. It is necessary that more facts shonld be proved, for the purpose of showing that a man has money in his possession or has had money come into his possession, than to make him civilly responsible; but though more facts should be proved in one case than is necessary to be proved in the other, each particular fact is to be proved by precisely the same evidence;" Mr. Plumer, on the opposite side: "I desire it may be distinctly understood that I do not dispnte that the rnles of evidence are the same in both. . . . What is the distinction, then? . . . It is not that the rules of evidence are at all altered, bnt that when you are looking at the individual who stands in a civil relation, and are pursuing it with that view, there is an identity of persons between the agent and principal, and all that one has done or said is done or said by the other; . . . [but otherwise for criminal responsibility]. We are not contending that the rules of law are different in the two cases, but that the nltimate result of the inquiry makes that which is competent, legal, and proper in one case not so in the other." Lord Chancellor Erskine took the view that the certificate was admissible to show the authorized reception of the monies by the agent, but not that the money actually reached the defendant; and proceeded: "This first step in the proof must advance by evidence applicable alike to civil as to criminal cases; for a fact must he established by the same evidence, whether it is to be followed by a criminal or a civil conseqnence. But it is a totally different qnestion, in the consideration of criminal as distinguished from civil justice, how the noble person now on trial may be affected by the fact when so established. The receipt by the paymaster would in itself involve him civilly, but could by no possibility convict him of a crime."

1820, Best, J., in R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, 122: "It has been solemnly decided that there is no difference between the rules of evidence in civil and criminal cases. If the rules of evidence prescribe the best course to get at truth, they must be and are the same in all cases, and in all civilized countries. There is scarcely a criminal case, from the highest down to the lowest, in which courts of evidence do not act upon this principle."

1884, Grove, J., in R. v. Mallory, 15 Cox Cr. 460: "I never heard that there was any difference [between civil and criminal cases] in the rules of evidence as to the admissibility of evidence; though there may be a difference in their application; and it may be that a piece of evidence, admissible in either class of cases, may not be sufficient in a criminal case [for conviction], that is, without further evidence; but the evidence is not the less admissible."

1883, Sir James Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 437: "The rules as to the relevancy of the facts and as to the proof of relevant facts are, speaking generally, the same in relation to criminal as in relation to civil proceedings; for the manner in which a fact is to be proved has no necessary connection with the use to which it is to be applied when it has been proved. If it is necessary to show that a man is dead, the fact must be proved in the same way, whether it is proved in a criminal trial for murder or on the trial of a civil action for the recovery of an estate. Moreover the principles which determine whether or no a given fact is either in issue, or is or is not relevant to the issue, are the same whatever may be the nature of the case. Some of the more detailed rules of evidence, however, apply exclusively, and others most frequently, to criminal cases;" and he then names the presumption of innocence, the defendant's disqualification, confessions, dying declarations, and the defendant's character.

1853, Ryland, J., in State v. Hays, 23 Mo. 314: "There is no difference; what may be received in the one case may be received in the other, and what is rejected in one ought to be rejected in the other; a fact may be established by the same evidence, whether it is to be followed by a criminal or civil consequence."

1896, Brickell, C. J., in Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 21 So. 214: "While there is a broad distinction" as to burden of proof, "the general rules and tests as to the admissibility and relevancy of evidence are the same in each class of cases." [4]

(3) Proceedings Ex Parte and Responsory, Interlocutory and Adjudicatory. Evidence is constantly being offered to a judge in establishing the grounds of a motion made and heard ex parte only. In such cases the usual system

[4] Accord: England: 1788, Eyre, C. B., in Att'y-Gen'l v. LeMerchant, 2 T. R. 201, 202 (documentary evidence); 1796, Lawrence, J., in Stone's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 1314; 1817, Abbott, J., in R. v. Watson, 32 id. 492, 2 Stark. 116, 155; 1820, Best, J., in Queen Caroline's Trial, Linn's ed. I, 490; 1828, Best, C. J., in Strother v. Barr, 5 Bing. 136, 155; 1837, Coleridge, J., in R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 306; 1839, Parke, B., in Leach v. Simpson, 5 M. & W. 309, 312; 7 Dowl. Pr. 513, 515; 1860, Lefroy, C. J., in R. v. Towey, 8 Cox Cr. 331; 1878, Grove, J., in Blake v. Assur. Soc., 14 Cox Cr. 252. United States: 1873, Gilpin, C. J., in State v. Carter, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 402, 411; 1849, Green, C. J., in West v. State, 22 N. J. L. 212, 242; 1856, Bartley, C. J., in Summons v. State, 5 Oh. St. 325, 352; 1875, Agnew, C. J., in Brown v. Schock, 77 Pa. 477; 1820, Nott, J., in State v. Rawls, 2 Nott & McC. 331, 333; 1840, McLean, J., in U. S. v. Winchester, 2 McLean 135, 138; 1879, Barrett, J., in State v. Potter, 52 Vt. 33, 38 (documentary evidence); 1817, White, J., in Warner v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 95, 105; 1878, Staples, J., in Trogdon's Case, 31 Gratt. 862, 874.

A good illustration of an apparent, but only accidental difference, resulting from a combination of rules, is found in Vaughton v. R. Co., 12 Cox Cr. 580 (1874), where a statute exempted carriers from liability conditionally, except for felonious acts of their servants; in an action for damages, the case turning on whether the articles had been feloniously taken by the carrier's servants, the defendant failed to offer any testimony, even that of the suspected servants; and in deciding whether there had been any evidence for the jury, the Court pointed out (Kelly, C. B., 587) that in a criminal charge against the servants no inference could have been drawn from their failure to testify, while in a civil case the carrier's failure to offer testimony was highly significant, on the principle of § 285, post.

of rules of evidence is not applied, partly because there is no opponent to invoke them, partly because the judge's determination is usually discretionary,[5] and partly because it is seldom final. Occasionally the analogy of the ordinary rules is followed, but no regular practice seems to have developed except as prescribed by the local rules of court. The most notable deviation from the ordinary rules of evidence is seen in the use of affidavits, the cross-examination being dispensed with.[6]

So too, in all interlocutory proceedings, even when responsory and not ex parte, the usual system of rules is ignored, again partly because of the subsidiary and provisional nature of the inquiry, but chiefly because there is no jury, and the rules of evidence are, as rules, traditionally associated with a trial by jury.

§ 5. Conflict of Laws; Distinction between Lex Fori and Foreign Laws. When evidence is offered, is the Court ever required in determining its admissibility, to set aside temporarily the rules of the forum, and look to some foreign law for the rules of admissibility? On the general principle that procedure is determinable by the law of the forum, the answer must be in the negative; for the law of evidence is a part of the law of procedure. With this result practical convenience also coincides, as Lord Brougham, in his classical exposition of the principle, has pointed out:

1835, Lord Brougham, in Yates v. Thomson, 3 Cl. & F. 544, 587: "The truth with respect to men's actions, which form the subject-matter of their inquiry, is to be ascertained according to a certain definite course of proceeding, and certain rules have established that in pursuing this investigation some things shall be heard from witnesses, others not listened to; some instruments shall be inspected by the judge, others kept from his eye. This must evidently be the same course, and governed by the same rules, whatever be the subject-matter of investigation; nor can it make any difference whether the facts, concerning which the discussion arises, happened at home or abroad; whether they related to a foreigner domiciled abroad, or a native living and dying at home. As well might it be contended that another mode of trial should be adopted as that another law of evidence should be admitted in such cases. Who would argue that in a question like the present the Court of Session should try the point of fact by a jury according to the English procedure, or should follow the course of our dispositions or interrogatories in courts of equity, because the testator was a domiciled Englishman, and because those methods of trial would be applied in his case were the question raised here? The answer is, that the question arises in the Court of Session, and must be dealt with by the rules which regulate inquiry there. Now the law of evidence is among the chief of these rules; nor let it be said that there is any inconsistency in applying the English rules of construction and the Scotch ones of evidence to the same matter, in investigating facts by one law and intention by another. The difference is manifest between the two inquiries; for a person's meaning can only be gathered from assuming that he intended to use words in the sense affixed to them by the law of the country he belonged to at the time of framing his instrument. . . . But can it be contended, that, as often as an English succession comes in question before the Scotch Court, witnesses are to be admitted or rejected upon the practice of the English Courts; nay, that examination and cross-examination are to proceed upon those rules of our practice, supposing them to be (as they may possibly be) quite different from the Scotch rules? This would be mani-

[5] For the significance of discretion, see post, § 16.

[6] Post, § 1384; an example may be found in Liter's Estate (1897), 19 Mont. 474, 48 Pac. 753.

fostly a source of such inconvenience as no Court ever could get over. Among other embarrassments equally inextricable there would be this: that a host of English lawyers must always be in attendance on the Scotch Courts, ready to give evidence, at a moment's notice, of what the English rules of practice are touching the reception or refusal of testimony, and the manner of obtaining it; for those questions which, by the supposition, are questions of mere fact in the Scotch Courts, must arise unexpectedly during each trial, and must be disposed of on the spot in order that the trial may proceed. The case which I should however put, as quite decisive of this matter, comes nearer than any other to the one at bar, and it may, with equal advantage to the elucidation of the argument, be put as arising both in an English and in a Scotch Court. By our English rules of evidence no instrument proves itself, unless it be thirty years old, or is an office copy authorized by law to be given by the proper officer, or is the London Gazette, or is by some special Act made evidence, or is an original record of a Court under its seal, or an exemplification under seal, which is quasi a record. By the Scotch law all instruments prepared and witnessed according to the provisions of the Act of 1681 are probative writs, and may be given in evidence without any proof. Now suppose a will of personalty or any other instrument relating to personal property, attested by two witnesses and executed in England according to the provisions of the Scotch Act, is tendered in evidence before the Court of Session; it surely never will be contended that the learned Judges, on being satisfied that the question related to English personal succession, ought straightway to examine what is the English law of evidence, and to require the attendance of one or other of the subscribing witnesses, where the instrument is admissible by the Scotch law as probative. Of this I can have no doubt. But suppose the question to arise in England, and that a deed is executed in Scotland according to the Act of 1681 by one domiciled here, would any Court here receive it as proving itself, being only a year old, without calling the attesting witnesses? It would have a strange effect to hear the circumstance of there being two subscribing witnesses to the instrument, which makes it prove itself in the Parliament House of Edinburgh, urged in Westminster Hall as the ground of its admission without any parol testimony. The Court would inevitably answer, 'two witnesses — then, because there are witnesses, it cannot be admitted, but they must, one or other of them, be called to prove it.' The very thing that makes the instrument prove itself in Scotland makes it in England necessary to be proved by witnesses. I have, therefore, no doubt whatever that the rules of evidence form no part of the foreign law, according to which you are to proceed in disposing of English questions arising in Scotch Courts."

This general principle has received uniform recognition, both in England [1] and in the United States,[2] though its application seems rarely to have come

[1] 1816, Appleton v. Brayhrook, 2 Stark. 6; Black v. Brayhrook, ih. 7 (an office copy of a judgment in the island of Jamaica, excluded, though admissible in that island; "it is not reasonable that greater effect [than to domestic office copies] should be allowed to the office copy of an officer of a foreign court"); 1837, Don v. Lippmann, 5 Cl. & F. 1, 15, per Lord Brougham (general principle stated); 1837, Brown v. Thornton, 6 A. & E. 184 (charter-party made between plaintiff and defendant in Java, a Dutch possession, for delivery of goods at London or Antwerp; the contract was entered in the notary's book at Java as the original; by Dutch law, notarial copies of the original were receivable, but not by English law; "there is nothing to give the copies the weight of evidence except the Dutch law, and . . . we cannot here adopt a rule of evidence from foreign courts"); 1841, Tulloch v. Hartley, 1 Y. & C. 114 (examined copy of a record of a deed in Jamaica; though the party relied on a Jamaica statute making such copies admissible, Shadwell, V. C., admitted it on the ground that by the substantive law of Jamaica the record of the deed was equivalent to the original, and hence an examined copy was admissible, the original being not procurable); 1850, Bain v. Whitehaven R. Co., 3 H. L. C. 1, 19, per Lord Brougham; 1882, The Gaetano and Maria, L. R. 7 P. D. 137, 144, per Brett, L. J.

[2] 1874, Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co., 115 Mass. 304 (citad post); 1900, Jones v. R. Co., 80 Minn. 488, 83 N. W. 446; 1839, Wilcox v. Hunt, 13 Pet. 378 (obscure; apparently the Louisiana rule as to calling attesting witnesses was held to prevail in an action in Louisiana on a contract made in New York); into controversy. But there are certain apparent exceptions to it, which are in truth instances of separate principles and need to be distinguished:

(1) Some rule of substantive law as to the validity of an act, in form or in essentials, may be adopted from the foreign law, because of the parties' domicile or of the place of the transaction; and thus a question may arise whether a particular requirement is a rule of evidence or a rule of substantive law. The more common instances of this are the parol evidence rule, which is in truth a rule of substantive law (post, §§ 2400, 2425);[3] the rules for interpretation of contracts, which are rules of substantive law (post, §§ 2400, 2458);[4] the rule requiring revenue stamps on documents, which is sometimes a rule of evidence and sometimes a rule of substantive law (post, § 2456), according to the terms of the statute;[5] the rules of the statute of frauds requiring writing, which in the 4th and 17th sections are rules of evidence and in the remaining sections are rules of substantive law (post, § 2454);[6] and the rule requiring attestation as a formality for the execution of wills, which in that aspect is a rule of substantive law, but leads also to a rule of evidence requiring the summoning of these witnesses in preference to others.[7]

(2) Some rule of jurisdiction may be involved, which may make impossible the due management, in a foreign country, of certain steps in the preparation for trial, and thus may incidentally affect the available evidence, — for example, a rule in regard to taking depositions by commission sent abroad.[8] Or such a rule may give effect to the judgment of a foreign

1866, Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 45 (cited post); 1903, Second Nat'l Bank v. Smith, — Wis. —, 94 N. W. 664 (notary's certificate of dishonor). Undecided: 1814, Clark v. Cochran, 3 Mart. La. 353, 361 (point considered but not decided, in regard to a Louisiana rule for expert testimony).

[2] Accord, and correct: 1879, Dunn v. Welsh, 62 Ga. 241 (New York bills of exchange indorsed in blank; the New York rule as to parol agreements for the indorser's liability, applied). Contra and incorrect: 1874, Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co., 115 Mass. 304 (bill of lading given in Illinois for transportation to Massachusetts; general principle conceded that "the law of the place where the action is brought . . . controls the admission of evidence" and applied to the question of conclusiveness of assent to a bill of lading by accepting it).

[3] 1890, Foote, Private International Jurisprudence, 2d ed., 378.

[4] 1890, Foote, ubi supra, 354; 1883, Story, Conflict of Laws, 8th ed., §§ 260–262; 1850, Bristow v. Sequeville, 5 Exch. 275, 278 (Alderson, B.: "It is very different whether the law makes a stamp necessary to the validity of an instrument or to its admissibility in evidence; an unstamped deed is a valid contract here, although it cannot be given in evidence"); 1808, Randall v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. 94 ("We do not sit here to enforce the revenue laws of other countries"); 1866, Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 45, 61 (Rives, J., noting the distinction between invalidity and inadmissibility, and declining even in the former class of cases to enforce the foreign revenue law as merely making invalidity a penalty; Joynes, J., reaching the same result by somewhat different reasoning; the opinions are valuable).

[5] 1852, Peroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801, 824 ("The 4th section applies not to the solemnities but to the procedure"; therefore an oral contract made in France was held not enforceable in England without a written memorandum); 1874, Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co., 115 Mass. 304, 307.

[6] Lord Brougham, in Yates v. Thomson, quoted supra; Story on Conflict of Laws, § 630, cited supra. Another example is the following: 1864, Koster v. Merritt, 32 Conn. 246 (the law of Connecticut made a chattel sale with retention of possession void against creditors; the law of New York made it, not void, but only presumptively fraudulent; in an action in the former State on such a sale made in the latter State, the law of the place of sale was applied).

[7] The following illustrates the variety of such questions: 1884, Fawcus' Goods, L. R. 9 P. D. 241 (the German law forbidding the administration of oaths by foreign officers in Germany, an affidavit sworn before a German judge was received, under a statute sanctioning such oaths "in places where there are no such persons," viz. British consuls, as are ordinarily appointed to administer oaths). A careful discussion of some of these problems will be found in Von Bar's Private International Law, 2d ed. (1892), translated by Gillespie, § 392, and note RR.

court having jurisdiction, and thus obviate the necessity of making any proof of a claim.

(3) The law of evidence in the forum may, in its own principles, implicitly refer to a foreign law for the applicability of the principle, — as when the exception to the Hearsay rule admits all statements made by an official having an authority to make such statements (post, § 1630), and thus a foreign law will in effect control the admissibility of the statement.[9] Here, however, there is no displacement of the domestic rule by the foreign rule; the former is maintained, but is found to turn upon the foreign rule as one of its conditions.

§ 6. Same; Conflict of Federal and State Laws of the United States and Canada.

A. What is the application of the foregoing principle to the relation between Federal and State Courts in the United States?

(1) In the Federal Courts, their own rules of evidence would ordinarily have prevailed, for the Federal jurisdiction rests upon a sovereignty separate from that of the respective States. Nevertheless their situation is peculiar, for (apart from the District of Columbia and the Territories) there is not a separate physical territory within which their jurisdiction is exclusive, and, in consequence, the litigation before their trial sessions is commonly in the hands of a body of practitioners which primarily is a State bar and represents local habits and traditions. It would be therefore natural and highly convenient to follow so far as practicable the local rules of evidence. Such was the view of the founders of the Federal Government, who in 1789 directed the Federal Courts to follow local rules except when otherwise directed by Federal legislation.[1] This policy was continued in later enactments, which enlarged the scope of the rule, though they added numerous instances to the exceptions.[2] The effect of this legislation may be considered under three heads:

(a) In chancery proceedings, since the statute of 1862, the local State rules are applicable to the "competency of witnesses." But this provision seems to be ignored or narrowly construed in the Federal decisions.[3]

[9] Numerous examples of this will be found in §§ 1633, 1644, 1675, 1677, post; a discussion of the problem occurs in Von Bar, ubi supra, §§ 396, 397, and note 88. A neat illustration is the following: 1837, Tickner v. Roberts, 11 La. 14 (notarial protest from Alabama, not authenticated by a seal in the form of seal prescribed by the Alabama law, excluded). Brown v. Thornton and Appleton v. Braybrook, supra, might have been differently decided if this principle had been invoked.

[1] U. S. R. S. 1878, § 721 (repeating St. 1789, c. 20, s. 34: "The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the Courts of the United States, in cases where they apply").

[2] U. S. R. S. 1878, § 858 (combining statutes of 1862, 1864, and 1865; after enacting certain provisions as to qualifications of witnesses, — set out post, § 488, — it continues: "In all other respects the laws of the State in which the trial is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law, and in equity and admiralty").

The specific Federal provisions upon evidence are placed with other statutes post, under the appropriate heads.

[3] 1889, Dravo v. Fabel, 132 U. S. 487, 489, 10 Sup. 170 (on a bill to set aside fraudulent deeds, the depositions of the defendants, taken by the plaintiffs, were held not to be governed by a Pennsylvania statute providing that an opponent should be regarded as a hostile witness, invok-

(b) In admiralty proceedings, the Federal Courts originally had their own rules of evidence;[4] but since 1862 the statute directs the adoption of the local State rules.

(c) Common law trials, being expressly named in the statute of 1789, have from the beginning been subject to the rule. Thus in the Federal courts a Federal statute prevails over the State rule upon the same subject,[5] but in the absence of a Federal statute the State rule is followed.[6] The State rules thus made applicable include statutory rules,[7] and they include all the rules of admissibility, even under the words "competency of witnesses" in U. S. R. S. § 858.[8] But by a singular and indefensible construction, criminal cases have been held not to be included under the term "trials at common law"

ing U. S. R. S. § 914, which in assimilating pleadings and practice to the local rules "expressly excepts equity and admiralty causes"; none of the ensuing rulings are cited, and the specific Federal provisions of §§ 721, 858, are ignored); 1902, Calivada C. Co. v. Hays, 119 Fed. 202, 207 (Dravo v. Fabel applied).

[4] 1859, The Ship William Jarvis, 1 Sprague 485, 486 (under St. 1789, State rules did not apply in admiralty); 1855, The Independence, 2 Curt. C. C. 350, 354 (same); 1847, The Steamboat Neptune, Olcott 480, 488 (same).

[5] 1876, Connecticut M. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457 (in this case the Court protects communications to attorneys on the ground that the Federal statute as to competency of parties does not expressly declare such communications admissible; this is a singular perversion of reasoning; the attorneys' rule is a rule of privilege; the State law as to privilege or qualification should have applied because not expressly superseded); 1880, Potter v. Bank, 102 U. S. 163 (Federal statute as to disqualification by interest, held to supplant a State statute on the subject); 1880, Page v. Brunstine, ib. 664 (R. S. § 858 held to override a Federal statute created for the District of Columbia); 1881, King v. Worthington, 104 id. 44, 50 (R. S. § 858 held to override an Illinois statute; the removal of a cause from a State to a Federal court makes the Federal rules of evidence thereafter controlling in the cause); 1884, Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 713, 721, 5 Sup. 724 (Federal statutes, §§ 861–870, providing for depositions, held to override a New York statute providing for the written examination of an opponent before trial); 1890, Stephens v. Bernays, 42 Fed. 488 (Federal statute as to disqualification by interest, held to supplant a State statute on the subject); 1898, Stewart v. Morris, 32 C. C. A. 203, 89 Fed. 290; 1902, White v. Wansey, 53 C. C. A. 634, 116 Fed. 345 (Federal statute, § 858, declaring survivors incompetent, held to override the Michigan statute on that subject, though narrower in its exclusionary scope); 1900, Travis v. Ins. Co., 43 C. C. A. 653, 104 Fed. 486 (R. S. § 858, as to executors, etc., supplants a State statute on that subject).

[6] 1848, Sims v. Hundley, 6 How. 1, 6 (statute includes rules applicable to commercial cases, here, a notary's certificate); 1861, Vance v. Campbell, 1 Black 427, 430 (statute applied to enforce a State statute as to witness' competency); 1861, Hausknecht v. Claypool, ib. 431 (same); 1862, Wright v. Bales, 2 id. 535 (same); 1863, Ryan v. Bindley, 1 Wall. 66 (State statute held to prevail against a Federal Court rule as to witness' competency); 1884, Connecticut M. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., 112 U. S. 250, 254, 5 Sup. 119 (New York statute as to physician's privilege, enforced); 1899, Camden & S. R. Co. v. Stetson, 177 U. S. 172, 20 Sup. 617 (New Jersey statute sanctioning compulsory examination of civil plaintiff, applied); 1899, National Cash Register Co. v. Leland, 37 C. C. A. 372, 94 Fed. 502 (Federal statutes are exclusive as to the mode of extracting testimony; statutory interrogatories in lieu of a bill of discovery are therefore excluded; this and the foregoing ruling are perhaps inconsistent).

[7] Cases cited supra, and the following: 1838, McNeil v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. 84, 89 (R. S. § 721 includes State statutes as to evidence); 1874, Packet Co. v. Clough, 20 Wall. 528, 537 (St. 1862, R. S. § 858, includes a State statute as to competency of wife to testify); 1897, Union P. R. Co. v. Yates, 25 C. C. A. 103, 79 Fed. 584. The interpretation of such a statute will usually follow that of the State Court, and where the statute has been copied, of the Court of the original State; 1897, Whitney v. Fox, 166 U. S. 637, 17 Sup. 713 (adopting the interpretation of the copying State, Utah, and not the original one, California, owing to peculiar circumstances). But this part of the doctrine trenches upon the great question of Gelpcke v. Dubuque (1 Wall. 175), and Swift v. Tyson (16 Pet. 1), whether the Federal Courts must follow the State Courts' interpretation of local statutes.

[8] 1884, Connecticut M. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., 112 U. S. 250, 254, 5 Sup. 119 (R. S. § 721 includes all rules of evidence, not merely rules as to witness' competency; § 858 does not restrict this); 1899, Butler v. Fayerweather, 33 C. C. A. 625, 91 Fed. 458 (privileged communication to attorney: R. S. § 858, by "competency," signifies the rules of admissibility in general).

either in U. S. R. S. § 721[9] or in U. S. R. S. § 858;[10] in consequence of which the Federal rules for criminal trials are determinable by an artificial and unpractical test, which merely creates useless obscurity and complication and ought to be reformed by legislation.

(2) In the State Courts, the legislation of each jurisdiction is supreme, except so far as limited by the Federal Constitution. Consequently, the rules of evidence in the State Courts are not controlled in any manner by the Federal statutory legislation, although they are subject to such limitations as may be prescribed in any Federal constitutional provision (post, § 7) applicable to State legislation. The only rule concerning which any question has been raised seems to be the Federal statutory rule (prevailing at different periods) excluding documents not bearing a revenue stamp; but the State Courts have here refused, with practical unanimity, to recognize any binding effect in the Federal law.[11] It may be noted, however, that the Federal statute providing a mode for authenticating copies of judgments and other public records has always been accepted as making admissible a document so authenticated, — perhaps as an inference from the Federal constitutional provision exacting full faith and credit for judgments in other States of the Union.[12]

B. In Canada, the question presents itself under two heads: (1) What are the reserved powers of the Imperial Legislature? and (2) What is the extent of the Federal Dominion Legislature's jurisdiction over Provincial litigation? In each of these, it is further necessary to note how far the imperial and federal powers have been actually exercised to affect the rules of evidence.

(1) The British Imperial Legislature, in the British North America Act of 1867, has conferred upon the Dominion of Canada and its provinces an apparently unlimited jurisdiction over all matters of justice public and private.[13] Nevertheless, as a sovereign body, the British Legislature's power remains abstractly supreme, and it may therefore at any time by express

[9] 1851, U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. 361, 363 (St. 1789, by "trials at common law" does not include criminal cases; it was not intended to allow the State legislation to govern the rules of evidence in Federal criminal trials, but to adopt for Federal Courts the common law rule "which was then [in 1789] in force in the respective States"; so that "the rules of evidence in criminal cases are the rules which were in force in the respective States when the Judiciary Act of 1789 was passed," subject to change by Congress, but not by State legislation).

[10] 1892, Logan v. U. S., 144 U. S. 263, 12 Sup. 617 (enforces the same construction for R. S. 1878, §§ 721, 858; the common law of Texas, as there adopted at the time of admission into the Union, applied; yet by U. S. v. Reid the only law adopted by implication was that of the States existing in 1789; quære, whether this implication under R. S. § 858 should also refer to the time of the State's creation, rather than to that of the statute's enactment; for the reason for taking the State law of 1789 was that the statute was then passed, not that the State was then created).

[11] 1867, Breese, J., in Latham v. Smith, 45 Ill. 29; 1872, Simrall, J., in Davis v. Richardson, 45 Miss. 499; 1899, Knox v. Rossi, 25 Nev. 96, 57 Pac. 179, 48 L. R. A. 305; 1901, Southern Ins. Co. v. Estes, 106 Tenn. 472, 62 S. W. 149 (pointing out that Sporrer v. Eifler, 1 Heisk. 638, and Miller v. Morrow, 5 Id. 689, repudiated Miller v. Morrow, 1867, 3 Coldw. 587; the rule being subsequently enforced in Walt v. Walsh, 10 Heisk. 321; Bangess v. Partee, 2 Tenn. Cas. 269); and cases cited post, § 2134. The only deliberate opinion to the contrary seems to be the following: 1872, Agnew, J., in Chartiers & R. T. Co. v. McNamara, 72 Pa. 278, 282 ("The taxing power being a clear Federal grant of power, and the disqualification, affixed to the writing as an instrument of evidence, being clearly proper to compel the payment of the tax"; Thompson, C. J., and Sharswood, J., diss.).

[12] Post, § 1681.

[13] B. N. A. Act, §§ 18, 56; subject, of course, to the usual royal veto. For notes of decisions on the general powers of the Dominion Parliament, see Bicknell & Kappele, Practical Statutes in force in Ontario, p. 50 (1900).

statute change the law of Canada.[14] In point of fact, however, it has only once, since the time of the British North America Act, made any law of evidence applicable in the Dominion, and that one was expressly left "subject to" any colonial law that might from time to time be enacted.[15]

(2) As between the Provinces[16] and the Dominion, the boundaries for the field of the law of evidence have not been precisely worked out. On the one hand, the Dominion may legislate for criminal justice.[17] On the other hand, the Provinces have exclusive control over civil justice;[18] subject to a reserved right in the Dominion to legislate for uniformity with the consent of the Provinces.[19] These powers of the Dominion Legislature appear to have been exercised, for the law of evidence, thus far, in only two important instances, the Criminal Code of 1892 (containing several rules of evidence) and the Evidence Act of 1893 (a measure of comparatively narrow scope).[20] These statutes have as yet been little construed,[21] but are not likely to raise any important controversy. Subject to these statutes, the Provincial rules of evidence apply in Dominion Courts,[22] as the State rules do in Federal Courts of the United States.

[14] Eng. St. 1865, c. 63 (Colonial Laws Validity Act), §§ 2, 3; 1898, Lefroy, Legislative Power in Canada, 208–231. In the absence of express statute, no application to Canada will be implied.

[15] The British evidence-statutes applicable to Canada (a list of which is compiled at p. xliii of vol. III, Ontario Revised Statutes 1897) appear to include only the following, on subjects of evidence: 1865, St. 28–9 Vict. c. 63, § 6 (proof of colonial laws; cited post, §§ 1680, 1684); 1843, St. 6–7 Vict. c. 22 (oath-capacity of uncivilized tribes; cited post, § 1829); 1851, St. 14–15 Vict. c. 99, § 11 (official documents admissible without proof of seal, etc.; cited post, § 2166); 1856, St. 19–20 Vict. c. 113 (empowering colonial courts to take depositions for use in civil or commercial litigation before a foreign tribunal); 1859, St. 22 Vict. c. 20 (similar, for depositions to be used in other parts of the British Dominions); 1859, St. 22–23 Vict. c. 63 (provision for obtaining a judicial certificate of the law obtaining in another part of the British Dominions; cited post, § 1674); 1861, St. 24 Vict. c. 11 (similar, for the law of foreign countries with whom a convention has been made; cited post, § 1674); St. 1868, 31–32 Vict. c. 37 (proof of proclamations, etc., by printed or certified copy; cited post, §§ 1680, 1684; in § 3 of the Act it is provided that "subject to any law that may be from time to time made by the Legislature of any British colony or possession, this Act shall be in force in every such colony and possession").

[16] That is, including Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Manitoba, and Northwest Territories. The Dominion does not yet include Newfoundland.

[17] British North America Act 1867, § 91, par. 27 ("the procedure in criminal matters").

Ib. § 92, par. 14 ("procedure in civil matters").

[19] Ib. § 94 ("the procedure of all or any of the Courts in those three provinces" of Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick).

For a discussion of these enumerated powers, see Lefroy, ubi supra, 305, 364, 425–494. For rulings involving the power over criminal procedure, see the following: 1882, Russell v. R., L. R. 7 App. Cas. 829; 1890, R. v. Wason, 17 Ont. App. 221; 1891, R. v. Hart, 20 Ont. 611 (powers of the provincial legislature to make witnesses competent in criminal cases, discussed); 1892, R. v. Bittle 21 id. 605 (similar); 1898, Lefroy, ubi supra (comments on some of the above rulings).

[20] Can. St. 1893, c. 31, § 21: ("In all proceedings over which the Parliament of Canada has legislative authority, the laws of evidence in force in the province in which such proceedings are taken, including the laws of proof of service of any warrant, summons, subpœna or other document, shall, subject to the provisions of this and other Acts of the Parliament of Canada, apply to such proceedings").

[21] The following seem to be the principal instances: 1893, Weiser v. Heintzman, 15 Ont. Pr. 260, 407 (Can. St. 1893, c. 31, held not to supersede Ontario statutes for civil cases in "provincial litigation"; here for libel); 1896, O'Neil v. Attorney General, 26 Can. Sup. 122, 132 (Can. St. 1893 held not applicable to a suit in Quebec by a claimant of money seized in gambling rooms by officers); 1896, R. v. Douglas, 11 Manit. 401 (Can. St. 1893, discussed).

For Quebec, see Lafleur, Conflict of Laws in Quebec, 216 (1898).

[22] Can. St. 1893, quoted supra. But in the Northwest Territories (St. 1901, c. 10, § 1) the rules of the Canada Evidence Act of 1893 have been adopted, and presumably apply to civil cases equally.

§ 7. Constitutional Sanction of Rules of Evidence; Ex post Facto Laws; Legislative Alteration of Rules. A constitutional provision sanctioning a rule of evidence has the legal effect of making it unalterable by ordinary statutory legislation. It also has the practical effect of inducing most Courts to construe the rule (if one of exclusion) with unusual care to avoid the evasion of the Constitution, and with unusual and sometimes reprehensible technicality in favor of the party benefited by the rule.

(1) The rules of evidence which have been expressly sanctioned by the various Constitutions are comparatively few.[1] They include usually the privilege against self-crimination, with occasional limitations of its scope;[2] the accused's right to confrontation, or cross-examination of witnesses;[3] the rule for two witnesses in treason;[4] the accused's right to process for compelling the attendance of witnesses;[5] and the right of testifying without regard to defects of theological belief.[6]

(2) Apart from these rules expressly thus [illegible] against contrary legislative change, the Legislature has the power to alter or create any rule of evidence.[7] This is so for reasons inherent in the nature of legislative functions. It would never have been doubted except for certain aspects in which the rules of substantive law (by reason of the confusion of terms and of thought already explained in § 2) have tended to present themselves in the false guise of rules of evidence. This has notably happened in three classes of cases:

(a) Certain rules of formality or procedure, or even of clearly substantive law, — such as the statute of frauds, the statute of limitations, and the rule that a new promise or acknowledgment revives a barred debt, — having sometimes been discussed in terms of evidence, it was once suggested that the constitutional provisions against ex post facto laws changing vested rights might apply to some rules of evidence.[8] But this opinion is now generally repudiated;[9] even in the jurisdiction where it first made its appear-

[1] They are set out, post, under the respective topics.

[2] Post, § 2252.

[3] Post, § 1397.

[4] Post, § 2039.

[5] Post, § 2191.

[6] Post, § 1829.

[7] 1854, Pittsfield & F. P. R. Co. v. Harrison, 16 Ill. 81 (competency of stockholders as witnesses); 1868, Patterson v. Hansel, 4 Bush 654, 659 (making insufficiently recorded deed-copies receivable); 1892, Messimer v. McCrary, 113 Mo. 382, 389, 21 S. W. 17 (making certain witnesses incompetent since deposition taken); 1901, State v. Heldenbrand, 62 Nebr. 136, 87 N. W. 25, semble; 1853, Foster v. Gray, 22 Pa. 9, 13, 16 (making certified copies of sheriff's deeds formerly recorded receivable); to these cases add the citations post, § 1354, holding valid a change in the rules of presumption.

For the effect of statutes which by altering the qualifications of witnesses affect the use of testimony given at a former trial, see post, § 1409.

[8] 1798, Chase, J., in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390 ("I will state what laws I consider ex post facto laws within the words and intent of the prohibition: 1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; 2d. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed; 3d. Every law that changes the punishment and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed; 4th. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence in order to convict the offender").

[9] 1868, Walthall v. Walthall, 42 Ala. 450 (statute removing disqualification by interest, held not within the prohibition); 1862, Ralston v. Lothain, 18 Ind. 303, 305 (St. 1861, p. 52, removing the disqualification of parties as witnesses, held constitutional); 1882, Robinson v. State, 84 id. 452 (statute allowing a certain kind of impeachment of witness, held not within the prohibition); 1874, Wormley v. Hamburg, 40

ance.[10] There can be no vested right in a rule of evidence. Those rules are merely methods for ascertaining facts. It must be supposed that a change of the law merely makes it more likely that the fact will be truly ascertained, — either by admitting evidence whose former suppression, or by suppressing

La. 22, 25 (Code §§ 2080, 3639, disqualifying survivors as witnesses, and changing the prior rule for parties to nonrious contracts, held constitutional); 1901, Burk v. Putnam, 113 Id. 232, 84 N. W. 1053 (change of rule as to testimony of husband and wife, held constitutional; "there is no vested right in a rule of evidence"); 1877, Laughlin v. Com., 13 Bush 261 (witness since made competent, admitted; point not expressly passed upon); 1899, Dunning v. West, 51 La. An. 618, 25 So. 306 (statute making witnesses competent, held not unconstitutional as retroactive; here, a new trial was granted to admit testimony thus made competent since the first judgment); 1862, Goshen v. Richmond, 4 Ali. 458 ("No party to a suit has a vested right to exclude his adversary or even a convict from testifying against him"); 1891, O'Bryan v. Allen, 108 Mo. 227, 230, 18 S. W. 892 (statute making a witness incompetent, not when the prohibition); 1896, Daggs v. Ins. Co., 136 id. 382, 38 S. W. 85 (in general); 1897, State v. Thompson, 141 id. 408, 42 S. W. 949 (under the fourth clause of the grouping in Calder v. Bull, supra, a law admitting proof of handwriting by specimens of additional sorts was held not invalid; Barclay, C. J., and Sherwood, J., diss., on special statutory grounds); 1859, Rich v. Flanders, 39 N. H. 304, 323, 329, 347, 362 (St. 1857, c. 1952, § 1, removing the disqualification of interest, held constitutional; "statutes changing the rules of evidence or of practice are to be classed with and treated like statutes affecting the remedy," and are effective for all cases, "unless they impair contracts or destroy vested rights" by merely employing the form of a rule of evidence; leading opinion on the subject, by Sargent, J.; Bell, C. J., and Bellows, J., diss., but the instances they adduce in support of their argument are really instances of changes in the substantive law, such as the rule requiring attestation as a formal element in the validity of a deed or will); 1873, Kent v. Gray, 53 Id. 576 (Rich v. Flanders apparently approved, obiter); 1880, Tabor v. Ward, 83 N. C. 291, 294 (St. 1879, c. 183, affecting the qualifications of witnesses in suits on bonds and judgments, held constitutional; "one can have no vested right in a rule of evidence"); 1898, First Meth. Ep. Church v. Fadden, 8 N. D. 162, 77 N. W. 615, semble (change of rule as to proof of corporate capacity, made since answer filed, applied); 1874, Weaterman v. Weaterman, 25 Oh. St. 560, 567 (statute making spouses competent against each other, applied to pending suits); 1875, John v. Bridgman, 27 id. 22, 43 (approving the preceding case); 1887, Strode v. Washer, 17 Or. 50, 16 Pac. 926 (the repeal of a statute making a tax deed prima facie evidence of the regularity of proceedings is valid to affect a purchaser under a deed made during the life of the statute, the statute merely affecting a rule of evidence and not creating a vested right); 1902, Saudberg v. State, 113 Wis. 573, 89 N. W. 505 (statute affecting the use of marriage registers, etc., held not ex post facto).

Contra: 1866, Hart v. State, 40 Ala. 32 (statute restricting to misdemeanors a former statutory rule requiring corroboration for an accomplice, held ex post facto for offences occurring before its passage; Walker, C. J., diss. in an acute opinion); 1867, State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 476, 484 (statute making admissions, repute, etc., sufficient to prove marriage on bigamy charge, held to violate the provision; following Calder v. Bull); 1902, State v. Cincinnati T. & J. Co., 66 Oh. 182, 64 N. E. 68 (the Legislature may make rules of prima facie evidence for "future transactions" only); Vt. St. 1894, § 28 (no act, except relating to the competency of witnesses, shall affect a suit begun).

Distinguish the following, in which a rule of substantive law (post, § 2082) was involved: 1848, Dunbarton v. Franklin, 19 N. H. 257, 261 (statute providing that, after three years' cohabitation and repute and the decease of one of the two, the persons "shall be deemed to have been legally married," held to be within the provision, because "evidence which did not prove a marriage before the passage of the act . . . is made competent by the act").

[10] 1866, Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 391, 394 (the dissenting judges seem to approve obiter the language of Calder v. Bull; the majority do not deal with the point); 1882, Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 228, 239, 2 Sup. 443 (Calder v. Bull cited; the fourth proposition by implication approved; and a law allowing a trial for murder in the first degree in spite of a conviction of murder in the second degree treated as a "rule of evidence" that "what was conclusive evidence of innocence of the higher grade of murder" should be rejected; four judges dissenting, but apparently not questioning the fourth proposition); 1884, Hopt v. Utah, 110 Id. 574, 587, 4 Sup. 202 (law making competent persons convicted of felony; held, not within the prohibition, because "statutes which simply enlarge the class of persons who may be competent to testify in criminal cases . . . do not attach criminality to any act previously done and which was innocent when done, . . . nor do they alter the degree or lessen the amount or measure of the proof which was made necessary to conviction when the crime was committed"; an alteration of the latter sort "might" be obnoxious to the prohibition); 1898, Thompson v. Missouri, 171 Id. 380, 18 Sup. 922 (law allowing comparison of handwriting-specimens, not forbidden; former general expressions repudiated).

evidence whose former admission, helped to conceal the truth. In either case no fact has been taken away from the party; it is merely that good evidence has been given the one, or bad evidence been taken from the other. In any event, the ascertainment of the truth cannot be supposed to depend on a particular piece of evidence. Quite apart from these considerations, the deprivation, whatever it may amount to (for example, in the creation of a new privilege for physicians, which would not rest on the ground of improving the means of truth), is not within the class of property deprivations which the principle of the ex post facto prohibition seeks to prevent.

(b) A rule of substantive law involving a property right may be protected by the Constitution, and thus a statute which in effect infringes that right may be invalid, even though it is expressed in terms of a rule of evidence; for example, a statute declaring a tax collector's deed of land sold for taxes to be conclusive evidence of due transfer of title may be ineffective as violating the rule that property shall not be taken without due process of law.[11] In this case the invalidity is due to the feature, not that it is a rule of evidence, but that it is a rule of substantive law.

(c) The legislative function is separate from the judicial function; and a statute which attempts in effect to exercise a judicial power is invalid. The judicial power involves the application of the law to concrete facts and, therefore, the investigation and establishment of the facts. Any statute which prevents the judicial body from ascertaining the facts in litigation coming properly before it is ineffective. It is on this ground that a statute which prescribes a conclusive effect for certain testimony may be held invalid.[12] Here, indeed, a genuine rule of evidence is involved (as distinguished from a rule of substantive law under the guise of evidence, as in par. (2), supra); but the invalidity would be due, not to any intrinsic lack of legislative control over the rules of evidence in general, but to the effect of that particular kind of a rule in depriving the judiciary of the exercise of its constitutional function.

§ 8. General Survey of the Historical Development of the Rules of Evidence. The details of the history of the rules of evidence can best be examined while considering the particular rules each in its place. But it is worth while to notice here summarily the historical development of the general system in its main features, and the relative chronology of the different rules. Some notion can thus be obtained of the influence of certain external circumstances on the rules at large and of some of the individual principles upon the others.[1]

The marked divisions of chronology, for our law of evidence, may be said to be seven, — from primitive times to 1200 A. D., thence to 1500, thence to 1700, to 1790, to 1830, to 1860, and to the present time:

[11] This class of cases is examined post, §§ 1353, 1354.

[12] The cases are examined post, §§ 1353, 1354.

[1] The authorities for the ensuing statements will be found cited in detail in the historical sections under the various Chapters post.

(1) A. D. 700–1200. Up to the period of the 1200s, the history of the rules of evidence, in the modern sense, is like the chapter upon ophidians in Erin; for there were none. Under the primitive practices of trial by ordeal, by battle, and by compurgation, the proof is accomplished by a judicium Dei, and there is no room for our modern notion of persuasion of the tribunal by the credibility of the witnesses;[2] for the tribunal merely verified the observance of the due formalities, and did not conceive of these as directly addressed to their own reasoning powers. Nevertheless, a few marks, indelibly made by these earlier usages, were left for a long time afterwards in our law. The summoning of attesting witnesses to prove a document, the quantitative effect of an oath, the conclusiveness of a seal in fixing the terms of a documentary transaction, the necessary production of the original of a document, — these rules all trace a continuous existence back to this earliest time, although they later took on different forms and survived for reasons not at all connected with their primitive theories.

(2) A. D. 1200–1500. With the full advent of the jury, in the 1200s, the general surroundings of the modern system are prepared; for now the tribunal is to determine out of its own conscious persuasion of the facts, and not merely by supervising external tests. The change is of course gradual; and trial by jury is as yet only one of several competing methods; but at least a system for the process of persuasion becomes possible. In this period, no new specific rules seem to have sprung up. The practice for attesting witnesses, oaths, and documentary originals is developed. The rule for the conclusiveness of a sealed writing is definitely established. But during these three centuries the general process of pleading and procedure is only gradually differentiated from that of proof, — chiefly because the jurors are as yet relied upon to furnish in themselves both knowledge and decision; for they are not commonly caused to be informed by witnesses, in the modern sense.

(3) A. D. 1500–1700. By the 1500s, the constant employment of witnesses, as the jury's chief source of information, brings about a radical change. Here enter, very directly, the possibilities of our modern system. With all the emphasis gradually cast upon the witnesses, their words and their documents, the whole question of admissibility arises. One first great consequence is the struggle between the numerical or quantitative system, which characterized the canon law and still dominated all other methods of proof, and the unfettered systemless jury trial; and it was not for two centuries that the numerical system was finally repulsed. Another cardinal question now necessarily faced was that of the competency of witnesses; and by the end of the 1500s the foundations were laid for all the rules of disqualification which prevailed thenceforward for more than two centuries, and in part still remain. At the same time, and chiefly from a simple failure to differentiate, most of the rules of privilege and privileged communication were thereby brought into existence, at least in embryo. The rule for attorneys, which alone stood upon its own ground, also belongs here, though its reasons were newly conceived after the lapse of a century. A third great principle, the right to have compulsory attendance of witnesses, marks the very beginning of this period. Under the primitive notions, this all rested upon the voluntary action of one's partisans; the calling of compurgators and documentary attestors, under the older methods of trial, was in effect a matter of contract. But as soon as the chief reliance came to be the witnesses to the jurors, and the latter ceased to act on their own knowledge, the necessity for the provision of such information, compulsorily if not otherwise, became immediately obvious. The idea progressed slowly; it was enforced first for the Crown, next for civil parties; and not until the next period was it conceded to accused persons. Thus was laid down indirectly the general principle that there is no privilege to refuse to be a witness; to which the other rules, above mentioned, subsequently became contrasted as exceptions. A fourth important principle, wholly independent in origin, here also arose and became fixed by the end of this period, — the privilege against self-crimination. The creature, under another form, of the canon law, in which it had a long history of its own, it was transferred, under stress of political turmoil, into the common law, and thus, by a singular contrast, came to be a most distinctive feature of our trial system. About the same period — the end of the 1600s — an equally distinctive feature, the rule against using an accused's character, became settled. Finally, the "parol evidence" rule enlarged its scope, and came to include all writings and not merely sealed documents; this development, and the enactment of the statute of frauds and perjuries, represent a special phase of thought in the end of this period. It ends, however, rather with the Restoration of 1660 than with the Revolution of 1688, or the last years of the century; for the notable feature of it is that the regenerating results of the struggle against the arbitrary methods of James I and Charles I began to be felt as early as the return of Charles II. The mark of the new period is seen at the Restoration. Justice, on all hands, then begins to mend. Cruelities which Matthew Hale permitted, under the Commonwealth, Scroggs refused, under James II. The privilege against self-crimination, the rule for two witnesses in treason, and the character rule — three landmarks of our law of evidence — find their first full recognition in the last days of the Stuarts.

[2] This is indeed elaborately denied by Declareuil, in Nouvelle revue hist. du droit fr. et etr. 1898, XXII, 220 ff.; but all prior students have assumed the contrary. It is no doubt difficult to replace ourselves in the primitive mental attitude.

(4) A. D. 1700–1790. Two circumstances now contributed independently to a further development of the law on two opposite sides, its philosophy and its practical efficiency. On the one hand, the final establishment of the right of cross-examination by counsel, at the beginning of the 1700s, gave to our law of evidence the distinction of possessing the most efficacious expedient ever invented for the extraction of truth (although, to be sure, like torture, — that great instrument of the continental system, — it is almost equally powerful for the creation of false impressions). A notable consequence was that by the multiplication of oral interrogation at trials the rules of evidence were now developed in detail upon such topics as naturally came into new prominence. All through the 1700s this expansion proceeded, though slowly. On the other hand, the already existing material began now to be treated in doctrinal form. The first treatise on the law of evidence was that of Chief Baron Gilbert, not published till after his death in 1726. About the same time the abridgments of Bacon and of Comyns gave many pages to the title of Evidence;[3] but no other treatise appeared for a quarter of a century, when the notes of Mr. J. Bathurst (later Lord Chancellor) were printed, under the significant title of the "Theory of Evidence." But this propounding of a system was as yet chiefly the natural culmination of the prior century's work, and was independent of the expansion of practice now going on. In Gilbert's book, for example, even in the fifth edition of 1788, there are in all, out of the three hundred pages, less than five concerned with the new topics brought up by the practice of cross-examination; in Bathurst's treatise (by this time embodied in his nephew Buller's "Trials at Nisi Prius") the number is hardly more; Blackstone's Commentaries, in 1768, otherwise so full, are here equally barren. The most notable result of these disquisitions, on the theoretical side, was the establishment of the "best evidence" doctrine, which dominated the law for nearly a century later. But this very doctrine tended to preserve a general consciousness of the supposed simplicity and narrowness of compass of the law of evidence. As late as the very end of the century Mr. Burke could argue down the rules of evidence, when attempted to be enforced upon the House of Lords at Warren Hastings' trial, and ridicule them as petty and inconsiderable.[4] But, none the less, the practice had materially expanded during his lifetime. In this period, besides the rules for impeachment and corroboration of witnesses (which were due chiefly to the development of cross-examination), are to be reckoned also the origins of the rules for confessions, for leading questions, and for the order of testimony. The various principles affecting documents — such as the authorization of certified (or office) copies and the conditions dispensing from the production of originals — now also received their general and final shape.

(5) A. D. 1790–1830. The full spring-tide of the system had now arrived. In the ensuing generation the established principles began to be developed into rules and precedents of minutiæ relatively innumerable to what had gone before. In the Nisi Prius reports of Peake, Espinasse, and Campbell, centring around the quarter-century from 1790 to 1815, there are probably more rulings upon evidence than in all the prior reports of two centuries. In this development the dominant influence is plain; it was the increase of [3] Hawkins, in 1716, and Hale, in 1680, in their treatises on the criminal law, had had short chapters on evidence at these earlier dates.

[4] "As to rules of law and evidence, he did not know what they meant; . . . it was true, something had been written on the law of Evidence, but very general, very abstract, and comprised in so small a compass that a parrot he had known might get them by rote in one half-hour and repeat them in five minutes" (1794, Hastings' Trial, Lords' Journal, Feb. 25).

printed reports of Nisi Prius rulings.[8] This was at first the cause, and afterwards the self-multiplying effect, of the detailed development of the rules. Hitherto, upon countless details, the practice had varied greatly on the different circuits; moreover, it had rested largely in the memory of the experienced leaders of the trial bar and in the momentary discretion of the judges. In both respects it therefore lacked fixity, and was not amenable to tangible authority. These qualities it now rapidly gained. As soon as Nisi Prius reports multiplied and became available to all, the circuits must be reconciled, the rulings once made and recorded must be followed, and these precedents must be open to the entire profession to be invoked. There was, so to speak, a sudden precipitation of all that had hitherto been suspended in solution. This effect began immediately to be assisted and emphasized by the appearance of new treatises, summing up the recent acquisitions of precedent and practice. In nearly the same year, Peake, for England (1801), and MacNally, for Ireland (1802), printed small volumes whose contents, as compared with those of Gilbert and Buller, seem to represent almost a different system, so novel were their topics. In 1806 Evans' Notes to Pothier on Obligations was made the vehicle of the first reasoned analysis of the rules. In this respect it was epoch-making; and its author in a later time once quietly complained that its pages were "more often quoted than acknowledged." The room for new treatises was rapidly enlarging. Peake and MacNally, as handbooks of practice, were out of date within a few years, and no new editions could cure them. In 1814, and then in 1824, came Phillipps and Starkie, — in method combining Evans' philosophy with Peake's strict reflection of the details of practice. There was now indeed a system of evidence, consciously and fully realized. Across the water a similar stage had been reached. By a natural interval Peake's treatise was balanced, in 1810, by Swift's Connecticut book, while Phillipps and Starkie (after a period of sufficiency under American annotations) were replaced by Greenleaf's treatise of 1842.

(6) A. D. 1830–1860. Meantime, the advance of consequences was proceeding, by action and reaction. The treatises of Peake and Phillipps, by embodying in print the system as it existed, at the same time exposed it to the light of criticism. It contained, naturally enough, much that was merely inherited and traditional, much that was outgrown and outworn. The very efforts to supply explicit reasons for all this made it the easier to puncture the insufficient reasons and to impale the inconsistent ones. This became the office of Bentham. Beginning with the first publication, in French, of his Theory of Judicial Evidence, in 1818, the influence of his thought upon the law of evidence gradually became supreme. While time has only ultimately vindicated and accepted most of his ideas (then but chimeras) for other practical reforms, and though some still remain untried, the results of his proposals in this department began almost immediately to be achieved. Mature experience constantly inclines us to believe that the best results on human action are seldom accomplished by sarcasm and invective; for the old fable of the genial sun and the raging wind repeats itself. But Bentham's case must always stand out as a proof that sometimes the contrary is true, — if conditions are meet. No one can say how long our law might have waited for regeneration, if Bentham's diatribes had not lashed the community into a sense of its shortcomings. It is true that he was particularly favored by circumstances in two material respects, — the one personal, the other broadly social. He gained, among others, two incomparable disciples, who served as a fulcrum from which his lever could operate directly upon legislation. Henry Brougham and Thomas Denman combined with singular felicity the qualities of leadership in the technical arts of their profession and of energy for the abstract principles of progress. Holding the highest offices of justice, and working through a succession of decades, they were enabled, within a generation, to bring Bentham's ideas directly into influence upon the law. One who reads the great speech of Brougham, on February 7, 1828, on the state of the common law courts, and the reports of Denman and his colleagues, in 1852 and 1853, on the common law procedure, is perusing epoch-making deliverances of the century.[6] The other circumstance that favored Bentham's causes was the radical readiness of the times. The French Revolution had acted in England; and as soon as the Napoleonic wars were over, the influence began to be felt. One part of public opinion was convinced that there must be a radical change; the other and dominant part felt assured that if the change did not come as reform, it would come as revolution; and so the reform was given, to prevent the revolution. In a sense, it did not much matter to them where the reform came about, — in the economic, or the political, or the juridical field, — if only there was reform. At this stage, Bentham's denouncing voice concentrated attention on the subject of public justice, — criminal law and civil procedure; and so it was here that the movement was felt among the first. As a matter of chronological order, the first considerable achievements were in the field of criminal law, beginning in 1820, under Romilly and Mackintosh; then came the political upheaval of the Reform Bill, in 1832, under Russell and Grey; next the economic regeneration, beginning with Huskisson and culminating with Peel in the Corn Law Repeal of 1846. Not until the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854 were large and final results achieved for the Benthamic ideas in procedure and evidence. But over the whole preceding twenty years had been spread initial and instructive reforms. Brougham's speech of February 7, 1828, was the real signal for the beginning of this epoch, — a beginning which would doubtless have culminated more rapidly

[8] Compare Campbell's account of the conditions when he began to report in 1807 (Life, I, 214).

[6] "The great controversy now [1851] is upon the Evidence Bill, allowing the parties to be examined against and for themselves. . . . If it passes, it will create a new era in the administration of justice in this country" (Campbell's Life, II, 292). "Our new procedure (which is in truth a juridical revolution) is now [1854] established, and people submit to it quietly" (Ib., II, 328).

if urgent economic and political crises had not intervened to absorb the legislative energy.

In the United States, the counterpart of this period came only a little later. It seems to have begun all along the line, and was doubtless inspired by the accounts of progress made and making in England, as well as by the writings of Edward Livingston, the American Bentham, and by the legislative efforts of David Dudley Field, in the realm of civil procedure. The period from 1840 to 1870 saw the enactment, in the various jurisdictions in this country, of most of the reformatory legislation which had been carried or proposed in England.

(7) A. D. 1860. After the Judicature Act of 1875, and the Rules of Court (of 1883) which under its authority were formulated, the law of evidence in England attained rest. It is still overpatched and disfigured with multiplicitous fragmentary statutes, especially for documentary evidence. But it seems to be harmonious with the present demands of justice, and above all to be so certain and settled in its acceptance that no further detailed development is called for. It is a substratum of the law which comes to light only rarely in the judicial rulings upon practice.

Far otherwise in this country. The latest period in the development of the law of evidence is marked by a temporary degeneracy. Down to about 1870, the established principles, both of common law rules and of statutory reforms, were re-stated by our judiciary in a long series of opinions which, for careful and copious reasoning, and for the common sense of experience, were superior (on the whole) to the judgments uttered in the native home of our law. Partly because of the lack of treatises and even of reports, — partly because of the tendency to question imported rules and therefore to defend on grounds of principle and policy whatever could be defended, — partly because of the moral obligation of the judiciary, in new communities, to vindicate by intellectual effort its right to supremacy over the bar, — and partly also because of the advent, coincidently, of the same rationalizing spirit which led to the reformatory legislation, — this very necessity of restatement led to the elaboration of a finely reasoned system. The "mint, anise, and cummin" of mere precedent[7] were not unduly revered. There was always a reason given, — even though it might not always be a worthy reason. The pronouncement of Bentham came near to be exemplified, that "so far as evidence is concerned, the English practice needs no improvement but from its own stores. Consistency, consistency, is the one thing needful. Preserve consistency, and perfection is accomplished."[8]

But the newest States in time came to be added. New reports spawned a multifarious mass of new rulings in fifty jurisdictions, — each having theoretically an equal claim to consideration. The liberal spirit of choosing and testing the better rule degenerated into a spirit of empiric eclecticism in which all things could be questioned and re-questioned ad infinitum. The partisan spirit of the bar, contesting desperately on each trifle, and the unjust doctrine of new trials, tempting counsel to push up to the appellate courts upon every ruling of evidence, increased this tendency. Added to this was the supposed necessity in the newer jurisdictions of deciding over again all the details that had been long settled in the older ones. Here the lack of local traditions at the bar and of self-confidence on the bench led to the tedious re-exposition of countless elementary rules. This lack of peremptoriness on the supreme bench, and (no less important) the marked separation of personality between courts of trial and courts of final decision, led also to the multifarious heaping up, within each jurisdiction, of rulings upon rulings involving identical points of decision. This last phenomenon may be due to many subtly conspiring causes. But at any rate the fact is that in numerous instances, and in almost every jurisdiction, recorded decisions of Supreme Courts upon precisely the same rule and the same application of it can be reckoned by the dozens and scores. This wholly abnormal state of things — in clear contrast to that of the modern English epoch — is the marked feature of the present period of development in our own country.

[7] Lumpkin, J., in 33 Ga. 306.

[8] Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. X, conclusion. Bentham never failed to preach the impropriety of not furnishing reasons. "'I think, therefore I exist,' was the argument of Descartes; 'I exist, therefore I have no need to think or be thought about,' is the argument of jurisprudence" (b. II, c. X, § 12; so also in b. III, c. IV, note).

Of the change that is next to come, and of the period of its arrival, there seem as yet to be no certain signs. Probably it will come either in the direction of the present English practice — by slow formation of professional habits — or in the direction of attempted legislative relief from the mass of bewildering judicial rulings — by a concise code. The former alone might suffice. But the latter will be a false and futile step, unless it is founded upon the former; and in any event the danger is that it will be premature. A code fixes error as well as truth. No code can be worth casting, until there has been more explicit discussion of the reasons for the rules and more study of them from the point of view of synthesis and classification. The time must first come when, in the common understanding and acceptance of the profession, "every rule is referred articulately and definitely to an end which it subserves, and when the grounds for desiring that end are stated or are ready to be stated in words."[9] [9] Mr. Justice Holmes, quoted in the motto prefixed to the Preface.

BOOK I.

WHAT FACTS MAY BE PRESENTED AS EVIDENCE (ADMISSIBILITY).

INTRODUCTION.

GENERAL THEORY AND PROCEDURE OF ADMISSIBILITY.

CHAPTER II.

1. General Theory.

§ 9. The Two Axioms of Admissibility; I. None but Facts having Rational Probative Value are Admissible. The modern system of evidence rests upon two axioms. These underlie its whole structure. Implicitly, but none the less actually and positively, recognized in the practice of the courts and in the utterances of the judges, they were first distinctly formulated by the great master and expounder of the history of our law of evidence. The first is this:

I. None but facts having rational probative value are admissible. This principle is indeed axiomatic, for any system of evidence purporting to be rational. It assumes no particular doctrine as to the kind of ratiocination implied, — whether practical or scientific, coarse and ready or refined and systematic. It prescribes merely that whatever is presented as evidence shall be presented on the hypothesis that it is calculated, according to the prevailing standards of reasoning, to effect rational persuasion:

1889, Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence," "Law and Fact in Jury Trials," 3 Harvard Law Review 143, 4 id. 156:[1] "There is one precept to be mentioned, which is not so much a rule of evidence as a presupposition involved in the very conception of a rational system of evidence as contrasted with the old formal and mechanical systems, viz., that nothing which is not supposed to be relevant, i. e., logically probative, shall be received. . . . Reasoning, the rational method of settling disputed questions, is the modern substitute for certain formal and mechanical tests which flourished among our ancestors for centuries, and in the midst of which the trial by jury emerged. When two men to-day settle which is the 'best man' by a prize-fight, we get an accurate notion of the old Germanic trial. Who is it that 'tries' the question? The men themselves. There are referees and rules of the game, but no determination of the dispute on the grounds of reason, — by the rational method. So it was with 'trial by battle' in our old law; the issue of right, in a writ of right, including all elements of law and fact, was 'tried' by this physical struggle, and the judges of the Common Pleas sat, like the referee at a prize-fight, simply to administer the procedure, the rules of the game. So of the King's Bench in criminal appeals; and so sat Richard II at the trial of the appeal of treason between Bolingbroke and Norfolk, as Shakespeare represents it in the play. So of the various ordeals; the accused party 'tried' his own case by undergoing the given requirement as to hot iron, or water, or the crumb. So of the oath; the question, both law and fact, was 'tried' merely by the oath, with or without fellow-swearers. The old 'trial by witnesses' was a testing of the question in like manner by their mere oath. So a record was said to 'try' itself. And so when out of the midst of these methods first came the trial by jury, it was the jury's oath, or rather their verdict, that 'tried' the case. How this mode of trial came to swallow up the others, and then to lose its chief features, and become shaped into an instrument of our modern purely rational procedure, is a long story, and is not for this place. But as we use the phrase 'trial' and 'trial by jury' now, we mean a rational ascertainment of facts, and a rational ascertainment and application of rules. What was formerly tried by the method of force or the mechanical following of forms, is now tried by the method of reason."

This notable passage fitly expresses the marked spirit of our law of evidence for the last century and a half, — that is, since the beginning of our consciousness of it as a system.[2] From the time of Erskine's eloquent, if rhetorical, pronouncement, that "the rules of evidence are founded in the charities of religion, in the philosophy of nature, in the truths of history, and in the experience of common life,"[3] the emphasis on their rationality of method has been an increasing one. The rules of evidence, said the early Pennsylvania Court, "are founded in reason and good sense";[4] and such utterances typify the general spirit of the modern administration of the law. Among the innumerable indirect effects are to be noted the rules directed to prevent the jury from substituting passion and prejudice, instead of reasoning, as the foundation of their conclusion (post, § 1904); and the doctrine that even the Legislature cannot establish a rule of decision which will deprive the Judiciary of its power to investigate the facts by rational methods (post, § 1353).

[1] These passages were substantially reproduced by the learned author, in 1898, in his Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 264, 198.

[2] It would seem that "divine testimonies" from responses, oracles, omens, augurs, dream-interpreters, or astrologers might be resorted to in even the most developed stage of the Roman procedure: Quintilian, De Institutione Oratoria, b. V, c. VII.

[3] 1794, Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 966.

[4] Yeates and Smith, JJ., in 1803, in Galbreath v. Eichelberger, 3 Yeates 515.

The resort to irrational methods, however, persisted sporadically in our history till a more recent date than we are accustomed to suppose. Trial by compurgation oath (or wager of law) was not formally abolished in England until 1833.[5] Trial by duel (or wager of battle) was not forbidden by law until 1819, and at least two instances of its recognition had occurred since 1800.[6] Trial by ordeal (of water, fire, and the like), however, was longest and hardest in dying. It had, to be sure, no longer been formally permitted in the English royal courts after the ecclesiastical law forbade it in 1215.[7] But it rested on a deep-rooted superstitious instinct which from time to time, in rude and popular justice, attempted to invoke it. It is certain that in the 1600s the corpse-touching ordeal (which seems to be the most persistent of superstitions) was judicially recognized on many occasions as probative;[8] and in the 1800s, in certain of the rural communities, it has been recorded even since the middle of the century.[9] No doubt these tests, as they still linger in popular beliefs, are entitled to be used indirectly in evidence, — that is, as indications of a guilty consciousness when the test is refused (post, § 275); but this is a different thing from giving them an intrinsic probative force:

1894, Gantt, P. J., in State v. Wisdom, 119 Mo. 539, 24 S. W. 1051 (admitting the fact that at the morgue the accused was requested, with others, to put his hand on the corpse of the murdered man, but refused): "The request to touch the body was evidently prompted by the old superstition of the ordeal of the bier in Europe in the middle ages. This superstition has come to this country with the emigration from other lands, and, although a creature of the imagination, it does to a considerable degree affect the opinions of a large class of our people. . . . The jury could consider that, while it was a superstitious test, still defendant might have been more or less affected by it. . . . There is not the slightest evidence that any member of the jury itself regarded the test itself as anything more than a groundless superstition."

[5] Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 34; in this treatise the history of all the earlier modes of trial is set forth.

[6] Thayer, ib. 45; 1817, Ashford v. Thornton, Woodall's Celebrated Trials, I, 39; 40 Hans. Parl. Deb. 1203–1207.

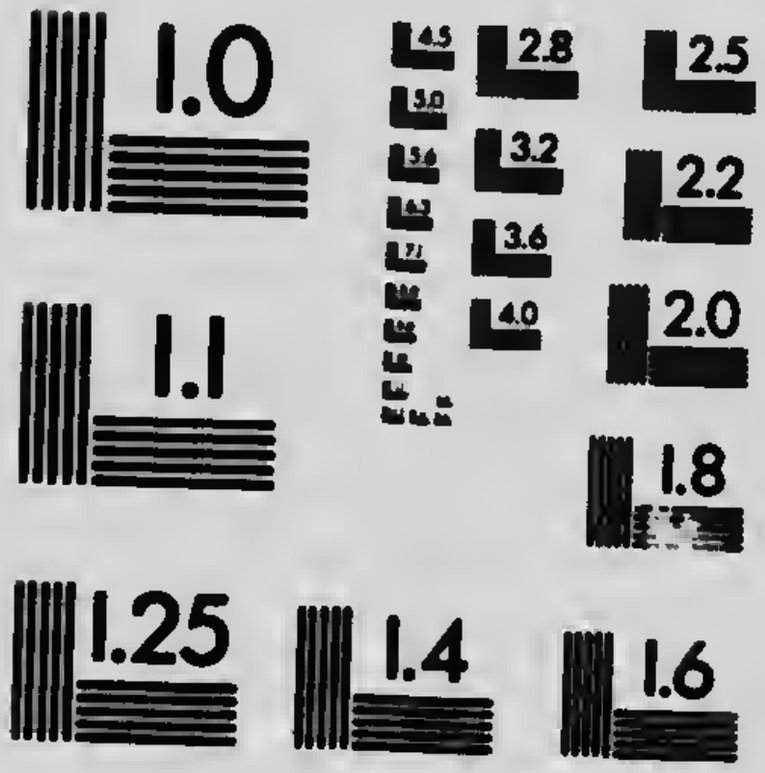
[7] Thayer, ib. 37; Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, II, 597; 1679, Gavan's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 311, 383 (the defendant, a Jesuit charged in the Popish Plot, invoked the old custom and law "for the prisoner to put himself upon the trial of ordeal, to evidence his own innocency"; L. C. J. North: "We have no such law now"; and the Court treated the request as a mere trick).

[8] 1629, Hertfordshire murder, 13 How. St. Tr. 1325 (the accused persons were tried on an appeal before Sir Nicholas Hyde, Chief Justice, and Sir J. Maynard reports that "because the evidence was so strange, I took exact and particular notice; the minister of the parish, and his brother the minister of the adjoining parish, deposed (and their statement was apparently received without objection) that the four defendants had been taken to the exhumed body and required each of them to touch it; and when a certain one touched it, a sweat came out on the body, the color changed, the eyes opened, and the finger dropped blood upon the ground"); 1688, Standefield's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 1371, 1387, 1393, 1403, 1417 (in Scotland; at the examination of a corpse two days buried, the defendant touched it in helping; and the effusion of blood that followed was treated as evidence, and it was argued by counsel that "God Almighty himself was pleased to bear a share in the testimonies which we produce"; this case is also alluded to by Scott, in the "Fair Maid of Perth"). So too the witchcraft cases involved similar credulities: 1702, Hathaway's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 639 (indictment as an impostor and cheat of one who claimed that a spell had taken away his power of swallowing; evidence was received for him of his expectoration of pins, etc.; but L. C. J. Holt made the issue for the jury his sanity, and not his bewitchment; the defendant was found guilty, and this trial is said to have checked the offering of such superstitious evidence).

[9] 1892, Lea, Superstition and Force, 4th ed., 367; for other modern instances, see Browne's History of Maryland, 179; Bentham, Judicial Evidence, b. V, c. XVI, § 6 (Bowring's ed., VII, 101); Browne, Practical Tests, 5 Green Bag, 13, et passim.

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

The contrast, it may be noted, between employing rational and non-rational modes of proof is after all not between the use of scientific reasoning and the employment of superstitious ordeals; it is rather between employing the best standards we know and those which we realize are not the best. For instance, the acceptance of a judicium Dei, for the men of a certain time, was the rational and appropriate process, the method accepted and employed in every-day affairs as well as in legal proceedings.[10] It was when the combats and the ordeals came to be abused, and to be known to be abused, that these modes were no longer the best known to the times; and the passage from ordeals and oaths to the jury marked what was equivalent to a rejection of the irrational and an assent to the rational.[11] But the change here was of the outward mechanism only; the jurors themselves still were dominated by modes of argument and persuasion which we should to-day call superstitious; yet they were for the time the best, being the generally accepted. When science advanced and modes of thought improved, the time again came when the old ways were recognized as inferior; and so to-day the contrast between the best which is known to us and something inferior to that is between what we call rational and superstitious modes of thought. Thus there have been, in the history of our modes of proof, separate epochs, in each of which we progressed from what we were aware to be the inferior to what we had come to know as better; and this in a broad sense is the significance of the principle that the law of evidence is based on the employment of rational standards.

In the present day the last remnant of the irrational element is our law of new trials (post, § 21). The primitive ordeals of fire and of water were not more calculated to deify chance or chicanery as the arbiter of litigation than is this dominant contemporaneous practice of granting new trials for an immaterial slip in the rules of evidence. The most trifling error "works a reversal," in the same wizard-like manner that the mispronounced word in the superstitious formulas of the Germanic litigation lost for the party his cause. This modern doctrine is the more discreditable of the two. They knew no better, then. We do know better; yet we preserve this technical trumpery.

§ 10. Same: II. All Facts having Rational Probative Value are Admissible, unless some Specific Rule forbids. The second axiom on which our law of evidence rests is this: All facts having rational probative value are admissible, unless some specific rule forbids. It has been otherwise expressed as follows:

[10] The spirit of the following passage illustrates this: 1110–1200, Prayer at the boiling-water ordeal (Translations, etc., from the Original Sources of European History, vol. IV, no. 4, p. 9, Howland): "O God, Thou who within this substance of water hast hidden Thy most solemn sacraments, be graciously present with us who invoke Thee. . . . O Thou who perceivest hidden things and knowest what is secret, show and declare this by Thy grace, and make the knowledge of the truth manifest to us to believe in Thee."

[11] A good illustration of the beginning of this consciousness is fonnd in the Neapolitan Code of Emperor Frederic II; translated in Howland's Translations, ubi supra, 18, 21, and also given in the original in Lea, Superstition and Force, 422.

1889, Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence," 3 Harvard Law Review 143:[1] "There is another precept which it is convenient to lay down as a preliminary one in stating the law of evidence, viz., that, unless excluded by some rule or principle of law, all that is logically probative is admissible. This general admissibility of what is logically probative is not, like the former precept, a necessary presnpposition in a rational system of evidence, . . . but yet . . . it is important to notice this also as being a fundamental proposition. In a historical sense, it has not been the fundamental rule to which the various exclusions were exceptions. . . . [But] the main propositions which I have stated should, in the order of thought, be first laid down and always kept in mind."

This axiom expresses the truth that legal proof, though it has peculiar rules of its own, does not intend to vary without cause from what is generally accepted in the rational processes of life; and that of such variations some vindication may, in theory, always be demanded. In other words, in the system of evidence the rules of exclusion are, in their ultimate relation, rules of exception to a general admissibility of all that is rational and probative.

This principle, then, does not mean that anything that has probative value is admissible; this would be an entire misconception.[2] The true meaning is that everything having a probative value is ipso facto entitled to be assumed to be admissible, and that therefore any rule of policy which may be valid to exclude it is a superadded and abnormal rule. Some of these rules may be extensive in scope — the hearsay rule, for example; or their applicability may in a particular case be so plain, on the face of the offer of evidence, that the objector has no burden of proving that his rule of exclusion is applicable. Nevertheless, when the rules of evidence are taken in view as a system, these rules of policy appear as merely so many reserved spaces in the vast territory of logically probative material:

1794, Mr. Edmund Burke's Report to the House of Commons, Debrett's History of Hastings' Trial, 1796, pt. VII, Suppl. p. xxiii, 31 Parl. Hist. 324: "Your Committee conceives that the trial of a cause is not in the arguments or disputations of the prosecutors and the counsel, but in the evidence, and that to refuse evidence is to refuse to hear the cause. Nothing, therefore, but the most clear and weighty reasons ought to preclude its production. Your Committee conceives that when evidence, on the face of it relevant, that is connected with the party and the charge, was denied to be competent, the burthen lay upon those who opposed it, to set forth the authorities, whether of positive statute, known recognized maxims and principles of law, passages in an accredited institute, code, digest, or systematic treatise of laws, or some adjudged cases, wherein the Courts have rejected evidence of that nature."

Circa 1823, Mr. Justice Edward Livingston, Introductory Report to the Code of Evidence (Works, ed. 1872, I, 421): "Ultimately, the whole machinery of jurisprudence, in all its branches, is contrived for the purpose of enabling the judging power to determine on the truth or falsehood of every litigated proposition. This is to be done by hearing and examining evidence; that is to say, hearing and examining everything that will contribute to bring the mind to the determination required. If we refuse to hear what will, in any degree, produce this effect, we must determine on imperfect evidence; and in proportion to the importance of the matter thus refused to be heard, must evidently be the chance of making an incorrect rather than a just determination. But, as in morals, we are forbidden to do evil that good may come of it, so, in legislation, we should refrain from doing that kind of good which may produce more than its equivalent in evil. The desirable end to be attained by the admission of every species of evidence, may be more than counterbalanced, in some instances, by the evil attending it; sometimes, in the shape of inconvenience and expense inseparable from its procurement; sometimes, from the danger of error arising from the deceptive nature of the evidence itself. The great art is to weigh these difficulties, and in those cases where they are most likely to preponderate, but in no others, to exclude the evidence."

[1] This passage was reproduced by the learned author, in 1898, in his Preliminary Treatise, 265, 268.

[2] 1838, Coleridge, J., in Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & F. 670 ("the fallacy that whatever is morally convincing, and whatever reasonable beings would form their judgments and act upon, may be submitted to a jury").

1837, Parke, B., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 384: "One great principle in this law [of evidence] is that all facts which are relevant to the issue may be proved."

1831, Hosmer, C. J., in State v. Watkins, 9 Conn. 53: "It is a universal rule of evidence that all facts and circumstances, upon which reasonable presumption or inference can be founded as to the truth of the issue or disputed fact, are admissible in evidence."

1849, Mr. W. M. Best, Evidence, § 2: "Facts which come in question in courts of justice are inquired into and determined in precisely the same way as doubtful or disputed facts are inquired into and determined by mankind in general, except so far as positive law has interposed with artificial rules to secure impartiality and accuracy of decision or exclude collateral mischiefs likely to result from the investigation."

1860, Baldwin, J., in People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 481: "The object of a trial is to elicit the real state of the transaction, and the rules which govern or determine the introduction of testimony have relation to this end. These rules are not mere arbitrary, conventional regulations; they are founded in reason and good sense. Generally speaking, whatever has a tendency to prove a material part of the issue is admissible."

1862, Pollock, C. B., in Milne v. Leisler, 7 H. & N. 796: "The Courts, so far as they can, are disposed to receive in evidence whatever can throw any light on the matter in issue and advance the search after truth."

1874, Appleton, C. J., in State v. Benner, 64 Me. 283: "It is an axiom in the law of evidence that no testimony should be excluded unless greater evil is seen as likely to arise from its admission than from its rejection."

1876, Sir James Stephen, Digest of Evidence, Introduction: "The great bulk of the law of evidence consists of negative rules declaring what, as the expression runs, is not evidence. The doctrine that all facts in issue and relevant to the issue, and no others, may be proved, is the unexpressed principle which forms the centre of and gives unity to all these express negative rules."

1878, Coleridge, C. J., in Blake v. Assurance Co., L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94: "The law [of evidence] . . . with a few exceptions on the ground of public policy, now is that all which can throw light on the disputed transaction is admitted, — not of course matters of mere prejudice nor anything open to real moral or sensible objection, but all things which fairly throw light on the case."

In this respect the century of the 1800s witnessed a gradual but marked improvement in the practical enforcement of this principle. "People were formerly frightened out of their wits," said Chief Justice Cockburn, in 1861, "about admitting evidence, lest juries should go wrong. In modern times we admit the evidence and discuss its weight."[3] The whole period of the reforms of 1840–1870, while it was effecting the abolition of many of the outgrown exclusionary rules, was propagating and illustrating the cardinal truth that these rules were exceptions only, and must show cause for existence. This moral attitude toward them is one which tends constantly to be relaxed in the mechanical routine of trial practice and the complexity of modern precedents. A recollection of the sturdy utterances of one of the champions of rationalism in a past generation of judges may serve to renew our courage amidst more modern temptations:

[3] R. v. Birmingham, 1 B. & S. 763.

1853–55, Lumpkin, J., in Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 61, and Haynes v. State, 17 id. 484: "The judges, both in England and in this country, are struggling constantly to keep open the door wide as possible, — aye, to take it off the hinges, to let in all facts calculated to affect the minds of the jury in arriving at a correct conclusion. . . . Truth, common sense, and enlightened reason, alike demand the abolition of all those artificial rules which shut out any fact from the jury, however remotely relevant, or from whatever source derived, which would assist them in coming to a satisfactory verdict. . . . This Court stands pledged, by its past history, for the abolition, to the extent of its power, of all exclusionary rules which shut out from the jury facts which may serve, directly or remotely, to reflect light upon the transaction upon which they are called upon to pass. For one case gained by improper proof, ninety-nine has been lost or improperly found on account of the parties being precluded by artificial rules from submitting all the facts to the tribunal to which is committed the decision of the cause. Verdicts, notwithstanding their etymological meaning (vere dico), will never speak the truth, because juries can never measure the power and influence of motives upon the actions of men, until the door is thrown wide open to all facts calculated to assist in the slightest manner in arriving at a correct conclusion in the pending controversy."

§ 11. Classification of the Rules of Admissibility. It follows, from the foregoing considerations, that the rules of admissibility may be grouped under three heads, the first dealing with the probative value of specific facts, the second including artificial rules which do not profess to define probative value but yet aim at increasing or safeguarding it, and the third covering all those rules which rest on extrinsic policies irrespective of probative value.

The first group of rules (Part I, post) attempts to define, for legal purposes, the amount of probative value which suffices to entitle a fact to be regarded as evidential. Here the law is concerned with the rules of logic and inference as applied in practical experience, i. e. with Relevancy. Circumstantial, Testimonial, and "Real" evidence are the three great classes; and each has its special problems.

The second group of rules (Part II, post) lays down auxiliary tests and safeguards, usually for particular kinds of facts, over and above the required minimum probative value. The hearsay rule, the rules of quantity, the rule of the oath, and a dozen others, belong here. An analysis of the general policy and relation of this group to the others is elsewhere made (§ 1171, post).

The third group of rules (Part III, post) invokes, for the exclusion of certain kinds of facts, extrinsic policies which override the policy of ascertaining the truth by all available means. These rules concede that the evidence in question has all the probative value that can be required, and yet exclude it because its admission would injure some other cause more than it would help the cause of truth, and because the avoidance of that injury is considered of more consequence than the possible harm to the cause of truth. Most of these rules consist in giving certain kinds of persons an option — i. e. a Privilege — to withhold the evidential fact. The general nature of these rules is elsewhere examined more at length (§ 2175, post).

Finally a group of rules (Part IV, post) known as the Parol Evidence rule, but belonging really to the substantive law, remains to be considered, since by tradition it has been ranked among the rules of evidence.

§ 12. Distinctions between Relevancy and Admissibility; between Proof, or Weight, and Admissibility. Admissibility, then, is a quality standing between Relevancy, or Probative Value, on the one hand, and Proof, or Weight of Evidence, on the other hand. Admissibility signifies that the particular fact is relevant and something more, — that it has also satisfied all the auxiliary tests and privileges. It does not signify that the particular fact has demonstrated or proved the proposition to be proved, but merely that it is received by the tribunal for the purpose of being weighed with other evidence.

(1) But the first of these distinctions has been questioned, as a matter of theory, by distinguished authority, and in two opposite directions:

(a) It has been maintained that Relevancy is identical with Admissibility. Such is the theory upon which a notable work of the last generation was constructed:

1876, Sir James Stephen, Digest of Evidence, Introduction:[1] "What then does the word [evidence] mean? The only possible answer is: It means that the one fact either is or else is not considered by the person using the expression to furnish a premiss or part of a premiss from which the existence of the other is a necessary or probable inference, — in other words, that the one fact is or is not relevant to the other. . . . The law has been worked out by degrees by many generations of judges who perceived more or less distinctly the principle on which it ought to be founded. The rules established by them no doubt treat as relevant some facts which cannot perhaps be said to be so. More frequently they treat as irrelevant facts which are really relevant, but exceptions excepted, all their rules are reducible to the principle that facts in issue or relevant to the issue, and no others, may be proved."

Either this generalization is wholly incorrect, or the difference of views reduces itself to a mere difference of phraseology. That most of the characteristic rules of admissibility are rules which do not prescribe anything about the relevancy, or probative value, of the facts they exclude is undoubted. All of the rules of Privilege, for example, are of that sort. The rules for the Order of Evidence assume the evidence to be relevant. The rule for Producing Documentary Originals concedes that a copy is relevant, even when excluding the copy. There is a group of rules defining the sufficiency of probative value, and the term Relevancy is a convenient one for them. If it be desired to enlarge that term, and make it synonymous with Admissibility, this can be done. But the rules for probative value, no matter what they be called, will remain distinct in nature from the other rules; and this distinction cannot be abolished merely by misusing the term Relevancy. The fallacy of that misuse has been well expounded as follows:

[1] Another exposition of his theory is given by the learned author in his Indian Evidence Act, 122–126 (1872).

1889, Professor James B. Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence," 3 Harvard Law Review 143:[2] "In stating thus our two fundamental conceptions, we must not fall into the error of supposing that relevancy, logical connection, real or supposed, is the only test of admissibility; for so we should drop out of sight the chief part of the law of evidence. When we have said (1) that, without any exception, nothing which is not supposed to be logically relevant is admissible; and (2) that, subject to many exceptions and qualifications, whatever is logically relevant is admissible, — it is obvious that, in reality, there are tests of admissibility other than logical relevancy. Some things are rejected as being of too slight a significance, or as having too conjectural and remote a connection; others, as being dangerous and likely to be misused or overestimated by a jury; others, as being impolitic, e.g. unsafe for the State; others, on the bare ground of precedent. . . . [The law] assuming, as it does, that in general what is evidential is receivable, is occupied in pointing out what part of this mass of matter is excluded. It denies to this excluded part, not the name of evidence, but the name of admissible evidence. Admissibility is determined, first, by relevancy — an affair of logic and not of law; — second, but only indirectly, by the law of evidence which, in strictness, only declares whether matter which is logically probative is excluded. . . . It is here that Mr. Justice Stephen's treatment of the law of evidence is perplexing; indeed, it comes to have the aspect of a tour de force."

(b) On the other hand, it has been maintained that there are no legal rules of Relevancy at all. This favorite thesis of the great master of the history of these rules was thus stated by him:

1889, Professor Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence," 3 Harvard Law Review 143, 145:[3] "How are we to know what these things are [that are logically probative]? Not by any rule of the law. The law furnishes no test of relevancy. For this it tacitly refers to logic, assuming that the principles of reasoning are known to its judges and ministers; just as a vast multitude of other things are assumed as already sufficiently known. . . . Admissibility is determined, first, by relevancy, — an affair of logic and not of law."

Here, after all, the difference is one of nomenclature only. The patent fact cannot be denied that there are thousands of judicial rulings which deal with pure questions of inference and probative value; they do this, not "tacitly" (as suggested in the passage above), but expressly. When the party is told that insanity in A cannot be inferred from the insanity of A's collateral relations, or that a consciousness of guilt can be inferred from flight, the material and method of this ruling is precisely the same as if the question were argued in a debating society or in a book of logic; the difference is that when the Court employs the process, the result is law. It is none the less law because it is also logic; and though this legal logic may lead to illogical law, still it is a legal precedent. Being a legal precedent, it must be studied and observed by the profession. As law aims to represent justice, so the rules of relevancy aim to follow the principles of natural logic; but neither the success or failure of the law to square with natural justice, nor the success or failure of the Courts to be truly logical, justify us in holding that the law is nothing but the dictates of justice and of logic. So long as Courts continue to declare in judicial rulings what their notions of logic are, just so long will there be rules of law which must be observed. For these rules the only appropriate place is the law of evidence:

[2] This passage is also found in the learned author's Preliminary Treatise, 266.

[3] In the learned author's Preliminary Treatise, 270, this doctrine is further expounded. It was opposed by Mr. Jabez Fox, in an article entitled "Law and Logic," in 14 Harvard Law Review 39, to which a reply was made in 14 id. 139.

1863, Bigelow, C. J., in Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 548, 563: "No rule of evidence is better settled, or more clearly founded in good sense and sound policy, than that which authorizes presumptions or inferences of fact to be deduced from the proof of certain other facts. . . . The process of ascertaining one fact from the existence of another is essential to the investigation of truth, and prevails in courts of law as well as in the ordinary affairs of life."

1876, Cushing, C. J., in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 288: "Although undoubtedly the relevancy of testimony is originally a matter of logic and common-sense, still there are many instances in which the evidence of particular facts as bearing upon particular issues has been so often the subject of discussion in courts of law, and so often ruled upon, that the united logic of a great many judges and lawyers may be said to furnish evidence of the sense common to a great many individuals, and, therefore, the best evidence of what may be properly called common-sense, and thus to acquire the authority of law. It is for this reason that the subject of the relevancy of testimony has become, to so great an extent, matter of precedent and authority, and that we may with entire propriety speak of its legal relevancy."

(2) Admissibility, on the other hand, falls short of Proof or Demonstration. This is due partly to the circumstance that, in our system, the tribunal has traditionally been a divided one, so that the rule of law, uttered by the judge, merely declares what is sufficient to go to the jury, and the jury ultimately decide upon the total effect which we call Proof. But chiefly the distinction is due to the circumstance that each evidential fact is offered separately, and the quality of complete demonstration could therefore never be expected of it. Since the production of evidence takes time, and since one piece of evidence must precede another, the rules of admissibility, if there are to be any at all, can have nothing to do with the inquiry whether certain evidence effects complete proof. Weight, Proof, Demonstration, — these terms have no application until the evidence is all introduced and the jury are ready to retire. The effect of this peculiar feature of Admissibility upon the quality of probative value required is more particularly considered in contrasting Relevancy and Weight (post, § 27).

§ 13. Multiple Admissibility; Evidence applicable to more than one Purpose. It constantly happens that a fact which is inadmissible for one purpose is admissible for other purposes; while, on the other hand, a fact which is entirely admissible, so far as some rules are concerned, is excluded because it fails to satisfy some other rule. This paradox may be solved if we notice the analogy of candidates for an obstacle-race. Let us suppose that there are to be several races, — one for boys under sixteen years of age, one for lawyers, and one for club-members. Now the ineligibility of A for the second or the third class of entries does not prevent his entering for the first, and conceivably he may be eligible in two different classes. But if after entering the race he fails to surmount any one of the half-dozen obstacles, he loses all chance of victory. So with evidentiary facts; the rules of substantive law, of pleading, and of relevancy are the conditions of entrance; the auxiliary rules and the rules of privilege are the obstacles which must then be evaded by the relevant material.

Now the peculiar operation of the auxiliary rules and the rules of privilege (ante, § 11) is that almost all of them are limited in their application; for example, the attesting-witness rule applies only to documents required by law to be attested, the hearsay rule applies only to utterances used testimonially, and so on. In the obstacle-race, the analogy would be presented by a single racecourse, with various obstacles, some of which were required for one class of entries but not for other classes, the races to be run at one time by the entries of all classes. Two situations may be presented, which typify the usual evidential difficulties:

(1) If A is a club-member, and if one of the obstacles in the club-members' race is a stream of water, then A, if he is unable to swim, will not enter that race; yet in the other races, in which that obstacle is not required, he may be ineligible, being neither a lawyer nor under sixteen years of age, even though he be amply able to vault the hurdles or surmount the other obstacles for the other classes. So, a letter containing a testimonial statement by a person who ought to have been called to the stand, is inadmissible under the hearsay rule; and if it cannot be used under the res gestæ doctrine, to which the hearsay rule does not apply, it must remain excluded, even though, had it come in under the res gestæ doctrine, it could have satisfied the rule for producing the original and the rule of authentication. In other words, so far as an evidentiary fact is offered for a particular purpose, as being material to a certain issue and relevant to a certain proposition, it must satisfy all the rules applicable to it in that capacity. In practical application this doctrine is constantly exemplified. It is sufficiently illustrated by its converse.

(2) Conversely, if A, though a club-member, is also as a lawyer eligible to enter the race not having the stream-obstacle, and would be permitted to pass over a bridge in the race for that class, it is no ground of objection to him that he cannot swim the stream as required for the club-members' class; further, it is no objection that perhaps the judges of the race will in the crowd be unable to distinguish who passed over the bridge and who swam the stream, and will by possibility award erroneously to A the prize in the club-members' class, thinking that he swam the stream. The reason is that the judges must be assumed to do their duty intelligently and to recollect that A was entered for the lawyers' race and not the club-members'. So, the letter above, if offered as an admission of the defendant, because shown to him and assented to, may be introduced without calling the writer of it, because it is no longer offered as the writer's testimony but as the defendant's admission. In other words, when an evidentiary fact is offered for one purpose, and becomes admissible by satisfying all the rules applicable to it in that capacity, it is not inadmissible because it does not satisfy the rules applicable to it in some other capacity and because the jury might improperly consider it in the latter capacity. This doctrine, though involving certain risks, is indispensable as a practical rule:

1832, Park, J., in Willis v. Bernard, 8 Bing. 376, 383: "I agree that it is more desirable that such part of the evidence as does not apply to the point to be proved should be withdrawn altogether from the consideration of the jury. But in many cases that is impossible; as in Manning v. Clement, where the plaintiff alleged that he carried on in an honest and lawful manner the trade of a manufacturer of bitters, and that the defendant libelled him in his trade by publishing that the bitters were made to adulterate porter, per quod the plaintiff was ruined; it was held, that under the general issue, the defendant might give in evidence that the plaintiff's trade was illegal, although in doing this it also appeared that his bitters had been condemned in the Court of Exchequer, and that the libel was true. So in the case of prisoners where confessions are given in evidence which unavoidably involve the mention of others besides the party confessing. But the jury are always cautioned to exclude the statement as against any but the party confessing. They also received a proper caution in this case, and, subject to that, the letter was properly admitted."

1870, Graves, J., in People v. Doyle, 21 Mich. 221, 227: "Whenever a question is made upon the admission of evidence, it is indispensable to consider the object for which it is produced, and the point intended to be established by it. . . . It frequently happens that an item of proof is plainly relevant and proper for one purpose, while wholly inadmissible for another which it would naturally tend to establish. And when this occurs, the evidence when offered for the legal purpose can no more be excluded on the ground of its aptitude to show the unauthorized fact than its admission to prove such unauthorized fact can be justified on the ground of its aptness to prove another fact legally provable under the issue."

1892, Peters, C. J., in State v. Farmer, 84 Me. 440, 24 Atl. 985: "That evidence properly admissible for one purpose may be so perverted in its use as to affect a different and illegitimate purpose, is not altogether preventable. But such evidence cannot on that account be wholly rejected. The correction of its abuse lies in such explanation as the presiding judge may feel required to give to the jury concerning it."[1]

Here the only question can be what the proper means are for avoiding the risk of misusing the evidence. It is uniformly conceded that the instruction of the Court suffices for that purpose; and the better opinion is that the opponent of the evidence must ask for that instruction; otherwise, he may be supposed to have waived it as unnecessary for his protection:

1855, Mason, J., in Pegg v. Warford, 7 Md. 582, 607: "But it has been said, that as this evidence was received for all or either of the three purposes for which it was offered, unless it was legally applicable to each, the jury might have been misled, and applied it to one of the purposes to which it did not relate. To avoid such a result, it was the duty of the counsel objecting to have pointed out specifically the purpose to which the testimony had no legal application, and to ask its exclusion for such purpose. . . . We must assume, where evidence has been offered generally, that it will be applied by the jury to the purposes to which it is legally applicable; and if counsel wish to guard against the contingency of a misapplication of the evidence by the jury, they should ask the court, as has been already said, to point out the branch of the case to which the evidence is not to be applied." [2]

[1] Accord: 1892, Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 186, 31 N. E. 961 (hearsay); 1893, Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 357, 379, 34 N. E. 486.

§ 14. Conditional Admissibility; Evidence admitted pending Subsequent Proof. The time for determining the admissibility of a particular fact is ordinarily the time when it is offered to the Court. But the presentation of all the evidence in a cause occupies a length of time, and some of the evidentiary facts must necessarily await the others. Moreover, the convenience of obtaining all the information of each witness by consecutive questioning, together with other reasons of practical necessity, often oblige certain facts to be presented at a particular point of time. Thus these facts, when presented, may be as yet inadmissible, that is, they may be relevant only because of their connection with other facts not yet presented. This dilemma is solved by admitting them conditionally. Being admissible only in dependence upon other facts, they are received on the assurance of counsel that the specific other facts will be duly presented at a suitable opportunity before the close of the case.

The rules for conditional admissibility thus involve the general rules for the Order of Presenting Evidence, and are accordingly better examined under that head (post, § 1871).

§ 15. Curative Admissibility; Prior Introduction of Inadmissible Evidence, as Estopping from Subsequent Objection to other Inadmissible Evidence. Does one inadmissibility justify or excuse another? If the one party offers an inadmissible fact which is received, may the opponent afterwards offer similar facts whose only claim to admission is that they negative or explain or counterbalance the prior inadmissible fact? No one has doubted that if the opponent duly objected and was erroneously overruled in the first instance, he could not claim to present similar inadmissible facts, because his objection will save him, on appeal, from any harm which may accrue, and he needs no other protection. But if he did not object and accept, he has no such protection; and the question thus arises whether he can protect himself by retorting in kind.

On this subject three different rules are found competing for recognition in the different jurisdictions. (1) The first is that the admission of an inadmissible fact, without objection by the opponent, does not justify the opponent in rebutting by other inadmissible facts:

1875 Loomis, J., in Phelps v. Hunt, 43 Conn. 194, 199: "It is obvious that this whole subject matter, both of the direct and cross-examination, was wholly irrelevant, and ought not to have been entertained at all. . . . It is doubtless true that the inquiries ruled out on the cross-examination were in the main pertinent to the matter testified to in chief, and if the irrelevant matter in chief was allowed to have any effect it would have been more just and fair to have allowed a reasonable opportunity for cross-examination upon the same subject; and if, when the questions on the cross-examination were excluded, the plaintiff had asked the Court to reject also all the kindred matter previously received, and the Court had refused, the plaintiff would have had a just ground for a new trial. But no objection whatever was made to the testimony in chief, neither at the time it was offered nor afterwards. The auditor seems to have allowed the parties to take their own course in the testimony until specific questions were raised on the cross-examination; and the decisions then made were according to law. The plaintiff seems to assume that if the cross-examination was pertinent to the examination in chief it necessarily makes the ruling erroneous. This proposition we do not accept. Where the plaintiff stands on matters stricti juris, it must appear that the particular ruling complained of was erroneous in law. We cannot hold that it was error in law to rule out, objection being made, what it would have been error to admit, merely because the Court had received without objection matter just as irrelevant before. The maxim 'Similia similibus curantur,' has been applied to some extent in the science of medicine, but the principle has never been recognized as applied to the cure of errors in law."

[2] Accord: 1853, Cook v. Parham, 24 Ala. 21, 34 (reputation of an employee). Contra, semble: 1894, Dalton v. Dregge, 99 Mich. 25, 57; 1903, Harrison v. Garrett, — N. C. —, 43 S. E. 594.

This rule is represented by some English authority and by a respectable number of American jurisdictions.[1]

(2) At the other extreme is a rule which declares that in general precisely the contrary shall obtain, i. e. the opponent may resort to similar inadmissible evidence:

1875, Tilton v. Beecher, N. Y., Abbott's Rep. II, 789; on the re-direct examination of Mrs. Moulton, the witness was asked to explain why she had advised a certain thing to be done, as stated by her on cross-examination; Mr. Evarts, for the defendant, objected that her answer on cross-examination had not been asked for and was irrelevant; Mr. Fullerton, for the plaintiff: "Your Honor knows perfectly well that when my learned friend upon the other side puts a question to the witness, and gets an answer that is not responsive, or does not suit him, he moves forthwith to strike it out, and does not rest until it is stricken out. But, on the other hand, if he puts a question to a witness, and gets an answer which is not responsive, but which he deems of some advantage to himself, he then fails to make such a motion, and lets it stand, perhaps, until some future time in the case when we, by a question, seek to take advantage of the answer, and then the argument is that it is irresponsive, and that we have no right to follow up the answer. Now, when counsel puts a question and gets an answer, and does not move to strike it

[1] Eng.: 1818, Shaw v. Roberts, 2 Stark. 455 (improper questions as to a nonsuit, held not to justify further inquiries on cross-examination). Ga.: 1900, Stapleton v. Monroe, 111 Ga. 848, 36 S. E. 428 (ordinarily); Ill.: 1875, Wickenkamp v. Wickenkamp, 77 Ill. 92, 96 ("This view of the question worked no hardship upon appellant; he had it in his power to exclude the improper evidence introduced by appellee from the jury upon motion, or he could have prepared an instruction directing the jury to disregard it"); 1900, Maxwell v. Durkin, 185 id. 546, 57 N. E. 433 (counter-evidence of character, excluded); Me.: 1874, Sturgis v. Robbins, 62 Me. 289, 292 (inadmissible evidence on cross-examination does not justify a re-examination on the same subject); Md.: 1853, Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Woodruff, 4 Md. 242, 255 (fire set by a locomotive; rebuttal of irrelevant facts, not allowed; "the offering of improper evidence by one of the litigant parties never can justify the introduction of similar evidence by the other party"); 1854, Mitchell v. Sellman, 5 id. 376, 385; 1854, Warner v. Hardy, 6 id. 525, 539 (prescriptive possession); Pa.: 1837, Smith v. Dreer, 3 Whart. 154 ("cross-examination to irrelevant matter shall not bring it into the issue"); U. S.: 1830, Stringer v. Marshall, 3 Pet. 320, 337 (intimating that the rule might be different for "improper testimony calculated to make such an impression on the jury that no instruction given by the judge can efface it"); 1840, Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 id. 448, 461 (hearsay matter irrelevant to the cause).

This rule would not apply where there had been no real opportunity to object in the first instance: 1900, People v. Barone, 161 N. Y. 451, 55 N. E. 1083 (here the question in chief did not warn of the answer's incompetency; held, that the cross-examiner was not restricted to a motion to strike out).

out, but permits that answer to stand as evidence, then it is evidence, and we have a right to explain it, if it needs any explanation. The question we now put is, why she advised or suggested this short statement." Judge Neilson: "She may answer that."

This rule has also ample authority, and is perhaps to be regarded as the orthodox English rule.[2]

[2] Eng.: 1835, Blewatt v. Tregonning, 3 A. & E. 554, 581 (acts of prescriptive uses in other places than that in issue having been testified to on the defendant's cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness, the plaintiff's re-examination to explain away those acts was allowed; "the plaintiff was entitled to pursue it, unless the defendant got it struck out"); 1837, Duncombe v. Daniell, 8 C. & P. 222, 227 (matters stated in the plaintiff's opening, but not afterwards evidenced by him, allowed to be rebutted; Lord Denman, C. J.: "A statement cannot fail to make some impression and I think it competent for the opposite party to remove that impression"); Ala.: 1882, Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385, 393 (rebuttal of testimony to sanity); 1889, Morgan v. State, 88 id. 223, 6 So. 761 ("the party first in fault cannot take any advantage of the ruling of the Court in favor of the other"; applied to the rebuttal of improper character evidence); 1891, Mobile & B. R. Co. v. Ladd, 92 id. 287, 9 So. 169 ("It is never erroneous to receive irrelevant evidence to rebut evidence of a like kind offered by the opposite party"; applied to the rebuttal of the irrelevant fact of the darkness of the night); 1899, McIntyre v. White, 124 id. 177, 26 So. 937 (wife's separate acknowledgment; irrelevant facts introduced may always be denied); Ind.: 1890, Perkins v. Hayward, 124 Ind. 449, 24 N. E. 1033 ("If a party opens the door for the admission of incompetent evidence, he is in no plight to complain that his adversary followed through the door thus opened"); Ia.: 1876, Artz v. R. Co., 44 Ia. 284, 286 (personal injuries; the defendant introduced a minister of the gospel, to prove conversations with the plaintiff after the injury, who testified, among other facts, to "offering the plaintiff the consolations of religion"; having then on cross-examination denied that he had refused to pray with the plaintiff, the plaintiff was allowed to prove this refusal, and an objection of irrelevancy was overruled; "this was clearly a continuation of the subject introduced by defendant, and objection cannot now be raised by the same party to the competency of the evidence"); 1877, Hale v. Philbrick, 47 id. 217 (false representations); 1885, Frost v. Rosecrans, 66 Ia. 405, 407, 23 N. W. 895 (fraudulent mortgages; rebuttal of irrelevant transactions allowed, to prevent prejudice); 1896, Spaulding v. R. Co., 98 id. 205, 67 N. W. 227 (personal injuries; rebuttal of improper opinion testimony allowed); 1903, Hamilton v. Mendota C. & M. Co., — id. —, 94 N. W. 282 (opinion testimony); Me.: 1851, State v. Sargent, 32 Me. 429 (here applied to an accomplice's testimony on a collateral point, because otherwise "if perceived to remain unimpeached when its truth might be tested," it might receive undue credit); 1880, Williams v. Gilman, 71 id. 21, 23 ("If the testimony be purely collateral, it was not for the plaintiff to call out collateral facts which might prejudice, and then object to an explanation"; here applied, in an action for negligence as a veterinary surgeon, to other instances of the defendant's treatment); N. H.: 1830, Grafton Bank v. Woodward, 5 N. H. 301, 309 (declarations of an agent for a contract); 1870, Janvrin v. Fogg, 49 id. 347 (admitting explanations of an offer of compromise improperly received); N. Y.: 1868, Blossom v. Barrett, 37 N. Y. 433, 437 (fraudulent marriage; contradiction of immaterial evidence as to property, allowed); 1873, Coleman v. People, 55 id. 81, 89 (contra; "A party does not acquire the right to give immaterial evidence because his adversary has done the same thing"; evidence of the receipt of other stolen goods, held to have been improperly admitted; no authority cited); 1895, People v. Buchanan, 145 id. 1, 39 N. E. 846 ("Even if the cross-examination had been as to facts not admissible in evidence, the rule seems to be that the witness may be re-examined as to evidence so given"; preceding cases ignored); Pa.: 1867, Sherwood v. Titman, 55 Pa. 77, 80 ("The defendant opened the door for the testimony, and cannot complain that it was not closed soon enough to suit him"; here applied in an action for criminal conversation); 1886, Swank v. Phillips, 113 id. 482, 489 (a disqualified witness of the defendant held improperly admitted, where the plaintiff had introduced another on the same subject; "that error could not be corrected by committing another"; preceding case not noticed); Vt.: 1897, State v. Slack, 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311 (mode of attacking character of a witness); 1898, Fuller v. Valiquette, 70 Vt. 502, 41 Atl. 579 (loss of support by husband's intoxication; the plaintiff having erroneously introduced evidence of prior intoxication, the defendant was allowed to rebut this); Wash.: 1896, Dutcher v. Howard, 15 Wash. 693, 47 Pac. 28 (cross-examination to irrelevant matter excuses a re-examination to the same matter); W. Va.: 1897, Sisler v. Shaffer, 43 W. Va. 769, 28 S. E. 721 ("Strange cattle having wandered through a gap made by himself, he cannot complain").

This rule would not apply where the original fact was not really introduced as evidence: 1844, Allen v. Hancock, 16 Vt. 230, 233 (re-examination to another instance of highway defects, not allowable if it was referred to on cross-examination merely to stimulate the witness' memory).

(3) A third form of rule, intermediate between the other two, is that the opponent may reply with similar evidence whenever it is needed for removing an unfair prejudice which might otherwise have ensued from the original evidence, but in no other case. This seems to be the true significance of what may be called the Massachusetts rule:

1864, Bigelow, C. J., in Mowry v. Smith, 9 All. 67: "The question then arises, how far the admission of incompetent and irrelevant evidence offered by one party, to which no objection is taken, renders it competent for the opposite party to introduce evidence of a similar character. There certainly must be some limit beyond which parties cannot be permitted to go, in extending issues of fact and bringing into a case matters which have no essential bearing on its real merits. Without indicating a general rule applicable to all cases of this nature, we think it may be safely said that a party should not be allowed to go farther than to prove facts which have a direct tendency to contradict and control the irrelevant or incompetent evidence which his adversary has introduced into the case. To this extent, it may be properly held that the latter has waived the strict rule of law applicable to such evidence, and is estopped from objecting to the proof of facts, by the opposite party, which can be properly deemed to be contradictory or in rebuttal of those offered by himself. It seems to us that the plaintiff was allowed to transcend this limit at the trial, in the introduction of evidence to which the defendant objected. He was not confined to disproof of the fact that he had charged the defendant with passing counterfeit money, which was the only ground of provocation which the latter had attempted to establish. The plaintiff was allowed to go much further, and to show the distinct and independent fact that the defendant had large sums of money in his possession, which he would take out in papers and show to persons about him, to the amount of several thousand dollars at a time. This was an irrelevant and immaterial fact, which not only had no bearing on the true issue between the parties, but did not tend to contradict or control the evidence which the defendant had introduced in mitigation of damages."[8]

The source of these divergent views is apparent enough. By the Courts adopting the first rule the emphasis is placed upon the circumstance that the opponent did not in the first instance object; hence, his waiver of objec-

[8] Accord: 1847, Connell v. Smith, 3 Kerr N. Br. 483 (refusal to perform contract of purchase; defendant's purchases at a cheaper price from other persons having been shown, he was allowed to explain the whole of these irrelevant transactions); 1903, Hoover v. State, — Ind. —, 68 N. E. 591 (defendant's irrelevant beer-drinking; testimony in denial or explanation, allowed); 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 535 (Peters, J.: "The introduction of immaterial testimony to meet immaterial testimony on the other side is generally within the discretion of the presiding judge. But if one side introduces evidence irrelevant to the issue, which is prejudicial and harmful to the other party, then, although it come in without objection, the other party is entitled to introduce evidence which will directly and strictly contradict it"; here, the birth of a child to an unmarried woman was improperly received to show the defendant's adultery; and evidence of other men's intercourse was received to explain away this irrelevant but prejudicial evidence); 1861, Brown v. Perkins, 1 All. 89, 96 (trespass in entering the plaintiff's shop and destroying goods; the plaintiff having volunteered the statement that no liquor was in his shop, the defendant was allowed to prove that liquor was found there; "it was too late to object to the question after he had voluntarily testified on the same subject"; but here the Court also thought the fact relevant to the issue); 1830, Stringer v. Marshall, 3 Pet. 320, 337 (see citation supra); 1868, Lytle v. Bond, 40 Vt. 618 (one erroneous admission does not justify another; but where the first fact is "a circumstance morally tending to render the disputed fact more probable," the opponent has a right "to do away with the impression it may create in the minds of the jury)."

But by the Massachusetts Court this rule does not give the opponent a fixed right to the counter-evidence; hence, if it was rejected below, the ruling will not be disturbed: 1875, Parker v. Dudley, 118 Mass. 602, 604 (bastardy; previous irrelevant improprieties of the complainant not admitted to contradict her testimony; "by failing to object to evidence on behalf of the complainant which was incompetent the respondent could not as of right claim to contradict it)."

tion leaves him without ground for maintaining that the original evidence was a wrong which estops the original offeror from now objecting. By the Courts adopting the second rule, on the other hand, the emphasis is placed upon the original party's voluntary action in offering the evidence, by which he virtually waived future objection to that class of facts. Both these circumstances of waiver are true; it is simply a question of relative emphasis; hence the contradictory views. But it may be noted that under the first rule, in almost all the cases, the counter-evidence had been rejected below, while under the second rule, in almost all the cases the counter-evidence had been admitted below; i. e. the Courts under both rules reached practically the same result in that they refused to disturb the ruling below. This points to the true rule, namely, that since each party is alike in the condition of volenti non fit injuria, neither can complain of a ruling either admitting or rejecting, — a waiver being predicable of both. The matter is thus left in the hands of the trial Court. Modify this in certain cases by conceding to the opponent, as of right, to use the curative counter-evidence when a plain and unfair moral prejudice would otherwise have inured to him, and the rule will be sufficiently flexible.

Certain other questions, apparently related, must here be distinguished; (1) whether certain facts properly admissible in impeachment of character may be rebutted or explained in a certain manner, as by the fact of innocence of crime (post, §§ 195, 1116), or of corroborative consistent statements (post, § 1122), and by explanatory evidence in general (post, §§ 1101–1144); (2) whether a collateral fact can be disproved by counter-evidence (post, §§ 1000–1015); (3) whether certain facts, in their order of presentation, may be put in on a re-examination instead of on the direct examination (post, § 1896).[4]

§ 16. Judicial Discretion as applied to Admissibility; Distinction between Discretion and Unappealable Rulings. The term "discretion," as applied to a trial Court's powers, may be used in several senses, which have not been, in our law, as often discriminated or as fully developed as they ought to be. It may mean (1) that the trial judge is controlled by no fixed rules, but may in each case decide according to good sense and justice without regard to precedents, either by himself or by a higher Court. In this meaning, nothing is involved as to the finality of the decision; it may or may not be appealable. (2) It may mean, on the contrary, that the trial judge decides according to some rule, but that in one or another respect his decision is final; and here it may be final (a) as to the law, i. e. the tenor of the rule, (b) as to the applicability of the rule to the facts, or (c) as to the existence of the facts.

[4] Compare also the rules for waiver of objection (post, § 18), whose principle is here partly involved. Under that head belongs the question whether a party who has originally objected to inadmissible evidence is to be deemed to have waived the objection by subsequently introducing similar evidence himself.

For the question whether an instruction must be given upon evidence admitted for both parties outside of the pleadings, see Thompson on Trials (1880), II, § 2310; 1902, Bomar v. Rosser, 131 Ala. 215, 31 So. 430.

For the present subject in general, see Thompson, ubi supra; Elliott, General Practice (1894), II, § 592.

The first of these meanings (1) is Discretion in the ordinary sense; the second (2) may be termed Finality of Ruling.

(1) Now Discretion, in this strict sense, is by our law not conceded to any trial judge on points of evidence, except perhaps in ex parte and interlocutory proceedings.[1] The whole spirit of our law requires the observance of precedents. The propriety of improving our system in this respect is a large question, which need not be here opened; the tenor of our law is plain. It is in this view that the following utterances were made:

1824, Taylor, C. J., in State v. Candler, 3 Hawks 398: "The superiority of our law [of evidence] consists in its laying down the rule, with its proper exceptions and limitations, and leaving nothing to the discretion of the Court."

1867, Sawyer, J., in People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 584 (the trial judge had declared that the rules of evidence were to an extent flexible; this the Supreme Court repudiated): "If the law has really established certain rules of evidence, the Court, as we conceive, is bound to adhere to them, not only 'in all ordinary cases,' but in all cases, and such rules cannot properly 'be bent when they come in contact with' what may seem to the Court or jury in the particular case in hand to be 'reason and justice, so as to suit the case to which they are to be applied.'"

1896, Benet, J., in Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 488, 25 S. E. 797: "The term 'discretion' implies the absence of a hard and fast rule. The establishment of a clearly-defined rule would be the end of discretion. And yet 'discretion' should not be a word for arbitrary will or unstable caprice. Nor should judicial discretion be, as Lord Coke pronounced it, 'a crooked cord,' but rather, as Lord Mansfield defined it, the 'exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it,' adding that 'if this discretion be wilfully abused . . . it ought to be under the control of this Court.' The Courts and text writers all concur that by 'judicial discretion' is meant sound discretion guided by fixed legal principles. It must not be arbitrary nor capricious, but must be regulated upon legal grounds, — grounds that will make it judicial. It must be compelled by conscience, and not by humor. So that when a judge properly exercises his judicial discretion he will decide and act according to the rules of equity, and so as to advance the ends of justice. There are two different kinds of discretion that may be exercised by the presiding judge, one of which is appealable, the other not. In the exercise of his exclusive right to decide a matter of fact, or to control the orderly conduct of trials, the discretion of the circuit judge will not be reviewed by this court. For example, in granting or refusing a new trial on the evidence, or in granting or refusing additional time for argument of counsel, or in deciding whether an admission or confession was made freely and voluntarily, so as to determine its admissibility as evidence, or in permitting a witness to be recalled, or in granting or refusing a motion for a continuance, or the like. In such matters no error of law can be committed, and no appeal can be taken."

(2) (a) Finality, as to the tenor of the law, is in our system never conceded to the trial judge. The very constitution of courts of appeal is of itself a demonstration.

(b) But finality as to the application of the law to the facts may conceivably admit of a different result. For example, let a certified copy of a deed be offered; the question arises whether the original should be produced; assume that the law of the jurisdiction is that a copy of a document is admissible when the original is lost, and that loss consists in the inability to find after diligent and adequate search; and, further, that a recorded deed is not governed by that rule, but by the rule that the certified copy of a recorded deed may be used without proof of loss. Now here (a) the law is these rules; (b) the application of the law consists in declaring the offer to be governed by the first or the second rule; and (c) the facts consist in the diligent and adequate search followed by inability to find. Under (b), then, is the decision of the trial judge final? It might perhaps be. But in our system of law this seems never to be recognized, for rules of evidence. If the trial judge selects the wrong rule as applicable to the case, this error is deemed open to revision:

[1] Distinguish the English legislation by which the Supreme Court is given power to alter the rules of evidence: 1894, St. 57 & 58 Vict. c. 16, § 3, Judicature Act (giving power to make rules of evidence in specified cases; explained in Boerlein v. Bank, 1895, 2 Ch. 488, 491).

1896, Benet, J., in Norris v. Clinkscales, supra: "To the appealable class, in this State, belong all instances of the exercise of discretion which may disclose the commission of error of law. And, without going into detail, it is enough for the purposes of this case to say that, in deciding the preliminary question whether or not there has been sufficient proof of the loss of the written instrument to justify the admission of secondary evidence of its contents, it is possible that a circuit judge may commit error of law in the violation or misapplication of the rules of evidence, and therefore his exercise of discretion may be appealed from; and the appeal will lie, not because of any so-called 'abuse of discretion,' — a phrase unhappily framed, because implying a bad motive or wrong purpose, — but because his ruling may appear to have been made on grounds and for reasons clearly untenable."

(c) Finality as to the findings of fact, however, is by most Courts in theory, and by some Courts in practice, conceded to the trial judge.[2] In the instance above, for example, the facts as to a diligent and adequate search would be taken, upon appeal, as determined below.[3] This is the sensible and practical doctrine. A few Courts — notably that of New Hampshire (largely due to the influence of Chief Justice Doe) and of Massachusetts — systematically recognize it for substantially all the rules of evidence. On a few topics (such as the qualifications of an expert witness) almost all Courts enforce its recognition. On the remaining topics, most Courts profess an adherence to it, but nevertheless inconsistently waste their own time and that of the profession by recording at great length their opinions upon a thousand petty questions of fact preliminary to the admission of particular pieces of evidence. This is due chiefly to their usual qualification that the discretion is final unless it is "abused"; so the necessity of overhauling the facts in detail, to see whether discretion has been "abused," involves the very labor for the appellate Court and the very uncertainty for suitors which would be obviated by a doctrine of discretion, if it were worth anything at all. It is usually the appellate Court, not the trial Court, that "abuses" the doctrine of discretion. However, in theory at least, all Courts are found more or less explicitly recognizing some concession of finality to the trial judge on the matters of fact upon which the application of the rules of evidence depend:

[2] This applies, of course, to such matters of fact only as fall within the province of the judge, not the jury (post, Book III).

[3] It will be noticed, further, that the attribution, in such a case, of finality on matters of fact signifies also, in effect, that the appellate Court will not define the rule of law any more minutely; for example, a holding that the sufficiency of the search is a question of fact for the trial judge signifies that no rule requiring search in a particular place or by a particular person will be laid down.

1870, Foster, J., in Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 116, 120: "By discretion — judicial discretion — we mean the exercise of final judgment by the [trial] Court in the decision of such questions of fact as from their nature and the circumstances of the case come peculiarly within the province of the presiding judge to determine, without the intervention and to the exclusion of the functions of a jury."

1894, Wood, J., in Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 371, 24 S.W. 885: "The trial Court had a discretion [in determining the conditions preliminary to secondary evidence], which was only limited to the extent that it should not be abused. It is absolutely essential that circuit Courts be vested with such discretion. The judge is acquainted with the surroundings, sees and hears the witnesses, and is the one to be satisfied as to whether the conditions exist calling for the introduction of secondary evidence. . . . The Court should proceed cautiously and avoid capricious conclusions. Its judgment should be based upon investigations reasonable and satisfactory. It should have diligent inquiry made, or be satisfied from competent proof that inquiry would do no good. When it appears to us that such has been the course of the trial judge, we will not review his discretion to disturb his findings upon the facts before him. If the law requires certain fixed and unbending rules to be observed by the circuit judge in laying foundation for the admission of secondary evidence, then he has no discretion in the matter."[4]

2. Procedure in Questions of Admissibility.

§ 17. The Offer of Evidence. The procedure in raising and deciding questions of admissibility is a part of the general body of procedure, and cannot be fully treated except in that connection. But its details often depend intimately upon the doctrines of Admissibility, and a knowledge of the rules of procedure is necessary in considering many of the applications of those principles. A short survey of the rules and their reasons is therefore necessary at this point. The procedure as a whole falls into five separate stages: the Offer of Evidence, the Objection, the Ruling, the Exception, and the Judgment of Error.

The Offer of Evidence. The offer of evidence involves three kinds of questions, — the time of offering, the form of the offer, and its tenor. The first of these is better considered elsewhere (post, §§ 1866–1900), as a part of the general body of rules for the Order of Evidence. The other two belong properly here.

a. Form of the Offer. (1) The offer at the trial need not be in writing; it is ordinarily made by the counsel's oral presentation of a witness or a document or his oral statement of a question to a witness. But where the testimony is in the form of a deposition taken before trial, the questions are required to be in writing when the depositions are taken by the method of commission, i. e. when the counsel do not attend personally at the time of the witness' examination before the officer but prepare written interrogatories to be sent to the officer;[1] the more usual method, however, consists in an oral examination by counsel personally attending, the questions and answers being written down after utterance.[2] In either case the deposition-document is usually required to be filed with the clerk of court before trial,[3] and is always formally offered at the trial, by being read by the counsel or handed to the clerk for reading.[4]

[4] Further utterances may be found in the ensuing opinions: 1895, State v. Sawtelle, 66 N. H. 488, 32 Atl. 831; 1898, Martin v. Jennings, 52 S. C. 371, 29 S. E. 807.

(2) The offers of specific facts are usually separated by being embodied in single successive questions to the witness. But in the discretion of the trial Court the witness may be permitted to relate a continuous narrative without interrogation. These matters involve rather the form of the witness' narration, including the use of photographs, maps, interpreters, and the like, and are considered under the head of Testimonial Narration (post, §§ 766–812).

(3) The offer must be a presentation of evidence actually available:

1903, Ricks, J., in Chicago City R. Co. v. Carroll, Ill. , 68 N. E. 1087 (the plaintiff having been allowed, after the close of both cases, to offer evidence of the defendant's ownership of the car on which the injury occurred, and the defendant then desiring to offer, for the first time, evidence of the due inspection of the cars, the defendant's attorney said: "We desire to offer evidence on the question of inspection," and the Court replied: "I will not receive any evidence, except as to the ownership of this line, at this stage"; this was held not a sufficient offer): "No witness was put upon the stand. No question was asked. Nothing was done, except a mere conversation or talk had between counsel for appellant and the Court. Such procedure as that does not amount to an offer of evidence, and the remarks of the Court did not amount to a refusal to admit evidence. There can be no refusal to admit that which has not been offered; and counsel cannot, by engaging in a mere conversation with the Court, although it may relate to the procedure, by merely stating what he desires to do, get a ruling from the Court upon which he can predicate error. If appellant desired to make the contention it now makes, it should have at least put a witness upon the stand, and proceeded far enough till the question relative to the point it is now said it was desired to offer evidence upon was reached, and then put the question, and allowed the Court to rule upon it, and then offered what was expected to be proved by the witness, if he was not allowed to answer the question asked."

The offer must therefore not be merely a verbal suggestion for invoking a ruling, nor a fallacious promise of expected material. It need not expressly appear, however, that a witness was corporally called to the stand, unless there are circumstances to raise the presumption that the offer was improper in one or the other of these respects.[5] An elusive violation of this principle

[1] For the distinction between these two methods, see post, §§ 802, 1376.

[2] The rules for interrogatories are briefly considered post, §§ 802–806.

[3] The statutes on this point may be found by consulting the citations post, §§ 1380–1382.

[4] For the duty of the proponent of a document to show it to the opponent before reading it to the jury, see post, § 1861.

[5] Such seems to be the result of the cases: 1877, Eschbach v. Hurtt, 47 Md. 61, 67 (a judicial statement that certain evidence will not be admitted is not the subject of exception where it does not appear that the party at the time produced or had present a witness to the fact, or so stated to the trial Court); 1878, Robinson v. State, 1 Lea 673, 674 (the party making the offer must show that he had the proper witness or the means of producing him, or in good faith so believed); 1884, Scotland Co. v. Hill, 112 U. S. 183, 186 ("If the offer is actually made and refused, and there is nothing else in the record to indicate bad faith, an appellate Court must assume that the proof could have been made"). For additional illustrations of the application of the principle, see post, § 1808.

The following ruling is too technical, and presumably would not be followed: 1884, Higham v. Vanosdol, 101 Ind. 160, 162 (the record showed that, a witness being on the stand, "the defend-occurs often on cr ss-examination to character, when facts of discreditable conduct are groundlessly asked about, in the hope that though denied they will be assumed by the jury as well founded (post, §§ 983, 1808). Here, since the cross-examiner is by another rule not allowed to prove such facts by extrinsic testimony, he is exempt from supporting his question by formal tender, and he thus abuses his advantage. Nothing but a strict exercise of judicial duty can avail to check this abuse.[6]

b. Tenor of the Offer. The general principle is that the offer must be judged exclusively by its specific contents regarded as a whole. This principle leads to several consequences. (1) If the evidentiary fact desired to be offered is in itself apparently irrelevant, or otherwise dependent on other facts for its admissibility, the offer must contain a statement of the specific purpose, or of all the other facts necessary to admissibility. This rests on the doctrine of conditional relevancy (ante, § 14, post, § 1871).[7] (2) If several facts are included in the offer, some admissible and others inadmissible, then the whole (if properly objected to) is inadmissible; in other words, it is for the proponent to sever the good and the bad parts.[8] (3) Similarly, an offer of a fact for two purposes is erroneous if the fact is inadmissible for one of the purposes, though it would have been admissible for the other if offered for that alone.[9] (4) An offer of a fact for an inadmissible purpose A is properly excluded, though the same fact would have been admissible for purpose B.[10] (5) Conversely, an offer of a fact for purpose B is properly admitted, even though the same fact would have been inadmissible if offered for purpose A; this follows from the doctrine of multiple admissibility (ante, § 13).

§ 18. The Objection. The initiative in excluding improper evidence is ant offered to prove by the witness" a specific conversation set out in full; a ruling rejecting the offer was sustained, partly because "it does not appear that any question was asked the witness").

[6] For the doctrine of conditional admissibility, by which an offer, positively made, is received conditionally, see ante, § 14, post, § 1871.

[7] For the rule that an offer rejected in the form of a question must show that the excluded answer would have been material, in order to justify an appeal, see post, § 20, under Exceptions.

[8] 1895, Herndon v. Black, 97 Ga. 327, 22 S. E. 924; 1885, Over v. Schiffling, 102 Ind. 191, 26 N. E. 91 (libel; offer rejected to show that the witness "communicated all these facts" to the plaintiff; not all of the facts being admissible for a privileged communication, "it was counsel's duty to specifically state the facts which they expected to show that the witness communicated to their client; . . . the Court was not bound to analyze the testimony and sift out the competent from the incompetent"); 1903, Farleigh v. Kelley, — Mont. —, 72 Pac. 756.

[9] 1855, Phillips v. Hoyle, 4 Gray 568.

[10] 1849, Doe v. Beviss, 7 C. B. 456, 508 (a reeve's account-book, being offered as entries against a deceased person's interest, held properly rejected, and the proposal to admit them as admissions of the lord of the manor, by reason of the book being in the latter's possession, this ground of reception, not having been urged at the trial, was rejected; "it would be manifestly unjust to allow that ground to be taken now, seeing that, if it had been so put then, it might have been explained"); 1890, Royal Ins. Co. v. Duffus, 18 Can. Sup. 711 (insurance; the finding of matches and shavings near by, being properly excluded on an offer to evidence an incendiary origin, was not allowed to be afterwards maintained as an offer to evidence the extent of the fire); 1834, Goodhand v. Benton, 6 G. & J. 481, 488 ("For the purpose for which the account was offered in evidence, we think it clearly inadmissible and approve of its rejection by the County Court. . . . In the Court's rejection of the account, they do not declare it admissible evidence for no purpose; but simply that it was inadmissible for the purpose for which it was offered. It was still open to the appellant to offer it as evidence for any other purpose for which it was legally competent. Had the defendant offered the account generally, without specifying his object, or had stated it to be to contradict or discredit the testimony of the witness given on his examination in chief, . . . there could not have been a doubt as to its legal admissibility").

left entirely to the opponent, — so far at least as concerns his right to appeal on that ground to another tribunal. The judge may of his own motion deal with offered evidence; but for all subsequent purposes it must appear that the opponent invoked some rule of evidence. The function of the objection is first to signify that there is an issue of law, and, secondly, to give notice of the terms of the issue. An objection serves, for the rules of evidence, the same purpose as a demurrer for the rules of substantive law:

1835, Mason, Sen., in Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593, 617: "If a party will not object, he admits the competency of the witness. To allow of a different rule would lead to great injustice. It is a trite, but nevertheless a very equitable saying, if a party will not speak when he ought to, he shall not be heard when he wants to speak. If no objection be made, the [other] party is well justified in supposing that it is not intended to be made."

The procedure for objections may be considered under five heads, — the time, the form, the tenor, the waiver, and the burden of proof.

a. Time of the Objection. The general principle governing the time of the objection is that it must be made as soon as the applicability of it is known (or could reasonably have been known) to the opponent, unless some special reason makes a postponement desirable for him and not unfair to the proponent of the evidence.

(1) For evidence first taken at the trial, the objection may be to the disqualification of a particular witness in general or to the inadmissibility of an evidentiary fact contained in a specific question or document. An objection to a witness' disqualification in general must be made as soon as he is called to the stand and before his direct examination begins, provided his disqualification was then known. But the rule on this point has relaxed in modern times, owing to the increasing disuse of the formal voir dire or preliminary questioning; and the subject is better considered in connection with the general doctrine of Testimonial Qualifications (post, §§ 486, 586).

For evidence contained in a specific question, the objection must ordinarily be made as soon as the question is stated, and before the answer is given; unless the inadmissibility was due, not to the subject of the question, but to some feature of the answer:

1824, Holroyd, J., in Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 B. & C. 434, 443: "If the objection was known a priori, it should have been made before the evidence was given. But if it was not discovered until afterwards, then the judge should have been requested to strike the evidence out of his notes; and if after that he persevered in summing it up to the jury, that would have been good ground for tendering a bill of exceptions."

1871, Bartol, C. J., in Marsh v. Hand, 35 Md. 123, 127: "The bill of exceptions states that no notice had been given to produce the original; there was no admission or proof that the original had ever been received by the plaintiffs. It is very clear that the copy was not legal or admissible evidence. The bill of exceptions however states that it was offered, and a part of it read to the jury, when the plaintiffs' counsel made their objection. The Court decided that the objection came too late: 'that having allowed the first part of the letter to be read, the plaintiffs could not object to the reading of the balance, and that it was too late to object to the admission of the letter, in whole or in part.' . . . The rule is well settled, 'that it is the duty of counsel, if aware of the objections to its admissibility, to object to the testimony at the time it is offered to be given,' and it has been embodied among the rules of the Superior Court, as follows: Rule 34. 'Every objection to the admissibility of evidence shall be made at the time such evidence is offered, or as soon thereafter as the objection to its admissibility shall have become apparent; otherwise, the objection shall be treated as waived.' This rule does not appear to us to have been infringed in this case by the appellants. It must have a reasonable interpretation. Its object is to prevent a party from knowingly withholding his objection, until he discovers the effect of the testimony, and then if it turns out to be unfavorable to interpose his objection. Such a course could not be allowed. It is very obvious from reading the bill of exceptions in this case, that such a purpose could not be justly ascribed to the plaintiffs' attorneys. There is nothing to show that they waived their objection or consented to the copy of the letter being read. It was not submitted to their inspection before it was offered, as is the usual and proper course. But it appears that in the hurry of the trial, probably from a momentary inadvertence on their part, a portion of the letter had been read to the jury, when the objection was interposed in good faith and with reasonable diligence. In our judgment it would be too strict and narrow a construction of the rule, to deny them under such circumstances, the right to make their objection."

1889, Elliott, C. J., in Jones v. State, 118 Ind. 39, 20 N. E. 634: "The question was in form and substance a proper one, and of course could not have been successfully assailed, so that an objection would have been unavailing. The appellant therefore did not lose the right to move to reject the answer by failing to object to the question. Where the question is a competent one, and the answer incompetent, the correct practice is to move to strike out the answer."[1]

(2) For evidence taken by deposition before trial, the general principle is that the objection should be made at the time of the taking (or in general by motion to suppress before trial[2]), if the ground of the objection was such as might have been obviated before trial, but otherwise not, because the officer has ordinarily no power to disallow answers; in other words, the objection before trial serves as a notice required by fairness to the opponent, rather than as a means of excluding the evidence or obtaining a ruling:

1835, Walworth, C., in Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593, 595: "The object of requiring the objection to the competency of a witness to be made before his testimony is closed was to enable the party calling him to obviate the objection, if possible, by a release, or, if that could not be done, to give the party an opportunity of substantiating the facts by other witnesses. . . . The objection [against a deponent] to his competency and the nature of the interest or other disqualification should be distinctly stated, in the same manner as an objection to the competency of a witness is taken at the circuit: except that it will not be necessary for the party making the objection to produce his evidence in support thereof previous to the examination of the witness."

[1] Accord: 1899, Coppin v. State, 123 Ala. 58, 26 So. 333; 1903, Yoder v. Reynolds, — Mont. —, 72 Pac. 417; 1903, Dobson v. Southern R. Co., — N. C. —, 44 S. E. 593; 1903, McGarrity v. R. Co., — R. I. —, 55 Atl. 718; 1894, Vermillion Co. v. Vermillion, 6 S. Dak. 466, 61 N. W. 802; 1880, Thompson, Trials, I, §§ 700, 715–720; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, II, § 594. An objection, upon its ground becoming known, must be made within a reasonable time thereafter: 1902, North v. Mallory, 94 Md. 305, 51 Atl. 89; and, in any case, before the end of the trial; 1901, Brady v. Nally, 151 N. Y. 258, 45 N. E. 547, 549. For the reservation of the right to object, see infra.

For the right to require the proponent of a document to show it to the opponent, so that he may object if necessary, see post, § 1861.

[2] The difference here will depend on the kind of deposition and the subject of objection. For example, an objection to the caption or other formality of course cannot be made until the document has been returned by the officers to the clerk; on the other hand, an objection to a written interrogatory in a commission is feasible before the commission is sent out.

1865, Field, J., in York Co. v. Central R. Co., 3 Wall. 107, 113: "All objections of a formal character, and such as might have been obviated if urged on the examination of a witness, must be raised at such examination or upon motion to suppress. The rule may be different in some State courts; but this rule is more likely than any other to prevent surprise and secure the ends of justice. There may be cases where the rule should be relaxed."

1874, Swayne, J., in Doane v. Glenn, 21 Wall. 33, 35: "In such cases [of formal defects] the objection must be noted when the deposition is taken, or be presented by a motion to suppress before the trial is begun. The party taking the deposition is entitled to have the question of its admissibility settled in advance. Good faith and due diligence are required on both sides. When such objections, under the circumstances of this case, are withheld until the trial is in progress, they must be regarded as waived, and the deposition should be admitted in evidence. This is demanded by the interests of justice. It is necessary to prevent surprise and the sacrifice of substantial rights. It subjects the other party to no hardship. All that is exacted of him is proper frankness."[3]

But so broad a principle is seldom stated. The doctrine is usually dealt with in specific rules. Objections to the procedure of taking and the form of the document must be made before trial;[4] so also objections to the manner of the interrogatories, for example, as improperly leading the deponent,[5] or to the manner of the answers, as being insufficient or irresponsive.[6] On the other hand, objections to the materiality or relevancy of particular facts need not be made until the trial.[7] The disqualification of a witness is sometimes

[3] This general principle, by which the incurability of the objection is taken as the test, is found stated in the following cases also: 1901, Albers Commission Co. v. Sessel, 193 Ill. 153, 61 N. E. 1075 (good opinion, reviewing the Illinois rulings); 1865, Blackburn v. Crawfords, 3 Wall. 175, 191 (similar to York Co. v. Central R. Co., supra). The general subject is treated in the following works: 1880, Weeks, Depositions, §§ 389, 413, 423; 1880, Thompson, Trials, I, § 701; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, I, § 413. The local statute usually prescribes a rule.

[4] 1898, Meyer v. Rothe, 13 D. C. App. 97, 99; 1873, Delventhal v. Jones, 53 Mo. 460, 462 ("A party should not be permitted to lie by and lull his adversary into a false sense of security by failure to file any motion to suppress his depositions, thus induce him to announce himself ready for trial, and then count on springing the question of some informality on him for the first time when he offers to read those depositions in evidence"); 1854, Crowell v. Bank, 3 Oh. St. 406 ("Exceptions to depositions for other causes than the competency of the witness or the relevancy of the testimony should not be heard unless noted on the depositions, or notice thereof given to the opposite party before the cause is called for trial"); 1903, Willeford v. Bailey, — N. C. —, 43 S. E. 928; 1902, Neland v. Dealy, — N. D. —, 89 N. W. 325; 1877, Hord v. Colbert, 28 Gratt. 49, 54.

Contra, but clearly wrong: 1853, Mills v. Dunlap, 3 Cal. 94, 96 (motion to suppress for various informalities, made on the day of filing; "the motion was prematurely made; the proper time to have objected to the introduction of the deposition as testimony was when it was offered in proof upon the trial").

[5] 1831, Woodman v. Coolbroth, 7 Greenl. 181, 184; 1847, Glasgow v. Ridge, 11 Mo. 40; 1849, Walsh v. Agnew, 12 id. 525; 1850, Whipple v. Stevens, 22 N. H. 219, 224 (since it is an objection "which if brought to the attention of the opposite party might be obviated"); 1849, Chambers v. Hunt, 22 N. J. L. 552, 562; 1810, Sheeler v. Speer, 3 Binn. 133; 1823, Strickler v. Todd, 10 S. & R. 73; 1869, Hill v. Canfield, 63 Pa. 77, 84.

Contra, but wrong: 1823, Craddock v. Craddock, 3 Litt. 77 ("It would be obviously absurd to require the objection to be made where it could not be decided," applying this rule even to leading questions).

[6] 1846, Spence v. Mitchell, 9 Als. 744, 749; 1856, McCreary v. Turk, 29 Id. 244, 246; 1876, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 56 id. 411, 413 ("The reason of the rule is that the objection is founded on a defect which can be cured; it is unlike an objection to the relevancy or competency of the evidence"); 1875, Sturm v. Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 77, 87 ("He should take an earlier opportunity for action, so that, if [he is] successful, his opponent might move for a commission to examine his witness anew out of court or might obtain a personal attendance at the trial").

[7] 1847, Wall v. Williams, 11 Ala. 826, 834; 1859, Walker v. Walker, 34 id. 469, 472, semble; 1873, McCoy v. People, 71 Ill. 111, 116, semble ("It is the duty of a party who offers to read a deposition in evidence to know in advance that removable by the party, sometimes not; and hence some Courts are found insisting on objection before trial,[8] others not;[9] the truth is that it must depend on the nature of the disqualification.[10] So, too, of the auxiliary rules, such as the production of a documentary original, or its authentication; in so far as these objections may be curable in the interval before trial, they should be made before t [11] When the trial comes, it is necessary to make formal objection, even when objection was already made before trial,[12] because the former objection was essentially only a notice to the proponent and there was no opportunity for securing a judicial ruling upon it. A failure to object at one trial precludes the opponent at any subsequent trial from further objection, for the reason and to the extent that a failure to object before the first trial would have precluded him;[13] and of course no objection at all will be heard when made for the first time in the court of appeal.[14]

b. Form of the Objection. An objection, like an offer, must be positive, not hypothetical or contingent; hence, it cannot be reserved or postponed by notifying the Court, at the time when it should be made, that it will possibly be made in the future;[15] unless, through the length of a deposition, for example, or a complication of relevancies, it is not practicable for the opponent to know whether there is ground for objection.[16] The test is, whether he at the time of the offer knows or could know the grounds; if he does, his decision must be absolute, not contingent.[17] the questions and answers are relevant"); 1878, Myers v. Murphy, 60 Ind. 282, 285 ("the motion to suppress was made before the trial of the cause and at a time when the Court could not possibly know whether the depositions would be relevant or irrelevant"); 1897, Winters v. Winters, 102 Ia. 53, 71 N. W. 184 (confidential communication to a physician); 1901, Wanamaker v. Megraw, 168 N. Y. 125, 61 N. E. 112 (under C. C. P. § 611).

[8] 1863, Moshier v. Knox College, 32 Ill. 155, 163; 1835, Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593 (quoted supra); 1825, U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils, 1 Paine 400; 1872, Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. 151, 160.

[9] 1829, Talbot v. Clark, 8 Pick. 51, 56 ("All question as to the form of the interrogatories should be made before the commission goes, to give the other party opportunity to vary his interrogatories; but objections to the competency of a witness should be made to the Court at the trial"); 1858, Adams v. Wadleigh, 10 Gray 360; 1903, Woodard v. Cutter, — Nebr. —, 96 N. W. 54; 1854, Crowell v. Bank, 3 Oh. St. 406 (see citation supra). The local statute often declares a rule.

[10] 1901, Albers Commission Co. v. Sessel, 193 Ill. 153, 61 N. E. 1075 (incompetent survivor; the objection being here incurable).

[11] 1865, York Co. v. Central R. Co., 3 Wall. 107, 113 (see quotation supra; an objection on the ground that the original of a document, proved by copy, was not accounted for, was required to be made at the time of taking).

For the rules as to notice of cross-examination, see post, §§ 1377–1379.

[12] 1867, Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187, 227.

[13] 1862, Alverson v. Bell, 13 Ia. 308; 1856, Bartlett v. Hoyt, 33 N. H. 151, 162 ("The caption of a deposition, when it has been produced in court and the deposition which it contained has been permitted to be used unquestioned, has performed its office, and it would seem to be entirely idle . . . [to permit the opponent to object later] when he has already had that opportunity, and has in effect conceded it to be sufficient"); 1862, Randolph v. Woodstock, 35 Vt. 291, 294 ("The party taking it has the right to consider all objections relative to the taking waived, and may allow his witness to go out of the country, or not produce him on another trial, or take the risk of his decease, relying upon having secured his testimony").

[14] 1902, Stewart v. Conrad, 100 Va. 128, 40 S. E. 624; and cases cited post, par. (c).

For the reservation of objection till a deposition is read through, see post, § 19.

[15] 1835, Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593, 595, 615 (a reservation of "every objection to the competency of the witness and all other legal exceptions," made at the outset of an examination, held insufficient when not followed by any formal and specific objection).

[16] Post, § 19, where reservation of rulings is dealt with.

[17] For conditional relevancy, see post, § 1871.

c. Tenor of the Objection. An objection is either general or specific in its tenor; that is, either it declares generally that the offered evidence is inadmissible, or it declares specifically that the evidence violates a named principle or rule of evidence.

(1) General Objection. The cardinal principle (no sooner repeated by Courts than it is forgotten by counsel) is that a general objection, if overruled, cannot avail:

1850, Lord Brougham, in Bain v. Whitehaven & F. R. Co., 3 H. L. C. 1, 16; "Now is it necessary that when a party excepts to the reception of evidence, to the rejection of evidence, or to the direction of the judge given to the jury, whatever is the subject-matter of his exception, he must state the ground of his exception, otherwise he cannot except. It is not enough for him to say, 'I except to the receiving of A's evidence,' or 'I except to the rejection of A's evidence,' or 'I except to the first passage in the direction given by the learned judge to the jury.' If he objects to the reception of A's evidence, he must show why it should not be received, as by stating that A is an incompetent witness. If, on the other hand, he objects to the rejection of A's evidence, he must show why it should not be rejected, as, for instance, that A is a competent witness, and that his evidence is admissible, and that the rejection of his evidence is contrary to law. . . . In all these cases the ground of objection must be clearly stated, and beyond the ground of the objection thus stated, the Court is not at all bound to look."

1870, Foster, J., in Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 116, 121: "The exception is to the refusal of the Court to entertain such an objection [to interrogatories] unless accompanied by a specification of the grounds upon which the plaintiff claimed that the questions were incompetent. We think the judge very properly refused to entertain the objection. A judge presiding at the trial of a cause is not to be burdened with the duty of searching for objections to an inquiry put by counsel, which the opposing counsel is himself unable to discover, or which, if apparent to his own mind, he sees fit to conceal for no other purpose, apparently, than to prevent a full consideration of the objection and with the ultimate intent to take advantage of an error, in case of defeat, which might have been avoided if his views of the matter had been fairly and candidly expressed at the proper time."

1874, Dunne, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 123, 25 Pac. 816: "A party wishing the benefit of the remedy must, at the time he complains, show how he is hurt; in the language of the old authorities, he must lay his finger upon the point of objection. . . . He must not merely complain in a general way, and say that to let certain evidence in will hurt his case, and that under the law it ought to be excluded, and leave the judge and opposite side in the dark as to what principle of law he relies on, and compel them to decide haphazard, or else stop the trial of the cause, with a jury waiting, while the counsel examine the whole body of the law, from the earliest judicial expositions down to the latest act of the legislature, to see if they can discover any valid objection to the testimony. The opposing counsel can make no reply to a general objection, except to throw the whole responsibility upon the judge at once, or else begin systematically and argue that under any possible objection the testimony should come in. Many trials under such a system would practically never end. The effect of it would be to compel one party to fight in the dark, not knowing when his opponent intended to strike, while the other would be free to choose his weapons, and the time and place to use them. Such things may do in love or war, when all things are said to be fair; but life is too short to transact business on such a system in courts of justice. . . . An objection that the testimony is 'irrelevant' without specifying wherein or how or why it is irrelevant will not be considered in the supreme court as raising any issue, if the testimony could, under any possible circumstances, have been relevant. An objection that the testimony is 'inadmissible' may be disregarded; it amounts to no more than the assertion that the evidence is illegal; the objection should fully and specifically point out how it is inadmissible. When an objection is that the evidence offered is 'incompetent and illegal,' it is the duty of the Court to overrule it if the evidence was admissible for any purpose. An objection that evidence is 'incompetent' does not raise any issue as to whether the question is leading or not. The only way to raise such an issue is to object specifically that the question is leading. . . . The object of requiring the grounds of objection to be stated, which may seem to be a technicality, is really to avoid technicalities and prevent delay in the administration of justice. When evidence is offered to which there is some objection, substantial justice requires that the objection be specified, so that the party offering the evidence can remove it, if possible, and let the case be tried on its merits. If it is objected that the question is leading, the form may be changed; if that the evidence is irrelevant, the relevancy may be shown; if that it is incompetent, the incompetency may be removed; if that it is immaterial, its materiality may be established; if to the order of introduction, it may be withdrawn and offered at another time, — and thus appeals could often be saved, delays avoided, and substantial justice administered."

1898, Lacombe, J., in Signfus v. Porter, 28 C. C. A. 443, 84 Fed. 430, 435: "The objection was not fairly called to the attention of the judge who tried the cause. The stock objection 'incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial' covers a multitude of sins. There is hardly an objectionable question but what can be classified under one or other of these heads. Sometimes the real nature of the objection is so plain that the general phrase will be quite sufficient to indicate it; indeed, it may be quite apparent without any statement of the grounds of objection at all. But there are many other objections which rest upon some particular theory of the case, or upon some single fact in proof, which a judge may readily forget in the course of a long and intricate trial. It is only fair in such cases to require counsel to state clearly to the trial judge on what ground it is that they object. Certainly it is not fair to allow such a general dragnet as 'incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial' to be cast over every bit of evidence in the case which counsel would like to keep out, and then to permit counsel, upon careful analysis of the printed narrative of the trial, to formulate some specification of error not thought of at the time, and which, if seasonably called to the Court's attention, might have been avoided or corrected." [18]

The only modification of this broad rule is that if on the face of the evidence, in its relation to the rest of the case, there appears no purpose what-

[18] Accord: 1881, Allen v. McDonald, 20 N. Br. 533; 1897, Wise v. Wakefield, 118 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 310 (impeaching one's own witness); 1897, Yaeger v. B. Co., — Id. —, 51 Pac. 190 (mode of cross-examining); 1895, Harris v. Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519 (good opinion by Lumpkin, J.); 1903, Andrews v. State, — Ga. —, 43 S. E. 852; 1855, Pegg v. Warford, 7 Md. 582, 603; 1903, Cololn v. McCormick C. O. Co., — S. C. —, 44 S. E. 380; 1880, Garner v. State, 5 Lea 213, 218 (record); 1859, Campbell v. Campbell, 3 Head 325, 329 (contents of tax-books not produced); 1886, Noonan v. Mining Co., 121 U. S. 393, 7 Sup. 911 ("The objection 'incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant' is not specific enough"); 1890, Patrick v. Graham, 132 id. 627, 629, 10 Sup. 194; 1890, District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 136 id. 450, 462, 10 Sup. 990; 1892, Toplitz v. Hedden, 146 id. 252, 254, 13 Sup. 70; 1897, New York El. Eq. Co. v. Blair, 25 C. C. A. 216, 79 Fed. 896 ("a specimen of a practice not to be encouraged, which is to object with a rattle of words that conceal the real nature of an objection capable of being removed on the spot, and to announce its true character for the first time in the appellate court"); 1896, Culmer v. Cliff, 14 Utah 291, 47 Pac. 35; 1870, Cornell v. Barnes, 26 Wis. 473, 480 ("A general objection to particular questions that they were irrelevant, or immaterial, or improper, was not sufficient").

Contra: 1870, Greenleaf v. R. Co. 30 Ia. 301, 303.

In Groh's Sons v. Groh, — N. Y. —, 68 N. E. 992 (1903), the opinion commits the fallacy of assuming that the terms "immaterial," "incompetent," and "irrelevant," have distinct and fixed meanings. In truth, they are too loose and interchangeable to be treated seriously as if they signified any particular ground of objection. The topic is dealt with in the following works: 1880, Thompson, Trials, I, § 693; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, II, § 584.

ever for which it could have been admissible, then a general objection, though overruled, will be deemed to have been sufficient:

1874, Dunne, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 123, 25 Pac. 816: "Perhaps the only limitation it can ever require is in those exceedingly rare cases where it is apparent on the face of the proposition that it is impossible the evidence is or can be made available for any purpose. As the object of requiring a specific objection is to enable the other party to obviate it if possible, if the objection is apparent, and it is clear that the defect cannot possibly be obviated, a specific objection would not help the adverse party, and in such case a general objection would be sufficient. But of course such cases will be very rare, and a prudent practitioner will hardly risk any point on a general objection."[19]

But when a general objection is sustained by the trial Court, it may be presumed that the reasons were apparent to all parties without statement; and as the exception is here to be taken by the proponent of the evidence, it is fair to require him to make clear therein the basis of his claim for its admissibility, if he had rested on any specific ground; hence, the general objection will suffice, if on the face of the evidence and the rest of the case there appears to be any ground of objection which might have been valid (or, otherwise stated, if there is any purpose for which the evidence would conceivably be inadmissible).[20]

(2) Specific Objection. A specific objection overruled, will be effective to the extent of the grounds specified, and no further. An objection, therefore, naming a ground which is untenable, cannot be availed of because there was another and tenable ground which might have been named but was not:

1821, Gibson, J., in Wolverton v. Com., 7 S. & R. 273, 276 (refusing to consider an objection on appeal that the loss of an original record was not shown so as to admit secondary evidence, the objection at trial having been that parol evidence of a record was never admissible): "Now I take it to be an inflexible rule, and one of the utmost value, both in pleading and evidence, that whatever is not denied or made special ground of objection is conceded. Thus, if a party being called on for that purpose opens the par-

[19] This modification is recognized in the following cases: 1842, Lord Trimleatown v. Kemmis, 5 Cl. & F. 749, 776; 1861, Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315, 323; 1902, Kirby v. State, — Fla. —, 32 So. 836; 1862, Clauser v. Stone, 29 Ill. 114 ("the general rule is unquestionably that objections on the trial, to a paper or other evidence, must be specially pointed out, so that they may be obviated if possible; but this rule applies only to cases where the objection can be removed by evidence, or by the act of the party under the sanction of the Court, or by the action of the Court itself"); 1903, Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Wallace, 202 Ill. 129, 66 N. E. 1096; 1901, Brewer v. Bowersox, 92 Md. 567, 48 Atl. 1060; 1859, Morris v. Henderson, 37 Miss. 492, 501; 1882, Heard v. State, 59 id. 545; 1898, Lipscomb v. State, 75 id. 559, 23 So. 210; 1852, Merritt v. Seaman, 6 N. Y. 168, 171 (general objection held good, where it could not have been obviated except by a change of parties); 1897, State v. Magone, 32 Or. 206, 51 Pac. 452; 1897, Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 338, 82 Fed. 720; 1901, Mine & Smelter S. Co. v. Parke & L. Co., 47 C. C. A. 34, 107 Fed. 881, 884; 1898, Snowden v. Coal Co., 16 Utah 366, 52 Pac. 599; 1872, Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 614, 619 ("If there was any possible purpose for which the books were admissible as evidence, or any supposable state of case in which they ought to have been received, then it was not error to admit them").

[20] 1843, Comstock v. Smith, 23 Me. 202, 208 (deposition rejected; "it is not set forth that the rejection took place on account of interest in the deponent, or of informality in the caption, or for irrelevancy; . . . it should have appeared in the exceptions how and in what particulars the plaintiff was aggrieved"); 1897, Emrich v. Union Stockyard Co., 86 Md. 482, 38 Atl. 943; 1877, Tooley v. Bacon, 70 N. Y. 34 ("When evidence is excluded upon a mere general objection, the ruling will be upheld, if any ground in fact existed for the exclusion; it will be assumed, in the absence of any request, by the opposing party or the Court, to make the objection definite, that it was understood, and that the ruling was placed upon the right ground"), ticular view with which he offers any part of his evidence, or states the object to be attained by it, he precludes himself from insisting on its operation in any other direction, or for any other object; and the reason is, that the opposite party is prevented from objecting to its competency in any view different from the one proposed. In like manner, a party may be called on to state the particular ground on which he rests an objection to competency, and if it fails him, it is not error to receive the evidence, although it be incompetent on other grounds. Where, therefore, there is a special objection, or, what is the same in effect, a general objection resting, not on collateral circumstances, but on the supposed existence of an abstract principle admitting of no exception, as was the case here, every ground of exception which is not particularly occupied, is to be considered as abandoned. For instance, a deposition is offered, and it is resisted exclusively on the ground, that the witness is interested, or that the evidence is irrelevant; would it not be palpably unjust in a court of error, to listen to an objection, that it did not appear there had been proof of notice, or that the deposition had in all respects been regularly taken? If the defect were pointed out in time, it might be supplied by further proof; or if that were impossible, the party would, at least, be apprised of the danger to ultimate success, which is necessarily incurred by pressing the admission of incompetent testimony. Here, if instead of urging the abstract operation of the rule, the defendants had objected that the case did not fall within the particular exception to it, now relied on, the plaintiffs might have been prepared to show that the execution actually came to the hands of the sheriff, or that it was lost or destroyed; but, as to that, the silence of their antagonists at the trial, had a direct tendency to lead them into a surprise."

1874, Dunne, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 122, 25 Pac. 816: "The Supreme Court, in examining a question as to whether a ruling of the court below on an objection to evidence was correct or not, will not consider any other grounds of objection to the evidence than those urged in the court below. This rule is of universal adoption in the courts of this country. . . . Counsel are held to the grounds of objection stated at the time they call for a decision of the judge below, because they are supposed to know the law of their case, and if they do not offer other objections they are supposed to waive them, and evidence admitted without valid objection should stand. Counsel must not be permitted to wink at the introduction of evidence to which they think there is a valid objection, hoping that it may benefit them, and if it goes the other way, move to exclude it; neither must they be permitted to plead inattention as an excuse. It is their business to be attentive on a trial, and if they miss a point by neglect, they must lose it. Neither can we allow them to strike between wind and water on the trial, and then go home to their books and study out other objections and urge them here. They must stand or fall upon the case they made below, for this court is not a forum to discuss new points of this character, but simply a court of review to determine whether the rulings of the court below on the case as presented were correct or not." [21]

[21] Accord: 1845, Ferrand v. Milligan, 7 Q. B. 730 (in proving a public right of way over the plaintiff's land, acts of repair by a township surveyor were proved by the defendant, and in rebuttal the plaintiff offered to show a contract of repair by which the plaintiff's steward agreed to pay the surveyor; the defendant's objection that the steward had no authority to make such a contract was overruled; on a motion for a new trial, the further ground of objection that the road to which the contract related was not the road in issue was repudiated, because not specified at the time of the ruling, "its admissibility having been decided upon alio intuitu by the learned judge"); 1838, Williams v. Wilcox, 8 A. & E. 314, 337 ("Justice requires this, not so much to the judge, as to the opposite party, who may be willing, as in the present case would probably have been done, rather to waive the benefit of the evidence than put his verdict in peril on the issue of the objection"); 1860, Reed v. Lamb, 6 H. & N. 75, 90; 1903, Brown v. State, — Fla. —, 35 So. 82; 1873, McCoy v. People, 71 Ill. 111, 115; 1851, Holbrook v. Jackson, 7 Cush. 136, 154 (entries in a mortgagor's books being admitted over an unsound objection based on the ground of some of them not being original and not being made by the parties themselves, the further ground of objection that some of them were made after transfer of title, and therefore could not be used as admissions of a grantor, was repudiated, because not specified at the time of the ruling); 1846, Monteeth v. Caldwell, 7 Humph. 13; 1873, Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 125, 133.

Compare § 13, ante (multiple admissibility).

Here, also, however (as with a general objection), it would seem that the objection will be effective, though naming an untenable ground, if there is no purpose at all for which the evidence could have been admissible;[22] in other words, a specific objection (like a special demurrer) is at least as good as a general objection. So, too, a specific objection sustained (like a general objection) is sufficient, though naming an untenable ground, if some other tenable one existed.[23]

In any event the offer, in relation to the opponent's specific objection, is to be construed as a single whole, just as it must be for the proponent himself (ante, § 17); so that where the objection is to a question including several facts[24] or to the entire testimony of a witness,[25] and names a ground tenable for one part but not for others, it is insufficient; the opponent must specify, not only his ground, but also the part of the offer to which the ground is applicable.

d. Waiver of Objection. An objection may of course be expressly waived. Of implied waivers, the usual instance is that of failure to make the objection at the proper time (supra, par. 1). Another instance is the curing of an error of admission by the opponent's subsequent use of evidence similar to that already objected to;[26] and perhaps the prior use of similar inadmissible [22] 1897, Presnell v. Garrison, 121 N. C. 366, 28 S. E. 409.

[23] 1877, Eschbach v. Hurtt, 47 Md. 61, 65 (an offer of testimony to defendant's reputation among men of the same business was rejected, sustaining the erroneous ground of objection that in malicious prosecution reputation was not in issue upon damages; but the exception was overruled on appeal because the reputation among a particular class of persons was improper; "what this Court must determine is whether the testimony offered was admissible, and not whether a right or wrong reason was assigned for its rejection"). Compare § 13, ante.

[24] 1859, Sayre v. Durwood, 35 Ala. 247, 251 (a specific objection to a question calling for an answer in part legal is ineffective; so also a motion to strike out an entire answer for a reason applicable to a part only); 1893, Davis v. Hopkins, 18 Colo. 155, 32 Pac. 70; 1898, Lipscomb v. State, 75 Miss. 559, 23 So. 210 (general rule stated; but in the opinion of Magruder, J., it appears to be somewhat qualified); 1903, State v. Ledford, — N. C. —, 45 S. E. 944; 1828, Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. 328, 337 ("Courts of justice are not obliged to modify the propositions submitted by counsel, so as to make them fit the case; if they do not fit, that is enough to authorize their rejection"); 1866, U. S. v. McMasters, 4 Wall. 680, 682.

[25] 1861, Myers v. People, 26 Ill. 173, 176 (objection to the whole testimony of a witness, held insufficient where a part of it related to other crimes and was inadmissible); 1885, Louisville N. A. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 Ind. 409, 3 N. E. 389 (motion to strike out certain testimony as a whole, part of which was admissible, held properly denied; "it is the duty of the party to select the competent from the incompetent testimony"); 1889, Jones v. State, 118 id. 39, 20 N. E. 634; 1839, Moore v. Bank, 13 Pet. 302, 310; 1845, Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. 515, 530 ("It could not be expected, upon the mere suggestion of an exception which did not obviously cover the competency of the evidence nor point to some definite or specific defect in its character, that the Court should explore the entire mass for the ascertainment of defects which the objector himself either would not or could not point to their view").

[26] 1874, Smith v. Gerow, 15 N. Br. 425; 1886, Gale v. Shillock, 4 Dak. 182, 29 N. W. 661 ("The general rule is that, where a party makes a valid objection to the introduction of evidence and afterwards puts in evidence proving the same facts, he waives his objection"); 1841, Sanders v. Johnson, 6 Blackf. 50, 52 ("The defendant waived the error by introducing another deposition by the same witness testifying to the same facts contained in that which was rejected"); 1842, Hayden v. Palmer, 2 Hill N. Y. 205, 209 ("This case [of a harmless error] is in principle like the case of a judge erroneously receiving evidence to a fact against the party; to which he excepts, but afterwards insists upon and proves the same fact himself; that has been often allowed to defeat the effect of the exceptions. I believe it has generally been called a waiver of the exception"). But it is otherwise where the subsequent evidence is introduced merely in self-defence, to explain or rebut the original evidence; 1900, Salt Lake City v. Smith, 43 C. C. A. 637, 104 Fed. 457.

evidence may be dealt with on the theory of waiver in advance (ante, § 15). No doubt other conduct of various sorts may require in fairness to be deemed a waiver.[27]

e. Burden of Proof. The burden of proving the grounds of an objection is ordinarily not upon the opponent; whether he objects on the ground that the original of a document is not produced, or that an attesting witness ought to be called, or that a dying declarant was not conscious of impending dissolution, the burden of establishing the preliminary facts essential to satisfy any rule of evidence is upon the party offering it. The opponent merely invokes the law; if it is applicable to the evidence, the proponent must make the evidence satisfy the law. To this general rule there are a few exceptions, based (like all solutions of the burden of proof) on experience and convenience in special classes of cases. These exceptions can better be considered in connection with the respective kinds of evidence involved; by way of example may be named the rules that a testimonial disqualification by insanity, infancy, or interest (post, §§ 484, 497, 508, 584) and the existence of an improper inducement to a confession (post, § 860) must be shown by the opponent of the evidence.

§ 19. The Ruling. The main question in regard to the judge's ruling upon an objection is whether it must be immediate upon the objection. A postponement of the time, or a subsequent revocation of the ruling, may affect the objecting party in two respects, namely, in his further management of his remaining evidence and in the impression upon the jury.

(1) An objecting opponent is entitled to an immediate and final ruling, before the close of the proponent's case, declaring the evidence admissible or inadmissible, either absolutely or conditionally (ante, § 14), in so far as otherwise he would be unable to know what evidence on his part in explanation or rebuttal would be needed:

1876, Allen, J., in Lathrop v. Bramhall, 64 N. Y. 365, 374: "The right to object to evidence as it is offered is a legal right of which the party cannot be deprived, and the right to object and to be heard upon the objection, necessarily implies a like right to a decision by a court or referee, and the refusal to entertain an objection or to pass upon it when made is a denial of a legal right to which an exception lies. . . . The judge or referee has, within proper limits, a discretion as to the order of proof, and may permit facts to be proved provisionally, subject to the condition that other facts shall be subsequently proved which are essential to the competency of the evidence admitted. But when all the facts, upon which the party relies for the admissibility of the evidence, have been put before the Court by him and he has rested his case, the adverse party is then entitled to a definite determination as to the competency of the evidence objected to. It is then no longer a question as to the order of proof, nor is it within the discretion of the Court to postpone the decision. . . . It was their right to know before entering upon their defence what evidence they had to meet, and they were necessarily embarrassed in their defence by the refusal of the referee to pass upon the questions made. A decision

[27] 1902, Rice v. Waddill, 168 Mo. 99, 67 S. W. 605 (taking a deposition of the opponent, though without filing it, held on the facts to be a waiver of objection to incompetency). Distinguish the rule that an error of exclusion is cured by the opponent's subsequent introduction of the same evidence: 1903, Lloyd v. Simons, — Minn. —, 95 N. W. 903; here it is not a waiver that cures, but the immateriality of the error (post, § 21).

adverse to the plaintiffs would not have prevented a renewed offer of evidence upon other facts appearing; and had the evidence been either rejected or admitted, the defendants might have shaped their defence entirely differently from what they were compelled to do, proceeding in ignorance of the fact whether the evidence was in or out of the case as against them."[1]

(2) An objecting opponent is not entitled to an immediate and final ruling, nor can he complain of a subsequent revocation of a ruling, merely in so far as the temporary admission of inadmissible evidence against his objection may obtain consideration for it in the minds of the jurors; for the instruction which will accompany the subsequent striking out of the evidence must be supposed to be obeyed by the jurors; except in extreme cases which obviously call for a stricter treatment:

1848, Redfield, J., in Northfield v. Plymouth, 20 Vt. 582, 591: "The question, made in regard to permitting the entire deposition of Duncan to be read to the jury, notwithstanding the general objection of the defendants, and the fact that it contained some irrelevant, and perhaps improper, evidence, is a question of practice, upon which the judge, who conducts the jury trial, must be allowed some reasonable discretion. If there were ample time, it might always be better to determine, in advance, how much of a deposition should be read to the jury even upon a general objection; and in practice, ordinarily, that will be done, where the objection is specific. But very often this course will require too much delay, and always the admissibility of evidence, at the opening of the case, depends so much upon what is expected to be proved thereafter, that great latitude must be allowed, or it may become necessary to reconsider the earlier determinations of the court as the trial progresses. And if improper evidence is admitted it may readily be set right in the charge. The recent English practice, upon this point, is much more liberal, than that which obtained as long ago as the time of Chief Justice Willes."[2]

1833, Parker, J., in Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 333, 346: "We cannot adopt the broad principle there [in New York] laid down, as sound law, applicable to all cases . . . [that an erroneous ruling cannot be cured by subsequent revocation and instruction]. The reason that the testimony so given in presence of the jury might have an influence, though they are directed to disregard it, would apply with equal force in all cases where anything irrelevant may have crept in during the course of the trial, and would entitle parties to a succession of new trials, until no sentence should have been uttered which by any possibility might have an undue influence, though the jurors were unconscious of any influence. It is apparent that the principle cannot be carried to this extent, and other authorities show it must fall far short of it, even if it can be supported in any degree. The rule respecting the testimony of interested witnesses, as laid down by Starkie and Phillipps, is that where it is discovered incidentally in the course of a cause that the witness is interested, his evidence will be struck out, although no objection has been made to him on the voir dire. . . . So where evidence which is competent in one view, and yet from its nature or connection proves something else, which would not be competent, and which might possibly have an effect upon the jury, the evidence is admitted, and the jury

[1] This passage is from a dissenting opinion; but the majority seemed to have differed merely in holding that the opponent was under the circumstances not disadvantaged by the postponement. A ruling, reserved and never rendered, upon an offer objected to and left pending, is therefore equivalent to a ruling of exclusion: 1903, Adams v. Elwood, — id. —, 68 N. E. 126 (following Lathrop v. Bramhall).

[2] The following case represents the early English practice: 1737, Smith v. Richardson, Willes 20, 23 ("It was said that a very great judge had frequently admitted evidence if doubtful whether it was evidence or not, and said he would afterwards tell the jury how far they ought to have regard to it; but this, though the practice of a very great man, was thought [by the present judges] to be of very dangerous consequence"); 1769, Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. 18.

directed not to regard it as evidence, except for the purpose for which it is admissible. So where the confession of a prisoner implicates others, charged in the same indictment, the whole evidence is introduced, and the jury directed to disregard it as to the others. . . . Cases are of daily occurrence, also, where evidence is admitted, which, from a failure to connect it with other evidence, with which it had a necessary connection in order to be relevant, eventually turns out to be incompetent. The utmost caution cannot always prevent the introduction of evidence, which in the course of the trial is discovered to be clearly inadmissible, and if, in such cases, its introduction was to be regarded as ground for a new trial, on the application of the party objecting, the practice should be to stop the case, and begin de novo to another jury, for however strongly the jury were directed to disregard the testimony, it could not be shown that it had not had an influence upon the verdict, of which the jurors were not conscious — and yet it is not believed, that a practice of stopping a trial upon such account, ever prevailed in any court. . . . This rule respecting the introduction of incompetent testimony may admit of exceptions. If the testimony be of a nature to excite popular prejudice, and if there is good reason from the verdict to suppose that it must have influenced the jury improperly, notwithstanding the direction of the judge that it was to be disregarded, such case might furnish an exception, and the granting of a new trial be a proper exercise of the discretion of the Court." [3]

§ 20. The Exception. The exception serves a double purpose. It makes clear that the party unfavorably affected by the ruling is not satisfied but takes issue; and it sums up and preserves the precise terms of the ruling for the purposes of appeal.[1] Both of these are indispensable. Neither of them is attained by the objection alone. Yet the distinction between objection and exception tends to become confused, and in judicial opinions the rules for exceptions are sometimes spoken of when the rules for objections are really being dealt with. But their functions are distinct. No matter how plain and correct the objection, the exception is still necessary, even though the objector and the exceptor be the same party:

1842, Abinger, L. C. B., in Gibbs v. Pike, 9 M. & W. 351, 360: "I cannot agree to the principle of taking the statements of counsel on such a point. . . . He may tender a bill of exceptions, or he may first ask the judge to make a note of the tender, and if the request is denied, then tender his bill of exceptions."

1837, Story, J., in Poole v. Fleeger, 11 Pet. 185, 211: "In the ordinary course of things at the trial, if an objection is made and overruled as to the admission of evidence, and

[3] This view represents the only sound doctrine; but it is denied in several courts. Compare the following authorities: 1877, Wilmot v. Vanwart, 17 N. Br. 456, 462; 1903, Bell v. Clarion, — Ia. —, 94 N. W. 907; 1901, Ives v. Ellis, 169 N. Y. 85, 62 N. E. 138; 1903, Mauk v. Brundage, — Oh. —, 67 N. E. 152; 1830, Thompson, Trials, 1, § 723; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, 11, § 594.

Distinguish the question whether after a case has been submitted to a judge without a jury, he may cure an erroneous ruling duly excepted to, by striking out and disregarding the evidence in his deliberations: 1903, Robinson v. N. Y. El. R. Co., — N. Y. —, 67 N. E. 431.

[1] It was the latter reason which led chiefly to the statute originally providing for the mode of taking exceptions: 1285, St. 13 Edw. I, Westminster Second, c. 31 ("When one that is impleaded before any of the justices doth alledge an exception, praying that the justices will allow it, which if they will not allow, if he that alledged the exception do write the same exception and require that the justices will put to their seals for a testimony, the justices shall do so; and if one will not, another of the company shall; and if the king, upon complaint made of the justices, cause the record to come before him, and the same exception be not found in the roll, and the plaintiff shew the exception written, with the seal of the justice put to," then if the justice admit his seal genuine, the exception shall be adjudged upon).

The history of the statute is noticed in the following works: 1895, Pollock & Maitland, History of the English Law, II, 663–669; 1838, Chitty, General Practice. IV, c. 1, § 1.

the party does not take any exception at the trial, he is understood to waive it. The exception need not, indeed, then be put into form, or written out at large and signed; but it is sufficient that it is taken, and the right reserved to put it into form, within the time prescribed by the practice or rules of the court."[2]

The rules for taking exceptions to rulings upon evidence fall under four heads, — time, form, tenor, and confirmation.

(1) Time of the Exception. The time of the exception, in some form or other, is to be immediately upon the ruling. In special circumstances, a later time prior to the end of the trial may suffice, and local rules of court often make express regulations. But an immediate claim is usually necessary:

1709, Wright v. Sharp, 1 Salk. 288: "A corporation-book was offered in evidence at the assizes to prove a member of the corporation not in possession, and refused. No bill of exceptions was then tendered, nor were the exceptions reduced to writing; so the trial proceeded, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff. Next term the Court was moved for a bill of exceptions, and it was stirred and debated in Court. It was urged, that the law requires quod proponat exceptionem suam, and no time is appointed for the reducing it into writing, and the party is not grieved till a verdict be given against him; and the same memory that serves the judges for a new trial will serve for bills of exceptions. On the other side it was said, that this practice would prove a great difficulty to judges, and delay of justice; that the precedents and entries suppose the exception to be written down upon its being disallowed, and the statute ought to be construed so as to prevent inconvenience; besides the words of the Act[3] are in the present tense, and so is the writ formed on the Act; Holt, C. J.: 'If this practice should prevail, the judge would be in a strange condition. He forgets the exception, and refuses to sign the bill, so an action must be brought. You should have insisted on your exception at the trial. You waive it if you acquiesce, and shall not resort back to your exception after a verdict against you, when perhaps, if you had stood upon your exception, the party had other evidence, and need not have put the cause on this point. The statute indeed appoints no time, but the nature and reason of the thing requires the exception should be reduced to writing when taken and disallowed, like a special verdict, or a demurrer to evidence; not that they need be drawn up in form; but the substance must be reduced to writing while the thing is transacting, because it is to become a record.'"

1879, Burks, J., in Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 469, 477: "In jury trials, I have always understood the rule to be, that if a party objects to a ruling of the presiding judge during the progress of the trial, either in admitting or excluding evidence, or giving or refusing instructions, or otherwise, and intends to except to such ruling, he must make known such intention at the time of the ruling, or at least before verdict, and if the bill of exceptions cannot be drawn up at once, liberty should be reserved to do so during the term, and if he neglect to prefer exceptions until after the verdict, he will not then be allowed to do so. One of the reasons for the rule requiring this promptness in taking the exception and giving notice thereof, is that an exception taken and made known for the first time at a subsequent period in the trial might affect very injuriously the rights of the opposing party; for, if he have reasonable notice of the exception, he may, perhaps, have it in his power at the time or during the trial to obviate or counteract it; and it would be unjust to allow his adversary to insist on the exception, and have the benefit of it, after, by his own negligence, or it may be by his contrivance, he has made it impossible to meet it."

[2] 1858, Lawton v. Tarratt, 4 All. N. Br. 1, 21 (Gibbs v. Pike approved); 1851, Lisbon v. Bath, 23 N. H. 1, 9 (failure to note, in a bill of exceptions, a particular objection made, held a waiver of the objection).

[3] Quoted in note supra.

(2) Form of the Exception. The exception must be written, for a main object is to preserve in it the fact and the terms of the dispute. A complete and formal writing may be postponed; but some memorandum there must be at the initial time:

1838, Mr. Joseph Chitty, General Practice, IV, c. 1, § 1: "A bill of exceptions need not be in complete form at the instant it is tendered; but the substance of it ought to be then put into writing, since it is to become a record. In practice, the points of the bill of exception are usually taken down in writing and signed by the counsel of each party, and the bill of exception is prepared at leisure, or at least without reprehensible hurry."

1880, Strong, J., in Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 333, 353: "It is no doubt necessary that exceptions should be taken and, at least, noted before the renditlon of the verdict; but the reduction of the bills to form, and the signature of the judge to the bills, required for their attestation, or, as said in the Statute of Westminster, 'for a testimony,' may be afterwards, during the term. In practice it is not usual to reduce bills of exception to form and to obtain the signature of the judge during the progress of the trial. Nor is it necessary. The Statute of Westminster did not require it. It would greatly and uselessly retard the business of courts were it required that every time an exception is taken the progress of the trial should be stayed until the bill could be reduced to form and signed by the judge. For this reason it has always been held that it need only be noted at the time it is made, and may be reduced to form within a reasonable time after the trial is over."

(3) Tenor of the Exception. The exception, as formally stated, must contain all that is necessary for determining the issue made. It must therefore include the offer of evidence, the objection with its reasons, the ruling, and the notice of exception taken. Furthermore, if the ruling was one excluding a question, so that the offering party is the exceptor, he must state the tenor of the expected answer to the question, and if the objecting party is the exceptor, then the tenor of the answer given; so that it may be seen whether this answer was favorable or unfavorable, and therefore whether he has lost by the one or been injured by the other. So far as admissibility may be dependent on other evidence introduced or offered to be, that other evidence must also be set out. Finally, with reference to determining the materiality of the error if any, the tenor of sufficient of the remaining evidence must be stated; but this is a consequence of the doctrine of new trials (post, § 21) and not of the doctrine of exceptions:

1874, Dunne, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 121, 25 Pac. 816: "The cases where we are called on to review rulings on the admission of evidence may be reduced to two classes: 1. When the party objecting was overruled and he appeals; 2. When the party objecting was sustained and the other side appeals. 1. In the first case, where the party objecting was overruled and he appeals, he must show by the record: (1) What the question was, and what answer was given to it, or what the evidence was which was introduced against his objection. This is important because the evidence admitted may not injure him. The answer may have been in his favor. It is not necessary that he should show clearly that he was injured, because that would often be impossible, but he must show that the evidence was admitted against his valid objection, which, it may be, has injured him; for the object of granting a review by this Court is not to determine the abstract questions as to whether the judge below ruled correctly or not, but to give relief in case a party may have been injured by an erroneous ruling. (2) He must set out enough of the evidence to illustrate the point of his objection, and to raise the presumption that he may have been injured; but where error is shown, injury will be presumed, unless the contrary clearly appears. (3) He must show what kind of an objection was made, and to avail him here he must show that the objection as made was good. Then it is for the other party to see that the statement made contains a showing sufficient to sustain the admission of the evidence as against the objection made. The amount of showing the latter party depends upon the nature of the objection. If the party objecting interpose merely a general objection, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the general objection. If the objection is specific, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the specific objection as made. Beyond this, we cannot in reason require him to go. He should defend himself against the particular attack made, but we cannot ask him to fortify himself against all possible attacks which might have been made. 2. In the second case, where the party objecting was sustained, and the other side appeals and asks to have the ruling declared erroneous, the party appealing must see that the record shows: (1) What question he asked or what evidence he sought to introduce; (2) Sufficient of the other evidence to illustrate the admissibility of that offered; (3) That the evidence so offered was excluded; (4) That there is reasonable ground to presume that he may have been injured by such exclusion. The other party must see that the record shows good grounds of exclusion."

1903, Lamar, J., in Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. —, 43 S. E. 712: "While the motion says what she would have testified, it does not appear that the Court was informed thereof at the time he excluded her; and therefore we are not permitted to consider this assignment of error. . . . In a few instances there may be one exception, particularly in cross-examinations, where the examining counsel may not know what the answer would be, or is exercising a right to test the witness. But ordinarily the exclusion of oral testimony can be made available as error only by asking some pertinent question, and, if an objection is sustained, informing the Court at the time what the answer would be, so that he can then determine whether the fact is or is not material. It will not do to state thereafter what the witness would have answered. . . . If a new trial should be granted because the answer was excluded, it might happen that on the second trial the question would be again propounded, allowed, and the witness give hearsay, inadmissible, or irrelevant testimony, or the answer might be harmful instead of helpful, or the witness may reply, 'I do not know,' with the result that the time and money of the parties and the country has been wasted for so inconsequent a conclusion. That this is not unlikely to occur is shown by the experience of all practising lawyers, who have often seen a long and heated argument as to the right to ask a question, followed by the laughter of all bystanders when the Court held it competent, and the witness replied that he knew nothing about the matter. Parties can often agree in the presence of the Court as to what the witness would testify, or, if not, the witness or examining attorney can state what the answer would be; and, where the subject-matter is important, the judge may, in his discretion, retire the jury until its admissibility has been settled. We are well aware that the rule may be perverted into a means of getting inadmissible evidence before the jury, or, by forcing their constant withdrawal, retard the trial. The Courts must rely upon the good faith of counsel not to bring about such a result. But it would never do to grant a new trial until it appeared not only that the question was proper, but that the answer was material, and would have been of benefit to the complaining party." [4]

[4] Accord: Illustrating the case of an exception to evidence admitted: 1889, Smethurst v. Barton Sq. Church, 148 Mass. 261, 267, 19 N. E. 387; 1902, Rio Grande W. R. Co. v. Utah N. Co., — Utah —, 70 Pac. 859; 1862, Randolph v. Woodstock, 35 Vt. 291, 296 ("Suppose a party offers to prove by a witness some fact which is clearly improper and inadmissible, and the offer is objected to, but the inquiry is allowed, and the witness answers that he has no knowledge on the subject, is this error for which the party objecting is entitled to a new trial? We think not"); 1902, State v. Buck, 74 id. 29, 51 Atl. 1087. Illustrating the case of an exception to questions excluded: 1903, Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. —, 43 S. E. 712 (see quotation supra); Andrews v. State, — id. —, 43 S. E. 852 (even on cross-examination, the motion for

(4) Confirmation by Motion for New Trial. By the orthodox English practice (doubtless still followed in some of our own jurisdictions) the remedies of new trial and of bill of exceptions were regarded as alternative and mutually exclusive.[5] Moreover, the bill of exceptions came to be only rarely chosen for establishing errors in evidence-rulings, partly because of its greater formality and expense, partly because the extensive discretion in granting new trials gave an ample remedy,[6] and partly because the tradition persisted (ever since the statute of Edward I) that a bill of exceptions involved in some degree a reflection on the trustworthiness of the trial judge, as being incapable or unwilling to note correctly the point of dispute.[7] But in the United States the orthodox practice fell extensively out of use. The bill of exceptions came to be the usual method of raising questions upon evidence,— chiefly, no doubt, because the English judicial custom of taking full notes of evidence was not kept up, except in early times in a few of the older jurisdictions. The two remedies not only ceased to be mutually exclusive, but a rule arose that a bill of exceptions must be confirmed afterwards by a motion for a new trial, as a condition precedent to the consideration of the bill on appeal. The reason for this rule has been thus stated:

1885, Green, J., in Danks v. Rodeheaver, 26 W. Va. 274, 298: "If either party were allowed to have the rulings of the Court below, which had been properly excepted to and a bill of exceptions taken at the proper time, reviewed without his making a motion for a new trial and its being overruled, he never would make such motion, when his only ground for it was these erroneous rulings against him during the trial; as, if he failed to make the motion, the appellate Court would have to presume, that such rulings were prejudicial to him; but if he be required to make such motion before he can avail himself of such rulings against him during the trial, he will afford his opponent an opportunity of having all the evidence spread upon the records, and when this is done, the appellate Court may see that these rulings at the trial were not really prejudicial to him, and in that case, though the rulings were against him, and he properly excepted to them and made them a part of the record, still the appellate Court will not reverse the case, though the rulings were erroneous, the presumption that they were prejudicial to him having been rebutted by the evidence in the case when all certified."[8]

new trial "should in some way indicate when the party had been injured by the exclusion"); 1883, Mills v. Winter, 94 Ind. 329, 331 (offer of witnesses to character, rejected; ruling sustained because "the party excepting should see to it that the bill of exceptions is so made up as to show affirmatively that the offer should have been sustained"); 1889, Kern v. Bridwell, 119 id. 226, 21 N. E. 664; 1901, Pittsburgh C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Martin, 157 id. 216, 61 N. E. 229 (for direct examination); 1902, Hoover v. Patton, 158 id. 524, 64 N. E. 10; 1903, Dunn v. State, — id. —, 67 N. E. 940 (reviewing the cases); 1901, Savary v. State, 62 Nebr. 166, 87 N. W. 34; 1897, State v. Noakes, 70 Vt. 247, 40 Atl. 249; 1868, Dreher v. Fitchburg, 22 Wis. 675, 680; 1903, Keffer v. State, — Wyo. —, 73 Pac. 556. The subject is treated in Elliott, General Practice (1894), II, § 587.

For the question whether in chancery admissible evidence, erroneously rejected below, should on appeal be considered, if preserved in the record, see Leavitt v. Bartholomew, — Nebr. —, 93 N. W. 856 (1901), and authorities cited.

[5] 1818, Doe v. Roberts, 2 Chitty 272; 1828, Tidd's Practice, 9th ed., II, 863.

[6] 1838, Chitty, General Practice, V, c. 1, § 1.

[7] Gibbs v. Pike, 9 M. & W. 351 (quoted supra); Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 B. & C. 445.

[8] The opinion in the above case collects and examines the authorities. Accord: 1853, Phelps v. Mayer, 15 How. U. S. 160. Contra: 1863, McCoy v. Julien, 15 Ia. 371, 374.

Distinguish the question whether a motion for a new trial is needed where the error alleged was a ruling that the evidence as a whole was insufficient to go to the jury; 1869, Smith v. Gillett, 50 Ill. 290, 300; this is a complicated question, involving the doctrine dealt with post, § 2494.

§ 21. The Judgment of Error; Materiality, and New Trial. An erroneous ruling having been made and excepted to, and the excepting party having received an adverse verdict on the law and the evidence, the great question on appeal then becomes,[1] Shall a new trial be granted because of the erroneous admission or exclusion of the particular piece of evidence? It is a great question, because, although it does not directly involve the tenor of the rules of evidence, yet the whole status of the law of evidence, as well as the efficiency of our methods of doing justice, is dependent upon the answer. Whether that law of evidence shall be a mere means to an end, — the end being a just settlement of particular controversies, — or whether it shall be an end in itself — an end so independent of justice, and so superior thereto, that it must be attained even at the cost of justice, — this depends practically upon whether it can be conceded that an erroneous ruling of evidence is ipso facto a ground for a new trial.

1. The Orthodox English Rule, and the Exchequer Rule. The original and orthodox English rule was plain. An erroneous admission or rejection of a piece of evidence was not a sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict and ordering a new trial, unless upon all the evidence it appeared to the judges that the truth had thereby not been reached:

1807, R. v. Ball, R. & R. 133: "Whether the judges on a case reserved would hold a conviction wrong on the ground that some evidence had been improperly received, when other evidence had been properly admitted that was of itself sufficient to support the conviction, the Judges seemed to think must depend on the nature of the case and the weight of the evidence. If the case were clearly made out by proper evidence, in such a way as to have no doubt of the guilt of the prisoner in the mind of any reasonable man, they thought that as there could not be a new trial in felony, such a conviction ought not to be set aside because some other evidence had been given which ought not to have been received. But if the case without such improper evidence were not clearly made out, and the improper evidence might be supposed to have had an effect on the minds of the jury, it would be otherwise."

Such was the rule in the King's Bench, in criminal[2] as well as in civil cases.[3] Such was the rule in the Common Pleas,[4] plainly stated in Doe v.

[1] The other questions on appeal concerning evidence have already been considered under other heads, — whether the record of the exception must show the evidence excluded or admitted (ante, § 20); whether an erroneous ruling can be cured by subsequent instruction of the trial Court (ante, § 19); whether a ground of objection not named upon the trial can be considered in the appellate Court (ante, § 18); and whether an erroneous ruling of admission is waived by the objector's own subsequent use of similar evidence (ante, § 18).

[2] 1781, Tinkler's Case, R & R. 133, note (all the Judges thought the evidence of a witness of the name of Parsons ought not in strictness to have been received; but as the evidence was ample without it, "the Judges did not think themselves bound to stop the course of justice"); 1807, R. v. Ball, R. & R. 133 (quoted supra); 1809, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in R. v. Teal, 11 East 311 ("If the evidence [as to character] had been admitted, it could have made no difference, at least it ought not to have made any difference in the verdict"); 1810, R. v. Treble, R. & R. 164, Heath, J. Though there could not at this period be a new trial in cases of felony, but only a pardon of the prisoner, still the general judicial tendency of those times to favor the escape from the gallows was such as to make up, in the judicial mind, for this difference between the modern law and the earlier law as affecting the balance of risks.

[3] 1819, Abbott, C. J., in Tyrwhitt v. Wynne, 2 B. & Ald. 554, 559 (the mere erroneous ruling of rejection "will not be sufficient, for it must be further shown and substantiated that, if they had been received, they would have led to a probable conclusion in favor of the offering party"). In Edwards v. Evans, 3 East 451, 455 (1803), occurs a premonitory instance of the later rule.

[4] 1807, Mansfield, C. J., in Horford v. Wil-

Tyler. Such was equally the practice in Chancery,[5] when issues had been sent to a jury in a common law court. All this lasted down to the decade of 1830.

In that decade the Court of Exchequer, in Crease v. Barrett,[6] announced a rule which in spirit and in later interpretation signified that an error of ruling created per se for the excepting and defeated party a right to a new trial. The new Exchequer rule was speedily accepted in the other courts;[7] and for something more than a generation it remained the law of England, until it was reformed away, for civil causes, in 1875.[8]

The Exchequer rule duly obtained recognition in the United States in a son, 1 Taunt. 12, 14 ("Neither will the Court set aside a verdict on account of the admission of evidence which ought not to have been received, provided there be sufficient without it to authorize the finding of the jury"); 1830, Doe v. Tyler, 6 Bing. 561 (rule explicitly approved); so too, in the Federal Supreme Court, for new trials as distinguished from writs of error; 1828, Story, J., in M'Lanahan v. Ins. Co., 1 Pet. 170, 183 ("In such cases, the whole evidence is examined with minute care, and the inferences which a jury might properly draw from it are adopted by the Court itself; if therefore upon the whole case justice has been done between the parties, and the verdict is substantially right, no new trial will be granted, although there may have been some mistakes committed at the trial").

[5] 1805, L. C. Eldon, in Pemberton v. Pemberton, 11 Ves. 50, 52 ("If upon the whole [record] he is satisfied that justice has been done, though he may think that some evidence was improperly rejected at law, he is at liberty to refuse a new trial"); 1816, Bullen v. Michel, 4 Dow 297, 319, 330; 1826, Barker v. Ray, 2 Russ. 76; 1838, L. C. Cottenham, in Lorton v. Kingston, 5 Cl. & F. 269, 340 ("The true consideration always is whether upon the whole there appears to be such a case as enables the judge in equity satisfactorily to administer the equities between the parties without the assistance of another trial"). So, too, generally in this country to-day: 1903, Dowie v. Driscoll, 203 Ill. 480, 68 N. E. 56.

[6] 1835, Crease v. Barrett, 1 C. M. & R. 919, 932 (intimating that the only cases where the error would be ineffective were where the same fact was otherwise proved or not disputed and where a verdict in favor of the defeated party "would have been clearly and manifestly against the weight of evidence and certainly set aside upon application to the Court as an improper verdict"); 1846, Hughes v. Hughes, 15 M. & W. 701 (Alderson, B., declared the rule to be that "the Court will not grant a new trial if with the evidence rejected a verdict given for the party offering it would be clearly against the weight of evidence, or if without the evidence received there be enough to warrant the verdict"; confusing two different tests, and citing Doe v. Tyler and Crease v. Barrett without discrimination); 1847, Doe v. Langfield, 16 id. 497, 515 (approving Crease v. Barrett, Parke, B., applies the exception there stated, and here refuses a new trial since "no evidence was improperly rejected but such as was immaterial and if admitted would not have prevented a nonsuit").

[7] 1835, Rutzen v. Farr, 4 A. & E. 53 (the Exchequer rule in Crease v. Barrett followed, and the Common Pleas rule in Doe v. Tyler rejected); 1837, Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 330 (Denman, C. J. "As this Court has so lately, on full consideration, and in conformity with a decision of the Court of Exchequer, renounced the discretion which was in that case [of Doe v. Tyler] exercised, we need not repeat our reasons for holding that . . . the losing party has a right to a new trial"); 1887, Coleridge, C. J., in R. v. Gibson, L. R. 18 Q. B. D. 537, 540 ("Until the passing of the Judicature Acts, the rule was that if any bit of evidence not legally admissible, which might have affected the verdict, had gone to the jury, the party against whom it was given was entitled to a new trial"). So also in Canada: 1895, Merritt v. Hepenstal, 25 Can. Sup. 150, 152, semble; 1867, Key v. Thomson, 1 Han. N. Pr. 295, 2 Id. 224, 228; 1877, Wilmot v. Vanwart, 17 N. Br. 456, 462; 1883, Doe v. Gilbert, 22 id. 576, 587.

[8] 1875, Judicature Act, 1883, Rules of the Supreme Court, Order 39, rule 6 ("A new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence . . . unless in the opinion of the Court to which the application is made some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned on the trial"); 1893, Pearce v. Lansdowne, 69 L. T. Rep. 316. So also in Canada: Can. Crim. Code 1892, § 746; N. Br. St. 1894, c. 8, § 47; N. Sc. Rules of Court 1900, Ord. 37, R. 6; 1897, R. v. Woods, 5 Br. C. 585, 590 (Dominion statute applied).

The reform had originally been introduced by Mr. (later Sir) James F. Stephen: 1872, Indian Evidence Act (Stephen's ed.), § 167 ("The improper admission or rejection of evidence shall not be ground of itself for a new trial or reversal of any decision in any case, if it shall appear to the Court before which such objection is raised that, independently of the evidence objected to and admitted, there was sufficient evidence to justify the decision, or that, if the rejected evidence had been received, it ought not to have varied the decision").

majority of jurisdictions. In its most extreme form, and in language exhibiting in the most radical manner the theory that the rules of evidence form an end in themselves, the new doctrine — which had indeed given sporadic signs of independent growth — was now rapidly promulgated.[9] During the last generation, the Exchequer heresy has clearly gained the ascendance.

There are, to be sure, Courts that still cling to the old-fashioned notion, resting on the orthodoxy of Doe v. Tyler, and refusing to bow the knee to the Baal-worship of the rules of evidence.[10] A model example of such an opinion is the following:

1866, Porter, J., in People v. Fernandez, 35 N. Y. 40, 50: "The circumstances which were established by evidence, confessedly competent, were so conclusive as to the guilt of the prisoner that no honest jury could refuse to convict him of the crime. To acquit him would be to shield guilt from justice and deny the protection of law to the innocent. If, therefore, the Court below was right in holding that the judge erred in admitting additional evidence tending to the same conclusion, we think it was clearly wrong in reversing the conviction; for, upon the facts disclosed, the supposed error could work no legal injury to the prisoner. As it was shown, beyond all question, by undisputed and competent proof, that the accused was one of the murderers, we are under no legal or moral obligation to assume that the jury might have rendered a false verdict of acquittal but for the erroneous admission of other and needless evidence. In this respect, there is no distinction between civil and criminal cases. The reception of illegal evidence is presumptively injurious to the party objecting to its admission; but where the presumption is repelled, and it clearly appears, on examination of the whole record, beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt, that the result would have been the same, if the objectionable proof had been rejected, the error furnishes no ground for reversal."

[9] 1895, Miller, J., in State v. Callahan, 47 La. An. 497, 15 So. 50 ("The admission of illegal evidence in a civil case is comparatively unimportant. . . . But in a criminal case . . . it is for the jury to convict, and it is presumed to act on all the evidence submitted. . . . It is the right of the accused to be tried on legal evidence alone. . . . The conviction must be by legal evidence only"); 1808, Sewall, J., in Bartlet v. Delprat, 4 Mass. 708 ("And upon the whole, although the other facts appearing in this case leave very little doubt of the justice of the verdict, yet as the competency of the evidence excepted to is not supported by any of the authorities we have examined, we think the verdict must be set aside"); 1894, Com. v. White, 162 Mass. 403, 38 N. E. 707; 1886, Cobb, J., in Masters v. Marsh, 19 Nebr. 467, 27 N. W. 438 (excluding certain books of account: "While I do not think that the books would have proved any fact of the least value in the case had they been properly admitted, yet the party presenting them would scarcely be permitted to escape the consequence of an erroneous ruling on that ground"); 1874, Cole, J., in Schaser v. State, 36 Wis. 434 ("It may be shown by the most irrefragible proof that the defendant is guilty of the offence charged against him; but this does not justify the violation of well settled rules of evidence in order to secure his conviction"). So, too, the words of Mr. Justice Story have been forgotten in the Court which he distinguished: 1894, Waldron v. Waldron, 156 U. S. 380, 15 Sup. 383; 1898, Northern P. R. Co. v. Hayes, 30 C. C. A. 576, 87 Fed. 131 ("It is elementary that the admission of illegal evidence over objection necessitates a reversal").

[10] 1885, State v. Beaudet, 53 Conn. 536, 539, 4 Atl. 237 (if evidence excluded "could not properly have changed the result, then he was not aggrieved by the ruling"); 1846, McCleskey v. Leadbetter, 1 Ga. 551, 556 ("The Courts will not set aside a verdict on account of the admission of evidence which ought to have been rejected, provided there be sufficient without it to authorize the finding"); 1896, Gardner v. R. Co., 135 Mo. 90, 36 S. W. 214 ("The judgment was manifestly for the right party; and where such is the case, the judgment will not be reversed because some incompetent testimony was admitted"); 1839, State v. Ford, 3 Strobh. 528 (Earle, J., dissents as to the propriety of admitting certain evidence, but agrees to dismiss the motion for a new trial; for "in such a case as this, where the prisoner's guilt is very manifest . . . I think it would exhibit unnecessary squeamishness to say he has not been legally convicted on abundant evidence"). Instances of the sensible application of this rule are the following cases: 1903, Barber v. People, 203 Ill. 543, 68 N. E. 93; 1903, Copenhaver v. State, — Ind. —, 67 N. E. 453; 1903, Com. v. Lenousky, — Pa. —, 55 Atl. 977; 1903, Dyor v. Union R. Co., — R. I. —, 55 Atl. 688.

2. Reason and Practical Working of the Exchequer Rule. What can be said on behalf of the Exchequer rule? The theories advanced to support it have been chiefly two. The first is the theory that a party has a legal right to the judicial observance of the rules of evidence per se. The second is the theory that the judicial consideration of the weight of all the evidence, as a motive for refusing a new trial, would be a usurpation of the jury's function. The whole doctrine, no doubt, has its deepest roots in the inveterate and unconscious professional instinct, which grows to venerate unduly the rules that form its daily mental pabulum. But there must at least be some ostensible reason; and these two have served in that capacity:

1835, Parke, B., in Crease v. Barrett, 1 C. M. & R. 919, 932: "The rule is there laid down [in the Common Pleas] much too generally; and it is obvious that if it were acted upon to that extent, the Court would in a degree assume the province of the jury; and besides, its frequent application would cause the rules of evidence to be less carefully considered."

1838, Morton, J., in Ellis v. Short, 21 Pick. 142, 144: "Some of the evidence objected to was not only clearly irrelevant, but might have prejudiced the jury against the plaintiff. We therefore find ourselves constrained to grant a new trial. We regret that we find it necessary to do this; because the action involves no principle of law, is attended with an expense disproportionate to its importance, has been fully and elaborately tried, and been brought to a result, which was entirely satisfactory and which there is very little reason to suppose will be changed on another trial, by the exclusion of the evidence which was improperly admitted. The English Courts and those of some of our sister States exercise a much broader discretion in relation to the granting of new trials than we do. Their practice is to refuse new trials for the improper admission or rejection of evidence, whenever, in their opinion, such erroneous admission or rejection of evidence, whether material or immaterial, ought not to have affected the verdict, or substantial justice has been done. This seems to us to trench upon the province of the jury. How can the Court know how much influence each particular piece of evidence had upon the minds of the jury, or that the illegal evidence was not the weight, however small it may be, which turned the balance, and that without it the opposite scale would not have preponderated? To sustain a verdict, under such circumstances, may be to make a decision contrary to the convictions, which the legal evidence would have produced upon the minds of the jury. . . . It is the province of the Court to guard the decisions of the jury from the influence of foreign or irrelevant matter and preconceived opinions and prejudices; and this imposes upon it the duty, on proper occasions, of giving to the jury an opportunity to revise its decisions; but never authorizes it to weigh the evidence or to determine how they should ultimately decide upon matters of fact."

1875, Devine, J., in Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 112: "The refusal of the Court to permit the witness to answer the question [an opinion as to insanity] deprived the accused of a clear legal right. How far his defence may have been prejudiced by it, we cannot say. It is sufficient to know that it was his right to have the question answered by the witness, and that it was relied on as material to his defence."

As to this theory of legal right, it may be said in reply that no man has a legal right to have his cause wrongly decided, — for that is what this "right" comes to. He has indeed a legal right to a jury trial; and he has a right to a fair trial in general. But these are ends in themselves, because the one by constitution and the other by common sense of justice becomes a paramount object. But none can justify the exaltation of the ordinary rules of evidence, which are mere instruments of investigation, into an end in themselves. As well might a gardener cut down a thriving vine because his henchman has used a hoe instead of a spade in planting it; or a farmer bring valuable bantams to the block because they were hatched by a meddlesome duck instead of by their lawful parent. A glance at common affairs will awaken us to the intrinsic absurdity of the theory of "legal right." As for the theory of usurpation, it ignores the doctrine and the history of the jury's function. It has always been under the control and correction of the trial judge and the appellate courts.[11] The judge determines questions of fact upon which the admissibility of evidence depends. The judge draws inferences of fact on a demurrer to evidence. The judge rules whether the whole evidence is sufficient to go to the jury, and whether the verdict is against the weight of evidence. He has never been without this revisory function. Moreover, upon a question of new trial, because of erroneous ruling on evidence, the appellate Court is not asked to overturn the verdict; on the contrary, it is asked to let the verdict stand, and the precise question which the appellate Court decides is, not whether the jury have been correct or incorrect, but whether, subtracting or adding the evidence admitted or excluded, the truth seems to be identical with the jury's verdict. This is a collateral question, and is entered upon merely as a help to avoiding, if possible, the disturbance of the verdict. The "usurpation," if any, consists in setting aside the verdict, not in confirming it. The advocates of the Exchequer rule concede that, for the purpose of overturning the verdict, they may scrutinize and interfere with it, so as to say that it goes against the weight of the whole mass of evidence; yet, for the purpose of supporting the verdict, they profess to be unable to weigh a particular piece of evidence, so as to say that it could not have affected the same weight of evidence. This is one of the most indefensible cases of Tweedledum v. Tweedledee that has ever been sanctioned in our books.

As to the practical working of the Exchequer rule, the results are lamentable. Whether in civil or criminal cases, it has done more than any other one rule of law to increase the delay and expense of litigation, to encourage defiant criminality and oppression, and to foster the spirit of litigious gambling. Added to this is the indirect result produced upon the ever-lurking animal instinct of gregarious human brutality, which takes the failures of criminal justice as its pretext and sates itself with cruel lynchings. That the law has gone to the extremes of absurd and provoking technicality in applying this rule is plain enough, even in a casual glance through the reports. Some of the instances of its enforcement would seem incredible even in the justice of a tribe of African fetish-worshippers.[12] As types of [11] The history of this is to be found in Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 183–253.

[12] The following instances have been here and there noted, and could be multiplied by the score: 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 109 Ala. 500, 19 So. 989 (more than a dozen exceptions to rulings on evidence; one only of these being found wrong, though no substantial prejudice was asserted, a new trial was granted); 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Malone, 109 id. 509, 20 So. 33 (similar; here there were twenty rulings and exceptions); 1878, People v. Bell, 53 Cal. 119 (here the defendant's testimony that the deceased, with whose murder he was charged, what is done in a lesser way every day in every court, they would explain well enough, even if there were no further reason, why poor men may hesitate to send their cause to trial, — why a rich oppressor or a desperate criminal may hope to tire out all endeavors to do justice on him, — why the decisive question for the suitor before litigation often is, not who is right, but who can longest endure, — why ignorant mobs have a patent pretext for distrusting the distant gallows and substituting a near-by tree or stake. Just so long as an erroneous ruling on evidence, however trifling, is described by the highest judges (and in many courts it habitually is) as "working a reversal," just so long will the reproach of technicality and futility mark our litigation. Until the rules of evidence cease to be assimilated to the play of a hand at whist or the operations of an automatic cash-register, they must remain, as often as not, the instruments of injustice.

Nor have there been wanting sage and courageous warnings from the Bench against the downward tendencies of the modern rule. Many judges — usually, though, as dissenters — have recorded their protests against its theory and their condemnation of its results. Their words and their example have remained thus far without much avail; but the time will come when they must be heeded:

1897, Brannon, J., diss., in State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. 813: "If we could say there was any misstep in matter of law in this long trial, it is one of very immaterial character, weighing not a feather in the trial, utterly inadequate to justify was habitually profane, was erroneously allowed to be contradicted by the prosecution, and though the matter was held to have "had no reference whatever to the guilt or innocence of the defendant," a new trial was ordered, solely on this error); 1897, Murphy v. Backer, 67 Minn. 510, 70 N. W. 799 (new trial granted solely because of a single improper contradiction of a witness on a collateral point); 1903, State v. Faulkner, — Mo. —, 75 S. W. 116 (St. Louis municipal corruption case; judgment reversed, apparently on no other ground than two minor errors in the rules of evidence, and a quibble upon a variance between the indictment and an instruction); 1894, Carpenter v. Lingenfelter, 42 Nebr. 728, 60 N. W. 1022 (new trial granted for allowing the contradiction of a witness on an immaterial point); 1899, State v. Jefferson, 125 N. C. 712, 34 S. E. 648 (a mob had almost lynched the accused, at the time of the arrest; but a new trial was awarded on the merest quibble of evidence, while conceding that the whole evidence "warranted conviction"); 1897, Cutler v. Skeels, 69 Vt. 154, 37 Atl. 228 (eighteen exceptions; a new trial granted simply because the plaintiff's counsel in his address said that he knew his clients to be of good reputation and that this was the best kind of evidence for them); 1896, Carver v. U. S., 160 U. S. 553, 16 Sup. 388 (a dying declaration was sanctioned as admissible, but the deceased on a subsequent day had said to an inquirer that her former declaration "was true in every particular"; this being erroneously admitted, a new trial was granted solely because of the error; later the case was again reversed in 164 U. S. 694, 17 Sup. 228). The Federal Supreme Court has been especially callous in pushing the technical rule to extremes, notably in its treatment of some of the rulings of the late Judge Parker, of the Western Arkansas District, one of the greatest trial judges of the Federal bench, whose work for law and order in that region was inestimable; examples may be found in Allen v. U. S., tried in 1893, reversed in 150 U. S. 551, reversed again in 157 U. S. 675, finally affirmed in 1896 in 164 U. S. 492, 17 Sup. 154; in Starr v. U. S., reversed in 1894, in 153 U. S. 614, and again in 1897, in 164 U. S. 627, 17 Sup. 223; and in Brown v. U. S., reversed three times, in 150 U. S. 93, 159 U. S. 100, and 164 U. S. 221. Of the above three defendants (all charged with homicide) whose cases were reversed, Starr subsequently pleaded guilty to manslaughter and to several charges of robbery; Brown pleaded guilty to manslaughter; and Carver was on a third trial convicted of murder; in short, the appellate Court's total achievement proves to have consisted merely in blocking justice for several years, and to have helped to diminish, in a turbulent community, that respect for law and justice which the trial Court, if unhampered, was able to maintain. These cases give to volume 164 of the Federal Supreme Court reports an unenviable mark in our jurisprudence. An instance of a juster doctrine in the same Court is found in Motes v. U. S. (1899), 178 U. S. 458, 20 Sup. 993.

the reversal of a long, laborious trial bearing on its face of having been full, patient, and fair. The scope of harmless error is, in these days, widening. Courts do not nowadays, even in grave trials, reverse such trials for trivial errors evidently not affecting them; so light, and plainly playing so unimportant a part, as not to be appreciably influential or prejudicial when the whole trial, all in all, is regarded. In days gone by, technicalities and rigid procedure sprang up and were enforced to defend accused parties against the demand of monarchic power for conviction, and they then answered, 'Good purpose'; but in this country there is not the same need of them, as the danger now is that the guilty will go free, and something is necessary to protect the public against crime. The great press is declaiming against the courts for lax administration of criminal law. The New York World recently stated that statistics show that for ten years past only 2 20 per cent of homicides have been punished, and that the people are afraid of the courts, and for quick justice resort to lynch law; and further says that this is attributable to the laxity and languor with which the law is enforced, the quibbles, subtleties, and technicalties of the courts fortressing criminals, and causing the administration of justice to appear a mere mockery. Such, I observe, is now almost the universal expression of the press. I would not overturn the solemn verdicts of juries rendered after fair trials, and approved by the trial court, unless I could see that on the whole case something substantially wronging the prisoner had been done. I would therefore affirm."

1898, Whitfield, J., diss., in Lipscomb v. State, 75 Miss. 559, 23 So. 210, 228: "It must thus be clear, beyond all cavil, that this appellate tribunal is not a helpless prisoner, bound in the fetters of some supposed hard and fast rule requiring it to reverse cases where, first, erroneous instructions have been given; or, second, proper instructions have been refused; or, third, competent testimony has been excluded; or, fourth, incompetent testimony admitted; or, fifth, improper argument has been allowed; or, sixth, the trial court has erred in its rulings on the pleadings, — on the ground, merely, that such action of the Court, of the one kind or the other, constitutes error in law merely. Every one of these propositions is laid down as settled law. . . . With all deference, it seems to me that my brethren have clearly confounded the primary function of the jury to pass on the evidence and find the defendant guilty, if satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, and the power which this appellate tribunal exercises in reviewing that finding of the jury. When the Court so reviews the finding of a jury in a criminal case, and reverses, as it repeatedly has done, on the sole ground that the evidence was manifestly insufficient to warrant the verdict of guilty, or affirm the jury's finding of guilt when that verdict is clearly right on the law applicable to the case and the competent testimony in the case, as it has also repeatedly done, this Court is not usurping the jury's primary function, and passing originally upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but is manifestly exercising its undoubted appellate power of reviewing and upholding or vacating the finding of the jury, as the case made may demand, in accordance with settled rules of law governing appellate jurisdiction. The practical inquiry is the true inquiry, and the practical rule must always be . . . that where substantial justice has been done, and the right result has been reached on competent testimony under the law applicable to the case, and no other reasonable verdict could be rendered than the one which was rendered, a reversal should not follow. The administration of justice is a practical thing. It should be administered in a practical way, so as, while not denying to any defendant any substantial right to which he is entitled by the law of the land, to protect society from violators of the law, and to secure the punishment of guilty men properly convicted." [18]

(3) Future of the Exchequer Rule. What is to be the remedy? Unfortunately, it does not seem to be merely in legislation. The fetters of the pernicious rule of the Exchequer were not forged by mere precedent, but by professional habit and tendency. They cannot be struck off by a simple statute. This has been tried; but in vain. There was already, at the very beginning, ample precedent and tradition for the better principle; yet the judges of the King's Bench and the Common Pleas and of our own Courts, when they could choose, made deliberate choice of the worse way. So, too, when legislation has sought to turn them back, they have persisted nevertheless, driven by this same strong technical instinct. In many jurisdictions there are statutes which expressly authorize and command that a new trial shall be granted only when justice requires it; and their object was to abolish the Exchequer rule. What was the consequence? In New York, for example, both the earlier statute [14] and the later statute [15] have proved alike ineffectual. In New Jersey the same fate ensued.[16] Occasionally, indeed, the true spirit has been communicated, — as in Kentucky.[17] But on the whole the effort [14] N. Y. St. 1855, c. 337 (a new trial may be granted if the appellate court is satisfied "that the verdict against the prisoner was against the weight of evidence or against law, or that justice requires a new trial"; 1858, Cancemi v. People, 16 N. Y. 507 (new trial granted for an erroneous ruling on character-evidence, merely because it was "calculated to mislead the jury as to the weight which the evidence should receive"); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174 (the deceased's threats communicated were admitted, but some threats uncommunicated were erroneously rejected; a new trial was granted, although the admission of the excluded evidence would simply have added to the number of threats proved).

[18] See also strong opinions by Wallace, J., diss., in People v. Stanley (1874), 47 Cal. 113, 119; Haight, J., diss., in People v. Koerner (1897), 154 N. Y. 355, 48 N. E. 730.

[15] Here for a while something was achieved; and then the practice fell back into the old rut: N. Y. C. Cr. P. 1881, § 542 (the Court shall "give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties"); 1896, Gray, J., in People v. Hoch, 150 N. Y. 299, 301, 44 N. E. 976 ("The spirit of this legislation, as is its letter, is that if the accused has had a fair trial upon his accusation, and if this Court is satisfied that the conviction is sufficiently supported by competent evidence, that conviction shall stand"); 1897, People v. Conroy, 153 N. Y. 174, 185, 47 N. E. 258 (preceding case approved); 1897, People v. Burgess, 153 N. Y. 561, 47 N. E. 889 (same); 1897, People v. Strait, 154 N. Y. 165, 47 N. E. 1090 ("That statute [C. Cr. P. § 542] is but little more than a codification of the previously established rule . . . ; neither that rule nor the statute affects the well-established principle that the rejection of competent and material evidence, which is harmful to the defendant and excepted to, presents an error requiring a reversal. Such a ruling affects a 'substantial right,' even though the appellate court, with the rejected evidence before it, would still come to the same conclusion reached by the jury; the defendant has the right to insist that material and legal evidence offered by him shall be received and submitted to the jury"). There are occasional signs of a better attitude; 1903, People v. Conklin, 175 id. 333, 67 N. E. 624.

[16] N. J. St. 1894, May 9, c. 163 (new trial is to be granted where any "manifest wrong or injury" has been suffered); 1897, Kohl v. State, 59 N. J. L. 445, 37 Atl. 73 (murder; the trial judge told the jury that a question was whether there was a motive, in particular, whether the deceased had any money; the defendant's mother, with whom the deceased lived, had said on the direct examination that the deceased showed no large sums of money, and on the cross-examination, that he had no money but a dollar a week; she was then allowed to be contradicted by B, who testified that she had elsewhere said the deceased had $800; this statement, however, it was ruled, not being precisely inconsistent with her direct examination, and not being available to impeach the cross-examination where she had been made the examiner's own witness, was therefore inadmissible, and hence there was no evidence to show that he had money, except this contradiction; "for that reason alone, the judgment, in my opinion, should be reversed and a new trial granted"). This ruling apparently led to another statute, which makes a further effort to control the judicial monomania (St. 1898, c. 237, § 136) by adding that "no judgment shall be reversed . . . for any error except such as shall or may have prejudiced the defendant in maintaining his defence upon the merits."

[17] Ky. Cr. C. 1877, § 340 ("A judgment of conviction shall be reversed for any error of law to the defendant's prejudice appearing on the record"); St. 1880, March 4 (amended by adding: "whenever upon the consideration of the whole case the Court is satisfied that the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced thereby"); 1880, Rutherford v. Com., 78 Ky. 639, 643 (dealing with the trial Court's erroneous refusal to allow the defendant to be present at a view; "If all the evidence that the jury could have received on the view . . . had been excluded, it is clear that the verdict must have been 'guilty of murder'; under such circumstances, we are authorized in saying that the record affirmatively shows that the error has been fruitless. By an emasculating interpretation, or by a virtual obliteration, the statutes remain substantially null. Professional instinct from within, and professional pressure from without — the demands of the bar to be allowed to win by technicalities —, have been too strong.

But the thing can be done. It has been done. In England, to-day, the whole odious practice of misusing the rules of evidence as petty stratagems in litigious tactics has passed away. In the reports of decisions, there now occur annually not more than five rulings upon points of evidence, as against more than five hundred in the reports of the United States, — and that in a community almost half as populous as ours but more than twice as litigious. The reformatory legislation in England, commencing with the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 and culminating in the Judicature Act of 1875 and the Rules of Court of 1883, seems to have been based upon a profound professional revolution, and to have signified not merely a change of rules but a change of spirit. The same thing is possible among us. No doubt the contributing conditions to such a change must be numerous. But among the marks of regeneration there must surely be found two vital ones:

First, the judge must cease to be merely an umpire at the game of litigation. Often he is little more. This, to be sure, is in part the continuance of a tradition, inherited from the spirit of gentlemanly sportmanship which dominated the administration of British justice. But it has been intensified, instead of lessened, by the spirit of strenuous struggle and unrestrained persistence which drives the bar of our country to wage their contests to the extreme of technicality. The judge weakly resigns himself to the position of "a mere automaton, or at most the attitude of the presiding officer of a deliberative assembly, with no greater powers than those of announcing the utterances or conclusions of others." [18] To this many circumstances conspire. But it is an old and a marked tendency among us; and, until it is rooted out, that early warning of one of the Nestors of our judiciary will still be worth heeding:

1852, Nisbet, J., in Cook v. State, 11 Ga. 53, 57: "It is to be feared, in these days of reform, that the Judges will be so strictly laced, as to lose all power of vigorous and healthful action. I have but little fear of judicial power in Georgia so aggrandizing itself, as to endanger any of the powers of other departments of the government; or to endanger the life and liberty of the citizen; or to deprive the Jury of their appropriate functions. The danger rather to be dreaded is making the Judges men of straw, and thus stripping the Courts of popular reverence, and annihilating the popular estimate of the power and sanctity of the law." [19] complained of was not 'prejudicial' to the defendant").

[18] 1885, Poché, J., in State v. Ford, 37 La. An. 443, 461.

[19] The following case illustrates the way in which this has been brought about partly by the unlicensed efforts of the bar: 1897, Davis v. State, 51 Nebr. 301, 70 N. W. 984 (the trial judge's instruction was: "If the jury find from the evidence that all the incriminating circumstances . . . [leave a reasonable doubt], then you should by your verdict acquit him"; the phrase "incriminating circumstances" was objected to by the defence as unfair; but the Supreme Court rejected this claim in the following language: "It never was the intention of the law that the district judges of the state should abdicate their reason because a man was on trial charged with the commission of a crime; nor does the law of the land place the district judges in a strait-jacket in criminal trials, nor make of them mere machines to repeat certain general

Secondly, the maudlin sentimentality of judges in criminal cases must cease. Reverence for the Constitution is one thing, and a respect for substantial fairness of procedure is commendable; but the exaltation of technicalities of every sort merely because they are raised on behalf of an accused person is a different and a reprehensible thing. There seems to be a constant neglect of the pitiful cause of the injured victim, and the solid claims of law and order. All the sentiment is thrown to weight the scales for the criminal — that is, not for the mere accused, who may be assumed innocent, but for the man who upon the record plainly appears to be the villain that the jury have pronounced him to be. We have long since passed the period (as a modern judge has pointed out)[20] "when it is possible to punish an innocent man; we are now struggling with the problem whether it is any longer possible to punish the guilty." The dignity, the truth, and the lofty inspiration of great constitutional principles are frittered away and degraded. While on the one hand certain fundamental ideals of political liberty have come to be lightly questioned as impracticable or cynically ignored as obsolete, on the other hand the constitutional safeguards of procedure and evidence are invoked with such fatuous frequency and such misplaced technicality that their respect is lowered and their true purposes are defeated. "I do not understand," protested a great judicial interpreter of the organic law,[21] "that the Constitution is an instrument to play fast and loose with in criminal cases, any more than in any other; or that it is the business of Courts to be astute in the discovery of technical difficulties in the punishment of parties for their criminal conduct." Yet they seem to make it their business. A false sentiment misapplies their energies. This they must unlearn. The epoch of governmental oppression has passed away; the epoch of individualistic anarchy has taken its place. They must learn the lesson of transferring the emphasis of their sympathies, — a lesson more than once read to them by the voices of their own fellow-members of the judiciary:

1805, Smith, B., on the trial of Mr. Justice Johnson, in 29 How. St. Tr. 353: "There may indeed be a tame and creeping and tradesmanlike mode of administering the law conceived; but it is not one which meets my ideas of the duties or station of a judge. Laws are but means; and though it be not our province to legislate but to interpret, yet we should not forget or fail to further the end and object of those laws which we are called upon to construe, namely, the preservation of public morals, the promotion of social order, and the establishment of good government, of our liberties, and of the constitution."

1873, McCoy, J., in Eberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 598, 610: "We have, however, no sympathy with that sickly sentimentality that springs into action whenever a criminal is at length about to suffer for crime. It may be a sign of a tender heart, but it is also a sign of one not under proper regulation. Society demands that crime shall be punished and propositious of law in their instructions." What was needed, however, was a stern rebuke, which should fittingly condemn the unscrupulous callousness of counsel capable of obstructing the course of justice by such impudent quibbles).

[20] 1893, Freeman, J., in Roper v. Territory, 7 N. Mex. 272, 33 Pac. 1014.

[21] 1883, Cooley, J., in People v. Murray, 52 Mich. 291.

criminals warned, and the false humanity that starts and shudders when the axe of justice is ready to strike is a dangerous element for the peace of society. We have had too much of this mercy. It is not true mercy. It only looks to the criminal. But we must insist upon mercy to society, upon justice to the poor woman whose blood cries out against her murderers. That criminals go unpunished is a disgrace to our civilization; and we have reaped the fruits of it in the frequency with which bloody deeds occur."

This much had to be said here, in order to redeem the law of evidence from that reproach which belongs rather to the law of new trials. The rules of evidence are not arbitrary. They are not in themselves mere instruments of stratagem for the bar and of logical exercitation for the judiciary. As a whole and as a system, they are founded on rational purposes and practical experience. They are always reasoned, and usually reasonable. They have a right to exist, but not to be abused. As a system and as individual rules, they must be judged by themselves, and not by the improper consequences which the law of new trials has often caused to be attributed to their enforcement. That they have often seemed technical and inconsistent is due chiefly to the habit of ignoring the study of their reasons, — which nevertheless (as the ensuing pages attempt to exhibit) have been at all times copiously vouchsafed by the judges. That they are often difficult to apply is due mainly to their inherent nature, — to the possible applicability of scores of rules of exclusion at one and the same moment to one and the same offer of evidence. That they have in many respects been unpractical and unnecessary has been largely due to the occasional anachronous survival of rules which had arisen in a former epoch and had ceased to correspond to the new commercial and moral conditions, — such as the rule for attesting witnesses and the rule for disqualification by interest. But that they have gained, in great extent, the character of instruments of quibbling, chicane, and injustice, is due to other and extrinsic circumstances, and chiefly to the law of new trials. Like a false and artificial incubus — that spirit of darkness which visits and consorts with one against his will — the law of new trials has associated its reproach with the law of evidence. But this identity must be constantly repudiated, in our thought of the rules of evidence. We may then be satisfied to respect and preserve those rules for whatever is good in them; and we shall be the better able to perceive the extent of that good. Just as English legislators, after yielding to the twenty years' pleading of Romilly, discovered after all that the enjoyment of the right of property in chattels could survive, without the fancied protection of the penalty of death for larceny, — so we shall some day awake to be convinced that a system of necessary rules of evidence can exist and be obeyed, without affixing indiscriminately to every contravention of them the monstrous penalty of a new trial.

PART I.

RELEVANCY.

INTRODUCTORY:

GENERAL THEORY OF RELEVANCY.

CHAPTER III.

1. Kinds of Evidentiary Facts.

§ 24. Classification of Evidentiary Facts. There are two possible modes of proceeding for the purpose of producing persuasion on the part of the tribunal as to the Proposition at issue. The first is by the presentation of the thing itself as to which persuasion is desired. The second is the presentation of some independent fact by inference from which the persuasion is to be produced. Instances of the first are the production of a blood-stained knife; the exhibition of an injured limb; the viewing of premises by the jury; the production of a document. The second falls further into two classes, according as the basis of inference is (a) the assertion of a human being as to the existence of the thing in issue, or (b) any other fact; the one may be termed Testimonial or Direct Evidence, the other Circumstantial or Indirect Evidence.

The first mode above mentioned has been termed Immediate or Direct Real Evidence.[1] "Thus," says Mr. Best,[2] "where an offence or contempt is committed in presence of a tribunal, it has direct real evidence of the fact. So formerly, on an appeal of mayhem, the court would in some cases inspect the wound, in order to see whether it were a mayhem or not. . . . Immediate Real Evidence is where the thing which is the source of the evidence is present to the senses of the tribunal." A preferable term is Autoptic Proference;[3] this avoids the fallacy of attributing an evidential quality to that which is in fact nothing more nor less than the thing itself. With reference to this mode of producing persuasion no question of relevancy arises. Res ipsa loquitur. The thing proves or disproves itself. No logical process is employed; only an act of sensible apprehension occurs, — apprehension of the existence or non-existence of the thing as alleged. Bringing a knife into Court is in strictness not giving evidence of the knife's existence. It is a mode of enabling the Court to reach a conviction of the existence of the knife, and is in that sense a means of producing persuasion, yet it is not giving evidence in the sense that it is asking the Court to perform a process of inference,[4] and it therefore gives rise to no questions of relevancy.[5] There is direct apprehension and conviction as to the truth or falsity of the desired proposition.

[1] Mr. Bentham, in his Treatise on Judicial Evidence (tr. Dumont, London, 1825), p. 12, used "real evidence" to mean the inferences from a res; this of course is a different usage.

[2] Chamberlayne's Best on Evidence, 1893, §§ 196, 197.

Though the classes of things that can become the subject of autoptic proference are few, yet within those classes its use is common. In addition to jury views of land, the production of movables associated with a crime, and the exhibition of personal injuries, the perusal of documents is the most usual instance of its employment. Though a document is generally evidential only as being the assertion of its writer, yet when it becomes desirable and allowable to prove the terms of the assertion (i. e. when its existence becomes in itself a proposition), it is obvious that we must either have some one tell about its contents, which would be using testimonial evidence, or must infer its existence circumstantially from some other fact, or produce the document itself for inspection, which would be Autoptic Proference.

Furthermore, though no question of relevancy can arise with reference to Autoptic Proference, yet there may be and are special rules for safeguarding its employment and preventing its dangers. These auxiliary rules are examined under that subject (post, §§ 1157–1168). Moreover, though relevancy is not involved in autoptic proference, yet there are in other connections certain questions of relevancy which commonly arise when it is employed. Some of these are, (a) Whether it is permissible to infer from voice, features, and other outward appearances, to inward qualities; this is a question of the relevancy of the former to the latter; the outward appearances are the only things autoptically presented; (b) Whether a jury may infer the race of a person from his skin-color or his hair, or may infer paternity from resemblance, and the like; these again are questions of relevancy,

[3] The propriety of these various terms is further examined in dealing with that mode of proof, post, § 1150.

[4] It might be said that the Court is to use the fact of its sense-perception as a basis of inference to a judgment; but this is a distinction which cannot be accepted in the law of evidence, because practically the Court recognizes none such and takes the results of its senses as immediate and full knowledge.

[5] Of course, the knife might become the source of an inference, e. g. as to the nature of a wound; but in that aspect it is merely circumstantial evidence.

for the real question is whether we have a right to assume the physiological generalization that a peculiarity of features is any indication of race or of relationship; (c) Whether models, photographs, etc., may be exhibited; this involves usually the inquiry whether they are substantially correct reproductions of the original, and concerns the principle of testimonial trustworthiness. Still further, certain of the auxiliary rules and the rules of privilege may be involved; for example, (d) Whether an accused person or a plaintiff in a suit for bodily injuries may be compelled to exhibit his person or submit to tests; (e) Whether the exhibition of certain things should be forbidden when it involves indecencies or the likelihood of unduly exciting prejudice; (f) Whether at a jury's view the hearsay rule has been violated by the reception of unsworn testimony. These are some of the instances in which autoptic proference is employed, and yet the rule involved is but an instance of some general principle belonging in another place.[6]

§ 25. Distinction between Circumstantial and Testimonial Evidence. Aside from Autoptic Proference, then, all evidence must involve an inference from some Fact to the Proposition to be proved. The kinds of inferences, with regard to the material taken as their subject, fall naturally into two great classes; or, rather, a single special class of evidentiary facts separates itself from the mass and calls for a distinct treatment, attended as it is with uniform and peculiar qualities affecting its probative features. A separate treatment is inevitably demanded by these qualities, long recognized in experience and acknowledged by jurists. This special class of facts is the assertions of human beings regarded as the basis of inference to the propositions asserted by them. This may be called Testimonial Evidence;[1] Direct Evidence is an alternative term sanctioned by usage, though not so satisfactory in theory. All remaining facts form a class known as Circumstantial Evidence. The distinction has been thus stated:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, I, 13: "Where knowledge cannot be acquired by means of actual and personal observation, there are but two modes by which the existence of a bygone fact can be ascertained: 1st, By information derived either immediately or mediately from those who had actnal knowledge of the fact; or, 2dly, by means of inferences or conclnsions drawn from other facts connected with the principal fact which can be snfficiently established. In the first case, the inference is founded on a principle of faith in human veracity sanctioned by experience. In the second, the conclusion is one derived by the aids of experience and reason from the connection between the facts which are known and that which is unknown. In each case the inference is made by virtue of previous experience of the connection between the known and the disputed facts, although the grounds of such inference in the two cases materially differ."

[6] These varions principlee are considered in detail, post, §§ 1151–1168.

[1] The word "evidence" was until the middle of the 1700s used distinctively of testimonial evidence, — circumstantial evidence being either not reckoned with or else conceived of under the term "presumptione"; hence, in the trials of that period "an evidence" is used to mean "a witness": 1628, Coke upon Littleton, 282, b: ("Evidence, evidentia: This word in legall nnderstanding doth not only containe matter of record, . . . and writings nnder seale, . . . and other writings without seale, . . . which are called evidences, instrumenta; bnt in a larger sense it containeth also testimonia, the testimony of witnesses, and other proofes to be produced and given to a jury for the finding of any isane betweene the parties. And it is called evidence, becanse thereby the point in issue is to be made evident to the jury"); 1746, Lord Lovat's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 798; 1754, Canning's Trial, 19 id. 478, 488, 514, 580.

1872, Sir J. F. Stephen, Indian Evidence Act, 38: "It will be found upon examination that inferences employed in judicial inquiries fall under two heads: —

(1) Inferences from an assertion, whether oral or documentary, to the truth of the matter asserted;

(2) Inferences from facts, which upon the strength of assertions are believed to exist,[3] to facts of which the existence has not been so asserted.

. . . This is the distinction usually expressed by saying that all evidence is either direct or circumstantial. . . . The truth is that each inference depends upon precisely the same general theory. . . . The judge hears with his own ears the statements of the witnesses and sees with his own eyes the documents produced in court. His task is to infer from what he thus sees and hears the existence of facts which he neither sees nor hears."

1873, Gilpin, C. J., in State v. Carter, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 402, 410: "As a matter of course, and from necessity, all judicial evidence must be either direct or circumstantial. When we speak of a fact as established by direct or positive evidence, we mean that it has been testified to by witnesses as having come under the cognizance of their senses, and of the truth of which there seems to be no reasonable doubt or question; and when we speak of a fact as established by circumstantial evidence, we mean that the existence of it is fairly and reasonably to be inferred from other facts proved in the case."

The special tests of this distinction and the peculiar results which follow from the segregation of assertive or Testimonial Evidence will be examined under that topic (post, § 475). It is here necessary merely to call attention to the existence of the distinction and to the general nature and limits of the class first to be considered — Circumstantial Evidence. The term "circumstantial" is unfortunately but inevitably fixed upon us.[3] It must suffice here to take note that this class embraces all offered evidentiary facts not being assertions from which the truth of the matter asserted is desired to be inferred. The doubtful instances lying on the line between the two classes may be examined in connection with the assertive or testimonial class (post, § 475).

In the grouping of Circumstantial Evidence, difficulty has arisen from not keeping in mind that most circumstantial evidentiary facts must ultimately in turn become themselves a Proposition[4] and be proved by testimonial evidence, and also from confining the latter term to assertions of some main fact in issue. For example, the finding of a bloody knife upon the accused after [3] This, as will be seen, is too narrow; for the tribunal may learn the fact of its own knowledge, as by a jury's view or by judicial notice.

[3] An earlier term for this class was "presumptive evidence." The distinction between "presumption" in the sense of a mere circumstantial inference and in the sense of a rule of procedure affecting the duty of proof is dealt with elsewhere under Presumptions (post, § 2490). It may be noted here that the term is often met with in the sense of "inference," as applied to the probative value of ordinary circumstantial evidence, and as distinguishing it from testimonial evidence: 1810, Boyle, C. J., in Davis v. Curry, 2 Bibb 239 ("Evidence, whether written or oral, is either positive or presumptive. Positive evidence is the direct proof of the fact or point in issue; presumptive evidence consists in the proof of some other fact or facts from which the point in issue may be inferred"); 1873, Gilpin, C. J., in State v. Carter, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 402, 411 ("When the existence of the principal facts is deduced inferentially by a process of sound reasoning from facts or circumstances proved and established in the case, it is termed presumptive evidence"; and he later uses the phrase "circumstantial or presumptive evidence").

[4] For the distinction between a Proposition and an Evidentiary Fact, see ante, § 2.

a secret killing is a circumstance from which an important inference may be drawn; yet this fact of the finding must be proved by some person's assertion; here the special rules of assertive or testimonial evidence must be applied in receiving the assertion, and the ordinary rules of circumstantial relevancy in receiving the fact of finding, assuming it as proved by the assertion. But this mixture of both kinds is not necessary and inevitable. At one extreme, as in a jury's view of a corpse or in a matter of judicial notice, we may have a circumstance given us as the basis of inference without the intervention of an assertion. At the other extreme we may have assertions, as of the signing of a deed or of the perceived felonious abstraction of a bank-note, directly positing the main proposition of the pleadings, and needing no intervening inference, except from the fact of the assertion. But between these extremes lies the mass of ordinary evidence, for which at least two distinct steps of inference are required, — the inference from the fact of an assertion to the matter asserted, and then the inference from the matter asserted to another matter. Moreover, just as we may need even two or three inferences of the latter sort before reaching a main proposition of the pleadings, so (as in using hearsay) we may often need to use two inferences from assertions, — first from one assertion on the stand to the fact of the making of the extra-judicial assertion, and then from the latter to the truth of the matter asserted by it.

Now, so far as the principles of relevancy are concerned, it is apparent that it does not matter how we have come to our knowledge of these so-called "circumstances," i.e. things not assertions, — whether we get at them through believing assertions, or otherwise; what matters is the nature of the particular evidentiary fact in hand, whether it is assertive or circumstantial. In dealing with the probative value of the circumstantial class, we are to take the alleged circumstantial (or non-assertive) fact as assumedly proved, and then determine its relevancy. It is immaterial whether it has itself to be proved by testimony (as ordinarily) or by the tribunal's use of its own senses or existing knowledge (as occasionally).

§ 26. Relative Value of the two Classes. The rules of admissibility have nothing to say concerning the weight of evidence when once admitted. The relative weight of circumstantial and testimonial evidence, therefore, does not present itself in this place. Indeed, it can be said that there are no rules, in our system of evidence, prescribing for the jury the precise effect of any general or special class of evidence.[1] But the question has long been discussed, within and without the profession, whether circumstantial or testimonial evidence is relatively the more persuasive; and, rather to eradicate possible a priori misconceptions than to declare any positive rule of law, the judicial utterances have often dealt with this question:

1838, Mr. William Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 26: "The best writers, ancient and modern, on the subject of evidence, have concurred in treating circumstantial as inferior in cogency and effect to direct evidence; a conclusion which seems to follow necessarily from the very nature of the different kind of evidence.[2] But language of a directly contrary import has been so often used of late, by authorities of no mean note, as to have become almost proverbial.

[1] For a systematic and detailed survey of the considerations affecting weight of testimony, see Bentham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. VI, c. X (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 563).

"It has been said that 'circumstances are inflexible proofs; that witnesses may be mistaken or corrupted, but things can be neither.'[3] 'Circumstances,' says Paley, 'cannot lie.'[4] It is astonishing that sophisms like these should have passed current without animadversion. The 'circumstances' are assumed to be in every case established, beyond the possibility of mistake; and it is implied, that a circumstance established to be true, possesses some mysterious force peculiar to facts of a certain class. Now, a circumstance is neither more nor less than a minor fact, and it may be admitted of all facts, that they cannot lie; for a fact cannot at the same time exist and not exist: so that in truth the doctrine is merely the expression of a truism, that a fact is a fact. It may also be admitted that 'circumstances are inflexible proofs,' but assuredly of nothing more than of their own existence: so that this assertion is only a repetition of the same truism in different terms. It seems also to have been overlooked that circumstances and facts of every kind must be proved by human testimony; that although 'circumstances cannot lie,' the narrators of them may; and that, like witnesses of all other facts, they may be biased or mistaken. So far then, circumstantial possesses no advantage over direct evidence.

"A distinguished statesman and orator has advanced in unqualified terms the proposition, supported, he alleges, by the learned, that 'when circumstantial proof is in its greatest perfection, that is, when it is most abundant in circumstances, it is much superior to positive proof.'[5] Paley has said, with more caution, that 'a concurrence of well authenticated circumstances composes a stronger ground of assurance than positive testimony, unconfirmed by circumstances, usually affords.'[6] Mr. Baron Legge, upon the trial of Mary Blandy for the murder of her father by poison,[7] told the jury that where 'a violent presumption necessarily arises from circumstances, they are more convincing and satisfactory than any other kind of evidence, because facts cannot lie.' Mr. Justice Buller, in his charge to the jury in Captain Donellan's case, declared, 'that a presumption which necessarily arises from circumstances is very often more convincing and more satisfactory than any other kind of evidence, because it is not within the reach and compass of human abilities to invent a train of circumstances which shall be so connected together as to amount to a proof of guilt, without affording opportunities of contradicting a great part if not all of those circumstances.'[8]

"It is obvious that the doctrine laid down in these several passages is propounded in language which not only does not accurately state the question, but implies a fallacy, and that extreme cases — the strongest ones of circumstantial, and the weakest of positive evidence — have been selected for the illustration and support of a general position. 'A presumption which necessarily arises from circumstances,' cannot admit of dispute, and requires no corroboration; but then it cannot in fairness be contrasted with and opposed to positive testimony, unless of a nature equally cogent and infallible. If evidence be so strong as necessarily to produce certainty and conviction, it matters not by what kind of evidence the effect is produced; and the intensity of the proof must be precisely the same, whether the evidence be direct or circumstantial. It is not intended to deny that circumstantial evidence affords a safe and satisfactory ground of assurance and belief; nor that in many individual instances it may be superior in proving power to other individual

[2] Menochius De Præsumptionibus, lib. 1. quest. 1. 6; Mascardus De Probationibus, vol. I, quest. 8. n. 8; Burnett on the C. L. of Scotland, p. 506; Starkie's Law of Evidence, vol. 1, pp. 515, 521 (2d ed.). The Theory of Presumptive Proof; Benth. Jud. Ev. vol. III, c. XV, s. IV.

[3] Burnett on the C. L. of Scotland, p. 523.

[4] Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, b. VI, c. IX.

[5] Burke's Works, ut supra, vol. II, p. 624.

[6] Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, b. VI, c. IX.

[7] State Trials, vol. XVIII, p. 1187.

[8] Gurney's Report of the Trial of John Donellan, Esq., for the wilful murder of Sir Theodosius Edward Allesley Broughton, Bart., at the Assize at Warwick, March 30th, 1781.

cases of proof by direct evidence. But a judgment based upon circumstantial evidence cannot, in any case be more satisfactory than when the same result is produced by direct evidence, free from suspicion of bias or mistake.

"Perhaps no single circumstance has been so often considered as certain and unequivocal in its effect, as the anno-domini water-mark usually contained in the fabric of writing-paper, and in many instance it has led to the exposure of fraud in the propounding of forged as genuine instruments. But it is beyond any doubt (and several instances of the kind have recently occurred) that issues of paper have taken place bearing the water-mark of the year succeeding that of its distribution, — a striking exemplification of the fallacy of some of the arguments which have been remarked upon. How often has it been iterated in such cases, that circumstances are inflexible facts, and facts cannot lie!

"The proper effect of circumstantial, as compared with direct evidence, was thus more accurately stated by Lord Chief Baron Macdonald. 'When circumstances connect themselves closely with each other, when they form a large and strong body, so as to carry conviction to the minds of a jury, it may be proof of a more satisfactory sort than that which is direct. In some lamentable instances it has been known that a short story has been got by heart, by two or three witnesses; they have been consistent with themselves, they have been consistent with each other, swearing positively to a fact, which fact has turned out afterwards not to be true. It is almost impossible for a variety of witnesses, speaking to a variety of circumstances, so to concert a story, as to impose upon a jury by a fabrication of that sort, so that where it is cogent, strong, and powerful, where the witnesses do not contradict each other, or do not contradict themselves, it may be evidence more satisfactory than even direct evidence; and there are more instances than one where that has been the case.'[9] In another case the same learned judge said, 'where the proof arises from a number of circumstances, which we cannot conceive to be fraudulently brought together to bear upon one point, that is less fallible than under some circumstances direct evidence may be.'"[10]

1846, Gibson, C. J., in Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. St. 269, 271: "No witness has been produced who saw the act committed; and hence it is urged for the prisoner, that the evidence is only circumstantial, and consequently entitled to a very inferior degree of credit, if to any credit at all. But that consequence does not necessarily follow. Circumstantial evidence is, in the abstract, nearly, though perhaps not altogether, as strong as positive evidence; in the concrete, it may be infinitely stronger. A fact positively sworn to by a single eye-witness of blemished character, is not so satisfactorily proved, as is a fact which is the necessary consequence of a chain of other facts sworn to by many witnesses of undoubted credibility. . . . The only difference between positive and circumstantial evidence is, that the former is more immediate, and has fewer links in the chain of connection between the premises and conclusion; but there may be perjury in both. A man may as well swear falsely to an absolute knowledge of a fact, as to a number of facts from which, if true, the fact on which the question of innocence or guilt depends must inevitably follow. No human testimony is superior to doubt. The machinery of criminal justice, like every other production of man, is necessarily imperfect, but you are not therefore to stop its wheels. Because men have been scalded to death or torn to pieces by the bursting of boilers, or mangled by wheels on a railroad, you are not to lay aside the steam-engine. Innocent men have doubtless been convicted and executed on circumstantial evidence; but innocent men have sometimes been convicted and executed on what is called positive proof. What then? Such convictions are accidents which must be encountered; and the innocent victims of them have perished for the common good, as much as soldiers who have perished in battle. All evidence is more or less circumstantial, the difference being only in the degree; and it is sufficient for the purpose when it excludes disbelief; that is, actual, and not technical disbelief; for he who is to pass on the question is not at liberty to disbelieve as a juror while he believes as a man. It is enough that his conscience is clear. Certain cases of circumstantial proofs to be found in the books, in which innocent persons were convicted, have been pressed on your attention. These, however, are few in number, and they occurred in a period of some hundreds of years, in a country whose criminal code made a great variety of offences capital. The wonder is, that there have not been more. They are constantly resorted to in capital trials to frighten juries into a belief that there should be no conviction on merely circumstantial evidence. But the law exacts a conviction wherever there is legal evidence to show the prisoner's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; and circumstantial evidence is legal evidence."

[9] Rex v. Patch, Surrey Spring Assizes, 1806.
[10] Rex v. Smith, for Arson, Old Bailey, June 15, 1813; Shorthand Report by Gurney.

1850, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 311: "Each of these modes of proof has its advantages and disadvantages; it is not easy to compare their relative value. The advantage of positive evidence is, that it is the direct testimony of a witness to the fact to be proved, who, if he speaks the truth, saw it done; and the only question is, whether he is entitled to belief. The disadvantage is, that the witness may be false and corrupt, and that the case may not afford the means of detecting his falsehood. But, in a case of circumstantial evidence where no witness can testify directly to the fact to be proved, it is arrived at by a series of other facts, which by experience have been found so associated with the fact in question, that in the relation of cause and effect, they lead to a satisfactory and certain conclusion; as when footprints are discovered after a recent snow, it is certain that some animated being has passed over the snow since it fell; and, from the form and number of the footprints, it can be determined with equal certainty, whether they are those of a man, a bird, or a quadruped. Circumstantial evidence, therefore, is founded on experience and observed facts and coincidences, establishing a connection between the known and proved facts and the fact sought to be proved. The advantages are, that, as the evidence commonly comes from several witnesses and different sources, a chain of circumstances is less likely to be falsely prepared and arranged, and falsehood and perjury are more likely to be detected and fail of their purpose. The disadvantages are, that a jury has not only to weigh the evidence of facts, but to draw just conclusions from them; in doing which, they may be led by prejudice or partiality, or by want of due deliberation and sobriety of judgment, to make hasty and false deductions; a source of error not existing in the consideration of positive evidence."

1851, Carruthers, S. J., in Coles v. Perry, 7 Tex. 109, 115, 168: "I do not yield unqualified assent to the proposition, as a rule of law, that circumstantial evidence is never to be weighed against positive testimony. There may be cases, and there are cases every day occurring, where the testimony of a witness testifying positively to an asserted fact as transpiring within his view (and honestly testifying, too) is disproved and falsified by proof of facts and circumstances known to exist, and the existence of which is wholly incompatible with the fact deposed to. In such cases, circumstantial evidence outweighs positive testimony; and I think the present one of those cases. The saying often quoted, but with the most perverse application, both in ordinary conversation and in argument at the bar, that 'circumstances never lie, but a witness may,' is, when stated with legal precision, a truth." [11]

2. General Considerations affecting Relevancy.

§ 27. Practical Necessities of Legal Controversy in general. When a fact is offered as evidence, the very offering of it is an implication that it

[11] See also the earlier but very instructive exposition, in 1785, by Dr. William Paley, Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, b. VI, c. IX, par. beginning, "There are two popular maxims"; and the striking passage in the argument of Attorney-General Knowlton, in Com. v. Border, Mass., 1898, quoted in 27 Amer. Law Rev. [illegible] has some bearing on the proposition at issue, — that it tends naturally to produce a conviction about that proposition. The situation is thus in its elements the same as when the persons engaged are not occupied in a legal controversy. One might suppose that the question would be essentially one of the ordinary laws of reasoning, whether it were to be decided, as here, by a judge or a jury, or by the audience of a lecturer, or by a policeman notified of an alleged misdemeanor in his district, or by a class in rhetoric. But the application of the laws of reasoning is here attended with peculiar consideration not existing for any investigation but a judicial one.

(1) The first consideration is that, so far as the tribunal can attempt expressly to deal at all with logical questions, it can do so only roughly and loosely and in a general way. To begin with, in courts as elsewhere, while the laws of reasoning must underlie inevitably all the operations of reasoning, they are, as a rule, followed instinctively and not with conscious skill. Little attempt is made deliberately to recognize or to apply them. The process of demonstration and decision in legal tribunals is an employment of the principles of reasoning upon a grander scale than is found in any other activity of life; yet the methods of logic are seldom alluded to in terms by judges or by advocates. Again, wherever a rule or a principle may be adopted in the effort to employ the recognized tests of reasoning, no attempt can be made to furnish ideal tests. Details, refinements, contingencies, exact distinctions, which the ideal principle would demand, may be and must often be neglected in order that the test may be serviceable. Perhaps it may be necessary to take a mean of convenience, and to lay down a specific and unshifting rule which will sometimes operate arbitrarily or unequally. Where general principles are declared, they may satisfy themselves with reaching fairness in the main. Finally, the logical powers employed must be those of everyday life, not those of the trained logician or scientist. The conclusions and tests of everyday experience must constantly control the standards of legal logic. Moreover, the possibilities of fraud must exclude much that is probative but capable of abuse. These considerations rest on the circumstances of the situation, patent to all. In the main, they are created by the need of speed in the settlement of litigation, and the impossibility of expecting aught else in a proceeding where parties, witnesses, advocates, jury, and judge, represent so many grades of training and accomplishment. The principles of legal proof are in fact affected by these just as we should have expected them to be. This feature of the legal rules of relevancy has been emphasized, from different points of view, by two of the most original thinkers in the law of evidence:

1872, Sir J. F. Stephen, Indian Evidence Act, 33: "The leading differences between judicial investigations and inquiries into physical nature are as follows: 1. In physical inquiries the number of relevant facts is generally unlimited, and is capable of indefinite increase by experiments. In judicial investigations the number of relevant facts is limited by circumstances, and is incapable of being increased. 2. Physical inquiries can be prolonged for any time that may be required in order to obtain full proof of the conclusion reached, and when a conclusion has been reached, it is always liable to review if fresh facts are discovered, or if any objection is made to the process by which it was arrived at. In judicial investigations it is necessary to arrive at a definite result in a limited time; and when that result is arrived at, it is final and irreversible with exceptions too rare to require notice. 3. In physical inquiries the relevant facts are usually established by testimony open to no doubt, because they relate to simple facts which do not affect the passions, which are observed by trained observers who are exposed to detection if they make mistakes, and who could not tell the effect of misrepresentation, if they were disposed to be fraudulent. In judicial inquiries the relevant facts are generally complex. They affect the passions in the highest degree. They are testified to by untrained observers who are generally not open to contradiction, and are aware of the bearing of the facts which they allege upon the conclusion to be established. 4. On the other hand, approximate generalizations are more useful in judicial than they are in scientific inquiries, because in the case of judicial inquiries every man's individual experience supplies the qualifications and exceptions necessary to adjust general rules to particular facts, which is not the case in regard to scientific inquiries. 5. Judicial inquiries being limited in extent, the process of reaching as good a conclusion as is to be got out of the materials is far easier than the process of establishing a scientific conclusion with complete certainty, though the conclusion arrived at is less satisfactory."

1898, Professor J. B. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 271–275: "It is a proper qualification when we use the phrase legal reasoning; not because, as compared with reasoning in general, it calls into play any different faculties or involves any new principles or methods, or is the creature of technical precepts; but because in law, as elsewhere, in adjusting old and universal methods to the immediate purposes in hand, special limitations, exclusions, and qualifications have to be taken into account. . . . This does not, like mathematical reasoning, have to do merely with ideal truth, with mere mental conceptions; it is not aiming at demonstration and ideally exact results; it deals with probabilities and not with certainties; it works in an atmosphere, and not in a vacuum; it has to allow for friction, for accident and mischance. Nor is it, like natural science, occupied merely with objective truth. It is concerned with human conduct, and all its elements of fraud, inadvertence, wilfulness, and uncertainty. Nor, as in history, is the purpose in hand merely that of ascertaining and setting forth the facts, or the habits, of human life and action. . . . The peculiar character and scope of legal reasoning is determined by its purely practical aims and the necessities of its procedure and machinery. Litigation imports, for the most part, as we have seen, a contest, and adversaries. It has in it, therefore, a personal element, and it requires not merely a consideration of what is just in general, but of what is just as between these adversaries. It has often to be conducted with the aid of a tribunal whose peculiarities in point of number and of physical and mental capacity, and whose danger of being misled, must constantly be considered. It must shape itself to various other exigencies of a practical kind, such as the time that it is possible to allow to any particular case, the reasonable limitations of the number of witnesses, the opportunities for reply, and the chance to correct errors. It must adjust its processes to general ends, so as generally to promote justice, and to discourage evil, to maintain long-established rights, and the existing governmental order. The judicial office is really one of administration. . . . While these are some of the chief characteristics of legal reasoning, it will be noticed that they are only, in the nature of them, so many reasonable accommodations of the general process to particular subject-matters and particular aims. Amidst them all the great characteristics of the art of reasoning and the laws of thought still remain constant. As regards the main methods in hand, they are still those untechnical ways of all sound reasoning, of the logical process in its normal and ordinary manifestations; and the rules that govern it here are the general rules that govern it everywhere, the ordinary rules of human thought and human experience, to be sought in the ordinary sources, and not in law books."

§ 28. Judge and Jury as a Tribunal; Relevancy, as distinguished from Minimum Probative Value. (2) The second condition peculiar to litigious proof is that the question with which the law of evidence in the strict sense has to do (that is, the rules regulating the production of evidence by opposing parties) is one of Admissibility, not of Demonstration or Proof (ante, § 12), — whether a particular fact is fit to be considered, and not whether it suffices for a demonstration. For example, the existence of a habit of doing a particular act under certain circumstances points forward to a doing of the act under those circumstances on a particular occasion. This is not a demonstration that the act was done, for the influence of the habit may have been counteracted by other considerations; there is not an invariable sequence. The jury may ultimately decide that the habit, with all the other circumstances, is not adequate to prove the doing; though the judge may at the outset have ruled that the course of conduct was at least sufficiently regular to have some value as an indication. The latter question is one of Admissibility, and under our system is a preliminary one for the judge only. The former question is one of completeness of proof; it is the final one, and is for the jury. Thus a peculiar and otherwise anomalous class of questions is raised. While the historian or the naturalist may as he pleases set aside and preserve data of the slightest helpfulness, or may pass judgment upon his facts immediately and finally, the legal tribunal is, with us, divided in function; the judge passes first upon the evidence and sets aside the tidbits for the jury; that which is not worth considering, for one reason or another affecting its value, never reaches the auxiliary functionaries, the jurors. This process, then, of determining the Admissibility of evidence, as distinguished from demonstrative and conclusive quality, is from the point of view of Logic a decidedly unique process, worked out clearly in no other department of life. Little considered by our logicians, it is a commonplace in the judicial experience. Its owes its persistence and emphasis (peculiar as it is to the Anglo-American legal system) in some part, no doubt, to the tradition of our practice which looks almost solely to the parties in a case for such evidence as may be mustered, leaving the judge almost entirely passive; for the question of the uselessness, or the contrary, of the spending of time on evidence offered is thus constantly required to be raised and settled at the outset. But chiefly it owes its origin, maintenance, and system to the separation of function between judge and jury. If this separation of judge and jury had not existed as it has, with all its history, nothing marked would probably have developed. Under the Continental systems, in which the jury is but a recent borrowing, little of the sort appears.

(a) This second feature, to some extent, eventuates merely in another phase of the first feature, the rough and practical quality already mentioned, noticeable in the whole law of probative value; for the Court will of course allow to be considered only such evidence as is worth submitting to men who will judge only by the most common and practicable tests. But to a more important extent the effect is to require a generally higher degree of probative value for all evidence to be submitted to a jury than would be asked in ordinary reasoning. The judge, in his efforts to prevent the jury from being satisfied by matters of slight value, capable of being exaggerated by prejudice and hasty reasoning, has constantly seen fit to exclude matter which does not rise to a clearly sufficient degree of value. In other words, legal relevancy denotes, first of all, something more than a minimum of probative value. Each single piece of evidence must have a plus value.[1] This feature is seen in the form of scores of detailed rules, applying and shaping the fundamental principles of probative value, i. e. the rules of admissibility with reference to simple relevancy. There has been a raising of the standard of probative value all along the line, — very unequal in its effects, because it has been done without system, and with numerous inconsistencies; yet almost always done in pursuance of this spirit of safeguarding the decision of the jury, and on the whole with good practical results.

1794, Mr. Edmund Burke, Report to the House of Commons, Debrett's Hastings' Trial, 1796, Part VII, Suppl. p. xliii, 31 Parl. Hist. 357: "In the trials below, the Jndges decide on the competency of the evidence before it goes to the jury, and (uuder the correctives in the use of their discretion, state i hefore in this report) with great propriety and wisdom. Juries are taken promiscuous.. from the mass of the people; they are composed of men who in many instances, in most perhaps, were uever concerned in any causes, judicially or otherwise, before the time of their service. They have generally no previous preparation or possible knowledge of the matter to be tried; and they decide in a space of time too short for auy nice or critical disquisition. These Judges, therefore, of uecessity must forestall the evideuce where there is a doubt on its competence, and indeed observe much ou its credibility, or the most dreadful consequences might follow. The institntion of juries, if not thus qualified, could not exist."

1837, Bosanquet, J., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 375: "[The Ecclesiastical Courts] are constituted upon principles very differeut from those which regulate the courts of commou law. Where judges are authorized to deal both with the facts and the law, a much larger discretion with respect to the reception of evidence may uot unreasonahly be allowed than in courts of commou law, where the evideuce, if received by the judge, must necessarily be submitted entire to the jnry. By the rules of evideuce established in the courts of law, circumstances of great moral weight are often excluded, from which much assistance might in particular cases he afforded iu coming to a just conclusion, but which are uevertheless withheld from the cousideratiou of the jury upou general principles, lest they should produce an undue influeuce upon the minds of persons nnaccustomed to consider the limitations and restrictions which legal views npou the subject would impose." [2]

1898, Professor J. B. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 2: "The very structure of the system thus produced points to the reasou, wheu we observe its constant, anxious, and over-anxious eudeavor to prevent the trihunal to which the evidence is principally addressed from heing coufused and misled, and from dealing with questions which it has no right to deal with. It might seem strange and uot worth while to keep alive so long a tribunal which has ueeded so mnch watchiug and so mauy safeguards, if oue did not recall the immense persistence of legal institutions and usages, as well as the deep political significance of the jury and its relation to what is most valued in the national history and traditions of the English race. It is this institution of the jury which accounts for the common-law system of evidence, — an institution which English-speaking people have had and used, in one or another department of their public affairs, ever since the Conquest."

[1] The degree of admissible probative valne is more particularly considered, for circumstantial evidence, post, § 38, and for testimonial evidence, post, §§ 475–478.

[2] The opinions of other jndges in the same report, and in the judgments delivered on appeal, in 5 Cl. & F. 670, point this out with similar tenor; thus, Lord Brougham, iu Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & F. 670, 769 ("From the pecnliarity of the tribunal of the courts of commou law have arisen nine parts out of ten of the peculiarities of our law of evidence").

§ 29. Same: Relevancy, as distinguished from Weight or Proof. (b) On the other hand, the judges constantly find it necessary to warn us that their function, in determining Relevancy, is not that of final arbiters, but merely of preliminary testers, i. e. that the evidentiary fact offered does not need to have strong, full, superlative, probative value, does not need to involve demonstration or to produce persuasion by its sole and intrinsic force, but merely to be worth consideration by the jury. It is for the jury to give it the appropriate weight in effecting persuasion. The rule of law which the judge employs is concerned merely with admitting the fact through the evidentiary portal. The judge thus warns the opponent of the evidence that he is not entitled to complain of its lack of absolute demonstrative power; a mere capacity to help in demonstration is enough for its admission:

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 157 (No. 16, § VI): "The general rules of law concerning the admission and sufficiency of evidence, and the particular conclusion which a jury may draw from the evidence before them in a particular case, are two things which, as I have already more than once observed, whilst they differ most essentially in their nature and principle, are very subject to be confounded, and which therefore in every discussion should be most carefully kept distinct."

1837, Tindal, C. J., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 407: "The judge who presides at the trial, by admitting this evidence, is not determining, nor has he any right to determine, the question of the [testamentary] competency of the testator. That is a question which the jury are to decide, after the termination of a long course of conflicting evidence. All that the judge has to determine is whether a particular piece of evidence is at a particular period of the cause admissible for the consideration of the jury as the matter then stands."

1846, Lord Brougham, in Irish Society v. Derry, 12 Cl. & F. 641, 673: "The main error which ran through the argument of the very learned and ingenious counsel . . . was that they seemed to confound the purpose for which evidence was tendered and admitted, with the admissibility of that evidence. The evidence tendered to prove any point may be perfectly inadequate to prove that point. It may be such that if the learned judge put it to the jury, as sufficient proof, his directions to them upon that point might well be a subject of exception. Yet the same evidence might be perfectly well admitted and received for such purposes to which it was strictly and correctly applicable. . . Suppose that in a cause at Nisi Prius, the defendant produces a letter under my hand; that letter is received in evidence, though it may be very true it does not prove the fact for which purpose the defendant put it in. If the judge refuses to receive it, his direction is liable to be excepted against for that refusal. If he receives and states erroneously to the jury that it proves the point which it does not, his direction is liable to be excepted against upon another ground. But still it may be properly receivable in evidence, though it does not prove the matter, to prove which it was offered in evidence."

1829, Marshall, C. J., in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Pet. 44: "This blending of an objection to the admissibility of evidence in the same application which questions its sufficiency is said to be not only unusual, but to confound propositions distinct in themselves. . . . It is undoubtedly true that questions respecting the admissibility of evidence are entirely distinct from those which respect its sufficiency or effect. They arise in different stages of the trial, and cannot with strict propriety be propounded at the same time."[1]

Thus, the judicial tests of Relevancy have this peculiar quality, in contrast with that of proof or evidence in general or in any other department of investigation:

(1) The required probative value is somewhat higher than it need otherwise have been, because the purpose is to select only such material as is worth laying before the jury;

(2) The required probative value, on the other hand, is far shorter than full proof, because the judge merely puts upon the material its ticket of admission as relevant, and leaves the weight, or final persuasive effect, for the jury to determine.

3. Modes of Inference and Types of Argument.

Two preliminary matters remained to be examined: 1. What is the logical form of inference or argument[2] employed in the use of litigious evidence? 2. What are the logical requirements, if any, as sanctioned by the Courts?

§ 30. Form of Argument is Inductive. The process of adducing evidence and passing upon probative value is and must be based ultimately on the canons of ordinary reasoning, whether explicitly or implicitly employed. It is therefore necessary to review the distinction which Logic makes between the two great types of Argument[1] or Proof — the Deductive and the Inductive forms. Modern Logic looks at this distinction without prejudice. Its tendency is to accept both types as capable of reduction to a single one. Nevertheless the distinction is a practical and substantial one, particularly in litigious proof. It is set forth with clearness and brevity by an eminent authority:

1884, Professor Alfred Sidgwick, Fallacies, A View of Logic from the Practical Side, 212 ff.: "The real foundation of Proof is always the recognition of resemblance and difference between things or events known and observed, and those which are on their trial, — whether such recognition is based (1) on knowledge already reached and formulated in names or propositions or (2) on direct observation and experiment. In proportion as we openly and distinctly refer to known principles (already generalized knowledge) is Proof deductive; in proportion as we rapidly and somewhat dimly frame new principles for ourselves from the cases observed is Proof inductive, empirical, or (in its loosest form) analogical. . . . The whole history of the rise and growth of knowledge (it has been also already remarked) is a record of fruitful rivalry and interaction between two opposite

[1] So also: 1840, Verplanck, Sen., in Mayor v. Pentz, 24 Wend. 676 ("That distinction between admissibility and credibility which our jurisprudence has always maintained"); 1897, Brickell, C. J., in Nelms v. Steiner, 113 Ala. 562, 22 So. 435. As early as 1745 Chief Justice Willes had declared that "the distinction between the competency and credit of a witness is a known distinction" (Omichund v. Barker, 3 Atk. 21); but the first emphasis on it for evidence in general seems to have been given in Mr. Burke's Report, quoted supra, § 28.

For the distinction between the admissibility of a particular piece of evidence, and the judicial control over the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole to go to the jury, see post, §§ 2488, 2494.

[2] "Argument" is here used in the logician's sense of a "proposed inference," not in the sense of § 1, ante.

[1] See n. 2, § 29, ante.

processes. Observation of facts has demanded theory — statement of 'laws' or uniformities — to explain, and even to name, the things and events observed; theory in its turn has always been more or less liable to purging criticism of 'fact.' . . .

"Strictly speaking all Proof, so far as really proof, is deductive. That is to say, unless and until a supposed truth can be brought under the shadow of some more certain truth, it is self-supporting or circular. Unless we have some more comprehensive and better-tested generalization within the sweep of which to bring our thesis, we reach no foundation broader than itself; no assurance beyond what may be derived from the fact that nothing has yet been found to contradict the theory. For two elements, express or implied, are required for all rationalization: (1) a Principle or abstract indication (an assertion that a certain sign is trustworthy); (2) an Application of such Principle, or an assertion that the sign is present in the case or cases contemplated by the Thesis. In other words all rationalization may be represented syllogistically. . . . Just as Explanation always demands a reference to some wider Generality than that which is to be explained, so Proof always demands a reference to some wider Generality than that which is to be proved. To explain and to prove consist essentially in this. Both are forms of 'rationalization.' But there is yet a meaning in the distinction [between inductive and deductive], and, with certain limitations and apologies, I propose to make some use of it.

"Although the dependence of any Thesis on its Reason must be rationalized — i. e. must have the underlying principle made clear — before the testing operation can be called complete, yet in regard to special dangers it makes considerable difference whether that principle is at first definitely apprehended or not, — whether (as it is commonly expressed) the Proof professes to rely (1) upon laws known or supposed to be true, or (2) upon facts observed or supposed to be observed. We must distinguish, then, as far as possible, between that kind of Proof which rests openly and distinctly upon already generalized knowledge — Deductive Proof — and that which rests upon what may be loosely described as 'isolated facts' or 'perception of resemblance and difference' or 'observation and experiment' . . . or however the phrase may run, — that which is commonly known in its highest form as Inductive Proof, and in its lowest form as the Argument from Analogy. The required limitations in preserving the distinction appear to be, in the first place, a clear recognition that although in Induction the Principle or Law connecting the cases is in the case of Inference commonly dropped out of sight, or at least left highly indistinct, yet the whole cogency of Inductive Proof depends upon the extent to which such principle is first rendered definite and then confronted with observable or admitted fact. . . . The second difficulty in preserving the distinction lies in the fact that as a rule the Empirical and Deductive processes are found in combination, both being employed on the same subject-matter. . . . These two considerations make it of course extremely difficult in practice to label every argument at once with one or the other name. Sometimes, as where the Reason is a direct statement of the Principle itself, or again where it consists of a record of some experiment, no hesitation need practically be felt as to where the danger lies; but in a large number of cases we have no means of deciding whether the argument may best be classed as empirical or deductive or both. . . . But, because the distinction breaks down when pressure is put upon it, we need not consider it wholly worthless. It possesses a solid core of applicability, and if we can be content to use it as a rough guide in finding the weak point of an argument, much value may still be extracted from it in economy of time. . . . However we choose to name the two different kinds of arguments, the distinction between them has a certain real importance, as already shown; and all that is intended to be done with it is to recognize that so far as the given argument may be seen to belong to one or the other class, so far we are already on the track of special dangers."

A brief examination will show that in the offering of evidence in Court the form of argument is always inductive. Suppose, to prove a charge of murder, evidence is offered of the defendant's fixed design to kill the deceased. The form of the argument is: "A planned to kill B; therefore, A probably did kill B." It is clear that we have here no semblance of a syllogism. The form of argument is exactly the same when we argue: "Yesterday, Dec. 31, A slipped on the sidewalk and fell; therefore, the sidewalk was probably coated with ice"; or, "Today A, who was bitten by a dog yesterday, died in convulsions; therefore, the dog probably had hydrophobia." So with all other legal evidentiary facts. We may argue: "Last week the witness A had a quarrel with the defendant B; therefore, A is probably biassed against B"; "A was found with a bloody knife in B's house; therefore, A is probably the murderer of B"; "After B's injury at A's machinery, A repaired the machinery; therefore, A probably acknowledged that the machinery was negligently defective"; "A, an adult of sound mind and senses, and apparently impartial, was present at an affray between B and C, and testifies that B struck first; therefore, it is probably true that B did strike first." In all these cases, we take a single or isolated fact, and upon it base immediately an inference as to the proposition in question.

It may be replied, however, that in all the above instances, the argument is implicitly based upon an understood law or generalization, and is thus capable of being expressed in the deductive or syllogistic form. Thus, in the first instance above, is not the true form: "Men's fixed designs are probably carried out; A had a fixed design to kill B; therefore, A probably carried out his design and did kill B"? There are two answers to this. (1) It has just been seen that every inductive argument is at least capable of being transmuted into and stated in the deductive form, by forcing into prominence the implied law or generalization on which it rests more or less obscurely. Thus it is nothing peculiar to litigious argument that this possibility of turning it into deductive form exists here also. It is not a question of what the form might be — for all inductive may be turned into deductive forms —, but of what it is, as actually employed; and it is actually put forward in inductive form. (2) Even supposing this transmutation to be a possibility, it would still be undesirable to make the transmutation for the purpose of testing probative value; because it would be useless. We should ultimately come to the same situation as before. Thus, in one of the instances above: "A repaired machinery after the accident; therefore, A was conscious of a negligent defect in it"; suppose we turn this into deductive form: "People who make such repairs show a consciousness of negligence; A made such repairs; therefore, A was conscious of negligence." We now have an argument perfectly sound deductively, i. e. if the premises be conceded. But it remains for the Court to declare whether it accepts the major premise, and so the Court must now take it up for examination, and the proponent of the evidence appears as its champion and his argument becomes: "The fact that people make such repairs indicates (shows, proves, probably shows, etc.) that they are conscious of negligence." But here we come again, after all, to an inductive form of argument. The consciousness of negligence is to be inferred from the fact of repairs, — just as the presence of electricity in the clouds was inferred by Franklin from the shock through the kite-string, i. e. by a purely inductive form of reasoning. So with all other evidence when resolved into the deductive form; the transmutation is useless, because the Court's attention is merely transferred from the syllogism as a whole to the validity of the inference contained in the major premise; which presents itself again in inductive form. For all practical purposes, then, it is sufficient to treat the use of litigious evidentiary facts as inductive in form.

§ 31. Practical Requirements of the Argument. The next inquiry is, What are the peculiar dangers of the argument, the loopholes for error, the opportunities for false inference? By ascertaining these, we shall learn what safeguards or tests may be expected to be imposed by the Courts before admitting the evidence at all, and what opportunities of counter-argument are offered to the opponent.

These peculiar dangers and necessities are thus set forth by the same eminent authority:

1884, Professor Alfred Sidgwick, Fallacies, 270: "There is at bottom one primary source of fallacy in the inductive argument, call it by whatever name may be most convenient. We may name it, for instance, the danger of overlooking plurality of causes, or of neglecting possible chance or counteraction, or the possibility of unknown antecedents, or of arguing either post hoc ergo propter hoc or per enumerationem simplicem, or of neglecting to exclude alternative possibilities, or of forgetting that facts may bear more than one interpretation, or of stating the law too widely, or of failing to see below the surface, or — perhaps on the whole the best of all — of unduly neglecting points of difference. . . . [The form of argument is] a case or cases brought forward of which such law is asserted to be the best explanation. If, then, some better explanation is possible, the theory as stated is impeachable. . . . By the 'best' explanation is meant . . . that solitary one out of all possible hypotheses which, while explaining all the facts already in view, is narrowed, limited, hedged, or qualified, sufficiently to guard in the best possible way against undiscovered exceptions. . . . Hence, the 'best' explanation of the facts A and B and C is that explanation which, while neglecting certain points of difference among them, and thus forming some generalization, neglects only those differences which are 'unessential.' The best explanation of (i. e. generalization from) one solitary sequence observed is that which neglects only its unessential elements or features. . . . It is in every case, then, through undue neglect of the essential difference between the specific case or cases observed and the wider genus to which the assertion professes to refer, that we rise to a generalization not sufficiently guarded against possible exceptions. . . . All positive proof depends . . . on the care, the precautions with which observation has been interpreted and experiment conducted. So far only as these exclude alternative possibilities are they of real value. . . . Because all positive assertion can only justify itself . . . when mistakes have been either one by one eliminated or in a body prevented, the burden of doubt to be removed by evidence consists essentially in the group of alternative theories remaining undiscarded. . . . The important point is, always, to show that all other possible theories are weighed in the balance and found wanting, — that is to say, that all precautions have been taken against that crudest kind of unchecked generalization which the least trained mind possesses in the greatest abundance. This objection against a theory, that alternative theories are not yet discarded, appears, however, more directly applicable, more fruitful of results, against a concrete or an abstract-concrete thesis than against a directly abstract one. . . .

And the right of the theory chosen, over all its possible rivals, depends entirely upon the depth of our insight into the conditions under which the experiment or observation was really made. This is the main lesson of Logic as regards Induction. . . .[1] These alternatives have to be faced as possible explanations of each observed case; and the immediate question in each case is, What certainty can we obtain that the alternative chosen is the right one out of all those conceivable? The methods of Inductive Proof may be viewed as attempts to answer this question."

The peculiar danger, then, of Inductive Proof is that there may be other explanations than the desired one for the fact taken as the basis of proof. But in the study of Logic we are concerned with discovering the defects of a mode of Proof, while, in judicial rulings upon evidence, we are concerned (ante, § 29) merely with the propriety of admitting the fact at all, — with its quality as a possible Inference, not as absolute Proof. What are the safeguards and requirements and opportunities, then, which are suggested to us for this peculiar judicial process by the nature of the inductive argument? The Courts cannot evade the regular and necessary processes of human thought. If there are conditions necessary for the proper employment of inference, the judicial determinations may be tested by them, and will illustrate them, so far as conscious reasoning by persons of experience and training who are not professed logicians may be assumed to be generally and roughly correct. The circumstances that judicial reasoning on questions of probative value is usually not conducted professedly according to logical rules, and that it looks to practical purposes attainable by simple and rough rules, warn us not to attempt to test this reasoning too steadily and minutely by logical rules. But as the logical processes cannot be evaded, and as the Courts do profess to reason upon these subjects, it is both necessary and possible to study their rules, and to learn how far there are any logical tests and requirements recognized in judicial reasoning.[2] So far as the body of rules of judicial evidence puts itself in harmony with scientific logic, we must ascertain it; so far as some arbitrary test, or no test at all, is adopted, we must ascertain this also. And we must throughout remember the peculiarity of the judicial problem, separating it from the problem of scientific logic, i. e. the problem of determining merely when the point of admissibility has been reached, and not the point of absolute proof or demonstration.

§ 32. Same: (1) with reference to the Proponent of Evidence. If, then, the potential defect of inductive Proof is that the fact offered as the basis of the conclusion may be open to one or more other explanations or conclusions, the test or requirement for mere Admissibility (as distinguished from Proof) must be something far short of this in strictness. The failure to exclude a single other rational hypothesis would be from the standpoint of Proof a fatal defect; and yet, if only that single other hypothesis were open, there might still be an extremely high degree of probability for the conclusion first claimed. When Robinson Crusoe saw the human footprint on the sand, he could not argue inductively that the presence of another human being was absolntely proved. There was at least (for example) the hypothesis of his own somnambulism. Nevertheless, the fact of the footprint was for his conclusion evidence of an extraordinary degree of probability, i.e. it passed beyond the line of mere Admissibility. The requirement or test, then, for this lower standard — Admissibility — would be something like this: Does the evidentiary fact point to the desired conclusion (not as the only rational hypothesis, but) as the hypothesis (or explanation) most plausible or most natural ont of the various ones that are conceivable? Or (to state the requirement more weakly), is the desired conclusion (not, the most natural, but) a natural or plausible one among the various conceivable ones? In practice it will be found that the Courts vary between these two, according to the practical possibilities of producing evidence and according to the dangers of its misuse. Sometimes they require in effect that the alleged conclusion (to which the evidentiary fact is directed) must be a more probable one than others; sometimes they merely reqnire that must be a probable or a possible one, irrespective of the greater probability of others.[1]

[1] P. 339.

[2] Compare Stephen, Indian Evidence Act, v, 14.

This general judicial attitude may be illustrated from various sorts of evidentiary facts. (1) The fact that A left the city soon after a crime was committed will be received by some Courts without further conditions, while others require that his knowledge that he was snspeeted shall first be shown. Here the evident notion is that the mere fact of departure by one unaware of the charge is open to too many innocent explanations; but the addition of the fact that A knew of the charge tends to put these other hypotheses into the background, and makes the desired explanation or conclusion — i.e. a guilty consciousness — stand out prominently as a more probable and plausible one. Even then there are other possible hypotheses — such as a summons from a dying relative or the fear of a yellow-fever epidemic in the city; bnt these are not the immediately natnral oncs, and the greater naturalness of the desired explanation suffices to admit the evidentiary fact of flight. (2) The fact that A makes repairs after an accident tends to the probable conclusion that he is conscious of the machine's being negligently defective. It is also open to the explanation, not perhaps equally probable, that he was conscious of its being merely defective, yet not negligently so. Nevertheless, the injustice of allowing the former inference to be made, if in truth the latter should be the correct one, is so great that (in the opinion of most Courts) the evidence should be excluded. Here the notion is that the desired explanation is not so preëminently the most probable one, as against others, as to make it desirable to consider it; the standard of the requirement being somewhat higher than in the preceding instance. (3) The fact that A before a robbery had no money, but after it had a large sum, is offered to indicate that he by robbery became possessed of the large sum of money. There are several other possible explanations, — the receipt of a legacy, the receipt of a debt, the winning of a gambling game, and the like. Nevertheless, the desired explanation rises, among other explanations, to a fair degree of plausibility, and the evidence is received. (4) The fact that A, charged with stealing a suit of clothes, was a poor man is offered to show him to be the thief. Now the conclusion of theft from the mere fact of poverty is, among the various possible conclusions, one of the least probable; for the conclusions that he would preferably work or beg or borrow are all equally or more probable, and the hypothesis of stealing, being also a dangerous one to adopt as the habitual construction to be put on poor men's conduct, has the double defect of being less probable and more hard upon the innocent. Such evidence, then, is seldom admitted to show that conclusion. (5) The fact that a person of unbalanced delusions asserts on the stand that he saw A strike B would formerly have been excluded absolutely. But nowadays it is recognized that a delusion may affect the powers of observation and memory to a limited extent only, and may not concern the subject of the testimony. If it does concern that subject, the witness is excluded, because the hypothesis that the fact occurred as he states it is too feeble and improbable, alongside of the hypothesis that his delusion is the only source of his statement. But if the delusion does not concern that subject, then his statement is received, even though it is still possible that his statement has been affected by the delusion. Thus the notion is, as before, that the evidentiary fact — i. e. the assertion on the stand — will be received where the correctness of the assertion is at least one among probable hypotheses. (6) The fact that A makes his statement on the witness-stand in response to a leading question of his counsel is not received, because in experience the chances are so great that his answer is based on the counsel's suggestion and not on his own knowledge. On the other hand, where the leading question deals merely with the preliminary matters of his name, age, and residence, the answer is receivable because, there being so little motive for falsification on those subjects, the conclusion that he answered truly is far the most probable one. Still further, where the witness cannot be made to understand what the inquiry is about, his statement answering a leading question is received, because although the conclusion that he is falsifying is perhaps still as probable as ever, yet there is no other way of obtaining evidence from that source (i. e. this witness), and hence the evidentiary fact (i. e. his answer), though furnishing an inference otherwise so weak as to be inadmissible, comes in because of the paucity of material and the practical necessities of the situation. (7) Formerly the presence of a pecuniary interest of any sort sufficed to exclude a witness, i. e. to exclude the evidentiary fact of his assertion. It was always conceded (and often declared by the Courts) that the hypothesis that such persons' assertions were usually false was a contingent and less probable one; but the mere possibility that they might be false was enough to exclude them. To-day the law has harmonized its treatment of such assertions with the treatment of all other evidentiary facts, i. e. it does not allow the less probable hypothesis of falsity to exclude the evidence, particularly in view of the availability of other methods of overthrowing or confirming that hypothesis. (8) The fact that A, the witness, has had a lawsuit with B, the defendant, is offered to show that A has feelings of animosity towards B which make it probable that he cannot testify correctly against him. Most Courts admit such evidence; but the Courts that reject it do so on the expressed theory that the inference of such animosity is a forced and unnatural one, and that the mere fact of a lawsuit is consistent with so many other more probable hypotheses that the evidence does not reach a sufficient degree of probative value.

[1] For judicial phrasings of the test for circumstantial evidence, see § 38, post.

Thus, throughout the whole realm of evidence, circumstantial and testimonial, the theory of the inductive argument, as practically applied from the standpoint of Admissibility, is that the evidentiary fact will be considered when, and only when, the desired conclusion based upon it is a more probable or natural, or at least a probable or natural, hypothesis, and when the other hypotheses or explanations of the fact, if any, are either less probable or natural, or at least not exceedingly more probable or natural. The degree of strength required will vary with different sorts of evidentiary facts, depending somewhat upon differing views of human experience with those facts, somewhat upon the practical availability of stronger facts, and somewhat upon the hardships of certain inferences in case they should be unfounded. But the general spirit and mode of reasoning of the Courts substantially illustrates the dictates of scientific logic.

§ 33. Same: Occasional Subordinate Tests; Method of Agreement and Method of Difference. The main question for the inductive argument being (in the words of Professor Sidgwick, already quoted), "What certainty can we obtain that the alternative chosen is the right one out of all those conceivable?," there have been stated by scientific logic several subordinate methods or processes of investigation which may be viewed as attempts to answer this question. Usually enumerated as five, they are reducible in essence to two, — the Method of Agreement and the Method of Difference. Occasionally they may be and are conveniently resorted to in the testing of judicial evidence.

(a) Method of Agreement. The canon which this applies may be thus stated: "Whatever circumstances can be excluded without excluding the phenomenon whose effect (or cause) is being sought; or can be absent notwithstanding its presence, are not causally connected with it. . . . The remainder, those circumstances which are not eliminated by this process, are supposed to be thus shown to be essential to the phenomenon, — to be the proved effect (or cause)."[1] From the point of view of Proof, then, when we argue that the observed instances of a, viz. a', a'', a''', being always followed by b, prove a to be the cause of b, we can avoid the danger of ignoring other causes as the true explanation, by providing that the various instances shall be attended by identically the same circumstances or conditions; then, and then only, when a, under identically the same conditions, is followed always by b, have we the right to claim that b is the effect of a and not of some other cause. Applying this method from the standpoint of mere Admissibility, we of course do not need to exclude so rigorously the possibility of other explanations; accordingly our test would be whether the evidential instances occurred under substantially similar (not identically the same) conditions, i. e. so that the supposed conclusion is at least the more probable, though not the only possible, explanation. This subordinate test — which is merely a practical aid to the ultimate or fundamental one — will naturally be most available and useful where the evidential fact consists of a supposed parallel instance. To illustrate: (1) In showing that a person's illness was due to the eating of certain food, the fact is offered that other persons were ill after eating of the same food. Here the test naturally to be applied is whether the other illnesses occurred under substantially similar conditions of time, surroundings, and symptoms. (2) To show that a portion of a pavement caused an injury because dangerous to passers-by, the fact is offered that other persons who passed fell down at that place. Here a similar test is called for. Judicial annals contain a vast variety of instances in which this same subordinate test is the natural one to be applied, and is in practice used by the Courts.[2]

[1] Sidgwick, ubi supra, 340.

(b) Method of Difference. The canon of this method is:[3] "If an instance in which the phenomenon under investigation occurs, and an instance in which it does not occur have every circumstance in common save one, that one only occurring in the former; the circumstance in which alone the two instances differ is the effect, or the cause, or an indispensable part of the cause, of the phenomenon." As applied to the judicial purposes of Admissibility, the test of this argument becomes: In order to prove that x is the cause of b, by the fact that wherever x was present the effect b, b', b'', was found, and that wherever x was not present the different effects c or d were found, the various instances b, b', b'', c, and d are admissible if they were substantially similar to each other in all respects except the presence of x.

This test is of comparatively rare employment in judicial evidence, because it is rare that instances occur which fulfil this requirement, unless where pre-arranged experiments are possible. But so far as the conditions of the case admit the fulfilment of the requirement, the argument may be and is employed. To illustrate: The injury to the paint on the plaintiff's house is attributed by the defendant to sewer-gas; for this purpose, he is allowed to use the fact that "under conditions and circumstances as nearly as possible like those surrounding the plaintiff's house," except the presence of the sewer-gas, the injury to paint did not occur.[4]

The purpose in using both these subordinate tests is always the same general one, — to secure a fair probability for the claimed hypothesis, as against and in competition with other possible ones. It is enough to note here that these specific and accepted logical tests are occasionally available and are judicially applied in the admission of litigious evidence.

[2] Post, §§ 441–464, in particular.

[3] Sidgwick, ubi supra, 345.

[4] 1879. Eidt v. Cutter, 127 Mass. 524; see further § 442, post, and §§ 450–464.

§ 34. Same: (2) with reference to the Opponent. It is important to notice the double treatment of which every offer of evidence may admit. Where we are dealing with the general subject of Proof in Logic, the single inquiry is whether the argument offered as involving Proof does really fulfil the logical requirements. But wherever, in the applications of logical principles to specific practical purposes, two parties are found contending, the proponent and the opponent — as in a formal debate, a controversy of scientific investigators, and, preëminently, a trial at law —, the mode of argument must be studied from two points of view. It has been seen that, in applying the principles of logic to Admissibility, the judicial standard falls far short of the standard of complete Proof. Where even the possibility of a single other hypothesis remains open, Proof fails, though it suffices for Admissibility if the desired conclusion is merely the more probable, or a probable one, even though other hypotheses, less probable or equally probable, remain open. It is thus apparent that, by the very nature of this test or process, a specific course is suggested for the opponent. He may now properly show that one or another of these hypotheses, thus left open, is not merely possible and speculative, but is more probable and natural as the true explanation of the originally offered evidentiary fact. That fact has been admitted in evidence, but its force may now be diminished or annulled by showing that some explanation of it other than the proponent's is the true one. Indeed, every ruling upon the admissibility of such a fact is concerned with the question whether the proponent shall in advance discount or exclude some of these other hypotheses or whether they are so much less probable that it is safe to leave to the opponent the task of showing that one or more of them is the better explanation, if in truth it is.

Thus every sort of evidentiary fact may call for treatment in two aspects: 1. What is the extent to which other hypotheses must be excluded before the fact is admissible? 2. What are the other hypotheses which are then available for the opponent as explaining away the force of the fact thus provisionally admissible? This second aspect of each class of facts will hereafter be treated usually, for the respective subjects of Relevancy, under the head of Explanation. To illustrate: (1) In showing the defendant's connection with a murder, the fact is admitted of the finding of a knife, bearing his name, near the body of the deceased; the defendant, to refute the claimed conclusion that he was present with the knife at the murder, will be allowed to show that he lost the knife a month before; thus giving greater color of probability to the hypothesis that some one else was present with the knife. (2) To show the defendant's animosity against the deceased, the fact of a serious quarrel ten years before is offered; some Courts will exclude this, thinking that the claimed conclusion, namely, that the animosity existed at the time of the killing, is an hypothesis of too low relative probability; other Courts will admit it, believing that this hypothesis has sufficient prima facie probability, and leaving it to the opponent to show — e. g. by the fact of a reconciliation in the interim — that the fact of the quarrel does not lead to the conclusion claimed. (3) To show the injurious vibrative qualities of a bridge in causing cracks in adjacent buildings, the fact of the existence of cracks in other adjacent buildings is received; this may be explained away by the fact that the operation of a railway, and not the bridge-vibrations, had been their cause.[1] (4) A witness must be shown in advance to have had adequate opportunity to observe the facts related, and to have sufficient experience to judge, if the matter is out of the ordinary; the hypothesis that he may be mendacious by disposition, being not a normal but an exceptional one, need not be discounted in advance by showing his good character for truth; but it is left to the opponent, if this derogatory circumstance exists, to show it; a showing of bad character will tend to explain away all his assertions as those of a confirmed liar. (5) The rest of a conversation or writing, of which a part has been received as an admission, may be presented by the opponent to explain away the apparent effect of the fragment; thus, to adopt Algernon Sidney's famous illustration (frequently used by Erskine in his arguments for the accused in the sedition trials of the 1790s), the prosecution, on a charge of blasphemy, might offer a statement of the defendant: "There is no God"; but this could be instantly explained away as part of a quotation from the Bible of the passage, "The fool hath said in his heart, 'There is no God.'" Such is the complementary process of Explanation, by the opponent, as suggested by and related to the evidentiary fact received from the proponent.[2]

It must be understood, of course, that the opponent's modes of opposition are not confined to this. He may also (2) deny the truth of the evidentiary fact itself; or (3) advance some new and different evidentiary fact tending to prove his own counter-proposition. But in neither case are we concerned here with any process of Explanation. In (2) there is no form of argument at all, but a simple denial of the fact; in (3) there is a wholly new argument, in which the opponent in turn becomes proponent and submits his material for admissibility according to the ordinary tests; i. e. it is an ordinary question of relevancy. To illustrate: To charge A with murder, the prosecution shows a specific threat, an old quarrel, and traces of blood on his clothes. The defendant answers: (1) Explaining away the old quarrel by showing an intervening reconciliation; explaining away the blood-traces by showing the recent killing of a chicken; this is the complementary process of Explanation suggested by the evidentiary facts of quarrel and blood, and is directed to diminishing their force; this complementary process depends for its conditions and possibilities upon those original facts; (2) Denying the specific threat; this is in itself no form of inference, and raises no question of relevancy; (3) Advancing the new facts of an alibi and of good character for peaceableness; here the defendant is simply a proponent of new evidentiary facts, just as the prosecution was for its own evidence; the question of relevancy is the ordinary one, and depends on precisely the same tests as the prosecution's original evidence.

[1] 1882, Abend v. Mueller, 11 Ill. App. 257.

[2] 1870, Graves, J., in Comstock v. Smith, 20 Mich. 348: "In cases of this kind, when the question is as to the relevancy of evidence in reply, the point is not whether the evidence offered is the most convincing or persuasive, but whether it tends to cut down, limit, explain, or obviate the defence in any part of it, or to illustrate some legitimate answer to the defence. In order to be relevant, it is not requisite that the testimony should be essential. It may be cumulative, it may be supererogatory, and still be relevant."

All an opponent's modes are reducible to these three; but only in the first is he distinctively an opponent so far as the logical nature of his argument is thereby affected. In the second he does not argue at all; in the third he ceases to be an opponent, from the point of view of argument, and becomes himself the proponent of a new argument, which the original proponent may now attack as an opponent.

§ 35. Same: Occasional Subordinate Forms. It has been seen that the proponent's evidentiary fact is occasionally subjected to a subordinate test, usually involving a substantial similarity of conditions, and peculiarly useful in a few situations (ante, § 33). In the same way, the opponent, desirous of explaining away the force of an evidentiary fact by showing that another hypothesis is equally or more probable than the one claimed, finds that the process, just described in its common form, sometimes takes on a specific subordinate form peculiarly useful in certain situations. These forms, as noticed in judicial annals, seem to be practically three in number.

(1) Explanation by Inconsistent Instances. Where the proposition is that y is the effect of x, and the evidentiary fact is that in instances a, a', and a'', the circumstance y followed and the circumstance x was present, a convenient way of annulling the effect of these instances is to show that in a fourth instance a''' the circumstance x was present and yet the circumstance y did not follow.[1] To illustrate: In arguing that the vibrations of the defendant's railway bridge cracked the plaintiff's buildings at the eastern end, the injured condition of various buildings at that end is received for the plaintiff; to explain this away, the fact is received for the defendant that at the western end the vibrations were even more severe and yet no buildings there were cracked.[2] The requirement for this mode of explanation is merely that the inconsistent instances shall have occurred under substantially similar conditions, so as to exclude the likelihood that any other cause — e.g. in the above illustration, the peculiar strength of the buildings at the western end — could have counteracted the operation of the supposed cause. A chief use for this mode of argument is to demonstrate an alleged possibility or impossibility. When A's argument is that an event or deed x is possible or impossible, it is obvious that the whole force of his evidentiary facts is at once destroyed by a single instance of its impossibility or its possibility, provided the conditions are substantially similar in both cases. In this way the hypothesis originally set up as the exclusive one is shown not to be an exclusive one at all, by the fact that a contrary one has occurred in the instance offered by the opponent. A universal or absolute affirmative can be thus exploded equally as well as a universal or absolute negative. It is the universality of the alleged indication that lays it open to fatal attack by an inconsistent instance. To illustrate: (a) A burglar was alleged to have entered through a certain window; but the accused affirmed the impossibility of a man's getting through it; the prosecuting attorney suddenly put the frsme over the defendant's head and drew it completely down, thus disproving the alleged impossibility; (b) at a trial for murder, there was testimony that the accused was seen going up a certain hill, wearing a pepper-and-salt suit, the witness looking from the rear and facing the sun; experiments showed that under such circumstances it was impossible for an observer to distinguish any color at all; (c) at a trial for arson, the prosecution claimed that the fire was set with a candle set in a closed box so as to burn down into a bnnch of shavings; experiment showed that under the conditions alleged a candle would have gone out in a shorter interval than that which mnst have elapsed.[3]

[1] Sidgwick, ubi supra, 275.

[2] 1882, Abend v. Mueller, 11 Ill. App. 256.

(2) Explanation by Dissimilarity of Conditions. Where the proponent's evidentiary fact has been admitted under the subordinate test of § 33, ante, — the substantial similarity of conditions in the instances offered —, the opponent's course is naturally suggested; i. e. he may show that there is at least a residuum of dissimilar conditions which, though not originally sufficient to exclude, nevertheless suffices to diminish probative value, by making some other hypothesis a possible one, if not an equally probable one. To illustrate: (a) In arguing that arsenical wall-paper was the source of the plaintiff's illness, the fact that others living in the same house were affected by similar symptoms is received; to explain this away, evidence is received that the same symptoms customarily attend the eating of unsound oysters, and that the others, but not the plaintiff, had eaten oysters; thus the dissimilarity of conditions is emphasized as the possible source of erroneous explanation. (b) To prove the qnalities of a dental invention as a pain-killer, the fact is received that the patrons of the dentist using it had suffered pain under other dentists but not under him; to explain this away, it may be shown that they had never been under him before he used this pain-killer; thus emphasizing the dissimilarity of conditions to suggest that this dentist's personal skill, and not the invention, had prevented their pain.

(3) Explanation by Cumulative Instances. Where the proposition is that y is the effect of x, and the evidentiary fact is that in instances a, a', and a'', the circumstance y followed and the circumstance x was present, another way of annulling the effect of these instances is to show that in a fourth instance a''' the circumstance y again followed, and yet the circumstance x was not present. This argument is in a manner the opposite of (1) supra, and consists in offering other instances in which the same effect is found, but without the presence of the alleged causing circumstance; and thus forces us to look upon its presence in the proponent's original instances as merely accidental, and not really causative. The requirement of this argument is that the conditions of the additional instances shall be substantially similar in every respect except the alleged causing circumstance; for if they were not, then the elimination of the alleged cause as harmless is not accomplished. For example, the fact of the defendant's flowage of certain lands of the plaintiff is alleged to be the cause of deterioration in their productiveness during the previous ten years; to refute this, the defendant offers the fact of similar deterioration of other lands that had not been subjected to the flowage; this is admissible only so far as the other lands are near by and presumably under the same influences of soil and climate.[4]

[3] Cited by Mr. Irving Browne, Green Bag, 1893, 186 ff.

§ 36. Summary. It has thus been seen that every evidentiary fact or class of facts may call for two processes and raise two sets of questions: (1) the admissibility of the original fact from the proponent; (2) the admissibility of explanatory facts from the opponent. (1) The first is subjected to the test whether the claimed conclusion is a probable or a more probable one, having regard to conceivable interpretations of the fact; the rulings vary more or less upon different evidentiary facts, according to various considerations of experience; and occasionally specific subordinate tests are applied. (2) The second process consists in explaining away the original fact's force by showing the existence and probability of other hypotheses; for this purpose other facts affording such explanations are receivable from the opponent; and here also, occasionally, occur specific subordinate processes and tests. The detailed rules for the various sorts of evidence are of course more or less concrete and dogmatic; this or that evidence is or is not held to be relevant. But the principles underlying these rulings are the principles of applied logic that have just been outlined.

[4] 1838, Standish v. Washburn, 21 Pick. 237; post, §§ 443, 451.

TITLE I.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

INTRODUCTORY:

GENERAL THEORY OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER IV

§ 38. Degree of Probative Value required. It has just been seen (§ 31) that the general and broad requirement for relevancy is that the claimed conclusion from the offered fact must be a probable or a more probable hypothesis, with reference to the possibility of other hypotheses. This is not only the general principle that best describes the attitude of the Courts, but is also the expressed form of the test for specific kinds of facts. Nevertheless, there is naturally more or less variation of language in the phrasings put forth from time to time by the Courts. Generalizations of this principle for circumstantial (or "presumptive") evidence have frequently been attempted; and the following typical passages will serve as a guide to the general spirit in which the Courts apply the test of relevancy:

1794, Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 298; the defendant in error offered evidence of former acts to show knowledge and intent by the opponent, and his evidence was received; his statement of the principle, thus impliedly approved by the Court, was as follows: "The defendant in error humbly submits that it is competent to a jury to find matters of fact without direct or positive testimony of those facts and upon circumstantial evidence only, although the inference or conclusion to be drawn from the circumstances proved be not absolutely certain or necessary; that it is sufficient if the circumstantial evidence be such as may afford a fair and reasonable presumption of the facts to be tried; and if the evidence has that tendency it ought to be received and left to the consideration of the jury, to whom alone it belongs to determine upon the precise force and effect of the circumstances proved and whether they are sufficiently satisfactory and convincing to warrant them in finding the fact in issue."

1834, Mattocks, J., in Richardson v. Turnpike Co., 6 Vt. 503: "The line between strengthening or confirming circumstances that have not a direct or certain tendency to prove the issue, and yet are not so remote as to be inadmissible, is not in all cases distinctly marked, and from the ever-shifting aspects that new cases present under the same issues, never can be distinctly defined. . . . In 1 Starkie [on Evidence], sec. 7, it is said that 'the great and general rule upon the subject seems to be this, — that all facts or circumstances upon which any reasonable presumption can be founded as to the truth or falsity of the issue or disputed fact are admissible in evidence.'"

1849, Bell, J., in Stevenson v. Stewart, 11 Pa. 308: "Great latitude is allowed to the reception of indirect, or, as it is sometimes called, circumstantial evidence. . . . This indirect evidence is sometimes drawn from the experience which enables us to trace a connexion between an ascertained collateral fact and the fact otherwise undetermined; and it is more or less cogent as this connexion is known to be more or less natural and frequent. Where antecedent experience shows this mutuality of relation to be constant or with a great degree of uniformity, the inference deducible, it is said, is properly termed a presumption. But this species of proof embraces a far wider scope than this. It in fact includes all evidence of an indirect nature, whether the inferences afforded by it be drawn from prior experience, or be a deduction of reason from the circumstances of the particular case, or of reason aided by experience. In the latter aspect, it is a conclusion the value of which obviously depends on the force and directness with which it is derived from the premises conceded or proved.

"But yet the competency of a collateral fact to be used as the basis of legitimate argument is not to be determined by the conclusiveness of the inferences it may afford in reference to the litigated fact. It is enough if these may tend, even in a slight degree, to elucidate the inquiry or to assist, though remotely, to a determination probably founded in truth. Indeed, to require a necessary relation between the fact known and the fact sought would sweep away many sources of testimony to which men daily recur in the ordinary business of life; and that cannot be rejected by a judicial tribunal without hazard of shutting out the light. Merely foreign matter must be avoided; but, though in appearance foreign, if it bear at all on the main subject, it must be heard. . . . The convincing power of the influence is for the jury, when weighing the value of the fact proved, — not for the judge, in determining the bare question of its relevancy; it is sufficient for the purposes of his inquiry that it has some affinity with the principal inquiry, though this may be weak or remote."

1861, Woodward, J., in Stauffer v. Young, 39 Pa. 460 (speaking of evidence to show fraud): "Whatever is not of a nature to beget mental conviction upon the point under inquiry is irrelevant evidence and should not be admitted; whatever is of that nature should be admitted. And of this moral quality of proofs the presiding judge is the arbiter; he admits and rejects, under our supervision, according to his estimate (not of the effect of the evidence, for that is for the jury, but according to his estimate) of the fitness of the evidence to conduct human reason to a sound conclusion on the point in question. . . . If any prescriptive rule in the law of evidence is applicable to the offer, the judge applies it, of course; if there be no such rule, he guides himself by the sound discretion I have indicated."

1863, Bigelow, C. J., in Com. v. Jeffries, 7 Ail. 548, 566: "To render evidence of collateral facts competent, there must be some natural, necessary, or logical connection between them and the inference or result which they are designed to establish. . . . It is sometimes difficult to mark with precision the line which separates the limits of just and reasonable inference from those of mere conjecture or surmise. This arises necessarily from the nature of indirect evidence. Being founded on the observation and experience of the mutual connection between facts and circumstances, the question of its competency is easy or difficult of solution according as such supposed connection is constant or more or less regular and frequent. But as a safe practical rule it may be laid down that in no case is evidence to be excluded of any fact or circumstances, connected with the principal transaction, from which an inference to the truth of a disputed fact can reasonably be made."

1871, Cooley, J., in Stewart v. People, 23 Mich. 75: "The proper test for the admissibility of evidence ought to be, we think, whether it has a tendency to affect belief in the mind of a reasonably cautious person who should receive and weigh it with judicial fairness."

1875, Agnew, C. J., in Brown v. Schock, 77 Pa. 479: "In a question of circumstantial evidence, the proof derived from the circumstances is a question of natural presumption and is to be found by the jury; the strength of this proof depends on the probability resulting from the facts. . . . It is the right of the party to have this submitted to the jury, unless it is so weak and inconclusive that as a matter of law no probability of fact can be drawn from the combined circumstances."

1875, Brickell, C. J., in Lerison v. State, 54 Ala. 528: "The rule is clear and well-defined that facts and circumstances which when proved are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference in regard to the material fact or inquiry involved are not admissible as evidence. The difficulty lies in its application."

1895, McCabe, C. J., in Deal v. State, 140 Ind. 354, 39 N. E. 930: "When evidence tends to prove a fact, however slight that tendency may be, it is admissible. That is the only guide the Court can have in determining the admissibility of evidence. . . . This is so for several reasons. One is that a party cannot be expected or required to prove the fact by a single item of evidence; and another reason is that the jury are the exclusive judges of the weight to be given to each item of evidence."

1902, Walker, J., in Cohn v. Saidel, 71 N. H. 558, 53 Atl. 800 (dealing with the question whether, in an action for malicious prosecution, the present defendants' submission to nonsuit in the former action warranted a conclusion that they had no probable cause in the beginning): "The argument is that that fact alone warrants the inference of a want of probable cause. But the fact of the nonsuit alone is direct evidence of no mental state on the part of the defendants, except that they did not desire to carry on the litigation at that time. It may be said that it establishes that fact conclusively. If it does, and if it might be inferred that they became nonsuit because, as then informed, they did not think they had a probable cause of action, it is necessary to go a step further in this mental operation, and to infer from this inference that the defendants, when they brought the suits, nearly a year before, upon information they then possessed, did not, as reasonable and prudent men, honestly believe they had a cause of action. There is no open and visible connection between the fact first proved, viz., that the defendants desired to withdraw their suits in April, 1900, and the fact to be proved, viz., that they had no probable cause of action in July, 1899. A great variety of reasons exist which may induce a plaintiff to become nonsuit, one of which may be that he has discovered or become convinced that he has no case. This, however, is but a mere conjecture. It is but one of a large number of sufficient reasons for such action. It cannot even be said to be the common or ordinary reason that induces a plaintiff to become nonsuit. In a particular case it may or it may not be the true reason. Unconnected with other evidence, it is pure conjecture. But one conjecture cannot be treated as a proved fact in order to reach another conjecture. The probative bearing of the evidence upon the point in issue is not logically clear and plain, but doubtful and involved, leading to no certain result. . . . The legitimate bearing or relevancy of evidence is ascertained by logic and reason applied in the conduct of a trial by jury. If it is illogical and unreasonable to allow the jury to draw conclusions from premises based upon simple conjecture, it is also illegitimate. The most that can be claimed in favor of the refusal to give the instruction requested in this case is that it is possible the defendants may have thought they had no probable ground of action when they became nonsuit, and hence, assuming that to be true, it is possible they were of the same mind when they brought their suits. This is piling conjecture upon conjecture, and reaching a result more by guessing than by the exercise of reason and logic. In a judicial tribunal mere guesses and conjectures cannot be substituted for the legal proof which the law requires. . . . In view of the fact that the reasons for becoming nonsuit are numerous, and that the plaintiff's belief that he had no cause of action in the beginning is probably a very rare one, the above rule would not seem to be reasonable, unless it is reasonable to require the defendant to prove his nonliability in the first instance. The logic of legal procedure does not lead to such a result."[1]

[1] Compare the following definitions: 1854, Scott, J., in Austin v. State, 14 Ark. 560 ("No facts are forbidden to be shown except such as are incapable of affording any reasonable

§ 39. Same: "Collateral" Facts. The term "collateral," sometimes here employed, has two senses, and is apt to mislead unless they are discriminated.

(1) The original and dominant sense of "collateral" as here applied (its application to the impeachment of witnesses — post, § 1021 — being a totally different one) is that of "immaterial." According to the principle of § 2, ante, no propositions can be proved except those which are properly in issue under the substantive law and the pleadings; hence, a fact evidencing a proposition not thus properly in issue is inadmissible, because immaterial. This it was at one time common to designate by the crude term "collateral":

1849, Bell, J., in Stevenson v. Stewart, 11 Pa. 308: "It is undonbtedly a rule governing the production and admission of evidence that the evidence offered must correspond with the allegations and be confined to the point in issne. The effect is to exclude merely collateral facts, having no connexion with the subject litigated, and therefore incapable of shedding light on the inquiry or affording gronnd for reasonable presumption or inference."

1865, Chapman, J., in Shepard v. Ashley, 10 All. 542: "One of the elementary rules of evidence is that it mnst be confined to the points in issne; and the reason of the rnle is that the attention of juries may not be distracted nor the public time consumed needlessly."

1890, Foster, J., in Nickerson v. Gould, 82 Me. 512, 514, 20 Atl. 86: "The evidence mnst be relevant to the issne, — that is, to the facts put in controversy by the pleadings. This rule prohibits the trial of collateral issues."

(2) But occasionally the term was used to signify "remotely probative" or "indirectly connected," i. e. directed to prove a proposition in issue, and yet possessing for that purpose a weak quality of relevancy; thus the fact might be possibly relevant, if a close enough connection and a real probative value should appear:

1854, Eccleston, J., in Lee v. Tinges, 7 Md. 236: "There is a rule of evidence which excludes collaterol facts, or snch as do not afford a reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute."

1858, Wright, C. J., in State v. Hinkle, 6 Ia. 384: "Collateral facts, or those which are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute, are excluded."[1]

The practical difference between these two senses was that in the former sense the fact was always and clearly inadmissible, while in the latter sense presumption or inference in elucidation of the matters involved in the issue"); 1855, Keener v. State, 18 Ga. 225 ("all facts upon wbicb any reasonable presumption or inference can be founded"); 1872, Valentine, J., in Sumner v. Blair, 9 Kan. 521, 528; 1851, Trull v. True, 33 Me. 367 ("Testimony cannot be excluded as irrelevant wbich would have a tendency, bowever remote, to establisb the probability or improbability of tbe fact in controversy"); 1824, Gibson, J., in Weidler v. Bank, 11 S. & R. 140 ("It will not be said that facts which by themselves can bave no other operation than to confuse and mislead by inducing a suspicion of the existence of some other necessary facts, where the presnmption is not a reasonable or natural one, onght therefore to be admitted"); 1870, Davis, J., in Ins. Co. v. Weide, 11 Wall. 438, 440 ("It is well settled tbat if the evidence offered conduces in any reasonable degree to establish the probability or improbability of tbe fact in controversy, it should go to tbe jnry").

[1] So also: 1873, Brooke v. Winters, 39 Md. 508 ("Tbe rule that excludes facts because they are collateral does not apply to facts wherever existing, if tbey may afford any reasonable presumption as to the matter in dispute").

it might be deemed admissible under some circumstances. A fact might thus deserve different fates, according as it was "collateral" in one or the other sense. This careless confusion of usage spread, until a kind of stigma began often to be intended in the epithet "collateral." It was appealed to in one sense in order to gain an argument involving its other sense. If an opposing counsel could stigmatize an offered fact as "collateral," he felt that he had struck a blow at its admissibility; and in this effort he had useful weapons, in the older passages in which a "collateral" fact, meaning an immaterial fact, was treated as necessarily inadmissible.[2] What is needed, therefore, is simply a mutual understanding of the sense in which the term is being used on a particular occasion. When it is used in the second sense to express remoteness of probative value, the fact in question may or may not be admissible, according to the standard judicially declared in § 38, ante; there is nothing decisive in its "collateralness."

§ 40. Present and Future Relevancy. A fact, when offered as evidence, may not be relevant, either because it goes to prove a subordinate proposition whose bearing is not yet apparent, or because it is relevant only in connection with some other fact not yet offered. Thus it is not now but may later in the trial become relevant. In this situation, (1) there is no objection to this fact in that it does not contain within itself all the necessary features of relevancy. It need not be per se relevant:

1831, Hosmer, C. J., in State v. Watkins, 9 Conn. 53: "If the fact consist of parts, or is provable by many circumstances, each of which conduces something to the establishment of it, then each part and each circumstance is admissible, although the point will not be established until the whole fact is proved."

On the other hand, (2) its relevancy must be made to appear by a preliminary and hypothetical statement of the additional facts or propositions that would make it relevant, with an engagement to make them good at the proper time:

1824, Gibson, J., in Weidler v. Bank, 11 S. & R. 139: "The evidence, therefore, as it was offered, presented facts which, isolated as they stand in the bill of exceptions were entirely irrelevant. . . . But the plaintiff contends that this may have been only a part of the chain of his evidence, and that what was deficient might afterwards have been supplied. . . . If it would be relevant, when taken in connexion with other facts, it ought to be proposed in connexion with those facts, and an offer to follow the evidence proposed with proof of those facts at the proper times. But the Court is not bound to spend its time in an inquiry which from the [present] showing of the party can produce no results. Dislocated circumstances may doubtless be given in evidence; particularly if there be no objection to the order of time; but the proposal of the evidence must contain in itself, by reference to something that has preceded it or that is to follow, information of the manner in which the evidence is to be legitimately operative."

1833, Buchanan, C. J., in Davis v. Calvert, 5 G. & J. 304: "It is sometimes difficult to ascertain whether a particular fact offered in evidence is connected with the issue, and will or will not become material in the progress of the investigation. In such cases, the Court not clearly seeing that it is wholly foreign and irrelevant to the issue and cannot be connected with it by evidence of other facts and circumstances, it is proper and usual in practice to admit the proof, on the assurance of the counsel who tenders it that it will turn out to be pertinent and material; otherwise, material and important testimony might frequently and injuriously be excluded, which it is the province of the Court to guard against when it may be done. . . . And when it does not clearly appear a priori that a fact offered to be proved is collateral and irrelevant, there is generally less mischief to be done or apprehended by admitting it, though it should afterwards turn out to be collateral, than by the rejection of the proof of a fact only because, standing alone, it does not plainly appear to be connected with the issue, but may, when connected with other facts and circumstances, become material and important."

[2] Mr. Justice Doe, in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 405–6, has incisively exposed the fallacy of this ambiguous usage.

Nevertheless, it may sometimes be desirable for the counsel not to disclose immediately the full purpose of his inquiry, and it is usually and properly said that the discretion of the trial Court should determine whether it is better to insist on the disclosure then, or to allow the fact to come in upon the general promise of counsel to connect it. In the absence, however, of some such promise, a fact apparently irrelevant will not be treated on review as admissible because it might have been relevant on certain conditions.

Moreover, the Court will often, where the facts would be highly improper if irrelevant, require the other facts, instead of being postponed, to be first offered, so as to ensure the presence of the proper foundation and leave nothing to the sanguine expectations of counsel. This, however, is rather a question of the order of presenting evidence.

The only exception ordinarily recognized to this doctrine is made for facts sought on cross-examination, where it is often so important to conceal from the witness the bearing of his answer that great latitude is conceded.[1]

§ 41. Circumstantial Evidence may be proved by the same Kind. It was once suggested that an "inference upon an inference" will not be permitted, i. e. that a fact desired to be used circumstantially must itself be established by testimonial evidence;[1] and this suggestion has been repeated by a few Courts, and sometimes actually enforced.[2] There is no such rule; nor can be. If there were, hardly a single trial could be adequately prosecuted.[3] For example, on a charge of murder, the defendant's gun is found discharged; from this we infer that he discharged it, and from this we infer

[1] This subject is so closely connected with the general principles governing the Order of Evidence, that the detailed rules and the authorities are considered under that head post, § 1871.

[1] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I, 57.

[2] 1896, Globe Accident Ins. Co. v. Gerisch, 163 Ill. 625, 45 N. E. 563 ((1) that G. lifted a box of ashes was shown by the facts that he was seen filling the box with ashes, that afterwards it was seen filled on the street, and that G. usually carried it there; (2) that G. was shortly afterwards found badly strained in the abdomen was otherwise shown; but (3) the fact that he lifted the box of ashes was not allowed to be used to infer that the lift caused the strain, because of the above supposed rule); 1879, Biddle, J., in Binns v. State, 66 Ind. 428, 430 ("Inferences can not be drawn from inferences, . . . but inferences may be drawn from facts previously proved [i. e. by direct testimony]"); 1860, Donglass v. Mitchell, 35 Pa. 440; 1868, McAleer v. McMurray, 58 id. 126, 135; 1880, Philadelphia C. P. R. Co. v. Henrice, 92 id. 431; 1875, U. S. v. Ross, 92 U. S. 281 ("Whenever circumstantial evidence is relied upon to prove a fact, the circumstances themselves must be proved [by testimonial evidence], and not presumed [i. e. inferred from circumstantial evidence]"); 1879, Manning v. Ins. Co., 100 id. 693.

[3] 1820, Abbott, C. J., in R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, 161 ("If no fact could be thus ascertained by inference in a court of law, very few offenders could be brought to punishment").

that it was his bullet which struck and killed the deceased. Or, the defendant is shown to have been sharpening a knife; from this we argue that he had a design to use it upon the deceased; and from this we argue that the fatal stab was the result of this design. In these and innumerable daily instances we build up inference upon inference, and yet no Court ever thought of forbidding it. All departments of reasoning, all scientific work, every day's life and every day's trials, proceed upon such data. The judicial utterances that sanction the fallacious and impracticable limitation, originally put forward without authority, must be taken as valid only for the particular evidentiary facts therein ruled upon.[4]

§ 42. Irrelevancy and Multifariousness, or Practical Inconvenience, distinguished. A circumstantial fact may be relevant, and thus far admissible, and yet be excluded by reason of one of the auxiliary principles dealt with in Part II (post, §§ 1171 ff.); in other words, it may have sufficient probative value to satisfy the logical requirements of Relevancy, and yet may be obnoxious to certain other principles of exclusion, particularly those of Confusion of Issues, Surprise, or Undue Prejudice (post, § 1906). For example, the moral disposition of an accused may be probatively of considerable value as indicating the probability of his doing or not doing a particular act of crime, yet it may be excluded because of the undue prejudice liable to be caused by taking it into consideration; for its probative value may be exaggerated, and condemnation be visited upon him, not for the act, but virtually for his character (post, § 55). Again, a witness' character as to veracity is probatively capable of being evidenced by specific mendacious acts of his; but if these were allowed to be evidenced without restriction, false testimony might be brought forward, specifying time, place, and conduct, and for lack of prior notice of these supposed details, it would be impossible for him to demonstrate their falsity; thus the principle of unfair surprise would be violated (post, §§ 979, 1849). Again, in proving the dangerous qualities of a place or a machine, repeated instances of its injurious operation would be of high probative value; yet the unrestricted admission of such instances might result in so multiplying the subordinate issues in a cause that confusion of mind would ensue and the main controversy would be lost sight of in the great mass of minor issues (post, §§ 443, 1863, 1906). Thus at every point the rules of relevancy are subject to be balked and counteracted by these auxiliary general principles of practical policy. The detailed consideration of their operation can be fully considered under the specific rules; but the following passages will suffice here to illustrate the judicial methods in allowing the one kind of principle to counteract the other:

1824, Bayley, J., in May v. Brown, 3 B. & C. 113, 127 (libel; the trial judge had admitted, in mitigation of damages, the general fact the plaintiff had published libels of the defendant, but not the particular libels; affirming this on appeal, the judges put the exclusion on the following grounds): "The reason of the distinction is that the admission of evidence of particular facts would be calculated not only to produce general inconvenience, but would operate as a surprise upon the party against whom it is offered. [As to the latter,] when a party knows what the issue is, he knows on what points to prepare himself; he may also be prepared upon general points not connected with the issue; but he certainly would not be prepared upon particular points. [As to the former,] suppose, in answer to an action for a libel, the defendant gives in evidence that the plaintiff at another time published a libel of the defendant. There might be first a question whether the plaintiff did or did not publish; secondly, whether it was or was not true; and then in this action for one libel, the matter tried would be that which ought to be in issue in another action brought for another libel. Besides, if the defendant might give in evidence one libel, he might give in evidence twenty; and so instead of trying one point and one issue joined, twenty different issues would be tried at one time, the inconvenience of which would be incalculable."

[4] The fallacy has been repudiated in the following case: 1897, Hinshaw v. State, 147 Ind. 334, 47 N. E. 158. Compare also Gibson, C. J., quoted ante, § 26, where the relative value of circumstantial and testimonial evidence is considered.

1876, Stone, J., in Mattison v. State, 55 Ala. 224, 232: "In inquiries of fact dependent on circumstantial evidence for their solution, no certain rule can be laid down which will define with unerring accuracy what collateral facts and circumstances are sufficiently proximate to justify their admission in evidence. Human transactions are too varied to admit of such clear declaration of the rule. Whatever tends to shed light on the main inquiry, and does not withdraw attention from such main inquiry by obtruding upon the minds of the jury matters which are foreign or of questionable pertinency, is as a general rule admissible evidence. On the other hand, undue multiplication of the issues is to be steadily guarded against, as tending to divert the minds of jurors from the main issue."

In the natural order of treatment, all the principles and rules of Relevancy would here first be treated systematically by themselves; and then, in Part II, the various Auxiliary Rules of Convenience, applying to this or that class of relevant and otherwise admissible facts, would receive in their turn a separate and systematic treatment, accompanied by a re-survey of the classes of cases in which facts already sanctioned so far as relevancy went were nevertheless excluded by the doctrines of practical inconvenience, — just as the testimonial qualifications of witnesses are recognized to be a separate subject with determinate rules, while the occasional exclusionary rules of confidential communications, self-criminating testimony, and the like, are separately treated under the rules of privilege, without misleading results. But for many classes of circumstantial evidence this separation of treatment would be practically inconvenient and confusing. It will therefore be desirable, in the ensuing pages, while discussing the detailed rules of Relevancy, at the same time to consider the Auxiliary Rules of Convenience so far as they may affect the particular class of evidence considered. In this manner the net rule for a particular class of evidentiary facts can be set forth, though it may rest upon some combined principles of relevancy and of practical convenience.

But it is worth while to note that such rules can be properly used only by keeping in mind the composite nature of their principles. Under differing circumstances, one or the other of the principles may cease to operate, and then the rule would vary. To recur to the simile of an obstacle race (ante, § 13); suppose a series of three races, open respectively to adults, to lawyers, and to club-members; suppose that one of the obstacles is a stream of water twenty feet deep and twenty feet across, so that no one has any chance for success who cannot swim. Now when we hear that A has failed to run in the race, although his name was entered, we cannot tell whether it is because he was disqualified as not being an adult or a lawyer or a club-member, or because he cannot swim; he may be eligible in one or in all three classes, and yet may be obliged to abandon his entry because he is no swimmer; or he may be able to swim but may be neither club-member nor lawyer nor adult. So with the exclusion of a fact to which some Auxiliary Rule of Convenience is capable of applying. The mere result of exclusion tells us nothing as to the reason or principle of exclusion. Yet it is necessary that we should know the kind of reason involved. The fact may be relevant, but in the particular instance objections to an auxiliary rule of policy; if so, we may be able to use it for some occasion to which that policy does not apply. Or, the fact may be objectionable to no such auxiliary policy, but merely irrelevant under the circumstances; if so, we may be able to cure its irrelevancy by changing the terms of our offer, and thus use it without hindrance. It is therefore indispensable when any fact or class of facts is found excluded, to ascertain if possible whether the reason of exclusion is based on its irrelevancy or on some auxiliary rule of policy. Without knowing these reasons, we are helpless and our rules are mere rules of thumb. In practice, Courts almost invariably indicate the reasons for exclusion. Though these reasons have seldom been much studied by the bar, the material is plentiful enough for a correct understanding of the principles concerned.

§ 43. Classification of Circumstantial Evidence. There are two important considerations that affect the classification of circumstantial evidence for convenient treatment. These considerations affect with equal force the classification of testimonial evidence (post, §§ 475, 875); but their bearings are there more easily apparent, and have been unconsciously accepted without question.

(1) The starting-point of the classification should be the proposition desired to be proved, rather than the evidentiary fact offered. The fundamental inquiry of relevancy is (ante, §§ 2, 3) whether the claimed conclusion is a probable inference from the offered fact. Now if we take a specific conclusion (proposition, factum probandum) as the starting-point, and ask in turn, whether it is relevantly evidenced by fact a, fact b, fact c, and so on, we are able to compare intelligently, without repetition, the various sources from which the conclusion or proposition is capable of being inferred; for it will often happen that the precise fact a will be irrelevant, while fact a', a slightly altered circumstance, will be relevant; so that a comparison of the various circumstances or combinations of circumstances which may become or be made relevant is possible only by taking the factum probandum as a starting-point or centre, and swinging round the circle of the various offerable evidentiary circumstances. If, on the contrary, we were to take each particular evidentiary fact in turn as the starting-point, and ask what various conclusions it is relevant to show, we should find that many distinct facts are available to evidence a single proposition, and thus an intelligent comparison of them would be difficult and much confusing repetition would be necessary. For these reasons, the basis of the classification should be the different kinds of propositions (facta probanda), so analyzed as to separate those which are essentially different in their requirements.

(2) A second consideration helps us to limit the field of classification, — the consideration that we are concerned, not with the conceivable kinds of propositions or of evidentiary facts, but only with such as have been made the subject of rules or rulings by the Courts. There are various plans of arrangement which might be justified, and there are scores of possible and curious lines of proof which the records of famous trials disclose. But we are here dealing, not with a general scheme of human life or of modes of proof, but with a limited body of rules brought forth by problems laid before the Courts for adjudication. Not every species of evidentiary fact or of inference is brought into the realm of judicial evidence, but chiefly certain common and frequently recurring matters affecting the usual crimes and civil disputes; and not every common kind of evidentiary fact is brought to the Supreme Courts for adjudication, but only those about which some doubt may be raised. Take, for instance, the proof of an alibi; until the very recent epoch of factious quibbling, a ruling upon evidence in connection with an alibi was exceedingly rare; and yet there could have been no more frequent an issue in a criminal case. Take, again, the immense number of rulings in the last half-century dealing with value-evidence; the problems and the evidence have always been conceivable, but they did not form the material of judicial rulings until disputes involving them became common, i. e. until the frequency of land-condemnation for public purposes since the era of railroads and municipal improvements, for here the values remained to be fixed by the tribunal instead of (as ordinarily) by the parties to contracts of sale.

Having in view these considerations, the most practicable classification consists in dividing the facta probanda into three groups:

I. A Human Act;

II. A Human Quality, Condition, or State;

III. A Fact or Condition of External Nature.

These three groups fall naturally apart, in our system, because in the first group the dominant and indirectly influential rule is the rule forbidding the admission of moral character to evidence an act, in certain classes of cases; and, in the second group, the rule excluding extrinsic testimony to particular acts of conduct holds a similar place; while in the third group the evidentiary facts and problems are almost naturally distinct from those of the first two. There are of course a few matters which do not plainly fall within one or another group; but this is inevitable under any classification.

Next, under each group, it will be convenient to arrange the evidentiary facts according as the proof or indication they afford is:

A. Prospectant;

B. Concomitant; or

C. Retrospectant.[1]

Instances under the second head are rare; an alibi is the usual one. But the distinction between the first and the third heads is always marked and often useful in hints. For instance, under Group I, above, the evidentiary facts of Character, Plan or Design, Motive, point forward to a future act; i. e. we take our stand before the time of the act, and argue that because of the person's character, design, or motive, he was likely, or not, to do the act in the future; while the fact of Consciousness of Guilt points backwards, i. e. we infer from his state of mind that he has been guilty of some crime in the past. In evidencing matters under Group II, this distinction becomes peculiarly useful; e. g. the fact of hereditary insanity as pointing forward to a defendant's insanity raises a question of relevancy essentially different from that raised by evidence of abnormal conduct exhibited by him; so also in proving an emotion or passion (motive), evidentiary circumstances such as family relationship, need of money, and the like, are offered as a priori indications, pointing forward to the probability of such an emotion being excited, while outward exhibitions of conduct, used for the same purpose, have an a posteriori value as showing that the emotion was the probable source of the evidentiary conduct. This distinction, then, while not always an essential one, at least provides a convenient order of arrangement, and is often serviceable in emphasizing related qualities of probative value.

In searching, then, for the true significance of a piece of evidence, it should always be remembered that the prime question serving as the key, not merely to this classification, but at all times to the use of evidence before the Courts, is: What particular proposition is the fact offered to prove? With the aid of this question, there will be little difficulty in discovering the specific problem which any particular kind of evidence involves.

[1] It is perhaps worth noting that this analysis was long ago hinted at by Burke, in his disquisition on evidence in the Report on Warren Hastings' Trial in 1794 (31 Parl. Hist. 342); "every circumstance," he remarks, "precedent, concomitant, and subsequent, become parts of circumstantial evidence."

SUB-TITLE I: EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT.

TOPIC I: PROSPECTANT EVIDENCE.

SUB-TOPIC A: CHARACTER OR DISPOSITION, AS EVIDENCE OF A HUMAN ACT.

CHAPTER V.

§ 51. Classification of Prospectant Evidence. It is convenient (as pointed out ante, § 38) to arrange the order of evidentiary facts, when offered to prove the doing of a human act, according as the indication of the evidence is Prospectant, Concomitant, or Retrospectant.[1] Evidence of the first of these three classes is much the most voluminous, so far as it raises questions of admissibility, though it is probably not the most frequent in point of actual use in trials.

[1] The last two classes are dealt with in Chapters VII and VIII, post.

Evidentiary facts having Prospectant indications are of several sorts, which may be roughly grouped as follows: Character or Disposition; Habit or Custom; Emotion or Motive; Design or Plan; Physical Capacity (including Strength and Skill). The nature of the argument or inference in each instance is this: Because A had a Disposition, Habit, Emotion, Design, or Capacity to do (or not to do), an act x, therefore he probably did (or did not do) the act x alleged. Observe that the party alleging the act argues that the disposition indicates a doing of the act, while the party denying the act argues that the (opposite) disposition indicates a not-doing; the nature of the argument or inference being precisely the same in both cases, the difference being in the proposition to be proved. Of these different kinds of evidentiary facts, the tenor of our law suggests that the treatment of Character or Disposition should come first (though other arrangements are conceivable); for the practical reason that special and positive limitations are conceded to affect it, and that these limitations have sometimes mistakenly been supposed to apply to the other sorts of evidence. Indeed, the character-rule is the dominant one for this branch of the subject.

Sub-topic A: CHARACTER OR DISPOSITION, AS EVIDENCE OF A HUMAN ACT.

1. Preliminary Discriminations.

§ 52. "Character" in Two Senses: Disposition, and Reputation of it. There are two distinct problems of evidence about character, in which the common use of one word for two ideas has caused confusion: (1) Is a person's disposition — i. e. a trait, or group of traits, or the sum of his traits — relevant and admissible for certain purposes? (2) Whenever it is so admissible as an evidentiary fact and thus becomes in its turn a proposition to be proved, how is it to be evidenced, — by the community's reputation, and by that only, and on what conditions?

The first question is essentially one of Relevancy, though auxiliary policies often come in to exclude relevant character. The second question, however, is raised in an entirely different quarter and has nothing to do with relevancy; moreover, it has nothing to do with character as an evidentiary fact, but with the mode of proving character, assuming it to be properly provable either as an evidentiary fact or as an issue. Two special problems which the second question raises are concerned with the Hearsay Rule and with the Opinion Rule. The Hearsay Rule concerns the question whether Reputation-Hearsay, when offered to show Character, forms an exception to that rule, and on what conditions the exception is allowed, — what constitutes a reputation, from how many people must it arise, in what place and at what time, and so on (post, §§ 1608–1621). The Opinion Rule raises the question whether individual testimonial opinion or estimate of character is obnoxious to that rule, and operates (if so applied) to exclude the testimony of individuals based on personal observation of another's character (post, §§ 1980–1987). At the present point, there is no question about the mode of getting at character; we assume that it is offered to be established in some proper way, and we ask how far this character (or actual disposition) is relevant to the present purpose. It is as if one had to decide whether he should spend a summer vacation at the mountains or at home, and also whether he should be able, in order to reach the mountains, to take a through train or should have to change cars; both these problems may have to be settled, and the acts both of travelling and of sojourning in the mountains are closely connected in point of time; but the considerations which affect the two problems have nothing in common; if we go, we shall do so in spite of having to change cars; and if we give up our journey, we shall take no train at all. Character and reputation are as distinct as are destination and journey. Nevertheless, the occasional use of the single term "character" for both actual disposition and reputation of it, and the circumstance that reputation is the most usual (and in some jurisdictions practically the only lawful) way of evidencing this actual disposition, has sometimes led even careful judges to define reputation and actual disposition, for all purposes of evidence, as the same, and to intimate that reputation alone is the thing involved:

1817, Duncan, J., in Kimmel v. Kimmel, 3 S. & R. 338: "Character and reputation are the same; the reputation which a man has in society is his character."

1854, Redfield, C. J., in Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 278: "'Character' and 'general character' are the same, of course, if by 'character' we understand the common estimation in which the man is held, by his acquaintance, for truth; and the books upon evidence so use the term. The word 'character' no doubt has an objective and subjective import, which are quite distinct. As to the object, character is its quality; as to the man, it is the quality of his mind, and his affections, capacity, and temperament. But as a subjective term, certainly in the minds of others, one's character is the aggregate or the abstract of other men's opinions of one. . . . It is the conclusion of the mind of the witness, in summing up the amount of all the reports he has heard of the man, and declaring his character for truth as held in the minds of his neighbors and acquaintances; and, in this sense, 'general character' and 'general report or reputation' are the same, as held in the books."

But this notion is certainly unfounded. The law itself clearly demonstrates this, because there is in fact more than one way of evidencing actual character. Reputation is not the sole way. Individual estimate was formerly always available, and still is in some jurisdictions (post, § 1980). Specific acts of conduct are also available for some purposes, especially to show a witness' character (post, § 977). If reputation were the essential and relevant fact, these other modes of proving character would be impossible; for the thing they are used to prove would be unrecognized in the law of evidence. The truth is that reputation is merely one of three possible modes of proving actual character. Even if it were the exclusive mode, by reason of considerations excluding other modes, it would be as reasonable to identify it with actual character as to identify the Red Line railroad with the town Millville simply because the other railroads to Millville have been abandoned or blockaded. Character, then, is to be considered, for the purposes of relevancy, as the actual moral or psychical disposition, or sum of traits, and is to be distinguished from reputation or any other source of evidencing character;[1] and this the Courts have frequently emphasized:

1855, Pearson, J., in Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 160: "As to the mode of proving character. The word has two meanings; to this may be ascribed the confusion of ideas met with in some of the cases. 'Character: The peculiar qualities impressed by nature or by habit on the person, which distinguish him from others; these constitute his real character. The qualities which he is supposed to possess constitute his estimated character, or reputation': Webster's Dictionary. Is a man honest, is he good-natured, is he of a violent temper, is he modest and retiring or impudent and forward, — these all constitute traits of character and are facts. . . . A witness called to prove them can only give the opinion which he has formed by his observations of the conduct of the person under particular circumstances. . . . Has a man the estimated character, or reputation, of being honest, or of being good-natured, or passionate, or humane, or cruel, — this general character, as it is called, is also a fact; it is the opinion which those who are acquainted with him have formed in respect to his several traits of character. This is also a mode of proving real character, which is the object in view. But it is objectionable, because it is a mere approximation, and does not arrive at the fact itself. The opinion of a man's acquaintances that he is honest, or good-natured, etc., does not prove that he is so. Still, this mode of proof is less objectionable than that which depends on the individual opinion of witnesses, . . . therefore it is admissible in more instances than the other."

1876, Berry, J., in State v. Lee, 22 Minn. 409: "[The relevancy of character] does not rest upon the ground that in general repute the accused possesses a disposition which would render it unlikely that he would commit the crime, but upon the fact that he possesses the disposition, — a fact of which general repute is only evidence."

1884, Campbell, C. J., in Pickens v. State, 61 Miss. 567: "Reputation which is general, prevalent, concurred in generally by those familiar with one, is presumed to be indicative of actual character."

§ 53. Conduct to evidence Character, distinguished from the Relevancy of Character itself. There is also to be distinguished the use of specific conduct to evidence character from the admissibility of character itself to evidence something else. Thus, the prosecution in a criminal case may sometimes use the defendant's bad character as relevant; but it is not allowed to evidence that character (as a proposition to be proved) by specific acts of misconduct (post, § 194). The reasons affecting the admissibility of this kind of evidence to show character must be kept separate from the reasons affecting the use of character itself as evidential. The latter may be allowable, yet the other not. In civil cases the separation is equally important. Much will always depend on whether the fact of character is being offered as an evidentiary fact, or whether it is itself a proposition to be evidenced by conduct exhibiting the character.

§ 54. Character as Evidentiary, distinguished from Character as an Issue on the Pleadings. (1) The present question is, whether a person's character is admissible to show the doing or not-doing of an act by him. But there are two other ways in which character may be involved, — one an evidential question, the other not. (2) Whether a person's character is evidentiary for any other purpose, e.g. a wife's character to show that the husband's alienation of affection was a natural consequence, or a deceased's character to show that the defendant was reasonably afraid of an attack by the deceased. This use is less usual, but must be distinguished as not being offered to evidence the doing of an act by the person having the character. (3) Whether a person's character is under the legal principles and the pleadings of the case one of the issues in it; e.g. the character of a plaintiff in defamation, either as expressly brought in issue by a plea of truth, or as issuable in the assessment of damages; the character of an employee as involving the employer's liability to a fellow-servant for the selection of incompetent employees; the character of a house charged with being used for immoral traffic; and so on. Here no evidentiary use is made of the character; it merely plays a part in the legal issues of the case, and the nature of the litigation must be looked to in determining whether character is so involved. This aspect of character as an issue in the case has constantly to be distinguished.[1]

[1] For passages further illustrating the distinction, see post, § 1608.

2. Character as evidentiary of an Act.

§ 55. (1) Defendant in a Criminal Case; Relevancy of Character. The evidentiary use of character for or against a defendant in a criminal case cannot be understood without separating the principles of Relevancy and of Undue Prejudice. As already pointed out (ante, §§ 42, 43), the first inquiry for all circumstantial evidence is whether it is relevant. If it is not, it cannot come in at all, and no further question arises. But if it is relevant, it may still be obnoxious to some independent policy of exclusion, some doctrine of Unfair Surprise or Undue Prejudice; and so far and so long as such a doctrine applies, the evidentiary fact, though relevant (i. e. having probative value) and therefore otherwise admissible, is to be excluded. Thus, as soon as this auxiliary policy ceases to apply, the fact, being relevant, is no longer prevented from entering. It thus becomes practically important to ascertain how far character, for the present purpose, may be, on the one hand, irrelevant, and how far, on the other hand, the objections to it may be based on grounds of auxiliary policy (ante, § 42, post, § 1904); for thus only can be understood the changing conditions of exclusion.

A defendant's character, then, as indicating the probability of his doing or not doing the act charged, is essentially relevant. As a matter of human nature in daily experience, this is not to be doubted. The character or disposition — i.e. a fixed trait or the sum of traits — of the persons we deal with is in daily life always more or less considered by us in estimating the probability of his future conduct. As a matter of legal theory and practice, the case is no different. A defendant is allowed to appeal to his own good character to aid in the demonstration of his innocence; and the prosecution is allowed to use the opposite fact for the opposite purpose. The Courts have made it clear that a defendant's character is regarded as constantly having probative value on that question:

[1] These separate uses of character are dealt with post, §§ 69–79.

1837, Patteson, J., in R. v. Stonnard, 7 C. & P. 674: "The object of laying the latter [character] before the jury is to induce them to believe, from the improbability that a person of good character should have conducted himself as alleged, that there is some mistake or misrepresentation in the evidence on the part of the prosecution"; Williams, J.: "It is evidence to induce them to say whether they think it likely that a person with such a character would have committed the offence."

1851, Alderson, B., in R. v. Shrimpton, 5 Cox Cr. 387: "You say he is not likely to have committed this offence, because he is a man of good character; then, in answer to that, they say he is likely, because he is not a man of good character"; Compbell, C. J.: "The question in issue is the good character of the prisoner, — whether or not he was likely to commit the offence of which he was charged."

1865, Willes, J., in R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 540: "It is a mistake to suppose that because the prisoner only can raise the question of character, it is therefore a collateral issue. It is not. Such evidence is admissible because it renders it less probable that what the prosecution has averred is true; it is strictly relevant to the issue"; Cockburn, C. J.: "What you want to get at is the tendency and disposition of the man's mind towards committing or abstaining from the class of crime with which he stands charged."

1820, Hosmer, C. J., in Stowe v. Converse, 3 Conn. 325 (speaking of the use of "uniform profession, conduct, and conversation" to rebut a charge of infidelity): "From the life and conversation of a man, viewed conjointly, men in private life form an opinion of his character; and Courts and jurors must form their opinion in the same manner. . . . If the words and actions harmonize, they form a united whole; and every man who exhibits a good conversation out of his lips, as well as a fair example in his life, is entitled to the benefit of both, at all times and in all places."

1858, Strong, J., in Concemi v. People, 16 N. Y. 506: "The principle upon which good character may be proved is that it affords a presumption against the commission of crime. This presumption arises from the improbability, as a general rule, as proved by common observation and experience, that a person who has uniformly pursued an honest and upright course of conduct will depart from it and do an act so inconsistent with it. Such a person may be overcome by temptation and fall into crime, and cases of that kind often occur; but they are exceptions; the rule is otherwise. The influence of this presumption from character will necessarily vary according to the varying circumstances of different cases."

1876, Berry, J., in State v. Lee, 22 Minn. 409: "The purpose of the evidence as to the character of the accused is to show his disposition, and to base thereon a probable presumption that he would not be likely to commit, and therefore did not commit, the crime with which he is charged."

§ 56. Same: Defendant's Good Character always admissible in his favor. Character being thus relevant, it follows that a defendant may offer his good character to evidence the improbability of his doing the act charged, unless there is some collateral reason for exclusion; and the law recognizes none such.

Up to the beginning of the 1800s, it is true, the admissibility was not recognized in this absolute form. There were two well understood limitations, both based apparently on considerations of probative value, but both now entirely abandoned:

(1) It was once thought that character could be appealed to in capital cases only:

1802, Mr. McNally, Evidence, 320: "It has been heretofore held that a prisoner cannot examine to character, except in favorem vitæ, when charged on a capital indictment; but the rule is now wisely extended to all cases of misdemeanors. And this appears to have been the ancient practice. In R. v. Brown, 1798, . . . the point appears finally settled. . . . Lord Carlton, C. J. C. P., said he had conversed with many of the judges on the subject now before the court, who thought, as he did, that . . . evidence of such a nature might be very material; for example, suppose a man of very great property was indicted for perjury, where the object to be attained by the perjury was a mere trifle, for instance a shilling; or suppose a man to be charged with a riot or assault who was known to be of a peaceable and quiet disposition; evidence of character in such cases, directly encountering the nature of the charge in the indictment must be of the last importance. . . . Lord Kilwarden, C. J. K. B., agreed with Lord Carlton, and observed that the reason generally assigned for the admission of such evidence in capital cases only was altogether unsatisfactory to his mind. It was said to be 'in favorem vitæ,' but he had no conception, according to the principles of sound sense and right reason, that character could be evidence in a case affecting the life of a man, and yet not evidence in a case affecting his freedom, his property, and his reputation."

1807, Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317; murder; Parsons, C. J., "said that he was of opinion that a prisoner ought to be permitted to give in evidence his general character in all [criminal] cases; for he did not see why it should be evidence in a capital case and not in cases of an inferior degree. In doubtful cases, a good general character, clearly established, ought to have weight with a jury; but it ought not to prevail against the positive testimony of credible witnesses"; Sewall and Parker, JJ., "said that they were not prepared to say that testimony of general character should be admitted in behalf of the defendant in all criminal prosecutions; but they were clearly of opinion that it might be admitted in capital cases, in favor of life."

It is now well understood to be admissible upon charges of all grades, even of mere misdemeanors.[1]

(2) It was also once thought that character was receivable in doubtful cases only, to turn the balance of evidence:

1808, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., to the jury in Davison's Trial, 31 How. St. Tr. 217: "If you do not know which way to decide, character should have an effect. But it is otherwise in cases which are clear. If it could be permitted to operate where a crime is clearly proved, it would always be brought forward; because there is hardly any one who has not at some time maintained a good character. . . . If the evidence were in even balance, character should make it preponderate in favor of a defendant; but in order to let character have its operation, the case must be reduced to that situation."

[1] 1874, State v. Kabrich, 39 Ia. 277 (in any "public offence"); 1878, State v. Northrup, 48 id. 584 ("all criminal cases where the object of the prosecution is to punish the offender for the crime"); 1900, State v. Wolf, 112 Ia. 458, 84 N. W. 536; 1903, State v. Cather, — id. —, 96 N. W. 722; 1850, Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 324; 1857, State v. Henry, 5 Jones L. 65, 67; 1895, State v. Hice, 117 N. C. 782, 23 S. E. 357 (in this case it had been ruled below that the defendant's good character was not admissible unless he went on the stand, — a ruling exhibiting such an ignorance of fundamental notions as would seem scarcely credible, even in a time when ignorance is allowed so freely to thrust itself to the front); 1897, State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964 ("in a criminal action").

But it is now understood to be admissible without any such limitation.[2] The broad statements by some Courts that a defendant's character in criminal cases is "always admissible"[3] negative impliedly both the foregoing limitations. Whether, when admitted, it should be given weight except in a doubtful case, or whether it may suffice of itself to create a doubt, is a mere question of the weight of evidence, with which the rules of admissibility have no concern.[4]

(3) Where the doing of the act charged is not in dispute, because conceded, it has been said that character no longer has any probative function, and should not be received, since it certainly cannot be set up merely in excuse.[5] But, after all, so far as in criminal cases the criminal intent remains in issue, the good character of the defendant may be regarded as always relevant to disprove it; and the better way seems to admit it.[6]

§ 57. Same: Defendant's Bad Character may not be offered against him. There is just as much probative value in the argument, "A is quarrelsome, therefore he probably committed this assault," as in the argument, "A is peaceable, therefore he probably did not commit the assault"; and this is acknowledged in judicial opinion (ante, § 55). Here, however, a doctrine of auxiliary policy operates to exclude what is relevant, — the policy of avoiding the uncontrollable and unfair prejudice and possible unjust condemnation which such evidence might induce:

1865, Willes, J., R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 540: "[Character evidence] is strictly relevant to the issue; bnt it is not admissible upon the part of the prosecution because, as my brother Martin says, if the prosecution were allowed to go iuto such evidence, we should have the whole life of the prisoner ripped up, and, as has been witnessed elsewhere, npon a trial for murder you might begin by showing that when a boy at school the prisoner had robbed an orchard, and so on throngh the whole of his life; and the result would be that the man on his trial might be overwhelmed by prejudice, instead of being convicted by that affirmative evidence which the law of this country requires. The evidence is relevant to the issue, but is excluded for reasons of policy and humanity;

[2] 1873, Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 155, 164; 1865, People v. Stewart, 28 Cal. 395 (overruling People v. Josephs, 7 id. 129, 1857); 1864, Jnpitz v. People, 34 Ill. 516, 521; 1867, Steele v. People, 45 id. 157; 1876, State v. Kinley, 43 Ia. 296; 1895, People v. Van Dam, 107 Mich. 425, 65 N. W. 277; 1899, State v. Sloan, 22 Mont. 293, 56 Pac. 364; 1790, State v. Wells, 1 N. J. L. 424, 429; 1857, State v. Henry, 5 Jones L. 65, 67; 1877, State v. Laxton, 76 N. C. 216, 218; 1898, State v. Blue, 17 Utah 175, 53 Pac. 978; 1899, Rowe v. U. S., 38 C. C. A. 496, 97 Fed. 779.

[3] 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 198; 1883, People v. Mead, 50 id. 233, 15 N. W. 95; 1859, Wesley v. State, 37 Miss. 327, 352; 1883, State v. King, 78 Mo. 556.

[4] This is a profitless question, which does not aid the jury at all. A discussion of the question may be fonnd in the following cases: 1903, Brazil v. State, — Ga. —, 43 S. E. 460; 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 27; 1878, State v. Northrup, 48 Ie. 584.

[5] 1807, Draper's Trial, 30 How. St. T. 1018 (criminal libel; "Do you think the defendent capable or incapable of publishing any statement of fects of the truth of which he was not perfectly convinced?" A. "Perfectly incapahle." Lord Ellenborongh: "I cannot suppose you meen it for any other purpose than as going in mitigation of punishment. . . . It cannot be offered in the shape of a defence. Good God! because one man says a thing and beceuse I may believe what he says, am I at liberty to dissemmate it all over the world? There is no color for it. I receive this for the purpose of mitigation of punishment. If the fact of publication were doubtful, and if it were referred to a man [ae defendant] who had such a character given to him, this wonld be evidence to go to the jury in anewer to the charge, end in that way it would be most materiel. But here you do not dispute that fect").

[6] 1873, Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 155, 164 (here, to disprove malice in murder); 1851, Davis v. State, 10 Ga. 103, 105 (murder).

because although by admitting it you might arrive at justice in one case out of a hundred, you would probably do injustice to the other ninety-nine"; Martin, B.: "There would be great danger that the prisoner would be tried on the evidence of character, instead of on that bearing more directly upon the offence charged."

1840, Verplanck, Sen., in People v. White, 24 Wend. 574: "The rule and practice of our law in relation to evidence of character rests on the deepest principles of truth and justice. The protection of the law is due alike to the righteous and unrighteous. The sun of justice shines alike for the evil and the good, the just and the unjust. Crime must be proved, not presumed; on the contrary, the most vicious is presumed innocent until proved guilty. The admission of a contrary rule, even in any degree, would open a door not only to direct oppression of those who are vicious because they are ignorant and weak, but even to the operation of prejudices as to religion, politics, character, profession, manners, upon the minds of honest and well-intentioned jurors."

1872, Doe, J., in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 406: "[There is] an exception (which is a peculiarity of precedents of English origin) excluding relevant evidence of a defendant's general and notorious disposition to commit such crimes or torts as that with which he is charged. . . . That such evidence is relevant, the law acknowledges by receiving, in criminal cases and in some civil cases, evidence of a defendant's good character in his favor, and allowing such evidence to be rebutted; and by receiving evidence of the character of witnesses and of other persons. The exclusion of such evidence is a plain departure from the general principle which admits relevant and material evidence. There is reason to believe that this exception originated in a usurpation of legislative power by English judges, led by a merciful impulse to mitigate the cruelty of a bloody criminal code by throwing obstacles in the way of its operation."

1876, Cushing, C. J., in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 289, 296: "It is a maxim of our law, that every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. It is characteristic of the humanity of all the English-speaking peoples, that you cannot blacken the character of a party who is on trial for an alleged crime. Prisoners ordinarily come before the court and the jury under manifest disadvantages. The very fact that a man is charged with a crime is sufficient to create in many minds a belief that he is guilty. It is quite inconsistent with that fairness of trial to which every man is entitled, that the jury should be prejudiced against him by any evidence except what relates to the issue; above all should it not be permitted to blacken his character, to show that he is worthless, to lighten the sense of responsibility which rests upon the jury, by showing that he is not worthy of painstaking and care, and, in short, that the trial is what the chemists and anatomists call experimentum in corpore vili."

1895, Peckham, J., in People v. Shay, 147 N. Y. 78, 41 N. E. 508: "Two antagonistic methods for the judicial investigation of crime and the conduct of criminal trials have existed for many years. One of these methods favors this kind of evidence, in order that the tribunal which is engaged in the trial of the accused may have the benefit of the light to be derived from a record of the whole past life of the accused, his tendencies, his nature, his associates, his practices, and, in fine, all the facts which go to make up the life of a human being. This is the method which is pursued in France, and it is claimed that entire justice is more apt to be done where such course is pursued than where it is omitted. The common law of England, however, has adopted another, and, so far as the party accused is concerned, a much more merciful doctrine. . . . In order to prove his guilt, it is not permitted to show his former character, or to prove his guilt of other crimes, merely for the purpose of raising a presumption that he who would commit them would be more apt to commit the crime in question."[1]

This policy of the Anglo-American law is perhaps more or less due to the

[1] The reasons for the rule were well and concisely put in a letter from the celebrated Dr. Parr to Sir S. Romilly, in 1811 (Life of Romilly, 3d ed., II, 180). Compare also § 194, post.

inborn sporting instinct of Anglo-Normandom — the instinct of giving the game fair play, — an instinct which asserts itself in other departments of our trial-law to much less advantage. But, as a pure question of policy, the doctrine is and can be supported as one better calculated than the opposite to lead to just verdicts. The deep tendency of human nature to punish, not because our victim is guilty this time, but because he is a bad man and may as well be condemned now that he is caught, is a tendency which cannot help operating with any jury, in or out of court. There are also indirect and more subtle disadvantages.[2] Our rule, then, firmly and universally established in policy and tradition, is that the prosecution may not initially attack the defendant's character.[3]

§ 58. Same: Prosecution may Rebut. After a defendant has attempted to show his good character in his own aid, the prosecution may in rebuttal offer as evidence his bad character.[1] The true reason for this seems to be, not any relaxation of the principle just mentioned, i. e. not a permission to show the defendant's bad character, but a liberty to refute his claim that he has a good one. Otherwise a defendant, secure from refutation, would have an absolute license to impose a false character upon the tribunal.[2]

[2] As suggested by Sir J. F. Stephan, quoted post, § 2251.

[3] 1872, People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137, 149 (murder by a mistress; here the defendant had offered evidence that the acts of the deceased had ruined her prospects in life, and the prosecution's rebuttal evidence that her character for chastity was already bad was held improperly received; this is clearly wrong, for it tended to show that on alleged fact relied on by the defendant was false and there was no other way of showing its falsity); 1874, State v. Kabrich, 39 Ia. 277; 1900, State v. Beaty, 62 Kan. 266, 62 Pac. 658 (larceny; the bad character of the defendant's associates, excluded); 1862, State v. Tozier, 49 Me. 404; 1763, R. v. Doaks, 1 Quincy 90; 1850, Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 325; 1866, State v. Creson, 38 Mo. 372; 1835, People v. White, 14 Wend. 113; 1840, People v. White, 24 Wend. 524, and passim; 1857, People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 457, 14 N. E. 319; 1829, State v. Merrill, 2 Dev. 269, 277; 1847, State v. O'Neal, 7 Ired. 251; 1850, Fain v. Edwards, 11 id. 307. Sometimes a case falls near the line of other principles: 1897, Downey v. State, 115 Ala. 108, 22 So. 479 (gaming; question to the defendant, whether he followed gambling for a livelihood, excluded; compare §§ 92, 300, post); 1880, State v. Moelchen, 53 Ia. 310, 313, 5 N. W. 186 (the defendant' previous occupation in Europe as a soldier, admitted; that it should be argued that he was "trained to scenes of blood and carnage," would be improper; but this was not necessarily involved in the evidence).

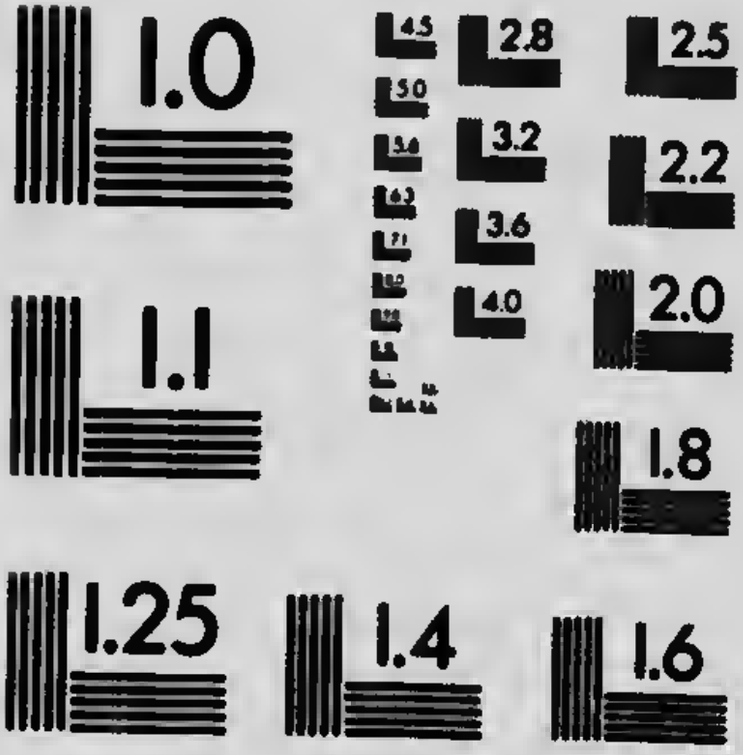
For the question whether the defendant's failure to produce evidence of good character is to be understood as an admission that his character is bad, see post, § 290.

[1] 1722, Page, J., cited in Vin. Abr. XII, 48, tit. Evidence ("In criminal cases, when the prisoner calls persons to his reputation, this gives an handle to the Crown to give evidence of the prisoner's reputation"); 1665, R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520 (Martin, B., who expressed a contrary opinion, asserted that "in no single recorded instance during the whole of that period [two hundred years] has evidence of general bad character been given in reply to evidence of the prisoner's good character"; but it was pointed out by Cockburn, C. J., and Willes, J., (1) that where good character could be shown, of course evidence of bad character would usually only be available in case these witnesses were false, and in such a case the prosecution's customary warning of rebuttal-testimony would deter the use of the defence's testimony; and (2) that the mention of rebutting evidence of the sort, as allowable, by the great lawyer-writers on Evidence of the early century, showed a practice, and not merely a principle). This case disposes of the contrary ruling in R. v. Burt, 5 Cox Cr. 284, 1851, Martin, B., and Erle, J. (giving no reasons, but apparently moved by considerations affecting the right of counsel to reply as based on the order of testimony). In the United States, the propriety of such evidence has been uniformly conceded: 1807, Parsons, C. J., in Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317 ("Whenever the defendant chooses to call witnesses to prove his general character to be good, the prosecutor may offer witnesses to disprove their testimony); 1858, Clifford, J., in U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 111, 15 Fed. 382 ("Such evidence is never admitted until the accused . . . has laid the foundation for its introduction by offering evidence to show that he is of good character, and then the counterproof is properly admitted as rebutting testimony").

[2] E. g. Erle, J., in R. v. Rowton, supra ("If the prisoner, having a bad character, misleads

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1853 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(718) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

§ 59. Same: Kind of Character. What limitations on these uses of a defendant's character are imposed by the principle of relevancy? In the first place, the character or disposition offered, whether for or against him, must involve the specific trait related to the act charged:

1663, Dover's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 539, 552; seditious publication; a witness testified that the defendant was a faithful member of the train-band; L. C. J. Hyde: "Do not mistake yourself. The testimony of your civil behavior, going to church, appearing in the trained bands, going to Paul's, being there at common service, — this is well. But you are not charged for this. A man may do all this, and yet be a naughty man in printing abusive books, to the misleading of the king's subjects."

1794, Mr. Erskine, arguing in Hardy's Trial and Horne Tooke's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 1076, 25 id. 348: "The meaning of witnesses to character is this; for instance, put the case of a man who is charged with a crime of a particular description, — suppose a man charged with an unnatural crime; would it be any evidence at all to that man's character that he paid his bills regularly, and that he was not a dishonest man, or anything of that sort? No; your examination to character must always be analogous to the nature of the charge; and you would there inquire whether he was a man of chastity; you would inquire into his regard for women, into his morals, and into his conversation, so as it might rebuff any such horrible and detestable idea having passed in his mind, that he was a man capable in the ordinary course of his life of entertaining such opinions and making use of such expressions. So if a man is indicted for any other offence, if a man is indicted for a robbery, I say I will show you that he was not a necessitous man, that he possessed a large fortune at that time, that he was a man whose ideas were moral and totally contrary to any such practice. That is the nature of character. . . . I speak to a most honorable person upon the bench, who lately tried Mr. Purefoy for the murder of Colonel Roper in a d[illegible]. What were the questions asked as to his character? Were they whether he was a good officer? Drilled his company well? Was a well-bred man? Whether he paid his debts? No; but whether he was a man of humanity. A gentleman came from a great distance to testify that humanity was the paramount characteristic of his disposition."

1817, Turner's Trial, 32 How. St. Tr. 1007; high treason; Mr. Cross (for the defence): "What has been his general character as far as you have known him?" Mr. Gurney (opposing): "I submit to your lordships that the proper question is as to loyalty"; Mr. Denman (for the defence): "If he is generally a respectable man, an inference arises that he is a loyal man"; Mr. Gurney: "If a man is indicted for felony, evidence is produced to his honesty; if for rape, to his chastity; and so on"; Mr. Justice Abbott: "As far as my experience goes, the inquiry into character is always adapted to the charge"; Mr. Denman: ". . . A man who had conducted himself peaceably and respectably was not likely to enter into wild schemes"; Mr. Justice Abbott: "The question was objected to as too general and therefore not applicable; it was not whether he was a peaceable man, but as to his general character."

1889, McClellan, J., in Morgan v. State, 88 Ala. 224, 6 So. 761: "The object and effect of such evidence is to disprove guilt by furnishing a presumption that the defendant would not have committed the offence; and hence the character sought to be proved must be such as would make it unlikely that the party would do the controverted act."[1]

the Court, . . . the false impression should be removed"); 1851, Alderson, B., and Campbell, C. J., in R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 322; Clifford, J., in U. S. v. Holmes, supra. In Lord Mansfield's phrase (2 Atk. 339), the defendant, by going into his own character, gives "a challenge to the prosecutor."

[1] 1701, Captain Kidd's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 146 (murder; Kidd: "My lord, I have witnesses to produce for my reputation; . . . I can prove what service I have done for the king [as a king's officer, before I turned pirate]"; L. C. B. Ward: "What would that help you in this case of murder?)"; 1865, Martin, B., in R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 537 (it must be "good character with respect to the species of crime charged against him"; Cockburn, C. J., was contra, but this is opposed to his remarks quoted ante, § 55); 1883, Kilgore v. State, 74 Ala. 7 (it must be a trait "having reference and analogy to the subject of the prosecution"); 1889, Morgan v. State, 88 id. 223, 6 So. 761 (assault with intent to kill; character for truth, excluded); 1897, Balkum v. State, 115 Id. 117, 22 So. 532 (battery upon a woman; character for "running after women" admitted); 1894, Chung Sing v. U. S., — Ariz. —, 36 Pac. 205 (selling spirits to Indians; character as a law-abiding citizen, excluded); 1878, Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 155, 164 (the character must be "such as would make it unlikely that the defendant would be guilty of the particular crime with which he is charged"); 1857, People v. Josephs, 7 Cal. 129 (attempt to rape; character for "morality and good behavior," and "general character," excluded, because the character ought to "bear some analogy and reference to the nature of the charge"); 1865, People v. Stewart, 28 id. 395 (murder; character for peace and quiet admitted); 1872, People v. Fair, 43 Id. 137, 147 (murder by a mistress; the defendant's character for unchastity not relevant to the act; "it is incorrect to say that the general character of the prisoner is received even in his own behalf"; it must be "general character as to the trait involved in the offence charged"); 1879, People v. Cseey, 53 id. 360 (it must be "in respect to the particular trait involved in the inquiry"); 1882, People v. Doggett, 62 id. 27, 29 ("traits involved in the charge"); 1901, People v. Chrisman, 135 id. 282, 67 Pac. 136 (larceny; defendant's habits "as to steadiness, drinking, or anything of that sort," excluded); 1899, Dorsey v. State, 108 Ga. 477, 34 S. E. 135 (on a charge of rape, the defendant, a negro, was shown to have followed the woman, a white, for some distance; held that "under the conditions surrounding the two races in this State," the negro race of the defendant and the white race of the woman could be considered as tending to rebut the explanation that he might be following merely to solicit consent to intercourse without force; this ruling will no doubt pass, in some communities; but all such race generalizations are dangerous; it would be equally logical, on a prosecution for lynching a negro, to hold that the white race of the defendant was some evidence that he was a member of the lynching mob); 1884, Tedens v. Schnmers, 112 Ill. 263, 267; 1874, Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 124, 131; 1879, State v. Bloom, 68 id. 54 (larceny; the defendant's evidence of good character limited to "honesty and integrity"); 1893, Carr v. State, 135 id. 1, 34 N. E. 583 (murder by poisoning; character for peace and quietude admissible); 1856, Gordon v. State, 3 Ia. 410, 415; 1876, State v. Kinley, 43 id. 295 (veracity, admitted on a perjury charge); 1879, State v. Curran, 51 Id. 112, 117 (seduction; character for virtue admitted, but not general good moral character); 1898; State v. Heacock, 106 Id. 191, 76 N. W. 654; 1852, State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 83, 88 (murder; character not restricted to peace and quietness, but may include kindness as a husband and father, honesty and integrity and purity of morals; yet the character admissible is defined by the majority of the Court merely as "such particular moral qualities as have pertinence to the charges"); 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 16 (murder; defence, insanity; the defendant's reputation in the civil war as "a good and valiant soldier," excluded); 1899, Westbrooks v. State, 76 Miss. 710, 25 So. 491 (illegal sale of liquor; defendant's general good character excluded); 1858, State v. Dalton, 27 Mo. 15 (assault with intent to kill; character for peace, but not for industry, admitted); 1883, State v. King, 83 id. 556; 1903, State v. Auslinger, 171 id. 600, 71 S. W. 1041 (illegal voting; defendant's character for industry, held irrelevant; the Court is not bound to instruct upon irrelevant evidence of character, under Rev. St. 1899, § 2627, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 140, relating to written instructions); 1903, State v. Thornhill, id. 74 S. W. 832 (defendants' repute as gamblers, admitted in rebuttal of their repute for honesty and integrity); 1895, Basye v. State, 45 Nebr. 261, 63 N. W. 811 (character for honesty and integrity, on a charge of murder excluded); 1880, State v. Pearce, 15 Nev. 188, 190 ("the particular trait of character at issue" is the kind admissible); 1899, State v. Snover, 63 N. J. L. 332, 43 Atl. 1059 (carnal knowledge of one under age of consent; character for "morality, virtue, and honesty in living," admitted); 1860, Cathcart v. Com., 37 Pa. 108, 111 (wife-murder; character as a "kind-hearted man" excluded, but character for "peaceableness and regularity of conduct" admitted: this is finical); 1898, Poyner v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 640, 48 S. W. 516 (incest; character as to "gentlemanly deportment and good moral character, allowed"); 1900, State v. Surry, 23 Wash. 655, 63 Pac. 557 (assault and battery while making an arrest; defendant's character as a conservative and conscientious peace officer, excluded; this is unsound). Contra, but inconsistent with other rulings supra in the same jurisdictions: 1894, Funderberg v. State, 100 Ala. 36, 14 So. 877 (general good character, admitted); 1863, Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385 (murder; the defence being insanity, the defendant's character "as a man and a citizen" was admitted); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 157 (rape; general good character of the defendant for morality having been received, the State was allowed to show his bad reputation as an illegal liquor seller).

In the orthodox common-law practice, this principle was carried so far that the inquiry could be specifically directed to the defendant's capacity for committing the particular crime, and not merely to the abstract trait involved;[2] but this practice seems to have fallen into disuse.

[2] E.g.: 1803, Hedge's Trial, 28 How. St.

§ 60. Same: Time and Place of Character. This, as a question of Relevancy, is simple enough. (1) Character in one place stands on precisely the same footing as character in another place. The person is the same wherever he is, and it is with the person that the trait is concerned. (2) Character at an earlier or later time than that of the deed in question is relevant only on the assumption that it was substantially unchanged in the meantime; i. e. the offer is really of character at one period to prove character at another, and the real question is of the relevancy of this evidence to prove character, not of the character to prove the act; it therefore more properly involves the principle of § 191, post. Most of the doubts, however, raised by a variation of time or of place have no concern with relevancy, but with the hearsay use of reputation to evidence character. Thus, a reputation post litem motam may be untrustworthy; a reputation in a community other than the defendant's home may be ill-founded. These problems are therefore all discussed in connection with the Reputation exception to the Hearsay Rule (post, §§ 1615–1618).

§ 61. Same: Defendant as a Witness. When a defendant in a criminal case takes the stand in his own behalf, he occupies a double position. As a defendant, his character cannot be attacked by the prosecution; as a witness, it can be. The question is whether the former position should be so strictly guarded as to require the exclusion of evidence properly admissible against him in the latter capacity. This question can be better examined in connection with the impeachment of witnesses; and it is therefore dealt with post, § 890.

§ 62. (2) Character of Complainant in Rape and similar Crimes. The reasons of auxiliary policy which affect the use of a defendant's character by the prosecution are peculiar to that use, and do not affect the use of character as against other persons in a criminal case wherever it may be relevant. One of these relevant uses is that of the character of a rape-complainant for chastity. The non-consent of the complainant is here a material element; and the character of the woman as to chastity is of considerable probative value in judging of the likelihood of that consent:

1846, Platt, B., in R. v. Ryan, 2 Cox Cr. 115 (admitting testimony to the "decency and propriety" of the general conduct of the prosecutrix, an idiot): "It is important to consider whether a young person in such a state of incapacity was likely to consent to the embraces of this man; because if her habits, however irresponsible she might be, were loose and indecent, there might be a probability of consent being given and a jury might not think it safe to conclude that she was not a willing party."

1856, Isham, J., in State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 514: "In all cases of this character, the assent of the witness to the act is the material matter in issue, and on that question the defence generally rests on circumstantial testimony. In determining that question, which is purely a mental act, it is important to ascertain whether her consent would from her previous habits be the natural result of her mind, or whether it would be inconsistent with her previous life and repugnant to all her moral feelings. Such habits as are imputed to the witness by this inquiry have a tendency to show such consent as the natural operation of her propensities, and rebut the inference or necessity of actual violence."

Tr. 1403 ff. ("Do you believe, from what you know of their character, that the defendants are capable of committing a gross fraud upon their employers?"); and other earlier trials cited supra.

1895, Garoutte, J., in People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622: "This class of evidence is admissible for the purpose of tending to show the non-probability of resistance upon the part of the prosecutrix; for it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed. In other words, this class of evidence goes to the question of consent only."

The admissibility of the complainant's character for chastity or unchastity is generally conceded;[1] and her habits as a prostitute are usually regarded as equivalent to a general trait of character.[2]

The same doctrine should apply to a charge of enticement for prostitution, because the question is whether the woman went of her own impulses or

[1] Accord: 1843, R. v. Tissington, 1 Cox Cr. 48, Abinger, C. B. ("general want of decency"); 1851, R. v. Clay, 5 id. 146, Patteson, J.; 1847, Camp v. State, 3 Kelly 417, 420; 1887, McQuirk v. State, 84 Ala. 435, 438, 4 So. 775; 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 643, 653; 1856, People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 223; 1899, People v. Shea, 125 id. 151, 57 Pac. 885 (following People v. Benson; McFarland, J., diss.); 1895, Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286; 1902, Seals v. State, 114 Ga. 518, 40 S. E. 731; 1873, Shirwin v. People, 69 Ill. 56, 59; 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 id. 573; 1861, Wilson v. State, 16 Ind. 393, semble; 1834, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 id. 582; 1885, Anderson v. State, 104 id. 471, 4 N. E. 63, 5 N. E. 711; 1848, Carter v. Cavenaugh, 1 Greene Ia. 171, 175, semble; 1880, Com. v. Harris, 131 Mass. 336; 1888, People v. McLean, 71 Mich. 310, 38 N. W. 917; 1895, Brown v. State, 72 Miss. 95, 16 So. 202; 1895, State v. Duffey, 128 Mo. 549, 31 S. W. 98; 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 N. H. 89; 1835, O'Blenis v. State, 47 N. J. L. 279; 1857, People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398; 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 197; 1874, Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 515; 1846, State v. Jefferaon, 6 Ired. 305; 1868, State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 32; 1897, State v. Hairaton, 121 id. 579, 28 S. E. 492 (general character allowed, but not character for virtue, on the singular ground that the offering party may only ask for general character, though the witness, "of his own motion, may say in what respect it is good or bad"; a novel and groundless quibble); 1858, McCombs v. State, 8 Oh. St. 643, 646; 1862, McDermott v. State, 13 id. 331, 335; 1874, Titus v. State, 7 Baxt. 132, 135; 1898, State v. McCune, 16 Utah 170, 51 Pac. 818 (character for chastity); 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 512 (Bennett, J., dissenting on another point); 1867, State v. Reed, 39 Vt. 417; 1864, Watry v. Ferber, 18 Wis. 500, 502 (civil action for rape; the woman's character held admissible, and equally in criminal cases). Contra, excluding bad character: 1877, State v. Morse, 67 Me. 429. Occasionally, too, a Court has been misled by the doctrine about presuming a witness' character to be good, and has therefore erroneously excluded the complainant's good character unless her character has first been impeached by the defendant: 1898, People v. Kuches, 120 Cal. 566, 52 Pac. 1002 (admitting good character in rebuttal of alleged lewd conduct); 1900, People v. O'Brien, 130 id. 1, 62 Pac. 297 (where the Court inconsistently held that there was no such strict presumption in a criminal case, and yet that evidence of good character was inadmissible; the opinion is confused in its notion of presumptions); 1903, Baker v. State, — Miss. —, 33 So. 716 (excluded, except after impeachment by the defendant).

[2] 1829, R. v. Barker, 3 C. & P. 589, Park and Parke, JJ. (that the prosecutrix had on one occasion acted the prostitute, admitted, after hesitation arising from R. v. Hodgson, post, § 200; perhaps in effect only a ruling as to testimonial discredit); 1871, R. v. Holmes, 12 Cox Cr. 143, per Kelly, C. B. ("the associate of common prostitutes, and such evidence of general loose character"); 1887, Stephen, J., in R. v. Riley, 16 Cox Cr. 195; 1855, Pleasant v. State, 16 Ark. 624, 643, 653, supra, semble; 1877, State v. Shields, 45 Conn. 256, 257, 260, 263 (former prostitution admitted, but the purpose not made clear); 1895, Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286 (admitting "promiscuous intercourse with men, or common prostitution"); 1888, People v. McLean, Mich., supra; 1895, Brown v. State, Miss., supra; 1838, People v. Abbot, N. Y., supra; 1874, Woods v. People, N. Y., supra; 1846, State v. Jefferson, N. C., supra; 1874, Titus v. State, Tenn., supra; 1856, State v. Johnson, Vt., supra. Here the general habit must be distinguished from particular acts of unchastity, the admissibility of which has been much controverted (post, § 200). The complainant's association with unchaste persons is near the line, but ought to fall under the present principle: 1871, R. v. Holmes, cited above, contra; 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. 435, 439 (bastardy; bad character of the young men she associated with, excluded); 1900, State v. Taylor, 57 S. C. 483, 35 S. E. 729 (reputation of the house of complainant's abode, excluded).

yielded to persuasion.[3] But it should not apply in rape where the woman is below the age of consent;[4] and perhaps not in a charge of mere assault with intent to commit rape, or of indecent assault.[5]

The only difficulty in applying the principle is to distinguish between the use of character, as bearing on consent, and the use of specific acts of unchastity as a means of evidencing the character itself. The latter kind of evidence being in many jurisdictions excluded (post, § 200), the woman's character as evidenced by reputation is alone admissible in those jurisdictions; and it thus becomes necessary therein to discriminate between the general character or trait of unchastity and the specific acts of unchastity.[6]

§ 63. (3) Character of Deceased in Homicide. When the issue of self-defence is made in a trial for homicide, and thus a controversy arises whether the deceased was the aggressor, one's persuasion will be more or less affected by the character of the deceased; it may throw much light on the probabilities of the deceased's action:

1860, Stephens, J., in Williams v. Fambro, 30 Ga. 233, 235 (admitting the turbulent character of a slave, as indicating that he was killed in an act of insubordination, as claimed by the defendant W.): "To prove a proneness to insubordination, to be sure, does not prove an act of insubordination, but it does increase the probability of the story where there is, as there was in this case, other evidence suggestive of such an act. Such a story of the rebellion [as the defendant's], if told by a witness or indicated by circumstances ought to be more easily believed concerning a violent, turbulent negro, than concerning a meek, humble one. I think that any mind in search of truth in such a case, or finding itself in doubt, would want to know the character of the negro. . . . [The defendant] Williams' knowledge or ignorance [of the character] has nothing to do with that bearing of the character which I have pointed out. The sole purpose for which character was admissible in this case on the question of justification was, from the negro's general readiness for rebellion, to render more probable the evidence which tended to show an act of rebellion at the time he was killed; and this probability is evidently not affected in the slightest degree by Williams' previous knowledge. The light comes from the fact that the negro was one who was apt or likely to do such an act as the one imputed to him, and not from Williams' knowledge of the fact."

There ought, of course, to be some other appreciable evidence of the deceased's aggression, for the character-evidence can hardly be of value unless there is otherwise a fair possibility of doubt on the point; moreover, other-

[3] 1899, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 405, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault and battery, and solicitation to commit adultery; the plaintiff's character for unchastity admitted); 1890, Brown v. State, 72 Md. 468, 475, 20 Atl. 140, 180 (applying the rule to the case of female minor charged to have been enticed for purposes of prostitution; but confusing the question with that of discrediting a witness); Brown v. State, ib. 477 (admitting the minor's previous recent residence in a house of prostitution).

[4] 1895, People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622; 1903, People v. Wilmot, id., 72 Pac. 838; 1893, People v. Abbott, 97 Mich. 484, 485, 56 N. W. 862; 1898, State v. Whitesell, 142 Mo. 467, 44 S. W. 332; 1900, State v. Hilberg, 22 Utah 27, 61 Pac. 215.

[5] Admitted: 1817, R. v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 243; 1897, Gross v. Brodrecht, 24 Ont. App. 687 (indecent assault); 1893, Shields v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 498, 502, 23 S. W. 893; 1903, Barton v. Bruley, — Wis. —, 96 N. W. 815 (indecent assault); Excluded: 1811, Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day 145, 148. Here though not admissible to evidence the woman's consent, which is not in issue, yet it might be relevant to show the defendant's natural expectation of her consent, on the principle of § 402, post. For the question whether the complainant in rape or bastardy can be impeached as a witness by general bad character, see post, § 923.

[6] See the citations in note 2, supra.

wise the deceased's bad character is likely to be put forward to serve improperly as a mere excuse for the killing, under the pretext of evidencing his aggression, and it is often feasible to obtain untrustworthy character-evidence for that purpose. In short, the same reasons for caution apply as in the case of uncommunicated threats when offered as involving a design of aggression, and thus evidencing a probable aggression, on the part of the deceased (post, § 110).

The reason for the hesitation, once observable in many Courts, in recognizing this sort of evidence, and the source of much confusion upon the subject, was the frequent failure to distinguish this use of the deceased's character from another use, perfectly well-settled, but subject to a peculiar limitation not here necessary, — the use of communicated character to show the fact and the reasonableness of the defendant's apprehension of violence (post, § 246). As the purpose there is to show the defendant's state of mind, it is obvious that the deceased's character, as affecting the defendant's apprehensions, must have become known to him; i. e. proof of the character must indispensably be accompanied by proof of its communication to the defendant; else it is irrelevant. In the present use, this additional element of communication is unnecessary; for the question is what the deceased probably did, not what the defendant probably thought the deceased was going to do. The inquiry is one of objective occurrence, not of subjective belief. This distinction, however, was at first not always appreciated by the Courts, nor clearly laid before them by counsel. Hence, a ruling excluding the present use of the evidence cannot always be taken as a repudiation of the present principle, but is often merely a ruling that the offer does not satisfy the doctrine of communicated character; and such a Court may in future recognize the present doctrine if the distinction is pressed upon it. Apart from a few such precedents, the principle is now generally accepted.[1]

[1] It may be noted that the doctrine is of course equally applicable in civil cases where a similar controversy arises (as in Williams v. Fambro, infra); it is also to be noted that the trait of character must be that of quarrelsomeness, turbulence, or violence: Ala.: 1839, Findlay v. Pruitt, 9 Port. 195, 199 (assault and battery; the plaintiff's reputation for a theft, held improperly admitted as a justificatiou); 1872, Fields v. State, 47 Ala. 603 (the deceased's character as a "violent, turbulent, revengeful, bloodthirsty, dangerous man," held admissible for "determining the turpitude of the crime and what should be the measure of the punishment to be inflicted"; no authorities cited); 1875, Eiland v. State, 52 id. 333 (character from the present point of view ignored); 1880, Roberts v. State, 68 id. 165 (same, semble); 1888, Hussey v. State, 87 id. 134, 6 So. 420 (question stated, but not decided); Ark.: 1874, Palmore v. State, 29 Ark. 248, 262, 263 (admitted as tending to explain "the conduct of the deceased at the time"); Cal.: 1858, People v. Murray, 10 Cal. 309 (admissible "when the circumstances of the conteat are equivocal" as to self-defence; but whether the present principle is intended by the Court is not clear); Fla.: 1899, Copeland v. State, 41 Fla. 320, 26 So. 319 (admissible only as significant of conduct of deceased at the time of the killing; character for "general cussedness," or for immorality, excluded); Ga.: 1860, Williams v. Fambro, 30 Ga. 233 (admitting the turbulent character of a slave, to show that he was probably killed, as claimed by the defendant, in an act of insubordination; see quotation supra); 1903, Dannenberg v. Berkner, id., 45 S. E. 682 (the plaintiff having made no attack, his character not known to the defendant was held inadmissible); Kan.: 1870, State v. Spendlove, 44 Kan. 1, 24 Pac. 67 (admissible, under the limitation, apparently, that the question as to the aggressor must be in doubt); Ky.: 1896, Com. v. Hoskins, — Ky. —, 35 S. W. 284 (violent character admitted, but not mere bad moral character); La.: 1878, State v. Burns, 30 La. An. 679 (the character of the deceased is said to be excluded as a general rule, with a possible exception for communicated character; the early cases under § 246, post, are assumed as authorities); State v. John-

§ 64. (4) Parties in Civil Causes; Character generally excluded. It is to-day generally said that (subject to specific exceptions, some of them doubtful) the character of a party in a civil cause is inadmissible; i. e. that it cannot be used, as it is for or against a defendant in a criminal case, to indicate the son, ib. 921 (intimating admissibility in a doubtful case, to show that the deceased had probably quarrelled with and been killed by some one else); 1883, State v. Garic, 35 Id. 970, 971 (a charge that it "tended to indicate that he [the deceased] was the assailant, and that the assault was felonious," apparently approved); 1893, State v. Nash, 45 Id. 1137, 1141, 13 So. 732, 734 (uncommunicated character, excluded); 1900, State v. Robinson, 52 Id. 616, 27 So. 124 (admissible; no precedents cited); Md.: 1877, Costley v. State, 48 Md. 175 (peculiar facts; the jealous character of the deceased, not admitted to show that the killing was the result of a quarrel arising from the deceased's jealousy of the defendant's intimacy with his wife); Mich.: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 15 (excluded; obscure); Minn.: 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 445 (admissible where there is a doubt as to the premeditation of the defendant; but no distinction is made as to the deceased's knowledge of the character, and the opinion is not clear); Miss.: 1849, Jolly v. State, 13 Sm. & M. 223 (general dangerous character admissible "when the manner of the homicide is not fully known"); 1859, Wesley v. State, 37 Miss. 327, 346 (declared inadmissible, but with intimations that in a case of doubt it might be received; Jolly v. State not cited); Mo.: 1853, State v. Jackson, 17 Mo. 544 (obscure); 1886, State v. Rider, 90 id. 61, 1 S. W. 825, semble ("in determining the question as to who was the assailant," character admissible); N. J.: 1790, State v. Wells, 1 N. J. L. 424, 429 (admitted); N. Y.: 1876, Thomas v. People, 67 N. Y. 224, semble (admitted); 1886, People v. Druse, 103 id. 655, 8 N. E. 733 (same); N. C.: 1820, State v. Tackett, 1 Hawks 210, 213, 216 (murder of a slave; the deceased's disposition as a turbulent and insolent man, admitted); 1827, Pierce v. Myrick, 1 Dev. 345 (trespass for killing the plaintiff's negro; to rebut evidence of the killing being done in defence, evidence was received of the "peaceable and submissive character," "general good character and orderly deportment" of the slave); 1843, State v. Tilly, 3 Ired. 424 (murder of his employer by an overseer; because (1) no case of self-defence was made out, (2) it would show only arrogant language, (3) it was not properly proved, evidence was excluded of the deceased being "high-tempered, oppressive, and overbearing towards his overseers"; no precedents cited); 1848, State v. Barfield, 8 id. 344, 349 (murder; the character of the deceased as "violent, overbearing, and quarrelsome," excluded, because it would be admissible, if at all, only where the evidence was purely circumstantial; State v. Tackett distinguished); 1855, Bottoms v. Keut, 3 Jones L. 154 (the preceding cases, except Pierce v. Myrick, noticed, and the rule stated obiter as absolute, that "evidence of the general character of the deceased as to temper and violence is inadmissible"); 1859, State v. Hogue, 6 Id. 381, 384 (the character of the deceased, who had attacked the defendant, excluded; "there may be exceptions to the rule; State v. Tackett is admitted to be one"); 1859, State v. Floyd, ib. 392, 395, 398 (the temper and disposition of the deceased for violence, excluded, the parties having voluntarily engaged in a fight; no precedents cited); 1877, State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 480 (the general character of the deceased for violence admitted, apparently on the conditions that self-defence be in issue and that the evidence be circumstantial; the precedents examined and summed up); 1880, State v. Chavis, 80 id. 357 (self-defence in issue; the deceased's general character for violence excluded, on the authority of Hogue's and Barfield's cases; Turpin's case recognized, but treated as dealing with some different question); 1897, State v. Byrd, 121 id. 684, 28 S. E. 353 (admissible only where the evidence of the killing is wholly circumstantial; opinion obscure); 1899, State v. McIver, 125 Id. 645, 34 S. E. 439 (vicious temper and violence in anger, admitted); Oh.: 1860, Gandolfo v. State, 11 Oh. St. 114, 118 (generally inadmissible); 1875, Marts v. State, 26 id. 162, 168 (declared inadmissible, without discussion); Pa.: 1863, Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 388 (general deportment for violence, rejected, there being no evidence as to a necessity for self-defence); Tenn.: 1846, Copeland v. State, 7 Humph. 479, 495 ("the character of the deceased" treated as throwing light on the question whether she was the aggressor; no objection of law had been raised); 1872, Williams v. State, 3 Heisk. 376, 396 (the deceased's violent character treated in the same way; no objection of law had been raised); Tex.: 1854, Henderson v. State, 12 Tex. 525, 530 (not admissible "as affording presumptive evidence that the party injured was the aggressor"; for it would be "very remote and merely possible conjecture"; but here there was no evidence of aggression by the deceased). It is commonly said that the State cannot offer the deceased's peaceable character until the defendant has questioned it (though there is no good reason for this limitation): 1858, Dukes v. State, 11 Ind. 557, 565; 1892, Fields v. State, 134 id. 46, 56, 32 N. E. 780; 1899, Tbrawley v. State, 153 id. 375, 55 N. E. 95 (the defendant's issue as to deceased's aggression sufficing to raise the question); 1894, State v. Eddou, 8 Wash. 292, 294, 36 Pac. 139, Hoyt, J., diss.).

For the use of particular acts of violence by the deceased, see post, §§ 198, 248.

For the use of the deceased's physical strength, see post, § 84.

likelihood that the act in issue was or was not done. This is laid down as a general rule, to which a specific exception, if any, must be clearly made out. This result, to be sure, was not always so clearly an accepted one.[1] But it is to-day almost everywhere accepted, subject to one or two occasional exceptions.

The reasons for this exclusion differ wholly from the reasons forbidding the prosecution's use of the character of an accused person; the two rules have nothing in common. The reasons advanced for the present rule are of two chief sorts. (1) A party's character is usually of no probative value. Where the issue is whether a contract was made or broken, whether money was paid or property improved by mistake, whether goods were illegally converted or a libel published, there no moral quality in the act alleged, or at any rate any moral quality that may have been present is ignored by the law; and moral character can therefore throw no light on the probability of doing or not doing. In torts involving violence or actual fraud, such a moral quality may appear; but, apart from these, it is (almost without exception) either non-existent or immaterial:

1854, Martin, B., in Attorney-General v. Radloff, 10 Exch. 97: "In criminal cases evidence of the good character of the accused is most properly and with good reason admissible in evidence, because there is a fair and just presumption that a person of good character would not commit a crime. But in civil cases such evidence is with equal good reason not admitted, because no presumption would fairly arise, in the very great proportion of such cases, from the good character of the defendant, that he did not commit the breach of contract or of civil duty, alleged against him.

1791, Thompson v. Church, 1 Root 312; qui tam for an assault; the defendant's character as a malicious, quarrelsome man was rejected; Per Curiam: "The general character is not in issue. The business of the court is to try the case, and not the man; and a very bad man may have a very righteous cause."

[1] The notion that character might be resorted to is often advanced by counsel in the early 1800s; but the mainstay of this claim seems always to have been Ruan v. Perry, whose subsequent repudiation in its own court is seen in the line of New York cases following:

1805, Ruan v. Perry, 3 Caines 120 (the defendant, a naval officer, had ordered the plaintiff's vessel, a neutral, to lie to, and had taken her out of her course, by reason of which she was captured by a belligerent; the plaintiff charged fraudulent collusion with the belligerent captain; and the defendant's good character was received because the evidence was purely circumstantial; Tompkins, J.: "In actions of tort, and especially charging a defendant with gross depravity and fraud, upon circumstances merely, as was the case here, evidence of uniform integrity and good character is oftentimes the only testimony which a defendant can oppose to suspicious circumstances"); 1827, Fowler v. Ins. Co., 6 Cow. 673 (defence of fraud, in an action on an insurance-policy; the plaintiff's good character was excluded; Savage, C. J.: "A specific fraud is charged, that must be met on its own merits, unless supported only by circumstances, as in the case of Ruan v. Perry. . . . Every man must be answerable for every improper act; and the character of every transaction must be ascertained by its own circumstances, and not by the character of the parties"); 1832, Townsend v. Graves, 3 Paige Ch. 453, 455, Walworth, Ch. (character admissible in cases of "a crime, or any other act involving moral turpitude," if evidenced only "by circumstantial evidence or by the testimony of witnesses of doubtful credit"); 1837, Gough v. St. John, 16 Wend. 645 (action for false representations as to a third person's solvency; the defendant's good character for honesty and fairness in dealing was excluded; Cowan, J.: "Such evidence [of character] is, in general, confined to criminal prosecutions involving the question of moral turpitude. . . . The case of Ruan v. Perry is to the contrary; but that is virtually exploded. . . . I mean to be understood as speaking of the general distinction; I know there are exceptions; they lie in that class of actions, or rather of issues, where the general character is drawn in question by the pleadings or the points involved in a cause," naming slander, criminal conversation, and breach of marriage-promise, as some of the instances"); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 496 (inadmissible; general statement).

1826, Marshall, C. J., in Etting v. Bank, 11 Wheat. 59, 73 (action on an indorsement of a note as surety, against which the indorser set up a frauduient concealment of material facts): "If this case depended on the deservedly high character of the individuals who were engaged on the part of the Bank in the transactions in which the suit originated, — if elevation above the possibility of suspicion that they could have meditated anything believed by themselves to be legally or morally wrong could decide it, this cause would not have required the great efforts that have been bestowed upon it. The names which appear on this record [8] can never be connected with actual fraud; nor would any difficulty be found in protecting them from the imputation, were it possible that it could be made. But judicial inquiries are into the rights of the parties; and although high and honorable character has and ought to have great influence in weighing testimony in which that character is in any manner involved, yet, when the inferences from that testimony are drawn by others, and a Court is required to pronounce the law arising upon them, character is excluded from the view of the judge, and legal principles alone can be acknowledged as his guide."

The meat of this reason is found in the expression of the Connecticut Court, that "a very bad man may have a very righteous cause." (2) But there is, additionally, a complex reason of auxiliary policy (ante, § 42), which has been pointed out by several Courts as equally efficient for exclusion:

1820, Hosmer, C. J., in Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 345 (the plaintiff's good character not received to rebut a slander): "It is not only in contravention of the fundamental rule that evidence shall be confined to the issue, to admit such testimony; but it would be infinitely dangerous to the administration of justice. Instead of meeting a charge of misconduct by testimony evincive of not having misconducted, general character would become the principal evidence in most cases; and he who could throng the court with witnesses to establish his reputation in general would shelter himself from the wrongs he had perpetrated."

1847, Wardlaw, J., in Smets v. Plunket, 1 Strobh. 372, 375: "The evidence tendered towards this purpose [of showing the plaintiff incapable of fraud charged in a set-off], if it could have laid bare the heart of the plaintiff, and ascertained really the strength of his moral principles, would have been highly influential. But examinations in court into general character, according to reputation, usually distinguish only between two classes, the good and the bad, without wise discrimination between the infinite degrees and varieties which exist of either class. Of most persons there is really no general reputation as to character, and of some the general reputation is widely different from the truth, which a full knowledge of their motives, principles, and habits, would disclose. Sometimes upon trials the good are overthrown by unexpected assault, and often the bad are furnished and strengthened by the ready testimony which their influence procures in their favor; whilst many of their neighbors, who think ill of them, shrink from being examined, or, being examined, cannot say that the suspicions which they entertain, and which they feel rather than know that others entertain also, have been uttered so as to constitute a bad reputation. In investigations concerning character, feeling and prejudice are more frequently exhibited than in inquiries upon any other subject. The number of witnesses is often extended far beyond the limit which upon other topics the Court would indulge; and if there be contrariety of opinion, the matter is usually left at last in great uncertainty. If in every case where an act of dishonesty is imputed, the imputation may be met by such evidence, then there are few cases into which such evidence might not be introduced; trials would be insupportably tedious; and the result of a trial would as often depend upon the popularity of a party as upon the merits of his case. These considerations suggest the propriety of adhering closely to the rules which have been established to regulate the admission of evidence of reputation concerning general character."

[8] The counsel in the case were Daniel Webster, Roger B. Taney, William Wirt, and Thomas Addis Emmett.

1864, Aldis, J., in Wright v. McKee, 37 Vt. 163: "Many considerations concur in rejecting such evidence in civil cases. Evidence of this character has but a remote bearing as proof to show that wrongful acts have or have not been committed; and the mind resorts to it for aid only when the other evidence is doubtful and nicely balanced; it may then perhaps suffice to turn the wavering scales; very rarely can it be of substantial use in getting at the truth. It is uncertain in its nature, both because the true character of a large portion of mankind is ascertained with difficulty; and because those who are called to testify are reluctant to disparage their neighbors, — especially if they are wealthy, influential, popular, or even only pleasant and obliging. It is mere matter of opinion, and in matters of opinion men are apt to be greatly influenced by prejudice, partisanship, or other bias, of which they are unconscious; and in cases which are not quite clear they are apt to agree with the first one who speaks to them on the subject or to form their opinion upon the opinions of others. The introduction of such evidence in civil causes wherever character is assailed would make trials intolerably long and tedious and greatly increase the expense and delay of litigation. It is a kind of evidence that is easily manufactured, is liable to abuse, and if in common use in the courts, as likely to mislead as to guide aright."

These two reasons combined seem to justify the fixed policy of our law in excluding the character of the parties to a civil cause when offered to prove or disprove the doing of an act. It is possible, however, to maintain that the reasons of policy should be yielded to in ordinary civil cases only; and that where a moral intent is marked and prominent in the nature of the issue, the defendant's good moral character should be received as in criminal cases. This view has in more modern opinions seemed to gain ground, and if only it can be phrased in a definite rule, it is worth recognizing:

1900, Start, C. J., in Hein v. Holdridge, 78 Minn. 468, 81 N. W. 522. "There would seem to be no logical reason why the same rule should not apply to civil actions in which the defendant is charged with a crime. . . . The rule seems to be one of practical convenience, for the purpose of avoiding the confusion of issues. On principle, however, it would seem that there ought to be exceptions to this general rule. . . . Inasmuch as the general rule is not based upon any philosophical reason, but is merely one of convenience, it ought not to be applied to cases where justice to the defendant requires that the inconvenience arising from a confusion of the issues should be disregarded, and he be permitted to give evidence of his previous good character, or, in other words, that such evidence ought to be received in a civil action when it is of a character to bring it within all of the reasons for admitting such evidence in criminal cases. Civil actions for an indecent assault, for seduction, and kindred cases, are of this character; for such cases are not infrequently mere speculative and blackmailing schemes. The consequences to the defendant of a verdict against him in such a case are most serious, for the issue as to him involves his fortune, his honor, his family. From the very nature of the charge, it often happens that an innocent man can only meet the issue by a denial of the charge, and proof of his previous good character. Ought a defendant in such a case to be deprived of the right to lay before the jury evidence of his previous good character, because it will tend to confuse the issue, while a defendant in a case where the State charges him with a simple assault, involving no more serious consequences than the payment, perhaps, of a fine of five dollars, is accorded the absolute right to give such evidence? . . . [But the doctrine] ought not to be extended to civil actions where the issue relates to a simple assault, or to the fraud, deceit, or negligence of the defendant, or to similar actions, for they are not within the reasons we have suggested for the admission of evidence of good character in exceptional civil actions."[8]

[8] In the following cases the evidence was excluded, except where otherwise stated [the cases involving negligence, defamation, malpractice, and the complainant's character in bastardy, are dealt with post, §§ 65–68; certain rulings for homicide in self-defence, involving the plaintiff's character, have been noted in § 63, ante]: Ala.: 1837, Ward v. Herndon, 5 Port. 382, 385 (false representations); Alaska: C. C. P. 1900, § 671 (like Or. Annot. C., 1892, § 812); Cal.: C. C. P. 1872, § 2053 ("evidence of the good character of a party is not admissible in a civil action . . . unless the issue involves his character"); 1894, Anthony v. Grand, 101 Cal. 235, 237, 35 Pac. 859 (battery; defendant's peaceable character excluded); Ark.: 1896, Powers v. Armstrong, 62 Ark. 267, 35 S. W. 228 (good character to rebut a charge of fraudulent purchase); Conn.: 1786, Woodruff v. Whittlesey, Kirby 60, 62 (fraudulent transfer of property); 1820, Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 345 (quoted supra); 1828, Humphrey v. Humphrey, 7 Id. 117 (divorce for adultery); St. 1897, Mar. 3, c. 16 (in bastardy proceedings, "evidence of the good character of the accused for morality and decency prior to the alleged commission of the offence," is admissible, subject to rebuttal); Ga.: Code 1895, § 5159, Cr. C. § 993 ("The general character of the parties" is inadmissible, "unless the nature of the action involves such character and renders necessary or proper the investigation of such conduct"); 1861, Boatright v. Porter, 32 Ga. 130, 140 (bad character of intermediate party in chain of title, excluded); 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 766, 12 S. E. 18 (character of plaintiff in insurance claim, the defendant alleging her husband to be still alive); Ida.: Rev. St. 1887, § 6084 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053); Ill.: 1869, Sprague v. Craig, 51 Ill. 288, 294 (breach of promise of marriage; defence, acts of unchastity; the plaintiff allowed to show her good character, "for the purpose of rendering it improbable that the charge is well-founded"); 1876, Crose v. Rutledge, 81 Id. 266 (crim. con.; defendant's bad character for chastity, excluded); Ind.: 1832, Rogers v. Lamb, 3 Blackf. 155 (malicious prosecution); 1841, Walker v. State ex rel. Corbin, 6 Id. 4 (bastardy); 1855, Church v. Drummond, 7 Id. 19 (fraudulent transfer); 1865, Cox v. Pruitt, 25 Ind. 92, 94 (seduction); 1877, Gebhart v. Burket, 57 Id. 379, 385 (civil arson); 1882, Haymond v. Saucer, 84 Id. 3, 14 (similar to Sprague v. Craig, Ill., supra); 1883, Houser v. State, 93 Id. 231 (bastardy); 1898, Vansickle v. Shenk, 150 Id. 413, 50 N. E. 381 (action to set aside fraudulent transfer; the grantor's reputation for honesty, excluded); 1899, Hilker v. Hilker, 153 Id. 425, 55 N. E. 81 (divorce, alleging wife's adultery; wife's character for chastity admissible on her behalf "to disprove the acts charged"); Ia.: 1881, Barton v. Thompson, 56 Ia. 571 (admitted only "where intention is the point in issue, and the proof consists of slight circumstances"; here excluded in an action for malicious burning); 1886, Stone v. Ins. Co., 68 Id. 737, 742, 28 N. W. 47 (defence of wilful burning, to an action for insurance-money; the plaintiff's good character excluded); Kan.: 1882, Simpson v. Westenberger, 28 Kan. 756 (transferee in fraud of creditors); Me.: 1829, Potter v. Webb, 6 Me. 14, 16, 18 (good character to disprove fraud in procuring a decree); 1841, Low v. Mitchell, 18 Id. 372, 374 (bastardy proceedings); 1849, Thayer v. Boyle, 30 Id. 475, 480 (trespass); 1877, Soule v. Bruce, 67 Id. 584 (trespass for battery); Mass.: 1835, Heywood v. Reed, 4 Gray 574, 576, 581 (assignee in fraud of creditors); 1891, Day v. Ross, 154 Mass. 14, 27 N. E. 676 (good character for peaceableness, in an action for battery); 1897, Geary v. Stevenson, 169 Id. 23, 47 N. E. 508 (the plaintiff's character, in an action for imprisonment, inadmissible, even though the offence set up in justification involves a crime); Mich.: 1886, Fahey v. Crotty, 63 Mich. 383, 29 N. W. 876 (battery; the defendant's good character, excluded; but where "wrong intention or moral turpitude" is in issue and is evidenced only circumstantially, character is admissible); 1897, Munroe v. Godkin, 111 Id. 183, 69 N. W. 244 (assumpsit for labor); 1897, Kingston v. R. Co., 112 Id. 40, 70 N. W. 315 (personal injury); 1902, Adams v. Elseffer, — Id. —, 92 N. W. 772 (assumpsit by an employer against his clerk for misappropriating moneys; defendant's good character excluded); Minn.: 1877, Schnek v. Hagar, 24 Minn. 339, 344 (action by a female minor for indecent assault; the defendant's character for chastity and morality, admitted in his favor); 1900, Hein v. Holdridge, 78 Id. 468, 81 N. W. 522 (father's action for daughter's seduction; defendant's character for chastity admitted, because the charge "involved the commission of a crime by him"; see quotation supra); Miss.: 1884, Leinkauf v. Brinker, 62 Miss. 255 (sale in fraud of creditors; the vendee's good character for honesty and fair dealing); Mo.: 1875, McKern v. Calvert, 59 Mo. 242 (seduction); 1877, Dudley v. McCluer, 65 Id. 241 (equitable proceeding to set aside a settlement obtained by fraud); 1892, Vawter v. Hultz, 112 Id. 633, 639, 20 S. W. 689 (action for death of plaintiff's husband; defendant's peaceable character excluded); Mont.: C. C. P. 1895, § 3381 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053); Nebr.: 1895, Stoppert v. Nierle, 45 Nebr. 105, 63 N. W. 382 (civil action for filiation of a bastard); N. H.: 1830 Washburn v. Washburn, 5 N. H. 195 (divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery; the wife's character for unchastity); 1838, Matthews v. Huntly, 9 Id. 146, 148; 1866, Boardman v. Woodman, 47 Id. 120 (the sanity of a testatrix was impeached by showing that she had charged one S. with fraud in a transaction and the character of S. for honesty was offered; excluded, as not allowable in a civil case to rebut a charge of fraud); 1897, Warner v. Warner, 69 Id. 137,

§ 65. Same: Character of a Defendant or a Plaintiff charged with Negligence. A few Courts have shown an inclination to admit, exceptionally, the character of a person charged with a negligent act (contributory negligence, if a plaintiff), as throwing light on the probability of his having acted carelessly on the occasion in question; provided that the other evidence leaves

44 Atl. 908 (divorce for adultery; respondent's character as to virtue and chastity, admissible in trial Court's discretion); N. Y. (see citations supra, note 1); N. C.: 1840, Melton v. Lilly, 1 Ired. 118 (seduction; the defendant's general character as a "modest and retiring man," excluded); 1848, Beal v. Robeson, 8 Id. 276 (malicious prosecution; the defendant had prosecuted for robbery; the plaintiff offered evidence that the defendant had merely fallen while drunk; the defendant's general character for sobriety, excluded); 1855, Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 154 (the propounder of a will, alleged by the caveator to have procured it by threats, not allowed to show his "easy, quiet temper and facile disposition"); 1899, Malcom v. Adams, 122 N. C. 222, 29 S. E. 333 (land sold; defendant's bad character, excluded); N. D.: 1899, Kinneberg v. Kinneberg, 8 N. D. 311, 79 N. W. 337 (assault with intent to rape; defendant's character for chastity, excluded); Or.: C. C. P. 1892, § 842 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053); 1896, Munkers v. Ins. Co., 30 Or. 211, 46 Pac. 850 (defence alleging a wilful firing by the plaintiff in an action on a policy; the plaintiff's character excluded); Pa.: 1819, Nash v. Gilkeson, 5 S. & R. 352 (assumpsit for money had and received; the defendant's good character excluded); 1819, Dietrick v. Dietrick, ib. 208 (good character to rebut a charge of fraud, not admissible, because "a man having a good character may commit a fraud"; but here, a will being attacked on the ground of fraudulent and undue influence by the devisee, in misrepresenting to the testator the moral character of the disinherited son's wife, her real character was allowed to be shown, as in issue upon the falsity of the representations); 1823, Anderson v. Long, 10 Id. 55, 60 (debt on bond; defence, fraud; the defendant's good character excluded, because not put in issue); 1825, Nussear v. Arnold, 13 Id. 323, 328 (same point, where the devisees had falsely represented their own character); 1854, Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. 424, 429 (trespass for stabbing; the injury had been given while the plaintiff was attempting by force to get possession of a carriage in which the defendant was; the defendant's character for peaceableness, the plea being self-defence, was rejected; the doctrine that it was receivable where the evidence was conflicting, expressly denied); 1855, Leckey v. Bloser, 24 Id. 401, 406 (breach of marriage-promise; plaintiff's good character not admitted to rebut evidence of her improper conduct); 1877, Battles v. Laudenslager, 84 Id. 446, 452 (a sharer in the fraud, not a party to the case); 1885, American Fire Ins. Co. v. Hazen, 110 Id. 530, 537 (wilful burning by the insured as a defence by the insurer; the insured's reputation for honesty, peace, and good order, excluded); R. I.: 1901, Markey v. Angell, 22 R. I. 343, 47 Atl. 882 (assault and battery); S. C.: 1825, Rhodes v. Bunch, 3 McC. 66, semble (trespass, with justification); 1847, Smets v. Plunkat, 1 Strobh. Eq. 372 (assumpsit; the defendant, in set-off, claimed a balance due from sales by the plaintiff, as commission-agent, which he had falsely suppressed; the plaintiff's good character was excluded; "in civil cases . . . evidence as to that character [of a party] cannot be offered to contradict an imputation of dishonesty or even of fraud"; quoted supra); 1901, Marshall v. Mitchell, 59 S. C. 523, 38 S. E. 158 (services to deceased; reputation of deceased for prompt payment, not admitted to show payment); Tenn.: 1859, Scott v. Fletcher, 1 Overton 488 ("In questions of tort, or quasi tort, where the injury is doubtful, character may be given in evidence"; Powel, J., doubted); 1870, Henry v. Brown, 2 Heisk. 213 (trespass for killing a heifer; defendant's good character for honesty, admitted; since "the charge is one involving moral turpitude"; Ruan v. Perry followed); 1872, Spears v. Ins. Co., 1 Baxt. 370 (insurance action; defence, the plaintiff's arson; the plaintiff's good character for honesty, admitted); 1889, Rogers v. Stokes, 87 Tenn. 215, 11 S. W. 215 (payee's fraud in the renewal of notes; the payee's good character for honesty, admitted); 1890, McBee v. Bowman, 89 Id. 140, 14 S. W. 481 (alleged forgery of a later will by a claimant; the claimant's good character admitted); 1902, Continental Bank v. First Nat'l Bank, 108 Id. 374, 68 S. W. 497 (false representations; "the rule in Tennessee is that in cases where a party is charged with a great moral wrong, he may introduce evidence of good character"); U. S.: 1804, Ketland v. Bissett, 1 Wash. C. C. 144, semble (evidence of good character excluded, because character had not been impeached); 1902, Morgan v. Barnhill, 55 C. C. A. 1, 118 Fed. 24 (civil action for homicide); Vt.: 1859, Lander v. Seaver, 32 Vt. 114 (trespass for a beating by the defendant as schoolmaster; the trial court having made the issue to turn on the presence of malice, the defendant's character as a "mild and moderate master" was held properly admitted for this purpose; but not upon the question whether a beating was given); 1864, Wright v. McKee, 37 Id. 161 (trover against a carrier for negligently losing a package of money; the facts were such that if the plaintiff's version were true, the defendant had been guilty of embezzlement; the defendant's good character was rejected as not admissible in civil cases; quoted supra); Wash.: 1903, Poler v. Poler, — Wash. —, 73 Pac. 372 (divorce for sodomy; respondent's character as a "law-abiding and moral man," excluded).

the matter in great doubt, or that the other evidence is purely circumstantial, or (as sometimes put) that there are no eye-witnesses testifying. The mainstay of this exceptional doctrine seems to have been the obiter suggestion in Tenney v. Tuttle.[1] Such evidence is no doubt likely to be of some probative value in such cases, and under the above limitations is hardly contrary to the ordinary policy of avoiding confusion of issues (ante, § 64). As a matter of law, however, the doctrine is maintained in a few jurisdictions only, and has been expressly repudiated in many.[2]

[1] 1861, Tenney v. Tuttle, 1 All. 185 (the defendant, in an action for injuries caused by a runaway horse, left standing untied, in the street, offered to show "his own character as a careful, prudent, and cautious man," as bearing on the question of whether he used ordinary care on this occasion; Metcalf, J., excluding it: "When the precise act or omission of a defendant is proved, the question whether it is actionable negligence is to be decided by the character of that act or omission, and not by the character for care and caution that the defendant may sustain. If such evidence . . . is ever admissible in a case like this, we incline to the opinion that it is only when the plaintiff attempts to prove the defendant's negligence by merely circumstantial evidence, or, perhaps, by witnesses shown to be of doubtful veracity").

[2] Eng.: 1889, Stephen, J., in Brown v. R. Co., L. R. 22 Q. B. D. 393 (character for negligence, inadmissible); Cal.: 1893, Towle v. P. I. Co., 98 Cal. 342, 33 Pac. 207 (careful character of defendant's employee, excluded, distinguishing Ficken v. Jones, 28 id. 618); Conn.: 1874, Morris v. East Haven, 41 Conn. 252 (contributory negligence; plaintiff's character for prudence, shown from personal opinion, excluded); 1902, Mears v. R. Co., — id. —, 52 Atl. 610 (whether a piano was carefully moved on a rainy day; "nor did proof of the care he generally took on rainy days legitimately tend to show the care he actually took on any particular rainy day"; it is singular that such language can be put forth from the bench by those who in other relations would by their own actions repudiate it as illogical; this was an offer of habit); Fla.: 1886, Saussy v. R. Co., 22 Fla. 327, 329 (reputation of the defendant's servant, who caused the harm, excluded); Ill.: 1883, Chicago, R. I. & R. Co. v. Clark, 108 Ill. 113 (a brakeman's character as to being "habitually prudent, cautious, and temperate," held admissible, unless there had been "witnesses who saw the infliction of the injury"); 1893, Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Bailey, 145 id. 159, 162, 33 N. E. 1089 (careful character of plaintiff's intestate, admitted, there being no eye-witnesses); 1898, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Ashline, 171 Ill. 318, 49 N. E. 521 (that the deceased, killed by a train, "was a man of careful habits," admissible where there are no eye-witnesses, "we are inclined to think"); 1900, Chicago & Alton R. Co. v. Pearson, 184 Id. 386, 56 N. E. 633 (deceased's habits of intemperance, excluded, where eye-witnesses of his conduct about the time of injury were available); 1901, Salem v. Webster, 192 id. 369, 61 N. E. 323 (plaintiff's habit as to rapid driving, admissible only "where there is no direct testimony as to the conduct at a particular time"); Ind.: 1871, Pittsburg, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 295, 311, semble (of a railroad employee, to show negligence at a particular time, excluded); Ia.: 1893, Hall v. Rankin, 87 Ia. 261, 264, 54 N. W. 217 (action against a druggist for giving poison instead of medicine; defendant's careful character, excluded); 1899, McKay v. Johnson, 108 id. 610, 79 N. W. 390 (whether an engine's poor working was due to the plaintiff's mismanagement; plaintiff's character as a competent engineer, excluded; this is unsound); Kan.: 1890, Southern Kans. R. Co. v. Robbins, 43 Kan. 145, 148 (the contributory negligence of an injured party; his character for care or the opposite, excluded; yet "exceptions are made in some cases where there are no eye-witnesses of the accident, and better evidence cannot be obtained"; here there were eye-witnesses); 1898, Erb v. Popritz, 59 id. 264, 52 Pac. 871 (careful character of the injured person, excluded); Me.: 1852, Lawrence v. Mt. Vernon, 35 Me. 100, 104 (competency of the plaintiff's driver, to disprove contributory negligence, excluded); 1880, Dunham v. Rackliff, 71 id. 345, 349 (careless character of the defendant's driver, as showing negligence at the time, excluded); Mass.: 1824, Com. v. Worcester, Thacher Cr. C. 100, 102 (on a charge of violating an ordinance by driving at a trot in a city, the defendant's character as a careful driver was excluded, apparently because the carefulness of his act was immaterial); 1838, Adams v. Carlisle, 21 Pick. 146 (Shaw, C. J.: "that the person driving was commonly careful and skilful" is admissible to show care at a particular time); 1855, Baldwin v. R. Co., 4 Gray 383 (negligent character of the plaintiff's driver, to show actual carelessness; excluded only when proved by reputation, but not when proved by one having personal knowledge); 1856, Robinson v. F. & W. R. Co., 7 id. 92, 95 (admissibility doubted); 1861, Tenney v. Tuttle, 1 All. 185 (see citation supra); 1861, Gahagan v. R. Co., ib. 187 (keeping cars improperly across the highway; Tenney v. Tuttle followed); 1872, McDonald v. Savoy, 110 Mass. 49 (a plaintiff bound to prove due care in driving was not allowed, by a majority of the Court, to show "that he was commonly careful and skilful in driving his team"; following Tenney v. Tuttle); see also Whitney v. Gross, Hatt v. Nay, cited post, § 80, not expressly dealing with this question; Minn.: 1898, Fonda v. R. Co., 71 Minn. 438, 74 N. W. 166 (general incompetency of motor-

The chief difficulty here is (1) to determine whether the fact offered is really character (Disposition) or only a Habit, i.e. of prudent or negligent methods. The latter should in any case be admitted; and a comparison of the doctrine as to Habit (post, §§ 92, 96, 97) will show how many instances fall close to the line. It is necessary also to distinguish two other questions, not always kept separate in discussion: (2) whether in proving a negligent character, specific former acts of negligence may be used; this assumes the character to be admissible, and deals only with a mode of getting at it (post, § 199); (3) whether an employee's negligent character or his negligent acts are admissible to charge the employer with the knowing maintenance of an incompetent employee; this is concerned with character as in issue, not as evidentiary to an act (post, §§ 80, 249, 250).

§ 66. Same: Character of a Plaintiff in Defamation to prove his Innocence. When A is said by B to have been guilty of murder or of forgery, and in a suit for defamation is met by a plea of truth, so that the issue is whether A committed the crime of murder or of arson, it is supposed by some Courts that A should be allowed to invoke his good character for peaceableness or for honesty, as bearing on the probability of his having committed the crime which B is trying to prove against him. There is much reason for assimilating the situation to that of an accused person and taking it out of the rule applicable ordinarily to parties in civil cases, — not only because the plaintiff is repudiating an accusation of crime, but because an unfavorable outcome affects his character to a degree equivalent to a punishment and carries a significance wholly absent after the loss of an ordinary civil suit:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, II, 305, 643: "Where, indeed, the defendant justifies the slander which conveys an imputation of dishonesty, the case may admit man, excluded); Mo.: 1896, Culbertson v. R. Co., 140 Mo. 35, 36 S. W. 834 (that a switchman was drunk at the time of giving a signal; excluded, because the fact of giving it was undisputed, and the only question was his negligence under the circumstances); N. H.: 1873, State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 549, semble (of an employee, to show whether he did or did not act carelessly, excluded); N. Y.: 1871, Warner v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465, 471 (former intemperate habits of a flagman on duty, held inadmissible to show neglect on the occasion in question; yet here the evidence of his drunkenness at the time and other facts affecting his conduct were fully before the jury; Hunt, C., dissenting); Pa.: 1874, Hays v. Miller, 77 Pa. 238 (counterclaim for injury caused by a collision with the plaintiff's tow-boat, while towing barges for the defendants; after evidence by the defendants tending to show that the plaintiff's servants carelessly caused the collision, the plaintiff offered to rebut by showing that the servants were "competent, skilful, and careful officers"; held, improper; for though the defendants might have rested their case on the plaintiff's selection of incompetent servants and the issue of their incompetence might thus have become legally material, yet here the only argument was from general character to conduct on the particular occasion, and this was held improper; "the jury will not confine the evidence of character to its true bearing upon the fact of negligence in the particular case, but set it up as per se a justification of the master"); 1888, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Colvin, 118 Pa. 230, 12 Atl. 337 (a flagman's reputation, not received to show him careless at the time in issue); Tex.: 1898, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 380, 48 S. W. 568 (plaintiff engineer's negligent habits, excluded; but certain exceptions are recognized); U. S.: 1896, Central Vt. R. Co. v. Ruggles, 21 C. C. A. 575, 75 Fed. 953 (intemperate habits of a watchman to show a specific failure of duty, excluded); 1898, Harriman v. Pullman P. C. Co., 29 C. C. A. 194, 85 Fed. 353 (employee's careful character, excluded); Vt.: 1884, Byrant v. R. Co., 56 Vt. 710, 712 (fire set by locomotive; the section-man's good character for care and prudence, excluded); Wash.: 1898, Carter v. Seattle, 19 Wash. 597, 53 Pac. 1102 (plaintiff's character for sobriety, not admitted to negative the fact of intoxication; treated as a question of negligence).

of a very different consideration, for there the party is charged with a crime, and in such a case character affords just the same presumption of innocence as if the party had been tried for the offence."

1853, Nash, C. J., in Sample v. Wynn, 1 Busbee 321 (charge of bestiality; plea of truth): "The nature of the crime charged upon the plaintiff is of the most odious character, the preferring of which is calculated to banish the individual charged from the ordinary intercourse of his fellow men, to brand him with an offence more odious than that which drove Cain into the wilderness and made him a wanderer upon the face of the earth. . . . The crime charged is detestable; and there is but one witness to the foul deed. In such a case, how can the purest man that lives shield himself from the effects of malice or revenge if not permitted to resort to such evidence?"

The only answer to this argument seems to be that it puts the plaintiff in a position relatively too favorable, as against the defendant, who already has the burden of proving his plea of truth:

1838, Parker, C. J., in Matthews v. Huntly, 9 N. H. 146 (charge of perjury; plea of truth; the plaintiff's general good character was rejected; after quoting the remark of Starkie, supra): "A party undertaking to justify, in an action of slander, should undoubtedly satisfy a jury of the fact; but he should not be held to make out the charge beyond all reasonable doubt, because the plaintiff is not on trial for the crime, and, whatever the verdict may be, no punishment or disability is incurred by him. And this being so, the plaintiff should not be permitted to avoid the evidence offered, in any other manner than he could be permitted to avoid similar evidence in any other civil suit. There is no hardship in this. A party may in many instances trust to his general character to exonerate him in public estimation from a charge or suspicion of particular misconduct; but if he brings a suit for the injury sustained by such charge, and the adverse party relies for justification upon its truth, the latter ought in justice to have that fact tried in the same way other facts are tried in civil cases."

With such plausible arguments on either side, it is natural that the state of the law in the various jurisdictions should differ.[1] There is, however, no reason why the defendant should be thus exceptionally allowed to use the plaintiff's bad character as evidence of his probable guilt; and it is generally agreed that this use is inadmissible.[2] Distinguish from the present subject the question whether the plaintiff's reputation may be considered in mitigation of damages (post, § 70).

[1] Eng.: 1825, Cornwall v. Richardson, 1 Ry. & Mo. 305, Abbott, C. J. (stealing money; excluded); 1833, Powell v. Harper, 5 C. & P. 589 (libel charging the plaintiff with receiving stolen goods; justification; the plaintiff's "general character for honesty" was admitted on his behalf); Ala.: 1900, Hereford v. Combs, 126 Ala. 369, 28 So. 582 (perjury admissible); Conn.: 1820, Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 343, semble (to disprove a charge of infidelity, the plaintiff was allowed to give evidence of his "uniform profession, conduct, and conversation"; but to disprove a charge of exacting money illegally as an official, evidence of his character for honesty was rejected, as unavailable in civil cases to disprove an act); Del.: 1841, Parke v. Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375, Layton, J., diss. (excluded); Ind.: 1843, McCabe v. Platter, 6 Blackf. 405 (unchastity, excluded); 1844, Byrket v. Monohon, 7 id. 84 (perjury; admitted on the theory that he could show it if criminally prosecuted for perjury); 1861, Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 249 (unchastity; excluded, following the McCabe case); 1867, Harm v. Wilson, 28 id. 301 (larceny; excluded, because there was no justification); 1873, Wilson v. Barnett, 45 id. 163, 168 (merely establishes the doctrine that one justifying a slanderous charge of crime must prove it beyond a reasonable doubt, as in criminal cases); 1876, Downey v. Dillon, 52 id. 442, 452 (citing the preceding case, admits the plaintiff's good character in a slander suit for a charge of perjury; distinguishing the earlier cases on this principle); 1877, Gebhart v. Burket, 57 id. 381 (preceding case approved); Ia.: 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 319, 37 N. W. 389 (excluded); Mass.: 1827, Harding v. Brooks, 5 Pick. 244 (slander, charging the plaintiff as "a liar, a knave, and a rascal"; justification; the plaintiff's evidence of good character was received, in order by "proof of the general tenor of his conduct and character to repel such imputations"; and it was apparently used to repel charges of specific misconduct); N. H.: 1839, Chesley v. Chesley, 10 N. H. 327, 330 (excluded); 1851, Severance v. Hilton, 24 id. 148 (excluded); N. Y.: 1848, Houghtaling v. Kilderhouse, 1 N. Y. 530 (poisoning the defendant's horses; plea of truth; plaintiff's good character excluded); 1851, Pratt v.

§ 67. Same: Character of Defendant in Malpractice. Where the action is for malpractice of a physician or other person engaging to use skill, the defendant's possession of due skill is usually put in issue under substantive law and the pleadings, and hence may of course be proved on the principle of §§ 70–79, post. But apart from this, and assuming that the question is as to his having done a particular act involving unskilful or improper methods, it would seem that his habitual qualities, if properly evidenced by repute or otherwise (post, §§ 1621,), were admissible as indicating his probable conduct; for it is a habit of training, rather than a moral trait, that is involved, and thus the principle of §§ 83, 92, post, should control, and not the character-rule. There is, however, little useful authority on the point.[1]

§ 68. (5) Character of Third Persons (Adultery, Illegitimate Inheritance,

Andrews, 4 Id. 496 (preceding case approved); N. C.: 1859, Burton v. March, 6 Jones L. 409, 412 (larceny, excluded).

[2] 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, semble; 1825, Cornwall v. Richardson, 1 Ry. & Mo. 305, Abbott, C. J.; 1841, Parke v. Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375; 1834, Com. v. Snelling, 15 Pick. 337, 343 (criminal libel; bad character of the libellee, not admissible to show the truth of the charge of gaming and drugging a horse, whether in a civil or in a criminal case); 1843, Stone v. Barney, 7 Metc. 86, 92 (it is receivable even where the defendant justifies by pleading truth, but is used solely on the question of damages, i. e. assuming that the jury find the words to be false, then they may consider the plaintiff's character in assessing damages, but not till then; "it would be the duty of the Court to advise the jury that it could not be used to sustain the justification, but was properly introduced because both questions were before them, and if the justification failed, upon the evidence applicable thereto, they would consider the evidence of the character of the plaintiff in assessing damages . . ., but for other purposes the evidence would be irrelevant"); 1897, Finley v. Widner, 112 Mich. 230, 70 N. W. 433; 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh., Pt. 1, 226 (perjury; the plaintiff's bad character for veracity, excluded). Contra: Ga.: 1897, Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655 (frequent arson; plaintiff's bad character admissible on plea of truth); Mich.: 1892, Sanford v. Rowley, 93 Mich. 119, 52 N. W. 1119 (perjury and lying; on a plea of truth, the plaintiff's bad reputation for veracity was admitted). That the defendant may not here use the plaintiff's bad character to show the probability of his having done the things alleged in the slander, seems implied also in the decisions (post, § 73) denying the use of such character on a plea of justification when offered in mitigation of damages; for as the objection to that course is merely the possible misapplication of the character-evidence to the justification-plea (i. e. to prove the truth of the charge), the clear implication is that such an applic. would be inadmissible. Those, moreover, must be cases where the character would be usable evidentially to prove a specific act, for of course if the charge had touched the general character, it would have come directly in issue under the justification of truth.

[1] 1902, Baker v. Borello, 136 Cal. 160, 68 Pac. 591 (reputed skill of a physician, admitted, as involved in the plaintiff's duty to employ a reputable physician to attend to his injury); 1812, Grannis v. Branden, 5 Day 260, 271 (malpractice by a surgeon and midwife; after evidence by the defendant of his professional skill and character, the plaintiff was allowed to show that the defendant was without proper training, having formerly been a dancing-master, etc.; following the analogy of the rule in criminal cases); 1824, Jeffries v. Harris, 3 Hawks 105 (assumpsit for services as a physician; the plaintiff's poor character as a physician excluded, because "not put in issue by the nature of this action"; aliter, semble, if the plaintiff had represented himself as of a certain grade of skill); 1845, Mertz v. Detweiler, 8 W. & S. 376, 378 (action for malpractice; the defendant's evidence as to his skill and character as a surgeon, held "irrelevant"; "It may be said that his general qualifications might serve to shed light on the propriety of his practice in this particular instance, but it is light which would be less likely to lead to a sound conclusion than to lead astray"). Distinguish the use of particular acts of incompetency (post, §§ 202, 208).

Bastard's Filiation, Forged Will, Other Persons' Crimes); Character of Animals. Where the character offered is that of a third person, not a party to the cause, the reasons of policy (noted ante, § 64) for exclusion seem to disappear or become inconsiderable; hence, if there is any relevancy in the fact of character, i. e. if some act is involved upon the probability of which a moral trait can throw light, the character may well be received. On this principle it has been admitted to evidence the illegitimacy of one claiming an inheritance,[1] to evidence the adultery of a co-respondent in divorce or other third person,[2] and to show a different parentage for a bastard in filiation proceedings;[3] and the principle may equally apply (subject to the limitations of §§ 139–142, post) to evidence the commission of any crime by a third person, particularly the forging or coercing of a will.[4]

The character or disposition of an animal is no less relevant than that of a human being, as indicating his probable conduct on a particular occasion, and it is open to none of the objections of auxiliary policy (ante, §§ 57, 64) which affect the use of a party's character. It is therefore commonly conceded to be admissible.[5] The hesitation sometimes observed in the rulings

[1] 1732, Pendrell v. Pendrell, 2 Stra. 925 (issue to try heirship; the defendant was allowed "to prove the mother to be a woman of ill fame," as tending to show the plaintiff a bastard); 1810, Banbury Peerage Case, in App. to LeMarchant's Gardner Peerage Case, 458; 1856, Legge v. Edmonds, 26 L. J. Ch. 125, 135 (legitimacy as affecting title).

[2] 1860, Blackman v. State, 36 Ala. 295, 297 (adultery with a woman M.; the reputation of M. for unchastity, admitted as corroborative evidence); 1868, Clement v. Kimball, 98 Mass. 535 (action for boarding the defendant's wife; defence, separation and adultery; the bad reputation for chastity of men who visited the wife while so separated, excluded, because no other evidence of adultery was offered as a foundation; but "such testimony often becomes competent when there is other evidence in the case to show relations of an equivocal character"); 1880, Com. v. Gray, 129 id. 476 (on a charge of adultery against a husband, after showing suspicious association with a woman, the character of the woman as a prostitute or the contrary may be shown); 1877, Marble v. Merble, 36 Mich. 386 (divorce for adultery; "reputation," of an unspecified sort, admissible as "subsidiary" evidence; Clement v. Kimball approved). Contra: 1901, Guinu v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 65 S. W. 376 (adultery; character of the third person, excluded). The following rulings seem sound: 1903, Burnett v. People, — Ill. —, 68 N. E. 505 (murder by persuading the deceased woman to a joint suicide; the deceased's good character for chastity, held inadmissible); 1902, State v. Chanute, 65 Kan. 682, 70 Pac. 870 (illegal sale of liquor; that the buyer, who did not testify, was a "spotter," inducing sales for the purpose of prosecution, excluded).

[3] 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Munf. 495, 497, 502, 505 (complainant in bastardy prosecution; the woman's bad character for virtue admitted, apparently to prove the probability of another's parentage). The following case could have been decided on this principle: 1855, Zitzer v. Merkel, 24 Pa. 408 (seduction; the daughter's good character for chastity not admitted to disprove specific unchastities alleged by the defendant).

[4] 1820, Rowt's Adm'r v. Kile's Adm'r, Gilmer 102 (as part of the evidence to show that a third person had forged the instrument sued on, evidence of the person's "infamous character" held admissible; but this ruling was made before the modern doctrine was settled). Compare the following case: 1903, Ward v. Brown, — W. Va. —, 44 S. E. 488 (undue influence; good character of deceased attorney preparing the will, admitted, as an exception to the general rule). Contra: 1903, McElroy v. Phirk, — Tex. —, 76 S. W. 753 (character for integrity of a deceased third person, said to have destroyed improperly a lost will, excluded).

Compare the rule for impeaching the character of an attesting witness (post, § 1514), for skill of a draftsman of a document (post, § 87), and for corroborating a witness (post, § 1106), and some of the cases ante, § 64, n. 3.

[5] 1878, Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535 (viciousness of a horse); 1897, Broderick v. Higginson, 169 id. 482, 48 N. E. 269 (habit of a dog to attack passing teams, admissible to show that he did it on a particular occasion). Contra, 1868, East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 57, 65 (the bad character of the defendant's dog as to sheep-killing, not admitted to evidence that he had killed particular sheep; Doe, J., dissenting; this would probably not be followed in the same Court to-day); 1896, Kelly v. Alderson, 19 R. I. 544, 37 Atl. 12 (a dog's character for peaceableness not admitted to show that the dog probably did not bite till assaulted; "this would set up the character of the dog against the plaintiff's oath," — an amusing piece of judicial reasoning).

has been due to the time at which the disposition is predicated in the offer; but here, as with human character (ante, § 60), the existence of a trait at a given time is evidence that it existed also for a reasonable time before and afterwards, and within liberal limits should therefore be received.[6]

3. Character as evidentiary for Other Purposes.

§ 69. Character as evidencing a Third Person's Belief, Knowledge, or Motive. The evidentiary uses of character just examined have the purpose in each case of indicating the likelihood that the person to whom the character is attributed did or did not do an act alleged. But a person's character may also have other evidentiary uses; and it is worth while here to point out the principles which they involve:

(1) Character as affecting another Person's Belief or Reasonable Grounds for Belief. There are several situations of this kind. Usually the character will be relevant only so far as attended with a reputation; for by means of the reputation the other person's belief or knowledge is best shown: (a) Character of a deceased person, as indicating a defendant's apprehension of aggression from the deceased (post, § 246); (b) Character of an arrested person, as indicating another person's reasonable ground for believing a charge of crime and for causing his arrest (post, § 258); (c) Character of an employee, as indicating his employer's knowledge of his incompetence (post, § 249).

(2) Character as indicating a Motive; this is an occasional use having various aspects (post, § 389).

4. Character as an Issue in the Case.

§ 70. (1) Plaintiff's Reputed Bad Character as mitigating Damages for Defamation. Where A sues B for defamation, and the issue is as to the proper amount of compensation, the question arises whether it is fair to measure his compensation by the quality of his original actual standing in the community, and, in particular, whether the fact that he had little or no reputation to lose may be considered as good reason for diminishing the damages accordingly. This question, it will be seen, is not one of the law

[6] 1900, Walrod v. Webster Co., 110 Ia. 349, 81 N. W. 598 (of horses after an accident, admitted); 1861, Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356, 360 (his disposition for skittishness six or eight months after an accident, admitted, since "it may be safely laid down as a general rule (having its exceptions, no doubt) that neither horses nor men entirely change their characters, their habits, or their manners, in that space of time"); 1865, Whittier v. Franklin, 46 id. 23, 26; 1898, Stone v. Langworthy, 20 R. I. 602, 40 Atl. 832 (character of a horse subsequent to an accident, excluded as of "slight practical value"); 1888, Turnpike Co. v. Hearn, 87 Tenn. 291, 10 S. W. 510 (whether a horse was unmanageable; his disposition before and after the accident admitted); 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; dog's character since the time, admissible). Distinguish the proof of an animal's character when in issue: 1901, Willet v. Goetz, 125 Mich. 581, 84 N. W. 1071 (dog; here his good character was excluded, because the scienter had been clearly shown otherwise by vicious acts); 1898, Citizens' R. T. Co. v. Dew, 100 Tenn. 317, 45 S. W. 790 (ancestry of a dog, admitted to show his value). Distinguish also the use of particular instances of conduct to evidence the animal's character (post, § 201), and also to evidence the owner's knowledge of that character (post, § 251).

of evidence, i. e. character or reputation for character is not offered as having probative value to evidence the probability of something else. A principle of the law of damages is involved, i. e. whether compensation shall be regulated according to a certain fact, namely, quality of reputation; if yes, reputation becomes material; if no, reputation is immaterial, and will not be considered. It must also be noticed that we are no longer dealing with actual character, but with reputed character; and, furthermore, that this reputation is not offered evidentially (ante, § 52), but as an element brought into issue by the law of the case. The propriety of considering this element in fixing compensation must here be considered (though it is no question of evidence), for the purpose of distinguishing those precedents which involve it from those which involve genuinely a question of evidence.

(1) Whether in an action for defamation the defendant may use the plaintiff's poor reputation (or lack of reputation) to mitigate the damages has been one of the most controverted questions in the whole law. The arguments on each side are so strong, and the balance of convenience is so clear, according to the point of view taken, that it is no wonder that Courts have taken radically opposite views. The argument in favor of considering reputation has been thus expressed:

1818, Mr. Holt, note in Holt's N. P. 308: "The ground of the action on the case for a libel is the quantum of injurious damage which the person libelled either has or may be presumed to have sustained from the libellous matter. . . . [Thus] the reputation cannot be said to be injured where it was before destroyed. The plaintiff has previously extinguished his own character. He has, therefore, no basis for an action to recover compensation for the loss of character and its consequential damage. The law considers him as bringing an action of damage to a thing which does not exist."

1882, Cave, J., in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491: "Speaking generally, the law recognizes in every man a right to have the estimation in which he stands in the opinion of others unaffected by false statements to his discredit, and if such false statements are made without lawful excuse, and damage results to the person of whom they are made, he has a right of action. The damage, however, which he has sustained must depend almost entirely on the estimation in which he was previously held. He complains of an injury to his reputation, and seeks to recover damages for that injury; and it seems most material that the jury who have to award those damages should know, if the fact is so, that he is a man of no reputation. 'To deny this would,' as is observed in Starkie on Evidence,[1] 'be to decide that a man of the worst character is entitled to the same measure of damages with one of unsullied and unblemished reputation. A reputed thief would be placed on the same footing with the most honorable merchant, a virtuous woman with the most abandoned prostitute. To enable the jury to estimate the probable quantity of injury sustained, a knowledge of the party's previous character is not only material but seems to be absolutely essential.' It is said that the admission of such evidence will be a hardship upon the plaintiff, who may not be prepared to rebut it; and under the former practice, where the damages could not be pleaded to, and general evidence of bad character was allowed to be given under a plea of not guilty, there was something in this objection, which, however, is removed under the present system of pleading, which requires that all material facts shall be pleaded; and a plaintiff who has notice that general evidence of bad character will be adduced against him, can have no difficulty whatever, if he is a man of good character, in coming prepared with friends who have known him to prove that his reputation has been good."

[1] 2 Starkie Evid. 306.

1806, Thompson, J., in Foot v. Tracy, 1 Johns. 46: "It cannot be just that a man of infamous character should, for the same libellous matter, be entitled to equal damages with the man of unblemished reputation; yet such must be the result, unless character be a proper subject of evidence before a jury. . . . As the legal intendment is that the action is brought to repair an injury done to a person's character in the estimation of the public, the jury must be left very much in the dark, in making a just reparation in damages, without being furnished with some data by which to estimate its value and susceptibility of injury. Though the inquiry may be, in some measure, vague and uncertain, and in some cases may lead to abuses, yet I have adopted it as being the least exceptionable course. Such inquiries may be legally made of witnesses as to enable the jury justly to appreciate the sources from which they form their opinion of the general character of a party and thereby prevent very great evil or imposition."

1818, 1820, Nott, J., in Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 269, Sawyer v. Eifert, 2 id. 515: "In every action at law the object is to recover reparation for some injury sustained. And where the injury is to property, the value of the article is the principal object of inquiry. And I can see no good reason why the value of character may not be investigated as well as that of any other commodity, when the reparation of character is the object of this suit. . . . It is said it would be taking a person by surprise thus to permit an inquiry into his character. But if the character of a witness, who is called upon in Court and compelled to give evidence without any previous notice, is not shielded from such an attack, how much less ought a party who has voluntarily brought his character into Court claim such an exemption? He commences with stating that he is a person of good name, fame, and reputation, and he ought to be always prepared to defend his allegation. A person is presumed to be always prepared to defend his general character, if he has a good one; if he has not, it ought to be exposed. . . . I hold that a woman ought not to be taken from the stews and brothels of a town, to be placed alongside of the most respectable ladies who equally adorn our drawing-rooms and our churches; nor that the high priest of vice and corruption should be ranked with the pious priest of the parish or the respectable bishop of the diocese. Where a person's character is such that he cannot safely trust it to a court and jury, slander can do him but little injury; and a person who is neither ashamed nor afraid to expose his character to the eye of the public ought not to be permitted to shelter it under the forms of law from the eye of a jury."

The meat of this argument is that a person should not be paid for the loss of that which he never had. The opposing argument lays stress on the abuses to which the use of such evidence is open:

1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 256, 269, slander, charging the plaintiff with being a disreputable and unprofessional attorney; testimony to his general bad character and reputation as an attorney was held inadmissible under the general issue; Graham, B.: "There is a full concurrence of opinion amongst the whole Court that such general evidence of bad character, . . . and that principally on the grounds that a party can not be expected to be prepared to rebut it, and that, if it were to be received, any man might fall a victim to a combination made to ruin his reputation and good name, even by means of the very action which he should bring to free himself from the effects of malicious slander"; Garrow, B.: "If ever it should [become the law that such evidence should be admissible], the libeller will become a much more general character than we find him now; for he will derive protection and impunity from the apprehension and dread, with which the object of his malice would naturally be possessed, of resorting for redress to courts of justice to vindicate his name, where it would be permitted to the defendant to bring forward testimony of general bad character which from its nature it would be impossible to disprove; whereby they in effect become the means of putting the libels of which they complain on the records of the courts of giving a wider circulation to the calumnies contained in them."

1806, Livingston, J., in Foot v. Tracy, 1 Johns. 46: "I am now satisfied that more mischief will follow from an adoption of such a rule than by excluding the investigation altogether, except when presented as a complete justification in the form of a special plea. . . . It is answered that a person of bad fame has no right to bring a suit, or, if he does, that he cannot expect the same compensation as those who have a character to lose. But no one, however low a man's reputation be, has a right to publish slanders of him, or to charge him with crimes of which he is innocent. If he confines himself to the truth, he can plead it; but if he will deal in general invective, or indulge his wit and venom by travelling out of the record, he must abide by the consequence. Nothing is better settled than that the truth of a libel or of slander cannot be relied on, in justification, unless pleaded. What is not permitted, then, directly, ought not to be tolerated in any other way. . . . [This result] will only impose on those who choose to publish their animadversions on the crimes or failings of others, which occupy so great a portion of our public papers, the task of proving by particular facts the truth of what they assert. Nor is there any hardship in this. Those who sport with the feelings of others, under the professions of zeal for the public good, on no other basis than that of common fame, which is not always an infallible guide, cannot complain if courts require from them, on these as on most other occasions, some better proof of their calumnies than general opinion. If every man who does not enjoy an unblemished reputation, or has the misfortune to be disesteemed by his neighbors, were fair game, in a country where the liberty of the press is so much perverted and abused, few indeed would escape."

1818, Cheves, J., dissenting, in Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 272: "1. It is alleged that the pleadings put the character of the plaintiff in issue. Now it is not true, in point of law, that the character of the plaintiff is put in issue . . . [since a plea denying the allegation would be demurrable]. 2. But it is said that the foundation of the damages given in actions of slander is the actual injury suffered by the plaintiff in his character. This is not true; it is upon the presumption of loss (little more than a legal fiction), and not upon the actual loss, that actions of slander are principally founded. . . . Are not the heaviest damages given when the slander is uttered against unsullied and impregnable character, — where the malice of the calumniator has been shot 'like a pointless arrow from a broken bow'? To the tottering and questionable character, the shafts of the slanderer are fatal and ruinous, . . . in such cases we know that the damages are usually nominal, though he injury is immeasurable and intolerable. Is it not, then, amusing ourselves with a phantom, when we suppose that the actual loss sustained by the sufferer is the real foundation of damages in actions of slander? There must be other and higher principles on which they are founded. Is it not obvious that the foundation of these damages is to be discovered in the general sanctity of character, which is considered as a shield, not against irreparable injury only, but against every possible assault upon the hallowed blessing of a good name? Even the wicked and the worthless are allowed this protection, as the infidel was once permitted to enter the Christian sanctuary. . . . Ought [the defendant] not to be subjected to heavier penalties for thus oppressing the fallen, perhaps the broken-hearted and repentant and reforming offender, than if he had, with equal malice but with less meanness, attacked the highest and most irreproachable man in the community? I should say he ought. [3.] But if the admission of this evidence were clear, according to analogy and theory, it ought to be rejected in practice from its immateriality to a fair defence, and from the abuses of which it will be susceptible. It is immaterial, because, as far as such a cause should operate, it has its full influence (and too much) through the knowledge of the jury. . . . It is susceptible to the greatest abuses. The person, not of unblemished reputation, must suffer every calumny that the tongue can utter, in silence; for if he seek redress against any specific slander, he must suffer the defects of his character to be exhibited and proclaimed in a court of justice by as many witnesses as the fears or malice of the defendant may choose to call. A man laboring under a neighborhood calumny, though perfectly innocent, must be the victim of every specific slander that may be uttered against him. He dare not enter the portals of a court of justice, or he will be doomed to eternal infamy by a thousand tongues."

§ 71. Same: the question as affected by the Pleadings. The state of the pleadings may affect the situation radically, by giving opportunity for different issues and policies. There are four conceivable cases: (a) General issue pleaded; the amount of damages being customarily herein issuable, the plaintiff's bad repute is offered in mitigation; (b) Justification of truth pleaded; the defamatory charge specific (e.g. "A stole a horse from B"); the plaintiff's bad character offered to show the probability of the theft; (c) Justification pleaded; the charge specific; the plaintiff's bad repute offered in mitigation of damages, anticipating a possible finding against the defendant on the plea; (d) Justification pleaded; the charge general (e.g. "A is a thief"); the plaintiff's bad reputed character offered as involved in the plea.

(a) This is the ordinary case, raising the general question; the passages quoted in the preceding section deal with this case. It is the most favorable for the defendant, for here his claim is not affected by any possible impropriety of pleading, except the supposed argument of surprise, discussed above by the judges.

(b) This is a purely evidentiary use of character, and has been already elsewhere examined (ante, § 66).

(c) Here the question is (1) whether as a matter of pleading the issue of damages can properly be raised under a plea of justification, and (2), even if it is theoretically possible, whether it is not practically better to exclude the element of repute, because of the probable abuse of the opportunity by those who would make no real attempt to prove truth but would simply abuse the plaintiff's reputed character, and because a mere direction to the jury not to consider such character except in mitigation of damages would hardly be sufficient to keep them from letting it affect their verdict on the plea of truth.[1]

(d) Here, since the defamatory charge is general, and the reputed character is offered as showing the very fact in issue, the defendant seems to be safe; yet it is sometimes argued that, to avoid abuse of the situation and to prevent surprise, he can never even plead in justification the fact of general character, but must affirm specific acts and prove them as such.[2] It will be noticed

[1] For the best exposition of this case, see M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542 (1837).

[2] The reasons are set forth in the following leading case: 1787, J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 748, 752 (slander by charging the plaintiff as a "notorious swindler and common informer"; Ashurst, J.: "The defendant . . . when he took upon himself generally to justify the charge, must be prepared with the facts which constitute the charge, in order to enable him to maintain the plea. Then he ought to state those facts specifically, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of denying them; for the plaintiff cannot come to the trial prepared to justify his whole life"; Buller, J.: "If the plaintiff has been guilty of any act of swindling, the defendant must be taken to know them. He could not prove the justification, as he has pleaded it, by general evidence; but he has no justification unless he can prove the special instances; and, knowing them, he ought to put them on the record, that the plaintiff might be prepared to answer them"; here the plea was held bad on demurrer).

(post, § 73) that the jurisdictions are divided as to case (a); that only the Courts which admit in case (a) need to discuss case (c), and here again there is a division; that only the Courts that exclude in case (a) are likely to care to raise the question of case (d), and that the result of exclusion therein is rarely reached. It will also be noticed that the effect of excluding in both (a) and (d) is practically to prevent a defendant from using the plaintiff's bad character at all, either in justification or in mitigation.

§ 72. Same: Kind of Character, Particular or General. A further question that arises in those jurisdictions where the plaintiff's bad character is admitted in mitigation is whether general bad character can alone be used, or whether bad character for the particular trait involved in the defamation can alone be used. Most Courts, instead of allowing the use of either or both, prefer to make the use of one sort exclusive. The argument that general character alone should be considered is expounded as follows:

1847, Coulter, J., in Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Pa. St. 175: "Can evidence of separate and particular departments of character be lawfully allowed? . . . How is character estimated? Certainly by its general import. It will not do to take up the Decalogue and inquire whether a man is generally reputed as addicted to fornication or adultery, to profane swearing, to Sabbath-breaking. . . . If this mode of destroying character was allowed in our courts, the standing of all men would be in peril. We have but few Catos among us; and if we had more, such individuals would hardly seek redress in our courts. But the law is not made for the protection of such men, but for the protection of that middle class all the world over, who have a sense of truth, honor, and virtue, and who are yet not above the infirmities of life; whose sensibility as to the value of character, and whose liability to err, make them more susceptible of wounds from the shaft of slander. The thousand wagging tongues of this world, sometimes in sport and sometimes in malice, make free with some department or quality of character of good men in the main; and if malice were allowed to seize hold of these reports and embody them in a court of justice to destroy character, few men would be safe. The truth is that it is only in general character that a man finds his true level in society; and that alone ought to mark his value."

This argument is answered as follows, by those who claim that a reputation for the particular trait involved is equally open to examination:

1864, Strong, J., in Conroe v. Conroe, 47 Pa. 202: "A man may have many virtues, and consequently a good general reputation, and yet be notorious for a single vice. If his virtues be called in question, it is an injury; but if only his vice be asserted, his injury is less. . . . [The plaintiff's] averment is not that her reputation for all the virtues which go to make up good character is fair, but that her reputation for chastity was sound; and it is that, she complains has been taken from her. Its real value was therefore a proper subject of inquiry."

The argument that the reputation for the particular trait alone should be considered is thus set forth:

1871, Lyon, J., in Wilson v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 614: "It is said that a person who brings such an action puts his reputation in issue; but it seems to be more accurate to say that he thereby puts it in issue in the particular wherein he claims that it has been assailed. Human reputation is complex in its nature. Because a man has a single vice, or even more than a single vice, it does not follow from that circumstance that he is totally depraved. . . . He may be an incorrigible liar, and yet strictly honest in all his dealings. He may be a great scoundrel in pecuniary matters, and yet perfectly chaste. . . . Where a person's character for truth and veracity is falsely assailed, and he brings his action against the assailant to recover damages therefor, if his reputation for truth and veracity is good, on what sound principle can it be said that if such plaintiff is unchaste, or dishonest in business matters, or covetous, profane, or a sabbath-breaker, the damages to which he would otherwise be entitled shall be reduced to a nominal sum?"

§ 73. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. (1) So far as concerns the question at large, as affected by the pleadings (ante, §§ 70, 71), it will be noticed that to-day, in case (a), the repute is in most of the jurisdictions admitted; that only the Courts which admit in case (a) need to discuss case (c), and that here again the repute is commonly admitted; that the question in case (d) is not likely to be raised except in the few Courts that exclude in case (a),—although in England (a) is admitted and (d) is excluded. It may also be noted that the effect of excluding in both (a) and (d) is practically to prevent a defendant from using the plaintiff's bad repute at all, either in justification or in mitigation. (2) As to the kind of repute receivable, the exclusive admissibility of general character is no longer the law anywhere; the exclusive admissibility of the particular trait is maintained in perhaps half of the jurisdictions, and in the others the admissibility of both is recognized.[1]

[1] England and Canada: (1) Character in mitigation or justification: (a) The earlier rulings all inclined to admit bad reputa, under the general issue, in mitigation: 1716, Dennis v. Pawling, Vin. Abr. "Evidence," I, b, 16 (XII, 159); 1809, Knobell v. Fuller, Peake, Add. Cas. 189, Lord Keuyon, C. J.; 1803, R. v. Waring, 5 Esp. 13, Lord Alvanley, C. J.; 1809, Leicester v. Walter, 2 Camp. 251, Mansfield, C. J.; 1810, Williams v. Callender, Holt N. P. 307, note, Lord Ellenborough, C. J.; 1813, Anon. v. Moor, 1 M. & S. 284, K. B.; 1811, Snowdon v. Smith, 1 M. & S. 286, note, Chambre, J., semble; 1817, Newsam v. Carr, 2 Stark. 70, Wood B.; 1817, Mille v. Spencer, Holt N. P. 533, Gibbs, C. J., semble; 1822, Waithman v. Weaver, 11 Price 257, note, Abbott, C. J., doubtful; 1824, Ellershaw v. Robinson, 2 Stark. Ev. 641, n., Holroyd, J.; and the same opinion was indicated under the next rulings (c), refusing to receive it under a justification. Then came a series of rulings excluding it: 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price, 235; 1859, Bracegirdle v. Bailey, 1 F. & F. 536, Byles and Willes, JJ.; 1863, Myers v. Currie, 22 N. C. Q. B. 470; but the more recent opinion looks upon the earlier line as orthodox, and receives the evidence: 1882, Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491. In Canada, statutory rules now usually admit it, subject to a notice of particulars: Ont. Rules of Court 1897, § 488 (where truth is not pleaded, character is not receivable in mitigation unless on seven days' notice of particulars); Man. Rev. St. 1902, c. 40, Rule 471 (like Ont. Rule 488); Newf. Cons. St. 1892, c. 50, Rules of Court 32, par. 16 (like Ont. Rule 488, requiring two days' notice); N. Sc. Rules 1900, Ord. 34, R. 30 (like Ont. Rule 488); (c) Its use under a justification was once thought improper: 1811, Snowden v. Smith, 1 M. & S. 286, note, Chambre, J.; but later the rulings were all in the other direction: 18—, Kirkman v. Oxley, 2 Stark. Ev. 306, k, Heath, J.; 1826, Mawby v. Barber, Ib. 641, e, Lord Tenterden, C. J.; 1836, Moore v. Oastler, ib., Lord Denman, C. J., and Parke, B.; 1837, Hardy v. Alexandar, Ib., Coltman, J.; 1833, Powell v. Harper, 5 C. & P. 590, 592, Parke, B.; Mr. Starkie also approved these rulings, believing it sufficient for the Court to tell the jury to apply the evidence only on the question of damages. (d) The exclusion of character on a justification of a general charge was supposed to have been settled by the following line of cases: 1787, J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 748 (quoted supra, § 71); 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 273; 1842, Hickinbotham v. Leach, 10 M. & W. 361, Parke, B.; 1893, Zierenberg v. Labonchera, 2 Q. B. 183, 186 (approving J'Anson v. Stuart); (2) Kind of Character. The particular trait, as well as the general character, seems to be admissible: 1833, Powell v. Harper, 5 C. & P. 590, 592 (honesty); the exclusion of "particular credit" in Dennis v. Pawling, Vin. Abr. "Evidence," I, b, 16 (1716), vol. XII, 159, seems not to refer to the present subject, but to discrediting a witness by particular acts. Alabama; (1) (a); admitted; the limitation specified is intended to prevent the defendant's abuse of this opportunity by taking advantage of the destruction of a reputation destroyed by himself: 1834, Commone v. Weltera, 1 Port. 322, 327 (but not after the date of the charge); 1836, Waters v. Jones, 3 Id. 442, 450; 1846, Bradley v. Gibson, 9 Ala. 406; 1849, Scott v. McKinnish, 15 Id. 665 (but not after the date of the charge); Connecticut; (1) (a); admitted: 1792, Brunson v. Lynde, 1 Root 354; Seymour v. Merrills, Ib. 459; 1794, Austin v. Hanchet, 2 Id. 148; 1820, Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 346; 1822, Treat v. Browning, 4 Id. 414; 1825, Bennett v. Hyde, 6 Id. 24; Delaware, (1) (a); inconsistent rulings: 1838, Wooplee v. Burton, 2 Herringt. 446 (admissible); 1841, Perke v. Blackiston, 3 Id. 373, 375 (inadmissible, following Jones v. Stevens); (c) same condition; Wooplee v. Burton, supra; Perke v. Blackiston, supra; Illinois; (1) (a) and (c): admitted: 1842, Young v. Bennett, 5 Ill. 43, 47 (even where a plea of justification has been put in); 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Id. 328; Indiana; (1) (a) and (c): 1825, Henson v. Veatch, 1 Blackf. 371 (left undecided); 1841, Sanders v. Johnson, 6 Id. 52 (left undecided, at least where the plea is justification); 1842, Burke v. Miller, Ib. 155 (said obiter to be admissible on the general issue); 1843, McCabe v. Pletter, Ib. 405 (held admissible even under a justification); 1867, Bickanstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 528 (admissibility recognized); Iowa; (1) (a): 1887, Henners v. McClelland, 71 Ia. 318, 322, 37 N. W. 399 (admitted); Kentucky; (1) (a); admitted: 1810, Eastland v. Caldwall, 2 Bibb 21, 28; 1880, Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 209; 1896, Ratcliff v. Courier-Journal, 99 Id. 416, 36 S. W. 177; (2) (b); particular trait only: Eastland v. Coldwall, supra; Louisiana; (1) (c); admitted; 1828, Kendrick v. Kemp, 6 Mart. N. S. La. 500; Maine; (1) (a); admitted: 1839, Smith v. Wyman, 16 Me. 14 (chastity); Massachusetts; (1) (a); admitted: 1810, Wolcott v. Hall, 6 Mass. 518 (Parsons, C. J.: "he ought not to obtain large damages, if his character is of little or no estimation in society"); 1817, Ross v. Lapham, 14 Id. 279 (but excluding evidence of the plaintiff's being an atheist); 1825, Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. 376 (Parker, C. J.: "To a reputation already soiled, the injury is small"); 1834, Com. v. Snelling, 15 Id. 387, 344; 1843, Stone v. Varney, 7 Metc. 86; 1863, Chapman v. Ordway, 5 All. 595; 1863, Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 Id. 406; 1874, Peterson v. Morgan, 116 Mass. 350; 1875, Clark v. Brown, Ib. 509; 1881, Hastings v. Stetson, 130 Id. 76, 78; (c); admitted: Stone v. Varney, supra (quoted supra, § 66); (2); general character and particular trait admitted: Clerk v. Brown, supra; Michigan; (1) (a); admitted: 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 Mich. 41, 44; 1883, Bathrick v. Detroit Post, 50 Id. 629, 642 (reputation before publication of the charge); 1897, Finley v. Widner, 112 Id. 230, 70 N. W. 433; 1897, Fowler v. Fowler, 113 Id. 575, 71 N. W. 1084; 1897, Georgia v. Bond, 114 Id. 196, 72 N. W. 232; (2) inconsistent rulings; 1883, Bathrick v. Post, supra (particular trait only); 1894, Thibault v. Sessions, 101 Id. 279, 290, 59 N. W. 624 (general character only); Minnesota; (1) (a); 1866, Simmons v. Holster, 13 Minn. 249, 257 (not decided); Mississippi; (1) (a); admitted: 1859, Powers v. Prestgroves, 38 Miss. 227, 241; Missouri; (1) (a); admitted: 1822, Anthony v. Stephens, 1 Mo. 254; (2); particular trait only: Anthony v. Stephens, supra; New Hampshire; (1) (a); admitted: 1833, Lamos v. Snell, 6 N. H. 413; 1851, Severance v. Hilton, 24 Id. 146; (2) general character and particular trait also: Lamos v. Snell, supra; New York; (1) (a); admissible, since the first case: 1806, Foot v. Tracy, 1 John. 46 (undecided; Kent, C. J., and Thompson, J., for, and Livingston, J., and Tompkins, J., against receiving it); 1824, Paddock v. Salisbury, 2 Cow. 811; 1829, Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. 352 (since "defendants might indirectly contribute to the reputation of the plaintiff's bad character for the very purpose of reducing the damages in actions of slender already instituted against them," the reputation offered cannot be of the character after the words were uttered); 1829, King v. Root, 4 Id. 139; 1847, Hemer v. McFerlin, 4 Den. 509; (c); admitted: King v. Root, supra; Hamer v. McFerlin, supra ("[The other view] assumes that the jury could not discriminate between the proof offered to enstein the justification and that which relates to the damages merely; but I think the evil apprehended is more imaginary than real"); North Carolina; (1) (a); admitted: 1802, Vick v. Whitfield, 2 Hayw. 222; 1853, Sample v. Wynn, Busbee 320; Ohio; (1) (a); admitted: 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh. 225; 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 Id. 418, 425; Pennsylvania; (1) (a); admitted, but (b) doubtful: 1825, Anderson v. Long, 10 S. & R. 61, obiter; 1833, Smith v. Ruckecker, 4 Rawle 295 (undecided); 1835, Henry v. Norwood, 4 Watts 347, 350; 1847, Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Pa. 170, 174 (admissible where a plea of not guilty is recorded; on a justification only, no decision given, the case going off on another point); 1864, Conroe v. Conroe, 47 Id. 198 (admissible on the general issue; but apparently not on a justification alone); 1865, Moyer v. Moyer, 49 Id. 210 (admitted; nothing said as to the bearing of pleadings); (2) The rulings have veered entirely around, originally admitting general character only, but now admitting only particular traits: 1833, Smith v. Ruckecker, 4 Rawle 295 (charge of whoring; evidence of the plaintiff's reputation for thieving, excluded); 1847, Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Pa. 170, 175 (refusing to confine the plaintiff to reputation for veracity only, in an action for charging perjury; overruled in effect by the following cases, admitting particular traits); 1864, Conroe v. Conroe, 47 Id. 198 (chastity); 1865, Moyer v. Moyer, 49 Id. 210 (general character excluded, and only the particular trait admitted; Steinman v. McWilliams susceptible of little or no injury, the defendant will sometimes attempt to attain his purpose by showing less than a total lack of reputation for general character or for the particular trait. If, for instance, the charge was that the plaintiff stole a horse, the defendant will offer to show that there was a prevalent rumor or a common belief that the plaintiff stole the horse; thus, the defendant will assert, his false charge could not have hurt the plaintiff by causing a belief in his guilt, because there was already a common belief in it, or at least a rumor of it. The argument for permitting this has never been better put than in the following passage:

§ 74. Same: Rumors of the Crime charged, as affecting Reputation. In thus seeking to mitigate damages by showing the plaintiff's reputation to be

1860, Pigot, C. B., dissenting, in Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. 413, 425: "It is by putting extreme cases that the application of a principle can often be most clearly tested; let me put the case that I shall now describe. Suppose this to have happened: a gentleman employed in a railway-office is found in the office murdered, and circumstances of the very strongest suspicion attach upon one individual; the case is tried, the facts are fully investigated, the individual is acquitted; but there exists generally, in the community at large, a moral conviction that the party charged is guilty. . . . He is entitled to the benefit of his acquittal, and to the presumption of innocence which the law casts around one whose guilt has not been proved; no man can be justified in calling him a 'murderer,'—nay, the general impression may, if the truth were clearly known, be unjust. But, rightly or wrongly, he has lost his good name, and there exists a general reputation that he was guilty of the specific offence which I have described. . . . Is it just or reasonable that a man so covered with the reputation of having been guilty of an atrocious crime should be entitled to as large a measure of damages, for being called a murderer, as a person of unblemished fame, upon whose character the breath of slander had never been blown? . . . Suppose two successive cases presented in succession to the same jury; in one, the alleged murderer is plaintiff, in the other, the plaintiff is a man without a stain upon his character; I do not think it just or reasonable (and I cannot think that it will ultimately be established as the law of England) that the same measure of damages should be applied to each."

and Conroe v. Conroe cited but misread); South Carolina; (1) (a); admitted; 1818, Buford v. M'Lnny, 1 Nott & M. 268; 1820, Sawyer v. Eifert, 2 id. 511; 1833, Anon., 1 Hill S. C. 251, 253; 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 id. 177; (2) admitting general character and particular traits also: 1818, Buford v. M'Lnny, 1 Nott & M. 268, 270 (it is not allowable "for instance, where a person is accused of stealing, to prove by way of mitigation that he had committed murder or that he was a drunkard or a gambler; but the evidence must go to show that his character is so bad that he might well be suspected of the particular offence charged, and could not be injured by the report"); Virginia; (1) (a), admitted: 1837, M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542; 1839, Lincoln v. Chrisman, 10 id. 338, 342 (except, possibly, where the slander charges nothing affecting the moral character); 1867, Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. 259, semble; (c), admitted: 1837, M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542 (perhaps the best single case on the subject); (2) admitting general character and particular traits also: 1837, M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542; 1839, Lincoln v. Chrieman, 10 id. 343; Vermont; (1) (a) and (2): 1802, Smith v. Shumway, 2 Tyler 74 (bad general character excluded); West Virginia; (1) (a), admitted: 1869, Shroyer v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 158, 161; Wisconsin; (1) (a), admitted, but (b) unsettled: 1867, B—— v. I——, 22 Wis. 372 (chastity; both general issue and justification pleaded); 1871, Wilson v. Noonan, 27 id. 599, 612 (official integrity); 1880, Maxwell v. Kennedy, 50 id. 645, 7 N. W. 657, semble (horse-stealing); 1898, Candrian v. Miller, 98 id. 164, 73 N. W. 1004; (2), neither rule apparently settled upon: 1860, Haskins v. Lunsden, 10 id. 259, 369 (admissibility of general character doubted); 1867, B—— v. I——, supra (admissibility of general bad character assumed, for both general issue and justification); 1871, Wilson v. Noonan, supra (reserving the question whether general character may be shown; and intimating the negative); 1880, Maxwell v. Kennedy, supra (obscure); 1882, Campbell v. Campbell, 54 id. 90, 97, 11 N. W. 456 (poisoning; general character admissible, no distinction being made as to particular traits).

Distinguish the defendant's offer of his own bad repute, as indicating that his utterance was not believed and thus did no harm: 1881, Hastings v. Stetson, 130 Mass. 76, . . .

But there are grave objections to permitting such a practice, as the following passages make clear:

1800, Fitzgerald, B., in Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. 413, 420: "A reputation there may be as to general character; and as general character is affected by a slander, it may be natural to show, by rumors or otherwise, what that reputation is. But there cannot, as it appears to me, be reputation as to the guilt of a particular offence, in the sense in which reputation is understood in the law of evidence."

1882, Cave, J., in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491: "It would seem that such evidence [rumors and suspicions as to the truth of the charge made by the defendant], is not admissible, as only indirectly tending to affect the plaintiff's reputation. If these rumors and suspicions have in fact affected the plaintiff's reputation, that may be proved by general evidence of reputation. If they have not affected it, they are not relevant to the issue. To admit evidence of rumors and suspicions is to give any one who knows nothing whatever of the plaintiff, or who may even have a grudge against him, an opportunity of spreading, through the means of the publicity attending judicial proceedings, what he may have picked from the most disreputable sources, and what no man of sense who knows the plaintiff's character would for a moment believe in. Unlike evidence of general reputation, it is particularly difficult for the plaintiff to meet and rebut such evidence; for all those who know him best can say is that they have not heard anything of these rumors. Moreover, it may be that it is the defendant himself who has started them"; a question to a witness, whether he had heard anywhere the story which was the libel in question before he saw it in the defendant's journal, was excluded.

1836, Gibson, C. J., in Long v. Brougher, 5 Watts 440: "Surely it does not lessen the injury that the plaintiff's character, bleeding from a thousand wounds, has received only the finishing blow from the defendant. Who can say that it would not have weathered the storm had it not sunk at last under the accumulated weight of the defendant's wrongs? I am unable to see the justice of estimating character by fragments, or of treating as matter of extenuation the fact that the injured party had suffered the same prejudice from another. The blow may fall heavier on sensibilities morbid from the repetition of injury. The principle has no analogue in any other part of the law; for in the pursuit of reparation for trespass to my person, I am not to be told that my battered carcass was of little worth to me by reason of a previous beating. . . . In that predicament the condition of the sufferer is an aggravation of the wrong; inasmuch as the residue of a man's soundness, whether of body or character, is the more valuable to him, because it is all that he has to depend on. . . . Now it seems to be irreconcilable to the dictates of justice that previous outrage should be made an invitation to aggression by cheapening the consequences of it to the perpetrator, . . . [or] that a stale and exploded accusation may be made a pretext for its repetition."

The better arguments seem to require the exclusion of such evidence; and this is the result in the great majority of jurisdictions. The difficulty is, however, to draw the line between a mere rumor of the particular act charged and a general loss of reputation as to the particular trait involved in it; for the latter, as already seen (ante, § 73) is received in most jurisdictions. Thus in King v. Root, infra, the libel had charged the plaintiff with being in a state of beastly intoxication, and it was held that mere rumors of the act charged were inadmissible, while a bad reputation for excessive intoxication would be admissible. So far, then, as rumors of the sort have in effect destroyed the plaintiff's reputation to a real extent, it is proper enough to receive them; for this is only saying what all concede, that his reputation may be shown. But the distinctions drawn and the phrasings used in the various decisions and jurisdictions differ considerably. It may be noticed, however, that some Courts recognize a third sort of thing, a reputation as to the act charged, — lying between a mere rumor as to the act, on one hand, and a reputation as to the particular trait involved, on the other; but this variation seems anomalous and unsound.[1]

[1] England: The reception of such evidence goes back to the case of Leicester v. Walter, 2 Camp. 251 (1809: libel; general issue; the right to dispute the damages under the general issue, being conceded, Mansfield, C. J., received evidence of "a general suspicion of the plaintiff's character," "general rumor," etc., "to show that he could receive little injury," "provided the reports got into many men's mouths"; follow Eamer v. Merle, unreported, by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in which the damages upon a slander charging insolvency were mitigated by "rumors in circulation" to that effect); the subsequent treatment of the subject is well analyzed by Cave, J., summing up the cases in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491 (1882): "While such evidence appears to have been admitted by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Eamer v. Merle (not reported), and by Cresswell, J., with the approbation of Wightman, J., in Richards v. Richards, 2 Moo. & Rob. 557, and while its admissibility was supported by Pigot, C. B., in Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. R. 413, it was doubted by Abbott, C. J., in Waithman v. Weaver, 11 Price 257 n. and by Coleridge, J., in Nye v. Thompson, 16 Q. B. 175, and it was held inadmissible by Fitzgerald and Hughes, BB., in Bell v. Parke, and by the whole Court of Exchequer, in Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235"; he then mentions Leicester v. Walter, 2 Camp. 251, as an early ruling of a peculiar sort; the only case omitted by the learned judge is Anon. v. Moor, 1 M. & S. 284, which received "reports in the neighborhood." The rule of exclusion seems settled for England by Scott v. Sampson. Canada: 1855, McGregor v. McArthur, 5 U. C. C. P. 493 (breach of promise; obscure); Alabama: 1834, Commons v. Walters, 1 Port. 323 (charge of receiving stolen goods; general suspicion in the neighborhood, before the charge, held admissible, as involving "loss of character"); 1846, Bradley v. Gibson, 9 Ala. 406 (charge that the plaintiff was a hog thief and had left Mississippi to avoid a trial for hog-stealing; such reports excluded, except that after showing bad general character, the reports might perhaps have been used to indicate its extent; the preceding case thus explained); Holley v. Burgess, ib. 730 (approving Bradley v. Gibson); California: 1901, Hearne v. De Young, 132 Cal. 357, 64 Pac. 576 (mere rumors of the act in question, excluded); Connecticut: 1820, Bailey v. Hyde, 3 Conn. 463, 466 ("reports in the neighborhood that he had been guilty of practices similar," admissible if they have circulated so far "as to have blemished the plaintiff's character"); 1822, Treat v. Browning, 4 id. 408, 414 (reports admitted as affecting the damages by amounting to "common fame or reputation"; purporting to follow Leicester v. Walter; here the slander was that the plaintiff had a bastard child); Georgia: 1897, Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655 (charge of arson; rumors of various arsons, excluded); Illinois: 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Ill. 328 (obscure ruling, but semble excluded); Indiana: 1825, Henson v. Veatch, 1 Blackf. 371 (left undecided); 1841, Sanders v. Johnson, 6 id. 54 (the mere existence of reports imputing the crime, without any showing as to their generality or their effect on the reputation, excluded, at least where the plea is justification); 1854, Kelley v. Dillon, 5 Ind. 428 (same as next case); 1867, Bickenstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 528 (general suspicion or rumor of the acts imputed, but not the mere existence of a rumor or suspicion, admissible); Iowa: 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 320, 322, 37 N. W. 389 (rumors excluded, distinguishing Barr v. Hack, 46 id. 310, and in effect overruling it on this point); Louisiana: 1828, Kendrick v. Kemp, 6 Mart. N. S. 500 (that "the people of St. H. were in the habit of" abusing the plaintiff, excluded); Massachusetts: excluded in the following cases: 1810, Wolcott v. Hall, 6 Mass. 518; 1822, Alderman v. French, 1 Pick. 1, 17; 1843, Stone v. Varney, 7 Metc. 91; 1848, Watson v. Moore, 2 Cush. 140; 1874, Peterson v. Morgan, 116 Mass. 350; Michigan: 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 Mich. 41, 44 (excluding "particular suspicions"); 1897, Wolff v. Smith, 113 id. 359, 70 N. W. 1010, semble (same); Minnesota: 1868, Simmons v. Holster, 13 Minn. 249, 257 (not decided); Mississippi: 1859, Powers v. Presgroves, 38 Miss. 227, 241 (excluded); Missouri: 1822, Anthony v. Stephens, 1 Mo. 254 (current report as to the fact charged, excluded); 1843, Moberly v. Preston, 8 id. 462, 466, semble (same); New Hampshire: 1827, Mason v. Mason, 4 N. H. 114, semble (common report, excluded); 1852, Dame v. Kenney, 25 id. 318 (reports excluded, even though they actually affect the reputation); New York: 1829, King v. Root, 4 Wend. 129, 140 (rumors excluded; but reputation for the class of act admitted, if "of the same quality or degree charged in the libel"; i. e. the damages for a charge of beastly intoxication not to be mitigated by reputation for the free use of liquors; but Mather, Sen., argues forcefully to the contrary, in dissenting at 158); 1838, Kennedy v. Gifford, 19 id. 298, 301 (reputation as to the charge, as well as rumors, excluded); North Carolina: 1826, Nelson v. Evans, 1 Dev. 9 (charge of theft; "general opinion and belief" of the plaintiff's guilt, admitted); 1861, Luther v. Skeen, 8 Jones L. 356 (reports of specific misconduct, excluded); Ohio: 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh. 226 (general suspicion as to the

This use of such rumors, as negativing the harm done to the plaintiff's reputation, is to be distinguished from two other uses of similar facts, arising chiefly under the substantive law of defamation, but also forming the subject of much controversy in the past: (1) Conduct or rumored conduct of the plaintiff offered as constituting the defendant's grounds for suspecting the plaintiff of the offence charged, and thus indicating the absence of malice and going in mitigation of damages; the argument against this is that such matter, so far as it amounts to anything substantial, should be made to support a plea of truth; (2) the fact that the defendant did not originate the charge, but merely heard it from others, offered to negative malice and mitigate damages; the argument against this is that a wise law will not regard it as an extenuation. Both these subjects belong to the law of defamation; and, as the cases treating them are not likely to be confounded with evidentiary rulings upon character or repute, it is unnecessary to deal with them here. Moreover, the use of particular acts of misconduct to evidence the character or reputation usable under the principles of the preceding sections, though it involves an evidentiary question, is governed by wholly different considerations, and is treated post, §§ 207, 209.

§ 75. (2) Plaintiff's Reputed Bad Character as mitigating Damages in Other Actions (Seduction, Crim. Con., Indecent Assault, Breach of Marriage Promise, Malicious Prosecution, etc.). It is obvious that, on the principle so generally accepted for an action of Defamation, the same element may be considered, in mitigation of damages, in any other action in which the law of damages recognizes the harm to reputation as one of the elements of recovery. This has always been conceded for the action of seduction, for here the disgrace to the father must naturally be less or lacking if the daughter is already of bad reputation for chastity; her previous bad reputation may therefore be shown.[1] In the same way, in a husband's action for criminal conversation, plaintiff's guilt of the act charged, admissible); 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 id. 418, 425 (general reputation of a different analogous act, excluded); 1855, Van Derveer v. Sutphin, 5 Oh. St. 293, 298 (reports in general circulation as to the facts charged, excluded); Pennsylvania: 1833, Smith v. Ruckecker, 4 Rawle 295 (charge of whoring; rumors as to the plaintiff's illicit intercourse, excluded); 1836, Loug v. Brougher, 5 Watts 439 (reports of the same crime, excluded; quoted supra); South Carolina: 1831, Freeman v. Price, 2 Bail. 115 ("whether he had never heard anything against the reputation of the plaintiff," excluded; distinguishing it from the fact that the plaintiff "was generally suspected of the fact charged"; but the latter is not allowed in the authority cited); 1833, Anon., 1 Hill S. C. 251, 253 (apparently contradictory, in allowing suspicious facts to be shown; but the doctrine of suspicion as an excuse was probably in the court's mind); 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 id. 177 (may prove suspicious facts, as in preceding case; also "that the plaintiff was generally reported and suspected to be guilty of the crime imputed to him"); United States: 1900, Sun Print. & P. Ass'n v. Schenck, 40 C. C. A. 163, 98 Fed. 925 (prior rumors of the act, excluded); Wisconsin: 1860, Haskins v. Lumsden, 10 Wis. 359 (mere rumors excluded; "the existence of unfavorable and defamatory rumors and reports [as to the fact charged] is one thing, and a real loss of character and standing in [the] community quite another").

[1] 1808, Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Camp. 460, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 id. 519, same judge; 1840, Carpenter v. Wall, 11 A. & E. 804; 1876, M'Creary v. Grundy, 39 U. C. Q. B. 316, 325; 1830, Drish v. Davenport, 2 Stew. 266, 270; 1811, Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day 145, 148; 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 337; 1874, White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 264; 1859, Shattuck v. Myers, 13 Ind. 50; 1868, Bell v. Rinker, 29 id. 269; 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 id. 580; 1848, Carter v. Cavanaugh, 1 Greene 171, 175, semble; 1807, Boynton v. Kellogg, 3 Mass. 189 (excluded so far as the bad character was acquired in consequence of the seduction); 1875, McKern v. Calvert, 59 Mo. 242 (excluded; whether as negativing an essential element of the plaintiff's the wife's previous bad reputation may be shown.[2] Here and in the preceding action, the father's or husband's own reputation is, as such, apparently immaterial; but a distinction is to be made as to his actual conduct or character, for this, while not necessarily an excuse for the defendant, may well serve in mitigation, inasmuch as the loss of his wife's or daughter's virtue can mean little to a person of his behavior; thus the reputation is here received as evidence of the actual character.[3] The reputed character of the plaintiff in an action for breach of promise of marriage,[4] or for indecent assault,[5] or for malicious prosecution,[6] is necessarily involved in the measurement of damages; but not in the ordinary tort-actions for violence.[7] Yet where injury to earning-capacity is involved, the actual character may be material,[8] and conceivably also the reputed character for skill and the like.

§ 76. (3) Plaintiff's Reputed Good Character as affecting Damages in Defamation, Seduction, Crim. Con., etc. That the plaintiff may refute the imputations cast on his reputed character, under the doctrine of the preceding sections, is not doubted. But whether he may go into it until it has been attacked has been the subject of much difference of opinion. The case, viz. his daughter's chastity, or in mitigation of damages, does not appear); 1805, Akerley v. Haines, 2 Caines 292 (contra, unchaste character of the daughter immaterial, as the loss of service is the basis of the claim); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 495, Bronson, C. J., semble (admissible); 1863, Hoffman v. Kemerer, 44 Pa. 452; 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582; 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 296 (but not after the time of seduction); 1864, Watry v. Ferber, 18 Wis. 500, 503. For the woman's character, as a main part of the issue and not merely as mitigating damages, in a criminal prosecution or her own statutory action by the woman for seduction, see post, § 79.

[2] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, II, 305; 1811, Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day 145, 148; 1876, Crose v. Rutledge, 81 Ill. 266; 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 495, Bronson, C.J. (approving Bamfield v. Massey and Dodd v. Norris); 1823, Anderson v. Long, 10 S. & R. 61; 1816, Ligon v. Ford, 5 Munf. 10, 16. Apparently the wife's or daughter's actual character would also be material as mitigating the injury to feelings (McKern v. Calvert, supra). For the use of particular acts as showing this actual character of the daughter, see post, §§ 210, 211.

[3] 1832, Norton v. Warner, 9 Conn. 172 (general moral character excluded; although his character as a husband is to be considered); 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 338 (reputation here not admitted to show the dissolute character of the father to mitigate damages in an action for seduction, because it "can be proved by particulars"); 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (admitted); 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 296 (admitted; but not the mother's reputation); 1900, Spellings v. Parks, 104 Tenn. 351, 58 S. W. 126 (seduction; bad reputation of plaintiff's mother, inadmissible). For the use of particular acts as showing this actual character of the father, see post, §§ 210, 211.

[4] 1855, McGregor v. McArthur, 5 U. C. C. P. 493; 1860, Burnett v. Simpkins, 24 Ill. 267; 1873, Williams v. Hollingsworth, 6 Baxt. 12, 16. Distinguish here the use of the woman's bad character as an excuse for the breach (post, § 77).

[5] Here both the actual and the reputed character would have a bearing: [illegible]7, Gross v. Brodrecht, 24 Ont. App. 687; 1889, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 405, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault; the plaintiff's character for unchastity, admitted); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 130, 32 N. E. 1039 (indecent assault; damages to feelings; the plaintiff's virtue or the reverse, as affecting her shocked feelings, semble, admissible); 1882, Mitchell v. Work, 13 R. I. 645 (same; "the mental sufferings of a vulgar and licentious woman from an indecent assault would be less than that of a modest and virtuous woman"); 1903, Barton v. Brnley, — Wis. —, 96 N. W. 815. For the use of particular acts to evidence this character, see post, § 212.

[6] 1849, Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 240; 1901, Hiersche v. Scott, — Nebr. —, 95 N. W. 494 (reputation of the plaintiff for insanity, admitted in an action for maliciously instituting proceedings to commit); 1900, Drummond v. Henderson, 62 Oh. 136, 56 N. E. 650 (malicious prosecution, against a magistrate; plaintiff's bad reputation for honesty admitted); 1891, Wolf v. Perryman, 82 Tex. 112, 120, 17 S. W. 772. Distinguish here the use of the plaintiff's ad character as evidencing reasonable ground of suspicion (post, § 258).

[7] 1851, Corning v. Corning, 6 N. Y. 97 (battery; excluded).

[8] 1895, Wright v. Crawfordsville, 142 Ind. 636, 639, 42 N. E. 227 ("vicious habit of becoming intoxicated," provable as affecting earning capacity of deceased in action for death).

better rule seems to be that his reputation is assumed to be good, and that he has therefore no need to sustain it until it has been attacked.[1]

§ 77. (4) Plaintiff's Bad Character as an Excuse, or as otherwise in Issue; Breach of Promise of Marriage. The character of a plaintiff, reputed or actual, may come into issue, under the substantive law and the pleadings, and thus becomes material. No principle of evidence is involved, until the question arises as to the mode of evidencing the character (post, §§ 202–208).[1]

In the action for breach of promise of marriage, to begin with, the actual bad character of the plaintiff as to chastity may be an excuse for terminating the contract, and is therefore material.[2]

§ 78. (5) Same: Character of Houses of Ill-fame or of their Inmates. In prosecutions for keeping a bawdy-house or house of ill-fame, it is often difficult to distinguish whether a question of evidence or a question of criminal law is involved; and much will depend on the elements of the crime as determined by the wording of the statute and by its judicial construction.

(a) Character of the House. If it distinctly appears in the statute that the repute of the house is the essential criminal fact, so that merely to keep a house of that reputation is the offence, then the reputation is a fact in issue, and the reputation may be shown, irrespective of the actual character or use of the house.[1] But if the actual character or use of the house is also or alone

[1] Defamation: Excluded before attack: 1841, Parke v. Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375 (absolutely, because the defendant is not allowed to attack it); 1843, McCabe v. Platter, 6 Blackf. 405; 1861, Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 249; 1867, Hann v. Wilson, 28 id. 301; 1827, Harding v. Brooks, 5 Pick. 244, semble; 1851, Severance v. Hilton, 24 N. H. 148; 1852, Dame v. Kenney, 25 id. 324 (improper evidence of rumors is sufficient to constitute an attack); 1893, Blakeslee v. Hughes, 50 Oh. 490, 34 N. E. 793; 1893, Cooper v. Phipps, 24 Or. 357, 362, 33 Pac. 985; 1902, Clark v. North American Co. 203 Pa. 346, 53 Atl. 237 (it is immaterial whether the impeachment is made directly or by insinuation on cross-examination); Admitted: 1803, R. v. Waring, 5 Esp. 13, Alvanley, L. C. J.; 1813, Giveus v. Bradley, 3 Bibb 192, 195, semble; 1894, Stafford v. Journal Ass., 142 N. Y. 598, 37 N. E. 625 (admitted on the facts); 1853, Sample v. Wynn, Busbee 322; 1867, Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. 250, 258; 1869, Shroyer v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 158, 161. Seduction: Excluded before attack: 1808, Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Camp. 460, Ellenborough, L. C. J.; 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 id. 520, same judge; 1876, Burke v. Scribner, 16 N. Br. 652 (breach of promise; after cross-examination to prior unchastity, the plaintiff's good character was admitted); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 493, Brouson, C. J., semble (particular acts of misconduct do not constitute such an attack); Criminal Conversation: 1800, R. v. Francis, 3 Esp. 116, Lord Kenyon, C. J. (the defendant pleaded the prosecutor's dissipated character, etc., in mitigation; but as his witnesses denied this, the prosecutor was not allowed to go into it); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, N. Y. supra. Malicious Prosecution: 1855, Goldsmith v. Picard, 27 Ala. 142, 147, 153 (malicious attachment, whereby the plaintiff's business was injured; his good reputation as a merchant admitted); Sundries: 1813, Givens v. Bradley, 3 Bibb 192, 195 (battery; excluded).

[1] The following cases illustrate the variety of issues: 1776, Martyn v. Hind, Cowp. 437, 441 (the plaintiff's character and conduct as a justification for the defendant's removal of the plaintiff, suing for dismissal from his curacy); 1873, People v. Gates, 46 Cal. 52 (a statute punishing "open and notorious cohabitation"; the notoriety is provable as a fact in issue). The use of character to evidence reasonable grounds for belief (in malicious prosecution and the like) is dealt with post, §§ 246–258.

[2] 1801, Foulkes v. Sellway, 3 Esp. 236; 1796, Woodard v. Bellamy, 2 Root 354; 1897, Smith v. Hall, 69 Conn. 651, 38 Atl. 386 (the bad character of the plaintiff being pleaded in defence, evidence of her good character was admitted in rebuttal); 1875, Von Storch v. Griffin, 77 Pa. 504. For the use of particular acts as showing this character, see post, § 206.

[1] 1846, Caldwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 472; 1873, State v. Morgan, 40 id. 44 (a statute punishing the keeping of a place "reputed" to sell liquors); State v. Buckley, ib. 246; 1880, State v. Thomas, 47 id. 546; 1879, King v. State, 17 Fla. 183, 190 ("ill-fame"; reputation admitted both of the house and of the individuals who resort to ' 1894, State v. West, 46 La. An. 1009, 1 So. 418 (reputation of the house, with ..t lacts, admitted to show it to an element of the crime, then the question of the use of reputation is an evidentiary one, i. e. whether reputation, as an exception to the Hearsay rule, may be used to evidence the character; this is dealt with post, § 1620.[2]

(b) Character of the Inmates. A house of ill-fame, or disorderly or bawdy house, signifies a house commonly resorted to or lived in by prostitutes for purposes of prostitution; thus, one element in the offence of keeping it may be the kind of persons resorting to or living in it. Now it is usually understood by Courts that this element of the crime involves, not merely the actual but also the reputed character of these persons as prostitutes; in which case their reputed character becomes a fact in issue; and this is the general result of the precedents. It is of course conceivable that a Court may hold their actual character to be the essential thing, and then the evidentiary question is again raised, whether the reputation may be used to prove this. Since, however, the propriety of thus using the reputation is plain (post, § 1620, under the Hearsay rule), the distinction ought to be practically of little consequence.[3]

§ 79. (6) Same: Criminal Prosecution or Statutory Action for Seduction. Where by statute the crime of seduction is established or an action given to the woman, three cases arise. (1) Either the statute (as occasionally) describes the woman as of "chaste repute"; or (2) it describes her as of "chaste character"; or (3) it does not make any limitation of the sort. In the latter case, however, the Courts have almost uniformly (post, § 205) implied into the statute the requirement of (2); so that (2) and (3) stand practically on the same footing. Now in (1) the reputation is the thing in issue; the actual character is immaterial. The reputation is therefore provable without doubt; be disorderly); 1893, State v. Hull, 18 R. I. 207, 26 Atl. 191 (reputation of the house or of its frequenters, admissible, but not of the defendant); 1873, Morris v. State, 38 Tex. 603 ("house for the purpose of public prostitution"; reputation admitted as "the subject of the inquiry"); 1875, Sylvester v. State, 42 id. 496 (same); 1872, State v. Brunell, 29 Wis. 435 (not clear whether reputation is treated as evidential or in issue). Of course the actual character, or use, of the house may also be shown (where the terms of the statute do not exclusively make repute the element). Whether this actual use may be shown by particular instances of prostitution, etc., is discussed post, § 204.

[2] There is also a third conceivable situation, viz., that the house must be one of prostitution both actually and by repute; in this case the reputation is in issue on the latter element, but the evidentiary question may arise whether it is also usable to prove the former.

[3] In most of the ensuing cases the distinction is not made, and the inmates' "character" is admitted: 1876, Wooster v. State, 55 Ala. 221; 1899, Demartini v. Anderson, 127 Cal. 33, 59 Pac. 207; 1866, State v. Jerome, 33 Conn. 265, 269; 1900, Howard v. People, 27 Colo. 396, 61 Pac. 595 (as well as that of the defendant); 1879, King v. State, 17 Fla. 183, 190 (see citation supra); 1898, Shaffer v. State, 87 Md. 124, 39 Atl. 313; 1856, Com. v. Kimball, 7 Gray 328; 1861, Com. v. Gannett, 1 All. 7; 1875, Com. v. Carloze, 119 Mass. 210; 1895, State v. Hendricks, 15 Mont. 194, 39 Pac. 94; 1851, Clementine v. State, 14 Mo. 113; 1860, State v. M'Gregor, 41 N. H. 407, 412; 1893, State v. Hull, 18 R. I. 207 (see citation supra); 1838, State v. McDowell, Dudley 345, 349 ("when the facts are proved that the defendants, common prostitutes, occupied particular houses . . ., a strong presumption of the character of the houses was raised"); 1833, U. S. v. Stevens, 4 Cr. C. C. 341 (on a count charging the defendant with suffering persons of ill-fame to come together, the reputation of the visitors of the house was admitted). Whether the character or occupation of such inmate may be shown by particular instances of prostitution, etc., is discussed post, § 204. The character of the defendant himself may not be used against him as defendant (ante, § 57), but his character as an inmate may well be; hence a variance of rulings: 1901, State v. Beebe, 115 Ia. 128, 88 N. W. 358 (whether the defendant's reputation for unchastity is receivable, not decided); 1893, State v. Hull, R. I., supra (excluded); 1900, Howard v. People, Colo., supra (admitted); 1900, Dailey v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 55 S. W. 823 (admitted). Compare § 1620.

and the only question that can arise is whether particular acts of unchastity are usable (post, § 205). In (2) the actual character is the matter in issue. One question is whether particular acts of unchastity are usable to show it; this is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 205). Another question is whether reputation may be used to show the actual character; this involves the exception to the Hearsay rule, and is therefore discussed elsewhere (post, § 1620).

§ 80. (7) Same: Character of an Employee, as affecting the Employer's Liability. By the law of torts and agency, an essential fact in the liability of an employer may be the employee's character as an incompetent person (through negligence, intemperance, and the like), and the employer's knowledge of this incompetence. Thus the employee's character becomes a fact in issue, and will usually be evidenced through his reputation.[1] There is here no doubt, and no question of evidence. But the employer's knowledge of this character is also a fact in issue, and the same reputation may serve also to show this knowledge; this is an evidentiary question of the mode of evidencing Knowledge (dealt with post, § 1249). Besides these aspects, however, there are also occasional instances in which an employee's character may in other ways become material under the issues.[2]

[1] For evidence by Reputation, see post, §§ 1608–1621 (Hearsay Rule); for evidence by Specific Acts of Negligence, see post, § 208; for evidence by Individual Opinion, see post, §§ 1984, 1987 (Opinion Rule). For the wholly different question, whether the employee's character may be used to argue that he was or was not negligent on a given occasion, see ante, § 65.

[2] 1896, Louisville Ins. Co. v. Monarch, 99 Ky. 578, 36 S. W. 563 (the competency of the captain and crew of a steamboat lost, as showing that she was properly manned and therefore seaworthy); 1874, Cleghorn v. R. Co., 56 N. Y. 44 (that the culpable employee was known to the defendant to be of intemperate habits, admitted as involving a culpability of the defendant which would support exemplary damages).

TOPIC I (continued): PROSPECTANT EVIDENCE OF A HUMAN ACT.

SUB-TOPICS B, C, D, E: PHYSICAL CAPACITY, SKILL, OR MEANS; HABIT OR CUSTOM; DESIGN OR PLAN; EMOTION OR MOTIVE; AS EVIDENCE OF AN ACT DONE.

CHAPTER VI.

Sub-topic B: PHYSICAL CAPACITY, SKILL, OR MEANS, AS EVIDENCE OF AN ACT DONE.

§ 83. General Principle. As indicating the likelihood of a person doing or not doing an act in question, his physical capacity (or lack of it), his technical skill (or lack of it), and his possession (or lack) of the appropriate means or tools, are usually of sufficient probative value to be admissible. The circumstances of each case usually make it clear whether one of these data is in a given instance relevant; and no more detailed rules need to be laid down, nor has any important controversy arisen over the relevancy of this species of evidence. The considerations that have led to exclusion in a few instances have usually been considerations affecting some other use or aspect of the evidence, with which the present use was confounded. Thus, the rules against the use of a party's character as evidence (ante, §§ 55, 64) have sometimes been thought to require exclusion of facts wrongly construed as equivalent to character. Again, the rule against using an accused person's specific misconduct to show character (post, § 193), and limiting such misconduct, when used to show intent, by strict conditions (post, § 300), may sometimes be thought to operate against the fact of possession of criminal tools or other means. The general impropriety of using against an accused person either character, or specific misconduct to show character, is so constantly in the mind of Courts that they occasionally ignore the possibilities of evidence from the present point of view, and, by a wrong construction of the purpose of the evidence, feel bound to apply to it exclusionary rules that have no concern with it. This much must be kept in mind as a key to rulings which are otherwise inexplicable and ought not to stand as precedents. As a general principle, then, the existence or lack of the physical capacity, skill, or means to do an act is admissible as some evidence of the possibility or probability of the person's doing or not doing it:[1]

1879, Taylor, J., in Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 651, 4 N. W. 785: "There can be no doubt as to the right of a person accused of crime to show that at the time of its commission he was physically incapable of committing it. There can be no doubt of the right of the accused to show that he was at the time prostrated by a disease which rendered it highly improbable that he could have endured the exertion and labor necessary to commit the crime. . . . In such case the intoxication is not shown for the purpose of excuse or mitigation of the offence charged, but as evidence tending to show that he was not present and did not commit the acts constituting the offence. Evidence of this kind would have but little weight against direct evidence showing the actual presence of the accused at the time and place when and where the crime was committed; but, certainly, in the absence of any such direct evidence, the accused may give in evidence any fact which would have a natural tendency to render it improbable that he was there and did the acts complained of; and the fact that drunkenness was the thing which tended to prove such improbability, can make no difference. If a man by voluntary drunkenness renders himself incapable of walking for a limited time, it is just as competent evidence tending to show that he did not walk during the time that he was so incapable, as though he had been so rendered incapable by paralysis of his limbs from some cause over which he had no control."

§ 84. Strength. The physical strength of a person may be of probative value to show that he was peculiarly capable or peculiarly incapable of doing the act in question.[1] How to evidence the strength is a different question; the use of specific feats or other instances of strength may be proper (post, § 220); a precedent admitting such evidence will usually be a precedent on the present subject also.

§ 85. Intoxication. A condition of intoxication by alcoholic liquor, as involving a peculiar condition of the body and faculties, may be of probative value as showing that the person could or could not do the act in question.[1]

[1] The contrary broad statement in Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 591, 2 N. E. 698 (1885), is unquestionably unsound, and is negatived by every day's trials.

[1] 1792, Goodtitle v. Brahsm, 4 T. R. 498 (physical inability from old age of a testator to write as long a document as the alleged will, admitted); 1838, Ellis v. Short, 21 Pick. 142 (bodily strength of a person arrested, as indicating the struggles made and therefore the force necessary to detain him, admitted); 1895, Thiede v. Utah, 11 Utah 241, 39 Pac. 837, 139 U. S. 510, 16 Sup. 62 (that the defendant was a powerful man, admitted, the death-wound having been caused by a blow requiring strength); 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 Wash. 544, 50 Pac. 512 (physical strength; notice necessary where the fact of his strength was not otherwise material).

[1] 1895, Wright v. Crawfordsville, 142 Ind. 636, 42 N. E. 227 (admitting intoxication at the time of plaintiff's injury, to show probable contributory negligence); 1872, State v. Horne, 9 Kan. 128 (admitting intoxication at the time of a homicide, as showing incapacity to attack, etc.); 1883, Com. v. Ryan, 134 Mass. 223 (confirmed habits of drunkenness and debauchery as likely to cause death, admitted); 1843, Cummings v. Nichols, 13 N. H. 429 (Parker, C. J.: "If intemperance tends to produce irritability of the nervous system, weaken the muscular action, and impair the mental faculties — all which is controverted by few at

How to evidence intoxication or intemperance is a different question (post, § 235). Intemperance, or a habit of drinking, is not always to be distinguished from an intoxicated condition, but its evidential use rests often on a different principle (post, § 96).

§ 86. Mental Powers. The strength or feebleness of the mental or intellectual faculties may have probative value to show that an act was or was not done which required a certain amount or quality of such ability. The commonest use of this sort of evidence is in controversies over undue influence in executing a will; for the mental condition may indicate whether on a given occasion the testator succumbed to the influence. There may, however, be other situations where similar facts would be relevant.[1] In cases of undue influence, the usual evidentiary question is whether a previous or subsequent mental condition may be used to show the condition at the time in question (post, § 230).

§ 87. Skill, Technical Knowledge. The possession or lack of a special skill, dexterity, or knowledge, may be of probative value to show the probable doing or not doing of an act requiring such skill or knowledge. Of the scores of daily instances in trials, uses that have called for rulings are chiefly those of knowledge of poisons or the like,[1] skill in imitation of handwriting,[2] and experience in drafting wills and other legal documents.[3] Often this sort of the present day, — evidence of its existence in any particular case certainly has a tendency to show that the labor and services of the subject of it are of less value, other things being equal"); 1902, Guertin v. Hudson, 71 N. H. 505, 53 Atl. 736 (injury to a wagon-party in a highway; the party's intoxication, and their destination to a road house for a debauch, held admissible to show probable contributory negligence); 1890, Franklin v. Franklin, 90 Tenn. 49, 16 S. W. 557 (that a person who was alleged to have forged the will in question had used morphine and whiskey "to such excess as to impair his mind and affect his moral character, thus rendering him capable of perpetrating crimes which in a normal state he would have avoided"; held, admissible to show general criminal irresponsibility, but not to show specific capacity to commit a forgery); 1879, Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 650 (larceny by cutting a hole in a window-pane, unfastening the window, and entering and taking certain goods in a store without disturbing other goods; evidence admitted that the defendant was at the time so drunk as to be incapable of the intelligent action thus required; see quotation supra).

[1] Perhaps the following cases belong here: 1897, Davis v. State, 51 Nebr. 301, 70 N. W. 984 (train-wrecking on Thursday; "the superstition or belief of [the defendant] D. that Thursday was a lucky day for him, and that anything he attempted on that day would succeed," admitted); 1847, Kauffman v. Swar, 5 Pa. St. 230 (action on a lost bond; plea, payment in full; replication, fraudulent procurement of a receipt in full; "the plaintiff's case was to be supported by proof of fraudulent practice, involving a great variety of transactions on the intellect of a weak and intemperate man; and to support it, required evidence of his general habits, thoughtlessness, and extravagance in transactions to many of which the defendant was not a party").

[1] 1781, Donellan's Trial, Eng. (murder by poisoning; in the library at the house of the defendant was a volume having the pages cut at a single place; at this place, the effect of the poison in question was described); 1833, Thompson v. Mosely, 5 C. & P. 501 (alteration of a bill by chloride of soda; evidence received that the alleged alterer was a surgeon and acquainted with that substance).

[2] 1892, Croom v. Sugg, 110 N. C. 259, 14 S. E. 748 (bond said to be a forgery; "it would unquestionably have been competent to prove . . . that the plaintiff . . . was unusually clever in imitating the handwriting of others"); Contra: 1860, Dow's Ex'r v. Spenny's Ex'r, 29 Mo. 390 (skill in imitating handwriting, not admitted to show forgery).

[3] 1872, R. v. Castro, alias Tichborne (education and experience used as negativing the authorship of documents; see citation, post, § 270); 1897, Gable v. Rauch, 50 S. C. 95, 27 S. E. 555 (the draughtsman of a will, who attested it; his experience and character as probate judge, etc., admitted to show that he "would see to it that the will was properly executed," the compliance with legal requirements being in issue); 1901, Claflin's Will, 73 Vt. 129, 50 Atl. 815 (testator's experience and habit of drawing wills, admitted to show probable due execution; compare the similar use of a style of spelling, post, § 99); Not decided: 1898, Throckmorton v. Holt, 12 D. C. App. 552, 581 (forgery of a will; the evidential fact is not to be distinguished from character on the one hand — as in the case of a physician's skill (ante, § 67) — and from habit on the other hand (post, §§ 92–98).

How the skill or knowledge is to be evidenced is another question. Whether skill in imitation of handwriting may be evidenced by particular instances is a mooted subject (post, § 221). Mere knowledge, as distinguished from skill, involves similar controversies (post, §§ 259, 266), especially in regard to particular instances of forgery and the like (post, § 309).

§ 88. Means, Tools, Apparatus. The previous possession or lack of special means, tools, apparatus, and the like, may be of probative value to show the doing or not doing of an act requiring such means.[1] Here, however, the negative fact is the one which usually supports this argument; and the more prominent significance of the affirmative fact — e.g. the possession of a gun or knife — will usually be its indication of a design or plan to use it for the act in question (post, §§ 237, 304).

§ 89. Possession or Lack of Money as affecting the Probability of a Loan, Payment or the like. A man destitute of property or credit cannot lend a large sum of money; his lack of the capacity to make such a loan is of some probative value to show that he did not make it:

1729, Hales' Trial, 17 How. St. Tr. 293; forgery of a promissory note for £4700, payable to Samuel Lee; to show that the payee could not have lent such a sum, counsel asked: "Is Lee a man of worth?" Witness: "No, sir; he is not worth £5 in the world." Counsel: "What say you to this, Mr. Hales? . . . This note, they say that you published it as a true note, how should it come to pass that such a poor person as this Lee is should indorse over such a note to you?"

1860, Pigot, C. B., in Dowling v. Dowling, 10 Ir. C. L. 236, 239, 244: "It has been the constant practice of judges to receive such evidence . . .; proof that a party was in such circumstances that he could not has been received as evidence that he did not pay the money in question. . . . It is said that evidence of this kind will be a surprise upon the parties; and so it sometimes may be. . . . [But] few cases can be imagined in which a party may not be surprised by unexpected evidence produced by his adversary.

"legal attainments and literary culture and style of the testator," offered to show a certain will not to have been written by him; not decided). Contra: 1901, Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 21 Sup. 474 (will of a Judge-Advocate General of the U. S.; opinion as to its genuineness by a witness familiar with his style of composition, that the purporting will was not genuinely his, excluded; unsound; no authority cited).

[1] 1792, R. v. Lambe, Peake N. P. 141 (forgery of a bank-note by tracing with a camel-hair pencil; the possession of drawings in ink of the design on a bank-note admitted); 1808, R. v. Ball, 1 Camp. 324 (uttering a forged bank-note; possession of appropriate tools, admitted); 1839, Griffits v. Payne, 11 A. & E. 131 (plea of forgery to an action against the acceptor of a bill; evidence was rejected that the plaintiff had been in possession of a mass of bills among which were three with the defendant's forged acceptance, and that these had been circulated; this is unsound); 1895, Thomas v. State, 107 Ala. 13, 18 So. 229 (previous possession of a jug which was used to saturate with oil the place set on fire, admitted); 1874, People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 402 (possession of a material which would remove ink from checks similar to the one alleged to have been altered by defendant, admitted); 1870, Com. v. Choate, 105 Mass. 451 (arson; the prior possession of a peculiar kind of apparatus adapted for setting the fire in question, as showing "the requisite skill, materials, tools, and opportunity," admitted); 1889, Miller v. S. P. Co., 118 N. Y. 199, 23 N. E. 462 (to show that the defendant had the means of preventing an accident caused by the giving way of a stick of wood used as the toggle for a rope, the fact was admitted that thereafter a capstan bar near by was used and stood the strain); 1895, Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. 364 (admitting the possession of an auger fitting a hole in the bottom of a boat which the defendant was charged with sinking).

. . . There would be little safety against unfounded demands supported by reckless swearing if circumstances of this kind, not too remote, could not be submitted to the judgment and common sense of a jury."

Such a lack of money or other resources is therefore relevant to show the improbability of the making of such a loan or payment.[1] It is possible that there are limits to this use of the evidence; but the circumstances of each case will suggest them, and no general exception seems to have been laid down.[2] As to the time of the lack of money, it may of course be so far anterior as to have no significance to the evidence; but the mere fact that the impecunious condition is anterior in time does not render it inadmissible.[3]

[1] Eng.: 1762, Lane v. Dighton, 1 Ambl. 409, 413 (evidence received that "before that time he was a poor person, and not able to pay for them [estates] out of his own money"); 1774, Mayor of Hull v. Horner, Cowp. 102, 109 (Lord Mansfield, C. J.; payment may be disproved "by showing the party not to have been in circumstances to pay"); 1805, Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves. Jr. 511, 518; 1808, Williams v. Gorges, 1 Camp. 217; 1812, Fladong v. Winter, 19 Ves. Jr. 196; 1837, Grenfell v. Girdlestone, 2 Y. & C. 662, 681; U. S.: 1866, Stebbins v. Miller, 12 All. 591, 594, 597; 1867, Winchester v. Charter, 97 Mass. 140, 143; 1868, Atwood v. Scott, 99 id. 177; 1871, Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 id. 453, 458; 1894, Bliss v. Johnson, 162 id. 323; 1894, Rosenthal v. Bishop, 98 Mich. 527, 531, 57 N. W. 573 (an $1100 order for whiskey by a druggist; the limited business of the druggist, considered, as making it unlikely); 1851, Demeritt v. Miles, 22 N. H. 523, 528; 1855, Wiggin v. Plumer, 31 id. 251, 268; 1880, Pontius v. People, 82 N. Y. 339, 349 (lack of means admitted to disprove the lending of $4000); 1852, Strimpfler v. Roberts, 18 Pa. 283, 296 (resulting trust in lands purchased in the name of a clerk; to show that the clerk did not buy them for himself, evidence was received of his inability to pay the large sums actually paid by him); 1861, Stauffer v. Young, 39 id. 455, 461, 462 (pecuniary inability to make an alleged loan, admitted); 1896, Moore v. Palmer, 14 Wash. 134, 44 Pac. 142 (defendant's high financial standing and plaintiff's small means, to show that defendant would probably not have given an alleged large note to plaintiff, admitted); 1884, Nash v. Hoxie, 59 Wis. 384, 386, 18 N. W. 408 (contract by the defendant to deliver logs to be sawed by the plaintiff; to disprove the making of the contract, the defendant's lack of logs such as alleged was rejected; this is sound; compare § 392, post); 1899, Williams v. Williams, 102 id. 246, 78 N. W. 419 (loan; the alleged lender's lack of means and the borrower's possession of ample means, admitted in disproof). Contra, but unsound: 1902, People v. Lapique, 136 Cal. 503, 69 Pac. 226, semble (forgery of a note in M.'s name; M.'s pecuniary condition, held inadmissible); 1861, Clark v. Fletcher, 1 All. 53, 56 (action for work done in tanning; evidence by the defendant of the plaintiff's insolvency, not admitted to show that the plaintiff had no teams with which he could have done the work; but evidence of the plaintiff's prior sale of all his teams was admitted for that purpose); 1901, Perkins v. Himmes, 200 Pa. 235, 49 Atl. 934 (insolvency of payee, and possession of funds by alleged maker, not admitted on an issue of execution of notes).

For lack of money as a motive for crime, see post, § 392.

[2] 1870, Sherwood, J., in Woods v. Gummert, 67 Pa. 137: ("Surely it is not to be inferred from this that wherever a plaintiff brings an action for goods sold and delivered, or money lent and advanced, or paid out, laid out, and expended, that it is competent to the defendant to give evidence of the pecuniary inability of the plaintiff, and thus raise an issue entirely collateral. What legitimate inference in such case can be drawn from the insolvency of the plaintiff? Men heavily indebted, and even keeping their creditors at bay, often have large transactions in borrowing and lending, and are possessed of considerable sums of money"; but he intimates the propriety of such evidence in some cases); 1844, Rowe v. Polkinghorne, 1 C. & K. 618 (smallness of income, to disprove a large purchase, excluded; but received to show that the wedding dresses supplied to the alleged debtor's daughter were more likely to have been supplied on the credit of the daughter's future husband than on the defendant's credit). These instances, however, involve rather the question of motive (post, § 392).

[3] 1860, Pigot, C. B., in Dowling v. Dowling, 10 Ir. C. L. 236, 243 ("It is said that this will open a wide issue for the jury as to time. Unquestionably it will; but it must be left to the discretion of the judge to take care that the evidence shall be confined within reasonable limits. Instances might be put in which it would be mere folly to give the slightest weight to such evidence, or indeed to admit it at all. . . . In the case of a merchant in extensive trade, no one would think it material to prove that thirty years ago he acted as a porter, in order to negative his ability to pay a debt or make a loan a year before the trial"). Accord: 1860, Dowling v. Dowling, supra (inability seven years before, with proof of intervening condition, admitted); 1851, Demeritt v. Miles, 22 N. H. 523, 528 (lack of money fifteen months before, admitted).

This must be distinguished from the general question how far anterior possession is admissible to show present possession (post, § 379).

The possession of money will usually not be admissible as making probable the payment or loaning of money.[4] But where the lack of money is alleged, as showing probable non-payment, this lack may be denied by evidence to the contrary, i. e. by proving possession.[5] Moreover, where the presumption of payment from lapse of time is sought to be raised, one way of supporting it is by showing that there were no obstacles in the interval to the collection of the claim, and, in particular, that the debtor was solvent and possessed of assets sufficient to satisfy the debt; this, however, is a different use of the evidence (post, §§ 224, 2517).

With what facts — e. g. the non-payment of a debt — this insolvency or destitution is to be evidenced, is a different question (post, § 224). The sudden possession of money, after the date of a theft, by one who had no money before it, as indicating an unlawful acquisition, also raises a different question (post, § 154). Still other distinct inquiries are whether poverty should be considered, as indicating a motive for crime (post, § 392); and whether there is to be a presumption of payment by lapse of time (post, § 2517).

Sub-topic C: HABIT OR CUSTOM.

§ 92. General Principle. Of the probative value of a person's habit or custom, as showing the doing on a specific occasion of the act which is the subject of the habit or custom, there can be no doubt. Every day's experience and reasoning make it clear enough:

1861, Flandrau, J., in Walker v. Barron, 6 Minn. 508, 512: "[Customs] may, like any other facts or circumstances, be shown when their existence will increase or diminish the probabilities of an act having been done or not done, which act is the subject of contest."

1873, Sargent, C. J., in State v. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528, 532: "It would seem to be axiomatic that a man is likely to do or not to do a thing, or to do it or not to do it in a particular way, [according] as he is in the habit of doing or not doing it."

1887, Sherwood, J., in Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 Mo. 527, 6 S. W. 253 (admitting evidence of a bookkeeper's custom of handing over collateral notes to the teller, as indicating that it was done in this instance): "It is really immaterial, under the authorities cited, whether he was able to do more than to verify his entries and prove his invariable custom. These things being proven, the presumption arises therefrom that the usual course of business was pursued in this particular instance. Every one is presumed to govern himself by the rules of right reason, and consequently that he acquits himself of his engagement and duty. . . . Whenever it is established that one act is the usual concomitant of another, the latter being proved, the former will be presumed; for this is in accord with the experience of common life. It is simply the process of ascertaining one fact from the existence of another."

There is, however, much room for difference of opinion in concrete cases, owing chiefly to the indefiniteness of the notion of habit or custom. If we conceive it as involving an invariable regularity of action, there can be no doubt that this fixed sequence of acts tends strongly to show the occurrence of a given instance. But in the ordinary affairs of life a habit or custom seldom has such an invariable regularity. Hence, it is easy to see why in a given instance something that may be loosely called habit or custom should be rejected, because it may not in fact have sufficient regularity to make it probable that it would be carried out in every instance or in most instances. Whether or not such sufficient regularity exists must depend largely on the circumstances of each case.

[4] 1868, Atwood v. Scott, 99 Mass. 177 (because "experience is not sufficiently uniform to raise a presumption that one who has the means of paying a debt will actually pay it"); 1876, Higgins v. Andrews, 121 Mass. 293.

[5] 1876, Higgins v. Andrews, 121 Mass. 293; 1851, Wiggin v. Plumer, 31 N. H. 251, 269.

There are two other difficulties that arise in connection with such evidence, both of them, however, depending on other doctrines of Evidence. (1) The idea of habit is sometimes difficult to distinguish from that of Character, — for example, where a negligent habit is charged; and if it is interpreted in the latter aspect, it may of course become obnoxious to the rule against the use of a party's character in civil cases (ante, § 64). (2) Assuming the relevancy of a Habit or Custom, the proof of it may often have to be made by marshalling various evidential instances as the basis of an inference to a habit or custom; this question — how to evidence Habit or Custom — is also a different one, dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 370, 377).

§ 93. Miscellaneous Instances. Subject to the foregoing distinctions, the admissibility of a person's habit, usage, or custom as evidence that he did or did not do the act in question may be said to be universally conceded. Yet the distinctions named, as well as the individual circumstances going to affect the regularity of the habit, will from time to time affect its exclusion. Courts vary, moreover, in their liberality of application of the principle.[1] It may be noted here, however, that the prohibitions of the opinion rule about testimony to usage or custom (post, § 1955), and as to the parol evidence rule concerning usage (post, §§ 2440, 2464), are not here involved in any way.

[1] Eng.: 1795, Lucas v. Novosilleski, 1 Esp. 296 (to prove payment of wages, evidence was offered of the defendant's custom of paying the workmen every Saturday night, and of the plaintiff's presence waiting with the rest; admitted, "as he worked under the same terms with the other workmen"); 1811, Evans v. Birch, 3 Camp. 10 (action against a milk-carrier for moneys not turned over to his employer; the regular course of business in paying over the receipts daily, admitted as showing payment); 1829, Sellen v. Norman, 4 C. & P. 81, note (course of paying wages every Saturday night, admissible); Ala.: 1877, Fincher v. State, 58 Ala. 221 ("The place at which F. [the accused] kept his gun and the habits of the family as to rising, when Mrs. D. [the witness] lived there [six months before], have a very remote bearing, if any, on the fact of where the gun was on the night preceding and the morning of the murder, and on the fact of whether the State's witnesses, members of the family, were up at a particular hour that morning," and were rejected); 1902, Hertsell v. Masterson, 132 Ill. 275, 31 So. 618 (defendant's custom to employ his clerks by the year, not admitted on the question whether the plaintiff's employment was by the month or the year); Ga.: 1895, Grantham v. State, 95 Ga. 459, 22 S. E. 281 (habit of gambling with X, as indicating that goods of X were obtained from him in gaming and not by burglary, admitted; compare § 85, ante); 1897, White v. State, 100 id. 659, 28 S. E. 423 (habit of carrying a pistol with one charge only, admitted to show that it was so carried till the moment of killing, and thus that it was not fully loaded and then partly fired); 1898, Oliver v. State, 106 id. 142, 32 S. E. 18 (carrying concealed weapon; habit of carrying it openly, not admitted for defendant); Ill.: 1865, American Express Co. v. Haggard, 37 Ill. 465, 469, 472 (non-delivery of a package; custom of the plaintiff's drivers in delivering, admitted; also, in rebuttal, past thieving habits of the particular driver); 1901, Sorenson v. Sorenson, 189 id. 179, 59 N. E. 555 (habitual partisan affiliations of a voter, admitted to evidence the tenor of his vote); Ind.: 1870, Foltz v. State, 33 Ind. 215 (business habits, admitted to evidence the selling of cigars); Ia.: 1861, Smith v. Clark, 12 Ia. 32 (whether a parol acceptance of a draft had been made; the defendant's custom to accept in writing only, admitted); 1874, Beiderbecke v. Transp. Co., 39 id. 500 (whether goods were to be delivered at D.; previous habit of the parties as to delivering goods, admitted); 1888, Riordan v. Guggerty, 74 id. 693, 39 N. W. 107 (the destruction of a telegram-original, evidenced by a custom of the office to destroy all such papers after six months); Kan.: 1899, Missouri P. R.

§ 94. Course of Dealing in Sales and Agencies. Where a transaction of selling, or of authorizing an agent to sell, has taken the form of a usual and fixed course of business between two persons, this habit is admissible to indicate the probable tenor of a particular transaction; the circumstances

Co. v. Moffatt, 60 Kan. 113, 55 Pac. 837 (former careful custom of deceased in approaching a railroad-crossing, admitted); Md.: 1837, Pocock v. Hendricks, 8 G. & J. 421, 427, 433 (whether a conveyance had been executed absolutely or conditionally, and whether it had been read over to the illiterate grantor; the habit of the draughtsman, a magistrate, to ask grantors whether they wished an absolute or a conditional conveyance, and to read over documents to the grantor before execution, excluded); Ky.: 1899, Tunks v. Vincent, — Ky. —, 51 S. W. 622 (a voter's regular party, admitted to show his vote); Mass.: 1901, Perlstein v. Express Co., 177 Mass. 530, 59 N. E. 194 (prescribed routes for defendant's drivers, admitted to show that the presence of one driver at a certain place was not in the course of duty); Mich.: 1877, Hamilton v. Billingsley, 37 Mich. 109 (to show that H. did not promise to go to a place on Sunday, the fact that he was a strict observer of the Sabbath was rejected); Mo.: 1862, Goodfellow's Exr's v. Meegan, 32 Mo. 280, 281, 284 (that it was not the custom for pasturers to become responsible for cattle, excluded); Nebr.: 1894, Lincoln V. P. & P. B. Co. v. Buckner, 39 Nebr. 83, 85, 57 N. W. 749 (injury from a pile of ashes; habitual deposit of ashes at that place, admitted to show defendant to be the source); 1898, Gate City Abstract Co. v. Post, 55 Nebr. 742, 76 N. W. 471 (to show the indexing of a judgment on the day of filing, the clerk's uniform custom received); 1898, Barr v. Post, 56 id. 698, 77 N. W. 123, semble (that "he never used profane language," admissible, to show non-user on a particular occasion); N. H.: 1877, Hall v. Brown, 58 N. H. 93 (injury at a highway blockaded by a train; to disprove the blockade, evidence was admitted of a practice of managing trains so as not to obstruct the highway); 1877, State v. Shaw, ib. 73 (a course of liquor-sales in a preceding month, admitted to show a specific sale; "where there is a question whether a particular act was done, the existence of any course of business according to which it naturally would have been done is a relevant fact"); 1900, Smith v. R. Co., 70 id. 53, 47 Atl. 290 (death at a crossing; deceased's "uniform habit of slackening the speed of his horse" at the crossing, admitted to show "that he did so on his fatal trip"); 1903, Stone v. R. Co., — id. —, 55 Atl. 359 (habitual speed of a particular train at a certain point, admitted); N. Y.: 1864, Dubois v. Baker, 30 N. Y. 369 (habit of carrying an inkstand, not admitted to show that it was in his possession on a certain day); N. C.: 1860, Ashe v. De Rosset, 8 Jones L. 240 (whether a receipt for rice was given by a miller; his habit to give a receipt, admitted); 1868, Vaughan v. R. Co., 63 N. C. 11 (whether goods had been received by a railroad company; its habit to weigh and mark goods when received, admitted, as showing that they would have been found marked); 1899, White v. Tripp, 125 id. 523, 34 S. E. 686 (whether a promise was to pay the debt of another; "usage and method of keeping accounts in such cases," admitted as corroborative); Or.: 1900, Wade v. R. Co., 36 Or. 311, 59 Pac. 875 (whether speed of cars on a particular occasion may be evidenced by customary speed; not decided); Pa.: 1850, Schoneman v. Fegley, 14 Pa. St. 376, 380 (whether a receipt was given for a payment; the person's usual practice of giving receipts, excluded, where the witness had no memory as to the specific act in question; explained in Meighen v. Bank, infra, as based on the witness' failure to give direct testimony to which the habit could be corroborative); 1855, Meighen v. Bank, 25 id. 288, 291 (whether a deposit was received; the habit of the cashier to enter deposits daily, and the absence of an entry, admitted to show no receipt of a claimed deposit, as corroborating the direct testimony; Schoneman v. Fegley explained); 1898, Wheeler v. Ahlers, 189 id. 138, 42 Atl. 40 (alteration of note by maker after indorsement; a card in the maker's writing, showing a practice in changing figures, admitted); 1898, Morris v. Gulley, 188 id. 534, 41 Atl. 731 (defendant's printed form of lease, not admitted to show terms of a particular lost lease); Tenn.: 1833, Leiper v. Erwin, 5 Yerg. 97 (that a creditor was habitually prompt in collecting, admitted to evidence the payment of a debt, other circumstances corroborating); 1881, Beuder v. Montgomery, 8 Lea 591 (similar); Tex.: 1896, McCray v. R. Co., 89 Tex. 168, 34 S. W. 95 (the duties of brakemen generally, inadmissible without showing that the same practice prevailed on all roads); U. S.: 1822, Bouldin v. Massie's Heirs, 7 Wheat. 153 (habit of never recording without a document of transfer, admitted); Vt.: 1867, Hine v. Pomeroy, 24 Vt. 211, 214, 219 (whether an attorney had directed a process-server to take N. and M. as receiptors; his uniform course of business to give no instructions as to receiptors, admitted as corroborative); 1901, Scott v. Bailey, 73 id. 49, 50 Atl. 557 (issue of payment; defendant's habit to pay the plaintiff personally, excluded).

For other examples, which involve the use of particular instances to evidence a habit or general plan, see post, §§ 370, 377. For the use of particular instances in criminal cases, see post, §§ 300–367.

will determine whether in a given case the relations have reached a sufficient degree of fixity to become relevant.[1] The usual doubt here, however, arises in the attempt to evidence this fixity by particular instances of the repetition of the transaction (post, § 371, 377).

§ 95. Course of the Mail and Telegraph. The fixed methods and systematic operation of the Government's postal service have been long conceded to be evidence of the due delivery to the addressee of mail matter placed for that purpose in the custody of the authorities. The conditions are that the mail matter shall appear to have conformed to the chief regulations of the service, namely, that it shall have been sufficiently prepaid in stamps, correctly addressed, and placed in the appropriate receptacle.[1] The habit of a

[1] 1866, Howard v. Shéward, L. R. 2 C. P. 148 (whether the defendant's servant, who had warranted a horse sold to the plaintiff, had authority to do so was disputed; and to show the probable non-existence of it, evidence was offered of a usage among horse-dealers not to warrant under the circumstances; the Court found that there was an ostensible authority, and therefore, per Willes, J., the usage "if not objectionable on the ground of remoteness, which I think it was, after all only amounted to a tacit direction from the principal to his agent not to warrant on this particular occasion," and was therefore legally ineffective); 1896, Plumb v. Curtis, 66 Conn. 154, 33 Atl. 998 ("The jury, in the case at bar, were to determine whether it was probable that the plaintiff, after charging all the materials furnished on the order of Simeon Plumb for the construction of three houses in Bridgeport, to the defendant, as the principal for whom Plumb acted, and for whom it was not denied that he had authority to act, proceeded to furnish like materials for the construction of five other houses in Bridgeport on the order of Plumb, and to charge them to the defendant, when he really gave credit to Plumb, and dealt with him as the only party to the transaction. . . . If he has been selling to him the same line of goods previously, as an agent for a responsible principal, and claims that the sales in question were made in the same way and under the same circumstances, any evidence which renders a change of credit improbable is relevant to an inquiry as to whether such a change was made"); 1896, Hamilton v. Hastings, 172 Pa. 308, 34 Atl. 43 (to show the parties included in a sale, evidence of the state of accounts and of the former course of dealings was admitted "as tending to make the proposition in controversy more or less probable"); 1863, Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall. 359, 363, 368 (false warranty, alleging the defendant warranted an article as fit to be used in the plaintiff's business; a broker was allowed to testify what kind of the article "he had been in the habit of selling the plaintiffs").

[1] This is universally conceded, and the strength of the evidence is even raised to a presumption (post, § 2534); the following list of citations does not attempt to be complete, because the decisions frequently involve also the matter of substantive law mentioned in note 6, infra: 1795, Saunderson v. Judge, 2 H. Bl. 509 (notice to an indorser; on objection that "it was not proved that the defendant received the letter which was put into the post-office," held that "the sending the letter by the post was sufficient evidence of notice"); 1836, Shipley v. Todhunter, 7 C. & P. 680, 686; 1834, Warren v. Warren, 1 C. M. & R. 250, 252 (Parke, B.: "If a letter is sent by the post, it is prima facie proof, until the contrary be proved, that the party to whom it is addressed received it in due course"); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 1963 (24); 1892, Young v. Clapp, 147 Ill. 176, 190, 35 N. E. 372; 1896, Ashley Wire Co. v. Ill. Steel Co., 164 id. 149, 158, 45 N. E. 410; 1890, Pennypacker v. Ins. Co., 80 Ia. 56, 45 N. W. 408; 1896, Goodwin v. Assur. Soc., 97 Id. 226, 66 N. W. 157; 1899, Watson v. Richardson, 110 id. 673, 80 N. W. 407; 1885, Sullivan v. Knykendall, 82 Ky. 483; 1896, Chase v. Surry, 88 Me. 468, 34 Atl. 270; 1901, Bostain v. Separator Co., 92 Md. 483, 48 Atl. 75; 1810, Munn v. Baldwin, 6 Mass. 316; 1870, Huntley v. Whittier, 105 id. 391 (distinguishing this rule and that of constructive notice, or due diligence, for commercial paper); 1895, McDowell v. Ins. Co., 164 id. 444, 41 N. E. 665; 1901, Lowry v. Saginaw S. P. Co., 128 Mich. 216, 87 N. W. 194; 1893, Dade v. Ins. Co., 54 Minn. 336, 56 N. W. 48 (proofs of loss); 1868, Phillips v. Scott, 43 Mo. 86, 89; 1899, National Mas. A. Ass'n v. Burr, 57 Nebr. 437, 77 N. W. 1098; 1897, State v. Howell, 61 N. J. L. 142, 38 Atl. 748; N. D. St. 1897, c. 110, § 3 (24); Or. C. C. P. 1892, § 776 (24); 1893, Jensen v. McCorkell, 154 Pa. 323, 325, 26 Atl. 366; 1857, Russell v. Buckley, 4 R. I. 525 (even for letters containing money); 1876, U. S. v. Babcock, 3 Dill. C. C. 571; 1883, Rosenthal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 185, 193, 4 Sup. 382; 1897, Dunlop v. U. S., 165 id. 486, 17 Sup. 375 (the course of delivery in the post-office, admitted as indicating that certain papers had come through the mail); 1898, Brown v. Frat. A. Assoc., 18 Utah 265, 55 Pac. 63; 1844, Oaks v. Weller, 16 Vt. 63, 70; 1897, McDermott v. Jackson, 97 Wis. 64, 72 N. W. 375; 1899, Small v. Prentice, 102 id. 256, 78 N. W. 415.

The following early ruling seems to be the only one to the contrary: 1846, Allen v. Blunt, 2 Woodh. & Man. 121, 131 (mailing said to be private person or commercial house, doing systematically a similar service, is equally relevant; the principle has been applied to an express carrier's delivery of packages[2] and to a telegraph company's transmission of telegrams.[3] The same application of the principle would admit a private person's usual course of business to evidence any act of delivery or transmission, such as the sending of a notice, or the placing of letters in the mail-box; the only differences are, first, that the fact of the governmental system will be judicially noticed without further evidence (post, § 2575), and secondly, that the course of business of an individual may under the circumstances not appear sufficiently fixed to be of probative value.[4] A consequence of the combination of these two applications of the principle is that, upon proper evidence of the habit of an individual commercial house as to addressing and mailing, the mere writing of a letter in the usual course of business may be evidence of its subsequent receipt by the addressee.[5]

Certain other principles must here be distinguished. (1) By the law of com-not sufficient; it would be "a presumption contradicted daily by the immense dead-letter collections never received by correspondents").

[2] Cases cited ante, § 93, passim.

[3] Can.: N. Br. St. 1881, c. 14, § 2 (the delivery and receipt of a message at a telegraph-office for transmission shall be evidence of its transmission and its receipt by the addressee); 1888, White v. Flemming, 20 N. Sc. 335 (Com. v. Jeffries, infra, followed); U. S.: 1896, Eppinger v. Scott, 112 Cal. 369, 44 Pac. 723; 1863, Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 548, 563 (transmission by the operator in Boston of a message, relevant to show its receipt by the addressee in New York); 1897, Perry v. Bank, 53 Nebr. 89, 78 N. W. 538; 1885, Oregon S. S. Co. v. Otis, 100 N. Y. 446, 452, 3 N. E. 485; 1899, Western Twine Co. v. Wright, 11 S. D. 521, 78 N. W. 942.

The course of business in telephone transmission is equally relevant; but this is complicated with other principles, and is dealt with post, § 2155.

[4] 1815, Hetherington v. Kemp, 4 Camp. 193 (to show the sending of a letter, the usage of the counting-house in placing the letters on a table, and the testimony of the partner as to his habit of posting them, admissible); 1837, Hart v. Alexander, 7 C. & P. 746, 751 (whether a circular announcing a dissolution of partnership was sent; "the practice of the house to send circulars on every change in the firm," admitted; Lord Abinger, C. B.: "That does not show that a particular person received a circular, except upon the presumption that a jury may make upon the general habit"); 1866, Trabue v. Sayre, 1 Bush 129, 131 (to prove the writing and mailing of a notice, the habits of a notary and of the respective bank-officers having the duty of preparing and mailing notices were received); 1862, Union Bank v. Stone, 50 Me. 595, 597, 601 (the "usual course of proceeding and customary habits of business" of a notary and his clerk, admitted to show the giving of notice); 1831, Flack v. Green, 3 G. & J. 474 (to prove the forwarding of a notice, the general course of business of the firm to forward such notices, excluded); 1848, Bell v. Bank, 7 Gill 216, 227 (to prove the mailing of a notice, the invariable habit of the bank-messenger charged with that duty to mail such notices, admitted; explaining the ruling in Flack v. Green as based on the indefiniteness of the proof of the habit); 1859, Brailsford v. Williams, 15 Md. 150, 152, 159 (to prove the mailing of a notice, the custom of the firm to leave letters on the desk for the clerk to mail, held not sufficient; the clerk whose duty it was to mail the letters should have been called); 1837, Dana v. Kemble, 19 Pick. 112, 114 (letter left at a hotel, where the usage was regularly to distribute letters so left; held sufficient); 1903, Dowagiac M. Co. v. Watson, — Minn. —, 95 N. W. 884 (business custom of the plaintiff to mail notices of acceptance of contracts, excluded on the facts); 1810, Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns. 375, 384 (the habit of a notary as to giving notice on the same day as demand, admitted to show that notice was given); 1826, Thallheimer v. Brinckerhoff, 6 Cow. 101 (whether a letter was sent; the clerk's invariable custom to mail letters as soon as copied, admitted); 1891, Beakes v. Da Cunha, 126 N. Y. 293, 27 N. E. 251 (whether notices were mailed on the 20th of the month; the person's habit to be at home on the 20th of each month for the purpose of transacting the business of that kind, admitted); 1825, Coyle v. Gozzler, 2 Cr. C. C. 625 (to show the making and mailing of a notice on a specified day, the notary's habit of giving notice on the day of making the demand was received); 1876, U. S. v. Babcock, 3 Dillon 571, 575 (telegrams delivered to a doorkeeper accustomed to distribute despatches to defendant's office, admitted).

[5] 1879, Trotter v. Maclean, L. R. 13 Ch. D. 574, 580; 1897, McKay v. Myers, 168 Mass. 312, 47 N. E. 98 (usual course of business, as indicating the mailing of a letter of which a copy had been kept).

mercial paper, actual receipt of notice of dishonor is, in certain conditions, unnecessary; the payee's due diligence (or, as sometimes improperly termed, the indorsee's constructive notice) suffices; hence a rule of commercial paper that the mere fact of seasonably mailing the notice suffices in law.[6] Here the fact of mailing is not used evidentially at all; for the receipt of the notice is not desired to be proved. (2) The receipt of a letter or telegram through the mails or telegraph-office may suffice as evidence of the genuineness of the letter or telegram, as being really sent by the person purporting to be its author; this rests on peculiar considerations and involves the principle of Authentication (post, §§ 2153, 2154). (3) When a letter is received through the mail, and the receiver desires to establish the time and place of posting, the postmark on the envelope is evidential. This involves two inquiries, first, whether the postmark may be assumed to be genuine, under the principles of Authentication (post, § 2152), and secondly, whether, under the exception to the Hearsay rule, the postmark, if genuine, can be treated as an official certificate of the act of marking and therefore be used as testimony without calling the postmaster himself to the stand (post, § 1674).

§ 96. Habit of Intemperance. In general, it would seem that, while a habit or fixed principle of abstaining from liquor would have value to show probable sobriety on a given occasion, yet "habits" of intemperance or intoxication could not be used for the contrary purpose; for the term "habit" here signifies thereby frequent indulgences, and not constant or periodical intoxication. If indeed a steady practice of intoxication can be shown, it would be equally probative. By reason of this looseness of meaning in the word "habit," the judicial applications of the principle are by no means uniform.[1] Distinguish the evidential use (ante, § 85) of a condition of intoxi-

[6] 1846, Woodcock v. Houldsworth, 16 M. & W. 124 (Parke, B.: "He has done all that was usual and necessary; and he does not guarantee the certainty or correctness of the post-office delivery"); 1848, Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, 398; 1821, Hartford Bank v. Stedman, 3 Conn. 489; 1858, Loud v. Merrill, 45 Me. 516, 520.

[1] 1849, Alcock v. Assur. Co., 13 Q. B. 292 (the question was whether a stranded ship might have been got off without total loss if the captain had exercised good judgment at the time; evidence was received of his previous "drunken habits," as "tending to show that he probably was drunk, or that, in consequence of former drunkenness, his perceptions were imperfect"; this involves both the present use and that of § 85, ante); 1894, Cosgrova v. Pitman, 103 Cal. 268, 273, 37 Pac. 232 (habit of intemperance, admissible to show intoxication at a given time); 1903, Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Riddle, — Ky. —, 72 S. W. 22 (whether the injured person was intoxicated at the time; testimony "that he was a perfectly sober man, and that he [the witness] had never seen him take a drink in his life," excluded; this is not common sense); 1898, Sullivan v. Sullivan, 92 Me. 84, 42 Atl. 220 (divorce for habits of intoxication; defendant's reputation for sobriety before marriage, not admitted as tending to disprove the charge; treated as a question of character); 1862, Heland v. Allen, 3 All. 407, 408 (habits of sobriety or general character as a temperate man, not admissible to show that a plaintiff was not drunk at a given time); 1875, McCarty v. Leary, 118 Mass. 509, 510 (same); 1898, Edwards v. Worcester, 172 id. 104, 51 N. E. 447 (plaintiff's habits of sobriety, as tending to negative his intoxication, excluded); 1897, Kingston v. R. Co., 112 Mich. 40, 70 N. W. 315, 74 N. W. 230 (whether the plaintiff was drunk at the time of the accident; previous habits of intoxication excluded); 1896, Lane v. R. Co., 132 Mo. 4, 33 S. W. 645 (Sherwood, J., delivering the opinion, but no other judges concurring on this point: "the habit of intoxication, when once proven to exist, is presumed to continue, and raises, in the case of an accident, a presumption of negligence, which stands until rebutted. . . . If evidence of the intemperate habits of a conductor of a railroad company may be gone into, in order to charge his employer with his negligence in case of an accident, though no intoxication be shown on that particular occasion, it is difficult to see why, in fairness and upon principle, the like rule should not prevail, and similar cated incapacity as indicating that a certain act was or was not done while in that condition.

§ 97. Habit of Negligence. Negligence is, in one aspect, the not-doing of a particular act; but in another and more correct aspect, it is the doing of one act in a manner which amounts to negligence in that some other act is omitted which ought to have accompanied it. Regarded evidentially, the question is, Can there be a habit of not-doing? Undoubtedly, — at least so far as this signifies a habit of doing a different or the contrary thing; e.g. A habitually goes to his work through X street; therefore he habitually does not go through Y street. But this is not a final answer to the real doubt implied in the question, i.e. Can there be a habit of non-acting, of omitting a thing which might have been or ought to have been done? It would seem plain that there can be; and in this sense there is no reason why such a habit should not be used as evidential:

1873, Sargent, C. J., in State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528, 532, 549 (indictment for negligently running over a person at a crossing; one of the issues was whether the bell had been rung and the whistle sounded; evidence was received that the same train, run by the same engineer and fireman, had sometimes passed the same crossing during the preceding year without those precautions; the testimony as to the actual doing or omitting on this occasion being in conflict): "It would seem to be axiomatic that a man is likely to do or not to do a thing, or to do it or not to do it in a particular way, as he is in the habit of doing or not doing it. But this must be understood of acts which are done or omitted to be done without any particular intent or purpose to injure any one; it cannot apply to acts that are done intentionally, wilfully, or maliciously, because such acts are done with a specific object in view, and they are performed, not by force of habit, but with a definite purpose. . . . But when the question is, did these servants of the road, without any intention whatever and through mere negligence or carelessness, omit to give these signals on that occasion, we think the inquiry was properly made as to what they evidence be admitted, and similar consequences follow, where a railroad company pleads the contributory negligence of one injured by its train"); 1871, Warner v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465 (previous habits of intoxication, not admitted to show intoxication at a particular time); 1874, Cleghorn v. R. Co., 56 id. 44, 46 (same); 1868, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Books, 57 Pa. 339, 343 (evidence admitted of the intemperate habits of the conductor of the defendant's train; "it would cast upon the defendants the burthen of proving that he was not intoxicated at the time, and had used due care"); 1876, Huntington B. T. M. R. Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119, 124 (superintendent's intemperate habits excluded, because he was not the cause of the injury; but the conductor's intemperate habits admitted, as "raising a presumption of negligence"); 1866, Thompson v. Bowie, 4 Wall. 467, 471 (action on notes; defence, that they were given for gambling debts; the fact that the defendant when drunk had a habit of gambling, excluded, though the notes were in the handwriting of a professional gambler and were payable to the keeper of a gambling house, and although the opinion, by Davis, J., concedes that "it is highly probable that the notes were executed by him for a gaming consideration"; this is a discreditable decision; Grier, J., diss.); 1896, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne, 19 C. C. A. 623, 73 Fed. 634 (intemperate habits of an engineer, not received to show that he was drunk at the time in question); 1895, Smith's Ex'r v. Smith, 67 Vt. 443, 32 Atl. 256 (habits of intoxication, admitted to show intoxication at a given time, a certain amount of other evidence being first offered). Some of the above rulings, it will be observed, are based upon a confusion of the present principle with that of the character rule (ante, § 64).

Distinguish the fact of intemperance as constituting incompetence, under the fellow-servant rule or under the rule for exemplary damages; 1872, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 63 Ill. 293, 297 (an employee's intemperate habits, known to the employer, used as fixing his liability for the employee's incompetence); 1881, Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176, 182, 9 N. W. 243 (same); 1885, Hilts v. R. Co., 55 id. 437, 444, 21 N. W. 878 (same); 1874, Cleghorn v. R. Co., 56 N. Y. 44, 46 (admissible, if known to the employer, as ground for exemplary damages).

had done before in that regard, and whether they had or had not grown habitually negligent of the requirements of the road in that particular. In this view of the case, we think the evidence was admissible, — not as evidence of character, not as evidence of fitness or unfitness, but simply as having some tendency to show that on this particular occasion these agents were more probably negligent and careless because they had before frequently neglected the same duty with impunity and had thus become habitually negligent in that regard."

The real difficulties here seem to be two: Is it possible to believe that careless action can ever be anything more than casual or occasional? If it is, are we not really predicating a careless disposition, rather than a genuine habit, and then are we not violating the rule against character in civil cases (ante, § 64) in employing such evidence? These doubts serve to explain the precedents that exclude such evidence; but it would seem that the doubts are not always well founded, and that such evidence is often of probative value, and is not attended by the inconveniences of character evidence.[1]

§ 98. Habit as a substitute for Present Recollection. It will be seen, in examining the qualifications of witnesses (post, §§ 734, 747) that a past recollection may be resorted to, if known to have been accurately recorded at the time; and one of the permissible ways for the witness to guarantee the accuracy of his record is to vouch for a habit of accurate recording. But theoretically such testimony may be resolved into circumstantial evidence of habit, neglecting the use of the record; or the record may be wanting, and thus the circumstantial evidence of habit alone is practically available. Thus, a notary may testify that his habit is always to mail a notice of protest, and this habit alone (apart from or in the absence of a minute of the sending) would be receivable to indicate the probability that a specific notice was sent:

1867, Strong, J., in Eureka Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 56 Pa. 264 (admitting evidence of the company's custom to send a notice, as indicating that the notice was sent): "We think it not uncommon in practice to corroborate the defective memory of a witness by proof of what was his habit in similar circumstances. Thus, a subscribing witness to a will or a bond, if unable to recollect whether he saw the testator or obligor sign the instrument or heard it acknowledged, is often permitted to testify to his own habit never to sign as a witness without seeing the party sign whose signature he attests or hearing that signature acknowledged. And it seems to be persuasive and legitimate supporting evidence."[1]

[1] 1893, East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane, 92 Ga. 187, 192, 18 S. E. 18 (action for the death of an engineer; defence, his own negligent act in using excessive speed; the engineer's habitual use of excessive speed, excluded on the facts; prior rulings discussed); 1885, Whitney v. Gross, 140 Mass. 232, 5 N. E. 619 (distinguishing between mere carelessness in driving a horse down hill on former occasions and training the horse so that he habitually broke into a rapid rate of speed, the latter being admissible); 1894, Brouillette v. R. Co., 162 id. 198, 204, 206, 38 N. E. 507 (the plaintiff's repeated boasts "about his ability to keep out of the way of trains and not get hurt," admitted, as bearing upon his "carefulness or readiness to take risks"); 1897, Mulville v. Ins. Co., 19 Mont. 95, 47 Pac. 651 (that the deceased made a practice of jumping on trains while in motion, excluded); 1873, State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528 (admitted; see quotation supra); 1878, State v. B. & M. Railroad, 58 id. 410 (similar); 1896, Baker v. Irish, 172 Pa. 528, 532, 33 Atl. 558 (that the plaintiff "before the accident made a practice of attempting to jump out of the elevator" before it stopped; rejected, because too remote to show that he did so on this occasion). Cases involving a careful habit have been placed ante, § 93. For the use of particular instances to evidence the careful or careless habit, see post, §§ 199, 376.

[1] 1832, Den v. Downam, 1 Green N. J. 142

§ 99. Traits of Handwriting and Spelling, to evidence Authorship of a Writing. When we are shown a signature, and, without having seen X write it, or handle the document, we infer nevertheless from the appearance of the writing that X was the writer, our process of thought is that, since X has a peculiar style or habit of handwriting known to us in its features, therefore, whenever he writes, the writing must bear these peculiar marks, and thus a writing bearing these marks was the product of his hand. Just as we think, of a deed of violence, "This man's character, his plan, his emotions, would be likely to lead him to this deed," so we argue, "This man's handwriting would result in his penning such a signature as the one in issue." It is commoner to evidence the authorship of a signature by the direct testimony of those who declare it to resemble the general qualities of the alleged person's handwriting as known to them; there the style of writing is not expressly offered in evidence, but is merely the ground of their competency to testify. When handwriting is offered circumstantially in evidence, it is expressly described or shown to the jury as the source of their inference; for thus only does the trait of the handwriting become available for them as the basis of an inference. Now, the relevancy of handwriting-traits, as of probative value to show whether or not a given act of writing was done by the person alleged, has always been conceded, since the beginning of the 1700s. The difficulty that has arisen over handwriting-evidence has not been over the relevancy of handwriting-traits to show the authorship of a writing but over the mode of evidencing the handwriting-traits themselves. There is only one way of evidencing them by circumstantial evidence, and that is by examining one or more specimens of the writing of the person in question and drawing inferences as to its peculiar traits (on the principle of § 383, post). This, however, being a different question from the present one, and complicated by many collateral considerations, is treated elsewhere (post, §§ 1996–2021). The qualifications of witnesses to speak as to handwriting-traits involve also distinct questions (post, §§ 693–709).

A person's mode of spelling is also a trait which evidences whether or not a document with words spelled in a given way was probably executed by him. Spelling and handwriting alike seem to be more or less personal and physical traits, like corporal strength and manual skill, in their probative bearing. A peculiar mode of spelling has always been treated as relevant to evidence a document's authorship; but the subject is more conveniently dealt with in connection with the rules for handwriting (post, § 2024).

Sub-topic D: DESIGN OR PLAN.

§ 102. General Principle. The presence of a design or plan to do or not to do a given act has probative value to show that the act was in fact done or not done. A plan is not always carried out, but it is more or less likely to be carried out. The existence of the plan is always used in daily life as the basis of an inference to the act planned. There is no question about the relevancy in general of such evidence:

(posting an advertisement of sheriff's sale; the sheriff's testimony to his "constant practice to do it [post it], without a single exception ever known by me," admitted). The principle is further exemplified by the citations post, § 747. The presumption from regular performance of official duty (post, § 2534) rests on the present principle.

1853. Bigelow, J., in Cook v. Moore, 11 Cush. 213, 216: "The existence in the mind of a deliberate design to do a certain act, when once proved, may properly lead to the inference that the intent once harbored continued and was carried into effect by acts long subsequent to the origin of the motive by which they were prompted."

The probative value of such a design or plan, for the purpose of admissibility, will depend chiefly on two elements, either of which may be very weak in a given instance, — the fixedness or absolute quality of the design, i. e. its subjection to no contingencies or conditions; and the specific direction of it to the act in question, i. e. its application, not merely to a class of acts indefinitely foreseen, but to the exact deed in question. The only questions of relevancy that have arisen are due to the probative importance of these elements.

§ 103. Discrimination of other Principles. It is necessary first to distinguish, from the relevancy of Design or Plan, certain very different evidential questions. (1) Hearsay expressions of Design. When it is sought to evidence a design or plan by expressions of the person alleged to have entertained it, the question immediately arises whether the Hearsay rule applies and whether such expressions may enter under some exception to it (post, §§ 1725, 1726). This has nothing to do with the relevancy of the design itself, when properly evidenced. (2) Conduct as evidence of Design. The design or plan being assumed to be relevant, a common source of evidencing it is the conduct of the person, i. e. not express assertions of it, but conduct circumstantially indicating it. This raises questions of relevancy, but very different ones from the relevancy of the design itself to evidence an act; just as the admissibility of conduct to evidence character raises different questions from the admissibility of character to evidence an act. Not only in theory, but in view of practical results, these two things are constantly to be distinguished; for, however relevant the design, the evidence to establish it may be inadmissible (post, §§ 237, 304). (3) Design or Intention, distinguished from Intent. The probative feature of an intention or design is its direction forward to the accomplishment of a purpose by action. That is why it is relevant to show the later doing of the act. This is a different thing from Intent, in the legal sense, i. e. the state of mind which accompanies an act and imparts to it a criminal or innocent quality. The two things are as different as the design with which a man buys a good cigar and his state of mind later when he is smoking it. His plan is, when buying, to smoke it; later, when his design is being fulfilled, his smoking is accompanied by sentiments of comfort and self-satisfaction. But his design may be frustrated and yet the accompanying sentiments may be experienced; as, if he loses the cigar and a friend gives him another. Or his design may be carried out, but the sentiments not be experienced; as, if the cigar turns out to be a poor one. So, too, a person may design to write a document and this design is relevant to show that he did later write it; but his intent, while writing it, to make false representations depends on different considerations. Again, a person may design to take another's property, and this design is relevant to show the subsequent taking; but whether the taking was under a claim of right or with felonious intent involv- a different mental state. In short, the importance of design, plan, or intention, is chiefly its evidentiary aspect, as looking forward and tending to prove the act in question; while the important aspect of intent is chiefly not an evidentiary one at all, but one of substantive law, as a state of mind accompanying the act in question and necessary to its legal effect. Occasionally, to be sure, intent has an evidentiary significance, — as where an intent at an earlier time is used to indicate the existence of the same intent at a later time, but here the evidentiary use is to prove another mental state or condition, and not an act. The practical consequences of this distinction between design and intent are elsewhere dealt with (post, §§ 242, 300–371).

§ 104. Miscellaneous Instances. There is no situation in which a design to do an act would be irrelevant to show the doing of the act.[1] Since the chief difficulty is usually as to the Hearsay rule, the precedents under the exception for Statements of Intention (post, §§ 1725, 1726) are also material; for a ruling admitting expressions of design under that exception to the rule is usually a precedent also for the relevancy of the design.

§ 105. Threats of one charged with Crime. A threat to do a criminal act is in general admissible; the threat being receivable under the Hearsay exception or as an admission, and the design, thus evidenced, being relevant under the present principle:

1688, Standsfield's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 1371, 1373, 1377, 1385; parricide; it was proved that the defendant, who had been disinherited by his father, "did declare, threaten, and vow at several times that he would cut his throat," and did "swear, if he had a sword, he would run it through him," and the like; Hume, arguing for defendant: "[These circumstances] are but very remote and uncertain. For, as to that expression that the defender is alledged to have threatened his father's death, it is the opinion of all lawyers who have written upon the subject that that is but a very remote presumption. And as Carpzovius expresses it (pt. 3, qu. 121, no. 51): 'Quod est indicium admodum periculosum, quippe cum homines sæpe nil minus faciant quam quod minas exequantur, et iracundia agitatus minas de crimine perpetrando sæpe jactet, ipso tamen animo fervore paulo post discusso, cohibeat manus, et abstineat a facinore illo, quod forsan ab alio postea committitur'"; King's Advocate, in reply: "And whereas it is answered to this qualification [i. e. circumstance] that the saying that a son would cut a father's throat is but a remote circumstance, it is replied that the law and all lawyers do agree that 'minæ præcedentes et damnum sequentum' is a most pregnant qualification [i. e. circumstance] of that party's crime, especially where the threats were to cut a father's throat, which of itself was so horrid and unnatural a villainy that it cannot be doubted he who durst vow it wanted but an occasion to act it, and it is acknowledged, that though this be the clearest presumption, yet per se it is not full probation, for though the son had both vowed and resolved, yet by an accident he might have been prevented. But the presumption at least lays the burden."

[1] 1895, Burton v. State, 107 Ala. 68, 18 So. 240 (the intention of a witness, not now to be found, as showing that he had left the State, admitted); 1881, State v. Smith, 49 Conn. 380 (murder of a chief of police making an arrest, the deceased's intention, on leaving his house, "to go to arrest Chip Smith," admitted); 1884, State v. Jones, 64 Ia. 349, 352, 17 N. W. 911, 20 N. W. 470 (murder; deceased's intention to go to a place to buy cattle, admitted to show the reason of his presence near defendant's house); 1898, State v. Smith, 106 id. 701, 77 N. W. 499 (husband-poisoning; defendant's declarations, in seeking to hire rooms, that herself and her daughter would be alone, admitted); 1899, Throckmorton v. Com., — Ky. —, 49 S. W. 474 (Federal license to sell liquor, admissible to show probable possession); 1895, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 81 Md. 371, 32 Atl. 202 (an intention of taking a railroad journey, admitted to show that the deceased was proceeding to get a ticket); 1885, Com. v. Cotton, 138 Mass. 502 (keeping liquor with intent to sell; the defendant was driving a wagon of liquors through a no-license suburb of a city; evidence admitted of orders from his employers to go through that suburb without selling and to sell only upon reaching the region where sales were allowed); 1897, Inness v. R. Co., 168 id. 433, 47 N. E. 192 (intention to take the cars, admitted to show later conduct); 1901, Com. v. O'Brien, 179 id. 533, 61 N. E. 213 (intention of going with a certain object, admitted); 1894, Houston v. Gran, 38 Nebr. 687, 691, 57 N. W. 403 (damage by sale of liquor; defendant's instructions to his servants not to sell to the deceased, not admissible to disprove the sale; unsound). Compare the rulings upon conduct as evidence of design (post, §§ 237, 304).

1810, Chief Justice Swift, Evidence, 136: "When one threatens to do an injury to another, and that or a similar injury afterwards happens, this furnishes ground to presume that he who threatened the fact was the perpetrator or instigator."

1873, Grover, J., in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 175: "Threats to commit the crime for which a person is upon trial are constantly received as evidence against him, as circumstances proper to be considered in determining the question whether he has in fact committed the crime; for the reason that the threats indicate an intention to do it, and the existence of this intention creates a probability that he has in fact committed it."

1892, Shiras, J., in Worth v. R. Co., 51 Fed. 173: "It is also said [by counsel] that a threat to do an act in the future is not proof that the person will in fact do the act threatened. It may not be proof conclusive, but it may be evidence competent to be considered with other facts in determining the question. Thus, if the two persons who made the threats in question had been charged, either civilly or criminally, with the tort of having wrecked the train, can it be questioned that on the trial of the case evidence of the threats made by them would have been competent as tending to show their complicity in the wrong done?"[1]

Such threats may also be circumstantially evidential of hatred, ill-feeling, or malice towards the injured person; in this way they are evidence to show this emotion (post, § 394), while the emotion itself is evidential (post, § 117) as an independent circumstance to show the act. But the practical difference is that almost any antagonistic expression may serve to denote ill-feeling, and rules can hardly be laid down for such evidence; while, on the other hand, regarding the expressions as indicating a design, the nature of the design may seriously affect its relevancy. That which would suffice as evidence of ill-

[1] The following miscellaneous examples raise no difficulty: 1760, Earl Ferrers' Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 919 (killing); 1896, Wilson v. State, 110 Ala. 1, 20 So. 415; 1883, Casat v. State, 40 Ark. 517 (killing); 1889, Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 521, 29 Pac. 817 (killing); 1877, Fulton v. State, 58 Ga. 224 (arson); 1887, Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, passim (killing); 1893, Painter v. People, 147 id. 462, 35 N. E. 64; 1902, Henry v. People, 198 id. 162, 65 N. E. 120; 1871, Cluck v. State, 40 Ind. 263, 270; 1895, State v. Windahl, 95 Ia. 470, 64 N. W. 420 (killing); 1897, State v. Millmeier, 102 id. 692, 72 N. W. 275; 1882, State v. Edwards, 34 La. An. 1012 (arson); 1884, State v. Birdwell, 36 id. 859, 861; 1896, State v. Pain, 48 id. 311, 19 So. 138; 1848, New Gloucester v. Bridgham, 28 Me. 68; 1869, Com. v. Madan, 102 Mass. 165 (killing); 1897, People v. Holmes, 111 Mich. 364, 69 N. W. 501; 1895, State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. W. 63 (killing); 1895, State v. Harlan, 130 Mo. 381, 32 S. W. 997 (killing); 1872, Maxwell v. State, 3 Heisk. 420; 1888, White v. Terr., 3 Wash. T. 397, 403, 19 Pac. 37 ("admissible in all cases"). Distinguish the question of a co-indictee's threats: 1901, State v. Weaver, 165 Mo. 1, 65 S. W. 308 (co-indictee's threats, inadmissible where no conspiracy at the time was shown; see post, § 1079).

feeling may show no design, or a design too indefinite to be relevant. Again, the expressions may be regarded as showing intent, or malice in the legal sense of a deliberate intent to do the act charged, and the presence of this intent at a former time may be evidential (post, § 242) of a later intent at the time of the act. The practical difference is (1) if the doing of the act is conceded, then the design is no longer needed to prove it; but the same evidence of expressions may still be useful to show intent; (2) in an offence where intent is immaterial, the intent-evidence is immaterial, yet the design to do the act may still be relevant. These are not much more than quibbles, for no harm is ordinarily done by admitting superfluous evidence; but if these quibbles are to be raised, they should be solved correctly; and the peculiar doctrines resulting from the raising of these quibbles are sometimes found to be hopelessly inconsistent and unsound.[2]

§ 106. Same: Generic Threats. It has been noted (ante, § 103) that the more specific a design is, the greater its probative value. There may come a point at which the design is too indefinite in its indications to be of any probative value; but the mere fact that it is generic, i. e. points towards a class of acts, however broad, does not in itself destroy its relevancy, provided the purpose might naturally include the act charged.[1]

[2] The rulings in North Carolina are in this condition: 1847, State v. Shepherd, 7 Ired. 195 (the fact that the deceased had bought the defendant's land at a sheriff's sale, that the defendant had threatened him with death if he took a deed, and that he had just taken the deed, admitted); 1880, State v. Norton, 82 N. C. 628 (assault and battery on S., the defendant's words two weeks before, when showing a pistol, that "If S. ever crossed his path he would send him to hell," rejected, because "neither malice nor intent nor knowledge nor motive forms any ingredient of the offence"); 1882, State v. Skidmore, 87 Id. 509, 512 (approving State v. Norton obiter; citing no other cases); 1887, State v. Thompson, 97 id. 496, 1 S. E. 921 (arson; threats to do injury to the son and the grandson of the occupant, admitted as showing general ill-will to the family, and a motive); 1892, State v. Rhodes, 111 Id. 647, 15 S. E. 1038 (arson; threats of harm against the son of the owner, admitted); 1895, State v. Goff, 117 id. 755, 23 S. E. 355 (threat to kill, as showing the defendant the aggressor; admitted with the obscure distinction that "while this was not competent as evidence of motive, it was admissible to show temper"); 1895, State v. Lytle, ih. 799, 23 S. E. 476 (threat to burn a house, admitted; but semble, not where the doing by the defendant is not disputed); 1896, State v. Mace, 118 id. 1244, 24 S. E. 798 ("Damn Bango Branch and everybody that lives on it; . . . I intend to kill some man this night," admitted, in the light of other circumstances); 1901, State v. Hunt, 128 id. 584, 38 S. E. 473 (declarations that he would go to the place where deceased was and "raise some hell," admitted).

[1] Eng.: 1873, R. v. Hagan, 12 Cox Cr. 357 (murder of a child brought up in the defendant's family; his remark a fortnight before, "The child is no good; he is eating the other children's food," admitted); Ala.: 1877, Commander v. State, 60 Ala. 1, 7 (murder; threat to kill any one who sued him under like circumstances, admitted, the deceased having sued him); 1891, Redd v. State, 68 id. 492, 497 (murder of a negro paramour; statements that "he did n't mind killing a negro, if he fooled with him, any more than he would a buck-rabbit," excluded); 1882, Ford v. State, 71 Id. 385, 396 (to kill some one, admitted); 1885, Clarke v. State, 78 id. 474, 477 (murder; threats against a third person, received exceptionally, because the defendant shot the deceased, mistaking him for the third person); 1895, Prater v. State, 107 id. 26, 18 So. 239 (arson; that the defendant belonged to a band of "white caps" who had posted threats to burn down the houses of a certain class of persons of whom the owner of the burned house was one, admitted); 1896, Drake v. State, 110 Id. 9, 20 So. 450 ("I will see you later," said after a quarrel, admitted); 1897, Linehan v. State, 113 id. 70, 21 So. 497 (that "he would show O. [the deceased] how to throw slurs on him," admitted); 1897, Burton v. State, 115 id. 1, 22 So. 585 (that he would "shoot some one," admitted); 1901, Cuddell v. State, 129 id. 57, 30 So. 76 (threats to kill "anybody that interfered," admitted); Cal.: 1896, People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 465, 44 Pac. 186 (threats that "something would happen sure before it would end," and on certain conditions "he would put a hole through them," speaking of the members of a family, admitted on a charge of wife-killing); 1899, People v. Gross, 123 id. 389, 55 Pac. 1054 (that he would "wipe out the name" of the deceased's family, admitted); Colo.: 1899, Moore v. People, 26 Colo. 213, 57

§ 107. Same: Conditional Threats. It has been pointed out (ante, § 103) that the probative value of a design involves some notion of positiveness or

Pac. 857 (that "he would get the son of a bitch yet," admitted); Conn.: 1880, State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 522, 539 (murder of father; the defendant's declaration, "I don't know but I shall kill some one in a week," admitted); D. C.: 1881, Guiteau's Trial, D. C., II, 95 (that the defendant in 1872 or 1873 said he would "shoot some of our public men," "would imitate Wilkes Booth," admitted); Fla.: 1866, Dixon v. State, 13 Fla. 636, 645 (the deceased being a policeman, threats of violence against "policemen," shortly before, admitted to show intent); Ga.: 1876, Stafford v. State, 55 Ga. 591, 593 (murder and robbery; a plan, of a week or so before, to rob others, admitted); 1878, Shaw v. State, 60 Id. 246, 250 (wife-murder by beating; a declaration, four years before, by the defendant while beating her, that he had a right to beat her, admitted); 1897, Shaw v. State, 102 Id. 660, 29 S. E. 477 (train-wrecking; defendant's statement that "he was going to have a wreck of his own some day," received); 1899, Harris v. State, 109 Id. 280, 34 S. E. 583 (murder of negro; defendant's remark, just before, "A negro took my woman, and I am gwine over there and get me a negro," admitted); Ida.: 1898, State v. Davis, — Ida. —, 53 Pac. 678 (murder of sheep-man; threats against sheep-men generally, admitted); 1897, State v. Larkins, — Id. —, 47 Pac. 945 (murder, "I have a dirty piece of business to do to-night," admitted); Ill.: 1886, Schoolcraft v. People, 117 Ill. 271, 277, 7 N. E. 649 (that "some serious" would occur, admitted); Ind.: 1893, Parker v. State, 136 Ind. 284, 287, 35 N. E. 1105 (threats to get even with a certain class of persons, which included the deceased, admitted); 1902, Wheeler v. State, 158 Id. 687, 63 N. E. 975 (threats against persons eating food intended for defendant's children, the deceased being such a person, admitted); 1903, Starr v. State, — Id. —, 67 N. E. 527 (threat to kill "the s— of a b—," admitted); Ia.: 1894, State v. Pierce, 90 Ia. 506, 512, 58 N. W. 891 (threats to kill any person who interfered in a certain way, admitted); 1896, State v. Helm, 97 Id. 378, 66 N. W. 751 (a threat that "some of the C. boys would die with their boots on some of these days," the deceased being a C.; admitted, but perhaps only as a self-contradiction); 1896, Laird v. Ass. Co., 98 Id. 495, 67 N. W. 385 (an angry husband to the deceased, his wife, "You'll run against a stump yet"); 1899, State v. Lightfoot, 107 Id. 344, 78 N. W. 41 (indefinite threats admitted); Kan.: 1872, State v. Horne, 9 Kan. 123, 128 (hostile desire to find the deceased, "By God, we want to see him," admitted); Ky.: 1896, Brooks v. Com., 100 Ky. 194, 37 S. W. 1043 ("he wanted some damned man to jump on him, so that he could kill him," admitted); 1901, Quinn v. Com., — Id. —, 63 S. W. 792 (murder; threats "that he would kill or be killed before he would go to the workhouse," admitted); Mass.: 1869, Com. v. Madan, 102 Mass. 1 (murder; threats to have revenge against certain witnesses, the deceased being one, admitted); 1887, Com. v. Chase, 147 Id. 597, 18 N. E. 565 (threats of harm to a person who had testified against the defendant, admitted to show that the defendant was the one who burned the former's barn); 1890, Com. v. Quinn, 150 Id. 401, 23 N. E. 54 (arson; the defendant's threats, after being formerly charged with robbery by the owner of the burned building, to "make him sweat for it," admitted); Mo.: 1879, State v. Guy, 69 Mo. 430 (a threat to kill an unnamed person, admitted); 1883, State v. Dickson, 78 Id. 438, 449 ("he shall not eat my bread and meat much longer," etc.); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Id. 113, 137 (murder of a policeman; threats against "policemen," admitted); 1885, State v. McNally, 87 Id. 649 ("going to have blood before morning," admitted); 1885, Culbertson v. Hill, 1b. 553, 555 ("general or special"); 1889, State v. Crawford, 99 Id. 74, 12 S. W. 354 (vague threats, admitted); 1895, State v. Fitzgerald, 130 Id. 407, 32 S. W. 1113 (threats to kill some one and then himself, admitted); 1899, State v. Cochran, 147 Id. 504, 49 S. W. 558 (that he "would like to kill some damned old Grand Army man," and "would like to kill somebody before the week was out," admitted, though the deceased was not a member of the G. A. R.); Nebr.: 1903, Keatlug v. State, — Nebr. —, 93 N. W. 980 (general expressions of a plan to rob, admitted); Nev.: 1880, State v. Hymer, 15 Nev. 49, 54, per Beatty, C. J. (murder; statements, about three hours before, "It is the first time I have been drunk since I have been in town; I got drunk just to kill two or three —— in this town, and I'll do it, too," admitted; distinguishing State v. Walsh, 5 Id. 315, 1869, in which a threat was uttered against "a party" who had been talking about his wife, but the person was not identified with the deceased); N. H.: 1898, State v. Davis, 69 N. H. 350, 41 Atl. 267 (illegal sale of liquor; a letter declaring a general intention not to open a hotel unless he sold liquor in it, admitted; also a conversation telling a prospective tenant that he would have to sell liquor, admitted); N. Y.: 1865, People v. Kennedy, 32 N. Y. 141 (threats by the defendant, a discharged farm-hand, to do all the damage he could to the employer and to destroy his property, admitted to connect the defendant with the burning of the other's barn); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 Id. 174 (general threats; he "would beggar him first and then kill him"; "I go prepared for him all the time; so sure as my name is Jim Fisk I will kill him"; per Grover, J., "the difference is only in degree" between these and more specific designs); 1874, Weed v. People, 56 Id. 628 (abortion; evidence admitted, after connecting the defendant with the act, of an advertisement issued by him, about two years before, offering advice and assistance in the procuring of miscarriages); 1897, People v. Sutherland, 154 Id. 345, 48 N. E. 518 (murder by shooting; showing a pistol on the same day shortly before, remarking, "This means business some day," received); 1898, People v.

absolutenes. The mere fact, however, that it is expressed in the alternative or with a condition or contingency does not destroy its probative value; but the intervening fulfilment of the condition should ordinarily be shown, if it occurred.[1]

§ 108. Same: Time of Threats. The element of fixedness is lacking, and the probative value disappears, if the threats were made at such a time anterior that the design cannot possibly be supposed to have continued throughout the interval. But no mere distance of time in itself should make the threats irrelevant. A design once formed presumably continues. The defendant may use the lapse of time as a circumstance explaining away the significance of the threats by indicating the probable abandonment of the design:

Decker, 157 id. 186, 51 N. E. 1018 (taking up a revolver, and saying to a wife, "I have your medicine if you do not do as I say," admitted); N. C.: (see citations ante, § 105); Oh.: 1865, Mimma v. State, 16 Oh. St. 221, 230 (threat to rob A, not admissible to show the killing of A, unless A was both robbed and killed); Pa.: 1865, Hopkins v. Com., 50 Pa. 9 (murder; the defendant, a sailor, had been in irons for turbulence; and after being released, and less than an hour before the killing, declared that he would kill somebody before twenty-four hours; admitted, for it was not "necessary that the premeditated malice should have selected its victim"; here the only issue was that of the degree of homicide); 1882, Abernethy v. Com., 101 id. 322, 324, 328 (threats to kill "somebody," admissible; but here they were followed by a specifying of a third person, and hence were held improperly considered); S. D.: 1895, State v. Isaacson, 8 S. D. 69, 65 N. W. 430 (charge of poisoning a horse; threats during the preceding year to kill animals of that person admitted); Tenn.: 1844, Kinchelow v. State, 5 Humph. 9, 12 (larceny of a bag of flour, a proposal of the defendant to the witness, on the night of the larceny, to "join him in various schemes of forgery, larceny, kidnapping, etc." excluded); Tex.: 1892, Massey v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 371, 379, 20 S. W. 758 (declaration that he intended to rape some person, admitted); 1898, Holley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 301, 46 S. W. 39 (threats not directed to deceased by name, inadmissible, unless otherwise shown to have signified or included him); U. S.: 1898, Stevenson v. U. S., 29 C. C. A. 600, 86 Fed. 106 (murder of a deputy marshal; threat made three months before "to kill the next damn marshal that arrested him," excluded; preposterous rule; 1900, Bird v. U. S., 180 U. S. 356, 21 Sup. 403 (quarrels and threats of assault upon another member of the same party of voyagers about a month before, excluded, partly as being a separate criminal act and partly as too remote; only two precedents cited for the first reason, and none for the second; opinion valueless); Vt.: 1878, State v. Smalley, 50 Vt. 736, 738, 749 (arson of the defendant's own house, to defraud the insurer; evidence of threats to be revenged on other persons, rejected, though the houses of the others had also been burned); Wash.: 1902, State v. Gates, 28 Wash. 689, 69 Pac. 385 (general threats against any person running into defendant's fishing net, admitted); Wis.: 1861, Benedict v. State, 14 Wis. 423 (murder; threats that a knife exhibited by him "would probably be the death of some person before the week was out," and the like, admitted; "such declarations . . . are not to be excluded because they are general, or because the accused did not choose fully to divulge his plans").

[1] 1881, Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492, 496 (Brickell, C. J.: "Whatever may be its force, whether absolute or conditional, whether it indicates a purpose only contemplated or fully matured, it is admissible"); 1896, Phillips v. State, 62 Ark. 112, 34 S. W. 539 (that he "would make his wife come back home to him or beat her to death," admitted); 1878, Everett v. State, 62 Ga. 65, 70 (murder of a paramour; threats three years before that he would kill her before any other man should have her, admitted); 1902, Abbott v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 124 (murder of a brother-in-law the day after his marriage; defendant's threats, a year before, to kill the deceased if he married the former's sister, admitted); 1896, Com. v. Crowe, 165 Mass. 139, 42 N. E. 563 (threat to burn the building "unless his mother got something out of the property," admitted, though she did get something out of the property); 1882, State v. Johnson, 76 Mo. 121, 124 (threat "to fix him if he fooled with him," admitted); State v. Adams, ib. 357 (similar); 1883, Carver v. Huskey, 79 id. 509 ("if they hunted in that neighborhood with hounds, he would kill them," admitted); 1899, State v. Sloan, 22 Mont. 293, 56 Pac. 364 (conditional threats, admitted); 1898, Com. Farrell, 187 Pa. 408, 41 Atl. 382 (defendant "swore he would get B.'s money, if he had to kill the old man to do so"; not admitted as evidence of defendant's robbery and murder of B., because "there is no legal presumption that such a threat will be executed"; a ruling supremely ridiculous); 1892, State v. Bradley, 64 Vt. 468, 470, 24 Atl. 1053 (murder of a paramour; threats six or eight months before, to kill her if she left him, admitted, "proof tending to show that the condition had transpired having been introduced"); 1895, State v. Bradley, 67 id. 465, 32 Atl. 240 (threats to kill under certain circumstances, admitted).

1881, Brickell, C. J., in Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492, 496 (murder of a paramour; threats made two years before were admitted): "The length of time elapsing between the making of the threat and the criminal act, when the crime is to be proved only by circumstantial evidence, is of importance in determining the weight to be accorded to it. . . . If a long period intervenes, during which there were opportunities of doing the threatened injury, and there was no attempt to do it, and no repetition of the threat, it would be but a slight circumstance in connecting the accused with the injury, and there would be more reason for regarding it as having been a mere careless, thoughtless utterance, or idle bravado, or ebullition of temporary passion. The length of time would impair its probative force, but would not render it inadmissible. So the probative force of the threat would be increased if it was frequently repeated during the whole time intervening . . . and the same cause for ill-will and hate continued to exist; then it could be imputed to a malignant spirit, and a purpose that may have been vacillating but at last became fixed and settled."

1896, Start, C. J., in Hale v. Life Ins. Co., 65 Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (excluding threats of the deceased, in an action on an insurance policy, to commit suicide): "The declarations must, in order to be admissible in evidence, bear a reasonably close relation, in point of time, to the alleged act. The reason for the rule suggests and enforces the necessity of this relation between the declaration of the party and the doing of the alleged act by him. They must be so near in point of time as to justify a reasonable probability, in connection with the other evidence in the case, that the party in fact carried his declared intention into execution. No definite rule applicable to all cases can be laid down as to when, and when not, such declarations will be received. It is a matter largely in the sound discretion of the trial Court in each particular case."[1]

§ 109. Same: Explaining away Threats. Under the principle of Explanation (ante, § 34), the defendant may of course attempt to explain away the design-evidence. Thus, he may show that the lapse of time probably led to the abandonment of the design; or that it did not apply to the act charged; or that it was otherwise without real significance.[1]

[1] 1881, Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492 (see quotation supra); 1889, Barnes v. State, 88 Id. 204, 207, 7 So. 38 (rape; expressions, uttered three months before, admitted); 1867, People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 190, 200, 205 (lapse of time affects weight only; threats to kill, made nearly a year before, admitted); 1882, People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 id. 387 (same principle; here threats to kill, made about a month before, were admitted); 1880, U. S. v. Neverson, 1 Mackey, D. C. 152, 169 (admitting threats made the summer before a killing in January); 1903, Johns v. State, — Fla. —, 35 So. 71 (threats three weeks before, admitted); 1896, McDaniel v. State, 100 Ga. 67, 27 S. E. 158 (threats "a considerable period beforehand," admitted); 1902, Abbott v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 124 (threats a year before, admitted); 1859, Com. v. Goodwin, 14 Gray 55 (arson; threats of revenge one or two years before, admitted; admissibility "would not be affected" by "the length of time which intervened"); 1890, Com. v. Quinn, 150 Mass. 401, 23 N. E. 54 (arson; threats three years before; admitted in trial Court's discretion); 1892, Com. v. Holmes, 157 id. 233, 239, 32 N. E. 6 (wife-murder; threats at various times during nine years, admitted; their "remoteness" "was for the Court, in the exercise of its discretion"); 1896, Com. v. Crowe, 165 Id. 139, 42 N. E. 563 (a threat fourteen months before, admitted, the ill-feeling having continued); 1900, Com. v. Corkery, 175 Id. 460, 56 N. E. 711 (larceny; declarations three months before, admitted); 1896, Hale v. Life Ins. Co., 65 Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (see quotation supra); 1882, State v. Adams, 76 Mo. 357 (lapse of time held immaterial; followed in later cases); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Id. 137; 1883, Carver v. Huskey, ib. 509; 1885, State v. McNally, 87 id. 650; 1897, State v. Wright, 141 id. 333, 42 S. W. 934; 1899, Terr. v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 12, 14, 22 Pac. 132 (threats about two months before the shooting, admitted; "mere lapse of time does not exclude" such evidence); 1898, State v. Davis, 69 N. H. 350, 41 Atl. 267 (discretion of trial Court controls); 1892, State v. Bradley, 64 Vt. 466, 470, 24 Atl. 1053 (murder; threats of six or eight months before, admitted; time goes "not to the admissibility but to the weight").

[1] 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 581 (explanation of circumstances under which threats to kill were uttered by defendant); 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239 (evidence that the defendant was accustomed when angry to make threats of violence without carrying them out, excluded; unsound).

§ 110. Threats by the Deceased against one charged with Homicide; General Principle. Where on a charge of homicide the excuse is self-defence, and the controversy is whether the deceased was the aggressor, the deceased's threats against the accused are relevant. The deceased's design to do violence upon the defendant is of some value to show that on the occasion in question he did carry out, or attempt to carry out, his design. Moreover, it is the fact of his design, irrespective of its communication to the defendant, that is evidential:

1860, Baldwin, J., in People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 481: "[The defendant urged] that this assault was not made by him, but that it was made by Sweeney [the deceased]; and to prove this, he proposed to show that Sweeney had armed himself with this pistol, that he had borrowed it, and that it was found at the place of the rencounter. He was permitted to show these facts, but he proposed to show a further fact, and that was that, at the time of Sweeney's getting the pistol, he declared what he meant to do with it. . . . This leads to the inquiry, whether the fact that A procures a weapon for a particular purpose conduces at all to show, in a question of conflicting proofs as to the manner in which he used it, what that manner was. We apprehend that if a man goes into a house, borrows a gun, goes out with it, saying that he means to use it on another, and a rencounter happens between him and that other, and the witnesses who see the difficulty differ, or the circumstances are equivocal, as to which one of the two commences the affray, that some light might be thrown upon this question, conducing to or towards its solution, by the proof of these facts as to A's procuring it and his motives in doing so. The jury might possibly, with some reason, conclude that as the weapon was procured for this purpose of assault on another, that purpose was fulfilled; that the assault, in other words, was made in pursuance of the intended purpose when the weapon was procured, and especially if other facts in corroboration of this conclusion existed. It is true there would be nothing conclusive in this. But the fact of the conclusiveness of this proof to establish the proposition which it is introduced to prove is not the decisive question; that question is, whether this item of fact be a matter proper to be considered by the jury in arriving at their conclusion upon this mooted point. And we have no doubt that it is."

1873, Grover, J., in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174: "[Why are such threats if communicated admissible?] For the reason that threats made would show an attempt to execute them probable, when an opportunity occurred, and the more ready belief of the accused would be justified to the precise extent of this probability. But an attempt to execute threats is equally probable, when not communicated to the party threatened, as when they are so; and when, as in this case [of self-defence alleged] the question is whether the attempt was in fact made, we can see no reason for excluding them in the former that would not be equally cogent for the exclusion of the latter."

1892, Raney, C. J., in Wilson v. State, 30 Fla. 242, 11 So. 556: "The principle of the admission of threats under such circumstances is that they tend to show that it was the intention of the deceased at the time of the meeting to attack the accused, or that he was seeking the latter's life, and hence they tend to prove that the former brought on the conflict, and consequently are relevant evidence. The philosophy of the matter is that where there has been an encounter, and it is not shown by direct evidence who was the assailant, threats of an intention to assail are some evidence of an assault having been made by the one who made the threats."

§ 111. Same: Discriminations and Limitations. (1) The use of communicated threats to show the defendant's apprehension of violence is to be distinguished (post, § 247), because the principle is different and does not need the limitations of the present doctrine.[1] Nevertheless, as so few Courts in the beginning perceived the present use of threats, it was natural that some confusion should arise in the process of establishing the distinction, especially through the erroneous application of rulings from other jurisdictions. The distinction itself rests on the same principle as that between character used to show the probability of the deceased's act, and communicated character used to show the defendant's apprehensions (ante, § 63). Occasionally a Court still applies the same tests to both uses, communicated and uncommunicated; but the distinctness of the two uses is now generally understood.[2]

(2) A necessary condition of relevancy is that the fact of killing is conceded, and is justified as done in self-defence, and that the virtual controversy is whether there was in truth any need for defence, i. e. whether the deceased was the aggressor. This is universally settled, expressly or by implication.

(3) There is much opportunity for abuse of this sort of evidence. Not only may it be manufactured; but, even when genuine, it may be employed improperly to help the defendant by way of justification, — in certain communities at least, where the Courts have been compelled repeatedly to make clear the law that a threat to shoot another is no justification for the latter to kill on sight. For these reasons various limitations have been attempted: (a) The evidence of threats is inadmissible where there is clear evidence that the defendant was the aggressor. Most jurisdictions adopt this rule, and none seem to negative it. (b) Furthermore, it is only admissible (as most Courts provide) where there is some other evidence of an aggression by the deceased. This is usually expressed by saying that there must have been some "demonstration of hostility," or, more shortly, some "overt act," by the deceased. It is difficult to say whether this limitation originated in the res gestæ notion (infra) or in a rule of criminal law that an overt act is a necessary element of the justification of self-defence, or merely in a general policy of preventing the abuse of this evidence. At any rate, it seems a satisfactory limitation, provided the multiplication of quibbles as to "overt acts" is avoided by leaving the whole matter in the hands of the trial judge; for it prevents the defendant from trying to use the threats as a mere pretext for justifying the killing of one who was making no actual attempt to injure him. (c) Another condition, sometimes suggested,[3] but inconsistent with and more stringent than the preceding one, is that the evidence should be received only when there is no other direct evidence as to who was the aggressor, i. e. when there were no eye-witnesses. Perhaps in practice a combination of (b) and (c) would be the best; i. e. to admit the evidence when by eye-witnesses there was some other evidence of the deceased's aggression, or when there were no eye-witnesses to the affair. (4) Another and additional use, independent of the preceding, receives the evidence in "confirmation" or "corroboration" of communicated threats. This is usually coupled with one of the preceding limitations as an alternative condition of admission.[4] (5) The doctrine of res gestæ is sometimes appealed to as the ground of receiving the evidence; and the same notion underlies the occasional suggestion that the threats "characterize" the deceased's conduct. This employment of res gestæ as a veil for obscurity of thought is elsewhere examined (post, § 1795); and it is enough here to say that it has no possible application to this kind of evidence, and cannot be made to fit its rules; and the sooner such phrases are abandoned, the better for clearness of legal thought. (6) In some jurisdictions it is impossible to ascertain the exact rule.[5] Previous precedents are ignored, inconsistent tests laid down in succeeding rulings, decisions in other jurisdictions are cited to the exclusion of local precedents; and the oftener the matter comes up for a ruling, the more it is obscured.[6]

[1] "Evidence of communicated threats is intended to shed light upon the mental attitude of the prisoner towards the deceased when the homicide occurred; uncommunicated threats are evidence of the mental attitude of the deceased towards the prisoner" (Lucas, J., in State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 426, 10 S. E. 792; 1889).

[2] Distinguish also the use of the deceased's expressions as evidence of prior ill-feeling or malice, and tending to prove present malice (post, § 396).

[3] As in Mississippi.

[4] As in Florida and Kansas.

[5] As in Louisiana.

[6] The rulings in the various jurisdictions are as follows: Alabama: 1851, Powell v. State, 19 Ala. 577, 581 (a suggestion that there might be a proper use for uncommunicated threats); 1853, Carroll v. State, 23 id. 37 (threats two weeks before offered "to show the character of the conduct of the deceased" in his trespass; excluded, because the deceased actually used no violence, and because the threats should be nearer in time to the affray, and be part of the res gestæ); 1873, Burns v. State, 43 id. 374 (threats uncommunicated are admissible when they "form part of the res gestæ," on the theory that they "show the mental status of the deceased and his motive in going" to the place, and thus they "may enable the jury to determine who was the aggressor"; here threats made the same afternoon were received, and threats made the day before were rejected); 1880, Roberts v. State, 68 id. 163 (repudiating former limitations; the essential condition is that "the deceased had sought a conflict with the accused, or was making some demonstration, or overt act of attack" at the time of the killing; if so, "uncommunicated threats, recently made, are admissible for the purpose of showing the quo animo of such demonstration or attack," or for "corroborating those that are communicated," or, where the aggressor is doubtful, "to show who was probably the first assailant"); 1881, Green v. State, 69 id. 7 (preceding case affirmed); 1896, Gunter v. State, 111 id. 23, 20 So. 632 (admitted); 1899, Henson v. State, 120 id. 316, 25 So. 23 (mere general threat, not applying to defendant, excluded); Arkansas: 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 568, 584 (present principle not considered); 1859, Coker v. State, 20 id. 53, 55 (same); 1860, Pitman v. State, 22 id. 353, 356 (recognizing the present principle, and admitting uncommunicated threats made on the day of the killing, as manifesting "the use he [the deceased] intended to make of the pistol, etc.," "the motive that was taking him to G.," and "his hostile feelings" towards the defendant); 1879, Harris v. State, 34 id. 469, 472 (no rule attempted, but the preceding case approved; the deceased's non-aggression being clearly shown, the threats were rejected); California: 1860, People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 476, 481 (admitted; but semble only where the evidence was conflicting as to the aggressor); 1869, People v. Scoggins, 37 id. 676, 684, 696 (admitted, where there is other evidence — no definite measure being given — that the deceased was the aggressor); 1880, People v. Alivtre, 55 id. 263 (the preceding cases approved; no specific rule laid down); 1880, People v. Travis, 56 id. 251, 253 (threats admissible, semble; no authorities cited); 1880, People v. Carlton, 57 id. 83 (following Arnold's Case); Colorado, 1878, Davidson v. People, 4 Colo. 145 (former threat admitted "to show that at the time of the meeting the deceased was seeking the defendant's life"; here, in view of the existence of a long-standing feud and of threats at the time); 1889, Babcock v. People, 13 id. 515, 521, 29 Pac. 817 (length of time does not exclude; here, a year before); Florida: 1886, Bond v. State, 21 Fla. 738, 751 (admissible when so near the time of the killing as to be part of the transaction, or when the question of the aggression "is in any manner of doubt"); 1891, Garner v. State, 28 id. 113, 133, 9 So. 835 (same); 1892, Wilson v. State, 30 id. 234, 242, 11 So. 556 (same); 1894, Steele v. State, 33 id. 348, 350, 14 So. 841, semble (same); 1896, Lester v. State, 37 id. 382, 20 So. 232 (as showing that "the deceased was shot while he was in the act of endeavoring to carry out the threat"); 1903, Fields v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 185 (threats, and the habit of going armed, admissible, where there is "doubt as to who began the difficulty"); Georgia: 1846, Reynolds v. State, 1 Kelly, 222, 230, semble (admitting evidence that the deceased had armed himself just before the affray); 1848, Monroe v. State, 5 Ga. 85, 138, semble (self-defence; admitted to show "the state of feeling of the parties towards each other at the time of the act"); 1855, Haynes v. State, 17 id. 465, 482 (self-defence; "It is important to ascertain the temper and conduct of the parties, to determine who was most likely to have brought about the emergency"; admitting

§ 112. Testamentary and Contractual Plans and Intentions. Where the issue is whether a will was executed, or whether a will was revoked, or threats); 1855, Keener v. State, 18 id. 194, 224, 228 (admitting evidence of threats to show the deceased's "evil intent" in going to where the defendant was; "remoteness or nearness of time" is immaterial as to admissibility); 1858, Hawkins v. State, 25 id. 207, 210 (the deceased's prior design to kill the defendant, excluded, the deceased being unarmed at the time of the killing); 1859, Lingo v. State, 29 id. 470, 483 (the doctrine ignored); 1869, Hoye v. State, 39 id. 718, 722 (Keener's Case held not applicable, as the deceased was unarmed at the time of the killing; prior threats excluded); 1871, Pound v. State, 43 id. 88, 129 (what the deceased said when taking an axe to the field; admissible according to circumstances); 1873, Peterson v. State, 50 id. 142 (recognizing Keener's Case, but regarding it as not to be extended); 1891, Vaughn v. State, 88 id. 731, 736, 16 S. E. 64 (excluded, where there was no hostile conduct at the time; the defendant's unsworn statement not sufficient to lay this foundation); 1892, May v. State, 90 id. 793, 797, 17 S. E. 108 (admitted where the aggressor was in doubt, Keener's Case approved; Vaughan's Case distinguished); 1893, Pittman v. State, 92 id. 480, 17 S. E. 856 (preceding case approved); Illinois: 1850, Campbell v. People, 16 Ill. 1 (admitted as furnishing "a reasonable inference that the deceased sought the defendant for the purpose of executing those threats"); 1870, Williams v. People, 54 id. 422, 426 (admitted); 1892, Siebert v. People, 143 id. 571, 590, 32 N. E. 431 (approving Campbell v. People); Indian Terr.: 1899, Helms v. U. S., — Ind. T. —, 52 S. W. 60 (deceased's hostile feelings, admissible, if self-defence is in issue); Indiana: 1871, Holler v. State, 37 Ind. 57, 60; 1881, Combs v. State, 75 id. 217 ("they supply grounds for an inference that the deceased was the assailant"); 1891, Bowlus v. State, 130 id. 227, 229, 28 N. E. 1115 (no rule particularized); 1898, Ellis v. State, 152 id. 326, 52 N. E. 82 (excluded here because there had been no aggression on the defendant); Iowa: 1875, State v. Woodson, 41 Ia. 428 (left undecided); 1876, State v. Maloy, 44 id. 104, 114 (excluded under the other principle, without noticing the present one); 1877, State v. Elliott, 45 id. 490 (excluded, unless, semble, the question of self-defence is in issue); Kansas: 1879, State v. Brown, 22 Kan. 222 (admissible when the question of aggression is "in any manner of doubt," or to corroborate communicated threats); 1880, State v. Scott, 24 id. 68, 70 (approving State v. Brown); 1890, State v. Spendlove, 44 id. 1, 24 Pac. 67 (same); Kentucky: 1855, Cornelius v. Com., 15 B. Mour. 539, 546 (admissible because "his intention to make an attack on the accused was an important matter, as well as the belief of the existence of such an intention"; also to corroborate the testimony as to communicated threats); 1890, Sparks v. Com., 89 Ky. 644, 20 S. W. 167 (threats by deceased showing his plan of aggression, admitted); 1897, Young v. Com., — id. —, 42 S. W. 1141 (threats admitted); 1897, Tudor v. Com., — id. —, 43 S. W. 187 (doctrine conceded; but where the defendant interfered in a fight between deceased and T., the deceased's threats against D. were excluded); 1901, Hollingsworth v. Warnock, — id. —, 65 S. W. 163 (here excluded as too general); Louisiana: 1851, State v. Bradley, 6 La. An. 554, 560 (excluding the evidence as an attempt at a plea of justification); 1869, State v. Gregor, 21 id. 473, 475 (excluded, but this principle not considered); 1878, State v. Ryan, 30 id. 1177 (excluded; no reason given); 1881, State v. Fisher, 33 id. 1344 (same); 1888, State v. Williams, 40 id. 168, 170, 3 So. 629 (citing decisions in other jurisdictions, but not the above cases, and admitting the evidence as "corroborating the evidence as to the communicated threats," and "establishing the purpose with which the deceased provoked the rencontre," and "confirming the reality of the danger" apprehended by the defendant); 1892, State v. Walsh, 44 id. 1122, 1131, 11 So. 811 (the trial Court's recital as to whether a foundation was laid is conclusive); 1893, State v. Harris, 45 id. 842, 845, 13 So. 199 (the rule of the preceding case recognized); 1893, State v. Depass, 45 id. 1151, 1152, 14 So. 77 (excluded, because the defendant's aggression was clear; no preceding case cited); 1895, State v. King, 47 id. 28, 16 So. 566 (threats offered to show merely "who was the aggressor," excluded, the matter being treated as governed by the overt-act rule of communicated threats, post, § 247, and the Williams Cases not being cited); 1896, State v. Compagnet, 48 id. 1470, 21 So. 46 (admitted, under the overt-act rule, semble); 1897, State v. Pruett, 49 id. 283, 21 So. 842 (see § 247, post); 1903, State v. Harrison, 111 La. —, 35 So. 560 ("some hostile demonstration" must be shown); Maryland: 1880, Turpin v. State, 55 Md. 462, 473, semble (admissible only in case of doubt as to the aggressor); Michigan: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 15 (excluded; obscure); 1878, People v. Lilly, 38 id. 277 (preceding deportment admitted as indicating his deportment at the time of the affray); Brownell v. People, ib. 736 semble (same); 1893, People v. Palmer, 96 id. 580 (admissible; no limitations stated); 1895, People v. Palmer, 105 id. 568, 63 N. W. 656 (similar); Minnesota: 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 449 (uncommunicated threats excluded; the present principle not considered); Mississippi: 1859, Newcomb v. State, 37 Miss. 383, 400, 404 (uncommunicated threats, excluded, but the present principle not considered); 1877, Johnson v. State, 54 id. 430 (the whole subject reviewed in the light of the Wiggin's Case, U. S., infra, and the evidence held admissible only where there is doubt as to who was the aggressor, i. e. ordinarily, when there are no witnesses to the act, but not even then, if a lying-in-wait otherwise appears; the opinion of Chalmers, J., is one of the best on the subject); 1877, Holly v. State, 55 id. 424, 428 (citing no precedents, and apparently apply-whether a will was made to have a certain tenor or provision (as where an alteration is at issue), the plan or design or prior intention of the testator ing the same rule as for communicated threats, q. v., in § 247, post); Kendrick v. State, ib. 436, 450 (approving Johnson's Case, and applying the same rule, though with a rider admitting such evidence where "peculiar circumstances" demand it); 1885, Moriarty v. State, 62 id. 654, 661 (applying the same rule, apparently, as in the case of communicated threats, q. v., in § 247, post); 1896, Prine v. State, 73 id. 838, 19 So. 711 (admitted, under the rule of Johnson's Case); Missouri: 1871, State v. Sloan, 47 Mo. 604, 609 (admitted, in effect overruling McMillen v. State, 1850, 13 id. 30); 1876, State v. Elkins, 63 id. 159, 164 (admitted in doubtful cases, where the issue is self-defence); 1877, State v. Taylor, 64 id. 358, 361 (excluded, because no question of self-defence arose); State v. Brown, ib. 367, 375 (admitted); 1877, State v. Alexander, 66 id. 148, 161 (admissible where there is "evidence tending to show" the deceased to be the aggressor; "unless an attempt be made to execute the threat," it is irrelevant); 1879, State v. Guy, 69 id. 435 (excluded; obscure); 1882, State v. Eaton, 75 id. 586, 590 (admitted, semble); 1885, State v. McNally, 87 id. 650 (threats received); 1886, State v. Rider, 90 id. 54, 60, 1 S. W. 825 (admitting threats without restriction, to determine who was the assailant, but pointing out that they constitute no legal justification without an overt act); 1888, State v. Rider, 95 id. 476, 484, 8 S. W. 723 (threats apparently usable to show whether the deceased did make the first assault, and the requirement that there must be other evidence of aggression apparently repudiated); 1897, State v. Thomas, 138 id. 168, 39 S. W. 459, semble (inadmissible, where no other evidence of aggression is offered); 1898, State v. Hopper, 142 id. 478, 44 S. W. 272 (the vagueness of the threat held here to affect its weight only); 1901, State v. Smith, 164 id. 567, 65 S. W. 270 (admissible only "in case the evidence leaves a doubt as to whether the defendant or the deceased was the aggressor"); Montana: 1901, State v. Shadwell, 26 Mont. 52, 66 Pac. 508 (threats held admissible; overt-act rule defined in detail); 1903, State v. Felker, 27 id. 451, 71 Pac. 668 (prior threats admitted; no definite rule stated); New Jersey: 1824, State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 237 (excluded; the point apparently not considered); New York: 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174 (see quotation supra); North Carolina: 1877, State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 479 (admitted as tending to show prior attack, the evidence being wholly circumstantial; also as corroborating communicated threats); 1882, State v. Skidmore, 87 id. 509, 511, 512 (mayhem; self-defence in issue; threats of the prosecutor, two weeks before, excluded; citing only State v. Norton, ante, § 105); 1897, State v. Byrd, 121 id. 684, 28 S. E. 353 (admissible only where the evidence of the killing is wholly circumstantial; opinion obscure); Ohio: 1850, Stewart v. State, 19 Oh. 302 (admitted); Oregon: 1894, State v. Tarter, 26 Or. 38, 41, 37 Pac. 53 (admissible where self-defence is in issue; also to corroborate communicated threats; also where the aggressor is doubtful on the evidence); Pennsylvania: 1881, Nevling v. Com., 98 Pa. 322, 337 (point not raised); South Carolina: 1890, State v. Bodie, 33 S. C. 130, 11 S. E. 624 ("there may be cases in which uncommunicated threats might be competent"); 1895, State v. Faile, 43 id. 52, 20 S. E. 798 (admissible; but, semble there must be other evidence of the deceased's aggression); Tennessee: 1846, Copeland v. State, 7 Humph. 479, 495 (the deceased's threats were treated by the Court as throwing light on the question of her aggressior; no objection of law had been raised); 1872, Williams v. State, 3 Heisk. 376, 396 (the deceased's threats were treated as indicating that he was the aggressor; no objection of law having been made); United States: 1876, Wiggins v. Utah, 93 U. S. 465 (the question who fired the first shot being in dispute, held that on the evidence the trial judge improperly treated the defendant's aggression as being beyond doubt, and therefore wrongly excluded the evidence of the threats of the deceased; Clifford, J., dissents, apparently only because there was no evidence rendering the defendant's aggression doubtful); 1895, Allison v. U. S., 160 id. 203, 16 Sup. 252 (admissible where there is a doubt); Vermont: 1847, State v. Goodrich, 19 Vt. 116, 120, semble (self-defence; a declaration of the injured person, while on his way to the defendant's house, that he wanted some powder to blow it up, admitted); Washington: 1888, White v. Terr., 3 Wash. T. 397, 403, 19 Pac. 37 ("admissible in all cases, whether or not the deceased was the first assailant and whether or not the deceased" made a demonstration at the time of the killing); 1896, State v. Cushing, 14 Wash. 527, 45 Pac. 45 (approving the preceding); 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 id. 544, 50 Pac. 512, semble (excluded); West Virginia: 1875, State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 743 (admissible to show the deceased's state of mind, but only after communicated threats have been shown); 1889, State v. Evans, 33 id. 417, 425, 10 S. E. 792 (same).

The prosecution may of course rebut the evidence of threats by counter-testimony of the deceased's peaceful plans: 1880, People v. Cariton, 57 Cal. 83, 85; 1891, People v. Powell, 87 id. 348, 362, 25 Pac. 481 (the deceased's declarations that he had no arms; his habit of not carrying them; and his refusal to carry them, excluded); 1899, State v. Chaffin, 56 S. C. 431, 33 S. E. 454 (deceased's expressions negativing hostile intent, admissible in rebuttal). It would seem also that, whenever the deceased's aggression is in issue, the prosecution could begin with its evidence of peaceful plans.

There may be sundry other cases in which the threats of a deceased person would be relevant apart from the present doctrine; e. g.: 1854, Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray 339 (where the defendis relevant to show the doing or not doing of this alleged act, as of any other act. The argument is, "Because he planned to make a will, or planned to revoke a will, or planned to will property to A, therefore he probably carried out this plan." The relevancy of such a plan is well established:

1851, Lord Campbell, C. J., in Doe v. Palmer, 16 Q. B. 747 (issue whether an alteration in a will was made by the testator before or after execution): "[We may consider] whether if in a will which is not in the handwriting of the testator an alteration appears, evidence might be received of previous declarations by him that he intended to dispose of the property in the manner in which it is disposed of by the will in its altered form. If the draft of the will could be produced, corresponding with the will in its altered form, would it not be admissible evidence, and might not the jury infer from it that before the will was executed the draft and the will had been compared and the mistake rectified? Would not written or verbal instructions from the testator to his solicitor to draw the will in the altered form be equally admissible? In what respect do such verbal instructions differ, for this purpose, from a contemporaneous declaration by the testator to another person that he had determined in his will to dispose of his property in the manner carried into effect by the will as altered? . . . It would not be very creditable to the law if such evidence were to be excluded, as a legal inference might be fairly drawn from it respecting the priority of two events, that is to say, the making of the alteration and the execution of the will, and I am not aware of any principle, rule of law, decided case, or dictum against the admissibility of such evidence. . . . They demonstrate that the alteration is not an afterthought."

1876, Jessel, M. R., in Sugden v. St. Leonards, L. R. 1 P. D. 154 (admitting ante-testamentary declarations of a lost will's provisions): "It is not strictly evidence of the contents of the instruments; it is only evidence of the intention of the person who afterwards executes the instrument. . . . simply evidence of probability, — no doubt of a high degree of probability in some cases, and of a low degree of probability in others. The cogency of the evidence depends very much on the nearness in point of time of the declaration of intention to the period of the execution of the document"; Mellish, L. J.: "The declarations of the testator as to what he intended to put in his will, made either contemporaneously with or prior to the execution of his will, are obviously evidence which may corroborate the other testimony as to what is contained in the will, . . . because it is more probable that the testator has than that he has not made a particular devise or a particular bequest when he has told a person previously that he intended to make it, inasmuch as it shows that he had it in his mind to make such a will at the time he made that declaration."[1] ant claimed to have done the killing under an insane delusion that the deceased was conspiring against him, the deceased's uncommunicated hostile expressions were admitted for the State, to show that there was real ground for the defendant's feeling and that it was no insane delusion); compare § 231, post.

[1] Accord: 1873, Keen v. Keen, L. R. 3 P. & D. 107 (Hannen, J.: "[A statement by the testator as to his alteration of mind tends to show] intention, from which the fact of destruction may be inferred, there being other circumstances leading to the same conclusion"); 1877, Dench v. Dench, L. R. 2 P. D. 60, 64 (to determine whether an alteration favoring H. D. was made before execution, prior declarations in H. D.'s favor were received); 1880, Gould v. Lakes, L. R. 6 P. D. 1 (Hannen, J.: "In considering whether or no several pieces of paper constitute the will, evidence would be admissible to show that it was the intention of the testator to make dispositions in conformity with those which are found upon the several sheets of paper. . . . The question of law would not be different if the suggestion were that the first sheet was a forgery or an interpolation by somebody after the event"; following Sugden v. St. Leonards); 1855, Davis v. Rogers, 1 Houst. 44, 74, 93 (the testator was said to be blind, and his intelligent execution was denied; his previous expressions of intention, instructions, and depositions, admitted to show his state of mind when signing); 1883, Hoppe v. Byers, 60 Md. 393 (intention before the execution of a will to make one of a certain tenor, held admissible to show that a document offered as a will is genuine and not forged, when other evidence of genuineness is also offered; following Sugden v. St. Leonards, and Gould v. Lakes); 1862, Converse v. Allen, 4 All. 512 (to show that the omission as legatees

Two other principles are to be discriminated. (1) The admissibility of the expressions or utterances themselves, to evidence the testator's plan, under an exception to the Hearsay rule, is well established, but raises a different question; the distinction between the various hearsay kinds of ante- and post-testamentary declarations is elsewhere discussed, with a survey of the subject (post, §§ 1734–1740). (2) The relevancy of one mental condition to show a later or earlier one is elsewhere treated (post, §§ 233, 241).

The same principle which admits a testator's designs as to a will serves also to admit the design of a person to make a gift[2] or to execute a contract.[3] Here, however, the usual source of difficulty is the use of particular instances of conduct to evidence this design or plan (post, §§ 238, 371, 377).

§ 113. Plans of Suicide by the Deceased, in a charge of Homicide. Where on a charge of homicide the defence offers the hypothesis of suicide to explain the death of the person whose killing is charged, one of the relevant pieces of evidence to show the suicide is a plan of suicide. This fact, however, has been sometimes excluded, not because irrelevant, but because a certain quantity of other evidence of suicide may be required before this can be received. This requirement is elsewhere discussed (post, § 138).

Sub-topic E: EMOTION OR MOTIVE.

§ 117. General Principle. The term "motive" is commonly used in a confusing way, as if there were but one thing and one evidential question inof children born illegitimate, was not accidental, previous declarations of intention were admitted; Bigelow, C. J.: "They tended to prove that [the testator] had then a fixed design in regard to the disposition of the estate, by which the appellants would be excluded from any share therein"); 1900, Wilton v. Humphreys, 176 Mass. 253, 57 N. E. 374 (whether a marginal addition to a codicil in different ink, the codicil reciting a part of the prior will, was there before execution; the testator's oral statement of the terms of the part thus recited, made two weeks before, held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion, the will itself being in the testator's possession at the time of executing the codicil, and the prior declaration being therefore of little value on the facts); 1892, Hope's Appeal, 48 Mich. 520, 12 N. W. 682 (former intentions to change an existing will, admitted as bearing on the execution of an alleged later will); 1897, Gordon v. Burris, 141 Mo. 602, 43 S. W. 642 (undue influence; the devisees' plan to prevent the testatrix from leaving property to the plaintiff, admitted); 1896, Gardner v. Gardner, 177 Pa. 218, 35 Atl. 558 (testator's plan admitted, as pointing to non-revocation); 1899, Swope v. Donnelly, 190 Pa. 417, 42 Atl. 882 (genuineness of a will; declarations of testamentary intentions at various preceding times, excluded as too vague; opinion ill-considered); 1879, Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 80 (testator's declarations admitted, on the question of a will's genuineness).

[2] 1846, Powell v. Olds, 9 Ala. 861, 864 (intention as to the nature of a gift afterwards made, admitted); 1899, Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791 (whether a deed was given on a certain condition in view of death; grantor's intention held relevant); 1886, Woodcock v. Johnson, 36 Minn. 217, 219 (issue whether a deed was forged; the fact "that he had previously directed the deed to be prepared precisely as it was executed, and with intent to execute it, would add probability to the testimony of those witnesses who testified that he directed his name to be signed to the deed"); 1898, Fellows v. Fellows, 69 N. H. 339, 46 Atl. 474 (whether a discharge was executed by a bondholder; his declarations of intention to do so, admitted). Compare the verbal act rule, post, § 1777.

[3] 1862, Kumler v. Ferguson, 7 Minn. 442 (to show the consideration actually paid, the preceding negotiations admitted); 1899, Aikin v. Oil Co., 189 Pa. 39, 41 Atl. 997 (terms of a contract; promise to sign a contract with certain terms, admitted); 1877, Torrey v. Nixon, 43 Wis. 142 (oral lease; dispute whether it was to P. or to N.; an unexecuted written lease to P., admitted as showing the probabilities). Contra: 1878, Richardson v. Robbins, 124 Mass. 105 ("previous talk of the parties," excluded to prove terms of a lost deed). Compare the use of value as showing a motive for the price of a sale (post, § 391).

The parol evidence rule (post, § 2430) would of course exclude prior negotiations when offered in competition with the terms of an existing document, and not, as here, to show what the terms of a lost document are.

volved. But there are two things, and two distinct evidential steps. (1) We may argue, first, that since a specific emotion or passion is likely to lead to the doing of the appropriate act — for example, desire for money to theft or robbery, or angry hostility to an act of violence —, the presence of such an emotion in the person in question is likely to lead to the deed in question. In this step of the argument we assume the emotion as a fact, proved somehow or other. Just as a specific sort of disposition, of habit, of plan, is likely to lead to the appropriate act, so a specific sort of emotion or passion has a similar evidential bearing. The basis of this inference is the living, impelling, active emotion, seeking for an outlet in volition. (1) But this emotion must in its turn be proved, — just as character, design, capacity, must be proved. This is the next step, and evidentially a very different one. Usually the evidence is circumstantial; and of two sorts, (a) conduct of the person, and (b) events about him tending to excite the emotion. In (a) his conduct is the expression and effect of the existing internal emotion. In (b) the outward facts are such as may be the stimulus and cause of the emotion. But what conduct and what outer events are of value as showing the probable existence of the emotion is a different question from the relevancy of the emotion to show the probability of an act induced for it. The latter (which is the present subject) raises practically no evidential disputes; the former raises a host of them (post, §§ 385–406).

The unfortunate ambiguity in the word "motive" thus reveals itself. That which has value to show the doing or not doing of the act is the inward emotion, passion, feeling, of the appropriate sort; but that which shows the probable existence of this emotion is termed — when it is of the sort (b) above, i. e. some outer fact — the "motive." For example, the prosecution of A by B in a suit at law may be said to have been a "motive" for A's subsequent burning of B's house. But in strictness the external fact of B's suit cannot be A's "motive"; for the motive is a state of mind of A; the external fact does tend to show the excitement of the hostile and vindictive emotion, but it is not identical with that emotion. This use of the word "motive" thus tends to obscure the double evidential step involved; for when it is said that B's suit may be offered in evidence as the "motive" for A's burning, we are apt to conceive ourselves as inferring directly from the suit (as the evidentiary fact) to the burning (as the proposition to be proved); when in truth there are two steps involved, — from the lawsuit to the emotion, and the emotion to the act. Although the evidential questions connected with the latter inference are practically none, nevertheless the true nature of the evidentiary questions connected with the former inference is much obscured when we fail to understand clearly what it is that we are trying to infer. Thus, the question of relevancy in the above illustration is, whether the fact of a lawsuit is of real probative value to show the probable excitement of a violently vindictive desire to destroy the opponent's property, and this inference may not be an admissible one. It ought, therefore, to be clearly understood that the "motive," in the correct sense, is the emotion supposed to have led to the act, and that the external fact is merely the possible exciting cause of this "motive," and not identical with the "motive" itself; and the evidentiary question is, not whether that external fact is admissible as a motive, but whether it is admissible to show the probable existence of the emotion or "motive." It would be more conducive to clearness of thought if the word "motive," so misleading in its popular associations, could be abandoned altogether in discussing evidential questions.

§ 118. Motive always Relevant, but never Essential. (1) Conceiving an emotion, then, as a circumstance showing the probability of appropriate ensuing action, it is always relevant:

1868, Woodruff, J., in Kennedy v. People, 39 N. Y. 245, 254: "It is always a just argument on behalf of one accused that there is no apparent motive to the perpetration of the crime. Men do not act wholly without motive. On the other hand, proof of motive tends in some degree to render the act so far probable as to weaken presumptions of innocence and corroborate evidences of guilt."

1897, Dale, C. J., in Son v. Terr., 5 Okl. 526, 49 Pac. 923: "Motive to commit crime, if shown, may in many cases be sufficient alone, almost, to induce a belief of guilt. Upon the other hand, where no motive for the commission of a crime can be shown it is almost impossible to convince the mind of guilt. Men do not ordinarily commit grave crimes unless there is in their minds a motive strong enough to overcome the natural repugnance against crime, and the fear of punishment which usually follows detection. This view of this question is so universally recognized as being true that it has become incorporated into the law, and in almost all cases where the guilt of a defendant depends upon the facts and circumstances in proof in the case the Court instructs the jury to consider the motive or lack of motive which the proof shows may or may not exist in the mind of a defendant on trial charged with crime."

All the questions of relevancy, then, can be, and should be for simplicity's sake, resolved into questions of the relevancy of evidence of this emotion. Thus, the relevancy of an intrigue by an alleged wife-murderer with a paramour raises the question, not whether lust is a sufficient emotion for murder, but whether the intrigue was a sufficient circumstance to excite a murderous impulse or emotion.

(2) It is sometimes popularly supposed that in order to establish a charge of crime, the prosecution must show a possible motive. But this notion is without foundation. Assuming for purposes of argument that "every act must have a motive," i. e. an impelling emotion (which is not strictly correct), yet it is always possible that this necessary emotion may be undiscoverable, and thus the failure to discover it does not signify its non-existence. The kinds of evidence to prove an act vary in probative strength, and the absence of one kind may be more significant than the absence of another; but the mere absence of any one kind cannot be fatal. There must have been a plan to do the act (we may assume); the accused must have been present (assuming it was done by manual action); but there may be no evidence of preparation; or there may be no evidence of presence; yet the remaining facts may furnish ample proof. The failure to produce evidence of some appropriate motive may be a great weakness in the whole body of proof;[1] but it is not a fatal one, as a matter of law. In other words, there is no more necessity, in the law of evidence, to discover and establish the particular exciting emotion, or some possible one, than to use any other particular kind of evidential fact:

1894, Harlan, J., in Pointer v. U. S., 151 U. S. 396, 413, 14 Sup. 410, approving the following charge by Parker, J.: "'The law does not require impossibilities. The law recognizes that the cause of the killing is sometimes so hidden in the mind and breast of the party who killed that it cannot be fathomed; and, as it does not require impossibilities, it does not require the jury to find it. Yet, if they do find it, it simply becomes an item of evidence in the case, which is only evidentiary at best, — that is, it is only an item of evidence going to show whether a particular party may have committed an act, and sometimes going to show the characteristics of that act.' It is not indispensable to conviction that the particular motive for taking the life of a human being shall be established by proof to the satisfaction of the jury. The absence of evidence suggesting a motive for the commission of the crime charged is a circumstance in favor of the accused, to be given such weight as the jury deems proper; but proof of motive is never indispensable to conviction."

1902, Prentice, J., in State v. Rathbun, 74 Conn. 524, 51 Atl. 540: "The State was under no obligation to show a motive for the commission by the accused of the crime charged, much less a sufficient or adequate one. While it is a recognized rule of human conduct that crime is the response of the evil mind to some temptation, and that men of sound mind are rarely, if ever, prompted to commit crime without some impelling motive, it does not follow, and it is not the law, that the prosecution, to justify a conviction in a given case, must be so successful in fathoming the mysteries of the human mind and in revealing the possibly hidden secrets influencing it as to develop and disclose to the jury a motive sufficient and adequate for the commission of the offence. Recognizing the fact that crimes are generally committed from some motive, evidence tending to show the existence or non-existence of such motive is held to be admissible, and often forms an important factor in the inquiry as to the guilt or innocence of an accused. For the purpose of this evidential inquiry the sufficiency of the motive is most pertinent. It is pertinent, however, only in so far as it tends to furnish evidence indicative of guilt, or the reverse, to be considered and weighed in connection with the other evidence in the case. The other evidence may be such as to justify a conviction without any motive being shown. It may be so weak that, without a disclosed motive, the guilt of the accused would be clouded by a reasonable doubt."[2]

(3) An emotion may impel against as well as towards an act. Thus, a defendant's strong feelings of affection for a deceased person would work against the doing of violence upon him, and would thus be relevant to show the not-doing. This is also the significance of evidence that there was "no apparent motive" for a murder; for a state of emotional indifference — i. e. the absence of any anger, jealousy, or the like — is almost equally powerful in its operation against a deed of violence.[3] Sometimes, of course, such evidence merely negatives an alleged murderous emotion, or negatives the tacit possibility of it; but there is also this affirmative

[1] 1898, State v. Foley, 144 Mo. 600, 46 S. W. 733.

[2] Accord: 1900, Brunson v. State, 124 Ala. 37, 27 So. 410; 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75; 1900, State v. Lucey, 24 Mont. 295, 61 Pac. 994; 1885, State v. Green, 92 N. C. 779, 782; 1877, Lanahan v. Com., 84 Pa. 80, 87.

[3] 1861, People v. Ah Fung, 17 Cal. 377; and the quotations supra.

aspect to the argument, namely, that emotional indifference makes against crimes.

(4) Where the doing of the act is conceded, and the dispute turns on an issue such as self-defence, there is in strictness no materiality for evidence which tends merely to prove the doing of the act, and, in particular, there is no evidential function remaining for the fact of emotion or motive. It does not necessarily follow that in criminal cases all such evidence should be excluded; for there are no pleadings to make clear what is conceded and what is not, and it is possible that the defence would improperly take advantage of the apparent failure of proof of the act. It has occasionally been said that the superfluousness of the evidence, and the possible unnecessary prejudice it might create against the defendant, require its exclusion;[4] but this seems an unwise rule.

§ 119. "Motive" as a Fact in Issue. In the proper sense of "emotion," a "motive" can seldom be a fact in issue under the substantive law. But in some of its loose popular senses, "motive" is frequently in issue, and these uses must be distinguished from the evidentiary use of emotion or "motive" as tending to prove the doing of an act. (1) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of good or bad faith; as where the motive of a transfer is charged to have been in fraud of creditors. (2) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of purpose aimed at in an act — a sense not materially different from the preceding one. (3) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of reason or ground for conduct; as where the motive of a wife for leaving her husband is disputed, or of employees for leaving their employer. (4) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of malice or criminal intent. The modes of evidencing these various states of mind are elsewhere dealt with (post, §§ 244–406).

[4] 1895, People v. Gress, 107 Cal. 461, 40 Pac. 752 (that the accused had endeavored to seduce the deceased's wife).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT.

TOPIC II: CONCOMITANT EVIDENCE (OPPORTUNITY, ALIBI, ETC.).

CHAPTER VII.

§ 130. General Principle. It has already been noted (§ 43), that convenience requires the grouping of the various kinds of evidentiary facts according as they come, in time, before, at, or after the act to be evidenced. The various facts of the first or Prospectant class have been examined (ante, §§ 51–119). The second or Concomitant class may now be considered. There is no radical distinction between the classes; they serve as convenient ways of subdividing the great mass of evidentiary facts and of associating those which are most closely related.

A fact having a Concomitant indication is one which is thought of as being in existence at the time of and in connection with the act to be proved; the logical indication or inference is that the person bearing that fact as a mark is thereby to be associated more or less closely with the act. There is a negative as well as an affirmative form of inference; the two being related much in the same way as good character (ante, § 55) points forward to the non-doing of a crime, while bad character points forward to its doing. In the Concomitant inference, there is the affirmative form, e. g. X was at the place of the murder, therefore he may have committed it; and the negative form, e. g. X was at a different place at the time of the murder, therefore he did not commit it. The theory of the former is that the fact of presence at the time is more or less intimately and necessarily associated with the doing of the act; the theory of the latter is that the fact of absence at the time is more or less certainly inconsistent with the doing of the act. Under each form of argument, there are opportunities for explaining away by other hypotheses the significance of the evidentiary fact, on the general theory of Explanation (ante, § 34).

So far as the scope of evidentiary facts is concerned (where the doing of a given act is disputed), the present class usually comprises a great number of circumstances in the ordinary trial; but the occasions for laying down rules of evidence are comparatively few. Interesting illustrations from celebrated trials might be multiplied almost without number. But the present purpose is merely to examine such rules of limitation as may have been prescribed by the Courts.

A. Opportunity.

§ 131. Nature of the Argument. When an act is done, and a particular person is alleged to have done it (not through an agent but personally), it is obvious that his physical presence, within a proper range of time and place, forms one step on the way to the belief that he did it. It is true that another person may have done it, but the former is at least within the limited number of persons who could have done it, and thus is fit to become a subject for further investigation. Under the evidential canon that to a fair extent the possibility of other hypotheses must be first excluded (ante, § 31), it might be asked whether the mere possibility involved in Opportunity is not too slender, whether something more than mere opportunity, — for example, exclusive opportunity — should not first be shown. The answer to this is that, by the very showing of an opportunity, countless hypotheses are negatived; and the person charged, who might otherwise have been one of innumerable other persons at the time, is shown to have been one of the limited number who are in a position to do this particular act. In short, opportunity alone, and not exclusive opportunity, is a sufficient showing for admissibility. The circumstances involving Opportunity will of course vary with the facts of each case; and no rule of evidence seems to have been laid down. That the offer involves incidentally the doing of another crime by the defendant does not affect its propriety.[1] Since the showing of Opportunity leaves open all the hypotheses of other persons' equal opportunity, it is proper for the proponent of the evidence to strengthen it by cutting off, so far as possible, these other hypotheses, i. e. by showing that the person charged was one of a few only, or the sole person, having the opportunity. In other words, while the proponent need not, he may always show exclusive opportunity.[2]

§ 132. Explaining away; Equal Opportunity for others. If A is shown

[1] 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 196, 211 (indictment for placing an obstruction, viz. two stones, on a railroad track; evidence of the placing of iron rails on the track by the defendant not far away and within two hours of the placing in issue, admitted to show that the defendant was "in a situation to place the obstructions on the track"). For the authorities upon the general principle that the incidental use of other crimes is immaterial, see post, § 216.

[2] 1897, People v. Van Horn, 119 Cal. 323, 51 Pac. 538 (murder by an officer of an arrested person; defence, that a mob took the man from the defendant and killed him; the region being sparsely settled, the prosecution was allowed to show, in disproving the mob-story, that various persons living in the region were not near the place at the time in question); 1866, Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 466 (the prosecution showed that no other persons of the description of the robbers, except the defendants, were in the neighborhood at the time in question). The following ruling seems to ignore this perfectly accepted principle: 1878, State v. England, 78 N. C. 552 (evidence that tracks did not fit the defendant's brother's foot, excluded; "A did not commit the offence, therefore B did," held an unsound argument; misled by the rulings of the same Court post, § 142).

to have been in a building when a murder was committed, he immediately becomes — so to speak — an eligible person for the charge; he may have done the deed. If, now, admitting this fact, i. e. opportunity, he seeks to diminish its probative significance, an effective and usual way will be to show that there were in the same building, at the same time, two or ten or five hundred other persons. In so doing, he has pointed out the possibility of two or ten or five hundred other hypotheses, equally possible with that charged against him. The equal strength of these other hypotheses (as noted ante, § 34, in dealing with the logical theory of relevancy) takes away the significance of the fact of his opportunity, just in proportion to the number and degree of naturalness of the other hypotheses, — i. e. the hypotheses that each of the other persons had an equal opportunity. Such is the principle of explaining away Opportunity. Moreover, as counter-explanations which equally satisfy the evidentiary fact may always be offered, and without limit, there is no restriction on proving the presence of other persons having the same or approximate opportunities, — a principle will be seen (post, § 139) to be of much consequence. The practical employment of this method of weakening the proponent's evidence of Opportunity is frequent enough; but it seldom calls for judicial ruling.[1]

§ 133. Same: Other Intercourse with Complainant in Bastardy, Seduction, or Rape. On this principle it is permissible to show, in a filiation suit or bastardy prosecution, that the mother had intercourse with another man about the time designated by the period of gestation, for this predicates an equal possibility of conception through some one else's act;[1] and it would seem

[1] 1847, Pollard v. Lively, 4 Gratt. 73, 77 (to show that there was a second person in existence named B. P., a deed executed by one B. P. and probated was received). The feasibility of self-infliction of harm seems to come under this principle: 1895, State v. Lee, 65 Conn. 265, 280, 30 Atl. 1110 (a showing that wound could have been self-inflicted, allowed); 1875, Hitchcock v. Burgett, 38 Mich. 504 (explaining a renewed injury by the plaintiff's negligent abandonment of splints and crutches, instead of the defendant's careless surgery). Sundry analogous cases: 1885, Quinn v. Higgins, 60 Wis. 667, 24 N. W. 482 (the non-union of bones in a fracture having been charged to the defendant's unskilful setting, evidence was admitted of non-union occurring through other causes than improper setting); 1852, Lush v. McDaniel, 13 Ired. 487 (to show that a warranty of soundness in a slave was not broken, evidence that the venereal disease affecting her was not known to exist in the region of the vendor's plantation but did exist in the region of the vendee's, 75 miles distant).

[1] Ill.: 1874, White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 264 (seduction; loss of service through pregnancy; intercourse with others admissible to show the defendant not the cause of the pregnancy); Ind.: 1841, Walker v. State, 6 Blackf. 1 ("about the time" of begetting); 1853, Hill v. State, 4 Ind. 112 (same); 1859, Townsend v. State, 13 Id. 357 ("a period of time that would render it not improbable"); 1880, Whitman v. State, 69 Id. 448 (extended to the woman's action for seduction, where pregnancy by the defendant would enter into the damages); 1883, Benham v. Richardson, 91 Id. 82 (admitted); Ia.: 1895, State v. Wickliff, 95 Ia. 386, 64 N. W. 283, (admitted); 1899, State v. Seevers, 108 Id. 738, 78 N. W. 705 (admissible if relating to period of gestation); Ky.: 1824, Ginn v. Com., 5 Litt. 300 ("about the same time she charges him"); Mass.: 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. 435, 439 (excluded, if "at any point of time more than ten calendar months before the birth of the child"; unless gestation is shown to have been unusually protracted); 1875, Sabins v. Jones, 119 Mass. 167, 170 (excluded, because not within the proper period); 1877, Force v. Martin, 122 Id. 5 (excluding the evidence because no time was stated); 1879, Ronan v. Dugan, 126 Id. 176 (same); Miss.: 1859, Anon., 37 Miss. 54, 58 (admitted); Nebr.: 1895, Stoppert v. Nierle, 45 Nebr. 105, 63 N. W. [illegible] ("at or near the time"); 1901, Erickson v. Sawmill, 62 Id. 368, 87 N. W. 166 (similar); 1902, Gatzmeyer v. Peterson, — Id. —, 94 N. W. 974 (cross-examination as to keeping company with other men, held not improperly excluded on the facts); N. Y.: 1890, Young v. Johnson, 123 N. Y. 226, 25 N. E. 363 (admitted; here the action was a civil one for rape, but pregnancy was laid as damage and that the mere fact of intimate association, or at least of improper familiarities, would be admissible, because this makes more possible the agency of some other man.[2] The time of the other intercourse should not be reckoned by any fixed rule.[3] But the issue of paternity must be involved. This is necessarily true of a filiation suit or bastardy prosecution, and also of a father's action for seduction where pregnancy is alleged as the cause of loss of service.[4] In a prosecution, however, for rape or adultery, paternity not being in issue, but merely the defendant's act of intercourse, the paternity and therefore the intercourse of another man is immaterial;[5] unless, indeed, the prosecution by inviting the issue, makes counter-evidence admissible (on the principle of § 15, ante).[6]

Certain other evidential uses of similar facts are here to be distingnished, such as the use of other acts of intercourse by a complainant in rape, to indicate her disposition or motive to consent (post, §§ 200, 402), and the use of particular instances of unchaste conduct to impeach the credit of a woman-witness (post, § 987); for both of these uses have their peculiar limitations, which may or may not in a given case be more favorable to admissibility than the preseut principle.

§ 134. Same: Adultery to show Illegitimacy. On the same principle, in an issue of illegitimacy, the wife's adultery would be evidential to show the proved as a fact); N. C. 1876, State v. Bennett, 75 N. C. 305 (excluded, Rodman, J.: "It would only tend to prove the physiological fact that two men may have connexion with a woman about the same time, and one of them get her with child: it would not tend to rebut the presumption that the defendant was the one"); 1878, State v. Britt, 78 id. 439, 442 (admitted, questioning the preceding case, but distinguishing it because here the defendant totally denied his own intercourse with the woman); 1880, State v. Parish, 83 id. 613 (without other evidence, "insufficient to overcome the statutory presumption [of the woman's oath], and by itself incompetent"); 1899, State v. Warren, 124 id. 807, 32 S. E. 552 (intercourse with the mother by a third person abont the time of begetting, admissible; conflict of previous cases examined); U. S.: 1809, U. S. v. Collins, 1 Cr. C. C. 592 (admissible, if "not more than twelve months nor less than six before the birth of the child"); Vt.: 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 512, 517, 523 (admitted); Va.: 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Munf. 495, 502, 505 (admissible, per Roane, J.; yet excluded, per Brook, J., since the defendant had admitted his own intercourse, — a clearly unsound ruling); Wis.: 1891, Humphrey v. State, 78 Wis. 571, 47 N. W. 836 (admitted).

[2] 1902, Kelly v. State, 133 Ala. 195, 32 So. 56; 1895 State v. Wickliff, 96 Ia. 386, 64 N. W. 283. Contra: 1877, Rawles v. Ford, 56 Ind. 433 (bastardy; the complainant's declarations of preference for another man, at the time of alleged intercourse, excluded); 1882, Houser v. State, 86 id. 23[illegible] (bastardy; that the complainant kept company with other men about the alleged time of intercourse, excluded).

[3] See the quotations in the note supra; the following case contains the best statement: Benham v. Richardson, Ind., supra, n. 1, Best, C. ("The limit within which this enquiry may be made, is not, however, settled. This must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. If conception is claimed to occur from a single act of coition the date of which is fixed, there is but little difficulty in determining the period within which this enquiry may be made; but if it follows three or four different acts of sexnal intercourse occurring at different times, and a fully developed child is born less than nine months thereafter, the enquiry ought to embrace a greater period of time, especially before the alleged acts of intercourse").

[4] Cases cited supra, n. 1.

[5] 1875, Com. v. O'Connor, 107 Mass. 219; 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 535.

[6] 1881, State v. Witham, supra; 1903, Knowles v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 72 S. W. 398 (admitted on a charge of rape under the age of consent, where offered to contradict the prosecutrix' testimony that the defendant was the father of her child; Brooks, J., diss.). Occasionally some other issue makes it relevant: 1850, Nugent v. State, 18 Ala. 521 (abuse of a child S. by an attempt to know carnally; the existence in S. of venereal disease and of bruises being shown, the defendant was allowed to offer evidence of intercourse with S. by others, as showing the possibility of others being the cause); 1898, People v. Craig, 116 Mich. 388, 74 N. W. 528 (carnal knowledge of minor while a member of family; intercourse of prosecutrix with others, admitted to account for pregnancy proved).

paternity of her child to be her paramour's. But this is forbidden, except on certain conditions, by the so-called presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527). The reason is that this fact does not actually prove the illegitimate paternity, but merely makes it possible or probable; and such an uncertainty of conclusion would be practically undesirable where an issue of inheritance is involved, especially in a country like England, where the interests of landed estates and the system of primogeniture were so important; while the paternity of an unmarried woman's child involves no such weighty considerations of general policy. Accordingly, the presumption of legitimacy forbids any investigation into the illegitimate paternity of a child born after marriage, except where the husband's non-access (post, § 137) during the period of gestation makes his paternity impossible, and thus the identity of the real father becomes a minor and corroborative fact only.

B. Essential Inconsistency.

§ 135. General Principle. It has been already pointed out (ante, § 130) that there is a negative form of the Concomitant inference, which is indeed, if not the more common, at least the more effective one. It may be termed the argument from Essential Inconsistency. Its usual theory is that a certain fact cannot coexist with the doing of the act in question, and, therefore, that if that fact is true of a person of whom the act is alleged, it is impossible that he should have done the act. The form sometimes varies from this statement; but its nature is the same in all forms. The inconsistency, to be conclusive in proof, must be essential, i. e. absolute and universal; but since, in offering evidence, we are not required to furnish demonstration but only fair ground for inference (ante, §§ 32, 38), the fact offered need not have this essential or absolute inconsistency, but merely a probable or presumable inconsistency; and its evidentiary strength will increase with its approach to absolute or essential inconsistency. There are five common cases of this form of the argument (though more are conceivable): 1. The absence of the person charged in another place (Alibi); 2. The absence of a husband (non-access), — a variety of the preceding; 3. The survival of an alleged deceased person after the supposed time of death; 4. The doing of a crime by a third person; and, 5. The self-infliction of the harm alleged, — resting on the same principle as the preceding instance.

§ 136. Alibi. The theory of an alibi is that the fact of presence elsewhere is essentially inconsistent with presence at the place and time alleged, and therefore with personal participation in the act. Thus, the evidentiary fact is a new affirmative proposition, considered as a factum probandum, though its logical operation is a negative one:

Ante 1726, Gilbert, C. B., Evidence, 145: "[The proof of an opponent] is not properly the proof of a negative, but the proof of the same proposition totally inconsistent with what is affirmed; . . . as if the defendant be charged with a trespass, . . . and if the fact be proved, he can only prove a proposition inconsistent with the charge, and that he was at another place at the time when the fact is supposed to be done, or the like."

1762, Foster, J., Crown Law, 3d ed. 368: "If it [alibi] appeareth to be founded in truth, it is the best negative evidence that can be offered. It is really positive evidence which in the nature of things necessarily implieth a negative."

1850, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 318; Bemis' Rep., 469: "When a fact has occurred, with a series of circumstances preceding, accompanying, and following it, we know that these must all have been once consistent with each other; otherwise the fact would not have been possible. Therefore, if any one fact necessary to the conclusion is wholly inconsistent with the hypothesis of the guilt of the accused, it breaks the chain of circumstantial evidence, upon which the inference depends; and, however plausible or apparently conclusive the other circumstances may be, the charge must fail. Of this character is the defence usually called an alibi; that is, that the accused was elsewhere at the time the offence is alleged to have been committed. If this is true, it being impossible that the accused could be in two places at the same time, it is a fact incousistent with that sought to be proved, and excludes its possibility." [1]

It is obvious that the alibi argument is relevant only for disproving personal participation (in a broad sense) in the act, and does not affect an alleged co-operation as principal ordering the act elsewhere by an agent. Just what modifications might be necessary in the alibi argument where action is predicated at a distance without an agent but through thought-transference may be left for determination until the practicability of such action is judicially accepted.

The only question of a rule of admissibility that seems to arise is whether the alibi must be such as absolutely to preclude the possibility of presence at the alleged time and place of the act. It is sometimes said that this much must be shown.[2] Such expressions, however, seem in truth to refer only to the weight of the alibi argument, by pointing out that it falls short of complete proof except on those conditions; they mean merely that without them the argument is valueless or less valuable, not that the evidence is inadmissible. If they were intended to mean anything more, they are clearly unsound,[3] and would exclude nine alibi arguments out of ten. Even as affecting the weight of the argument (with which we have in this place no concern), such statements seem erroneous; for an alibi may not involve absolute impossibility, but only high improbability, and yet be convincing. The matter may be thus demonstrated. Suppose we are to argue that X's footprint near the house of a murder is evidentiary of his presence; no one would contend that in proving this fact as a factum probandum complete proof is necessary; any evidence that it is probably his footprint would be admissible. So, when the fact of X's presence elsewhere is offered in disproof of his participation any evidence rendering this fact probable is receivable.[4]

[1] Compare also Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. V, c. XVI, § 11 (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 112).

[2] 1873, Agnew, J., in Briceland v. Com., 74 Pa. 463, 469 ("When a defence rests on proof of an alibi, it must cover the time when the offence is shown to have been committed, so as to preclude the possibility of the prisoner's presence at the place of the murder; . . . for if it be possible that he could have been at both places, the proof of the alibi is valueless."

[3] Accord: 1879, Stuart v. People, 42 Mich. 255, 260, 3 N. W. 863; 1898, Ford v. State, 101 Tenn. 545, 47 S. W. 703.

[4] Thus all facts tending to show his presence elsewhere are admissible: 1894, State v. Delaney, 92 Ia. 467, 61 N. W. 189 (the defendant was in a room in a house; evidence admitted of the impossibility of passing to the street without waking other inmates).

There is no reason why, in proving the subsidiary fact of alibi, any different rule should be applied than is applied to the proof of other subsidiary facts. Thus, if X was at the other place one hour before the act, we argue that probably he was still there at the exact time, and hence that he could not have been at the place charged.[5] It may be added that the argument of alibi is not in theory confined to criminal acts, but may be equally applied to the disproof of civil acts, such as the execution of a deed.[6] Distinguish, as involving other principles, the evidential effect of the fabrication of an alibi (post, § 279), and the question of the burden of proving an alibi (post, § 2512).

§ 137. Non-access of Husband to show Illegitimacy. Since legitimacy of offspring implies a begetting by the husband, it would be relevant, in disproving legitimacy, to use his absence from the wife at the probable time of begetting as showing the impossibility of the act of begetting. For reasons of policy, however (already noted in § 134), it was long forbidden to employ this mode of proof, except in a very restricted form, namely, that the husband was not at the time infra quattuor maria. This doctrine has in modern times been much relaxed, if not entirely abandoned, so that the argument from non-access is now fully available. The scope of the doctrine is dealt with in connection with the presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527).

§ 138. Survival of the alleged Deceased. Where the corpus delicti is disputed, and, for example, in a charge of homicide the alleged deceased is claimed by the defendant not to have been killed, the argument is obviously available that he is still alive, or was alive after the time of the supposed death, for this would be absolutely inconsistent with his death as supposed:

1762, Foster, J., Crown Law, 3d ed., 367: "A is convicted upon circumstantial evidence, strong as that sort of evidence can be, of the murder of B. C is afterwards indicted as accessory to this murder; and it cometh out upon the trial by incontestable evidence that B is still living. Lord Hale somewhere mentioneth a case of this kind. Is C to be convicted or acquitted? The case is too plain to admit of a doubt."

1850, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295; Bemis' Rep. 269, 295, 475: "It may be as well to consider now as at any other time that ground of defence on the part of the prisoner which has been denominated — not perhaps with precise legal accuracy — an alibi; that is, that the deceased was seen elsewhere out of the Medical College after the time when (by the theory of the proof on the part of the prosecution) he is supposed to have lost his life at the Medical College. It is like the case of an alibi in this respect, that it proposes to prove a fact which is repugnant to and inconsistent with the facts constituting the evidence on the other side. . . . Although the time alleged in the indictment is not material, and the act done at another time would sustain it, yet in point of evidence it may become material; and, in the present case, as all the circumstances shown on the other side, and relied upon as proof, tend to the conclusion that Dr. Parkman was last seen entering the Medical College, and that he lost his life therein, if at all, the fact of his being seen elsewhere afterwards would be so inconsistent with that allegation that (if made out by satisfactory proof) we think it would be conclusive in favor of the defendant." [1]

[5] The full logical effect of an alibi, however, arises only when by ordinary exertion the person could not have changed his place in season; 1898, Peyton v. State, 54 Nebr. 188, 74 N. W. 597 (instruction held too strict in requirements).

[6] 1897, Brown v. Tourtelotte, 24 Colo. 204, 50 Pac. 195 (signing of a note); 1867, Doe v. Stevens, 36 Ga. 463, 473 (execution of deed); 1884, Nash v. Hoxie, 59 Wis. 384, 386, 18 N. W. 408 (contract).

§ 139. Commission of Crime by a Third Person. If X is charged with homicide, committed by himself alone, and it is shown in disproof that Y did the killing, X is clearly exonerated; for the fact that Y has done it is inconsistent with and exclusive of X's guilt:

1833, Gaston, J., in State v. May, 4 Dev. 328, 338 (larceny of a slave): "The criminal act imputed to the prisoner might as readily be committed by many as by one. . . . Both [W. M. and the defendant] might be guilty, or both might be innocent; and a common guilt or a common innocence was as presumable as the guilt of one only. . . . But proof that certain acts constituting a part of the criminal transaction itself were done by W. M. might have been of high importance to the prisoner by removing so much of the inference of guilt as would be raised were those acts brought home to him. . . . Proof that the taking was by other than the prisoner perhaps might repel this inference [of guilt], — not because the guilt of one shows the innocence of the other, but because proof that specific acts were done by one weakens or removes the presumption that the same acts were done by another."

There are, of course (as the preceding passage shows), cases in which X is by hypothesis in some way an accomplice of Y, either at a distance or as a personal sharer; and there is even the rare case of independent and double felonious acts upon the same object. To such cases the argument cannot apply. Apart from them, it is as cogent as an alibi. If the Man with the Iron Mask was the Duc de Vermandois, he could not have been the Général de Bulonde; and if the Tichborne claimant was Arthur Orton, he could not have been Roger Tichborne.

The question that arises, from the point of view of the rules of evidence, is whether, in evidencing this doing by a third person as a fact of disproof, any unusual requirements should be made as to the strength of the evidence before it can be admitted. Thus, to prove A guilty of murder, evidence of his threats (i. e. a design) to commit it are always admissible (ante, § 105); now, if the fact to be proved is that B committed the murder (as inconsistent with A's guilt), why should not B's threats be admitted, without further restriction, as A's are? It is true that evidence of B's threats alone would not go far towards proving B's commission; but it is not a question of absolute proof nor even of strong probability, but only of raising a reasonable doubt as to A's commission; and for this purpose the slightest likelihood of B's commission may suffice or at least assist. The evidence of B's threats, to be sure, may, in a given instance, be too slight to be worth considering; but it seems unsound as a general rule to hold that mere threats, or mere evidentiary facts of any one other sort, are to be rejected if unaccompanied by additional facts pointing towards B as the doer. Nevertheless, most Courts have shown an inclination to make some such restriction, and to insist that two or more kinds of evidentiary facts pointing towards B must be offered, and that one kind alone will not be received. It is difficult to see the object of this restriction, because if the evidence is really of no appreciable value, no harm is done in admitting it; while if it is in truth calculated to cause the jury to doubt, the Court should not attempt to decide for the jury that this doubt is purely speculative and fantastic, but should afford the accused every opportunity to create that doubt. A contrary rule is cruel to a really innocent accused.

[1] In this case the prosecution were not allowed to show that the testimony of survival might be explained away by showing that there was another person in Boston easily mistakable for Dr. Parkman: a ruling which seems erroneous.

§ 140. Same: Threats by a Third Person. Threats are perhaps the commonest kind of evidence offered for this purpose. The rulings differ widely in their effect; but in general a wholly unnecessary strictness is shown, and the illiberal attitude of some Courts in this respect towards accused persons is in singular contrast with the maudlin tenderness otherwise often exhibited.[1]

§ 141. Same: Motive of a Third Person. A motive as evidence is perhaps not of such value as a threat; yet Courts seem more inclined to receive it.[1] There is no reason for requiring that it be coupled with other evidence in order to be admissible.

[1] 1861, People v. Williams, 18 Cal. 193 (threats to kill, by a third person, admitted); 1885, State v. Beaudet, 53 Conn. 543, 4 Atl. 237 (unspecified threats of a third person against the assaulted party, excluded; partly because too vague, partly because hearsay, partly because not accompanied by other evidence of the third person's guilt; opinion inconclusive and unsound); 1886, Schoolcraft v. People, 117 Ill. 271, 277, 17 N. E. 649 (murder; the deceased's statement that certain third persons, "whose wives he had been running after, would kill him some day," excluded); 1894, Carlton v. People, 150 id. 181, 188, 37 N. E. 244 (arson; threats of third person to burn all the property of the injured person, excluded); 1901, Keith v. State, 157 Ind. 376, 61 N. E. 716 ("isolated threats by third parties is not admissible"); 1878, Morgan v. Com., 14 Bush 106, 112 (murder; threats against the deceased's life, by a third person present at the affray, admitted, the third person being first shown present and thus by possibility connected with the act); 1889, State v. Crawford, 99 Mo. 74, 80, 12 S. W. 354 (arson; threats of burning by a third person, rejected as res inter alios, — as if the law of judgments had any connection with the process of drawing an inference; this ground of decision is absurd, for it would exclude the whole process of proof that another was the guilty person); 1896, State v. Taylor, 136 id. 66, 37 S. W. 907 (burglary; threats by another person to commit such a burglary, excluded, unless perhaps an overt act, etc., had followed); 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239; 1877, State v. Davis, 77 Id. 483 (for these two cases, see post, § 142); 1893, State v. Fletcher, 24 Or. 295, 300, 33 Pac. 575 (threats, etc., by a third person, excluded; there must be "some appropriate evidence directly connecting that person with the corpus delicti"); 1891, Alexander v. U. S., 138 U. S. 353, 355, 11 Sup. 350 (the defendant and the deceased were seen together just before the latter's disappearance; evidence of threats by H. against the deceased, H. then being in search of the deceased, who was supposed to have eloped with H.'s wife, held admissible, subject to a certain discretion in the trial Court as to remoteness); 1892, Worth v. R. Co., 51 Fed. 171 (action by a passenger injured by the derailment of a car; evidence of the design of outsiders to wreck the train by derailment was admitted, no conditions being laid down, but other evidence being presented of the existence of a motive in certain outsiders, and of the presence of suspicious persons at the place); 1871, Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510, 513 (prior threats to kill, and subsequent immediate flight, of a third person, excluded as "not pertinent"); 1899, Buel v. State, 104 Wis. 132, 80 N. W. 78 (murder; threats of third persons against the deceased, excluded).

[1] 1902, Tatum v. State, 131 Ala. 32, 31 So. 369 (deceased's declarations of a difficulty with R., and facts indicating a motive in R., held inadmissible); 1852, Crawford v. State, 12 Ga. 142, 145 (murder; the identity of the assailant not being directly testified to, evidence was admitted that just previously the deceased had had a quarrel with third persons); 1896, McElhannon v. State, 99 id. 672, 26 S. E. 501 (malicious mischief; motive in the prosecuting witness, admitted); 1854, State v. D'Angelo, 9 La. An. 46 (murder; that the deceased "had innumerable enemies," excluded as too vague; a showing that one or more designated enemies were present at the time of the killing would perhaps be admitted); 1878, State v. Johnson, 30 Id. 921 (murder, no eye-witnesses being present; evidence received, on the peculiar circumstances, of quarrels by the deceased, shortly previous, with other persons who had "more reason for committing the murder than the accused"); 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 475 (murder of a woman; evidence was offered, to fix the murder on a third person, that her husband had quarrelled with her, and that a stranger was seen near the place on the day of the killing; Colt, J.: "The existence of ill-feeling as a motive for the commission of crime will not alone justify submitting to a jury the question of the guilt of a person entertaining such a feeling. It becomes material only when offered in connection with other evidence, proper to be submitted, showing that the person charged with such ill-feeling was in fact implicated in the commission of the crime. . . . The mere claim made by counsel that there are circumstances which tend to implicate the person charged is not enough; there must be proof of such circumstances, or an offer to prove. The evidence that a stranger was in town at the time of the murder does not alone implicate the husband); 1903, Horn v. State, — Wyo. —, 73 Pac. 705 (motive and opportunity of a third person; "much must depend on the circumstances of each case"; here excluded).

§ 142. Same: Miscellaneous Facts. Of the other kinds of evidence, it can only be said that the inclination should always be to admit any one of them, unless totally without probative suggestion.[1] In particular, the conviction of another person for the same crime (assuming that it is predicated as the deed of one person, not of joint actors) should be received;[2] no techni-

[1] 1890, R. v. Dytche, 17 Cox Cr. 39 (felonious wounding; evidence that other persons, already convicted for the offence, were present and made the assault, and not the now defendants, admitted); 1846, Smith v. State, 9 Ala. 990, 995 (conduct of another to be admitted in rare cases only; Goldthwaite, J., dissenting); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 Id. 519, 527 ("The evidence of the guilt must relate to the res gestæ, and not to the declarations or conduct of the party on whom it is attempted to cast suspicion, subsequent to and having no immediate connection with the crime"; here excluding the flight of a third person); 1895, Whitaker v. State, 106 Id. 30, 17 So. 456 (unexplained flight of a third person, excluded); 1895, Crawford v. State, 112 Id. 1, 20, 21 So. 214 (murder; W.'s concealment of himself, held irrelevant on the facts, the defendant's actual deed of shooting being uncontroverted); 1862, Phillips v. State, 33 Ga. 281, 287 (larceny; pleased conduct of a third person upon the discovery of the article on the defendant's premises, the third person having been present at the time of the theft, admitted); 1900, Green v. State, 154 Ind. 655, 57 N. E. 637 (a dying declaration naming B., and not the defendant, as the murderer, B.'s threats, motive, and doings were admitted to prove B. the murderer, though not B.'s subsequent admissions of guilt); 1885, McPherrin v. Jennings, 66 Ia. 626, 24 N. W. 242 (death by unknown cause was rejected as an explanation of the plaintiff's horse's death); 1813, Logan v. Steele, 3 Bibb 230 (trespass by burning a barn and killing horses; the plaintiff having proved threats by the defendant, the defendant was allowed to prove that other enemies of the plaintiff "had also threatened to injure his property"); 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 475 (cited ante, § 142); 1897, State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 23 S. W. 1089 (third person's admissions of the larceny, excluded); 1833, State v. May, 4 Dev. 328, 331 (stealing a slave; evidence that another person, who lived near the slave, while the defendant lived at a distance, had been included in the original warrant for arrest, but had then fled the State, confessing himself guilty, excluded; but "direct evidence connecting W. with the corpus delicti would certainly have been admissible"; the offered evidence, if not followed by evidence of an "overt act," was merely "res inter alios acta"); 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239 (accessory to murder; threats and arrest of other persons, excluded); 1873, State v. White, 68 N. C. 158 (larceny; suspicious conduct, and flight from the State, of a third person, excluded); 1874, State v. Haynes, 71 Id. 79 (conduct of another person, before and after the crime, admitted); 1875, State v. Bishop, 73 Id. 44, 46 (larceny; the familiarity of a third person with the premises, and his suspicious conduct on the night of the larceny, excluded); 1877, State v. Davis, 77 Id. 483 (murder; threats of a third person, and his departure for the deceased's house, excluded, on the reasoning of State v. May); 1880, State v. Baxter, 82 Id. 602 (larceny; another person's suspicious conduct, excluded); 1895, State v. Wallace, 44 S. C. 357, 22 S. E. 411 (a prosecuting witness was said to be the real thief, and other receipts of stolen property by him were admitted); 1864, State v. Barron, 37 Vt. 57, 60 (illegal sale of liquor; a habit of "gentlemen in travelling about the country to carry spirituous liquors in bottles with them," not admitted to explain the source of bottles found in the defendant's public-house); 1883, Lewis v. Barker, 55 Id. 23 (that a clerk in defendant's store had refused to work for him the day after it was burned; not admitted to show that the clerk had burned it); 1900, State v. Totten, 72 Id. 71, 47 Atl. 105 (robbery; certain conduct of a third person indicating his guilt, excluded); 1820, Rowt's Adm'r v. Kile's Adm'r, Gilmer, Va. 202 (action on an instrument of defendant; evidence of its forgery by the son of the payee, admissible; after "the agency of that person" in the forgery is made out, then that person's skill in imitating the hand in question would be admissible); 1871, Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510, 513 (stabbing; threats and flight of another person, excluded).

[2] Contra: 1897, State v. Smarr, 121 N. C. 669, 28 S. E. 549 (that another had been convicted of the burglary charged, inadmissible); 1898, Chamberlain v. Pierson, 31 C. C. A. 157, 87 Fed. 420 (injury by derailment; to exonerate the defendant's employees, a conviction of third persons for causing the derailment was excluded). But of course mere suspicion is nothcality of the law of judgments should stand in the way; indeed, it is difficult to see why such a judgment should not be pleaded in bar. Certainly, the law must in some manner avoid the absurdity of convicting two persons for the same crime committable by one only. This same singular and inexcusable attitude of the Courts is seen also in the exclusion of a third person's confession of guilt under the exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1476), and of a suicide's declarations (post, § 143).

The general principle is applicable, it may be noted, equally to civil cases, such as the trespasses of animals.[3] Moreover, on the principle noticed already for the argument of opportunity (ante, § 132) the prosecution may in advance negative the argument by showing that other possible persons did not do the act.[4] The fact of mistaken identity seems also to be relevant in this connection; the argument is that a third person, not the one charged, was really involved, and the fact of the existence of a third person capable of being mistaken for the one charged is some evidence that he possibly or probably did the things attributed to the person charged.[5]

§ 143. Suicide, or other Self-Infliction of Harm; Suicidal Plans. If the deceased, with whose death the defendant is charged, committed suicide, obviously the defendant could not have killed the deceased. There ought to be no doubt about the admissibility of plans or desires to commit suicide, even where no other evidence of its particular probability or feasibility is offered. Its improbability or non-feasibility should be matter for rebuttal, and should not exclude the evidence of its probability. That the evidence may be manufactured is no reason for its exclusion; for it may also not be manufactured, and if not, it is most cogent. The distance in time ought not to exclude the evidence of plans; for it does not exclude evidence of a defendant's threats (ante, § 108). That the deceased's hearsay statements of plan are admissible under an exception to the Hearsay rule, is plain (post, § 1725). The relevancy of plans of suicide has been well expounded in the following passage:

1892, Field, C. J., in Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 31 N. E. 961: "The nature of the case proved by the Commonwealth was such that it was not impossible that she had coming; 1899, Brown v. State, 120 Ala. 342, 25 So. 182 (merely showing that another was suspected, excluded). Nor can the prosecution show that another person was acquitted, because this leaves still open the defendant's share in the act (except for the purpose mentioned in note 4, infra); 1893, People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 328, 334, 34 Pac. 698.

[3] 1895, Green v. Skoqvist, 57 N. J. L. 617, 31 Atl. 228 (trespass by cattle; the trespassers of other persons' cattle, admitted); Contra, but wrong: 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; killing of other sheep by other dogs, not admissible to negative the guilt of defendant's dogs).

[4] 1897, Brant v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 182 (where the probabilities lay between three persons).

[5] The argument is of course a common one, and only seldom has a ruling upon it been necessary: 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 484 (mistaken identity allowed to be shown); 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 536 (adultery; testimony by a neighbor that the defendant had several times talked with the woman at her gate in the evenings of certain months; counter-testimony was admitted by a nearer neighbor that a person, not the defendant, had talked there during the same time; Peters, J.: "Of course, both statements cannot be true; still it cannot reasonably be said that the truth of the one would not lessen the probability of the truth of the other").

mitted suicide. If it could be shown that she actually had an intention to commit suicide, it would be more probable that she did in fact commit it than if she had no such intention. . . . It may be true that an unmarried woman pregnant with child, if she has an intention to commit suicide, does not always carry that intention into effect, although she have an opportunity; but it is impossible to say that the actual existence of such an intention does not tend to throw some light upon the cause of death of such a woman when found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide. . . . If it could be shown that during the week before her death she had actually attempted to drown herself, and had been prevented from doing so, it seems manifest that this fact, according to the general experience of mankind, would have some tendency to show that she might have made a second attempt."

Such evidence has constantly been admitted, as the annals of celebrated trials illustrate; until the squeamish doubtings of modern times, hesitating to accept the suggestions of natural logic, and not happening to be provided with justifying authority, furnished a few instances of rejection. Such rulings are without support from any point of view.[1]

§ 144. Same: Motive for Suicide. For the same reason, an emotion or feeling impelling to suicide is relevant; and facts tending to show the existence of such an emotion — either events, e. g. the pregnancy of a seduced woman, or conduct, e. g. exhibitions of melancholy or despair (two kinds of evidence dealt with post, §§ 391, 394) — should be received to show it. Contrary facts tending to show emotions averse to suicide would be equally admissible.[1]

[1] 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1166 (murder, the issue being whether the deceased had committed suicide or was killed; evidence was received of her being melancholy and depressed; "she said her distemper lay in her mind, . . . and the sooner it did kill her the better; . . . she neglected herself in doing those things that were necessary for her health, in hopes it would carry her off, and often wished herself dead"); 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (intention to commit suicide, and consistency of the mode of death with suicide, admitted); 1892, Siebert v. People, 143 Id. 571, 584, 32 N. E. 431 (statements of suicidal intent excluded; no ruling on the question of relevancy); 1896, State v. Asbell, 57 Kan. 898, 46 Pac. 770 (admitted, there being a possibility of suicide); 1851, Preston, J., in State v. Bradley, 6 La. An. 559 (putting as admissible the supposed fact of a letter being found on the person of the deceased declaring an intention to commit suicide); 1882, Com. v. Felch, 132 Mass. 32 (abortion; to show a self-abortion of the deceased, her "purpose and intent" "would be if known a material aid in coming to a correct conclusion"; but her declarations of purpose were excluded); 1892, Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Id. 180 (intention to commit suicide, the defendant being the deceased's seducer, admitted; overruling Com. v. Felch; see quotation supra); 1896, Hale v. Life Co., 65 Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (insurance policy; the deceased's threat to commit suicide, not admitted to show suicide, because made two years before); 1894, State v. Punshon, 124 Id. 448, 457, 27 S. W. 1111 (threats of deceased wife to kill herself, excluded, on the ground of hearsay); 1896, State v. Punshon, same decision affirmed on second trial, 133 id. 44, 34 S. W. 25; 1895, State v. Fitzgerald, 130 Id. 407, 32 S. W. 1113 (excluded, unless accompanied by an attempt to execute them; overruling State v. Ludwig, 70 id. 412); 1890, Smith v. Benef. Soc., 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197 (suicide as a defence to an insurance policy; the deceased's design to commit suicide before taking out the policy, admitted); 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 146, 149, 165 (intention more than six years before, admitted); 1834, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea 161, 177 (a disposition and intention to commit suicide, held admissible, "as there is no direct testimony as to the fact of the homicide"); 1896, State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 35 Atl. 178 (question left undecided); 1898, State v. Marsh, 70 Id. 288, 40 Atl. 836 (deceased's declarations that he was giving his horse arsenic as medicine, offered to show that he had it and might have used it himself, excluded). Compare the citations post, § 1725.

[1] 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, Eng. (see citation ante, § 143); 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (evidence admitted of mental condition of cheerfulness, or the contrary, pointing towards or against suicide); 1896, State v. Punshon, 133 Mo. 44, 34 S. W. 25 (the deceased's "disordered condition of mind," excluded); 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 165 (a previous melancholy disposition, tending to suicide, admitted; the interval between the death and the time testified to affecting only the weight of the evidence); 1884, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea 161, 177 (melancholy or despondent disposition relevant on the question whether suicide was committed; Deaderick, C. J.: "The conditions and surroundings at the time of death may be looked into if of a character likely to impel suicide"); 1899, Morrison v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 478, 51 S. W. 358 (deceased's cheerful behavior up to time of death, admitted to disprove suicide); 1898, State v. Marsh, 70 Vt. 288, 40 Atl. 837 (state of health of deceased, considered). Compare the citations post, § 391 (motive for suicide).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT.

TOPIC III: RETROSPECTANT EVIDENCE (TRACES, — MATERIAL, ORGANIC, AND MENTAL).

CHAPTER VIII.

§ 148. General Principle. The convenience has already been explained (ante, § 43) of grouping the various kinds of evidentiary facts according as they come, in time, before, at, or after, the act to be proved. There is no radical distinction between these groups; they merely serve as a convenient index of arrangement, and very often throw light on the features of relevancy common to the kinds of facts in each group. There have now been considered the various kinds of evidentiary facts in the first two groups, i. e. facts having Prospectant and Concomitant indications; there remains the third group, namely, facts having a Retrospectant indication. The inference here looks backward from the evidentiary fact to the alleged act; i. e. taking our stand at the fact offered, we infer from it that at some previous time the act was or was not done. The common feature of this group of evidentiary facts is that they are all open to a similar source of weakness, and thus offer to the opponent a general mode of explaining away their force. Thus, if, to show that A on January 1 stole a bicycle, there is offered the fact of his possession of the bicycle on June 1, the probative force of this fact rests on the assumption that the hypothesis that will explain his possession is that he obtained the bicycle by stealing it. But there are also in truth other possible hypotheses, for example, that it was given or sold to him by the thief or by a purchaser from the thief, or that he found it. The question of admissibility is whether the hypothesis of his stealing is, among all hypotheses, prima facie sufficiently prominent to make the fact admissible (on the general theory of Relevancy, ante, § 31); and, if it is admissible, the opponent may show that one of the other hypotheses is in truth a much more probable explanation (on the theory of Explanation, ante, § 34). So, if in proving the doing of an act by A as a mark of his identity with B, there is offered (as in the Tichborne case) the fact that A has a recollection of the event, or if, to disprove it, we offer the fact that A has no recollection of it, the opponent may show, in the first instance, that the recollection has come, not from having done the act, but from having heard or read about it; and, in the second instance, that the lack of recollection is due, not to not having done the act, but to the natural fading of memory. In short, the tests of relevancy and the opportunities of explanation are of the same general nature in this group of evidentiary facts. The general argument runs: Is the trace one whose possession (or lack of possession) by the person charged could be explained by the operation of other causes than the doing (or not doing) of the act in question?

The kinds of facts may best be roughly subdivided according to the mode in which such causes might operate, i. e. according as the connection between the evidentiary trace and the act in question is mechanical, organic, or mental. The typical case of the first sort is the possession of stolen goods; of the second sort, corporal resemblance as evidence of paternity; of the third sort, consciousness of guilt.

a. Mechanical Traces.

§ 149. Miscellaneous Instances in Criminal Cases. The presence upon the person or premises of articles, fragments, stains, tools, or any other resulting circumstance, is constantly employed as the basis of an inference that the person did an act with which these circumstances are associated. In general, however, few questions of relevancy arise. There are innumerable instances in the records of celebrated trials; but their relevancy is so patent that no occasion is given for rulings of law:

1850, Mr. W. Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 3d ed., 96: "In a case of burglary, the thief had gained admittance to the house by means of a penknife, which was broken in the attempt, and part left in the window-frame; the broken knife was found in the pocket of the prisoner, and perfectly corresponded with the fragment. . . . In another case, identification was established by the correspondence of the wadding of fire-arms with part of a torn letter found in the prisoner's possession; and in a case on the Northern circuit, where a man had been shot by a ball, the wadding of the pistol, which stuck in the wound, was found to be part of a ballad, which corresponded with another part found in the pocket of the prisoner."

The few rulings recorded are merely the occasional instances in which such questions have been (usually quite without necessity) pushed to a decision in the higher Court.[1]

[1] 1892, Gilmore v. State, 99 Ala. 154, 159, 13 So. 536 (boot-tracks); 1897, Thornton v. State, 113 id. 43, 21 So. 356 (book and pencil); 1893, Whetston v. State, 31 Fla. 240, 250, 12 So. 661 (shoe-tracks excluded, because having no marked peculiarities); 1900, Ireland v. Com., — Ky. —, 57 S. W. 616 (slungshot, excluded on the facts); 1870, State v. Kingsbury, 58 Me. 238, 243 (fire set by kerosene; presence of kerosene stains on a shirt admitted); 1850, Webster's

It is to be noted that (on the principle of § 34, ante) the opponent may always explain away the indication by showing other hypotheses for the presence of the trace, — as where, on a charge of murder, the presence of blood-stains is explained by the killing of a chicken, or the presence of a weapon by the owner's previous loan of it to another person. It is also to be noted that an argument may be based negatively on such traces, — as where it is shown, on a charge of murder, that the murderer must have been stained with blood, while the accused bears no blood-stains and therefore could not have done the killing. To this also there is a counter-argument (of explanation) that the absence of such traces can be accounted for by their intervening destruction.

The question may be asked, What is the distinction between evidence of traces and evidence of identity? For example, to prove a murder, evidence is offered that a gun found in the defendant's possession is exactly fitted by the bullet found in the body of the deceased; what kind of evidence is this? The truth is that this evidentiary fact is really double and involves both kinds of inferences. The nature of the argument to prove identity (post, § 411) is that a certain fact offered is an essential mark of sameness of person, — in this instance, that the fit of the bullet is a necessary and unique mark of the slayer. The weakness of this type of argument is that the mark may not be necessarily associated with one person but may be common to a number of persons; and hence the mode of dealing with such evidence is to show that other persons also have the same mark, — here, that other persons in the neighborhood possessed guns of the same bore. Now the argument from traces assumes that the argument to identity has been settled and accepted, i. e. here it assumes that the use of the gun in question is an essential or sufficient mark of the murderer, and it then sets about to prove that the accused possessed that mark, i. e. used that gun; and to do this it offers the fact of its subsequent finding in the accused's possession. Here the weakness of the argument is an entirely new and different one, namely, the trace of subsequent possession does not necessarily indicate a use at the time of the murder, since the gun may be one which the accused has recently borrowed, or it may be his own gun which was lent to another person at the time of the murder. Thus, there are two wholly different evidentiary questions involved in the use of this evidence, — first, the question of identity, whether this individual gun is a necessary mark of the slayer; and secondly, the question of traces, whether its subsequent possession evidences its use at the time of the murder. The present type of argument, then, — the argument from traces to a former act, — is a distinct argument from that of identity.

Trial, 5 Cush. 295, 318, Barnes' Rep., 84 (the lower jaw of the deceased, etc., found on the defendant's premises); 1898, State v. Miller, 144 Mo. 26, 45 S. W. 1104 (pistols); 1897, State v. Campbell, 7 N. D. 58, 72 N. W. 935 (burglary; various tools, etc., admitted); 1898, State v. Garrington, 11 S. D. 178, 76 N. W. 326 (sack of defendant found on premises the next day, admitted); 1899, Pike v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 613, 51 S. W. 395 (the fact of the sale of some liquor being admitted, the presence of drunken men about the defendant's store was admitted to show that the liquor was intoxicating; compare R. v. Burton, cited post, § 152 and the cases in § 153); 1898, McBride v. Com., 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. 454 (certain traces held inadmissible).

Although in some instances the same circumstance offered may give rise to both arguments, this is by no means necessary or usual, and there is no essential connection between the two kinds of arguments.

§ 150. Brands on Animals and Timber. When an animal is found in B's possession, and the animal bears a brand or other mark, and one of the issues is whether A is the owner of the animal, it is a natural and immediate inference that the animal belongs to the person who [illegible] bears, and, if that brand is A's, then to A. This inference, however [illegible] probable in the light of practical experience, is in truth a composite one, made up of two steps: (1) first, the inference, from the presence of A's usual mark, that A placed this particular mark, — a genuine argument under the present principle, from a trace to the source of the trace; and (2) secondly, the inference from the fact that A placed it there, to the [illegible] of A's ownership of the animal. The latter step of inference is [illegible] perhaps not less natural than the former, but it is more [illegible] in its effect. It would seem that the latter step of inference has been rarely conceded by Courts, as a matter of common law;[1] though the former step was universally conceded, it was said that the presence of A's brand was evidence of identity (i. e. of the animal being one of those originally branded by A), but not of ownership. This unduly cautious attitude has been generally corrected by legislation. In most of the stock-raising communities, the brand on animals is made evidence of ownership; though in order to encourage registration and thus prevent confusion, the rule is applied only to brands duly registered by law.[2] The

[1] It was in the following case: 1900, R. v. Forsythe, 4 N. W. Terr. 398 (a brand is on common law principles evidence of ownership; Rouleau, J., diss.; best opinion on this subject by McGuire, J.).

[2] Can.: Dom. St. 1900, c. 46, § 3, St. 1901, c. 42, § 2, adding to the Crim. Code 1892, § 707*a* (in criminal cases, the presence of a duly recorded brand or mark is to be evidence of ownership); Man. St. 1903, c. 6, § 6 (cattle-brand duly allotted shall be evidence of ownership, where title to cattle is involved); N. W. Terr.: Cons. Ord. 1898, c. 76, § 5, St. 1900, c. 22, § 5 ("the presence of a recorded brand on any stock" shall be evidence of the ownership of the animal); U. S.: Colo. Annot. Stats. 1891, § 4240 ("no evidence of ownership by brands shall be permitted" unless the brand is a recorded one); Colo. Annot. Stats. § 216 (auctioneer's stock-register of animals, required to be kept, "shall be evidence in any court where the trial of the right of property may be had"); § 4251 ("the brand on an animal," if recorded, shall be prima facie evidence of ownership); St. 1899, Apr. 6, c. 142, § 19 (earmarks may be used in evidence "in connection with the owner's recorded brand"); 1895, Chesnut v. People, 21 Colo. 512, 523, 42 Pac. 656 (recorded brand, admissible "merely as a mark of identification"); 1897, Brooke v. People, 23 id. 375; 48 Pac. 502 (unrecorded brand; same); Nebr. Comp. St. 1899, §§ 446, 3635 (proof of recorded brand, to be evidence of ownership of stock); St. 1903, c. 53 (brand duly recorded shall be evidence of ownership of cattle, horses, mules, or swine); Nev. Gen. St. 1885, § 4561 (on trial of offences concerning animals running at large upon a range, "the brand and other marks upon such animal shall be prima facie evidence of ownership"); § 761 (on trial of actions for possession of any animal marked or branded as provided by statute, "the mark and brand" shall be primary evidence of ownership); § 758 (certified copy by recorder under seal of recorded mark and brand, to be evidence of ownership in "any action" of all animals legally marked and branded); N. Mex. Comp. L. §§ 54, 57 ("the brand on an animal shall be prima facie evidence of the ownership of the person whose brand it may be, provided that such brand has been duly recorded"; "no evidence of ownership by brand shall be permitted" unless the brand has been duly recorded); 1891, Pryor v. Portsmouth C. Co., 6 N. Mex. 44, 27 Pac. 327 (instruction under the statute construed); 1892, Terr. v. Chavez, 6 id. 455, 30 Pac. 902 (the brand is evidence equally for an assignee of it); 1901, Gale v. Salas, — id. —, 66 Pac. 520 (statute applied); N. D. Rev. C. 1895, § 1540 (vent-brand is evidence of sale or transfer of stock); Okl. Stats. 1893, § 245 (recorded brand on stock, to be evidence of ownership); Or. St. 1893, p. 51 ("no evidence of ownership by brand" to be received unless the brand is recorded; when title to stock is involved, "the brand on an animal shall be prima facie evidence of ownership of the person whose brand it may be," provided tha same policy has led, in timber-producing communities, to similar legislation for marks on logs and timber.[3] It would seem that the principle is equally applicable to other sorts of marks on property,[4] and in particular to the port-name of a vessel required by law to be marked on the hull.[5]

Distinguish the question whether the official register of brands or marks is admissible to show a person to be entitled to use the brand recorded as his; this is usually dealt with in the same legislation, but it falls under another principle (post, § 1674).

§ 151. Postmarks on Envelopes. The postmark on an envelope is, upon the same principle, admissible to show that the envelope bearing it had passed through the hands of the postal officials at the time and place indicated. Here, however, the question separates itself more distinctly into two others, — first, whether the postmark may be assumed genuine, without more evidence (post, § 2152), and if so, whether the postmark, regarded as a statement of tho postal official, may be admitted under the Hearsay exception for official statements (post, § 1674). This analysis might be applicable equally to the brands of stock and timber; but it seems not to have been made, and its recognition for postmarks only is due to the course of early English rulings.

§ 152. Possession of Stolen Chattels. On a charge of taking goods, the fact that A was found, subsequently to the taking, in possession of the goods brand has been duly recorded; proof shall be made by a certified copy by the county clerk; an earmark for stock "shall be taken in evidence in connection with the owner's record brand" in all suits involving title to stock); 1899, State v. Hanna, 35 Or. 195, 57 Pac. 629; State v. Morse, ib. 462, 57 Pac. 631; S. D. Stats. 1899, § 3072 (recorded brand on stock is evidence of ownership); Tex. Annot. Stats. 1897, § 4930 ("No brands except such as are recorded by the officers named in this chapter shall be recognized in law as any evidence of ownership of the cattle, horses, or mules upon which the same may be used"); 1898, Turner v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 327, 45 S. W. 1020 (larceny; brand recorded after the date of the alleged taking is not evidence of ownership under the statute; moreover, as evidence of identity it is unnecessary; prior cases on the latter point disapproved); 1900, Welch v. State, 42 id. 338, 60 S. W. 46 (preceding case approved, but treated as holding that the unrecorded or subsequently recorded brand is at least evidence of identity); 1899, Chowning v. State, 41 id. 81, 51 S. W. 946 (like Welch v. State; repudiating Tittle v. State, 30 Tex. App. 597); 1900, Walton v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 454, 55 S. W. 566 (recorded brand is evidence of ownership, even in a county other than where recorded); 1903, Swan v. State, — id. —, 76 S. W. 464 (Turner case cited, but held not to exclude but merely to limit the purpose of a multiple brand as evidence); Wash. C. Stats. 1897, § 3439 (recorded stock-brand, to be evidence of ownership of animal); Wyo. St. 1890, c. 73, § 151 (on any indictment, "proof of the brand thereon shall be sufficient to identify all classes of live-stock, and proof of the ownership of such brand shall be prima facie evidence of the ownership of such live stock").

[3] Can. Crim. Code 1892, § 708 (in trials for certain offences concerning timber, a duly registered timber-mark shall be evidence of ownership of the timber); Fla. Rev. St. 1892, § 2026 (official stamp "appearing upon timber or lumber adrift," to be evidence of ownership); Minn. Gen. St. 1894, §§ 2405, 2413 (recorded log-mark on logs to be evidence of ownership); Mo. Rev. St. 1899, § 1505 (recorded mark on logs, lumber, etc., to be evidence of ownership); N. Y. Laws, 1880, c. 533, § 8 (presence of recorded mark on logs or timber, presumptive evidence of ownership of party recording); Oh. Rev. St. 1898, § 4364 (61) (registered trade-mark on timber, to be prima facie evidence of trade-mark proprietor's ownership of timber); Or. St. 1891, Feb. 20, § 4 (recorded mark on log or timber, to be evidence of ownership); Wash. C. & Stats. 1897, § 3131 (recorded mark on logs or timber afloat, to be evidence of ownership).

[4] 1903, Chicago City R. Co. v. Carroll, — Ill. —, 68 N. E. 1087 (injury by the defendant's railroad car; that the cars running on the line where the plaintiff was injured bore the inscription "Chicago City R. Co.," admitted); 1900, Ingraham v. Chapman, 177 Mass. 123, 58 N. E. 171 (presence of name on a dog's collar is some evidence of the person's ownership; "it is like the case of a brand or mark upon cattle").

[5] Compare Stearns v. Doe, 12 Gray 482, 486 (port-name on stern of vessel), post, § 1674; 1883, Com. v. Collier, 134 Mass. 203, 205 (label on barrel; cited post, § 415).

taken is relevant to show that he was the taker. It is true that several other hypotheses are conceivable as explaining the fact of his possession; nevertheless the hypothesis that he was the taker is a sufficiently natural one to allow the fact of his possession to be considered as evidentiary. There has never been any question of this:

1866, Pollock, C.B., in R. v. Exall, 4 F. & F. 922 (burglary; the three accused were seen near the place on the night in question, and the next morning the watch was found on Exall): "The law is that if, recently after the commission of the crime, a person is found in possession of the stolen goods, that person is called upon to account for the possession, — that is, to give an explanation of it which is not unreasonable or improbable. The strength of the presumption which arises from such possession is in proportion to the shortness of the interval which has elapsed. If the interval has been only an hour or two, not half a day, the presumption is so strong that it almost amounts to proof, because the reasonable inference is that the person must have stolen the property; in the ordinary affairs of life, it is not probable that the person could have got possession of the property in any other way. . . . Such evidence is, no doubt, not conclusive. As an illustration of this, I may mention that I remember hearing the late Baron Gurney say that he once picked up something lying in the road and observed, 'Now if this has been stolen and I am found with it, I might be charged with the robbery.' The other circumstances in the case, however, will always aid or rebut the presumption, and it is not the less evidence because it is not conclusive evidence. It is some evidence, if its weight depends upon the circumstances, and especially on the nature of the possession, whether it is open and avowed or secret and concealed, and what is the nature of the account given of it. What the jury have to consider in each case is, what is the fair inference to be drawn from all the circumstances before them, and whether they believe the account given by the prisoner is under the circumstances reasonable and probable or otherwise."

The use of this sort of evidence goes back as far as any in our law; for in the earlier system of Germanic law the possession of goods stolen gave rise to a peculiar and particularly speedy mode of procedure unfavorable to the accused. In modern times the fact of recent possession is also given a procedural effect, in that it casts upon the defendant the duty of producing an explanation, in default of which the case may be closed adversely to him. This effect of the evidence as a presumption is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 2513). The inquiry is here as to the admissibility of the evidence, and only one or two questions capable of dispute have ever been suggested. The time of the subsequent possession is immaterial. The lapse of a long interval opens a greater possibility of innocent explanations, and may prevent the raising of a presumption of law, but does not alter the relevancy of the fact.[1] Possession by a husband can probably not be used against the wife, unless the husband is shown to be ignorant of the presence of the articles.[2] The possession of goods of the same kind as the general class of goods from which the taking was done is receivable, even though the specific quantity or any quantity of the general mass cannot be identified or discovered or shown to be missing.[3] But these and other questions are almost invariably discussed

[1] 1862, R. v. Wilson, 2 F. & F. 123, Bramwell, B. (said to be "strong evidence," if "shortly after" the stealing; here seventeen months after; yet the evidence was used); 1846, Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Metc. 534, 537 ("at a period somewhat distant," sufficient).

[2] See post, § 2513.

[3] 1854, R. v. Burton, Dears. Cr. C. 282 (lar-

in judicial opinions from the point of view of the legal presumption to be attached to the evidence (post, § 2513), and not as involving a question of admissibility. Where a presumption is held to be created, the admissibility of the evidence is of course conceded, but where the presumption is refused, it is sometimes difficult to say whether the inadmissibility of the evidence is also intended to be declared.

§ 153. Possession of Chattels as indicating other Crimes than Larceny. Wherever goods have been taken as a part of the criminal act, the fact of the subsequent possession is some indication that the possessor was the taker, and therefore the doer of the whole crime. Thus such possession is receivable to prove the commission of other acts than the simple crime of larceny. It is receivable to show the commission of a burglary,[1] a forgery,[2] a counterfeiting,[3] a murder,[4] a liquor selling,[5] or any other crime in which either a chief or a subordinate result might be the possession of a material article. For the same reason, the possession of burglar's tools is relevant to show that the possessor committed burglary, provided it first appears that the burglary was committed with such tools.[6] ceny of pepper; the defendant was found coming out of the warehouse with pepper in his pockets of a sort similar to that on the next floor above in the warehouse, but it could not be shown that any pepper was missing; Maule, J., admitting the evidence: "If a man go into the London Docks sober without means of getting drunk, and comes out of one of the cellers very drunk wherein are a million gallons of wine, I think that would be reasonable evidence that he had stolen some of the wine in that cellar, though you could not prove that any wine was stolen or any wine was missed"); 1881, Sartin v. State, 7 Lea 679 (stealing M's horse; the defendant when found was riding M's mule, and evidence was received of the stealing of M's mule on a day subsequent to that charged, in company with C, who when found was riding M's horse charged to have been stolen by the defendant); 1898, Parker v. U. S., 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858 (larceny of cattle; defendant's possession of other stolen cattle not received to identify those charged, because not taken from the same place). For other cases concerning the possession of stolen goods as evidence of crime on other evidential principles, see post, §§ 218, 414.

[1] 1878, Short v. State, 63 Ind. 376, 380; 1804, Com. v. Millard, 1 Mass. 6.

[2] 1861, Com. v. Talbot, 2 All. 161 (possession of a forged document by one claiming a benefit under it, admitted, to show forgery); 1885, State v. Yerger, 86 Mo. 33, 39 (possession of forged instrument is evidence of forgery of it).

[3] 1815, R. v. Fuller, R. & R. 308, by all the Judges (admitted to show a procuring with intent to utter).

[4] 1857, Williams v. Com., 29 Pa. 102, 103, 106 (murder; possession of money and watch of the deceased, admitted; "possession of the fruits of crime is of great weight in establishing the proof of murder, where that crime has been accomplished with robbery").

[5] Going into a place sober and coming out drunk evidences the obtaining of liquor therein: 1854, Meule, J., in R. v. Burton, Dears. Cr. C. 282 (quoted ante, § 152); 1859, Com. v. Taylor, 14 Gray 26; 1867, Com. v. Kennedy, 97 Mass. 224; 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 id. 165, 19 N. E. 215; 1893, Com. v. Hurley, 158 id. 159, 33 N. E. 342. The following rulings probably depend upon the same principle: 1860, Com. v. Maloney, 16 Gray 20 (goings in and comings out of numbers of persons with jugs, etc., admitted to show liquor-selling); 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 165, 19 N. E. 215 (admitting the mere fact of frequent goings in and comings out, as under certain circumstances indicating the sale of liquor within); 1893, Com. v. Brothers, 158 id. 206, 33 N. E. 386 (same); 1899, Pike v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 613, 51 S. W. 395 (cited ante, § 149).

[6] 1865, People v. Winters, 29 Cal. 658 (but first it must be shown that a burglary was committed, and by the aid of such tools; otherwise "there is no connection, probable or possible, between it and an offence confessedly committed without the aid of such tools"); 1882, People v. Hope, 62 id. 291, 295 (same in substance); 1890, People v. Sansome, 84 id. 449, 453, 24 Pac. 143 (same principle applied); 1879, State v. Morris, 47 Conn. 179, 181 (burglary while armed; the possession of arms after emerging from the house admitted as evidence of their possession while in it); 1884, State v. Franks, 64 Ia. 39, 42, 19 N. W. 832; 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 Mo. 496, 498 (burglary; the finding of the goods stolen, and of the burglar's tools, admitted); 1872, State v. Dubois, 49 id. 573 (finding of burglars' tools, admitted). Distinguish the admission of burglar's tools, possessed before the act, to show a design (post, § 238, ante, § 88).

§ 154. Possession of Money to evidence Larceny, etc. The mere possession of money is in itself no indication that the possessor was the taker of money charged as taken, because in general all money is alike and the hypothesis that the money found is the same as the money taken is too forced and extraordinary to be receivable. Where the denominations of the money found and the money taken correspond in a fairly close way, the fact of the finding of that specific money would have probative value and be relevant, because the money found is fairly marked as identical with the money taken. Another mode, however, of making the fact of money-possession relevant is to show its sudden possession, i. e. to show that before the time of taking the person was without money, while immediately after that time he had a great deal; this reduces the hypotheses to such as involve sudden acquisition, and a dishonest acquisition thus becomes a natural and prominent hypothesis. On such conditions the possession of unidentified money becomes relevant.[1]

§ 155. Same: Discriminations as to Stolen Chattels and Money. The use of possession of stolen goods to show their stealing must be distinguished from the use of possession of other stolen goods to show a knowing receipt of stolen goods, the object there being to show knowledge or intent (post, § 323). The relevancy of lack of money to show a motive for stealing involves also a different question (post, § 392).[1] Whether a person may be tried under the same indictment for stealing and for knowing receipt of stolen goods, and be found guilty as an accessory of the theft, raises questions of criminal pleading.[2]

§ 156. Possession of Receipt, and Instruments of Debt, to show Payment. The payee of money naturally leaves behind him in the hands of the payor some document by way of receipt or evidence of payment. (1) Where this document is a signed acknowledgment, — in the strict sense, a receipt, — it is receivable as an Admission.[1] (2) Where this document is merely the

[1] 1897, Leonard v. State, 115 Ala. 80, 22 So. 564 (possession of money after a larceny, admitted); 1900, Turner v. State, 124 id. 59, 27 So. 272 (possession of money after a larceny, excluded on the facts); 1901, Leath v. State, 132 id. 26, 31 So. 108 (forgery; mere possession of a smaller sum of money, held inadmissible; a strained ruling); 1853, Gates v. People, 14 Ill. 433, 438 (that the defendant before a murder and robbery had no money, but after it had some resembling that taken, admitted); 1877, State v. Grebe, 17 Kan. 458, 460 (larceny; possession of money by one who had been poor, admitted); 1816, Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Metc. 534, 537 (larceny of bank bills and checks; principle applied); 1854, Boston & W. R. Co. v. Dana, 1 Gray 101 (embezzlement; insolvency before entering the employment and subsequent possession of property far exceeding his earnings in the employment, admitted; leading opinion); 1898, Com. v. Mulrey, 170 Mass. 103, 49 N. E. 91 (false pretences by a city official having a salary of $1,200; deposits in bank at the time charged, too large to be accounted for by his salary, received); 1902, Com. v. Devaney, 182 id. 33, 64 N. E. 402 (robbery); 1897, Williams v. U. S., 168 U. S. 382, 18 Sup. 92 (extortion; large bank deposits by the defendant, about the times of the alleged offence, and in excess of his salary, held improperly submitted to the jury as evidence of dishonest acquisition, because there was no necessary connection between this excess and the alleged extorted sums; the Court treats the question as though the jury had been told that this proved guilt, though the trial Court merely said "you are at liberty to infer" an unfavorable explanation; the opinion is valueless and illustrates this Court's frequent confusion of the admissibility of evidence and its effect as a presumption); 1898, State v. Burns, 19 Wash. 52, 52 Pac. 316 (possession of any money when arrested, admitted).

[1] Compare also § 89, ante (lack of money as evidence of a capacity to pay or to lend).

[2] See State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 429, 439.

[1] For admissions in general as open to expla-instrument of liability itself, customarily surrendered to the obligor upon satisfaction made, — e. g. a promissory note, a bond, — the possession of the instrument by the obligor may be relevant to show a past transaction of discharge. The circumstances in each case, however, must determine; for the party offering the evidence must be one who would naturally have received the instrument from the party now seeking for payment.[2] Counter-explanations may be shown by circumstances explaining the possession otherwise, as where the debtor has access to the place of custody of the instrument. But in judicial opinions few questions here arise except upon the propriety of creating a presumption of payment (post, § 2518), for this requires a much stronger quality of probative value than mere admissibility.[3]

§ 157. Possession or Existence of a Document, to show Execution, Delivery, or Seisin. The possession or existence of a document is connected with a number of inferences, most of them resting on the present principle, but some of them requiring for convenience to be treated elsewhere in connection with other principles.

(1) The existence of a document purporting to be signed by A is under all circumstances some evidence of A's genuine execution of it. But the question which has naturally arisen is whether under certain circumstances it is sufficient evidence of A's execution. That it is sufficient, in combination with one or more circumstances, is well recognized in a few classes of cases. The age of the document, together with its custody, and (if it is a deed of land) with the fact of possession of the land, suffices for its authentication (post, § 2137); the official custody of a purporting official document equally suffices (post, § 2158); the imprint of an official seal will often suffice to authenticate (post, § 2161); and the course of the mails may suffice for a reply-letter (post, § 2153). All these rules, however, are auxiliary rules of sufficiency, not rules of admissibility. It is necessary here merely to note that the rules are founded on an inference applying the present principle.

(2) The existence of a document in a certain kind of place — such as the grantee's custody or office of registry — may be sufficient evidence of the delivery of the document, so far as its delivery may be material. Here the usual question is not of the admissibility of the fact (which is conceded), but of its sufficiency to raise a presumption of law (post, § 2520).

nations, see post, § 1058. For a receipt as not conclusive but open to denial by parol evidence, see post, § 2432. For a receipt in unproved handwriting, as presumptively authenticated, see post, § 2148. For a receipt of a third person, as not admissible without calling him to the stand, see post, § 1456.

[2] Instances of the use of this evidence: 1800, Egg v. Barnett, 3 Esp. 196 (possession of a bill of exchange, bearing the plaintiff's indorsement as payee and the defendant's name as drawer); 1809, Suby v. Champlin, 4 Johns. 461, 468 (possession by surety of a bond for duties and of the collector's receipt).

[3] This explains the apparent illiberality of the following ruling: 1810, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Pfiel v. Vanbatenberg, 2 Camp. 439 (excluding the mere bill of exchange, when offered by the acceptor against the drawer to prove payment; "Show that the bills were once in circulation after being accepted, and I will presume that they got back to the acceptor's hands by his having paid them. But when he merely produces them, how do I know that they were ever in the hands of the payee, or any indorsee, with his name upon them as acceptor? It is very possible that when they were left for acceptance he refused to deliver them back, and, having detained them ever since, now produces them as evidence of a loan of money").

(3) The existence of a document in the house or among the goods of A may be offered as evidence that A has had possession of it, or has otherwise dealt with it. Here the question is genuinely one of mere admissibility; and it is usually answered by holding that the fact of the document's discovery in that condition is admissible, provided the place was actually in A's control and provided the lapse of time has not made too probable the hypothesis of other persons' intrusion:

1581, Campion's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 1050, 1061; Campion the Jesuit being charged with treason in seducing subjects to take an oath of obedience to the Pope, Anderson, Queen's counsel, said: "These papers, thus found in houses where you were, show that for ministering such oaths you are a traitor. . . . For if a poor man and a rich man come both to one house, and after their departure a bag of gold be found hidden, forasmuch as the poor man had no such plenty and therefore could leave no such bag behind him, by common presumption it is to be intended that the rich man only, and no other, did hide it. So you, a professed papist, coming to a house, and there such reliques fonnd after your departure, how can it otherwise be implied than that you did both bring them and leave them there; so it is flat they came there by means of a papist, ergo by your means;" Campion: "Your conclusion had been necessary if you had also showed that none came into the house, of my profession, but I."[1]

From the foregoing inference must be distinguished the inference, from the existence of a document in A's possession, to his knowledge of its contents (post, § 260) or, still further, to his approval of the contents as his admission (post, § 1073).

(4) The existence of a document of ownership of land (a deed, lease, or license) may be evidence that the maker of the document had possession of the land at the time of making it. This doctrine, now well settled in English law, is applicable in proof of title by adverse possession in prior generations, where no evidence has survived except the documents themselves which embodied acts of claim of ownership. It used to be said occasionally that the deed was itself an act of possession; but this is incorrect; it is merely evidence of possession, in the nature of a trace or mark such as only a possessor is likely to have. The limitations of the doctrine are thus expounded:

1878, Cairns, L. C., in Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 653, 668: "Old leases have always been considered to be admissible as being evidence facts of ownership. . . . [The circumstances of giving and taking them] are real transactions between man and man not intelligible except on the footing of title, or at least an honest belief in title." Lord Blackburn: "Inasmuch as after long time all the witnesses who could prove such possession are dead, the law permits ancient documents, either with or without evidence of ancient payment of rent, to be given as evidence from which the jury may properly draw an inference that there was such possession. For in the ordinary course of things men do not make leases unless they act on them, and lessees do not pay rent unless they are in possession, so that the ancient payment of rent adds weight to the ancient indenture."

[1] 1843, R. v. O'Connor, 4 State Tr. N. s. 935, 1045 (sedition; Rolfe, B.: "If time elapses between the apprehension of the party and his being taken away, and you find documents afterward in his possession, non constat but they came there afterwards"); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 id. 1, 100, 193 (documents found in a portmanteau of the defendant after he had been arrested and others had had access to it, received); 1897, State v. Shive, 58 Kan. 783, 51 Pac. 274 (robbery; near the place was found an envelope addressed to one defendant and bearing the return-request of the other; excluded, because no possession of the envelope by either was shown).

1847, Collier, C. J., in Doe v. Eslava, 11 Ala. 1028, 1030: "Ancient documents, it is said, are allowed to support ancient possession, though these documents are not proved to be part of any res gesta. They are admitted in such cases as forming a part of every legal transfer of title and possession by act of parties. . . . Care is first taken to ascertain their genuineness; and this is shown prima facie by proof that the document comes from the proper custody or by otherwise accounting for it."[2]

This doctrine is in itself simple, and the only difficulty has arisen in distinguishing it from two superficially related principles which usually come into application in the same sort of litigation. (a) One of these is the doctrine (referred to supra, par. 1) of presuming the genuineness of ancient deeds. As a part of that doctrine it has in some Courts been laid down that possession of the land must have been enjoyed by the grantee before his alleged ancient deed can be presumed genuine (post, § 2142); in that rule, then, it is the land-possession which is evidence of the document's genuineness; while in the present rule it is the document which is evidence of the land-possession. Moreover, in that rule it is the grantee's possession which is material, while in the present rule it is the lessor's or grantor's. Thus the two rules are really concerned with different evidential purposes, and rest on independent grounds. (b) The other principle is that of using deeds, or other land-documents, ancient or modern, as verbal acts accompanying an act of possession and signifying the scope of the claim of possession (post, § 1778). Here the possessor may be grantee or grantor; his possession is, with reference to the document, neither evidence of it nor evidenced by it; the document's genuineness or validity is immaterial; it merely colors and defines his claim, as a verbal part of his act of adverse possession.

[2] The line of cases is as follows: Eng.: 1783, Clarkson v. Woodhouse, 5 T. R. 412, 3 Doug. 189 (a custom to hold land exempt from common right; to show prescriptive exercise, leases of 71 and 123 years of age were received; Lord Mansfield, C. J.: "They are so old that nobody can speak to possession under them"); 1808, Rogers v. Allen, 1 Camp. 309 (alleged licenses of fishing and dredging, dated from 1661 to the end of that century, were objected to because no rent appeared to have been paid under them; Heath, J., thought this not necessary, "as they were of such an ancient date that it could not reasonably be supposed that evidence of such payments was still preserved; however, to give any weight" to them, the receipt of payment, or other acts of ownership, must be shown "in later times"); 1809, Doe v. Askew, 10 East 520 (to prove a custom of a widow's holding during chaste viduity, entries in the manor book of successions to estates so described were admitted, although no instances of the acting upon the custom by forfeiture for unchastity were testified to); 1829, Coombs v. Coether, M. & M. 398, semble (old lease-copies; possession not necessary for chapter-house leases, which were like public records); 1842, Doe v. Pulman, 3 Q. B. 622 (a counterpart of a lease, admitted, as equivalent to it, without accounting for the original lease or showing possession); 1862, Malcomson v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. C. 593, 614 (Willes, J.: "Ancient documents . . . purporting on the face of them to show exercise of ownership, such as a lease or a license, may be given in evidence without proof of possession or payment of rent under them, as being in themselves acts of ownership and proof of possession; this rule is sometimes stated with the qualification, provided that possession is proved to have followed similar documents, or that there is some proof of actual enjoyment in accordance with the title to which the documents relate"); 1878, in Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 653 (see quotation supra); 1899, Blandy-Jenkins v. Dunraven, 2 Ch. 121 (ancient agreement in settlement of litigation for trespass, admitted as "evidence of an act of possession"; following Malcomson v. O'Dea); Can.: 1885, Esterbrooks v. Towse, 24 N. Br. 387, 398 (defendant claimed under the son of C., who had been in possession, presumably under a purchase from B, who had a power of attorney to sell, given by the administrator of A, the original grantee; all the parties prior to defendant being deceased, B's indorsement on the original grant to A, which was in C's possession, that B had sold the land to C, was held admissible, though on varying grounds; Wetmore, J., diss.); U. S.: 1870, Boston v. Richardson, 105 Mass. 351 (licenses, etc. of the city made 67 and more years ago, to use certain land, objected to because "no acts were proved to have been done under them"; the licenses were received, "at least when taken in connection with the evidence of the subsequent occupation," because "it would be impossible to supply the proof required"); 1889, Baeder v. Jennings, 40 Fed. 199 (certain old documents of title admitted as evidence of possession).

(5) Finally, the reverse of the preceding inference (4) may be made; i. e. from the present possession of land the inference that there once existed a deed of it, now lost, may be made:

1844, Gilchrist, J., in New Boston v. Dunbarton, 15 N. H. 201, 205: "The jury may find, from the facts in a case, that a certain deed once existed, although there be no direct evidence of its execution. Where parties have occupied land and have conducted themselves precisely as they would have done if a deed had been made, it may be left to the jury to say whether a deed under which one of the parties claims ever had an existence. . . . Whether a fact which is unknown is to be presumed from its usual connection with other facts which are known would seem to be properly in all cases a question for the jury."

This is the logical foundation of the presumption of a lost grant, which after long service has finally degenerated into a mere rule of substantive law (post, § 2522), although the living principle of the original inference is still occasionally open to application.[3] It may be noted here that this inference, of a document's execution from the fact of land-possession, has no relation to the inference of possession of the whole of a piece of land from possession of a part (post, § 378).

§ 158. Negative Traces: (1) Lack of News, to show Death or Loss. Where certain results would have followed if an act or an event had occurred (or not occurred) the absence of those results is some indication that the act or event has not occurred (or occurred). A common class of evidence of this sort is that of lack of news to show probable death of a person or the probable loss of a ship; for as it is usual for living persons to be heard from directly or indirectly, by persons having an interest in knowing, and for ships' officers to leave word of their journey at the ports they touch or with the other ships they pass, the lack of any such news indicates their non-existence. Such evidence has always been received.[1] It is usually discussed, however, with reference to the legal presumption of death, founded on this evidence (post, § 2531). The fact of lack of news is admissible without regard to the time elapsed, and is not limited by the seven-year-period required for the

[3] 1869, Goodell v. Labadie, 19 Mich. 88 (agreement to exchange lands; deed performing this agreement by one party admitted to show probable performance by the other also); 1844, Downing v. Pickering, 15 N. H. 344, 350 (possession, plus an agreement to make the deeds, sufficient on the facts to go to the jury).

[1] A good example of such evidence in its various possibilities will be found in the Tichborne Case, R. v. Castro, Charge of C. J. Cockburn, passim. Other examples are as follows: 1763, Rowe v. Hasland, 1 W. Bl. 404, Lord Mansfield, C. J. (that a person "has not been heard of for many years," admissible to show death; here the person had lived in Liverpool); 1815, Watson v. King, 1 Stark. 121 (loss of a ship; evidence admitted that she had been last seen in a tempest in March, 1814, and never since heard from; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "observed that this was the kind of proof usually given in actions against insurers, where the vessel is proved to have sailed and has not been heard of for two or three years").

presumption. In counter-explanation (ante, § 34) such facts as the infrequency of communication from the place the person went to, the fixed determination of the person to give up all connection with his former home, and the like, may of course be used to explain away the force of the fact of lack of news.[2]

§ 159. Same: (2) Lapse of Time, to show Payment. It is a natural propensity of creditors to realize their claims, when left unsatisfied, by process of law, within a fair space of time; and when it is found, after some time, that a creditor has not resorted to law for the realization of his claim, there is a natural inference that this failure was due to the lack of right and necessity to resort to law, i. e. that the claim had been satisfied by payment. The fact may be explained away by showing a more probable hypothesis (ante, § 34), for example, the insolvency of the debtor, his absence, or other circumstance likely to prevent the creditor from proceeding even though the claim was unpaid. The general evidentiary fact, however — lapse of time — is also the foundation of a legal presumption of payment (post, § 2517), and plays very little part in the theory of admissibility.

§ 160. Same: (3) Lost Will; Lost Documents in general; Debtor's Fraud in Possession; Sundry Instances. There are various other situations in which a retrospectant inference is permissible from the absence of certain results to the absence of certain causes. Most of these raise no doubt of admissibility and are commonly of importance only in the rules of presumption or elsewhere; the chief of these are the inference, from the non-discovery of a will once existing, to the testator's revocatory destruction of it (post, § 2523), the inference from the non-discovery of any document and the lapse of time, to the loss of the document (post, §§ 1195, 2522), and the inference, from a debtor's continued possession of property, after its mortgage or sale, of his fraudulent intent to defraud creditors by the transfer (post, §§ 336, 1082, 1779). In general, that a certain effect was not seen or heard by those who would naturally have seen or heard it had its cause occurred is some evidence of the non-occurrence.[1] But, though this situation can thus be treated as permitting an inference from circumstantial evidence, it is usually more natural to treat it as involving testimonial evidence; i. e. the argument is that witness A is qualified to testify that act X was not done by B, because A would have seen or heard it if it had been done; A's statement that it was not done is therefore receivable; thus, the principle of testimonial knowledge is here the controlling one (post, § 671).

[2] That the evidence of inability to find a person is not hearsay, see post, § 1789.

[1] 1805, R. v. Long Buckby, 7 East 45 (the fact that a document required to be stamped and sealed is not found recorded as so treated, admissible to show that it was not stamped); 1894, State v. Delaney, 92 Ia. 467, 61 N. W. 189 (to show that a person could not have left the house during the night, the fact admitted that other inmates were so situated that they must have been awakened, but were not).

b. Organic Traces.

Next are to be considered those retrospectant inferences which rest for their validity, not upon mechanical associations of effect and cause, but upon the working of organic natural laws, and usually upon some physiological principle. The fact offered as evidence is traced back to its cause through some physiological process to the originating act.

§ 164. Birth during Marriage, to show Legitimacy. When a child X is born to a wife A married to a husband B, it is natural to infer that the intercourse which begot the child was the intercourse of the husband B, i. e. that the child is legitimate. It is true that this inference is less strong where the birth occurs very shortly after the marriage; but even here the likelihood that the pre-marital intercourse was B's is greater than that it was another man's. It is also true that, even where the birth occurs a year or more after the marriage, it is possible that the begetting intercourse was another man's; but it is still exceedingly more likely that it was that of B the husband. Upon this likelihood is founded a rule of procedure, namely, the presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527). No controversy of admissibility arises.

§ 165. Same: Adultery of the Mother, to show Illegitimacy. A birth during marriage having been shown by the proponent of legitimacy, the opponent, according to the theory of explanation (ante, § 34), would ordinarily be allowed to show that the birth could be accounted for otherwise than by the husband's begetting, i. e. could show the mother's intercourse with another man, about the probable time of conception, as accounting for the birth. In the same way, a person charged as the father of an unmarried woman's child might explain away the evidentiary fact of the birth of a child by showing the fact of her intercourse with other men about the time. This form of argument, however, seems more correctly to fall under the theory of multiple opportunity, and the rule of law accordingly has been examined under that head (ante, §§ 133, 134).

§ 166. Resemblance of Child, to show Paternity. If the corporal traits of the progenitor are or may be transmitted to the progeny, then a specific corporal trait of the progeny may point back to a person of similar trait as the progenitor, on the condition that the person so charged as progenitor is within the number of those who by association and opportunity may have had intercourse; for otherwise the possible number of similar persons would leave open too many hypotheses. The propriety of the inference rests on the supposed physiological likelihood that traits may be transmitted by procreation. The validity of this physiological principle, and therefore the propriety of the inference, is and always has been a matter of common knowledge:

1598, William Shakspeare, King John, Act I, Scene 1 (the king hears a lawsuit between Philip Faulconbridge, the supposed Bastard son of Sir Robert Faulconbridge's wife by Richard the Lion-hearted, and Robert Faulconbridge his younger brother, who claims the estates):

Bastard: "But that I am as well begot, my liege, . . .
Compare our faces and be judge yourself
If old Sir Robert did beget us both
And were our father and this son like him."
Elinor (queen-mother of Richard): "He hath a trick of Cœur-de-Lion's face;
The accent of his tongue affecteth him.
Do you not read some tokens of my son
In the large composition of this man?"
Bastard (who is more interested in proving himself Richard's son): "Sir Robert could do well; marry, to confess,
Could he get me? Sir Robert could not do it;
We know his handiwork. Therefore, good mother,
To whom am I beholding for these limbs?
Sir Robert never holp to make this leg."

1769, Lord Mansfield, C. J., in the Douglas Peerage Case, 2 Hargr. Collect. Jurid. 402: "I have always considered likeness as an argument of a child's being the son of a parent; and the rather as the distinction between individuals in the human species is more discernible than in other animals. A man may survey ten thousand people before he sees two faces perfectly alike; and in an army of an hundred thousand men every one may be known from another. If there should be a likeness of features, there may be a discriminancy of voice, a difference in the gesture, the smile, and various other things; whereas a family-likeness generally runs through all these; for in everything there is a resemblance, as of features, size, attitude, and action. . . . If Sir John Stewart, the most artless of mankind, was actor in the enlevement of Mignon and Sanry's [the supposed parents'] children, he did in a few days what the acutest genius could not accomplish for years. He found two children, the one the finished model of himself, and the other the exact picture in miniature of Lady Jane. It seems nature had implanted in the children what is not in the parents; for it appears in proof that in size, complexion, stature, attitude, color of the hair and eyes, nay and in every other thing, Mignon and his wife, and Sanry and his spouse, were toto cœlo different from and unlike to Sir John Stewart and Lady Jane Douglas. Among eleven black rabbits, there will scarce be found one to produce a white one."

1859, Fowler, J., in Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108, 113: "The practice of bringing before the jury, on trials for bastardy, the child whose paternity is sought to be established, when living, has been almost universal in this State, from the earliest recollection of the oldest practitioners. . . . If the child were referred to at all, its general appearance, its complexion and features, might properly be commented upon; and we think, under the well-established physiological law that like begets like, and that generally there is a striking resemblance, more or less strong and striking, between the parent and his child, it was a fair matter of argument before the jury, by the counsel on both sides, whether or not there had been anything in the complexion, appearance, and features of the child which the witness had produced and identified before them, tending to indicate its other parent."

The English practice seems always to have admitted this evidence without question.[1] In the United States the early practice was probably the same;

[1] 16—, Piercy's Case, 12 How. St. Tr. 1199 ("This James Piercy was a trunk-maker in the Strand; . . . one of his arguments to make you believe him a true descendant of the Piercys was that he was born with a mole on his body, as other of the Piercys had been, like a half-moon; the crescent being the crest of the Piercys earls of Northumberland"); 1743, Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1139, 1316, 1321; 1769, Douglas Peerage Case (quoted supra); 1797, Day v. Day, Trial, 3d ed., 827, quoted in Nicolas, Adulterine Bastardy, 140, and Hubback, Succession, 384 (Heath, J., received "evidence that the defendant bore a strong resemblance to his supposed father," and in summing up "admitted that resemblance was frequently fanciful, and therefore the jury should be well convinced that it did exist; but

but as the chief use of the evidence was found in filiation proceedings, to charge the defendant with the paternity of a bastard, the possible abuses of the evidence led to an unfortunate questioning of its validity under any circumstances:

1888, Foster, J., in Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454, 456, 15 Atl. 56: "While it may be a well-known physiological fact that peculiarities of form, feature, and personal traits are oftentimes transmitted from parent to child, yet it is equally true as a matter of common knowledge that during the first few weeks, or even months, of a child's existence, it has that peculiar immaturity of features which characterize it as an infant, and that it changes often and very much in looks and appearance during that period. Resemblance can then be readily imagined. . . . And in a trial in bastardy proceedings the mere fact that a resemblance is claimed would be too likely to lead captive the imagination of the jury, and they would fancy they could see points of resemblance between the child and the putative father."

Now it must be noted that this opinion (which is representative of others) does not dispute the validity of the inference from resemblance of features to paternity; its quarrel is with the difficulty of establishing the fact which is the foundation of the inference, namely, the resemblance. The answers to this objection are several. (1) The fanciful acceptance of a resemblance — which is the danger feared — is only likely where the child is so young as to have no decidedly marked features; and it is both proper and feasible to obviate this objection by excluding the evidence where the child is too young, either by leaving the matter to the trial Court's discretion, or by fixing a specific minimum age. (2) The physiological principle being perfectly well settled, it is poor policy to exclude invariably a piece of evidence that will usually be useful merely because it may occasionally be abused. (3) The Opinion rule cannot avail to exclude testimony to resemblance, because matters of identity, similarity, and the like are well settled to be not obnoxious to that rule (post, § 1974).

A number of Courts in the United States now exclude this kind of evidence, partly through misunderstanding the precedents in its favor, partly for the reasons above quoted. Moreover, by a curious contrariety of views, in some instances the evidentiary fact of resemblance is excluded only when offered through testimony of those who have seen the child; in other instances, only when offered by the presentation of the child in court. The partial exclusion of the former mode of evidence is based chiefly on the Opinion rule — the fallacy of which, in this application, needs no further exposition —; and partly also on the ease with which a resemblance can be affirmed in general terms, but the simple correction for this danger is to require detailed statements of specific traits, for the force of the inference rests on these and not on a general resemblance. The partial exclusion of the other mode of evidence — presentation of the child in court — rests if they were so convinced, it was impossible to have stronger evidence"; this latter part of the remark of Mr. J. Heath has sometimes been omitted, when the former part was quoted, by Courts opposed to the use of the evidence, e. g. in Jones v. Jones, infra; Heath, J.'s ruling is also given in the abridged report of the case in Craik's English Causes Célèbres, 215, 223); 1837, Andrews v. Askey, 8 C. & P. 7, 9 (used without objection).

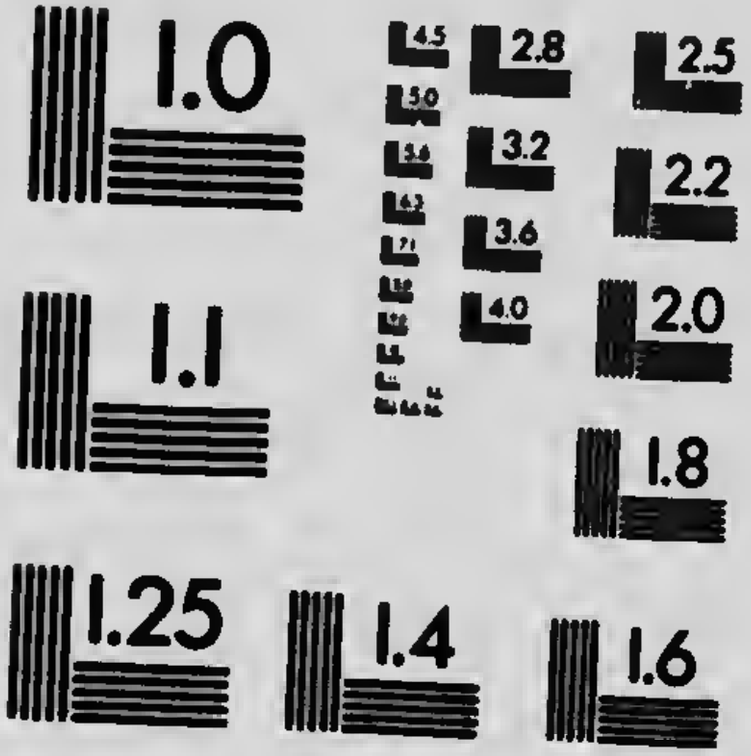
MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5969 - Fax

on no good reason whatever, and is further considered under the principle involved (post, § 1160).

The sound rule is to admit the fact of similarity of specific traits, however presented, provided the child is in the opinion of the trial Court old enough to possess settled features or other corporal indications.[2] It is to be noted that the evidence is relevant not merely in bastardy proceedings, but also in trying the legitimacy of a child born during marriage, whenever the presumption of legitimacy allows the issue to be raised (post, § 2527), as well as occasionally in other proceedings.

[2] The rulings in the various jurisdictions are as follows: Ala.: 1875, Paulk v. State, 52 Ala. 427, 429 (lack of resemblance to the defendant, or resemblance to another man who had opportunities of intercourse, admissible; but not resemblance to the children of the other man, because they might have their features from their mother; semble, also that resemblance may not be shown by testimony); 1902, Kelly v. State, 133 id. 195, 32 So. 56 (bastardy; child about a year old, allowed to be shown to the jury); Cal.: 1889, Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 417, 21 Pac. 976 (inheritance; resemblance, as shown by photographs, allowed to be used to show paternity; inspection in Court declared much more valuable; semble, the opinion of witnesses, inadmissible); Ind.: 1862, Risk v. State, 19 Ind. 152 (age unstated; propriety of evidence doubted, because of the uncertainty of a mere infant's features, and because "it would involve the necessity of giving the alleged father in evidence"); 1870, Reitz v. State, 33 id. 187 (same); Ia.: 1874, Stumm v. Hummel, 39 Ia. 478, 480 (criminal conversation; resemblance assumed to be relevant); 1878, State v. Danforth, 48 id. 43, 47 (child three months old; resemblance excluded, there being no corroborating evidence); 1880, State v. Smith, 54 id. 104, 6 N. W. 153 (child two years and one month old; resemblance allowed to be considered as a general principle, the child being of sufficient age); 1900, State v. Harvey, 112 id. 416, 84 N. W. 535 (exhibition of child under two years, held improper); Kan.: 1895, Shorten v. Judd, 56 Kan. 43, 42 Pac. 337 (admitted); Me.: 1839, Keniston v. Rowe, 16 Me. 38 ("it was not the color or any peculiarity of conformation or form of features as matters of fact that were proposed to be proved; it was to prove a resemblance, which is matter of opinion," and therefore inadmissible); 1888, Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 id. 454 (a child six weeks old; resemblance, whether by exhibition or by testimony held irrelevant, apparently irrespective of the child's age); Md.: 1876, Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 151 (inheritance; "When the parties are before the jury, and the latter can make the comparison for themselves, whatever resemblance is discovered may be a circumstance, in connection with others, to be considered"; but resemblance being "notional" and "fanciful," it cannot be shown by testimony); Mass.: 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. 435, 438 (excluded; here offered by witnesses, and declared obnoxious to the Opinion rule); 1867, Finnegan v. Dugan, 14 id. 197 (admitted as relevant; here the child was shown to the jury; no authorities cited); 1869, Young v. Makepeace, 103 Mass. 50, 54 (child shown to the jury; but testimony to the dissimilarity between the child and a third person, not present, but alleged by the defendant to be the real father, excluded; reasons confused and exact rule left obscure; Finnegan v. Dugan not cited); 1894, Farrell v. Weitz, 160 id. 288, 35 N. E. 783 (likeness not allowed to be shown by photograph of third person alleged as the father by defendant; semble, comparison by actual presence allowable; Mich.: 1884, People v. White, 53 Mich. 537 (resemblance of a young infant; "we do not well see how the jury could be prevented from noticing the child, which was properly enough in court"); N. H.: 1859, Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108, 113 (resemblance allowed to be considered; here by exhibition); 1900, State v. Saidell, 70 id. 174, 46 Atl. 1083 (resemblance on exhibition to jury, allowed to be considered); N. J.: 1888, Gaunt v. State, 50 N. J. L. 490, 493, 495, 14 Atl. 600 (fornication; resemblance admissible, without any apparent limitations; "the illusory nature of such resemblances rather imposing a duty on the Court in conjunction with the admission of the proof, than militating against the relevancy of the inquiry"; resemblance to be available either by inspection or through witnesses); N. C.: 1872, State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 89, semble (admissible); 1878, State v. Britt, 78 id. 439, 442 (resemblance to a third person, the alleged father, admitted); Oh.: 1892, Crow v. Jordan, 49 Oh. St. 655, 32 N. E. 750 (child allowed to be exhibited); Tenn.: 1846, Cannon v. Cannon, 7 Humph. 410, 411 (distribution of estate; resemblance used to evidence illegitimacy); Tex.: 1852, Higginbotham v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 20 S. W. 360 (admitted); 1899, Hilton v. State, 41 id. 190, 53 S. W. 113 (adultery; resemblance of child seven months old, excluded); Ut.: 1901, State v. Neel, 23 Utah 541, 65 Pac. 494 (illicit intercourse; child not allowed to be exhibited, following Hanawalt v. State, infra); U. S.: 1809, U. S. v. Collins, 1 Cr. C. C. 592 (excluded, from witnesses); Wis.: 1895, Hanawalt v. State, 64 Wis. 84, 24 N. W. 489 (excluded, where the child was less than a year old; but perhaps admissible for an adult; the jury's inspection disapproved).

§ 167. Corporal Traits, to show Race or Nationality. A physiological principle, similar to the preceding one, but attended usually with more clearly marked results, tells us that the progeny of persons of one race receive from the progenitors certain corporal traits very different from the traits transmitted from a progenitor of another race. The presence of these peculiar traits of the race are therefore evidential to show a progenitor of the race bearing those traits. The admissibility of this evidence has never been doubted by Courts; though its use, since the abolition of slavery in this country, is now very rare, because the issues in which it is relevant can only be uncommon.[1] There seems no reason why similar evidence should not occasionally be usable to show foreign birth or origin from a foreign nation, even though from a people of the same race.[2]

§ 168. Birthmarks, to show Events during Pregnancy; Venereal Disease, to show Adultery. There remain two other instances of this form of inference, one as yet hardly accepted, the other fully conceded, in its scientific basis. (1) That a shock received by the mother during pregnancy may leave a mark upon the child has long been a popular belief. Should it ever receive scientific sanction in any defined terms, the child's corporal mark after birth may be taken as evidential of the act which produced it.[1] (2) That the existence of venereal disease in a husband is some evidence of an act of adultery on his part has always been conceded;[2] it is merely a question of the strength of the explanatory circumstances.

c. Mental Traces.

§ 172. General Principle. The struggle of a victim for his life, and the act of taking his life, may leave upon the perpetrator indelible traces of

[1] 1861, Daniel v. Guy, 23 Ark. 50, 51 (footformation, admitted as evidential of negro race); 1856, Bryan v. Walton, 20 Ga. 480, 508 (complexion, etc., of alleged slaves, considered to prove ancestry); 1864, Nave's Adm'r v. Williams, 22 Ind. 370 (color and featnres, to show race, admitted); 1835, Gentry v. McGinnis, 3 Dana Ky. 382, 388 (white color of an alleged slave, received to sbow white ancestry; "a black or mulatto complexion is prima facie evidence" of slavery, black anceators being necessarily slaves, and "one apparently a white person or an Indian," is prima facie free); 1839, Chancellor v. Milly, 9 id. 24 (appearance of an alleged slave, received to infer ancestry); 1888, Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454, 457 (complexion, etc., admissible in determining race); Mo. Rev. St. 1899, § 2174 (illegal mixed marriage; jury "may determine the proportion of negro hlood in any party to such marriage from the appearance of such person"); 1826, Fox v. Lambson, 8 N. J. L. 275, 277 (black color raises a presumption of slavery); 1897, Warlick v. White, 76 N. C. 175, 178 (color of a child, to show black hlood, and therefore illegitimacy, admitted); 1846, White v. Collector, 3 Rich. 138, 140 (color admissihle to evidence race); 1806, Hudgin v. Wrights, 1 Hen. & M. 134, 137 (long, straigbt, hlack hair, and copper complexion, for Indians, and flat nose, woolly hair, and color of complexion, for negroes, admissible to show ancestry); 1811, Hook v. Pagee, 2 Munf. 379, 383 (complexion of an alleged slave, admitted to ahow ancestry); 1827, Gregory v. Bangh, 4 Rand. 611, 613 (complexion, etc., assumed proper to determine Indian anceatry).

[2] 1856, Dennis v. Brewater, 7 Gray 351, 353 (foreign birth; arrival as a child on a ship, foreign appearance, speech, and gestures, dark complexion, etc., held aufficient).

[1] Anon., cited hy Irving Browne, Green Bag, 1892, V, 555 (Mercer Co., Pa.; the complainant charged an assault upon her two weeka before hy the defendant in a lonely house; the defendant was held for trial, but three weeks before it occnrred, the complainant was delivered of a child, and on the child's throat and wrist appeared insrks of a thnmh, etc., auch as the complainant had alleged).

[2] 1794, Popkin v. Popkin, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 765, 767 ("Whether this disease is [sufficient] evidence of adultery may depend upon circumstances"); 1835, Johnson v. Johnson, 14 Wend. 637, 639, 641 (venereal disease contracted by a hnsband during the wife's absence is evidence of his adultery).

blood, wounds, or rent clothing, which point back to the deed as done by him; these traces come from a mechanical contact with the body, weapons, and other things involved in the deed, and they remain upon him or are divested from him by a mechanical process. But a deed may also leave traces upon the doer through other than a mechanical process, i. e. through a mental, moral, or psychological process. These traces may be as significant in their way as the others, — perhaps more so; and they may be equally relevant evidentially to show their bearer to be the doer of the act. These traces, like those of the other sorts, may be employed either affirmatively or negatively. The presence of such a trace may be used as indicating the doing of the act by the person bearing it; and the absence of the trace may be used as indicating the not doing it by the person not bearing the trace. The traces of this mental or psychological sort will be some form of a mental condition, — memory, belief, consciousness, knowledge, or whatever other name may be more usual and appropriate.

How to evidence this mental condition — by conduct or the like — is a different question. There is here involved simply the question, When is memory, consciousness, and the like, relevant to show the doing of a past act? The evidencing of this mental condition raises different and more complicated questions as to the significance of conduct; hence a consideration of the state of the law upon the various uses of the present sort of evidence can best be made in connection with the rules of conduct-evidence. Those rules in their details are elsewhere examined (post, §§ 265–293). It is enough here to summarize the chief types of inference of the present sort, and thus to exhibit the place of this inference in the general doctrine of Relevancy.

§ 173. Consciousness of Guilt. The commission of a crime leaves usually upon the consciousness a moral impression which is characteristic. The innocent man is without it; the guilty man usually has it. Its evidential value has never been doubted. The inference from consciousness of guilt to "guilty" is always available in evidence. It is a most powerful one, because the only other hypothesis conceivable is the rare one that the person's consciousness is caused by an insane delusion, and not by the actual doing of the act. The difficulty in connection with this evidence is, not its own relevancy to show the doing of the act — that is universally conceded —, but the mode of proving this consciousness of guilt in its turn by other evidence. There are two processes or inferences involved, — from conduct to consciousness of guilt, and then from consciousness of guilt to the guilty deed. The latter, belonging here, gives rise to no disputed questions of evidence. The former gives rise to many questions, due to the variety of conduct offerable in evidence. These questions are dealt with (post, §§ 273–291), in discussing evidence of consciousness or knowledge in general. It is worth while here to note this double step of inference involved; for it exhibits the true significance of the evidential use of conduct as indicating consciousness of guilt.

§ 174. Consciousness of Innocence. Just as the lack of mechanical or corporal traces may be used negatively (ante, § 158) to show the non-doing of an act, so the lack of guilty consciousness may be useful to show innocence of a crime. This lack of guilty consciousness — in other words, this consciousness of innocence — seems not to have been doubted by Courts as having in itself evidential value. But, assuming it to be relevant, a difficulty arises in the proof of it as a proposition, — the difficulty that the conduct offered to evidence it is so likely to be feigned and artificial. The disputed question, then, whether the conduct of an accused person is admissible in his favor, involves a doubt, not as to the evidential value of consciousness of innocence as indicating non-doing, but as to the evidential value of conduct as showing consciousness of innocence, — a problem elsewhere examined (post, § 293).

§ 175. Belief or Recollection of Personal Doings, as Evidence of Identity. All personal deeds are likely to leave some sort of a mark in the recollection or belief. The presence of that mark is some indication of the doing of the act recollected, and the absence of the mark is some evidence of the non-doing of the act. Where a person's identity is in issue, his recollection or non-recollection of experiences known to have occurred to the person with whom he is to be identified may often serve as useful evidence. For the reasons already stated, the rulings on this subject can best be examined elsewhere (post, § 270).

§ 176. Same: Legitimacy, as evidenced by Parent's Conduct; Marriage, by "Habit"; Testamentary Execution, by the Deceased's Belief. Among the most notable facts of life which are certain to leave marked traces on those into whose experience they enter are the facts of marriage, of the birth of children, and of the execution of a testament. Long tradition has recognized this, and has in these cases sanctioned the inference from subsequent belief or recollection to the prior act or experience. But the real difficulty lies in the inference from conduct to that belief, and, for the reason already noted, the details of the law can best be examined in another place, — the inference to legitimacy, under § 269, to marriage, under § 268, and to testamentary execution, under § 271.

§ 177. Conduct of Animals, as evidencing a Human Act. If the instinct or habit of animals can in a given case be supposed to be sensitive to the dealings of men with them, it would seem that the conduct of an animal may be trusted evidentially as indicating the human act which would naturally have caused the animal's conduct.[1] Such indications may be of two kinds. (1) The behavior of the animal may be a trick or other action expressly taught or implicitly acquired during his past association with a particular person; the possession of such a trick by a given animal will therefore serve to identify him as having been in that person's possession. This evidential use is well established in judicial practice, though it has seldom been brought before courts of appeal.[2] (2) The behavior of the animal may be the result of an impression made on some peculiarly strong sense by a casual outward event or human act, incapable of being perceived by the human senses. The behavior of a horse in the vicinity of a concealed beast of prey is an instance of this. The custom, in certain of our communities, of tracking fugitives by bloodhounds, rests on a similar trait of those animals. It seems to be conceded that evidentially the fact that a well-trained bloodhound of good breed, after smelling a shoe or other article belonging to the doer of a crime, has tracked to the accused, is admissible to show that the accused was the doer of the criminal act.[3]

[1] For animal's conduct as evidencing the character or disposition of the animal, see post, § 201.

[2] Circa 1530, More's "Life of Sir Thomas More," quoted in Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors," II, 37 (story of the beggar-woman's little dog, who was bought from a thief by the Chancellor's wife; the Chancellor allowed her to prove property by the dog's recognition of her); 1800, Anon., in Twiss' Life of Lord Eldon, I, 354 (quoted post, § 1152); 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 185, 17 Atl. 483 (where a complicated set of turnings on different roads must have been followed by the incendiary, evidence was admitted that the defendant's horse shortly after took the same turning without guidance); 1894, Chicago Herald, May 31 (a German saloonkeeper in Chicago lost his parrot; in the possession of an American saloonkeeper a similar parrot was found; the ownership of this parrot was claimed by both parties, each affirming that he had possessed and trained the parrot for a long time, and that the parrot would show the effect of this training in his language; at the trial before Justice of the Peace Eberhardt, the parrot would not speak; he was therefore committed temporarily to the custody of a police-captain; "Captain Barcel will keep the bird in custody, and will keep his ears strained to catch either 'Set 'em up again,' or 'Unser bier ist gut'"); 1900, Boston Transcript, Dec. 12 (in East Orange, N. J.; the larceny of a carrier pigeon by B. from E. was charged; the defendant claiming to be owner, the pigeon was released, and alighted later in E.'s barn).

[3] 1896, Simpson v. State, 111 Ala. 6, 20 So. 572, semble (that bloodhounds had tracked the defendant from the place of the crime, admitted, the dog's habit being never to leave a human track once scented); 1898, Pedigo v. Com., 103 Ky. 41, 44 S. W. 143 (admitted; DuRelle, J.: "It is difficult to lay down a general rule as to the introduction of testimony of this kind. . . . We think it may be safely laid down that, in order to make such testimony competent, even when it is shown that the dog is of pure blood, and of a stock characterized by acuteness of scent and power of discrimination, it must also be established that the dog in question is possessed of these qualities, and has been trained or tested in their exercise in the tracking of human beings, and that these facts must appear from the testimony of some person who has personal knowledge thereof. We think it must also appear that the dog so trained and tested was laid on the trail, whether visible or not, concerning which testimony has been admitted, at a point where the circumstances tend clearly to show that the guilty party had been, or upon a track which such circumstances indicated to have been made by him." Guffy, J., diss., in an able opinion); 1901, State v. Moore, 129 N. C. 494, 39 S. E. 626 (that a bloodhound trailed and pointed out the defendants, charged with larceny of meat and other things, was held inadmissible on the facts, without denying that it might be a "circumstance to be considered in connecting a person with an act"); 1903, Brott v. State, — Nebr. —, 97 N. W. 593 (behavior of bloodhounds in trailing the defendant, held inadmissible on the facts).

TITLE I (continued): CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

SUB-TITLE II: EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

CHAPTER IX.

§ 190. Nature of this Class of Evidence. 1. The reasons for dividing into three groups the whole subject of Circumstantial Evidence have been already stated (ante, § 43). The groups being distinguished according to the propositions to be proved, the second group is now to be considered, namely, Evidence to prove a Human Quality, Condition, or other attribute. This group of propositions (facta probanda) separates itself from the first (Human Acts) with fair distinctness, not only because the circumstances available as evidence are usually distinct for the two groups, but also and chiefly because certain general considerations of policy, as well as of relevancy, run through the present group, constantly reappearing, and not only making various analogies useful, but rendering it impossible to understand the rules of evidence for certain kinds of propositions without considering those for others. Though the distinction between the two groups is only a rough and practical one, nevertheless, it is in essence a real and unavoidable one, and is calculated to aid in the study of the evidential questions involved. It is also by no means an artificial one, but is fully in harmony with the attitude of the Courts towards the problems involved.

2. The various conceivable propositions to be proved may be reduced to the following well-defined sorts: Moral Character or Disposition; Physical and Mental Capacity; Design or Plan, and Intent; Knowledge, Belief, or Consciousness; Motive or Emotion; Habit or Custom, and Possession; Traits of Handwriting; Identity. A different analysis and order of treatment is conceivable; but with reference to the usefulness of putting in proximity those matters which throw light upon each other, this division and this order seem the most practical.

3. It will be understood that we are here not concerned how the above human qualities come to be propositions for proof.[1] We are concerned only to learn what facts will be admissible evidentially to prove the quality proposed for proof. For instance, character may be in issue through the pleadings in a suit for slander on a plea of justification, or in an action for personal injury as an element of the defendant's liability for an incompetent servant; or it may be used, not as in issue through the pleadings, but as evidential to prove a human act, for example, the good character of a defendant in a criminal case or his bad character in rebuttal. So, also, knowledge may be in issue in a suit to set aside a purchase in fraud of creditors, or it may be evidential only, as when it is offered to prove the doing of a past act as a mark of identity (post, § 270). In all these instances the quality which is termed character, knowledge, or the like, has somehow come into the case as a proposition to be proved; and the question how to evidence it presents itself equally whether the factum probandum, when once proved, is going in turn to be used itself evidentially to show some other fact, or is one of the very ultimate propositions made material by the pleadings. It is true that by tradition or by policy the mode of proof available in the one case may sometimes not be available in the other; but this is only an incidental and not a necessary or common feature.

4. Three species of evidential facts are available to show a human quality or condition.[2] (1) Conduct; this is the expression, in outward behavior or acts, of the quality or condition operating to produce effects. These results are the traces by which we may infer the moving cause. In point of time, conduct is closely associated with the internal condition giving rise to it; nevertheless, the indication is strictly not a concomitant, but a retrospectant one (ante, § 43), because the argument is backwards from effect (conduct) to cause (internal condition). (2) External facts pointing forward to the probable coming into existence of the quality; for example, the victim's gold, as pointing forward to the defendant's probable desire to rob him, or the reputation of A's insolvency, as pointing forward to B's probable receipt of knowledge of it. In using this evidence, we take our stand beforehand and argue that the evidential fact probably gave rise to the emotion, knowledge, or intent to be proved. The indication is thus prospectant; while that of conduct is retrospectant. (3) There is also a third sort of fact, having either a prospectant or a retrospectant indication, and not exactly corresponding to either of the preceding sorts, namely, prior or subsequent condition, as showing condition at a given time. Thus, to prove insanity, we may offer (1) conduct as the effect illustrating its cause, mental aberration, (2) circumstances of unsuccessful business, domestic troubles, and the like, tending to bring on insanity; and (3) prior or subsequent insanity, pointing forwards or backwards to insanity at the time in question. So also, to show a husband's desire or motive to get rid of his wife, we may offer (1) his conduct exhibiting such a desire, (2) the existence of a paramour, tending to create such a desire, and (3) a prior desire, as pointing forward to its continued existence at the time in question. A similar general question presents itself in all evidence of this third sort, namely, how far before or after the time in question the survey may extend in considering the fact of prior or subsequent condition. For some subjects, all three of these sorts of evidence are available, perhaps with equal frequency; for others only one or two of them are available, at least usually; thus, to evidence character, facts of the second sort do not come into play at all, — unless the principles of heredity one day become so clearly ascertainable as to offer a sure basis of argument from ancestry. It is enough to note that in taking up the different facta probanda a convenient order of arrangement of the evidential facts may be based on this triple division.

[1] For the distinction between proposition, the matter to be proved, and evidentiary fact, the evidence to prove it, see ante, § 2.

[2] This classification does not hold good for the last subject, Identity, above-mentioned; but that is to some extent anomalous, and its peculiarities need not be noticed here.

5. The distinction between a pure principle of Relevancy and a doctrine of Auxiliary Policy (expounded ante, § 42) is in the present subject of constant importance. Our first question, for any kind of evidence, must be, Is it relevant, i. e. has it probative value enough to be considered? But even when it is relevant and would so far be admissible, it may still be shut out by some principle forbidding confusion of issues or undue prejudice, or other exclusionary doctrine of auxiliary policy (post, § 1904). It is practically necessary to treat in one place the two sets of considerations, relevancy and auxiliary policy, as applied to the same piece of evidence; but it must not be forgotten that the two are entirely distinct in function.

Topic I: Evidence to prove Character or Disposition.

§ 191. Kinds of Evidence. It is here assumed that Moral Character or Disposition is somehow in the case to be proved, — either as material under the pleadings or as evidential to prove something else (ante, § 54). The question then here arises, what evidential facts may be used to prove it. Of the three sorts of facts just described, the second sort is here wholly unavailable; there is no external fact from which we can argue forward that a person will have a certain character. The third sort of fact, prior or subsequent character, as indicating character at the time in question, is undoubtedly available evidence; but its use is so complicated with the question of using reputation (under the Hearsay exception) at a prior or subsequent time, that both subjects can best be examined together; accordingly the use of prior or subsequent character, to evidence character at the time in question, is there dealt with (post, § 1617). The material here to be considered, therefore, is the first sort of evidence, — the sort by far the commonest and the only one that raises questions of serious difficulty. Under what condition, then, is conduct admissible to evidence Character?

1. Conduct to show Character of a Defendant in a Criminal Case.

§ 192. Nature of the Inference; an Act is not evidential of another Act. At the outset of this entire prospectant class of inferences, it must be noted that, where the doing of an act is the proposition to be proved, there can never be a direct inference from an act of former conduct to the act charged; there must always be a double step of inference of some sort, a tertium quid. In other words, it cannot be argued: "Because A did an act X last year, therefore he probably did the act X as now charged." Human action being infinitely varied, there is no adequate probative connection between the two. A may do the act once, and may never do it again; and not only may he not do it again, but it is in no degree probable that he will do it again. The conceivable contingencies that may intervene are too numerous.

Thus, whenever resort is had to a person's past conduct or acts as the basis of inference to a subsequent act, it must always be done intermediately through another inference. It may be argued: "A once committed a robbery; (1) therefore he probably has a thieving disposition; (2) therefore he probably committed this robbery"; or "(1) therefore he had some general design to commit certain robberies; (2) therefore he probably carried out that design and committed this robbery." Or it may be argued: "A gave money to his poor friend B; (1) therefore A probably is of a benevolent disposition; (2) therefore A probably did not commit the present robbery"; or "(1) therefore he probably had a kindly feeling towards B; (2) therefore he probably did not rob B." The impulse to argue from A's former bad deed or good deed directly to his doing or not doing of the bad deed charged is perhaps a natural one; but it will always be found, upon analysis of the process of reasoning, that there is involved in it a hidden intermediary step of some sort, resting on a second inference of character, motive, plan, or the like. This intermediate step is always implicit, and must be brought out. The result is that, when the ultimate proposition to be proved is the doing of an act by a defendant, and resort is had evidentially to his past conduct, this is not in order to argue directly from act to act, but in order, by the past act, to evidence character, design, motive, or some other quality, and through that quality to infer that it led to the act charged. . . . make available such evidence of past conduct or acts, some use for it must be found as evidencing character, design, or other quality.

This principle has long been accepted in our law. That "the doing of one act is in itself no evidence that the same or a like act was again done by the same person," has been so often judicially repeated that it is a commonplace:

1872, Agnew, J., in Shaffner v. Com., 72 Pa. 65: "It is a general rule that a distinct crime, unconnected with that laid in the indictment, cannot be given in evidence against a prisoner. . . . Logically the commission of an independent offence is not proof in itself of the commission of another crime."

1893, Knowlton, J., in Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 129: "That a person has committed one crime has no direct tendency to show that he committed another similar crime which had no connection with the first."

1896, Martin, J., in People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 365, 386, 44 N. E. 1041: "It is an elementary principle that the commission of one crime is not admissible in evidence to establish the guilt of a party of another."[1]

§ 193. Particular Bad Acts to show the Defendant's Character; (1) Relevancy. It has already been seen (ante, § 58) that if a defendant in a criminal case chooses to offer his good character (for the appropriate trait) as an argument that he probably did not commit the offence charged, the prosecution may by counter-evidence dispute the existence in him of the good character thus alleged; and it has also been seen that the fact thus to be proved or disproved is the real disposition or character, of which reputation or anything else is merely evidence (ante, § 52). The question thus arises how the character is to be proved or disproved. It has been noted (ante, §§ 52, 53) that there are three conceivable ways of evidencing it: (1) Reputation of the community; this is open to the objection of being Hearsay, and is dealt with post, § 1608; (2) Personal Knowledge or Opinion of those who know the defendant; this is open to the objection of the Opinion rule, and is dealt with post, § 1980; (3) Particular Acts of Misconduct, exhibiting the particular trait involved. This last sort of evidence is now to be considered.

The law here declares a general and absolute rule of exclusion. It is forbidden, in showing that the defendant has not the good character which he affirms, to resort to particular acts of misconduct by him. Is this prohibition based on the irrelevancy of such evidence, or on some reason of auxiliary policy (ante, § 42) which assumes its relevancy but sees reasons of policy for its exclusion? That such former misconduct is relevant, i.e. has probative value to persuade us of the general trait or disposition, cannot be doubted. The assumption of its probative value is made throughout the judicial opinions on this subject;[1] and the following acute analysis makes it entirely clear:

[1] For similar utterances, see the cases cited post, §§ 300–371.

1876, State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 275, 290; on a charge of murder committed in an attempt to rape, the fact of the defendant's recent rape of another person was offered; Mr. Norris, arguing for the defence: "Making no point of remoteness in time or space, let us see how well this evidence will bear analyzing. Premise to be proved: he committed a rape, in no way, except in kind, connected with this crime. Inference: a general disposition to commit this kind of offence. Next premise: this general disposition in him. Inference: he committed this particular offence. . . . It may be tried by the common test of the validity of arguments. Some men who commit a single crime have, or thereby acquire, a tendency to commit the same kind of crimes; if this man committed the rape, he might therefore have or thereby acquire a tendency to commit other rapes; if he had or so acquired such a tendency, and if another rape was committed within his reach, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty; if more likely to be guilty of rape, and if there was a murder committed in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty of this rape, and hence of this murder; a sort of an ex-parte conviction of a single rape, from which the jury are to find a general disposition to that kind of crimes, in order to help them out in presuming the commission of another rape as a motive or occasion of the murder. We can find nothing like it in the books." Ladd, J.: "But it is nevertheless argued on behalf of the State (if I have not wholly misapprehended the drift of the argument) that the evidence was admitted because, as matter of fact, its natural tendency was to produce conviction in the mind that the prisoner committed rape upon his victim at the time he took her life. . . . I shall not undertake to deny this. If I know a man has broken into my house and stolen my goods, I am for that reason more ready to believe him guilty of breaking into my neighbor's house and committing the same crime there. We do not trust our property with a notorious thief. We cannot help suspecting a man of evil life and infamous character sooner than one who is known to be free from every taint of dishonesty or crime. We naturally recoil with fear and loathing from a known murderer, and watch his conduct as we would the motions of a beast of prey. When the community is startled by the commission of some great crime, our first search for the perpetrator is naturally directed, not among those who have hitherto lived blameless lives, but among those whose conduct has been such as to create the belief that they have the depravity of heart to do the deed. This is human nature — the teaching of human experience. If it were the law, that everything which has a natural tendency to lead the mind towards a conclusion that a person charged with crime is guilty must be admitted in evidence against him on the trial of that charge, the argument for the State would doubtless be hard to answer. If I know a man has once been false, I cannot after that believe in his truth as I did before. If I know he has committed the crime of perjury once, I more readily believe he will commit the same awful crime again, and I cannot accord the same trust and confidence to his statements under oath that I otherwise should. . . . Suppose the general character of one charged with crime is infamous and degraded to the last degree; that his life has been nothing but a succession of crimes of the most atrocious and revolting sort: does not the knowledge of all this inevitably carry the mind in the direction of a conclusion that he has added the particular crime for which he is being tried to the list of those that have gone before? Why, then, should not the prosecutor be permitted to show facts which tend so naturally to produce a conviction of his guilt? The answer to all these questions is plain and decisive: The law is otherwise."

[1] For example, in the quotations in the next section, and also in the following: 1851, R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 322 (Campbell, L. C. J.: "The question in issue is the good character of the prisoner; surely, whether the prisoner had been previously convicted is relevant to that"; Alderson, B.: "The prisoner raises the question of character, and the evidence of his former conviction is brought to show what his character really is").

§ 194. Same: (2) Reasons of Policy. It may almost be said that it is because of this indubitable relevancy of such evidence that it is excluded. It is objectionable, not because it has no appreciable probative value, but because it has too much. The natural and inevitable tendency of the tribunal — whether judge or jury — is to give excessive weight to the vicious record of crime thus exhibited, and either to allow it to bear too strongly on the present charge, or to take the proof of it as justifying a condemnation irrespective of guilt of the present charge. Moreover, the use of alleged particular acts ranging over the entire period of the defendant's life makes it impossible for him to be prepared to refute the charges, any or all of which may be mere fabrications. These reasons of auxiliary policy (post, § 1863), directed to prevent the risks of reaching verdicts through insufficient evidence, have operated to exclude that which is in itself relevant. For more than two centuries,[1] ever since the liberal reaction which began with the Restoration of the Stuarts, this policy, in one or another of its reasonings, has received judicial sanction, more emphatic with time and experience. It represents a revolution in the theory of criminal trials, and is one of the peculiar features, of vast moment, which distinguishes the Anglo-American from the Continental system of evidence:

1684, Withins, J., in Hampden's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1053, 1103: "You know the case lately adjudged in this Court; a person was indicted of forgery, we would not let them give evidence of any other forgeries but that for which he was indicted, because we would not suffer any raking into men's course of life to pick up evidence that they cannot be prepared to answer to."

1692, Holt, L. C. J., in Harrison's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 833, 864, 874 (charge of murder; a witness was called to speak of some felonious conduct of the defendant three years before): "Hold, hold, what are you doing now? Are you going to arraign his whole life? How can he defend himself from charges of which he has no notice? And how many issues are to be raised to perplex me and the jury? Away, away! That ought not to be; that is nothing to the matter."

1847, Parke, B., in Att'y-Gen'l v. Hitchcock, 1 Ex. 93: "We cannot enter into a collateral question as to the man's having committed a crime on some former occasion, one reason being that it would lead to complicated issues and long inquiries; and another, that a party cannot be expected to be prepared to defend the whole of the actions of his life."

[1] It is clear that before 1670–1680 the accused's prior record of misconduct could be considered: 1669, Hawkins' Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 921, 935, 949 (larceny; details of a larceny from another person at another time, allowed to be given; L. C. B. Hale: "This, if true, would render the prisoner now at the bar obnoxious to any jury"); 1684, Hampden's Trial, cited post (the judge, in excluding such evidence invokes a "case lately adjudged in this court"). The case of Faulconer (1653; 5 How. St. Tr. 323, 354), which Sir J. Stephen has cited (Hist. Cr. Law, I, 368) as an early instance of such evidence, is hardly in point; for here the trial was for perjury, and the evidence was offered as "proofs to the credit of Faulconer," i. e., rather looking upon him as a witness to be impeached. Lord Campbell, on the other hand (Lives of the Chief Justices, III, 24), erroneously gives Harrison's Trial, in 1692 (cited post) as the first case of exclusion. But at any rate the older practice died hard and slowly: 1695, R. v. Hains, Comb. 337 ("If the defendant give evidence of a general reputation, it may be answered by particular instances on the other side for the King").

Yet it is odd to find the following anachronistic remark in a judgment of Lord Mansfield, in 1742 (Clark v. Periam, 2 Atk. 339): "If there is a criminal prosecution, and the prisoner in order to strengthen the evidence for his character enters into particular facts to support it, this is called a challenge to the prosecutor, and then he may likewise examine to particular facts."

1851, R. v. Oddy, 2 Den. Cr. C. 264, Campbell, L. C. J.: "The moral weight of such evidence in any individual case would no doubt be great. But the law is a system of general rules; and it does not admit such evidence, because of the inconvenience which would result from it"; Mr. Pickering, for prosecution: "But in several analogous cases the law does admit such evidence, notwithstanding the inconvenience; and there the inconvenience, which is confessedly the only ground of exclusion, is tolerated in order that justice may not be defeated. The inconvenience is put upon two grounds; first, that of the prisoner being taken by surprise; secondly, of many different issues being raised"; Campbell, L. C. J.: "Yes; that is so"; Mr. Pickering: "If in such cases [as previous utterings of forgeries to show lutent] justice is not permitted to be defeated by the argument drawn from the inconvenience of raising different issues, why should it in the present case?" . . . Campbell, L. C. J.: "It would have been evidence of the prisoner being a bad man, and likely to commit the offences there charged. But the English law does not permit the issue of criminal trials to depend on this species of evidence."

1865, Willes, J., in R. v. Rowton, L. & C. 520, 541: "[Evidence of particular acts] is excluded, partly for the reason [irrelevancy] already given, and partly because no notice has been given to the other side that such an inquiry is going to be made. . . . The impossibility of giving such notice with respect to the prisoner's conduct would exclude such evidence, even if it were not excluded by general rules of policy."

1846, Thacher, J., in Dowling v. State, 5 Sm. & M. 686 (excluding evidence of cruelty to other slaves by an overseer charged with the murder of a slave): "A principal reason for this rule is that a party, having had no notice of such a course of evidence, may not have prepared himself to rebut it. It is not an answer to this to say that the matter in evidence, having no relation to the point in issue, cannot therefore influence the mind upon it; it may have the effect to withdraw the minds of the jury from the point in issue, and thus to mislead them. If the admitted evidence tend to prove that the prisoner has committed another and distinct offence, it may thus excite prejudice, and even raise the inference of the commission of the offence alone in question. It is of the last importance to a person charged with an offence that the facts laid before the jury should consist exclusively of the transaction, not only because he can be expected to come prepared to answer them alone, but because, even should he happen to be so prepared, it is so much irrelevant matter tending to confuse the minds of the jury and to take from him the benefit of their exclusive consideration of the merits of the matter solely in issue."

1858, Mr. John Norton Pomeroy, arguing in People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 97: "In its administration of criminal jurisprudence, the civil law allows and requires such evidence. It investigates the antecedent character, disposition, habits, associates, business, — in short, the entire history of an accused person, to discover whether it is probable that he would commit the alleged crime. English and American criminal law, in its practical administration, confines itself to the investigation of the very crime charged, and restricts judicial evidence to circumstances directly connected with and necessary to elucidate the issue to be tried.[2] These two systems are diametrically opposed to each other, and whatever may be said of their comparative merits, the rule of the common law is so firmly established that it lies at the very foundation of criminal procedure, as an inseparable element of trial by jury. Trained judicial minds may be able to eliminate from a mass of irrelevant and general criminative facts those which directly bear upon the crime charged against the prisoner; but the very character of juries, and the theory of trial by jury, require that all prejudicial evidence tending to raise in their minds an antipathy to the prisoner, and which does not directly tend to prove the simple issue, should be carefully excluded from them."

1873, Allen, J., in Coleman v. State, 55 N. Y. 70: "A person cannot be convicted of one offence upon proof that he committed another, however persuasive in a moral point of view such evidence may be. It would be easier to believe a person guilty of one crime if it was known that he had committed another of a similar character, or indeed of any character. But the injustice of such a rule in courts of justice is apparent. It would lead to convictions upon the particular charge made by proof of other acts in no way connected with it, and to uniting evidence of several offences to produce conviction of a single one."

[2] When Campbell visited Paris, in 1819, and the French lawyers "laughed at our strictness" in excluding hearsay, "I retorted by pointing out the injustice of their practice" in character-evidence (Life of L. C. Campbell, I, 364). For some examples of French trials, see Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, I, Appendix.

1882, Devens, J., in Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 20: "The objections to the admission of evidence as to other transactions, whether amounting to indictable crimes or not, are very apparent. Such evidence compels the defendant to meet charges of which the indictment gives him no information, confuses him in his defence, raises a variety of issues, and thus diverts the attention of the jury from the one immediately before it; and by showing the defendant to have been a knave on other occasions, creates a prejudice which may cause injustice to be done him."

1887, Thayer, J., in State v. Saunders, 14 Or. 300, 309, 12 Pac. 411: "Place a person on trial upon a criminal charge, and allow the prosecution to show by him that he has before been implicated in similar affairs (no matter what explanation of them he attempts to make), it will be more damaging evidence against him and conduce more to his conviction than direct testimony of his guilt in the particular case. Every lawyer who has had any particular experience in criminal trials knows this, — knows that juries are inclined to act from impulse, and to convict parties accused, upon general principles. An ordinary juror is not liable to care about such a party's guilt or innocence in the particular case, if they think him a scapegrace or vagabond. That is human nature."

1888, Hayne, C., in People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 112, 16 Pac. 537 (excluding, on a trial for murder, evidence that he had attempted "to make money out of his wife's shame"): "The prosecution might with equal propriety have undertaken to get a verdict by proving that he was a horse-thief or a blackleg, or any other thing calculated to expose him to contempt. In a case which is at all doubtful, such a course would be almost certain to produce a conviction from an average jury. It is contrary to the first principles of justice to try a man for one crime and convict him of that because he may be guilty of another, or because he may be a low specimen of humanity."[3]

The reasons thus marshalled in various forms are reducible to three: (1) The over-strong tendency to believe the defendant guilty of the charge merely because he is a likely person to do such acts; (2) The tendency to condemn, not because he is believed guilty of the present charge, but because he has escaped unpunished from other offences; (3) The injustice of attacking one necessarily unprepared to demonstrate that the attacking evidence is fabricated. It is also said, by some judges, (4) that the confusion of new issues is a reason for avoiding such evidence; but this can play but a small and cumulative part, since this reason could be obviated, as it is with witnesses (post, § 979), by excluding extrinsic testimony and allowing proof by a record of prior conviction, or cross-examination, where the defendant waives his privilege by taking the stand; yet these means are never allowed. Thus it seems clear that the doctrine of confusion of issues, while it would operate to the extent of excluding extrinsic testimony, is nevertheless not in itself controlling and does not account for the full scope of the rule. The other three reasons are the vital ones.

These reasons, it may be noted, represent general policies and constant quantities in our law of evidence, and reappear individually in other parts of it.[4] For example, the third — but not the first or the second — reappears in the use of particular misconduct against a witness; but it is there allowed to be satisfied by forbidding extrinsic testimony, while admitting judgments of conviction and cross-examination of the witness himself (post, § 979). Again, the first two reasons apply also, though not in equal strength, to the prosecution's use of general character against a defendant (ante, § 57); and accordingly that is forbidden except where the defendant has himself challenged inquiry into his character. Again, the third reason finds an analogy in the law of criminal pleading, in the rule that on an indictment charging only a single offence the issue must be confined to that offence, and no election is allowed to lay before the jury a number of such offences from which they are to select the one best proved.[5] Furthermore, it is to be noted, the judicial exposition of these reasons shows the fallacy of supposing, as some do, that the object of the rule is merely to show mercy to the guilty one, to give him a final chance for life and liberty by artificially handicapping the prosecution, — thus importing into courts of justice the notions of sportsmanship. On the contrary, the object is to prevent a person not guilty of the present charge from being improperly found guilty of it. If it be said that nevertheless this is still a spirit of kindness to the guilty, seeking to prevent his being punished now for what he has formerly done, the answer is that we are nevertheless protecting a person who is theoretically innocent of the present charge from being now found guilty of a past crime which he was not aware would be charged against him and which he has no opportunity to show to be fabricated. There is quite enough maudlin pity for criminals in our law in other respects; and we ought not to give support to that tendency by claiming on such grounds the doctrine here involved, — a doctrine which is in truth mainly designed to protect the innocent and not the guilty.

[3] See also a good opinion by Dodge, J., in Paulson v. State (1903), — Wis. — , 94 N. W. 771.

The rule thus expounded is so firmly established that it would be held to prevail even in jurisdictions where no express enunciation of it has been made.[6] It is constantly assumed or laid down in the rulings which expound

[4] Compare the general principles examined post, §§ 1863, 1904.

[5] See U. S. v. Mitchell, 2 Dall. 348, 357; State v. Bates, 10 Conn. 372, where the similarity of the reasons may be noticed. In these cases of course there is no attempt to argue evidentially from one offence to the other.

[6] The practical bearing of the rule, it is to be noted, is to exclude this class of facts on rebuttal by the prosecution; for the use of bad character in any form is already forbidden to the prosecution until the defendant has opened the subject (ante, § 57): Can.: 1888, R. v. Trigganzie, 15 Ont. 294, 299 (excluding a prior conviction for a similar crime; Ala.: 1856, Franklin v. State, 29 Ala. 20; 1859, Dupree v. State, 33 id. 388 (that the defendant was an escaped convict); 1887, Steele v. State, 83 id. 25, 3 So. 547; 1889, Moulton v. State, 88 id. 116, 6 So. 758; Morgan v. State, ib. 224, 6 So. 761; 1895, Murphy v. State, 108 id. 10, 18 So. 557 (that the witness, as sheriff, had often had a warrant out against the defendant); Cal.: 1888, People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 112, 16 Pac. 537; 1898, People v. Lynch, 122 id. 501, 55 Pac. 248; 1900, People v. Lee Dick Lung, 129 id. 491, 62 Pac. 71; Ill.: 1869, McCarty v. People, 51 Ill. 231; 1871, Sutton v. Johuson, 62 id. 209; Ind.: 1895, Griffith v. State, 140 Ind. 163, 39 N. E. 440; Ia.: 1887, State v. Sterrett, 71 Ia. 387; 32 N. W. 387; 1890, State v. McGee, 81 id. 17, 19, 46 N. W. 764; 1895, State v. Tippet, 94 id. 646, 63 N. W. 445; Kan.: 1901, State v. Kirby, 62 Kan. 436, 63 Pac. 752; Ky.: 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 485; 1898, Ballowe v. Com., — id. —, 44 S. W. 646; La.: 1893, State v. Donelon, 45 La. An. 744, 754, 12 So. 922; 1903, Cook v. State, 111 La. —, 35 So. 665 (but a character for violence when drinking is not within the prohibition of specific acts);

all the ensuing distinctions arising from the use of conduct to evidence some other fact than moral character.

§ 195. Particular Good Acts, to show Defendant's Character. Do any of the foregoing reasons apply to exclude the use by the defendant of his own particular good acts to evidence that good character which he is allowed to invoke? They do not seem to; and the propriety of the defendant's use of such evidence has been more than once judicially commended:

1786, R. v. Brecknock, McNally's Evidence, 322; indictment for murder; the witness, a clergyman, "being examined to the character of the prisoner, said he believed him to be the last man in the world who would have a thirst of blood, and he would give particular instances"; these instances being objected to, the offering counsel's argument was sustained, that "this rule as to particular instances does not hold when you call a witness to support a man's character, for then . . . the wit- may give his reasons for entertaining a good opinion of him."

1852, Preston, J., in State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 88: "It appears to me so reasonable and humane that I cannot think it inconsistent with the rules of evidence. The effort to avoid collateral issues seems sometimes to have excluded from the jury-box what every juryman would wish to learn, and to have trenched closely upon the principles of humanity. It is but the just reward of many good actions that they should be of some avail to a man in his utmost need, especially when by invoking their aid he throws himself open to all the opprobrium that can be cast upon him by the character he has acquired by his evil deeds."

That such was the practice up to the close of the 1700s is clear.[1] But, after a time, two of the reasons already noted, surprise and confusion of Mass.: 1807, Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317 (Parsons, C. J.: "in such case there can be no examination as to particular acts"); 1876, Com. v. O'Brien, 119 id. 342 (here, a good character for peace and quiet, attempted to be disproved by showing a conviction for assault); Mich.: 1878, Brownell v. People, 38 Mich. 732, 736; Miss.: 1890, Kearney v. State, 68 Miss. 233, 238; 8 So. 292; Mo.: 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 Mo. 497; 1882, State v. Turner, 76 id. 351; Nebr.: 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 27, 7 N. W. 444; 1894, Patterson v. State, 41 id. 538, 59 N. W. 917; 1895, Basye v. State, 45 id. 261, 63 N. W. 811; N. H.: 1844, State v. Renton, 15 N. H. 174; N. J.: 1900, Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, 47 Atl. 62; N. Y.: 1832, Townsend v. Gravea, 3 Paige, Ch. 453, 455; 1835, People v. White, 14 Wend. 113; 1887, People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 457, 467, 14 N. E. 319; 1888, People v. Greenwall, 108 id. 801, 15 N. E. 404; N. C.: 1822, State v. Twitty, 2 Hawks 248, 258; 1855, Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 156; 1877, State v. Laxton, 67 N. C. 218; 1888, State v. Bullard, 100 id. 486, 488, 6 S. E. 191 (but confusing the question with that of impeaching a witness' character); Or.: 1897, State v. Moore, 32 Or. 65, 48 Pac. 468; R. I.: 1892, State v. Ellwood, 17 R. I. 763, 766, 24 Atl. 782; Wis.: 1895, Fosdahl v. State, 89 Wis. 482, 62 N. W. 185 (prior convictions). The only modern instance of a contrary view seems to be the following, which must be regarded as a casual inadvertence: 1840, Story, J., in Bottomley v. U. S., 1 Story 135, 145, 1 Fed. 688 (importation of goods by bribery of the deputy-collector; other false entries were admitted as tending to overcome the "ordinary presumption of law in favor of . . . [the official's] general character being elevated above" such a fraud, so that "he who has the baseness to accept a bribe . . . in one case, withdraws from himself all the sanctity of his official character in other cases of a similar nature").

Compare the distinctions of § 988, post.

[1] 1696, Lowick's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 292 (how the defendant once heroically saved people's lives); 1742, Mansfield, L. C. J., in Clarke v. Periam, 2 Atk. 339; 1753, Murphy's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 725 (Mr. Laroche: "This is the second time I have come from Bristol to London to speak to Mr. Noads' character [jointly indicted]. I knew him at Bristol; . . . he behaved so well there that the gentleman recommended him to my brother-in-law, Mr. Henry Casamaijor, to transact his great affairs"; Mr. Alderman Ironside: "Mr. Noads has been concerned in an affair where I am interested, in which he has always acted with great diligence and prudence. I have trusted him with large sums of money; it has been in his power to have injured us, but I never had any occasion or room to doubt his honesty"); 1786, R. v. Brecknock, Ire. (cited supra).

issues, came to be thought applicable to a defendant's evidence of particular acts in his own favor:

1660, Peters' Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1116, 1137; murder of King Charles; Peters: "I have here a seal that the earl of Norwich gave me to keep for his sake for saving his life, which I will keep as long as I live"; L. C. B. Bridgman: "I am not willing at all to interrupt you or hinder you; [but] that which you speak of, doing good services, is not at all to the point. We do not question you for what good you have done, but for the evil you have done."

1794, Eyre, L. C. J., in Horne Tooke's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 359 (rejecting certain specific instances of conduct "in respect of the particularity of it"): "General character is general character; and it is not a collection of many moral or religious acts of a man's life, but the result of all. General character may be opposed by evidence; but if you are on the part of the prisoner to go into all the particulars of his life which are in his favor, you will have an undue advantage in that respect, because the crown cannot be prepared to oppose that evidence. We have very often gone into too many particulars upon evidence of general character; but whenever that point has been discussed, it has been found that the true way of examining to character was to the general character."

1808, Alexander Davison's Trial, 31 How. St. Tr. 187; fraud in public accounts by a former commissary-general; Lord Moira sworn (formerly general-in-command): "I never had the remotest ground for suspicion. . . . Shall I state the particulars?" L. C. J. Ellenborough: "One is very unwilling to diminish the scope of these inquiries, but the general inquiry is as to the general character"; John Martin Leake sworn; examined by Mr. Holroyd: "I believe you are one of the comptrollers of the army accounts?" "I am"; "In that character have you at any time had Mr. Davison's accounts before you?" "Yes"; "Have those been examined by you?" L. C. J. Ellenborough: "I really must interfere. It would be dangerous as a precedent to permit particular instances to be given in evidence where there can have been no notice. General evidence of general character is admissible; but this is certainly contrary to all rule"; Mr. Holroyd: "I ask this question to show Mr. Leake's means of knowledge"; L. C. J. Ellenborough: "You ask as to his knowledge of the examination of public accounts. Now would it be proper to try a collateral issue for which the other side cannot be prepared? It is as clear a rule of evidence as can be that you must not examine to particular facts." . . . Mr. Holroyd: "I ask this only as introductory of general character"; L. C. J. Ellenborough: "If you mean only to ask whether the witness has had such means of knowing him as to form the judgment he is about to give, I have no objection to that"; Mr. Holroyd: "Had you opportunities, from examining Mr. Davison's accounts, of knowing his general character?" "I have seen many of his accounts, and many of them were extremely regular; in the years 1794, 1795, and 1796, they were before the comptrollers"; L. C. J. Ellenborough: "I cannot admit this; you must go into general character."

By the opening of the 1800s, this had become established as the law of England.[2] Nevertheless (as illustrated in the last passage above), the ortho-

[2] 1787, Buller, J., in J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 754; 1794, Horne Tooke's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 359 (L. C. J. Eyre intimates that the former practice is now definitely abandoned); 1798, O'Connor's Trial, 27 How. St. Tr. 31 (Earl of Moira: "I do not feel myself at all competent to speak to Mr. O'Connor's general character [for loyalty] from the little acquaintance I have had with him, but from a particular occasion —"; Mr. Garrow: "His lordship cannot state any particular fact"; Mr. Plumer argued for admitting the conversations as an expression of opinion; Buller, J.: "Suppose a man were indicted for murder, and he could bring a person to prove a particular act of humanity, you could not conceive that would be evidence"; 1808, Davison's Trial (quoted supra); 1809, Jones' Trial, 31 How. St. Tr. 309, 310; 1865, R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 541 (Willes, J.: "Evidence of particular acts is excluded, because a robber may do acts of generosity, and the proof of such acts is therefore irrelevant to the question whether he was likely to have committed a particular act of robbery"; yet Cockburn, C. J., more correctly said: "The prisoner cannot give evidence of particular facts, although

dox doctrine, that a witness to character could speak from personal knowledge of his disposition (post, § 1981), was conceded to allow such a witness, to some extent, to explain his reasons for his estimation of character by stating whatever striking conduct within his knowledge evinced the settled trait of character. Unfortunately, this orthodox and wise doctrine has itself been discarded in all but a few jurisdictions, and with it the availability of the present sort of facts given as the ground of such knowledge. Were the orthodox doctrine again to prevail, such evidence commends itself as valuable and just, for the reasons above stated by Mr. J. Preston; and the objections of surprise and confusion of issues would be practically obviated by the limitations under which it would thus be used.

There is in this country some early authority for its use;[3] but most Courts would to-day undoubtedly forbid it.[4] If, however, the prosecution has improperly used specific acts of misconduct against the defendant, the defendant should certainly be allowed to deny or explain it, on the principle of curative admissibility (ante, § 15).[5] Moreover, there are other principles by which a defendant may occasionally avail himself of conduct as evidence in his favor, — in particular, of conduct indicating consciousness of innocence (post, § 293), of utterances asserting his innocence (post, §§ 1142, 1731, 1732, 1785), and, in sedition charges, of conduct indicating a loyal state of mind (post, § 367).

§ 196. Particular Misconduct of the Defendant (1) to Impeach his Credit as a Witness, or (2) to Increase his Sentence by reason of Prior Conviction. (1) Where the defendant chooses to take the stand as a witness, he occupies two positions, — that of a defendant and that of a witness. In the former aspect, particular bad acts of his, as exhibiting character, cannot be used at all, whether shown by extrinsic testimony or brought out by cross-examination. But in the latter aspect such acts may be brought out (under certain limitations) by his cross-examination or by record of conviction (post, § 979–981). The question arises whether when he takes the stand, he should be treated as defendant or as witness, — whether policy requires that the former or the latter capacity should prescribe the rule for his treatment. This quesone fact would weigh more than the opinion of all his friends and neighbors.")

[3] 1810, Swift, Evidence, 141; 1830, Com. v. Robinson, Thacher Cr. C. 236, Thacher, J., semble; 1852, State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 83, 88 (murder of a woman; per Preston, J., only, evidence that he was "one of the last men who would willingly shed a woman's blood" received, with such good acts as form the "reasons of the witness for testifying to the good character," following R. v. Brecknock, which with the others "I do not find overruled"; but the majority speak of "general character" as alone admissible).

[4] 1888, Hussey v. State, 87 Ala. 133, 6 So. 420 (that he was a church-member, excluded; this ruling is intelligible enough from either standpoint); 1898, State v. Ferguson, 71 Conn. 227, 41 Atl. 769 (assault with intent; questions by defendant's counsel as to never having been in quarrels before, excluded); 1897, Smalls v. State, 102 Ga. 31, 29 S. E. 153 (peaceable conduct of defendant while in jail, excluded); 1901, State v. Dexter, 115 Ia. 678, 87 N. W. 417; 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 485 (good acts excluded, for the reasons of small probative value, confusion of issues, and surprise to the Commonwealth); 1899, State v. Brooks, 23 Mont. 146, 57 Pac. 1038 (that the defendant had preached in church, excluded); 1900, State v. Coates, 22 Wash. 601, 61 Pac. 726.

[5] 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 27, 7 N. W. 444 (murder; why the defendant had on another occasion drawn a revolver on some one, allowed). Contra: 1895, Griffith v. State, 140 Ind. 163, 39 N. E. 440, semble.

tion can best be examined in dealing with the rules for witnesses' character (post, § 890). Furthermore, the act of taking the stand in his own favor is to some extent a waiver of his privilege against self crimination. Wherever it is treated as not being a waiver of the privilege so far as former crimes are asked after, this privilege alone would suffice to exonerate him from answering; and some Courts dispose of the question from this point of view alone (post, § 2277). But this (as noted in that place) is a superficial and inadequate way of disposing of it, for two reasons: (1) The privilege merely allows the defendant to decline to answer; it does not say whether the matter can be asked after, or whether it can properly be used even if the privilege is not claimed; which is the present question. (2) The privilege covers only criminating matters; while the present rule, if it applies, forbids inquiring into or using any misconduct whatever, whether criminal or not, as a source of exhibiting character. Hence the whole question must be determined independently of the bearing of a waiver of privilege.

(2) Under enlightened modern legislation for habitual criminals, the tribunal is authorized to increase the sentence of one whose offence, when established, is found to be the second or the third offence of the sort. The proof of the prior offence for that purpose does not militate against the rule forbidding the use of prior misconduct to evidence character, provided the purpose is kept distinct. But there are two types of these statutes. One of these, observing the spirit of the character-rule, permits the fact of prior conviction to be found by the judge or the jury upon proof reserved until a verdict of guilty has first been found by the jury:[1]

[1] ENG.: 1836, St. 6 & 7 W. IV, c. 111 (reciting that by a statute of 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 28, § 11, increased punishment was allowed for the subsequent felony, "and whereas since the passing of the said act the practice has been on the trial of any person for any such subsequent felony to charge the jury to inquire at the same time concerning such previous conviction, and whereas doubts may be reasonably entertained whether such practice is consistent with a fair and impartial inquiry as regards the matter of such subsequent felony, and it is expedient that such practice should from henceforth be discontinued," it is enacted that the jury shall not "inquire concerning such previous conviction until after they shall have inquired concerning such subsequent felony and shall have found such person guilty of the same," and that the reading of the statement of prior conviction in the indictment shall also be deferred; provided however that "if upon the trial of any person for any such subsequent felony as aforesaid, such person shall give evidence of his or her good character, it shall be lawful for the prosecutor in answer thereto to give evidence of the indictment and conviction of such person for the previous felony." This statute was re-enacted in St. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, § 9, which was repealed and replaced in 1861 by St. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, § 116, and c. 99, § 37, which substitutes "offence" for felony; the provision has been construed in the following cases: 1851, Anon., 5 Cox Cr. 268; 1851, R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 319, 5 Cox Cr. 387 (the statute phrase "if such person shall give evidence of his good character" includes testimony of good character obtained from an opposing witness on cross-examination); CAN.: Can. Rev. St. 1886, c. 106, § 115 (offences under the Temperance Act; procedure of proving prior offences prescribed), Crim. Code 1892, § 676 (substantially like the preceding, for criminal cases generally); Man. Rev. St. 1902, c. 101, § 214 (liquor offences; like Ont. R. S. 1897, c. 245, § 101; N. W. Terr. Cons. Ord. 1898, c. 89, § 105 (like Ont. R. S. 1897, c. 245, § 101); Ont. Rev. St. 1897, c. 245, § 101 (in trials for liquor offences, prior convictions shall not be inquired into till after conviction for the subsequent offence; procedure prescribed), St. 1902, c. 33, § 197 (replacing the preceding, but similar, for prosecutions under the liquor act); 1888, R. v. Triganzie, 15 Ont. 294 (statute construed); P. E. I. St. 1900, c. 3, § 15 (like Ont. R. S. 1897, c. 245); U. S.: Cal. P. C. 1872, § 1093, par. 1 ("If the indictment or information be for felony, the clerk must read it, and state the plea of the defendant to the jury; and in cases where it charges a previous conviction, and the defendant has confessed the same, the clerk in reading it shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction"); 1890, People v. Sansome,

1890, Belcher, C. C., in People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 451, 24 Pac. 143: "The evident purpose of the provision of the Code above quoted was to keep from the jurors all knowledge that the person on trial before them had been previously convicted of criminal offence; and this is based upon the well-settled and familiar principles of law and right. In the first place, it is elementary law that every one accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty, and is entitled to a fair and impartial trial before an unbiased jury. In the next place, it is well known that ordinary jurors are more ready to believe the accused guilty if it be understood by them that he has suffered a previous conviction for a similar offence."

The other type of statute, apparently formed by the supposed requirements of the unwise rule (existing in some jurisdictions) which allows the jury to fix a criminal sentence, permits the fact of prior conviction to be considered by the jurors before verdict;[2] this method is decidedly an inferior one.

1899, DuRelle, J., in Hall v. Com., 106 Ky. 894, 51 S. W. 804: "It is earnestly urged that it was error to permit the introduction of evidence of former convictions at all until the jury should have first found her guilty under the charge for which she was then being tried; that it amounted to the admission of testimony to impeach her general character, which she had not put in issue, and enabled the commonwealth to show her to the jury in the light of a common thief, and rebut the presumption of innocence which the law gives her by evidence in chief upon a trial for grand larceny. It is painfully apparent that, with the circumstances shown as to the loss of the money, and evidence of two former convictions for grand larceny, the accused, who is an ignorant negro woman, had not the slightest chance that an average jury would entertain a reasonable doubt of her guilt, while, without the evidence of former convictions, there was a possibility that they might do so. There is a considerable force, therefore, in the proposition urged, that this procedure denied the accused a fair trial of the offence whereof she was accused. But the statute as to habitual criminals (Ky. St. § 1130) seems to have created an additional and higher degree of offence, viz. the commission of a felony, having been theretofore

84 Cal. 449, 24 Pac. 143 (where the trial judge alluded to it; see quotation supra); 1891, People v. Wheatley, 88 id. 117, 26 Pac. 95; 1895, People v. Thomas, 110 id. 42, 42 Pac. 456; Haw. Penal Laws, 1897, § 655 (after plea of guilty or conviction, a previous conviction of the same offance may be proved; except that if on the main trial good character is offered, the prosecutor is entitled "in answer thereto to give evidence of the conviction of such person for the previous offence or offences before such verdict of guilty shall be returned; and the jury shall enquire concerning such previous conviction or convictions at the same time that they enquire concerning such subsequent offence"); Okl. Stats. 1897, § 5286, Stats. 1903, § 5574 ("after a plea or verdict of guilty . . . tha Court upon the suggestion of either party that there are circumstances which may properly be taken into view, either in aggravation or mitigation of the punishment, may in its discretion hear the same summarily at a specified time and upon such notice to the adverse party as it may direct"); 1899, Walburn v. Tarr, 9 Okl. 23, 59 Pac. 972 (under Stats. § 5286, allowing facts of aggravation to be considered by the judge after plea or verdict of guilty, evidence of misconduct, given before verdict and without instructions to disregard, is improper); Wash. St. 1903, c. 86 (the prior conviction is to be inqnired into after plea or conviction of guilt of the subsequent offence; procedure prescribed).

[2] Ill. Rev. St. 1874, c. 38, § 473, Laws 1883, p. 76 ("On any trial for any of said offeuces," burglary, etc., a former conviction "may be used in evidence against such party," provided the judgment is "set forth in apt words in the indictment"); § 477, Laws 1889, p. 112 (the prison record and criminal history of any one indicted under the foregoing statute "may be given in evidence upon any trial . . . for the purpose of proving a former conviction"); Ky. Stats. 1899, § 1130 (where sentence is to be increased for former conviction, "judgment in such cases shall not be given for the increased penalty unless the jury shall find, from the record and other competent evidence, the fact of former convictions"); 1899, Hall v. Com., 106 Ky. 894, 51 S. W. 804 (see quotation supra); N. Y. C. Cr. P. 1881, § 513 (against a person adjudged an habitual criminal and afterwards charged with crime, previous character may be proved as if he had first offered evidence thereon); 1898, People v. Sickles, 156 N. Y. 541, 51 N. E. 288 (the fact of former conviction may be put in before verdict rendered, because "the prior conviction enters as an ingredient into the criminality of the prisoner"; Bartlett, J., dissenting).

twice convicted of a felony, etc. To show the accused guilty of this degree of the offence charged, it is necessary to show the former convictions; and this, of course, is bound to prejudice the accused, — just as evidence showing malice is bound to prejudice the defendant in a murder case, — but it may be shown to make out a higher degree of the offence, which authorizes the severer punishment. . . . The statute requires the jury to find the fact of the former convictions. There is no provision for a separate trial of the fact of former conviction, nor do we think the statute intended there should be one. The law seems to work a hardship, but it is a hardship the Legislature alone can remedy."

§ 197. Rumors of Misconduct, as testing a Witness supporting Character. When the defendant offers his good character and a witness testifies to the defendant's good reputation for the trait in question, one way of testing the honesty and accuracy of the witness' assertion of the prevalence of this reputation is to find out from him whether this or that rumor of flagrant misconduct has come to his notice. If one or more such rumors are known to him, obviously his broad assertion of the prevalence of good reputation is more or less inconsistent with his knowledge of such rumors. The purpose of the inquiry is to show that one knowing of certain rumors has nevertheless rashly asserted a reputation inconsistent with the rumors. Thus, the defendant's misconduct is not inquired after as a fact to show his character; but as a rumor to discredit the witness' assertion. A question, therefore, which does not expressly refer to the witness' hearing of the conduct as rumored is improper, because it aims apparently at the conduct as a fact showing the defendant's character. Precisely the same principle is applicable to the cross-examination of one testifying to a witness' character; and the precedents are dealt with under that head (post, § 988).

2. Conduct to show Character of Other Persons evidentially used.

It has been seen (ante, §§ 62–68) that a person's character, as evidential to show his doing of an act, may occasionally be used for others than the accused in a criminal case. When character is thus evidential, may it be evidenced by particular acts of the person whose character is to be proved?

§ 198. Character of Deceased, in Homicide, from Particular Acts of Violence. When the turbulent character of the deceased, in a prosecution for homicide, is relevant (under the principle of § 63, ante), there is no substantial reason against evidencing the character by particular instances of violent or quarrelsome conduct. Such instances may be very significant; their number can be controlled by the trial Court's discretion; and the prohibitory considerations applicable to an accused's character (ante, § 194) have here little or no force.[1]

[1] 1902, State v. Beird, — Ia. —, 92 N. W. 694 (good opinion, by McClain, J.); 1899, State v. McIver, 125 N. C. 645, 34 S. E. 439 (an unmerciful beating to an employee on the same morning, admitted). Contra: 1899, Thornton v. State, 107 Ga. 683, 33 S. E. 673; 1903, Andrews v. State, — id. —, 43 S. E. 852; 1868, Com. v. Andrews (Mass.), Davis' Rep. 128, 156 (murder, said by defendant to have been committed in defence from an assault by the deceased for the purpose of buggery; evidence of the deceased's conduct indicating a passion and disposition to sodomy and buggery was excluded, except so far as it involved prior attempts by deceased on defendant); 1886, People v. Druse, 103 N. Y. 655, 8 N. E. 733 (instances of treat-

§ 199. Negligence of Party in Civil Cases, from Particular Negligent Acts. It has been seen (ante, § 65) that in a few jurisdictions the character of a defendant or of an employee or of a plaintiff for negligence or prudence may be used to show that he probably was not or was careful on a given occasion. Is it proper to evidence that character by particular instances of the trait? The reason of undue prejudice, which applied to a defendant in a criminal case (ante, § 194), has here a corresponding application, though a less dangerous one. The reason of unfair surprise is also applicable; for the party charged cannot even guess the time, place, and occasion that may be predicated for his supposed act, and has no means of showing the testimony to be fabricated. The reason of confusion of issues also operates, for disputes over other carelessness would soon obscure the main issue. Add to this that a careless act or two may be done by the most prudent person, and that particular instances, unless repeated and emphatic, throw little light on the general disposition. For these reasons, almost all Courts exclude such evidence, whatever their views may be (ante, § 65) as to the propriety of using the character, if otherwise evidenced, to show the probability or improbability of carelessness on a particular occasion.[1]

ing his domestic animals with cruelty, excluded); 1903, People v. Gainari, — id. —, 68 N. E. 112 (specific acts of violence to a third person, excluded).

Distinguish the use of such instances to show the accused's apprehensions of violence (post, § 248).

[1] Ark.: 1894, Little R. & M. R. Co. v. Harrell, 58 Ark. 454, 468, 24 S. W. 883, 25 S. W. 117 (prior negligent acts of the defendant's employee, not admissible to show negligence at the time); 1899, St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Strond, — id. —, 56 S. W. 870 (former misconduct by defendant's employee, excluded); Cal.: 1896, Pacheco v. Mfg. Co., 113 Cal. 541, 45 Pac. 833 (the faulty breaking of other shears in the same way as that by which the plaintiff was injured, excluded); 1896, Howland v. R. Co., 115 id. 487, 47 Pac. 255 (another collision, wholly unconnected, excluded); Conn.: 1874, Morris v. East Haven, 41 Conn. 252, 254 (contributory negligence; former instances of care or negligence, inadmissible); 1897, Laufer v. Traction Co., 68 id. 475, 37 Atl. 379 (street-railroad injury; carefulness of defendant at other times, excluded); Ga.: 1890, Augusta S. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706 (previous care in selecting drivers, excluded, because the issue was as to a specific act of the driver); 1898, Atlanta C. S. R. Co. v. Bates, 103 id. 333, 30 S. E. 41 (injury in alighting from a car; instances of plaintiff's careless slighting at other times, excluded); Ida.: 1894, Rumpel v. R. Co., — Ida. —, 35 Pac. 700 (blockading of streets by the same railroad at other times, not admitted to show negligence); Ind.: 1871, Pittsburg, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 295, 311 (excluding former acts of a railroad employee, to show negligence at a particular time); Ia.: 1901, Dalton v. R. Co., 114 Ia. 257, 86 N. W. 272 (injury while driving across a railroad track; prior instances of plaintiff's having slept while riding in his buggy, excluded, partly because there were eye-witnesses); Kan.: 1890, Southern Kans. R. Co. v. Robbins, 43 Kan. 145, 149, 23 Pac. 113 (former acts of negligence inadmissible to show contributory negligence); Md.: 1886, Baltimore Elev. Co. v. Neal, 65 Md. 438, 452, 5 Atl. 338 (former acts of negligence, excluded); Mass.: 1856, Robinson v. F. & W. R. Co., 7 Gray 92, 95 (negligence of the defendant's servants; prior negligent acts in running the train on other occasions, excluded, as involving collateral and confusing issues, and as "having no legal or logical tendency to prove the point in issue"); 1874, Maguire v. R. Co., 115 Mass. 239 (negligent stopping of street-car; former negligent stopping by the same driver, excluded); 1885, Whitney v. Gross, 140 id. 232, 5 N. E. 619 (former negligent overloading of a wagon excluded, to show negligent overloading on this occasion); 1887, Hatt v. Nay, 144 id. 186, 10 N. E. 807 (specific acts of negligence excluded on the grounds of surprise and of confusion of issues); 1894, Connors v. Morton, 160 id. 333, 35 N. E. 860 (same); 1896, Lewis v. Gaslight Co., 165 id. 411, 43 N. E. 178 (negligent laying of gaspipes in one place to show negligent laying in the case in hand, inadmissible); 1897, Olsen v. Andrews, 168 id. 261, 47 N. E. 90 (while "specific acts of negligence cannot be introduced to show the incompetency of a servant," yet "when conduct tending to show his qualifications or his physical fitness or unfitness for his work is properly before a jury upon one of the issues of the case," they may "consider it on the question of his competency"; here admitting evidence of nervous conduct and other singular behavior shortly before the acci-

Two other possible uses of particular acts of negligence or carefulness are here to be distinguished. (1) Where the character is not offered evidentially to prove an act, but is already in issue as a material proposition under the pleadings — as where the incompetency of an employee is for a fellow-servant the ground of the employer's liability, or where a physician is sued because though incompetent he held himself out as competent, — particular instances of carelessness or the reverse may conceivably be resorted to. The answer there need not be the same as here, because here the jury might be too apt to infer directly from the former careless act to the present one, while there the sole object is to prove the general trait and the proof stops there. The doctrine is examined elsewhere (post, § 208). (2) Where a person's character is required, by the law of the case, to be known to a defendant in order to make the latter liable, the doing by the former of a careless act may be thought to be sufficient, if known to the defendant, to put him upon inquiry dent, the foreman having testified to notice to the superintendent of this conduct); Mich.: 1868, Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 111 (former negligence inadmissible; but here admitted to rebut the defendant's evidence of his employee's good character); 1881, Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 id. 176, 179, 9 N. W. 243 (yardmaster's negligence; former acts of negligence not admitted to show negligence at the time in question); 1899, People v. Thompson, 122 id. 411, 81 N. W. 344 (negligent management of boiler; negligent absence of defendant from boiler-room on other occasions, inadmissible, except as showing that he had been warned of the danger of absence); Minn.: 1898, Fulmore v. R. Co., 72 Minn. 448, 75 N. W. 589 (motorman's negligent management shortly before the act charged, perhaps admissible); N. H.: 1879, Plummer v. Ossipee, 59 N. H. 59 (Allen, J.: "The defendants claimed that the plaintiff's husband was a fast and careless driver, and introduced in evidence particular instances of his fast and careless driving. The plaintiff was permitted to testify to other instances of his careful driving. . . . The evidence was relevant to the question of the husband's character for driving safely or otherwise"); 1903, Stone v. R. Co., — id. —, 55 Atl. 359 (injury at a railroad crossing; that the plaintiff had on former occasions driven carefully at the crossing, admitted); N. Y.: 1871, Warner v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465, 471 (former neglect or drunkenness of a flagman on duty, held inadmissible); 1874, Baulec v. R. Co., 59 id. 360 (semble, excluded; see quotation, post, § 250); Oh.: 1882, Desbrack v. State, 38 Oh. St. 365 (murder by poisoning; the attending physician's mistake was set up as the real cause of death; a druggist who had supplied the physician having testified to his carefulness, the defendant was allowed to show, on cross-examination that on several occasions prescriptions had been sent to him by the physician with mistakes such as "would have killed the patient," that he had returned them, and that the physician had admitted the mistakes and made corrections); Pa.: 1898, Woeckner v. Motor Co., 187 Pa. 206, 41 Atl. 28 (loss of services of child; to show negligent guarding by the plaintiff, previous "disconnected" acts excluded); R. I.: 1903, Dyer v. Union R. Co., — R. I. —, 55 Atl. 688 (defendant's failure to signal at other street-crossings, inadmissible); S. C.: 1898, Mack v. R. Co., 52 S. C. 323, 29 S. E. 905 (injury on a track not at a crossing; failure of the engineer to sound warning at previous crossings, admitted to show recklessness); Tex.: 1895, Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534, 31 S. W. 629 (excluding evidence of specific acts of negligence as showing negligent habits; but perhaps this case means only to admit such evidence where the character is in issue on the pleadings; see quotation, post, § 208); 1898, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Johnson, 92 id. 380, 48 S. W. 568 (plaintiff engineer's previous negligent conduct, excluded; certain exceptions recognized); U. S.: 1894, Southern Bell T. & T. Co. v. Watts, 13 C. C. A. 579, 66 Fed. 460 (negligence in adjusting a telephone wire; former similar carelessness by the same employee of the defendant, excluded, except to contradict his testimony as to the possibility of certain harm); 1896, Central Vt. R. Co. v. Ruggles, 21 C. C. A. 575, 75 Fed. 953 (fire caused by heated bearings; the stoppage of the oil-pipes by carelessness three years before, not admitted to show former carelessness, but admitted to show a tendency of the machinery); Vt.: 1896, Sullivan v. Salt Lake, 13 Utah 122, 44 Pac. 1039 (former careless management of freight cars in the same way, excluded); 1899, Stoll v. Daly Min. Co., 19 id. 271, 57 Pac. 295 (prior accidents to plaintiff in a mine, excluded); 1900, Konold v. R. Co., 21 id. 379, 60 Pac. 1021 (railroad employee's entries; incorrectness on other occasions, by him or other employees, excluded); Wash.: 1893, Christensen v. U. T. Line, 6 Wash. 75, 82, 32 Pac. 1018 (that a motorman had run at too high speed at other times, excluded).

Distinguish the principles of § 252 and §§ 437, 458, post.

and charge him with notice of the former's incompetency. This is not inconsistent with rejecting particular acts as evidence of the objective fact of incompetency; for while a single act might be unsatisfactory evidence of a general trait, yet, if this general trait is otherwise proved, the same single act might well suffice to warn the defendant and put him upon inquiry and thus charge him with notice of the other person's incompetency. This use of single acts as involving notice is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 250.)[2]

§ 200. Character of Complainant in Rape Charge, from Particular Acts of Unchastity. It is generally accepted (ante, § 62) that the bad character for chastity of the complainant in a rape charge is relevant and admissible to show the probability of her consent to the intercourse. In evidencing this character, may particular acts of the woman's unchastity be resorted to, as showing her to be a person more prone than another to have consented? No question of evidence has been more controverted. The relevancy of the fact is seldom doubted; but the arguments of unfair surprise, undue prejudice, and confusion of issues (post, § 1863) are thought to form serious objections. The classical opinion in favor of admissibility is the following:

1838, Cowen, J., in People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 194: "The prosecutrix is usually, as here, the sole witness to the principal facts, and the accused is put to rely for his defence on circumstantial evidence. Any fact tending to the inference that there was not the utmost reluctance and the utmost resistance is always received. . . . The connection must be absolutely against the will; and are we to be told that previous prostitution shall not make one among those circumstances which raise a doubt of assent? That triers should be advised to make no distinction in their minds between the virgin and a tenant of the stew, — between one who would prefer death to pollution, and another who, incited by lust and lucre, daily offers her person to the indiscriminate embraces of the other sex? And will you not more readily infer assent in the practised Messalina in loose attire, than in the reserved and virtuous Lucretia? . . . [After referring to evidence of common prostitution as admissible], It has been repeatedly adjudged that in the same view you may also show a previous voluntary connection between the prosecutrix and the prisoner. Why is this? Because there is not so much probability that a common prostitute or the prisoner's concubine would withhold her assent as one less depraved; and may I not ask, does not the same probable distinction arise between one who has already submitted herself to the lewd embraces of another, and the coy and modest female severely chaste and instinctively shuddering at the thought of impurity? Shall I be answered that both are equally under the protection of the law? That I admit, and so are the common prostitute and the concubine. If either have in truth been feloniously ravished, the punishment is the same. But the proof is quite different. It requires that stronger evidence be added to the oath of the prosecutrix in one case than in the other."

The reasoning of the exclusionary rule is represented in the following passages:

1857, Strong, J., in People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398 (here the question was asked whether the prosecutrix had had intercourse with Dr. M., her betrothed, while on the voyage to New York, and the Court called attention to the circumstances as being peculiar; but added): "In any case, a single aberration from virtue, in one whose general character for chastity is otherwise unimpeachable, would raise so slight an inference, if any, of non-resistance to a brutal outrage from a person (or indeed any one except him to whom she had already yielded) that it would not justify a departure from the ordinary rules of evidence. Besides, if proof of particular instances should be admissible, rebutting evidence would be allowable, and thus there might be one or more collateral issues to occupy the time and divert the attention of the jury. Such would be the evils if the prosecution could require previous and timely notice of the particulars of the intended attack upon the conduct of the complainant; but as no such notice can be exacted, there would be no means of meeting the evidence, often of the dissolute companions of the accused, however mistaken or corrupt it might be, and thus the character of an innocent and greatly abused female might be sacrificed and the ends of public justice be defeated."

[2] For former accidents in highways, or defective operation of machines, as showing a defective or dangerous quality in them, see post, § 458.

1905, Siddon, J., in Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286: "The fact that a woman may have been guilty of illicit intercourse with one man is too slight and uncertain an indication to warrant the conclusion that she would probably be guilty with any other man who sought such favors of her. If she was a woman of general bad reputation for chastity, or had been guilty of acts of lewdness with the defendant, the case would be different. In the first instance, the evidence would bear directly upon the question as to whether such a woman would be likely to resist the advances of any man; and, in the second, as to whether, having yielded once to the sexual embraces of the defendant, she would not be likely to yield again to the same person. The greatest objection to such testimony is that it introduces collateral issues, which have no direct bearing upon the defendant's guilt."

The better view seems to be that which admits the evidence. Between the evil of putting an innocent or perhaps an erring woman's security at the mercy of a villain, and the evil of putting an innocent man's liberty at the mercy of an unscrupulous and revengeful mistress, it is hard to strike a balance. But, with regard to the intensity of injustice involved in an erroneous verdict, and the practical frequency of either danger, the admission of the evidence seems preferable. In the opposing judicial opinions the writers respectively assume that the man is innocent and that the woman is wronged; and on these inconsistent assumptions, the conclusion reached by each is fair enough. But the real question is, Which state of fact is the commoner and the one most needing our protection? The answer to this must depend more or less on the experience and the sentiments of each community. The English precedents were for some time opposed to the use of such evidence; but it now seems to be admissible, subject to a limitation intended to avoid the objections of unfair surprise and confusion of issues, i. e. by allowing only the inquiry on cross-examination of the complainant, and by excluding extrinsic testimony.[1]

[1] Eng.: 1812, R. v. Hodgson, R. & R. 211, by all the judges (that the prosecutrix had had connection with another man a year before; excluded on the ground of surprise; but apparently treated only as affecting her testimonial discredit); 1817, R. v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 243, Holroyd, J. (same; but perhaps meant only as a ruling on testimonial discredit); 1834, R. v. Martin, 6 C. & P. 562, Williams, J. (whether the prosecutrix had previously had intercourse by consent with the accused, allowed; "I must say I never could understand the case of R. v. Hodgson, . . . it does appear to me to be not quite in strict accordance with the general rules of evidence"); 1843, R. v. Tissington, 1 Cox Cr. 48, Abinger, C. B. (citing Wood, B.; acts of solicitation by her to other men, rejected); 1843, R. v. Robins, ib. 55; 2 Moo. & Rob. 512 (for-

Historically, the vacillation and the obscurity in the English precedents, and the misconception in some American rulings, were due to the failure to distinguish a second question which usually presents itself at the same time, viz., How far may the character of the woman as a witness be attacked by particular instances of unchaste conduct? In the early 1800s it was already settled (1) that particular acts of misconduct presented by outside testimony could not be used, but were available through cross-examination only (post, § 979); and it was just being settled (2) that only misconduct affecting veracity-character could be so used against a witness (post, §§ 922, 982). Thus the effect of the first rule would be to exclude all extrinsic testimony of particular misconduct of the woman; while the effect of the second rule might be to exclude even on cross-examination any inquiry into acts of unchastity. Moreover the rule forbidding collateral contradiction (post, § 1003) was thought to have a bearing. Having regard to what was then passing in the minds of English judges, the earlier exclusion of the present class of evidence seems to have proceeded from the point of view of the rules about impeaching witnesses. Later, the consideration that there was another point of view became clearer to them, and thus the rulings changed. That the two points of view differ practically in their results is obvious. If regard is had solely to the witness-character of the woman, and we ignore her chastity-character as bearing on consent, the evidence will be excluded in two situations in which it would otherwise be admissible, viz., (a) where the woman does not take the stand as a witness, and (b) where she does take the stand in a jurisdiction (post, § 922) in which veracity-character and not general bad character of a witness is admissible, except in jurisdictions (post, § 982) where acts of unchastity in a woman are regarded as relevant to veracity-character.

The state of the law in the various jurisdictions of this country is not uniform; but the exclusionary rule prevails, in some form, in the greater number of jurisdictions.[2]

mer connection with other men, admitted; Coleridge, J., with Erskine, J., after the citation of the conflicting rulings: "It is not immaterial to the question whether the prosecutrix has had this connection against her consent, to show that she has permitted other men to have connection with her, which on cross-examination she has denied"; used as "a fact from which the jury may draw conclusions as to the probabilities of her story"); 1846, R. v. Page, 2 Cox Cr. 133 (rape by a father; former intercourse of the daughter with the father without making complaint, admitted); 1870, R. v. Cockcroft, 11 id. 410, Willes, J., and Martin, B. (excluded; but Willes, J., would allow the question to be put on cross-examination); 1871, R. v. Holmes, 12 id. 137 (before five judges; the question may be put to the prosecutrix, subject to her privilege not to answer; but no other evidence may be received; the reason given is that of surprise; but the Court confuses the question with that of discrediting a witness, and speaks of "contradictions" on collateral matters as not all weighable); 1887, R. v. Riley, 16 Cox Cr. 191 (excluded); Can.: 1877, Lalibert*é* v. R., 1 Can. Sup. 117, 131, 139, 142, 144 (the prosecutrix may be asked as to connection with other men, but a negative answer cannot be contradicted; 1897, Gross v. Brodrecht, 24 Ont. App. 687 (allowable on cross-examination only; here, indecent assault). Compare the cases post, §§ 986, 1005.

[2] Ala.: 1887, McQuirk v. State, 84 Ala. 435, 438, 4 So. 775 (excluded); Ark. 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 643 (excluding outside testimony, because of the particular-act rule; and excluding cross-examination, because of the witness' disgrace-privilege, thus admitting in the latter case if the privilege is waived); Cal.: 1856, People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221 (admitting "particular acts of lewdness"); 1898, People v. Kuches, 120 id. 566, 52 Pac. 1002 (habitual telling of lewd stories, not accompanied by lewd demeanor, not admissible);

It has been seen (ante, § 62) that the general character of the woman for unchastity is in such cases almost universally received. The question then arises whether the fact of being a professional prostitute is to be assimilated to such a general character; or whether it is to be regarded merely as particular misconduct, and therefore in most jurisdictions inadmissible. With reference to its real significance, and the absence of the dangers of unfair surprise and confusion of issues, it ought to take the former rank; and this is the general conclusion (ante, § 62).

1900, People v. Benc, 130 Id. 159, 62 Pac. 404 (excluded, even on cross-examination); Conn.: 1877, State v. Shields, 45 Coun. 256, 257, 260, 263 (former intercourse with others admitted, but on no clear principle); Fla.: 1895, Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286 (excluded); Ill.: 1873, Shirwin v. People, 69 Ill. 56 (inadmissible; but admitted here to explain away the fact that the prosecutrix lacked the physiological marks of virginity, — a reason which would seem to be equally available in all such cases); 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 id. 533 (obscure); Ind.: 1861, Wilson v. State, 16 Ind. 393 (admitted); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 id. 582 (same); 1888, Bedgood v. State, 115 id. 275, 278, 17 N. E. 621 (question evaded; such intercourse with a member of the defendant's party here admitted, as tending to contradict on a material point); Ia.: 1897, State v. McDonough, 104 Ia. 6, 73 N. W. 357 (excluded); Kan.: 1895, State v. Brown, 55 Kan. 766, 42 Pac. 363 (excluded); Ky.: 1892, Cargill v. Com., 93 Ky. 578, 581, 20 S. W. 782 (excluded; but here also because the charge was of detaining for prostitution against her will; the latter ground of distinction is unsound); 1897, Brown v. Com., 102 id. 227, 43 S. W. 214 (undue liberties allowed to others, received); La.: 1903, State v. DeHart, 109 La. 570, 33 So. 605 (incest; carnal intercourse by the woman with other men, held inadmissible); Mass.: 1870, Com. v. Regan, 105 Mass. 593, semble (excluded); 1872, Com. v. McDonald, 110 id. 405 (undecided); 1880, Com. v. Harris, 131 id. 336 (excluded); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 id. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039 (excluded); Mich.: 1871, Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 1, 6 (inadmissible, semble, by outside evidence; but questions to the prosecutrix are proper); 1888, People v. McLean, 71 id. 309, 38 N. W. 917 (approving the preceding; but also stating, without noting the conflict, that the question cannot be put on cross-examination); 1893, People v. Abbott, 97 id. 484, 486, 56 N. W. 862 (excluded); Miss.: 1859, Anon., 37 Miss. 58, semble (inadmissible); 1895, Brown v. State, 72 id. 997, 17 So. 278 (undecided); Mo.: 1898, State v. Whitesell, 142 Mo. 467, 44 S. W. 332 (excluded, on a charge of rape under the age of consent); N. H.: 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 N. H. 89 (excluded); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 id. 154, semble (same); N. M.: 1899, Terr. v. Pino, 9 N. M. 598, 58 Pac. 393 (excluded); N. Y.: 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 192, 194 (admissible; see quotation supra); 1857, People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398 (inadmissible); 1874, Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 517 (undecided); N. C.: 1846, State v. Jefferson, 6 Ired. 305 (kissing and other liberties, excluded); 1857, State v. Henry, 5 Jones L. 65, 70 (an act of lewdness, excluded, because not known to the defendant); 1868, State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 32 (whether she had not been delivered of a bastard child, and whether she had not had intercourse with other men, admitted, as affecting credibility, on the doctrine of State v. Patterson, § 982, post, and without noticing State v. Jefferson, supra; but in the Jefferson case the cross-examination was not objected to and it was extrinsic evidence that was excluded, while here both question and extrinsic evidence were held proper; so that the two cases may be reconciled); Oh.: 1858, McCombs v. State, 8 Oh. St. 643, 646 (excluded); 1862, McDermott v. State, 13 id. 332 (same); Or.: 1901, State v. Ogden, 39 Or. 195, 65 Pac. 449 (inadmissible, even on cross-examination); R. I.: 1893, State v. Fitzsimon, 18 R. I. 236, 240, 27 Atl. 446 (excluded); Tenn.: 1874, Titus v. State, 7 Baxt. 132 (admissible); Vt.: 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 512 (not allowed with extrinsic evidence, on the usual ground of surprise; but allowed on cross-examination, because "she is able to give satisfactory explanations, if such explanations can be made"; Bennett, J., dissented, because "no such presumption [of general unchastity] should be allowed to arise from a particular instance of an illicit connection with another person," i. e. the ground of irrelevancy); 1867, State v. Reed, 39 id. 417 (admissible); 1894, State v. Hollenbeck, 67 id. 34, 30 Atl. 696 (same); Wis.: 1864, Watry v. Forbes, 18 Wis. 500, 502 (civil action for rape; intercourse with others, admissible as "tending to disprove the probability of the use of force"; whether admissible on the criminal charge, not decided). Compare the cases cited post, §§ 986, 1005.

In actions for indecent assault, it would seem that the same principles apply; and the same attitudes would be taken upon this as upon the above subject: 1889, Goro v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault and battery and solicitation to adultery; the plaintiff's prior acts of unchastity excluded); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 153 Mass. 127, 129, 32 N. E. 1039 (same, semble).

In bastardy or seduction, where pregnancy is a part of the issue, similar evidence may be used for another purpose, explained ante, § 133.

Other intercourse with the defendant himself is sometimes offered in such cases, but involves in truth a different principle. Such conduct is not intended to show a general willingness or disposition to commit acts of unchastity, but merely an emotion towards the particular defendant tending to allow him to repeat the liberty; it is thus not only more cogent as evidence, but is not open to the objections advanced against evidence of intercourse with third persons; and its admissibility has always been conceded (post, §§ 399, 402).

§ 201. Disposition of an Animal, from its Behavior in Particular Instances. However correct the notion may be psychologically, we are usually more inclined, in the case of animals, to trust individual instances of conduct as illustrating disposition. "In proportion to the element of personality, of the interjection of the free will of a human being, we become more certain of the effects of the causative force and more ready to admit it."[1] Moreover, the doctrines of auxiliary policy (ante, § 199) are less applicable to such evidence. The doctrine of undue prejudice (ante, § 194) does not apply; for we do not recognize the animal as entitled to that careful protection from unfair condemnation which we accord to the accused human being. The doctrine of unfair surprise offers less of an objection than otherwise, because the possible range of the evidence is much smaller. The doctrine of confusion of issues still remains applicable, but the new issues that might be involved are in no way capable of the complexity and variety that are involved in proving the character-acts of a human being. For these reasons it is generally conceded that, in proving the disposition of an animal, particular instances of its conduct are admissible.

1864, Bigelow, C. J., in Todd v. Rowley, 8 All. 51, 58 (to show the timid and unsafe character of the plaintiff's horse, instances were admitted of his having shied so frequently, before and after the time of the injury, as to indicate a vicious habit): "The habit of an animal is in its nature a continuous fact, to be shown by proof of successive acts of a similar kind. Evidence having been first offered to show that the horse had been restive and unmanageable previous to the occasion in question, testimony that he subsequently manifested a similar disposition was competent to prove that his previous conduct was not accidental or unusual, but frequent and the result of a fixed habit at the time of the accident."[2]

[1] Mr. Barrows, in 14 Amer. L. Rev. 358.

[2] 1866, Worth v. Gilling, L. R. 2 C. P. 3 (attempts of a dog to bite, to show its ferocious nature, admitted); 1873, Whiteley v. China, 61 Me. 202 (conduct of a horse in similar places immediately before and after an accident, admitted to show injury to his temper and amiability to control); 1864, Todd v. Rowley, 8 All. 51 (see quotation supra); 1878, Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535 (admitting a horse's vicious conduct); 1897, Broderick v. Higginson, 169 id. 482, 48 N. E. 269 (habit of an animal may be shown by "frequent observation of particular instances"); 1885, Kennon v. Gilmer, 5 Mont. 257, 265, 5 Pac. 847 (injury by a carrier using horses alleged to be unsafe; evidence of the horses shying, before and after the time in question, admitted); 1861, Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356, 360 (acts of skittishness, admitted); 1865, Whittier v. Franklin, 46 id. 23, 26 (vicious acts, admitted); 1868, East Kingston v. Towle, 48 id. 57, 65 (the issue being whether the defendant's dog had killed the plaintiff's sheep, evidence of former sheep-killings by the dog was not admitted; Doe, J., dissenting; this ruling would probably not be followed in this jurisdiction to-day); 1898, Stone v. Langworthy, 20 R. I. 602, 40 Atl. 832 (conduct of the horse when driven by another, the day before, admitted to show his traits); 1899, Stone v. Pendleton, 21 id. 332, 43 Atl. 643 (a horse's prior conduct during the same drive, admitted to show its gentle disposition); 1900, Buckley v. Express Co., 22 id. 358, 48 Atl. 7 (prior

3. Conduct to show Character in Issue.

§ 202. General Principle. In the numerous classes of cases in which character may be established, not as evidential of the doing of an act (ante, §§ 55–68) nor as affecting notice or belief (post, §§ 246–258), but because by the principles of substantive law it is one of the propositions in issue (ante, §§ 70–80), the reasons which affect the use of particular acts to evidence the character may not apply as they do to such acts used as evidence of a defendant's character or other persons' character used evidentially (ante, §§ 192–201). It is indispensable to examine the precise application of these reasons to this class of cases. (1) The doctrine of probative value, or relevancy, remains the same; conduct is here as elsewhere a legitimate basis for inference to disposition or character. (2) The doctrine of undue prejudice disappears (except in a few instances), since there is no defendant (except in those instances) to be condemned penally and therefore likely to suffer unjustly for past misdeeds. Moreover, the risk of hasty and unjustifiable inference from one past act to the present act charged (ante, § 94) is wanting, since the ultimate thing to be proved is not the doing of an act, but a disposition. (3) The doctrine of unfair surprise remains the same, in one aspect, and yet not the same. Its application is not the same, in the sense that there is no prior notice that character would be offered evidentially; for here the law of the case warns beforehand that character will be an issue in it. But its application does remain the same, in the sense that there can be no anticipation as to the time, place, and kind of act that will be predicated as showing the character; and thus the impossibility of being prepared to disprove fabricated testimony and the unfairness of such a situation (ante, § 94, post, § 1849) remain precisely the same. It is this double aspect of the surprise-argument that causes most of the conflict of rulings upon this subject. (4) The doctrine of confusion of issues (ante, § 94, post, § 1904) is no longer so serious an objection, because, since a specific character is usually the issue, the use of particular instances of such a character keeps the general trend of the investigation within the lines of that issue as marked out by the substantive law of the case, and does not tend to such diversion of attention as would be possible in proving (for example) the character of an accused person. (5) There is a greater practical necessity for the use of specific instances of conduct, in this class of cases. In the preceding topics, where character is merely evidential of the act in issue, there will always be a dozen other and more cogent facts evidencing this act, and the restriction instance of a horse's propensity to run away, admitted); 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; defendant's evidence that his dogs did not kill any of his own sheep, and plaintiff's evidence that sheep-killing dogs never killed their owner's sheep, admitted). As to the range of time of such acts, the trial Court's discretion should control, having regard to the time of probable permanency of disposition: 1878, Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535 ("the limit of time within which such misbehavior may be proved must depend largely upon the discretion of the presiding judge").

For the use of an animal's acts to show the owner's notice of his propensity, see post, § 251; for the use of an animal's acts to shew the frightening quality of an external object, see post, § 458. For the use of an animal's general disposition, as evidencing his probable conduct on a particular occasion, see ante, § 68.

of the evidence of character to reputation-evidence cuts off only a trifling portion of the total available evidence for the main issue. But where the character itself is the main issue (or one of them), the exclusion of the particular instances of conduct would leave the proving party restricted solely[1] to reputation-evidence as the single evidential source available for getting at the main issue (or one of the issues) in the case; and the generally indecisive and inferior nature of reputation-evidence makes it an unsatisfactory source to serve as the exclusive one available. Thus, there is here, as there is not in the former topics, a certain necessity for the use of particular acts or conduct, i. e. the loss of it would be felt as it would not be in the other cases.

It may be seen, then, that, apart from the doctrine of unfair surprise, everything points toward the propriety of allowing the use of particular instances of conduct to prove character wherever character is by the law of the case a proposition to be proved. This was the orthodox common-law view, enunciated in general and unequivocal terms:

1742 L. C. Hardwicke, In Clark v. Periam, 2 Atk. 337 (cross-bill to cancel a bond because given ex turpi causa, to wit, for criminal conversation with a lewd woman, the plaintiff): "The counsel insist . . . that the plaintiff is not entitled to examine to anything but her character in general, because it is impossible for Mrs. C. to be prepared to give an answer to the particular facts charged; for though everybody is supposed to be ready, to support a general character, yet not a particular fact. . . . As to the reason of the thing: In criminal prosecutions it comes in only collaterally and incidentally and is not the particular thing to be tried; and when that is the case, they are not supposed to be prepared with evidence. But compare this with cases where the character is the particular issue to be tried; suppose in the case of an indictment for keeping a common bawdy-house, without charging any particular fact; though the charge is general, yet at the trial you may give in evidence particular facts and the particular time of doing them; the same rule as to keeping a common gaming-house. This is the practice in all cases where the general behavior or quality or circumstance of the mind is in issue; as for instance, in non compos mentis, it is the experience of every day, that you give particular acts of madness in evidence, and not general only, that he is insane; so where you charge that a man is addicted to drinking, and liable to be imposed upon, you are not confined in general to his being a drunkard, but particular instances are allowed to be given. . . . Wherever the general life or conversation is put in issue, it is notice to the person who is charged that she should be prepared to take off the weight of that evidence; but where it comes in collaterally you shall be confined to general evidence. This seems to me to be the distinction, and the grounds of it; and if I was of a different opinion, I should overturn the constant course of this court and make the greatest confusion."

1811, Roane, J., in Fall v. Overseers, 3 Munf. 495, 505: "In all cases in which the general character or behavior is put in issue, evidence of particular facts may be admitted; for whatever is material to the issue each party must come prepared to prove or to deny."[2]

The doctrine is found constantly repeated in these broad terms, though seldom expressly decided except in connection with the particular classes of cases ensuing. It represents a general policy and tendency, which connects, supports, and explains the various instances in which such evidence is admitted.

[1] Since personal opinion is usually excluded also: post, § 1980.

[2] Accord: 1767, Buller, Trials at Nisi Prius 295; 1835, People v. White, 14 Wend. 113 (because character is not collateral, and "it is impossible without particular facts to prove the charge"; no examples mentioned).

Nevertheless, it cannot be stated in these broad terms as an invariable rule. There are one or two settled exceptions to it; and there are other disputed instances in which some Courts refuse to accept it. This opposing tendency has occasionally, in modern times, gone so far that even the general validity of the doctrine is repudiated, — chiefly on the ground that it involves all the serious dangers protected against by the doctrine of unfair surprise:

1893, Knowlton, J., in Miller v. Curtis, 163 Mass. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039: "It is a general rule, which has been adhered to with great strictness in this Commonwealth, that when character is in issue, it may be shown only by evidence of general reputation, and not by proof of specific acts. . . . The principal reason for this rule is that a multiplicity of issues would be raised if special acts, covering perhaps a lifetime, could be shown. It might be necessary to go into the circumstances attending each act before it could be determined what its nature was and what effect should be given to it. It would be impossible for the opposing party to come prepared to meet evidence upon matters in regard to which he had no notice, and great injustice might be done by bearing biased and false testimony to which no answer could be made."

This passage is assuredly unsound as a statement of the general rule. The common law began rather with the doctrine of Lord Hardwicke as the general rule; and the exceptions, whether universally or only locally recognized, can hardly be said to justify a statement that the general rule favors exclusion rather than admission. The only satisfactory mode of decision is to consider by itself each instance where character may be in issue, note the application of the various reasons, and solve the problem for that instance; bearing always in mind these two general tendencies or policies operating respectively for admission and for exclusion. The various instances fall into a natural grouping according as character is an issue (1) by the substantive law of the case, i. e. as involved in the cause of action, or (2) by the remedial law, i. e. as affecting the mitigation of damages. In the latter group the various instances are apt to have something in common; in the former group the peculiar substantive law of each case is of prime consequence.

§ 203. "Common" Offenders. (Cheats, Liquor-sellers, Barrators, Gamblers, Drunkards, etc.) The typical case, to which Lord Hardwicke's rule applies, and for which it is as good law to-day as it ever was, is that of a charge of being a "common" offender of one sort or another, — a common cheat, a common gambler, a common drunkard, and the like. The peculiarity of the issue is that it involves not so much the inward disposition or trait of the person charged as his habitual doing of certain outward acts; and thus, while the issue is traditionally said to involve "character," it really involves rather a course of conduct as the thing to be proved. Thus, while reputation as to this course of conduct may be an admissible sort of evidence (post, § 1620), the most natural and cogent sort will be a series of particular acts of the kind charged. The only question would be as to the sufficiency of the number of these acts to justify the epithet of "common" or "habitual"; and this will not affect the admissibility of any particular instance,[1] but will be a matter for the jury, under instructions of law from the judge. The objection of surprise may sometimes be a serious one; but the necessity of the situation must control, and in some instances the danger of surprise is obviated by requiring prior notice of the alleged instances that will be relied on.

For this purpose, then, evidence of particular acts is always admissible.[2] There may also be analogous instances in which the issue is practically the same, though not arising in a criminal charge against the person as defendant.[3] Distinguish here the use of particular instances to prove Habit in the strict sense, as not involving character (post, § 376).

§ 204. House of Ill-fame. It has already been seen (ante, § 78) that, apart from statutes constituting the repute of the house as the sole element of the crime of professional pandering, the character or use of the house and the character or occupation of the inmates may come into issue. Two questions having a bearing here are thus presented. (1) May particular instances of prostitution in the house be offered, as showing its habitual use or character? (2) May particular acts of prostitution by the inmates be offered, as showing their occupation or character as prostitutes? Both these questions should be answered in the affirmative, for the same reasons as in the preceding class of cases; the considerations affecting the question are practically identical.[1]

§ 205. Seduction; Statutory Action or Prosecution. Where by statute the seduction of an unmarried woman is made a crime against the State or a cause of civil action for the woman, the character of the woman is usually

[1] Unless, as in some jurisdictions, the statute specifies a minimum number of instances.

[2] 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 296; 1802, McNally, Evidence, 324 (both these writers declare the general doctrine; in barratry, notice of the specific acts charged is necessary); 1808, R. v. Roberts, 1 Camp. 399 (indictment for "conspiracy to carry on the business of a common cheat"; "cumulative instances are necessary to prove the offence"); 1864, Ingram v. State, 39 Ala. 247, 253 (doctrine recognized for a common barrator, common seller of liquor, etc.); 1895, Wright v. Crawfordsville, 142 Ind. 636, 642, 42 N. E. 227 (habit of intoxication, provable by specific acts); 1834, Com. v. Moore, 2 Dana Ky. 402 (common gambler); Com. v. Hopkins, ib. 419 (same); 1878, World v. State, 50 Md. 49, 54 (under St. 1864, c. 38, on a charge of being a "common thief," acts other than of stealing are not admissible, nor any acts done before the statutory period); 1855, Com. v. Whitney, 5 Gray 85 (common drunkard; no particular number of instances are necessary or sufficient); 1873, Com. v. McNamee, 112 Mass. 285 (in proving the defendant a "common drunkard," the facts of intoxication five to seven times within four months, sufficient to support a finding of "habitual drunkenness").

[3] 1876, Smith v. State, 55 Ala. 11 (where a statute forbada selling liquor to a person of "known intemperate habits"); 1852, McMahon v. Harrison, 6 N. Y. 443, 447 incompetency as administrator because of professional habits of gambling; his habits in November, 1848, when last heard from, "presumptive evidence" of similar habits in July, 1850).

[1] (1) Acts of prostitution to show the use of the house: 1900, Howard v. People, 27 Colo. 396, 61 Pac. 595 (keeping a house of ill-fame; acts at any time within the statutory period, admitted, the offence being a continuing one; former convictions for similar offences, admitted); 1846, Caldwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 473 (resort by particular prostitutes); 1896, Egan v. Gordan, 65 Minn. 505, 68 N. W. 103 (in an action to recover rent); 1860, State v. M'Gregor, 41 N. H. 407, 412 (acts of prostitution); 1863, Harwood v. People, 26 N. Y. 190 (repeated arrests at the house, of persons before convicted as prostitutes); 1863, Kenyon v. State, ib. 203, 209 ("particular facts, . . . such as the harboring of unchaste persons"); 1896, Lanpher v. Clark, 149 id. 472, 44 N. E. 182; ("such specific acts of immorality and impropriety" on the keeper's part "as tend to furnish a reasonable inference as to the real character of the place"); 1903, People v. Glennon, 175 id. 45, 67 N. E. 125 (admitted, on a charge of the defendant patrolman's neglect of duty in failing to arrest the persons keeping such a house); 1846, State v. Patterson, 7 Ired. 70. (2) Acts of prostitution to show the occupation of persons resorting to the house: Contra: 1861, Com. v. Gannett, 1 All. 7.

treated by the statute as affecting the crime or wrong.[1] Under such statutes several questions arise, involving the present principle:

(1) Where the statute applies to women of "chaste character," does this signify the actual inward character or disposition? If so, particular acts of unchastity are certainly relevant to disprove this actual character. Although the objection of unfair surprise is here as elsewhere a serious one, the practical necessity for resorting to this kind of evidence, and its cogency if believed, are perhaps greater than in any of these kindred topics. Accordingly, it is generally conceded that such instances may be offered by the defendant.[2]

(2) Where the statute applies to women of "good repute for chastity," it is clear that by the statutory terms the reputation is the thing in issue; and a particular act is obviously irrelevant to show reputation. Such acts are therefore inadmissible under these statutes.[3]

(3) Where the statute prescribes nothing expressly as to the woman's chastity, shall a requirement of actual chastity be implied into the statutory elements of the crime or the wrong? Having regard to the purpose of the statute and to the singular consequences of omitting such a requirement, it seems highly proper to make the implication:

1876, Marston, J., in People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 118: "In most of the States their statute makes the seduction of a woman of 'previous chaste character' an indictable offence, while there are no such words, nor any of like import, in ours; and the Courts [in those States] have held that the words 'previous chaste character' mean that she shall possess actual personal virtue, in distinction to a good reputation, and that a single act of illicit connection may therefore be shown on behalf of the defendant . . . The object of this statute was not to punish illicit cohabitation; its object was to punish the seducer who by his arts and persuasions prevails over the chastity of an unmarried woman. . . . If, however, she had already fallen, [there is no seduction.] . . . Then the chastity of the female at the time of the alleged act is in all cases involved."

[1] For the use of general character or of reputation in these cases, see ante, § 79.

[2] 1857, Andre v. State, 5 Ia. 389; 1865, State v. Carron, 18 id. 372, 375; 1871, State v. Shean, 32 id. 88, 92 ("It will not do if she possesses a reputation for chastity; she must be really so"); 1871, State v. Higdon, ib. 252 (same); 1880, West v. Druff, 55 id. 335, 336, 7 N. W. 636 ("conversations, acts, and associations are manifestations of character, and constitute the true index of the heart"); 1860, State v. Timmens, 4 Minn. 325, 334 (maintaining that there may be reformation); 1892, State v. Blize, 111 Mo. 464, 471, 20 S. W. 210; 1853, Crozier v. People, 1 Park. Cr. 453 (contra, Safford v. People, ib. 478, and Carpenter v. People, 8 Barb. 608, on the ground that the statutory term "chaste" may still be appropriately used of a woman who has had one act of illicit intercourse; but these are now practically repudiated by the next case); 1868, Kenyon v. State, 26 N. Y. 203, 208 ("specific acts of lewdness," admissible); 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 33.

[3] 1885, State v. Bryan, 34 Kan. 63, 69, 8 Pac. 260 (because the statute affects "any female of good repute"); 1881, Zahriskie v. State, 43 N. J. L. 640, 646 ("There is a distinction between actual personal virtue and 'good repute for chastity' as used in our statute; . . . it does not necessarily follow that they are co-existent"); 1896, Foley v. State, 59 id. 1, 35 Atl. 105 ("where the legislative language is unmistakably clear, it is the duty of the Court to enforce it in that sense"); 1876, Bowers v. State, 29 Oh. St. 542, 545 (the statute applied to "any female of good repute for chastity"; other illicit intercourse excluded; Welch, C. J.: "If she has repented of her past error and by her upright walk acquired an unimpeachable reputation for chastity, the law protects her against the man who overcomes her good resolves by a promise of marriage"). In Missouri the opposite view is now taken: 1883, State v. Brassfield, 81 Mo. 151, 157 ("There is a material difference between our statutes and those statutes under which such evidence has been held admissible in other States"); 1885, State v. Patterson, 88 id. 85, 95, 100 ("Our statute is worded a little differently, but in substance and effect is the same" as the others; in State v. Brassfield "we went too far"; Henry, C. J., diss., in a good opinion); 1888, State v. Wheeler, 94 id. 252, 7 S. W. 103 (preceding case approved).

1883, Smith, J., in Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 486 (a statute punished "carnal knowledge of any female by virtue of any feigned or pretended marriage," etc.): "In every prosecution for seduction the character of the seduced female is involved in the issue; and character means in this connection, not her general reputation in the community, but the possession of actual personal chastity; . . . the Legislature never intended to send a man to the penitentiary for having had illicit connection with a prostitute or a woman of easy virtue where she had consented, even under a promise of marriage." [4]

(4) In the first and third cases preceding, does a "chaste character" mean merely the physical condition of virginity, or does it signify the moral disposition to be chaste? If the former, then nothing short of intercourse would be relevant; if the latter, then any lewd behavior would be relevant. The latter interpretation is generally accepted:

1857, Woodward, J., in Andre v. State, 5 Ia. 389, 395: "The statute is for the protection of the pure in mind, for the innocent in heart, who may have been led astray. . . . [Obscenity of language, indecency of conduct, and undue familiarity with men] serve to indicate the true character; they become exponents of it; and a defendant is not punished for an act with one whose conversation and manners may even have suggested the thought, and opened the way to him, as he would be for the same act with one innocent in mind and manners." [5]

(5) In any case, acts of unchastity after the seduction have no relevancy.[6]

§ 206. Excuse for Breach of Promise of Marriage. The unchaste character of the promisee, whether existing and concealed before the promise or supervening after the promise, may be treated as the breach of a condition or representation, and therefore as an excuse for refusal to fulfil the promise of marriage. In such a case, the unchaste character may be shown by a particular act of intercourse with another or by other lewd behavior, for the same

[4] Ala.: 1883, Wilson v. State, 73 Ala. 527, 533 (the statute applied to "any unmarried female"; held that "the statute is for the protection of the chastity of unmarried women, and the existence of the virtue at the time of the intercourse is a necessary ingredient of the offence"; but here an amendment had expressly so provided); 1888, Hussey v. State, 86 id. 34, 36, 5 So. 484; 1888, Munkers v. State, 87 id. 94, 97, 6 So. 357; 1896, Bracken v. State, 111 id. 68, 20 So. 636, semble; 1898, Smith v. State, 118 id. 117, 24 So. 55 (inquiry is as to actual chastity; in rebuttal, good character since the time of seduction is inadmissible); 1898, Suther v. State, ib. 88, 24 So. 43; Ark.: 1883, Polk v. State, Ark. (quoted supra); 1903, Walton v. State, — id. —, 75 S. W. 1; Haw.: 1896, Woodward v. Republic, 10 Haw. 416 (admitting particular acts); Mich.: 1873, People v. Brewer, 27 Mich. 133, 135, semble; 1876, People v. Clark, 33 id. 112, 118 (holding, nevertheless, that there may be a reformation, and thus that "if she has repented of that act and reformed, she may again be seduced"); 1879, People v. Knapp, 42 id. 267, 268, 3 N. W. 927; 1882, People v. Squires, 49 id. 487, 488, 13 N. W. 828 (maintaining that there may be a reformed chastity).

[5] Accord: 1888, Hussey v. State, 86 Ala. 34, 36, 5 So. 484, semble (acts of indecency); 1883, Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 487 ("particular acts of immorality or indecorum"); 1857, Andre v. State, 5 Ia. 389, 395 (quoted supra); 1865, State v. Carrou, 18 id. 372, 375; 1871, State v. Shean, 32 id. 88, 90 ("acts of lewdness and immodesty"); 1871, State v. Higdon, ib. 262, 264 semble. Contra: 1898, People v. Kehoe, 122 Cal. 224, 55 Pac. 911 (seduction; "unchaste character" may be shown only by intercourse, not by mere indecencies).

[6] 1896, Bracken v. State, 111 Ala. 68, 20 So. 637; 1883, Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 487; 1898, Keller v. State, 102 Ga. 506, 31 S. E. 92; 1876, People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 117. Other intercourse with the defendant himself may also be admissible as throwing light upon the incidental question, which arises under some statutes, whether the seduction was upon a promise of marriage (post, §§ 399, 401). For particular acts as admissible to mitigate damages in the parent's action for seduction, see post, § 210.

On a charge of adultery, the woman's previous intercourse with others than the defendant is of course immaterial: 1879, People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 268, 3 N. W. 927.

reasons as in the preceding topic.[1] The use of such conduct as affecting the mitigation of damages (post, § 213) raises slightly different questions.

§ 207. Justification of Defamation of Character. Where a defendant in an action for defamation pleads the truth of his charge, and the charge is not of a specific act of misconduct, but of a general bad character or trait or habit or course of dealings, the proper mode of proof for him is often not an easy matter to discern. On the one hand, it is clear that, where he charges a habit or occupation or course of dealings, he must be allowed to use specific instances of it as cumulatively assisting to substantiate the general charge; and this, on the principle of § 202, ante, seems to be conceded generally.[1] On the other hand, so far as his charge concerned, not merely some outward course of conduct, but the plaintiff's inward and moral disposition — character, in the strict sense —, he is met by a doctrine which tells him (from the point of view of the surprise-argument) that this is unfair, that no plaintiff can be prepared to meet evidence ranging over his whole life, and that a simple and just mode of adducing the supposed facts is to plead them specifically as supporting the truth of the charge.[2] The difficulty is to draw the line be-

[1] 1801, Foulkes v. Sellway, 3 Esp. 236 (the plaintiff's bad character in defence to an action on a promise of marriage; evidence of an act of gross misconduct received); 1796, Woodard v. Bellamy, 2 Root 354 ("particular instances of unchastity" admitted); 1873, Sheahan v. Barry, 27 Mich. 217, 221 (considered here from the point of view both of excuse and of mitigation); 1895, Stratton v. Dole, 45 Nebr. 472, 63 N. W. 87 (same).

[1] 1880, R. v. Labouchere, 14 Cox Cr. 419, 428, 430 (libel charging that the prosecutor gained his livelihood in 1878 by card-sharping; evidence admitted of his having so gained a living in 1876 and 1877; to show this habit in given years, evidence of two instances of card-sharping was received, and it was left to the jury to say whether they would infer that the prosecutor, as charged, "lived by card-sharping"); 1899, Ratcliff v. Courier-Journal, 99 Ky. 416, 36 S. W. 177 (libel; to prove a charge that the plaintiff "has been in more rows than any other one man in this county," evidence was admitted of "many instances of quarrels and disturbances" in which he had taken part); 1896, Lanpher v. Clark, 149 N. Y. 472, 44 N. E. 182 (a charge of keeping a disorderly house; "such specific acts of immorality and impropriety on the part of the plaintiff as to furnish a reasonable inference as to the real character of the place," admitted).

[2] 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235 (charge of being a disreputable attorney; particular acts excluded on the ground of surprise, the reason being the same as under § 71, ante, where a quotation is given; the Court went even further, and declined to allow a truth-justification of a general charge to be supported by general evidence of bad character, its policy being to force all justifications of general slander to plead specific acts of the nature charged; these acts if thus pleaded, could be used to prove the charge true); 1882, Scott v. Sampson, 8 Q. B. D. 491 (libel for charging that the plaintiff had obtained £500 from G. under a threat of publishing certain facts, and had systematically abused his position as a dramatic critic and a journalist for the purpose of extorting money; the question was asked the plaintiff whether he had used his position as critic of the Daily Telegraph to injure or annoy an actor; Cave, J.: "Mr. Willes supported the question on the ground that it was material to the justification, as showing that the plaintiff had abused his position as critic for other purposes than that of extorting money; viz., for the purpose of grossly abusing a man whom he personally disliked. Lord Coleridge held — as I think rightly — that the question was not admissible as tending to prove justification; the natural meaning of the libel being that the witness abused his position as a critic for the purpose of extorting money. Mr. Willes now contends that it was also admissible as evidence tending to show the plaintiff's general bad character. I am of opinion that . . . as evidence of particular facts tending to show the plaintiff's disposition, it is therefore inadmissible"); 1899, Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 193, 56 Pac. 878 (charge of being a drunkard; specific acts of drunkenness "not included within the lines marked out by the plea of justification," excluded); 1899, McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287, 80 N. W. 21 (specific acts excluded).

In the following instances there were such specific instances pleaded: 1868, Talmadge v. Baker, 22 Wis. 625 (Cole, J.: "The plaintiff in effect says, 'You have defamed my character by charging me generally with a propensity to steal [the charge was, "He is in the habit of picking up things"]'; 'True,' the defendant replies, 'I have so charged, and I propose to make good my words by showing that you have been guilty of various larcenies mentioned in my answer'"); 1902, Cunningham v. Underwood, tween the two rules, and to determine when the charge involves disposition or trait of character and when it involves merely a habit or course of dealings. No Court seems yet to have furnished a satisfactory solution of this difficulty. It is after all chiefly one of pleading, for no one can doubt that, to prove a bad trait of character as charged, specific instances of its exhibition are relevant, and a mode of pleading which avoids the objection of unfair surprise would obviate the only impropriety of such evidence.

§ 208. Incompetency of Employee or Physician. In evidencing the incompetency of an employee, as a fact which if known to the employer may make him liable for injury to a fellow-employee, there is not always the same necessity for evidence of particular acts of incompetence, because in many jurisdictions personal opinion of those who know him is received (post, § 1984). Moreover, the possible range of the evidence is greater, and emphasizes the argument of unfair surprise, as well as that of undue prejudice (ante, § 94). Finally, there may be a limitation from the point of relevancy, since an act of mere negligence does not in itself show incompetence, nor does a single act of any sort necessarily show a lack of the general trait in question. These reasons have led some Courts to forbid this mode of proof:

1887, Devens, J., in Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807: "Because a servant may have been guilty of negligence on certain specified occasions, it by no means follows . . . that he might not ordinarily be a careful and skilful workman and properly employed as such. The investigation of other individual acts of alleged carelessness on the foreman's part would necessarily have a tendency to confuse the case by collateral inquiries, to protract it infinitely if those inquiries were carefully made, and to mislead and distract a Court or jury from the true issue."

There is, however, much to be said for the opposite view. A single act may signify little, but two or three of an extreme quality would signify everything. Fabricated testimony could be exposed, if notice were required and time were allowed. Proof by reputation is inconclusive, and needs to be reenforced. There is a danger of being too cautious in excluding evidence:

1895, Denman, J., in Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534, 31 S. W. 629: "The pleadings and evidence, however, raise the issue as to Rownie's competency as a car inspector, which involves, first, his skill; and, second, his attentiveness to duty. If he was lacking in either of these qualities, he could not be said to be competent to perform the important duties required of him. It is a matter of common knowledge that some persons are by nature inattentive or thoughtless, and, as a result thereof, frequently neglect the performance of important duties, without any intention so to do. This mental quality can only be evidenced by the outward acts of the person, and, where its existence or nonexistence is in issue, evidence of such acts is admissible. If Rownie was an inattentive or thoughtless person, such mental quality was a relevant fact upon the issue as to whether he probably inspected the cars on the particular morning of the accident. . . . Thus it seems that frequent failures to perform this duty at different times would be competent evidence 53 C. C. A. 93, 116 Fed. 803, 809 (libel charging the plaintiff with "immoral," "dishonest," and "dishonorable" conduct; defendant allowed, on a plea of truth, to prove "specific instances of just such conduct as a defence, the justification having been pleaded with sufficient particularity).

For the use of other instances of adultery or incest, where such conduct has been charged by the defendant in defamation, see post, § 400.

tending to prove this mental condition, and we see no reason why such omissions subsequent to the time of the accident would be less competent than similar omissions prior to the time of the accident. The question here is the existence or nonexistence of a mental condition or quality of the servant; inattentiveness or thoughtlessness, rendering him incompetent, such incompetency being direct evidence on the main issue in the case. We see no reason why specific acts cannot be given in evidence upon such issue, just as they could upon the issue of testamentary or contractual capacity."

The latter view seems on the whole the better. The direct rulings are comparatively few; and the state of the law is complicated by the frequent failure to distinguish two other related questions: (1) Whether, when character is offerable evidentially to prove the negligent act of a defendant or a plaintiff or a defendant's employee, this character may be shown by particular negligent acts (ante, § 199); the evidence here is of a narrower scope, but is offerable upon more numerous issues, than in the above case; (2) Whether particular acts of an employee may be used to show knowledge of his incompetency by his employer (post, § 250). In the former case the evidence is inadmissible in most jurisdictions; in the latter, it is admissible in most jurisdictions; while in the present case it is admitted in the majority of courts.[1]

Where the unskilfulness of a physician, or other professional person bound to furnish a certain quality of skill, is in issue as a part of the substantive law, it would seem that the same considerations apply, and that specific instances, if sufficiently marked, should be receivable.[2]

§ 209. Mitigation of Damages: (1) Defamation. It has already been seen that, exceptions and conditions apart, the reputed character of a plaintiff in an action of defamation is generally admissible in mitigation of damages, as involving the amount of his harm suffered (ante, §§ 70–73). So long as proof of character is made by reputation only, the true nature of the situation does not call for more accurate analysis; because, whether the reputation is itself

[1] Cal.: 1892, Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 292, 30 Pac. 529 ("Previous negligent acts," admissible); Del.: 1901, Giordano v. Brandywine Granite Co., Del., 3 Pennewill 423, 52 Atl. 332 (admissible); Ill.: 1899, Consolidated Coal Co. v. Seniger, 179 Ill. 370, 53 N. E. 733 (mine-engineer's competency; his prior conduct admitted to show his "fitness or unfitness"); 1903, Metropolitan W. S. E. R. Co. v. Fortin, — id. —, 67 N. E. 977 (motorman of an elevated railroad; "that he had run past signals, had jerked the train he was pulling, and had been laid off and reprimanded" on former occasions, admitted); Md.: 1893, Baltimore v. War, 77 Md. 593, 598, 27 Atl. 85 (two or three accidents to the employee's elevator-cage the day before, excluded; no authority cited); Mass.: 1885, Keith v. N. H. & N. Co., 140 Mass. 175, 179, 3 N. E. 28 (admissible sometimes; here, the acts of a car-inspector, to show incompetency, 1887, Hatt v. Nay, 144 id. 186, 10 N. E. 807 (specific acts of negligence excluded; see quotation supra); 1893, Kennedy v. Spring, 160 id. 203, 205, 35 N. E. 779 (inadmissible; following Hatt v. Nay); 1894, Connors v. Morton, 160 id. 333, 35 N. E. 860 (same); Minn.: 1898, Morrow v. R. Co., 74 Minn. 480, 77 N. W. 303 (former conduct admitted to show incompetency); N. J.: 1897, State v. Swett, 61 N. J. 457, 38 Atl. 969 (incompetency to produce good material, set up as defence to an action for discharging an employee; good similar work by the plaintiff in another factory, admitted, citing Baulec v. R. Co., N. Y., post, § 250); N. Y.: 1897, Youngs v. R. Co., 154 N. Y. 764, 77 Hun 612, 49 N. E. 1106 (specific acts, receivable to show incompetency); 1898, Park v. R. Co., 155 id. 215, 49 N. E. 674 (same); Tex.: 1888, Honston & T. C. R. Co. v. Patton, — Tex. —, 9 S. W. 175 (repeated acts of carelessness by employee, admitted); 1895, Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 id. 534 (see quotation, supra); 1898, Galveston H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Davis, 92 id. 372, 48 S. W. 570 (single instances of a conductor's incompetence, excluded).

[2] Compare the citations ante, §§ 67, 87, post, § 221.

the material fact or is merely evidence of actual character, in either case it is receivable. But when particular acts of misconduct are offered in mitigation of damages, it then becomes necessary to determine whether actual character or reputation (ante, § 52) is the ultimate fact in respect of which the harm is suffered; for if it is the latter, then particular acts of misconduct are irrelevant; they have no bearing on reputation.

That the reputation is the ultimate fact seems clear. The harm for which compensation is asked is the loss of social relations, as involved in the diminished reputation of the plaintiff. The condition of that reputation shows the extent of his loss. In this view, particular acts of misconduct, if they have not affected his reputation, have no bearing on the issue; and if they have affected it, the reputation alone suffices to show this. It might be argued that the injury is also regarded as in part the wound to the feelings, the mental suffering, and that a person guilty of misconduct could not suffer as deeply as an innocent person from a false charge of like misconduct. This argument, however, has never been advanced, and it ignores the fact that the injury to feelings which the law of defamation recognizes is not the suffering from the mere making of the charge, but is that suffering which is caused by other people's conduct towards him in consequence of it; which brings the question back again to the point of view of reputation alone.

After all, the the fundamental reason for the rejection of particular misconduct in miti ation of damages is that these facts of misconduct are wholly without bearing on the proposition in issue; that is, they show merely, in the neat phrase of Mr. Justice Cave, "not that the plaintiff has not, but that he ought not to have, a good reputation"; and no further reason need be sought. It is important to recognize this; because other reasons, particularly those of unfair surprise and of confusion of issues, have also been advanced for the exclusion of such evidence, — reasons which assume that actual character is in issue and that particular acts, though relevant, are excluded by these considerations of auxiliary policy. But if these were true and effective reasons, they would also operate to exclude similar evidence when offered in other cases to mitigate damages where actual character, and not reputation, was really in issue, — as in the topics of the ensuing sections, where nevertheless evidence of such particular misconduct is concededly proper. Thus, if actual character for chastity is not to be proved, in mitigation of damages, by particular acts in an action for defamation, the same reasons should presumably impel the same Court to exclude the same evidence offered for the same purpose in an action for seduction; yet the same Court constantly excludes in the former action what it admits in the latter. The inevitable conclusion and the true solution of the apparent inconsistency is that different reasons are operating. In the action for defamation, the true and controlling reason is the immateriality of particular acts of misconduct. Thus a Court which excludes such evidence in that action, while it might or might not also exclude it in the other actions, is not inconsistent in admitting it in the latter. In actions of defamation, then, such evidence is universally regarded as improper. The following passages illustrate the various reasons that have been judicially advanced:

1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 265 (charge of being a disreputable and unprofessional attorney); Richards, C. B.: "I cannot . . . allow defendants to impeach all the transactions of a man's life who may have occasion to seek redress in courts of justice and throw on him the difficulty of showing an uniform propriety of conduct during all his existence. It would be impossible for any man to come prepared to meet such a charge"; Wood, B.: "If, as contended for, you could call witnesses, upon the plea of not guilty, to contradict the general introductory words [of the declaration as to the plaintiff's good character], what would be the consequence? We should have counsel getting up and saying, 'The plaintiff has alleged,' as in the present declaration, 'that he is a good, honest, just, and faithful subject of the realm. I propose to call twenty witnesses to prove that he is an immoral, dissolute man; twenty more to prove that he has committed acts of dishonesty; twenty more to prove that he is not a faithful subject, by proving that he has been guilty of sedition, treasonable practices, and even high treason.' Did any one ever hear such stuff as this? It might do in a farce upon the stage meant to excite laughter, but it surely cannot be tolerated in a court of justice."

1882, Cave, J., in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491: "As to the third head, or evidence of facts and circumstances tending to show the disposition of the plaintiff, both principle and authority seem equally against its admission. At the most it tends to prove not that the plaintiff has not, but that he ought not to have, a good reputation; and to admit evidence of this kind is in effect, as was said in Jones v. Stevens, to throw upon the plaintiff the difficulty of showing an uniform propriety of conduct during his whole life. It would give rise to interminable issues which would have but a very remote bearing on the question in dispute, which is to what extent the reputation which he actually possesses has been damaged by the defamatory matter complained of."

1836, Earle, J., in Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill S. C. 177: "The defendant may justify and prove the plaintiff guilty of the crime imputed to him. If he be afraid to hazard that course, he may under the general issue (as from a masked battery), prove, in mitigation of damages, facts and circumstances going to show a ground of suspicion and belief. He may prove that the plaintiff was generally reported and suspected to be guilty of the crime imputed to him. And he may prove that the plaintiff is a person of general bad character, and although he may not have committed that particular crime, yet he is not entitled to damages. This, in all conscience, ought to satisfy the most voracious appetite for defamation. To allow the defendant, in an action for words imputing one crime, and under the general issue which simply denies the speaking, to prove that the plaintiff had been guilty of any other crime, even of the same nature, would be to deliver the plaintiff bound hand and foot to his adversary. It would render nugatory all the forms of practice and pleading which experience has found necessary for the investigation of truth and to promote the ends of justice; for the plaintiff never could know what hidden transactions the industrious malice of his adversary might be prepared to drag to light."[3]

[3] Compare with the following cases the distinctions of those cited ante, § 73: Eng.: 1716, Dennis v. Pawling, Vin. Abr., "Evidence," I, b, 16 ("The baron would not allow . . . any particular credit to be given of the plaintiff, but if the defendant had a mind to examine to this, the question must be general"); 1701, Smithies v. Harrison, ib. 15, semble (same); 1787, Buller, Nisi Prius, 9, semble (same); 1797, Knobell v. Fuller, Peake Add. Cas. 139 (slander charging the obtaining money for procuring pardons; general issue; to mitigate the damages, Lord Kenyon, C. J., received evidence of facts pointing towards the plaintiff having done such things); 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235 (excluded; see quotation supra); 1836, Moore v. Oastler, 2 Stark. Ev. 641, note e, Lord Denman, C. J., and Parke, B. (excluded); 1859, Bracegirdle v. Bailey, 1 F. & F. 536, Byles and Willes, JJ. (same); 1882, Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491 (same; see quotation supra); Conn.: 1792, Seymour v. Merrills, 1 Root 459 (excluded, "except those charged by the words," i. e. under a justification); Del.: 1838, Waples v. Burton, 2 Harringt. 446 (excluded); Ill.: 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Ill. 329 (excluded);

§ 210. Same: (2) Father's Action for Seduction of Daughter. The father's claim against the seducer of his daughter is based primarily on the loss of her services; but he is allowed to include also in the items of his loss for which compensation may be claimed (a) the impairment of the family honor or reputation, and (b) the mental suffering experienced by him in the loss of his daughter's chastity. Thus whatever affects either of these two elements is material to the issue, so far as the estimation of damages is concerned. From the point of view of (a) the daughter's prior reputation, as involving the family reputation, is material (ante, § 75). From the point of view of (b) the daughter's prior actual chaste character, as affecting the prior condition of his feelings, is also material (ante, § 75). Now particular acts of unchastity of the daughter are not relevant to show her reputation, but they are relevant to show her actual character.[1] For the latter purpose, then, the only question is whether, from the point of view of the arguments of surprise and confusion of issues (ante, § 194), such evidence should be excluded. It is generally conceded that these reasons do not stand in the way; and this conclusion seems just. Particular acts of unchastity by the daughter are therefore admissible.[2] That the father's reputation, as affecting his loss of Ky.: 1880, Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 208 (excluded); Me.: 1839, Smith v. Wyman, 16 Me. 14 (charge, "you are a whore"; the "utmost latitude of examination," as to the plaintiff's having lived in a house of ill-fame, etc., admitted); Mass.: 1825, Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. 376 (excluded, on the ground of surprise); 1863, Chapman v. Ordway, 5 All. 595 (excluded); 1863, Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 Id. 406 (same); 1881, McLaughlin v. Cowley, 131 Mass. 70, 72 (charge of murder and adultery; the plaintiff's former plea of guilty to an indictment for cheating, excluded); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Id. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039 (same); Mich.: 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 Mich. 41, 44 (excluded); N. H.: 1833, Lamos v. Snell, 6 N. H. 413 (charge of stealing and being "thievish"; that the plaintiff harbored thieves, excluded); N. Y.: 1806, Foot v. Tracy, 1 Johns. 46 (excluded); 1827, Root v. King, 7 Cow. 635 (same); 1829, King v. Root, 4 Wend. 160, semble (same); N. C.: 1802, Vick v. Whitfield, 2 Hayw. 222 (excluded); Oh.: 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh. 226 (excluded); 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 Id. 418, 425 (same); Pa.: 1835, Henry v. Norwood, 4 Watts 347, 349 (excluded on the ground of surprise); R. I.: 1896, Folwell v. Journal Co., 19 R. I. 551, 37 All. 6 (excluded); S. C.: 1820, Sawyer v. Eifert, 2 Nott & M. 511, 515 (excluded, qualifying Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 268, 271); 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill S. C. 177 (same); Wis.: 1871, Wilson v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 598, 603, 610 (excluded); 1890, Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Id. 236, 243, 46 N. W. 123 (destruction of credit alleged: the number of the plaintiff's creditors, excluded).

The same rule should apply in malicious prosecution: 1891, Wolf v. Perryman, 82 Tex. 112, 120, 17 S. W. 772 (excluded). Distinguish the use of prior libels by the plaintiff upon the defendant, in mitigation: 1809, Finnerty v. Tipper, 2 Camp. 73 (defendant in his journal had charged the plaintiff with crime; plaintiff had proposed as a question in his debating society, "Whether the editor of S. Journal or a notorious pickpocket were the greater nuisance to society," and had caused boards announcing this to be carried through the street, and at the debate had argued in favor of the pickpocket; Mansfield, C. J.: "If a man is in the habit of libelling others, he complains with a very bad grace of being libelled himself. . . . But I cannot say that he loses his right to maintain an action"; though damages might thereby be mitigated).

[1] 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 29, 33 (Nicholson, C. J.: "The injury complained of by the plaintiff was the loss of a virtuous daughter and of her companionship and example to the other children and the wound to the feelings of the parent produced by this injury; the rejected proof, however, would show that plaintiff was under a delusion as to the virtue of his daughter, that she had already surrendered her chastity before she yielded to the embrace of the defendant").

[2] Eng.: 1808, Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Camp. 460 (having a child by another man); 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 Id. 519 (immodest conduct with defendant); 1823, Bate v. Hill, 1 C. & P. 100 (same, and improper company of others); 1837, Andrews v. Askey, 8 Id. 7, Tindal, C. J.; 1836, Verry v. Watkins, 7 C. & P. 308, Alderson, B. (particular acts of unchastity by the daughter with third persons); 1840, Carpenter v. Wall, 11 A. & E. 803; that the daughter "went about in a light manner" speaking of the father of her child); 1850, Thompson v. Nye, 16 Q. B. 175; Ala.: 1830, Drish v. Davenport, 2 Stew. 266, 270, semble; Del.: 1851, Robinson v. Burreputation, is equally in issue, and that his actual character, as affecting the extent of his mental suffering, is equally in issue, has already been seen (ante, § 75). To show this actual character, particular acts of his own unchastity would seem to be receivable, for the same reasons as above.[3]

§ 211. Same: (3) Husband's or Wife's Action for Crim. Con. or Alienation of Affections. In the husband's action for criminal conversation or for alienation of affections, the actual character both of his wife and of himself are material to the issue (ante, § 75). For the same reasons therefore as in the foregoing topic, her character may be evidenced by particular acts of unchaste conduct;[1] and his character may be evidenced in the same way.[2]

In the wife's action for alienation of affections, the same considerations would apply;[3] but not in her action for loss of pecuniary support.[4]

§ 212. Same: (4) Indecent Assault. In a civil action for assault, where the assault is claimed to have been made for indecent purposes, the actual chaste character of the woman is material as affecting the extent of the shock to her feelings and thus the proper damages to be given (ante, § 75). The ton, 5 Harringt. 335, 338 (improper conduct); Ill.: 1874, White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 264 (acts "of immorality or indecorum"; but only before the seduction, apparently because the father's loss then began); Ind.: 1859, Shattuck v. Myers, 13 Ind. 50; 1868, Bell v. Rinker, 29 id. 269 (contra; not citing the preceding case); Smith v. Yarvan, 69 id. 448, semble (contra); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 id. 580, 582 (going back to the first case); Pa.: 1855, Zitzer v. Merkel, 24 Pa. 408, semble; 1863, Hoffman v. Kemerer, 44 id. 452 (contra; either on cross-examination or by outside evidence; reputation is the only mode of proof); Tenn.: 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (admissible, by outside testimony); 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 295 (admitted); 1860, Lea v. Henderson, 1 Cold. 116, 150 (excluded, because the reputation is foundation of the claim, and is not thereby necessarily injured); 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 33 (admissible, repudiating the preceding case). Of the following rulings the second is of course the better: 1813, Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. 519 (loss of service by seduction; to explain away the improper conduct of the plaintiff's daughter, a witness, with the defendant, evidence of a prior promise of marriage by him was rejected, and evidence only of an honorable paying of addresses was admitted, since otherwise the promise might be taken as an element in the recovery; the ruling is anomalous and poor); 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 339, cited supra (to explain away acts of familiarity with the defendant by the daughter in an action for seduction, evidence was admitted that a promise of marriage had been made).

For particular acts of intercourse with others as explaining away the defendant's responsibility for her pregnancy, see ante, § 133.

[2] 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 338 (the dissolute character of the father allowed to be shown by "any facts showing him to be of dissolute habits," or "his general habits of association with improper persons," or "declarations or conversations"). Contra: 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (excluded; venereal disease); 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 296 (excluded; adultery).

[1] 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 27 (the wife's misconduct before marriage, etc., admissible to show no loss of affection and thus mitigate damages); 1797, Elsam v. Faucett, 2 Esp. 563 (subsequent misconduct of a seduced wife not admissible in mitigation of damages); 1850, Thompson v. Nye, 16 Q. B. 175, per Erle, Coleridge, and Wightman, JJ. (admitted); 1820, Torre v. Summers, 2 Nott & M. 269, 271 (both before and after leaving the husband; here, admitting intercourse with other men than the defendant).

[3] 1790, Hodges v. Windham, Peake 39 (here the husband's formerly suffering his wife's adultery with others was allowed to be an excuse for the defendant, — a doctrine probably unsound; but the admissibility of such conduct in mitigation would not have been doubted); 1801, Wyndham v. Wycombe, 4 Esp. 16 (the husband's open and notorious infidelity, admitted as a defence, — a doctrine going even further than the use of such facts in mitigation); 1802, Bromley v. Wallace, ib. 237 (similar facts allowed in mitigation but not in excuse); 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Mumf. 495, 505, semble (wife's adultery, admissible, per Roane, J.).

[4] 1900, Wolf v. Frank, 92 Md. 138, 48 Atl. 132 (wife's unchaste conduct before separation, admitted to mitigate damages in her action for loss of husband's society).

[4] 1901, Kolb v. R. Co., 23 R. I. 72, 49 Atl. 392 (widow's action for husband's death; that plaintiff bore an illegitimate child since his death, not admitted in mitigation of damages).

unchaste character of the woman may be shown by particular acts, for the same reasons as in the preceding topics.[1]

§ 213. Same: (5) Breach of Promise of Marriage. For the same reasons as before, the unchaste character of the promisee of marriage, which is admissible in mitigation of damages (ante, § 75), may be shown by particular acts of unchastity.[1] Their use as evidencing character when offered to excuse the breach has been already noticed (ante, § 206).

4. Conduct independently usable evidentially for Other Purposes than to show Character (Design, Intent, Motive, etc.).

§ 215. General Principle. Suppose A to be charged with robbing the till in a store of which he is a sale-clerk; and suppose the facts to be offered against him (1) of having stolen the key of the till in the preceding week; (2) of having falsified his sale-book recently; (3) of having suffered large losses in gambling. From the point of view of the foregoing subject, these acts would all tend to show that he was of a dishonest and reckless disposition, and therefore disposed to steal from the till if opportunity offered. But from that point of view such acts would be wholly inadmissible, either in proving the charge in opening, or in rebutting his evidence of good character (ante, § 194). But that is not the only possible point of view. These acts may be relevant in other ways to show the commission of the crime, without in any way employing or suggesting their inference as to his character. They may justify other inferences which go to show his doing of the act charged. Thus, the purloining of the key may found an inference of Design or Plan, — a plan to use the key in some unlawful way for obtaining access to the till; or it may show Knowledge, — knowledge of the whereabouts of the till and of its valuable contents. So the falsification of his sale-book may show a Motive, — the desire to prevent his larcenies from being discovered; or it may show Design, — a general design to obtain money from his employers unlawfully. So the gambling losses may show Motive in another way, — the need and desire of money at any cost, to pay his losses. Whatever tended ordinarily to show such Knowledge or Design or Motive would otherwise have been admissible; and these acts are merely instances, from a variety of evidence, of classes of facts which would be evidential for their respective purposes.

Now this double or multiple possibility of use is an extremely common feature of evidence; and it is a well established principle, applied in numerous ways, that the inadmissibility of an evidential fact for one purpose does not prevent its admissibility for any other purpose otherwise proper (ante, § 13). In other words, if one door of entrance is closed to it, this does not prevent its entrance by other doors which may still remain open. Any other result would be unpractical and unreasonable in the highest degree. It would be as singular as a prohibition to a lame man to become a bookkeeper or a physician because he was incapable of becoming a circus-rider. This eligibility of evidence for one purpose, despite its ineligibility for another, is illustrated throughout the whole law of evidence. Reputation may be used, if it is a fact in issue, although it might not be admissible as hearsay to prove the fact reputed (ante, § 78). The unchaste acts of a complainant in rape may be admitted to disclose her unchaste character as evidence of consent (ante, § 200), although the same acts could not be received to impeach her veracity as a witness (post, § 987). Acts of an employee may be received to show the employer's knowledge of his incompetency (post, § 250), although they might not be admissible to show the employee's negligent character (ante, § 199). The misconduct of a defendant testifying for himself may be asked about to impeach his character as a witness (post, § 890), although they would not be received to show his character as an accused (ante, § 194). The uncommunicated threats or the character of a deceased person may be received to show him the aggressor in an affray (ante, § 110), although they would be inadmissible to show the defendant's belief in an impending attack (post, § 247). A testator's remarks about his relatives would be received to show the normal state of his affections, although they might be inadmissible to show directly the fact of duress (post, § 1734). In scores of these instances the principle is illustrated and established. Our law of evidence, as a workable system, would be impossible without it.

[1] Accord: 1882, Mitchell v. Work, 13 R. I. 645 (indecent assault; that "the plaintiff had been unchaste in her relations with men," admitted, as "specific acts"); 1864, Walry v. Ferber, 18 Wis. 500, 503 (same, semble); 1903, Barton v. Bruley, —id.—, 96 N. W. 815 (acts of lewdness only, not beer-drinking, admissible). Contra: 1889, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 405, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault and battery and solicitation; the plaintiff's prior intercourse with others, inadmissible); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 130, 32 N. E. 1039 (indecent assault; whether particular acts of lewdness are admissible to show the plaintiff's character, as affecting the shock to her feelings; semble, inadmissible).

[1] 1873, Sheahan v. Barry, 27 Mich. 217, 221; 1895, Siralton v. Dole, 45 Nebr. 472, 63 N. W. 875.

So far, then, as this general principle is concerned, the fact that a defendant's acts of misconduct would be inadmissible as showing his bad character does not in the slightest stand in the way of receiving the same acts in evidence if they are evidential for other purposes.

§ 216. Criminality of Conduct Immaterial, if it is otherwise Relevant. Is there, then, any reason why, for this particular class of facts, an exception should be made to the general canon of multiple admissibility, and facts relevant for some other purpose be rejected because they would be inadmissible if offered to show a bad character? In the great majority of instances in which such an exception has been sought to be established, the facts of conduct thus objected to are crimes; for obviously such conduct presents the clearest case in which the evidence is obnoxious to the character-rule, and the case in which the fact, if offered to show character, would most tellingly violate the spirit and the reasons of that rule. The question thus in effect becomes: Is the criminality of conduct a reason for excluding that conduct (when offered against an accused person) if it would be otherwise relevant and admissible?

Now the possibility of the abuse or misapplication of such evidence is no reason for making such an exception. This possibility exists equally for all the other cases above-mentioned; and it is always open to the opponent, here as there, to have the jury fully instructed in the limited purpose and use of the evidence. Such an instruction, it is always understood, is an ample safeguard against abuse or misunderstanding. If it be said that here, in the case of an accused person, where past crimes are offered, there is greater danger of such abuse and greater risks of harm in case of abuse, there are two answers. One is dogmatic, that there is no difference in the rules of evidence for criminals and for civil cases (ante, § 4). The other is practical, that an exception such as is here suggested would handicap the State in its prosecution of the man of cumulative criminal daring. The greater the criminal brought to bar, the more closely the traces of his crimes were involved in other misdeeds, the more stupendous his scheme of crime culminating in the act charged, so much the more safe and invulnerable would he have rendered himself, if the law were made thereby to lose this evidential material. By every spot of blood with which he taints the steps of his criminal progress, he succeeds in increasing the safety of his new crimes. This is an ample reason, if no other were even conceivable, for refusing to make an exception, already antagonistic to principle and obnoxious to practical procedure. "No man," in the neat phrase of Mr. Justice Brewer, "can by multiplying crimes diminish the volume of testimony against him." It may be additionally noted that the chief reason for the character-rule, namely, the doctrine of unfair surprise (ante, § 194; post, § 1849) does not, after all, apply here; for it is plain that this class of facts does not range over the whole scope of the defendant's life (as character-evidence of particular misconduct would), but bears only on the immediate antecedents and concomitants in time of the act charged, — plan, knowledge, motive, intent, and the like; and there is thus ample warning beforehand of this scope of the inquiry. The argument of surprise has never been thought to have any bearing on any part of the evidence dealing with these common ingredients of the proof of any and every act.

This much attention to the suggested exception is called for, because the effort to secure it and the inclination to ask for it seems to be so persistent and so common at the Bar; and not because its validity has ever been recognized or implied. On the contrary, no fallacy has been more frequently or more distinctly struck at by denial, by argument, by explanation, on the part of the Courts. It has been rebuffed, rebuked, repudiated, discredited, denounced, so often that it ought by this time to have been abandoned forever.[1] That it does still crop up again from time to time is apparently due in part to the inherent difficulty of distinguishing between conduct as showing character and conduct as showing other things; but also to the failure to appreciate that the rejection of past misconduct by the character-rule is never due simply to the incidental circumstance that it is misconduct, but to the fact that it is offered to show character and that herein consists its impropriety. If there is any other material or evidential proposition for which it is relevant, and if it is offered for that purpose, it is receivable, and its quality as misconduct or crime does not stand in the way. The persistency of this fallacy, and its utter lack of foundation, make it worth while to exhibit fully, from the utterances of the judges, their constant repudiation of the notion that the criminality of conduct offered for some relevant purpose is any objection to its reception:

[1] 1878, Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Blake v. Ass. Soc., 14 Cox Cr. 254 ("In any but an English court, and to any one but an English lawyer, the controversy whether this evidence is admissible or not, would seem, I imagine, supremely ridiculous; because it is admitted that it is most cogent and material to the plaintiff's claim").

1860, Williams, J., in R. v. Richardson, 2 F. & F. 346: "There is no principle of law which prevents that being put in evidence which might otherwise be so, merely because it discloses other indictable offences. . . . Evidence which is admissible for such a purpose is not the less so because it tends to prove the commission of other felonies by the prisoner."

1865, Willes, J., in R. v Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 541: "There are cases in which it is allowable to go into the prisoner's antecedents, as for the purpose of showing that he has had opportunities of committing the offence, or that in a particular instance his act could not have been accidental. But these cases only establish the principle that a relevant fact which incidentally casts a slur upon the prisoner is not thereby rendered inadmissible when it is part of the direct evidence in the case."

1829, Brockenbrough, J., in Walker's Case, 1 Leigh 576: "It is proper that the chain of evidence should be unbroken. If one or more links of that chain consist of circumstances which tend to prove that the prisoner has been guilty of other crimes than that charged, . . . there is no reason why the criminality of such intimate and connected circumstances should exclude them, more than other facts apparently innocent. Thus, if a man be indicted for murder, and there be proof that the instrument of death was a pistol, proof that that instrument belonged to another man, that it was taken from his house on the night preceding the murder, that the prisoner was there on that night, and that the pistol was seen in his possession on the day of the murder just before the fatal act was committed, is undoubtedly admissible, although it has the tendency to prove the prisoner guilty of a larceny. Such circumstances constitute a part of the transaction; and whether they are perfectly innocent in themselves, or involve guilt, makes no difference as to their bearing on the main question which they are adduced to prove. But if the circumstances have no intimate connection with the main fact, if they constitute no link in the chain of evidence; then, supposing them innocent, their admission, to be sure, may do no harm, yet they ought to be excluded, because they are irrelevant; but if they denote other guilt, they are not only irrelevant, but they do injury, because they have a tendency to prejudice the minds of the jury, and for this additional reason they ought to be excluded."

1858, Johnson, J., in People v. Wood, 3 Park. Cr. 681: "The proper inquiry, when the circumstance is offered, is, Does it fairly tend to raise an inference in favor of the existence of the fact proposed to be proved? If it does, it is admissible whether such fact or circumstance be innocent or criminal in its nature. It does not lie with the prisoner to object that the fact proposed as a circumstance is so heinous in its nature and so prejudicial to his character that it shall not be used against him, if it bears upon the fact in issue. The atrocity of the act cannot be used as a shield under such circumstances, or as a bar to its legitimate use by the prosecution. If it could, many criminals might escape just and merited punishment solely by means of their hardened and depraved natures."

1874, Kingman, C. J., in State v. Folwell, 14 Kan. 109: "It would be a singular rule of law that a person accused of a grave crime could compel the exclusion of important and relevant testimony merely by committing two felonies at the same time or so nearly connected that the one could not be proven without also proving the other."

1876, Cushing, C. J., in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 288: "I think we may assume, in the outset, that it is not the quality of an action, as good or bad, as unlawful or lawful, as criminal or otherwise, which is to determiue its relevancy. I take it to be generally true, that auy act of the prisoner may be put in evidence against him, provided it has any logical and legal tendency to prove any matter which is in issue between him and the State, notwithstanding it might have an indirect bearing, which in strictness it ought not to have, upon some other matter in issue."

1878, Brewer, J., in State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 319: "Whatever testimony tends directly to show the defendant guilty of the crime charged is competent, though it also tends to show him guilty of another and distinct offence. A party cannot by multiplying crimes diminish the volume of competent testimony against him."

1881, Peters, J., in State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 534: "It is no objection that, in attempting to prove one offence by the respondent's answers, another offence is proved or confessed by him, if the counection is such that the proof is relevant to the issue. That is unavoidable."

1888, C. Allen, J., in Com. v. Robinson, 146 Mass. 571, 16 N. E. 452: "While it is well settled in this Commonwealth that on the trial of an indictment the government cannot be allowed to prove other independent crimes for the purpose of showing that the defendant is wicked enough to commit the crime on trial, this rule does not extend so far as to exclude evidence of acts or crimes which are shown to have been committed as part of the same common purpose or in pursuance of it. . . . In such a case it makes no difference whether the preliminary acts are criminal or not; otherwise, the greater the criminal, the greater his immunity. Such preliminary acts are competent because they are relevant to the issue on trial; and the fact that they are criminal does not render them irrelevant. Suppose, for further example, one is charged with breaking a bank, and there is evidence that he had made preliminary examinations from a neighboring room; that his occupation of such room was accomplished by a criminal breaking and entering would not render the evidence incompetent."

1889, Hemingway, J., in Billings v. State, 52 Ark. 303, 309, 12 S. W. 574: "The general rule is well established, in civil as well as in criminal cases, that evidence shall be confined to the issne. It seems that the necessity for the enforcement of the rule is stronger in criminal cases. The facts laid before the jury should consist exclusively of the transaction that forms the subject of the indictment, and matters relating thereto; to enlarge the scope of the investigation beyond this would subject the defendant to the dangers of surprise against which no foresight might prepare and no innocence defend. Under this rule it is generally improper to introduce evidence of other offences. But if facts bear upon the offence charged, they may be proven, although they disclose some other offence. The test of admissibility is the connection of the facts offered with the subject charged. Such connection exists in a variety of cases."

1893, Beatty, C. J., in People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 138, 141, 32 Pac. 864, and People v. Tucker, 104 id. 440, 442, 38 Pac. 195: "It is trne that in trying a person charged with one offence it is ordinarily inadmissible to offer proof of another and distinct offence; but this is only because the proof of a distinct offence has ordinarily no tendency to establish the offence charged. But whenever the case is such that proof of one crime tends to prove any fact material in the trial of another, such proof is admissible; and the fact that it may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors is no ground for its exclusion. . . . When such evidence is offered, the same considerations arise as upon the offer of other testimony: Is the evidence relevant and competent? Does it tend to prove any fact material to the issues?" [2]

[2] Accord: Eng.: 1804, R. v. Whiley, 2 Leach 4th ed. 985, 986; 1825, Burrough, J., in R. v. Moore, 2 C. & P. 235; 1836, R. v. Rooney, 7 C. & P. 517; 1843, Maule, J., in R. v. Tissington, 1 Cox Cr. 12; 1846, Maule, J., in R. v. Dossett, 2 C. & K. 306, 2 Cox Cr. 243; 1848, Erle, J.,

Occasionally this principle is spoken of as though it involved an exception to some otherwise general rule.[3] The truth is, however, that it is itself an illustration of the general principle, to which the character-rule is the exception. That general principle (ante, § 10) is that all facts affording any reasonable inference as to the act charged are relevant and admissible, including facts showing design, motive, knowledge, or the like, where these matters are in issue or relevant. To this general principle there is the important exception (ante, § 194), that conduct tending and offered to show bad moral character as evidence is inadmissible. Thus, so long as we avoid the realm of this exception and do not seek to attack the defendant's character, we are within the scope and sanction of the great general principle. We are in no sense saved by a mere exception; and we are further reënforced by the fundamental canon (ante, § 13) that admissibility for one purpose is not affected by inadmissibility for another:

1842, Story, J., in Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. 360: "They constitute exceptions to the general rule excluding evidence not directly comprehended within the issue; or rather, perhaps, it may with more certainty be said, the exception is necessarily embodied in the very substance of the rule; for whatever does legally conduce to establish the points in in R. v. Bleasdale, 2 Cr. & K. 765; 1849, Pollock, C. B., in R. v. Geering, 18 L. J. M. C. 215; 1861, R. v. Weeks, Leigh & C. 18, 21, by five judges; 1864, Willes, J., in R. v. Reardon, 4 F. & F. 79; 1878, Blake v. Assur. Co., L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94, 102; Ark.: 1884, Melton v. State, 43 Ark. 367, 371; 1889, Billings v. State, 52 id. 303, 309, 12 S. W. 574 (disposing of the apparently contrary notion in Endaily v. State, 39 id. 280); Cal.: 1865, People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, 515 (the fact that an indictment is pending on the other charge is immaterial); 1885, People v. Cunningham, 66 id. 668, 670, 4 Pac. 1144, 6 Pac. 700, 846; 1887, People v. Rogers, 71 id. 565, 567, 12 Pac. 679; 1894, People v. Lane, 101 id. 513, 517, 36 Pac. 16; 1894, People v. Tomlinson, 102 id. 19, 24, 36 Pac. 506; 1896, People v. Craig, 111 id. 460, 468, 44 Pac. 186; 1896, People v. Sanders, 114 id. 216, 46 Pac. 153; 1897, People v. Ebanks, 117 id. 652, 49 Pac. 1049; People v. Wilson, ib. 688, 49 Pac. 1054; 1897, People v. Winthrop, 118 id. 85, 50 Pac. 390; 1899, People v. Pette, 123 id. 373, 55 Pac. 993; Fla.: 1898, Roberson v. State, 40 Fla. 509, 24 So. 474; Ill.: 1889, Farris v. People, 129 Ill. 521, 529, 21 N. E. 821; 1893, Painter v. People, 147 id. 463, 35 N. E. 64; 1897, Williams v. People, 166 id. 132, 46 N. E. 749; 1899, Schintz v. People, 178 id. 320, 52 N. E. 903; 1902, Henry v. People, 198 id. 162, 65 N. E. 120; 1903, Glover v. People, — id. —, 68 N. E. 464; Ia.: 1899, State v. Wrand, 108 Ia. 73, 78 N. W. 788; Kan. 1874, State v. Folwell, 14 Kan. 105, 109; 1878, State v. Adams, 20 id. 311, 319; Me.: 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 534; Mass.: 1869, Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 114; 1870, Com. v. Choate, 105 id. 458; 1877, Com. v. Scott, 123 id. 235; 1878, Com. v. Bradford, 123 id. 17, 45; 1882, Com. v. Jackson, 132 id. 45; 1884, Com. v. Corkin, 136 id. 429; 1886, Com. v. Blood, 141 id. 570, 575, 6 N. E. 769; 1888, Com. v. Schaffner, 146 id. 515, 16 N. E. 280; 1902, Higlister v. Freneh, 180 id. 299, 62 N. E. 264; Mich.: 1878, People v. Marble, 38 Mich. 117, 123; 1882, People v. Henssler, 48 id. 49, 52, 11 N. W. 804; 1896, People v. Macard, 109 id. 623, 67 N. W. 968; Mo.: 1866, State v. Harold, 38 Mo. 497; 1879, State v. Nugent, 71 id. 136, 141; N. H.: 1872, Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 406 (quoted post); 1898, State v. Davis, 69 id. 350, 41 Atl. 267; N. J.: 1838, State v. Robinson, 16 N. J. L. 508; N. M.: 1900, Terr. v. McGinnis, 10 N. M. 269, 61 Pac. 208; N. Y.: 1858, People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 71, 114, 128, 138; 1874, Weed v. People, 56 N. Y. 628; 1874, Coleman v. People, 58 id. 556, 560; 1880, Pierson v. People, 79 id. 436; 1895, People v. Shea, 147 id. 78, 41 N. E. 508; 1896, People v. McLaughlin, 150 id. 386, 44 N. E. 1017; 1897, People v. Peckens, 153 id. 576, 47 N. E. 883; N. D.: 1896, State v. Kent, 5 N. D. 516, 67 N. W. 1052; Or.: 1881, State v. Wintzingerode, 9 Or. 153, 158; Pa.: 1863, Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 386; 1878, Turner v. Com., 86 id. 70; S. C.: 1839, State v. Ford, 3 Strobh. 517, 524; U. S.: 1893, Moore v. U. S., 150 U. S. 57, 61, 14 Sup. 26; 1900, Wolfson v. U. S., 41 C. C. A. 422, 101 Fed. 430; Vt.: 1876, State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 212; Va.: 1829, Walker's Case, 1 Leigh 576; 1847, . irr v. Com., 4 Gratt. 534; 1867, Adams v. Lawson, 17 id. 259, semble.

[3] Thus, in People v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 671, 4 Pac 1144, 6 Pac. 700, 846, supra, it is said that "as a general rule no evidence can be introduced respecting any other crimes than that charged," except so far as it "tends to prove the crime alleged."

issue is necessarily embraced in it, and therefore a proper subject of proof, whether it be direct or only presumptive."

1872, Doe, J., in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 412: "It is sometimes erroneously supposed that such evidence is excluded because it is 'collateral.' The true reason seems to be the exception (established by ancient English, and adopted without due consideration by modern American authorities) which excludes evidence of a prisoner's character and disposition for the commission of such a crime as that alleged in the indictment on which he is being tried, and the fact that although the Courts who introduced the exception might trust themselves to weigh evidence of other crimes, solely on the question of physical strength or other question on which it might be competent, they would not trust juries. It is evident that the exception, not being sufficiently emphasized as an exception and a very peculiar one, has produced much confusion, by seeming to countenance the idea that the law has an antipathy against experimental knowledge in general."

On the other hand, where the facts offered consist of past misconduct, whether criminal or not, and being offered to show design, motive, intent, knowledge, or the like, are determined not to be relevant for any such purpose, it follows, as of course, that they are also obnoxious to the character-rule and must be excluded. If they had been innocent (as Mr. Justice Brockenbrough points out above), "yet they ought to be excluded, being irrelevant"; but where they involve past misconduct, "they are not only irrelevant, but they do injury," because they prejudice the accused by invoking his character, "and for this additional reason they ought to be excluded." They are admitted, then, whenever they are relevant otherwise than to character; and if they are not so relevant, they are excluded for the double reason of irrelevancy for the one purpose and impolicy for the other. Thus the only legitimate bearing of the character-rule is to impel to a greater caution in determining their relevancy in a given instance; because if we are too liberal or loose, in not exacting an adequate degree of relevancy or probative value for the allowable purposes, we admit evidence whose dominant bearing is a dangerous and forbidden one. But while greater care and caution is thus called for in applying to this class of evidence the tests of relevancy for design, motive, and the like, those tests themselves remain the same in scope, and, when once satisfied, avail to admit the evidence. Whatever avenues of relevancy — design, motive, knowledge, identity, and so on — were open to this class of facts before, are open to them still. We are merely to scrutinize more carefully their right to enter these avenues, because of the harm that may be done by erroneous or over-loose interpretation:

1854, Scott, J., in Austin v. State, 14 Ark. 559: "It is certainly true as a general rule, both in civil and criminal cases, that the evidence must be confined to the point in issue; and in criminal cases there is perhaps a greater necessity, if possible, than in civil proceedings to enforce the rule. But in neither class of cases does this rule exclude all evidence that does not bear directly upon the issue; on the contrary, all evidence is admissible which tends to prove it, and no facts are forbidden to be shown except such as are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference in elucidation of the matters involved in the issue."

1861, 1863, Bigelow, C. J., in Com. v. Shepard, 1 All. 581, and Com. v. Jeffries, 7 Id. 567: "It is a dangerous species of evidence, not only because it requires a defendant to meet and explain other acts than those charged against him and for which he is on trial, but also because it may lead the jury to violate the great principle that a party is not to be convicted of one crime by proof that he is guilty of another. For this reason, it is essential to the rights of the accused that, when such evidence is admitted, it should be carefully limited and guarded by instructions to the jury, so that its operation and effect may be confined to the single legitimate purpose for which it is competent. . . . If it be asked what limit is to be placed on the range of such an inquiry, the answer is obvious: It cannot be extended to facts or circumstances which do not naturally or necessarily bear on the issue to be established, precisely as evidence of all collateral facts and circumstances must be confined to the proof of those which have a legitimate and direct connection with the principal transaction."

§ 217. Summary of other Modes of Relevancy. What are these other avenues of Relevancy by which such conduct may enter evidentially? They are limited only by the matters which, in the words of Mr. J. Bigelow, "naturally or necessarily bear on the issue to be established." These modes will be found throughout the whole scope of the system of relevancy, and the utility of such evidence may appear at any point. Nevertheless, the commonest instances of its use occur in the ensuing topics, because the matters there to be proved are those for which conduct most commonly serves as evidence. These matters may here be briefly enumerated, illustrating how under each head an act of misconduct may be, among other kind of facts, relevant: Capacity (physical strength or the like): on a charge of placing a large stone on a railroad track, the previous felonious placing of a rail on the track shows the defendant's strength-capacity for the act; Habit or Custom: to show a habit of omitting a signal at a railroad-crossing, previous instances of its omission are relevant; Design or Plan: to show a plan to rob a safe, the stealing of the key would be relevant; or to show a plan to murder a whole family and obtain their insurance-money, the killings of other insured members of the family would be admissible; Knowledge or Belief: to show knowledge of the counterfeit quality of a bank-bill, a former unsuccessful attempt to pass a similar one is relevant; Intent: to show intentional falsification of accounts, former incorrect entries of a similar sort tend to negative mistake; Motive: to show a probable desire in a husband to get rid of his wife, an adulterous relation with another woman is relevant; Identity: to assist in identifying a murderer, the commission of another murder by the defendant is relevant, if it appears that the same person committed both. In all these instances, and in others less frequent, the misconduct of a defendant may become relevant otherwise than as showing Character. In the following chapters the bearing of the present principle is amply illustrated.

§ 218. Res Gestæ and Acts a part of the Issue; Inseparable Crimes. There is, however, an additional class of cases in which the misconduct of a defendant may be received, irrespective of any bearing on character, and yet not as evidential of one of the above other matters (design, motive, or the like), or as relevant to any particular subsidiary proposition. That class includes other criminal acts which are an inseparable part of the whole deed. Suppose that A is charged with stealing the tools of X; the evidence shows that a box of carpenter's tools was taken, and that in it were the tools of Y and Z as well as of X; here we are incidentally proving the commission of two additional crimes, because they are necessarily interwoven with the stealing charged, and together form one deed. The other two crimes are not offered as affecting A's character, nor do they affect his character; because all were done, if at all, as parts of a whole, and if we believe or disbelieve his doing of one part, we believe or disbelieve his doing of all. The two other crimes do not affect his character in the way forbidden by the reasons of the character-rule (ante, § 194) — i.e. by way of undue prejudice, in that we might condemn him now, though innocent of the act charged, because we are prejudiced by his former crimes; nor by way of unfair surprise, in that he cannot be prepared to defend himself against evidence of former misconduct of which he had no notice. While thus, on the one hand, these concomitant crimes are not obnoxious to the reasons of the character-rule, so also they are necessarily gone into in proving the entire deed of which the act charged forms a part. There is therefore not only a necessity for proving them, but no objection against proving them.[1]

[1] 1831, R. v. Salisbury, 5 C. & P. 155 (stealing bank-notes from a letter; the stealing of others from another letter, and replacing them by the ones in issue, admitted as a part of the transaction); 1862, R. v. Cobden, 2 F. & F. 833 (burglary; evidence of three other burglaries by the defendants on the same night was admitted, partly because "so intermixed that it is impossible to separate them," partly to explain the disposal of the property taken); 1899, People v. Piggott, 126 Cal. 509, 59 Pac. 31 (general principle stated); 1898, Roberson v. State, 40 Fla. 509, 24 So. 474 (finding stolen goods under a warrant to search for other stolen goods; nature of the warrant, excluded, because of the intimation of other crimes; unsound); 1898, Republic v. Tsunikichi, 11 Haw. 341, 344 (killing of a child at the same time with that of a woman, admitted); 1899, Republic v. Yamane, 12 id. 189, 217 (assault on another person at the same time, admitted); 1885, Turner v. State, 102 Ind. 425, 1 N. E. 869 (the possession of another stolen book, admitted, as contradicting the defendant's account of how he came into possession of the lot of books among which was the one charged); 1852, Terreil v. Allen, 7 La. An. 47, 48 (inveigling and stealing a slave; the capture of the slave in the defendant's quarters, admitted, though involving the crime of harboring; Preston, J.: "The same evidence that tends to prove one crime often tends to prove another; the firing a gun may tend to prove an attempt to kill, or manslaughter, by an actual killing; so the felonious taking of goods may be offered to prove a burglary as well as larceny"); 1857, State v. Munco, 12 id. 625 (charge of firing a gun with intent to kill; the fact of the other person being wounded, and a distinct crime shown, held admissible as a part of the proof of the offence charged); 1882, Stete v. Vines, 34 id. 1079, 1083 (another killing at the same time, by a member of the same party lying in wait, admitted); 1849, Com. v. M'Pike, 3 Cush. 181, 184 (manslaughter; to show the assault which ensued in the death, a conviction for it was received, with other evidence, but this was not to be used to show "his disposition to engage in such assaults"); 1888, Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 515, 16 N. E. 280 (on a charge of coloring milk, evidence of the milk being also of bad quality, held not inadmissible because it concerned a separate offence not necessarily involved); 1896, State v. Perry, 136 Mo. 126, 37 S. W. 804 (that other persons were killed within a few moments of the same time, admitted); 1897, State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964 (three persons killed within a few moments; the circumstances and conditions of all three deaths admissible); 1899, State v. Wong Gee, 35 id. 276, 57 Pac. 914 (another assault by defendant at the same time, admitted); 1899, State v. Hanna, ib. 195, 57 Pac. 629 (stealing of third person's horses at same time, admitted); 1898, Com. v. Roddy, 184 Pa. 274, 39 Atl. 211 (murder; traces of the escaping murderer, involving the stealing of another person's property, received); 1896, State v. Hayes, 14 Utah 118, 46 Pac. 752 (three men killed under the same circumstances; the deaths of two admitted on a charge of killing the third); 1895, State v. Craemer, 12 Wash. 217, 40 Pac. 945 (where an infant child was killed at the same time as the mother, all the circumstances were received).

For other instances involving the stealing of chattels from the same lot, see ante, § 152 (possession of stolen chattels) and post, § 414 (identity of chattels). For other instances involving contemporaneous homicides, see post, § 363 (other

It is sometimes said that such acts are provable as a part of the res gestæ. But this phrase is unsatisfactory, first, because it is obscure and indefinite, and needs further definition and translation before either its reason or its scope can be understood; and, secondly, because its very looseness and obscurity lend too many opportunities for its abuse. It is not too much to say that it is nowadays most frequently used merely as a cover for loose ideas and ignorance of principles. It is occasionally used to admit acts whose real function is to show Intent or Motive or Design. But the result is only to make rulings on evidence arbitrary and chaotic, when we ignore the correct purposes of admission and substitute an indefinite and meaningless phrase of this sort. The term res gestæ should be once for all abandoned as useless and vicious. Let it be said that such acts are receivable as "necessary parts of the proof of an entire deed," or "inseparable elements of the deed," or "concomitant parts of the criminal act," or anything else that carries its own reasoning and definition with it; but let legal discussion sedulously avoid this much-abused and wholly unmanageable Latin phrase.[2] acts to show intent). Throughout the various classes of crimes dealt with in §§ 302–367, post, will be found further instances. For other instances of proof of an inseparable crime, see post, § 414 (evidence of identity).

[2] Its abuse in other senses is dealt with post, § 1765.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

TOPICS II, III, IV, V: EVIDENCE TO PROVE PHYSICAL OR MENTAL CAPACITY, DESIGN OR INTENT.

CHAPTER X.

Topic II: EVIDENCE TO PROVE PHYSICAL CONDITION OR CAPACITY (STRENGTH, SKILL, HEALTH, ETC.).

§ 219. General Principle. It has been already noted (ante, § 190) that physical capacity or condition, like most other human attributes, may be evidenced in three ways: (1) by conduct or other manifestations indicating their inward source; (2) by external facts pointing forward to the existence of the quality or condition; (3) by the prior or subsequent existence of the quality or condition, pointing forward or backward to its existence at the time in question. The considerations which affect the validity of the various inferences are simple, depending chiefly on ordinary experience and common sense, and cause little difficulty. The doctrine just examined (ante, § 216), that the criminality of conduct which is in itself relevant is no objection to its reception, is frequently illustrated; and the necessity for applying it and for distinguishing the character-rule (ante, § 194) has given the occasion for most of the rulings. The objections of unfair surprise, undue prejudice, and confusion of issues (ante, §§ 194, 202) are here occasionally applicable. But they have ordinarily no real force.

The trial Court's discretion is best trusted to determine their validity in the light of the circumstances of each case.

§ 220. Power or Strength, from Instances of Conduct exhibiting it. Where a person's physical power or strength is a proposition to be proved, instances of the person's conduct and acts, manifesting the existence in him of such power or strength, are the natural and proper evidence of it. In limiting the use of this evidence, the trial Court's discretion should control, — a principle fully established in New Hampshire.[1]

§ 221. Skill or Means, from Instances of its Exercise. The possession of instruments adapted to do an act in question is evidence of capacity or ability to do it.[1] The skill to do the act may be evidenced by previous or subsequent conduct exhibiting it.[2] Skill or competence may also to some extent be inferred from ordinary appearance and conduct.[3] That a physician's competence or skill may be evidenced by marked instances of the presence or absence of it seems clear from the present point of view; but a

[1] 1838, Ellis v. Short, 21 Pick. 142 (false arrest; to prove the plaintiff's strength and power of violent resistance when drunk, the fact of his having on a former occasion when drunk thrown stones and resisted arrest with violence was excluded; unsound); 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 196, 211 (indictment for placing an obstruction, viz. two stones of considerable size, on a railroad track; the fact of the placing of iron rails on the track, near by, about the same time, by the defendant, was admitted as showing that the defendant "had the strength and ability to place them there"); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 id. 148, 149, 154 (rape; to show the defendant's "capacity of overcoming such resistance as the prosecutrix might have offered, . . . evidence was received that he had once "taken a barrel of flour up in his hands before him and carried it several rods," had "carried a barrel of sugar some ten rods on his shoulder," etc.); 1879, Hilliard v. Beattie, 59 id. 462, 465 (the rate of pulse of other healthy men subjected to the same conditions as the plaintiff was held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); 1895, People v. Corey, 148 N. Y. 476, 42 N. E. 1066 (the condition of the defendant, charged with murder, the act of stabbing being conceded, and his affection by syphilis, was held unnecessarily and improperly admitted to show his capacity to commit the assault, on the principle that it merely prejudiced the jury, and that "illegal evidence which has a tendency to excite the passions, arouse the prejudice, awaken the sympathies, or warp or influence the judgment of the jurors, in any degree, cannot be considered as harmless"); 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 Wash. 544, 50 Pac. 512 (strength-tests, excluded, except on cross-examination to test accuracy).

For the relevancy of physical capacity, when properly evidenced, to show the doing or not-doing of an act, see ante, §§ 84, 85.

[1] 1876, Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 71, (abortion; the possession of a "speculum chair" and other instruments, admitted, as showing that the defendant had "the means and opportunity to commit the offence charged"). For other ruling, see ante, §§ 87, 88, and post, § 238; some of the rulings are difficult to place, as the evidential fact has often more than one aspect.

[2] 1885, Belt v. Lawes, Eng., described in Montague Williams' Reminiscences, II, 222 (libel, for charging that the plaintiff, a sculptor, did not make the works of art put forth by him as his own, but merely employed others and took their productions; the plaintiff was ordered by the judge to execute a second bust of a person of whom there was already in existence a bust claimed by the plaintiff to be his work; this the plaintiff did in a room adjoining the Court, under conditions arranged to prevent fraud; and the resulting bust "went a long way to determine the result of the trial," which was a verdict for £5000); 1885, Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 2 N. E. 698 (defence of forgery to a promissory note; evidence rejected of the plaintiff's having shown a person how to imitate notes by tracing; the character-rule was invoked as excluding evidence of "capacity and means" where directed to the act in issue and not the intent of the doer; the ruling is unsound). Compare the citations ante, § 87, post, §§ 309, 460, 461.

[3] 1885, Keith v. N. H. & N. Co., 140 Mass. 175, 180, 3 N. E. 28 ("the appearance and conduct [upon the stand] of a railroad car-inspector," admissible "to aid the jury in determining whether he was a person of suitable qualifications and of sufficient intelligence to be entrusted with so responsible a duty"; the "principle applies where the inquiry . . . relates to intelligence and understanding as well as to physical capacity"; 1890, Peaslee v. R. Co., 152 id. 155, 158, 25 N. E. 71 (sanctioning the preceding, where there is other evidence of incompetency); 1897, Olsen v. Andrews, 168 id. 261, 47 N. E. 90 (see the citation ante, § 199; here nervous conduct, etc., was admitted to show unfit physical condition of an employee).

confusion of moral character with technical skill has occasionally led to the judicial treatment of such evidence under the character-rules (ante, §§ 108, 67, 87).[4]

§ 222. Age, from Appearance; Voice, from Utterances; Sight, from things seen. Experience teaches us that corporal appearances are approximately an index of the age of their bearer, particularly for the marked extremes of old age and youth. In every case such evidence should be accepted and weighed for what it may be in each case worth. In particular, the appearance of an alleged minor may be considered in judging of his age;[1] a contrary rule would be pedantically over-cautious.[2]

[4] The rulings are therefore by no means consistent: 1807, R. v. Williamson, 3 C. & P. 635 (a midwife indicted for childbed-death caused by negligence; fourteen women were called, and six examined, who had been delivered by the accused; Ellenborough, L. C. J.: "From the evidence of the witnesses on his behalf it appears that he had delivered many women at different times, and from this he must have had some degree of skill"); 1831, R. v. Long, Old Bailey, before Bayley, B., Pelham's Chronicles of Crime, ed. 1891, II, 217, 227 (trial of a quack physician, for manslaughter by improper treatment; this accused called one Mr. A., who testified that "he had several times been under the care of the prisoner; he had an asthma, and subsequently a determination of blood to the head. The Attorney-General here interfered, and submitted that the course of the present examination ought to be confined to the general character of the prisoner; in which the Court, after hearing arguments from Mr. Alley and Mr. Phillips, acquiesced. Mr. Phillips endeavored to shake this decision, contending that as the indictment raised the question whether Mr. Long was grossly ignorant, or had been grossly careless, it was impossible to establish his innocence otherwise than by showing, as he verily believed they could, that he was both learned and skilful, and most attentive and humane in his practice of the healing art. Mr. Baron Bayley: 'We cannot go into specific cases; we must confine ourselves to general evidence.' Mr. Phillips resumed his argument at length; but the Attorney-General in reply said that if his learned friends found themselves at liberty to go into all the successful cases of the prisoner, he should go into his several failures in practice. The Court having repeated its former decision, the examination of Mr. A. was resumed, and he stated that the prisoner had attended him for several disorders, and he had the fullest reason to be satisfied with his skill, care, and attention. Mrs. A., the wife of Gen. A., Miss R., her sister, Mrs. P., Mrs. M., Mrs. Mc., and a vast number of other ladies and gentlemen were then examined, and every one bore testimony in the strongest manner to the skill, assiduity, and humanity of the prisoner, and to the extraordinary success which had uniformly attended his practice"; notice that what was excluded was only the details of particular cases, the general success of the accused's treatments being received); 1845, R. v. Whitehead, 3 C. & K. 202, Maule, J. (particular instances inadmissible; though the doctrine seems to have been violated in this very case); 1869, Key v. Thomson, 1 Han. N. Br. 295, 301 (malpractice; defendant's successful similar treatment of other cases, admitted to show the incorrectness of the plaintiff's witnesses' testimony as to the unskillfulness of his treatment); 1882, Dresbrack v. State, 38 Oh. St. 365 (see citation ante, § 199); 1898, Lacy v. Kossuth Co., 106 Ia. 16, 75 N. W. 689 (incompetency of physician, under statute; particular acts excluded). Compare also the citations ante, §§ 67, 87, and post, § 457.

[1] Can. St. 1900, c. 46, adding § 701 a to Crim. Code 1892 (in proving the age of a young person, on certain charges, the judge or jury "may infer the age from the appearance of the boy, girl, child, or young person"); 1901, Black v. Pate, 130 Ala. 514, 30 So. 434 (age of a voter); 1899, Jones v. State, 106 Ga. 365, 34 S. E. 174 (rape of girl of fifteen years; appearance of the girl, allowed to be considered in determining capacity to consent); 1896, Republic v. Parsons, 10 Haw. 601, 606 (sexual intercourse under age); 1898, Com. v. Hollis, 170 Mass. 433, 49 N. E. 632 (girl said to be under sixteen; jury allowed to consider appearance); 1902, People v. Elco, 113 Mich. 519, 91 N. W. 755 (criminal intercourse with a girl under sixteen); 1889, Elsner v. Supreme Lodge, 98 Mo. 645, 11 S. W. 991; 1900, State v. Thomson, 155 id. 300, 55 S. W. 1013; N. Y. Laws 1882, c. 340 (appearance to be evidence to the Court on dispute as to child's age); Laws 1883, c. 375, § 2 (same, on charge of selling firearms to minor); 1851, State v. Arnold, 13 Ired. 184, 192 (inspection of a defendant, to judge whether he was under fourteen); 1893, Jones v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 108, 22 S. W. 149 (selling liquor to a minor; the buyer's appearance, admissible); 1903, Earl v. State, — id. —, 72 S. W. 175; 1888, Hermann v. State, 73 Wis. 248, 250, 41 N. W. 171 (knowing enticement of minor female; her appearance before jury allowed to be considered, her age being otherwise shown, as indicating whether the defendant must have known her to be a minor). Compare the doctrine as to exhibiting the person to the jury, post, § 1160.

[2] This is apparently the rule in Indiana; some of the rulings intimate an even more unjustifiable doctrine, namely, that the appearance of the person cannot be considered even in deter-

The quality of a voice may be evidenced by instances of utterance. But here the questions that have arisen concern rather the requirement of the oath (post, § 1824), the opinion rule (post, § 1977), the possibility of accurate knowledge founded on hearing only (post, § 660), and the relevancy of identifying circumstances (post, § 413).

The capacity of sight may be indicated by instances of its exercise; but this can best be considered in dealing with the modes of evidencing distance and other external facts (post, § 457).

§ 223. Health or Disease, from Appearance, Occupation, or Heredity. Corporal appearances and conduct as indications of the inward health or lack of it are relevant.[1] The questions which arise in connection with such evidence are due to other considerations than relevancy; these may involve the propriety of inspection of an injured body by the jury (post, § 1158), or the competency of lay witnesses to testify to health or disease, by interpreting corporal appearances (post, § 568), or the application of the opinion rule to testimony about appearances of health or disease (post, §§ 1974, 1975), or the application of the hearsay rule, or its exceptions, to the person's statements of pain or injury (post, §§ 1718, 1790).

Physical capacity may also be evidenced by the hereditary existence of a certain quality;[2] and the same test of admissibility would here be applied as for insanity (post, § 232). Capacity may also sometimes be evidenced a priori (on the principle noted ante, § 190) by circumstances likely to result in a physical injury or degeneration, — as when "expectation of life," in insurance cases, is affected by the hazardous circumstances of one's occupation.[3]

§ 224. Pecuniary Capacity, from Borrowing or Non-Payment. It has already been seen (ante, § 89) that a person's pecuniary capacity to pay a debt or to lend money is relevant to the probability of his paying or lending. To show his pecuniary condition as to this capacity, his conduct in borrowing or not paying thus becomes relevant. Nevertheless, a line is to be drawn; for the mere failure (for example) to pay a specific debt may be open to so mining whether the liquor-seller acted in good faith in treating the person as an adult: 1876, Ihinger v. State, 53 Ind. 251, 253 (appearance before the jury, rejected; but testimony to appearance held competent, the issue being the defendant's good faith in selling liquor to an alleged minor); 1878, Robinins v. State, 63 id. 235, 237 (selling liquor to a minor; appearance rejected); 1878, Swigart v. State, 64 id. 598 (same); 1885, Bird v. State, 104 id. 385, 389, 3 N. E. 827 (same); 1887, Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 id. 544, 550, 14 N. E. 572, 16 N. E. 197 (same, but treated as exceptional). In these rulings (except in the first) there is apparently no discrimination between the use of appearance before the jury and testimony to appearance; but possibly it is the former only (as in the first ruling) that is intended to be excluded. For a consideration of this erratic doctrine that inspection by the jury is improper, see post, § 1160.

For the use of such evidence to show the liquor-seller's belief, see post, § 257.

[1] 1867, R. v. Zeigert, 10 Cox Cr. 547 (murder by starving a child; the child's asking for bread admitted as an "act"); 1881, Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 477 (cited post, § 225).

[2] 1902, Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Cuzzart, 133 Ala. 262, 31 So. 979 (injury to eyes; to prove the plaintiff's injury due to other causes, the defendant was not allowed to show the existence of eye ailments in other members of the plaintiff's family, without evidence of the "descendible quality" of such ailments).

[3] 1893, Birmingham M. R. Co. v. Wilmer, 97 Ala. 165, 170, 11 So. 886 (that the plaintiff was in an extra hazardous occupation, admitted); 1893, Townsend v. Briggs, 99 Cal. 481, 485, 34 Pac. 116 (the injured plaintiff's expectation of life being in issue, any facts about him lessening that expectation are admissible; here, his drinking habits).

many other explanations than total lack of the means (on the logical principle of § 32, ante) that it would have no appreciable probative value. There is room for much variety of circumstance in such evidence, and the discretion of the trial Court should control.[1]

§ 225. Prior or Subsequent Condition. In showing the existence at a given time of any physical condition (skill, strength, health, or the like), the existence of such a condition at a prior or subsequent time (being one of the classes of evidence noted ante, § 190) is evidential.[1] The limits of time over which such evidence may range must depend on the circumstances of each case as to the probability of intervening changes, and should be left entirely within the discretion of the trial judge. Other and analogous illustrations of the doctrine of prior and subsequent condition may be found elsewhere (post, §§ 233, 379, and 437).

2. Mental Capacity.

§ 227. Modes of evidencing Mental Capacity circumstantially. Mental capacity, like other human qualities or conditions (ante, § 190), may conceivably be evidenced circumstantially by three classes of facts, (1) the person's outward conduct, manifesting the inward and causing condition;

[1] The conflict of rulings illustrates the desirability of making no hard-and-fast rule: 1871, Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453, 458 (borrowing money to compromise with creditors, admitted); 1855, Wiggin v. Plumer, 31 N. H. 251, 270 (same, admitted in rebuttal of alleged non-borrowing); 1864, Angell v. Rosenbury, 12 Mich. 241, 252 ("among the particular facts admissible for the purpose, and thought to be of much weight, and most generally resorted to, is the return of an execution against the party unsatisfied"); 1875, Burr v. Wilson, 22 Minn. 206, 211 (same); 1880, Pontius v. People, 82 N. Y. 339, 349 (the defendant claimed that he had lent $4000 and taken a note; to disprove the likelihood of this, evidence was offered of his straitened pecuniary condition; Danforth, J.: "His conduct in regard to necessary expenses, his pecuniary necessities, the borrowing of money by himself at or about the time when he claimed to have advanced the complainant money, would all bear upon the question. So would the fact that small debts were contracted by him and not paid when due or after frequent request, indicate something in regard to pecuniary ability. . . . A man may indeed be willing to lend to his neighbor in time of need, and yet be unwilling to pay his debts in due season, although fully able to do both; but whether in any given case either one or both of these facts existed, would have to be determined from a variety of circumstances, and their force could properly be estimated by the jury"); 1902, Bank of State of N. Y. v. Southern N. Bank, 170 N. Y. 1, 62 N. E. 677 (insolvent condition of a firm on Feb. 26, held admissible to show its condition on Jan. 21 prior); 1870, Woods v. Gummert, 67 Pa. 136 (action for money advanced as agent in 1860–62; an unsatisfied execution against the plaintiff in 1858 was excluded; though the use of such evidence for some situations was conceded; Sharswood, J.: "If the defendant is allowed to show that the plaintiff owes debts which he does not pay, the plaintiff may certainly rebut the evidence by showing that he has a good defence to them; thus innumerable collateral issues might be introduced. . . . Now had the plaintiff been suing upon a paper alleged to be forged or procured by fraud, such evidence might have been admissible as having some weight in a case of doubt, especially if it was contemporaneous with the transaction in controversy"). Compare the citations post, §§ 379, 392.

[1] 1899, Sturdevant's Appeal, 71 Conn. 392, 42 Atl. 70 (condition of a person's leg a year before, admitted); 1892, Com. v. Campbell, 155 Mass. 537, 30 N. E. 72 (former facial appearance, admitted); 1893, Com. v. Morgan, 159 id. 378, 34 id. 458 (same); 1894, Gilbert v. R. Co., 160 id. 403, 36 N. E. 60 (former physical health; doubtful, or subject to the trial Court's discretion); 1903, State v. Scott, — Mo. —, 72 S. W. 897 (condition of prosecutrix in rape, some months later, admitted); 1881, Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 477 (condition of a starved child after the time charged, the child having changed only for the better, admitted); 1895, Taylorville, B. & H. R. Co. v. Warner, 88 Tex. 642, 32 S. W. 868 (personal appearance two years before, by photograph, admitted). For other instances where the condition in question was shown by photograph and the ruling also involved the use of prior or subsequent condition, see post, § 792.

(2) pre-existing external circumstances, tending to produce a special mental condition; and (3) the prior or subsequent existence of the condition, from which its existence at the time in question may be inferred. Each of these modes has its own special difficulties and problems.

§ 228. (1) Insanity, in general, as evidenced by Conduct. (1) Sanity and insanity are terms applicable to the mode of operation of the mind as judged by some accepted standard of normality. The mode of operation of the mind is ascertainable from the conduct of the person in question, i. e. from the effect produced by his surroundings on his mind when responding by action to those surroundings. Virtually, then, the mind is one, while the surroundings are multifold; and the mode of operation cannot be ascertained to be normal or abnormal except by watching the effects through a multifold series of causes. On the one hand, no single act can be of itself decisive; while, on the other hand, any act whatever may be significant to some extent. The first and fundamental rule, then, will be that any and all conduct of the person is admissible in evidence. There is no restriction as to the kind of conduct. There can be none; for if a specific act does not indicate insanity it may indicate sanity. It will certainly throw light one way or the other upon the issue. "Upon this I believe that no difference of opinion will be found to exist," said Mr. Justice Patteson, in a celebrated case, "as to the principle on which such evidence is admissible. Every act of the party's life is relevant to the issue."[1] There can be no escape from this consequence. There is no distinction in kind (whatever there may be in degree) between one or another piece of conduct as evidence to be considered; some inference is always possible:

1836, Denman, L. C. J., in Doe d. Tatham v. Wright, 6 Nev. & M. 132, 146: "Such an issue [insanity] opens a wide door for the admission of evidence, as every transaction of the testator's life, every expression he ever used, and his manner of conducting himself on the most ordinary concerns, may have a bearing on the question."

1870, Howe, J., in State v. Hays, 22 La. An. 39, 40: "Insanity is a disease. It has its pathology and its symptoms, and it would seem that its existence can be determined only by a careful scrutiny of those symptoms. The tree is to be known by its fruits. The condition of the hidden mechanism is to be ascertained by those communicated movements which are external and apparent. To this end the usual expressions of a mental state are original and competent evidence. If they are the natural language of mental alienation, they furnish satisfactory and sometimes the only proof of its existence. It is true that such expressions may be feigned, and often are; but whether they were real or feigned is for the jury to determine. Hence the rule prevails that, as indicia of the mental condition, not only the acts, but the conversations, exclamations, and declarations of the person may be shown."[2]

No doubt a Court is occasionally found excluding this or that piece of conduct;[3] but such rulings, which cannot be defended on principle, are explainable usually as refusals to allow the incorrect impression to be given to the jury that the specific conduct raises a presumption of insanity[4] or has special weight in that direction. Moreover, a court on appeal may properly enough refuse a new trial merely for the rejection below of conduct which was not especially significant; but such decisions are in strictness not rulings upon the admissibility of evidence.

[1] 1838, Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & F. 670, 715; so also Alderson, B., at p. 722.

[2] Compare the following opinions: 1851, Marianski v. Cairs, 1 Macq. Sc. App. 212, 218 (good opinion by Lord Truro); 1900, State v. Wright, 112 Ia. 436, 84 N. W. 541 ("in all cases involving the question of mental capacity, it is competent to go into the minutest details of the personal history" of the individual); 1900, Blume v. State, 154 Ind. 343, 56 N. E. 771 (handwriting and composition of letters, admitted); 1868, Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112 (see quotation post, § 233); 1854, Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157 (see quotation post, § 233).

(2) Whether a certain piece of conduct ought to raise a presumption of insanity or of sanity, so as to shift the duty of producing evidence or otherwise to have special controlling force with the jury, is a different question, and is not a matter of the mere admissibility of the evidence. Such a question is often raised, for example, with regard to the fact of suicide. Rightly considered, "it stands as a fact, with all the other acts of the deceased's life,"[5] so far as its admissibility is involved. Nevertheless, it is sometimes ruled upon in terms of admissibility, though the language is even then applied where the question of presumption is the one really raised; such rulings are therefore considered elsewhere (post, §§ 2500, 2501), in dealing with presumptions.

(3) Sometimes the condition of insanity is exhibited in a belief which is a delusion, and it may thus become necessary, not only to prove the belief, but also to prove the facts which make it a false and unnatural belief. When a man says, "I am the Messiah," or "I am the Emperor of the United States," the falsity of the external fact is ascertainable without expressly evidencing it. But when his belief is that a brother is plotting to poison him, or that he is a millionaire, these facts must be expressly evidenced in disproof. Accordingly, as a part of the whole fact constituting the delusion, the external elements may be evidenced. The objection to this is usually that confusion of issues ensue (ante, § 42) or that undue prejudice or sympathy will be excited for one or another party concerned (ante, § 42); but these possibilities (subject, no doubt, to the trial Court's discretion) cannot be allowed to stand in the way of demonstrating a significant manifestation of mental condition.[6]

[3] 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 16 ("unnatural and undue excitement" in a time of battle, excluded); 1895, Taylor v. U. S. 7 D. C. App. 27, 34 (accused's conversations in general, and apart from any specific one suggestive of insanity, excluded).

[4] See the next paragraph as to this.

[5] 1838, Duffield v. Morris, 3 Harringt. 375, 382.

[6] 1889, Burkhart v. Gladish, 123 Ind. 337, 42 N. E. 118 (facts to prove a delusion as to the adultery of the testator's wife, admitted); 1898, Manatt v. Scott, 106 Ia. 203, 76 N. W. 717 (declarations by deceased that T. had attempted to poison J. and had said that he would poison the deceased, admitted as indicating a delusion); 1871, State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 369, 382 (wife-murder; belief in the wife's adultery, admitted as showing an insane delusion); 1868, Rouch v. Zehring, 59 Pa. 78 (denying the doing of a thing which had in reality been done, admitted); 1896, Titus v. Gage, 70 Vt. 13, 39 Atl. 246 (alleged insane belief that certain neighbors stole; the good reputation of these neighbors receivable, after proof of their innocence, to show the unreasonableness of the belief). In such a case, of course, the opponent may (on the logical principle of § 34, ante) prove facts which indicate that the belief was not a delusion: 1854, Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray 337, 339 (murder of A; defence, insane delusion that A was conspiring against defendant; A's expressions of hostility admitted to show his real feelings, as evidence that defendant was not deluded); 1871, State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 369, 382 (the issue being whether the defendant's belief in his wife's adultery was a mere insane delusion, or was founded on rational grounds, particularly rumor, the existence of such a general rumor was received). Distinguish the

(4) On the same principle, when conduct is looked to as an index of the rationality of mental operations, all the facts upon which the conduct was based being essential to forming a standard of judgment, the acts and communications of third persons, may become relevant, — not as in themselves having value, but as the raw material (as it were) for the mental manufacture of the person in question. When Pharaoh forbad to give the Hebrews "straw to make brick as heretofore," and required that they "go and gather straw for themselves," yet should not "minish aught from your bricks of your daily task," it was in fact not humanly possible to fulfil the new exactions; yet no man could judge whether the people of Israel were idle or were overworked, merely from the fact that their tale of brick was not delivered to their masters. All human action, mental or physical, when judged as to the normality of its accomplishment, depends upon the material and means furnished for action. When Horace Hawes, the insane millionaire of San Francisco, said that Jesus Christ was the greatest man that ever lived, and that he himself was the second in rank, it was easy to judge the irrationality of the latter statement; yet we do not regard Napoleon as irrational because he believed himself the greatest general in the world's history. Just as the greatness of a man's executive achievement must be measured by comparing what he had to do and his means of doing with what he has actually done, so the rationality of his acts is to be ascertained only by comparing the results of his reasoning with the data that lay before him to be reasoned upon. Accordingly, when any act of his is found, preceded by third persons' acts or communications, the latter are essential to a judgment upon the former. The only requirements to be insisted upon, as necessary assumptions, are that the other person's acts or communications have come to the knowledge of the person in question, and that some act or treatment of them by him has ensued. This application of the principle has been expounded, once for all, in the opinions delivered in the much-argued case of Wright v. Tatham; where, in spite of irreconcilable difference of detail between the various judges, there was a general recognition of the principle at large:[7]

1837, Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 376; 5 Cl. & F. 670, 736, 740; Bosanquet, J.: "The letters tendered in proof of the testator's capacity are stated to have been found after the testator's death, open and with the seals broken, in a cupboard under a bookcase in the testator's private apartment, among other letters, some of which had been answered, and others indorsed by him. . . . If the testator is shown to have dealt with the letters as a sensible man would deal with them, his doing so will afford evidence of his capacity. But, until it appears that he has acted personally in the matter, there is nothing from which any inference as to his state of mind can be drawn. Capacity or incapacity to make a will is the matter to be ascertained. In other words, the question is whether he has been in a condition to manage his own concerns, or whether his condition has been such that they must necessarily have been managed for him by others? Such use of external facts inducing or predisposing to insanity, post, § 231; there it is not the truth or falsity of the facts that is involved, but merely the receipt of information to that effect.

[7] See this case in another aspect, post, § 1786.

being the real question to be tried, no presumption is to be made that any act bearing upon it was either done by the testator or by any other person for him, since the whole value of the act as evidence of the testator's mind depends upon the part which the testator himself has taken in it. The letters may have been opened, arranged, and deposited in the cupboard by the testator himself, or by his steward, attorney, or other agent. The facts are perfectly consistent with either view of the case." Parke, B.: "There is no direct proof whatever of these acts being done by the testator; and, as to indirect proof, to infer that the testator did the acts, is to assume the very fact to be proved. . . . For the purpose of showing his capacity to make a will, the evidence is offered; and, to prove that, a letter found in the repository, in an open state, with the indorsement of Mr. Barrow upon it, is produced to show that the testator was competent to open the letter and to read it over, and to refer it to his attorney. If it be asked to use all this as indirect evidence, that is, as an inference that he did the acts, how can I so use it, except upon the ground, that, if he was capable of such acts of business, it is to be presumed that he, and not some one else, did this? But that is to assume the degree of competence which the facts are adduced in order to prove. The argument, then, proceeds in a circle, — because he had sufficient ability to do these acts of ordinary business, therefore it is to be inferred that he did them; and because he did them, it is to be also inferred that he was of sufficient ability to do these acts of ordinary business. No such inference can be made without an assumption of the very fact in question." Vaughan, J.: "In the first place, it may be asked, is there any evidence of acts done by the testator upon the letters in question, or any one of them? (for any acts of the testator are of course evidence). I am of opinion that there is fair ground for such inference. Certain letters are found in a man's private room, in the cupboard of his bookcase, with the seals broken in company with other letters, some of which have indorsements in his handwriting, and others of which have been answered in his handwriting. Do not all these facts conspire to prove, at least almost irresistibly to invite the conclusion, that the letters in question had their seals so broken and were perused by him? It has been argued at the bar, that, to raise this presumption, we assume the man's competency, which is the point to be proved. A little reflection will, I think, show this reasoning to be vicious. In the first place, the argument does not assume any competency at all; and, in the second place, the competency which is inferred is not the competency which is disputed, namely, the competency to make a will. . . . And I infer that the testator was competent to open the seals and peruse the letters, because the answers and indorsements to the other letters in his handwriting prove him competent so to do, and we conclude that he actually did open and peruse these letters, because the fact of finding them opened in his private drawer, and in the company of letters which he must be taken to have opened and perused, furnishes cogent evidence that he opened and perused these. But we do not thereby even infer him competent to make a will. We conclude him competent to open and read a letter. The opening and perusing a letter are certainly acts, and therefore they stand upon the same footing with all the other acts of a man, and may be properly and primarily admitted. How far they are valuable elements in a body of proof, is another question, quite distinct from the present. . . . Thus we are carried on to the question, whether the contents of the rejected letters, or any of them, can throw any light upon and explain the acts so established; if they can, then of course they may be admitted; if not, they must be rejected. . . . I think I am warranted in saying that the contents of a letter cannot tend to clear up, or explain, or give any stamp of character to any act which does not from its nature import that the party apprehended or misapprehended its contents. . . . So, if it can be shown that a man has done any act in consequence of having read a letter, that letter will be a very valuable instrument to lead the mind to a proper estimate of the purpose or wisdom of such act. In all these cases, there is some act flowing from an apprehension or a misapprehension of the contents of the letter; and the contents are necessary to enable us to form a judgment of the soundness or absurdity of such apprehension. Or, if a person is proved by gestures or words to have shown certain signs of passion or apathy upon reading a letter or hearing some intelligence, then those gestures or words, or that apparent disregard, will prove how he apprehended such contents; and such contents may therefore be received to lead us to an opinion of his temper or his sanity. But, in such cases, it is not the perusal of the letter, but the acts and conduct at the perusal, which are illustrated by the subject-matter of the letter; and there must be evidence of some such acts or states of mind, in order to justify the admission of such declarations. In some cases, indeed, the mere omission to do anything upon the receipt of intelligence, might be proof of a state of mind. In the present case, then, there is no fact presented to us but that of mere perusal and casting the eye over the contents. There is nothing, as applied to two of the letters, on which we can fairly found the presumption, that Mr. Marsden acted upon an apprehension of what they contained."

(5) In the foregoing sort of evidence, the Hearsay rule forms no objection to admitting the communications of third persons, because they are received without reference to the truth of their statements and without any credit being given to them testimonially; they are therefore not obnoxious to the Hearsay rule (as noted more fully post, § 1789). The same objection may also be made to receiving the utterances of the person himself (accused, testator, or the like) whose sanity is in question; and the answer is the same. Such utterances are not received as testimonial assertions by him to prove the facts asserted therein, but as indicating circumstantially the operations of his mind; accordingly, it is no violation of the Hearsay rule to receive them (post, § 1790).

(6) On the general principle of Relevancy (ante, § 34), any piece of conduct offered as indicating insanity may be explained away as equally or more consistent with some other hypothesis. That which appears to be an irrational act or utterance may, in the light of certain facts, be rational, or may be the result of some other abnormal mental condition than insanity (such as fever or intoxication). These explanatory facts are thus always admissible, providing only that they have in some degree an explanatory significance.[8] This much is indisputable, and is merely a simple application of a general principle. But there is a larger application of it in the present relation; for since insanity or sanity is the relation of the mind as a whole to life as a whole, and since the grades and distinctions between eccentricity and insanity are sometimes difficult to interpret, the operation of the mind in a single instance may be explainable, not merely by other facts and conduct at that very time, but also by facts and conduct at a different time. The mental operation at the moment may seem irregular, and an inference of general irregularity might thence be drawn; but, when noticed at other times, it may be perceived to be regular enough on the whole. A larger scope of observation must often be taken in order to negative the erroneous inference from single acts that the whole, if known, would be similar to the single acts. This larger group of data, then, may properly be considered in order to explain away the apparent inference from isolated acts:

[8] 1863, Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385, 388 (wife-murder; the defendant's coolness and unconcern at the deed being offered as evidence of insanity, the prosecution was allowed to show that he "had spent years of his early life in a perilous calling," namely, smuggling, "demanding at all times great coolness and hardihood, and therein . . . learned the deportment exhibited by him on this occasion"); 1876, Ross v. McQuiston, 45 Ia. 147 (a testator had made two wills at different times, and the contestants, after showing insanity at the time of the first, offered it as indicating by its rational character that the rationality of the second will was not conclusive of sanity at the time); 1894, People v. Miles, 143 N. Y. 383, 38 N. E. 456 (to explain away strange conduct, the fact of intoxication at the time was received); 1867, Wood v. Sawyer, Phillips 275 (peculiar conduct being offered to show insanity at the time, it was evidenced that these peculiarities were normal traits present even at times of conceded sanity).

1858, Clifford, J., in U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 98, 109: "One of the suggestions . . . was that the government, in attempting to rebut the testimony offered by the prisoner on this point [of insanity] should have been limited to the explanation or denial of the particular transactions, acts, conduct, and declarations introduced by the prisoner to make out his defence. . . . [It] cannot be sustained. Most men in the course of their lives, in times of excitement produced by disease or otherwise, do many strange and peculiar acts, and oftentimes give utterance to eccentric or unusual language; and it is obvious that if a person accused of crime may select and offer in evidence all the dark spots of his life, or every peculiar and unusual act and declaration, and be allowed to exclude all the rest, that many guilty offenders must escape and justice be often defeated, because the means of ascertaining the truth are excluded from the jury. . . . [Whenever the accused has offered his acts, conduct, and declarations, before and after the homicide,] the government may offer evidence of other acts, conduct, and declarations of the accused within the same period to show that he was sane and to rebut the evidence introduced by the defence."

§ 229. Same: Testamentary Capacity. That any and all conduct may be indicative of sanity or insanity is equally true for testamentary capacity as for criminal capacity. There is, to be sure, a different legal standard of capacity for the two situations, and accordingly more emphasis and legal significance will attach to certain kinds of cases in the one instance than in the other. Moreover, certain forms of mental abnormality might conceivably be excluded altogether from consideration by the definition of the substantive law; but the evidence to prove them would then be excluded because the facts to be proved by it would be immaterial and not because of the law of evidence (ante, § 2). The chief questions that arise specially in the proof of insanity as affecting testamentary capacity are thus rather a consequence of its special definition in the substantive law rather than of any difference in the rule of evidence. Only two of these seem worth noticing here, namely, the facts of former testamentary plans and of disinheritance of relatives in the will in issue. These two need special notice because such facts have other evidential uses which ought to be distinguished from the present one.

(1) The testator's capacity may be indicated, among other things, by his method of dealing with his property and other affairs. Whether they are treated by him intelligently or otherwise will be significant of capacity.[1] In particular, his plans, conversations, and acts (independently of the actual execution of the will) in reference to the disposition of his property after death will indicate whether his treatment of the subject is intelligent. Such facts are therefore admissible, like all other conduct, as bearing on his capacity at the time:

[1] Examples: 1893, Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393, 412, 27 Atl. 973 (testator's diaries received); 1895, Bower v. Bower, 142 Ind. 194, 41 N. E. 523 (that the testator did not attend in person to his business, admitted); 1886, Woodcock v. Johnson, 36 Minn. 217, 218, 30 N. W. 894 (testator's acts and declaration "tending to show his comprehension or non-comprehension of daily occurrences in his business," admitted).

1890, Vanderburgh, J., in Hammond v. Dike, 42 Minn. 273, 44 N. W. 61 (admitting the fact that the testator, a week before his death, "had arranged to have his will changed in the way it was changed by the codicil [made on his death-bed] and his declarations on that subject"): "The question was substantially . . . whether he was able to and did comprehend the nature and effect of the transaction in its different bearings, including the subject-matter and the effect of the testamentary act upon his heirs and legatees named in the prior will. A testator may be of sound disposing mind and memory sufficient to sustain a will executed by him, though the state of his health and consequent mental condition may be unequal to business transactions of a more exacting nature; and his strength might hold out for the completion of a transaction involving but few details, and requiring his attention but a short time, while it would be insufficient for the disposition of a large estate under an elaborate will. Certainly, then, in determining the question of the capacity of the testator to understand the situation in which he stood in relation to the disposition of his estate, whether the subject was new or familiar to his thoughts, and what his previous intentions may have been, as shown by his acts or declarations, were important and material matters for the consideration of the jury. . . . If, then, the testator, in this instance, contemplated a change in the terms of his will, in view of an accession to his property, and had manifested his purpose so to do a short time before his sickness, these things would be material to be considered in determining whether he was able to understand, and did understand, the nature of the business in which he was engaged at the time he executed the codicil, and the scope and effect of the transaction. . . . Such declarations, especially if recent, inform the jury of the state of mind of the testator when confessedly sound, and so aid in determining whether the instrument is the product of the same will."[2]

This use of prior testamentary plans and the like is to be distinguished from their use to show that he did or did not execute a certain disputed will or make a certain disputed alteration (ante, § 112, post, § 1735), or to show whether he intentionally destroyed a will by way of revocation (post, §§ 1737, 1782), or to show whether a will charged to have been made under undue influence conforms to his normal wishes and plans (post, § 1738). These are all legitimate evidential uses, but they rest in each instance on different principles and perform different services.

(2) That the testator has omitted, or disfavored, or expressly disinherited certain near relatives who might have been expected to be his chief beneficiaries is a circumstance having some bearing upon his mental condition. The provisions of the will in this respect, however, are not in themselves the evidential facts. Taken alone, they are colorless; it is only in comparison with the state of his relationships that they become significant. If a will read, "I bequeath all my property to Joan of Arc, Maid of Orleans," our general knowledge supplies a fact which marks this bequest as a mental aberration. But if he bequeaths all "to my friend John Smith," and the facts are that John Smith is a well-to-do man, while an amiable wife and a large family of children are left totally unprovided for by the testator, it is only after comparison of these facts with the bequest that we infer a mental lack of balance. In short, the facts of the testator's family relationships are material to establish a standard of normal testamentary terms, — such terms as a rational man would presumably have sanctioned, and it is only after obtaining such a standard that it is possible to make inferences as to the rationality of the terms of the will. It is to this end that the facts of family relationship are considered:

[2] 1899, Nieman v. Schnitker, 181 Ill. 400, 55 N. E. 151 (previous wills at a sane period, admitted).

1820, Gibson, J., in Patterson v. Patterson, 6 S. & R. 55: "Where a will is impeached for imbecility of mind in the testator, together with fraudulent practices by the devisees, the intrinsic evidence of the will itself, arising from the unreasonableness or injustice of its provisions, taking into view the state of the testator's property, family, and the claims of particular individuals, is competent and proper for the consideration of the jury. The issue devisavit vel non involves the validity of the execution, and not the contents; yet, the contents, so far as they have a bearing on the question of execution, are pertinent, and with this view, the whole will is usually read. But the particular provisions of the will could have no practical influence on the question, without evidence of the circumstances and condition of the testator's family and property; for it is only by a comparison of these with each other, that an inference arises, as to the sanity of his mind, and its freedom of action. To justify a jury in invalidating a will, from its intrinsic evidence only, would require an extreme case, perhaps such as never can occur; but the disposition of the property may be so utterly absurd or unjust, as to induce a reasonable belief, that no man in his senses, and uncontrolled by an improper influence, would make it; and there may be cases, where this internal evidence, added to other proof, which would, of itself, leave the question doubtful, ought to turn the scale. In fact, the evidence of practice on the intellect of a weak man, is usually compounded of ingredients so various in their nature, and remote in their consequences and connexion, that the question of relevancy is often of very difficult solution. In such a case, the Court should lean in favor of admitting the evidence, to enable the jury to judge from a consideration of all the circumstances."

1833, Buchanan, C. J., in Davis v. Calvert, 5 G. & J. 269: "It is not of itself sufficient to avoid a will or testament, that its dispositions are imprudent, and not to be accounted for. But a will or testament may, by its provisions, furnish intrinsic evidence involving it in suspicion, and tending to show the incapacity of the testator to make a disposition of his estate with judgment and understanding, in reference to the amount and situation of his property, and the relative claims of the different persons who should have been the objects of his bounty — such as a disposition of his whole estate, to the exclusion of near and dear relations, having the strongest natural claims upon his affection, a wife and children, for instance, or other near relations —, without any apparent or known cause, which alone would be a suspicious circumstance, although not furnishing per se sufficient ground for setting aside the instrument. This is but a single example, and not given as the only one, calculated to excite suspicion of the competency and freedom to act of a testator. The contents, therefore, of the will or testament itself, and the manner in which it was written and executed, together with the nature and extent of the estate of the testator; his family and connections; their condition and relative situation to him; the terms upon which he stood with them, and the claims of particular individuals; the condition and relative situation of the legatees or devisees named; the situation of the testator himself, and the circumstances under which the will or testament was made, are all proper to be shown to the jury, and often afford important evidence in the decision of the question of incapacity. And sometimes, if taken altogether, may, according to the degree of the injustice, absurdity, or unreasonableness of the dispositions attempted to be made of the property, tending to induce a reasonable doubt of the necessary sanity of the maker, and of his free agency uncontrolled by some undue influence, and the nature of the attending circumstances, and condition, and conduct, and character of those around him, justify a jury in deciding against the validity of the instrument, when its provisions, standing alone, unattended by such circumstances, or not coupled with them, would not be sufficient."

1841, Verplanck, Sen., in Stewart v. Lispenard, 26 Wend. 255, 313: "If the testamentary disposition be in itself consistent with the situation of the testator and in congruity with his affections and previous declarations; if it be such as might naturally have been expected from one so situated, this is itself rational and legal evidence of no small weight to testamentary capacity; whilst the reverse will alone furnish occasion of doubt, demanding other evidence to refute it. The rationality of the act goes to show the reason of the person."

1854, Perkins, J., in Addington v. Wilson, 5 Ind. 137: "By our law, a person competent to make a will may entirely disinherit his children if he pleases to do so; nor can his motives for such an act, where it is done, be called in question. The right is absolute to dispose of all one's property, over and above the portion required to pay debts and expenses. The hardship of the case, therefore, when the children are disinherited, is of no weight further than a circumstance for the consideration of the jury in connection with the other evidence submitted tending to show insanity or other mental defect."

This use of such facts to evidence incapacity is generally conceded as proper.[8] It is desirable, however, to distinguish it from sundry other uses of analogous facts to evidence undue influence; these are noted in the ensuing section.

§ 230. Same: Undue Influence. The making of a will under undue influence signifies that the testator's mind was capable of being and was in fact so subjected to the control of another person that the former did not follow his own normal wishes and plans but yielded to the latter's volition. For the purpose of evidencing this condition, various sorts of facts are relevant, but the chief questions about them arise in connection with the Hearsay rule, and they need be noted here only in order to distinguish them from the foregoing classes of evidence on the issue of mental incapacity.

(a) The facts of family relationship, in comparison with the will's actual provisions, may be considered not only (as above) on the issue of sanity, but

[8] 1859, Stubbs v. Houston, 33 Ala. 564 (unnatural distribution of property, admissible); 1861, Fountain v. Brown, 38 id. 74 (same); 1810, Swift, Evidence, Conn., 140 ("If the disposition of the estate be very unreasonable and improper, as giving it to strangers, or all to one child, this will be a strong circumstance from whence to infer undue influence and want of understanding"); 1893, Crandall's Appeal, 63 Conn. 365, 28 Atl. 531 (approving the above passage); 1867, Roe v. Taylor, 45 Ill. 485 (prior will rejected as being of no value under the circumstances); 1868, Crum v. Thornley, 47 id. 192, 198 (principle conceded); 1902, Webster v. Yorty, 194 id. 408, 62 N. E. 907; 1854, Addington v. Wilson, 5 Ind. 137 (see quotation supra); 1889, Conway v. Vizzard, 122 id. 266, 270, 23 N. E. 771 (a testator's giving more to nieces and nephews than to sisters, no evidence of insanity, apart from other facts); 1894, Sim v. Russell, 90 Ia. 656, 57 N. W. 602 (unnatural distribution of property, admissible); 1894, Denning v. Butcher, 91 id. 429, 59 id. 70 (same); 1895, Bever v. Spangler, 93 id. 576, 61 id. 1080, semble (same); 1898, Manatt v. Scott, 106 id. 203, 76 N. W. 717 (same); 1833, Davis v. Calvert, 5 G. & J. 269 (see quotation supra); 1828, Clark v. Fisher, 1 Paige Ch. 171 ("the will itself is unreasonable on its face, when taken in connection with the amount of his property and the situation of his relatives, and this is always proper evidence to be taken into consideration in judging of the state of the testator's mind"); 1897, Burns' Will, 121 N. C. 336, 28 S. E. 519 (that a testator had disinherited his seven children, admissible).

Occasionally a Court is found rejecting such facts merely because in the circumstances they do not enlighten, or declaring them in effect not to raise a presumption of incapacity: 1889, Spratt v. Spratt, 76 Mich. 384, 391, 43 N. W. 627 (facts of kinship may be shown "as bearing upon the question of mental capacity"; but the omission of certain relations "is not an indication of mental incapacity"); 1892, Conch v. Gentry, 113 Mo. 248, 256, 20 S. W. 890 (that omitted children had worked in the fields, excluded); 1892, Maddox v. Maddox, 114 id. 35, 41, 21 S. W. 499 (similar).

also on the issue of undue influence.[1] The latter issue presupposes a due or normal standard of disposition which the testator might be expected to observe; and when a deviation is found, a possible inference is that the deviation was due to undue pressure.

(b) The testator's conduct and utterances, exhibiting dislike, fear, anger, or their opposite, towards particular persons, may serve to indicate his general condition of susceptibility to influence in certain quarters, and may thus be put in evidence for that purpose, in spite of the Hearsay rule (post, § 1738).

(c) The testator's prior and subsequent testamentary plans and wishes, as gathered from his conduct and utterances, may serve to indicate his normal testamentary attitude, which presumably would have been given effect in the will in issue, had no undue pressure been exerted. These may therefore be considered, in spite of the Hearsay rule, in order to reach a standard for judging of the undueness or abnormality of the will (post, § 1738).

(d) The testator's prior or subsequent assertions as to the fact of undue influence or of urgency or threats are usually excluded, because their natural but improper use would be to serve as mere testimonial assertions, inadmissible under the Hearsay rule (post, § 1738).

§ 231. (2) Insanity, as evidenced by Predisposing Circumstances. As human conditions of every sort are created or influenced by external environment, so too that diseased mental condition which we term insanity may be precipitated, intensified, or otherwise affected by external events coming to the apprehension of the person. Accordingly, circumstances calculated to induce this mental condition may always be admitted to evidence the probability of such affection; the only limitation is that the circumstance be in itself capable in some degree of producing such an effect, that it came to the person's knowledge, and that some further foundation for probability be laid by other evidence that there was a diseased mental condition:

1891, Peckham, J., in People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 249, 259, 27 N. E. 362 (admitting evidence that a defendant, charged with killing his father-in-law, and now defending on the ground of insanity, had been told by his wife, a week before the killing, of an incestuous rape upon her by the father, the purpose being to show "an adequate cause for the state of mind existing subsequent to the communication, and . . . that in truth such communication acting upon a diseased and weakened brain produced insanity at the time of the commission of the crime"): "It is not disputed that a fall on the head, a physical injury to the brain, or other physical and sufficient cause for insanity, can be proved. . . . Any material fact which might account for or naturally lead to insanity at that moment may be proved. Why should not the defendant have the right to prove a moral cause which might act upon a brain already diseased and might result in insanity as naturally as blows upon the head? This, in connection with evidence tending to show insanity at the time of the act done, is proper. . . . In fine, the evidence is admitted on the ground that it is corroborative, more or less strongly, of the mental condition which the other and separate evidence in the case tends to prove."

[1] 1891, Eastis v. Montgomery, 95 Ala. 486, 492, 11 So. 204 (possession of property by omitted grandchildren, admissible as tending to show that "this exclusion was not unnatural"); 1903, Yorty v. Webster, — Ill. —, 68 N. E. 1068 (unequal distribution is some evidence); 1892, Maddox v. Maddox, 114 Mo. 35, 46, 21 S. W. 499 ("unjust discrimination" held not to "raise an inference" of undue influence); and cases cited in the foregoing section.

1871, Worden, J., in Sawyer v. State, 35 Ind. 80, 84: "[It is claimed] that inasmuch as the infidelity of the deceased [wife, killed by the defendant], was a great wrong inflicted upon the defendant, and inasmuch as his mind would protractedly dwell upon the subject, the evidence was competent as tending to show the existence of an exciting cause of insanity. This argument assumes that a jury may infer the existence of insanity from proof merely of a cause that may tend to produce it, without any proof whatever that the effect followed the cause. If it were a case where a given effect must follow a cause, there would be force in the argument, because proof of the cause would be proof of the effect. But we know that the various causes that may tend to produce insanity very frequently fail to produce any such effect; and it seems to us that it is not competent to prove the existence of such exciting cause unaccompanied with some [other] proof that the effect followed the cause." [1]

§ 232. Same: Hereditary Insanity. That insanity of some varieties may be and even tends to be transmitted to descendants is an accepted pathological fact. Moreover, since it is equally true that it may pass over a generation or an individual before reappearing, it follows that insanity in collateral relatives may indicate an anterior ancestral tendency capable of appearing in other collateral branches. It seems to be generally conceded that ancestral and perhaps collateral insanity may therefore be put in evidence. Yet the irregularity of its operation, its frequent dependency on external provoking circumstances as a condition of bringing it into activity, and the possibilities of too much weight being given to its probative value, have led the Courts, almost unanimously, to impose some limitations on its admissibility. These limitations, in general, may be gathered from the following passages, but it will be seen that no clear settlement of them has been reached, except on the point that there must be some other accompanying evidence of insanity by conduct-manifestations (ante, § 234) on the part of the person himself:

1844, Maule, J., in R. v. Tucket, 1 Cox Cr. 103 (receiving evidence of the insanity of a maternal grandfather): "It is a matter of fact and not a matter of law, that insanity is often hereditary in a family; but I think you should prove that in the first instance by the testimony of a medical man, and then your question will be legitimate."

1856, Thomas, J., in Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray 71: "With the fact that the father and mother or either of them had been insane, that the insanity had appeared in them about

[1] 1871, Sawyer v. State, 35 Ind. 80, 83 (wife-murder; the wife's adultery not admitted to show insanity without concurrent evidence of insane conduct; see quotation supra); 1891, People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 147, 27 N. E. 362 (see quotation supra).

It follows that the significance of such a fact can be explained away (on the principle of § 228, par. 6, ante) by conduct of the person showing that his mind was not susceptible to an influence from such circumstances: 1894, People v. Lana, 101 Cal. 513, 517, 36 Pac. 16 (murder; to disprove that the defendant's mind had been preyed upon, to the degree of derangement, by the belief that the deceased was trying to ruin his daughter, evidence was admitted of the incest of defendant and his daughter). Contra, but clearly unsound: 1901, State v. Kirby, 62 Kan. 436, 63 Pac. 752 (murder of alleged seducer of defendant's daug.. .r; to rebut the defendant's alleged mental excitement over the seduction, the prosecution was not allowed to prova the daughter's prior reputation for unchastity); 1896, People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 566, 42 N. E. 1045 (wife-murder; after evidence of separation, offered to show a cause of insanity, evidence of adultery while separated from a prior wife, offered to show that the subsequent separation from the second wife could not have caused his mind to become unbalanced, was rejected).

Distingnish the present sort of evidence from that noted in § 228, par. 3, ante; there the delusion being the material thing, the falsity of the facts believed by him is essential; here, however, it is the belief alone that is material, whether or not the facts were as believed or not; accordingly, a rumor or reputation may suffice to create the belief, whether or not there be a foundation of fact.

the same age and in same form, its existence in the child is rendered more probable and is believed upon less perfect evidence. The transmission of this predisposition to insanity is matter of general observation, and is recognized by the best medical authorities."

1850, Pearson, J., in State v. Christmas, 6 Jones L. 471, 474: "[Hereditary insanity] would only be one link in the chain, and would not per se establish the fact. . . . [The authorities being conflicting, yet] thus far the way seems to be clear. In order to render it admissible, the species of insanity which is alleged and that which is offered to be proved in respect to members of the family must be of the same character; and the instances to be proven must have been notorious, so as to be capable of being established by general reputation, and not left to depend upon particular facts and proof about which witnesses may differ and the consequence of which would be to run off into numberless and endless collateral issues, so that in trying the question as to the insanity of one, the supposed insanity of half a dozen would be drawn in."

1868, Cooley, C. J., in People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 17: "That insane tendencies are transmitted from parent to child there is now no longer a doubt; and though it was once ruled that proof that other members of the same family have decidedly been insane is not admissible either in civil or in criminal cases, yet this ruling has been rejected as unphilosophical and unsound, and it is now allowed to prove the insanity of either parent, — or even of a more remote ancestor, since it seems well established that insanity sometimes disappears in one generation and reappears again in the next. . . . [In this case, insanity of a brother was admitted.] It sometimes occurs that persons in vigorous health and correct habits, who have nevertheless entered into a marriage which violates some physiological law, may become parents of weak and diseased children only, so that insanity enters the family for the first time in the person of the children, but through qualities derived exclusively through the parentage. . . . If a family of several children should be found without known cause to be idiotic or subject to mental delusions, the inference of hereditary transmission would in many cases be entirely conclusive, notwithstanding the inability to point out anything of a similar character in any ancestor. Insanity in a part of the children only would be less conclusive; but the admissibility of the evidence in these cases cannot depend upon its quantity, and it could never be required that it should amount to a demonstration."

1875, Bynum, J., in State v. Cunningham, 72 N. C. 469, 474: "It is held admissible in corroboration. . . . To allow such evidence to go to the jury as independent proof of the insanity of the prisoner would be of the most dangerous consequence to the due administration of criminal justice; since there are but few persons, it is ascertained, who have not had ancestors or blood relations, near or remote, affected by some degree of mental aberration. To admit such testimony, then, under the conditions set forth in this case, would break down the strongest barriers to crime established by the laws of evidence as heretofore understood."

1877, Agnew, J., in Laros v. Com., 84 Pa. 200, 209: "A Court is not bound to hear evidence of the insanity of a man's relatives . . . [or other collateral or secondary evidence] as grounds of a presumption of possible insanity, until some evidence has been given that the prisoner himself has shown signs of his own insanity."[1]

[1] The various limitations suggested are illustrated in the following rulings, many of which are virtually based only on the facts of the case in hand and should not serve as precedents: Eng.: 1760, Earl Ferrers' Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 932, 937 (ancestral insanity admitted); 1813, M'Adam v. Walker, 1 Dow 148, 161, 167, 177 (left undecided; termed by Lord Eldon, L. C., a "very delicate question"; but most questions were to his mind delicate ones); 1838, Doe v. Whitefoot, 7 C. & P. 270, Gurney, B. (sister's insanity, excluded); 1840, R. v. Oxford, 9 id. 525, 533, 547, 4 State Tr. N. S. 497, 528 (before three judges; insanity of accused's grandfather, father, and brother, admitted); 1844, R. v. Tucket, 1 Cox Cr. C. 103 (see quotation supra); Ark.: 1898, Green v. State, 64 Ark. 523, 43 S. W. 973 (admissible only after evidence of insane conduct); Cal.: 1866, People v. Smith, 31 Cal. 466 (insanity of mother and aunt, held admissible, other evidence of "personal insanity" being in the case); Conn.: 1880, State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 540 (sister's insanity admitted, and cross-examination to show it not from hereditary causes); D. C.: 1881, Guiteau's Trial, I, 520, II, 1386 et passim (the insanity of

§ 233. (3) Prior and Subsequent Insanity. A condition of mental disease is always a more or less continuous one, either in latent tendency or in manifest operation. It is therefore proper, in order to ascertain the fact of its existence at a certain time, to consider its existence at a prior or a subsequent time. The degree of continuity varies infinitely in various cases, and hence there can be little certainty in the inference from one period to another. Nevertheless, since it can never be known beforehand to what variety the case in question belongs in this respect, the facts of prior and subsequent existence cannot be absolutely known beforehand to be relevant. Much must depend on the type of insanity, as preliminarily indicated by the person's conduct at the time in question. There is also a further element of uncertainty in criminal cases, in that the accused has a strong motive to feign insanity after the act charged; and thus particular scrutiny is required in weighing the evidence of an accused person's subsequent insane conduct. In spite, however, of these uncertainties and difficulties, Courts are to-day universally agreed that both prior and subsequent mental condition, within some limits, are receivable for consideration; stress being always properly laid on the truth that these conditions are merely evidential towards ascertaining the mental condition at the precise time of the act in issue:

1822, Washington, J., in Stevens v. Van Cleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262: "The point of time to be looked at . . . is that when the will was executed. . . . The law permits evidence Guiteau's father and near relatives was allowed to be evidenced); 1900, Snell v. U. S., 16 D. C. App. 501, 511 (insanity in a second cousin, held inadmissible); Ill.: 1862, Snow v. Benton, 28 Ill. 306, semble (insanity of a mother, admitted); 1874, Meeker v. Meeker, 75 id. 260, 270 (paralysis of ancestors and near relations, excluded, because the testator's affection by paralysis was not disputed; "had it been a question of doubt, . . . we could see its pertinency"); 1883, Upstone v. People, 109 id. 169 (insanity of mother, sister, three brothers, and mother's sisters, admitted); Ind.: 1869, Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492, 495, 503, 510 (insanity of a half-sister, mother, her twin brother, and a cousin, admitted, but only in connection with other evidence of insane conduct of the defendant); 1871, Sawyer v. State, 35 id. 80, 84 (preceding case approved; see quotation supra); Ia.: 1868, State v. Felter, 25 Ia. 75 (insanity of ancestors, admissible); 1876, Ross v. McQuiston, 45 id. 147 (parental insanity, admissible); 1894, Sim v. Russell, 90 id. 656, 57 N. W. 601 (same); 1894, Denning v. Butcher, 91 id. 425, 59 id. 70 (same); 1897, State v. Van Tassel, 103 id. 6, 72 N. W. 497 (admissible as cumulative only, accompanying other evidence); 1899, State v. Robbins, 109 id. 650, 80 N. W. 1061 (murder; epilepsy of defendant's mother and brother and insanity of another brother, admitted); Me.: 1885, St. George v. Biddeford, 76 Me. 598, semble (admissible); Md.: 1902, Berry v. Safe D. & T. Co., 96 Md. 45, 53 Atl. 720 (insanity in other members of the family, held inadmissible except after evidence of insanity in the person in issue); Mass.: 1868, Com. v. Andrews, Davis' R. 133 (murder; insanity of various ancestral relatives, admitted); Mich.: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 17 (insanity of a brother, admitted; see quotation supra); Minn.: 1895, State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. W. 63 (ancestral insanity, admissible only to corroborate other and more direct evidence); Mo.: 1878, State v. Simms, 68 Mo. 305, 309 (insanity of aunt and sisters, held proper to be considered, even though no other evidence "directly" tended to prove insanity); 1887, State v. Pagels, 92 id. 307, 4 S. W. 931 (insanity of persons not shown to be connections, held not "material," as ground for a continuance); 1899, State v. Soper, 148 id. 217, 49 S. W. 1007 (insanity of collateral kindred, rejected on the facts); N. J.: 1846, State v. Spencer, 21 N. J. L. 196, 203, semble (admissible); N. Y.: 1882, Walsh v. People, 88 N. Y. 467 (insanity of "parents or relatives," admissible "in aid or corroboration of other proof"); N. C.: 1859, State v. Christmas, 6 Jones L. 471, 474 (see quotation supra); 1875, State v. Cunningham, 72 N. C. 469, 474 (insanity of uncles and aunts excluded, where there was no insane conduct of the accused himself in evidence; see quotation supra); Tenn.: 1875, Hagan v. State, 5 Baxt. 615 (insanity of a brother admitted, there being evidence of the accused's insane conduct); U. S.: 1858, U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 98, 109, 110 (unspecified "hereditary insanity," admitted); Vt.: 1896, Titus v. Gage, 70 Vt. 13, 39 Atl. 246 (intemperance of parent, without medical testimony to its significance, inadmissible).

of such prior and snbseqnent incapacity to be given. But nnless it bear npon that period and is of snch a natnre as to show incompetency when the wili was executed, it amounts to nothing."

1854, Selden, J., in Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157: "The insanity or incapacity of the testator may be proved, not as important in itself, but as a means of arriving at his condltion when the wili was executed. . . . [It is usefui] with a view to its reflex influence upon the question of his condition at the time of executing the will. . . . The object of the evidence is to show the mental state of the testator at the time when the will was executed. Of conrse, therefore, it is admissible oniy where it has a iegitimate bearing on that question, and of this the Court mnst judge, as in every other case where the relevancy of testimony is denied. If the judge can see that the evidence offered cannot jnstly be supposed to reflect any iight upon the mental condition of the testator at the time of making the will, he has an undouhted right to exclude it."

1858, Clifford, J., in U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 98, 108: "His acts, conduct, and deciarations, not only throughout this voyage, but throughout his whole life, from early youth to the time of his arrest, had been introduced; . . . counsel had claimed and exercised the right to examine the witnesses so called npon aii such occurrences, acts, and declarations in the life and conduct of the prisoner as tended to show that he was insane. . . . Beyond douht the precise question to be tried in ali such cases is whether the accused was insane at the time he committed the act, and to that point ali the evidence must tend. Great difficulties surround the inquiry, and it is for that reason that the rules of law allow a wide range of testimony in the investigation."

1868, Colt, J., in Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112: "By common observation and experience the existence of many forms of mental development, especially that of weakness in those facuities which are an essential part of the mind itself, when once proved imply that the infirmity must have existed for some time. The inference is quite as conciusive that such condition mnst have had a gradnal and progressive development, requiring antecedent iapse of time, as that it will continue when once proved for any considerable period thereafter. . . . [Prior and snbsequent deciarations], if they are equally significant and no more remote in point of time, are equally competent, and may be quite as influential. . . . If therefore the statement or prior declaration offered has a tendency to prove a condition not in its nature temporary or transient, then, by the aid of the recognized rule that what is once proved to exist must be presumed to continue tili the contrary be shown, the declaration, though prior in time to the act the validity of which is questioned, is admissihie. Its weight wili depend upon its significance and proximity."

1880, Gilfillan, C. J., in Pinney's Will, 27 Minn. 283, 6 N. W. 791: "The gradual decay of his mental facuities from old age, . . . when it begins, is progressive and permanent; and if at one time it has reached such a stage that the man has become incapabie of doing bnsiness, it wonld be contrary to ali experience that he should recover. So, if in such a case it is shown that at any time subseqnent to that in question the man's faculties are so far nnimpaired that he is capabie of transacting hnsiness, it is evidence that they were so nnimpaired at the time in question."[1]

[1] Eng.: 1742, Sergeson v. Sealey, 2 Atk. 412 (inquisition of lunacy, found in 1726, and declaring insanity for eight years previous, admitted to show insanity in 1724); 1854, Beavan v. M'Donnell, 10 Exch. 184 (to show that the defendant's insanity on the day of the contract was such as to be necessarily apparent to the plaintiff, the defendant's insane conduct before and after that day was admitted; Platt, B.: "The question is one of degree only; the further off the evidence is carried, the weaker it may be; but it is still evidence, though, not proof, of the fact of knowledge"); Ala.: 1849, McLean v. State, 16 Ala. 679; 1886, Kramer v. Weinert, 81 id. 414, 415, 1 So. 26; 1895, Murphree v. Senn, 107 id. 424, 18 So. 264 (temporary aberration twenty years before, not admissible without evidence of intervening aberration); Ark.: 1859, Clinton v. Estes, 20 Ark. 219, 231; 1891, Bolling v. State, 54 id. 588, 599, 16 S. W. 658 (accused's conduct and language after a killing, admissible "whenever they are so connected with or correspond to evidence of disordered or weakened mental condition preceding the time of the offence as to strengthen the inference of continuance and carry it by the time to which the inquiry relates and thus establish its existence at that

There seems to be no agreed definition of the limit of time within which such prior or subsequent condition is to be considered; and in the nature of time; or whenever they are of such a character as of themselves to indicate unsoundness to such a degree or of so permanent a natnre as to have required a longer period than the interval for its production or development"; following the language of Com. v. Pomeroy, Mass. infra); 1894, Green v. State, 59 id. 246, 248, 27 S. W. 5 (insanity twenty years before, excluded on the facts); 1898, Green v. State, 64 id. 523, 43 S. W. 973 (defendant's mental condition after arrest and during custody, admissible); Cal.: 1867, People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 581 (no time limit can be fixed in general); 1885, Dalrymple's Estate, 67 id. 444, 7 Pac. 906; 1897, People v. Griffin, 117 id. 583, 49 Pac. 711 (feeble-mindedness six months later, admitted); Conn.: 1822, Grant v. Thompson, 4 Conn. 208; 1831, Kinne v. Kinne, 9 id. 101, semble; Ill.: 1862, Snow v. Benton, 28 Ill. 306, 308 (insanity ten or twelve years before, admitted); 1878, Reynolds v. Adams, 90 id. 147; 1893, Craig v. Southard, 148 id. 37, 46, 35 N. E. 361 (prior and subsequent mental condition of testator, admissible); 1897, Harp v. Parr, 168 id. 459, 48 N. E. 113 (prior mental condition of a testator, receivable); 1899, Nieman v. Schnitker, 181 id. 400, 55 N. E. 151 (testator's utterances before and after execution, admitted); 1903, Baker v. Baker, 202 id. 595, 67 N. E. 410 ("no fixed rule can be laid down"); Ind.: 1882, Dyer v. Dyer, 87 Ind. 13, 19 (mental condition of a testator the day before the will's execution, admitted); 1889, Staser v. Hogan, 120 id. 207, 217, 21 N. E. 911 ("It was proper to show the condition of the testator's mind at any time"); 1895, Bower v. Bower, 142 id. 194, 41 N. E. 523 (no fixed limits of time can be made); 1900, Enlow v. State, 154 id. 664, 57 N. E. 539; Ia.: 1868, State v. Felter, 25 Ia. 72, 75, 76; 1876, Ashcraft v. De Armood, 44 id. 233 (admitting evidence of continued preceding insanity; "It would be otherwise if her insanity were temporary in its nature, as where it was occasioned by the violence of disease or where she was subject to lucid intervals"); 1876, State v. Lewis, 45 id. 20 (defendant's condition subsequent to the time of the act, admitted); 1876, Ross v. McQuiston, ib. 147; 1884, State v. Jones, 64 id. 349, 355, 357, 360, 17 N. W. 911; 1895, Bever v. Spangler, 93 id. 576, 61 N. W. 1072; Kan.: 1897, State v. Newman, 57 Kan. 705, 47 Pac. 831 (condition "shortly before or after the homicide," admissible); La.: 1870, State v. Hays, 22 La. An. 39 (accused's conduct and language before and after the time charged, admissible); Me.: 1870, Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 412; 1885, St. George v. Biddeford, 76 id. 598; Md.: 1833, Davis v. Calvert, 5 G. & J. 269 (testator's mental condition "both before and after that period," admissible); 1888, Spencer v. State, 69 Md. 28, 13 Atl. 809 (accused's condition three years before, excluded on the facts); 1902, Jones v. Collins, 94 id. 403, 51 Atl. 398; Mass.: 1820, Somes v. Skinner, 16 Mass. 348, 358 (admitting previous extreme weakness of mind, to show present susceptibility to undue influence); 1841, Peaslee v. Robbins, 3 Metc. 164 (indorser's insanity, before and after indorsement, admitted); 1868, Shaller v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112 (see quotation supra); 1871, White v. Graves, 107 id. 327; 1876, Com. v. Pomeroy, 117 id. 148 (accused's subsequent condition admitted; see the phrasing followed in Bolling v. State, Ark. supra); 1878, Davis v. Davis, 123 id. 598; 1879, May v. Bradlee, 127 id. 420; 1882, Potter v. Baldwin, 133 id. 428; 1890, Lane v. Moore, 151 id. 87, 90, 23 N. E. 828; 1890, Woodward v. Sullivan, 152 id. 470, 25 N. E. 837; 1891, Dumangue v. Daniels, 154 id. 483, 485, 28 N. E. 900 (subsequent mental condition admissible; the trial Court's discretion to control as to time); 1896, Howes v. Colburn, 165 id. 385, 43 N. E. 125 (approving the trial Court's limitation to a period from about eight years before the execution of the will to about two and a half years after); 1896, Laplante v. Mills, ih. 487, 43 N. E. 294 (mental condition of a boy a year after his injury, received; "a boy who is dull at fifteen probably was dull at fourteen"); Mich.: 1893, Haines v. Hayden, 95 Mich. 332, 351, 54 N. W. 911 (subsequent mental condition, admitted on the facts); Minn.: 1880, Pinney's Will, 27 Minn. 282, 6 N. W. 791 (see quotation supra); 1895, State v. Hayward, 62 id. 474, 65 N. W. 63 (temporary delusions, of a different sort from that alleged against the witness, and existing some time before the trial, excluded); Mo.: 1897, State v. Duestrow, 137 Mo. 44, 38 S. W. 554 (liberal range of time allowed); 1897, Rhoades v. Fuller, 139 id. 179, 40 S. W. 760 (insanity twenty days later, excluded, partly because proved by a probate judgment of guardianship; see post, § 1671); 1901, Hamburger v. Rinkel, 164 id. 398, 64 S. W. 104; Nev.: 1889, State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 342, 22 Pac. 241 (approving Com. v. Pomeroy, Mass.); N. H.: 1871, State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 369, 382 (insanity "for a period of many years before the act," admitted); 1876, State v. Kelley, 57 id. 549 (insanity two months before, admitted); 1898, Pritchard v. Austin, 69 id. 367, 46 Atl. 188; N. J.: 1846, State v. Spencer, 21 N. J. L. 196, 203 ("Evidence of former attacks of insanity amounts to about this: It does not show that the prisoner was insane at the time of the homicide; but if there is any independent evidence that he was so, the former insanity increases the probability"); N. Y.: 1854, Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157 (see quotation supra); 1888, People v. Hawkins, 100 id. 408, 410, 11 N. E. 371, semble (accused's insanity two months later, admissible); 1891, People v. Wood, 126 id. 249, 272, 27 N. E. 362 (diseased condition of the accused's brain, when examined by physicians, admitted to show insanity at the time of the killing charged); 1893, People v. Taylor, 138 id. 398, 404, 34 N. E. 275 (condition during the four months between the homicide and the trial, admitted); 1896, People v. Nino, 149 id. 317, 43 N. E. 853 (admitting language of the accused to the expert examining things no definition is possible. The circumstances of each case must furnish the varying criterion, and the determination of the trial judge ought to be allowed to control:

1853, Isham, J., in Robinson v. Hutchinson, 26 Vt. 47: "Weakness of mind at the time of making the will may be inferred from weakness subsequent, . . . when the declarations were made so near the time of the execution of the will that a reasonable conclusion may be drawn as to the state of mind of the testatrix at the time the will was executed."

1868, Colt, J., in Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112: "[The declaration's] weight will depend upon its significance and proximity. It may be so remote in point of time, or so altered in its import by subsequent changes in the circumstances of the maker, as to be wholly immaterial and wisely to be rejected by the judge."

1889, Clark, J., in Herster v. Herster, 122 Pa. 230, 16 Atl. 342: "The weakness of mind and consequent susceptibility to influence which is admissible in such a case must be shown to exist at the very time of the testamentary act. . . . The limitations which govern the admission of this quality of evidence must depend largely on the character of the unsoundness to be proved. There are types of mental unsoundness which appear suddenly and may be of short duration, and in such cases the proof, to be of any avail, must come near to the precise time when the act was performed; but the decadence of old age and many forms of mental derangement and imbecility are of slow advancement, and proof of their distinct development at any given period will afford pretty clear ground to infer their existence for a long period, either before or after, with a considerable degree of certainty. . . . The Court must judge, in each particular case, how far it will be profitable to extend the rule before and after the precise date in question. . . . Of course the objective point of inquiry, in every case, is the state of mind at the precise date of the testamentary act."

1890, C. Allen, J., in Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87, 90 (holding that the mental condition before and after a given time, if near enough, is relevant to show the condition at that time when it is in issue): "The judge will determine whether the time is so remote, or whether the circumstances have so changed, that declarations then made would not be deemed satisfactory evidence tending to show the person's condition at the earlier period."[2]

him in jail for insanity); 1896, People v. Hoch, 150 id. 291, 44 N. E. 977 (examination of the accused, made just before and during trial, admitted); N. C.: 1820, State v. Scott, 1 Hawks 24, 25, 32 (homicide; conduct and utterances on the morning after, excluded; Henderson, J., diss., holding them admissible "not to prove the truth of the facts declared," but to allow inferences); 1839, Norwood v. Marrow, 4 Dev. & B. 451, 578 (subsequent insane conduct, admitted; practically repudiating State v. Scott); 1880, State v. Vann, 82 N. C. 631, 633 (insane language of the accused after the act, excluded); Oh.: 1878, Wheeler v. State, 34 Oh. St. 394, 396 (inquisition of lunacy four years before, admitted); Okl.: 1901, Queenan v. Terr., 11 Okl. 261, 71 Pac. 218; Pa.: 1821, Ramhler v. Tryon, 7 S. & R. 93; 1822, Irish v. Smith, 8 id. 576; 1845, Chess v. Chess, 1 Pa. St. 163; 1850, McTaggert v. Thompson, 14 id. 154; 1851, Londen v. Blythe, 16 id. 542; 1854, Wilkinson v. Pearson, 23 id. 120; 1861, Stauffer v. Young, 39 id. 455, 462, semble; 1871, Pidcock v. Potter, 68 id. 351; 1884, First Nat'l Bank v. Wireback's Ex'r, 106 id. 46; 1889, Herster v. Herster, 122 id. 289, 16 Atl. 342 (see quotation post); 1893, Hindman v. Van Dyke, 153 id. 243, 246, 25 Atl. 772 (condition four years before, admitted); 1895, Com. v. Bezek, 168 id. 603, 32 Atl. 109; U. S.: 1822, Stevens v. Van Cleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262 (see quotation supra); 1858, U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 98, 108 (see quotation supra); 1896, St. Louis I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Greenthal, 23 C. C. A. 100, 77 Fed. 150 (insanity three weeks before, admitted; following U. S. v. Holmes); Vt.: 1853, Robinson v. Hutchinson, 26 Vt. 47 (see quotation supra); 1862, Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 id. 398, 417 (condition four years before, admitted); W. Va.: 1878, Dinges v. Branson, 14 W. Va. 100, 105 (prior testamentary declarations, admitted to show capacity at a later time to recollect and carry out a plan); Wis.: 1874, Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 117, 134; 1889, Giles v. Hodge, 74 id. 360, 366, 34 N. W. 163; 1896, French v. State, 93 id. 325, 67 N. W. 706 (a time subsequent held not too remote on the facts); 1899, Small v. Champney, 102 id. 61, 78 N. W. 407 (mental condition when adjudicated insane, presumed to continue subsequently, but not to have existed antecedently, unless with other evidence of similarity of mental condition at prior time); 1901, Hempton v. State, 111 id. 127, 86 N. W. 596 (insanity fourteen years before, admitted).

The question whether an inquisition or adjudication of lunacy is admissible at all raises a question of an exception to the Hearsay rule, post, § 1671. Supposing it admissible, then it evidences insanity at the time of inquisition, and the present question — of the relevancy of insanity at that time — is then the same as in cases where the insanity is otherwise evidenced by conduct or the like.

Compare the cases cited post, §§ 1738, 1739.

§ 234. Other Principles affecting Proof of Insanity, discriminated. The only inquiry in this place is with the evidencing of mental capacity by circumstantial evidence. Other principles specially affecting the proof of capacity are dealt with elsewhere, and are chiefly the following: the qualifications, as to experience, of a witness to sanity (post, § 568); the qualifications of a witness, as to his observation of the person in question (post, § 689); the exception to the Hearsay rule, admitting utterances of the person in question (post, § 1734); the exception to the Hearsay rule, admitting reputation to prove insanity (post, § 1621); the exception to the Hearsay rule, admitting an official inquisition or adjudication upon insanity (post, § 1671); and the application of the Opinion rule to testimony to insanity (post, § 1933).

§ 235. Intoxication. Intoxication, as a mental condition of temporary stupefaction, may be evidenced circumstantially in the same general modes that are available (ante, § 227) for mental capacity or condition in general. (1) It may be evidenced by the person's conduct.[1] (2) It may be evidenced by predisposing circumstances, i. e. by the drinking of intoxicative liquor.[2] (3) It may be evidenced by his prior or subsequent condition of intoxication within such a time that the condition may be supposed to be continuous.[3]

[2] This relegation to the trial judge's discretion is also approved in the following cases cited supra: Clinton v. Estes, Ark.; Enlow v. State, Ind.; Dumangue v. Daniels, Mass.; Wilkinson v. Pearson, Pa. The length of time which has in various cases been recognized as within the proper range of consideration is illustrated in the citations of the foregoing note.

[1] 1897, State v. Harris, 100 Ia. 188, 69 N.W. 413 (burglary; to disprove the fact of the defendant's intoxication at the time, evidence admitted of a robbery by him on the same evening); 1896, Bagley v. Mason, 69 Vt. 175, 37 Atl. 287 (battery; boisterous and belligerent conduct of the defendant just beforehand, admitted to show the extent of the intoxicated condition in which the plaintiff alleged the defendant was).

[2] 1805, Tuttle v. Russell, 2 Day 202 ("Can a Court say that evidence to show that a man has within an hour before drunk a quart of rum is not relevant to prove that the man is drunk? . . . It is barely possible that the consequence of a man's drinking a quart of rum may not be drunkenness, but generally it is not only a highly probable but a certain consequence. Courts and juries in weighing evidence are to calculate on probabilities, not possibilities"; this was the argument, as affirmed by the Court); 1858, McDowell v. Boston, 26 Ga. 535 (the mere taking of laudanum at unspecified times was held not enough to show general impairment or temporary affection by it); 1845, Fleming v. State, 5 Hump. 564 (drinking a pint of brandy, admitted). For the use of intoxication as discrediting a witness, see post, § 933.

[3] 1900, Allen v. Allen, 73 Conn. 54, 46 Atl. 242 (divorce for habitual intemperance; habits after date of complaint, admitted); 1883, Upstone v. People, 109 Ill. 169, 175 (murder when intoxicated; intoxication the day before, admitted); 1857, Com. v. Howe, 9 Gray, 113 (prior and subsequent intoxication, to show intoxication at the time of a confession, admitted); 1901, Raynor v. R. Co., 129 N. C. 195, 39 S. E. 821 (intoxication at 3.45 P.M., held no evidence of intoxication at 11 A.M. the same day; "neither drunkenness nor soberness is necessarily a continuing state; both conditions are liable to rapid and frequent fluctuations"; this ruling throws an odd light on the manners of inebriety in that jurisdiction); 1855, McCandless v. McWha, 25 Pa. 95 (prior intemperate habits, admitted). This use of a prior continuing condition is to be distinguished from the use of an intemperate habit as evidence of an act of drinking done as a part of the habitual course of conduct (ante, § 96), and from the use of a condition of intoxication as evidencing incapacity to do a specific act (ante, § 85).

Topic IV: Evidence to prove Design or Plan.

§ 237. General Principle. The existence of a design or plan is usually employed evidentially to indicate the subsequent doing of the act designed or planned (ante, §§ 102–113). An utterance in which a design or plan is asserted is admissible under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1725). The question here is how such a design or plan may be otherwise evidenced, i. e., circumstantially. Of the three conceivable sorts of circumstantial evidence (ante, § 190), only two are practically available, viz.: (1) Conduct, as indicating the inward existence of a design; (2) Prior or subsequent existence of the design, as indicating its existence at the time in question.

Design or Plan is to be carefully distinguished from Intent. In many parts of the substantive law, particularly in the criminal law, the state of mind accompanying an act becomes legally important, and is for such purposes one of the propositions in issue. This may be termed Intent. It is not used evidentially to prove something else; it is one of the ultimate parts of the issue. Design or Plan, on the other hand, has almost invariably (except where a conspiracy is charged) a purely evidential use; the inference is to be from the design to the act, and thus the design must in its turn be evidenced. The two are practically as well as theoretically to be distinguished, because the conduct that evidences Intent (as may be seen post, §§ 302–304) is often of a different sort and needs fewer restrictions than conduct evidencing Design.

Design must also be distinguished from Emotion or Motive (anger, jealousy, and the like). Thus, threats of violence may evidence both a Design and an Emotion. Conduct as evidencing Emotion is dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 394–406).[1]

§ 238. Sundry Instances (Tools, Materials, Liquor Licenses, Preparations, Journeys, Experiments, Inquiries, Prophecies, and the like). The kinds of conduct which may evidence a design are innumerable in their variety. Any act, which under the circumstances and according to experience as naturally interpreted and applied would indicate a probable design, is relevant and admissible. It is true that the design indicated may be too indefinite to be itself relevant as evidence of an act (ante, § 106); but this does not affect the relevancy of the conduct to evidence that design. Most evidence of this sort needs no judicial ruling to determine its relevancy, and the precedents deal with only a limited number of the possible uses of such evidence. The discretion of the trial Court should control in all these cases; it is impossible to lay down any general rule that will be definite enough to serve as a solution for each instance; and it is poor policy to attempt in a Supreme Court to pass upon the probative value of each given piece of conduct. Any attempt to reconcile all the rulings is hopeless; there is no reason why they should be treated as binding precedents. The question is always one of experience and common sense in each case. The general judicial attitude is shown in the following passage:

[1] The occasionally hazy condition of judicial reasoning and nomenclature in this field is illustrated in an opinion (State v. Goff, 117 N. C. 755, 23 S. E. 355) admitting evidence of threats to kill as indicating which party was the aggressor, but using this singular distinction: "while this was not competent as evidence of motive, it was admissible to show temper."

1878, Brewer, J., In State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 320 (burglary; the four defendants held a meeting to arrange for the crime; a bar of iron and a pair of pincers were alone necessary, and these the defendant brought; the facts were admitted of the defendant having taken a carpenter's brace from a store and hidden it; a third person removed it, and the defendant never used it); "Would not the act be one tending to show preparation, — a preparation made fruitless by the unexpected act of another? Could it not be shown that the one charged with homicide immediately prior thereto was providing himself with several weapons, though one only was used? . . . If one weapon he stole, another he borrowed, and one (his own) he put in order, would proof as to the first be incompetent while evidence as to the others was admissible? . . . If no act or conduct of the defendant could be shown unless the motive therefor or the connection between it and the crime were made indisputably clear, the range of inquiry would be limited and narrow. It is enough that the act has an apparent or probable connection with the crime, and then the motive of the defendant and the weight of it as testimony are to be considered by the jury. . . . Must it be affirmatively shown that each weapon was procured with reference to the homicide before evidence concerning its procurement is competent? Or are the facts concerning all to be put in evidence, leaving their weight to be determined by the jury?"; and the latter is approved.

The acquisition or possession of instruments, tools, or other means of doing the act, is admissible as a significant circumstance; the possession signifies a probable design to use; the instruments need not be such as are entirely appropriate, nor such as were actually put to use.[1] In particular, the advertisement or possession of the apparatus or a license for gaming,[2] or selling liquor,[3] evidences a design to game or to sell.

[1] 1855, R. v. Jarvis, 7 Cox Cr. 53 (the possession of a number of false coins, wrapped in separate papers, etc., admitted to show a plan to utter them); 1886, Finch v. State, 81 Ala. 41, 42, 49, 1 So. 565 (borrowing a knife just before the affray in which the knife was used, admitted as "an act of preparation"); 1898, People v. Cuff, 122 Cal. 589, 55 Pac. 407 (poisoning by strychnia; defendant's purchase of chloroform, admitted); 1899, Mobley v. State, 41 Fla. 621, 26 So. 732 (murder by stabbing; purchase of poison and taking it to deceased's house, admitted as indicating a general design to kill deceased); 1887, Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 141, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898 (the fact that many men came promptly to a place and procured bombs simultaneously, held to point to an "expectation that bombs would be found at that place at that time," and thus to tend to establish a specific plan for their use); 1858, State v. Hinkle, 6 Ia. 384 (wife-poisoning; previous possession of arsenic, admitted); 1884, State v. Franks, 64 Id. 39, 42, 19 N. W. 832 (burglary; prior possession of burglar's tools, admitted); 1901, State v. Wayne, 62 Kan. 636, 64 Pac. 68 (possession of tools appropriate to a burglary, though not exclusively so, admissible); 1849, Com. v. Wilson, 2 Cush. 590 (burglary of the City Hall in Charlestown; evidence was rejected of the possession of a key fitted to open the door of the Lancaster Bank); 1849, Com. v. Williams, ib. 584 (burglary; the possession of burglar's tools, admitted); 1870, Com. v. Choate, 105 Mass. 451 (arson; after evidence tending to show that the fire was set by means of a box containing a lighted candle and combustible materials, and not adapted to any but incendiary purposes, the fact was admitted of the defendant's possession of a similar box before the fire in question, as showing, with other things, "a use of his shop for the purpose of preparing boxes and materials for setting incendiary fires, including the fire alleged, in the same place, and all instigated by one motive"; distinguishing Com. v. Wilson, supra); 1876, Long v. State, 52 Miss. 23, 34 (murder by shooting; procuring a pistol on the same morning, admitted); 1888, State v. Rider, 95 Mo. 474, 485, 8 S. W. 723 (murder; the procurement of a pistol just beforehand, admitted); 1897, People v. Scott, 153 N. Y. 40, 46 N. E. 1028 (getting a revolver out of pawn a few days before, admitted, to show deliberate intent); 1849, U. S. v. Burns, 5 McLean 23, 26 (possession of instruments for counterfeiting, admitted); 1889, State v. Webster, 21 Wash. 63, 57 Pac. 361 (murder; defendant's purchase and possession of cantharides just before the shooting, admitted on the facts). Compare the cases cited ante, § 88. For the subsequent possession of stolen chattels, as indicating the act of stealing, see ante, § 153.

The presence of a person at a place or a journey towards it, together with behavior showing a desire for secrecy, may indicate a design to commit an unlawful act there.[4] But the indications of secrecy are not essential. In a civil case, for instance, a person's turning down the street to a railroad station would be some indication that he planned taking the train; so too, waiting openly under arms is some indication of a plan to use them, lawfully or unlawfully. The significant thing is the going to or being in a place under conditions which naturally suggest the supposed plan as a possible or probable explanation.[5] Where a person makes inquiries, either by word of mouth or by messenger, or by experimentation searches for knowledge, it is natural to infer that he designs to use the knowledge thus sought; and if the knowledge is needed or is adapted to help in doing the act in question, the inquiries or experiments are thus evidential of a design to do the act.[6] Obscure intima-

[2] There are a number of statutes dealing in the same way with this and related offences, but they are usually intended to lay down a rule for the burden of proof (post, § 2500), and do not add anything new to the law of admissibility. The following are merely a few examples: Mass. St. 1895, c. 419, § 8 (advertising, etc., a ticket, etc., for lottery, evidence of the existence of the lottery, etc.); 1895, Com. v. Gormen, 164 Mass. 549, 42 N. E. 94 (possession of policy slips, evidence of intent to game).

[3] Conn. Gen. St. 1887, § 3107 (Federal liquor license or tax-payment, to be evidence, with the possession of liquor, of possession with illegal intent); 1899, Guy v. State, 90 Md. 29, 44 Atl. 997 (Federal liquor license is evidence of sale); Mass. St. 1887, c. 414 (exposure of signs, etc., is evidence that liquor is there for sale); N. H. Pub. St. 1891, c. 112, § 25 (exposure of signs, labelled bottles, etc., or a Federal liquor-tax receipt, is admissible to show the illegal keeping of liquor); 1887, State v. Spaulding, 60 Vt. 228, 233, 14 Atl. 769 (Federal license, admissible to show actual sales; "for if he had the intent to do an act, it would be more probable that he did it than it would be if he had no such intent"); Vt. St. 1894, § 4476 (payment of Federal liquor-tax, to be evidence of being a common seller and of keeping a liquor-nuisance).

[4] 1829, R. v. Wilson, 1 Law. Cr. C. 112 (murder in a churchyard; the fact was offered that just before the affair the defendant and two others "were lurking there clandestinely with a bundle of cloth; the object being to raise a presumption that they were there with an evil intent, and ergo that they must have had malice against all persons coming in their way and likely to interrupt them;" Littledale, J., rejected it); 1896, Smalls v. State, 99 Ga. 25, 25 S. E. 614 (waiting out in a field, armed, for a pursuing officer, admitted).

[5] A man's presence in a brothel is some evidence that he intended to and did commit adultery: 1828, Astley v. Astley, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 714, 720; 1831, Kenrick v. Kenrick, 4 id. 114, 138 (citing other cases); 1878, Latham v. Latham, 30 Gratt. 307, 312 ("Such an act, wholly unexplained, might be considered evidence of guilt, but it is clearly not one which precludes explanation"). So, too, the fact of a man and woman, not husband and wife, spending the night alone in the same sleeping-room: 1798, Williams v. Williams, 1 Hagg. Consist. 299; 1887, Com. v. Clifford, 145 Mass. 97, 13 N. E. 345.

[6] 1891, Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 588, 596, 16 S. W. 658 (murder; buying a gun and practising shooting, a few weeks before, admissible); 1786, State v. Green, Kirby 89 (adultery; evidence admitted that the defendant hired a person to go to the woman's house and see whether her husband was at home); 1896, Jackson v. Com., 100 Ky. 239, 38 S. W. 422 (evidence of inquiries about cocaine, and of its known effects and use, in procuring abortions, admitted to show a plan to procure one); 1861, Com. v. Hersey, 2 Ill. 173, 177 (murder of a woman by poisoning; an inquiry two or three years before as to the methods of procuring abortions, excluded); 1885, Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 2 N. E. 698 (defence of forgery to a promissory note; evidence rejected of the plaintiff's having shown a person how to imitate notes by tracing, the character-rule being invoked; unsound); 1882, Walsh v. People, 88 N. Y. 462, 466 (murder by stabbing with a knife; a conversation of the defendant about the effect of throwing pepper into another's eyes and the punishment for it was admitted, as "tending to show that the prisoner was meditating the infliction of a personal injury upon some one and [with other evidence] a personal injury to the deceased"; evidence was also admitted of his having had the knife, used in the killing, sharpened on that morning, and of having the same morning asked the position of the heart in the body); 1899, State v. Mowry, 21 R. I. 376, 43 Atl. 871 (inquiries for a weapon like that used in a murder, and the presence of such a weapon at a third person's house, admitted). Compare some of the citations ante, § 106.

tion and allusions are often significant. Words of a person, uttered beforehand, indicating a knowledge that an event is about to occur or an act to happen, tend to show a design to do it or to coöperate in it, so far as it was not definitely expected or foreknown by others, because in that case the knowledge could be possessed only by the one planning it or privy to the plan; and the probative value of such evidence would vary with the particularity and exclusiveness of the foreknowledge thus indicated:

1752, Blandy's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 1122, 1132; the defendant had frequently told the servants that her father, the deceased, with whose murder she was charged, would not live long, basing the prophecy on the sight of his apparition and other things; Bathurst, arguing for the prosecution: "Mark how the destruction of this poor man is ushered into the world. Apparitions, noises, voices, music, reported to be heard from time to time in the deceased's house; even his days are numbered out, and his own child limits the space of his life but till the following month of October. What could be the meaning of this but to prepare the world for a death that was predetermined? Who could limit the days of a man's life but a person that knew what was intended to be done towards the shortening of it?"

1880, Loomis, J., in State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 538: "Remote and obscure allusions to the act in contemplation are admissible as tending to show an existing disposition or design. . . . The fact that the language might possibly have an innocent meaning did not prevent its consideration by the jury, who would of course be called upon to decide whether such was the fact, or whether it was a dark hint thrown from a mind that already felt the shadow of the coming tragedy."[7]

§ 239. Explanations of Incriminating Facts. According to the logical principle of Explanation (ante, § 34), it is always open to the person against whom such conduct is offered to explain away its force by showing some other hypothesis to be equally or more natural, as the reason for the conduct,

[7] 1895, People v. Evans, — Cal. —, 41 Pac. 444 (the defendant spoke in the third person, saying that the man who had killed R. meant also to kill the deceased before he stopped); 1880, State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 522, 538 (murder of a father; the defendant's declarations, in the previous May, that he should not be there to gather the corn they were planting, but should be in Kansas, admitted; also, "Folks talk about me; I will come home drunk some time and give them something else to talk about"); 1858, People v. Potter, 5 Mich. 1, 5 (just before coming to the place of the affray, the defendant remarked that "he had been reading 'Jack Rand,' and he should not be surprised if he should turn highwayman sometime, for he had been struggling with poverty long enough," and, at the same time holding an open dirk-knife, said "if any man piled onto him, he would stick him"; this evidence was admitted, on the principle that "every occurrence, every remark, and the whole conduct of the prisoner, from the time he and the deceased came together until the consummation of the crime, are competent . . . for the purpose of illustrating the act itself by showing the influences which operated to produce the catastrophe, to establish malice, and to justify the act or mitigate the crime"); 1874, State v. Gailor, 71 N. C. 88, 90 (arson; the defendant's remark that "he would not be surprised if in three weeks there would not be a building on this hill, from the threats of B. M.," a third person, admitted); 1885, State v. Green, 92 id. 779, 782 (the crime being supposed to have been committed for money paid by another, evidence was admitted that the defendant said he would soon have some money); 1876, Continental Ins. Co. v. Delpeuch, 82 Pa. 235 (the deceased's pointing out his property just before death, held not relevant to show suicidal design); 1829, Rowt v. Kile, 1 Leigh 217, 223 (instrument alleged to have been forged by J. R.; a remark of his that "his pen had not forgot to write," held not improperly excluded); 1895, Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. 364 (the defendant's statements on several occasions that the deceased had heart disease and was liable to die at any time). Some of the rulings cited under § 106, ante, could be as well considered from the present point of view. The following case is odd: 1903, Hainsworth v. State, — Ala. —, 34 So. 203 (murder; defendant's facial expression at a prayer-meeting two hours before, admitted).

than the design which it is claimed to evidence. Any explanation which is at all plausible should be received.[1]

§ 240. Similar Offences or Other Acts to show Plan or System. In the cases just considered, the conduct carried within itself the suggestion of design or plan. But acts which in themselves or alone carry no such suggestion may, when multiplied, or when compared with other acts or circumstances, suggest a common plan as the explanation or solution of the compared data. This kind of evidence has many difficulties; and the whole subject, for reasons of convenience, is dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 300–371), where the distinction between the various uses of such evidence for proving Design, Intent, and Knowledge can best be examined.

§ 241. Prior or Subsequent Design. The time of a Design or Plan is seldom material. Wherever it is, the general principle (ante, § 190) is applied that the existence of a prior or subsequent condition is relevant to show its existence at the time in question; the length of the allowable interval depending on whether, under the circumstances of the case, there is any real probability that the continuance of the condition was interrupted. The application of the principle may be seen in the rulings dealing with design or plan as evidence of an act (ante, §§ 102–113).

Topic V: Evidence to prove Intent.

§ 242. General Principle. The state of mind which accompanies an act is often of legal consequence as forming an ingredient necessary for the attachment of certain consequences.

(1) Criminal Intent. The state of mind accompanying a forbidden act is frequently an element material to make the act a crime. This state of mind, often spoken of as "malice," differs in different crimes. In no case is it malice in the sense of mere hostile feeling or enmity; for a religious fanatic who kills to please his Deity and to save his victim from the taint of heresy, or a parent who kills his child to save it from starvation, may have legal "malice." This state of mind is also to be distinguished from design or plan, which, as already noted (ante, § 237), is a purpose or aim, considered with reference to its future fulfilment. The notion of Intent, in crimes, may be also, in a broad sense, that of ultimate purpose or object, but it is regarded simply as a state of mind co-existing with the act, and is of a conglomerate nature peculiar to itself. Thus, when A shoots a pistol whose ball strikes X, A's state of mind as he shot may have been that he was pulling the trigger of a pistol whose ball would (a) strike a tree, (b) strike Z,

[1] 1881, People v. Malaspina, 57 Cal. 628 (reason for carrying a pistol, admitted); 1898, People v. Cuff, 122 id. 589, 55 Pac. 407 (poisoning by strychnia; custom of the place to have strychnia for vermin, admissible to explain the defendant's possession); 1822, Prindle v. Glover, 4 Conn. 266 (showing an innocent reason for a suspicious haunting of the premises on which the trespass took place); 1876, Com. v. Bowers, 121 Mass. 45 (adultery; the defendants were found in a bed-room at night; the fact that their plans in going to the town were innocent, excluded, apparently because the appearances against them were so strong); 1877, Com. v. Blair, 123 id. 242 (abortion; similar ruling); 1877, State v. English, 67 Mo. 136 (the defendant's journey to the place of a larceny, explained as called for by his business).

(c) strike a person, X, who was about to assault A himself. The criminal law tells us whether either of these states of mind is criminal; but it does not need to generalize in one phrase or term the exact nature of all possible criminal states of mind; it merely defines the criminal state of mind essential for each respective crime. The idea of criminal Intent, then, usually partakes of deliberateness, knowledge, object, and the like; its absence is often indicated by the ideas of mistake, good faith, reasonable belief, and the like. So far as evidence of it is concerned, the evidence of emotion, of knowledge, or of design has a bearing only so far as emotion, or knowledge, or design, enter by the criminal law as constituents of criminal Intent. In other words, there is no special evidence of Intent (with the exception to be mentioned) apart from evidence of emotion, of knowledge, of design. If those elements affect criminal intent (as they usually do), then whatever evidence would serve to prove those elements would be receivable, but no new or peculiar principle of evidence would be involved. If, for example, the charge is of breaking and entering with intent to steal, obviously "intent" here signifies "design," or "plan," and whatever would otherwise be receivable to show design would also be here receivable, — in particular, the conduct throwing light on the design of the person's entrance.[1] So if one is charged with wife-murder, his ill-feeling towards the wife would be an ingredient of criminal Intent, and whatever evidence would be otherwise suitable to show motive (i. e. ill-feeling) would be receivable here also. So on a charge of uttering counterfeit notes, knowing them to be spurious, knowledge is an ingredient of the criminal intent, and whatever evidence would be otherwise suitable to show knowledge would here be appropriate. In short Intent as a separate proposition for proof does not commonly exist. Knowledge, emotion, and design, are distinct from each other, and have more or less distinct modes of proof. But as Intent is constituted of one or more of these as ingredients, it forms no separate title of proof; for each of the ingredients is to be proved in the way proper to itself.

There is, however, one element in Intent which is distinct from any of those above, and may thus have to be shown by different evidence. This is the element of deliberateness or wilfulness, — the negative of inadvertence, accident. Thus, one who incorrectly writes the addition of a column of figures may do so inadvertently or intentionally; one who knocks over a lamp and sets fire to a house may do so inadvertently or deliberately. This element is distinct from that of ignorance, or mistake through ignorance (i. e. the absence of knowledge). For instance, one who utters a counterfeit bill may have known it to be counterfeit, but may pay it out by inadvertence, having drawn from the wrong part of his pocket-book. So, on the other hand, one who sells tainted milk does not do it by accident, though he is ignorant of its bad quality. In other words, one may lack knowledge and yet act deliberately, or one may have knowledge and yet act inadvertently. Thus, this distinct element in criminal Intent consists not alone in the voluntary movement of the muscles (i. e. in action), nor yet in a knowledge of the nature of an act, but in the combination of the two, — the specific will to act, i. e. the volition exercised with conscious reference to whatever knowledge the actor has on the subject of the act.[2] We do not necessarily show this in showing knowledge; and, conversely, we may find this conceded and still have to show criminal knowledge. For instance, on the one hand, a person might know arsenic to be poisonous, and yet might administer it inadvertently to another; so that independently of showing his past knowledge of its nature, it might also be necessary to negative his inadvertence. On the other hand, a person might deliberately pull the trigger of a firearm though ignorant that it was loaded; and thus the deliberateness of the act — i. e. the combination of voluntary action with all the knowledge which the person had — would be unquestioned, and the further proof required would be that peculiar to showing knowledge of the particular firearm's contents. There may always thus be a residuum, apart from knowledge, which remains to be proved.

[1] 1886, Reed, J., in State v. Teeter, 69 Ia. 718, 27 N. W. 485 ("It often occurs in human experience that the mere fact that a particular act has been done affords the best evidence of the motive or intention with which it was done. If one was to break and enter a building which was known to be on fire, the reasonable presumption from his act would be that his intention was either to attempt the extinguishment of the fire or the rescue of the property or persons within it. So if one was to be found in the night time in the act of breaking into a building in which money or property of great value was deposited, his act would give very strong evidence indeed of the motive or purpose which prompted it").

This residuum, the element of deliberateness, the negative of inadvertence or accident, may of course be evidenced by the surrounding circumstances and the conduct, as other mental states are. It may also be evidenced by Design; for, e. g., one who has planned to kill another is very unlikely to have acted inadvertently in shooting at him. It may also be evidenced by Knowledge, for one who knows, e. g. that arsenic is poisonous is less likely than otherwise to administer it inadvertently. It may also be evidenced by Emotion; for one who is angry with another is less likely than otherwise to strike him inadvertently. All these elements, independently useful and provable as bearing on the doing of the act, help also to throw light on the intent accompanying the act. But there is one peculiar mode of evidencing this deliberateness — the negative of inadvertence or accident — which stands by itself, in the sense that it may have no bearing distinctively on a previous Design or on a previous Knowledge or on a previous Emotion, and yet may help to throw light on deliberateness, this distinctive residuum, — namely, other similar acts. The doctrine of chances and the experience of conduct tell us that accident and inadvertence are rare and casual; so that the recurrence of a similar act tends to persuade us that it is not to be explained as inadvertent or accidental. The rulings dealing with this kind of evidence are for the sake of convenience dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 300–371), in connection with the other principles to be distinguished.

(2) Testamentary Intent. The state of mind accompanying an act dealing with a will is frequently of consequence as an ingredient of the total act. A tearing or a cancelling of a will may or may not be a revocation according as it is done deliberately and knowingly or the reverse. The peculiar element of Intent, here as in the preceding case, consists not merely of knowledge of the nature of the paper, but in action with the presence of such knowledge and with the foresight of the consequences. Circumstances, conduct, knowledge, former design, and the like, — all evidence this element of intent, and no distinct principle of evidence is involved. Other similar acts have rarely a bearing; so far as they have, they are admissible (post, § 370). Former design to revoke, as indicating probable intent at the time of destroying or cancelling, is admissible (ante, § 112, and post, § 1737). Subsequent belief in revocation, as pointing back to an intent to revoke, may also be admissible (post, §§ 271, 1737). The Hearsay rule is here the chief obstacle to be considered (post, § 1737).

[2] Compare Austin's distinction between Will and Intention, quoted post, § 2413.

(3) Sundry Intents. In other cases the intent accompanying an act may be material, as in an act of delivery, payment, or the like, and the intent is evidenced, as in the preceding cases, by conduct and circumstances. The only question of evidence that arises is as to the application of the Hearsay rule to language accompanying the act (post, §§ 1770–1786).

SUB-TITLE II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

TOPIC VI: EVIDENCE TO PROVE KNOWLEDGE, BELIEF, OR CONSCIOUSNESS.

CHAPTER XI.

§ 244. General Analysis of the Subject. The notions of Knowledge, Belief, and Consciousness are not precisely identical; but they have a common feature, which is the typical one so far as concerns the modes of evidencing these mental states. That feature is most nearly expressed by the term Consciousness, i. e. presence in the mind of an impression as to a given fact. Thus, a person's Knowledge of a city's streets may be inferred from his conduct in finding his way through them unerringly; his Consciousness of guilt may be inferred from his conduct in fleeing from arrest; his Belief in a friend's innocence of embezzlement may be inferred from his conduct in trusting him with money. The respective terms are by usage more usually associated with different relations in which this impression of mind arises; the term Belief is used commonly when the impression is thought of as bearing on present or future action, Consciousness when thought of as bearing on past action, and Knowledge when thought of in connection with the reality of external objects.

These states of mind may or may not, considered in themselves, be in issue or be evidential of something else; e. g., a person's state of mind as to the city's streets may not be evidential to show their actual condition, but may be legally material otherwise; his impression as to his own guilt may be evidential of that, but not of something else; his impression as to a friend's innocence may not be evidential of his innocence, but may be material in other respects. We are here not concerned, in theory at least, with the way in which one of these states of mind has come to be an object of proof, either as being in issue or as being itself evidential of something else. The substantive law tells us when any one of these states of mind is legally material to the issue; and the principles governing their relevancy evidentially to prove an act have already been considered (ante, §§ 172–177). It is assumed that somehow this kind of state of mind — impression, consciousness, knowledge, belief — is in the case, either as material to the issue or as relevant to prove something; and the question is how it is in its turn to be evidenced.

Of the three modes of evidencing a state of mind (ante, § 190), the first two are here the commonest, the third rarely calls for a ruling. (1) Conduct or behavior (including language not used assertively) illustrates and points back to the state of mind producing it; and the state of mind which is variously termed knowledge, belief, or consciousness, shows itself in the conduct of its bearer. (2) External circumstances, calculated by their presence or occurrence to bring about the state of mind in question, are also available to show the probability that consciousness, knowledge, or belief subsequently ensued. (3) A prior or subsequent state of mind indicates, within certain limits, its existence at the time in question. These three typical modes of evidencing consciousness, knowledge, or belief, have each their peculiar and common features, and must be examined separately. The inferences in the respective modes have so much in common that it is profitable to group them together. The second of the above modes will for convenience' sake be considered first.

1. External Circumstances as evidencing Knowledge, Belief, or Consciousness.

§ 245. General Principle. There are, in a broad analysis, four kinds of circumstances (events or things) which may point forward to the probability that a given person received a given impression (i. e. obtained knowledge, formed a belief, or was made conscious): (1) The direct exposure of the fact to his sense of sight, hearing, or the like; (2) The express making of a communication to him; (3) The reputation in the community on the subject, as leading probably to an express communication; (4) The quality of the occurrence, as leading either to actual perception by his senses, or to express communication.

Throughout all these four modes there run two considerations, affecting some modes more strongly than others: (a) The probability that the person received an impression of any fact at all; and (b) The probability that from the particular occurrence he would gain an impression as to the specific fact in question. Doubt may arise upon either of these points, and the various modes above are stronger or weaker in one or the other of these considerations. The four modes may now be examined more in detail.

(1) Direct exposure of the fact to the senses. Here there is seldom any doubt as to the element (b) above; the question usually is whether the fact in question was brought within the range of the senses so as probably to be perceived at all. The typical case is the possession of a document. If a deed or a notice was laid on A's desk, the probability (greater or less according to circumstances) is that A read it. But actual possession by A is not necessary; the posting of a placard in a street through which A habitually passes is some evidence that A ultimately came to see and understand its contents. Occasionally the element (b) above is the emphatic one; for example, where A is charged with selling liquor to B, a minor, the appearance of B, as indicating A's knowledge of B's minority or his belief in B's maturity, was the fact brought before A, and the question is whether it would probably have informed him as to the further specific fact, namely, B's age.

(2) Express communication. Little difficulty can arise here. There may be a question as to whether the communication came from a source which the person was fairly bound to consider authentic; but this would be a question of substantive law, involving the elements of good faith, constructive notice, or the like. There may also be a question as to the interpretation of the communication, — whether its sense could properly be taken as of one sort or another; but this also is a question of substantive law.

(3) Reputation. Here the element (a) is the important one. The probative considerations are that, when a matter is so much talked of in a community that a reputation arises about it, a member of that community, in his ordinary intercourse with others, will come to hear it mentioned, i. e. by express communication; and the question is whether the probability is that there would be such a general discussion and whether the person is likely to have learned of that discussion. The first part of this inquiry — whether a reputation can arise — depends on the nature of the matter; the second part depends on the situation of the person in question.[1]

(4) Quality of the occurrence, in general. Sundry cases here combine the considerations of all the preceding modes, as well as of both the elements (a) and (b) above. Thus, a former accident to apparatus owned by A may indicate that A learned of the defect in the apparatus, either because he probably observed the former accident or because he probably was told of it by his subordinate having charge of the apparatus, or because complaint was probably made to him; and not only is the probability (a) of his having learned of the former accident thus involved, but also the probability (b) that the former accident would have revealed to him specifically the existence of the defect. So, also, a former act of violence by the deceased, in order to have any value to show the slayer's ground for apprehension of an attack, must (a) not only have been communicated to the slayer, (b) but also must be such as would create a belief in the deceased's probable aggression.

Such being the various modes in which the evidence may operate, nevertheless in a given situation, as where an employer is to be charged with knowledge of an employee's incompetency, or a defendant accused of murder is to show belief in the deceased's probable aggression, the knowledge, belief, or consciousness may be sought to be evidenced by more than one of the above modes. Practically, therefore, it is more convenient to group the cases, not according to the above modes of operation, but according to the various ultimate facts the knowledge or belief of which is to be shown.

§ 246. (1) Defendant charged with Murder; Reputation of the Deceased. Where a defendant charged with murder asserts that he killed in self-defence, his state of mind at the time of the killing becomes material; and an important element in determining his justification is his belief of an impending attack by the deceased. The reputation of the deceased for a violent, dangerous, or turbulent disposition is a circumstance which would contribute to such a belief:

1848, Lumpkin, J., in Monroe v. State, 5 Ga. 137: "Reasonable fear, under our code, repels the conclusion of malice; and has not the character of the deceased for violence much to do in determining the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the fear under which the defendant claims to have acted? Does it make no difference whether my adversary be a reckless and overbearing bully, having a heart lost to all social ties and order and fatally bent on mischief, or is a man of Quaker-like mien and deportment, one who never strikes except in self-defence and then evincing the utmost reluctance to shed blood? Who, knowing the character of Kyd the pirate, or of the infamous John A. Murrell, would not instantly, upon their approach armed with deadly weapons, act upon the presumption that robbery or murder or both were contemplated? We apprehend that the imminence of the danger, as well as the chances of escape, will depend greatly upon the temper and disposition of our foe."

[1] Whether the reputation of a fact is admissible to prove the fact itself is a question of the Hearsay rule, treated post, §§ 1580–1626, and has nothing to do with the present subject.

1856, Walker, J., in Franklin v. State, 29 Ala. 17: "Conduct of a man of peaceable character and harmless deportment might pass by without exciting a reasonable apprehension of impending peril; while on the other hand the same conduct from a man of notoriously opposite character and habits might reasonably produce a consciousness of the most imminent peril and a conviction of the necessity of prompt defensive action. Whenever such bad character on the part of the deceased thus illustrates the circumstances attending a homicide, and the circumstances, so illustrated, tend to produce a reasonable belief of imminent danger in the mind of the slayer, the character, as mingled with the transaction, is a part of it, and is indispensable to its correct understanding."

1856, Fisher, J., in Cotton v. State, 31 Miss. 511: "The hostile demonstrations of two men may in every respect be the same; yet the party threatened may be placed in imminent peril from the conduct of one, and feel not the slightest apprehension of danger from the other. . . . One may excite fear and the greatest apprehension of danger, while the same demonstrations on the part of another may only excite mirth and ridicule. The question is in both cases the same, — Was there imminent danger to the life or to the person of the party threatened? As part of the means of arriving at the truth of this fact, the peculiar character of the hostile party is as much a fact for the consideration of the jury as any other fact in issue; and the jury must determine from the hostile demonstrations whether there was such danger of this party's executing his felonious design as to justify the party killing in doing so."

1875, Roberts, C. J., in Horbach v. State, 43 Tex. 250: "A man's character for violence, dependent upon his irascible temper, overbearing disposition, and reckless disregard of human life, is as much a part of himself as his judgment and discretion, his sight or hearing, his strength, his size, his activity, or his age, — any one of which may become a material fact to give a correct understanding of his conduct and the intention with which an act is done by him, and are therefore part of the res gestæ when pertinent to the act sought to be explained. Their office in evidence is adjective, or auxiliary to a substantive fact to which they are pertinent and without which they are irrelevant and immaterial. They are helps to the understanding in construing human conduct. The mind cannot reject or disregard them. They, and all like helps, ever have been and ever will be elements in the formation of belief as to what a man designs by an act to which they are pertinent. . . . If then the character of the assailant in any case has helped to form a reasonable belief in the mind of the assailed that his life was then in danger, when the acts alone would fail to do it, the jury should in some way be informed of the character of the assailant, as well as of his acts, to enable them to understand that the belief was a reasonable one. . . . It is scarcely necessary to go into an explanation of the condition of things in this country which imperatively requires the admission of the proof of the character of the deceased for violence. . . . It is well and generally known that there are some violent and dangerous men in this country, who are in the habit of carrying pistols, belted behind them and in their pockets, who never think of fighting in any other way than with deadly weapons, who are expert in using them, and who, especially when intoxicated, bring on and press to the extreme of outrage their deadly encounters for causes and provocations that would be regarded as utterly trivial by peaceable men; and that if one of such persons, while engaged in an angry altercation, should suddenly step back and rapidly throw his hand behind him, it might readily be understood by those who saw it to mean that he was in the act of drawing a pistol to use it. The same act by one of the great mass of our peaceable citizens who are not in the habit of carrying weapons would suggest no such thought, and in such case the pistol would have to be drawn and exhibited before any such thing would be conceived, unless there had been some very extraordinary provocation. This state of things here is a substantial reality, well known and ostensible to the perception of every one at all familiar with the subject; and men act upon it, and are compelled to act upon it, in defending themselves from deadly assaults. . . . It may be deduced from these authorities that the general character of the deceased for violence may be proved when it would serve to explain the actions of the deceased at the time of the killing; that the actions which it would serve to explain must first be proved before it would be admissible as evidence; that if no such acts were proved as it would serve to explain, its rejection when offered in evidence would not be error; and that, if rejected when a proper predicate has been established for its admission, it is held to be error. . . . In arraying the facts to establish that he acted in self-defence, if an act of the deceased at the time of the killing is of doubtful import, or is otherwise of a character that it would be explained and construed more favorably for the accused by adding to it the proof of the character of the deceased for violence, then such proof is admissible."

(a) Overt act. The abstract validity of this reasoning cannot be doubted. That the deceased's reputation should in such situations be accepted as affecting the defendant's apprehensions is clear. But the unconditional and indiscriminate admission of such evidence is dangerous The danger is, not only that the deceased's reputed character, once in evidence, will be appealed to as justifying the deliberate destruction by private hands of a detested malefactor, but also that, though no plausible situation of self-defence is otherwise evidenced, this evidence will be improperly used to confuse the issue as if there were real doubt about the necessity for defence and the apprehension of danger. These considerations, and the rarity in some regions of the possibility of bona fide apprehensions based on such sources,[1] have induced a few Courts to decline to recognize this evidence at all. The others have usually laid down certain conditions intended to prevent its abuse. A common limitation is the broad one that other evidence shall be offered which serves to bring self-defence fairly into issue, — some appreciable evidence of the deceased's prior aggression, or of ground to believe in impending aggression, — for it is not always clear which is judicially meant. By some Courts it is said (more strictly) that the issue of self-defence (i. e., presumably, the impending of an attack) must be in doubt. Another and more specific form of limitation is the doctrine of "overt act," peculiarly developed in Louisiana and Florida. The notion here is that the deceased's reputation can have a bona fide bearing on the defendant's apprehension only where there occurs, at the time of the affray, some conduct of the deceased which might be otherwise colorless, but when interpreted by his known character becomes apparently an act of aggression. Thus there must be some "overt act," i. e. of possible aggression, before the reputation-evidence can be received. This is a wise and fair limitation, provided it be not further refined by details which degenerate into quibbles, — a proviso not always observed. In few Courts has any one form of these limitations been clearly laid down or consistently followed.

Two peculiar questions may arise under the overt-act form of the doctrine. (1) Shall the question whether an overt act is sufficiently evidenced to lay the foundation for the reputation-evidence be left entirely in the hands of the trial Court? Unless our law is to become a mass of quibbles which no practitioner can master and every murderer will welcome, the answer must be in the affirmative.[2] (2) May the defendant's mere unsworn assertion of an overt act (where permitted instead of his sworn testimony) be considered as in itself some evidence of an overt act? It certainly should be;[3] but whether it is sufficient evidence for the trial Court should never be considered on appeal.

[1] Differences of social conditions may obviously in some communities or parts of the community make the bearing of such sources of apprehension much more real and frequent than in others.

(b) Kind of character. The kind of reputed character of the deceased which should affect the defendant's apprehension may be any trait that would naturally lead the former to make unprovoked aggression. Various phrasings are employed by the Courts to define this trait.[4]

(c) The reputation of a third person is relevant only so far as the third person at the time of the affray is associated with the deceased in the apparent aggression.[5]

(d) It is assumed throughout that the reputation offered was known to the defendant. Reputation in the neighborhood where both live is sufficient with nothing more. Reputation in any other place must be specifically shown to have been probably brought to the defendant's attention; his sojourn in the place where it prevailed would suffice.[6]

(e) In civil cases of assault or battery, or, for example, in a prosecution for rape, a similar situation — i. e. apprehension as affected by the opponent's reputation — may be presented, and similar evidence should be received.[7]

[2] 1885, Poché, J., in State v. Ford, 37 La. An. 443, 461: "Does the rule governing the admission of such testimony content itself with testimony of an overt act by the deceased, or does it require proof of such an act? . . . In passing on such a question, the trial Judge must of necessity be clothed with the authority to decide whether a proper foundation has been laid for the proffered evidence and that authority necessarily includes the discretion to ignore and not consider testimony which his reason refuses to believe." For the rulings on this point, see the precedents at the end of this section.

[3] Contra: 1886, Bond v. State, 21 Fla. 738, 759; 1894, Steele v. State, 33 id. 348, 351, 14 So. 841. But since the accused has been enabled, in this jurisdiction, not merely to make a statement, but to become a witness (c. 4400, St. 1895, amending R. S. § 2908), it is properly held that his testimony alone may supply the overt act required: 1896, Hart v. State, 38 id. 39, 20 So. 805; Allen v. State, 38 id. 44, 20 So. 807.

[4] 1883, Williams v. State, 74 Ala. 18 (as a "turbulent, violent, and bloodthirsty man"); 1893, Garner v. State, 31 Fla. 170, 175, 12 So. 638 (must be a "violent and dangerous" character); 1891, Bowlus v. State, 130 Ind. 227, 28 N. E. 1115 ("strength, ferocity, vindictiveness, quarrelsomeness, etc."); 1881, Spivey v. State, 58 Miss. 858, 864 (admitting character as "violent, dangerous, or regardless of human life," but not as "overbearing, turbulent, or impetuous," because "the inquiry should be limited to such features of character as have a tendency to throw light on the apprehension of the accused because of that character"). Other phrasings will be found infra in the citations at the end of this section.

[5] 1895, Goldsmith v. State, 105 Ala. 8, 16 So. 933 (excluded; yet here the third person was taking part in the affray); 1898, Anderson v. U. S., 170 U. S. 481, 18 Sup. 689 (murder of captain and mate; trial for the latter only; captain's ferocious character excluded; unsound, on the facts).

[6] The cases are cited in note 13, infra, at the end of this section. But the defendant's knowledge may be obtained otherwise than by reputation: 1901, State v. Burton, 63 Kan. 602, 66 Pac. 633 (defendant's personal knowledge or belief, however obtained, is admissible). But a witness' personal knowledge or opinion of the deceased's character, even if it were admissible under the Opinion rule (post, § 1983) would not serve here, because it would not show the defendant's knowledge: 1899, State v. Shalwell, 22 Mont. 559, 57 Pac. 281.

[7] 1897, Golder v. Lund, 50 Nebr. 789, 70 N. W. 397 (civil action, admitted); 1871, Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 1, 5 (where the prosecutrix gave as a reason for not complaining of an uncle's rape that he had been violent to his wife, etc.). For further illustrations of this class of evidence, see post, § 140.

(f) The strength of the deceased may conceivably affect the defendant's apprehensions,[8] and also his potency for harm as indicated by his habitual carrying of weapons or his possession of them at the time of the affray;[9] these facts, if known to the defendant, should be considered as properly affecting his apprehensions.

(g) The prosecution may rebut the evidence of bad reputation, just as it may attempt to disprove any other allegation of the defence.[10] Most Courts refuse to allow the deceased's good reputation to be shown except in rebuttal of an alleged bad reputation.[11] Yet it is difficult to see, if a genuine issue of self-defence is raised, why the prosecution should not be allowed to show, independently of such rebuttal, the deceased's good reputation as throwing light on the defendant's just apprehensions.[12]

(h) The actual character of the deceased, though unknown to the defendant, is admissible in most jurisdictions, from another point of view and therefore under different conditions, as evidencing the deceased's probable aggression (ante, § 63). A comparison of the rulings in each jurisdiction and of the requirements made for the two kinds of evidence is profitable.

(i) The tests applied in admitting communicated threats (post, § 247) are often the same as for the present subject, for the principle is in effect identical.

(j) The principle of admitting communicated single acts of violence by the deceased (post, § 248) is also the same, though the same tests are not applicable in every respect.

The state of the law in the various jurisdictions, on the chief aspects of the rule (a and b above), varies only in respect to the particularity of definition attempted for the conditions of admissibility. In three jurisdictions, however (Delaware, Maine, and Massachusetts), the whole doctrine seems to be rejected.[13]

[8] 1871, State v. Collins, 32 Ia. 38; 1896, Smith v. U. S., 161 U. S. 85, 16 Sup. 483; 1880, State v. Nett, 50 Wis. 524, 527, 7 N. W. 344.

[9] 1902, Cawley v. State, 133 Ala. 128, 32 So. 227; 1897, People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 503, 48 Pac. 495 (allowing the prosecution to deny this); 1902, People v. Adams, 137 id. 580, 70 Pac. 662; 1897, Daniel v. State, 103 Ga. 202, 29 S. E. 767; 1897, McDonall v. People, 168 Ill. 93, 48 N. E. 86; 1858, Payne v. Com., 1 Metc. Ky. 370, 379; 1888, King v. State, 65 Miss. 576, 582, 5 So. 97; 1900, State v. Yokum, 14 S. D. 84, 84 N. W. 389 (deceased's reputed habit of carrying firearms, admissible; reversing the ruling in s. c. 11 id. 544, 79 N. W. 835; Corson, J., diss.); 1902, State v. Ellis, 30 Wash. 369, 70 Pac. 963; 1903, State v. Crawford, — id. —, 71 Pac. 1030. Compare the cases cited ante, § 111.

[10] 1885, Davis v. People, 114 Ill. 86, 95, 29 N. E. 192; 1858, Dukes v. State, 11 Ind. 557, 565; 1892, Fields v. State, 134 id. 46, 56, 32 N. E. 780; 1876, Thomas v. People, 67 N. Y. 218, 224.

[11] 1870, People v. Anderson, 39 Cal. 704; 1891, People v. Powell, 87 id. 348, 362, 25 Pac. 481; 1871, Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 88, 129; 1874, State v. Potter, 13 Kan. 414, 423; 1895, State v. Vaughan, 22 Nev. 285, 39 Pac. 733; 1872, Dock v. Com., 21 Gratt. 909, 912.

[12] Accord: 1842, Carroll v. State, 3 Humph. 315, 317.

[13] Ala.: 1833, Quesenberry v. State, 3 Stew. & P. 308, 315 ("if the circumstances were such as to leave any doubt" as to the necessity of self-defence," admissible); 1853, Pritchett v. State, 22 Ala. 39 (admitted in cases of self-defence, because it "might very reasonably justify a resort to more prompt measures of self-preservation"; but the deceased "forfeits no right to his life," until "by an actual attempt to execute his threats, or by some act or demonstration at the time of killing, taken in connection with such character or threats, he induces a reasonable belief," etc.; this is the foundation of the "overt-act" doctrine, advanced later); 1856, Franklin v. State, 29 id. 10, 14 (character for turbulence, violence, revengefulness, bloodshed, and the like, admissible where the deceased's conduct in the light of the character would excite apprehen-

§ 247. (1) Defendant charged with Murder; (b) Threats by the Deceased. On the same principle as that of the preceding section, threats of violence

sion; not limited to doubtful cases); 1875, Eiland v. State, 52 id. 333 (same; "it should never be received when at the time of the killing there is no act or word of the deceased which can be illustrated or explained by it, or when there is not evidence conducing to show the killing was in self-defence"); 1880, Roberts v. State, 68 id. 165 (same; adopting the same phrasing as in the case of threats; see post, § 247); 1882, De Arman v. State, 71 id. 360 (bad character for peacefulness, admitted; not necessary to use any special form of words, such as "bloodthirsty," "quarrelsome," etc.); 1882, Storey v. State, ib. 329, 841 (admissible "in all cases where an issue of self-defence properly arises"); 1883, Williams v. State, 74 id. 18, 20 (admitted, citing the last three cases); 1889, Smith v. State, 88 id. 77, 7 So. 52 (principle affirmed); 1891, Amos v. State, 96 id. 120, 124, 11 So. 424 (not admitted where there were no facts that could excite a belief of peril); 1893, Karr v. State, 100 id. 4, 14 So. 851 (no conditions specified); 1898, Naugher v. State, 116 id. 463, 23 So. 26; 1898, Rufus v. State, 117 id. 131, 23 So. 144 (excluded, the defendant being "clearly at fault"); 1908, Morrell v. State, — Id. —, 84 So. 208 (excluded, there being no evidence of an overt act); Ark.: 1874, Palmore v. State, 29 Ark. 248, 261, 263 (admitted); Cal.: 1858, People v. Murray, 10 Cal. 309 (admissible "when the circumstances of the contest are equivocal" as to self-defence); 1861, People v. Lombard, 17 id. 816, 820 (admissible "where the immediate circumstances of the killing render it doubtful whether the act was justifiable or not"); 1871, People v. Edwards, 41 id. 640, 643 (like People v. Murray); 1896, People v. Howard, 112 id. 135, 44 Pac. 464 (admissible "in rare cases"); 1899, People v. Griner, 124 id. 19, 56 Pac. 625 (distinction between "character" and "general reputation," not decided); Colo.: 1878, Davidson v. People, 4 Colo. 145, 150 (admitted, if an attack by the deceased is shown); Del.: 1845, State v. Thawley, 4 Harringt. 562 (excluded, on the theory that it is no excuse; Harrington, J., dubit.); Fla.: 1886, Bond v. State, 21 Fla. 738, 756 (excluded, because there was no evidence of hostile conduct at the time); 1891, Garner v. State, 28 id. 113, 136, 9 So. 835 (admissible when there was "some demonstration which," though otherwise innocent, "when received or considered in connection with or illustrated by such character, may arouse a reasonable belief of imminent peril" of death or great bodily harm; the Court to determine whether evidence of such exists, solving doubts in favor of the defendant); 1893, s. c. 31 id. 170, 174, 12 So. 638 (same); 1893, Roten v. State, 31 id. 514, 523, 12 So. 910 (admissible only after evidence of a hostile demonstration or overt act); 1894, Steele v. State, 33 id. 348, 350, 14 So. 841 (same as Garner v. State, semble); 1896, Hart v. State, 38 id. 39, 20 So. 805; Allen v. State, ib. 44, 20 So. 807; Ga.: 1848, Monroe v. State, 5 Ga. 85, 137 (admitted); 1855, Keener v. State, 18 id. 194, 220 (same); 1855, Bowle v. State, 19 id. 7 (same); 1892, Croom v. State, 90 id. 430, 17 S. E. 1003 (character for violence towards negroes, excluded); 1903, Dannenberg v. Berkner, — id. —, 45 S. E. 682 (rule applied); Ida.: 1868, People v. Stock, 1 Ida. 218 (admissible, if the circumstances "raise a doubt" in regard to self-defence); Ill.: 1885, Davis v. State, 114 Ill. 86, 95, 29 N. E. 192, semble (that he was "a good man in a fight," admissible); 1902, Carle v. People, 200 id. 494, 66 N. E. 82 (admissible, after other evidence tending to show the deceased's aggression); Ind.: 1858, Dukes v. State, 11 Ind. 556, 565 (admitted where a question of self-defence arose); 1864, Fahnestock v. State, 23 Id. 231, 237, semble (general character for violence when intoxicated, admissible); 1884, Boyle v. State, 97 id. 322, 324 (character admitted); 1891, Bowlus v. State, 130 id. 227, 28 N. E. 1115 (same); Kan.: 1864, Wise v. State, 2 Kan. 419 (admissible, semble, where from other circumstances it appears that "the defendant was justified in believing himself in danger"); 1874, State v. Potter, 13 id. 414, 423 (admissible, semble, where there is a doubt as to self-defence and the testimony "may serve to explain the conduct of the deceased"); 1878, State v. Riddle, 20 id. 711, 714 (excluded on no clear rule; here there was an assault by the deceased, but not such as to excite fear of serious harm); 1879, State v. Scott, 24 id. 68, 70 (admitted; no rule stated); 1902, State v. Spangler, 64 id. 661, 68 Pac. 39 (admissible); Ky.: 1858, Payne v. Com., 1 Metc. 370, 379 (character, and the habit of carrying concealed deadly weapons, admitted; no general test laid down); 1871, Bohannon v. Com., 8 Bush 481, 488 (semble, admissible); 1893, Riley v. Com., 94 Ky. 266, 270, 22 S. W. 222 (admitted); La.: 1850, State v. Chandler, 5 La. Au. 489 (excluded; no reason given); 1854, State v. D'Augelo, 9 id. 48 (same; Slidell, C. J., intimating possible exceptions); 1855, State v. Brien, 10 id. 453 (same as Chandler's case); 1856, State v. Jackson, 12 id. 679 (same); 1878, State v. Robertson, 30 id. 340 (admitted where aggression by the deceased is shown, and semble previous threats; the above cases ignored); State v. Burns, ib. 679 (the preceding case ignored, the early cases cited; the evidence rejected, as under a general rule, intimating that on a proper showing of self-defence, it might be admissible); 1880, State v. Vance, 32 id. 1177 (excluded, because no action evincing a hostile purpose at the time was offered, a prior conditional threat not sufficing); State v. Ricks, ib. 1098 (admissible, when "threats and hostile acts or demonstrations are proven"); 1881, State v. Jackson, 33 id. 1087 (admissible, if there was an "assault or hostile demonstration" at the time, prior threats not being a sufficient foundation); 1882, State v. McNeely, 34 id. 1022 (admissible in connection with previous threats alone); 1883, State v. Garic, 35 id. 970, 971 (a charge that it could be considered, "in con-against the defendant, uttered by the deceased, and brought to the knowledge of the defendant, are relevant to show his belief of impending danger from the deceased.

nection with proof of an overt act," apparently approved); State v. Claude, ib. 71, 74 (admissible when "any assault or hostile demonstration" or other circumstances showing belief of danger is proved); 1884, State v. Watson, 36 id. 148 (admitted, if there were "threats made and communicated, followed by some act on the part of the deceased to induce the belief or apprehension that the threats were about" to be executed); State v. Birdwell, ib. 859, 861 (admissible only in case of an "overt act, assault, or hostile demonstration" at the time, and not merely of the use of previous threats); 1885, State v. Saunders, 37 id. 339 (admissible in case of a "hostile demonstration, overt act, or threats"; citing only State v. Garic); State v. Ford, ib. 443, 460 (same test; the trial Court is to determine whether the preliminary overt-act evidence suffices); State v. Janvier, ib. 644 (same); State v. Kervin, ib. 782 (same); State v. Jackson, ib. 806 (same); 1888, State v. Williams, 40 id. 168, 3 So. 629 semble (same); 1890, State v. Cosgrove, 42 id. 753, 7 So. 714 (same); 1891, State v. Paterno, 43 id. 514, 9 So. 442 (rejecting the character because of the "absence of danger and necessity for self-defence"; none of the above cases cited); 1892, State v. Christian, 44 id. 950, 954, 11 So. 589 (same as State v. Ford, including the rule of trial Court's discretion); 1893, State v. Stewart, 45 id. 1164, 1166, 14 So. 143 (same); State v. Nash, ib. 1137, 1141, 13 So. 732, 734 (rejecting the character because not communicated and because no overt act was shown); State v. Carter, ib. 1326, 14 So. 30 (dangerous character not received in mitigation, unless "hostile demonstration" is shown); 1894, State v. Barker, 46 id. 798, 802, 15 So. 98 (trial Court's findings control, unless affirmatively shown erroneous); State v. Williams, ib. 703, 15 So. 82 (same as State v. Ford; the "overt act" must be "some demonstration . . . of such character as to impress upon him that he was in imminent danger of his life or some great bodily harm"); State v. Beck, ib. 1419, 16 So. 368 (same as State v. Ford); State v. Green, ib. 1522, 16 So. 867 (same); 1895, State v. Vallery, 47 id. 182, 16 So. 745 (admissible, where there is "a hostile demonstration"; the trial Court's discretion controls); 1896, State v. Compagnet, 48 id. 1470, 21 So. 46 (same); 1901, State v. Napoleon, 104 La. 164, 28 So. 972 (admitted; no cases cited). From this maze of twisting precedents, which none but a Louisiana practitioner should be condemned to unravel, four conclusions may be ventured: (1) The law of to-day goes back only to Birdwell's and Ford's cases, in which the phrasing of the limitation and the doctrine of the trial Court's discretion are established; (2) Some later cases still (erroneously, it would seem) treat threats at the time of the affray as equivalent to an overt act of aggression; (3) In the Paterno case, the doctrine is laid down that the deceased's character and threats are also evidential as explaining away the inference of the defendant's malice from his prior preparations; this doctrine is apparently unsound as far as concerns the character-evidence; see post, § 247; (4) The Court of Louisiana had still in the above period to learn two truths essential to the successful administration of justice; first, that the fundamental duty of a Supreme Court is to be familiar with its own decisions, and either to repeat them or to overrule them, but not to ignore them; secondly, that a due self-respect and a regard for the course of justice requires that a stern rebuke be given to the continued agitation by unscrupulous practitioners of questions of law once settled, and that no attention, other than to give such a rebuke, be paid in an opinion to exceptions taken purely for the purpose of gambling on the Court's inadvertence; since 1896, some appreciation of this duty is perceivable in the diminished number of rulings. Me.: 1837, State v. Field, 14 Me. 244 (the deceased's character as "quarrelsome, savage, and dangerous," excluded, as not amounting to an excuse; the present point of view was emphasized by the counsel, but was apparently not understood by the Court); Mass.: 1845, Com. v. York, 7 Law Reporter, Mass. 497, 507 (character rejected, as without precedent and leading to multifariousness); 1854, Com. v. Hilliard, 2 Gray 294 ("general character and habits" as a "quarrelsome, fighting, vindictive, and brutal man of great strength," not admitted to show "reasonable cause to fear great bodily harm"; because "such evidence is too remote and uncertain"); 1858, Com. v. Mead, 12 id. 167 (the defendant shot the deceased while the latter was choking him, as alleged; the fact was excluded, following the preceding case, of the deceased's remarkable strength and of his skill and practice as a garroter by seizing another by the throat in a peculiar and dangerous mode); Mich.: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 15, (excluded, because insanity, not self-defence, was the defence); 1878, Brownell v. People, 38 id. 782, 735 (that the deceased was "a powerful men of violent temper," admitted); Minn.: 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 445 (admissible where there is doubt as to the premeditation of the defendant; opinion not clear); Miss.: 1849, Jolly v. State, 13 Sm. & M. 223, 225, semble (admissible, if the deceased appears as the aggressor); 1856, Cotton v. State, 31 Miss. 504 (character admissible); 1859, Wesley v. State, 37 id. 327, 346 (admissible, where the defendant had ground to apprehend an attack); 1872, Chase v. State, 46 id. 683, 703 (excluded, although the issue of self-defence was raised and strong evidence of it offered; the opinion is confused, and, though citing authorities profusely, does not show understanding of the principle); 1872, Harris v. State, 46 id. 319, 325 (approving the Chase case); 1881, Spivey v. State, 58 id. [illegible] 864 (admissible, where there is apparent danger from some overt act

(a) As in the preceding topic, considerations of policy call for some restrictions calculated to secure the bona fide use of such evidence. These may indicating a present purpose to do the accused some greatly bodily harm"); 1885, Moriarty v. State, 62 Id. 654, 661 (expressing the rule substantially as in the preceding case); 1888, King v. State, 65 id. 576, 582, 5 So. 97 (character admissible, approving the preceding case); 1898, Smith v. State, 75 id. 542, 23 So. 260 (the defendant's testimony alone is enough to "lay the predicate" of "some testimony" of an overt act); Mo.: 1853, State v. Jackson, 17 Mo. 544, 548 (excluded here, because no issue of self-defence was made); 1859, State v. Hicks, 27 Id. 588, 590 (admitted, the issue being self-defence and the other evidence creating a doubt); 1872, State v. Keene, 50 Id. 357, 360 (same); 1874, State v. Bryant, 55 id. 75, 78 (holding that character as a "desperate and dangerous" man, and not merely as to "peace and quiet," should have been admitted); 1875, State v. Harris, 59 id. 550, 552, 556 (admitted, but with the intimation that the deceased must appear to have made some demonstration at the time); 1876, State v. Elkins, 63 Id. 165 (admissible in doubtful cases of self-defence); 1893, State v. Pettit, 119 id. 410, 414, 24 S. W. 1014 (admitted); 1893, State v. Kennade, 121 Id. 405, 415, 26 S. W. 347 (excluded, because not communicated); Mont.: 1898, State v. Shafer, 22 Mont. 17, 55 Pac. 526 (admitted; there being evidence of deceased's aggression); 1899, State v. Shadwell, 22 Id. 573, 57 Pac. 281 (similar); Nev.: 1880, State v. Pearce, 15 Nev. 188, 191 (admissible, where "the circumstances are such as to raise a doubt" as to self-defence); N. Y.: 1866, People v. Lamb, 41 N. Y. 360, 366 (admissible only "where the defendant had reason to be in fear" of life or great bodily harm); 1881, Abbott v. People, 86 Id. 461, 469 (admissible only "where it is shown that an assault has been committed or threatened at the time when the homicide is committed or immediately preceding it, or is intimately connected with it so as to justify" action in self-defence); N. C.: 1877, State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 477 (character as a violent and dangerous man; uncommunicated character also admissible, under § 63, ante; the limitation is made that there must be evidence tending to show self-defence, and that the evidence be wholly circumstantial; for the first time the necessity of communication is recognized in this State; the local precedents cited do not deal at all with the present question); 1879, State v. Chavis, 80 id. 357 (State v. Turpin recognized); 1893, State v. Rollins, 113 id. 722, 732, 18 S. E. 394 (excluded, where not known to defendant); 1897, State v. Byrd, 121 id. 684, 28 S. E. 353 (admissible, but only where there is "other evidence tending to show self-defence" or where "the evidence of the killing is entirely circumstantial"; but the latter seems to be said of uncommunicated character only); Oh.: 1860, Gandolfo v. State, 11 Oh. St. 114, 118, semble (admissible); 1875, Marts v. State, 26 id. 162, 168 (same); Or.: 1894, State v. Morey, 25 Or. 241, 255, 35 Pac. 655, 36 Pac. 573 (admissible, when there is evidence "tending to show that the defendant was assailed by the deceased and in apparent danger"); Pa.: 1794, Pennsylvania v. Robertson, Add. 246 (murder of an Indian in self-defence; the reputation of the time that the Indians were in an angry mood, and the bad repute of the deceased, considered by the Court as affecting the defendant's state of mind); 1867, Com. v. Lenox, 3 Brewst. 249, 251 (reputed character admissible "if the case showed" that the defendant was "under reasonable fear of his life from the deceased at the time"); 1868, Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 388 (general deportment as to violence, rejected, there being no evidence of aggression calling for self-defence); 1893, Com. v. Straesser, 153 Id. 451, 456, 26 Atl. 17 (admissible, if the issue is self-defence and if knowledge is shown); S. C.: 1860, State v. Smith, 12 Rich. 430, 443 ("a character and habits of violence, treachery, etc., such as might beget reasonable apprehensions of grievous bodily harm"); 1888, State v. Turner, 29 S. C. 34, 41 (admissible; it must not be merely "bad character, as contradistinguished from character for violence, ferocity, vindictiveness, etc., etc."); Tenn.: 1836, Wright v. State, 9 Yerg. 342 (malicious stabbing; self-defence not alleged; the deceased's character as a "turbulent, insolent, saucy fellow" held inadmissible, as not extenuating the offence); 1842, Carroll v. State, 3 Humph. 315, 317 (no general rule); 1859, Harmon v. State, 3 Head 243 (the desperate and dangerous character of the deceased, "in connection with previous threats," held admissible, on self-defence pleaded, as "explanatory of the state of defence in which the defendant placed himself"; the requirement of communication implied only); 1872, Williams v. State, 3 Helsk. 376, 397 (the deceased's violent character, known to the defendant, treated as admissible, the issue being self-defence); 1873, Jackson v. State, 6 Baxt. 452, 458, 466 (semble, same); Tex.: 1854, Henderson v. State, 12 Tex. 525, 530 (not clear); St. 1858, Feb. 12, Pen. Code 1895, art. 713 ("where a defendant accused of murder seeks to justify himself on the ground of threats against his own life, he may be permitted to introduce evidence of the threats made; but the same shall not be regarded as affording a justification for the offence unless it be shown that at the time of the homicide the person killed by some act then done manifested an intention to execute the treat so made. In every instance where proof of threats has been made, it shall be competent to introduce evidence of the general character of the deceased. Such evidence shall extend only to an inquiry as to whether the deceased was a man of violent or dangerous character, or a man of kind and inoffensive disposition, or whether he was such a person as might reasonably be expected to execute a threat made"); 1871, Dorsey v. State, 34 Tex. 651, 658 (applying the preceding); 1875, Horbach v. State, 43 id. 242, 255 (pointing out that the

be, and frequently are, the same as those applied (in the preceding topic) to the use of the deceased's character. But they are less frequently laid down for the present class of evidence, apparently for two reasons, — first, because there is less danger of improperly using the deceased's threats in justification for the killing (less danger, that is, than where he can be shown to be an abandoned ruffian, a curse to the community), and, secondly, because specific threats of violence have a more decided bearing on the probability of aggression than mere dangerousness of character. It is therefore to be noted that the rulings on the two subjects in a given jurisdiction are not necessarily mutually applicable.[1]

(b) Wherever the overt-act limitation is adopted, the rule should prevail (as in the preceding topic) that the trial Court's discretion determines the sufficiency of the evidence of an overt act.[2]

(c) The threats are required to have been communicated to the defendant, i. e. brought to his notice in some way; otherwise they have no bearing for the present purpose.

(d) The use of uncommunicated threats, as showing the probability of the deceased having been the aggressor, involves a different principle (dealt with ante, § 110); but the respective precedents are not always duly discriminated.

The state of the law in the various jurisdictions varies chiefly in the phrasing of the generally accepted conditions of admissibility.[3]

Code section was chiefly intended to settle a controversy as to the admissibility of threats, and is therefore not exclusive of character-evidence relevant under other conditions not therein specified; admitting character-evidence additionally to explain acts of the deceased at the time "of doubtful import," are capable of being "construed more favorably for the accused" by such evidence); 1892, Evers v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 318, 324, 20 S. W. 744 (excluded, where no "act indicating any purpose" to kill or harm defendant was shown); 1893, Skaggs v. State, ib. 563, 21 S. W. 257 (reputation of the deceased acquired after the killing, excluded); U. S.: 1896, Smith v. U. S., 161 U. S. 85, 16 Sup. 483 (Gray, J.: "that the deceased had the general reputation of being a quarrelsome and dangerous person was competent, especially if his character in this respect was known to the defendant"; the "especially" here is an uncertain phrase, indicating an unfamiliarity with the principle); Va.: 1884, Harrison v. Com., 79 Va. 374 (admissible where "a case of self-defence is prima facie made out"; but the deceased's reputation, not the witness' personal opinion, is alone admissible); Vt.: 1876, State v. Lull, 48 Vt. 581 (admitted; here the character as "a violent and desperate man"); Va.: 1872, Dock v. Com., 21 Gratt. 909, 911 (admissible; giving no general rule); 1900, Jackson v. Com., 98 Va. 845, 36 S. E. 487 (excluded, because the evidence did not tend to show self-defence); Wash.: 1896, State v. McGonigle, 14 Wash. 594, 45 Pac. 20 (excluded, because there was no contention of self-defence), W. Va.: 1889, State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 424, 10 S. E. 792 (excluding hearsay — spoken of as reputation — to the influence of one of the two persons killed over the other, as affecting the defendant's reasonable fear; here it was perfectly immaterial whether the influence existed, and therefore whether reputation could be used to prove its existence); 1901, State v. Morrison, 49 id. 210, 38 S. E. 481 (theory of admission pointed out); 1901, State v. Madison, ib. 96, 38 S. E. 492 (admissible only where there is some evidence of self-defence); Wis.: 1880, State v. Nett, 50 Wis. 524, 527 (admitting such evidence where the circumstances raise a question as to self-defence; and distinguishing on that ground the earlier ruling of Brucker v. State, 19 id. 539; 1865).

[1] The rulings are collected infra, note 3.

[2] 1897, State v. Pruett, 49 La. An. 283, 21 So. 842 (discretion of the trial Court as to overt acts conceded; but irrespective of this the defendant is entitled, under Act 99 of 1896, to have the testimony as to the alleged overt act taken down in writing for review); 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 Wash. 544, 50 Pac. 512 (discretion conceded).

[3] Eng.: 1713, Nobie's Trial, 15 How. St. Tr. 740 (the deceased broke into the defendant's room with a constable to arrest him, and the defendant stabbed him in alleged self-defence; evidence was admitted that the deceased had once before "drawn his sword upon him, and once brought a pistol to his chambers on purpose to shoot him"); Ala.: 1851, Powell v. State, 19 Ala. 577, 581 (admitted); 1853, Pritchett v.

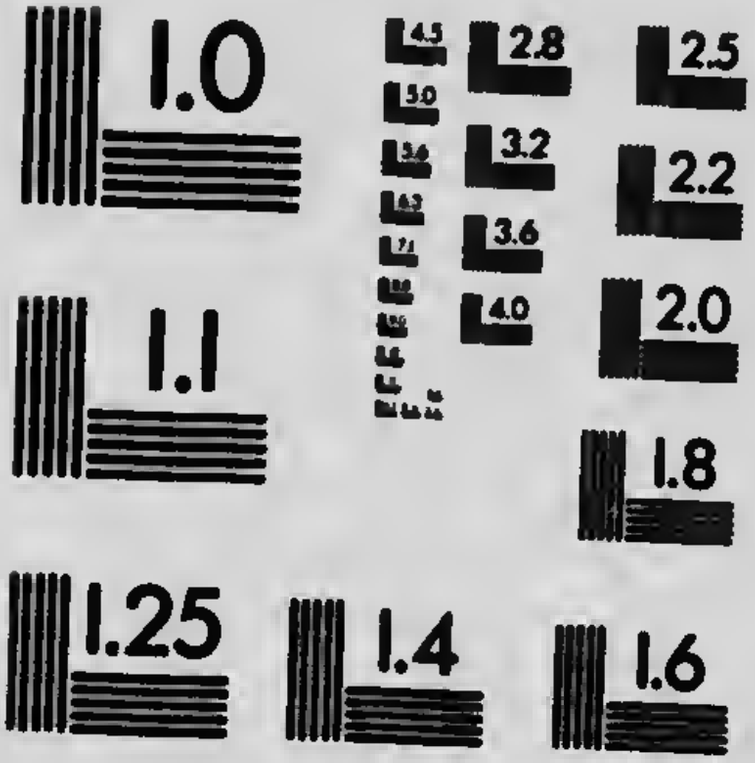
§ 248. (1) Defendant charged with Murder: (c) Violent Acts of the Deceased. If it could be shown that the deceased had just before been running

State, 22 id. 42 (where the circumstances indicate self-defence; for the beginning of the "overt act" doctrine, as here applied, see § 246, ante); 1853, Carroll v. State, 23 id. 28, 36; 1859, Dupree v. State, 33 id. 380, 386; 1872, Hughey v. State, 47 id. 97, 103 (as "threats unaccompanied by acts" of aggression could not possibly excuse, mere threats alone are not receivable); 1875, Powell v. State, 52 id. 1 (communicated threats received); 1877, Payne v. State, 60 id. 80, 86 (no evidence of aggression by the deceased; threats made two weeks before, excluded; Pritchett's Case misunderstood); 1878, Myers v. State, 62 id. 603 (the jury should not consider the deceased's threats, unless there was "a present, impending purpose on his part, real or apparent, to put such threats into immediate execution"; i. e. the threats are admitted, and the absence of an "overt act" merely weighs with the jury, — a true construction of Pritchett's Case); 1878, Polk v. State, ib. 239 (threats of J. admitted, as an excuse upon a charge of carrying concealed weapons); 1880, Roberts v. State, 68 id. 164 (admissible only when "the deceased had sought a conflict with the accused, or was making some demonstration, or overt act of attack"; "in other words, the circumstances must properly raise a case of self-defence"; hence, such threats "cannot be excluded if there is the slightest evidence tending to prove a hostile demonstration"); 1881, Green v. State, 69 id. 8, 10 (threats a week before, excluded; but, as there was evidence of aggression, the ruling seems erroneous); 1898, Jones v. State, 116 id. 468, 23 So. 135 (excluded where there was "no act or hostile demonstration," etc.); 1901, Harkness v. State, 129 id. 71, 30 So. 73 (excluding threatening conduct, as distinguished from threatening words, on an improper application of the principle of § 951, post; Sharpe and Dowdell, JJ., properly dissenting); 1901, Willingham v. State, 130 id. 35, 30 So. 429 (Harkness v. State followed, by a majority); 1902, Andrews v. State, 134 id. 47, 32 So. 665 (overt-act rule, applied); 1902, Ragsdale v. State, ib. 24, 32 So. 674 (same); 1903, Johnson v. State, — id. — , 34 So. 209 (excluded, there being no evidence of aggression); Ark.: 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 568, 584 (admitted); 1859, Coker v. State, 20 id. 53, 55; 1860, Pitman v. State, 22 id. 354, 356; 1874, McPherson v. State, 29 id. 225, 228 (the limitation suggested that threats are not admissible if there is no evidence tending to show apprehension of injury; no authorities cited); Palmore v. State, ib. 248, 261, 263 (admitted not only to throw light on the defendant's state of mind at the time of the affray, but also to negative the apparent malice of having armed himself beforehand); 1879, Harris v. State, 34 id. 469, 472 (admissible); Cal.: 1860, People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 476, 480 (admissible); 1861, People v. Lombard, 17 id. 316, 320 (admissible; but not legally sufficient as a defence unless followed by an overt act); 1869, People v. Scoggins, 37 id. 676, 683 (same); 1879, People v. Taing, 53 id. 602 (excluded here because no preliminary showing of any kind was made); 1880, People v. Travis, 56 id. 251, 253 (threats admissible; no authorities cited or rule laid down); Fla.: 1886, Bond v. State, 21 Fla. 738, 752 (admissible when there are "circumstances which might reasonably cause him to believe that the deceased at the time of the killing had a purpose to carry them out"; though "no exact definition of an overt act can probably be given"); 1889, Smith v. State, 25 id. 517, 521, 6 So. 482 (same); 1891, Garner v. State, 28 id. 113, 133, 9 So. 835 (admissible when there is, "at least apparently, a hostile demonstration, or overt act of attack, tending to show" danger with other phrasings; the Court to determine whether evidence of such exists and to solve doubts in favor of the defendant); 1894, Steele v. State, 33 id. 348, 350, 14 So. 841, semble (same); 1902, Lane v. State, — id. — , 32 So. 896 ("there must be some evidence of the overt act"); Ga.: 1846, Reynolds v. State, 1 Kelly 222, 230, semble (overt act not necessary); 1847, Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. 173, 181 (communicated threats admissible; here excluded only on the absurd ground that the informant, who told the defendant, "Yonder comes J. A., and he will kill you," expressed his "opinion" only; see the Opinion rule, post, § 1938); 1848, Howell v. State, 5 Ga. 48, 54; Monroe v. State, ib. 85, 135 ("naked threats unaccompanied with personal violence," excluded); 1855, Keener v. State, 18 id. 194, 218, 225 (the deceased's demeanor and threats just before the affray, admitted; the limitation of Monroe's case in effect repudiated; no overt act necessary); 1858, Hawkins v. State, 25 id. 209 (same as Hudgins' case); 1859, Llogo v. State, 29 id. 470, 483 (threats uncommunicated, rejected); 1881, Coxwell v. State, 66 id. 309 (previous communicated threats admitted); Ind.: 1863, DeForest v. State, 21 Ind. 23, 26 (admitted); 1883, Wood v. State, 92 id. 269, 273 (same); 1900, Enlow v. State, 154 id. 664, 57 N. E. 539 (same); Ia.: 1871, State v. Collins, 32 Ia. 36; 1875, State v. Woodson, 41 id. 425, 428; 1876, State v. Maloy, 44 id. 104, 114; 1877, State v. Elliott, 45 id. 490 (admitted in all of these cases); Kan.: 1879, State v. Brown, 22 Kan. 222, 230 (assumed as admissible); 1880, State v. Scott, 24 id. 68, 70 (admitted; no rule stated); 1901, State v. Burton, 63 id. 602, 66 Pac. 633 (admitted); Ky.: 1855, Cornelius v. Com., 15 B. Monr. 539, 546 (admissible); 1869, Young v. Com., 6 Bush 318, semble (same); 1865, Philips v. Com., 2 Duv. 328, 329 (same); 1870, Carico v. Com., 7 Bush 124, 129 (same); 1871, Bohannon v. Com., 8 id. 481, 488, semble (same); 1882, Lightfoot v. Com., 80 Ky. 521, semble (same); 1896, Com. v. Hoskins, — id. — , 35 S. W. 284 (admissible; but here they were too indefinite); 1896, Grayson v. Com., — id. — , 35 S. W. 1035 (threats of a year before, held not improperly excluded, but not threats of a month before);

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

amuck in the streets, and that the defendant was informed that the deceased was on his way towards the defendant's locality, it is difficult to believe that 1903, Morrison v. Com., — id. — , 74 S. W. 277 (overt-act rule apparently adopted); La.: 1859, State v. Mullen, 14 La. An. 577, 579, semble (admissible); 1878, State v. Robertson, 30 id. 340 (same); State v. Ryan, ib. 1177, semble (same); 1880, State v. Cooper, 32 id. 1034, semble (same); State v. Vance, ib. 1177, semble (same; but conditional threats excluded); 1881, State v. Jackson, 33 id. 1687, semble (admissible); State v. Fisher, ib. 1344, semble (same); 1884, State v. Birdwell, 36 id. 859, 861 (threats alone, without an "overt act, assault, or hostile demonstration" at the time, excluded); 1885, State v. Ford, 37 id. 443, 460 (same test; the trial Court to determine whether the preliminary overt-act evidence suffices); State v. Labuzan, ib. 489 (same); State v. Janvier, ib. 644 (same); 1886, State v. Spell, 38 id. 20 (same); 1887, State v. Brooks, 39 id. 817, 2 So. 493 (same as State v. Birdwell); 1889, State v. Demareste, 41 id. 617, 6 So. 136 (same as State v. Ford); 1890, State v. Cosgrove, 42 id. 753, 7 So. 714 (same); 1891, State v. Wilson, 43 id. 840, 9 So. 490 (same as State v. Birdwell, but phrasing the preliminary condition as "threat or hostile demonstration"); 1892, State v. Jackson, 44 id. 160, 161, 163, 10 So. 600 (same as State v. Ford; the deceased's ability to carry out the threats, not sufficient to admit them); [illegible]3, State v. Harris, 45 id. 842, 845, 13 So. 299 (same as State v. Ford, emphasizing the trial Court's discretion); 1894, State v. Green, 46 id. 1522, 16 So. 367 (same); 1895, State v. King, 47 id. 28, 16 So. 566 (same); 1895, State v. Vickers, ib. 1574, 18 So. 639 (threats must be communicated); 1896, State v. Compagnet, 48 id. 1470, 21 So. 46 (same as King's case); 1897, State v. Pruett, 49 id. 283, 21 So. 842 (an overt act not required, where the only purpose was to explain away the defendant's expressed intention to kill the deceased, by showing his reasons for so threatening, i. e. to negative malice); 1898, State v. Wiggins, 50 id. 330, 23 So. 334 (admissible if an "overt act or hostile demonstration" is shown; the trial Court's discretion to determine this); 1899, State v. Frierson, 51 id. 706, 25 So. 396 (rule applied; trial judge's certificate not treated as sufficient on the subject of overt act; no authorities cited); 1903, State v. Tasby, 110 id. — , 34 So. 300 (whether the trial judge's report as to the absence of evidence of an overt act is conclusive, not clear); 1903, State v. Forbes, 111 id. — , 35 So. 710 (the Court remarks upon the importance of preserving "the stability of judicial decisions"; the trial judge's finding held conclusive); 1904, State v. Thomas, ib. — , 35 So. 914 (threats, without an overt act, not admissible "as part of the res gestæ and in mitigation"); Md.: 1880, Turpin v. State, 55 Md. 462, 473 (admitted only when there was an overt act at the time and the defendant was in apparent imminent danger); Mich.: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 15 (excluded, because insanity, not self-defence, was the issue); 1878, Brownell v. People, 38 id. 732, 735, 736 (threats and conduct admitted on the issue of self-defence); People v. Lilly, ib. 276 (admitting "language, manner, and acts"); 1902, People v. Tillman, — id. — , 92 N. W. 499 (battery; plaintiff's prior attack upon defendant, admitted); Minn.: 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 449 (threats made ten days beforehand, admissible); Miss.: 1859, Wesley v. State, 37 Miss. 327, 346 (admissible, where the defendant had ground to fear an attack); New comb v. State, ib. 383, 400, semble (if communicated, admissible); 1870, Evans v. State, 44 id. 762, 772 (excluded, because the other evidence showed no possible case for self-defence); 1872, Harris v. State, 46 id. 319, 323 (excluded, for the same reason); 1877, Johnson v. State, 54 id. 430, 435 (reviewing all the cases, and concluding that the issue must be self-defence, and there must be testimony tending to show a demonstration by the deceased); Holly v. State, 55 id. 424, 428 (excluded, because there was no evidence of any "overt act" or "demonstration" which in the light of the threats could reasonably have caused fear of their execution); Kendrick v. State, ib. 436, 449, 450 (apparently applying the same rule); 1885, Moriarty v. State, 62 id. 654, 661 (expressing the rule substantially as in Holly's Case); 1900, Johnson v. State, — id. — , 27 So. 880 (threats held improperly excluded); Oden v. State, — id. — , 27 So. 992 (threats held properly excluded on the facts); Mo.: 1853, State v. Jackson, 17 Mo. 544, 548 (excluded, no issue of self-defence being made, and the threats not being recent); 1856, State v. Hays, 23 id. 287, 310 (same); 1871, State v. Sloan, 47 id. 604 (approving the Hays case, but admitting here threats made continuously to within a recent time, the issue being self-defence); 1872, State v. Keene, 50 id. 357 (similar facts); 1875, State v. Harris, 59 id. 550, 552, 556 (admitted; but with intimations that there must be an attempt to execute); 1876, State v. Elkins, 63 id. 159, 163 (no general rule attempted; intimations that the threats must be fairly recent and that there must be an attempt to execute them at the time); 1877, State v. Alexander, 66 id. 148, 162 (admissible, if there is "evidence tending to show" the deceased the aggressor); 1879, State v. Guy, 69 id. 435 (threat excluded; obscure); 1882, State v. Harris, 76 id. 364 (threat received); 1897, State v. Reed, 137 id. 125, 38 S. W. 574 (admissible only where the issue of defence is raised); 1898, State v. Albright, 144 id. 638, 46 S. W. 620 (admissible only in connection with an overt act); 1900, State v. Hollingsworth, 156 id. 178, 56 S. W. 1087 (conditional threats admitted; compare § 107, ante); 1901, State v. Smith, 164 id. 567, 65 S. W. 270 (admissible); Nebr.: 1895, Basye v. State, 45 Nebr. 261, 63 N. W. 811 (admissible, "where it is claimed that the killing was in self-defence"); Nev.: 1873, State v. Hall, 9 Nev. 58 (admissible only when at the time "something was done which would induce any Court would decline to consider this conduct as bearing on the defendant's apprehensions. The fact that the circumstance creating apprehension is a reasonable man" to fear death or serious bodily harm); N. J.: 1824, State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 237 (admissible); N. M.: 1900, Terr. v. Hall, 10 N. M. 545, 62 Pac. 1083 (admissible "where there is proof of a hostile demonstration by the deceased at the time of the killing"; confused opinion); Terr. v. Pratt, ib. 138, 61 Pac. 104 (an anonymous threatening letter, if rightfully believed by the defendant to come from the deceased, is admissible); N. Y.: 1835, People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 589, 614 (murder at the defendant's door, the deceased standing there, and the defendant having been summoned by knocks on the door just before; the fact was admitted of a riotous breaking of the defendant's house a few nights before, and of threats to return, though the defendant did not know whether the deceased was one of that party; Bronson, J., dissenting, at 601); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174 (threats admissible, "as tending to create a belief in the mind of the accused that his life was in danger, or that he had reason to apprehend some great bodily harm from the acts and motions of the deceased, when in the absence of such threats such acts and motions would cause no such belief"); N. C.: 1844, State v. Scott, 4 Ired. 415 (the threats apparently held admissible, but treated as in this instance not important, since the deceased was not doing anything which could be referred to this design to injure); 1877, State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 476 (threats admissible); 1897, State v. Byrd, 121 id. 684, 28 S. E. 353 (admissible only where there is "other evidence of tending to show self-defence" or where "the evidence of the killing is entirely circumstantial"; but the latter seems to be said of uncommunicated threats only); Or.: 1870, State v. Dodson, 4 Or. 64 (uncommunicated threats, held properly excluded, when offered to show the defendant's apprehension; whether admissible for the purpose of showing deceased's actual intent, under § 110, ante, not decided; communicated threats, admitted); 1897, State v. Porter, 32 id. 135, 49 Pac. 964 (communicated threats of a third person not acting with the deceased, excluded); 1898, State v. Bartmess, 33 id. 110, 54 Pac. 167 (admissible; the conditions obscurely stated); Pa.: 1867, Com. v. Lenox, 3 Brewst. 249, 251 (admissible, "if the case showed" that the defendant was "under reasonable fear of his life from the deceased at the time"); 1881, Nevling v. Com., 98 Pa. 322, 336, semble (admissible, if there is evidence of a necessity for self-defence); S. C.: 1860, State v. Smith, 12 Rich. 430, 443 (admissible); 1890, State v. Bodie, 33 S. C. 130, 11 S. E. 624 (same); State v. Wyse, ib. 591, 12 S. E. 556, semble (same); Tenn.: 1858, Rippy v. State, 2 Head 218 ("previous threats, or even acts of hostility, . . . will not of themselves excuse the slayer; but there must be some words or overt acts at the time clearly indicative of a present purpose to do the injury; past threats and hostile actions or antecedent circumstances can only be looked to in connection with present demonstrations as grounds of apprehension"; this was said in repudiating the argument of the defendant that, after hearing of such recent threats, "he had a right to kill the deceased on sight"); 1872, Williams v. State, 3 Heisk. 376, 395 (the same doctrine laid down, and such threats assumed to be admissible); 1873, Jackson v. State, 6 Baxt. 452, 454 ("the doctrine of the above cases approved, but the distinction pointed out that the evidence of former threats must be received and considered without any attempt on the judge's part to exclude it until some overt act at the time is shown; a decision reserved for such an extreme case as that of the deceased being asleep at the time); Tex.: 1854, Lander v. State, 12 Tex. 462, 484 (a full discussion of the proposition that prior threats are in themselves no legal excuse; but no decision as to admissibility); St. 1858, Feb. 12, Pen. Code 1895, art. 713 (quoted ante, § 246); 1870, Myers v. State, 33 Tex. 525, 542 (the Code is to be interpreted by common-law principles; threats are admissible only when they are distinctly directed against the defendant's life and when it is "unequivocally shown" that the deceased "was doing some act at the time of the killing which manifested an intention to carry the threat into execution"); 1871, Dorsey v. State, 34 id. 651, 657, semble (same); 1875, Horbach v. State, 43 id. 242, 255, 259 (declaring the object of the Code section to have been to settle a controversy as to the admission of threats, and holding that threats are admissible "as independent evidence without first having established a predicate for their admission by the proof of acts done at the time of the killing"; not citing Myers v. State); Irwin v. State, ib. 236, 241 (adopting apparently the same rule; but here holding not improper the rejection of cumulative evidence of threats which if admitted could not have served as a legal defence under the above section, because no act of violence at the time was shown); 1893, Mealer v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 102, 107, 22 S. W. 142 (excluded, where the defendant "was in no possible danger" at the time); U. S.: 1895, Alliaon v. U. S., 160 U. S. 203, 16 Sup. 252 (threats admissible); 1896, Wallace v. U. S., 162 id. 466, 16 Sup. 859 (same); Vt.: 1847, State v. Goodrich, 19 Vt. 117, 121 (previous affrays between the parties, and former attacks by the injured person on the defendant's house, and threats by the former, held not improperly rejected because not so offered as to indicate any influence in causing in the defendant a just fear of harm); Wash.: 1888, White v. Terr., 3 Wash. T. 397, 403, 19 Pac. 37 ("admissible in all cases"); 1896, State v. McGonigle, 14 id. 594, 45 Pac. 20 (excluded because there was no contention of self-defence); 1896, State v. Cushing, ib. 527, 45 Pac. 145; 1897, s. c., 17 id. 544, 50 Pac. 512 ("overt act of attack" and "apparent imminent danger" of life therefrom are necessary; purporting to follow the Louisiana rule); W. Va.: 1875, State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 743, 759 (admissible; rule a single act or series of acts, instead of a general character, does not necessarily destroy its capacity to create apprehension. Nor does its distance in time from the moment of the affray necessarily have that effect. Such particular acts may or may not in a given case be calculated to create apprehension; but there is no reason for a fixed rule of exclusion, invariably forbidding their consideration:

1884, Niblack, J., in Boyle v. State, 97 Ind. 322, 326: "As in personal conflicts every man is permitted within reasonable limits to act upon appearances and to determine for himself when he is in real danger, it would seem to follow, as an inevitable consequence, that whoever relies upon appearances and a reasonable determination upon such appearances, as a defence in a case of homicide, ought to be allowed to prove every fact and circumstance known to him and connected with the deceased which was fairly calculated to create an apprehension for his own safety."

Nevertheless, in the majority of jurisdictions, such evidence was, for a long time, absolutely excluded. In some instances this was probably due to a notion that the deceased's character is sought objectively to be shown by particular acts (on the principle of § 198, ante); but the real purpose is merely to show such conduct as would naturally excite apprehension, whether it objectively indicates a fixed trait of character or not. Certainly all analogies of the law (apart from the common sense of the situation) favor such evidence; for if particular vicious acts of an animal are relevant to show that its owner was warned of its viciousness (post, § 251), and if particular misconduct of an employee is relevant to show that his employer was warned of his incompetency (post, § 250), then particular deeds of unscrupulous violence may well be deemed relevant to show an apprehension of violence from such a person. The true solution is to exercise a discretion, and to admit such facts when common sense tells us that they could legitimately affect a defendant's apprehensions. The state of the law in more recent times has come on the whole to favor the admissibility of such facts.[1] obscure); 1889, State v. Evans, 33 id. 417, 425, 10 S. E. 792 (same).

The following ruling shows a different application of the same principle: 1857, People v. Shea, 8 Cal. 538 (assault with intent to kill; the prosecuting witness' reason for going armed, viz. that he had been told of something the defendant had said, admitted).

The threats of a third person, not joining in the deceased's overt act, should ordinarily be excluded: 1903, State v. Forbes, 111 La. —, 35 So. 710 (leaving it to the trial Court's discretion; Monroe, J., diss.; here the defendant claimed to have been aiming at the third person).

[1] Eng.: 1866, R. v. Hopkins, 10 Cox Cr. 229 (to show the defendant's state of mind when he killed his wife with a knife, evidence was received that the wife had often before attacked him and nearly strangled him, that his neck was sensitive with old abscesses, and that the wife on this occasion rushed at his neck); Ala.: 1884, Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 15 (excluded); 1888, Davenport v. State, 85 id. 336, 5 So. 152 (same); Ark.: 1882, Campbell v. State, 38 Ark. 498, 508 (excluded); Cal.: 1865, People v. Henderson, 28 Cal. 465, 469, semble (recent acts of violence excluded, only because not communicated); 1891, People v. Powell, 87 id. 348, 362, 25 Pac. 481 (quarrels with other persons, inadmissible); Del.: 1874, State v. Woodward, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 455, 458 (shooting a trespasser; previous marandings and personal violence by others in the neighborhood, excluded, there being no act of aggression at the time by the deceased); Fla.: 1891, Garner v. State, 28 Fla. 113, 138, 9 So. 835 (excluded); 1893, S. C., 31 id. 170, 175, 12 So. 638 (same); 1855, Bowie v. State, 19 Ga. 7 (excluding the fact that the deceased had fled from the law in Tennessee, but intimating that if the crime would in its nature "excite the fears of a reasonable man," the fact might be received); 1871, Pound v. State, 43 id. 88, 128 (excluded, unless so connected with

§ 249. (2) Employer of an Incompetent Employee: (a) Reputation of the Employee. Where by the substantive law an employer's liability for injuries done by his employee depends upon his selection of a competent employee, it is well settled in all jurisdictions that the reputation of the employee is receivable to show that the employee's character in respect to competency was known to the employer. It is sometimes pointed out that the reputation in a given instance may obtain in such a narrow or remote circle of persons that it is not likely to have brought notice of the character to the employer (on the logical principle of § 245, par. 3, ante); but this is simply a corollary of the general principle. The principle is unquestioned, and has been applied without express decision in numerous cases.[1] the killing as to "form a link," etc.); 1892, Croom v. State, 90 id. 430, 17 S. E. 1003 (excluded); 1897, Powell v. State, 101 id. 9, 29 S. E. 309 (excluded); Ind.: 1884, Boyle v. State, 97 Ind. 322, 326 (former shooting and stabbing, etc., admitted); 1891, Bowlue v. State, 130 id. 227, 230, 28 N. E. 1115 (admitted); 1900, Enlow v. State, 154 id. 664, 57 N. E. 539 (admitted); Ia.: 1902, State v. Sale, — Ia. —, 92 N. W. 680 (deceased's violence at a remote prior time, excluded); State v. Beird, — id. —, 92 N. W. 694 (instances of specific acts of violence on the same evening, held admissible); Kan.: 1901, State v. Burton, 63 Kan. 602, 66 Pac. 633 (admissible); La.: 1898, State v. Fontenot, 50 La. An. 537, 23 So. 634 (excluded); Mich.: 1893, People v. Harris, 95 Mich. 87, 91, 54 N. W. 648 (admissible); Miss.: 1885, Moriarty v. State, 62 Miss. 654, 661 (various desperate acts, excluded; general reputation alone admissible); 1888, King v. State, 65 id. 576, 582, 5 So. 97 (that the deceased had made deadly assaults on others, to the defendant's knowledge, excluded); Mont.: 1899, State v. Shadwell, 22 Mont. 573, 57 Pac. 281 (deceased's riotous conduct towards others on the same evening in defendant's presence, admitted; but "specific acts of violence" at other times, excluded; opinion not well considered); 1901, State v. Shadwell, 26 id. 52, 66 Pac. 508 (prior ruling approved); 1903, State v. Felker, 27 id. 451, 71 Pac. 668 (prior assaults by the deceased upon the same person, admitted); N. Y.: 1874, Eggler v. People, 56 N. Y. 642 (particular instances of exhibitions of temper, excluded); 1876, Thomas v. People, 67 id. 222 (the making of assaults with a knife upon various other persons, some time before, excluded); Or.: 1900, State v. Mims, 36 Or. 315, 61 Pac. 888 (excluded); Pa.: 1893, Com. v. Straesser, 153 Pa. 451, 456, 26 Atl. 17 (single act of violence, unexplained, inadmissible); S. C.: 1897, State v. Dill, 48 S. C. 249, 26 S. E. 567, semble (excluded; but here merely cumulative); Tex.: 1893, Skaggs v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 563, 21 S. W. 257 (said to be sometimes admissible); 1903, Connell v. State, — id. —, 75 S. W. 512 (patricide; specific acts of violence to other members of the family, excluded); U. S.: 1898, Andersen v. U. S., 170 U. S. 481, 18 Sup. 689 (murder of captain and mate; trial for the latter only; maltreatment of the defendant by the captain and by the mate on preceding occasions, excluded on the facts, because no overt act at the time of killing was shown; no authorities cited).

[1] 1853, Cook v. Parham, 24 Ala. 21, 34; 1872, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 63 Ill. 293, 297 (intemperate habits); 1894, Western Stone Co. v. Whalen, 151 id. 482, 38 N. E. 243 (captain of a towing vessel); 1903, Metropolitan W. S. E. R. Co. v. Fortin, 203 id. 454, 67 N. E. 977 (motorman of an elevated railroad); 1871, Pittsburg F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294, 311 (train-conductor); 1895, Cherokee Co. v. Dickson, 55 Kan. 62, 39 Pac. 691; 1880, Dunham v. Rackliff, 69 Me. 345, 349, semble; 1894, Norfolk W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 79 Md. 253, 263, 29 Atl. 994 (intemperate habits); 1861, Gahagan v. R. Co. 1 All. 187, 190 (that a flagman was "careful, attentive, and temperate" in his "general habits and behavior"); 1865, Gilman v. R. Co., 10 id. 233, 235, 239 (intemperate habits); s. c., 1866, 13 id. 433, 444 (same); 1890, Monahan v. Worcester, 150 Mass. 439, 23 N. E. 228 (that he was "physically weak and partially blind and deaf"); 1895, Driscoll v. Fall River, 163 id. 105, 39 N. E. 1003 (reputation "of a foreman amongst a few workmen employed under him," excluded, as not likely to give notice to or require attention from the employer); 1902, Carson v. Canning, 180 id. 461, 62 N. E. 964 (reputation of an employee "around the building," held not improperly admitted); 1870, Davis v. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105, 123 (engineer; a reputation, but not mere casual remarks, admissible); 1885, Hilts v. R. Co., 55 id. 437, 442, 21 N. W. 878 (intemperate habits); 1873, State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 539, 549, semble; 1897, Yonngs v. R. Co., 154 N. Y. 764, 49 N. E. 1106 (like next case); 1898, Park v. R. Co., 155 id. 215, 49 N. E. 674 (reputation receivable to show knowledge of incompetency, after specific acts showing the fact of it; here a reputation ten years before was excluded); 1896, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Johnson, 89 Tex. 519, 35 S. W. 1042 (reputation of the wrong-doing servant among his fellow-employees, held sufficient to fix upon the employer a knowledge of his inefficiency, but not to fix such knowledge upon the plaintiff-employee, though he and the other

It is to be noted that the substantive law may be such that the evidential question, whether such reputation was likely to reach the employer, does not arise; i.e., it may be held that if a reputation of incompeteucy had arisen, then, even if the employer did not in fact hear of the reputation, yet his failure to learn of such an easily knowable thing is in itself negligence, as a matter of law, in that it involves failure to make inquiry concerning competence:

1870, Cooley, J., in Davis v. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105, 123: "If the defendants continue a man in their employ who is so notoriously unfit as to have established a general reputation to that effect, it is unreasonable (the plaintiff argues) to suppose the officers of the defendants ignorant of that fact; unless we excuse their want of information on the ground of neglect of duty on their part to their employees and the public, so gross as to make it proper and just to hold them responsible to the same extent as if they were fully informed of all the facts."

1890, Field, J., in Monahan v. Worcester, 150 Mass. 440, 23 N. E. 228: "If a person is incompetent for the work he is employed to do, the fact that he is generally reputed in the community to want those qualities which are necessary for the proper performance of the work certainly has some tendency to show that the master would have found out that the servant was incompetent, if proper means had been taken to ascertain the qualifications of the servant."[2]

§ 250. (2) Employer: (b) Acts of an Employee. Since reputation is after all created originally by conduct, the use of reputation, for the purpose just noticed, gives also, by implication, a sanction to the probative value of particular acts of misconduct as giving warning of incompetency. Experience, too, in general as well as in the business of employers, tells that particular acts of incompetency are the usual and sufficient source of judgment upon an employee's incompetency. The only objection, then, can arise from the doctrines of confusion of issues and of unfair surprise (ante, § 202); yet, since the evidence is so closely connected with the issue of the pleadings, since it has a comparatively small range of time and place, and since the facilities of procuring testimony to expose a fabricated charge are ample, an objection on this score does not seem serious. The natural view, that such particular acts, if not isolated or lacking in marked significance, may in a given case be admissible as calculated to give warning to the employer, is well set forth in the following passage:

1874, Allen, J., in Baulec v. R. Co., 59 N. Y. 356, 358: "When character, as distinguished from reputation, is the subject of investigation, specific acts tend to exhibit and bring to light the peculiar qualities of the man, and indicate his adaptation or want of adaptation to any position, or fitness or unfitness for a particular duty or trust. It is by many or by a series of acts . . . that the actual qualities, the true characteristics of servants were upon the same division and were personally acquainted; the opinion is a labored attempt to explain this absurdity); 1896, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne, 19 C. C. A. 623, 73 Fed. 634 (engineer's reputation for intemperance); 1896, Central Vt. R. Co. v. Ruggles, 21 id. 575, 75 Fed. 953; 1899, Stoll v. Daly Min. Co., 19 Utah 271, 57 Pac. 295. Distinguish the question what sort of reputation is admissible, under the Hearsay exception, to prove the fact of the employee's incompetence (post, §§ 1615, 1616, 1621), and the question of substantive law whether the employee's character is in issue (ante, § 80). The rulings upon these distinct principles are occasionally confused.

[2] Accord: Gilman v. R. Co. and Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, supra.

individuals, those qualities and characteristics which would or should influence and control in the selection of agents for positions of trust and responsibility, are known. . . . [But only a single instance of carelessness in eight years' service was here shown.] A single act of casual neglect does not per se tend to prove the party to be careless and imprudent and unfitted for a position requiring care and prudence. Character is formed and qualities exhibited by a series of acts and not by a single act. An engineer might from inattention omit to sound the whistle or ring the bell at a railroad crossing; but such fact would not tend to prove him a careless and negligent servant of the company. . . . The question in this case was whether the single occurrence detailed by the witness, in connection with other circumstances and with his general character and conduct, was such as to make it necessary for the defendant, in the exercise of proper care and prudence such as the law enjoins, to discharge this switchman. I am clearly of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury."[1]

While it is to-day generally conceded that such evidence is admissible, it is not usually specified whether the acts of incompetence must be by other evidence shown to have come to the employer's notice. It would seem that where the act is so flagrant that it would ordinarily be observed by or reported to the employee's superior officer, no other evidence would be required as a condition precedent to admission.

From the foregoing use distinguish the more controverted questions whether an employee's particular acts of negligence may be used directly to evidence the character itself, either as in issue (ante, § 208) or as offered evidentially (ante, § 199).

§ 251. (3) Owner of Vicious Animal. Where against the owner of an animal a scienter is to be proved — the knowledge of the animal's vicious quality —, reputation of the animal is relevant, on the principle of the foregoing topics; though the occasion for resorting to it is naturally rare.[1] Particular acts of viciousness are also relevant, for similar reasons, and this application of the principle is long established in tradition.[2]

[1] Accord: 1871, Pittsburg, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294, 311; 1895, Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Tothill, 143 id. 49, 41 N. E. 709 (that a train-dispatcher had often run trains ahead of their schedule time; admitted on the question of the employer's notice of incompetency); 1886, Baltimore Elev. Co. v. Neal, 65 Md. 438, 452, 5 Atl. 338, semble; 1894, Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 79 id. 253, 264, 29 Atl. 994; 1898, Cox v. R. Co., 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97 (a watchman's habits of intoxication, for some years previous, receivable, as showing that the defendant might have discovered them by reasonable diligence); 1870, Davis v. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105, 124; 1881, Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176, 179, 9 N. W. 243; 1900, Shaw v. R. Co., 123 id. 629, 82 N. W. 618 (previous practice of mail agent in throwing mail-bag, admitted to show notice to the railroad company); 1874, Chapman v. R. Co., 55 N. Y. 579, 585, semble; 1874, Paulee v. R. Co., 59 id. 356 (see quotation supra); 1895, Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534, 31 S. W. 629 (repudiating R. Co. v. Scott, 68 id. 694, 5 S. W. 501; R. Co. v. Rowland, 82 id. 171, 180, 18 S. W. 96 (disapproving the Frazier case, Pa., infra); 1898, Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Davis, 92 id. 372, 48 S. W. 570 (provided the incompetence is otherwise shown); 1895, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 13 C. C. A. 233, 65 Fed. 952, 958 (going to sleep on duty, etc.; "the entire record" of K. as an employee in the capacity concerned, admitted); 1899, Stoll v. Daly Min. Co., 19 Utah 271, 57 Pac. 295 (usually a single act will not suffice). Contra: 1896, Columbus R. R. Co. v. Christian, 97 Ga. 56, 25 S. E. 411 (following Frazier v. R. Co., Pa.); 1860, Frazier v. R. Co., 38 Pa. 104 (negligence of the defendant in employing a careless conductor; other acts of carelessness on the conductor's part, known to the defendant, rejected, because character is not to be evidenced by specific acts).

[1] 1796, Jones v. Perry, 2 Esp. 482 (common report that defendant's dog had been bitten by a mad dog, admitted as indicating a duty to secure him); 1889, Wormsdorf v. R. Co., 75 Mich. 472, 475, 42 N. W. 1000 (reputation of a horse among the railway employees for fractiousness).

[2] 1866, Worth v. Gilling, L. R. 2 C. P. 3 (previous attempts of a dog to bite, admitted to show

§ 252. (4) Owner or Possessor of a Dangerous Machine or Place. Of the four ways (ante, § 245) in which knowledge of the dangerous qualities of a thing or place might be obtained by its owner or possessor, the first two seldom raise here any evidential question. Direct exposure to the senses[1] and express communication[2] are of course always legitimate modes of evidencing knowledge of the dangerous condition of a machine or place. The reputation of the place or machine, and the fact that its dangerousness or the existence of the defect was reputed or generally talked about, would be relevant as showing the probable carrying of information by some one to the person charged;[3] usually the question is one of constructive notice, not an evidential one. The nature of the defect itself, as likely to lead to discussion and report, is always a relevant circumstance.[4] The length of time of its existence (especially for a defect in a highway) is in such cases an additional circumstance always admissible;[5] but this becomes a question of substantive law, inasmuch as the length of time is commonly held to be capable of amounting in law to constructive notice, and by statute or otherwise a specific period is frequently established as constituting a default based on constructive notice.

The occurrence of former injuries at the same place or machine, and the existence of defects in other parts of it, are equally admissible, though less cogent in the probabilities suggested. The element (a) (ante, § 245) requires that the prior injury or defect should be such as would probably lead to a general publication of it or to a report being carried to the person charged (or his agent); and the element (b) (ante, § 245) requires that the prior injury or defect should be one which if known would naturally warn the person charged of the existence of the defect in question; for example, if it is an injury or "accident," it should have occurred in substantially the same place and mode; if it is another defect (as, in another part of the same the owner's knowledge of its disposition); 1856, Arnold v. Norton, 25 Conn. 92 (single bite of a dog); 1876, Graham v. Nowlin, 54 Ind. 391 (to show knowledge of the glandered condition of a mule sold, the fact was admitted of the existence of the same disease in the defendant's horses and his knowledge of it); 1844, Kittredge v. Elliott, 16 N. H. 77 (single bite of a dog); 1850, Cockerham v. Nixon, 11 Ired. 269 (single attack of a bull); 1850, McCaskill v. Elliot, 5 Strobh. 196, 197 (single bite of a dog); 1876, Keenan v. Hayden, 39 Wis. 558 (dog).

[1] 1883, Dotton v. Albion, 50 Mich. 129, 132, 15 N. W. 46 (injury at a cross-walk; "the further fact stands unquestioned that the street-commissioner actually resided in plain sight of this cross-walk"); 1888, Noyes v. Gardner, 147 Mass. 505, 508, 18 N. E. 423 (that one of the selectmen passed daily over a walk, admitted).

[2] 1892, Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 290, 292, 30 Pac. 529 (direction to the owner of an elevator by the maker, as showing the former's knowledge of its proper mode of use).

[3] 1891, Knowlton, J., in Chase v. Lowell, 151 Mass. 422, 426, 24 N. E. 212: "The fact that it [the highway-defect] was generally talked about in the community is a circumstance which may properly be considered. In such a case, notoriety derives its force as evidence, not merely from its suggestion that the defect was of such a kind that the authorities would have been likely to discover it in the first instance with their own eyes, but quite as much from the probability that their attention would have been brought by others to a matter which was generally talked about and in which they were interested." Accord: 1867, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shannon, 43 Ill. 345 (admitting reputation of the unsafeness of a boiler); 1890, Chase v. Lowell, 151 Mass. 422, 426, 24 N. E. 212 (remarks made about a defect by persons looking at it, admitted; practically repudiating Hinckley v. Somerset, 145 id. 326, 328, 337, 14 N. E. 166 (1887), where conversations about it were excluded.

[4] 1860, Donaldson v. Boston, 16 Gray 508 ("Upon the question of notoriety, the jury might consider whether the obstruction of travel was of such a nature that, if citizens passing by had seen it, they would have been likely to have forthwith informed such officers of its existence").

[5] 1890, Chase v. Lowell, supra.

sidewalk), it should be so closely associated with the one in question that the discovery of the former would naturally lead to the discovery of the latter or would warn of its existence. The facts of prior injuries and of other defects are generally conceded to be admissible, subject to certain varieties in the phrasing of the rule.[6] Distinguish the use of such prior injuries

[6] Cal.: 1873, Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409, 413 (defect in an elevator; a former fall of the same elevator from a similar cause, admitted to show notice); Colo.: 1895, Colorado M. & I. Co. v. Rees, 21 Colo. 435, 42 Pac. 42 (leaving open an elevator-door on former occasions, admitted); Ill.: 1866, Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169, 173 (death by falling off a bridge insufficiently lighted; the fact that another person had fallen off the same bridge, admitted to show notice, on the part of the defendant's agents, of the condition of the bridge); 1894, Bloomington v. Legg, 151 Id. 9, 14, 37 N. E. 696 (injury at a drinking-fountain; prior injuries admitted); Ind.: 1881, Delphi v. Lowery, 74 Ind. 520, 523 (injuries of other persons at the bridge where the intestate was drowned, admitted to show notice to the city); Ia.: 1878, Moore v. Burlington, 49 Ia. 136, 137 (previous pilings of lumber at a place, admitted); 1884, Ruggles v. Nevada, 63 id. 185, 18 N. W. 866 (condition of a sidewalk "along there," excluded, chiefly as not amounting to constructive notice of a particular defect); 1887, Armstrong v. Ackley, 71 id. 76, 80, 32 N. W. 180 (condition of another part of a continuously unsafe sidewalk, admitted; distinguishing the preceding case); 1897, Faulk v. Iowa Co., 103 id. 442, 72 N. W. 757 (defect in railing at or near the place in question, admitted); 1900, Wilberding v. Dubuque, 111 Id. 484, 82 N. W. 957 (prior injuries at a highway defect, admitted); 1902, Yeager v. Spirit Lake, 115 id. 593, 88 N. W. 1095 (other injuries on the same sidewalk, admitted); 1903, Kircher v. Larchwood, — id. —, 95 N. W. 184 (condition of adjacent sidewalk, admitted to show notice); Mass.: 1887, Hinckley v. Somerset, 145 Mass. 326, 328, 337, 14 N. E. 166 (prior similar highway-accident, about the same place, admitted); 1888, Noyes v. Gardner, 147 Id. 505, 508, 18 N. E. 423 (the condition of other planks in the same sidewalk, admitted); Mich.: 1883, Dotton v. Albion, 50 Mich. 129, 131, 15 N. W. 46 (other defects in the same cross-walk, admitted); 1886, Smith v. Sherwood, 62 id. 159, 165, 28 N. W. 806 (other horses' shying at the same hole, admitted; "as more or less publicity would naturally be given to such occurrences, it tended to show that knowledge of such dangerous character was brought to the attention" of the defendant); 1889, Dundas v. Lansing, 75 id. 499, 504, 507, 42 N. W. 1011 (the defective condition of a street-crossing being the cause of the injury, the condition of the sidewalks "in the vicinity," "a block or more each way," and even express notice of the latter condition, held inadmissible as "too remote and indefinite"; the source of error in the opinion is that it relies upon inapplicable line of precedents, cited in § 458, post, which are not the law in Michigan); 1889, Tice v. Bay City, 73 Id. 209, 44 N. W. 52 (defective condition of sidewalk "at other places beyond the defect which caused the injury," excluded); 1890, Campbell v. Kalamazoo, 80 id. 655, 659, 45 N. W. 652 (other defects of various sorts in the sidewalk in front of the same lot of land, admitted); 1890, O'Neil v. West Branch, 81 id. 544, 546, 45 N. W. 1023 ("other defects of long standing, existing in close proximity to the defect which causes the injury," admissible); 1891, Lombar v. East Tawas, 86 id. 14, 20, 48 N. W. 947 (other accidents at the same hole, admissible as tending "to show constructive notice to defendant; and, where the accident results in death or great bodily injury, it may by reason of its publicity tend to show actual notice"); 1892, Fuller v. Jackson, 92 Id. 191, 205, 52 N. W. 1075 (the three preceding cases approved); 1893, Corcoran v. Detroit, 95 id. 84, 86, 54 N. W. 692 (defects in other parts of the road in the vicinity, admitted); 1894, Edwards v. Three Rivers, 102 Id. 153, 60 N. W. 454 ("condition of the walk in the vicinity of the accident," admissible); 1895, Strudgeon v. Sand Beach, 107 id. 496, 65 N. W. 616 (defective parts of the sidewalk in the same block, admitted); 1896, Moore v. Kalamazoo, 109 id. 176, 66 N. W. 1089 (that others stepped into the same hole in the sidewalk, admitted); 1898, Butts v. Eaton Rapids, 116 id. 539, 74 N. W. 872 (condition of a walk six or eight months previously, admitted; condition of "whole length" in front of certain premises, admitted); 1900, Boyle v. Saginaw, 124 id. 348, 82 N. W. 1057 (condition of sidewalk in front of other lots, admitted); Minn.: 1883, Gude v. Mankato, 30 Minn. 256, 258, 15 N. W. 175 (condition of the sidewalk "at and near the place," admissible); 1895, Burrowa v. Lake Crystal, 61 id. 357, 63 N. W. 74 (former accidents, admitted); Mo.: 1899, Young v. Webb City, 150 Mo. 333, 51 S. W. 709 (admitted); Nebr.: 1886, Plattsmouth v. Mitchell, 20 Nebr. 228, 230, 29 N. W. 5.3 ("bad condition of the sidewalk in general at the place," admitted); N. H.: 1857, Willey v. Portsmouth, 35 N. H. 303, 310 (former giving way of a culvert); N. J.: 1899, Exton v. R. Co., 62 N. J. L. 7, 42 Atl. 486 (former disorderly conduct making a carrier's premises dangerous, admitted to show notice); Pa.: 1898, Potter v. Natural Gas Co., 183 Pa. 757, 39 Atl. 7 (condition of a road up to a few weeks before, admitted); 1901, Fitzgerald v. E. E. Illum. Co., 200 id. 540, 50 Atl. 161 (defective insulation; that the wire had given out sparks for several weeks, admitted, as showing the defect to have "existed for such a period that it ought to have been known," by reason of its duty of "constant oversight and repair"); 1903, Reid v. Linck, — id. —, 55 Atl. 849 (prior instances of falling or other defects to show objectively the actual dangerous quality of the thing or place (post, §§ 437–458); the precedents under that principle often incidentally deal with this use also.

§ 253. (5) Purchaser from an Insolvent or Lunatic. Where a transfer of property by an insolvent is in issue as being in fraud of creditors, and knowledge by the transferee of the transferor's insolvency is to be shown, the reputation of the transferor as to solvency is relevant to show the probability of that knowledge, provided it is a reputation in a locality frequented by the transferee. This is equally true whether the offeror of the evidence is attempting to show that the transferee believed in the transferor's solvency or that he was aware of the latter's insolvency.

(1) Such a reputation of solvency is evidence of a belief in that solvency upon the same principle that reputation of a deceased's dangerous character (ante, § 246) evidences an apprehension of danger from him:

1855, Metcalf, J., in Bartlett v. Decreet, 4 Gray 113: "The testimony is admissible . . . on the ground that man's belief, as to matters of which they had not personal knowledge, is reasonably supposed to be affected by the opinions of others who are about them."

1855, Merrick, J., in Heywood v. Reed, 4 Gray 579: "Individuals cannot in general resort to the most authentic sources of information to ascertain the pecuniary responsibility of parties with whom they deal. They are obliged to act upon opinions entertained and adopted in view of circumstances which are merely external and apparent, and hence they may well be presumed to be in some degree influenced in their transactions by the business credit and pecuniary standing which a party has acquired and maintained among his neighbors and acquaintances. When his motives to action in pecuniary transactions are called in question, considerations of this kind deserve attention." [1] through an elevator-shaft, admitted to show knowledge of its danger); R. I.: 1871, Smith v. R. Co., 10 R. I. 24, 27 (other fires set by the defendant's engines, but only prior, not subsequent, to the one in question; compare § 452, post); 1903, McGarrity v. R. Co., — id. —, 55 Atl. 718 (condition of telltales in a freight yard at other times, admissible to show the defendant's knowledge of their defective condition); S. C.: 1887, Bridger v. R. Co., 27 S. C. 456, 3 S. E. 860 (injury at a turntable; former injuries of others there, excluded, unless knowledge of them had been brought home to the defendant; present question ignored); S. D.: 1903, Waterhouse v. Schlitz B. Co., — S. D. —, 94 N. W. 597 (collapse of other buildings of like construction, admitted to show notice); Tenn.: 1900, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wyatt, 104 Tenn. 432, 58 S. W. 308 (condition of adjacent platform-planking, admitted to show notice); U. S.: 1898, Valley R. Co. v. Keegan, 31 C. C. A. 255, 87 Fed. 849 (other defects in a railroad yard, admissible to show notice by an employee); Utah: 1894, Thomas v. Springville, 9 Utah 426, 430, 35 Pac. 503 (shying of other horses at a hole, admissible); Wash.: 1897, Elster v. Seattle, 18 Wash. 304, 51 Pac. 394 (injuries to others at the same place in a sidewalk, a week or ten days before, admitted to show notice); 1900, Piper v. Spokane, 22 id. 147, 60 Pac. 138 (similar; and also "declarations of other persons at the same time"); 1903, Shearer v. Buckley, — id. —, 72 Pac. 76 (condition of a street in the same block, admitted); Wis.: 1870, Weisenberg v. Appleton, 26 Wis. 56, 58 (general condition of a sidewalk sufficient, if known, to involve negligence, irrespective of knowledge of a particular defect); 1872, Ripon v. Bittel, 30 id. 614, 620 (same); 1882, Sullivan v. Oshkosh, 55 id. 508, 513, 13 N. W. 468, semble (general condition of a sidewalk, available to show notice of a particular defect); 1885, Spearbracker v. Larrabee, 64 id. 573, 575, 25 N. W. 555 (holes in a bridge at other places, admitted); 1889, Shaw v. Sun Prairie, 74 id. 105, 42 N. W. 271 (condition of a sidewalk "in the vicinity," "or the general bad condition of the same street, sidewalk, or bridge," admissible); Spaulding v. Sherman, 75 id. 77, 79, 43 N. W. 558, semble (same); 1891, Propsom v. Leatham, 80 id. 608, 611, 50 N. W. 586 (condition of a bridge at other points, admitted); 1900, Shafer v. Eau Claire, 105 id. 239, 81 N. W. 409 (similar).

[1] Accord: 1855, Bartlett v. Decreet, 4 Gray 113 (quoted supra); 1855, Heywood v. Reed, ib. 579 (quoted supra); 1861, Carpenter v. Leonard, 3 All. 33; 1862, Whitcher v. Shattuck, ib. 319, 321 (mortgage); 1865, Metcalf v. Munson, 10 id. 492.

(2) Such a reputation of insolvency is evidence of knowledge of that insolvency in the same way that reputation of an employee's incompetency (ante, § 249) evidences the employer's probable knowledge of it:

1858, Stone, J., in Price v. Mazange, 31 Ala. 701, 707: "Ability to pay, responsibility to the coercive power of an execution, is a weighty consideration with one who parts with his goods on credit. . . . It is difficult to believe that merchants and traders will not learn the pecuniary condition of their customers when that condition so vitally affects them and is notorious in the neighborhood in which they are operating."[2]

An express communication would also be receivable to show notice of insolvency;[3] and similarly, express assertions by the transferor would have some (if little) probative value to show the transferee's belief in his solvency.[4] The use of reputation to show the fact of insolvency or solvency itself is a different question, involving the propriety of making an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1623).

On the same principle the reputation of the insanity of a transferor would be admissible to show probable notice of the insanity by the transferee.[5]

§ 254. (6) Adverse Possessor, Receiver of Stolen Goods, and other Dealers with Property. On the same principle, reputation of a property-interest may serve to evidence knowledge or good faith wherever that state of mind is important in dealings with the property. Thus, the owner's knowledge of an adverse possession set up as the foundation of a prescriptive title may be evidenced by the notoriety or repute of the possession.[1]

So, too, a purchaser's knowledge of equitable or other interests may be evidenced by reputation;[2] and, the good or bad faith of one purchasing or

[2] 1843, Branch Bank v. Parker, 5 Ala. 736 (Ormond, J., diss.); 1845, Lawson v. Orear, 7 id. 784, semble; 1858, Price v. Mazange, 31 id. 701, 704, 707 (that he was "notoriously insolvent"; see quotation supra); 1883, Humea v. O'Bryan, 74 Id. 81 (Somerville, J.: "The rule should in our opinion have no application to persons living at a distance in another State, unless they are shown to have had an opportunity of hearing the common report by frequently visiting the residence of the alleged partners, or otherwise"); 1885, Kuglar v. Garner, 74 Ga. 765, 768 (note obtained by fraud and duress; "public notoriety" of the circumstances admitted to show the indorsee's knowledge); 1840, Brander v. Ferriday, 16 La. 296, 299 (mortgage); 1848, Denny v. Dana, 2 Cush. 169 (setting aside a fraudulent preference; evidence that the business of the debtor was known in the community to be ruinous to those engaged in it); 1854, Lee v. Kilburn, 3 Gray 594; 1862, Cook v. Mason, 5 All. 212; 1875, Sweetser v. Batea, 117 Mass. 468; 1894, Bliss v. Johnson, 162 id. 323, 38 N. E. 446; 1848, Benoist v. Darby, 12 Mo. 196, 205; 1899, Webb v. Atkinson, 124 N. C. 447, 32 S. E. 737; 1893, Hinds v. Keith, 6 C. C. A. 231, 57 Fed. 10, 13 U. S. App. 222, 227 (notoriety of insolvency, not admissible to show buyer's knowledge, if not within the same community).

[3] 1829, Vacher v. Cocks, M. & M. 355 (letters to a bankrupt, not as evidence of the fact of insolvency, but of his knowing that his condition was insolvent).

[4] 1861, Carpenter v. Leonard, 3 All. 33 (bona fides of a mortgagee; the express statements of the mortgagor admitted to show the former's grounds for believing in his solvency).

[5] 1860, Romilly, M. R., in Greenslade v. Dare, 20 Beav. 290, rejected it on the singular ground that "to admit evidence of general reputation to fix a defendant with knowledge of a fact, while that evidence would not be admissible to prove the fact itself, appears to me to be a violation of the first principle," etc.

[1] 1858, Brown v. Cockerell, 33 Ala. 38, 47; 1899, Tennessee Coal I. & R. Co. v. Linn, 123 id. 112, 26 So. 245 (after evidence of the adverse possession); 1899, Knight v. Knight, 178 Ill. 553, 53 N. E. 306 (title by prescription; reputation of ancestor's possession admissible to show notoriety of it and adversity of claim); 1880, Sparrow v. Hovey, 44 Mich. 63, 6 N. W. 93; 1894, Maxwell Land-Grant Co. v. Dawson, 151 U. S. 586, 603 14 Sup. 458. Distinguish the question whether reputation is admissible, under the Hearsay exception, to evidence title directly (post, § 1626).

[2] 1901, Stephenson v. Kilpatrick, 166 Mo. 262, 65 S. W. 773 (to show notice, by a pur-receiving stolen goods,[3] or otherwise unlawfully dealing with chattels,[4] may be evidenced by repute or by express communications made to him.

§ 255. (7) Dealer with a Partnership. The modes usually available for showing notice of a dissolution of partnership, as against one who has dealt with its members after dissolution, are the first three already noted (ante, § 245), namely (1) exposure to observation, i. e. publication where the person would be likely to have seen it, (2) express communication, and (3) reputation or notoriety. (1) Here the only evidential question seems to be whether the newspaper containing the notice must be shown to have been subscribed to or taken by the person to be notified; but this question is rarely raised as one of admissibility, and is generally treated as one either of constructive notice or of the sufficiency of evidence on all the facts of the case.[1] (2) An express communication raises no evidential question. (3) A reputation or notoriety of dissolution serves to evidence knowledge;[2] but here the chaser at a sale, of plaintiff's interest in the property, the community's general knowledge of certain litigation was held relevant). The following is another use: 1903, Jennings v. Rooney, — Mass. —, 67 N. E. 665 (fact of a conversation admitted, to show that a vendee obtained first knowledge of the property from the broker and not from the vendor).

[3] 1824, R. v. Whitehead, 1 C. & P. 67 (conspiracy to defraud by B. and W.; to show W.'s good faith in the representations made to him by B., it was proved that "B. was a clergyman and most respectably connected"); 1859, R. v. Wood, 1 F. & F. 497 (receiving stolen goods; vendor's declarations to defendant, admitted); 1855, Spivey v. State, 26 Ala. 90, 93, 103 (larceny; statements to defendant of supposed owner, admitted to show defendant's good faith); 1879, State v. Waitz, 52 Ia. 227, 2 N. W. 1102 (larceny; information to the defendant that the things were not the property of the owner, admitted); 1857, People v. Rando, 3 Park. Cr. 336, 339, 341 (to disprove guilty knowledge of stolen goods possessed, evidence of the statements by the person bringing them, which induced the defendant to receive them, was offered; Peabody, J., diss.: "They should be admitted, not as evidence of the truth of the facts, but as evidence that such statements were made, without regard to the truth or falsity of them"; here rejected, erroneously, by the majority; but in 1881, in People v. Dowling, 84 N. Y. 485, the passage quoted was made the law).

[4] 1870, State v. Graham, 46 Mo. 490 (maliciously killing H.'s hog; instructions given to defendant to kill his employer's hogs, admitted to show his belief).

[1] The earlier English cases are subjoined, in order to illustrate the method of dealing with such evidence: 1795, Godfrey v. Macauley, Peake 155 (notice of dissolution of partnership; Lord Ellenborough, C. J.: "The Gazette was not [conclusive] evidence of notice, any more than any other newspaper; . . . but in all cases, if published in the neighborhood of a person, it ought to be left to the jury whether he had notice of it or not"); 1816, Leeson v. Holt 1 Stark. 186 (notice of a carrier's responsibility; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "said that he would receive evidence of the advertisement in the Gazette, but that unless it were proved that the party was in the habit of reading the Gazette, the evidence would be of little avail. . . . The advertisement in the Times was not admissible at all without proof that it was taken in by the party. The first instance in which such evidence was received was a case where a person . . . inserted a notice in a provincial Sunday paper, and the Court held that it was admissible in evidence because it was probable that the party had seen it, since he took in the paper and the advertisement related to his business." "It appeared that D. had occasionally read the Times newspaper, and Lord Ellenborough then admitted the advertisement contained in it to be read"); 1816, Jenkins v. Blizard, Ib. 418, 420 (dissolution of partnership; "the notice had been advertised in the Morning Chronicle once only, and it did not appear that this individual paper had ever reached the plaintiffs," though it was proved that they took in the paper regularly; admitted); 1817, Munn v. Baker, 2 id. 255 (notice of a carrier's responsibility; an advertisement in the Gazette, rejected by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "without proof of the plaintiff's having read the Gazette, since he might be expected to look into the Gazette for notices of the dissolution of partnerships, but not for notices by carriers of the limitation of their responsibility"); 1825, Rowley v. Horne, 3 Bing. 2 (notice by a carrier in a weekly paper to which the plaintiff subscribed; admitted, but held not sufficient); 1837, Hart v. Alexander, 7 C. & P. 746, 749, 751, 753; 2 M. & W. 484 (advertisements of dissolution of partnership in various newspapers, admitted). The following modern case illustrates that it is not a question of admissibility: 1898, Amer. F. I. Co. v. Landfare, 56 Nebr. 482, 76 N. W. 1068.

[2] 1883, Haines v. O'Bryan, 74 Ala. 81 (reputation of a dissolution of partnership, admitted; Somerville, J.: "It is based upon the probability that the plaintiff would be likely to question tends to become one of constructive notice or ostensible partnership, and thus of substantive law.

§ 256. (8) Maker of False Representations. Where a representation is made as to the credit of a third person to whom a loan or a sale is to be made, and in an action of deceit the knowledge of the incorrectness of the representations is to be shown, the reputation of the third person as to solvency or insolvency is relevant (on the principle of § 253, ante).[1] In general, wherever the knowledge of the incorrectness of representations is to be shown, any of the modes of evidence already noted in § 245 may become available.[2]

§ 257. (9) Seller of Liquor to Intemperate or Minor. (a) Where a statute forbids the selling of liquor to a person of known intemperate habits, the reputation of the vendee for intemperance is relevant to show probable knowledge by the seller;[1] and the other modes noted ante, § 245, would be equally available. (b) Where a statute forbids the knowing selling of liquor to a minor, the appearance of the vendee would be admissible as affecting the seller's probable knowledge (ante, § 222).

§ 258. (10) Party Prosecuting or Arresting without Probable Cause. (a) Where in an action for malicious prosecution or false arrest, the issue arises whether the prosecutor had reasonable grounds and acted in good faith, the bad reputation of the now plaintiff is a circumstance bearing on this state of mind, and is admissible.[1] There is no reason why particular acts of similar know a fact of which no one else in the neighborhood seemed to be ignorant"); 1838, Cowen, J., in Halliday v. McDougall, 20 Wend. 81, 89 ("Where a partnership has existed in fact, but has been dissolved, and a third person has yet dealt with one of the partners, and sues them all, insisting that he acted on the credit of the former concern, the question whether a partner who has retired shall yet be holden on a contract of the others, may depend on his having been known as a partner, for the notoriety of the fact may have influenced the conduct of the plaintiff").

[1] 1837, Ward v. Herndon, 5 Port. 382, 384 ("no man is presumed to be so much of a recluse as not to know what is generally known and talked of in his neighborhood").

[2] 1839, Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. 515 (false pretences; collecting money by representing himself to be an agent; to show that he had before that time to his knowledge been dismissed from his agency, evidence was received that he was dismissed for having lost his employer's money at a house of ill-fame).

[1] 1854, Elam v. State, 25 Ala. 53, 57; 1855, Stanley v. State, 26 id. 26 (excluded; but this case is repudiated in Stallings v. State, infra); 1859, Stallings v. State, 33 id. 425, 427 (indictment for selling liquor to one known to be intemperate; notoriety in the neighborhood admitted as indicating defendant's knowledge); 1876, Smith v. State, 55 id. 12; 1879, Tatum v. State, 63 id. 151.

The following statute illustrates another application of the same principle: Ia. Code 1897, § 2422 (illegal liquor sales; "general reputation of the place kept," admissible to show "knowledge of the owner").

[1] 1773, Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 20 How. St. Tr. 94 ("While you knew Mr. Fabrigas what character did he bear? or how did he behave himself, as far as you had an opportunity of observing?" "As far as I could observe, he behaved very well, and had a very good character." . . . "While you knew him, I ask you, what was his behavior?" . . . "He always behaved with very great decency and decorum"; again at 142); 1799, Rodriguez v. Tadmire, 2 Esp. 721 (bad reputation as showing reasonable cause for suspicion, admitted); 1841, Downing v. Butcher, 2 Mo. & Rob. 374; 1890, Halifax Banking Co. v. Smith, 29 N. Br. 462 (general principle conceded; but two judges dissenting as to its applicability); 1894, Olsen v. Lantaium, 32 id. 526 (principle applied); 1855, Martin v. Hardesty, 27 Ala. 458; 1873, Oliver v. Pate, 43 Ind. 132, 138; 1811, Gregory v. Thomas, 2 Bibb 286; 1849, Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 240; 1887, Dorsey v. Clapp, 22 Nebr. 564, 568, 35 N. W. 389, semble; 1896, Beckman v. Souther, 68 N. H. 381, 36 Atl. 14 (as bearing on the plaintiff's replication of excess of force; the matter in each case to be left entirely to the trial Court's discretion). Contra, but unsound: 1817, Newsam v. Carr, 2 Stark. 69; 1876, Fitch v. Murray, Wood Manit. 74, 88. There is no reason why the plaintiff's good repute should not be received on his part, on the same issue; 1897, Geary v. Stevenson, 169 Mass. 23, misconduct by the now plaintiff should not be equally admissible, on the same principle (ante, § 248) that particular acts of violence by a deceased person are admitted to show the apprehensions of a defendant charged with homicide.[2] (b) In the same way, when in a prosecution for assaulting an officer or resisting an arrest, the officer's right to arrest, and incidentally his reasonable ground for suspicion, comes in issue, the reputation[3] of the arrested person, and also prior particular acts[4] of similar misconduct, should be receivable as affecting his grounds of suspicion. (c) So, too, in any of the preceding actions, or in an actiou for battery involving a similar issue, the express communications of third persons are relevant to show the belief or good faith of the person arresting or prosecuting.[5]

§ 259. (11) Utterer of Forged or Counterfeit Paper or Money, Possessor of Stolen Goods, etc. Knowledge or notice is an essential ingredient of many crimes; and in some of these the knowledge may be acquired from former dealings with the same article or similar articles; i. e. on the princi-

47 N. E. 508 (plaintiff's good reputation, to negative probable cause). Contra. 1899, Claiborne v. R. Co., 46 W. Va. 363, 33 S. E. 262 (false arrest of a passenger; plaintiff's good character not admitted).

For the use of reputation in mitigation of damages in such actions, see ante, § 75. For the use of the testimony at the original trial, see post, § 1416.

[2] The precedents are for the most part to the contrary: 1799, Rodriguez v. Tadmire, 2 Esp. 721 (bad character as ground for suspicion and prosecution; particular acts excluded; though the plaintiff, suing for malicious prosecution, was allowed to ask); 1899, Williams v. Casebeer, 126 Cal. 77, 58 Pac. 380 (transaction ten years before, giving defendant ground to suspect plaintiff of larceny, inadmissible); 1811, Gregory v. Thomas, 2 Bibb 286 (excluded); 1902, Perkins v. Spaulding, 182 Mass. 218, 65 N. E. 72 (embezzlement of other articles from the same owner, admissible to show the owner's good faith in prosecuting); 1887, Dorsey v. Clapp, 22 Nebr. 564, 568, 35 N. W. 389 ("particular acts" of the arrested party said to be inadmissible to show the prosecutor's good faith; but the acts here excluded were such as could afford no reasonable suspicion of the charge made).

[3] Contra, but clearly wrong: 1864, R. v. Turberfield, L. & C. 495 (assault upon a constable; the issue being whether the constable had reasonable grounds for suspecting the accused of a felony; the question to the constable, "What did you know had been the prisoner's previous character?" was held improper).

[4] 1898, State v. Healey, 105 Ia. 162, 74 N.W. 916 (murder while deceased was attempting to arrest; robbery of third persons by other persons just before, received to show the deceased's reason for arresting); 1895, State v. Foley, 130 Mo. 482, 32 S. W. 973 (asking a defendant whether he was concerned in a former attempt to rob, allowed, as showing that the officer for an assault on whom he was now on trial had reason to arrest him on suspicion of the former offence).

Distinguish the following question: 1903, People v. Glennon, 175 N. Y. 45, 67 N. E. 125 (patrolman's neglect of duty in failing to arrest the keepers of a disorderly house; specific conduct of the inmates, admitted to show the defendant's knowledge of its character).

[5] 1773, Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 20 How. St. Tr. 137 (false imprisonment; defence, fear of the raising of a seditious mob by the plaintiff; statements to the defendant that a mob was being raised by plaintiff, admitted to show defendant's apprehensions; see the quotstion post, § 1785); 1821, Redford v. Birley, 1 State Tr. N. s. 1071, 1174 (battery in dispersing a mob: whether persons expressed to the magistrates their apprehensions of danger, admitted, not as evidence of the alarm but as facts on which the magistrates might properly have acted; for a further consideration of the classes of evidence connected with mob violence, see post, § 1790); 1854, Main v. McCarty, 15 Ill. 441 (battery; plea, resistance to the defendant while arresting; "what did persons in the crowd say" to the officers, admitted); 1849, Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 240 (malicious prosecution; third person's information to the defendant, admitted); 1870, Friend v. Hamill, 34 Md. 298, 308 (information to plaintiff, admitted in an action for malicious prosecution); 1868, Simmons v. Holster, 13 Minn. 249, 258 (reasonable ground for charging the plaintiff as a thief, to disprove malice; the defendant had made the charge on the faith of Mrs. J.'s statement to him of what she had seen; Mrs. J.'s bad character for veracity was then admitted to show that the defendant "could not reasonably rely upon her statements"; compare Hastings v. Stone, Mass., cited ante, § 73); 1869, Castner v. Sliker, 33 N. J. L. 507, 508 (battery; plea, self-defence; statements of bystanders declining to interfere, admitted to show whether the defendant had reason to expect assistance).

For the application of the Hearsay rule here, see post, § 1789.

ple of the fourth mode (noted ante, § 245), one experience with counterfeit money or with stolen goods may conceivably result in revealing the counterfeit or stolen character of the article, so that a knowledge arises which is applicable to the subsequent dealing now charged as criminal because done with knowledge. It is, however, so difficult to distinguish this use of former dealings to show Knowledge from the use of former dealings to show Intent or to show Design, that all three subjects are best dealt with together (post, §§ 300–371).

§ 260. (12) Possessor of a Document. The possession of a document is an important and often the only circumstance to show that its possessor has by reading it become aware of its contents; the inference rests on the probable operation of the element (1) already noted (ante, § 245):

1581, Campion's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 1050, 1066; Campion, the Jesuit, being charged with administering treasonable oaths, and a certain papist book being found in his "budget," Anderson, Queen's counsel, asked him: "To what end, then, should you carry this book about you if you were not purposed to do as it prescribeth?" Campion: "Many casualties and events may happen whereby a man may be endangered, ere he beware, by the carrying of a thing whereof he knoweth not, — as, either the malice of others that privily convey it amongst his other provisions, or his own negligence or oversight which marketh not attentively what he took with him."

1837, Bosanquet, J., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 364, 376: "Knowledge of letters and of other things found in a place accessible to him in his own house or apartments, may sometimes be presumed; such as writings connected with the charge, upon a charge of treason; notes or other documents forged or partly forged, upon a charge of forgery; instruments of coining or house-breaking, upon charges of coining or burglary."[1]

This use of such evidence needs however to be distinguished from its use for other purposes, which are frequently associated in the same litigation; for (a) it may be used to evidence an assent to the document's contents or an admission of their truth (post, §§ 1073, 1074), or (b) the presence of the document on a person's premises or among his effects may be used to evidence his possession of it at a prior time (ante, § 157), and thus to lead to one of the [1] 1817, R. v. Watson, 2 Stark. 116 (placard); 1822, Scott v. Waithman, 3 id. 170 (possession by sheriff of writs giving information); 1843, R. v. Zulueta, 1 C. & K. 215, 224 (here not traced in fact to his possession); 1851, Holbrook v. Jackson, 7 Cush. 136, 147, 153 (transfer in fraud of creditors; books of the vendor, not a party, admitted to show his knowledge of his insolvency, irrespective of the authorship of the entries; "every merchant must be presumed to know and in fact from his balance sheet and books generally does know the state of his concerns"; for the question whether a partner or shareholder may be charged with notice of the books of the firm or corporation, see post, § 1074); 1901, People v. Higgins, 127 Mich. 291, 86 N. W. 812 (possession of a manuscript story of a murder, in the accused's handwriting, admitted).

Distinguish the question whether keeping a document is a waiver of the right to dissent or rescind: 1898, McMaster v. Ins. Co., 30 C. C. A. 532, 87 Fed. 63, 171 U. S. 687, 18 Sup. 944, 183 U. S. 25, 22 Sup. 10; 1902, Bostwick v. Ins Co., — Wis. —, 89 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246; or is an admission of the truth of its contents (post, § 1073).

The following much-debated ruling rests on the present principle, together with that of § 148, ante, and the opinions are instructive, and are quoted ante, § 228, in considering evidence of insanity: 1837, Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 325, 364, 369, 376, 390, 407; s. c., 5 Cl. & F. 670, 694, 703, 710, 716, 723, 736, 741, 767, 774 (a letter found in M.'s bookcase-cupboard, opened; if M. had been a person of sound mind, the inference would be that he had opened, read, and deposited it; but as his sanity was the main issue, the inference was not allowed by a majority of the judges).

above inferences; or (c) the possession of a document may serve other evidential purposes already sufficiently compared (ante, §§ 156, 157).

§ 261. Miscellaneous Instances of Belief or Knowledge evidenced by Circumstances. In the four ways already noted (ante, § 245), belief or knowledge of various other facts may be properly evidenced. (1) By direct exposure to the senses, the observed appearance of a person or thing may evidence some quality material to the issue.[1] (2) Express communication is always a proper mode of evidencing knowledge or belief.[2] Communication to a husband or wife is always receivable to show probable knowledge by the other (except where they are living apart or are not on good terms), because, while it is not certain that the one will tell the other, and while the probability is less upon some subjects than upon others, still there is always some probability, — which is all that can be fairly asked for admissibility.[3] (3) Reputation, or general discussion in a community or a part of it, may be useful in a variety of ways as showing the probability of knowledge or belief by a member of the community or a local circle.[4]

2. Conduct, as Evidence of Knowledge, Belief, or Consciousness.

§ 265. General Principle. It has already been pointed out (ante, § 244) that a second chief sort of evidence for proving that mental state which is termed Knowledge, Belief, or Consciousness, consists of Conduct of the person to whom the mental state is attributed. In this sort of evidence, we argue from an observed effect — conduct — to the probable cause — a specific mental state; and not, as in the preceding sort (ante, §§ 245, 261), from cause to effect, i. e. from outward events to an ensuing mental state. The basis of

[1] 1874, Jaques v. Sax, 39 Ia. 370 (a minor's being engaged in business; appearance admitted); 1888, Hermann v. State, 73 Wis. 248, 41 N. W. 171 (personal appearance of a girl, admitted to show whether the defendant knew the girl to be under 21, in a prosecution for keeping a house of ill-fame knowing an inmate to be under 21).

[2] 1831, Taylor v. Willans, 2 B. & Ad. 845, 855, 858 (a letter to a justice of the peace, purporting to be from a Judge; admitted merely to show why the justice admitted an accused to bail); 1858, Tobin v. Shaw, 45 Me. 347 (the issue being whether the plaintiff's voluntary destruction of letters would prevent her from producing secondary evidence of them under the principle of § 1198, post, her sister was allowed to tell what advice she gave the plaintiff about destroying them, so as to negative the charge of fraudulent destruction); 1857, Com. v. Castles, 9 Gray 121 (charge that the defendant substituted a false deed for a deed which W. supposed he was signing: the difference in the deeds being shown, a prior conversation of the defendant with a third person was admitted to show that the defendant knew what W. was really intending to sign); 1869, Williams v. Poppleton, 3 Or. 143 (consultation by other surgeons with one charged with malpractice).

[3] The precedents tend to be too strict: 1842, Oden v. Stubblefield, 4 Ala. 41 (Collier, C. J.: "It by no means follows that the wife informs the husband of everything she may hear, especially if it be not likely to interest or affect him in some way. Now it does not appear [in a case where notice of a previous unrecorded sale of slaves by the plaintiff to a third party was charged] that the defendant had or was about to acquire an interest in the slaves at the time the wife heard the deed from the plaintiff spoken of, so that it cannot be reasonably intended that she repeated what she heard"); 1843, Petrie v. Rose, 5 W. & S. 364, 366 (slander by a wife; communication of suspicious facts, tending to negative malice, to the husband of the defendant, held properly rejected).

[4] 1875, Clinton v. Howard, 42 Conn. 294, 310 (to show the diminished value of a frightened horse, evidence was admitted as to the extent of local knowledge of the horse having run away through this fright); 1888, Tucker v. Constable, 16 Or. 407, 409, 19 Pac. 13 (statutory action for unlawfully gelding an animal knowing it to be kept for covering; reputation, semble, held admissible; but here the indefinite fact that the animal was "generally known" to be so kept, was held insufficient); 1888, State v. Flint, 60 Vt. 304, 310, 319, 14 Atl. 178 (notoriety of a crime in a village by a certain time, admitted to show knowledge by one there).

the inference, here as elsewhere, is our experience of the operation of human nature. The general principle of Relevancy (ante, §§ 31, 38) applies, that the evidential fact should be received whenever the factum probandum is at least a fairly possible or a probable inference, though not the conclusive or the most probable one.

But it is not in the application of the principle of Relevancy that the special difficulties of this subject are found. In only two or three of its applications are there any controverted points; the notable ones, perhaps, are the questions as to the inference from Innocent Conduct (post, § 293) and the inference from Non-Production of Testimony (post, §§ 285–291. The peculiar problem of this subject lies rather in the fact that conduct admissible enough from the present point of view may also be regarded as being in effect an assertion and therefore as obnoxious to the Hearsay rule, which excludes the use of testimonial assertions made out of court. For example, on an issue of legitimacy, the parents' conduct, in treating the child as legitimate, is a circumstance from which may easily be inferred their belief in his birth since marriage, and from that belief may be inferred the ultimate fact; yet, this conduct of theirs is also, in another view, equivalent to a declaration of his legitimacy, and thus a hearsay statement, not to be received except as an admission of the parties to the suit or under some specific exception to the Hearsay rule. It is this double aspect of the conduct-evidence that presents the chief difficulty of principle. Again, when a person's utterances are offered as indicating his knowledge of a fact mentioned by him, the utterance may circumstantially reveal the factum probandum, his knowledge; yet the utterance cannot be used as an assertion, to evidence the truth of the fact asserted, because the Hearsay rule forbids; and thus it is necessary constantly to discriminate between the circumstantial and the testimonial use of such utterances.

The specific uses of conduct-evidence may now be noticed in detail, keeping in mind that the circumstantial use of such evidence presents little difficulty on principles of relevancy, and that it is the testimonial use which is obnoxious to Hearsay rule and thus creates a special complication.[1]

§ 266. Conduct and Utterances, as Evidence of Knowledge or Belief, as a Fact in Issue. Conduct and word-utterances may betray the knowledge or belief of the actor or speaker, in so far as the specific act or utterance is of a tenor which cannot well be supposed to have been willed without the inner existence of that knowledge or belief. For example, A's act of boarding a railroad train is some evidence of his belief as to the destination of the train; B's act of taking a purse, found by him in the street, to the house of X, is some evidence that he knows or believes X to be the loser of the purse. So, also, for the verbal[1] utterance; A's mention of Charles the Great or Roentgen rays or the Klondike is some evidence that he knows or is aware of the existence of such a person, thing, or place. For such instances of conduct, including utterances, as evidence of knowledge or belief, there can be no general test of relevancy; ordinary experience usually suffices, without controversy, to tell us whether the inference is at least a fairly possible one, and therefore whether the evidence is admissible. Every trial illustrates the principle; and such judicial rulings as have been made are seldom of use as precedents:

[1] For the distinction between circumstantial and testimonial evidence, see ante, § 25, post, § 479.

[1] "Verbal" is here used in its proper sense of "that which is expressed in words"; it is not synonymous with "oral," which is the term of contrast with "written."

1703, Hathaway's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 639, 654; cheating by pretending to be bewitched; one Dr. M. had been reviled by the populace for helping to exonerate Sarah M., who had been tried for bewitching the defendant; it was argued that "other people's censuring the doctor cannot be brought as evidence against my client"; but L. C. J. Holt answered: "What other people have said, abstractedly considered, ought not to affect Richard Hathaway. But if there be evidence that Hathaway hath been guilty of deceit and a design to deceive people, will you not allow it to be given in evidence that the people have been deceived? . . . Now Dr. Martin's evidence is what Hathaway did and that people did believe him to be bewitched." [2]

The important thing is that, so far as the evidential fact consists in an utterance of words, it is receivable for the present purpose, as circumstantial evidence; and that, so long as it is offered for that purpose only and not as an assertion to be credited like testimony, it is not obnoxious to the Hearsay rule. For example, A's mention of X's insolvency is receivable as circumstantial evidence of A's knowledge, but not as testimonial evidence of X's insolvency. The distinction is elsewhere examined, from the point of view of the Hearsay rule (post, § 1790); it is enough to note here that it is well established:

[2] 1759, Eugene Aram's Trial, Eng. (one Daniel Clark having been missing for thirteen years, a human skeleton was discovered and suspected to be his; at an inquest, Aram and Houseman, with whom Clark had been seen just before his disappearance, were summoned; and Houseman, when shown the bones, said: "This is no more Daniel Clark's bone than it is mine"; whence it was inferred that he knew something of the whereabouts of Clark; and he subsequently confessed, pointing out Clark's skeleton at an entirely different place); 1879, State v. Allen, 47 Conn. 132 (language by the accused implying knowledge); 1895, Leslie v. State, 35 Fla. 182, 17 So. 558 (an offer to return stolen property, as showing knowledge that it was stolen); 1850, Com. v. Webster, Mass., Bemis' Rep. 178 (the defendant had asked whether they had found the whole of Dr. Parkman's body; indicating a knowledge that it had been cut up); 1896, Cary v. Crowe, 165 Mass. 139, 42 N. E. 563 (laughter, showing knowledge of the place of an arson); 1903, Hayes v. Pitts-Kimball Co., — id. —, 67 N. E. 248 (whether deceased was conscious before death; his utterances admitted); 1880, State v. Howard, 82 N. C. 627 (murder; language showing that the defendant knew the deceased had money in his house); 1853, Moore v. State, 2 Oh. St. 500, 506 (a few days after a murder by strangling, the defendant remarked that he could kill a man by strangling and described the process; admitted as indicating that the accused's mind was running on the subject, as the guilty person's would be); 1899, Slavens v. R. Co., 38 C. C. A. 151, 97 Fed. 255 (injured person's declarations showing knowledge of danger, admitted; here justified under the res gestæ notion, post, § 1745); 1896, Forbes v. Morse, 69 Vt. 220, 37 Atl. 295 (to show that a letter was written after July 30, the mention therein of facts occurring since that date was held some evidence); 1901, State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 39 S. E. 676 (language indicating a knowledge of the circumstances of the murder, admitted). The following case rests on peculiar facts: 1886, R. v. Gunnell, 16 Cox Cr. 154 (under a statute exempting a bankrupt who first "disclosed" his malfeasance under examination, certain remarks of M. indicating his knowledge of the malfeasance were excluded). This class of utterances may also be offered as admissions, when the person is an adverse party, a grantor, or the like (post, §§ 1076, 1081, 1083, 1086).

1810, DuBost v. Beresford, 2 Camp. 511; libel: "Lord Ellenborough held . . . that the declarations of the testators while they looked at the picture in the exhibition-room were evidence to show that the figures portrayed were meant [rather, were understood] to represent the defendant's sister and brother-in law."

1890, Knowlton, J., in Chase v. Lowell, 151 Mass. 422, 24 N. E. 212 (notice of the rottenness of a tree's roots was in issue, and to show knowledge by the city the evidence mentioned was offered): "The acts of persons in looking at the roots were an important part of the evidence. From this it might be inferred that they noticed the decayed condition of the roots. . . . The remarks made at the time rendered it certain that the view of the roots gave notice of the defect to those who then saw them."

1892, Field, C. J., Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 188, 31 N. E. 961: "Suppose that it had been denied at the trial that the deceased knew that she was pregnant, testimony that she had said that she was pregnant would be some evidence that she knew it, [though not that she was so.]"[3]

It is to be noted that there is a specific Hearsay exception for assertions as to declarant's mental condition; and thus an utterance of that particular sort —e. g. "I know where the money is," as distinguished from "The money is hid in my house"—is receivable equally by either of the two avenues, as circumstantial evidence and as a testimonial assertion; so that Courts seldom discriminate carefully; the use of such utterances under the Hearsay exception is considered post, §§ 1714, 1731. This exception includes also assertions of an internal state of physical suffering, existing at the time of the assertion, but not of a past condition (post, 1718).

Nevertheless, this Hearsay exception, being subject to certain limitations, will often not suffice for the purpose in hand, and the present, or circumstantial, use of such utterances may become the only available one. For example, in actions on life-insurance policies, where the deceased's misrepresentations as to his health are in issue, his statements as to a prior illness would be inadmissible under the Hearsay exception to prove that illness, and might also not be receivable as a party's admissions (under § 1081, post); and yet, if the fact of the illness were otherwise evidenced, the deceased's statement might be receivable as circumstantial evidence of his knowledge of it.[4]

[3] Other illustrations are found in the preceding note.

[4] 1901, Towne v. Towne, 191 Ill. 178, 61 N. E. 426 (insured's conduct and declarations admitted, on the issue of his knowledge of the contents of a certificate held by him); 1875, Swift v. Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 187 (the issue being whether a statement by the insured that he had not had scrofula was knowingly false, the insured's statements, made within a year previous, to persons who saw him walk lame and saw a sore in his side, as to the cause of the ailment, were admitted, as tending "to prove with more or less certainty, as the cause and character of the ailment are more or less in the common and unskilled knowledge of men, that the cause and character of it are known to him"; the opinion somewhat obscurely justifies the use of these statements also as admissions; it also requires that the statements be not too remote); 1876, Edington v. Ins. Co., 67 id. 193 (similar); 1877, Dilleber v. Ins. Co., 69 id. 256, 260 (similar); 1896, Mutual L. I. Co. v. Seeley, 19 C. C. A. 331, 72 Fed. 980 (affidavits of third persons, the contents not being known to insured, excluded; Swift v. Ins. Co. cited); 1899, McGowan v. Supreme Court, 104 Wis. 173, 80 N. W. 603 (insured's statements of a condition of disease too remote in time to be material, not received as admissions; but, after other evidence of his condition at the time of application, held admissible to evidence his knowledge of that condition); 1902, Rawson v. Ins. Co., 115 id. 641, 92 N. W. 378 (insured's statements in 1895, admitted to show his knowledge of a disease, regardless of their remoteness from the issuance of a policy in 1896, where the alleged false representation was that he had never had the disease). If the insured's knowledge is immaterial under the issues, then his statements are not receivable: 1880, Union Cent. L. I. Co. v. Cheever, 36 Oh. St. 201, 208.

§ 267. Conduct as Evidence of Belief, and thus of the Fact Believed; General Principle. In the cases dealt with in the foregoing section, the knowledge or belief — i. e. the mental condition — to be evidenced was of itself material to the issue as a factum probandum, — e. g. whether an insured knew of his illness, or whether the public were made to believe in a certain defamatory meaning. There is however a large class of cases where the belief or knowledge or consciousness (whatever may be the appropriate usage of terms for the mental condition) is of service only evidentially, as forming a second step of inference to some other fact which forms the ultimate object of proof. It has already been noted (ante, § 172) that an act or event may be evidenced, retrospectively, by the traces left by it, and that, in theory, these evidential traces may be not merely physical and organic, but also mental or psychical, i. e. the evidence would consist in the consciousness or belief of some person as to the happening or doing of the prior event or act, which has left its impression on him. But, since his belief or consciousness can itself be evidenced only by his conduct or utterances, there would always be two steps of inference involved in using that belief or consciousness, — first, the conduct or utterance to evidence the belief, and next, the belief to evidence the act or event believed. Now the former of these inferences is of the class here concerned; and it is at this point, therefore, that we are able to take up the question whether, as a whole, this double step of inference is allowable.

What, then, are the objections to it? Plainly, that it is practically often equivalent to the inference from testimonial evidence, and that therefore we should be violating the Hearsay rule by accepting an extra-judicial assertion as evidence of the fact asserted. For example, on an issue of the existence of a lost will, suppose the fact to be offered that the deceased on his death bed told his daughter, "My will is in the iron chest"; or, on an issue of legitimacy, suppose the fact to be offered that the parents always treated the child as their own. In these instances suppose it to be argued that the deceased's utterance indicates circumstantially his belief in the will's existence, and that his belief in turn indicates the fact of the will's existence; or that the parents' conduct leads to the inference that they believed the child to have been born to them after marriage, and that this belief evidences the fact of such birth. Such a double circumstantial inference is in theory perfectly possible and proper. But, after all, is not the process practically equivalent to accepting the deceased's declaration and the parents' conduct in a purely assertive and testimonial fashion, i. e. to admitting directly their assertions about the will and the child, precisely if they were on the stand and credit were asked for their testimonial assertions to that effect? And if such evidence were allowed to come in as circumstantial, could not any and every hearsay statement be brought in upon the same plea, by resolving it into a double inference, namely, by translating A's assertion, that he saw M strike N, into an inference from his utterance to his belief and from his belief to the fact asserted? Short of such an extreme deduction, it seems at first sight impossible to stop. It is plain enough that the settled analogies in the rules of circumstantial inference, as well as the modes of reasoning in every-day affairs, justify us in claiming that the inference from conduct to belief and from belief to the fact believed is, in theory at least, a legitimate one. Yet, on the other hand there is force in the argument that the pretended double inference of a circumstantial sort is equivalent to giving credit to a testimonial assertion, and involves therefore a danger of evasion of the Hearsay rule. The latter argument has been well set forth in the following passages:

1838, Vaughan, J., in Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & F. 670, 733 (the sending of letters to a testator by various persons was offered as conduct or "treatment" tending to show their belief in his sanity, and thus the fact of that sanity): "Acts performed by strangers, expressive not merely of opinion, but of the strongest conviction, even in cases where such conviction conflicts altogether with the interest of the person entertaining it, — even such acts as these the law will not allow to be presented to the minds of jurymen as evidence. They are merely opinions expressed in different language, — in the language of conduct instead of the language of words. They may be acts involving a great sacrifice of personal interest, as the payment of a policy of insurance by an underwriter on a marine loss; and therefore as moral evidence they may be very cogent. Yet does the law, more rigid and inflexible, resist the weight of such moral evidence, although in the ordinary transactions common sense and experience might possibly yield to it. As acts of strangers, the law regards them as personal admissions, which cannot affect third parties; as the opinions of strangers, they bear the general insufficiency and infirmity of hearsay evidence, without any claim to the privilege which in some peculiar subjects of inquiry is extended to that class of proof."

Parke, B., in the same case (in the lower Court), 7 A. & E. 313, 386: "For example, if a wager to a large amount had been made as to the matter in issue by two third persons, the payment of that wager, however large the sum, would not be admissible to prove the truth of the matter in issue. You would not have any right to present it to the jury as raising an inference of the truth of the fact on the ground that otherwise the bet would not have been paid. It is after all nothing but the mere statement of that fact with strong evidence of the belief of it by the party making it. . . . [To the same sort of evidence] belong the supposed conduct of the family or relations of a testator, taking the same precautions, in his absence, as if he were a lunatic; his election, in his absence, to some high and responsible office; the conduct of a physician, who permitted a will to be executed by a sick testator; the conduct of a deceased captain on a question of seaworthiness, who, after examining every part of the vessel, embarked in it with his family. All these, when deliberately considered, are, with reference to the matter in issue in each case, mere instances of hearsay evidence, mere statements, not on oath, but implied in or vouched for by the actual conduct of persons by whose acts the litigant parties are not to be bound. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that proof of a particular fact, which is not of itself a matter in issue, but which is relevant only as implying a statement or opinion of a third person on the matter in issue, is inadmissible in all cases where such a statement or opinion not on oath [in court] would be of itself inadmissible."

What exit did the common law take from this dilemma? It followed that instinct of compromise which has affected so many British institutions; it conceded something to both principles. In a few specific instances, mostly of traditional inheritance, it yielded fully to the theory of circumstantial inference; in a large group of other instances, it yielded in fact, but only because the evidence was commonly there also admissible for other reasons, and thus it became practically of no consequence which theory was relied on for its reception; and in all remaining instances it denied the propriety of the circumstantial inference and insisted on the application of the Hearsay rule to conduct which was equivalent to an extra-judicial assertion. These three classes of cases may now be briefly noticed in advance.

(a) First, where the desired inference leads up to a personal deed, of radical force and natural psychologic significance, and thus the circumstantial nature of the inference strongly dominates the testimonial aspect, a few classes of cases are recognized in which the former is conceded to be legitimate. The distinction thus reached is a fairly practical one. For example, a criminal act leaves usually on the mind a deep trace, in the shape of a consciousness of guilt, and from this consciousness of guilt we may argue to the doing of the deed by the bearer of the trace. The reliance is not upon the testimonial credit of the person, but upon psychologic forces closely analogous to the forces of external nature. As an axe leaves its mark in the speechless tree, so an evil deed leaves its mark in the evil doer's consciousness. But as soon as that type of consciousness is left aside, and we turn to a consciousness based upon any other past experience, i. e. upon the impressions from hearing or seeing another's deed or an outward event in general, we are dealing with that commonplace sort of mental trace or impression which is the basis of ordinary assertions and testimony, and the circumstantial use of it becomes merged and swallowed up in the testimonial use. On some such real basis of distinction as this, then, we find that the circumstantial use of conduct and belief is plainly allowed by the law to be resorted to in a few classes of cases covering some sort of personal deed of emphatic significance and effect. Of those classes, the following are chiefly to be noted: (1) a Consciousness of Guilt, as evidenced by flight or the like (post, §§ 273–291); this is ordinarily offered against the defendant in the case, and thus might be accounted for under the second class (b, infra), but it is also receivable of a third person, to show him to be the guilty one and thus to exonerate the defendant (ante, § 142), and must therefore be reckoned under the present head;[1] (2) a Belief in a Marriage, as evidenced by the conduct of a pair living and treating each other as husband and wife (post, § 268); this has been from time immemorial received, whether or not the persons are parties or privies to the suit, and is a plain use of the double circumstantial inference; (3) a Belief in Legitimacy, as evidenced by the treatment of a child by its alleged parents (post, § 269); this, again, is a tradition of long standing, and can be justified only on circumstantial grounds; (4) a Belief in Personal Name, Family History, and the like, as evidenced by conduct and language, and as tending to prove identity with a person in issue (post, § 270); this is recognized in a few instances only, but seems nevertheless orthodox; (5) a Belief in a Testamentary Act, as evidenced by the alleged testator's conduct and utterances (post, § 271); this use of such evidence has been sanctioned by a few judges, but there is a decided repudiation of it by others.[3]

[1] This is also shown by the fact that the rules for Confessions (post, § 821) are treated as not applicable to such conduct.

(b) In the second class of cases is to be included that sort of conduct which is received only when it emanates from a party to the cause or a witness, and can therefore be equally justified as involving an admission on a self-contradiction. Such conduct, for example, as the fabrication or suppression of evidence, the failure to produce important witnesses or documents, indicates a consciousness that one's cause is a bad one or a weak one, and from this consciousness or belief may be inferred the fact that it is bad or weak, i. e. that facts essential for its support are lacking (post, §§ 273–293). So also, from a witness' failure on a former trial to state a fact which he now asserts, may be inferred that he did not then believe it and thus that it did not in truth occur. In criminal causes, such guilty conduct on the part of the accused may be treated as a trace of his own criminal deed, and thus would fall under the first class (a), above examined; and it is in fact so treated, by receiving it also when proved for persons other than the accused and by not applying to it the rules for confessions. But in civil causes, and for witnesses, the belief or consciousness relates back usually to some act or event not a personal deed, — as, for example, in the case of the assignee of a contract or the principal of a tortious agent, — and thus would fall usually without the class in which the circumstantial inference would be the primary one. Accordingly, while the circumstantial inference is always an underlying one and a real one, the assertive value of the evidence becomes more apparent; and in consequence, such conduct can be received only so far as there is some other avenue of entrance which removes from it the obstacle of the Hearsay rule. Two such ways are open; such conduct from a party, even if treated as a plain assertion, is at any rate an Admission, and is therefore receivable as such in any case; such conduct from a witness is receivable as a self-contradiction or an act of corruption, and therefore receivable in any case. The result is that while the evidence is indeed conduct, and not assertion, yet the objection that it is equivalent to assertion, and therefore obnoxious to the Hearsay rule, is obviated by receiving it only when it is predicated of a party or a witness. In other words, the inference from conduct remains essentially circumstantial, but the danger of the conduct being accepted also as assertion is cured by restricting it to those cases where it would be received even though it were unmixed assertion. Hence it is sometimes judicially spoken of as an admission, or an "admission by conduct." More correctly speaking, it is still conduct, but the doctrine of admissions serves to remove from it the reproach of its potential quality as an assertion. In short, the doctrine of admissions is not the reason for its reception, but is the reason for its not being excluded. All evidence, therefore, of that class is properly to be treated here, in collation with other inferences of a similar sort from conduct to belief or consciousness.[8]

[3] Another class of cases, not properly belonging here, consists of those in which the conduct of third persons is received as evidence of the dangerousness of a place, or the like (post, §§ 459 ff.).

(c) Whatever remains, then, in the way of conduct-evidence as supporting an inference of the person's belief and thus of the fact believed, is in general, apart from the two preceding groups, declared inadmissible, as being too open to construction as assertions and therefore as mere hearsay. The reasoning on which this result is reached is sufficiently set forth in the passages from Wright v. Tatham, above quoted. The language of those opinions ignores, to be sure, the well-settled exceptions of the first group (a) just summarized; but, apart from these allowances, it fairly represents the general attitude of the law. Whatever instances of opposite tendency may be noted in the following sections, and however well-founded these may be in a given case, they must be regarded as casual and unusual.

§ 268. Marriage, as evidenced by Conduct or Habit. When the fact of marriage is in issue — whether a consensual or a ceremonial marriage — the subsequent conduct of the man and the woman said to have been the parties to it is receivable to evidence the marriage. This conduct is traditionally spoken of as "habit"; and this common source of proof, with the reputation-evidence which usually accompanies it, has come to be known by the phrase "habit and repute."[1] The logical nature of the argument indicates it plainly to fall under the present principle; that is, from the conduct of the man and the woman as married persons may be inferred their firm belief that they were at some prior time made husband and wife, and from this belief may be inferred the fact. That this sort of evidence is admissible seems not to have been questioned; there is an important question, depending upon a different principle, whether it is alone sufficient evidence of a marriage (post, §§ 2082–2088); there is another principle which governs the use of reputation as evidence of marriage (post, §§ 1602–1604); and there is still another principle which admits hearsay declarations of marriage under the Family-History exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1480 ff.); but the propriety of the present sort of evidence, exceptional though it is (as already pointed out in § 267), seems not to have been doubted. This is partly due to the circumstance that in any event it would commonly have been receivable from another point of view, — for example, as falling under the above Hearsay exception, when the persons in question were deceased; or as Admissions of a party, when the person whose conduct was offered, or his successor in interest, was a party to the cause. But, at any rate, it has commonly been used when no such mode of justifying it was tenable, and its propriety is now too firmly established to be for a moment questionable. The following passage, from a writer the most learned and comprehensive in his familiarity with the traditions and the lore of genealogical controversies, serves to illustrate the scope of this class of evidence:

[8] So far, however, as witnesses are concerned, it is impracticable, in treatment, to separate this sort of evidence from other analagous sorts of impeaching evidence, and the principles are discussed together, post, §§ 956 ff., 1040 ff.

[1] This term is further defined post, § 2083.

1844, Mr. J. Hubback, Succession, 247: "The parties' assertions of marriage and the general reputation of the fact may be evidenced with as much strength and distinctness by actions as by words. Thus the former may appear by their elopement and return as married persons. Their visiting with families of respectability was successfully relied on in the claim to the Say and Sele Barony, and was dwelt upon as a strong fact by Abbott, C. J., in summing up the evidence in the case of Beer v. Ward. And similar weight was ascribed to the fact of a husband procuring a woman to be presented at Court as his wife. . . . Proof of the observance of customs which are peculiar to the entry upon or subsistence of the state of marriage is evidence of the same description, and will assist the inference that the contract has been duly constituted. By the civil law the Roman custom of traductio ad domum was a conclusive presumption of matrimony, and by the canon law similar weight was ascribed to it, if observed in places where it was a solemnity usual upon bringing brides to their husband's houses. So in England the circumstances of the man impaling the woman's arms with his own upon his plate, seals and carriage, and in another case that of the father of the person whose legitimacy was disputed having appointed with the clergyman a day for the mother to be churched, were severally treated as carrying considerable weight in evidence of marriage. On the same principle, the assumption by the woman of the name of the man, the gestatio annuli, or wearing by her of her wedded ring, or (in countries where a difference exists) of apparel peculiar to married women, are acts, which, if they be done sciente, vidente, et patiente viro, may be considered as so many tacit declarations by the parties of the existence of a marriage between them. To these circumstances may be added that of the parties joining as husband and wife in fines or other assurances for the purpose of passing the right of the latter to dower, and the entry in the register of the woman's burial by the description of the wife or widow of the man. And the mere cohabitation of two persons of different sexes, or their behavior in other respects as husband and wife, always affords an inference of greater or less strength, that a marriage has been solemnized between them. Their conduct being susceptible of two opposite explanations, is to be moral rather than immoral, and credit is to be given to their own assertions, whether express or implied, of a fact peculiarly within their own knowledge."

It may be noted that upon this principle a certificate of marriage which otherwise would be receivable only under the Hearsay exception (post, § 1645), may, if found in the person's possession, be admissible as exhibiting the person's belief as to his marriage.[2] The principle is also sometimes extended to admit, on an issue of breach of marriage-promise, the woman's subsequent conduct (in preparing a wedding-outfit, and the like) as evidence of her prior act of assent to the promise.[3]

[2] 1886, Camden v. Belgrade, 78 Me. 204, 209, 3 Atl. 652 ("a paper found in the possession of one of the parties to the alleged marriage, or produced by such party, purporting to be a marriage certificate, is admissible upon the ground that such a possession or such a production of it is equivalent to a declaration of such party that the facts stated in the certificate are true, . . . without separate and distinct evidence of its genuineness or that it was given by one acting in an official capacity"). Distinguish the following case: 1848, Com. v. Morris, 1 Cush. 391 (adultery; unauthenticated certificate in possession of a woman said to be defendant's wife, excluded, her conduct not being evidence against him).

It has been suggested that conduct as a married person after cohabitation is ended is inadmissible, but this is perhaps not necessarily so; 1881, Dysart Peerage Case, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 489, 499, 502 (legitimacy of a child born in 1863, of an alleged informal marriage with A in 1844, another marriage with B having been openly celebrated in 1851; the husband's declarations, after 1851, of the first woman being his lawful wife, excluded; his conduct and statements "as one of the alleged marrying parties" up to that date would have been receivable; but after that date, the res gestæ of the first cohabitation being ended, his statements were solely testimonial; the principle of party's admissions or of the pedigree exception being not here available). Contra: 1886, Camden v. Belgrade, 78 Me. 204, 212, 3 Atl. 652. Compare the citations post, § 1770.

[3] The cases are collected post, § 1770.

§ 269. Legitimacy, as evidenced by Parents' Conduct. Upon an issue of the legitimacy of a child, the conduct of the parents towards the child is admissible on the present principle, as involving an inference from the parents' conduct to their belief as to the fact on which the legitimacy depends (time of birth, time of marriage, identity of the child, and the like), and then from that belief to the fact itself. Such evidence has traditionally been received since Solomon's day; though perhaps the more easily, inasmuch as it would usually, as in the case of marriage-conduct (ante, § 268), be also defensible under the Family-History exception to the Hearsay rule, when the parents were deceased, or under the doctrine of Admissions, when the parents or their successors in interest are parties to the cause. But its orthodoxy from the present point of view is not only established by its traditional reception free from any reference to the limitations of those two special doctrines, but also is plainly declared as a matter of theory by the exposition of eminent judges:

The Judgment of Solomon, First Book of the Kings, III, 16: "Then came there two women, that were harlots, unto the king, and stood before him. And the one woman said, O my lord, I and this woman dwell in one house; and I was delivered of a child with her in the house. And it came to pass the third day after that I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also: and we were together; there was no stranger with us in the house, save we two in the house. And this woman's child died in the night, because she overlaid it. And she arose at midnight, and took my son from beside me, while thy handmaid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child in my bosom. And when I rose in the morning to give my child suck, behold, it was dead: but when I had considered it in the morning, behold, it was not my son, which I did bear. And the other woman said, Nay; but the living is my son, and the dead is thy son. And this said, No, but the dead is thy son, and this is my son. Thus they spake before the king. Then said the king, The one saith, This is my son that liveth, and thy son is the dead; and the other saith, Nay; but thy son is the dead, and my son is the living. And the king said, Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other. Then spake the woman whose the living child was unto the king, for her bowels yearned upon her son, and she said, O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it. But the other said, Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it. Then the king answered and said, Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it: she is the mother thereof. And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king: for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment."[1]

1810, L. C. Eldon, in Banbury Peerage Case,[2] App. to LeMarchant's Gardner Peerage Case, 490: "Evidence of the conduct of the supposed parents of the child appears to me to be admissible evidence upon this question [of legitimacy]. My lords, when two women each claimed a particular child as hers, and called upon a person to decide between them, he ordered that the child should be severed into two parts, and that each take half; the true mother instantly waived her claim; and he decided, upon that, that the child was hers. What is the lesson which this story teaches? Not, perhaps, that mere declarations are evidence in such a case; for such declarations may be made for a temporary purpose

[1] A similar judgment is attributed in Japan by tradition to the great judge Oka Tadasuke, who lived in the early 1700s. By the Japanese version, the judge orders the two claimants to grasp the child and pull each one towards herself, the strongest to be the victorious claimant. The judgment is found in a popular collection known as "Oka Seidan," and has been translated by Mr. Walter Dening, in his "English Readers for Japanese High Schools," Book I, p. 131.

[2] Lord Eldon's remarks are also given in Nicolas, Adulterine Bastardy, 524.

(In that case both women made declarations, and one of course made false declarations); but it teaches that the conduct of a parent, the feelings of a parent — those feelings being inferred from such conduct — afford us some evidence assisting us in arriving at a right conclusion as to the matter in controversy. It has been argued at the bar that mere declarations of parents on such subjects are not admissible evidence to affect a question of legitimacy, and that conduct is precisely the same thing; that it is substantially nothing more than a declaration; that it is only a declaration by deed instead of by word. I will not say that all simple declarations are evidence in such a case; but I will say that the conduct of a husband and wife towards a person claiming to be their legitimate child is in some cases admissible evidence upon the question whether the husband and wife had sexual intercourse at such time as by the course of nature that child might have been the fruit of that intercourse. It is often a most material species of evidence. It is not always, but it is frequently a safe ground for inference; for it comes from the least suspicious source, that is, from the very individuals who are the most interested to give a different testimony. If there ever was a case where circumstantial evidence of this description is admissible, it is this."

1810, Lord Redesdale, ib. 439, 447: "Acknowledgment of a child by the reputed father and mother as their child is generally the only evidence of the fact even that the child is the child of the woman, unless evidence of the persons present at its birth can be produced; and such acknowledgment is sufficient evidence, if not rebutted by clear evidence to the contrary."

1890, Clark, J., in Woodward v. Blue, 107 N. C. 407, 12 S. E. 453 (Mourning Crisp, a mulatto, claimed as widow of Underzine Pelot, a slave of Greenlea, and Emily Woodward Blue as daughter of the marriage; the defence denied the marriage, and affirmed Greenlea to have been the father of Emily by Mourning; Greenlea's treatment of Emily was offered in evidence): "There being evidence to show non-access by the husband, the jury should not have been cut off from a knowledge of how Greenlea treated the child. It may be that it could have been shown that he betrayed fondness and affection for it, showed anxiety in its illness, lavished money on it, or educated it; and sur[illegible] these things would be strongly corroborative of the evidence of the defendant, for it would be hardly expected that a white man should so act towards the child of Underzine his negro slave. Was not the violent grief of David the king upon the death of the child, some corroboration that he and not Uriah was its father?"[3]

§ 270. Identity, as evidenced by Belief and Knowledge of Personal Doings, Family History, and the like. On an issue of personal identity, the present principle finds one of its simplest and commonest applications. The situation is this: Whether X is A is the fact in issue; A is shown to have done a certain act, to have had certain marked and individual experiences; if X did this act or had this experience, he probably is A; thus, as indicating whether X did or had it, the fact of his present belief or consciousness or recollection becomes relevant, and therefore his conduct as evidencing that belief. This sort of evidence, of the commonest use in the affairs of everyday life, has of course its weaknesses; the fact of X's belief or recollection of the act may be explained away as due, not to his having actually done

[3] The authorities are few, because the matter has seldom been disputed; compare the cases cited under the Hearsay exception, post, § 1497, and also the following: 1856, Legge v. Edmonds, 26 L. J. Ch. 125, 139 (admitting the parents' conduct, but excluding letters as not mere conduct); 1904, Locklayer v. Locklayer, — Ala. —, 35 So. 1008 (negro birth); 1898, Erwin v. Bailey, 123 N. C. 628, 31 S. E. 844 (quarrels as to child's legitimacy, admitted).

For the question whose declarations as to illegitimacy are receivable under the Family-History exception to the Hearsay rule, see § 1494, post. Compare also § 1790, post.

the act, but to his having heard of it from others; while the fact of his non-recollection may also be explainable as due merely to that failure of memory which increases in proportion to the lapse of time and the insignificance of the act. Thus the strength of the inference is proportionate, on the one hand (when he claims to recollect), to the improbability of the person's having learned of the act from others, and, on the other hand (when he fails to recollect), to the improbability of a forgetfulness of the particular act. The theory of this sort of evidence, and its application, are well expounded in that marvellous feat of judicial skill and endurance, the charge of the presiding judge in the second Tichborne trial:[1]

1874, Cockburn, C. J., in R. v. Castro (alias Orton, alias Tichborne), Official Report of the Charge, I, 16; II, 327, 403; the claimant to the rich Tichborne estate purported to be Roger, the long-lost son, who had been given up for dead, after the news of his loss at sea, some twenty years before, in a vessel last heard of off the coast of South America; Roger had been brought up a Catholic, and attended a Catholic school at Stonyhurst, but had spent most of his youth in France, where he became more fluent in French than in English; he afterwards served a while in the army; he was some twenty-five years of age when he left on his travels. The claimant had lived for most of his manhood-life in the backwoods of Australia; and was said to be really Arthur Orton, a butcher of Wapping. At the civil trial for the title to the estates, in 1871,[2] the claimant's case finally broke down and was not submitted to the jury; he was then, in 1874, put on trial for perjury and convicted; in this trial he was not competent as a witness, but his testimony at the civil trial was used against him; and it is in this cross-examination that most of the instances referred to by the Chief Justice were found. On the claimant's cross-examination by Sir J. Coleridge, it appeared that though Roger had been three years at Stonyhurst School and lived on the quadrangle, the claimant thought that the quadrangle was "a part of a building"; that, though Roger had studied Latin and Greek, the claimant replied, when asked "Was Cæsar in verse or prose," "I don't recollect"; and "Was Cæsar a Latin writer or a Greek writer?" "I can't say; I suppose it was Greek"; and when shown a copy of Virgil, "It appears to me to be Greek"; and when asked, "Is mathematics the same thing as chemistry?" "I have no recollection"; and "Has Euclid anything to do with mathematics?" "I don't know"; and when asked, "What is physiology?" "The formation of the head, I believe"; and when asked the meaning of the Stonyhurst motto, "Laus Deo Semper," answered "They mean, 'The laws of God forever.'" A list of Roger's library was read to him; he thonght that the "Theatre de P. Corneille" was written "by one of the Fathers"; asked as to the "Life of John Bunyan," whether he was "a sportsman, a general, a bishop, a master of fox hounds, or a prize-fighter," the claimant said it was "difficult to give an answer to such a question";[3] taking up these instances, the Chief Justice commented as follows: "Although outward appearance may deceive, yet if you are acquainted with what has passed through the mind of a man, and another man were to come forward and say, 'I am that man,' you have only to ask him as to the events of the other man's life, those at least which must have remained impressed on his memory, and which, therefore, if he be the man, he must of necessity retain, to enable him to demonstrate that he is the man he says he is, or to enable you to pronounce that he is not. If his memory is not the memory of the man he seeks to personate, if he does not know the events of that man's life, if he does not know what thoughts, what feelings, what emotions, that man's mind underwent, he cannot be the individual. . . . Now you are in danger, in an inquiry of this nature, of being led into error by one of two alternatives. You may require too much; you may be satisfied with too little. You may require too much if you expect a man . . . to recollect every trifling individual occurrence of his life. . . . But there are things which it is next to impossible any one should forget, and in respect of those things we are entitled to require that a man should exhibit some knowledge when you know that they happened to a person whom he represents himself to be. . . . You must consider what it is you may fairly and reasonably and justly expect that a man should recollect. . . . Again, you may . . . also be satisfied with too little if you are led to accept, as true genuine knowledge, that which is not the honest production of the unaided memory, but knowledge derived from extraneous and adventitious sources. This is the danger into which persons too credulous have before now been led by imposture. . . . [He] may have acquired that knowledge from without, instead of possessing it from within. . . . What, then, are the things which would have impressed themselves on the mind and memory of a boy growing up into the period of adult life? For the recollections of boyhood still cling to us in after years with the freshness of the age to which they belong, and, though less vivid, even those of childhood do not wholly disappear. . . . [After the recital of various instances, the cross-examination is then quoted]: 'Do you recollect [from your studies] whether Cæsar was written in verse or prose? No, I do not. — . . . Did you ever do any Cæsar? I do not remember whether I did or not. — Is Cæsar a Latin writer or a Greek?' . . . To which comes the memorable answer, 'I should suppose Cæsar is Greek.' . . . Cæsar a Greek! Would Roger, do you think, have made that mistake? When Roger read Cæsar, did he believe he was reading Latin, or did he believe he was reading Greek? Is that a thing about which a person could make a mistake? Do you think that is what a man would be likely to forget?"

[1] The charge alone occupies two printed octavo volumes of some seven hundred pages each.

[2] Reported by Heywood, s. v. Tichbourne v. Lushington, in book form; the above-cited passages are found at pp. 200 ff., 390 ff.

[3] A neat summary of the various points of identity and difference between the defendant and Roger Tichborne and Arthur Orton will be found, in the form of an itemized list, in Charles Reade's "Readiana," in the chapter on "The Doctrine of Coincidences," first letter. Besides the instances above quoted, there were scores of others, notably, the defendant's ignorance of the contents of the sealed packet deposited by Roger when leaving England (Charge, I, 630 ff.), and of Roger's peculiar amusement of stupefying flies with cigar-smoke (Charge II, 162, 167). It may be supposed that the strong presumption created by the extraordinary fact that Roger's own mother recognized and to the day of her death received the defendant as her son could never have been satisfactorily met except by this mass of striking evidence of the defendant's lack of the mental traces of Roger's early life.

This application of the principle receives constant use in trials where personal identity is in issue, though few rulings need to be made or come to be recorded.[4] When the person in question is deceased, the Family-History excep-

[4] 1846, Smith v. Earl Ferrers, Cherer's Rep. 34, 323 (breach of marriage-promise; the plaintiff put in a long series of letters alleged to have been written to the plaintiff by the defendant, containing promises of marriage; the defendant claimed that the plaintiff had forged the letters herself; from the matters mentioned in the letters it was sought to be inferred that the plaintiff alone could not have known the things mentioned, but in fact they equally indicated that the defendant could not have written them because they mentioned numerous things that never happened to him; the defendant's case was clearly made out, and a nonsuit was taken; the case is an extraordinary one, in respect of the audacity of the claim, the ingenuity of the young woman, and the narrow escape of the defendant from the imposture); 1889, Howard v. Russell, 75 Tex. 171, 179, 12 S. W. 525 (the identity of B. with S. being in question, B.'s statements as to his change of name, his residence, and his reasons for the change, were admitted); 1900, Smith v. Russell, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 554, 56 S. W. 687 (statements, by a person to be identified, as to coming from South Carolina, and being a single man, admitted); 1900, Nehring v. McMurrian, 94 Tex. 45, 57 S. W. 943 (statements by the person as to his name, family members, birthplace, etc., admitted). The conduct of third persons seems equally admissible to identify: 1855, Willis v. Quimby, 31 N. H. 485, 487 (trespass; to prove defendant's identity, a deposition was offered, referring to "a man they said was J. M. I."; admissible, since "the only knowledge men generally have of the names of others is derived from the fact that they hear them so called"); 1877, Gillian v. State, 3 Tex. App. 132, 134, (conspiracy; "there was a man present that the crowd called W. G.," held not alone sufficient to prove identity, because of the motives for false appellation under the circumstances; but held admissible on the principle of Willis v. Quimby).

tion to the hearsay rule has usually served to admit his statements and his conduct; yet it is important to remember that much would properly be received from the present point of view would be excluded if offered under the hearsay exception.[5]

§ 271. Testamentary Execution, as evidenced by the Testator's Belief and Declarations. If the fact of recollection or belief or knowledge of a past act is generally indicative as a mental trace of the doing of the act, and if the person's conduct and utterances are indicative of that belief, it would follow that the theory applies equally where the doing of a testamentary act is in issue. If A, for example, an alleged testator, has clearly exhibited belief in the existence of a certain will of his the inference is natural that . . as in fact executed it; otherwise, except on the hypothesis of an insane delusion, he could hardly have acquired the belief or consciousness of having done the act. So, too, if he has the belief that he has made no will, this tends to persuade us that in fact he has not. The truth is that there is, for that step of the inference (i. e. from his belief to the past act) no ground for hesitation, either in principle or in practical good sense. The real doubt and weakness lies in the other and prior step of the inference, namely, from the person's conduct and utterances to his belief. Were we once firmly persuaded that the person actually possessed such a belief, we could not refuse to treat it as a strong piece of evidence. But how are we asked to conclude that he has the belief? From his conduct and utterances, by circumstantial inference, and it is here that the objections begin to have force. In the first place, and as a matter of circumstantial inference purely, it must be conceded that the probability of his feigning this conduct, in order to deceive designing relatives and to obtain peace and quiet, is in general experience not a small one; the circumstantial value of such evidence of his real belief may thus be thought too trifling. In the next place, it may be objected that the conduct and utterances thus offered are after all equivalent to mere assertions by him of the fact of his execution (or non-execution) of a will, and are therefore inadmissible as hearsay statements, since their assertive significance is so plain that their circumstantial use becomes a mere pretext. If, however, we can bring ourselves to consider these objections as forced and captious, the plain fact remains that such evidence would be admissible, in strict accordance with the general principle already examined (ante, § 267). This view has been taken by a number of Courts, more or less explicitly. In the following passages this view is phrased in one form or another:

1876, Hannen, J., in Sugden v. St. Leonards, L. R. 1 P. D. 203: "Believing, as I do, the testator . . . [showed] a belief in his mind that the will was in existence at a time subsequently to that at which he could have revoked it, I am led to the conclusion that he had not in fact revoked it."

1844, Marshall, J., in Steele v. Price, 5 B. Monr. 69 (admitting, on the question of revocation, evidence of intention at different times and of a belief, just before death, that he still had a will, the will being in fact lost): "There is no principle of law or reason which either requires or can enable the mind to resist the accumulated force of that evidence of internal feeling and intention which is furnished by the uniform and unvarying tenor of a man's conduct and conversations through a long series of years."

[5] See the citations under the Family-History exception to the Hearsay rule, post, § 1502, and also the discussion of principle in § 1791, post. In §§ 413, 667, post, are collected cases involving other modes of proving Identity; the use of Traces of Crime, as examined ante, §§ 149–154, sometimes involves what would loosely be termed a question of identity.

1847, Ormond, J., in McBeth v. McBeth, 11 Ala. 60 (the testator's declarations as to the existence of a will which could not be found were admitted on the issue of revocation): "It is then very clear that at this time he supposed the will to be in existence, and [this] repels the presumption of a voluntary cancellation or destruction of it previous to that time. . . . The necessary inference from the declarations of the testator a short time before his death is that he supposed it was then in existence, consequently did not by any act of his destroy or revoke it."

1867, Appleton, C. J., in Collagan v. Burns, 57 Me. 458 (a subsequent intention not to revoke, as declared by the testator to his wife in various ways, was held admissible on the question whether the tearing of a torn will had been done by him and with intent to revoke): "The condition of the testator, . . . the state of his affections, when proved, may raise an improbability almost amounting to an impossibility that the testator himself intentionally destroyed his will; . . . they may show that up to the time of his death he believed his will was existing and would act upon his property, and consequently that its non-appearance, or its torn appearance, was the result of some cause other than the wish or intentional act of the deceased. . . . The evidence of the testator's declarations was offered to negative the intention to destroy and the fact of destruction of the will in question, by showing the true relation of the parties, the entire absence of intention to destroy, and hence the improbability of any destruction, intentional or otherwise, of the will by the party by whom it is conceded to have been made."

But this mode of reasoning has not been accepted by a majority of Courts. Some judges prefer, in admitting such evidence, to treat it frankly as a direct hearsay assertion which merits an exception of its own to the Hearsay rule. Others, representing perhaps the greater number of Courts, also regard the conduct and utterances as obnoxious to the Hearsay rule, but refuse to concede any exception for their benefit, and thus exclude them.[1] This variety of views, together with the possibilities of using a testator's declarations for certain other purposes by general concession, make it impracticable to examine at this point the general state of the law in regard to these related uses of such evidence; the authorities are collected and the various principles examined in dealing with the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1736–1740). It is enough here to note that there is a plausible place, under the present principle, for the circumstantial use of such conduct and utterances.

§ 272. Sundry Inferences from Belief to Past Acts; Contracts, Appointments to Office, etc. The same mode of reasoning may of course, upon occasion, be resorted to in evidencing the execution of a contract or the doing of any other important act. No doubt this would frequently bring us into plain conflict with the Hearsay rule. But no doubt also such a reasoning process is constantly illustrated in the trials of every day, without any objection being conceived; and the following passage illustrates how wide an application the principle may receive while remaining within orthodox analogies:

[1] Very rarely, however, has a Court plainly considered and rejected the circumstantial argument as above explained; it is usually merely ignored. In the following case it was expressly repudiated: 1860, Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 274, 279 ("the plaintiffs relied upon the declarations and conduct of M. . . . to show that while living he never knew of the existence of such a will, and that therefore he had never knowingly executed the paper"; Whelpley, J., alone noticed this argument, in saying, "nor does ignorance of a fact, at a time long subsequent to its occurrence, raise a necessary presumption that the mind was never acquainted with it"; but his real reason for exclusion seems to have been the Hearsay rule, post, § 1736).

1858, Erle, J., in R. v. Forderingbridge, E. B. & E. 678, 684 (admitting conduct of master and apprentice to show the previous execution of an indenture of apprenticeship): "The execution here is whether upon this evidence a reasonable man would infer that the man had been bound apprentice. I know of no rule of law requiring technical proof of the existence of an indenture of apprenticeship, or of any other deed, or which prohibits the presumption of the existence of the deed from the circumstances. . . . The relations of landlord and tenant, of partnership, of marriages, are frequently presumed from the conduct of the parties being consistent with that state of things, and more consistent with that than with any other."

In its application to contracts and deeds, the principle is probably oftener applied than the number of recorded rulings indicates.[1] It has also an application in proof of the fact of appointment or election to office,[2] although here the reputation-element is probably the most important; the inference is at any rate so well conceded that the presumption of title to office (post, § 2535) is founded upon it. In other instances than these there seem to be few rulings upon this use of the inference.[3]

§ 273. Conduct, as evidence of Guilt; (1) Conduct in general; Demeanor when Charged or Arrested. It has already been seen (ante, § 267) that one of the common and established uses of the mode of reasoning here involved is the inference from guilty conduct to the commission of the guilty deed; and the place of this inference in the general scheme of evidence-rules need be no further considered. So far as the employment of it in practice is concerned, the real opening for controversy arises in the first step of the inference, and not in the second. No one doubts that the state of mind which we call "guilty consciousness" is perhaps the strongest evidence (on the principle of § 172, ante) that the person is indeed the guilty doer; nothing but an hallucination or a most extraordinary mistake will otherwise explain its presence.[1]

[1] 1858, R. v. Forderingbridge, E. B. & E. 678 (to prove that J. D. had executed with B. an indenture of apprenticeship, the fact of J. D.'s working in the shop of B. like other apprentices, of B.'s treating him as an apprentice, etc., was held sufficient); 1896, Wrigley v. Cornelius, 162 Ill. 92, 44 N. E. 406 (issue whether the defendant had ordered of the plaintiff 10,000 pictures or only 5,000 and as many more as he should need; evidence admitted that the plaintiff, immediately after receiving the order, had made a contract with a third person for 10,000 frames, to be delivered to the defendants, as throwing light on the terms of the contract). Compare the cases under Interpretation, post, § 2465.

[2] 1860, Com. v. McCue, 16 Gray 226 (assault on the field-driver of a town; "the testimony of H. that he was a field-driver and had acted as such implies that he acted under the belief that he had been legally elected and qualified").

[3] 1743, Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1139, 1144 (to prove the delivery of Lady Altham of a child and heir in 1715, the fact was offered "that a bonfire was made upon this happy event, and drink publicly given to the neighbors and people who came in to testify their joy"; perhaps this rather illustrates § 269, ante); 1897, State v. Lee, 69 Conn. 186, 37 Atl. 75 (abortion; subsequent fear of the defendant shown by the woman just after the alleged attempt at abortion, admitted to indicate the fact of the alleged violence).

[1] That this sort of evidence may be used for a defendant to prove a third person guilty, see ante, § 142.

That the rule for confessions does not apply to the use of guilty conduct, see post, § 821.

But, in the process of inferring the existence of that inner consciousness from the outward conduct, there is ample room for erroneous inference, and it is in this respect chiefly that caution becomes desirable and that judicial rulings upon specific kinds of conduct become necessary.

In general, it may be premised, any and all conduct may be open to this inference. The kinds of behavior which may properly suggest such a cause are beyond enumeration; they are as various and as changeable as men's dispositions and emotions. No conduct is conclusive; but, on the other hand, no conduct is entirely without significance, greater or less according to the circumstances:

1850, Parsons, J., in Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 618, 624: "We cannot say that facts, such as silence, which indicated unusual seriousness at such a moment, are inadmissible as evidence tending in some degree to show the prisoner's guilty knowledge of the condition of his wife, or to show his crime itself. Doubtless such a circumstance by itself should weigh but little and it should be received with great caution, but we cannot say that it was wholly inadmissible. . . . A flight is universally admitted as evidence of the guilt of the accused, though not conclusive. If we take a flight as evidence of fear, and fear as evidence of a known cause of dread or apprehension, we arrive thus at the inference of crime. But it is sufficient perhaps for all practical purposes to regard a flight as immediate evidence of crime, because it betrays conscious guilt. In this instance, then, we take the flight, a thing of itself harmless and innocent, as evidence of conscious guilt, a necessary consequence of the crime itself, and the conscious guilt, of which the flight was evidence, is proof, in its turn, of the crime. In this instance, therefore, it is certain that the law admits evidence of the party's conduct, merely to prove his conscious guilt, which is proof of crime. Now this conscious guilt is merely internal, but the law allows that proof of it which consists of outward signs. Is a flight the only outward evidence of conscious guilt? So far from it, any indications of it, arising from the conduct, demeanor, or expressions of the party, are legal evidence against him. The law can never limit the number or kind of such indications."

1853, Caldwell, J., in Moore v. State, 2 Oh. St. 502: "From our knowledge of the human mind and its workings, we expect, with almost positive certainty, that when it is the sole repository of so dreadful a secret it will affect the conduct and sayings of the person; hence the mind naturally looks to these with the most anxious scrutiny, and would require for its satisfaction, if such a thing were possible, a complete transcript of the person's conduct and sayings. . . . Sometimes a person is detected as the author of a crime by showing an unusual anxiety to discover the perpetrator; at other times the discovery is led to by the person showing too much indifference. In some instances the observation that the person appears to know too much about the transaction leads to the discovery; at other times the inquiry is started by his appearing to know too little. These are generally acts that in themselves show no disposition to do mischief; but it is because they are unnatural, because they tend to the conclusion that they are produced by a mind conscious of its guilt, that they are provable against the accused. They are in themselves nothing, except as showing the state of mind of the party."

1878, Brickell, C. J., in McAdory v. State, 62 Ala. 154, 159: "Any indications of a consciousness of guilt by a person suspected of or charged with crime, or who may after such indications be suspected or charged, are admissible evidence against him. The number of such indications it is impossible to limit, nor can their nature or character be defined. Presumptions or inferences may be, and often are, founded on circumstances which, of themselves, independent of the accusation, would not be ground of crimination. It is largely a question of fact, rather than a question of law, for the determination of the jury, whether particular conduct, or particular expressions of the accused, refer to a criminal offence, and spring from his consciousness of guilt. When it is clear that they have no relation to the offence, and that they ought not to have any influence with the jury, it is the duty of the Court to reject them as evidence. But however minute or insignificant they may be, shedding but a dim light upon the transaction, if they have a tendency to elucidate it they must be admitted."

Yet experience tells us that no fixed relations of inferences can be predicated for the same conduct in different persons. The same symptom is often the result of exactly opposite psychological conditions. This sort of evidence is admitted because there is a certain degree of uniformity in its meaning, but the variations from uniformity are so frequent, and depend so much upon personal character and local circumstances that no fixed rules should be laid down. Repeated judicial warnings tell us that the evidence is merely to be estimated as best we can in the light of our knowledge of human nature in general and of the accused in particular:

1846, Ormond, J., in Smith v. State, 9 Ala. 990, 995: "The conduct of one accused of crime is the most fallible of all competent testimony. Those emotions or acts which might be produced in one person by a sense of guilt, or by the stings of conscience, might be exhibited by another, differently constituted, by an overwhelming sense of shame, and the degradation consequent upon a criminal accusation; the same cause producing opposite effects in different persons, owing to weakness or strength of nerve, and other inexplicable moral phenomena."

1850, Shaw, C. J., in Webster's Trial, Mass., Bemis' Rep. 486: "Such are the various temperaments of men, and so rare the occurrence of the sudden arrest of a person upon so heinous a charge [as murder], that who of us can say how an innocent or a guilty man ought or would be wholly likely to act in such a case, or that he was too much or too little moved for an innocent man? Have you any experience that an innocent man, stunned under the mere imputation of such a charge, though conscious of innocence, will always appear calm and collected? Or that a guilty man who, by knowledge of his danger, might be somewhat braced up for the consequences, would always appear agitated? Or the reverse? Judge you concerning it."

1881, Miller, J., in Greenfield v. State, 85 N. Y. 86: "Such indications, however, are by no means conclusive, and must depend greatly upon the mental characteristics of the individual. Innocent persons, appalled by the enormity of a charge of crime, will sometimes exhibit great weakness and terror, and those who have been crushed with the weight of a great sorrow will manifest the greatest composure and serenity in their grief and meet it without the shedding of a tear. While the manifestations at such a time sometimes indicate excitement and great disturbance of the physical system, and do not always sanction an inference of guilt, they are admissible evidence for the jury to pass upon in view of the circumstances."

The general principle, as applied to the conduct of one accused of crime, finds illustration in a great variety of instances. In those which have led to judicial rulings, there has seldom resulted an exclusion, because usually none but conduct having at least plausibly a guilty significance is commonly offered.[2]

[2] 1850, Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 618, 623 (see quotation supra); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 id. 519, 527 ("demeanor when arrested," admitted); 1878, McAdory v. State, 62 id. 154, 159 (questions by the defendant to the witness, of the former's own motion, as to the latter being in search of the culprit, held admissible on the facts; see quotation supra); 1882, Beale v. Posey, 72 id. 323 (demeanor admissible); 1896, Boykin v. People, 22 Colo. 496, 45 Pac. 419 (demeanor of the accused during the trial, admitted); 1898, Miller v. Dill, 149 Ind. 326, 49 N. E. 272 (forgery set up as a defence to a note; the payee's conduct in attempting to dispose of the

Among these inexhaustible varieties of conduct, there are a few sorts which recur often and possess some uniform feature that gives rise to doubt or controversy. These may now be taken up in detail.

§ 274. Same: (2) Demeanor during Trial. It has been judicially maintained that the demeanor of an accused person in court during the trial is too elusive to be justifiably considered as any indication whatever of his guilty consciousness:

1892, Baker, J., in Purdy v. People, 140 Ill. 50, 29 N. E. 700: "Evidence may be introduced which was not anticipated; a witness may greatly exaggerate a trifling circumstance, or may deliberately make a misstatement; a witness may fail to testify to a fact which the defendant fully believed was within the knowledge of such witness and would be stated by him; exaggerated denunciation may be indulged in by attorneys; the presiding judge may decide contrary to the expectations in regard to the admissibility of certain evidence, or may rule a point of law against him. Under these and other like circumstances, a prisoner (and especially in a trial where his life was at stake) might frequently (and especially so if he was not a hardened criminal) demean himself while under the influence of his disappointment, fears, and feelings, in such a manner that an observer would regard his conduct and demeanor as indicative of guilt. It would be illogical and unjust, under circumstances, such as stated, to deduce a conclusion unfavorable to the defendant."[1]

But none of the supposed dangers of mistake apply with any more force to this particular sort of conduct than to conduct in general. Moreover, it is as unwise to attempt the impossible as it is impolitic to conduct trials upon a fiction; and the attempt to force a jury to become mentally blind to the behavior of the accused sitting before them involves both an impossibility in practice and a fiction in theory. No other Court seems ever to have sanctioned such a proposal:

1896, Campbell, J., in Boykin v. People, 22 Colo. 496, 45 Pac. 419: "We know it to be a fact, grounded in human nature, that the conduct of a defendant or of a party to a suit

note, admitted); 1903, State v. Dennis, — Ia. —, 94 N. W. 235 (demeanor when identified); 1886, State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 10, 11, 12 Pac. 318 (admitting the accused's apathy as to a sister's death, charged against him; also the fact that he "was nervous and showed a great deal of fear" when arrested); 1883, People v. Wolcott, 51 Mich. 615 (excitement while boot-tracks were examined; excluded as depending too much on personal peculiarities); 1902, State v. Brown, 168 Mo. 449, 68 S. W. 568 (accused's reluctance to have his shoe measured, held admissible); 1875, Lindsay v. People, 63 N. Y. 143, 155 (turning pale when arrested, admitted); 1881, Greenfield v. People, 85 id. 75, 85 (wife-murder; the defendant's failure to shed tears the next morning, admitted; demeanor "at the time of his arrest, or soon after the commission of the crime, or upon being charged," is admissible; see quotation supra); 1897, State v. Coudotte, 7 N. D. 109, 72 N. W. 913 (attempted suicide of an Indian under arrest, not evidential of guilty consciousness); 1853, Moore v. State, 2 Oh. St. 500, 506 (murder; conduct when informed of the finding of the body of the deceased, admitted; see quotation supra); 1875, Smith v. State, 42 Tex. 444, 447 (readiness to deliver up on demand a hog alleged to have been stolen, admitted); 1898, Holt v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 282, 45 S. W. 1016, 46 S. W. 829 (that he "tucked his head and looked like he had done something wrong," when charged, admitted); 1901, Weaver v. State, 43 id. 340, 65 S. W. 534 (defendant's refusal, after arrest, to look on the body of the deceased, excluded, on the special principle of § 1072, post); 1879, Dean v. Com., 32 Gratt. 912, 924 (admitting a failure to exhibit natural interest in the crime).

Compare also the citations under §§ 394, 396, post.

[1] 1884, Rider v. People, 110 id. 11, 13, semble (accused's demeanor admissible, when "on the witness-stand and during the trial"); 1892, Purdy v. People, 140 id. 46, 49, 29 N. E. 700 (forbidding to consider his demeanor during the trial where he has not taken the stand; see quotation supra); 1892, Siebert v. People, 143 id. 571, 593, 32 N. E. 431 (approving Purdy's case).

during the trial is more or less potential, and has necessarily more or less influence with the Court and jury upon the question of his credibility. . . . If this be so, we fail to perceive the vice in an instruction telling the jury that they may do the very thing which common experience and common observation teach that the human mind inevitably will do." [2]

§ 275. Same: (3) Refusal to Undergo a Superstitious Test. The popular trust in certain superstitious and irrational tests of guilt is much more widespread in this country than is commonly supposed; and it is not rare for the police or interested persons to employ these superstitions as a means of obtaining a clue. The refusal of a suspected person to undergo such a test would properly be evidential of his guilty consciousness; although it would be also open to explanation as due to his repugnance to an unpleasant situation or to ignorance of the superstition:

1875, Brickell, C. J., in Gassenheimer v. State, 52 Ala. 316: "The conduct, demeanor, and words of one charged with crime, about the time of its commission or of its discovery, or on his arrest for or on accusation of it, are admissible in evidence against him. The mental emotion he exhibits is a criminative fact of more or less force as it is connected with other facts and circumstances. Alarm, confusion, anger, resentment, or despair, may be evinced, and may spring from a consciousness of guilt. In the olden time it was a popular superstition that the corpse of the slain would bleed afresh if touched by the murderer; and it was deemed almost conclusive of guilt that he who was charged with the murder refused to lay his finger on the body or to take his hand; in recent years persons suspected of murder have been required to touch the dead body, not because the old superstition was indulged, but that its effect on them — the emotion produced and manifested — could be observed."

1894, Gantt, P. J., in State v. Wisdom, 119 Mo. 539, 24 S. W. 1051 (testimony was offered that at the morgue the defendant was requested with others to put his hand on the corpse of the murdered man, but he refused): "It was simply a test proposed by some bystander, and it was offered as showing the manner in which the three suspects conducted themselves when it was proposed. While defendant had a perfect right to decline, either because of his instinctive repugnance to the unpleasant task, or because no one had a right to subject him to the test, and his refusal might not prejudice him in the minds of a rational jury; on the other hand, a consciousness of guilt might have influenced him to refuse to undergo the proposed test, however unreasonable it was, and it is one of the circumstances of the case that the jury could weigh."

1894, Feb. 21, Boston Transcript: "B. G. was on trial for the larceny of $365 from Simon Melnikoff, his lodging-house keeper. It will be remembered that when the crime was discovered seven persons who could possibly have taken the money were requested to step into a dark room in Melnikoff's house and touch a live hen fastened on a table. They were told that when the guilty party touched her she would make an outcry. Unknown to the men who entered the room the hen had been saturated with blueing. An inspection of the hands of the men who entered the room showed that all but Goldstein had touched the hen. His hands bore no marks of blueing, and when he was informed of the trick that had been played on him he said he did not understand the condition of the test to be that he must place his hand on the hen. Judge Sherman admitted this testimony and in commenting on the weight it should have with the jury said: 'This test was not applied to determine who was guilty from the result of the thing itself, but it was believed that the guilty one, in the uneasy state of his conscience, would be overcome with dreadful superstitiou and avoid carrying out the test.'" [1]

[2] Accord: 1893, Brewer, J., in Graves v. U. S., 150 U. S. 118, 14 Sup. 40.
In the Guiteau trial, for the killing of President Garfield, the accused's singular demeanor during trial was a chief source of evidence. Compare § 946, post (witness' demeanor).

§ 276. Same: (4) Flight, Escape, Resistance, or Concealment. Flight from justice, and its analogous conduct, have always in human experience been deemed indicative of a consciousness of guilt. The wicked flee, even when no man pursueth; but the righteous are bold as a lion. In our primitive system of law, the accused who fled, whether innocent or guilty, suffered forfeiture and escheat;[1] though this was rather a mode of deterring him from refusing to appear for judgment than an evidential rule.[2] It is to-day universally conceded that the fact of an accused's flight, escape from custody, resistance to arrest, concealment, assumption of a false name, and related conduct, are admissible as evidence of consciousness of guilt, and thus of guilt itself:

1796, L. C. J. Eyre, in Crossfield's Trial, 26 How. St. Tr. 216: "The prosecution say — and they say truly — if they make out that the conduct of the prisoner has been that he has either originally withdrawn himself from justice or that he has taken pains to secrete himself from justice after he was apprehended, that those are circumstances which do at least infer a consciousness of very great guilt, and, if there be no other reason assigned for the conduct of the party, very much corroborating and supporting the charges."

1850, Parsons, J., in Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 618, 624: "A flight is universally admitted as evidence of the guilt of the accused, though not conclusive. If we take flight as evidence of fear, and fear as evidence of a known cause of dread or apprehension, we arrive thus at the inference of crime. . . . In this instance, then, we take the flight, a thing of itself harmless and innocent, as evidence of conscious guilt, a necessary consequence of the crime itself; and the conscious guilt, of which the flight was evidence, is proof in its turn of the crime. In this instance, therefore, it is certain that the law admits evidence of the party's conduct merely to prove his conscious guilt, which is proof of crime."

1896, Parker, J., in the Federal District Court for Western Arkansas, charging the jury in Starr v. U. S., 164 U. S. 627, 17 Sup. 224, and in Alberty v. U. S., 162 U. S. 499, 16 Sup. 864: "The law says that a man is to be judged by his consciousness of the right or wrong of what he does, to some extent. If he flees from justice because of that act, if he goes to a distant country, and is living under an assumed name because of that fact, the law says that is not in harmony with what innocent men do, and jurors have a right to consider it as an evidence of guilt, because he is an eyewitness to the occurrence, he knows how it did transpire, he is presumed to have a consciousness of that act. . . . It is a principle of human nature — and every man is conscious of it, I apprehend — that, if he does an act which he is conscious is wrong, his conduct will be along a certain line. He will pursue a certain course not in harmony with the conduct of a man who is conscious that he has done an act which is innocent, right, and proper. The truth is — and

[1] To these instances add the following: 1828, State v. Guild, 10 N. J. L. 171 (refusal to touch a corpse; admitted below, not criticised on appeal). The illegality of compelling such a test would be immaterial: post, § 2183. But distinguish the case of a refusal to submit one's feet to measurement, or the like; if this be regarded as compulsory self-crimination, then the refusal could not be admissible: post, § 2265.

For the principle which excludes such tests as in themselves a mode of proving guilt, see ante, § 9.

[1] 1607 (?), Coke, 5 Rep. 109 b, Foxley's Case: "For although he be found Not Guilty, yet he shall forfeit his goods by the flying, quia fatetur facinus qui judicium fugit, and the law will not admit any proof against this presumption"; so also in 3 Inst. 232, 233.

[2] Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, II, 588.

it is an old scriptural adage — 'that the wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are as bold as a lion.' Men who are conscious of right have nothing to fear. They do not hesitate to confront a jury of their country, because that jury will protect them. It will shield them, and the more light there is let in upon their case the better it is for them. We are all conscious of that condition, and it is therefore a proposition of the law that, when a man flees, the fact that he does so may be taken against him, provided he does not explain it away upon some other theory than that of his flight because of his guilt."

This principle has been so many times sanctioned that its frequent modern repetition has become redundant;[3] no further judicial attention should be

[3] In the following rulings the circumstance offered is flight, unless otherwise specified; and the evidence was admitted where not otherwise stated: Eng.: 1826, R. v. Hazy, 2 C. & P. 458 (trespass; running away from the premises when detected, admitted as evidence of not being there by permission); Ala.: 1853, Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, 75 (plan to escape); 1856, Martin v. State, 28 id. 71, 81 (escape); 1871, Murrell v. State, 46 id. 89, 91 (same); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 id. 519, 527; 1877, Bowles v. State, 58 id. 335 (and that the flight was beyond the jurisdiction may be shown); 1881, Sylvester v. State, 71 id. 23, 26; 1883, Ross v. State, 74 id. 536; 1885, Clarke v. State, 78 id. 478; 1895, Whitaker v. State, 106 id. 30, 17 So. 456; 1895, Jackson v. State, 106 id. 12, 17 So. 333 (flight and assumption of alias); 1896, White v. State, 111 id. 92, 21 So. 330; Ark.: 1867, Flanagin v. State, 25 Ark. 92, 95 (concealment when inspected with others in order to be identified); 1881, Burris v. State, 38 id. 221, 225 (flight and escape); Cal.: 1873, People v. Strong, 46 Cal. 302 (escape, admissible, but, semble, not unless he knows the cause of the arrest); 1873, People v. Stanley, 47 id. 113, 118 (escape); 1880, People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 id. 151, 153 (same; but it does not raise a presumption); 1897, People v. Winthrop, 118 id. 85, 50 Pac. 390 (hiding, taking an assumed name, carrying around newspaper accounts of the crime); 1897, People v. Ashmead, ib. 508, 50 Pac. 681 (failure to return and claim the stolen goods taken from him, admitted); 1898, People v. Vidal, 121 id. 221, 53 Pac. 558 (flight from arrest for another crime, excluded); 1900, People v. Lee Dick Lung, 129 id. 491, 62 Pac. 71 (but not the mere receipt of letters from other persons advising flight); 1900, People v. Flannelly, 128 id. 83, 60 Pac. 670 (resistance to arrest); D. C.: 1900, Funk v. U. S., 16 D. C. App. 478, 491 ("a confession of a contemplated assault for the purpose of escaping," admitted); Fla.: 1903, Carr v. State, — Fla. —, 34 So. 892 (resistance); Ga.: 1852, Whaley v. State, 11 Ga. 123, 126 ("It is argued that this attempt to bribe the guard, in order to effect his escape, is consistent with innocence. But that is no test. Is it not an index of guilt?"); 1858, Revel v. State, 26 id. 275, 281 (escape); 1879, Smith v. State, 63 id. 168, 170; 1886, Sewell v. Vincent, 76 id. 836 (unless explained); 1897, Hudson v. State, 101 id. 520, 28 S. E. 1010; Ida.: 1870, People v. Ah Choy, 1 Ida. 317, 320 (admissible, but only to indicate the perpetrator; where the act is not denied, and the degree of homicide alone in question, excluded; this seems unsound, for there may be a guilty consciousness of the malice of the killing); 1901, State v. Lyons, — Id. —, 64 Pac. 236; Ill.: 1874, Barron v. People, 73 Ill. 258, 260 (giving "straw bail" and forfeiting the recognizance; passing under an alias); 1893, Jamison v. People, 145 id. 357, 376 (murder; "the circumstances of the pursuit and capture of the defendant by the crowd of people," when he fled, admitted); Ind.: 1850, Porter v. State, 2 Ind. 435, 436; 1862, Hittner v. State, 19 id. 48, 50 (attempt to escape); 1877, Waybright v. State, 56 id. 122, 125 (flight does not create a real presumption of law); 1881, Batten v. State, 80 id. 394, 400; 1897, Amerson v. State, 147 id. 445, 46 N. E. 901 (resistance to arrest); 1900, Barton v. State, 154 id. 670, 57 N. E. 515 (failure to appear for trial when under recognizance); Ia.: 1867, State v. Arthur, 23 Ia. 430, 432 (escape); 1877, State v. James, 45 Id. 412 (same); 1879, State v. Fowler, 52 Id. 103, 105, 2 N. W. 983 (resistance to a demand for the weapon, excluded); 1883, State v. Rodman, 62 id. 456, 458, 17 N. W. 663 (attempt to escape); 1890, State v. Van Winkle, 80 Id. 15, 18, 45 N. W. 388 (departure sufficient, if occurring after knowledge that he was or would be charged); 1895, State v. Minard, 96 Id. 267, 65 N. W. 147 (murder; the defendant's leaving the funeral procession on hearing that he was to be charged with the crime, admitted); 1895, State v. Seymore, 91 id. 699, 63 N. W. 663; 1900, Wise v. Schloesser, 111 id. 16, 82 N. W. 439 (breach of promise and seduction; doubted for civil cases; the doubt is unfounded); Kan.: 1897, State v. Thomas, 58 Kan. 805, 51 Pac. 228; 1902, State v. Stewart, 65 id. 371, 69 Pac. 335; Ky.: 1860, Plummer v. Com., 1 Bush 76, 78; 1878, Kennedy v. Com., 14 id. 345; 1888, Basham v. Com., 87 Ky. 440, 9 S. W. 284 (flight or concealment) 1891, Baker v. Com., — Ky. —, 17 S. W. 625; 1895, Clark v. Com., — id. — , 32 S. W. 131 (attempt to escape from jail); 1900, Saylor v. Com., — id. —, 57 S. W. 614 (failing to appear under a bail bond, admitted); La.: 1878, State v. Bentty, 30 La. An. 1267 (attempt to break jail); 1879, State v. Dufour, 31 id. 804 (escape); 1896, State v. Harris, 48 id. 1189, 20 So. 729; 1901, State v. Middleton, 104 La. 914, 28 So. 904; 1901, State v. Baptiste, 105 id. 661, 30 So. 146; Me.: 1879, State v. Frederic, 69 Me. 400, paid to any bill of exceptions so presumptuous as to raise the question. There remain only a few details that can be open to comment:

(a) It is occasionally required by a Court that the accused should have been aware that he was charged or suspected. This is unnecessary; it is the act of departure that is itself evidential; ignorance of the charge is merely a circumstance that tends to explain away the guilty significance of the conduct.

(b) It has sometimes been said that an unexplained flight is the admissible evidence. But this is obviously unsound. The prosecution cannot be expected to negative beforehand all conceivable innocent explanations. The fact of flight is of itself significant; it becomes most significant when after all no explanation is forthcoming.

(c) The flight of another person is relevant so far only as the accused has connived at it;[4] and it may then also become relevant as an act of suppression of testimony (post, § 278).

403 (allowable for flight when sought for arrest; whether he had been informed of the charge or not); Mass.: 1876, Com. v. Tolliver, 119 Mass. 315 (flight or concealment); 1895, Com. v. Acton, 165 id. 11, 42 N. E. 329 (hiding beer from officers searching for liquor illegally kept; the intimation that this might be rejected if the search was illegal and the defendant knew this seems to be improper, because that would furnish merely a counter-explanation of the conduct); Mich.: 1867, People v. Pitcher, 15 Mich. 397, 406 (concealment); 1878, Probasco v. Cook, 39 id. 717, 718 (resistance when arrested); 1895, People v. Caldwell, 107 id. 367, 374, 65 N. W. 216; 1900, People v. Keeps, 123 id. 231, 81 N. W. 1097 (escape from jail of convict for another offence knowing of the present charge against him); Miss.: 1849, Cicely v. State, 13 Sm. & M. 202, 221 (hiding); Mo.: 1851, Fanning v. State, 14 Mo. 386, 390 (attempt to escape); 1857, State v. Phillips, 24 id. 475, 484; 1873, State v. Williams, 54 id. 170 (attempt to escape after arrest); 1882, State v. Mallon, 75 id. 357 (breaking or attempting to break jail); State v. King, 78 id. 557; 1897, State v. Evans, 138 id. 116, 39 S. W. 462 (the mere fact of presence in another State when arrested is not enough); 1898, State v. Hopper, 142 id. 478, 44 S. W. 272 (mere return to home near by is not a flight); 1899, State v. Garrison, 147 id. 548, 49 S. W. 508 (escape from jail); Mont.: 1900, State v. Lucey, 24 Mont. 295, 61 Pac. 994 (inability of searchers to find the defendant); Nebr.: 1898, McVey v. State, 55 Nebr. 777, 76 N. W. 438 (that the police had searched for the defendant unsuccessfully, admitted); 1901, George v. State, 61 id. 669, 85 N. W. 840 (going to another part of the State); N. H.: 1856, State v. Rand, 33 N. H. 216, 225 ("the act of flying and escaping from the place, concealment and disguise of the person, and other acts and conduct of the like character"); N. Y.: 1839, People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509, 518 (advising an accomplice to break jail, admitted); 1880, Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 593, 601 (keeping out of the sheriff's way); N. D.: 1896, State v. Kent, 5 N. D. 516, 67 N. W. 1052; Pa.: 1877, Lanahan v. Com., 84 Pa. 80, 86; Tenn.: 1844, Tyner v. State, 5 Humph. 386 ("We are told by an early and most venerable authority that the wicked fly when no one pursues; and we are told elsewhere that conscience makes men cowards"); Tex.: 1899, Buchanan v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 127, 52 S. W. 769 (flight after a preliminary charge of another tenor for the same crime, but before indictment, not excluded); Utah: 1900, State v. Morgan, 22 Utah 162, 61 Pac. 527; Vt.: 1901, State v. Shaw, 73 Vt. 149, 50 Atl. 863; Va.: 1902, Anderson v. Com., 100 Va. 860, 42 S. E. 865 (escape).

In the Federal Supreme Court, the evidential admissibility of the circumstance is conceded in a series of cases, in some of which however a charge of a trial judge (Parker, J., of Ark. W. D.) is disapproved for using the term "presumption": 1896, Hickory v. U. S., 160 U. S. 408, 16 Sup. 327; 1896, Alberty v. U. S., 162 id. 509, 16 Sup. 864; 1896, Allen v. U. S., 164 id. 492, 17 Sup. 154; 1897, Starr v. U. S., 164 id. 227, 17 Sup. 223. These cases, on the point of presumption, are ill-advised in their attempts to assume the position of monitor over a great and experienced trial judge. In the Alberty case, the charge did not bear the construction put upon it above. In the Allen case, the opinion repudiates the notion that flight creates a "presumption," and then, in the very next paragraph, itself declares that fabrication of testimony creates a "presumption." Compare § 21, ante, note, §§ 2490, 2511, post.

[4] 1873, People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 118 (escape of a co-indicter, excluded); 1867, People v. Pitcher, 15 Mich. 397, 406 (flight of an accomplice; admitted, the defendant having instigated the flight); 1879, Cummins v. People, 42 id. 142, 3 N. W. 305 (flight of an accomplice, found with the defendant when arrested, admitted); 1839, People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509, 518 (cited in the preceding note).

(d) Whether the fact of flight raises a presumption of law is a question of the rules of presumption (post, §§ 2490, 2511).

(e) On the logical principle of Explanation (ante, § 32), the accused may always endeavor to destroy the guilty significance of his conduct by facts which indicate it to be equally or more consistent with some other hypothesis than that of a consciousness of guilt:

1878, Cofer, J., in Kennedy v. Com., 14 Bush 346 (the accused offered to show that he fled, while being conducted to jail, because "the jail to which he was being conducted was in a filthy condition"): "When flight has been proved as furnishing evidence of guilt, it is competent for the accused to prove other causes which may have influenced him to fly, and leave the jury to decide whether his flight was caused by a consciousness of guilt and apprehension of conviction, or by such other causes as he may prove to have existed. But it would be clear that a mere aversion to lawful imprisonments could not be allowed to be given in evidence for that purpose. . . . The appellant [by appealing to the judge] thus had in his power the means of relieving himself from the danger which he claims to have apprehended from the condition of the jail. . . . Evidence of apprehended danger, in order to be admissible to rebut the inference of guilt which may be drawn from an escape and flight, should show such danger as could not have been readily, efficiently, and with entire safety provided against by the accused, either by his own act or through the instrumentality of the officers of the law."

Such attempts at explanation are sometimes declared improper; but the general and sounder tendency is to admit them freely, leaving to the jury to pass their plausibility.[5]

§ 277. Conduct, as evidence of Consciousness of a Weak Cause; (1) General Theory. The second class of cases already noted (§ 267, par. b) includes those in which the inference is towards an act or event not necessarily a personal deed, and thus the circumstantial nature of the evidence is less marked (though not less real) in comparison with its testimonial nature. For example, when A, the defendant in an action by B for slander, bribes a witness to assist in proving a plea of truth as to B's misdoing, A's conduct is some evidence of a consciousness that his cause is a weak one; and yet A can ordinarily have no personal knowledge, one way or the other, of B's misdeed, so that his belief or consciousness is not a mark or a trace of his own past act, but is an impression founded on all that he has been able to learn by inquiry. Thus if A were a third person, the evidential use of his conduct amounts to little more than using his hearsay assertion, and the objection expounded in Wright v. Tatham (quoted supra, 267) applies in fullest force. Consequently, such evidence would have to be confined to the conduct of parties in the cause, since for them it would at any rate be receivable as an admission; for any assertion by an opponent in the cause may be offered against him as an admission (post, § 1048). It is true that, so far as the conduct is that of a criminal defendant, it may be referred to a consciousness of his personal deed, and thus would fall under the first class already noted (§ 267, par. a; § 273). But the sort of conduct in question — suppression of evidence, bribery of witnesses, non-production of evidence, and the like — is a matter of law receivable equally against civil parties, and must therefore be treated in the light of this broader use. It is enough, then, for practical purposes to note that this kind of conduct, though circumstantial in its nature, is guarded against evidential misuse as hearsay by using it, in civil cases, only when predicated of the party opponent, i. e. only when it could be treated as an admission; while in criminal cases, though not so theoretically so restricted, practically it does not exceed the same limits except in the rare instances when it is offered to prove a third person the really guilty party (ante, § 142).

[5] 1885, Chambles v. State, 78 Ala. 466, 468 (certain explanatory evidence, held irrelevant); 1902, Sanders v. State, 131 id. 1, 31 So. 561 (acts of a lynching mob three weeks after the flight, excluded); 1892, U. S. v. Cross, 20 D. C. 378 (explanation admitted); 1858, Golden v. State, 25 Ga. 527, 531 (fear of an attack from one who had already assaulted him, admitted), 1881, Batten v. State, 80 Ind. 394, 400 (fear of violence from bystanders, admitted); 1885, Welch v. State, 104 Id. 347, 352, 3 N. E. 850 (excluded, because no evidence of the flight had been offered); 1901, Bradburn v. U. S., 3 Ind. T. 604, 64 S. W. 550 (that he had been advised to leave, to avoid vengeance by the deceased's friends, allowed); 1899, State v. Desmond, 109 Id. 72, 80 N. W. 214 (defendant's attempt to escape, held explainable as due to fear of mob violence); 1866, Plummer v. Com., 1 Bush 76, 78 (fear of violence from soldiers and from the mob, admitted); 1876, Com. v. Tolliver, 119 Mass. 314 (the defendant having denied that he concealed himself and affirmed that he went about openly, evidence that he was disguised when going about was admitted); 1895, People v. Caldwell, 107 Mich. 374, 65 N. W. 218 ("It is always open to the person to make explanation of the reason of his escape, to show that he was not prompted by a consciousness of guilt," but a voluntary return after escape did not furnish such explanation); 1856, State v. Hays, 23 Mo. 287, 316 (explanation allowed); 1857, State v. Phillips, 24 Id. 484 (popular excitement as a reason for flight, not admitted here, because it did not yet exist at the time of flight, nor could it be apprehended); 1882, State v. Mallon, 75 id. 355 (maltreatment admitted, in explanation); 1883, State v. King, 78 id. 557 ("the presumption or inference from guilt arising from flight may be modified or overthrown by testimony showing that the flight of the defendant was occasioned by other causes than consciousness of guilt"); 1896, State v. Taylor, 134 id. 109, 35 S. W. 92 (that he was willing to return when arrested, not admitted). Compare the doctrine post, § 293, as to conduct indicating consciousness of innocence.

So far as regards the nature of the conduct which is open to this inference, all that can be said, in generalizing, is that there are broadly two sorts; first, conduct indicating a consciousness of the weakness of the cause in general, — bribery, destruction of evidence, and the like; and, secondly, conduct indicating a consciousness of the weakness of a specific element in the cause, — failure to produce a particular witness or a document, and the like. In the former, the inference is an indefinite one, that the whole cause must be an unfounded one since such means are employed to sustain it; in the latter, the inference is a definite one, that the specific witness or document bears unfavorably on the cause.

§ 278. Same: (2) Falsehood, Fraud, Fabrication and Suppression of Evidence, Bribery, Spoliation, and the like. It has always been understood — the inference, indeed, is one of the simplest in human experience — that a party's falsehood or other fraud in the preparation and presentation of his cause, his fabrication or suppression of evidence by bribery or spoliation, and all similar conduct, is receivable against him as an indication of his consciousness that his case is a weak or unfounded one, and from that consciousness may be inferred the fact itself of the cause's lack of truth and merit. The inference thus does not apply itself necessarily to any specific fact in the cause, but operates, indefinitely though strongly, against the whole mass of alleged facts constituting his cause. The nature of the inference, in general, may be gathered from the following passages, which deal with one or another variety of conduct of this character:

1743, Craig dem. Annesley v. Earl of Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1217; in this celebrated case the plaintiff claimed to be the legitimate son of the defendant's brother, and the true heir to the estates and peerage; he showed that at the age of 14 he had been kidnapped by the defendant's procurement and transported to Pennsylvania, and after 15 years' slavery had escaped back to England and instituted a suit to obtain his rights; while on the way to begin proceedings, he joined the gamekeeper of a friend in catching some poachers, and one of them was killed by a shot from his gun, which he claimed went off accidentally; he had been tried for murder and acquitted;[1] he now proposed to show "that the relations of the deceased, being convinced that the killing was only accidental, had intended a very slight prosecution, but that the defendant, who was in no way related to or acquainted with the person killed, employed a solicitor and carried on a severe prosecution against Mr. Annesley at a very great expense, and declared 'he would spend £10,000 to get him hanged';" the purpose of this evidence was to "strengthen that evidence of the defendant's spiriting away the lessor of the plaintiff, and show the defendant's continued design of removing this gentleman from any possibility of asserting his birthright"; Mounteney, B. (for admission): "The foundation of my opinion is this: Every act done by the defendant, which hath a tendency to show a consciousness in him of title in the lessor of the plaintiff, must I think be admitted, beyond all controversy, to be pertinent and legal evidence in the present cause. I think that the evidence now offered hath that tendency, and consequently is proper to be admitted. This evidence of the prosecution, in my apprehension, stands exactly on the same footing with the evidence of the kidnapping, . . . for I can by no means enter into the distinction of lawful and unlawful acts, which seems to have so much weight with my lord chief baron. That unlawful act was not therefore, in my apprehension, to be admitted in evidence because unlawful, but because it had a tendency to show such a consciousness as I have mentioned in the defendant; and if the carrying on the prosecution (which must be admitted to be a very extraordinary, though lawful, act of the defendant) hath the same tendency, it ought upon the same principle to be admitted"; Dawson, B., was at first undecided, but later[2] agreed with Mounteney, B. Chief Baron Bowes also, in charging the jury, finally showed his accord with the same general principle, in thus alluding to the kidnapping: "You will also consider whether these acts are not evidence to satisfy you that the defendant, in his own thoughts and way of reasoning, considered the staying of the boy here as what might some way prejudice his title. But whether, as insisted upon by the plaintiff's counsel, you ought to take this as an admission on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff was the lawful son of Lord Altham [earl of Anglesea], will deserve further consideration. Undoubtedly there is a violent presumption, because no man is supposed to be wicked without design, and the design in this act must be some way or other relative to the title; but whether or no it was the opinion of the trouble he might have from this lad that induced him to do the act, or a consciousness that the lad was the son of Lord Altham, must be left to your determination."

1870, Cockburn, C J., in Moriarty v. R. Co., L. R. 5 Q. B. 319: "The conduct of a party to the cause may be of the highest importance in determining whether the cause of action in which he is plaintiff, or the ground of defence if he is defendant, is honest and just, — just as it is evidence against a prisoner that he has said one thing at one time and another at another, as showing that recourse to falsehoods leads fairly to an inference of guilt. Anything from which such an inference can be drawn is urgent and important evidence with a view to the issue. So, if you can show that a plaintiff has been suborning false testimony, and has endeavored to have recourse to perjury, it is strong evidence that he knew perfectly well his cause was an unrighteous one. I do not say that it is conclusive; I fully agree that it should be put to the jury with the intimation that it does not always follow, because a man, not sure he shall be able to succeed by righteous means, has recourse to means of a different character, that that which he desires, namely, the gaining of the victory, is not his due, or that he has not good ground for believing that justice entitles him to it; . . . but it is always evidence."

[1] R. v. Annesley, ib. 1093; this great controversy led to three trials; the first, R. v. Annesley, was for the above murder; the second, Annesley v. Anglesea, was for the title to the estates; and the third, R. v. Heath, 18 How. St. Tr. 1, was for perjury committed by the chief witness for the defendant at the second trial. The remarkable feature is that, though the jury found for the claimant in the second trial, yet in the third, in which the whole cause was virtually re-tried, the jury acquitted of perjury the chief witness against the claimant at the second trial.

[2] Ib., p. 1244.

1873, Cockburn, C. J., in R. v. Castro (Tichborne Case), Charge to the Jury, I, 813: "These falsehoods [of the defendant], however, must not operate unduly to the prejudice of the defendant beyond this, that falsehood is a badge of fraud; and a case which is sought to be supported by means of deception may prima facie, until the contrary be shown, be taken to be a bad and dishonest case; and, further, the recourse to fraud and falsehood necessarily engenders distrust."

1850, Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 316: "To the same head may be referred all attempts on the part of the accused to suppress evidence, to suggest false and deceptive explanations, and to cast suspicion without just cause on other persons, — all or any of which tend somewhat to prove consciousness of guilt, and, when proved, to exert an influence against the accused. But this consideration is not to be pressed too urgently; because an innocent man, when placed by circumstances in a condition of suspicion and danger, may resort to deception in the hope of avoiding the force of such proofs."

1862, Bigelow, C. J., in Egan v. Bowker, 5 All. 452 (admitting evidence of subornation of a witness): "The inference is a reasonable and proper one that a person having an honest and fair debt will not endeavor to support it by falsehood and fraud; and the fact that he resorts to such means of proof has a tendency to show that he knows he cannot maintain his suit by evidence derived from pure and incorrupt sources."

1875, Ross, J., in Green v. Woodbury, 48 Vt. 6: "All authorized attempts of a party to suppress the testimony of the other party are clearly admissible, and are evidence that in such party's own conviction his case will not bear full examination. They show a consciousness in such party of the weakness of his own cause."

1874, State v. Reed, 62 Me. 145; the following charge was approved: "There is no reason, if he is innocent, for withholding a single truth; there is every reason for uttering it if innocent. If guilty, if he does not confess, the resort in all cases is or must ever be to falsehood, evasion, or silence. . . . Each falsehood uttered by way of exculpation becomes an article of circumstantial evidence of greater or less inculpatory force."

As the general principle applies in common to all these forms of fraud, it is not necessary, nor is it usually possible, to discriminate the precedents that apply it in one or another form. Roughly classifying them, they admit all forms of personal falsification by the party in the course of the litigation;[3]

[3] 1873, Walker v. State, 49 Ala. 398, 401 (lying explanation of suspicious circumstances); 1875, Lavison v. State, 54 id. 519, 527 ("fabrication of evidence"); 1894, Jones v. State, 59 Ark. 417, 27 S. W. 601; s. c. 61 id. 88, 32 S. W. 81 ("false, improbable, and [or] contradictory statements" explaining suspicious circumstances against him); 1897, Hinshaw v. State, 147 Ind. 334, 47 N. E. 158 (telling a false story); 1874, State v. Benner, 64 Me. 267, 289 (false stories); 1880, People v. Arnold, 43 Mich. 303, 306, 5 N. W. 385 (defendant's statement at the prior trial, admitted and allowed to be shown false; Curley, J.: "It betrays a consciousness that, unless the jury are made to believe a falsehood, the case against the party is sufficient to convict him"; Christiancy, J., diss., but his opinion seems to rest on the rule that a witness is not to be contradicted on a collateral point, — a rule not here applicable, because it is the party's fabrication as defendant, not as witness, that is offered); 1902, Com. v. Devaney, 182 Mass. 33, 64 N. E. 402 (lying); 1901, State v. Furgerson, 162 Mo. 668, 63 S. W. 101 (false

the fabrication or manufacture of evidence, by forgery, bribery, subornation, and the like;[4] the suppression of evidence, by intimidation, eloignment, or concealment of witnesses or material objects,[5] or by the destruction or spoliation of documents (post, § 291) or other material objects.[6] stories, etc.); 1874, State v. En, 10 Nev. 277, 281 (larceny; different statements as to how possession was obtained, admitted); 1874, Coleman v. People, 58 N. Y. 556, 560 (false statements received "as showing a consciousness of wrong"); 1869, U. S. v. Randall, Deady 524, 542, 543 (contradictions, misstatements, falsifications of entries); 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895 (false stories); 1879, Dickerson v. State, 48 Wis. 288, 293, 4 N. W. 321 (false stories). Contra, but unsound: 1881, Burris v. State, 38 Ark. 221, 225 (an affidavit for continuance to secure absent witnesses had stated that they would prove threats of the deceased; on the trial these witnesses were offered by the State to testify that they had never heard such threats nor told the defendant about them; excluded, on the theory that the defendant's character was attacked; the present use of such evidence was ignored; it showed a corrupt falsification by the defendant).

Distinguish the improper attempt to argue from the falsity of the defendant's case as a whole; this would be a begging of the question; 1892, Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 199, 31 N. E. 961 ("To argue that, by the other evidence, the defendant is shown to be guilty and that therefore his denial of guilt is false and is additional evidence against him, ought not to be permitted").

[4] 1743, Craig dem. Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1217 (see quotation supra); 1806, Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 140 (forgery of a register; Erskine, L. C.: "Every case must depend upon its own circumstances"); 1870, Moriarty v. R. Co., L. R. 5 Q. B. 314 (attempts to suborn witnesses, by the plaintiff and by C. acting under his authority; Blackburn, J.: "I think there is no case or authority in which the present point was actually ruled, except the celebrated case of Annesley v. Earl of Anglesea"; the proper inference is that "he was very doubtful about his case, — not necessarily that he thought his case untrue, but that it was not a good one"; see quotation supra); 1876, Lacey v. Hill, L. R. 4 Ch. D. 537, 543 (Jessel, M. R.: "No man makes fictitious entries and commits forgeries except to conceal that which he knows ought to be concealed for his own credit; and therefore no one can doubt for a moment that Sir R. Harvey was perfectly well aware that he was committing these frauds"); 1882, Chicago C. R. Co. v. McMahon, 103 Ill. 485, 487 (attempt to bribe a witness; "it is in the nature of and implies an admission that he has no right to recover if the case was tried on the evidence as it exists,—that it is not sufficient to recover unless aided by suppressing evidence or the fabrication of more evidence"); 1903, U. S. Brewing Co. v. Ruddy, 203 id. 306, 67 N. E. 799 (subornation of witnesses); 1862, Egan v. Bowker, 5 All. 449, 451 (suborning a witness, admitted, though the deposition had not been used); 1877, Com. v. Wallace, 123 Mass. 400 (attempt to bribe an arresting officer); 1881, Lynch v. Coffin, 131 id. 311, semble (attempt to suborn a witness); 1874, People v. Mason, 29 Mich. 31, 39 (attempt to influence a witness and to bribe jurymen); 1903, Baker v. State, — Miss. —, 33 So. 716 (defendant's request to B. to testify falsely if called, B. not being called, excluded; unsound); 1877, State v. Brown, 76 N. C. 222, 224 (using false testimony; but the falsities of a witness of the defendant must of course have been known to him beforehand); 1895, State v. Reinhart, 26 Or. 466, 38 Pac. 825 (false entries of account); 1898, McHugh v. McHugh, 186 Pa. 197, 40 Atl. 410 (attempt to suborn witnesses and to corrupt jurors, admitted; that defendant was acting as executrix only, immaterial); 1855, State v. Williams, 27 Vt. 724, 726 (deposition); 1896, Allen v. U. S., 164 U. S. 492, 17 Sup. 154 (using false testimony).

[5] 1888, Vye v. Alexander, 28 N. Br. 89, 93, 94, semble (libel; defendant's change of signature since litigation began, admissible to prove consciousness of guilt); 1889, Alexander v. Vye, 16 Can. Sup. 501 (foregoing case affirmed); 1857, Liles v. State, 30 Ala. 24 (ordering his wife to hold her tongue about the matter, admitted); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 Ala. 519, 528 (a conversation with his associate, "Lie still, and keep your damned mouth shut," admitted); 1895, People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697 (intimidation of witness); 1898, People v. Clausen, 120 id. 381, 52 Pac. 658 (failure of pawnbroker to enter goods in book required by law, evidence of guilty knowledge that they were stolen); 1896, State v. Hogan, 67 Conn. 581, 35 Atl. 508 (keeping away a witness); 1900, Keesler v. State, 154 Ind. 242, 56 N. E. 232 (intimida-

[6] 1898, Roberson v. State, 40 Fla. 509, 24 So. 474 (burning a house to destroy evidence of burglary, admitted); 1903, Weightnovel v. State, — id. —, 35 So. 856 (abortion); 1881, Betts v. State, 66 Ga. 508, 512 (murder; throwing away money taken from the deceased); 1862, Com. v. Hall, 4 All. 306 (swallowing a counterfeit bill when arrested on the charge of uttering counterfeit bills); 1877, Com. v. Wallace, 123 Mass. 400 (illegally keeping liquor with intent to sell; destruction of the liquors); 1882, Com. v. Daily, 133 id. 577 (same; intentional breaking of a bottle); 1892, Com. v. Sullivan, 156 id. 487, 31 N. E. 647 (same; destruction of liquor); 1904, Harper v. State, — Miss. —, 35 So. 572 (hypodermic injections, to prevent the victim from telling, excluded; absurd); 1883, State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 448 (murder; burying the dead body in a hole, and false statements as to the cause of the deceased's disappearance, admitted).

§ 279. Same: Other rules discriminated; Confessions, Impeachment of Witnesses, Failure to prove Alibi, etc. In applying the principle to the foregoing instances, no difficulty arises except so far as it becomes necessary to discriminate certain other principles.

(a) The rules of limitation for an accused's confession of guilt do not apply to conduct of the foregoing sorts, because a confession, properly so called, is a direct assertion of the incriminating fact and does not include within its definition mere conduct used circumstantially (post, § 821).

(2) A witness may be impeached by his corrupt conduct consisting in bribery or subornation of other witnesses or of court-officers; this is dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 957 ff.).

(3) The mere failure to produce witnesses, documents, or chattels must be distinguished from the suppression or concealment of them; the inference from the former conduct is a more restricted one (examined elsewhere, post, §§ 285–291). In particular, the failure to establish an alleged alibi is to be distinguished from the use of perjury or subornation in an unsuccessful attempt to prove the alibi; the latter admits of the usual broad inference from fraud, but the former amounts to nothing more than an inability to prove the specific fact of alibi:

1866, Welch, J., in Toler v. State, 16 Oh. St. 585: "The defendant's case is often much weakened by an unsuccessful attempt to prove an alibi. But this result happens, not because of any implied or technical admission involved in the attempt, but because of fraud and subornation of perjury manifested in the attempt. . . . In no case can the attempt be held to involve an admission of crime, nor the simple failure to establish it afford any presumption of the defendant's presence at the time and place when and where the crime was committed. . . . It can have no effect upon the question of his presence at the place charged, otherwise than by disclosing falsehood and prevarication and thus affording general evidence of guilt."[1]

tion of witnesses; "such conduct is regarded as in the nature of an admission that the party has a bad case, which cannot be supported by honest proof"); 1878, State v. Hudson, 50 Ia. 157 (furnishing money for an accomplice's escape); 1844, State v. Bruce, 24 Me. 72 (property obtained by threats; its subsequent concealment admitted); 1877, Com. v. Wallace, 123 Mass. 400 (illegal liquor-selling; concealment of bottles); 1895, Com. v. Welch, 163 id. 372, 40 N. E. 103 (liquor-selling; refusal to let an officer see something hidden under the clothing and shaped like a bottle); 1899, Adams v. Swift, 172 id. 521, 52 N. E. 1068 (concealing identity after a collision); 1900, Jones v. Shattuck, 175 id. 415, 56 N. E. 736 (refusal to disclose one's name, on request, after a collision, admitted); 1899, State v. Rozum, 8 N. D. 548, 80 N. W. 480 (intimidation of witness); 1864, State v. Barron, 37 Vt. 57, 61 (getting witnesses out of the way); 1898, State v. Taylor, 70 Vt. 1, 39 Atl. 447 (refusal to give name, age, and residence, to attending physician after arrest, held admissible, by a majority of the Court); 1882, Snell v. Bray, 56 Wis. 156, 162, 14 N. W. 14 (letters to a witness urging non-appearance; also letters urging a particular tenor of testimony). To these add tho code-provisions cited post, § 285, which cover the present sort of conduct also.

[1] Accord: 1876, Porter v. State, 55 Ala. 107; 1902, Tatum v. State, 131 id. 32, 31 So. 369; 1883, Kilgore v. State, 74 id. 8; 1881, People v. Malaspina, 57 Cal. 628; 1869, White v. State, 31 Ind. 262, 264 ("The fabrication of an alibi, like the wilful introduction of false and fabricated evidence in support of any other ground of defence, is a circumstance against the accused"; but not the mere failure to succeed in showing an alibi); 1878, Turner v. Com., 86 Pa. 54, 73; 1898, Ford v. State, 101 Tenn. 454, 47 S. W. 703. Contra: 1870, State v. Josey, 64 N. C. 56, 59, semble (mere failure to prove an alibi suffices).

But any inference which merely accepts the failure of evidence to deny the fact, as indicating the truth of the fact, is permissible on the principle of § 285, post: 1865, Gordou v. People, 33 N. Y. 501, 508 (inference allowable for failure to account for whereabouts); 1879, Dean's Case, 32 Gratt. 912, 925 ("the failure unexplained to assert the defence of an alibi when it could first be made [here, at the preliminary examination], and if true would be conclusive, is always regarded . . . as a most

§ 280. Same: Fraud in Separate Litigation; Fraud by Agents. (1) The use of fraudulent practice in a separate litigation has of itself no other significance than a reflection on the opponent's general character as an unscrupulous man, and is of course from that point of view inadmissible (ante, §§ 55, 64). But, so far as the other litigation involves substantially the same issue or object as the present one, a party's fraudulent conduct in the former, indicating a consciousness of the weakness of his cause, carries the same indication for the present cause, since by hypothesis the two causes are substantially the same with reference to the party's motives. On principle, then, the misconduct of the party in other litigation should be received, provided the issue involved was in effect the same, or provided the interests at stake in that and the present litigation are so united that the motive to succeed unlawfully in the present case might be supposed to be furthered by fraud in the former one.[1] (2) Where the fraudulent act — bribery, intimidation, spoliation, or the like — has personally been committed by an agent or other third person, and not by the party-opponent himself, it is obvious that the act must be brought home to the party's connivance or sanction, express or implied, in order to use it as indicating any consciousness on his part of a weak cause. In thus connecting it with the party, it is to be noted, on the one hand, that no mere technical theory of agency will suffice to charge him; for it is not a question of legal liability, but of actual moral connivance. On the other hand, no less should mere technical deficiencies of proof be allowed to exonerate him; due regard to the common probabilities of experience should be paid. For example, if a witness has been suborned by B, a clerk in the defendant's bank, it is idle to argue that such a clerk has no implied authority to tamper with witnesses, and therefore that some conversation or letter of the defendant, expressly authorizing B's errand, must be proved. Why should B meddle in such fashion, except upon some hint or order from the defendant? The relation between the two, together with common experience, should suffice to admit the fact, leaving to the defendant the opportunity to exculpate himself, as he easily could if innocent of any share. The common probabilities of such cases cannot be ignored; and it is better to admit such suspicious circumstance," as indicating that the alibi was false).

[1] The precedents do not show the sanction of any general rule; the phrasing above, in its second proviso, is illustrated by the first of the ensuing cases: 1743, Craig dem. Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1217 (see quotation ante, § 278; Bowes, C. B., seems to have dissented); 1896, Georgia R. & B. Co. v. Lyhrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794 (a false affidavit in connection with a former trial of the same cause; Atkinson, J., diss., because of the incidental admission of facts affecting character); 1899, Fuller v. Fuller, 108 id. 256, 33 S. E. 865 (attempted subornation in another case, excluded); 1899, State v. Seevers, 108 Ia. 738, 78 N. W. 705 (institution of a collateral prosecution against complainant to hinder present trial, admitted); 1839, Com. v. Sacket, 22 Pick. 394 (offer of reward, on behalf of the opponent, for his testimony in a class of cases including the present, admitted; but here the impeachment of the witness seems alone to have been in mind); 1881, Hastings v. Stetson, 130 Mass. 76 (attempt to bribe a juror at a former trial of the same case, admitted); 1866, State v. Staples, 47 N. H. 113 (an offer of a bribe to a witness for help in a series of charges including the present, admitted).

For the use of similar evidence to impeach a witness as corrupt, see post, §§ 957–963, 1040; some of these cases involved witnesses who were also parties, and they might serve as precedents under the present head. Compare also the use of other frauds as evidence of intent or plan (post, §§ 333, 340, 352).

facts in the fair certainty that an innocent party can protect himself, than to exclude them by requiring such a degree of connecting proof as practically gives a general immunity to fraud and chicanery. Most Courts exhibit an undue tenderness for technicality in dealing with such evidence, and shut their eyes, with solemn pretence, to that which every one must believe to be deserving of strong suspicion. No general rule seems to have found acceptance; but the wide variety of judicial attitude may be seen in the following passages:

1820, Abbott, C. J., in The Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 302 (answering the question, Whether the offer of a bribe, to a person not called as a witness, by one employed as an agent to procure evidence, is admissible): "This is a lawful employment necessary in many cases, . . . and, being a lawful employment, it is to be presumed, until the contrary be shown, that the employer means and intends that his agent shall execute it by lawful means. . . . The prosecutor may, up to the very moment when the proof is offered, be wholly ignorant of the wicked act of his agent; it is no less consistent that, having been informed of it, he may have rejected it with indignation and have repudiated the proffered testimony and withholden the witness from the Court; and if he be absent from the trial, which frequently happens, it may be impossible to prove his ignorance in the one case or the propriety of his conduct in the other. . . . [Nevertheless] I am by no means prepared to say that in no case and under no circumstances appearing at a trial it might not be fit and proper for a judge to allow proof of this nature to be submitted."

1901, Vann, J., in Nowack v. R. Co., 166 N. Y. 433, 60 N. E. 32: "If an honest man by mistake employs a dishonest one to look up witnesses for him, and the latter, through excess of zeal, resorts to bribery, although it was never thought of by his employer, it is better, for cleanliness and purity in the administration of justice, that the facts should be shown, with the fullest opportunity for explanation, than to exclude all evidence of the evil acts upon the ground that they were not authorized; because authority may properly be inferred from the nature of the employment. In such a case all doubt should be resolved, if possible, in the interest of clean evidence and the exposure of foul practices."[2]

[2] The precedents seem to furnish no accepted rule or test: 1743, Craig dem. Annesley v. Angleseа, 17 How. St. Tr. 1217 (see quotation supra, § 278); 1820, The Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 302; s. c. Queen Caroline's Trial, Linn's ed., III, 168, 177, 184 (offer of bribe, made by A, not a witness, to B, not a witness, A being the party's agent to procure witnesses, but no authority to offer bribes being expressly shown; excluded, because the party may have been wholly ignorant of it; unsound, for (1) it is possible that the party was ignorant, but it is entirely unlikely; common probability suggests connivance as the most likely explanation, and a party's bribes can otherwise be hardly ever proved; (2) repeated instances of the sort indicate a general plan to bribe, on the principle of § 343, post, and from that may be inferred the probable bribery of other persons actually examined as witnesses, and this circumstance, no matter who gave the bribe, would be admissible under § 962, post; see the argument of Mr. Wilde and Lord Erskine, at pp. 172, 178, ubi supra); 1856, Martin v. State, 28 Ala. 71, 81 (suppression of evidence; third person's conduct, inadmissible unless a connection with the party is shown); 1870, Winchell v. Edwards, 57 Ill. 41, 48 (fabrication by a former party in interest, admitted); 1882, Chicago C. R. Co. v. McMahon, 103 id. 485, 488 (a clerk of the company offered the bribe; the solution is worked out by the doctrine of scope of employment, as making the principal responsible for malicious acts); 1902, Ashcraft v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 847 ("that the prisoner's father, or any other person than the prisoner, had bribed or offered to bribe a witness in the case, could not be a relevant fact against the prisoner"); 1899, State v. Harris, 51 La. An. 1105, 26 So. 64 (admissions of subornation by a relative, not shown to be an agent, excluded); 1825, Com. v. Robbins, 3 Pick. 63 (husband's attempt to suborn the prosecutor not to testify, excluded as not made with the defendant-wife's privity); 1883, Com. v. Ryan, 134 Mass. 223, 225 (suppression of evidence by a prosecuting officer in a criminal case; undecided); 1888, Com. v. Locke, 145 id. 401, 14 N. E. 621 (same; destruction of liquors by the defendant's barkeeper, admitted); 1888, Com. v. McHugh, 147 id. 401, 18 N. E. 74 (same; destruction by a person present, without the defendant's objection, admitted); Com. v. Downey, 148 id. 14, 18 N. E. 584 (same; destruction of liquor by the defendant's wife, admitted); 1888, Com. v. Gillon, 148 id. 15, 18 N. E. 584 (same as Com. v. Downey); 1860, Dillin v. Peo-

§ 281. Same: Explaining away the Suspicious Conduct. On the general logical principle of Explanation (ante, § 32) the opponent may always introduce such facts as serve to explain away, on some other hypothesis, the apparent significance of the fraudulent conduct. A consciousness of the weakness of the cause is the natural inference, but not the only possible one, from such conduct; and there is nothing to prevent the admission of facts which make some other inference more plausible.[1]

§ 282. Same: (3) Taking Precautions to remedy or prevent Injury; Conveying Property; Insuring against Risks. The opponent's conduct in taking precautions to prevent an apprehended injury, or to remedy one already inflicted, may sometimes indicate a consciousness of wrong, in respect either to the party's identity as the wrongdoer or to his culpability in doing the act. For example, the precautions taken by the owner of an animal alleged to be vicious would be some evidence of his knowledge of that viciousness;[1] the conveyance of property, during litigation or just prior to it, may be evidence of the transferor's consciousness that he ought to lose;[2] the procurement of an abortion may indicate consciousness of the procurer's paternity;[3] and other

ple, 8 Mich. 357, 370 (attempts by accused's counsel and friends, to induce a witness' absence; "such testimony should only be allowed to go to the jury when some evidence accompanies it upon which the jury may inquire as to the prisoner's knowledge of and complicity in it"); 1903, People v. Salsbury, — id. —, 96 N. W. 936 (it must appear that the attempt to bribe was with the "consent or approval" of the party, "or at least knowledge or expectation that it had been or would be made"); 1896, Matthews v. Lumber Co., 65 Minn. 372, 67 N. W. 1008 (admissible if the agency is shown; here the person was only an officer of the law); 1878, State v. Rothschild, 68 Mo. 52, 54 (inducements to leave the State, made by persons not shown to be connected with defendant, excluded), 1901, State v. Huff, 161 id. 459, 61 S. W. 900 (improper attempts by a person claiming to represent the party, but not shown to be authorized, excluded); 1901, Nowack v. R. Co., 166 N. Y. 433, 60 N. E. 32 (a corrupt offer by one concededly an agent to interview witnesses, admitted, the party being a corporation; Landon, Haight, and O'Brien, JJ., diss.; see quotation supra); 1883, Tullis v. State, 39 Oh. 200 (that money had been offered, though not by the opponent's agent, admitted); 1876, Heslop v. Heslop, 82 Pa. 537 (efforts to tamper with a witness, by the defendant and her son jointly, admitted); 1899, Luttrell v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 651, 51 S. W. 930 (subornation by defendant's attorney; excluded for lack of proof of authority); 1893, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Rambo, 8 C. C. A. 6, 59 Fed. 75, 82 (attempt at bribery by the "special agent" of the defendant, admissible); 1875, Green v. Woodbury, 48 Vt. 5 (attempt to keep a witness away; "such acts must be the acts of the party, either directly or by authorization").

Distinguish the use of evidence of bribery or the like for the purpose of impeaching a particular witness, post, §§ 957–963.

Compare the rulings in regard to using a compromise by an authorized person, post, § 1062.

[1] 1903, Sherrill v. State, — Ala. —, 35 So. 129 (an explanation made some time after the flight, excluded); 1859, Com. v. Goodwin, 14 Gray 55 (as tending to explain away his falsehoods, the defendant was not allowed to show that he had formerly acknowledged the truth in the matter; apparently too strict a ruling); 1881, Lynch v. Coffin, 131 Mass. 311 (fabrication of evidence; explanation allowed); 1883, Homer v. Everett, 91 N. Y. 641, 646 (permitting an explanation of an alleged attempt to suborn); 1903, Evans v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 76 S. W. 467 (flight.)

Compare the principle allowing explanation of an admission (post, § 1058) and of a witness' prior self-contradiction (post, § 1044).

[1] 1796, Jones v. Perry, 2 Esp. 483 (the precaution used in tying up a dog, admitted to show defendant's knowledge that it was fierce and dangerous); 1900, Sanders v. O'Callaghan, 110 Ia. 574, 82 N. W. 969 (keeping a dog chained so that it would not bite is an admission of his vicious character); 1883, Montgomery v. Koester, 35 La. An. 1091, 1093 (similar); 1888, Brice v. Baner, 108 N. Y. 428, 431, 15 N. E. 695 (similar).

[2] Contra: 1898, Miller v. Dill, 19 Ind. 326, 49 N. E. 272 (mere fact of conveyance of property, not received as an admission of a debt); 1892, Tile Co. v. Snyder, 93 id. 325, 53 N. W. 359, semble (that the defendant had disposed of his property pending suit, excluded); 1901, Hocks v. Sprangers, 113 Wis. 123, 87 N. W. 1101 (defendant's attempts to dispose of his property, excluded).

[3] 1881, McIlvain v. State, 80 Ind. 71 (bastardy; the fact that the defendant had, after the complainant's pregnancy, procured abortion-medicine for her, admitted); 1894, Badder v. Keefer, 100 Mich. 272, 273, 58 N. W. 1007 (bas-instances may well occur. But it is plain that the prior provision of insurance against a certain class of risks can permit no such inference; first, because insurance is mainly intended to guard against inevitable injuries for which no one may be to blame; and, secondly, even so far as it is intended to cover injuries caused by the insured's culpability (e. g. employer's liability insurance), this affords no indication of the insured's belief as to the specific injury at issue, for to assume that it was one of the class of injuries insured against is to beg the question.[4] It must be admitted that the same argument might to some extent be used on behalf of owners taking precautions for animals; this, however, would then give reason to doubt the doctrine laid down above for that class of cases.

§ 283. Same: Repairs of a Machine, Highway, or the like, after an Injury. If machines, bridges, sidewalks, and other objects, never caused corporal injury except through the negligence of their owner, then his act of improving their condition, after the happening of an injury thereat, would indicate a belief on his part that the injury was caused by his negligence. But the assumption is plainly false; injuries may be and are constantly caused by reason of inevitable accident, and also by reason of contributory negligence of the injured person. To improve the condition of the injury-causing object is therefore to indicate a belief merely that it has been capable of causing such an injury, but indicates nothing more, and is equally consistent with a belief in injury by mere accident, or by contributory negligence, as well as by the owner's negligence. Mere capacity of a place or thing to cause injury is not the fact that constitutes a liability for the owner; it must be a capacity which could have been known to an owner using reasonable diligence and foresight, and a capacity to injure persons taking reasonable care in its use. On this ground, then, namely, that the supposed inference from the act of improvement is not the plain and most probable one, such acts may be excluded. To be sure, it may be argued that, on the general theory of Relevancy (ante, §§ 31, 38), it would suffice for admissibility if merely the inference was a fairly possible one, — leaving it to the opponent to argue that it was the less probable one. Theoretically, it would be perhaps difficult to deny this. But in the present instance an argument of policy has always been invoked to strengthen the case for exclusion. That argument is that the admission of such acts, even though theoretically not plainly improper, would discourage all owners, even those who had genuinely been careful, from improving the place or thing that had caused the injury, because they would fear the evidential use of such acts to their disadvantage; and thus not only tardy; defendant's inquiries of a physician for what was "good to get a young lady out of a fix," admitted); 1868, Fox v. Stevens, 13 Minn. 252; 1903, Gatzmeyer v. Peterson, — Nebr. —, 94 N. W. 974 (bastardy; defendant's offer to obtain medical aid to get rid of the child, admitted).

[4] 1894, Anderson v. Duckworth, 162 Mass. 251, 38 N. E. 510 (admitting a conversation for other reasons, but cautioning against the use of this fact referred to in it); 1899, Manley v. Minneap. Paint Co., 76 Minn. 169, 78 N. W. 1050 (employer's indemnity policy, not admissible as an admission of negligence); 1902, Casselmon v. Dunfee, 172 N. Y. 507, 65 N. E. 494 (similar); 1897, Sawyer v. Shoe Co., 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311 (similar).

Distinguish the use of such evidence to show a motive in the employer to be negligent or indifferent in care (post, § 391), or to show a bias in his testimony (post, § 949).

would careful owners refrain from improvements, but even careless ones, who might have deserved to have the evidence adduced against them, would by refraining from improvements subject innocent persons to the risk of the recurrence of the injury. Whatever, then, might be the strength of the objection to such evidence from the point of view of relevancy alone, the added considerations of policy suffice to make clear the impropriety of resorting to it. On one or another or both of these grounds have most Courts rested their reasoning:

1869, Bramwell, B., in Hart v. R. Co., 21 L. T. R. N. S. 263: "People do not furnish evidence against themselves simply by adopting a new plan in order to prevent the recurrence of an accident. I think that a proposition to the contrary would be barbarous. It would be (as I have often had occasion to tell juries) to hold that, because the world gets wiser as it gets older, therefore it was foolish before."

1892, Coleridge, L. C. J., in Beever v. Hanson, 25 L. J. Notes of Cases 132: "Now a perfectly humane man naturally makes it physically impossible that a particular accident which has once happened can happen again, by fencing or covering, or at any rate making safe the particular thing from which it arose. That, however, is no evidence of, and I protest against its being put forward as evidence of negligence. A place may be left for a hundred years unfenced, when at last some one falls down it; the owner, like a sensible and humane man, then puts up a fence; and upon this the argument is that he has been guilty of negligence, and shows that he thought the fence was necessary because he put it up. This is both unfair and unjust. It is making the good feeling and right principle of a man evidence against him."

1883, Mitchell, J., in Morse v. R. Co., 30 Minn. 468, 16 N. W. 358: "Such acts afford no legitimate basis for construing such an act as an admission of previous neglect of duty. A person may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, in the light of his new experience, after an unexpected accident has occurred, and as a measure of extreme caution, he may adopt additional safeguards. The more careful a person is, the more regard he has for the lives of others, the more likely he would be to do so, and it would seem unjust that he could not do so without being liable to have such acts construed as an admission of prior negligence. We think such a rule puts an unfair interpretation upon human conduct, and virtually holds out an inducement for continued negligence."

1889, Elliott, J., in Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Clem, 123 Ind. 18, 23 N. E. 965: "The effect of declaring such evidence competent is to inform a defendant that if he makes changes or repairs, he does it under penalty. . . . True policy and sound reason require that men should be encouraged to improve or repair, and not be deterred from it by the fear that if they do so their acts will be construed into an admission that they had been wrongdoers. A rule which so operates as to deter men from profiting by experience and availing themselves of new information has nothing to commend it; for it is neither expedient nor just."

Accordingly, it is conceded, in almost all courts, that no act in the nature of repairs, improvement, substitution, or the like, done after the occurrence of an injury, is receivable as evidence of a consciousness, on the part of the owner, of negligence, connivance, or other culpability in causing the injury.[5]

[5] In three or four jurisdictions only is there any inclination to qualify or to repudiate this doctrine; the early contrary cases in Pennsylvania raised the question generally, and were followed in Georgia, Iowa, Kansas, and Minnesota; but since Morse v. R. Co., in Minnesota, and Columbia R. Co. v. Hawthorne, in the Federal Court, there has been little disposition to concede any force to the Pennsylvania view, and it has apparently been discarded in most courts where it was originally accepted: England: 1869, Hart v. R. Co., 21 L. T. R. N. S. 261 (injury by a railroad collision; subsequent improvement of tracks excluded); 1892, Beever v.

There may of course be other evidential purposes for which the acts in question may be relevant; in that event, they are to be received, subject to a

Hanson, 25 L. J. Notes of Cases 132 (injury on cogs of a machine; subsequent boarding of the cogs, excluded); Canada: 1900, Cole v. R. Co., 19 Ont. Pr. 104 (subsequent safeguards, excluded); Alabama: 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Malone, 109 Ala. 509, 20 So. 33 (the mere fact of repairs, held inadmissible; but in determining the condition at the time of the accident, the repairs may be considered); California: 1891, Sappenfield v. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 61, 27 Pac. 590 (injury by failure of the pin in the drawhead of a car; subsequent adoption of an improved pin, excluded); 1896, Turner v. Hearst, 115 id. 394, 47 Pac. 129 (the discharge of the reporter, after the libellous publication, excluded); 1900, Limburg v. Gleuwood L. Co., 127 id. 598, 60 Pac. 176 (wagon accident; subsequent remedy of defect, excluded); 1903, Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Co., — id. — , 73 Pac. 165 (boiler-explosion; subsequent precaution, held inadmissible); 1903, Dyas v. Southern P. Co., — id. —, 73 Pac. 972 (subsequent condition of a derrick structure, admitted to show its condition at the time in question, though incidentally involving a mention of the fact of repairs); Colorado: 1874, Kansas P. R. Co. v. Miller, 2 Colo. 442, 468 (washing away of a bridge; subsequent different construction, admissible to show "that the first one was inadequate," but not to show negligence); 1888, Colorado Electric Co. v. Lubbers, 11 id. 505, 508, 19 Pac. 479 (injury to employee by electric shock; defendant's subsequent warning to employees as to mode of doing work, excluded); 1893, Anson v. Evans, 19 id. 274, 277, 35 Pac. 47 (subsequent renewal of ropes, excluded); Annot. Stats. 1891, § 3706 (railroad's appointment of appraiser for damage done by fire set, not to be evidence that fire "was set out or caused by the operating of such railroad"); Connecticut: 1884, Nailey v. Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 524, 526 (injury at a door; subsequent closing-up of the door, excluded); 1901, Waterbury v. Waterbury T. Co., 74 id. 152, 50 Atl. 3 (subsequent restoration of a railing, not received as evidence that it was the defendant's workmen who had taken it down); Georgia: 1898, Atlanta C. S. R. Co. v. Bates, 103 Ga. 333, 30 S. E. 41 (street-railroad company's rule for motormen at a certain place, received as an admission of its danger); 1902 Georgia S. & F. R. Co. v. Cartledge, 116 Ga. 164, 42 S. E. 405 (subsequent removal of a post near a railroad track, considered; "our faith in the correctness [of our prior decisions admitting such evidence], which in the past had already been much shaken, has succumbed . . . ; we do not, however, distinctly announce that those decisions are now overruled," — a singularly unjudicial utterance); Idaho: 1898, Giffen v. Lewiston, — Ida. —, 55 Pac. 545 (injury at a sidewalk; subsequent repairs excluded); Illinois: 1882, Warren v. Wright, 103 Ill. 298, 302 (falling of a sidewalk; the fact and mode of rebuilding afterwards, excluded); 1890, Hodges v. Percival, 132 id. 53, 56, 23 N. E. 423 (falling of an elevator; subsequent construction of an air-cushion beneath it, excluded); 1891, Marder v. Leary, 137 id. 319, 323, 26 N. E. 1093 (elevator accident; improvements after the accident, inadmissible); 1892, Weber Wagon Co. v. Kell, 139 id. 644, 650, 29 N. E. 714 (injury from a slippery floor; subsequent change of the floor, held inadmissible); 1894, Bloomington v. Legg, 151 id. 9, 15, 37 N. E. 696 (removal of the injuring article, inadmissible); 1899, Howa v. Medaria, 183 id. 288, 55 N. E. 724 (machine; subsequent repairs excluded); 1902, Taylorville v. Stafford, 196 id. 288, 63 N. E. 624 (subsequent repairs of a sidewalk, held not receivable as an admission, but only to explain a difference of measurement); Indiana: 1883, Lafayette v. Weavar, 92 Ind. 477, 479 (injury at a sidewalk; subsequent repairs excluded); 1889, Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Clem, 123 id. 15, 23 N. E. 965 (injury at a railroad crossing; subsequent repairs excluded; repudiating the obiter dictum in Goshen v. England, 119 id. 368, 373, 21 N. E. 977); 1891, Board v. Pearson, 129 id. 456, 28 N. E. 1120 (falling of a bridge; defendant commissioners' resolution to renew the bridge, excluded); 1898, Sievers v. P. B. & L. Co., 151 id. 642, 50 N. E. 877 (subsequent change of operation of an elevator, excluded); Iowa: 1877, Cramer v. Burlington, 45 Ia. 627, 629 (injury at a sidewalk; subsequent repairs excluded, but on the theory that the acts of an agent, to operate as admissions, must be contemporaneous); 1882, Hudson v. R. Co., 59 id. 581, 584, 13 N. W. 735 (same); 1883, Coates v. P. Co., 62 id. 491, 17 N. W. 760 ("The existence of a general order [to block all frogs on the line] was important only as a circumstance in the nature of an admission that without some protection frogs are dangerous to employees"); 1897, Henmi v. R. Co., 102 id. 25, 70 N. W. 746 (fire from a locomotive; subsequent repairs considered); 1900, Sylvester v. Casey, 110 id. 256, 81 N. W. 455 (sidewalk-injury; subsequent repairs, held inadmissible); 1901, Wimber v. R. Co., 114 id. 551, 87 N. W. 505 (photograph of a track, showing the subsequent removal of the guard-rail in which plaintiff's foot had been caught, held properly admitted on the facts); Kansas: 1873, St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Chase, 11 Kan. 47, 56 (fire from engine-sparks; subsequent change of the smoke-stack, admitted); 1877, Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Retford, 18 id. 245, 249 (injury at a track near a coal-chute; subsequent removal of the track, admitted); 1885, Emporia v. Schmidling, 33 id. 485, 488, 6 Pac. 893 (injury at a sidewalk; subsequent removal of the walk admitted to show it defective, but not to show notice); 1886, St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 35 id. 412, 432, 11 Pac. 408 (derailment at a washed-out culvert; subsequent erection of a larger culvert, admitted); Kentucky: 1897, Taylor v. R. Co., — Ky. —, 41 S. W. 551, semble (repairs to an engine said to have emitted sparks, excluded); Maryland: 1894, Washington C. & A. T. v. Case, 80 Md. 36, caution restricting their use to the specific proper purpose. In particular, (a) when the defendant's liability depends upon whether a landlord or his 30 Atl. 571 (defective bridge; repairs fourteen months later, excluded); Massachusetts: 1890, Menard v. R. Co., 150 Mass. 386, 388, 23 N. E. 214 (injury at a railroad crossing; subsequent placing of a flagman there, excluded); 1891, Shinners v. Merrimack Locks, 154 id. 168, 28 N. E. 10 (fall of a bank of earth; subsequent treatment of the bank, excluded); 1892, Downey v. Sawyer, 157 id. 418, 32 N. E. 654 (injury at a wool-feeding machine; change of apparatus not admissible to show former defect or former negligent use); 1894, McGuerty v. Hale, 161 id. 51, 53, 36 N. E. 682 (subsequent covering of gearing, excluded); 1895, Chalmers v. Mfg. Co., 164 id. 532, 42 N. E. 98 (machine; substitution of another machine, excluded); 1897, Dacey v. R. Co., 168 id. 479, 47 N. E. 418 (injury at a switch; subsequent construction of a different kind of switch, excluded); Michigan: 1883, Fulton Works v. Kimball, 52 Mich. 146, 149, 17 N. W. 733 (injury at a bridge; subsequent repairs, excluded); 1891, Lombar v. East Tawas, 86 id. 14, 18, 48 N. W. 947 (injury at a sidewalk; subsequent repairs, excluded); 1892, Thompson v. R. Co., 91 id. 255, 260, 51 N. W. 995 (injury at a crossing; subsequent removal of a building, excluded); 1893, Noble v. R. Co. 98 id. 249, 57 N. W. 126 (injury by a car-horse shying; subsequent separation of horses, excluded); Minnesota: the evidence was here at first thought admissible, following the Pennsylvania rulings; 1874, O'Leary v. Mankato, 21 Minn. 65, 68 (injury at a ditch near a bridge; subsequent covering of the ditch, admitted); 1877, Phelps v. Mankato, 23 id. 276, 279 (injury at a post in a street, subsequent removal of the post, admitted); 1881, Kelly v. R. Co., 28 id. 98, 108, 9 N. W. 588 (injury at a railroad crossing; subsequent repairs, admitted); but this view was afterwards repudiated; 1883, Morse v. R. Co., 30 id. 465, 468, 16 N. W. 358 (derailment at a switch; subsequent repairs, excluded); 1893, Day v. Lumber Co., 54 id. 523, 525, 528, 56 N. W. 213 (injury by emission of furnace-sparks; subsequent improvement in the smoke-stack, excluded); 1897, Hammargren v. St. Paul, 67 id. 6, 69 N. W. 470 (sidewalk; subsequent repairs, excluded); Missouri: 1882, Ely v. R. C., 77 Mo. 34, 46 (derailment at an embankment; subsequent alterations, excluded); 1885, Hipsley v. R. Co., 88 id. 348, 354 (railroad accident; subsequent repairs of the track, excluded); New Hampshire: 1892, Aldrich v. R. Co., 67 N. H. 250, 29 Atl. 408 (subsequent replacement of a switch by a new kind, excluded; Martin v. Towle, 59 id. 31, so far as inconsistent, overruled); New Jersey: 1899, Flanigan v. Guggenheim S. Co., 63 N. J. L. 647, 44 Atl. 762 (injury from alleged defective ladder; ladder's destruction by defendant's employee after the injury, admissible as accounting for plaintiff's non-production of it and as discrediting employee's exculpatory testimony); New York: 1871, Reed v. R. Co., 45 N. Y. 575 (derailment of a car; subsequent placing of new ties in the vicinity, excluded); 1874, Dougan v. Champlain Co., 56 id. 1, 8 (falling off a steamer-deck; subsequent boarding-up of the rail, excluded); 1877, Baird v. Daly, 68 id. 547, 551 (swamping of a scow; subsequent towing of the scow at reduced speed, excluded); 1878, Dale v. R. Co., 73 id. 468 (injury on a narrow bridge; subsequent erection of a wider one, excluded on the facts; but evidence of subsequent repairs said obiter to be admissible); 1878, Sewell v. Cohoes, 75 id. 45, 54 (injury at a low bridge; subsequent removal of the bridge, held inadmissible to show negligence); 1888, Corcoran v. Peekskill, 108 id. 151, 154, 15 N. E. 309 (injury at an area; subsequent fencing of the area, excluded); 1891, Getty v. Hamlin, 127 id. 636, 27 N. E. 399 (bridge accident; subsequent repairs, excluded); Pennsylvania: 1865, Pa. R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315, 320 (injury on a railroad platform; subsequent removal of the platform, admitted); 1871, West Chester & P. R. Co. v. McElwee, 67 id. 311, 314 (injury on a railroad track; subsequent change in the track, admitted); 1873, McKee v. Bidwell, 74 id. 218 (injury at an elevator-opening; subsequent placing of a gas-light there, admitted); 1895, Lederman v. R. Co., 165 id. 118, 30 Atl. 725 (injury at railroad crossing; subsequent erection of gates there, admitted, "to rebut an inference that the gates were there at the time of the accident"); 1902, Smith v. Philadelphia Traction Co., 202 Pa. 54, 51 Atl. 345 (substitution of a new system of sanding tracks, held not evidence of negligence); 1902, Baron v. Reading Iron Co., 15 274, 51 Atl. 979 (prior cases overruled; "in the later cases the rule has been recognized with reluctance, and doubt suggested as to its validity; the time has come when we should distinctly say that we do not approve the rule"; subsequent alteration of a railroad platform, here excluded); 1902, Elias v. Lancaster, 203 id. 638, 53 Atl. 507 (preceding case followed); Rhode Island: 1902, McGarr v. National & P. W. Mills, — R. I. —, 53 Atl. 320 (subsequent repairs to belting, excluded); South Carolina: 1897, Farley v. C. B. & S. Co., 51 S. C. 222, 28 S. E. 193 (subsequent precautions at a machine; question undecided; McIver, C. J., for rejection); Tennessee: 1900, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wyatt, 104 Tenn. 432, 58 S. W. 308 (subsequent repairs, excluded); Texas: 1889, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGowan, 73 Tex. 355, 362, 11 S. W. 336 (washing out of a culvert; subsequent widening, excluded; but not as an absolute rule); 1889, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Hennessey, 75 id. 155, 158, 12 S. W. 608 (injury at a railroad crossing; subsequent lighting of the crossing, excluded); 1890, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Compton, ib. 667, 675, 13 S. W. 667 (railroad accident; subsequent precautions, excluded); United States: 1886, Osborne v. Detroit, 36 Fed. 36, 38 (injury at a defective sidewalk; subsequent repairs, admitted; no authority cited); 1892, Columbia R. Co. v. Hawthorne, 144 U. S. 202, 12 Sup. 591 (injury at a machine; subse-tenant was in control of premises, or upon whether a municipal corporation was exercising authority over a highway, the acts of control of such a person are provable, and an act of repair done after the injury may chance to be such an act.[6] (b) Again, since the condition of a place or thing at the time of an injury may always be evidenced by showing its condition before or after that time, provided no substantial change has occurred (post, § 437), the description of the condition of the place subsequent to the injury may necessarily involve a mention of the fact of repairs;[7] but this use of the fact should be guarded against misuse for the forbidden purpose. (c) Furthermore, the failure to observe a precaution required by law may, if unexcused, be in itself a ground of liability, though it is sometimes dealt with in terms of a rule of evidence.[8]

§ 284. Same: (4) Failure to Prosecute; Failure to make Complaint; Failure to explain Innocence. (1) In general, a delay in instituting a prosecution,[1] or a reluctance, overcome only by the instigation of others,[2] is some indication — quent placing of safeguards, excluded); 1900, Southern Pacific Co. v. Hall, 41 C. C. A. 50, 100 Fed. 760 (subsequent change of railroad hydrant, excluded); 1902, Choctaw O. & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 50 C. C. A. 591, 112 Fed. 889; s. c. on appeal, — U. S. —, 24 Sup. 24 (changes of construction in a waterspout, admitted solely as affecting the measurement of its dimensions); Utah: 1896, Jenkins v. Irrigation Co., 13 Utah 100, 44 Pac. 829 (change in the method of using an irrigation ditch, made after suit brought, admitted to show consciousness of former negligence); Vermont: 1834, Richardson v. W. & R. T. Co., 6 Vt. 496, 504 (injury by the falling of a bridge; subsequent erection of a stronger bridge, intimated to be not admissible); 1901, McGovern v. Smith, 73 id. 52, 50 Atl. 549 (injury at a crossing; defendant's maintenance of electric signals at other crossings, held no evidence of negligence in not having them at this crossing); 1901, Sias v. Consol. Lighting Co. ib. 35, 50 Atl. 554 (that the defendant, being the employer of the plaintiff, had furnished medical or nursing assistance, held not receivable); Washington: 1893, Christensen v. U. T. Line, 6 Wash. 75, 83, 32 Pac. 1018 (discharge of the defendant's employee causing the injury, excluded); 1894, Bell v. W. C. S. Co., 8 id. 27, 28, 35 Pac. 405 (subsequent changes in machinery, not admissible to show negligence); 1899, Carter v. Seattle, 21 id. 585, 59 Pac. 500 (sidewalk injury; subsequent repairs, excluded); 1871, Castello v. Landwehr, 28 Wis. 522, 530 (subsequent safeguards for a bridge, excluded); 1890, Lang v. Sanger, 76 id. 71, 74, 44 N. W. 1095 (planing-mill accident; subsequent repairs, excluded); 1894, Anderson v. R. Co., 87 id. 195, 202, 58 N. W. 79 (railroad accident; subsequent precaution as to speed, excluded); 1895, Jennings v. Albion, 90 id. 22, 62 N. W. 926 (subsequent repairs, excluded); 1898, Green v. Water Co., 101 id. 258, 77 N. W. 722 (supplying contaminated water; precautions after the injury, excluded); 1901, Kreider v. Wisconsin R. P. & P. Co., 110 id. 645, 86 N. W. 662 (subsequent repair of machinery, excluded).

But it would seem that precautions taken before the injury might in some aspects be receivable; 1902, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Eaton, 194 Ill. 441, 62 N. E. 784 (adoption of a rule requiring flags and torpedoes in a certain exigency, held an admission "that ordinary care required the course of conduct prescribed").

[6] 1883, Lafayette v. Weaver, 92 Ind. 477, 479 (repairs as acts of dominion by a city over a street; but the Court here practically infringes on the preceding rule by allowing this evidence even though "the city's obligation . . . were sufficiently shown by other evidence"; this is going too far); 1870, Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Ia. 73, 82 (repairs done to a highway by a city, admitted as acts of dominion); 1879, Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 374 (on the question whether landlord or tenant had the control of and the duty to repair a platform, the acts of the landlord in making repairs after the injury were admitted); 1878, Sewell v. Cohoes, 75 N. Y. 45, 54 (injury at a low bridge built, by a coal company on land owned by the defendant city; subsequent removal of it by the defendant, admitted as an act of control involving responsibility); 1899, Siglin v. R. Co., 35 Or. 79, 56 Pac. 1011 (acts of repair of a fence admitted to show ownership).

[7] A few instances of this occur in the citations of note 5, supra; e. g. in Alabama and Iowa.

[8] The following statute is typical: Ohio St. 1898, Apr. 13, p. 113 (failure of a factory proprietor to make alterations or safeguards ordered by inspector "shall be prima facie evidence of negligence").

[1] 1895, Fussell v. State, 93 Ga. 350, 21 S. E. 97. Contra: 1902, Davis v. Hamilton, — Mich. —, 92 N. W. 512 (libel; plaintiff's failure to sue or otherwise call defendant to account for prior similar utterances by defendant, not receivable as an admission).

[2] 1876, Rogers v. People, 34 Mich. 345.

perhaps only a slight one in fact — of a consciousness of the weakness of one's cause. So also is the failure to sue or prosecute in the jurisdiction or court which would naturally be sought.[3] These are but a few illustrations of a great variety of the party's conduct which may be and constantly is inquired into as affecting his belief in the merits of his cause. Like all similar circumstances, it is of course open to explanation.[4]

(2) The failure to complain speedily of a rape is universally conceded to be a damaging circumstance against the woman making the charge. There is much question here over the allowable methods of explaining away, or meeting beforehand, this inference; and as the doctrines of impeachment and rehabilitation of witnesses are mainly concerned, the subject is examined in detail elsewhere (post, §§ 1134–1140).

(3) The woman's failure in travail to name her seducer, the father of her bastard, is by old tradition in some jurisdictions receivable as a significant fact. Here, too, the doctrines about witnesses come to be concerned, and the subject is examined elsewhere (post, § 1141).

(4) The failure to lodge immediate information of a robbery is similarly a circumstance discrediting the charge; for like reasons it is dealt with in another place (post, § 1142).

(5) The failure to protest one's innocence, on being arrested for a crime — a circumstance perhaps not to be distinguished from the conduct already considered in § 273 — leads to the question whether the fact of such protestation may be shown to repel in advance the inference that might otherwise have been made; this is considered elsewhere (post, § 1144).

(6) The failure to explain the possession of stolen goods, when arrested, is a significant circumstance which gives rise to the question whether an explanation actually made at the time is receivable; this trenches upon the Hearsay rule, and with other related questions is there considered (post, § 1781).

§ 285. Failure to Produce Evidence, as indicating Unfavorable Tenor of Evidence; (1) in general. The consciousness indicated by conduct may be, not an indefinite one affecting the weakness of the cause at large, but a specific one concerning the defects of a particular element in the cause. The failure to bring before the tribunal some circumstance, document, or witness, when either the party himself or his opponent claims that the facts would thereby be elucidated, serves to indicate, as the most natural inference, that the party fears to do so, and this fear is some evidence that the circumstance or document or witness, if brought, would have exposed facts unfavorable to the party. These inferences, to be sure, cannot fairly be made except upon certain conditions; and they are also open always to explanation by circumstances which make some other hypothesis a more natural one than the party's fear of exposure. But the propriety of such an inference in general is not doubted. The non-production of evidence that would naturally have been produced by an honest and therefore fearless claimant permits the inference that its tenor is unfavorable to the party's cause. Ever since the case of the chimney-sweeper's jewel, this has been a recognized principle:

[3] 1894, Merritt v. R. Co., 162 Mass. 326, 38 N. E. 447.
[4] Cases cited supra.

1722, Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange 505; a chimney-sweeper's boy, finding a jewel, took it to the defendant, a jeweler, for appraisal, but the defendant would not restore it. In an action of trover, in proving the value, "the Chief Justice [Pratt] directed the jury that unless the defendant did produce the jewel and show it not to be of the finest water, they should presume the strongest against him, and make the value of the best jewels the measure of their damages; which they accordingly did."[1]

1774, Lord Mansfield, C. J., in Blatch v. Archer, Cowp. 66: "It is certainly a maxim that all evidence is to be weighed according to the proof which it was in the power of one side to have produced and in the power of the other to have contradicted."

1820, Best, J., in R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 122: "If the opposite party has it in his power to rebut it by evidence, and yet offers none, then we have something like an admission that the presumption is just. . . . The law does not impose impossibilities on parties; it expects that a man who has the means of knowing who may be witnesses shall call them."

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier II, 128: "When weaker and less satisfactory testimony is tendered in support of a fact the nature of which will admit of elucidation from proofs of a more direct and explicit character, the same caution which rejects evidence of an inferior degree when higher evidence might be produced will awaken suspicion; and it will reasonably be supposed that a more perfect exposition of the subject would have laid open deficiencies and objections which a more obscure and uncertain representation was intended to conceal."

1846, Nelson, J., in Clifton v. U. S., 4 How. 247: "One of the general rules of evidence, of universal application, is that the best evidence of disputed facts must be produced of which the nature of the case will admit. This rule, speaking technically, applies only to the distinction between primary and secondary evidence; but the reason assigned for the application of the rule in a technical sense is equally applicable, and is frequently applied, to the distinction between the higher and inferior degrees of proof, speaking in a more general and enlarged sense of the terms. . . . Even in cases where the higher and inferior testimony cannot be resolved into primary and secondary evidence, technically, so as to compel the production of the higher, . . . the same presumption exists in full force and effect against the party withholding the better evidence, especially when it appears, or has been shown, to be in his possession or power, and must and should in all cases exercise no inconsiderable influence in assigning to the inferior proof the degree of credit to which it is rightfully entitled."

1877, Brewer, J., in State v. Grebe, 17 Kan. 458 (approving an instruction that "where evidence which would refute or explain certain facts and circumstances of a grave and suspicious nature is peculiarly within the defendant's knowledge and reach, and he makes no effort to procure that testimony," an inference may arise): "It seems to us that that clause is only a recognition of a well-understood principle of human action. The instinct of self-preservation impels one in peril of the penitentiary to produce whatever testimony he may have to deliver him from such peril. Every man will do what he can to shield himself from the disgrace of a conviction of crime, and the burden of punishment. We all know this. We all expect it. Whenever then a fact is shown which tends to prove crime upon a defendant, and any explanation of such fact is in the nature of the case peculiarly within his knowledge and reach, a failure to offer an explanation must tend to create a belief that none exists. Will not a man, who can, explain that which unexplained will stamp him a criminal and consign him to the felon's cell? The criminal law furnishes in its rules more than one illustration of this principle. The possession of recently-stolen property casts upon the possessor the duty of explaining such possession. Why? Because the fact and manner of acquiring that possession are peculiarly within his knowledge and reach, and the instinct of self-preservation will compel him to give an explanation thereof consistent with his innocence, if any such explanation exists. Other illustrations might be cited, but it is scarcely necessary. The principle itself rests in the common knowledge and conviction of all."

[1] Of course the mode of reasoning was understood and applied long before this case. An earlier record of it is found in Ward v. Apprice, 6 Mod. 264 (1705), quoted post, § 291.

This undoubted general principle has been frequently applied in numerous rulings, most of which throw no special light upon its doubtful features and are of little service as precedents.[2]

§ 286. Same: (2) Witnesses not Produced. (a) Witnesses Unavailable or Privileged. There remains some uncertainty in the judicial treatment of

[2] Eng.: 1754, Canning's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 312; 1794, Rowan's Trial, 22 id. 1140, 1142, 1170; 1798, Bond's Trial, 27 id. 605; 1835, Boyce v. Chapman, 2 Bing. N. C. 222 (issue as to the stealing of the plaintiff's goods by the defendant's porter; the defendant's failure to call the porter, admitted); 1839, Tracy Peerage Case, 10 Cl. & F. 154, 180, 189 (failure to produce available witnesses, taken as negativing the fact alleged); 1874, Vaughton v. R. Co., 12 Cox Cr. 580, 588 (similar facts); 1880, R. v. Labouchere, 14 id. 419, 432, Cockburn, C. J. (libel charging that the prosecutor gained his livelihood by card-sharping; that certain co-players were not produced by the prosecutor, was allowed to be considered; "you may fairly ask yourselves whether, if these persons had not been associated with the prosecutor in the evil practices alleged, he would not have been eager to produce them as witnesses to rebut the charges made against him"); Can.: 1878, Briggs v. McBride, 17 N. Br. 663, 666; 1899, Hesse v. St. John R. Co., 30 Can. Sup. 218, 225, 234 (personal injury); Alaska C. C. P. 1900, § 673 (like Or. Annot. C. 1892, § 845); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 1963 (it is to be presumed "that evidence wilfully suppressed would be adverse, if produced," and "that higher evidence would be adverse, from inferior being produced"); Conn.: 1895, Throckmorton v. Chapman, 65 Conn. 441, 454, 32 Atl. 930 (conveyance in fraud of creditors; inference allowed for failure to call the debtor and his wife); Fla.: 1895, Leslie v. State, 35 Fla. 171, 17 So. 555 (failure to call a person who could have explained an alleged larceny; inference allowed); Ga.: 1883, Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 128, 137 (homicide); 1885, Gainesville & J. S. R. Co. v. Wall, 75 id. 282 (failure of defendant to produce fireman of engine, in an action for killing a cow); 1885, Davis v. R. Co., ib. 645, 648 (similar); 1885, East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Cutler, ib. 904, semble (similar); 1886, Savannah F. & W. R. Co. v. Gray, 77 id. 440, 442, 3 S. E. 158 (similar; but on the facts the inference was held not proper); 1887, Harrison v. Kiser, 79 id. 588, 592, 4 S. E. 320 (employer's liability; inference denied on the facts); Code 1895, § 5163, Cr. C. § 989 (a presumption arises, "where a party has evidence in his power and within his reach . . . and omits to produce it, or having more certain and satisfactory evidence in his power relies on that which is of a weaker and inferior nature," that the opponent's "charge or claim is well founded"); Ind.: 1897, Hinshaw v. State, 147 Ind. 334, 47 N. E. 158; Ia.: 1883, State v. Rodman, 62 Ia. 456, 458, 17 N. W. 668; Kan.: 1877, State v. Grebe, 17 Kan. 458; La.: 1899, Pruyn v. Young, 51 La. An. 820, 25 So. 124; Me.: 1890, Freeman v. Fogg, 82 Me. 408, 411, 19 Atl. 907; Mass.: 1860, Com. v. Clark, 14 Gray, 367, 370, 373; 1862, Whitney v. Bailey, 4 Atl. 173, 175; 1895, Com. v. McCabe, 163 Mass. 102, 37 N. E. 777; Mich.: 1875, Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 380, 394; 1879, People v. Gordon, 40 id. 716, 720; 1882, Ruppe v. Steinbach, 48 id. 465, 466, 12 N. W. 658; Mo.: 1879, State v. Degunia, 69 Mo. 485, 490; Mont. C. C. P. 1895, § 3266 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1963); N. H.: 1900, Hersey v. Hutchins, 70 N. H. 130, 46 Atl. 33; N. Y.: 1860, People v. Dyle, 21 N. Y. 578 (inferences allowable from failure to contradict an accomplice on a material point); N. C.: 1876, State v. Smallwood, 75 N. C. 104, 106 (inference allowed from failure to call a witness overhearing a confession); Or. Annot. Code, 1892, § 845, ed. 1902, § 788 (similar to Cal. C. C. P. § 1963); Pa.: 1856, Fowler v. Sergeant, 1 Pa. 355 (malpractice; failure to call an assisting surgeon); 1883, Rice v. Com., 102 id. 408, 411 (seduction; failure to call a person present at an alleged confession of the defendant); U. S.: 1874, Steamship Ville du Havre, 7 Ben. 328, 332, 16 Fed. 943 (failure to call a steward who had trimmed a light, to show what condition the light was in); 1880, U. S. v. Schindler, 18 Blatch. 227, 230, 3 Fed. 338; 1883, The Fred M. Laurence, 15 Fed. 635; 1896, Kirby v. Tallmadge, 160 U. S. 379, 383, 16 Sup. 349; 1897, The Joseph B. Thomas, 81 Fed. 578 (failure to produce probable eye-witnesses); 1902, Re Kellogg, 113 Fed. 120, 130; 1902, Sanntry v. U. S., 55 C. C. A. 148, 117 Fed. 132 (principle applied to proof of the value of timber cut by a trespasser); 1903, Marande v. R. Co., — C. C. A. —, 124 Fed. 42; W. Va.: 1892, Robinson v. Woodford, 37 W. Va. 377, 391, 16 S. E. 602; 1902, Garber v. Blatchley, 51 id. 147, 41 S. E. 222; 1903, Vandervort v. Fouse, 52 id. 214, 43 S. E. 112 (but using the entirely improper phrase that a "conclusive presumption" is raised).

certain conditions preliminary to the inference. It is plain that the inference is based, not on the bare fact that a particular person is not produced as a witness, but on his non-production when it would be natural to suppose that he would have been produced if the facts known by him had been favorable. What are the additional elements which justify us in saying that it would have been natural?

(a) In the first place, the person must be within the power of the party to produce. This is unquestioned.[1] This lack of power may be due to the person's absence from the jurisdiction, or to his illness, or to other circumstances.[2] In particular, it may be due to the party's ignorance of the whereabouts of the witness or of the witness' possession of useful information,[3] or of the need of proving the facts in question;[4] for here knowledge is essential to power. Further, it may be due to the person's disqualification as a witness.[5] When the witness is privileged, and the privilege is independent of the party's control, the witness' claim of privilege renders the party unable to use his testimony;[6] but it would seem that the witness should at least have been summoned and asked, for he may waive his privilege.[7] But where the privilege is one which lies within the control of the party himself, it is obvious that the employment of the witness is in fact within the party's power; and thus, so far as the present principle is concerned, the inference might be justified. Nevertheless, the question arises whether thus the privilege might not be undermined and destroyed by indirection; and this depends so much on the nature of the privilege that it is better examined under the heads of the respective privileges.[8]

Of course, a rule of evidence other than a rule of privilege for the party is a means of excluding evidence which he is always entitled to take advantage of; and his objection to prohibited evidence (or his failure to waive an objection) cannot in any way be construed to his disadvantage,[9] since by

[1] This is mentioned or assumed in almost all the cases, e. g.: 1876, Schnell v. Toomer, 56 Ga. 168, 171; 1887, People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 463, 14 N. E. 319; 1902, State v. Buckman, 74 Vt. 309, 52 Atl. 427.

[2] Compare the circumstances allowed in explanation: post, § 287.

[3] 1896, State v. Fitzgerald, 68 Vt. 125, 34 Atl. 429; 1902, McKinstry v. Collins, 74 Vt. 147, 52 Atl. 438 semble (the testimony must be within the peculiar knowledge of the opponent; but the objecting party must show that it was not).

[4] Compare the rule as to notice to produce documents, post, § 291. Whether a corporation can be defaulted for its failure to cause its officer, being out of the jurisdiction, to appear as a witness, is considered in Central Grain & S. Exch. v. Board of Trade, C. C. A., 125 Fed. 463 (1903).

[5] 1900, Knox v. State, 112 Ga. 373, 37 S. E. 416 (failure to call a minor, not shown competent, who was an eye-witness, not to be considered; Little, J., diss., because the witness was competent); 1862, Carter v. Beals, 44 N. H. 408, 413 (party's husband disqualified; but otherwise, where he is as joint defendant qualified to testify for himself); 1893, Graves v. U. S., 150 U. S. 118, 120, 14 Sup. 40 (wife alleged to have been present at a place with defendant, and desired so as to allow of identification; she was incompetent, both for and against him; failure to produce her, not admissible).

[6] This seems not to be questioned.

[7] This situation would be chiefly likely to occur for a witness privileged not to produce documents, under the principle of § 2211, post; see the cases as to non-production of documents, post, § 291. Compare the rule permitting the use of copies of documents in a third person's hands, but requiring that at least a demand or service of process be first shown: post, §§ 1211–1213.

[8] For the privilege between husband and wife, see post, §§ 2243, 2340; for the privilege between attorney and client, see post, § 2322; for the privilege against self-crimination, see post, §§ 2272, 2273. The effect of claiming a privilege as a civil party may be sufficiently examined here, in § 289, post.

[9] 1901, Laird v. Laird, 127 Mich. 24 86

hypothesis the evidence is prohibited, not for his personal sake on grounds independent of the value of the evidence, as privileged evidence is (post, § 2196), but because of the untrustworthiness of the evidence. No doubt a party usually does take advantage of such rules because the forbidden evidence is unfavorable, and no doubt the opponent constantly seeks by innuendo to give an unfavorable meaning to such objections. But the rules of evidence could never be enforced if parties were not guaranteed free scope in calling attention to the impending violation of the rules; and it is universally assumed and understood that no inference can lawfully be urged in consequence of such objections.

§ 287. Same: (b) Witnesses Prejudiced or Inferior in Value. (b) In the next place, the inference is clearly not a proper one where the person in question is one who by his position would likely be so prejudiced against the party that the latter could not expect to obtain from him the unbiassed truth.[1] Furthermore, it seems plain that possible witnesses whose testimony is for any reason comparatively unimportant, or cumulative, or inferior to what is already utilized, might well be dispensed with by a party on general grounds of expense and inconvenience, without any apprehension as to the tenor of their testimony. In other words, put somewhat more strongly, there is a general limitation (depending for its application on the facts of each case) that the inference cannot fairly be drawn except from the non-production of witnesses whose testimony would be superior in respect to the fact to be proved. This limitation should not be enforced with any strictness; otherwise it would become practically objectionable; but on principle it is sound, and has often been recognized:

1885, Stone, C. J., in Carter v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 223, 224, 231 (disapproving a charge that "if a party has a witness within his power to produce, and fails to produce him, the presumption is fair that the witness if produced would not support the right of the party"): "Carried to its extent, it would require of a suitor that he should produce all the witnesses, no matter how numerous they might be, who knew anything of the transaction. . . . There is a rule, and a just one, that if a party has a witness possessing a peculiar knowledge of the transaction, and supposed to be favorable to him, and fails to produce such witness when he has the means of doing so, this, in the absence of all explanation, is ground of suspicion that such better-informed testimony would make against him."[2]

N. W. 436 (failure to waive objection to incompetency by survivorship).

[1] 1882, State v. Cousins, 58 Ia. 250, 12 N. W. 281 (inference not allowable for a failure to call an alleged accomplice). This doctrine is implied in the following cases: 1895, Com. v. McCabe, 163 Mass. 98, 39 N. E. 777 (illegal keeping of liquor; the failure of the defendant to produce persons present at the time of the seizure, allowed as ground for inference; their probable relations to the defendant being such as to make it useless for the prosecution to call them, when it had other evidence); 1898, Fonda v. R. Co., 71 Minn. 438, 74 N. W. 166 (defendant's failure to call the employee who injured the plaintiff, admissible, though he was equally accessible to plaintiff).

[2] Accord: 1852, Patten v. Rambo, 20 Ala. 485 (two physicians had examined a slave, whose soundness was in issue; one only was called; the failure to call the other held no ground for an inference, without a showing that his testimony would have been more valuable); 1884, Jackson v. State, 77 id. 18, 21, 25 (two eye-witnesses of a homicide; no inference allowed against the prosecution for producing one only; so also for hearers of a dying declaration); 1885, Carter v. Chambers, 79 id. 223, 224, 231 (driver of the defendant's carriage, who ran over the plaintiff, not called; a charge that the failure to produce any available witness justifies an inference, rejected); 1892, Haynes v. McRae, 101 id. 318, 13 So. 270 (purchaser from an attached debtor, suing the sheriff; failure of the plaintiff to call

§ 288. Same: (c) Witnesses Equally Available to Both Parties. (c) It is commonly said that no inference is allowable where the person in question is equally available to both parties;[1] particularly where he is actually in court;[2] though there seems to be no disposition to accept such a limitation absolutely or to enforce it strictly.[3] Yet the more logical view is that the failure to produce is open to an inference against both parties, the particular strength of the inference against either depending on the circumstances.[4] To prohibit the inference entirely is to reduce to an arbitrary rule of uniformity that which really depends on the varying significance of facts which cannot be so measured.

§ 289. Same: (d) Party himself failing to Testify. At common law the party-opponent in a civil case was ordinarily privileged from taking the stand (post, § 2217); but he was also disqualified; and hence the question could rarely arise whether his failure to testify could justify any inference the debtor as to the consideration of the sale, etc., held no ground for inference); 1900, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 128 id. 95, 27 So. 760 (defendant's failure to call fireman of engine; no inference allowed); 1898, People v. Dole, — Cal. —, 51 Pac. 945 (C. C. P. § 1963, par. 6; "weaker" held hardly a proper synonym for "inferior"); 1867, Doe v. Stevens, 36 Ga. 463, 473 (execution of a deed denied; held that proof by witnesses to an alibi, instead of witnesses to handwriting or the like, raised no inference). So, too, a fortiori, where it does not appear what the witness would testify to: 1886, State v. Starnes, 94 N. C. 973, 975.

For the rule in a few jurisdictions that all eye-witnesses must be called in criminal cases by the prosecution, see post, § 2079.

[1] 1897, Nelms v. Steiner, 113 Ala. 562, 22 So. 435; 1899, Brock v. State, 123 id. 24, 26 So. 329 (defendant's failure to call one jointly indicted but separately tried for adultery: Tyson, J., rightly dissenting on the ground that a witness is not in truth "accessible" if, though present and compellable, he "may be so hostile to the prosecution or so connected with the defendant that his testimony would be unavailable to the State"); 1899, Coppin v. State, ib. 58, 26 So. 333 (similar); 1858, Scovill v. Baldwin, 27 Conn. 316, 318; 1900, Ray v. Camp, 110 Ga. 818, 36 S. E. 242; 1882, Haymond v. Saucer, 84 Ind. 3, 13; 1887, Coleman v. State, 111 Ind. 563, 569, 13 N. E. 100; 1881, State v. Rosier, 55 Ia. 517, 8 N. W. 345; 1882, State v. Cousins, 58 id. 250, 12 N. W. 281; 1902, Erie R. Co. v. Kane, 55 C. C. A. 129, 118 Fed. 223, 239, semble (no inference to be drawn against either party, where the witness was an employee of defendant but was summoned by plaintiff and in court); 1901, McCabe's Will, 73 Vt. 175, 50 Atl. 804 (but here stated in modified form). On this ground the following case apparently rests: 1887, Blackman v. State, 78 Ga. 592, 595, 3 S. E. 418 (trial having been postponed, on defendant's motion, to enable him to procure witnesses to an alibi, and the witnesses attending but not being called, no inference as to guilt was held allowable).

[2] 1891, Pollak v. Harmon, 94 Ala. 420, 10 So. 156 (purchase from an attached debtor; both grantors being in court, it was held that no suspicion or presumption could arise against the purchaser for not calling them); 1892, Bates v. Morris, 101 Ala. 282, 286, 13 So. 138 (the husband of the plaintiff, in Court and available for both parties; inference not allowed); 1895, Crawford v. State, 112 id. 1, 23, 21 So. 214; 1885, Davis v. R. Co., 75 Ga. 645, 648.

[3] 1878, McAdory v. State, 62 Ala. 154, 157, 162 (presence of witnesses not called; left to trial Court's discretion); 1897, Western & A. R. Co. v. Morrison, 102 Ga. 319, 29 S. E. 104 (failure to put on the stand a material witness, who is however produced in Court, may be commented on by counsel; Simmons, C. J., diss.); 1899, Harriman v. R. Co., 173 Mass. 28, 53 N. E. 156 (failure to call a witness available for both; left to jury to infer upon the circumstances); 1900, Story v. R. Co., 70 N. H. 364, 48 Atl. 288 (defendant's failure to produce the engineer who had caused the accident, held admissible, even though plaintiff might have taken his deposition; yet "ordinarily no inference can be drawn because a witness equally at the command of each party is not called"); 1899, Frank Waterhouse Co. v. Rock Land A. M. Co., 38 C. C. A. 281, 97 Fed. 466 (opponent's failure to produce an employee to whom leave of absence has been granted, open to inference, the proponent having fruitlessly subpœnaed him); 1892, Arbuckle v. Templeton, 65 Vt. 205, 211, 25 Atl. 1095 (inference not allowable from a mere omission to ask a witness while on the stand, because the opponent also might have asked).

[4] 1894, Mitchell v. R. Co., 68 N. H. 96, 116, 34 Atl. 674 (fireman, conductor, and M., being within ear-shot of a train, were not called to testify as to the bell-ringing; either party held entitled to argue as to the inference from this); 1901, State v. Slamon, 73 Vt. 212, 50 Atl. 1097 (undecided); 1892, Robinson v. Woodford, 37 W. Va. 377, 392, 16 S. E. 602, semble.

against him. But since the general abolition both of the privilege and the disqualification (post, §§ 2218, 577), the party has become both competent and compellable like other witnesses; and the question plainly arises whether his conduct is to be judged by the same standards of inference. This question should naturally be answered in the affirmative:

1862, Appleton, J., in Union Bank v. Stone, 50 Me. 595, 599: "There was evidence proving or tending to prove that a notice of demand and non-payment had been given the defendant. He had been notified to produce it, and did not. He was present and not a witness. If he had never received such a notice, he knew it, and, knowing it, would be little likely to omit an opportunity of stating a fact thus conclusively in his favor. The evidence tended strongly to charge him. A word from his lips might exonerate him from all liability. . . . If notice had been received, and the defendant knew it, he might well be silent. The utterances of the truth would establish the plaintiff's claim. . . . If he were a witness, he must either state the truth or a falsehood. If he testified truly, his hope of a successful defence was at an end. The defendant does not offer his own testimony. He prefers the adverse inferences which he cannot but perceive may be drawn therefrom, to any statements he could truly give or to any explanations he might make. He prefers any inferences to giving his testimony. Why? Because no inferences can be more adverse than would be the testimony he would be obliged by the truth to give. — The fact of not testifying was obvious to the jury. . . . No Court could perceive such a fact without attaching some degree of importance — more or less — to its existence, according to the necessity of the testimony and the emergencies of the defence. No judge exists who would not, if the trial had been before him, regard this as a fact bearing on his decision. To direct a jury to disregard it would be to direct them to disregard a fact existent, material, and probative. However much so directed, they could not fail to perceive, and, perceiving, could not avoid regarding it."

1875, Agnew, C. J., in Brown v. Schock, 77 Pa. 471, 478: "A man of ordinary intelligence must know that his failing to appear, when he had a strong motive to appear, would be evidence against him; if he relies upon his ability to disprove the motive imputed, he takes the risk, but he leaves the effect of his conduct, as a matter of evidence for the opposite side, to go to the jury."

1901, Blanchard, J., in Bastrop State Bank v. Levy, 106 La. 586, 31 So. 164: "Judicial tribunals are established to administer justice between litigants, and the first and most important step to that end is the ascertainment of the truth of the controversies which come before them. It is only when the truth is ascertained that the law can be properly applied in the just settlement of disputes. Litigants owe the duty of assisting in every legitimate way in the elucidation of the truth. When a defendant can by his own testimony throw light upon matters at issue, necessary to his defence and peculiarly within his own knowledge if the facts exist, and fails to go upon the witness stand, the presumption is raised, and will be given effect to, that the facts do not exist."

The only dissent from this view seems to be based on that subtle sentiment of honor (scarcely capable of appreciation outside of the Southern States) which recognizes the repugnance that an honorable and sensitive man feels to placing himself in a situation where his word may be doubted by reason of his interested motives. The legislation making parties competent has not even yet been received in those communities without scruple and apprehension. Where such motives of delicacy prevail, it would obviously be unfortunate to place the party in the dilemma of either violating his scruples by testifying or of suffering discredit by remaining silent:

1877, Bleckley, J., in Thompson v. Davitte, 59 Ga. 472, 480: "The request [which was properly refused] was based on the assumption that because the proponnder was present and competent to testify, he was bound to do so, or else suffer by his failure to offer himself as a witness in his own case. We think, on the contrary, that it is becoming, and to be commended, in a party not to testify, if he can avoid it without positive injury to the cause of truth and justice. As long as he is unheard, there should be no presumption that his silence is counseled by prudence rather than by modesty. While his case should not gain by his forbearance to testify, neither should it lose by it. Public policy forbids that a suitor should feel constrained to mount the witness-stand for no purpose but to let the jury know that he has something to say in his favor, or to show them that he can face the terrors of a cross-examination without breaking down. The encouragement of anything like competition in swearing would be too sure to breed perjury. Let those testify in their own behalf who voluntarily present themselves; but let no uncharitable imaginations light upon those who stay away, merely because they might swear if they would."

These standards of honor, however, cannot be expected to be considered in the Courts of other communities not affected by them in daily life. Moreover, it does not appear that the Southern Courts are either unanimous or rigorous in applying them. It would be generally agreed, to be sure, that the mere fact of the party's failure to testify is not of itself open to inference; it is his failure when he could be a useful and natural witness (ante, § 287) that is significant. But, granting this much, it is to-day conceded, except in a few Courts or in peculiar instances, th[illegible]he party's conduct is to be judged by the standard of other witnesses.[1] [illegible]party's refusal to submit to a physical examination should likewise be open to inference, for he is virtually withholding evidence; and this is generally conceded (post, § 2220); the curious thing is that it is equally conceded by Courts which decline to compel a submission and thus in effect recognize a privilege.

[1] 1831, Taylor v. Willans, 2 B. & Ad. 845, 856 (malicious prosecution; the prosecutor's failure to testify at the prosecution, held not inapt "under the very peculiar circumstances of this case, to raise an inference that his motive was a consciousness that he had no probable cause for instituting the prosecution"); 1858, Tufts v. Hatheway, 4 Allen N. B. 62 (trover for cordwood taken; the defendant's failure to testify as to the exact quantity, usable to infer the amount to be unfavorable to him); 1880, McGar v. Adams, 65 Ala. 106, 110 (agent's good faith; defendant's failure to take the stand, held not necessarily to raise an inference, where, on the facts, he might "properly rely on that which his adversary introduces, when it is without contradiction"); 1895, Throckmorton v. Chapman, 65 Conn. 441, 32 Atl. 930 (inference allowed; but here it did not appear that the absence was unexplained, and the circumstance hence could not be considered); 1875, Emory v. Smith, 54 Ga. 273, semble (no inference allowed); 1877, Thompson v. Davitte, 59 id. 472, 480 (see quotation supra); 1878, Moore v. Wright, 90 Ill. 470 ("it was a personal privilege"; no inference allowed); 1899, Harding v. American Glucose Co., 182 Ill. 551, 55 N. E. 577; 1901, Bastrop State Bank v. Levy, 106 La. 586, 31 So. 164; 1903, Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Turner, — Md. —, 55 Atl. 1023; 1873, McDonough v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 92, 96 (inference allowed); 1884, Lynch v. Peabody, 137 id. 92 (same); 1889, Mooney v. Davis, 75 Mich. 188, 193, 42 N. W. 802 (party's failure to testify in denial of certain representations attributed to him, held open to inference); 1890, Cole v. R. Co., 81 id. 156, 159, 45 N. W. 983 (personal [illegible]; plaintiff's failure to testify, held open to [illegible]rence on the facts; the rule is applicable where the party "possesses knowledge of the facts in controversy unknown to others who have been called as witnesses and such facts would supply positive evidence of what would otherwise be established by inference from other facts"); 1893, Cole v. R. Co., 95 id. 77, 80 (same case on re-trial; plaintiff's failure to testify, held open to inference); 1896, Connell v. McNett, 109 id. 329, 67 N. W. 344 (silence at a former trial; inference allowed); 1901, Bunckley v. Jones, 79 Miss. 1, 29 So. 1000 (failure of plaintiff and his father to testify, held admissible under the circumstances); N. M. Comp. L. 1897, § 3022 (if opposing party fails to testify when summoned, it shall be taken "as an admission pro confesso, unless otherwise ordered by the Court," and judge may non-suit, order a general finding, or postpone on terms); 1877, Bleecker v. Johnson, 69 N. Y. 309, 311 (failure to call one of the defendants, held to authorize "the jury to say whether under all the circumstances the absence of the defendant was suspicious, so as to authorize an unfavorable inference"); 1868, Devries v. Phillips, 63 N. C. 53, 55 (no inference from the mere failure to call; but there may be "according to the circumstances, as the introduction or non-introduction of any other witness might be com-

The failure of the accused in a criminal case to take the stand ought to permit, so far as the present principle is concerned, the same inference as for witnesses and parties in general. But here the question arises whether the use of such an inference would not indirectly infringe on the privilege; and this can best be considered after examining the privilege (post, §§ 2272, 2273).

§ 290. Same: (e) Sundry Distinctions: Criminal Cases; Good Character; Experts; Experiments; Depositions; Explanations; Nature of Inference; Burden of Proof; Presumptions. (1) The principle under consideration applies equally in criminal cases as in civil cases, both for the prosecution as for the accused.[1] So far, however, as it affects the accused, some complications arise in discriminating the generally prohibited inference from the accused's own failure to testify by claiming privilege, and the permissible inference from his failure to produce other evidence; and such problems are therefore best considered in connection with the privilege against self-crimination (post, §§ 2272–2273). One thing only (which does not involve the effect of the privilege) may be noted here, namely, that by general concession the accused's failure to produce testimony to his good character is not open to the inference that the character is bad, since otherwise the rule (ante, § 57) would be evaded, that the prosecution cannot invoke and prove his bad character until he offers to prove his character good.[2] mented on"); 1898, Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 495, 48 S. W. 809 (inference not allowable, if his testimony could add nothing valuable); 1895, Kirby v. Tallmadge, 160 U. S. 379, 383, 16 Sup. 349 (failure of defendants to take the stand to explain an alleged fraudulent purchase; inference allowed); 1885, Hefflebower v. Dietrick, 27 W. Va. 16, 23 (inference allowed against a defendant who did not testify to facts within his knowledge; the result partly affected by the presence of a demurrer to evidence).

The following principles are distinct from the foregoing, although in their application the difference is sometimes obscured: (1) that the failure of a witness (or party) to give certain testimony at a former trial which he now gives amounts to a self-contradiction (post, § 1042); that a party's silence during adverse testimony may sometimes be equivalent to assent and therefore to an admission of its truth (post, § 1072); that a party's failure to deny in a chancery answer the allegations of the bill may amount to an admission; this is a question of chancery pleading (Langdell, Equity Pleading, § 84).

The effect of a party's failure to produce a document is dealt with in § 291, post.

[1] The cases cited ante, passim, illustrate this; in particular, the passage quoted from Mr. J. Brewer in § 284.

[2] 1898, People v. Gleason, 122 Cal. 370, 55 Pac. 123; 1874, Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 134; 1874, State v. Kabrich, 39 Ia. 277; 1876, State v. Dockstader, 24 id. 486; 1878, State v. Northrup, 48 id. 584; 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 29, 7 N. W. 444; 1840, People v. White, 24 Wend. 524, 546, 554, 555, 560, 584 (Walworth, Ch., diss. at 537; this case overrules People v. Vane, 12 Wend. 82; 1834); 1845, People v. Bodine, 1 Den. 281, 292, 314; 1831, State v. Collins, 3 Dev. 118; 1847, State v. O'Neal, 7 Ired. 251; 1881, State v. Sanders, 84 N. C. 729; 1895, Com. v. Weber, 167 Pa. 153, 31 Atl. 481; 1839, State v. Ford, 3 Strobh. 522, 527, semble (here holding that the absence of good-character evidence simply leaves the defendant without such a benefit as it might have given in persuasion, and semble, that this is not the same as directing an inference that the character is bad); 1899, McKnight v. U. S., 38 C. C. A. 115, 97 Fed. 208. The only jurisdiction in which any doubt remains is that of Maine; 1844, State v. McAllister, 24 Me. 139, 144 (inference allowed); 1854, State v. Upham, 38 id. 261 (contra); 1862, State v. Tozier, 49 id. 404 (left undecided). But note that it is incorrect to say (as in Mullen v. U. S., 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892; 1901) that the accused's good character is presumed; this inconsistently gives him the untrammelled benefit

(2) The kind of witness or evidence is immaterial. The inference, for example, may be drawn from a failure to use expert testimony,[3] or a failure to employ experiments or samples or like instructive evidence.[4] So also the form of the testimony withheld is immaterial; the failure to take a deposition, where it could have been taken,[5] or to use a deposition, where it has been taken by the party not using it,[6] may be equally open to inference.

(3) In any event, the party affected by the inference may of course explain it away[7] by showing circumstances which otherwise account for his failure to produce the witness. There should be no limitation upon this right to explain, except that the trial judge is to be satisfied that the circumstances thus offered would, in ordinary logic and experience, furnish a plausible reason for non-production.[8]

(4) The inference (supposing the failure of evidence not to be explained of evidence which if he had introduced might have been disputed. What really happens, or ought to, is that the defendant's character is simply a non-existent quantity in the evidence; this distinction has sometimes been expressly pointed out; 1901, Addison v. People, 193 Ill. 405, 62 N. E. 235; 1880, Knight v. State, 70 Ind. 380.

[3] 1898, McKim v. Foley, 170 Mass. 426, 49 N. E. 625 (signature denied; failure to call experts said to have been consulted, admissible, in trial Court's discretion; doctrine may be applied to expert witnesses); 1901, Vergin v. Saginaw, 125 Mich. 499, 84 N. W. 1075 (failure to call physicians who had examined plaintiff's injuries; inference allowed); 1901, Wilkins v. Flint, 128 id. 262, 87 N. W. 195; 1886, Bullard v. R. Co., 64 N. H. 27, 31, 5 Atl. 838 (personal injury; plaintiff's failure to call one of the physicians consulted by her, held to be open to inference).

[4] 1900, Concord L. & W. P. Co. v. Clough, 70 N. H. 627, 47 Atl. 704 (failure to show subsoil at a view). Contra: 1880, Philadelphia v. Rule, 93 Pa. 15, 18 (action for pavement laid; failure to present samples of work done, held not to be considered); 1893, U. S. Sugar Refin. v. Allis Co., 6 C. C. A. 121, 9 U. S. App. 550, 552, 56 Fed. 786 (rule refused to be applied to a buyer's failure to test a machine as evidence of its defects).

For a party's failure to submit to corporal examination of his injuries, see post, § 2220.

For the non-production or concealment of chattels or other material objects, see post, § 291.

[5] Compare the cases cited ante, passim, and the following: 1895, Leslie v. State, 35 Fla. 171, 17 So. 555 (allowing comment on a failure to take out a commission, after filing interrogatories, for an alleged witness, so material that the failure indicated that the witness was a fictitious person); 1884, Judevine v. Weeks, 57 Vt. 278, 281. Contra: 1901, Lindle v. Com., — Ky. —, 64 S. W. 986 (introducing an affidavit for continuance containing the testimony of supposed absent witnesses, and then proving that the witnesses were present and that their testimony had not been offered by the accused either on the stand or by affidavit, held improper; this ruling seems unsound).

[6] 1882, Learned v. Hall, 133 Mass. 417, semble; 1885, Com. v. Haskell, 140 id. 128, 2 N. E. 773 (on the facts, held a matter for the jury to determine).

Distinguish the question whether the taking and filing of a deposition is such an adoption of it as amounts to an admission of its truth (post, § 1075); and also the question whether the opponent may use a deposition taken but not used by the other party (post, § 1389).

[7] On the general principle of Explanation, ante, § 34.

[8] Some of the following circumstances would have sufficed to forbid in the first instance any comment on the failure to produce: 1875, Com. v. Costello, 119 Mass. 214 (that the missing witnesses had been threatened by the prosecuting officer with prosecution for perjury on a collateral charge, and had fled the jurisdiction); 1895, Com. v. McCabe, 163 id. 98, 39 N. E. 777; 1897, Runnill v. Ash, 169 id. 341, 47 N. E. 1017 (failure to look for probable evidence; reasons for failure, allowed); 1898, Hall v. Austin, 73 Minn. 134, 75 N. W. 1121 (witness' illness, admitted in explanation); 1875, Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 477, 482 (trover for goods stolen by the defendant's porter; the plaintiff allowed to show that the porter was then in prison for the theft, as explaining why he was not produced); 1885, Hoard v. State, 15 Lea 321 (person not summoned, shown to be mentally incapable); 1895, Weatherford M. W. & N. R. Co. v. Duncan, 88 Tex. 611, 32 S. W. 878 (a showing that the witnesses had been subpœnaed but were in defendant's employ); 1874, Durgin v. Danville, 47 Vt. 95, 105 (a former willingness to be examined, held allowable to explain away a later refusal on the score of feebleness). Contra, but clearly unsound: 1882, Learned v. Hall, 133 Mass. 417 (failure to use a deposition; explanation of the reasons forbidden, as involving a new issue over the merits of the witness).

away) is of course that the tenor of the specific unproduced evidence would be contrary to the party's case, or at least would not support it. In other words, the inference does not affect indefinitely the merits of the whole cause, as it does when fraudulent conduct is involved (ante, § 277), but affects specifically and only the evidence in question.[9]

(5) The opponent whose case is a denial of the other party's affirmation has no burden of persuading the jury; and, therefore, until the burden of producing evidence has shifted, he has no call to bring forward any evidence at all, and may go to the jury trusting solely to the weakness of the first party's evidence. Hence, though he takes a risk in so doing, yet his failure to produce evidence cannot at this stage afford any inference as to his lack of it; otherwise the first party would virtually be evading his legitimate burden. This distinction has been recognized [10] and is unquestionable; but it has been little developed in its application. The nature of the two burdens of proof (post, §§ 2485, 2487) is here involved.

(6) So, too, where by the pleadings or otherwise a party has judicially admitted a fact favoring his opponent, the opponent may rely on this admission, and his failure to produce evidence to prove the admitted fact cannot be taken as evidence against the truth of the admission.[11]

(7) In a few instances the question arises whether conduct of the present sort raised a presumption of law, i.e. shifts to the opponent the burden of producing evidence. These instances are examined in dealing with the various presumptions of law (post, §§ 2490, 2524).

(8) Whether a new trial should be granted on the ground of the successful party's withholding of evidence [12] depends upon the law of new trials (ante, § 21), and does not involve the admissibility of evidence.

§ 291. Same: (3) Documents or Chattels Destroyed or not Produced. The applicability of the general principle to an opponent's non-production or suppression of documents or chattels has always been assumed. From the beginning of the recognition of the principle in England, some sort of inference has been acknowledged to be legitimate.[1] In this country, similarly,

[9] In the following opinion the two inferences were erroneously interchanged: 1887, Allen, J., in Blecker v. Johnson, 69 N. Y. 309, 311, 313 (the jury, on failure of the defendant to call a co-defendant, "might take a less favorable view of the testimony on the part of the defence," but should not infer "that his testimony would be adverse to the defendants").

[10] 1897, Brill v. Car Co., 80 Fed. 909 (the plaintiff was bound to prove an intent in the defendant to infringe; the defendant's failure to adduce testimony to the contrary, held to be no evidence).

[11] 1893, East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane, 92 Ga. 187, 192, 18 S. E. 18.

[12] As in Standen v. Edwards, 1 Ves. Jr. 133.

[1] Eng.: 1617, R. v. Arundel, Hob. 109 (title to a manor, claimed by the king; the title-deeds being "very vehemently suspicions to have been suppressed" on the defendants' behalf, the decree gave the land to the king "till the defendants should produce the deeds"); 1698, Anon., 1 Ld. Raym. 731 (Holt, C. J., said, "that if a man destroys a thing that is designed to be evidence against himself, a small matter will supply it"; and so "a copy sworn" was admitted to prove a note of defendant torn by him); 1705, Ward v. Apprice, 6 Mod. 264 ("if very slender evidence be given against him, then, if he will not produce his books, it brings a great slur upon his cause"); 1706, Sanson v. Rumsey, 2 Vern. 561 (the defendant, having burnt certain articles of marriage-settlement, was kept in jail "until he had consented to admit the articles were to the effect in the bill"); 1718, Young v. Holmes, 1 Strs. 70 (ejectment for a leasehold; "it being proved the defendant had the lease in her custody, and refusing to produce it, an attorney who had read it was allowed to give evidence of its contents;

the tradition has been continued and steadily enforced, in numerous instances, where the opponent has destroyed, suppressed, or refused or failed to produce a document or chattel whose contents or quality came into issue or became relevant under the issues.[3] and the C. J. [Parker] said, he would intend it made against the defendant, it being in her power, if it was otherwise, to show the contrary"); 1721, Dalston v. Coatsworth, 1 P. Wms. 731 (bill for relief against suppression of a deed; decree made according to the contents as testified to); 1722, Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Stra. 505 (jewel refused to be produced by bailee; see quotation ante, § 285); 1749, Cookes v. Hellier, 1 Ves. Sr. 234 (L. C. Hardwicke: "If deeds or writings are destroyed by a party who would take benefits thereof, a court of equity in odium spoliatoris will go farther than a court of law"); 1764, R. v. Smith, 3 Burr. 1475 (charge of trading without a license; refusal to produce it held to be sufficient evidence); 1769, Roe v. Harvey, 4 id. 2484, 2489 (the plaintiff in ejectment would not produce a deed affecting his title; L. C. J. Mansfield observed that the Court "leave the refusal to do it, after proper notice, as a strong presumption to the jury"); 1807, Clunnes v. Peggy, 1 Camp. 8 (sale of liquor; proof of bottles delivered, and nothing more; the jury authorized to assume that only the cheapest liquor of the plaintiff was therein); 1815, The Hunter, Dods. Adm. 480, 486 (spoliation "generates a most unfavorable presumption"); 1826, James v. Bion, 2 Sim. & St. 600, 606 (non-production of receipts, treated as "evidence that these receipts afford inferences unfavorable" to that party); 1826, Barker v. Ray, 2 Russ. 63, 73 (discussing the jurisdiction of Chancery in cases of spoliation, and negativing the existence of an absolute presumption; Lord Eldon, L. C.: "To say that if you once prove spoliation, you will take it for granted that the contents of the thing spoliated are what they have been alleged to be, may be in a great many instances going a great length"); 1841, Curlewis v. Corfield, 1 Q. B. 814 (non-production of a letter called for, held relevant to show its contents to be as claimed); 1854, Gray v. Haig, 20 Beav. 219, 224 (bill for an account; destruction by a party of documents of unsettled accounts, held ground for presuming "everything most unfavorable to him which is consistent with the rest of the facts"); 1857, Sutton v. Devonport, 27 L. J. C. P. 54 (to verify a description identifying a document, it was offered, but was objected to by the other party and was withdrawn; held, that the jury might infer it to be as described); 1858, Att'y-Gen'l v. Dean & Canons, 24 Beav. 679, 706 (suppression of a deed affecting title is "always to be taken most strongly against the persons" keeping it back); Can.: 1895, St. Louis v. R., 25 Can. Sup. 649 (account-books, etc.). Contra, but never law, being merely a casual aberration: 1813, Cooper v. Gibbons, 3 Camp. 363 (sale of goods, the defendant setting up a joint debtor; the non-production of his books by the plaintiff after notice, not allowed to be considered).

[3] Cal.: 1866, Lease v. Clark, 29 Cal. 664, 668 (refusal to produce an original deed in possession; inference may be drawn, though an alleged copy is offered); Conn.: 1843, Merwin v. Ward, 15 Conn. 377 (party's books; whether an inference could be drawn from secondary evidence, undecided; but no presumption of law, and semble, no inference can arise where the documents would not be admissible without the opponent's consent); Ga.: 1878, Davis v. Alston, 61 Ga. 225, 228 (no inference allowable, where the Court rules that the document need not be produced); Ill.: 1846, Rector v. Rector, 8 Ill. 105, 119 (failure to produce bond; inference allowed as to contents); 1868, Law v. Woodruff, 48 id. 399 (breach of marriage-promise, the defendant's failure to produce the plaintiff's letters, after the defendant's answers to them had been introduced by them to the plaintiff, held not to raise a presumption, nor to require an unfavorable construction of defendant's letters); 1877, Gage v. Parmelee, 87 id. 329, 341 (partnership-settlement; inference from destruction of account-books, held on the facts not to overcome the weight of evidence); 1878, Downing v. Plate, 90 id. 268, 272 (contract and indorsements burned; inference to be drawn against the spoliator); 1882, Anderson v. Irwin, 101 id. 411, 415 (destruction of a will; slight evidence by the propounder, held to suffice); 1891, Carter v. Troy Lumber Co., 138 id. 533, 539, 28 N. E. 932 (no inference to be drawn from non-production where the document could be used only by the opponent's consent, moreover, that the production might prove "injurious to his case," other than by showing the contents and inferences from them to be as alleged, held not a proper inference from a failure to produce); 1902, Momence Stone Co. v. Groves, 197 id. 88, 64 N. E. 335 (rule applied to non-production of a book); Ind.: 1857, Thompson v. Thompson, 9 Ind. 323, 332 (presumption from spoliation, not conclusive); La.: 1871, Lucas v. Brooks, 23 La. An. 117 (inference not drawn, upon the facts of the case from a destruction); 1884, Crescent C. I. Co. v. Ermann, 36 id. 841 (bills indicating to whom credit was given; inference drawn from non-production); 1902, Johnson v. Levy, 109 La. 1036, 34 So. 68 (inference allowed for certain drafts not produced); Me.: 1829, Emerson v. Fisk, 6 Greenl. 200, 206 (inference allowable, but only after notice before trial to produce); 1858, Tobin v. Shaw, 45 Me. 331, 349 (inference allowable if notice to produce has been given); 1878, Davis v. Jones, 68 id. 393 (book of accounts; inference allowable from non-production); Mass.: 1830, Thayer v. Ins. Co., 10 Pick. 326, 329 (like Cross v. Bell, N. H., infra); 1859, Beecher v. Dennistou, 13 Gray 354 (conversion of watch, etc.; defendant's concealment of them from plaintiff's value-witnesses held

Nevertheless, there remains much uncertainty as to the precise nature of the inference and the conditions in which it may legitimately be drawn. At the outset, certain unquestionable points may be removed from the discussion. (1) It is not here a question of a presumption of law, i. e. of a rule not to be without significance; opinion obscure); 1886, Berney v. Dinsmore, 141 Mass. 42, 5 N. E. 273 (conversion of pearl-ring; rule of Armory v. Delamirie, that the value of the best jewels should be presumed, repudiated; expert's testimony to value of a similar article should be taken); Mich.: 1871, Page v. Stephens, 23 Mich. 357, 363 (books of account; inference allowable from non-production); 1893, Lamble's Estate, 97 Id. 49, 55, 56 N. W. 223 (destruction of a second will by the parties benefited by the first is evidence that contents were as claimed against them; and is also evidence of due statutory execution); 1901, Battersbee v. Calkins, 128 Id. 569, 87 N. W. 760 (inference allowed, on the facts); Miss.: 1878, Botts v. Wood, 56 Miss. 136, 440 (spoliation, the inference can only be drawn when there is other evidence of contents; and it cannot be drawn when the other evidence fully supports the spoliator's claim); Mo.: 1882, Pomeroy v. Benton, 77 Mo. 64, 35 (partnership account; defendant's destruction of book of account, after suit brought, held to be open to inference; careful opinion); 1886, State v. Chamberlain, 89 Id. 129, 134, 1 S. W. 145 (destroying or concealing forged notes, inference allowable); N. H.: 1856, Cross v. Bell, 34 N. H. 82, 88 (the inference not to be drawn simply from the fact of non-production; but if some secondary evidence is given of the contents, "and such evidence is imperfect, vague, and uncertain, every intendment and presumption is to be made against the party who might remove all doubt by producing the higher evidence"); N. Y.: 1820, Jackson v. M'Vey, 18 Johns. 331, 334 (inference allowed from non-production, after some evidence of contents had been given); 1831, Life & Fire Ins. Co. v. Ins. Co., 7 Wend. 31, 34 (the same; the rule of this case is stated in full in Cross v. Bell, N. H., supra); N. C.: 1841, Little v. Marsh, 2 Ired. Eq. 18, 27, semble (inference allowable from spoliation); Or.: 1895, Connell v. McLaughlin, 28 Or. 230, 42 Pac. 218 (there must be other evidence of contents than the inference from non-production; but speaking of it confusedly as a presumption of law); 1896, Schreyer v. Mills Co., 29 id. 1, 43 Pac. 719 (inference allowable from non-production); Pa.: 1826, Wishart v. Downey, 15 S. & R. 77, 79 (non-production of a receipt for money; inference allowable); 1837, McReynolds v. McCord, 6 Watts 288, 290 (destruction by the opponent; "before he can be fixed with the character of a spoiler, the purport of the paper must be proved to have been what it is surmised to have been"); 1870, Frick v. Barbour, 64 Pa. 120 (assumpsit; the non-production of receipts, held open to inference); Tex.: 1890, Martin Brown Co. v. Perrill, 77 Tex. 199, 203, 13 S. W. 975 (no inference allowable, for documents inadmissible as irrelevant); U. S.: 1817, The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. 227, 241 (per Story, J., "a very awakening circumstance, calculated to excite the vigilance and justify the suspicions of the Court," but not always a ground for refusal of further evidence, nor, in prize cases, a substantive cause for condemnation); 1844, Hanson v. Eustace, 2 How. 653 ("the refusal to produce books, under a notice, lays the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence," and "all inferences shall be taken from the inferior evidence most strongly against the party refusing to produce"; but "the refusal itself raises no presumption of suspicion or imputation to the discredit of the party, except in a case of spoliation or equivalent suppression"; "in other words, with the exception just mentioned, the refusal to produce books or papers upon notice is not an independent element from which anything can be inferred as to the point which is sought to be proved by the books or papers"; this is too narrow); 1846, Clifton v. U. S., 6 Id. 242, 247 (falsely invoicing to defraud the customs; inference allowed where the books of account, and one of the sellers, being available, were not produced to show the prices); 1873, Chaffee v. U. S., 18 Wall. 516, 528, 544 (revenue frauds; defendant's failure to produce his books, held not to throw the burden of explanation upon him and to serve to remove reasonable doubt; poor opinion); 1884, U. S. v. Flemming, 18 Fed. 907, 916 (fraudulent gambling in stocks; inference allowable, from failure to produce account-books, that they would not help the defendant's case); 1893, Runkle v. Burnham, 153 U. S. 216, 225, 14 Sup. 837 (power of attorney; non-production held open to inference); 1900, Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. Elliott, 42 C. C. A. 188, 102 Fed. 96, 102 (failure to produce train books, held open to inference); Utah: 1898, McIntyre v. Mining Co., 17 Utah 213, 53 Pac. 1124 (failure to produce a contract-copy because he was not sure that it was correct and was advised by counsel that if not correct it could not be used, semble, evidence of its terms being as claimed by opponent); W. Va.: 1886, Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 773, 789 (contract of sale; the effect of withholding documents is not "to supersede the necessity of other evidence" but to furnish "matter of inference in weighing the effect" of other evidence). To the above rulings are to be added the statutory provisions collected post, § 1858, in dealing with the right to inspect an opponent's documents before trial; on his failure to permit such inspection or to produce at the trial, it is provided in a majority of jurisdictions that the Court may direct the jury to presume the contents to be as the demandant alleges it to be.

shifting the burden of producing evidence. There may be such a rule (post, § 2524), but, if it exists, it is independent of and additional to the present principle. Here the sole question is whether the jury may legitimately draw a certain inference from a certain fact. (2) If the document is the subject of a privilege, the inference is not available. This much may be here assumed, because the nature of a privilege is usually held to be incompatible with the allowance of an inference from exercising the privilege. It is true that, while at common law the privilege of an opponent in a civil case to withhold his documents was fully recognized (post, § 2219), nevertheless during all that time the courts permitted an inference to be drawn against the opponent refusing to produce.[3] But, since the general abolition of the privilege of a civil party, the propriety of such a ruling is removed from practical importance, and in the privileges that continue to exist the doctrine of the incompatibility of the privilege with an inference from its exercise is generally conceded.[4] (3) If a failure to produce on one's own behalf is the fact in question, it is at least necessary (under the general principle, ante, § 286), that the document be in the party's power to produce; and if a refusal to produce on behalf of the opponent is the fact relied upon, it is at least necessary that a demand or notice by the opponent should have been made, because otherwise it does not appear that the party was not willing to produce.[5] (4) Upon the same general principle, namely, that the inference can arise only where the document was one that could have been used if produced, it is obvious that the inference is not available from mere non-production where the document would have been inadmissible on the possessor's or the demandant's behalf or is declared by the Court to be unnecessary or useless.[6] These plain postulates being removed from consideration, the real field for controversy remains, namely, (a) whether the inference alone will suffice as evidence of the contents of the document in question, and (b) whether there is in this respect any difference between spoliation or destruction and mere refusal or failure to produce.

(a) First, then, we meet with a strong current of authority which disfavors the sufficiency of the inference as of itself evidence of the contents. This view is carefully stated in the following passage:[7]

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 145: "What is said [by Lord Mansfield][8] respecting leaving the refusal as a presumption to the jury should be received with considerable qualification; for it cannot be admitted that such a presumption should [3] All the cases cited supra, before the middle of the 1800s, illustrate this.

[4] For the privilege against self-crimination, see post, §§ 2264, 2273; the privilege against anti-marital testimony, see post, §§ 2233, 2243; the privilege against marital communications, see post, §§ 2337, 2340; the privilege against communications between attorney and client, see post, §§ 2307, 2322.

[5] As in Emerson v. Fisk, Me. The rules for the time and form of notice would naturally be the same as those for the notice which permits the non-possessor to use secondary evidence (post, §§ 1202–1210).

[6] As in Merwin v. Ward, Conn.; Carter v. Lumber Co., Ill.; Martin Brown Co. v. Perrill, Tex.; compare also Davis v. Alston, Ga.; Law v. Woodruff, Ill. Compare the rule as to inference from unanswered letters (post, § 1073).

[7] It is less lucidly stated in Hanson v. Eustace, U. S., supra, note.

[8] In Roe v. Harvey, supra, note 1.

stand instead of all other evidence and supply the total deficiency of proof. It is only in weighing the effect and substance of evidence in its nature adequate to the support of a fact in question that the jury can take into consideration the opportunity allowed to the opposite side of contradicting the evidence if false, or of destroying the inference from it if erroneous, and thereby conclude that evidence otherwise suspicious is true, or that an inference otherwise slight and feeble is correct."

But, after all, why is any additional evidence required as a matter of law? All that is asked is that the jury be allowed to make the inference if they are in truth convinced to that effect. What hardship or unfairness is involved to the possessor of the document? He has deliberately failed to show, by production, that which it was in his power to show, and he has by hypothesis given no other fact in explanation than the apparent one, namely, that he is afraid to submit the document to the tribunal's inspection. If there were any risk of the inference being too strong, would he not immediately make production? And does not his failure to do so indicate that the production would, in his belief, be more damaging to him than any inferences which the tribunal may make for lack of the document itself? Add to this that no one who withholds evidence can be in any sense a fit object of clemency or protection. The truth is that there is no reason why the utmost inference logically possible should not be allowable, namely, that the contents of the document (when desired by the opponent), are what he alleges them to be, or (when naturally a part of the possessor's case), are not what he alleges them to be. The existence of a contrary view seems to be due chiefly to two distinct influences. One of these is the general tendency at common law to regard litigation as a sport of high quality, and to concede to the parties the right to hamper and obstruct their opponents, so far as may be, by the retention of such casual advantages (including the possession of documents) as chance has placed in their hands at the outset. This spirit has been totally discountenanced at the present day by the statutes which almost universally have given the power of forcing an opponent to disclose beforehand his documentary evidence, and have thus radically condemned the gaming theory of the British common law (post, §§ 1847, 1859). The other influence is due to a half-conscious recognition of a logical requirement which must be kept in mind and yet does not properly affect the general principle. For example, when A desires to prove his title by a deed from X to Y, describing the land he claims, and upon B's failure to produce it, A shows that B has burned a deed from X to Y and argues that the deed be taken to read as he alleges, and B maintains that the burned deed, though from X to Y, concerned a piece of land totally different from the land in controversy, it is obvious that A has not yet made out a case ripe for inference; he is arguing from the supposed fact that B has destroyed the deed that A wants, but it does not yet appear that the destroyed deed was the one which A wants. In the words of an eminent judge, "the act of a spoiler [i. e. of a desired document] is in its nature equipollent to a confession; but before he can be fixed with the character of a spoiler, the purport of the paper must be proved to have been what it is surmised to have been."[9] In short, we must at least avoid the fallacy of begging the question. Thus, when B denies the identity of the document spoliated or the identity of the document failed to be produced, no inference can be drawn until the jury find the fact against B's denial, and obviously this cannot be done until some evidence of this identity has been introduced by A. It is this consideration of caution, this logical requirement, which seems to account partly for the rule as laid down by some Courts that some evidence of the contents of the document must be introduced as a preliminary to the use of the inference.[10] Keeping in mind, then, the object of the requirement, the rule might correctly be stated as follows: The failure or refusal to produce a relevant document, or the destruction of it, is evidence from which alone its contents may be inferred to be unfavorable to the possessor, provided the opponent, when the identity of the document is disputed, first introduces some evidence tending to show that the document actually destroyed or withheld is the one as to whose contents it is desired to draw an inference. In applying this rule, care should be taken not to require anything like specific details of contents, but merely such evidence as goes to general marks of identity.

(b) In answering the preceding question, the second one has also been answered. There is no distinction, in the present connection, between spoliation and non-production. If the latter admits of the inference, certainly the former does also. But so far as spoliation or suppression partakes of the nature of a fraud, it is open to the larger inference already examined (ante, § 278), namely, a consciousness of the weakness of the whole case. In that respect it differs, of course, from a mere withholding of the document. It is in respect of an inference to the contents of the document that there is no difference between the two acts.

Certain discriminations of other principles remain to be noticed. (1) The failure to produce a certain kind of document sometimes affords an inference of the document's non-existence,[11] and in various classes of cases a statutory rule of this sort has been created.[12] These rules, however, seem after all to be no more than an indirect method of placing upon the defendant in a criminal case the burden of producing evidence (post, § 2511); for while leaving on the prosecution the burden of proving that the defendant has not a license or certificate (as the case may be), the fact of his failure to produce one is made sufficient evidence of non-possession, i. e. in effect he must prove that he has it and this proof he must make by production. Had the burden fallen originally on the defendant of pleading and proving his license (as it natu-

[9] 1837, McReynolds v. McCord, 6 Watts 288, 290 (the opponent had destroyed a paper obtained from the plaintiff's witness).

[10] The question cannot usually arise for a refusal to produce; for a refusal is usually made upon a specific demand and thus the identity of the document is likely to be apparent.

[11] 1845, State v. Simons, 17 N. H. 83, 88 (illegal liquor-selling; non-possession of a license inferable from non-production of it).

[12] There are probably scores of such statutes, all told; the following are examples: Mass. St. 1894, c. 508, § 67 (failure to produce certificate of minor's proper age for employment, evidence of illegal employment); N. Y. Laws 1896, c. 376, § 62 (refusal to produce peddler's license on demand, evidence of non-possession).

rally would have fallen), such statutes would not have been necessary. (2) Whether the non-production of a self-criminating document may be the subject of an inference is considered under the head of the privilege against self-crimination (post, § 2264). (3) The opponent's refusal to produce may serve as a ground for permitting the use of a copy or other secondary evidence, under other rules (post, §§ 1199–1210). (4) The effect of spoliation as evidence, not merely of the contents, but also of the due execution of the document, is more conveniently noticed elsewhere (post, § 2132).

§ 292. Silence, as equivalent to an Admission. Silence, when the assertion of another person would naturally call for a dissent if it were untrue, may be equivalent to an assent to the assertion. This, however, fixes the party, by adoption, with the other person's assertion, and thus it ceases to be a question of conduct-evidence, and involves a genuine admission in express words. For that reason it is dealt with under the head of Admissions (post, §§ 1071–1072).

§ 293. Conduct, as evidence of Consciousness of Innocence (Accused's Voluntary Surrender, Refusal to Escape, Demeanor, etc.). If guilt leaves the psychological mark which we term "consciousness of guilt," and if this is available as evidence (ante, § 273), then the absence of that mark (which for want of a better term may be spoken of as "consciousness of innocence") is some indication of the absence of guilt, i. e. of not having done the deed charged. No Court seems to repudiate this proposition (ante, § 174); but the tendency to reject evidence of a consciousness of innocence is rather due to a distrust of the inference from conduct to that consciousness, since the conduct is often feigned and artificial. Such distrust, however, seems improper. Certainly in the inferences of ordinary life we attach as much weight to that inference as to the inference of consciousness of guilt; the bearing of one accused person as consciously innocent impresses us no less strikingly than the bearing of another as consciously guilty. Moreover, it is judicially conceded (as noticed ante, § 273) that the inference of consciousness of guilt is a highly dubious one, and that the evidence is never to be emphasized or treated as of much value. If this be so, why should we strain a doubt to admit a dubious inference against the accused, and yet refuse to admit in his favor a scarcely more dubious one? Such an attitude is wholly inconsistent with itself and is out of harmony with the spirit of our law. Let the accused's whole conduct come in; and whether it tells for consciousness of guilt or for consciousness of innocence, let us take it for what it is worth, remembering that in either case it is open to varying explanations and is not to be emphasized. Let us not deprive an innocent person, falsely accused, of the inference which common sense draws from a consciousness of innocence and its natural manifestations. With singular perversity, however, a majority of the Courts profess to refuse to allow conduct to be considered for the purpose of drawing an inference of consciousness of innocence; but one consequence of this is the frequent occurrence of inconsistent rulings by the same Court.[1]

[1] Eng.: 1679, Green's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 159, 207 (Witness: "It was a good evidence of his innocency that, when he had notice of it, he did not fly. . . . All that I say is, if flight be a sign of guilt, as no doubt it is — 'Adam, ubi es?' — and courageousness is a sign of innocency, then this man is innocent"); 1758, Barnard's Trial, 19 id. 833 (charge of sending threatening letters to the Duke of Marlborough; the letters twice made appointments for the Duke to come and pay the blackmail, at Kensington and at Westminster Abbey; he went, and on both occasions found the defendant passing, but, on accosting him, was answered that he knew not what the Duke meant; the defendant, a respectable bridge-builder, admitted his presence on those occasions, but denied all knowledge of the letters, and was allowed to prove, by his family and others, his public and frequent expression of surprise that the Duke should accost him in that singular way); Ala.: 1850, Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587, 595 (that the accused went to town to surrender himself, but was persuaded not to do it till he had obtained bailmen, inadmissible; except under § 281, ante, to explain away flight); 1853, Campbell v. State, 23 id. 44, 79 ("the prisoner could no more make his appearance or conduct evidence than he could his declarations or admissions"; excluding evidence that "he appeared surprised on being informed of the murder"); 1867, Hall v. State, 40 id. 698, 700, 706 ("conduct and statements," excluded, for the same reason); 1872, Birdsong v. State, 47 id. 68, 71, 77 (like Oliver v. State); 1886, Jordan v. State, 81 id. 20, 23, 31, 1 So. 577 (refusal to escape, excluded; it would be "to allow him to make evidence for himself"); 1895, Henry v. State, 107 id. 22, 19 So. 23 (demeanor excluded; same reason); 1896, Dorsey v. State, 110 id. 38, 20 So. 450 (going voluntarily to the police-station, after hearing of the charge, excluded); White v. State, 111 id. 92, 21 So. 330 (immediate surrender to the police, admitted); 1901, Vaughn v. State, 130 id. 18, 30 So. 669 (defendant's voluntary surrender, excluded); Cal.: 1879, People v. Montgomery, 53 Cal. 576 (refusal to escape when able, excluded); 1896, People v. Shaw, 111 id. 171, 43 Pac. 598 (voluntary surrender, excluded); Ga.: 1860, Pinkard v. State, 30 Ga. 759 (putting an officer on the track of the real criminal, admitted); 1895, Boston v. State, 94 id. 590, 21 S. E. 603 (voluntary surrender, admitted); 1897, Kennedy v. State, 101 id. 559, 28 S. E. 979 (failure to escape from jail, excluded); Kan.: 1868, Lewis v. State, 4 Kan. 309 (failure to accept an opportunity to escape when others did, admitted; then explained away by the fact that the accused was ill); Mass.: 1861, Com. v. Hersey, 2 All. 173, 177 (refusal to escape, excluded); Mich.: 1860, Dillin v. People, 8 Mich. 357, 367 (subsequent mental condition or utterances, not admissible, except as part of the res gestæ or as explaining away facts introduced by the prosecution; here admitted for the latter purpose, by the majority); Mo.: 1890, State v. Musick, 101 Mo. 260, 274, 14 S. W. 212 (voluntary surrender, excluded); 1892, State v. Smith, 114 id. 406, 424, 21 S. W. 827 (same); 1900, State v. Strong, 153 id. 548, 55 S. W. 78 (that defendant went for a physician after the stabbing, excluded); 1899, State v. McLaughlin, 149 id. 19, 50 S. W. 315 (voluntary surrender, excluded); N. Y.: 1839, People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509, 519 (refusal to escape, excluded); N. C.: 1903, State v. Wilcox, — N. C. —, 44 S. E. 625 (refusal to escape, excluded; Connor, J., doubting); S. C.: 1852, State v. Valgneur, 5 Rich. L. 391, 403 ("the conduct of the accused, whether before or after he is charged . . . is a source of evidence, sometimes for him as well as the prosecution"); W. Va.: 1903, State v. Bickle, — W. Va. —, 45 S. E. 917 (failure to escape from jail, when he might have done so, excluded). Compare the citations post, §§ 1144, 1732, 1765, 1781, concerning the admissibility of an accused's protestations of innocence or other explanatory statements; and of an accused's expressions of loyalty in sedition cases, post, § 367.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

TOPIC VII. OTHER OFFENCES OR SIMILAR ACTS, AS EVIDENCE OF KNOWLEDGE, DESIGN, OR INTENT.

CHAPTER XII.

1. General Principles.

§ 300. Discrimination between Various Principles. In the two foregoing Chapters have been examined the principles upon which Knowledge, Intent, and Design may be evidenced. It remains to examine here the admissibility of similar offences or acts (i. e. similar to the one charged) offered for the purpose of showing such a Knowledge, Intent, or Design. Since the conditions may differ under which the same conduct will evidence one or another of these propositions, it is essential to compare the respective conditions before determining what test to apply to the offered evidence. Practically, the difference of theory may be important; for if these conditions are less stringent for one purpose than for another, and if the one purpose is by the nature of the issue a proper one, while the other is not, all will depend on the precise purpose involved and the requirements appropriate to it.

It is worth while at this point to re-state briefly the distinction between Knowledge, Intent, and Design. (1) Knowledge signifies a being aware (ante, § 244); and, in the usual case of the present sort, this knowledge has to refer to the nature of a thing used in the alleged crime. Even where the doing of the act involved is not disputed, a knowledge existing at the time of the act may be in dispute. Thus, proof of knowledge becomes a usual necessity for certain offences, such as the uttering of forged or counterfeit paper and the possession of stolen goods; while it is rarely an element to be proved in other offences, such as robbery, rape, and homicide. (2) Intent involves often nothing more than knowledge or hostile feeling; or, what is practically not very different, if knowledge or hostile feeling (malice) can be shown specifically, there may be inferred immediately the criminal intent, without further evidence. But Intent more frequently signifies (ante, § 242) merely the absence of accident, inadvertence, or casualty, — a varying state of mind which is the contrary of an innocent state of mind, whatever may be pointed out by the nature of the crime as an innocent state of mind. Thus, in homicide the criminal intent may signify the absence of good faith as to self-defence or the absence of inadvertence; in assault with intent to rape, the criminal intent is a design to rape, instead of any other design; in embezzlement, the criminal intent is a will to hold the money unlawfully, as distinguished from a will to hold it for the owner or from a merely inadvertent possession. This element, then, of Intent — simple in its generality, yet changeable — is a different thing from Knowledge. In a given offence — as in uttering counterfeit money — the proof of Knowledge may practically affect the proof of Intent; but in such a case the evidence is directed specifically to show Knowledge and is governed by the rules appropriate to that subject. But if the issue does not involve specifically the element of Knowledge, then the rules about evidencing Knowledge have no application. In short, Intent may sometimes be indirectly got at by proving Knowledge; but this is not necessary nor is it (for most kinds of offences) usual; and since in any case Intent may be conceived of apart from Knowledge, the mode of proving Intent is a problem distinct from that of proving Knowledge, even where the latter is also concurrently available. (3) Design. The peculiarity of Intent, as a factum probandum, is that an act is assumed as done by the defendant, and the issue is as to the kind of state of mind accompanying it. Design or Plan, however (with reference to present bearings), is not a part of the issue, an element of the criminal fact charged, but is the preceding mental condition which evidentially points forward to the doing of the act designed or planned (ante, §§ 237, 242). Thus, the peculiarity of Design is that the act is not assumed to be proved, and the design is used evidentially to show its probable commission. It is obvious that something more definite and positive is here involved than in the case of Intent. In proving Intent, the act is conceded or assumed; what is sought is the state of mind that accompanied it. In proving Design, the act is still undetermined, and the proof is of a working plan, operating towards the future with such force as to render probable both the act and the accompanying state of mind. The Intent is a mere appendage of the act; the Design is a force producing the act as a result.

§ 301. Theory of evidencing Knowledge. In resorting to former offences or other similar acts to show Knowledge, it is sufficient to invoke the general principles of proving Knowledge, as already set forth. It may perhaps be practicable to employ acts of conduct as exhibiting a posteriori the inward state of mind (according to the principle of § 265, ante), — as when a person, finding his counterfeit coin closely examined by his vendor, attempts to run away. But such a case presents no problem of the present sort. The problem now to be dealt with — the use of evidence of former offences — involves the other general mode of showing knowledge, namely, the use of external circumstances likely a priori to have produced Knowledge. It has been seen (ante, § 245) that this mode of proof rests on the following process of thought. When fact X is used to show a person's knowledge of fact A, it is assumed (a) that through fact X there probably was received an impression by the person; and (b) that this impression would probably result in notice or warning of fact A. Thus, (a) a prior injury to an employee by a machine would probably have come to the employer's notice in some way, and (b) the notice of the accident would probably reveal to him the defect in the machine. These two elements may not both be doubtful in a given case, but they are always impliedly present if the inference is to have any validity. Apply this to the class of cases we are now concerned with. Suppose A's knowledge of the poisonous nature of a substance X is to be shown; suppose the fact offered that he once gave it to a sick dog and that the dog died; if we are to base an inference of probable knowledge upon this, it is because we believe it probable (a) that the dog's death came to his notice, and (b) that the fact of the death would suggest to him that it was the substance X and not the illness that caused the dog's death. Again, suppose A's knowledge of the counterfeit nature of a certain silver dollar is to be shown; suppose the fact offered that he twice passed counterfeit ten-dollar bank-notes; if we are to base on this an inference of probable knowledge, it is because we believe it probable (a) that in the course of using the bank-notes, at one time or another up to their final disposal, some one probably doubted to him their genuineness, and (b) that a doubt as to the genuineness of the bank-notes would probably suggest a doubt as to the genuineness of the silver dollar. Again, if A's knowledge of the stolen character of a bar of iron is to be shown, and the fact is offered that he has also received and possessed a stolen bicycle, then our inference must assume (a) that A's receipt of the bicycle was under such circumstances as to suggest its vendor or pledgor to be a thief, or as to result in a reclamation by the owner and a warning to the defendant; so that (b) when the bar of iron was offered to A, by the same or another vendor or pledgor, the circumstances were such that the former transaction would naturally suggest that this bar of iron also was stolen.

Such, then, is the strict and legitimate scope of evidence of other similar acts to show Knowledge. The process of thought is: The other act must probably have resulted in some sort of warning or knowledge; this warning or knowledge must probably have led to the knowledge in question. There may occasionally be a logical short-cut or a condensation of this process — as where A at a former attempt to pass the same counterfeit bill, was expressly told that it was counterfeit —; but such cases cause no difficulty; and the difficulty that does arise can always be accounted for by a doubt as to one or the other of the above two elements. The principle is clearly enough seen in its application in the detailed rules of the ensuing sections; but it has also been expounded, more or less incompletely, in various judicial utterances:

1846, Maule, J., in R. v. Dossett, 2 C. & K. 307: "If a person were charged with having wilfully poisoned another, and it were a question whether he knew a certain white powder to be poison, evidence would be admissible to show that he knew what the powder was because he had administered it to another person who had died."

1849, Cresswell, J., in R. v. Cooper, 3 Cox Cr. 547 (false charge of indecent conduct towards S. with the intent of extorting money, evidence of a previous obtaining of money by such means was offered): "If the prisoner is proved to have stated on other occasions that he had obtained money by the same means that are stated to have been used in this case, is it not a fair inference to make to the jury that his object was to obtain money here?" Serjt. Ballantine, for the defendant: ". . . That does not show that he had an intention to obtain money at this particular time. . . . Suppose the charge was breaking into a house with intent to steal; the fact of his having broken into the house before would show that he knew how the offence was to be accomplished, but it could not be adduced to show what his intention was on the second occasion; and this shows the difference between proof of knowledge and that of intention." Cresswell, J.: "The question is whether on this occasion he did an act with the design of effecting a certain object. One step in the proof would be to show that he would be likely to know that a certain result would follow; and if it can be proved out of his own mouth that he was aware that such a result would be produced, it is one ingredient in the necessary proof that he contemplated it. Suppose a charge against a man that he attempted to procure abortion; the same medicine might be administered with that intention or without it; if it could be shown that he had often given that medicine before and that he knew that abortion had always followed, surely that would be evidence against him. Or if, on a charge of wounding, a certain instrument had been used by the prisoner with a dangerous result, would not that be admissible to show that he knew the consequences of using it?"[1]

§ 302. Theory of evidencing Intent. To prove Intent, as a generic notion of criminal volition or wilfulness, including the various non-innocent mental states accompanying different criminal acts, there is employed an entirely different process of thought. The argument here is purely from the point of view of the doctrine of chances, — the instinctive recognition of that logical process which eliminates the element of innocent intent by multiplying instances of the same result until it is perceived that this element cannot explain them all. Without formulating any accurate test, and without attempting by numerous instances to secure absolute certainty of inference, the mind applies this rough and instinctive process of reasoning, namely, that an unusual and abnormal element might perhaps be present in one instance, but the oftener similar instances occur with similar results, the less likely is the abnormal element likely to be the true explanation of them. Thus, if A while hunting with B hears the bullet from B's gun whistling past his head, he is willing to accept B's bad aim or B's accidental tripping as a conceivable explanation; but if shortly afterwards the same thing happens again, and if on the third occasion A receives B's bullet in his body, the immediate inference (i. e. as a probability, perhaps not a certainty) is that B shot at A deliberately; because the chances of an inadvertent shooting on three successive similar occasions are extremely small; or (to put it in another way) because inadvertence or accident is only an abnormal or occasional explanation for the discharge of a gun at a given object, and therefore the recurrence of a similar result (i. e. discharge towards the same object, A) excludes the fair possibility of such an abnormal cause and points out the cause as probably a more natural and usual one, i. e. a deliberate discharge at A. In short, similar results do not usually occur through abnormal causes; and the recurrence of a similar result (here in the shape of an unlawful act) tends (increasingly with each instance) to negative accident or inadvertence or self-defence or good faith or other innocent mental state, and tends to establish (provisionally, at least, though not certainly) the presence of the normal, i. e. criminal, intent accompanying such an act; and the force of each additional instance will vary in each kind of offence according to the probability that the act could be repeated, within a limited time and under given circumstances, with an innocent intent. The general canon of logical inference already examined (ante, §§ 31, 32) is here applied and illustrated.

[1] Other passages are as follows: 1882, Devens, J., in Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 18 ("It is the knowledge which it may be inferred he must have derived from other transactions . . . that makes the evidence admissible as affording just ground for inference against him as to intent in the matter under examination"); 1811, Mitchell, C. J., in State v. Smith, 5 Day 175, 178 ("It is lawful to prove that the prisoner attempted to utter the note at different times and places where it had been suspected and challenged as false"); 1832, U. S. v. Roudenbush, 1 Baldw. 514 (the Court admits the uttering of other notes "if their general resemblance to the one laid in the indictment is such that a person who knows the one to be a counterfeit could not reasonably believe the others were genuine"; and excludes them if they are "so unlike in appearance that an honest man might think one good though the other was known to be bad"); 1873, Allen, J., in Coleman v. People, 55 N. Y. 81, 90 (referring to evidence of former receipt of stolen goods: "There must be such a connection of circumstances that a natural inference may be drawn that, if the prisoner knew one article was stolen, he would also be chargeable with knowledge that another was").

Such is the theory of evidencing Intent, as expounded, in various phrasings and for all sorts of offences, in repeated judicial utterances:

1848, Mr. Holmes, arguing in R. v. Mitchel, 6 State Tr. N. s. 599, 632 (challenging an array as not selected by the sheriff with impartial intent, and offering to show a disproportion between the Catholics and Protestants qualified and those actually summoned; the contention being approved by the Court): "We don't put it on the ground of religion. If a man were playing hazard, if all is fair and the dice are not loaded, there can be no honester game; but if one man always throws 'crabs,' as it is called, while the other always throws in his own favor, the presumption is that the dice are loaded. So in this case there is strong evidence that all is not right. If the natural result of the proportionate number of those qualified to be placed on the panel should be that there would be on it two Catholics to one Protestant, and that we find that, so far from that being the case, there are of Protestants five to one on the panel, is it not the natural presumption that there has not been fair dealing in the construction of the panel?"

1874, Coleridge, C. J., in R. v. Francis, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128: "It seems clear upon principle that when the fact of the prisoner having done the thing charged is proved, and the only remaining question is whether at the time he did it he had a guilty knowledge of the quality of his act or acted under a mistake, evidence of the class received must be admissible. It tends to show that he was pursuing a course of similar acts, and thereby it raises a presumption that he was not acting under a mistake. It is not conclusive, for a man may be many times under a similar mistake, or may be many times the dupe of another; but it is less likely he should be so oftener than once, and every circumstance which shows he was not under a mistake on any one of these occasions strengthens the presumption that he was not on the last."

1878, Grove, J., in Blake v. Assurance Co., L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94, 98: "When the question is whether an act was or was not fraudulent, acts of a similar kind are given in evidence to show intention. I remember in a housebreaking case in which I was counsel, a man was found under suspicious circumstances in a bedroom; it was set up that he was there courting the servant; to show a guilty intention, Erle, C. J., admitted evidence of the fact that he was seen in the house a week before under circumstances equally suspicious and which rebutted the idea that he was there for the purpose of courting. . . . To take the common instance of fraud committed by means of begging letters. If a single letter to one individual only were proved, the evidence would probably be insufficient for a conviction; but the particular transaction is shown to be a guilty one by proving that the person charged has done the same thing twenty times before, and that in each case he has told false stories and given fictitious names. Then is there any rule of law to exclude this evidence? I am of opinion that there is not. Where the act itself does not per se show its nature, the law permits other acts to be given in evidence for the purpose of showing the nature of the particular act; as, for instance, in cases of uttering counterfeit coin, even in some cases of murder, and generally wherever it is necessary to show the intent with which the act was done. . . . [So in this case] if you show similar shams, carried out under the same false name, and that the defendants are the people who put the money in their pocket in each case, the difficulty arising from any possibility of mistake in the case is removed, and the jury may reasonably be called upon to infer that the defendants intended to pocket the money of the plaintiff in the particular case."

1840, Story, J., in Bottomley v. U. S., 1 Story 135 (to show defendant's fraudulent intent in undervaluations of imports, other instances were offered): "It appears to me clearly admissible upon the general doctrine of evidence in cases of conspiracy and fraud, where other acts in furtherance of the same general fraudulent design are admissible, first, to establish the fact that there is such a conspiracy and fraud; and, secondly, to repel the suggestion that the acts might be fairly attributed to accident, mistake, or innocent rashness or negligence. In most cases of conspiracy and fraud, the question of intent or purpose or design in the act done, whether innocent or illegal, whether honest or fraudulent, rarely admits of direct and positive proof; but it is to be deduced from various circumstances of more or less stringency and often occurring, not merely between the same parties, but between the party charged with the conspiracy or fraud and third persons. And in all cases where the guilt of the party depends upon the intent, purpose, or design with which the act was done, or upon his guilty knowledge thereof, I understand it to be a general rule that collateral facts may be examined into, in which he bore a part, for the purpose of establishing such guilty intent, design, purpose, or knowledge. . . . [After illustrating by the doctrines about counterfeit money, stolen goods, etc.] In short, wherever the intent or guilty knowledge of a party is a material ingredient in the issue of a case, these collateral facts, tending to establish such intent or knowledge, are proper evidence."

1876, Mr. Clark, Attorney-General, arguing, in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 245, 261 (the argument being approved by the Court): "Suppose the defendant were tried for breaking and entering the store at the north end of Elm Street in Manchester — the most northern of all the stores on that street — with intent to steal; suppose it were proved that he broke and entered that store; that he was arrested as soon as he entered it, and the only question were whether he intended to steal; suppose there were one hundred other stores on that street, and he had broken and entered every one of them, and stolen something in every one of them, beginning at the south end of the street and taking the stores in succession, on his burglarious march from one end of the street to the other; suppose he did all this in one night, and was completing his night's work when arrested; on the question of his intent in entering the one hundred and first store, would any one think of objecting to evidence of his one hundred larcenies in the other one hundred stores? His robbing one hundred stores would tend to show that he intended to rob the one hundred and first, just as his passing counterfeit money in the one hundred would tend to show that he intended to pass counterfeit money found in his possession in the one hundred and first. There would be no difference between his presence in the one hundred and first store, and his having counterfeit money in his pocket in that store, that would, on the question of intent, affect the admissibility of the evidence of what he had done in the other hundred stores. Suppose, instead of robbing stores, he had robbed persons, going from one end of the street to the other, and knocking down and robbing one hundred men, one after the other, and not touching a single woman; suppose when he had knocked down the one hundred and first man, and before he had had time to rob him, he had been arrested, and the question were whether he intended to rob him, — whether his last offence were an attempt to rob, or a mere assault, or an assault with intent to kill; would anybody suppose his robbing the other hundred men, after he knocked them down, was no evidence of the intent with which he knocked down number one hundred and one? Suppose the one hundred and one persons whom he assaulted were women; suppose he touched no man; suppose he had unsuccessfully attempted to ravish one hundred of them, and were arrested at the instant of his knocking down the one hundred and first, and the question were whether his last assault were a mere assault, or an assault with intent to commit a robbery, or an assault with intent to commit a rape; suppose the last woman assaulted should die of her injuries, and the defendant were indicted for her murder; . . . how would you expect, if you were the prosecuting officers, to find any better evidence of the defendant's intent than his attempts upon the other one hundred women? . . . If a ship master lands in Congo, obtains a cargo of blacks, and carries them to Cuba, and four years and four months afterwards he is found at another place on the African coast, as far from Congo as Pembroke Academy is from St. Beatrice, with a hundred blacks in his possession, — would anybody think that his proved intent on the former occasion had, as a matter of fact, no tendency to show what he intended to do on the latter occasion? . . . No man on earth would refuse to hear it, or to consider it, unless he were bound by some arbitrary and irrational rule overriding his understanding, and dictating a course at war with his common sense. . . . It is the spontaneous and irreversible judgment of every grade of intellect that has appeared, or is likely to appear, in this state of existence. It is an involuntary and unavoidable perception of the inherent and self-evident relations of conduct and intention; a mental revelation as natural as memory, and as trustworthy and unanswerable as consciousness."

1876, Cushing, C. J., in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 245, 291: "Another class of cases consists of those in which it becomes necessary to show that the act for which the prisoner was indicted was not accidental, — e. g. where the prisoner had shot the same person twice within a short time, or where the same person had fired a rick of grain twice, or where several deaths by poison had taken place in the same family, or where children of the same mother had mysteriously died. In such cases it might well happen that a man should shoot another accidentally, but that he should do it twice within a short time would be very unlikely. So, it might easily happen that a man using a gun might fire a rick of barley once by accident, but that he should do it several times in succession would be very improbable. So, a person might die of accidental poisoning, but that several persons should so die in the same family at different times would be very unlikely. So, that a child should be suffocated in bed by its mother might happen once, but several similar deaths in the same family could not reasonably be accounted for as accidents. So, in the case of embezzlement effected by means of false entries, a single false entry might be accidentally made; but the probability of accident would diminish at least as fast as the instances increased."

1896, Taft, J., in Penn M. L. Ins. Co. v. M. L. B. & T. Co., 19 C. C. A. 286, 72 Fed. 422: "It is a well established rule of evidence that, where the issue is the fraud or innocence of one in doing an act having the effect to mislead another, it is relevant to show other similar acts of the same person having the same effect to mislead, at or about the same time, or connected with the same general subject-matter. The legal relevancy of such evidence is based on logical principles. It certainly diminishes the possibility that an innocent mistake was made in an untrue and misleading statement, to show similar but different misleading statements of the same person about the same matter, because it is less probable that one would make innocent mistakes of a false and misleading character in repeated instances than in one instance."

It will be seen that the peculiar feature of this process of proof is that the act itself is assumed to be done, — either because (as usually) it is conceded, or because the jury are instructed not to consider the evidence from this point of view until they find the act to have been done and are proceeding to determine the intent. This explains what is a marked feature in the rulings of the Courts, namely, a disinclination to insist on any feature of common purpose or general scheme as a necessary requirement for the other acts evidentially used. It is not here necessary to look for a general scheme or to discover a united system in all the acts; the attempt is merely to discover the intent accompanying the act in question; and the prior doing of other similar acts, whether clearly a part of a scheme or not, is useful as reducing the possibility that the act in question was done with innocent intent. The argument is based purely on the doctrine of chances, and it is the mere repetition of instances, and not their system or scheme, that satisfies our logical demand.

Yet, in order to satisfy this demand, it is at least necessary that prior acts should be similar. Since it is the improbability of a like result being repeated by mere chance that carries probative weight, the essence of this probative effect is the similarity of the instance. Suppose the blowing up of an American warship in Havana Harbor to be in question; the blowing up of various ships of various other nations in the preceding fifty years would have no significance as to the accidental nature of the occurrence (except to show that such an accident is possible); the blowing up of an American warship in the preceding year in Algiers would have scarcely more significance; but the blowing up of an American warship in the same year in Cadiz or in the same harbor of Havana would have striking significance. So, where the intent of an erroneous addition in a bookkeeper's accounts is in issue, the erroneous addition of a bill rendered to a former employer ten years before would have no significance, because it is still within the limits of ordinary casual error that such things should occur at intervals; but several other erroneous additions in the bookkeeper's own favor in the same year and the same book of accounts go to exclude the explanation of casual error, and leave deliberate intent as the more probable explanation. In short, there must be a similarity in the various instances in order to give them probative value,—as indeed the general logical canon requires (ante, § 33).

It is just this requirement of similarity which leaves so much room for difference of opinion and accounts for the bewildering variances of rulings in the different jurisdictions and even in the same jurisdiction and in cases of the same offence. Some judges incline to treat the judicial test of probative value as identical with the common-sense test, and to admit such instances as bear a similarity liberally interpreted by the standard of every-day reasoning. Other judges set their faces firmly against every instance which is not on all fours with the offence in issue, regardless of the consideration that justice consists quite as much in protecting the public against evil doers as in showing mercy to those whose guilt has been more or less skilfully concealed. It is hopeless to attempt to reconcile the precedents under the various heads; for too much depends on the tendency of the Court in dealing with a flexible principle. One Court will be certain to exclude everything that is not too clearly probative for even technical quibblers to oppose, and sometimes will exclude even that. Another Court will accept whatever has real probative value. Something, however, may perhaps be gained by realizing, as to the former, that it is not the law, nor precedent, nor principle, nor policy, that will account for such rulings, but merely a rooted inclination to take the stricter view and a preference to err in favor of criminals and against innocent victims.

§ 303. Same: Anonymous Intent. It will be seen that the strength of the foregoing kind of inference does not rest exclusively on a given person's connection with the prior injurious transactions. It is possible to negative accident or inadvertence, and to infer deliberate human intent, without forming any conclusion as to the personality of the doer. Thus, if A's cellar-window is found broken, and the pieces falling inside, one morning after a high wind, he may well assume the probability that the force of the wind blew the glass in; but if on the next morning and the next he again finds a window broken in the same way, though no high wind prevailed the night before, he gives up the hypothesis of the force of the wind as the explanation, and concludes that a deliberate human effort was the highly probable cause of the breakage, although he can form no notion whatever of the personality of the doer. It is thus clear that innocent intent — accident, inadvertence, or the like — may be negatived by anonymous instances of the previous occurrence of the same or a similar thing. After assuming or proving the defendant's connection with the deed charged, then, to negative innocent intent, resort is had to the anonymous instances; and they may have equal force for that purpose, whether they are connected with the defendant or not. This mode of proof is not infrequently resorted to; and the following passage illustrates its judicial sanction:

1847, Pollock, C. B., in R. v. Bailey, 2 Cox Cr. 311 (arson; the fire had originated near the kitchen, where the accused stayed as servant; evidence was offered of two fires occurring shortly before in the prosecutor's shop and warehouse attached, though no connection of the prisoner or any one else with these was shown): "I think this is clearly evidence, and may be used at all events for the purpose of showing that the present fire which was the third on the same premises within so short a time, could not have been the result of accident. Surely, if a man finds certain mysterious circumstances to arise day after day in his establishment, he is at liberty to refer to them, if only for the purpose of showing that they could not have had their origin in accident and that a repetition of them could only lead to the conclusion that they resulted from malice and design. This course of evidence is not without precedent and authority, moreover; for on the trial of Donellan for the murder of Sir Theodosius Broughton by administering him some poison, evidence was given that a certain tree, which hung over a deep and dangerous brook near a spot where Sir Theodosius was accustomed to fish, had been sawn almost in two by some unknown person. This was proved to show that some one entertained a design against the life of Sir Theodosius, for he was accustomed to stand on that tree while engaged in fishing; and the natural presumption was that whoever cut the tree did so with the design of precipitating the deceased into the water. Those facts were given in evidence on the trial of Donellan for murdering Sir Theodosius afterwards, and were received, though quite unconnected with the prisoner, in order to show that some one entertained a design on his life and that the probability was that he had not come to a natural death."

The only limitation upon this mode of proof is that the defendant's doing of the act in issue must be shown by other evidence at some stage of the trial; and the anonymous instances should not be received until the trial Court is satisfied with the amount of evidence introduced or pledged for showing that connection.

§ 304. Theory of evidencing Design or System. When the very doing of the act charged is still to be proved, one of the evidential facts receivable is the person's Design or Plan to do it (ante, § 102). This in turn may be evidenced by conduct of sundry sorts (ante, § 234) as well as by direct assertions of the design (post, § 1725). But where the conduct offered consists merely in the doing of other similar acts, it is obvious that something more is required than that mere similarity, which suffices for evidencing Intent (ante, § 302). The object here is not merely to negative an innocent intent at the time of the act charged, but to prove a pre-existing design, system, plan, or scheme, directed forwards to the doing of that act. In the former case (of Intent) the attempt is merely to negative the innocent state of mind at the time of the act charged; in the present case the effort is to establish a definite prior design or system which included the doing of the act charged as a part of its consummation. In the former case, the result is to give a complexion to a conceded act, and ends with that; in the present case, the result is to show (by probability) a positive design which in its turn is to evidence (by probability) the doing of the act designed. The added element, then, must be, not merely a similarity in the results, but such a concurrence of common features that the various acts are naturally to be explained as caused by a general plan of which they are the individual manifestations. Thus, where the act of passing counterfeit money is conceded, and the intent alone is in issue, the fact of two previous utterings in the same month might well tend to negative innocent intent; but where the very act of uttering is disputed — as, where the defendant claims that his identity has been mistaken —, and the object is to show that he had a general system or plan of working off a quantity of counterfeit money and did carry it out in this instance, the fact of two previous utterings may be in itself of trifling and inadequate significance. So, on a charge of assault with intent to rape, where the intent alone is disputed, a prior assault on the previous day upon the same woman, or even upon another member of her family, might have probative value; but if the assault itself is disputed, and the defendant attempts, for example, to show an alibi, the same facts might be of little or no value, and it might be necessary to go further and to show (for example) that the defendant on the same day, with a confederate guarding the house, assaulted other women in the same family who escaped, leaving the complainant as the only woman accessible to him for his purpose. This requirement of common features for the various acts pointing to a common plan or system as their natural explanation has been set forth by the judges in varying phrases:

1878, Lindley, J., in Blake v. Assurance Co., L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94, 106: "I agree that in order to prove that A has committed a fraud on B, it is neither sufficient nor even relevant to prove that A committed fraud upon C, D, and E. Stopping there, I admit that proposition. But let it be shown that the fraud on B is one of a class of other transactions having common features, then I disagree altogether with that proposition. . . . The answer to the objection that evidence of frauds on other persons cannot be admitted is that this transaction is one of a class, that there are features in common, the features in common being a false pretence and a knowledge of that false pretence on the part of the defendant company; and the moment that is shown the plaintiff's case is established."

1858, Smith, J., in People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 127: "When several felonies are connected together as parts of one scheme or plot, like the different acts in a drama, and all tend to a common end, then they may be given in evidence to show the process of motive and design in the final crime."

1888, C. Allen, J., in Com. v. Robinson, 146 Mass. 571, 17 N. E. 452: "[In the case of] acts or crimes which are shown to have been committed as part of the same common purpose or in pursuance of it, in such cases there is a distinct significant probative effect, resulting from the continuance of the same plan or ... from the [illegible] other acts in pursuance thereof. It is somewhat of the nature of the [illegible] declarations of intention, but more especially of preparations for the commission of the crime which is the subject of the indictment. If, for example, it could be shown that a defendant had formed a settled purpose to obtain certain property which could only be got by doing several preliminary things, the last of which in the order of time was criminal, the government might show, on his trial for the commission of that last criminal act, that he had formed the purpose to accomplish the result of obtaining the property, and that he had done all of the preliminary things which were necessary to that end. This would be quite plain if the evidence of the purpose were direct and clear, — as, if a letter in the defendant's handwriting should be discovered, stating in terms to a confederate his purpose to obtain the property by the doing of the several successive acts the last of which was the criminal act on trial. In such case, no one would question that proof might be offered that the defendant had done all the preliminary acts referred to, which were necessary steps in the accomplishment of his purpose. But such purpose may also be shown by circumstantial evidence. It is, indeed, usually the case that intentions, plans, purposes, can only be shown in this way. Express declarations of intention, or confessions, are comparatively rare; and therefore all the circumstances of the defendant's situation, conduct, speech, silence, motives, may be considered. The plan itself, and the acts done in pursuance of it, may all be proved by circumstantial evidence, if they are of themselves relevant and material to the case on trial. . . . It is sometimes said that such evidence may be introduced where the several crimes form part of one entire transaction; but it is perhaps better to say, where they have some connection with each other, as a part of the same plan or induced by the same motive."

It will be seen that the difference between requiring similarity, for acts negativing innocent intent, and requiring common features indicating common design, for acts showing design, is a difference of degree rather than of kind; for to be similar involves having common features, and to have common features is merely to have a high degree of similarity. This is another reason why the precedents are so difficult to reconcile; for the Courts have not always perceived that there are in truth these two distinct purposes and therefore two distinct tests for such evidence. Nevertheless the distinction is a real one. It is to be seen in concrete illustrations, even though in abstract definition it is not easy to formulate. The clue to the difference is best gained by remembering that in the one class of cases the act charged is assumed as done, and the mind asks only for something that will negative innocent intent; and the mere prior occurrence of an act similar in its gross features — i. e. the same doer, and the same sort of act, but not necessarily the same mode of acting nor the same sufferer — may suffice for that purpose. But where the very act is the object of proof, and is desired to be inferred from a plan or system, the combination of common features that will suggest a common plan as their explanation involves so much higher a grade of similarity as to constitute a substantially new and distinct test. An occasional error in judicial rulings is to require the higher conditions of the present test where only the preceding test (for Intent) is needed. Thus, to show that certain representations as to goods sold (the making of the representations and their falsity being assumed) were deliberately and knowingly made, and not innocently, the former making of like representations about the same goods to the same or other persons is clearly of value to negative innocent intent; yet in at least one jurisdiction, in such cases, the Court has in terms required that these evidential instances shall be so connected by common features as to indicate a general fraudulent scheme or system. This is a misapplication of the stringent theory of Design or System to a case where the theory of Intent is alone involved. Such misapplications of the rigorous requirements of the Design principle are also met with in rulings upon other kinds of crimes; but the error involved in such rulings may be perceived by an analysis of the purposes of the evidence in a given case.

Two necessary limitations are to be observed in the use of this class of evidence of Design. (1) Anonymous acts are not available, as they are for evidencing Intent (ante, § 303); for the whole purpose of the evidence is to fix a design upon the defendant, as making it likely that he carried it out, and thus that it was he who did the act charged. Nevertheless, in the order of proof it may not be possible to evidence the defendant's connection with the previous acts until the acts themselves have been testified to; and hence the trial Court, applying the general principle of conditional admissibility (ante, § 14) may admit the latter portion of the evidence on the assurance that the defendant's connection with those acts will later be duly evidenced.[1] (2) The object being to argue to the act charged from a design or plan to do it, the prior acts are received to show that system; since, however, it may require a number of acts and circumstances to furnish the desired mass of conduct illustrating this design or system, and since the production of only parts or fragments of it would in effect violate the principle and remain in evidence merely as affecting the defendant's character, the trial Court must pass upon the offer beforehand, to see whether if offered in its entirety it satisfies the proper test and is sufficient to go to the jury; and (on the same principle of § 14, ante) must, if the offer is sanctioned, require an assurance that it will be forthcoming in its entirety.[2] [2] The following is an example: 1888, Com. v. Robinson, 146 Mass. 579 (the judge merely deciding that there was sufficient strength in the evidence to submit it to the jury, but not thereby giving it any greater weight with the jury).

[1] The following is an example: 1865, People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, 518 (the order of proof being in the discretion of the trial Court). Compare §§ 1870, 1871, post (order of evidence).

§ 305. Criminality of Act Immaterial; Character Rule, distinguished. It has already been noted (ante, § 216) that the criminality of prior acts thus offered does not affect their admissibility. Either they are relevant, by the above tests, or they are not; if they are not, they are rejected because they are irrelevant; if they are, they are received in spite of their criminality. The only bearing of the latter quality is that, if they are irrelevant, it furnishes another reason for excluding them, namely, the reason of Undue Prejudice, as enforced in the Character rule (ante, § 194); for these other criminal acts would not merely be irrelevant, but would go to evidence the defendant's character and career as bad and thus to create undue prejudice, — a mode of argument against him that is forbidden by a fundamental principle. It is, however, to this reluctance to violate the Character rule that is due the strictness shown by the Courts in excluding prior criminal acts which do not strictly fulfil the rigorous tests just examined. If the admission of irrelevant evidence had been the only consequence of an error in the ruling, there would undoubtedly have been seen a greater liberality in the judicial application of the foregoing tests. The unsatisfactory result has been that, in this narrow and over-cautious anxiety not to infringe upon the Character rule, evidence highly appropriate to show Knowledge, Intent, or Design, and amply fulfilling the proper tests for that purpose, has often been excluded.

Of the other objections (than undue prejudice) from the point of view of that auxiliary policy which creates the Character rule (ante, § 194), the objection of Unfair Surprise is the only one that could be supposed to be here applicable. But it has never been treated by the Courts as of consequence. This rational and practical conclusion is easily understood when it is remembered that any other conclusion might result in shutting out most of the appropriate evidence, of this and other sorts, to prove a crime. The legal objection of unfair surprise, so far as it is ever recognized, is not founded on the notion that the opponent was not in fact anticipating this specific evidence (post, §§ 1845, 1849), but on the notion that he could not by possibility have anticipated evidence which might easily be fabricated beyond detection; and the objection is recognized as having force only when the evidence offered is of a class capable of involving the entire range of the person's life. Evidence tending to show, not the defendant's entire career, but his specific knowledge, motive, design, and the other immediate matters leading up to and succeeding the crime, is of a class always to be anticipated and is in each given instance rarely a surprise; moreover, the kernel of the objection of unfair surprise, namely, the impossibility of exposing fabricated evidence, is wanting where the evidence deals with matters so closely connected with a crime as design, motive, and the like:

1804, Ellenborough, C. J., in R. v. Whyley, 2 Leach Cr. L., 4th ed. 985: "The observations respecting prisoners being taken by surprise and coming unprepared to answer or defend themselves against extrinsic facts is not correct. The indictment alleges that the prisoner uttered this note knowing it to be forged; and they must know that without the reception of other evidence than that which the mere circumstances of the transaction itself would furnish, it would be impossible to ascertain whether they uttered it with a guilty knowledge of its having been forged, or whether it was uttered under circumstances which showed their minds to be free from that guilt."

§ 306. Other Evidential Purposes Discriminated. Other similar acts by a defendant may of course be available for other purposes than to show Knowledge, Intent, or Design. These other uses and their distinction from the present one will usually be apparent. It is worth while, however, to point out those which are often available at the same time as the present ones: (1) Motive. To show the hostility towards the deceased of a defendant charged with murder, a former assault by him upon the deceased would be relevant (post, § 396). Owing to the occasional failure of Courts to distinguish between Motive (Emotion) — the state of feeling impelling towards an act — and Intent — the mental state accompanying an act —, it is not always possible to know whether a ruling admitting such evidence is meant to deal with the subject of Motive or Intent. Its relevancy to show Motive (hostility) has never been doubted. (2) Identity. To identify a defendant as the perpetrator of the crime charged, it may become necessary to show former conduct of his, known to be the conduct of the perpetrator (post, § 413, ante, § 218). (3) Inseparable acts. In evidencing the act charged, it may be necessary to describe an affair which involves a number of acts, one or more others of which will also be crimes. Such proof is receivable, because it is inseparable from the act charged (ante, § 218). Courts often employ that principle — especially in proving deeds of violence (post, § 362) — as the sufficient source of admission, where that of Intent might equally have sufficed.

It remains now to take up the various kinds of offences charged, and examine under each head the application of the foregoing principles to the use of other similar acts to evidence Knowledge, Intent, and Design.

2. Forgery and Counterfeiting.

§ 309. General Principle. The chief forms of offence connected with forged and other counterfeit documents or money are: (1) making the false article; (2) possessing it knowingly with intent to utter; (3) knowing utterance of it. In the last two, the defendant's knowledge is always in issue; in the first, it is occasionally in issue, as where the act of writing is conceded but an authority is claimed. In all of them the criminal intent, including knowledge and other elements, will be in issue. In any of them, the act charged — making, possessing, or uttering — may be disputed, and a plan or system may be offered to evidence the doing; but this will rarely happen except in the first class of offences.

§ 310. Evidence of Knowledge; (1) Other Utterings. The principle here applicable (ante, § 301) is that a former utterance is likely to have resulted in a questioning of the false article by the person to whom it was presented, and thus the attention of the defendant would have been called to its suspicious nature. The former utterance is thus relevant as showing that the defendant thereby probably acquired the knowledge charged.[1]

Two questions here arise, as indicated by the general principle for evidencing Knowledge a priori (ante, § 301): (1) Is the fact of a prior successful utterance likely to have given warning of the article's false character? Does it not rather show that no such warning was in fact received? In some of the cases it clearly appears that the defendant did receive such notice through an unsuccessful attempt,[2] or that his conduct betrayed such knowledge,[3] and in one ruling it is intimated that the prior uttering must have been an unsuccessful one.[4] Nevertheless no such requirement is laid down in the remaining rulings. One way to explain this is to suppose that the rulings proceeded from the point of view of Intent, for which purpose (post, § 312) the mere fact of uttering suffices; but this is incorrect, because in other aspects the Knowledge principle is consistently applied. The truth seems to be that though the single fact of successful utterance is not likely to have resulted in warning at that precise occasion, yet the person receiving the money or paper would probably ultimately have discovered its falsity or have had it returned to himself by some later transferee, and would then have notified the defendant if he could be found; and thus, except in infrequent cases, the chances of the defendant's receiving warning after even a successful utterance are appreciable and become very great with each additional utterance. (2) Even assuming that through the prior occasion a warning came to the defendant, would the warning about that piece of paper or money have involved a fair warning about the one charged, unless the two were of a similar sort? All Courts answer this in the negative, and require that the former article have some similarity to the one in question; for otherwise there is no probability of knowledge having been thereby received.[5] But, naturally, no general fixed rule can be laid down to determine what similarity should be required. The rulings exhibit views of all degrees of liberality and narrowness.[6]

§ 311. Same: (2) Other Possession. The possession of other forged or counterfeit articles operates in a different way to show Knowledge. The mere fact of possession has in itself no force for this purpose, though it may be relevant to show Intent (post, § 312). But the possession may involve conduct betraying a knowledge of the falsity of the article, — as where counterfeit coins are separately wrapped in paper[1] or counterfeit paper is kept secreted,[2] or tools are also found;[3] and thus the prior knowledge applies

[1] The cases are arranged by jurisdictions, post, § 318; the above principle is illustrated in various cases.
[2] R. v. Forster, Eng.
[3] R. v. Phillips, Eng.
[4] State v. Smith, Conn.
[5] As well set forth in U. S. v. Roudenbush, U. S.
[6] R. v. Millard, R. v. Sunderland, R. v. Hodgson, R. v. Kirkwood, R. v. Martin, R. v. Phillips, R. v. Ball, R. v. Forster, Eng.; Stalker v. State, Conn.; State v. Saunders, Ia.; Lindsey v. State, Oh.; Martin v. Com., Va.; State v. Twitty, N. C.; U. S. v. Doebler, U. S.
[1] R. v. Jarvis, Eng.
[2] State v. Hess, Oh.
[3] State v. Antonio, S. C.

equally to the article in question. Here, moreover, similarity of the article would probably be immaterial, for the concealment indicates a general criminal knowledge.

§ 312. Evidence of Intent: (1) Other Utterings. The principle here applicable (ante, § 302) proceeds merely upon the doctrine of chances; it does not attempt to show knowledge or any other possible element of Intent; but it endeavors to negative inadvertence and any other innocent explanation. It argues that the oftener a like act has been done, the less probable it is that it could have been done innocently.[1] (a) It is therefore immaterial whether the other attempt to utter was unsuccessful, or whether it resulted in notice to the utterer; it is the bare fact of the uttering, or of the attempt to utter, that is evidential. (b) As to the similarity of the article uttered, it follows that the act as a whole must be like the act charged; so that the test is here in general the same as when it is desired to show Knowledge (ante, § 310). No effort seems to have been made to define more closely the similarity to be required;[2] but at least it seems clear that the specific principle applicable to evidence of Knowledge — a similarity such as would have warned the utterer of the falsity of the article in question (ante, § 310) — has no application here.

§ 313. Same: (2) Other Possession. The principle here operates precisely in the same way, — not as tending to show a probable warning, but as negativing, by repetition of instances, the possibility of innocent explanation.[1] The practical difference between the use of such facts to show Knowledge and to show Intent is that in the former case (ante, § 311) something more than possession is theoretically necessary, while here the mere fact of possession is evidential.[2] The difference is also brought out by this, that another possession after the act charged would be evidential of Intent,[3] while it could in no way be evidential of anterior knowledge.

§ 314. The foregoing Principles Compared. It is thus seen that the principles to be followed in evidencing Knowledge and Intent differ to some extent at certain points, — each one being in some respects more exacting, in some more lax, in its requirements than the other. Moreover, the Courts seem at some times to have the one principle in view, at some times the other. Which of the two is to control? Neither; and both. The truth is that Intent in general, as well as Knowledge in particular, is in this class of offences always open to be proved; that either object, or both, may be aimed

[1] 1887, Peckham, J., in People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 467, 14 N. E. 319 ("A man might think the money he passed was good, and he might be mistaken once or even twice; but the presumption of mistake lessens with every repetition of the act of passing money really counterfeit"); see also R. v. Francis, quoted ante, § 302.

[2] See the cases cited ante, note, § 310.

[1] 1829, State v. Houston, 1 Bail. 300 ("His having a number of others of the same description is evidence of a general guilty purpose, of which the act under consideration is only a part: one may by accident come into the possession of a single counterfeit note or coin, but when he is possessed of many or passes many, it must be attributed to something more than accident"); 1853, Thurman, J., in Farrer v. State, 2 Oh. St. 73 ("The best evidence of this scienter . . . is proof that the accused had more spurious money in his possession than would be likely to come into the hands of an honest man in the ordinary course of business").

[2] See for example the cases in England and Massachusetts.

[3] As in Com. v. Price, Mass.

at; but that the evidence should be appropriate to the purpose it is aimed at. The confusion of precedents seems to have come from instinctive perception of the requirements of one or the other of the principles, accompanied by a failure to observe that there were in reality two principles equally available. Every piece of evidence offered in the present connection has these two avenues of entrance, and its right to enter by either, on the general principle of multiple admissibility (ante, § 13), should be liberally construed.

§ 315. Evidence of Design or System. Where the act itself (forging, uttering, or the like) is disputed, and the resort of proof is to a plan or system as tending to show the doing of the act, the prior acts offered must be something more than an individual instance or two; they must be so connected by common features as to suggest a system or plan (ante, § 304). (1) This sort of evidence has not always been intelligently treated by the Courts. It has occasionally been received;[1] it has occasionally been properly rejected;[2] but there are other rejections which cannot be supported,[3] and still others which can only be described as ridiculous and tending to dishonor our law of evidence.[4] (2) Evidence amounting to proof of system or design may of course be employed also where the act is not disputed, and the Intent alone (ante, § 312) is in issue;[5] the evidence here being merely stronger than is absolutely essential. But it would be erroneous to require such a systematic connection where proof of Intent alone is desired.

§ 316. Time of other Acts. (1) Whether subsequent acts of uttering should be admitted was in England at one time doubted;[1] but the doubt was afterwards solved in favor of admission,[2] and does not seem in this country to have received any support.[3] Subsequent possession is equally admissible.[4] This result emphasizes the difference between evidencing Knowledge and evidencing Intent; for the subsequent uttering could of course result in no warning which should show Knowledge at the anterior time charged; while, in evidencing Intent, it is the repetition of instances that tends to negative innocence in particular instances, and thus it is immaterial whether the instances are found occurring before or after the act charged. (2) The length of time over which we may range in search of evidential instances is obviously determinable by no fixed rule. The precedents illustrate various lengths of time.[5] The discretion of the trial Court should here control.[6]

[1] Roupell v. Haws, Eng.; Blalock v. Randall, Ill.; Card v. State, Ind.; Carver v. People, Mich.

[2] Viney v. Barss, Balcetti v. Serani, Eng.

[3] Graft v. Lord Bertie, Eng.; Franklin v. Franklin, Tenn.; Redding v. Redding's Est., Vt.

[4] Dodge v. Haskell, Me.; Costelo v. Crowell, Mass.; Keith v. Taylor, Vt.

[5] Com. v. White, Mass.; Finn v. Com., Va.

[1] R. v. Taverner, R. v. Smith.

[2] R. v. Forster.

[3] People v. Frank, Cal.; Thomas v. State, Ind.; State v. Mix, Mo.; Peck v. State, Tenn.; Hendrick's Case, Va.

[4] Com. v. Price, Mass.

[5] R. v. Wylie, R. v. Hough, R. v. Ball, R. v. Millard, Eng.; State v. Smith, Stalker v. State, Conn.; People v. Frank, Cal.

[6] Distinguish the question of criminal pleading whether, as the act charged, any criminal act may be proved as of a time not specified in the indictment; this is sometimes governed by a statute, for the present class of cases; e. g., Me. Pub. St. 1883, c. 120, § 8.

§ 317. Sundry Limitations. (1) The falsity of the other articles (forged or counterfeit) uttered or possessed must of course be shown.[1] But the defendant's knowledge of their falsity need not be shown.[2] The very kernel of the principle (either of Knowledge or of Intent) is that the fact of the uttering tends, in one way or another, to show the defendant's knowledge at the time in issue, either by the probable warning received or by the improbability of innocent intent in repeated instances; and the assumption throughout is that the bare fact of utterance tends to show this. (2) A possession or utterance by a co-conspirator, as making the defendant equally responsible if the other person was acting in connection with the defendant, involves a different principle from the present.[3] (3) Whether the contents and the uttering of another false article may be evidenced by the defendant's admission is a question of the rule requiring the production of an original (post, §§ 1205, 1255).

§ 318. State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The precedents in the various jurisdictions exhibit the application of the foregoing principles, both in civil and criminal cases, with more or less consistency.[1] The falsifi-

[1] R. v. Forbes, Eng.; People v. Whiteman, Cal.; Peck v. State, Tenn.

[2] Com. v. Bigelow, Mass., requires this; but the doctrine is not repeated in later rulings.

[3] 1827, U. S. v. Craig, 4 Wash. C. C. 729 (parts of the tools were found in other persons' possession, shown to be connected with the defendant in their operations).

[1] Eng.: 1684, Lady Ivy's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 555, 621 (to prove the defendant's title-deeds forged, the fact was admitted of her forging a number of deeds to support her title); 1777, Graft v. Lord Bertie, Peake Evid. 72 (to prove that a deceased attesting-witness had attested a forgery, the fact was offered that other bonds attested by him were forgeries; the objection was made that the plaintiff "could not be prepared to support the authority of other deeds"; and with hesitation Lord Mansfield rejected the evidence); 1792, Balcetti v. Serain, Parke 142, Buller, J. (action on a bill claimed to be forged by the drawer's clerk; the fact of a previous forgery of the defendant's name to another acceptance by the same clerk was rejected as not sufficiently connected); 1794, Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 288 (H. drew a bill on G., payable to F. (a fictitious person) or order, and indorsed in F.'s name; the plaintiff, a bona fide holder for value, sued G., and in order to show that G. knew this particular F. to be a fictitious person, offered the fact of the former issuance of such bills with irregularities and suspicious circumstances of such a nature that they must have made G. aware of the fictitiousness of F.'s name, and it was admitted); 1795, Vmey v. Barss, 1 Esp. 293, Kenyon, L. C. J. (action against the acceptor of a bill; defence, that it was a forgery by the drawer; evidence of other similar forgeries by the drawer, excluded); 1804, R. v. Wylie, 1 B. & P. N. R. 92, 2 Leach 4th ed., 983 (indictment for uttering a forged bank-bill; the fact of three previous utterings in the preceding month to other persons was admitted; Ellenborough, L. C. J.: "The more detached in point of time the previous utterings are, the less relation they will bear to that stated in the indictment. But in such a case the only question would be, whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant the inference of knowledge from such particular transactions; it would not make the evidence inadmissible"); 1806, R. v. Hough, R. & R. 120, by all the Judges present (uttering a forged bill; the possession when arrested of three other bills upon the same drawee, admitted to show scienter); 1807, R. v. Ball, ib. 132; by all the Judges present except one (uttering a forged bank-note; the utterance of a similar one three months before, and the possession, at some previous time, of fifteen others, admitted, "subject to observations as to the weight of it, which would be more or less considerable according to the number of the other notes, the distance of time at which they were put off, and the situation of life of the prisoner, so as to make it more or less probable that so many notes should pass through his hands in the course of business"; Chambre, J., dissenting, partly on the ground of surprise); 1808, R. v. Ball, 1 Camp. 324 (uttering a forged bank-note; the fact admitted, to show knowledge, of the utterance of various notes of similar manufacture in the preceding six months; Heath, J.: "Everything that you said or did was proper to be admitted to show your knowledge of the forgery"); 1809, R. v. Taverner, Carr. Suppl. 195, Ellenborough, L. C. J., Thomson, C. B., and Lawrence, J. (uttering forged bank-notes; an uttering five weeks later excluded, "unless the latter uttering was in some way connected with the principal case or it could be shown that the notes were of the same manufacture"); 1813, R. v. Millard, R. & R. 245 (uttering a forged bank-note; the fact of uttering forged notes of cation of documents in other frauds than forging and counterfeiting is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 341).

other denominations and of the same and another bank two, five, and twelve months before respectively, held admissible; here the evidence was excluded, as not showing that they were forged; but some judges "seemed to doubt" whether the difference of qualities and the distance of time did not exclude the evidence); 1825, R. v. Moore, 2 C. & P. 235, Burrough, J. (charge of possessing an edger, for marking money round the edge, with intent to use it; the fact received of his having so used it); 1827, R. v. Smith, ib. 633, Vaughan, B. (uttering a forged note; another uttering, charged in a second count, excluded, because so charged; and even the use of other uncharged utterings was said to have been questioned by many able lawyers; this ruling never represented the law); 1827, R. v. Hodgson, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 103 (to show guilty knowledge of a forged Edinburgh bank-note, the uttering by the defendant of forged Paisley bank-notes was doubted by Hullock, B., his own opinion being for admission, but many judges being thought by him to be against it; here the evidential notes were the subject of another indictment); 1828, R. v. Sunderland, ib. 102 (to show guilty knowledge of a forged Rochdale bank-note, the discovery on the defendant's person of two forged Bank of England notes was admitted); 1829, R. v. Phillips, ib. 105, Bayley, B. (to show guilty uttering of a bank-note, the conduct was admitted of the defendant while previously uttering other forged notes; also, the former uttering of a £1 note was admitted to show knowledge in uttering a £5 note); 1830, R. v. Kirkwood, ib. 103 (facts similar to R. v. Hodgson; Littledale, J., "without hesitation overruled the objections"); 1830, R. v. Martin, ib. 104, Littledale, J. (similar to R. v. Kirkwood); 1831, R. v. Smith, 4 C. & P. 411, Gaselee, J. (uttering a forged acceptance; other similar utterances in the next month of forged bills having the same parties' names, admitted, but subject to reservation for the Judges, because occurring subsequent to the charge in issue); 1835, R. v. Forbes, 7 C. & P. 224 (forging a bill, the issue being whether the defendant bona fide believed himself to have authority to sign; the fact of another similar forgery admitted to show intent; "clear proof" of the other forgery required); 1836, R. v. Ball, 1 Moo. Cr. C. 470, 7 C. & P. 429, by all the Judges (uttering forged Austrian notes; the fact of a recent forging and uttering of Polish notes, admitted "in support of the scienter"); 1837, R. v. Page, 4 B. & Ad. 122 (counterfeit utterance; possession of another counterfeit piece, admitted); 1855, R. v. Forster, Dears. Cr. C. 456, by five Judges (to prove a guilty uttering on Dec. 12, an uttering of a similar piece on Dec. 11 was shown; on that occasion the shopkeeper told the defendant the piece was bad, whereupon she promised she would bring her husband and her daughter to show where she got it, but she did not return; a subsequent uttering on Jan. 4 also admitted; the uttering of a shilling was admitted to show knowledge in uttering a crown); 1855, R. v. Jarvis, 7 Cox Cr. 53, Dears. Cr. C. 552, before five Judges (knowing possession of counterfeit coin; the discovery in different pockets, of many other coins of similar style and make, each wrapped in paper, was admitted); 1861, R. v. Weeks, Leigh & C. 18, by five Judges (knowing possession of a counterfeiting mould; previous utterance of a bad half-crown, not shown to fit the mould, admitted to show scienter); 1863, Roupell v. Haws, 2 F. & F. 784 (the defendants claimed title, against the heir-at-law, under a deed of gift from the testator; evidence of other forgeries (letters, leases, etc.) of the testator's son were received as showing under the circumstances a system to defraud of which the forgery of the deed of gift was a part); 1867, R. v. Goodwin, 10 Cox Cr. 534, Mellor, J. (another uttering admitted to show knowledge; ruled also that a former conviction of false uttering could not alone be admitted to show knowledge); Ala.: 1849, Tharp v. State, 15 Ala. 749 (counterfeit utterance; previous passing of "other and similar spurious coin," admissible); 1903, Wright v. State, — Id. —, 34 So. 1009 (forgery; another forged order about the same time, admitted); Ariz.: 1902, Qualey v. Terr., — Ariz. —, 68 Pac. 546 (falsification of books; other alterations of entries in the same book, admitted); Cal.: 1865, People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, 515, 517 (forgery; other forged notes or bills "uttered at or about the same time," "whether of the same kind or a different kind," admissible to show knowledge; the time before or after the charge in question being largely in the trial Court's discretion); 1866, People v. Farrell, 30 id. 316 (possession with intent to utter; sale of such counterfeit coin to a confederate, admissible to show intent); 1896, People v. Sanders, 114 id. 216, 46 Pac. 153 (forgery; murder by the defendant of the person whose name was forged, before the date of the writing, admitted to show knowledge); 1896, People v. Whiteman, ib. 338, 46 Pac. 99 (forgery; other utterings admissible if clearly shown to be forged); 1898, People v. Creegan, 121 id. 554, 53 Pac. 1082 (forgery; a series of swindling schemes in other States a few months before, excluded); 1899, People v. Bird, 124 id. 32, 56 Pac. 639 (forgery; other similar forgeries, unconnected with defendant, held admissible to show intent only, after evidence of the corpus delicti); 1902, People v. McGlade, — Cal. —, 72 Pac. 600 ("other forgeries of similar instruments about the same time admitted); Conn.: 1811, State v. Smith, 5 Day 175, 178 (counterfeit utterance; Mitchell, C. J.: "It is lawful to prove that the prisoner attempted to utter the note at different times and places where it had been suspected and challenged as false"); 1832, Stalker v. State, 9 Conn. 341 (uttering a base half-dollar; evidence held admissible of other coins "on the same day or near the time," but not of the possession of an engraving like an

3. False Pretences or Representations.

§ 320. General Principle; Three Modes of Evidencing. The utterance of forged paper or counterfeit money is simply one species of false representa-unsigned bank-note; because "there must be a strong connexion in the subject matter"]; Ia.: 1852, Hoskins v. State, 11 Ga. 92, 95 (altering the paper, admissible on a charge of making, to show intent); 1892, Lascelles v. State, 90 Id. 347, 355, 375, 16 S. E. 945 (forgery; false representations as to wealth to the person defrauded, admitted); Ill.: 1867, Steele v. People, 45 Ill. 152, 157 (forgery; "other forged checks," admitted); 1875, Blalock v. Randall, 76 id. 224, 229 (to show that R. had forged B.'s name, B. having concededly signed his name to documents of another sort, evidence was admitted of R.'s having fraudulently obtained the signatures of other persons by a method similar to that alleged by B.); 1880, Fox v. People, 95 id. 71, 75 (forgery; previous passing of "similar bills," admissible); 1893, Anson v. People, 148 id. 494, 503, 35 N. E. 145 (forgery; possession of other forged instruments about the same time, admitted to show intent and knowledge, though not to show the fact of forging); Ind.: 1852, McCartney v. State, 3 Ind. 354 (other utterings of notes upon the same and different banks, admissible); 1859, Bersch v. State, 13 id. 439 (obscure); 1876, Harding v. State, 54 id. 359, 365 (forgery; other forged notes offered to the same parties at the same time, admitted); 1879, Robinson v. State, 66 Id. 331, 334 (forgery; another forged note, made to secure the same debt, but in a different name, admitted); 1885, Thomas v. State, 103 Id. 432, 2 N. E. 808 (utterings of similar forged instruments shortly before or after, admissible); 1886, Card v. State, 109 id. 415, 420, 9 N. E. 591 (forgery of a note; thirteen other forged notes with the same payee but a different maker, admitted; "in order to prove system, isolated crimes are admissible from which system may be inferred"; applying this to a charge of forgery); Ia.: 1885, State v. Breckenridge, 67 Ia. 204, 25 N. W. 130 (forgery; other forgeries to show intent; left undecided); 1886, State v. Saunders, 68 id. 370, 27 N. W. 455 (forgery of a note to another person; question reserved; "the doubt seems to be whether the paper must not be of the same character or manufacture and precisely similar"); 1901, State v. Prins, 113 id. 72, 84 N. W. 980 (forgery; other forgeries of similar documents, admissible to show intent); 1902, State v. Prins, 117 id. 505, 91 N. W. 758 (forgery; other unspecified forgeries, admitted); Ky.: 1897, Barnes v. Com., 101 Ky. 556, 41 S. W. 772 (forgery; possession of similar forged checks, admitted to show intent); 1901, First National Bank v. Wisdom, — id. —, 63 S. W. 461 (forgery of other notes by the same person as a part of one scheme, admitted); Me.: 1844, State v. McAllister, 24 Me. 139, 143 (counterfeit utterance; uttering of another bill on the same bank, admitted); 1879, Dodge v. Haskell, 69 id. 429 (D. sued the defendant's testator on a note signed by him as surety for S.; defence, alteration by S. before delivery; evidence of the finding in the desk of S., who had absconded, numbers of forged and altered notes, blank and partly written notes, bearing the signatures of the testator and other persons, was excluded, on the theory that the argument from former forgeries and from bad character was inadmissible); Md.: 1880, Bishop v. State, 55 Md. 138, 144 (forged uttering; utterings of similar forged instruments about the same time, admitted); Mass.: 1844, Com. v. Bigelow, 8 Metc. 235 (counterfeit utterance; former knowing passing, admitted); 1845, Com. v. Stearns, 10 id. 256 (former utterances, admissible); 1849, Com. v. Miller, 3 Cush. 243, 250 (uttering a forged promissory note; the utterance of thirty other similar ones, at or near the same time, admitted); 1858, Com. v. Price, 10 Gray 473 (possession with intent to utter; the fact received of the subsequent possession of counterfeit bills of banks in other States, to show intent); 1862, Com. v. Hall, 4 All. 306 (uttering; possession at the same time of another counterfeit bill, admitted to show intent); 1865, Com. v. Edgerly, 10 id. 184 (possession with intent to utter; previous possession of and attempts at uttering other counterfeit money, admitted to show "guilty knowledge"); 1882, Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 18 (counterfeit utterance; Devens, J.: "It is the knowledge which it may be inferred he must have derived from other transactions, and not the intent that the defendant had in other transactions, that renders the evidence admissible as affording just ground for inference against him as to intent in the matter under examination"); 1888, Com. v. White, 145 id. 394, 14 N. E. 611 (forging bills for hides, the bill being used by the defendant as a voucher to the employer that the hides were bought by customers, thus enabling the defendant to obtain cash on them; the fact was received of the fabrication of many other bills of a like sort, before and after those in issue, not to show that a forgery was committed, but to show the defendant's fraudulent intent and knowledge); Mich.: 1878, Carver v. People, 39 Mich. 786 (forgery; a general scheme shown to use forged instruments of the sort and in the way in question); 1893, Pearson v. Hardin, 95 id. 360, 366, 54 N. W. 904 (action against accommodation indorser; plea, that the note was raised; the fact that other notes indorsed by him at the same time were raised, excluded); Mo.: 1851, State v. Mix, 15 Mo. 153, 160 (utterings of other counterfeit bank-notes, of a similar kind, to other persons, before and after the time charged, admitted to show guilty knowledge); State v. Wolff, ib. 173 ("other acts of passing counterfeit money," admissible); 1893, State v. Minton, 116 Mo. 605, 611, 22 S. W. 808 (forgery of a deed; other forged deeds by defendant under the tion, — a representation in conduct instead of in words. Thus, the general principles of evidencing Knowledge, Intent, and Design, as examined for the same name and in the same region, admitted to show intent and knowledge); 1898, State v. Hodges, 144 Id. 50, 45 S. W. 1093 (uttering a check; similar utterance a few days previously, admitted to show intent); Nebr.: 1899, Davis v. State, 58 Nebr. 465, 78 N. W. 930 (forgery of railroad ticket; other sales of such tickets to other persons by the defendant on the same day, admitted); 1901, Burlingim v. State, 61 Id. 276, 85 N. W. 77 (inciting forgery of a deed; another forged deed of the same land, admitted to show intent); N. J.: 1810, State v. Van Houten, 2 N. J. L. 248 (other utterings on the same day of other counterfeit bills on the same bank, admitted by the majority, to show knowledge and intent); 1838, State v. Robinson, 16 Id. 507 (another uttering of a note on the same bank, admitted; "Vanhouten's case . . . has been followed ever since in this State"; acquittal on the charge of the other uttering, held immaterial); 1897, Ryan v. State, 60 Id. 552, 38 Atl. 672 (counterfeit money; evidence of former offences, rejected on the facts); N. Y.: 1855, People v. Thoms, 3 Park. Cr. 256, 270 (possession with intent to utter; other altered notes found in the possession of the accused, admitted; but notes found in his wife's possession, who had just come from his house, excluded); 1874, People v. Corbin, 56 N. Y. 363 (forgery of A's name, the defendant's claim being that he had authority to write it, but the prosecution claiming a revocation of the authority; other forgeries, about the same time, of his father-in-law's name, excluded); 1887, People v. Everhardt, 104 Id. 591, 11 N. E. 62 (utterance of a forged check; utterance "of other forged checks by him upon other occasions," admitted to negative innocent uttering); 1900, Boyd v. Boyd, 164 Id. 234, 58 N. E. 118 (whether the defendant forged an assignment of a certificate of redemption in the name of a deceased judgment-creditor; a similar forged assignment in the same hand and covering a similar transaction, admitted, on the principle of § 303, ante, to show that "an act which had been done by some one was in fact done by the person who designed and pursued the plan"; "there is neither reason nor authority to support the proposition that it must always be limited to cases where motive is material"); N. C.: 1822, State v. Twitty, 2 Hawks 248, 258 (uttering a bank-note; former utterings of counterfeits of other banks, admitted to show knowledge); Oh.: 1831, State v. Hess, 5 Oh. 9 (the possession of other counterfeit bank-notes, secreted about the house, admitted); 1846, Reed v. State, 15 Id. 217 (other counterfeit utterances about the same time, admissible; here of the same bank); 1862, Griffin v. State, 14 Oh. St. 55, 62 (uttering; the possession of counterfeit money similar in character, admissible); 1882, Lindsey v. State, 38 Id. 507 (uttering a forged warranty deed; other forged warranty deeds and also deeds of trust admitted to show knowledge; sameness of kind in the other articles not being essential); Pa.: 1895, Penna. Co. v. R. Co., 153 Pa. 160, 164, 25 Atl. 1043 (conversion; forged letter of attorney in issue; other draft forgeries found in defendant's desk of the signatures in question, admitted as showing a plan to forge the one in issue); 1899, Wheeler v. Ahlers, 189 Id. 138, 42 Atl. 40 (alteration of a note by the maker after indorsement; similar alterations by the same person of similar notes transferred to plaintiff, admitted); S. C.: 1816, State v. Antonio, 2 Constl. Ct. 776, 783, 791, 797, 806 (the possession of "instruments calculated to coin money," offered to show the quo animo in passing; admitted, as not involving unfair surprise and as tending to show "that he must have had a knowledge of the baseness of the metal of which the false dollar was composed"; Nott, J., dissenting, because it "did not prove that he knew this dollar to be counterfeit; . . . unless indeed there was some proof, by comparison or otherwise, that these were the moulds in which the dollar passed by the defendant was cast"); 1829, State v. Houston, 1 Bail. 300 (forgery; possession of other such instruments, admitted to show intent; quoted ante, § 313); 1900, State v. Allen, 56 S. C. 495, 35 S. E. 204 (forgery of school certificates; forgery of other similar certificates for the same county within five months later, admitted); Tenn.: 1840, Peck v. State, 2 Humph. 78, 86 (uttering false silver dollars; other utterings of similar coins, if distinctly shown, held admissible, whether before or after the time in issue; "the accidents of trade can hardly be supposed to have placed in his possession so much spurious money"); 1885, Foute v. State, 15 Lea 712, 719 (uttering forged bills for jail fees; the fact of uttering "other forged bills for jail fees," admitted "to prove the scienter"); 1890, Franklin v. Franklin, 90 Tenn. 48, 16 S. W. 557 (a will alleged to be forged by F.; other forgeries held admissible to show guilty motive "if it had been shown that he had written this will and the defence was that it was written innocently or by direction of the testator"; but "it was not competent to show that he had written this will by proof that he had forged other papers"); Tex.: 1893, Strang v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 219, 228, 22 S. W. 680 (forged utterance; that the defendant had embezzled other funds of the employer, held inadmissible, by a majority); U. S.: 1827, U. S. v. Moses, 4 Wash. C. C. 726 (like U. S. v. Roudenbush, 8 Pet. infra); 1832, U. S. v. Roudenbush, 1 Baldw. 514 (uttering; "if their general resemblance to the one laid in the indictment is such that a person who knows the one to be a counterfeit could not reasonably believe the others were genuine . . . , [other utterings are admissible, . . . but therefore inadmissible] when the notes are on different banks or so unlike in appearance that an honest man might think one good, though the other was known to be bad"); 1832, U. S. v. Doehler, 1 Baldw. 519, 524 ("if the note is of the same kind or character," other utterings are admissible); 1834, U. S.

preceding topic, apply equally to the present topic. It will be here necessary only to call attention to the specific application of those principles (ante, §§ 301–304). In a false representation or pretence, there is involved — alike in all the varieties of offence, and in most civil cases as well as in criminal cases — the general notion of Intent to deceive. Within this, and usually decisive in showing it (but capable, as already noted, of being evidenced by a separate principle), is the element of Knowledge. Lastly, in the (here unusual) case where the act of making the representations is disputed, and resort is had to a system or design to prove it, the stricter test applicable to proving Design may be invoked.

(1) Knowledge. Other former acts of a similar sort may in certain conditions show the likelihood of a warning being received (ante, § 301);[1] but this specific form of proof is rarely brought out clearly. No doubt with every prior occasion of the sort the probability grows that the prior promisees would have sought out and charged the defendant with the falsity of the representations; but this reasoning does not appear to be used by the Courts.

(2) Intent. The argument (ante, § 302) to the improbability of innocent intent from the repetition of similar acts is the apparently accepted ground for the use of this class of evidence. (a) As to the similarity of the other representations, no attempt has been made by the Courts to lay down a general test. The precedents illustrate a wide variety of ruling on this point.[2] A common-sense liberality is the best guide for decision. (b) As to the length of time over which the evidence should range, it is equally impossible to fix a general test; the circumstances of each case must determine.[3] Subsequent representations are equally admissible with prior ones;[4]

v. Roudenbush, 8 Pet. 288 (apparently recognizing the general doctrine by implication that other utterings are admissible to show intent); 1849, U. S. v. Burns, 5 McLean 23, 26 (uttering; possession of other coins, admissible); 1879, U. S. v. Brooke, 3 McArth. 315, 317 (obtaining money by a deed of trust on property got shortly before by a forged deed, admitted to show intent in a prosecution for forging the deed); Va.: 1827, Finn v. Com., 5 Rand. 701, 709 (efforts of the accused to procure counterfeit money, expressed intentions to go where it could be got, and to cultivate the acquaintance of a counterfeiter, admitted as showing a scienter); 1830, Martin v. Com., 2 Leigh 745 (counterfeit uttering; uttering another note of a different amount, on a bank in the same State, admitted); Spencer v. Com., ib. 751, 756 (other forged notes, admitted); 1834, Hendrick's Case, 5 id. 769, 773, 776 (uttering a forged check; the fact admitted, to prove "guilty knowledge," of uttering forged checks on other banks on the day after); Vt.: 1830, Keith v. Taylor, 3 Vt. 153 (to prove that the name of E. as witness on a note purporting to be the defendant's had been forged by D., a former holder of the note, the fact was offered (1) that D. had written the body of the note; (2) that D. had forged another note, of the same date and about the same amount, with the name of the same E. as witness, but with a different person as maker; excluded); 1897, Redding v. Redding's Est., 69 Id. 500, 38 Atl. 230 (other forgeries, not admitted to show the commission of the one in question); 1859, State v. Morton, 8 Wis. 352 (possession with intent; evidence to show scienter not stated; but evidence for the defendant that he had examined a "counterfeit-detector," admitted).

[1] Allen v. Millison, Ill.; State v. Bokien, Wash.; R. v. Francis, Eng.

[2] For example, Tarbox v. State, Oh.; Simons v. Vulcan Co., Pa.; Butler v. Watkins, U. S.

[3] 1880, Earl, J., in People v. Shulman, 80 N.Y. 373, note: ("it is obviously impossible to lay down any general rule limiting the time within which such transactions must have taken place. . . . Each case, as to the application of this rule, must depend largely upon its own circumstances, and not unfrequently the limit of them must rest entirely in the discretion of the judge presiding at the trial"); 1880, Meyer v. People, ib. 364, 372 (approving the preceding).

[4] Hathaway's Trial, R. v. Saunders, Eng.; State v. Call, N. H.; People v. Shulman, N. Y.; U. S. v. Snyder, U. S.

because, on the principle of Intent (ante, § 316), it is the repetition of them that is significant, and a subsequent instance reduces the probability of innocence equally as well as a prior one. (c) Knowledge of the falsity of the other representations need not be shown;[6] for, if it could be shown, there would be an end of the proof, and practically the present question would never need to be discussed. It is the mere recurrence of similar incorrect (not necessarily knowingly false) representations which leads to the belief that they could not have been made innocently; we may assume that any given one might have been innocent, but cannot concede this when we notice the recurrence.

(3) Design. When the very act of making the representations is to be proved, and a system or design is to be argued from, the evidence is to be restricted by the rigorous rule applicable to that purpose (ante, § 304), i. e. there must be shown a connection of features, in all the instances, so strong as to indicate a system throughout them. What is to be noted is that occasionally a Court is found applying the same test where the doing of the act is not disputed, but the intent alone is in issue.[6] This is a wholly misplaced strictness, out of harmony with all other analogies, and resting on a confusion of Intent and System.

§ 321. State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The precedents in the various jurisdictions exhibit the application of the foregoing principles with more or less consistency, and concern both civil and criminal cases.[1]

[5] Jordan v. Osgood, Mass.; U. S. Ins. Co. v. Wright, Oh.; Hall v. Naylor, N. Y.; compare Mayer v. People, N. Y.

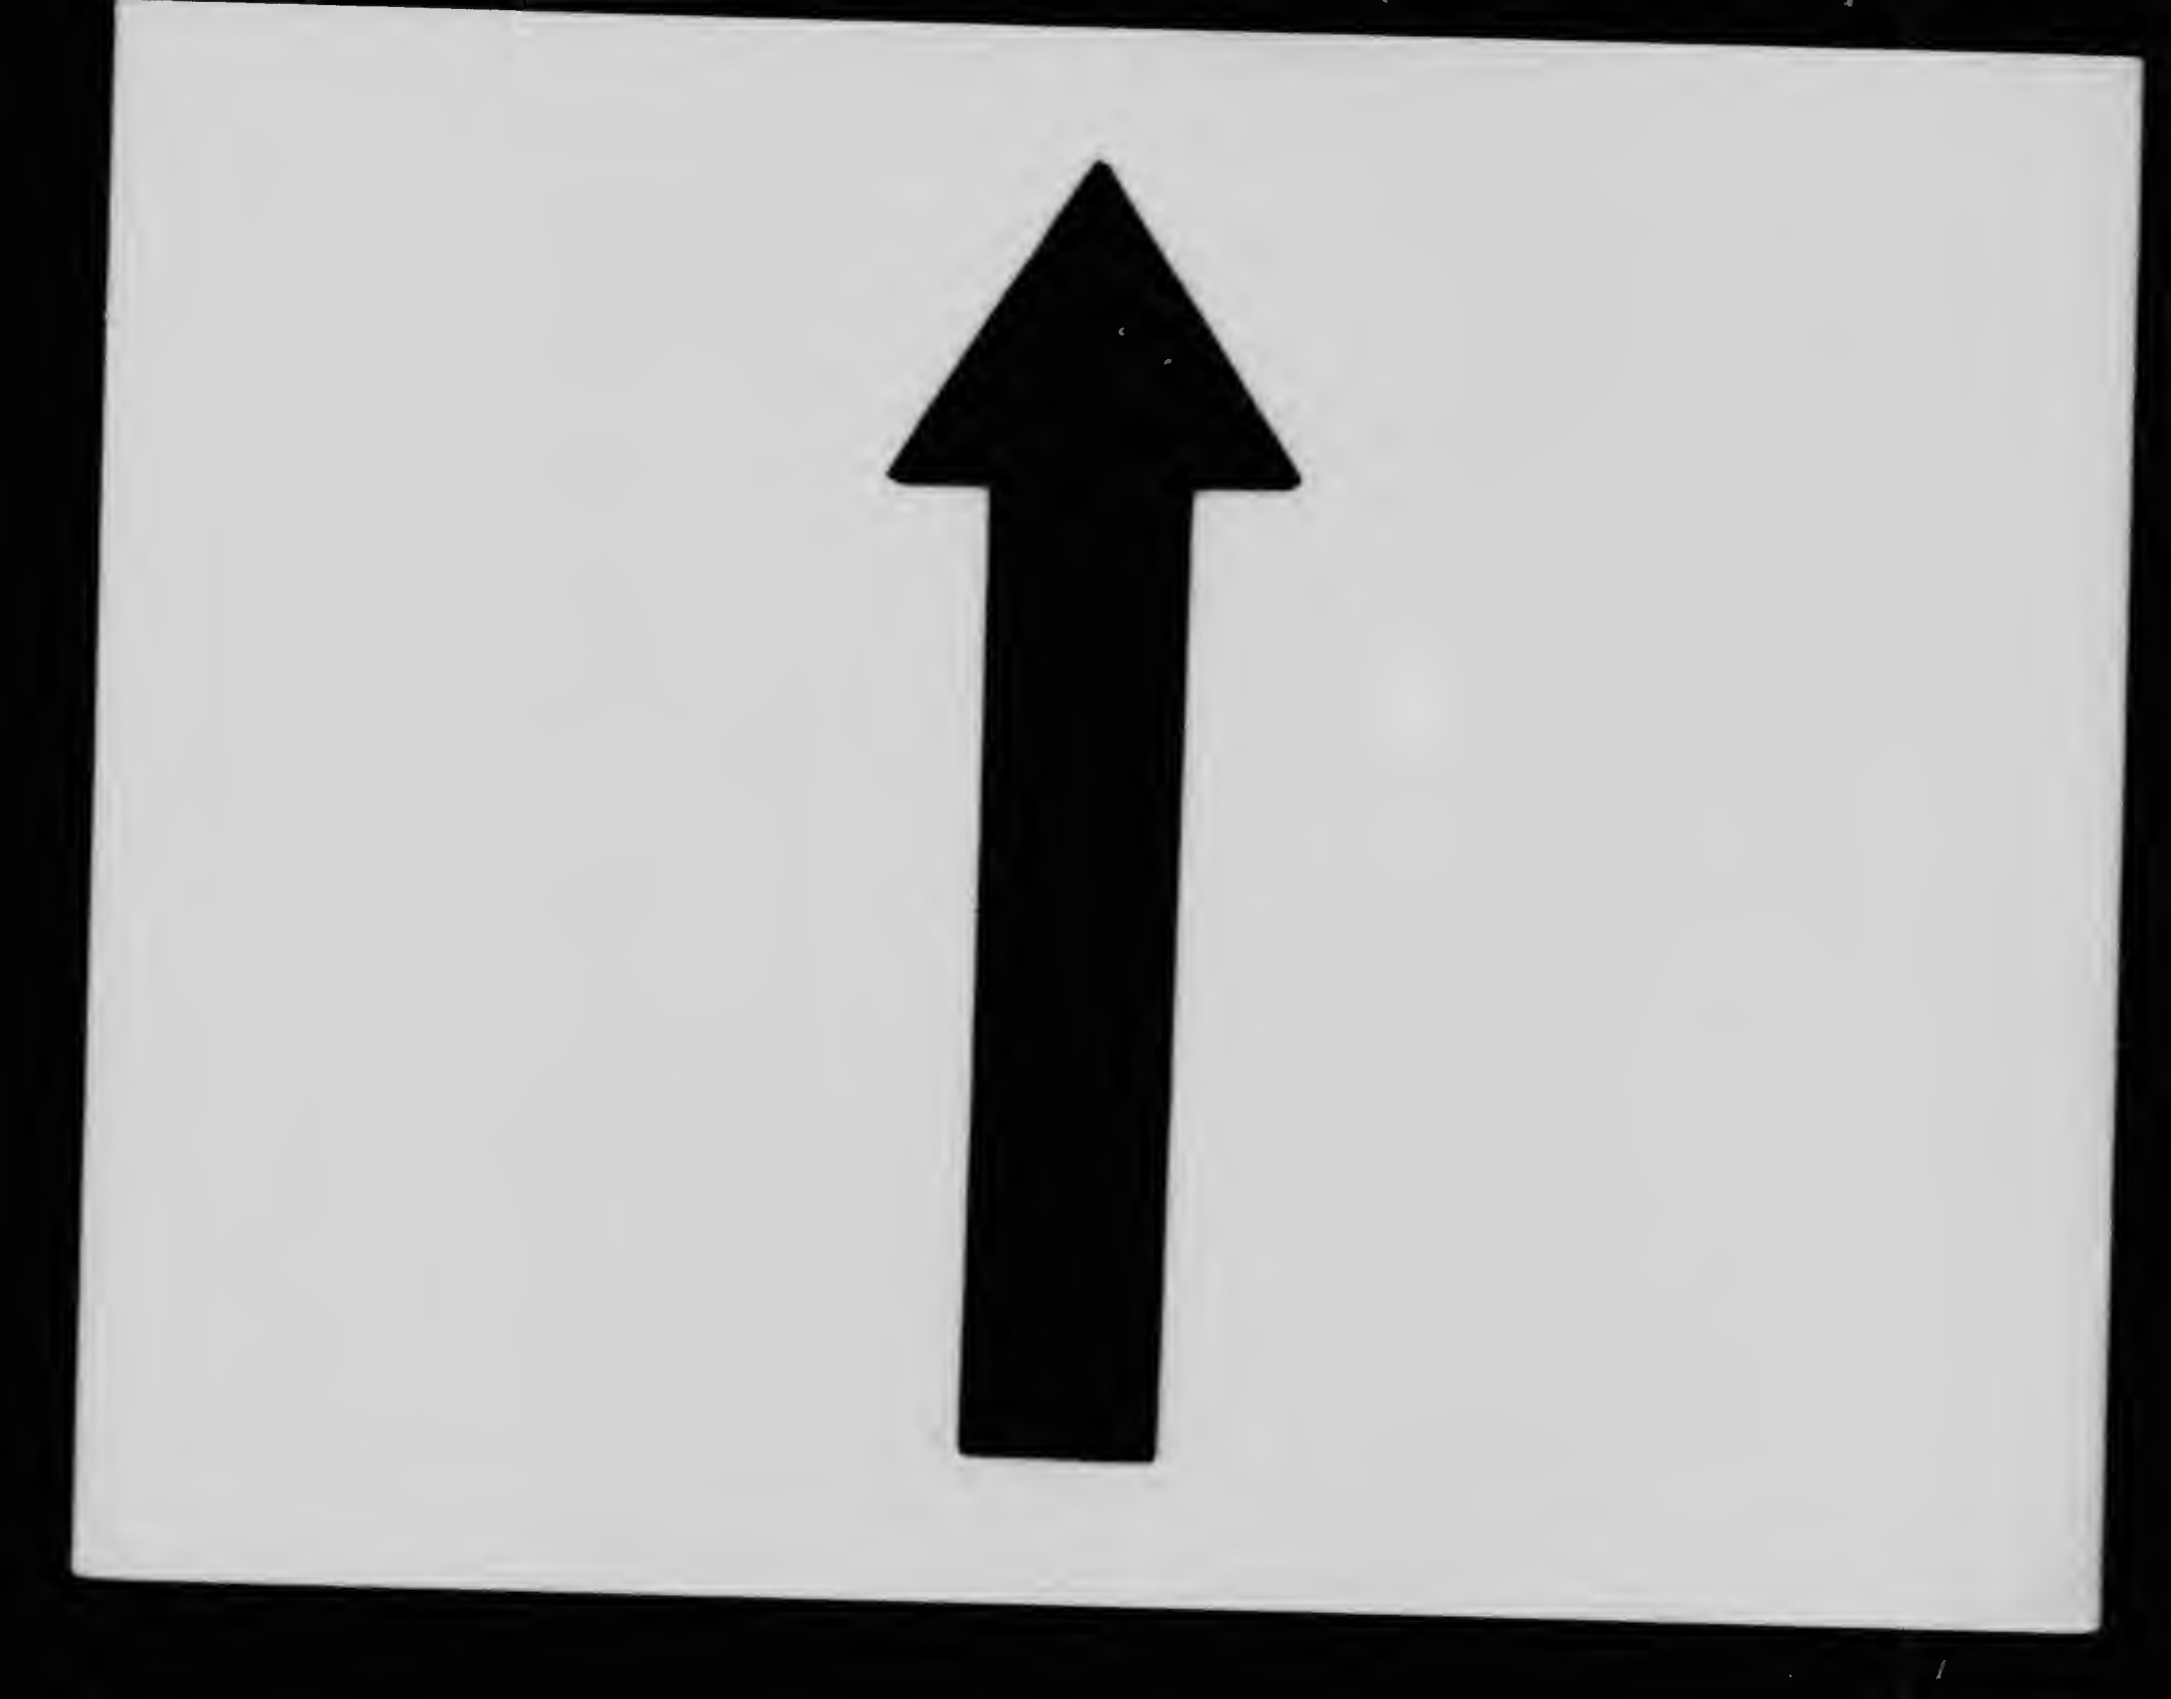
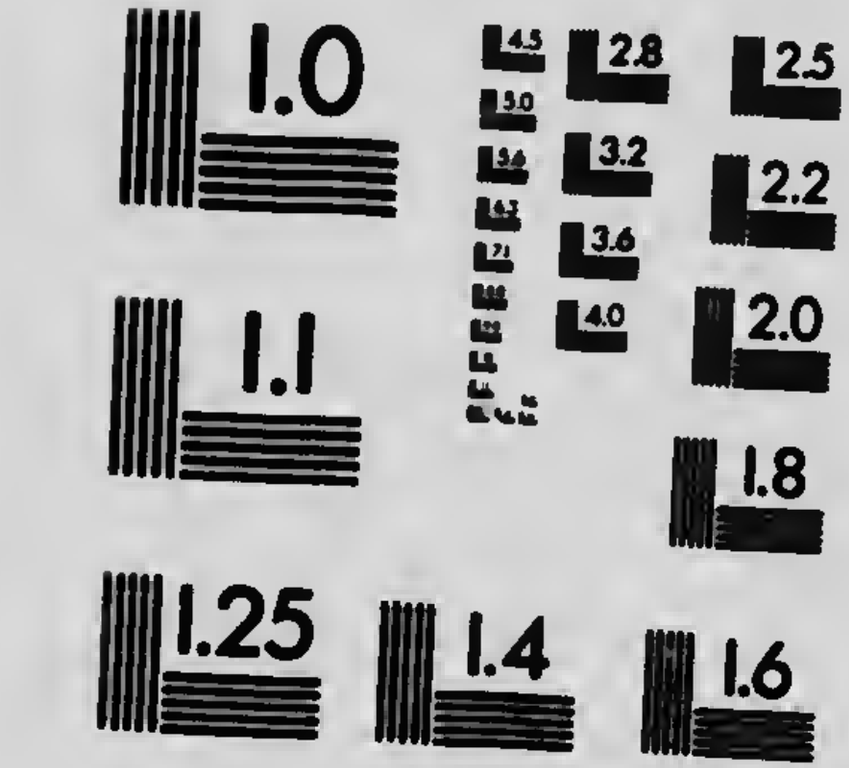
[6] Hall v. Naylor, People v. Peckens, N. Y.; Com. v. Jackson, Mass.; see also the Maine cases. Of course, as stronger evidence of Intent, the prior acts may be so cumulated as to show a system, as in Carnell v. State, Md.; but it is one thing to allow such a system to be shown (which nobody would oppose) and quite another to require that it be shown.

[1] Eng.: 1702, Hathaway's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 664 (cheating by pretending to be bewitched by one Sarah M., so that he fasted, went into a trance, etc., through her bewitching; the popular belief was that the sorcery was true, for many people had seen him fasting for twelve weeks; to show that the fasting was a fraud, in that he secretly took food, evidence to that effect was offered covering the last two weeks of it, which, however, fell after the date of the information charging him, and was therefore objected to; L. C. J. Holt: "It is an evidence of his cheating since that time, and that out of the information [i. e. not charged]; but it is an evidence also to prove that his pretended fasting before was a mere deceit; for he then pretended to have fasted ten weeks before he came hither, and after pretends to continue fasting in the same manner; if that be proved to be a fraud, it is strongly to be inferred that this pretended fasting before was so too"); 1808, R. v. Roberts, 1 Camp. 399 (conspiracy by fraudulent representations to obtain goods; the defendants had held themselves out as wealthy in their mode of life; representations to that effect to another tradesman were admitted); 1824, R. v. Whitehead, 1 C. & P. 67 (cheating by false representations as to B.'s property; B.'s representations to the defendant, similar to those of the defendant to others, were admitted to show that the defendant was misled by B.; this is really a mode of proving good faith, under § 256, ante); 1831, Irving v. Motly, 7 Bing. 548, semble (other purchases by representations under similar circumstances, admitted to show fraud); 1856, R. v. Roebuck, D. & B. 24, before all the judges but one (obtaining money by offering to pawn a chain of false silver; the fact admitted of a subsequent offering of a similar false chain, and of the possession of twenty-six similar false chains); 1860, R. v. Holt, 8 Cox Cr. 411 (before five judges; the fact of another unauthorized obtaining of money near the same time, not admitted to show intent); 1864, R. v. Fuidge, L. & C. 390 (false pretences; the fact of the false obtaining of a similar article three days later was rejected, no reasons being given); 1871, R. v. Stenson, 12 Cox Cr. 111 (false pretences by causing an order to be given to A., a bookseller, purporting falsely to be from S., a lady of quality, for a book sold by the defendant; the fact of the sending of other false orders of the same sort was received to show the intent); 1874, R. v. Francis, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128 (to show guilty knowledge of the falsity of a ring offered for pawn as a diamond, the fact was received of the offering, shortly before, to other pawnbrokers,



MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)



APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA
(716) 482 - 0300 - Phone
(716) 288 - 5989 - Fax

4. Knowing Possession or Receipt of Stolen Goods.

§ 324. Other Possession of Stolen Goods; (1) Knowledge Principle. The act of possession is in this class of cases (except rarely) conceded, and the

of a false gold chain and of other alleged diamond rings; in one of the instances the broker told the accused that the diamond was not genuine; quoted ante, § 302); 1875, R. v. Saunders, 1 Q. B. D. 19 (false pretences by advertising to give work and requesting money by mail to pay for the preliminary instructions; the fact received, to show intent, of a number of other persons having been induced afterwards by him in the same way to forward money on such advertisements); 1878, Blake v. Assurance Soc., 14 Cox Cr. 246, L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94 (action to recover a premium obtained by false pretences; H. agreed to lend money to the plaintiff, on condition that he insured his life with the defendant; the defendant insured his life, but H. failed to make the loan; to show that the defendant was in fraudulent collusion with H. for the purpose of obtaining premiums, the fact was admitted of similar policies issued and similar defaults of H. with reference to other persons, the person H. being a mere figurehead or fictitious person; quoted ante, § 302); 1899, R. v. Rhodes, 1 Q. B. 77 (false pretences in obtaining eggs; the obtaining of eggs from other persons by similar pretences shortly afterwards, admitted as "part of a scheme to fraud"); 1900, R. v. Ollis, 2 Q. B. 758, 764 (falsely passing a check upon no funds; similar passing of a check on the same bank to another person about the same time, held admissible, though the defendant had been acquitted of the latter charge on a trial therefor; Bruce and Ridley, JJ., diss.); Can.: 1897, Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Jonah, 1 N. Br. Eq. 482 (insurance policy; prior and subsequent similar frauds, admissible); 1889, Kidd v. Henderson, 22 N. Sc. 57 (false representations inducing a contract; the plaintiff's similar false representations to others, admitted, by two judges, and semble, by all); Ala.: 1897, Martin v. Smith, 116 Ala. 639, 22 So. 917 (contents of paper signed; false representations as to a similar paper shortly before, excluded on the facts); 1899, Bomar v. Rosser, 123 id. 641, 26 So. 510 (similar representations, to one other person, about the same patent, not admitted to show the making of representations in issue); Ark.: 1898, White v. B. & F. G. Co., 65 Ark. 278, 45 S. W. 1060 (fraudulent purchase; other purchases about the same time, admissible only when connected by a common purpose); Conn.: 1805, Gardner v. Preston, 2 Root 205 (case for fraudulent representations as to T.'s solvency; similar representations to other merchants in the same town about the same time, admitted, as showing a combination to defraud; here, however, the combination was alleged in the declaration); 1899, Elwell v. Russell, 71 Conn. 462, 42 Atl. 862 (fraudulent representations as to a mortgage, subsequent conduct, admitted); Ill.: 1871, Allin v. Millison, 72 Ill. 201 (sale of a patent-right; the fact admitted that other purchasers had complained to the seller of the patent's worthlessness); 1902, Du Bois v. People, 200 id. 157, 65 N. E. 658 (similar transactions in a "confidence game" with other persons about the same time, admitted to show guilty knowledge); Ind.: 1882, Strong v. State, 86 Ind. 208 (false pretences to be a travelling Mason in distress; the fact excluded of a former false pretence of the same sort in an adjoining State a few years before, because such evidence is limited to cases where the act charged does not on the evidence carry with it "an evident implication of a criminal intent," as it did here; Elliott, J., diss.); 1897, Crum v. State, 148 id. 401, 47 N. E. 833 (larceny by trick, in furnishing counterfeit money; the fact of "other like crimes about the time," admitted to show intent; overruling Strong v. State, supra); Ia.: 1882, State v. Rivers, 58 Ia. 102, 108, 12 N. W. 117 (false representations to a bank that a mortgage was a first lien; the defendant's bank account before and after the transaction, and other matters, admitted as indicating his intent); 1888, State v. Jamison, 74 id. 613, 617, 38 N. W. 509 (false representation of the contents of a mortgage in obtaining a signature to it; a prior similar pretence to the same person with a similar instrument, admitted); 1897, State v. Brady, 100 id. 191, 69 N. W. 290 (obtaining money by false warrants; former false warrants, admitted to show intent and also to show a systematic scheme of fraud); 1901, State v. Dexter, 115 id. 678, 87 N. W. 417 (obtaining property under false pretences; purchases from others on similar representations, admitted); 1902, State v. Soper, — id. —, 91 N. W. 774 (false pretences; similar representations to others about the same time, admitted to show intent); Ky.: 1897, Roche v. Coleman, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 985, 42 S. W. 739 (false representations as to shares of stock; similar representations to other persons, not received to show the fact of making); Me.: 1826, McKenney v. Dingley, 4 Me. 172 (similar pretences as to solvency, to persons in the same town, about the same time, admitted; semble, that a general plan must have existed); Seaver v. Dingley, ib. 306, 320 (similar, but more limited, evidence received; and no plan required, semble); 1840, Hawes v. Dingley, 17 id. 341 (similar case; like fraudulent purchases of others about the same time, admissible; the testimony said "in most cases" to have involved a formed design thus to defraud, but such design apparently not held necessary); Md.: 1897, Carnell v. State, 85 Md. 1, 36 Atl. 117 (false representations as to money in bank; similar pretences as to such money, to another person, about the same time, admitted, first, to show guilty knowledge, and, secondly, to show that he had "devised a scheme to obtain goods wherever and from whomsoever he could" by such representations); Mass.: 1832, Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 307, 311 (trover for goods bought with fraudulent intent not to pay; the fact of question is as to the criminal intent, and specifically, as to the knowledge accompanying the possession. In what way does the fact of possession of similar purchases of like articles about the same time, admitted to show the fraudulent purpose); 1842, Com. v. Stone, 4 Metc. 43, 47 (cheating by knowingly passing the bill of a broken bank; evidence admitted of the passing of other similar bills, to show the scienter); 1848, Com. v. Eastman, 1 Cush. 189, 195 (conspiring to obtain goods from S. under pretence of buying and with intent not to pay; purchases from nine other persons under the same circumstances of insolvency, etc., admitted to show intent); 1857, Wiggin v. Day, 9 Gray 97 (replevin for goods obtained with fraudulent intent not to pay; evidence received of purchases of large amounts of personalty from others at the same time of insolvency, and their secreting); 1872, Jordan v. Osgood, 109 Mass. 457 (replevin for goods bought with intent not to pay, and bought under false pretences as to solvency; the fact was rejected of similar false representations to other persons at or about the same time; Morton, J.: "The transaction proposed to be proved for the purpose of showing the fraud which is the subject of controversy must be shown by some evidence, direct or circumstantial, to be so connected with it as to make it apparent that the defendant had a common purpose in both; but if the transaction is distinct and with no connection of design, it is not admissible. . . . The mere fact [in this case] that an insolvent trader makes misstatements as to his pecuniary condition does not justify the inference that he has formed a general scheme to cheat," and there being no other evidence of it, "the evidence of these distinct transactions therefore was not competent"; this opinion was rendered in full view of the preceding line of cases, and of those dealing with transfers in fraud of creditors (post, § 333), and was apparently intended to overrule the above line of cases, as well as those cited under § 333 except Williams v. Robbins, which it rehabilitates and makes law; the result is to apply the rigorous System rule (ante, § 304) even where the object is merely to show intent, a result wholly unsound, as already suggested (ante, § 320), and out of harmony with the rule in other analogous situations; but this misapplication of the System rule in Massachusetts does not seem to extend beyond the present topic of false pretences, that of fraudulent transfers (post, § 333), and perhaps that of embezzlement (post, § 331)); 1875, Haskins v. Warren, 115 id. 523, 538 (goods purchased fraudulently; the fact of other purchases admitted under the rule of Jordan v. Osgood); 1874, Com. v. Coe, ib. 481, 501 (cheating by the false pretence that a certificate of stock was genuine; the fact admitted of the use of other false certificates about the same time, to negative "casual and accidental" possession, and "to show guilty knowledge"); 1882, Com. v. Jackson, 132 id. 16 (false pretences as to the soundness of a horse; the fact of three similar false warranties in the preceding two months, rejected, as not indicating any single scheme or plan, "any more than the various robberies of a thief"); 1886, Com. v. Blood, 141 id. 575, 6 N. E. 769 (false pretences about the same article to other persons, admitted as parts of one fundamental scheme); 1902, Com. v. Lubinsky, 182 id. 142, 64 N. E. 966 (obtaining of goods from other persons about the same time by the same pretences, admitted to show intent; the Court still employs the language of the narrower rule as to a "common scheme to defraud"); Mich.: 1879, Shipman v. Seymour, 40 Mich. 274, 280 (other purchases on similar false representations of solvency, two months before, admitted); 1880, Cook v. Perry, 43 id. 623, 626, 5 N. W. 1054 (sale; subsequent similar representations about the same property, made to a decoy, admitted); 1882, People v. Hensaler, 48 id. 49, 52, 11 N. W. 804 (procuring indorsement to a note; similar previous false representations about other notes to the same person, admitted); 1886, People v. Wakely, 62 id. 297, 303, 28 N. W. 871 (sale; "previous acts of the same kind," admissible); 1887, Ross v. Miner, 67 id. 410, 35 N. W. 60 (obtaining goods by false pretences as to credit, etc.; purchases from others, and "the whole business" of the defendant, admitted); 1888, Stubly v. Beachboard, 68 id. 401, 422, 36 N. W. 192 (false representations as to encumbrances on the same lands to other parties, about the same time, admitted); Minn.: 1898, State v. Wilson, 72 Minn. 522, 75 N. W. 715 (obtaining money by personating an officer; that the defendant "had been engaged in practising like cheats," admitted to show intent); 1899, State v. Southall, 77 id. 296, 79 N. W. 1007 (false pretences by circulating "time checks"; circulation of others of the same tenor, admitted to show knowledge and intent); Mo.: 1892, State v. Jackson, 112 Mo. 585, 588, 20 S. W. 674 ("confidence game"; similar prior obtaining of money from another person three months before, admitted); 1897, Davis v. Vories, 141 id. 234, 42 S. W. 707 (fraudulent representations as to a copyright; similar representations, held admissible); 1898, State v. Turley, 142 id. 403, 44 S. W. 267 (similar representations to other merchants about the same time, admissible to show intent); 1898, State v. Wilson, 143 id. 334, 44 S. W. 722 (fraudulently obtaining and disposing of goods; similar transactions with other sellers on the same day in the same city, admitted to show intent); Nebr.: 1887, Cowan v. State, 22 Nebr. 519, 524, 35 N. W. 405 (obtaining goods by false pretences; such acts "in two other cases, entirely distinct and separate" from that at bar, excluded); 1896, Johnson v. Gulick, 46 id. 817, 65 N. W. 883 (similar representations to other persons, not admitted to show the fact of making those charged); 1898, Morgan v. State, 56 id. 696, 77 N. W. 64 (similar representations to another person shortly before, excluded); 1903, Barbar v. Martin, — id. —, 93 N. W. 722 (fraudulent representations to another stockholder, admitted); Nev.: 1900, Swinney v. Patterson, 25 Nev. 411, 62 Pac. 1 other stolen goods at other times throw light upon this knowledge or this intent?

(fraudulent representations in obtaining a note; similar ones made about the same time to other persons in the same place, admitted to show intent); N. H.: 1839, Bradley v. Obear, 10 N. H. 477 (replevin for a horse bought by false representations of solvency; the fact received of the purchase of another horse about the same time by "similar fraudulent representations"); 1852, Angier v. Ash, 26 id. 109 ("acts or declarations evincing a fraudulent intention or purpose, if connected in point of time," admissible); 1868, State v. Call, 48 id. 126, 132 (cheating by false statements as to solvency; the mortgaging of most of his personalty within three days thereafter, to a third person, admitted to show intent); 1873, Hnvey v. Grant, 52 id. 589 (trover for goods bought with intent not to pay; purchases from other persons about the same time while insolvent, admitted; the limits of time being a question of fact in each case); N. Y.: 1841, Cary v. Hotaling, 1 Johns. 311, 316 (purchase; similar representations to another person the day before, admitted tn show intent); 1808, Allison v. Matthieu, 3 Johns. 235 (trover for goods obtained by false representations in buying furniture for L., said to be a rich foreigner but really lacking in means and now absconded; the fact received, to show the intent, of similar representations about the same time to other persons); 1859, Hall v. Naylor, 18 N. Y. 588 (Comstock, J.: "K. & Co. concealed the fact of their insolvency, with a design of procuring the goods and not paying for them, it was a fraud which rendered the sale void if the plaintiff [seller] chose sn to regard it. On the trial of such an issue, the quo animo of the transaction is the fact to be arrived at; and it is therefore competent to show that the party accused was engaged in other similar frands at or about tho same time. The transactions must be so connected in point of timo, and so similar in their other relations, tbat tbe same motive may reasonahly be imputed to them all"; and accordingly evidence of a prior false representation not fraudulent was rejected); 1861, Hennequin v. Naylor, 24 id. 139 (a case arising out of the same insolvency; this stricter rule was not applied, Hall v. Naylor not heiug cited, and mere prior purchases from nthers on the eve of suspension were admitted to show intent); 1864, Hathorne v. Hodges, 28 id. 486, 489 (other purchases while insolvent, admitted in the same way); 1874, Bielschofsky v. People, 60 id. 616 (false representations to obtain money; tbe same fraud on another person a day or twn before, admitted; no cases cited); 1875, Weymsn v. People, 62 id. 623 (larceny by obtaining goods hy false representations; the procuring of goods from others by the same means, about the same time, admitted, on the principle of Hall v. Naylor, that "the similarity in their leading features and characteristics justified the conclusion that tbey were pervaded and controlled by the same general intention"); 1880, People v. Sbulman, 80 id. 373, note (obtaining goods by false pretences; other such fraudulent obtalnings, after and before, admitted; Hall v. Naylor's rule followed, that the transactions must have "some relation to or connectinn with the main transaction"); 1880, Mayer v. People, ib. 364, 369, 372 (the same rule lsid down, tbst the other acts, which may be either before or after the time ln question, must show "a general purpose or scheme to obtain goods fraudulently," but the fact offered was merely of other false (i. e. incorrect) representations of solvency, and not of other fraudulent (i. e. knowingly false) representations, nor did the Court prescribe such a limitation); 1881, Shipply v. People, 86 id. 376, 380 (larceny by falae pretences; a "similar transaction" with another person, admitted, citing the last two cases); 1887, People v. Dimick, 107 id. 13, 31, 14 N. E. 178 (representations as to insurance after knowledgo of loss; other similsr representations during the same season, as to other cargoes, admitted to show intent); 1897, People v. Peckens, 153 id. 576, 47 N. E. 883 (larceny by false representationa; transactions with other parties tending to show a fraudulent scheme to use the same devices, admissible, "provided the dealings are sufficiently connected in point of time and character to authorizo an inference that the transaction was in pursuance of the same general purpose"); N. C.: 1894, State v. Walton, 114 N. C. 783, 784, 18 S. E. 945 (false representations to a treasurer as to orders for money; other instances of the sort, admitted); 1897, State v. Durham, 121 id. 546, 28 S. E. 26 (similar representations to another person about the same time, admitted); Oh.: 1878, U. S. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 33 Oh. St. 533 (fraudulent representations by an insurance agent; similar representations to others excluded, because not shown to be false nor known by him to be false); 1883, Tarbox v. State, 38 id. 581 (representations as to the breeding, etc., of two horses; "similar offences" shortly before, in another State, admitted to show knowledge); Pa.: 1868, Simons v. Vulcan Co., 61 Pa. 202, 204, 218 (assumpsit for money obtained by false representations in selling oil-lands; other prospectuses by the defendant, issued about the same time, admitted to show fraud); 1872, Com. v. Yerkes, Phila. Com. Pleas, 29 Leg. Intell. 60; 12 Cox Cr. 208, 215, 225, 226 (larceny and false pretences by obtaining a check from the City Treasurer for a purchase aa agent for the sinking fund, never made in fact; the fact that upon similar previous transactinns checks were thus given by the Treasurer on transactions to be perfected in the future, not received to show innocent intent; two Judges dissenting); 1893, Schofield v. Schiffer, 156 id. 65, 73, 27 Atl. 69 (similar representations hy a debtor-buyer to third persons, admitted to show intent); 1896, White v. Rosenthal, 173 id. 175, 33 Atl. 1027 (action for deceit by false representations of solvency; a series of purchases admitted as indicating a scheme to obtain by fraud); R. I.: 1902, State v. Letourneau, — R. I. — , 51 Atl. 1048 (selling

(1) Knowledge Principle. From the point of view of the Knowledge principle the argument requires (ante, § 301) that the former possession be such as is likely to have led to a knowledge or a warning of the stolen character of those goods, and that such warning would have naturally warned the defendant also of the stolen character of the goods in question. (a) As to the first element, it may be assumed that the receipt of stolen goods is in itself always more or less likely to result in a warning, chiefly because the owner is apt to follow them up and reclaim them, but also in part because a purchase not made in the ordinary course of trade has often suspicious features about the vendor's offer. (b) As to the second element, the warning thus obtained can affect the subsequent receipt of other goods upon one condition only, namely, that there is a similarity in the transactions, i. e. that the same person comes to dispose of the second article, or that the second article is of the same lot as the first. From these points of view, then, what are the essential limitations?

(a) The mere fact of possession would seem to be sufficient, as probably leading to a warning through the reclamation of the goods; and it is not necessary additionally to show that the receipt was accompanied by circumstances calculated in themselves to excite suspicion, or that the possession was so concealed as to show guilty knowledge. The latter features, however, are present in some of the precedents, though they do not seem to be treated as a requirement for every instance.[1] There are therefore three possible attipills on false representations; similar sales to other persons after the sale charged, excluded; no authority cited); Tenn.: 1870, Defreese v. State, 3 Heisk. 53, 62 (larceny by a fraudulent card trick; evidence admitted of other occasions when the defendant and his confederate used it to win money from other persons); 1891, Rafferty v. State, 91 Tenn. 655, 663, 16 S. W. 728 (representations as to loss by fire, made to obtain insurance money; evidence admitted of thirteen different claims of fire-loss by the defendant, within three years, in various cities, under different aliases, and of the similarity of the representations in those cases as to the articles lost; compare § 340, post); U. S.: 1859, Castle v. Bullard, 23 How. 172, 186 (fraudulent sale by an agent to an insolvent purchaser; similar connivance in purchases by the same person from others than the plaintiff, about the same time, admitted to show intent); 1868, Lincoln v. Claflin, 7 Wall. 132, 138 (case for obtaining goods by false representations as to assets; "other similar fraudulent transactions of the same parties with others, made about the same time," admitted to show intent); 1871, Butler v. Watkins, 13 Wall. 456, 464 (deceit; to show intent, the plaintiff was allowed to show "similar conduct towards another, at about the same time, and in relation to a like subject," here, the business of selling the plaintiff's goods for him); 1882, U. S. v. Snyder, 4 McCr. 618, 621 (false return as postmaster, in order fraudulently to increase his compensation, during the quarter ending Dec. 31, 1880; evidence admitted of similar false returns before and after that time, to show intent); 1894, Mudsill M. Co. v. Watrous, 9 C. C. A. 415, 61 Fed. 163, 172, 179 (fraudulent salting of ore-samples to induce a purchase; the salting of samples in prior negotiations of purchase with other persons, admitted as showing a plan to tamper with the samples; the opinion is one of the best illustrations of the principles of this chapter); 1896, Penn M. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' S. B. & T. Co., 19 id. 286, 72 Fed. 413, 421 (whether a false answer in an insurance application was made with intent to deceive; similar false answers in applications for other policies, admitted); 1898, Spurr v. U. S., 31 id. 202, 87 Fed. 701 (false certification of checks by a bank president knowing the account to be deficient; prior approval of illegal stock-speculations of the cashier by the defendant, admitted to show intent); 1899, Bacon v. U. S., 38 id. 37, 97 Fed. 35 (false report to comptroller by president of national bank; previous false reports, admitted to show intent); Va.: 1878, Trogdon's Case, 31 Gratt. 862, 870 (obtaining goods by false pretences; "similar representations about the same time to other persons," admitted); Wash.: 1896, State v. Bokien, 14 Wash. 403, 44 Pac. 889 (drawing a check knowingly on no funds; other such previous drawings excluded; a ruling clearly wrong; if any interim deposits had been made, it was for the defendant to make this explanation).

[1] E. g. R. v. Hinley, R. v. Primelt, Eng.; Lewis v. State, Kan.

tudes to take as to this element: The mere fact of possession suffices; or, The possession must have been obtained under suspicious circumstances; or, Neither of these suffices, and former knowing possession is alone sufficient. The first view is that represented in most Courts in this country; the second is sometimes hinted at; the third is represented by R. v. Oddy, in England, — reached not so much on the above reasoning, as on the doctrine of auxiliary policy (ante, § 42), a doctrine which if rightly interpreted would exclude evidence of former possession under all conditions whatever.

(b) But it remains to be shown that such knowledge or warning would involve warning of the stolen character of the goods in question. In other words, there must be also shown a similarity in the transactions, either as to the person bringing the goods or as to their kind, such as would bring the former knowledge or warning to bear in the present instance. What circumstances constitute sufficient similarity is a matter about which no fixed rule can be laid down;[2] but it seems clear that this requirement in its general notion is essential upon the present principle. Moreover, it applies equally whether the proof is of former mere possession or of knowing possession;[3] because the possession is supposed merely to lead up to the inference of knowing possession (by element a, above), and when there is thus shown a knowing possession (directly or by this inference) it remains still to show that the former knowledge would have a bearing on the present knowledge, and it is just here that the similarity of the goods or the identity of their vendor is significant. Thus, even the former knowing possession of wholly different goods obtained from a different person could show nothing as to knowledge of the goods charged. From the point of view, then, of the Knowledge principle, it is necessary and sufficient to show (a) former receipt and possession (and, perhaps, under suspicious circumstances) (b) of goods similar as to the person bringing them or as to their kind or otherwise.

§ 325. Same: (2) Intent Principle. From the point of view of the Intent principle, the test of admission may be very different. The reasoning of this argument (ante, § 302) is that the recurrence of a like act lessens by each instance the possibility that a given instance could be the result of inadvertence, accident, or other innocent intent. Accordingly, the argument here is that the oftener A is found in possession of stolen goods, the less likely it is that his possession on the occasion charged was innocent. It is not a question of specifically proving Knowledge; it is merely a question of the improbability of an innocent Intent. Several practical differences result: (1) It is immaterial whether in the other instances a knowing possession is shown. It is the mere fact of the repeated possession of other stolen goods that lessens the chances of innocence. (2) It is immaterial that the other goods were similar in kind to those charged, or were received from the same person. On the contrary, the greater the variety of the goods and of the sources they came from, the more striking the coincidence, and the more difficult to believe that the explanation is an innocent one. (3) It is immaterial whether the other possessions occurred before or after the possession charged; it is the multiplication of instances that affects our belief, and not the time of their occurrence, — provided the time is not so distant as to be accountable for on the theory of chance acquisition. There are precedents which illustrate all the above three conclusions (except the last), i. e. which do not require that knowing possession be shown, nor that any similarity in the goods or the vendor be shown; and these precedents thus appear to go distinctly upon the theory of Intent, as above set forth, rather than upon the theory of Knowledge.

[2] Coleman v. People, N. Y.

[3] State v. Wood, Conn.

So far as concerns the reconciliation of the precedents, it may be said (a) that both the above theories (of Knowledge and of Intent) are legitimate; that it is open to show specifically Knowledge, if so desired, or to show, more generally, Intent; and that evidence which satisfies either of these purposes is proper, on the principle of multiple admissibility (ante, § 13); but that the two ought to be discriminated and to be employed intelligently, and without confusing the one with the other; (b) that the force of an argument based on the Intent theory lies in the multiplication of instances; that a single instance has from this point of view little or no weight; and that therefore it is much better, in accepting a single instance, to test it by the Knowledge theory, while in accepting several instances it is sufficient to judge it by the looser but then equally satisfactory Intent theory.

§ 326. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. In the light of the foregoing explanation, the precedents in the various jurisdictions, even in the same court, will be seen to be not always consistent; but the significance of each precedent can perhaps be understood by comparing it with the logical requirements of each principle.[1]

[1] Eng.: 1826, R. v. Dunn, 1 Moo. Cr. C. 146, by all the Judges (knowing receipt of stolen goods; the fact of having received and pledged, within five months, various other goods stolen from the same persons and brought to the defendant by the same person, was admitted, "as an ingredient to make out the guilty knowledge"); 1833, R. v. Davis, 6 C. & P. 177, Gurney, B. (the finding on the accused of many other goods stolen from the same person, admitted; also their receipt at previous times; except the receipt of other articles charged in the indictment); 1843, R. v. Hinley, 2 Mo. & Rob. 524, 1 Cox Cr. 12, Maule, J. (knowing receipt of stolen goods; repeated acts of receiving stolen property "under circumstances which must have shown him that the property was not honestly obtained," admitted); 1851, R. v. Oddy, 2 Den. Cr. C. 264 (knowing receipt of stolen goods; the fact was rejected of the possession, at the same time, of four other pieces of cloth stolen by some one three months before from another mill and belonging to different persons; Pickering, for the prosecution: "It must be conceded that the moral weight of such evidence is irresistible. Suppose a thousand articles, all stolen at different times, either from the same or different persons, and all of them to be found in the possession of the prisoner; could any one doubt that he received them with a guilty knowledge? . . . Is the rule to be confined to cases which are in all particulars identical with Dunn's Case? Or is the evidence admissible if the goods have been received from the same person, though stolen from a different person or at a different time? Or will it be admissible if the other articles were only stolen from the same person, though received from a different one or at a different time?"; Alderson, B.: "Here the evidence merely went to show that the prisoner was in possession of other property which had been stolen in the previous December, and not that he had received such property knowing it to be stolen. Now the mere possession of stolen property is evidence, prima facie, not of receiving, but of stealing; and to admit such evidence in the present case would be to allow a prosecutor, in order to make out that a prisoner had received property with a guilty knowledge, which had been stolen in March, to show that the prisoner had in the December previous stolen some other property from another place and belonging to

§ 327. Other Modes of Evidencing. Needless to say, there are other modes of evidencing the knowledge or the intent of the person possessing other persons"; Campbell, L. C. J., went chiefly on grounds of the Character rule); 1858, R. v. Primelt, 1 F. & F. 51 (to show knowing receipt of stolen lead, the fact was admitted of eleven sales of lead of the same sort, false names being given, and the lead in one case being certainly stolen). The result of R. v. Oddy was a legislative change of the law: 1871, St. 34–35 Vict. c. 112, § 19: "... evidence may be given ... that there was found in the possession of such person other property stolen within the preceding period of twelve months, ... for the purpose of proving that such person knew the property [for which he is indicted] to be stolen." The possession offered in evidence under this statute must be possession at the time he is found in possession of the property charged in the indictment: 1884, R. v. Carter, 15 Cox Cr. 448; affirming R. v. Drage, 14 id. 85, Bramwell, L. J., and solving the doubt of Keating, J., in R. v. Harwood, 11 id. 388. The soundness of this limitation may be questioned; but at any rate it is clear that the whole provision is based on the Intent theory. But by the second half of the same statutory section, the possession at other times than the time charged may be shown by the fact that the defendant has "within five years immediately preceding been convicted of any offence involving fraud or dishonesty ... for the purpose of proving that the person accused knew the property which was proved to be in his possession to have been stolen," provided seven days' notice in writing is given. The object of using only the conviction of the offence, instead of proving the offence in the ordinary way, is apparently to obviate Lord Coleridge's objection of unfair surprise and confusion of issues (ante, § 194), advanced in R. v. Francis, as the main reason for the Character rule; for those objections do not apply to proof by record of conviction. The theory of using the former offence under this clause is clearly that of Intent, not of Knowledge. Can. Crim. Code, 1892, §§ 716, 717 (like Eng. St. 1871, supra; substituting three for seven days' notice); Ala.: 1875, Gassenheimer v. State, 52 Ala. 313, 318 (the stolen cotton being found at daybreak in the defendant's store, the fact was rejected that during the preceding week persons had been seen going into the store just before daybreak with sacks of cotton and coming out with the sacks empty); Conn.: 1881, State v. Wood, 49 Conn. 429, 440 (holding it to be necessary and sufficient that the other goods were received from the same person, but not that they were of the same kind or stolen from the same place; the opinion makes no distinction between former knowing receivings and mere receivings); Ind.: 1895, Goodman v. State, 141 Ind. 35, 39 N. E. 939 (the stolen thing charged as received by the defendant was a calf, and the knowing receipt of a stolen horse was given in evidence); Kan.: 1868, Lewis v. State, 4 Kan. 306 (larceny; the fact was admitted of the finding of many other stolen articles in premises carefully equipped for concealing such things, to show guilty knowledge, because "of the general knowledge men have that such an assortment would not be innocently gathered and secured"); Mass.: 1861, Devoto v. Com., 3 Metc. 418 (possession of other stolen goods, admitted); Mo.: 1851, State v. Wolff, 15 Mo. 168, 172, semble (possession of "various other articles of stolen property," admissible); 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 id. 497 (approving State v. Wolff); 1894, State v. Flynn, 124 id. 480, 27 S. W. 1105 (other articles stolen about the same time from the same and other persons, admitted); Nebr.: 1902, Goldsberry v. State, — Nebr. —, 92 N. W. 906 (other transactions with stolen goods, admitted on the facts); N. Y.: 1857, People v. Rando, 3 Park. Cr. 335, 339 ("a series of other acts of the like character," irrespective of the kind of goods or source of obtaining, admitted "to show the knowledge" and "to rebut any presumption of innocent mistake"); 1873, Coleman v. People, 55 N. Y. 81, 90, and 58 id. 556, 560 (knowing receipt of twenty-two bars of pig-iron, the property of Burke; evidence rejected of the defendant's possession of some iron-railing stolen from Briggs; both lots had been bought by the defendant from boys, but not the same boys; Allen, J., after noting the limitations sometimes put, that the articles must have been stolen from the same person and brought to the defendant by the same person: "It is unnecessary to say that all these qualifications must exist; but to warrant the introduction of such evidence there must be such a connection of circumstances that a natural inference may be drawn that, if the prisoner knew one article was stolen, he would also be chargeable with knowledge that another was. ... The Briggs iron had no connection with the pig-iron; it was taken from another place, belonged to another person, was of a different character, and received at another time and — for aught that appears — some of it from different persons. Assuming therefore that the prisoner received the Briggs iron and was chargeable with knowledge that it had been stolen, would that circumstance logically or legally charge him, or tend to charge him, with knowledge that the pig-iron was stolen?"; and the Court answered in the negative, while holding that "every case must depend upon its own circumstances"); 1874, Copperman v. People, 56 id. 591 (knowing receipt of two parcels of sewing-silk; the knowing receipt from the same person of similar articles stolen from the same place, admitted); 1881, People v. Dowling, 84 id. 486 (the rule is laid down, citing Coleman v. People, that other possession is admissible if the property was stolen from the same person and obtained from the same person, and if there is such a connection of circumstances, etc.; but this is a careless statement, and is probably entitled to no consideration); 1901, People v. Grossman, 168 id. 47, 51, 60 N. E. 1050 (larceny of similar goods from the same owners by the same sellers to defendant, admissible); 1903, the goods charged. The fact itself of their possession is some evidence of probable knowledge,[1] on the theory that the mode of acquisition would as a rule raise suspicion; and in a given instance the circumstances of acquisition — for example, the low price paid[2] — may be available to strengthen this probability. Moreover, the conduct of the defendant in concealing the possession may, as always (ante, §§ 276, 278), evidence guilty knowledge. The possession of stolen goods in other evidential aspects has been considered elsewhere (ante, §§ 152–155).

5. Embezzlement.

§ 329. General Principle. Here the act of taking the property is usually conceded or otherwise proven, and the purpose of using other acts of the sort is to show the criminal knowledge or intent. (1) The Knowledge principle (ante, § 301) has here little scope for application. It may occasionally happen that a former error in accounting would be likely to result in warning of it to its maker, but this does not in itself carry any probability of disclosure of the later error charged or of knowledge of the nature of the property taken. (2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) is the usually appropriate one, and is the one generally accepted by the Courts as governing the use of such evidence. Its theory is that the recurrence of similar takings of property, or, as in the usual case, similar incorrect entries in account-books, suffices to negative mistake or inadvertence on the occasion charged.[1] No doubt the other instances must have occurred under circumstances fairly similar (ante, § 302); but no fixed rule is possible on this subject; whether the other acts must appear to have been done in the same employment or in the same series of accounts, or in the same account-book, must depend on the circumstances of each case. (3) The System principle (ante, § 304) may equally be applicable here, where it is desired to argue from a system of embezzlements to the very act of taking in issue, and not merely to the intent in taking. As to this certain limitations may be noticed. (a) A few Courts are found saying[2] that evidence of other acts is receivable "not to prove that the defendant took the money," but to prove

People v. Doty, 175 id. 164, 67 N. E. 303 (knowing receipt of a stolen cowhide; receipt of other stolen hides from the same thieves, but stolen from other owners, admitted; two Judges diss.); N. C.: 1881, State v. Murphy, 81 N. C. 741 (larceny of a hog; possession in the same pen of another hog belonging to another person, admitted; the opinion fails to appreciate the bearings of the question); Oh.: 1872, Shriedley v. State, 23 Oh. St. 130, 142 (possession of other goods, known to have been stolen, and received from the same thief, admissible); S. C.: 1893, State v. Crawford, 39 S. C. 343, 350, 17 S. E. 799 (possession of other kinds of stolen goods, admitted); Wash.: 1893, State v. Humason, 5 Wash. 499, 503, 32 Pac. 111 (cattle; possession of other cattle, not shown to be stolen, excluded).

[1] 1845, R. v. Brett, 1 Cox Cr. 261; 1862, R. v. Deer, Leigh & C. 240.

[2] 1860, People v. Levison, 16 Cal. 98.

[1] 1888, Manisty, J., in R. v. Stephens, infra; 1887, Peckham, J., in People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 468, 14 N. E. 319 ("A man indicted for the embezzlement of funds by false entries might claim, with some degree of plausibility perhaps, that the entry was a mistake; but the probability of such mistakes would be greatly lessened by proof that other false entries of the same kind had been made at or about the same time by the same person").

[2] R. v. Stephens Eng.; Com. v. Tuckerman, Mass.

that "if he took it, it was done with fraudulent intent." This is unsound, if it is meant absolutely to exclude the inference from System evidence under any conditions; for where the requirements of that principle (ante, § 304) are met, such evidence is admissible even to show the very act of taking if it is disputed. (b) Occasionally an intimation is seen [3] that the other acts, even when used merely to prove Intent, must be tested by the System rule (ante, § 304), i. e. must be so connected as to appear to be parts of a general system of embezzlement. This is also unsound; all that is required is that the other acts should have been done under sufficiently similar conditions to negative the reasonable chances of casual error. (c) In using the other acts to prove Intent, where the very act charged is also disputed, it is not necessary to apply the System test; the Intent evidence may be left to the jury with instructions not to use it unless they first believe from other evidence that the act charged was done.[4]

§ 330. Other Principles, discriminated. (1) To avoid the dangers of variance between indictment and proof, statutes have occasionally provided that upon an indictment charging a specific act of embezzlement a certain range of time in the proof is to be allowable. This provision deals with the time of the substantive offence charged, and will be strictly construed; [1] but it has no concern with the time of other acts used merely as evidential of the substantive offence. (2) Other questions of variance, or of the identity or the scope of the substantive offence are equally to be distinguished from the present question as to the evidential use of other acts.[2]

§ 331. State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The precedents in the various jurisdictions illustrate with more or less consistency the foregoing principles, and concern both civil and criminal cases.[1]

[3] Com. v. Tuckerman, Mass.

[4] R. v. Stephens, Eng.

[1] Mass. Pub. St. 1882, c. 203, § 44 (In prosecutions for embezzlement or fraudulent conversion, evidence is admissible of any such act within six months after the time alleged); 1882, People v. Donald, 48 Mich. 491, 12 N. W. 669 (prior embezzlements in June and September received at the trial; conviction held improper, apparently because they were offered as the very substance of the indictment, which charged embezzlement in November; a statute allowing a range of six months after the date charged excludes impliedly any prior offence); 1889, State v. Cornhauser, 74 Wis. 42, 41 N. W. 959 (same).

[2] 1871, R. v. Balls, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 328 (whether on an indictment for embezzling 1*l.* 1*s.* the embezzlement of sums separately within a short time might be shown in order to prove the total).

[1] Eng.: 1861, R. v. Richardson, 2 F. & F. 343, 8 Cox Cr. 448, Williams, J. (embezzlement by a clerk, by increasing the figures of cash-payments and keeping the difference of money; the fact of many other incorrect entries of the same sort was admitted to negative mistake); 1861, R. v. Proud, L. & C. 97, 102 (embezzlement by false entries; other incorrect entries admitted, semble, to show guilty intent); 1864, R. v. Reardon, 4 F. & F. 79, Willes, J. (other takings, admitted to negative mistake); 1888, R. v. Stephens, 16 Cox Cr. 387 (on a charge of embezzlement of three separate sums, from the same master in the course of the same work, the evidence for all the counts was held properly considered under each; Manisty, J., quoting with approval Roscoe on Evidence: "'This cannot be done merely with a view of inducing the jury to believe that, because the prisoner has committed a crime on one occasion, he is likely to have committed a similar offence on another; but only by way of anticipation of an obvious defence, — such as that the prisoner did the act of which he was accused, but innocently and without any guilty knowledge, or that he did not do it because no motive existed in him for the commission of such a crime, or that he did it by mistake.' . . . It is not with a view of proving guilt, but of proving the intention with which the act was done, that you anticipate it [by such evidence]"); Cal.: 1884, People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 274 (embezzlement by a clerk of the Harbor Commissioners; the fact was admitted of other acts of embezzlement

6. Fraudulent Transfers.

§ 333. Transfers in Fraud of Creditors. Here the question is whether the transfer was made with intent to defraud the transferor's creditors by deceiving, delaying, or hindering them. The act of transfer is conceded; no specific question as to Knowledge (except of insolvency) usually arises (ante, § 301); and the inquiry is simply as to the Intent accompanying the act. On the Intent theory (ante, § 302), other transfers of property may have some bearing on this question by tending to negative the probability of good faith. They will have such a probative value whenever they are made under such circumstances that they cannot be naturally accounted for by the ordinary course of business in which such transfers occur from time to time with good faith. The difficulty is to determine what circumstances are essential to produce this improbability that the transfer was in that ordinary course of business which involves good faith. (1) The quantity of property conveyed will have great weight — as where all the debtor's estate is conveyed; but this is not an essential. (2) The persons to whom the transfers are made will have weight; because ordinary transfers are naturally made to various persons, and a multiplicity of transfers to the same person is hardly to be accounted for by good faith. Moreover, the family or friendly relationship of the transferee may strengthen the improbability. But it is not essential that the transferee should be the same person in each case or should be intimately related.[1] (3) The time of the other transfers has much weight; for in the ordinary course of business a large proportion of the entire property may be while in that office, to negative ignorance or mistake); 1894, People v. Bidleman, 104 id. 609, 613, 38 Pac. 502 (embezzlement; the receipt, etc., of other sums than those charged, admissible as "tending to show a system" to conceal the takings and "the intent" of the taking); Fla.: 1896, Thalheim v. State, 38 Fla. 169, 20 So. 938 (a preceding embezzlement admitted); Ill.: 1876, Krilo v. People, 82 Ill. 425 (embezzlement; fraudulent collection "of money belonging to other parties," excluded); Ky.: 1897, Shipp v. Com., 101 Ky. 518, 41 S. W. 856, (falsifying account-books; other false entries admitted to show a common purpose to deceive the bank-officers); Mass.: 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 Gray 173, 179, 197 (embezzlement by taking and using his employer's money; the fact was admitted of other embezzlements from the same employer having as transactions "a peculiar and intimate, if not also an inseparable, connection with" the transaction charged; "not for the purpose of proving or as having a tendency to prove that the defendant took the money charged in the indictment, but for the purpose of showing that if he took it, it was done with the fraudulent intent to convert it"); 1861, Com. v. Shepard, 1 All. 575, 581 (embezzlement; the fact received of another act of embezzlement in the same week and out of the same books, to show intent); 1902, Perkins v. Spaulding, 182 Mass. 218, 65 N. E. 72 (embezzlement of "other articles at about the same time, from the same owner and under the same general circumstances," admissible to show intent); Mich.: 1895, People v. Hawkins, 106 Mich. 479, 64 N. W. 736 ("previous acts of embezzlement," admitted "to prove intent"); Minn.: 1896, State v. Holmes, 65 Minn. 230, 68 N. W. 11 (prior takings admitted); Or.: 1895, State v. Reinhart, 26 Or. 446, 38 Pac. 822 ("a series of connected transactions," covering "many acts done in a series of years," admitted); U. S.: 1890, American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 18 C. C. A. 644, 72 Fed. 470 (embezzlement by a bank cashier by falsification of the books; to negative "mere oversight or negligence," similar acts of fraud and dishonesty, prior to the date of his surety bond, were admitted); 1900, Dorsey v. U. S., 41 id. 652, 101 Fed. 746 (making false entries, etc., in national bank; other false dealings with same bank admitted, Sanborn, J., diss.); 1900, Wolfson v. U. S. 41 id. 442, 101 Fed. 430, 102 id. 131 (misapplication of national bank funds; instances of similar misapplication for three years previous, admitted to show intent; Boarman, J., diss., in an opinion full of misconceptions and singularly illiberal views); Wyo.: 1894, Edelhoff v. State, 5 Wyo. 19, 27, 36 Pac. 627 (embezzlement of rents; other similar takings, admitted to negative mistake). Compare the related precedents cited ante, § 321.

[1] Howe v. Reed, Me.

casually sold from time to time, but not repeatedly within a short time. But the time is chiefly important so far as the other transfers occur during the period when the transferor is insolvent; because the singularity of such transfers at that time is less accountable by the ordinary course of business than at any other time. It is usually said that the other transfers offered must have occurred about the same time or recently;[2] and perhaps they must have occurred during a time of insolvency, actual or impending, but this should hardly be required as a rule. Subsequent as well as prior transfers equally avail to negative good faith.[3] (4) The consideration is material; for a voluntary transfer at such a time is singularly inconsistent with the probability of good faith. On the whole, then, while several sorts of circumstances are significant, their weight may vary in each case, and no one of them is essential, except that of time, and here no fixed rule can be laid down.

But it is not necessary that the rigorous test of the System rule (ante, § 304) should be applied, i. e. that the other transfers should be so connected as to disclose a general scheme (though one or two Courts do go to this extent);[4] it is enough that the other transfers occurred under such circumstances as to tend to negative good faith in the transfer charged. Nor is it necessary to show the other transfers fraudulent; it is enough that they were made under some of the above circumstances; for it is the mere recurrence of the similar transactions which by the strange coincidence raises the improbability of good faith (ante, § 302); to require a showing of fraud in each of the evidential instances is both unnecessary in principle and impracticable in application.[5]

§ 334. State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The precedents in the various jurisdictions illustrate the development of the foregoing principles with more or less consistency.[1]

[2] Nelms v. Steiner, Ala.; Piedmont Bank v. Hatcher, Va.; for examples of exclusion, see Hardy v. Moore, Ia.; Flagg v. Willington, Me.

[3] Lynde v. McGregor, Mass. For a discrimination on this point, see § 335.

[4] E. g. Massachusetts.

[5] In some opinions the language intimates such a requirement, e. g. Whittier v. Varney, N. H.; but it is usually not called for; see, in particular, Bottomley v. U. S., U. S.; M'Elwee v. Sutton, S. C.

[1] Ala.: 1843, Cummings v. McCullough, 5 Ala. 321, 332 (another deed, two days before, while insolvent, to the same person, admitted to show a scheme to defraud); 1852, Dent v. Portwood, 21 id. 589 (a deed for land on the same day to the same person, admitted to show the intent of a deed of slaves); 1853, Benning v. Nelson, 23 id. 801, 804 (another deed on the same day, admitted); 1897, Nelms v. Steiner, 113 id. 562, 22 So. 435 (admitting "other transactions which are fraudulent and which are in point of time contemporaneous or nearly so"); 1898, Davidson v. Kahn, 119 id. 361, 24 So. 583 (other transfers about the same time to other persons, admitted); Ia.: 1883, Hardy v. Moore, 62 Ia. 65, 70, 17 N. W. 200 (conveyances to the same person and others, nearly two years before, excluded as evincing no common purpose); 1902, Kelliher v. Sutton, 115 id. 632, 89 N. W. 26 (fraudulent mortgage; "other acts of a similar character, about the same time," admitted to show a connected scheme; La.: 1851, Lockhart v. Harrell, 6 La. An. 530, 532 (other transactions between the same parties, admitted); Me.: 1830, Flagg v. Willington, 6 Greenl. 386 (similar sale to another person five years before, not admitted to show present dishonest motives); 1834, Blake v. Howard, 11 Fairf. 202 (similar sale to another person eight months before, excluded; semble not admissible at all, even though known to the present grantee; weak opinion); 1835, Howe v. Reed, 12 id. 515 (in effect overruling the preceding; admitting fraudulent conveyances to other persons about the same time, to show the grantor's intent; the present grantee's knowledge of that intent being a separate fact, to be proved by separate evidence); Mass.: 1831, Foster v. Hall, 12 Pick. 99 (conveyance alleged to be in fraud of creditors; other fraudulent conveyances to the demandant, at the same time and previously, admitted); 1852, Long v. Lamkin, 9 Cush. 361 (prior sales, excluded because no question of fraudulent transfer was involved); 1853, Cook v. Moore, 11 Cush. 213, 216 (similar facts to Foster v. Hall; prior fraudulent conveyance, admitted); 1860, Williams v. Robbins, 5 Gray 590 (bill to set aside a transfer in fraud of creditors; the fact of two other fraudulent transfers, excluded, because belonging to "a distinct, separate, and independent negotiation, and one had therefore no tendency to characterize or to evince the purpose or design of the parties in the other"; such transactions "must be shown to be so connected with it as to make it apparent that the parties had a common purpose in both"); 1861, Taylor v. Robinson, 2 All. 562 (other fraudulent conveyances to other persons, made on the same day, admitted to show fraudulent intent; subsequent ones semble excluded, on an erroneous application of the principle that admissions after title divested do not bind); 1866, Lynde v. McGregor, 13 id. 172, 174 (similar facts; subsequent fraudulent conveyances, admitted to show a fraudulent purpose); 1867 Winchester v. Charter, 97 Mass. 143 (similar to Taylor v. Robinson); 1872, Jordan v. Osgood, 109 id. 457 (adopts the rule of Williams v. Robbins as to showing System; quoted ante, § 321); 1899, Brownell v. Briggs, 173 id. 529, 54 N. E. 251 (deed alleged to be void against the grantor's wife, as made with intent to defraud her of rights at his decease; similar transfers of personalty to relatives and friends, admitted to show a general plan to defeat the wife's interest); Mich.: 1888, Ganong v. Green, 71 Mich. 1, 9, 38 N. W. 661 (fraudulent mortgage; other conduct, such as releases of other mortgages, admitted on cross-examination); Minn.: 1895, Nicolay v. Mallery, 62 Minn. 119, 64 N. W. 108 (that notes had been improperly turned over by an insolvent about the same time to other creditors, to show a fraudulent plan to evade creditors, admitted); Miss.: 1895, Uhler v. Adams, 73 Miss. 332, 18 So. 367, 654 (conveyances of lands between the same parties in other States, to show fraud against creditors in this conveyance; excluded on the facts); N. H.: 1820, Lovell v. Briggs, 2 N. H. 223 ("it is established practice to admit evidence concerning different sales of a debtor's estate, made at or about the same time, to show a fraudulent intent in the debtor to injure his creditors"); 1839, Whittier v. Varney, 10 id. 291, 294 (writ of entry by an attaching creditor to recover land transferred in alleged fraud of creditors; the fact admitted of other transfers of land by the debtor to the defendant about the same time and while insolvent; the other transfers must be shown fraudulent); 1852, Angier v. Ash, 26 id. 109 (affirming the doctrine); 1856, State v. Johnson, 33 id. 441, 456 (indictment for concealing the property of a debtor with intent to prevent its being taken by process; "evidence of other sales and dispositions of his property by the debtor to defraud his creditors, so connected in time and circumstances as to constitute parts of a general scheme of fraud," held admissible); N. Y.: 1833, Benham v. Cary, 11 Wend. 83 (like the next case); 1834, Jackson v. Timmerman, 12 id. 299 (transfer of land alleged to be in fraud of creditors; other contemporaneous transfers admitted to show intent); N. C.: 1855, Holmesly v. Hogue, 2 Jones L. 391 (fraudulent transfer of a slave; the fact of a sale by the debtor, six months before, of land which he did not own, rejected, as totally unconnected); 1895, State v. Jeffries, 117 N. C. 727, 23 S. E. 163 (transfer of a bicycle in fraud of creditors; pledge of a wagon, covered by the same mortgage, to another person five months later, held too remote in time); Pa.: 1851, Zerbe v. Miller, 16 Pa. 488, 495 (ejectment, the title depending on whether a conveyance by a father to his son was in fraud of creditors; other deeds and confessions of judgment by the father about the same time, admitted to show intent); 1869, Heath v. Page, 63 id. 108, 125 (another deed, made five days before, admitted); S. C.: 1831, M'Elwee v. Sutton, 2 Bail. 128, 130 (trover; gifts about the same time to each of his other children, six or seven in number, admitted); 1831, Lowry v. Pinson, ib. 321, 328 (trespass to try title; another voluntary bill of sale about the same time, admitted); U. S.: 1840 Story, J., in Bottomley v. U. S., 1 Story 145 (describes the question as "whether a particular voluntary conveyance was made in fraud of creditors," and would admit "like [i. e. voluntary] conveyances to other persons who are mere volunteers, made about the same time"); 1893, Kellogg v. Clyne, 4 C. C. A. 554, 54 Fed. 696, 12 U. S. App. 174, 183 (fraudulent mortgage; other transfers by debtor about the same time, admitted); Va.: 1897, Piedmont Bank v. Hatcher, 94 Va. 229, 26 S. E. 505 ("other frauds of like character at or near the same time," admissible); Wis.: 1894, Kanfer v. Walsh, 88 Wis. 63, 68, 59 N. W. 460 (purchase in fraud of creditors; other transactions of the sort by the buyer with other persons than this debtor, excluded).

§ 335. Same: Other Kinds of Evidence. The fraudulent intent of the transferor may be indicated by other circumstances not of the above sort, — such as the debtor's remaining in possession after the mortgage or sale,[1] the pendency of suits at the time of the sale,[2] and other circumstances[3] suggesting their own significance and not raising any difficulty of principle.

[1] 1846, Abney v. Kingsland, 10 Ala. 361 (with qualifications); 1831, Smith v. Henry, 2 Bail. 118, 123; 1833, s. c. 1 Hill S. C. 24; 1837, Reinhard v. Keenbartz, 6 Watts 94. This is the subject of a presumption (post, § 2515).

[2] 1831, Smith v. Henry, 2 Bail. 118, 123.

[3] 1864, Gray v. St. John, 35 Ill. 222 ("the manner in which he had recently obtained goods from his creditors," admitted)

§ 336. Same: Other Principles, discriminated. The doctrine about Admissions, when made by a predecessor in title, as to the nature of his ownership or possession, has the effect, in an action against a transferee claiming bona fide acquisition of property from a debtor, of excluding the admissions of the debtor made subsequent to the transfer. This rule was in some early cases thought to exclude evidence of subsequent transfers as bearing on the debtor's intent.[1] But it is clear that these are not used in any sense as admissions of his intent, either then or at the time charged; they are used simply as circumstances negativing his former innocent intent at the time charged, and are not justly obnoxious to the above doctrine.[2] The various uses of a debtor's declarations, both as verbal acts and as admissions, in connection with fraudulent transfers, are dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 1082–1086, 1727–1729, 1779–1780).

§ 337. Fraudulent Purchase with Intent not to Pay. The invalidity of a purchase made with intent not to pay rests on the falsity of the implied representation of an intent to pay; the transaction is so treated by the Courts, and the rulings are accordingly collected under that head (ante, § 321).

§ 338. Other Fraudulent Transfers. The principles of Knowledge and Intent (ante, §§ 301–304) may occasionally be applied to other kinds of transfers in which fraudulent intent is material.[1]

7. Sundry Frauds; and Fraud in General.

§ 340. False Claim of a Cause of Action; Fraudulent Insurance. The bearing of former false claims of a similar sort may often be weighty. The exact principle of evidence applicable is perhaps not beyond doubt. The case is not the same as that of Extortion (post, § 352), because there the intent to be proved is not merely the intent to make a false claim, but to obtain money by making a false claim. Here the evidence seems to be sometimes in the nature of conduct exhibiting Guilty Consciousness (ante, § 280), or of an Admission (post, § 1060) or of the Self Contradiction of a witness (post,

[1] In Foster v. Hall and Taylor v. Robinson, Mass., ante, § 334, believing the Admission doctrine, as laid down in Bridge v. Eggleston, 14 Mass. 249, to be applicable; traces of the same notion are also seen in the early Maine cases.

[2] As illustrated in Lynde v. McGregor, Mass., ante, § 334.

[1] 1820, Somes v. Skinner, 16 Mass. 348, 358 (conveyance alleged to have been obtained by undue influence; a series of former similar transactions between the same parties, rejected for showing a plan or bad character; but admitted for showing the grantor's susceptibility to the grantee's influence); 1882, Porter v. Throop, 47 Mich. 313, 320, 11 N. W. 174 (that G. P.'s will was made by undue influence of A. P., not admissible to show the same for the will of G. P.'s mother, to whom G. P. had bequeathed his property; on this and the preceding case, compare the citations under § 1738, post); 1818, Farrington v. Sinclair, 15 Johns. 428 (to show a prior levy of execution to be collusive and fraudulent, the officer having given the debtor permission to use the article, the fact was received that similar permission was given for other articles levied on at the same time); 1820, Lovell v. Briggs, 2 N. H. 218, 223 (fraudulent purchase by an administrator from the heirs; the facts about other purchases from the other heirs, admitted to show improper dealing, since "the whole intestate estate was probably managed with similar views"); 1859, Castle v. Bullard, 23 How. 172 (fraudulent sale by an agent to an insolvent; other fraudulent sales to him before and after time in question, admitted to show intent; also other false representations by the defendant to other persons, about the same time, as to the solvency of the buyer).

§ 1040); yet the former false claims are hardly admissions of the falsity of the present claim. The truth seems to be that the recurrence of false claims of a similar sort tends to negative good faith in the present claim, and thus to show an intent to make a false claim; and it is this intent which is itself an Admission of the party inconsistent with the claim on the pleadings; if the Intent were declared in express words, this would be clear. In short, the former acts are not in themselves admissions, but are evidence of a lack of good faith which is equivalent to an admission.

Of the two possible rules to be applied, that of Intent and that of System (ante, §§ 302, 304), it seems clear that the former suffices; the issue concerns the intent accompanying the claim, and the purpose is to negative good faith; the other incorrect claims must be so similar as not to be consistent with casual error; but they need not be so connected as to indicate a system.[1]

§ 341. Sundry Frauds (Taxes, Mails, Measures, etc.). The principles of Intent and of System (ante, §§ 302–304) are illustrated in many other situations in which a fraudulent intent is in issue, and other similar acts may be received to evidence it, — for example, in the importation of goods with intent to defraud the Government, by undervaluation or otherwise;[1] in the

[1] Besides the following cases, reference may be made to the cases under Extortion (post, § 352) and to some of those under False Pretences (ante, § 321), especially Rafferty v. State, Tenn.: 1895, Hood v. R. Co., 95 Ia. 331, 64 N. W. 261 (the plaintiff's claim for an injured eye was alleged to be fraudulent; fraud in making a claim upon an insurance company for other injuries was excluded); 1831, Bradford v. Ins. Co., 11 Pick. 161 (to prove that damaged blankets received were not damaged by sea-water in transit, but by wetting in the consignor's factory to increase the weight fraudulently, the fact was offered of the receipt of many similar goods, by other consignees in the same year from the same consignor but in different vessels, the damage being similar and of a kind indicating a wetting at the factory; admitted as indicating merely that the damage probably did not arise from sea-water, but not as showing a general plan of the consignor to export wetted blankets); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039 (charge of indecent assault; other instances, many years before, of the plaintiff making similar false charges against other men, held competent, if they showed "a purpose to obtain money" in that way; but here held not open to that construction); 1890, Smith v. Nat'l Ben. Soc'y, 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197 (applications to thirty-six different insurance companies, and other acts, admitted to show a general scheme to defraud by insuring and committing suicide); 1897, Young v. Doherty, 183 Pa. 142, 38 Atl. 587 (action on a note, said by defendant to be forged; evidence of the plaintiff's habit "of endeavoring to enforce unjust claims," excluded); 1902, Jack v. Mutual R. F. Life Ass'n, 51 C. C. A. 36, 113 Fed. 49 (fraudulent insurance; conduct showing a fraudulent scheme of insurance, admitted); 1883, Lewis v. Barker, 53 Vt. 23 (the plaintiff claimed that the defendant had caused his goods to be largely over-insured and then burned them; attempts to defraud the insurance companies by making claims for goods not destroyed were admitted, though made after the fire; "the attempt to defraud the company into paying him for the oil, and the owners of the oil into not collecting it of him, was so connected with the main transaction as to make any part of the attempt admissible whether made before or after the fire; it was evidence relative to the scheme, etc.").

Compare the citations post, §§ 956–964 (impeaching a witness by showing corruption).

[1] 1840, Bottomley v. U. S., 1 Story 135 (importation of goods under fraudulently false invoices; the goods in question were seized in May, 1838; and evidence was received of twenty-three false entries between Aug. 5, 1837, and March 15, 1838, the goods being "broadcloths of a similar character and description" to those seized, and shipped from the same port and persons, and that after the seizure, but before news could have reached England, four other importations of "broadcloths of the same character, cost, and value" as those seized, shipped from the same port and persons, and contained in cases marked like those seized and in numerical sequence, arrived and were stored, and were afterwards entered at a much higher valuation than those seized and under a consignor's oath taken not at the time of shipment, but long after the seizure in question; quoted ante, § 302); 1842, Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. 342, 346, 356, 360 (fraudulent undervaluation of imported goods; the defendant had entered twenty-nine importations, of which the four charged were a part, during the years 1839–40, of which fifteen were before and ten after the four charged; all of these invoices were over-falsification of documents or books, with intent to conceal or misuse;[2] in the substitution of false articles or measures, with the intent of cheating;[3] and in sundry modes of chicanery not coming under any general class.[4]

§ 342. Perjury. On the analogy of the principles for False Representations (ante, § 319), a prior misstatement in the nature of perjury may have value as negativing mistake or bona fides on the occasion charged.[1]

§ 343. Bribery. On a charge of bribery, any of the three general principles (ante, §§ 301–304) — Knowledge, Intent, and Design — may come into play. To show Knowledge of the nature of the transaction, a former transaction of the sort may serve, as indicating an understanding of the particular transaction.[1] To show Intent, another transaction of the sort may serve to valued, and all asserted an exporter's disconnt which was not given; these were admitted on the same principle as in Bottomley v. U. S., Story, J., delivering the opinion, and admitting "other acts and doings of the party of a kindred character, in order to illustrate or establish his intent or motive in the particular act").

[2] 1833, Thompson v. Mosely, 5 C. & P. 501, Lyndhurst, L. C. B. (alteration of a bill; the fact excluded of alterations in ten other unspecified bills; "it is trying other issues, which the opposite party are not prepared to meet"; here the System rule was applicable); 1857, Gardner v. Way, 8 Gray 189 (party's book of accounts offered to show a debt; to impeach its correctness, the fact that some years before this the plaintiff had kept two books of original entries so as to falsify his accounts, was excluded, because the former transactions were "remote and different").

Compare the precedents under Embezzlement (ante, § 331) and Forgery (ante, § 318), crimes often committed by alteration of books or documents.

[3] 1900, State v. Jamison, 110 Ia. 337, 81 N. W. 594 (using false weights; falsity of weights "at other times," admitted to show knowledge); 1882, Dibble v. Nash, 47 Mich. 589, 11 N. W. 399 (fraudulent substitution of other land; the defendant's offer to sell the original land to a third person, admitted to negative mistake); 1887, Reid v. Ladne, 66 Mich. 22, 25, 32 N. W. 916 (two or three false weighings in 1885, in a general course of dealing, held not sufficient to establish fraudulent weighing in 1877); 1876, Bainbridge v. State, 30 Oh. St. 264, 274 (knowingly delivering skimmed milk to a factory for cheese, with intent to defraud; repeated deliveries to the same factory about the same time, admitted); 1832, Townsend v. Graves, 3 Paige Ch. 453 (fraudulent drawing of a lottery; the defendant's fraudulent alteration of his account-book in a lodge a year before, excluded).

Compare the precedents under False Pretences (ante, § 321).

[4] Can. Crim. Code 1892, § 693 (advertising counterfeit money; any letter etc. concerning "any similar scheme or device to defraud the public" is prima facie evidence of the "fraudulent character of such scheme or device"); 1892, Continental Ins. Co. v. Ins. Co., 2 C. C. A. 535, 51 Fed. 884 (action to recover reinsurance-moneys paid out by the plaintiff to third persons, a common agent of plaintiff and defendant having apportioned the reinsurance not according to good judgment or chance, as authorized, but through a fraudulent scheme in general to relieve the defendant from loss and throw it upon others; evidence of similar shiftings of loss by the agent upon other companies, admitted to show this scheme); 1901, Packer v. U. S., 46 C. C. A. 85, 106 Fed. 906 (using the mails to defraud by investment-circulars; other solicitations of a similar sort, admitted).

[1] 1903, Stone v. State, — Ga. —, 45 S. E. 630 (subornation of perjury; other preparatory efforts to coach the false witnesses, admitted); 1866, State v. Raymond, 20 Ia. 582, 588 (another perjury "relating to the same oath and subject-matter," allowed to evidence intent); 1898, People v. Van Tassel, 156 N. Y. 561, 51 N. E. 274 (subornation of perjury; attempts to suborn for the same trial other persons not called as witnesses, admitted); 1902, People v. Doody, 172 id. 165, 64 N. E. 807 (perjury in falsely testifying that he did not remember certain criminal acts; his prior testimony asserting and admitting those acts, here received to show that he did know and remember them); 1840, U. S. v. Wood, 14 Pet. 430, 432, 437, 443 (perjury by falsely valuing imported goods; thirty-five letters indicating a general design of the sort, covering more than three years, admitted as showing a false swearing with intent to defraud). Compare the cases cited post, § 963 (impeachment of a witness by other perjuries or admissions of perjury).

[1] 1838, Webb v. Smith, 4 Bing. N. C. 373, 379 (bribery; the defendant stood in the front room of the house receiving voters, and gave a card to many; those receiving cards went to an adjoining room and received from another person £10 for each card; to show the defendant's knowledge of this handling of the money, the fact was received of his giving cards to other voters than the three charged, and of their receiving the money; Bosanquet, J.: "To show that he knew such cards would produce money, it was very important to prove that on the same day and in the same place he was cognizant of what passed in the inner room").

negative good faith.[2] To show a general Design, a former attempt towards the same general end may be significant.[3]

§ 344. Fraud in General; Latitude of Investigation. It is often said that, in evidencing fraud, a broad scope of investigation must be allowed,[1] and, in particular, that the range of cross-examination of the party charged must be liberal.[2] It is not easy to understand the exact significance of such statements. Apart from a ruling upon a concrete piece of evidence, they cannot mean much. If they mean that the principles of evidence are to be relaxed or abandoned, they are unsound. If they mean that evidence of System or of Intent is to take a wide range, they are useless except so far as they are reducible to some definite principle, such as are here involved (§§ 301–304, ante). Perhaps they are usually intended to suggest that many apparently innocent parts of a fraudulent scheme must be evidenced before the fraudulent significance of the whole can appear.[3] As to any particular liberty on cross-examination, nothing can be claimed for that situation beyond the general principle applicable to all witnesses (post, § 946).

8. Larceny and Kidnapping.

§ 346. Larceny; General Principle. (1) The Knowledge principle (ante, § 301) may occasionally come into application, where the purpose is to show specifically that the defendant was aware that the property was not his

[2] 1899, People v. Hurley, 126 Cal. 351, 58 Pac. 814 (offering to accept a bribe, the defendant being a delegate to a nominating convention; similar solicitations to another candidate for the same office about the same time, excluded; a ruling that wrongs the law and protects a rank crime); 1901, Higgins v. State, 157 Ind. 57, 60 N. E. 685 (common councilman soliciting a bribe for the passing of an ordinance; solicitation about the same time of a bribe for another pending ordinance, admitted); 1898, State v. Durnam, 73 Minn. 150, 75 N. W. 1127 (demanding a bribe by a city councillor; similar demand of another member of the same firm about the same subject, admissible); 1903, State v. Fitchette, — id. —, 92 N. W. 527 (taking money for appointment to office; similar transaction six months before, excluded; the opinion is over-scrupulous, and is of the sort that helps to create immunity for rascals); 1903, State v. Ames, — id. —, 96 N. W. 330 (bribery; payment to defendant's agent by other persons, admitted on the facts; State v. Fitchette distinguished).

[3] 1896, State v. Williams, 136 Mo. 293, 38 S. W. 75 (embracery; attempts to corrupt other jurors on the same panel about the same case, admitted to show intent); 1887, People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 456, 470, 14 N. E. 319 (indictment for offering a bribe in 1886 to a member of the Common Council of the City of New York, to influence his consent to a franchise for a surface-railway on Broadway; the fact of the offer of a bribe in 1883 to the engrossing-clerk of the State Assembly to alter a bill so as to allow the construction of the same railway was rejected; the present principle and precedents were not considered, except by Peckham, J.,; there is nothing to be said in support of this ruling; it is of the kind that breeds defiance of the law and encourages criminals in gambling on the result of judicial quibbles). Compare the cases post, §§ 956–964 (impeaching a witness by showing bribery).

[1] 1897, Nelms v. Steiner, 113 Ala. 562, 22 So. 435; 1870, Comstock v. Smith, 20 Mich. 345; 1860, Filley v. Register, 4 Minn. 391, 405 (grant in fraud of creditors); 1865, Smalley v. Hale, 37 Mo. 103 ("to disclose its [the transaction's] true character, explain the acts of the parties, and throw light on their objects and intentions"); 1880, Massey v. Young, 73 id. 260, 273; 1898, Armagost v. Rising, 54 Nebr. 763, 75 N. W. 534; 1847, Kauffman v. Swars, 5 Pa. St. 31 ("No case of this sort could be made out if it were necessary to dissect the evidence, and show that every part of it was immediately connected with the party to be affected by it"); 1895, Leedom v. E. F. & C. Co., 12 Utah 172, 42 Pac. 208.

[2] 1876, Jacobsen v. Metzger, 35 Mich. 103; 1896, Cohen v. Goldberg, 65 Minn. 473, 67 N. W. 1149; 1897, Pincus v. Reynolds, 19 Mont. 564, 49 Pac. 145; 1897, Bennett v. McDonald, 52 Nebr. 278, 72 N. W. 268.

[3] 1861, Woodward, J., in Stauffer v. Young, 39 Pa. 455, 460, suggests that the ordinary doctrines of relevancy are not intended to be varied by such statements.

own, by showing former acts which must naturally have led to a warning.[1] (2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) is the one of most frequent application; for the recurrence of similar takings may serve to negative mistake, inadvertence, or good faith at the time charged, because this recurrence cannot be accounted for by the ordinary chances of innocent taking.[2] In this view the other instances offered may be subsequent as well as prior to the time charged.[3] They must occur under circumstances more or less similar, that is, so similar that the chance of innocent recurrence in the same way is lessened.[4] It is in such a case assumed that the act of taking is otherwise proved, and that the Intent is alone aimed at by such evidence. The theory of Anonymous Intent (ante, § 303) is also occasionally applicable; for mistake may be negatived by other instances of the same sort, even though the other instances cannot be connected with the defendant.[5] (3) The System principle (ante, § 304) is applicable where the act of taking is to be proved, and a general system leading up to the act is offered as the basis of inference; [illegible] the other acts should be so connected by common features as to indicate a general plan. Such requisites are seldom fulfilled; and in most of the rulings the prior similar acts are excluded because their sole purpose is to show the doing of the act, and yet they do not fulfil the requirements of the System principle.[6] So far, however, as the object is merely to negative the innocent intent accompanying a proved act, the question should be governed by the Intent principle.

§ 347. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The precedents in the various jurisdictions illustrate the development of the foregoing principles with more or less consistency.[1]

[1] R. v. Bleasdale, Eng.

[2] Compare the quotations ante, § 302.

[3] R. v. May, Eng.

[4] R. v. Ellis, Eng., Dove v. State, Ark., People v. Cunningham, People v. Robles, People v. Lopez, Cal., Williams v. People, Ill., Barton v. People, Oh.

[5] State v. Van Winkle, Ia.

[6] Lewis v. State, Kan., Shears v. State, Ind., Peopla v. Schweitzer, Mich., Stata v. Goetz, Stata v. Reavis, Mo., Cheny v. Stata, Oh., Walker's Case, Va., Schaser v. State, Wis.

[1] Eng.: 1826, R. v. Ellis, 6 B. & C. 145 (larceny by a clerk; marked shillings were put into the till; the fact of several successive takings from the till on the sama day was admitted "to show the character" of the act); 1845, R. v. May, 1 Cox Cr. 236 (larceny of money on the 9th by a servant in a shop; a larceny from tha sama till on tha 13th was admitted, apparently to negative the idea of the money being placed on tha defendant's person by others); 1848, R. v. Bleasdale, 2 C. & K. 765 (larceny of coal by cutting beyond the boundary-line beneath the surface; to show that tha trespass was knowing, the fact was received of similar cuttings into tha land of 30 other proprietors); 1858, R. v. Southwood, 1 F. & F. 356 (to show the stealing of three books of account, the fact of the destruction of another was held not "material", "It would be merely bad conduct in one instance inducing a probability of bad conduct in another"); 1864, R. v. Reardon, 4 F. & F. 79 (other larcenies, admitted to negative mistake); Can.: 1897, R. v. McBerny, 29 N. Sc. 327, 328 (larceny by trick; other simllar acts, admitted); Ala.: 1839, State v. Wisdom, 8 Port. 511, 516 (negro-stealing; that the defendant was seen talking with other slaves shortly before, excluded); Ark.: 1881, Dove v. State, 37 Ark. 261, 263 (larceny of a horse by a boy, who claimed that he had merely jumped on tha horsa and run away to escape a whipping from his father; evidenca that the defeudant had taken a bridla from another person, at an unspecified time and place, excluded); 1881, Endaily v. State, 39 id. 278, 280 (larceny of horses; larcany at the same tima of a saddla and a bridle, taken from other persons and put on the horses, not admitted to show intent); Cal.: 1868, People v. Robles, 34 Cal. 591, 593 (larceny of sheep of R.; the fact of tha theft of W.'s sheep, which were herded with R.'s, driven off and sold by the same persons, admitted as indicating intent); 1881, People v. Lopez, 59 id. 362 (finding of other horses, disappearing at the same time, in the defandant's possessiou, admitted); 1885, People v. Cunningham, 66 id. 668, 4 Pac. 1144, 6 Pac. 700, 846

§ 348. Same: Sundry Limitations. (1) Throughout the preceding topics it has been seen that under the Intent theory the purpose was to negative (larceny of cattle; the defence being innocent purchase from a third person, the fact was admitted in rebuttal that cattle of another person were stolen from the same premises at the same time and found in the defendant's possession; Thornton, J., diss.); 1894, People v. Fehrenbach, 102 id. 394, 36 Pac. 678 (taking money deposited with a confederate; defendant's attempts to induce another to deposit in the same way, admitted); Colo.: 1897, Housh v. People, 24 Colo. 262, 50 Pac. 1036 (larceny of sheep by fraud; similar transaction with another person at the same time, admitted to show intent); Fla.: 1903, Baldwin v. State, — Fla. —, 35 So. 220 (larceny of grain; other acts forming part of a plan, admitted); Ill.: 1897, Williams v. People, 166 Ill. 132, 46 N. E. 749 (assault with intent to steal; previous larcenies about the same place and time, admitted to show a general plan of picking pockets during the presence of a circus); 1902, Bishop v. People, 194 id. 365, 62 N. E. 785 (larceny of wire; defendant's stealing of another lot of wire, shortly before, excluded); Ind.: 1871, Bonsall v. State, 35 Ind. 461 (larceny; robbery of the same person on the next day, excluded); 1897, Shears v. State, 147 id. 51, 46 N. E. 331 (other larcenies, not admissible to show the fact of commission of the larceny charged; nor even to show intent where as here "proof of the commission as charged carries with it the evident implication of a criminal intent"; wrong on both points, and of no value); Ia.: 1890, State v. Van Winkle, 80 Ia. 15, 18, 45 N. W. 388 (larceny of cattle; the stealing of other cattle from the owner in question at the same time, admitted as indicating that the cattle charged to have been stolen had not strayed but had been stolen); 1902, State v. Wackernagel, — Ia. —, 91 N. W. 761 (larceny of hogs; larceny of harness, excluded on the facts); Kan.: 1868, Lewis v. State, 4 Kan. 306 (larceny; the fact admitted of the careful arrangement of the premises for concealing goods, the finding of many stolen articles secreted, etc., as showing "a combination between the appellent and the others to carry on a general stealing business"); 1883, State v. Thurtell, 29 id. 148 (larceny; the defendant's belonging to a gang of horse-thieves, excluded, because shown by reputation only, but also — this seems incorrect — irrespective of the mode of proof); La.: 1894, State v. Bates, 46 La. An. 849, 15 So. 204 (another larceny at a different time and place, excluded); 1898, State v. Marceaux, 50 id. 1137, 24 So. 611 (defendant's admissions of former similar larcenies and of a plan to continue them, admitted); Me.: 1855, Pike v. Crehore, 40 Me. 503, 511 (to disprove the receipt of money sent by mail in September, 1834, the fact was offered of the finding in 1836, in the house inhabited in September, 1834, by the letter-carrier delivering letters at the alleged payee's town, of secreted letters, dated 1834, directed to persons in that town, and opened; excluded); Mich.: 1871, People v. Schweitzer, 23 Mich. 301 (prior larceny of other articles from the same person, excluded); 1894, People v. Machen, 101 id. 401, 404, 59 N. W. 664 (pocket-larceny; that the defendant shortly before was seen feeling in other persons' pockets, admitted to show intent); Mo.: 1863, State v. Goetz, 34 Mo. 85, 90 (larceny; other larcenies on the same day, about the same hour, and in stores near by, excluded, no connection being shown between the different felonies); 1880, State v. Reavis, 71 id. 421 (larceny of cattle; other larcenies of cattle excluded); Nebr.: 1898, Davis v. State, 54 Nebr. 177, 74 N. W. 599 (larceny by bailee; fraudulent borrowing from a third person while using the horse taken, not received to show intent); Oh.: 1833, Cheny v. State, 7 Oh., Pt. 1, 222 (larceny of a horse; subsequent engagement of the defendant with others "in one line as horse-thieves," excluded); 1849, Barton v. State, 18 id. 221 (a larceny of money from E., on the night before the alleged stealing of a horse from T., not admitted to show intent); Okl.: 1899, Beberstein v. Terr., 8 Okl. 467, 58 Pac. 641 (larceny; other larcenies forming part of a general plan, admitted); Or.: 1888, State v. Harding, 16 Or. 493 (larceny; that the defendant, while going to the place, assaulted a co-conspirator, admitted); 1900, State v. Savage, 36 id. 191, 60 Pac. 610 (larceny from an express company; instances of a former plan to rob an express car of the same company, admitted); Tenn.: 1884, Links v. State, 9 Lea 701, 712 (larceny by substituting a cheap ring for a valuable one in a jeweller's tray, while the jeweller was attending to another matter, the defendant having at the time purchased another cheap ring and left it for engraving; the fact of two similar acts in other stores, one in another State, admitted to negative mistake; compare State v. Defreese, ante, § 321); Tex.: 1874, Gilbraith v. State, 41 Tex. 567 (larceny of a bull; larceny of a steer belonging to another person, excluded, chiefly because the record showed the conditions and purpose of its use too imperfectly); 1892, Nixon v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 205, 208, 20 S. W. 364 (larceny of a horse; prior possession and sale of other horses stolen from another place, excluded); 1898, Unsell v. State, 39 id. 330, 45 S. W. 1022 (theft of cattle; prior thefts of cattle, excluded on the facts); 1898, Holt v. State, ib. 282, 46 S. W. 829 (larceny; another larceny admitted on the facts); Vt.: 1892, State v. Kelley, 65 Vt. 531, 27 Atl. 203 (larceny; other stealings on the same trip of a wagon, admitted); Va.: 1829, Walker's Case, 1 Leigh 574 (larceny of a watch, chain, and key from T.'s house; the fact of the defendant's stealing on the same day a cloak from T.'s house, rejected); Wash.: 1901, State v. Gottfreedson, 24 Wash. 398, 64 Pac. 523 (larceny of a horse; defendant's larceny of another horse turned on the range with the former, excluded; unsound); Wis.: 1874, Schaser v. State, 36 Wis. 429 (a former larceny from another person, excluded).

For other instances, compare the citations of innocent intent; if the jury find the act proved, they are to use the evidence in question to determine the Intent. It is immaterial that mistake or inadvertence has not been expressly set up by the defendant; for the prosecution is bound as a part of its case to prove the criminal intent and therefore to negative innocent intent; for example, if the jury on retiring agreed that the taking had been proved, and then proceeded to determine the intent, they might find themselves without sufficient evidence, if these former acts were not before them as a part of the evidence. It is therefore a radical error to suppose that the evidence under the Intent principle is only available after the defendant has expressly suggested mistake or inadvertence as his exoneration.[1]

(2) The defendant may equally resort to former acts as indicating a general honest purpose, provided there is similarity enough in the occasions to make the former acts relevant by the general principle.[2]

§ 349. Kidnapping and Enticement. On a charge of kidnapping, enticement to escape, or the like, the analogies of proof of larceny are often applicable.[1]

9. Robbery, Burglary, and Extortion.

§ 351. Robbery and Burglary; General Principle. (1) No opportunity seems here to arise for the application of the Knowledge principle (ante, § 301). (2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) allows the use of another similar act wherever, assuming the act to be otherwise proved and the intent to be in issue, the recurrence of the act negatives the possibility of mistake or good faith.[1] (3) The System principle (ante, § 304) assumes that the act itself is to be proved and proposes to infer its probability from the existence of a general design or system; the other acts offered to show this should be so connected as to indicate a common design; but this requirement is often not met.[2] larceny by trick, under false pretences (ante, § 321), of larcenies forming inseparable parts of an act (ante, § 218), and of larcenies identifying the goods taken (post, § 415).

[1] 1894, People v. Tucker, 104 Cal. 440, 38 Pac. 195 (larceny of money from L. on Jan. 18; another larceny of money from L. on Jan. 17, offered to negative a defence that the taking on Jan. 18 was done to preserve L.'s money as a friend; excluded because no such defence was made).

[2] 1897, Hendry v. State, 39 Fla. 235, 22 So. 647 (larceny of cattle; a custom of cattle-owners to drive off and sell friends' cattle with their own, not admitted, where the defendant was not a friend of the owner of the cattle taken); 1869, Foster v. People, 18 Mich. 266, 271 (larceny of a horse; an attempt by the defendant, within six months before, to purchase a horse, not admitted to show honest intent, the defence being that the horse was purchased, not stolen).

[1] 1849, Taylor v. Horsey, 5 Harringt. 131 (business as a negro trader, admitted to show the intent of purchase, under a statute forbidding purchase with intent to export); 1841, Com. v. Turner, 3 Metc. 19 (kidnapping with intent to transport, the taking of the child not being disputed; the fact of the defendant's attempt on the previous day to get possession of another child, admitted to show his intent); 1839, State v. Ford, 3 Strobh. 517 (indictment for stealing slaves; the fact received of an unsuccessful solicitation by the defendant to the witness, two years before, to undertake such work; O'Neall, J.: "Remoteness of time, where the party made declarations pointing to this corrupt intention, cannot render the evidence incompetent. . . . If it could be shown that he had thrown out dark hints to others who had declined, might it not be considered as the natural consequence that his solicitations would be followed up until he found his man?"); 1848, Cole v. Com., 5 Gratt. 696 (advising slaves belonging to E. L. to escape; evidence of a similar advising of slaves belonging to other persons, excluded).

For enticement to prostitution, see post, §§ 357, 401.

[1] Kidd's Trial. R. v. Briggs, Eng., People v. McGilver, Cal., State v. Cowell, Nev., State v. Desroches, La.

[2] Mason v. State, Ala., Ford v. State, Ark., Com. v. Scott, Mass., Lightfoot v. People, Mich., State v. Greenwade, Mo., Swan v. Com., Pa.

(4) The principle of Inseparableness (ante, § 218) will sometimes admit evidence of other offences inseparable from the narrative of the substantive act charged.[3] In general the considerations applicable to the preceding topic (Larceny) are also here applicable.[4]

[3] 1849, Com. v. Williams, 2 Cush. 584 (burglary; the possession of a large number of burglar's tools was shown, but some of them were not fitted to the commission of the particular offence; admitted, because they were part of the mass or parcel, "without sanctioning the admission of evidence merely tending to show that the defendant had in his possession instruments adapted to the commission of other crimes").

[4] Eng.: 1696, Captain Vaughan's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 499 (treason by cruising under the French flag in the "Loyal Clencarty," with intent to capture English subjects and vessels; after proving the cruising in that vessel, the prosecution offered to show "that during this war, before and after the treason laid in the indictment, he was a cruiser upon and taker of the king's ships, and this fortifies the direct proof given of the intention; . . . we would produce collateral evidence, to induce a firmer belief of that special overt act, by showing you that he hath made it his practice during the war to aid and assist the king's enemies"; L. C. J. Holt: "I cannot agree to that . . . ; because a man has a design to commit depredation on the king's subjects in one ship, does that prove that he had an intention to do it in another?"; this ruling is clearly wrong, and is entirely inconsistent with the next one); 1701, Captain Kidd's Trial, 14 id. 154, 182 (piracy; the defendant was commissioned by the king in 1696 to destroy the pirates in the Indian seas, but was now charged with piracy in those regions; he admitted the capture of the ship as charged, but pleaded that it was done under his commission; to disprove this lawful intent, evidence was given of a series of previous and subsequent marauding on the same voyage; L. C. B. Ward: "The seeming justification he depends on is his commissions. Now it must be observed how he acted with relation to them, and what irregularities he went by; . . . what he did before shows his mind and intention not to act by his commissions, which warrant no such things. . . . Now no man knows the mind and intention of another but as it may be discovered by his actions"); 1796, R. v. Vandercomb, 2 Leach 4th ed. 708 (burglary; a previous larceny from the same house, rejected); 1839, R. v. Briggs, 2 Moo. & Rob. 199, Alderson, B. (robbery; the fact received of the robbery by the defendant of another person at the same place a short time in hours before); Ala.: 1868, Mason v. State, 42 Ala. 532 (the fact admitted of a series of other burglaries by the defendant and others under similar conditions, during the same week, and in the same region); Ark.: 1879, Ford v. State, 34 Ark. 649 (murder committed during a robbery of B.; the fact received of a general plan to rob the stores of B., C., and J.); Cal.: 1874, People v. Dubois, 48 Cal. 551 (burglary; another burglary of the same room on the night before, excluded); 1885, People v. McGilver, 67 id. 55, 56, 7 Pac. 49 (burglary; that the defendant was arrested while breaking into another store and that burglar's tools were found upon him, admitted); Ind.: 1893, Frazier v. State, 135 Ind. 38, 41, 34 N. E. 817 (other burglaries by the defendant on the same night, admitted to show that he "was out on a mission of burglary"); Ia.: 1903, State v. Berger, — Ia. —, 96 N. W. 1094 (burglary of a railroad car; sundry prior misdoings, excluded); La.: 1896, State v. Desroches, 48 La. An. 428, 19 So. 250 (breaking and entering with intent to rob; a shooting at the same time, admitted to show intent); Mass.: 1877, Com. v. Scott, 123 Mass. 225, 234 (robbery of the Northampton Bank; the fact received of various criminal doings showing a general plan to rob banks, and in particular the one in question); Mich.: 1868, Lightfoot v. People, 16 Mich. 507, 510 (burglary; a former burglary of the same house within a year, excluded); 1901, People v. Henry, 129 id. 100, 88 N. W. 77 (breaking and entering; convictions of larceny on two former unconnected occasions, excluded); Miss.: 1898, McGee v. State, — Miss. —, 22 So. 890 (robbery; independent assault committed at the same time and place by the defendant's employer upon another person, excluded); Mo.: 1880, State v. Greenwade, 72 Mo. 300 (the robbery of H. was planned, and L. being mistaken for H. was first robbed; the fact of the plan and the robbery of H., admitted on the charge of robbing L.); 1903, State v. Spray, — id. —, 74 S. W. 846 (robbery; another robbery nearby and about the same time of night, excluded); Nev.: 1877, State v. Cowell, 12 Nev. 337 (burglary of A.'s house; the fact admitted, to show intent, that a few days beforehand the defendant had planned with others to rob A. on the street and desisted only because they learned that he had no money about him); N. J.: 1898, Leonard v. State, 60 N. J. L. 8, 41 Atl. 561 (possession of burglar's tools; conviction of larceny, and suspicious conduct near a dwelling, excluded); N. Y.: 1880, Hope v. People, 83 N. Y. 419, 423, 428 (robbery of the key of a bank; evidence admitted of two prior unsuccessful attempts by the defendant to rob the same bank, as indicating with other facts a general plan with other persons to rob the bank, the latter robbery being shown to have been committed by the key-robbers); Oh.: 1876, Coble v. State, 31 Oh. St. 100 (assault with intent to rob; an assault upon another person in the same vicinity about five minutes later, not admitted to show intent); Pa.: 1883, Swan v. Com., 104 Pa. 218 (robbery of a store of B. on the night of September 13; the fact of the defendant's complicity in a robbery of the house of R., "about the same time," in the same township, rejected, because there was no "system established between the offence on trial and that

§ 352. Extortion and Blackmail (Robbery by Threatening Demands). The principles that here apply are those of Knowledge and of Intent. (1) It may be argued that the successful obtaining of money on a former occasion by similar means tends to show the acquisition of knowledge that money can be obtained in this way (ante, § 301). This argument, however, as here applied,[1] seems somewhat forced; such knowledge being a matter of common understanding and not needing to be proved. (2) It is clear, however, that the Intent argument is entirely applicable, i. e. the doing of similar acts at other times tends to negative the supposition that the demand on the occasion charged was made in good faith (for example, with a genuine desire to obtain compensation for supposed injuries). This use of such evidence is generally sanctioned.[2]

10. Arson.

§ 354. General Principle; State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. (1) The Knowledge principle (ante, § 301) has here usually no scope for introduced, to connect it with the defendant"); Tex.: 1894, Dawson v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 535, 552, 25 S. W. 21 (prior and subsequent burglaries, admitted on the facts); 1898, Long v. State, — id. —, 47 S. W. 363 (other burglaries in the neighborhood about the same time, excluded); 1903, Glenn v. State, — id. —, 76 S. W. 757 (burglary; other anonymous burglaries of the same house, excluded); Wash.: 1902, State v. Norris, 27 Wash. 453, 67 Par. 983 (burglary of an adjacent house on the same night, admitted); Wis.: 1881, Neubrandt v. State, 53 Wis. 89, 91, 9 N. W. 824 (breaking with intent to steal B.'s goods; the taking of goods of other persons from the same house at the same time, admitted to show the intent).

[1] In R. v. Cooper, Eng., infra; quoted ante, § 301.

[2] 1758, Barnard's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 825 (charge of sending threatening letters; a series of them offered; objection, not passed on, that "one felony, whoever it may affect, cannot be evidence of another felony"); 1830, R. v. Winkworth, 4 C. & P. 444, Parke, J. (robbery by demanding money under threats of violence; the accused, one of a mob in front of the prosecutor's house, came up and civilly advised him to give them money to get rid of them; to show that this was not bona fide advice, the fact was received of similar demands made at other houses on the same day by the same mob when the defendant was with it); 1819, R. v. Egerton, R. & R. 375, by all the Judges (robbery by threats of charging the prosecutor with sodomy; the fact of another attempt by the same threats on the next evening to rob the prosecutor was admitted "as confirmatory of the truth of the prosecutor's evidence, as to the transaction of the former day and as to the nature of those transactions"); 1849, R. v. Cooper, 3 Cox Cr. 547, Cresswell, J. (charge of feloniously accusing a person of an unnatural crime with intent to extort money; the fact offered of former obtaining of money by similar methods, as told by the accused to a comrade; admitted, to show knowledge of the likelihood of money being offered); 1850, R. v. McDonnell, 5 Id. 153, Erle, J. (excluding a former instance of a similar charge because the intent was clear here, if the prosecutor was to be believed at all); 1898, People v. Lambert, 120 Cal. 170, 52 Pac. 307 (prosecutrix for rape by her father, allowed to be asked whether she had not planned to "put up jobs" on him to get him into prison and thus be free from control); 1899, Wallace v. State, 41 Fla. 547, 26 So. 713 (blackmail by threatening to accuse A. of keeping a bawdy-house; similar threats to other similar women, admitted to show intent); 1903, Glover v. People, — Ill. —, 68 N. E. 464 (maliciously threatening to kill, with intent to extort money; defendant's prior arrest etc. of the person threatened, and his demand for money, admitted, as showing the parties' "previous relations"); 1895, State v. Lewis, 96 Ia. 286, 65 N. W. 295 (extortion of money by a newspaper publisher; previous instances of extortion from other persons, admitted merely to show guilty intent); 1893, Com. v. Saulsbury, 152 Pa. 554, 558, 25 Atl. 610 (extortion by a constable; similar obtaining of money from another person, excluded; clearly erroneous); 1848, Britt v. State, 9 Humph. 31 (the prosecutor was a stranger and the defendant was charged with obtaining money from him by false pretences that the prosecutor had passed counterfeit money and false pretences of having a warrant against him; to negative good faith, the fact was received of the defendant's having followed the prosecutor the next day into the adjoining county and extorted other money, etc., by falsely claiming that the latter had stolen his overcoat; citing R. v. Winkworth and R. v. Egerton).

For some analogous cases, see the citations under False Claims, ante, § 340, and Impeachment of Witnesses, post, § 963.

application.[1] (2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) is constantly applied. Where the act itself is conceded or otherwise proved, and the object is to negative inadvertence or accident, the recurrence of similar acts of firing by the defendant tends to diminish the possibility of an innocent explanation.[2] Moreover, the principle of Anonymous Intent (ante, § 303) is recognized as being here occasionally of peculiar utility; i. e. the recurrence of a similar fire may tend decidedly to negative innocent intent, even though the author of the other fires is not shown; thus, the prosecution having negatived innocent intent in the present fire by whomsoever set, the defendant may be shown to have kindled it.[3] (3) The System principle (ante, § 304) supposes the act itself of setting the fire to be desired to be proved, and accepts former acts of the kind as admissible to show a design or system from which the setting of the fire charged may be inferred, provided the other acts have common features indicating a common plan.[4] For this purpose, however (ante, § 304), the defendant's connection with the previous fires must be shown.[5] The disinclination of the Courts to resort to this System principle, and their aptness, when using its rigorous test, to misapply it to evidence of mere Intent, have been already spoken of (ante, § 304), and are to be disapproved.[6]

[1] It may have, where knowledge of the nature of combustible materials is to be shown.

[2] R. v. Dosset, Eng., Com. v. McCarthy, Com. v. Bradford, Mass.

[3] R. v. Bailey, R. v. Gray, R. v. Nattrass, Eng., Fancett v. Nicholls, People v. Murphy, N. Y., State v. Thompson, N. C.

[4] R. v. Taylor, Eng., Martin v. State, Ala., State v. Raymond, N. J., Kramer v. Com., Pa., State v. Ward, Vt., State v. Miller, Wis.

[5] R. v. Reagan, Eng., People v. Kennedy, N. Y., State v. Freeman, N. C.

[6] The precedents are as follows: Eng.: 1839, R. v. Howell, 3 State Tr. N. S. 1087, 1098 (felonious burning at a riot; preceding burning of another house, admitted as evidence of a riot but not of design to burn the house charged); 1846, R. v. Dosset, 2 Cox Cr. 243, 2 C. & K. 306 (a hayrick had been fired by the discharge of a gun in the prisoner's hand; the facts of the rick having been fired the day before and the prisoner being seen near it with a gun were admitted; Maule, J.: "It is only by the conduct of the prisoner that a judgment can be formed whether the act was accidental or intentional"); 1850, R. v. Regan, 4 id. 335 (the fact that the accused had given notice of other fires and claimed the rewards in the present case was apparently rejected as not strong enough); 1851, R. v. Taylor, 5 id. 138 (evidence tending to show the accused's share in other rick-fires of the same night, excluded, except as bearing on his conduct as to the fire in question; the ruling seems erroneous, for part of the evidence was a threat "to light B. from end to end," and thus a general connection between the fires was supplied); 1866, R. v. Gray, 4 F. & F. 1102 (indictment for setting fire to the defendant's own house, with intent to obtain insurance-money; the fact was received, to negative accident, of the occurrence of fires in two of the defendant's former houses and of his claiming and receiving the insurance-money on both, though no evidence of the cause of these fires or of the defendant's connection with them was offered); 1882, R. v. Nattrass, 15 Cox Cr. 73 (charge of attempt to burn the house by setting fire to articles so that the house would catch fire; the fact was received that on the same day articles were found on fire at four different times in different parts of the house; Ala.: 1855, Brock v. State, 26 Ala. 104 (a subsequent firing of the same person's property, excluded; the point not raised); 1856, Martin v. State, 28 id. 71, 82 (arson with intent to defraud; a previous attempt to hire some one to burn the same house, admitted); 1900, Merricourt v. Norwalk F. Ins. Co., 13 Haw. 218, 224 (arson of one's own house in fraud of insurance; questions as to prior fire-losses of the plaintiff, excluded; no rule defined); Mass.: 1876, Com. v. McCarthy, 119 Mass. 355 (arson on Sept. 10; to show intent only, the fact was admitted of a setting fire by the defendant on Aug. 24 and Sept. 6 to a shed ten feet distant from but connected with the building in question); 1878, Com. v. Bradford, 126 id. 42 (arson; the fact of the defendant's setting fire to the same mill a few nights before, admitted to show wilfulness and to negative accident or negligence; the Court apparently had in mind the stricter System rule, however, for they say that the evidence indicated "that the defendant then had a settled purpose in regard to it," and that such evidence must be near enough to "afford a presumption" that the design continues; compare this Massachusetts peculiarity, ante, § 321); Mo.: 1903, State v. Jones, 171 Mo. 401, 71 S. W. 680 (burning of another house, and stealing of a horse, on the same night,

11. Rape, Abortion, and other Sexual Offences.

§ 357. Rape; General Principle. (1) Here the Knowledge principle (ante, § 301) has no opportunity for application. (2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) clearly applies where the act is assumed as otherwise proved and the intent is in issue; i.e. in such cases, former acts of the kind are relevant to negative the intent as being of any other kind than to commit rape. (a) Where the charge is of assault with intent, the propriety of such evidence cannot be doubted. There should be some limitation of time, but merely to avoid the objection of unfair surprise (ante, § 194). There need be no limitation as to the person assaulted, because the only purpose is to negative any other than the rape-intent, and a previous rape-assault on another woman has equal probative value for that purpose, for it is the general desire to satisfy lust that is involved in this crime, and no particular woman is essential for this. Accordingly, where the charge is assault with intent, former acts of the sort should be received without any limitation except as to time; admitted); Nebr.: 1899, Knights v. State, 58 Nebr. 225, 78 N. W. 508 (arson; defendant's setting of other fires in adjacent buildings on the same night, admitted); N. J.: 1891, State v. Raymond, 53 N. J. L. 260, 264, 21 Atl. 328 (arson in 1888 with intent to defraud; the occurrence of six fires between 1877 and 1883, in buildings in which the defendant was interested, excluded, even as negativing accident, because there was "not the slightest connection between it and them"; wrong application of the System theory); N. Y.: 1865, People v. Kennedy, 32 N. Y. 141 (burning of a barn; the defendant was a discharged employee living near by; the fact of an attempt by him to burn the employer's house about the same time was rejected, partly because the defendant was not sufficiently connected with it, partly because "we cannot presume that he burned the barn because we presume that he attempted to burn the house"; no authorities cited); 1876, Faucett v. Nichols, 64 Id. 377 (action against an innkeeper for goods lost negligently by fire; defence, that the fire was set by a third person wilfully; to negative the theory of carelessness in the defendant's household and show deliberateness by some one else, the fact was held admissible that on the same night an attempt was made to fire another building, near by, with kerosene, etc., as in the case of the defendant's building; but the Court say, obiter, without citing authorities, that such evidence could not have been admitted in a criminal charge against the defendant); 1892, People v. Murphy, 135 id. 450, 456, 32 N. E. 138 (arson of a barn; the poisoning of the owner's horses, and the mutilation of his carriages, on the same night, where another's were untouched, admitted to show a general though anonymous scheme of destruction, including the barn); 1898, People v. Fitzgerald, 156 id. 253, 50 N. E. 846 (defendant, a trustee of corporate property, was charged with arson of it; the burning of other corporate property and the defendant's private property, more than two years before, not shown to be incendiary, excluded); N. C.: 1856, State v. Freeman, 4 Jones L. 5 (two former attempts by the same servant, within a month or so, by setting fire to the same premises, here rejected, because the defendant was not connected with them); 1887, State v. Thompson, 97 N. C. 496, 1 S. E. 921 (arson of an outhouse; attempted burning of the dwelling itself at the same time, admitted as showing that the same person had fired both); 1897, State v. Graham, 121 Id. 623, 28 S. E. 409 (burning of a landlord's dwelling; the defendant's burning of his former landlord's dwelling, ten months before, excluded); 1902, State v. McCall, 131 Id. 798, 42 S. E. 894 (arson of a church; arson of a mill shortly before, excluded); Pa.: 1878, Kramer v. Com., 87 Pa. 299 (setting fire to a hotel on May 23; the fires were put out; the fact admitted that on the 25th, the defendant, who was a resident of the hotel at both times, attempted to set fire to the hotel; "the purpose of the first attempt . . . was not complete, for that was to consume the building entirely; being saved, it was clearly the subject of a renewed purpose; and the evidence of this renewed purpose tended strongly to show that the person was the same who had made both attempts"); Vt.: 1878, State v. Smalley, 50 Vt. 738, 750 (other burnings, not passed upon); 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Id. 181, 17 Atl. 483 (an attempt by the defendant, four weeks previous, to burn the same barn, admitted); 1898, State v. Hallock, 70 Id. 159, 40 Atl. 51 (arson of L.'s barn by defendant's procurement; an incendiary firing of L.'s dwelling-house six weeks before, admitted, to negative accident, and also to show, with other evidence, the defendant's plan to burn L.'s buildings); Wis.: 1879, State v. Miller, 47 Wis. 530, 3 N. W. 31 (forgery and larceny, not admitted on the facts as so intimately connected with the arson charged as to indicate a common purpose in all).

though the Courts can hardly be said to have accepted this result fully. (b) Where the charge is of rape, the doing of the act being disputed, it is perhaps still theoretically possible that the intent should be in issue; but practically, if the act is proved, there can be no real question as to intent; and therefore the Intent principle has no necessary application. The former acts, if available at all, must be available under the Design principle. (3) The Design or Plan principle (ante, § 304) requires that the former act or acts should indicate, by common features, a plan or design which tends to show that it was carried out by doing the act charged. Here it is obvious that there is much room for difference of opinion in a given case. The committing of a single previous rape, or rape-attempt, upon another woman may not in itself indicate such a design, — a view carefully examined in the following leading case:

1876, State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 289, 295, 299, 303; Cushing, C. J.: "I think we may state the law in the following propositions: (1) It is not permitted to the prosecution to attack the character of the prisoner, unless he first puts that in issue by offering evidence of his good character. (2) It is not permitted to show the defendant's bad character by showing particular acts. (3) It is not permitted to show in the prisoner a tendency or disposition to commit the crime with which he is charged. (4) It is not permitted to give in evidence other crimes of the prisoner, unless they are so connected by circumstances with the particular crime in issue as that the proof of one fact with its circumstances has some bearing upon the issue on trial other than such as is expressed in the foregoing three propositions. . . . It should also be remarked that this being a matter of judgment, it is quite likely that Courts would not always agree, and that some Courts might see a logical connection where others could not. But however extreme the case may be, I think it will be found that the Courts have always professed to put the admission of the testimony on the ground that there was some logical connection between the crime proposed to be proved other than the tendency to commit one crime as manifested by the tendency to commit the other. In the case under consideration, I cannot see any such logical connection, between the commission of the rape upon Julienne Rousse and the murder of Josephine Langmaid, as the law requires. I am unable to see any connection by which from the first crime can be inferred that the respondent was attempting the commission of a rape when he committed the murder, if he did it, other than such inference as I understand the law expressly to exclude." Smith, J.: "Proof that he committed a rape in Canada, four years previously, upon Julienne Rousse, shows what? Not that he then had any design or intent to perpetrate a rape four years afterwards upon another woman whom he had never seen or heard of, or in a place two hundred miles distant where he had never been; not that he had then formed a design to rape and murder women whenever he might have opportunity; not that he had ever before or since committed that crime, — but that the defendant had a disposition to commit the crime of rape four years previously. No one will pretend that evidence that the prisoner had committed another murder, in Canada, or Texas, or Europe, could be shown on this trial. One cannot be convicted of murder, by showing that he has at some time and somewhere else committed another murder; or of larceny, by showing that he has committed the crime before, and therefore has an evil disposition inclining him towards that particular crime."

Nevertheless, a single previous act, even upon another woman, may, with other circumstances, give strong indication of a design (not a disposition) to rape; and a previous act of the sort upon the same woman ought in itself usually to be regarded as indicating such a design. Courts have shown altogether too much hesitation in receiving such evidence. Even when rigorously excluded from any bearing it may have upon character (ante, § 194), it may carry with it great significance as to a specific design or plan of rape. There is no reason why it should not be received when it does convey to the mind, according to the ordinary logical instincts, a clear indication of such a design. There is room for much more common sense than appears in the majority of the rulings.[1]

[1] Assault with Intent: 1875, People v. Bowan, 49 Cal. 654 (assault with intent to rape a child under ten; intercourse with other children under ten, excluded); 1877, State v. Walters, 45 Ia. 389 (assault with intent to rape; other similar assaults upon the same person admitted, but not other similar assaults upon another person); 1899, State v. Desmond, 109 Id. 72, 80 N. W. 214 (assault with intent to rape; defendant, giving a stage-entertainment, invited the complaining witness and other young girls separately behind the curtain; the facts of rape and other indecencies upon the others at that time, admitted to show intent); 1880, State v. Boyland and McCurty, 24 Kan. 186 (assault on B. with intent to rape, by B.'s husband and a friend M., the husband helping M. violate A.; conduct and expressions of the husband, a few days later, in the presence of B. and M., rejected, though the Court conceded that it showed "a willingness on the part of the husband that the wife might be debauched by the other defendant"; an example of gross failure of justice through misapplication of the legal principles in favor of crime); 1896, State v. Stevens, 56 Id. 720, 44 Pac. 992 (attempt to rape; evidence of an indecent assault upon the same person two years later, excluded); 1901, McAllister v. State, 112 Wis. 496, 88 N. W. 212 (assault with intent to rape; similar assault on another woman living three blocks away, one hour before, excluded; unsound); 1903, Barton v. Brnlay, — Id. —, 96 N. W. 815 (indecent assault; defendant's prior similar misconduct, excluded).

Rape: 1836, R. v. Lloyd, 7 C. & P. 318 (liberties taken by the defendant with the prosecutrix, not admitted to show lustful intent); 1848, R. v. Chambers, 3 Cox Cr. 92 (former rape upon the prosecutrix, his granddaughter; here admitted to explain the child's condition); 1864, R. v. Reardon, 4 F. & F. 76 (carnal knowledge of a female child, the defendant lodging in the same house; the fact admitted of subsequent perpetrations of the same act two and four days later; Willes, J.: 'I shall allow all the matters to be proved, in order to show the real nature of the case. . . . It has repeatedly appeared to me in cases of this sort that the man by a threat of violence deters the child from complaining, and thus acquires a species of influence over her by terror, which enables him to repeat the offence on subsequent occasions; and this seems to me to give a continuity to the transaction which makes such evidence properly admissible"); 1895, People v. Fultz, 109 Cal. 258, 41 Pac. 1040 (on a charge of rape of his daughter, other rapes upon her by the defendant were admitted to explain the absence of signs of rape); 1902, Bigcraft v. People, — Colo. —, 70 Pac. 417 (rape upon defendant's daughter; other acts of intercourse excluded because not expressly offered in corroboration only); 1890, Parkinson v. People, 135 Ill. 401, 25 N. E. 764 (a preceding rape on the prosecutrix, held inadmissible; here, however, admitted as necessarily mentioned in describing the offence charged); 1896, Jäuzen v. People, 159 Id. 440, 42 N. E. 862 (rape on May 1 on defendant's daughter M.; a rape on May 15 on another daughter Y., excluded); 1901, Addison v. People, 193 Id. 405, 62 N. E. 235 (rape; defendant's conduct that day in becoming intoxicated and in treating a boy to beer, excluded); 1892, State v. Bonsor, 49 Kan. 758, 31 Pac. 736 (rape in July; the fact of previous intercourse by the defendant in June, and of efforts to conceal its resulting pregnancy, rejected; clearly unsound); 1898, Legore v. State, 87 Md. 735, 41 Atl. 60 (rape; prior indecent proposal of defendant to prosecutrix, excluded; no authority cited); 1895, People v. Burwell, 106 Mich. 27, 63 N. W. 986 (where the woman's consent was alleged to have been forced, the fact that the defendant "had abused and beaten her [his daughter] before," and that he "was abusive to his wife and other children," was admitted); 1903, Dabney v. State, — Miss. —, 33 So. 973 (rape; larceny in an adjoining room the same night, excluded); 1903, State v. Scott, 172 Mo. 536, 72 S. W. 897 (prior attempts to rape the same woman, admitted); 1901, Reinoehl v. State, 62 Nebr. 619, 87 N. W. 355 (prior indecent language to the complainant, admissible); 1859, Conkey v. People, 5 Park. Cr. 32, 35 (rape; violent conduct in the room by the defendant about the same time, in overturning the stove, throwing things out of the window, etc., admitted as indicating a purpose to alarm and coerce the woman); 1887, People v. O'Sullivan, 104 N. Y. 483, 10 N. E. 880 (rape by a Catholic priest upon his servant; the fact was received of an unsuccessful attempt, four days before, to ravish her; "It is always competent to show, upon the question of his guilt, that he has made an attempt at some prior time, not too distant, to commit the same offence"); 1877, State v. Laxton, 76 N. C. 216 (that the defendant "was running after one certain bad white woman," excluded); 1848, Williams v. State, 8 Hnmph. 585, 590, 594 (rape upon the defendant's daughter; the fact was admitted of a series of requests, threats, and attempts at the rape, extending about four § 358. Same: Other Principles discriminated. (1) Occasionally the former act will be receivable for other purposes independently of the present principles, — as, in explanation of certain physical appearances,[1] or under the doctrine of Inseparableness (ante, § 218).[2] (2) The use of former voluntary intercourse of the same complainant with the defendant, as indicating her general sentiments toward him and therefore the probability of her consent on this occasion, involves a question of Emotion or Motive, dealt with elsewhere (post, § 402). The logical principles are distinct, but their application cannot always be discriminated. In the one class of cases the evidence is appropriate for the prosecution; in the other, for the defence.

§ 359. Abortion. (1) The Knowledge principle (ante, § 301) has here no application in practice; though it is available to show a knowledge of the nature and effect of the instruments or drugs used, if that should be disputed.[1] (2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) is available; other occasions of using such instruments or drugs, whether prior or subsequent,[2] tend to negative an innocent intent.[3] (3) The Design principle (ante, § 304), where the act itself is to be proved, would allow resort to former acts showing by common features a general design indicating that it was carried out by doing the act charged.[4] The precedents in the various jurisdictions illustrate these principles with more or less consistency.[5] months back, and beginning about eight months after the mother's death; Green, J.: "When a party for a series of months, by every persuasive, by importunity, by threats, and by force, seeks to gratify his lust for sexual intercourse with a particular woman, certainly every mind must perceive the force and relevancy of those facts to explain the intent with which he made an assault subsequently on the same woman"); 1896, State v. Thompson, 14 Wash. 285, 44 Pac. 533 (rape; a former "trouble" of a similar sort, excluded); 1893, Proper v. State, 85 Wis. 615, 628, 55 N. W. 1035 (rape; the prosecutrix and a girl E. slept together in the defendant's house; evidence of the defendant's previous indecent assaults and rape on E. while so living, admitted).

Rape under Age of Consent: this is practically the offence of fornication, consent being immaterial, and hence is dealt with under § 402, post.

[1] R. v. Chambers, Eng., People v. Fultz, Cal.

[2] Parkinson v. People, Ill.

[1] See the quotation, ante, § 301, from R. v. Cooper.

[2] R. v. Perry, Eng., Lamb v. State, Md.

[3] Com. v. Corkin, Mass., People v. Seaman, Mich.

[4] Baker v. People, Ill., People v. Sessions, Mich.

[5] 1847, R. v. Perry, 2 Cox Cr. 223, Wilde, C. J. (administering a drug with intent to produce a miscarriage; subsequent administrations of other drugs admitted to show intent); 1883, Baker v. People, 105 Ill. 452, 456 (abortion; the fact of another attempt to cause an abortion in the course of the same pregnancy, excluded; clearly wrong); 1899, State v. Moothart, 109 Ia. 130, 80 N. W. 301 (giving a drug with intent to cause miscarriage; subsequent use of an instrument on the same person for the same miscarriage, admitted); 1903, State v. Crofford, — id. —, 96 N. W. 889 (murder by abortion; abortions by the defendant upon other women, excluded); 1901, Clark v. Com., — Ky. —, 63 S. W. 740 (abortion; other perpetrations of abortion admissible to prove intent, where the act in question is conceded but justified on the ground of necessity, but, by a majority of the Court, not admissible to prove a plan to do the act, its commission being denied); 1884, Com. v. Corkin, 136 Mass. 429 (the use of instruments with intent to produce a miscarriage; the use of them on the same woman a few days before, admitted to show the intent); 1886, Lamb v. State, 66 Md. 285, 7 Atl. 399 (attempt to procure abortion by drugs; a "subsequent attempt to accomplish the same purpose by a different means [viz., an operation] is admissible to show with what purpose and intent" he acted); 1886, People v. Sessions, 58 Mich. 594, 600, 26 N. W. 291 (murder by abortion; the facts admitted of the frequent and habitual use of instruments by the defendant in other cases to produce abortion, and of the repeated proffer of services for that purpose); 1895, People v. Seaman, 107 id. 348, 65 N. W. 203 (abortion; the fact that the defendant's house was a place of resort for such practices, and that he had frequently performed such criminal operations, admitted to show a guilty intent; the defendant conceding that he had attended the case as a medical man); 1898, People v. Abbott, 116 id. 263, 74 N. W. 529 (a § 360. Indecent Exposure, Sodomy, Bigamy, Incest, Seduction, Adultery, etc. The same principles are occasionally applicable on charges of indecent exposure,[1] sodomy,[2] bigamy,[3] or enticement for prostitution.[4] But for the offences of adultery, seduction, rape under age of consent, incest, and certain others, there is commonly no question of intent, and the significance of prior conduct of the defendant with the woman is usually to show, not Intent, but an Emotion of lust. This is perhaps not always to be distinguished from evidence of Design; but it is best examined under the principles applicable to evidence of Emotion (post, §§ 398–402).

12. Homicide and Homicidal Assault.

§ 363. Homicide, including Murder by Poison. (1) The Knowledge principle (ante, § 301) has practically little application here; though it would be available to show a knowledge of the nature and injurious effects of a lethal weapon.[1]

(2) The Intent principle (ante, § 302) receives constant application; for the intent to kill is in homicide practically always in issue, and is to be proved by the prosecution, and the recurrence of other acts of the sort tends to negative inadvertence, defensive purpose, or any other form of innocent intent. For this purpose, therefore, the evidence is receivable irrespective of whether the act charged is itself conceded or not. Where (as usually) it is not conceded, the evidence of intent goes to the jury to be used by them only on the assumption that they find the act to have been done by the accused; it is then to be employed by them in determining the intent. This use of such evidence is universally recognized.[2] As to the similarity of the other acts, no fixed rule can be formulated. They certainly need not have been done to the same person;[3] they need not have accompanied more or less immediately the act charged,[4] and they may have habit of performing abortions, receivable to show the intent of an operation).

[1] 1893, State v. Stice, 88 Ia. 27, 55 N. W. 17 (indecent exposure; prior and subsequent instances, admitted to show intent).

[2] 1893, State v. Place, 5 Wash. 773, 774, 32 Pac. 736 (assault with intent of sodomy; conduct about an hour before on the same train but in another State, admitted).

[3] 1901, State v. Graham, 23 Utah 278, 64 Pac. 557 (cohabitation with several women at a prior time, admissible to show intent during the time charged).

[4] 1898, People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 51 Pac. 955 (enticement for prostitution; that the defendant had attempted to entice other young girls into the same house for the same purpose, excluded; but it should have been received to show intent).

[1] See the quotation from R. v. Cooper, ante, § 301.

[2] R. v. Mobbs, R. v. Roden, Makin v. Att'y-Gen'l, Eng., Smith v. State, Ala., Austin v. State, Melton v. State, Ark., People v. Walters, People v. Craig, Cal., Killins v. State, Oliver v. State, Fla., Reese v. State, Shaw v. State, Ga., State v. Fontenot, La., State v. Pike, Me., Com. v. Campbell, Mass., People v. Knapp, People v. Marble, Mich., State v. Testerman, State v. Martin, State v. Sanders, Mo., Walters v. People, N. Y., State v. Mace, N. C., People v. Coughlin, Utah, Poindexter's Case, Va., Albricht v. State, Wis. Poisoning cases: R. v. Mogg, R. v. Calder, R. v. Geering, R. v. Winslow, R. v. Garner, R. v. Flannagan, Eng., Johnson v. State, Ala., People v. Thacker, Mich., Goersen v. Com., Pa.

[3] R. v. Roden, Makin v. A.-G., Eng., Smith v. State, Ala., People v. Walters, People v. Craig, Cal., Killins v. State, Oliver v. State, Fla., Reese v. State, Ga., State v. Fontenot, La., People v. Marble, Mich., State v. Testerman, State v. Sanders, Mo., People v. Coughlin, Utah; so also in almost all the poisoning cases.

[4] R. v. Roden, Makin v. A.-G., Eng., Austin v. State, Ark., Shaw v. State, Ga., Poindexter's Case, Va.; so also in almost all the poisoning cases.

been done even at a subsequent time.[5] The precedents show every variety of circumstances, and a correct application of the principle would receive any evidence of the sort which conveys any real probative indication of the defendant's intent.

(2 a) The principle of Anonymous Intent (ante, § 303) finds occasional application, particularly in poisoning cases. Other instances of death by poison under somewhat similar circumstances serve to negative the supposition of inadvertent taking or of mistaken administration, even though the person responsible for the other poisonings is not identified; and thus, a criminal intent having been shown for the act charged, by whomsoever done, the defendant may be then shown to be its doer.[6]

(3) The principle of Design or System (ante, § 304) finds here frequent application. It supposes that a design or plan in the defendant is to be shown, as making it probable that the defendant carried out the design or plan and committed the act; and it receives former similar acts so far as through common features they naturally indicate the existence of such a plan, design, or system, of which they are the partial fulfilment or means. This principle is fully recognized in the precedents.[7] There has been occasional hesitation in applying it in poisoning cases;[8] but this hesitation is wholly unfounded, and numerous instances illustrate its equal applicability to such cases.[9]

The precedents in the various jurisdictions illustrate the development of the foregoing principles with more or less consistency.[10]

[5] Smith v. State, Ala., People v. Walters, People v. Craig, Cal., Killins v. State, Fla., People v. Marble, Mich., State v. Sanders, Mo., State v. Mace, N. C. Poisoning cases: R. v. Geering, R. v. Heesom, Eng.

[6] R. v. Geering, R. v. Flannagan, R. v. Bailey, Eng.

[7] Melton v. State, Ark., State v. Smith, Ia., State v. Vaughan, Nev., Stephens v. People, People v. Shea, N. Y., Snyder v. Com., Com. v. Mudgett, Pa., Heath v. Com., Nicholas v. Com., Va. In Makin v. Att'y-Gen'l, Eng., it should have been applied, but the opinion is not clear on this point.

[8] R. v. Flannagan, Eng., People v. Thacker, Mich.

[9] R. v. Cotton (semble), R. v. Heesom (semble), Eng., Com. v. Robinson, Mass. (leading case), People v. Wood, N. Y., Farrer v. State (semble), Brown v. State, Oh., Shaffner v. Com. (leading case), Goersen v. Com., Pa.

[10] For convenience of reference the poisoning cases have been arranged separately in a second list, infra. Eng.: 1853, R. v. Mobbs, 6 Cox Cr. 223 (murder of wife; things done to her by the defendant ten days before, not admitted to show intent; Coleridge, J.: "It is very difficult to draw the line in these cases"); 1864, R. v. Reardon, 4 F. & F. 79, Willes, J., semble (other killings, admissible to show intent); 1874, R. v. Roden, 12 Cox Cr. 630, Lush, J. (murder by suffocating her infant while in bed; the fact that the defendant had "had four other children who had also died in infancy at early ages," was admitted, on the authority of R. v. Cotton, infra); 1889, R. v. Crickmer, 16 id. 701, Charles, J. (murder by stabbing; the fact of another stabbing by the defendant an hour before, admitted); 1893, Makin v. Att'y-Gen'l of N. S. Wales, 17 id. 704, Privy Council (murder of an illegitimate infant intrusted for keeping by its mother to the defendant and found buried on the defendant's premises; the fact was admitted of the finding, in the various premises where the defendant had lived about the time in question, of the buried bodies of other infants, respectively four, six, and two at each place, no deaths having been registered from those addresses, and of several other infants having been received on similar arrangements to the one in question; received, per L. C. Herschell, following R. v. Geering, infra, as "bearing upon the question whether the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental, or to rebut a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused"); Ala.: 1887, Lawrence v. State, 84 Ala. 424, 5 So. 33 (previous "difficulty," admissible to show "malice, or a motive"; but not "the particulars or merits" of the "difficulty"; 1889, Smith v. State, 88 id. 76, 7 So. 52 (quarrel with deceased and S.; the defendant's following up S. and shooting at him after shooting at the deceased, admitted); 1901, Miller v. State, 130 id. 1, 30 So. 379 (murder of a police-officer; conspiracy between the defendants to kill another officer at the same time, admitted); Ark.: 1812, Baker v. State, 4 Ark. 56, 61 (general principle stated, that other acts of violence are admissible to show intent); 1854, Austin v. State, 14 Id. 555, 558 (murder by a slave to show intent, "former grudges, former threats, previous lying in wait," etc., admissible; here, the slave's declarations that he would resist capture); 1884, Melton v. State, 43 id. 367, 371 (murder alleged to have been done in pursuance of a plan by the Ku-Klux Society to dispose of the deceased for having opposed the Society; the fact received that the defendant with others had on a former occasion gone masked to the deceased's house and flogged him as a part of the plan to stop his opposition); Cal.: 1893, People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 138, 141, 32 Pac. 864 (murder of a son; the killing of the mother immediately afterwards by an associate of the defendant, with the fact of a long-standing feud between the two parties, admitted to show intent); 1895, People v. Smith, 106 id. 73, 82, 39 Pac. 40 (murder of D.; the killing of C. in the same house at the same time, admitted to show that C. could not have killed D.); 1896, People v. Craig, 111 id. 460, 467, 44 Pac. 186 (wife-murder; after evidence of ill-feeling by the defendant against his wife's family generally, the fact that he shot the wife's brother at the same time as the shooting of the wife and then went immediately to her father and mother and shot them was admitted as showing that the shooting of the wife was not accidental); 1898, People v. Miller, 121 id. 343, 53 Pac. 816 (M. killed C. when C. stopped M.'s pursuit of a woman N.; the intent of the pursuit admitted, to show the intent against C.); Fla.: 1891, Killins v. State, 28 Fla. 313, 333, 9 So. 711 (killing of the deceased's mother immediately afterwards, admitted to show intent); 1896, Oliver v. State, 38 id. 46, 20 So. 803 (shooting of another person at the same time and in the same affray, admitted); 1898, Milton v. State, 40 Id. 251, 24 So. 60 (murder; shooting another at the same time, as negativing self-defence, admitted); 1900, West v. State, 42 id. 244, 28 So. 430 (murder; the killing of the only other man in the vicinity, just beforehand, robbery of a house being the motive, admitted to show intent); Ga.: 1849, Reese v. State, 7 Ga. 373 (assault upon the deceased's father just before the murder; such evidence limited to "the time of the transaction"); 1878, Shaw v. State, 60 id. 246, 250 (wife-murder by beating; the fact of a similar beating four years before, admitted); Ida.: 1900, State v. Taylor, — Ida. —, 61 Pac. 288 (manslaughter; the defendant's shooting at a witness shortly afterwards while escaping, excluded); Ky.: 1895, Saylor v. Com., 97 Ky. 184, 30 S. W. 390 (murder; questions as to the killing of two other persons "at the same place and immediately afterwards," excluded: erroneous); 1896, Green v. Com., — id. —, 33 S. W. 100 (a nearly simultaneous killing; obscure); 1901, Bishop v. Com., — id. —, 58 S. W. 817, 60 S. W. 190 (murder of an officer; that the defendant had just killed another man and was fleeing from arrest, admitted as evidencing motive); 1903, O'Brien v. Com., — Id. —, 74 S. W. 666 (murder during a burglary; burglary of neighboring houses on the same night, admitted); La.: 1896, State v. Fontenot, 48 La. 305, 19 So. 111 (attacks by the defendant on a third person just before killing the deceased, admitted); Me.: 1876, State v. Pike, 65 Me. 111, 113 (manslaughter of wife by cruel abuse; other acts of violence on the same evening, admissible, but not "another distinct assault"); Mass.: 1863, Com. v. Campbell, 7 All. 541 (murder at 7 P. M. by one of a mob during the Draft Riots; riotous acts by the defendant at [illegible] of the same day, admitted to show the subsequent guilty intent, provided there was a general resistance and disturbance of the public peace such that the earlier and the later acts formed "a part of one transaction"); Mich.: 1872, People v. Knapp, 26 Mich. 112, 116 (murder; the preceding affray, alleged to have involved a rape on the deceased, admitted); 1878, People v. Marble, 38 id. 117, 123 (murder of A.; three persons attacked at once; A. was killed outright M. was pursued, and all fired at, within two minutes; the shooting and pursuit of M., admitted as "coloring" the act of attacking A.); 1901, People v. Dowd, 127 id. 140, 86 N. W. 546 (certain "acts of violence" to other persons, excluded); Miss.: 1846, Dowling v. State, 5 Sm. & M. 664, 666, 686 (murder of a slave by an overseer, by beating; the fact excluded that the defendant's usual manner of punishing the slaves was by a thick wooden paddle); 1898, Herman v. State, 75 Miss. 340, 22 So. 873 (murder; defendant's assault on the deceased with a knife, about a year before, excluded); Mo.: 1878, State v. Testerman, 68 Mo. 408, 415 (murder; the cutting of another person by the defendant in the same affray, admitted); 1881, State v. Martin, 74 id. 547 (murder; two other indictments for felonious assault, excluded); 1882, State v. Sanders, 76 Id. 35, 36 (a stroke at a bystander, who had seized the defendant after the killing and as he was escaping, admitted); 1882, State v. Emery, ib. 349 (previous assault to show intent to kill; obscure); 1900, State v. Tettaton, 159 id. 354, 60 S. W. 743 (murder; the killing of other members of the family at the same time, and the burning of the house, admitted); Mont.: 1901, State v. Shafer, 26 Mont. 11, 66 Pac. 463 (conflict between the same parties a few hours before, admitted); Nebr.: 1903, Jahnke v. State, — Nebr. —, 94 N. W. 158 (prior attempts by other means to take the deceased's life, admitted); Nev.: 1895, State v. Vaughan, 22 Nev. 285, 39 Pac. 733 (whether or not the deceased had been the aggressor; former attempt by the deceased to shoot the defendant's brothers, excluded); N. M.: 1893, Roper v. Terr., 7 N. M. 255, 265, 33 Pac. 1014 (murder; previous attempt at robbery of another, not admitted on the facts to show intent to rob the deceased); N. Y.: 1859, Stephens v. People, 4 Park. Cr. 396, 511, 19 N. Y. 571 (wife-murder; to show a general design to get rid of all obstacles to marry a woman tending to negative innocent intent and thus to establish the criminal intent charged (to kill, to wound, to resist an officer, and the like). No fixed

§ 364. Assault with Intent; Other Crimes of Personal Violence. The principle of Intent (ante, § 302) here admits other acts of the defendant

B., of which the wife-murder was to be one part, tha fact was received of an attempt by the defendant to drive away B.'s suitor C., by sending him after the wife's death an anonymous letter reflecting on B.'s character); 1864, Walters v. People, 6 Park. Cr. 15 (murder by stabbing; acts of violence to tha deceased on the day before, admitted to show deliberation of intent); 1893, People v. Laruhia, 140 N. Y. 87, 35 N. E. 412 (murder; violence on behalf of the same paramour, four months before, excluded); 1895, People v. Shea, 147 id. 78, 41 N. E. 508 (admitting, in a trial for homicide at the polls, the fact of a general plan to repeat votes and to intimidate by violence those who opposed, and of instances of this conduct); 1899, People v. Place, 157 id. 584, 52 N. E. 576 (homicide of a stepdaughter; assault by defendant on her husband after tha daughter's death and on his return, admitted to show intent); N. C.: 1873, State v. Shuford, 69 N. C. 486, 492 (murder of a new-born child; the defendant's admission that she had "had a child this way before, and put it away," excluded; tha evidence here left it uncertain whether the child was killed by an accident); 1896, State v. Mace, 118 id. 1244 24 S. E. 798 (an assault, a quarter of an hour aftar a killing, upon an eye-witness who was going away to tell the news, admitted to show intent); Pa.: 1877, Snydar v. Com., 85 Pa. 519, 521 (murder of the illegitimate infant of the defendant's daughter; the fact of an incestuous rape upon har, excluded); 1896, Com. v. Mudgett, alias Holmes, 174 id. 211, 34 Atl. 588 (the killing of three children of tha deceased so as to prevaut tha deceased's wife from learning of his death, admissible); 1898, Com. v. Wilson, 186 id. 1, 40 Atl. 283 (murder; attempt to rob another person at another time, and other unconnected crimes, excluded); 1901, Com. v. Major, 198 id. 290, 47 Atl. 741 (murder; prior burglary at another place tha sama evening, admitted as showing intent); 1901, Com. v. Biddle, 200 id. 647, 50 Atl. 264 (murder; casual mention of other crimes by an accomplice relating his intimacy, held not improperly admitted); R. I.: 1833, Avery's Trial, Newport, Hildreth's Rep. 41 (murder; anonymous letter making an appointment with the deceased, admitted "to rebut the presumption of suicide"; Eddy, C. J., Brayton and Durfee, JJ., sitting); Tenn.: 1843, Stone v. State, 4 Humph. 27, 35 (murder; the fact that the defendant had shortly before set fire to the deceased's house, rejected, because proof of a separate felony could not be received; erroneous reason); Tex.: 1899, Barkman v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 105, 52 S. W. 69 (murder; a single accidental prior killing, excluded); Utah: 1896, People v. Coughlin, 13 Utah 58, 44 Pac. 94 (killing of another person in the sama affray, to show intent, admitted); Vt.: 1902, State v. Eastwood, 73 Vt. 205, 50 Atl. 1077 (murder of a wife's sister's husband at M.; defendant's shooting of his wife's sister at the same time, and of his wife and her mother immediately before, five miles away at East M., where he said "I have come to break up tha family," held admissible to show "purpose, preparation, and intent"); Va.: 1842, Heath v. Com., 1 Rob. 735, 738, 743 (murder of a woman by stabbing; the fact admitted of the shooting of her companion by the defendant just previously on the same night under circumstances indicating a design to do away with both); 1880, Poindexter's Case, 33 Gratt. 766, 788 (murder; a prior attack on the deceased by the defendant on the same morning, admitted); 1895, Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. 364 (the defendant's giving strychnine to a wife and telling her to administer it in milk or coffee to the deceased, admitted; here the deceased in fact was drowned in a boat, which the defendant was charged with sinking); Wis.: 1857, Albricht v. State, 6 Wis. 74 (manslaughter of his son by striking with a chisel; evidence of former strikings of the boy with an axe-helve and otherwise, not admitted even to show intent; clearly wrong); 1903, Paulson v. State, — id. — , 94 N. W. 771 (murder; larcenies several years before, excluded); 1903, Horn v. State, — Wyo. — , 73 Pac. 705 (defendant's assault, shortly before, on tha deceased's father, admitted to show motive and identity).

Additional instances, analogous to tha foregoing cases, are cited under §§ 396, 397, post, dealing with acts of prior hostility as evidence of motive.

Poisoning Cases: Eng.: 1830, R. v. Mogg, 4 C. & P. 335 (mixing poison with a horse's feed; the administration to the other horses in the sama stable, admitted to show intent); 1844, R. v. Calder, 2 Cox Cr. 348 (administration of similar drugs on subsequent days, admitted to show intent on the day in question); 1847, Pollock, C. B., in R. v. Bailey, ib. 312 (declaring evidence admissible, on a charge of poisoning, that the prisoner had attempted to drown the deceased by sawing nearly in two tha limb of a tree on which the deceased was accustomed to sit when fishing); 1849, R. v. Geering, 18 L. J. M. C. 215 (murder of husband by arsenic-poisoning; evidence was offered of the death by arsenic, within six months later, of two sons of the defendant, and of tha arsenical illness of a third son, to show (1) "that the deceased had in fact died of poison administered by some party," and (2) "to prove that the death of the deceased husband was not accidental"; objected to because the death and illness occurred after the death in issue; Pollock, C. B., Alderson, B., and Talfourd, J., approving, admitted it, "to determine whether such taking was accidental or not"; the prosecution also connected the defendant with the plan or system by showing that she generally cooked the meals for all four persons); 1860, R. v. Winslow, 8 Cox Cr. 397, Martin, B. (murder by antimony-poisoning; evidence that within six months three other persons in the same family, the prisoner being employed there, had died from antimony-poisoning, was offered rule can be formulated as to the similarity which the other act must bear; chiefly "to exclude the supposition of an accidental poisoning in present case," but was excluded; no reason given); 1863, R. v. Garner and wife, 3 F. & F. 681, 4 id. 346 (murder by arsenic-poisoning; the deceased was the mother of the male defendant; the latter sold arsenic for agricultural purposes; the fact that one of his own horses and some of his milk-customers, against whom he apparently had no feeling, had suffered from arsenic, had been received to show accidental administration; and the fact of the death of his former wife was then received to negative accident); 1864, R. v. Harris, 4 id. 342, Willes, J. (general principle of R. v. Geering approved); 1873, R. v. Cotton, 12 Cox Cr. 400, Archibald, J., Lush, J., and Pollock, B. (murder of the defendant's stepchild by arsenic-poisoning in July; the fact was received of the death of the defendant's two sons in the preceding November and March, and of one M., lodging in the house, in the preceding April; all were supplied with food by the defendant and all showed arsenic-traces; the evidence was received on the authority of Geering's and Garner's Cases); 1878, R. v. Heesom, 14 id. 40, Lush, J. (murder of her child by arsenic-poisoning in October, 1877; evidence having been received of the death of another child of the defendant in March, 1876, and of the defendant's mother in November, 1877, by the same poison, both being in the same household, the fact was also received that the lives of all three had been insured a short time before by the defendant, and that on the death of the other two she had collected the insurance; following Geering's Case); 1884, R. v. Flannagan, 15 id. 403 (two sisters, charged with the murder by arsenic of the husband of the second; evidence was offered of the deaths by arsenic-poisoning, within three years, of three other persons in the same household; Butt, J.: "I think, where the authorities are at all in conflict, the safest rule to be guided by is one's common sense, and I cannot conceive that on a charge of this nature it is consistent with common sense to exclude such evidence. It has been decided . . . in the case of poisoning by arsenic, that evidence of the deaths of people other than the deceased, whose death was the subject-matter of the particular inquiry might be given, with a view to showing not that the prisoner had poisoned the deceased, but that the deceased had in fact died by poison administered by some one; that is the extent to which that authority went, and that is the extent to which, I have no hesitation in saying, I shall admit evidence as to the other deaths in this case"); Ala.: 1850, Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 618, 622 (wife-murder by poison; a former attempt by the defendant to poison her, admissible to negative mistake); Ia.: 1897, State v. Smith, 102 Ia. 656, 82 N. W. 279 (the deceased was insured in the defendant's favor, and had died of poison; one year before, he had been shot in the head, but had only lost sight thereby; the complicity of the defendant, his wife, in the shooting, admitted); 1899, State v. Lightfoot, 107 Id. 344, 78 N. W. 41 (poisoning a horse by strychnine; the presence of strychnine in other horse-boxes in the same barn, and the poisoning of other horses in other barns of the same owner, on the same night, admitted); Mass.: 1888, Com. v. Robinson, 146 Mass. 571, 16 N. E. 452 (murder by poisoning a brother-in-law, the obtaining of an insurance-benefit being the alleged motive; the prosecution, to show that the defendant had formed a general design to obtain the money by killing him, was allowed to give in evidence that her sister, the original beneficiary, and then a child of her sister, had died by poisoning within the previous five months while under the defendant's care, and that the brother-in-law had then appointed the defendant the beneficiary; ante, § 304); 1897, Com. v. Kennedy, 170 id. 18, 48 N. E. 770 (poisoning, by putting poison in a tea cup; the finding of the same poison in the same cup at other times, admitted to show an anonymous scheme); Mich.: 1870, People v. Lansing, 21 Mich. 221, 226 (poisoning a grandmother by putting arsenic into wine; a similar attempt, a few days before, by putting arsenic into her food, admitted for another purpose, and the present question left undecided); 1896, People v. Thacker, 108 id. 652, 66 N. W. 562 (wife-poisoning; attempts to poison the wife's sister, living in the same household, held admissible to show intent and negative accident, but not to show the act itself of administering); 1903, People v. Quimby, — id. —, 96 N. W. 1061 (poisoning of another child in the same way at the same time, admitted); N. Y.: 1858, People v. Wood, 3 Park. Cr. 685 (murder of a sister-in-law by poison; the fact was admitted, to show a general purpose to get the brother's estate for himself, of the prior poisoning of the brother, the contemporaneous attempt at poisoning of his two children, the procuring himself appointed as their guardian, and the forging of claims against the estate; all these being "parts of a single transaction, influenced by a single motive, and designed to accomplish a single object"); 1901, People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286 (murder of A. by poison sent to C. and taken by him and also by A.; the defendant's murder of B. by similar poison, more than a month previously, the only other common circumstances being that B. and C. were members of the same club as the defendant and that the defendant had conducted false correspondence with other persons in the names of B. and of C., held inadmissible, as not relevant to prove motive, intent, common plan, or any other evidential element; three judges dissenting); N. C.: 1892, State v. Best, 111 N. C. 638, 640, 15 S. E. 930 (wife-murder by poisoning; the presence of uneaten poisoned food in the house, admitted); Oh.: 1853, Farrer v. State, 2 Oh. St. 54, 61, 67 (murder by arsenic of a child in the family, by the defendant, the nurse, in October, 1851; the fact admitted of deaths of other members of the same family in the same way about the same time; it may be done to another person;[1] it may not accompany immediately the act charged;[2] and it may occur at a time subsequent.[3] The precedents illustrate these various aspects of the principle.[4] but the fact rejected of the death of I., a former mistress of the defendant, in the same way, in the preceding August, before the defendant came to F.'s house; Bartley, C. J., diss.); 1875, Brown v. State, 26 id. 176, 180 (poisoning horses; the fact admitted of the poisoning of other horses about the same time in the same village, to indicate that the defendant had inflicted the injuries and had given out that a general epidemic prevailed, with the design of profiting by treating the horses professionally for cure); Pa.: 1872, Shaffner v. Com., 72 Pa. 60 (wife-murder by poison; the defendant had ... criminally intimate with Susan C. for many years, during the life of his first wife, and married the deceased, his second, while Susan C. was still unmarried; the criminal relation continued, C. was married to S., and both lived in the defendant's house; S.'s life was insured for his wife in November, 1870; he died in February, 1871, and the defendant collected the insurance; then the defendant's wife died in June, 1871; an offer by the prosecution to show that the cause and circumstances of the two deaths were similar, and that the defendant attended both, was rejected, because the other facts did not show that the death of S. and the wife could have been "contemplated as parts of one plan in his mind in which the taking of S.'s life was part of his purpose of taking the life of his wife"; the opinion works out the application of the principle carefully and instructively, and is worth study as a useful illustration of method; though the conclusion reached is perhaps a strained one); 1882, Goersen v. Com., 99 id. 388, 390, 398 (wife-murder by arsenic-poison; the fact that the wife's mother, living in the same house and attended by the defendant, had died a few days before in the same way and that her daughter succeeded to her property in remainder after her life-estate, was received "to show his purpose and intent, and the system by which that purpose was to be accomplished, and to connect the death of both women with that purpose and intent"; also "to rebut the theory that the death of Mrs. G. was the result of accident or suicide, or of the negligent or ignorant use or administering of arsenic by either his wife or by him"); Wis.: 1892, Zoldoske v. State, 82 Wis. 580, 599, 52 N. W. 778 (poisoning of E., the supposed intended wife of M.; the death of M.'s wife by poison, admitted to negative the accidental nature of E.'s death, E. and M.'s wife being obstacles in the way of defendant's marriage to M.).

[1] People v. Wilson, Cal.; though this is not frequent, and its propriety is sometimes, though erroneously, denied: People v. Gibbs, N. Y.

[2] Ross v. State, Ala., State v. Merkley, Ia. State v. Patza, La., People v. Jones, N. Y.

[3] R. v. Voke, Eng.; in People v. Hopson, N. Y., a subsequent act was excluded.

[4] 1823, R. v. Voke, R. & R. 531 (by all the Judges; assault with intent to kill; defence, accident; the fact of the accused having run away after the firing and concealed himself beside the road ahead, and then fired again at the same person, was received to prove the intent); 1877, Hickey v. Fitzgerald, 41 U. C. Q. B. 303 (assault; question to the plaintiff as to prior fights, excluded); 1878, Ross v. State, 62 Ala. 224 (assault with intent to commit murder; previous assaults upon the same person on the same evening, admitted to show intent); 1893, Horn v. State, 102 id. 144, 151, 279, 15 So. 278 (assault with intent to kill; an attempt to shoot the wife and the clerk immediately after, admitted; Freeman, J., diss.); 1898, Gaston v. State, 117 id. 162, 23 So. 682 (shooting a gun across a public road; defence, accidental discharge; declarations just before of an intent to shoot at Mr. Bryan's picture, admitted); 1899, Ellis v. State, 120 id. 333, 25 So. 1 (assault with intent to kill; previous "difficulty" between the parties, admitted); 1897, People v. Wilson, 117 Cal. 688, 49 Pac. 1054 (shooting an officer; a shooting of others just preceding the arrest, admitted to show intent); 1899, People v. Teixeira, 123 id. 297, 55 Pac. 988 (assault with intent; another assault about the same time upon the injured person's companion, admitted); 1888, State v. Merkley, 74 Ia. 695, 39 N. W. 111 (burning an adopted child with a hot iron, with intent to kill; other similar burnings of the child admitted to show intent); 1848, State v. Patza, 3 La. An. 512 (stabbing with intent to kill; a former attempt to poison the same person by putting laudanum in her wine, admitted); 1900, State v. Cavanaugh, 52 id. 1251, 27 So. 704 (assault with intent to kill; assault on the same person the previous night, excluded); 1897, State v. Raper, 141 Mo. 327, 42 S. W. 935 (defendant's riotous misconduct before an assault, admitted to show intent); 1845, People v. Hopson, 1 Den. 574 (assault and battery on a constable and resisting him in performing his duty; an assault on him ten days later while the same proceedings of execution were being carried out, excluded); 1875, Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 228 (the purpose of taking up a weapon, shortly before assaulting with it, admitted to show the purpose at the time of the assault); 1883, People v. Gibbs, 93 id. 470 (assault with intent to kill M.; the defendant had entered M.'s house, claiming the right to it, and about 8 o'clock shot at M.; then about half-past 9 J. came, and took M.'s part, who was absent, and the defendant attempted to shoot him; excluded, as throwing no light on the intent in assaulting M., and also because "the principle upon which evidence is admitted ... other offences to show the intent ... has no application to a case of this kind"; no cases cited; clearly wrong); 1885, People v. Jones, 99 id. 667, 2 N. E. 49 (wife-murder, by shooting; as indicating whether he fired in anger to § 365. Other Principles, discriminated. (1) According to the principle of § 218, ante, another act may be evidenced so far as it is an inseparable part of the whole act charged. This is simply because in narrating the one it is impracticable to avoid describing the other, and not because the other has any evidential purpose. The phrase res gestæ is sometimes used to sanction the admission of such acts, but it merely serves to obscure thought and to confuse principle. Either the act is an inseparable part of the main act or res gestæ, in which case it has no evidential function; or it serves to evidence intent or the like, in which case it must be tested by the foregoing principles. This latter purpose is often the one really in mind when this phrase is used, — as where the other act is said to "color" or "characterize" the main act charged;[1] obviously this is an evidential use, throwing light on the intent, and the phrase res gestæ not only has no real application but introduces a loose and unworkable test.

(2) Another act of violence may need to be offered so as to assist in identifying the defendant, — as where it is shown that the same person did both acts, and then that the defendant did the other (post, § 413).

(3) Prior acts of violence by the defendant against the same person, besides evidencing intent, may also evidence emotion or motive, i. e. a hostility showing him likely to do further violence; this principle is elsewhere dealt with (post, § 396). The practical difference is that in the latter use the acts may range over a wider period of time (as indicating an enduring emotion) than in the present use, where they must be fairly near in time in order to throw light on the design or intent of the act charged.

(4) Threats of violence are in themselves expressions of a design to injure, and are accordingly dealt with elsewhere (ante, §§ 105–109).

13. Miscellaneous Offences.

§ 367. Treason, Sedition, Riot, Trespass, Gaming, Liquor-Selling, Electoral Offences, etc. The foregoing principles apply to this class of evidence in any offence where knowledge, intent, or design is to be proved. What is to be kept in mind is that the Intent principle (ante, § 302) is available wherever the intent accompanying an act is to be shown, the other acts being so far similar as to negative by their recurrence that innocent intent which might be conceded for one occasion but becomes less supposable with every repetition; and that the Design or System principle (ante, § 304) has application wherever the doing of the act itself is to be proved, and the design or system pointing towards it is to be inferred from other acts indicating by their common features its existence. These principles may thus have application frighten her, or fired intending to kill, the fact was admitted of two prior shootings at his wife during the preceding twelve months; no cases cited); 1892, Moore v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 234, 236, 20 S. W. 563 (assault with intent to kill; indecent language to the assaulted, just before, admitted); 1900, Hamilton v. State, 41 id. 644, 56 S. W. 927 (assault with intent to kill; prior assaults on the same person during a year or more, admitted); 1866, Devine v. Rand, 38 Vt. 621, 627 (trespass for beating, kicking, throwing into the snow, placing on a hot stove, etc.; the various acts of cruelty admitted to show the intent, exemplary damages being allowable for wilful trespass).

[1] E. g., People v. Marble, Mich., ante, § 363.

on a charge of rioting or the like,[1] keeping a disorderly house,[2] gambling, or keeping a lottery,[3] committing a wilful trespass to property,[4] uttering a criminal libel,[5] refusing a vote,[6] or casting a vote,[7] packing a jury,[8] and sundry other offences.[9]

[1] 1820, R. v. Hunt, 3 B. & Ald. 566, 569, 573 (mob-meeting; acts of various parts of the mob admitted to show its intent as a whole); 1876, R. v. Mailloux, 16 N. Br. 499, 507, 512, 516 (indictment for a riot; evidence to explain away conduct previous to the day alleged was rejected, because it did not call for explanation); 1844, State v. Renton, 15 N. H. 169, 170, 174 (riot on the 4th of July, 1842; the fact that the celebrations on that anniversary in 1839, 1840, and 1841 were riotous, and that the defendant took part in them, excluded). The various other questions of evidence that become material in proving mob violence are analyzed, with cross-references, post, § 1790.

[2] 1896, Roop v. State, 58 N. J. L. 479, 34 Atl. 749 (former keeping of a disorderly house, that being the offence charged, excluded); 1897, Parks v. State, 59 id. 573, 36 Atl. 935 (keeping a disorderly house; matters connected with a similar offence in another State, excluded). For other acts as showing the inmates' character, see ante, § 204.

[3] 1898, Toll v. State, 40 Fla. 169, 23 So. 943 (keeping a gaming room; where acts within the period charged are shown, acts prior and subsequent are admissible to illustrate); 1866, Dunn v. People, 40 Ill. 469 (lottery; the defendant called it a "gift-sale"; and other envelopes and advertisements were admitted to show its real nature); 1871, Thomas v. People, 59 id. 160, 162 (lottery; other tickets, bills, and advertisements, connected with the same enterprise, admitted to show intent); 1878, Miller v. Com., 13 Bush 737 (maintaining a lottery; the fact admitted of its regular maintenance for several years preceding the time alleged); 1888, Com. v. Ferry, 146 Mass. 209, 15 N. E. 484 (pool-selling in rooms kept for the unlawful purpose of so selling, etc.; the carrying on of such transactions shortly before, admitted); 1885, Clark v. State, 47 N. J. L. 556, 4 Atl. 327 (sale of lottery tickets; the sale of a ticket to another person, not admitted "for the purpose of showing that the defendant would be likely to commit the crime charged").

[4] 1897, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hill, 115 Ala. 334, 22 So. 163 (in proving, to recover a penalty, that a trespass was wilful and knowing, under the statute, the breaking down of the fence at the same time may be shown); 1903, State v. Roscum, — Ia. —, 93 N. W. 293 (malicious mischief; larceny of similar articles two years before, excluded); 1895, Mayer v. R. Co., 90 Wis. 522, 63 Mo. 1048 (to show that the defendant had piled snow at a certain crossing, the fact that it had piled snow at other adjacent points was admitted).

[5] 1791, R. v. Pearce, Peake 75 (several other paragraphs about the plaintiff by the defendant were admitted in corroboration, to prove him the author).

[6] 1870, Friend v. Hamill, 34 Md. 298, 305 (action by a Democrat for malicious and corrupt refusal of an election officer to allow him to vote; the fact was received of the defendant's prior declaration that the plaintiff and certain others should not vote, the fact that these persons were not allowed to vote, and the fact that they were all Democrats while the defendant was a Republican). Compare the jury cases infra.

The following case illustrates a similar application: 1899, People v. Alton, 179 Ill. 615, 54 N. E. 421 (mandamus to compel the allowance of the relator's negro children to attend the public schools; an ordinance authorized the superintendent or the board committee to assign pupils to specific schools; the relator's children were alleged to have been excluded from schools containing white children only and sent to schools containing negro children only; to prove that the exclusion was made with sole intent to discriminate on grounds of race, the treatment of other negro children by the defendant was admitted).

[7] 1895, People v. Shee, 147 N. Y. 78, 41 N. E. 508 (admitting evidence of previous repeating, to show a general design of fraudulent voting).

[8] 1848, R. v. Mitchel, 6 State Tr. N. s. 599, 630 (challenge to the array because not impartially selected by the sheriff; the fact that among the qualified persons the Catholics and the Protestants were as two to one, but on the panel were as one to five, held admissible as tending to show an unfair intent in the sheriff; quoted ante, § 302); 1848, R. v. O'Doherty, ib. 831, 881, 888 (same); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 id. 1, 28, 30 (similar); 1848, R. v. Duffy, ib. 795, 859, 870 (similar facts allowed, but the ruling is obscure, apparently from a failure to distinguish between religious disproportion as a ground of challenge and the same as evidence of corrupt selection); 1903, Binyon v. U. S., — Ind. T. —, 76 S. W. 265 (grand jurors discriminated against, in selection, on account of race; evidence held insufficient on the facts); 1903, Carter v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 76 S. W. 437 (similar question; evidence held insufficient).

[9] 1890, Dodd v. State, 92 Ala. 61, 9 So. 467 (carrying a concealed pistol; the fact of the use of a pistol shortly before, excluded); 1855, Thomas v. State, 103 Ind. 419, 431, 434, 2 N. E. 808 (knowingly sending a lewd letter; another letter to the same person, admitted); 1896, Meyer v. State, 59 N. J. L. 310, 36 Atl. 483 (knowingly and unlawfully prescribing medicine to C. without a license; the fact excluded of similar unlawful prescriptions to others; the Court treat it as character-evidence, and ignore its use as indicating intent or scheme); 1866, The Springbok, 5 Wall. 1, 7, 25, 27 (confiscation of goods of a neutral, captured between England and Nassau, and consigned to Nassau, a block-

The violation of the laws in regard to intoxicating liquors involves constantly the use of evidence under the present principles. There are four chief varieties of offences under these laws: selling, being a common seller, keeping with intent to sell, and keeping a place for the purpose of sale. (1) The first may raise the question how far an intent may be evidenced by other instances, and how far a design or plan, as showing probably an actual sale, may be evidenced by former acts of the sort.[10] (2) The second involves the principle of separate instances to show a character or habit (ante, § 203).[11] (3) The third may raise the question how far other acts of keeping or selling may be received to show the intent;[12] (4) and the fourth may raise the same question.[13] The answers are not difficult, so far as they depend on the application of the foregoing principles. But in order to discriminate properly the various other questions of substantive law and criminal pleading which occasionally bear a superficial resemblance to the evidential questions, it would become necessary to consider a great variety of local statutory material and a mass of decisions having no bearing on the law of evidence. Nothing short of a treatise on the law of intoxicating liquors could do justice to the subject,[14] so that it seems better on the whole to omit any treatment of it here.

ade of Confederate ports then prevailing; issue, whether the cargo was destined by the shippers for transshipment at Nassau to a Confederate port; to evidence the intention, the facts were admitted that two other vessels, the Gertrude and the Hart, recently captured on their way to blockaded ports, had a cargo consigned by the same shippers, of the same classes of goods marked in the same way, and that many consecutively numbered bales, missing in the other two vessels, were found on the Springbok); 1898, Safter v. U. S., 31 C. C. A. 1, 87 Fed. 329 (mailing lewd letters; subsequent adultery of the defendant with the addressee, held irrelevant).

[10] 1898, Chipman v. People, 24 Colo. 520, 52 Pac. 677 (sale of liquor said to have been in good faith for medicinal purposes; the sale being denied and the medicinal use being immaterial, evidence of other sales to disprove good faith was held improperly admitted); 1877, State v. Shaw, 58 N. H. 73 (illegal liquor-selling; sales during the same month, admitted as showing a plan or course of business); 1895, Fosdahl v. State, 89 Wis. 482, 62 N. W. 185 (illegal selling of whiskey on Oct. 29, 1892; illegal selling of beer and whiskey during the summer of 1892, excluded; but illegal possession during October, 1892, admissible, apparently to show the selling charged).

[11] 1890, People v. Haas, 79 Mich. 457, 461, 44 N. W. 923 (illegal sales shortly before the date charged, admitted); and instances cited ante, § 203.

[12] 1876, State v. Plunkett, 64 Me. 534 (keeping with intent; former sales admitted; here a conviction for illegal selling); 1885, Com. v. Cotton, 138 Mass. 501 (keeping liquor with intent to sell unlawfully; the defendant was the driver of a wagon sent out from the city, where sales were lawful, to a suburb where they were unlawful; the fact of deliveries in the same suburb three and four months before was admitted to show intent); 1895, Com. v. Vincent, 165 id. 18, 42 N. E. 332 (keeping liquor illegally; to show intent, the fact was admitted of intoxicated men leaving the place some weeks before; that "the same condition of things existed both before and after the day named" was admissible "for the purpose of showing the intent with which the liquors were kept on the day set forth"); 1897, Hans v. State, 50 Nebr. 150, 69 Mo. 838 (sales shortly before, admitted to show the intent of keeping); 1898, State v. White, 70 Vt. 225, 39 Atl. 1085 (keeping with intent to sell on June 18; keeping with intent to sell on Sept. 14 of same year, admitted to show intent). Another principle to be distinguished is that which, while allowing a range between certain dates for the offence proved at the trial, forbids the attempt to prove more than one as the basis of the charge, on the ground that each juror might regard a different one as proved, e. g. Boldt v. State, 72 Wis. 14, 38 N. W. 177.

[13] 1860, Com. v. Edds, 14 Gray 406, 408 (keeping a tenement used for illegal sales of liquor; after evidence of the keeping of the tenement, the fact of sales by others in the absence of the defendants was received); 1871, Sherman v. Wilder, 106 Mass. 537, 540 (the intent charged being to give a lease knowingly to one selling liquor illegally, the intent at another time was admitted); 1896, People v. Caldwell, 107 Mich. 374, 65 N. W. 213 (former sales, admitted to show a general plan).

[14] Consult Black, Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 499–527, et passim. Compare the cases cited post, § 382.

In treason, the period of the Restoration saw a general improvement in the definition of the crime as well as in its procedure and rules of evidence (post, § 2036), — an improvement which was permanently established by the practice under Lord Holt after the Revolution and the accession of William and Mary. As a part of this advance there came in the doctrines of criminal law and pleading that treason must consist in an overt act (which was in truth a revival of an ancient limitation), and that no overt act other than such as is charged in the indictment can be proved as constituting the offence.[15] But this latter doctrine was one of pleading only; and it did not prohibit the use of other overt acts as evidential of intent under the present principle;[16] and this result has been accepted in applying our own constitutional enactment of the same rule.[17]

In sedition (including seditious riot and seditious libel), other acts and utterances are receivable, under the present principles, to evidence seditious intent.[18] In the same way, the accused may offer his other utterances and acts to evidence his loyal (i. e. non-seditious) intent,[19] — an application of the rule which became well enough established as law, but was no doubt hampered by its apparent relation to other rules which might have prohibited it, such as the character-rule (ante, § 195) and the rule for innocent conduct (ante, § 293).[20]

14. Civil Cases.

§ 370. In general. The foregoing principles are equally as applicable to civil cases as to criminal cases, and to the use of other torts, sales, forgeries, or the like, in evidencing similar issues in civil cases. The peculiarity of the question involved is merely whether and under what conditions other similar acts are receivable to show Knowledge, Intent, or Design as to the act charged. This question is of much less frequent occurrence in civil [15] 1696, R. v. Vaughan, Salk. 634 ("a distinct overt act cannot be given in evidence unless it relate to that which is alleged or conduces to the proof of it. But if it conduce to prove an overt act alleged, it is good evidence"). For the history of the rule, see the following authorities: 1660, Regicides' Trials, 5 How. St. Tr. 947, 976; 1762, Foster, Crown Law, 245; 1803, East, Pleas of the Crown, I, 130.

[16] R. v. Vaughan, supra.

[17] 1799, U. S. v. Fries, Whart. St. Tr. 482, 585, 594 ("evidence may be given of other circumstances or even of other overt acts, connected with that on which the indictment is grounded, and occurring or committed in any other part of the district than the place mentioned, . . . to show the quo animo, the intent, with which the act laid was committed"); 1807, Burr's Trial, Robertson's Rep. I, 472 (acts of treason elsewhere than as charged, admissible, since they, "by showing a general evil intention, render it more probable that the intention in the particular case was evil").

[18] 1820, R. v. Hunt, 1 State Tr. N. S. 171, 476, 486, 491 (seditious meetings; resolutions at a similar meeting shortly before, admitted to show intent and design); 1821, Redford v. Birley, Ib. 1071, 1237 (seditious mob; antecedent doings of the same persons, admitted); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 Id. 1, 75 (sedition; other speeches than those charged, six months before, admitted to show intent).

[19] 1683, Lord Russell's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 577, 622; 1684, Rosewel's Trial, 10 Id. 147, 197, 206, 212; 1691, Grahme's Trial, 12 Id. 645, 794; 1831, R. v. Cobbett, 2 State Tr. N. S. 789, 877 (seditious libel; the defendant's publications nine years before, received to negative wrongful motive or intent); 1839, R. v. Frost, 4 Id. 85, 380 (treason; former anti-seditious conduct described); 1843, R. v. O'Connor, ib. 935, 1162 (sedition; acts of good conduct testified to); 1843, R. v. O'Connell, 5 Id. 1, 537 (sedition; defendant's speeches in 1841, read to negative seditious intention); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 Id. 1, 260, 266 (sedition; past expressions of loyalty received); 1848, R. v. Rankin, ib. 711, 747 (seditious riot; former assistance to police in quelling riots, received).

[20] Compare also the principles of §§ 461, 1731, 1732, post, which may be thought to have a bearing.

cases than in criminal cases, mainly because the issues of intent and the like are less commonly open in civil cases. But wherever Knowledge or Intent or Design is relevant in a civil case the foregoing principles are equally applicable. Thus, where the act of forgery is in issue, there may be a criminal prosecution for the forgery or there may be a civil action based on the forged document, and the same evidence may be applicable in both. So, where a false representation is charged, it not only may be but usually is a civil case in which the issue arises and the foregoing principles become applicable. In almost every one of the foregoing classes of cases there are instances of the application of the principles in civil litigation. The salient feature is the nature of the issue and the kind of evidence offered, not the penal or the civil form of the proceeding. There are, however, a few classes of cases to be noticed in which the present principles may be applied and yet the opportunity occurs practically in civil litigation only.

§ 371. Copyright Infringement. The infringement of copyright may be evidenced by the aid of the present principle, in connection with another one, actually different, but seldom distinguished in practice. (1) Where B's book is published subsequently to A's, and in B's is found a passage, similar to a passage in A's, but purporting to be composed by B, the reappearance of the same passage points back to A's book as the source of its borrowing, — on the principle of Traces (examined ante, §§ 148, 152). But B may explain away this indication, in showing that there were other sources from which the passage could equally well have been composed, — as, in a directory, from a canvass of the same persons, or, in a guide-book, from observation of the same places; the similarity in reproduction being thus more or less unavoidable. It is only in the rare case when A is the sole source of the information, or when the passages are peculiar in tenor and also identical in wording, that the inference from similarity is a necessary one. But this hypothesis of other sources is not available as an explanation where the same errors — either of fact or of printing — occur in B's passage as well as in A's; and accordingly the recurrence of such errors is a well-established mode of evidencing, to a high degree of probability, the copying of such a specific passage by B from A:

1858, Wood, V. C., in Spiers v. Brown, 31 L. T. 16: "The difficulty that arises in this class of cases [dictionaries] is that they only relate to a subject common to all mankind, and that the mode of expression and language is necessarily so common that two persons may to a very great extent express themselves in identical terms in conveying the instruction or information to society which they are anxious to communicate. The most obvious case is that of figures, such as a table of logarithms, where the calculations are so nicely performed that the result and the expression of the result must be identical; neither is it very easy to vary the order. The same may be said of directories, calendars, court guides, and works of that description. Those are cases in which the only mode of arriving at the amount of labor bestowed is by the common test resorted to of discovering the copy of errors and misprints, indicating a servile copying."

1852, Kindersley, V. C., in Murray v. Bogue, 1 Drewry 353, 360: "Now the use of showing the same errors in both is that . . . if the evidence is unsatisfactory on the question whether the defendant did use the plaintiff's work or not, to show the same errors in the subsequent work that are contained in the original is a strong argument to show copying; . . . which is the ordinary and familiar mode of trying the fact whether the defendant has used the plaintiff's book."

(2) But, assuming that in this way there is shown the probability of the copying of specific passages, it remains to invoke the present principles (of Intent and Design), and to argue that the copying of a number of such passages indicates a more extensive copying of other passages not otherwise shown to have been copied. This argument is always open, and its use has constantly been sanctioned; there can merely be a question of its weight in a given instance.[1] Just what its nature is, however, is not entirely clear. (a) It seems at first sight to be an argument from the System or Design principle (ante, § 304); i.e. because B in various instances copied from A's book, therefore he probably had a general plan to copy, which he carried out in other instances. (b) It is doubtful, however, whether a Court would give much weight to this argument as showing a copying of passages which are merely more or less similar. Practically, the argument is resorted to only where there is a certain similarity in specific passages, and this similarity is attempted to be explained as due to the use of common sources necessarily resulting in similar language or thought; this explanation may suffice to leave the Court in a state of doubt; but if it can be shown that there was copying in other passages also this doubt may dis-

[1] 1809, Longman v. Winchester, 16 Ves. Jr. 269 (Royal Calendar, etc.; the "identity of the inaccuracies" taken as proof of "a vast proportion of the work" being mere copying); 1826, Mawman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 385, 394 (Eldon, L.C.: "When a considerable number of passages are proved to have been copied, by the copying of blunders in them, other passages, which are the same with passages in the original book, must be presumed prima facie to be likewise copied, though no blunders occur in them"; 1839, Lewis v. Fullarton, 2 Beav. 6, 13 (copying of parts taken as justifying an inference of further copying); 1900, Cadieux v. Beauchemin, 31 Can. Sup. 370; 1847, Webb v. Powers, 2 Woodb. & M. 497, 513 (coincidences in descriptions used to determine whether there was a systematic copying); 1869, Lawrence v. Dana, 4 Cliff. 1, 74 ("When a considerable number of passages are proved to have been copied by the copying of the blunders in them, other passages which are the same with the passages in the original book must be presumed, prima facie, to be likewise copied, though no blunders appear in them"; "coincidence of citations" and "identity in the plan and arrangement of the notes" were also treated as evidential); 1887, Publishing Co. v. Keller, 14 C. C. A. 213, 30 Fed. 772 (alleged infringement of a directory; the fact that in 2,800 names and addresses paralleled in the defendant's book 39 material errors were also reproduced, was taken as evidence of a general piracy; "in a case like this, when a close resemblance is the necessary consequence of the use of common materials, the existence of the same errors in the two publications affords one of the surest tests of copying; the improbability that both compilers would have made the same mistakes, if both had derived their information from independent sources, suggests such a cogent presumption of copying by the latter compiler from the first that it can be overcome only by clear evidence to the contrary"); 1888, Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 617, 660, 9 Sup. 177 (the improper use of the plaintiff's headnotes, etc., in some instances in every one of many volumes, taken by the Court as indicating similar use in a "large portion of the work"); 1895, Chicago D. D. Co. v. Chic. D. Co., 13 C. C. A. 8, 66 Fed. 977 (the defendant's directory contained about 60,000 names; 67 errors in the plaintiff's directory were shown to be repeated in the defendant's; no ruling as to evidence, except to admit the above and similar facts indicating system); 1897, West Pub. Co. v. Lawyers' Co-op. Pub. Co., 25 C. C. A. 648, 79 Fed. 756 (the defendant having made a digest of some 38,000 paragraphs, the piracy of a limited number (such as 303 out of 548 examined by the master) was held evidence of a systematic use of the plaintiff's material, indicating piracy in other portions not expressly pointed out; the opportunity and temptation to pirate being similar in the other portions).

appear and the Court become willing to believe that the similarity in question is not entitled to an innocent explanation. In short, the effect is precisely analogous to that of the Intent principle (ante, § 302), where the conceivable innocent explanation of the intent of an ambiguous act is negatived by other instances of the sort. So that perhaps the Intent principle is in essence the one here involved.

§ 372. Contracts (Sale, Agency, Lease, etc.). There is a large class of civil issues in which at least one of the foregoing principles may receive frequent application, — the issue whether a specific contract was made; the fact being offered to be proved by other instances of the making of similar contracts. The argument here is that the other instances indicate a general plan, system, or habit of making such contracts, which was probably carried out in the specific instance, — as where a factory-hand, to show the agreed amount of his wages, offers instances of the same amount being paid to others in the same factory doing the same kind of work. This question theoretically has a place here. But it also verges on and often really is the question of proof of Habit. It is perhaps in most cases merely a matter of words whether these other instances be offered as evidencing a Plan, System, or Design, or be offered as evidencing a Habit or Course of Business. For this reason, and also because there are many instances which strictly involve only the question of Habit, and because the principle is in such cases practically the same for proving both Habit and System, the rulings on such evidence are collected under one head (§§ 376, 377, post).

Sub-title II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION.

Topic VIII: EVIDENCE TO PROVE HABIT, STATUS, COURSE OF BUSINESS, OR CUSTOM.

CHAPTER XIII.

§ 375. General Principle. That a habit, course of business, or custom is relevant to show the doing of an act, has already been seen (ante, §§ 92–98). Evidence of Habit or Custom may of course be furnished testimonially, by a witness who asserts its existence in the form: "A has a habit of riding to the city"; "There is a custom of granting a discount." But the question is now of circumstantial evidence only. Of the three modes of evidencing circumstantially a human quality or condition (ante, § 190), two only are practically here available, namely, specific instances of conduct exhibiting the habit or custom, and the prior or subsequent existence of it. And first, of the former.

At the outset may be distinguished two kinds of things that come to be proved (1) Habit proper, i. e. a course of conduct by an individual; and (2) Custom, or usage, i. e. a course of conduct by a community or other body of individuals.

(1) In evidencing the Habit of an individual, it is impossible to group the precedents with entire exactness, because a Court occasionally excludes the evidence without making it clear whether its objection is to Habit as itself irrelevant to something else, or merely to the evidence of Habit. In general, wherever the evidence excluded is of individual instances, the precedent is considered here. Another obstacle arises through the occasional difficulty of distiuguishing between Habit and other qualities. Where Habit and Disposition (or Character) may both be fairly applicable terms to describe a condition or quality — i. e. that of intemperance —, specific acts would be in most cases inadmissible from the latter point of view (ante, §§ 194, 199, 203), but admissible from the present point of view. Where Habit and Design or System are both conceivably applicable terms, the instances of specific conduct could equally well be treated from the latter point of view (ante, § 372). There must therefore be numerous instances in which the precedents could be as well considered under one principle as under another; and this difficulty is insuperable, until Courts become more exact in indicating the precise effect of their rulings on these points. It is worth while, then, to keep in mind the possible bearings of other principles; for example, the relevancy of Habit, as indicating the doing of an act (ante, §§ 92–98), and of Character or of Capacity, for the same purpose (ante, §§ 65, 85); so also the relevancy of specific conduct as indicating Character (ante, §§ 198–203), or Capacity (ante, §§ 219–225).

(2) In evidencing Custom or Usage of the community or of a trade, the foregoing difficulties do not arise.

§ 376. Individual Habit; Miscellaneous Examples. In general, where a habit of conduct is to be evidenced by specific instances, there is no reason why they should not be resorted to for that purpose. The only conditions (ante, § 32), are (a) that they should be numerous enough to base an inference of systematic conduct, and (b) that they should have occurred under substantially similar circumstances, so as to be naturally accountable for by a system only, and not as casual recurrences. As to the first condition, convenience requires that the discretion of the trial Court should control, in order to avoid the objections of unfair surprise and confusion of issues (ante, §§ 42, 194, post, §§ 1849, 1904). The following passage illustrates this consideration:

1883, Morton, C. J., in Com. v. Ryan, 134 Mass. 223 (murder; the debauched habits of the deceased were alleged by the defendant to have been the cause of her death, and he offered testimony directly to her intoxicated habits; but the facts of particular instances of intoxication were held admissible only in the discretion of the trial judge): "The question is whether . . . the defendant had the right to go into any number of individual instances of intoxication throughout her life, unrestrained by the discretion of the Court. We do not understand that the law gives him such a right. . . . It must be in the power of the Court to limit the amount of the testimony where it may be extended indefinitely, — as in cases of usage, or character, or genuineness of handwriting. Confirmed habits of drunkenness can usually be easily proved without going into the investigation of particular instances; while such investigations, if unlimited, would tend to raise a multiplicity of issues, and to distract and confuse the minds of the jury and to divert them from the real issues of the case. . . . It was within the discretion of the presiding justices to admit or reject the evidence offered of particular acts of drunkenness."

As to the second condition, it may be said that the Courts are apt to require too much, ruling often as if it were their function to require incontrovertible demonstration from each piece of evidence instead of merely to declare it relevant to be considered by the jury. The following passage illustrates the proper treatment:

1835, Shaw, C. J., in Howe v. Thayer, 17 Pick. 91, 96 (the defendant had given a general notice of dissolution of partnership to all creditors; the terms of the notice received by the plaintiff being in question, the terms of the notice to another creditor were admitted): "A man goes forth to a class of persons, all standing in the same relation, to give them a notice affecting their interests alike; if there are ten, and he gives a particular notice to nine, it leads to a probable inference that he gave a like notice to the tenth, where he states that he intended to make no distinction and believes that he notified all alike."[1]

[1] The following is an example of improper and pedantic treatment: 1837, Watts v. Fraser, 7 A. & E. 223, 232 (answering in the negative, "whether or not, in the absence of direct proof, it can be inferred from the printing of one newspaper [or book] which was not circulated, that another exactly corresponding with it was printed" and published in the usual way and quantity).

That a negative habit may be shown, and not merely an affirmative one, seems unquestionable, i.e. that a person systematically omits to do a certain thing; separate instances suffice to persuade us on such matters in everyday life, and they should be received as probative in courts of justice. The only conditions are as before, namely, that the instances be sufficiently numerous, and that they occur under such circumstances as to indicate a general course of behavior under like circumstances.[2]

Subject to the foregoing considerations, and to the distinctions noted in § 375, the proof of habit by specific repeated instances of conduct is allowed in all varieties of situations.[3]

§ 377. Same: in Contracts (Sale, Lease, Loan, Agency, Hiring, etc.). It has already been pointed out (ante, § 372) that it is often difficult to say whether the idea of Habit or that of Plan or System is the more appropriate in evidencing a course of conduct in making contracts. This, however, is after all chiefly a question of words, for the underlying notion and the applicable principle are the same in each case. That principle is (ante, §§ 32, 33) (a) that the instances must be numerous enough, and (b) that they must have occurred under conditions so similar as to indicate a system, plan, or habit of doing that particular thing under similar circumstances. This principle has, however, found slow acceptance in application. The reason seems to have been chiefly a notion that because such evidence would in some cases clearly be improper (even under the above principle), therefore it must be in all cases improper, — an over-cautious attitude founded on a fallacy. Many precedents, however, do distinctly recognize the principle.

[2] 1873, State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528, 532, 549 (to show a habit of omitting the ringing of the bell and the blowing of the whistle at a particular crossing by a particular fireman and engineer, the fact was received of such omissions by them at that place during the preceding year); 1878, State v. B. & M. Railroad, 58 id. 410 (same; compare the citations ante, § 93); 1877, Adams v. Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. 169 (whether a condition of an insurance policy had in fact been waived; the fact held inadmissible that he had never waived such a condition before in other policies, or that he had constantly waived it; the ruling is confused, however, by raising the question of corroborating an impeached witness); 1897, Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Craig, 25 C. C. A. 585, 80 Fed. 488 (to show an abandonment of an employer's rule by the habitual sanction of its disobedience, instances of such sanction under circumstances not entirely similar are admissible; here, a rule forbidding train hands to go between cars in uncoupling).

[3] 1898, Ferner v. State, 151 Ind. 247, 51 N. E. 360 (whether a person was "engaged in the practice of dentistry"; specific instances received); 1899, Eagon v. Eagon, 60 Kan. 97, 57 Pac. 942 (alienation of husband's affections by father; after evidence of defendant's solicitations of the son to abandon the plaintiff, defendant's evidence of a series of acts and solicitations of an opposite tenor were excluded; incorrectly, because they tended to show an habitual course of conduct, and thus to disprove the acts alleged by the plaintiff; Smith, J., diss.); 1861, Gahagan v. R. Co., 1 All. 187 (an issue was whether the defendant's cars were unreasonably standing across the highway; the fact of an unreasonable use of the highway for switching, etc., at times past, excluded; compare the citations ante, § 199); 1878, State v. Shaw, 58 N. H. 73 (illegal sale of liquor; sales at former times, admitted to show "a course of business according to which it would naturally be done"; compare § 367, ante); 1884, Davis v. Lyon, 91 N. C. 444 (libel on a justice of the peace charging him with "habitual abuse of his authority for private gain" by receiving money; evidence received of other cases of his corrupt receipt of money as justice; compare the citations ante, § 203); 1900, Wade v. R. Co., 36 Or. 311, 59 Pac. 875 (particular instances of high speed on former occasions, not admissible to prove speed on the present occasion; compare the citations ante, § 93); 1903, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Summers, — C. C. A. —, 125 Fed. 719, 723 (that the plaintiff on prior occasions on the same day had stopped, looked, and listened, before crossing the track, held inadmissible); 1900, Clark v. Smith, 72 Vt. 138, 47 Atl. 391 (injury by negligent jerking of the car; that "the train was jerked violently at other stations," excluded; compare the citations ante, § 199).

It is impossible to reconcile all the conflicting precedents; but it is possible to explain most of them. The solution of any given case can easily be reached if it is remembered that no technical rule or general policy obstructs such evidence; that the only question can be whether the instances produced do have any real probative value to show a system or plan or habit; that in commercial affairs it is sometimes very unlikely, and sometimes very likely, that a particular contract or term of a contract will be habitually made; and that it is frequently possible to differ in opinion over the solution in a given case, while there may be no difference of opinion as to the principle applicable. The cases may be grouped under three heads: (1) the Authorization of an agent; (2) the making of some other Contract, evidenced (a) by other contracts with the same person, (b) by other contracts with other persons.

(1) Authorization of an agent. Here the use of such evidence has always been sanctioned. Where a general authority to do an act is alleged, and the plaintiff relies on the defendant's having held out the third person as his agent, other instances of the plaintiff's having treated the person as agent for such an act are receivable to show a general holding-out of that person as agent.[1] This principle applies as well to a criminal agency as to a civil agency;[2] for though the facts making a person liable criminally for an agent's act may be different from those involving civil liability, the mode of evidencing a general authority is the same for both.[3]

(2) (a) Contract evidenced by other contracts with the same person. Here

[1] 1794, Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 288 (H. drew a bill on G., payable to F., a fictitious person, or order, and indorsed it in F.'s name; the plaintiff, a bona fide holder for value, in order to show in H. a general authority from G. to draw such bills, offered the fact of many other bills of the sort being drawn and accepted by H. with apparent consent of H.; the objection raised conceded that "a general authority to do such acts . . . can only be inferred by showing an acquiescence of the person supposed to have given such authority in other acts done with his privity or consent," and rested on the failure to show such actual privity to the former drawings; the evidence was held admissible, the grounds not appearing); 1800, Barber v. Gingell, 3 Esp. 61, Kenyon, L. C. J. (to show that the defendant had given authority to T. to accept the bill for him, the drawee, the fact was received of the defendant's having paid several bills drawn like the present by T., a general authority being thus inferrible); 1830, Cash v. Taylor, Ll. & W. C. C. 178, K. B. (similar facts); 1845, Llewellyn v. Winkworth, 13 M. & W. 599 (authorizing the acceptance of another bill is evidence of a general authority to accept bills and therefore to accept the bill in question); 1869, Morris v. Bethell, L. R. 4 C. P. 765 (the fact of a single such former payment as in Barber v. Gingell was held not improperly rejected, no general authority being set up); 1899, Lytle v. Bank, 121 Ala. 215, 26 So. 6 (the giving of other notes by an alleged agent, and their ratification, admitted); 1885, Snn Mut. Ins. Co. v. Barrel Co., 114 Ill. 99, 29 N. E. 477 (previous relations of a broker and an insurance company, admitted to show that the former was authorized to receive the plaintiff's premium); 1854, Lee v. Tinges, 7 Md. 215, 235, 237 (to show ratification of certain settlements by an employer, the ratification of other such settlements by him during the same week was excluded, because made "under circumstances very different from those existing at the time of the occurrence of the principal matter"); 1851, Trull v. True, 33 Me. 367 (whether H. had given S. the authority to sign a note; their business relations admitted); 1824, Irvine v. Buckloe, 13 S. & R. 35 (agency one or two years later, admitted); 1862, Stevenson v. Hoy, 43 Pa. 191, 196 (authority to give a written guaranty; similar guaranties by the same person previously recognized by the defendant, admissible).

[2] Contra: 1896, People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 365, 44 N. E. 1017 (the fact of B. having acted as agent for the defendant in other cases of corrupt official conduct, not admitted to show that B., the actor in the present misconduct, was the defendant's agent then: "It is true that in civil actions upon contract the course of dealing between parties may be proved to establish a general agency, but that principle has no place in criminal jurisprudence").

[3] Cases cited ante, § 4, especially Lord Melville's Trial.

the making of other contracts with the same person should be received to show either the making in general or the specific terms of the contract in question, provided the other instances were so connected as to indicate a general plan or habit of which they were merely parts or illustrations:

1878, Peters, J., in Eaton v. Telegraph Co., 68 Me. 63, 67 (whether A had sold to B, or was merely holding for B, certain certificates of stock in the former's possession; the certificates were in A's name and bore assignments to B; the fact of A's possession as custodian of other certificates of the same stock made out in B's name was received): "The difficulty is to decide what is and what is not relevant evidence. The best authorities clearly sustain the doctrine that 'the fact of a person having once or many times in his life done a particular act in a particular way does not prove that he has done the same thing in the same way upon another and different occasion.' It is sometimes permissible to show, however, what men generally have done under certain circumstances and conditions, as showing how a particular man might act under the same surroundings. . . . Here the dealing inquired about was between the same persons at the same time and related to the same kind of property. The reason of the rule which excludes irrelevant testimony admits such as this." [4]

[4] 1844, Bourne v. Gatliff, 11 Cl. & F. 45, 49, 70 (the defendant, a sea-carrier, claimed the right to deliver goods immediately on the wharf without further responsibility; the fact was received, from the consignor, of former bills of freight and of lading, and of the mode of other deliveries, in consignments between the same parties between the same countries; L. C. Lyndhurst: "That evidence was offered . . . to explain the meaning of the contract by showing what had been the meaning of the parties. It is said that the evidence offered was that of instances of individual contracts. Be it so; that does not render the evidence the less admissible; it may be open to observation on that ground, but it is not inadmissible"); 1895, Bank of Nova Scotia v. Robinson, 33 N. Br. 326, 334 (false representations as to negotiable paper; certain similar prior transactions between the parties, admitted, but on varying grounds); 1903, Zane v. Onativis, 139 Cal. 328, 73 Pac. 856 (whether a sum advanced by plaintiff was a loan to defendant or a deposit for plaintiff's expenses to be paid by defendant; the parties' prior relations as friends, admitted to show the probable intent); 1897, Gardner v. Meeker, 169 Ill. 40, 48 N. E. 307 (whether a note was given for a gaming transaction; the prior and subsequent dealings of the parties, admissible, for a time within the trial Court's discretion); 1899, Mabry v. Cheadle, — Ia. —, 80 N. W. 312 (action for attorney's services; on a plea denying a contract, a prior employment "as leading up to the second employment," allowed to be shown); 1903, Livingston v. Stevens, — id. —, 94 N. W. 925 (previous dealings between the parties showing a "system of dealings" in waiving a mortgage lien, admitted); 1890, Nickerson v. Gould, 82 id. 512, 20 Atl. 86 (whether a note was a forgery; other pecuniary transactions between the parties, admitted); 1898, Wood v. Finson, 91 id. 280, 39 Atl. 1007 (whether the contract for sale of oil to the defendant by a salesman E. involved also an agreement to insure the oil: terms of former similar sales between the same parties, through a salesman C., admitted to show the "probability or improbability of the contract being as claimed by the plaintiff"); 1837, Tibbetts v. Sumner, 19 Pick. 166 (prior and usual course of dealings between the parties, admitted to show whether a particular sale was upon credit); 1859, Farnum v. Farnum, 13 Gray 508 (several prior dealings of lease and loan between the parties, rejected on the facts); 1875, Huntsman v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 521 (promissory note, made by F., alleged to have been indorsed by the defendant, who denied the indorsement; to show the likelihood of the indorsement, F. testified to several such transactions and indorsements about the same time); 1875, Schwerin v. De Graff, 21 Minn. 354 (excavation-contract; the amount excavated in December, under similar conditions as to number of men, etc., admitted to show the probable amount in January and February); 1876, Iron Mountain Bank v. Murdock, 62 Mo. 70, 74 (whether a bookkeeper had inserted an interest-clause in a promissory note without authority after indorsement; the fact that the maker had indorsed four other notes with a clause of that tenor, excluded as irrelevant); 1851, Swamscot M. Co. v. Walker, 22 N. H. 457, 467 (whether the plaintiff's contract was made with the defendant or with W. and F.; the fact that the plaintiff had formerly refused to trust W. and T. for other articles, not admitted to show that they had not here contracted with W. & T.); 1892, Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S. 150, 162, 13 Sup. 288 (whether the payee of a note was in fact an accommodation maker; the "relations," not specified, between the defendant and the payee, admitted); 1896, Welch v. Ricker, 69 Vt. 239, 39 Atl. 200 (to show no agreement to pay for goods furnished to I., the fact that the defendant had paid for goods thus furnished on another such agreement was excluded, as not relevant); 1898, Limerick Nat'l Bank v. Adams, 70 id. 132, 40 Atl. 166 (plaintiff claimed as bona fide purchaser of notes;

(3) Contract evidenced by other contracts with other persons. Here, obviously, though the principle remains the same, the other instances must be more marked in their similarity in order to be admissible to evidence a general plan or habit, because the element of a different personality is so important in affecting the making or the terms of a contract that the likelihood of making a similar contract with different persons is relatively much smaller. It thus happens that the Courts are generally inclined to exclude such evidence, and, in the majority of instances, properly. In the much-cited case of Hollingham v. Head, there has sometimes been discovered an intimation that such evidence as a class is inadmissible; but the later ruling of Woodward v. Buchanan, and in our own country numerous rulings, show that this is an error. There is merely a question in each instance of the probative value of the particular facts offered:

1858, Willes, J., in Hollingham v. Head, 4 C. B. N. S. 388 (to show a warranty, by a travelling agent of a manure-company, that the guano should be equal to Peruvian guano, evidence that other contracts of his contained such a guaranty was rejected): "I am of opinion that the evidence was properly disallowed as not being relevant to the issue. It is not easy in all cases to draw the line and to define with accuracy where probability ceases and speculation begins; but we are bound to lay down the rule to the best of our ability. . . . Now it appears to me that the evidence proposed to be given in this case, if admitted, would not have shown that it was more probable that the contract was subject to the condition insisted upon by the defendant. The question may be put thus: Does the fact of a person having once or many times in his life done a particular act in a particular way make it more probable that he has done the same thing in the same way upon another and different occasion? To admit such speculative evidence would I think be fraught with great danger. . . . If such evidence were held admissible it would be difficult to say that the defendant might not, in any case where the question was whether or not there had been a sale of goods on credit, call witnesses to prove that the plaintiff had dealt with other persons upon a certain credit; or in an action for an assault, that the plaintiff might not give evidence of former assaults committed by the defendant upon other persons, or upon other persons of a particular class, for the purpose of showing that he was a quarrelsome individual and therefore that it was highly probable that the particular charge of assault was well-founded. The extent to which this sort of thing might be carried is inconceivable." [5] other purchases of similar notes from the same person, not received to show a bona fide purchase in this instance); 1899, Koehler v. Koehler, 104 Wis. 260, 80 N. W. 449 (alleged contract with a daughter for services; the fact of a similar contract three years before, excluded). Compare the citations ante, § 94, and post, § 462.

Distinguish the use of other transactions of the parties to interpret the meaning of a contract whose words are not disputed (post, § 2465).

[5] 1792, Carter v. Pryke, Peake 95 (whether rent was payable quarterly or half-yearly; that the plaintiff's other tenants of the same description paid quarterly, excluded); 1806, Spenceley v. Wilmot, 7 East 108 (Qui tam for usury; the fact that the borrower, alleging usury, had on the same and other days received sums for investment as agent, and not as loans, from third persons who belonged to the same circle of intimates as the borrower and the defendant, was rejected; since "whatever contracts the witness might have entered into with other persons for other loans, they could not be evidence of the contract made with the defendant, unless the witness had first said that he had made the same contract with the defendant as he had made with those persons; which he had not said"); 1833, Smith v. Wilkins, 6 C. & P. 180, Tindal, C. J. (assumpsit for goods sold to a wife; defence, that the credit was given to the defendant's father-in-law; the fact that other tradesmen had given her father credit when she bought, rejected); 1836, Borden v. Keverberg, 2 M. & W. 61 (the defendant having pleaded, in assumpsit, that credit had been given to her husband, the plaintiff, after proving her husband to be an absent alien, offered the facts that in her dealings with other tradesmen she had not disclosed her marriage, in order to prove that she had in the contracts with him represented herself as a feme sole; the evidence was rejected, because her failure to disclose was not equivalent

§ 378. Same: in Prescriptive Possession; Surveys and Boundaries evidenced by other Lines. A mode of argument which seems to belong here to an affirmative representation); 1870, Woodward v. Buchanan, L. R. 5 Q. B. 285 (action for plumbing work and materials on a house, the defendant being mortgagee, and the issue of fact being whether he or a contractor had hired the plaintiff; the fact was received that in building the same house and at the same time others of the contracts had been made by the defendant, as showing that he was systematically taking the responsibility; Mellor, J.: "Had the evidence applied to other houses, the authorities might be in point against the admissibility of the evidence"); 1873, Stolp v. Blair, 68 Ill. 541 (assumpsit for $500 loaned for six months, without a note; the fact that the plaintiff had formerly loaned various persons such sums without notes, admitted as rebutting the inference that might be drawn from the failure to take a note); 1892, Schmidt v. Packard, 132 Ind. 398, 402, 31 N. E. 944 (indorsement of a note as transferring ownership; similar indorsements by him on the same day, held admissible to negative intent to transfer); 1893, Roberts v. Dixon, 50 Kan. 436, 31 Pac. 1083 (money loaned on cattle-investments; the terms of defendant's contracts with other investors in the same business, held not admissible to show the terms of plaintiff's investment); 1898, Lexington & E. R. Co. v. Lyons, 104 Ky. 23, 46 S. W. 209 (whether representations as to a ticket were made; similar representations to another person about similar tickets, admitted); 1903, Gill v. Staylor, — Md. —, 55 Atl. 398 (wages of another hand in the same employ, not admitted to show the terms of the plaintiff's contract); 1893, Davis v. Kneale, 97 Mich. 72, 76, 56 N. W. 220 (whether a contract by a subscriber to a factory was made conditionally by C.; the terms of the contract with another subscriber, excluded); 1880, Roles v. Mintzer, 27 Minn. 31, 6 N. W. 378 (to prove that the plaintiff's wages were agreed to be his board only, and not $20 and board and washing, the defendant offered to show that about the same time the plaintiff offered to work for W. for board only; excluded, because "there is no presumption that a person will work for one man on certain terms from the fact that he is willing to work for some other man on those terms"); 1897, Murphy v. Backer, 67 Id. 510, 70 N. W. 799 (defence of usury; question to the plaintiff whether he "had not made certain other usurious loans to other persons at other times," allowed in discretion), 1853, True v. Sanborn, 27 N. H. 383 (selling diseased beef: a sale of unwholesome beef by the defendant several years before, excluded, as not having "such an intimate connection . . . as to lead naturally to the conclusion" alleged); 1827, Jackson v. Smith, 7 Cow. 717 (loans of money on land at an alleged usurious rate, the bond being dated Dec. 22; another usurious bond dated Dec. 21 was offered, and also the fact of two other persons who on applying for loans had been offered the same usurious terms; treated as showing "that N. was in the habit of loaning money at usurious interest," but excluded because it involved "his general character or habit as a usurer"; this is unsound; compare § 216, ante); 1893, McLoghlin v. Bank, 139 N. Y. 514, 522, 34 N. E. 1095 (whether a deposit bore interest; that the depositor had interest-bearing deposits at other banks, excluded); 1900, Lowenstein v. Lombard, 164 Id. 324, 58 N. E. 44 (to show the terms of a contract for carriage by sea, the fact was admitted of contracts by the same agent of the defendant with other parties about the same time, "for the purpose of defining the contract that was actually made"); 1902, Thompson v. Exum, 131 N. C. 111, 42 S. E. 543 (rent-contract of one tenant, not admitted to show the terms of another's); 1876, Coxe v. Deringer, 82 Pa. 236, 258 (payment of taxes in 1832–33; the fact received of the owner's continuous payments on all five tracts in January of biennial periods from 1826 to 1844, then 1849 to 1868; "it was a very natural conclusion that a man who always paid his taxes promptly in biennial periods previous to the time of the sale [1834] would have paid them in time in 1832 and 1833"); 1899, Cravens v. Carter-Crume Co., 34 C. C. A. 479, 92 Fed. 479 (plaintiff agreed to sell his factory products to defendant only, and to close his factory, in consideration of certain shares in the defendant company and a guaranteed dividend; in an action to obtain the dividend, the defence being that the contract was unlawful as having for its object the restraint of trade, similar contracts of other manufacturers with the defendant were admitted); 1858, Phelps v. Conant, 30 Vt. 277, 282 (action on a promise to pay for goods furnished to W.; the fact that the defendant promised to pay another person for other goods furnished to W. was rejected; "nor is there any legal probability that he would pay one because he agreed to pay the other; . . . to have one fact prove another, there must be a necessary or probable connection between the two"); 1886, Aiken v. Kennison, 58 id. 665, 5 Atl. 757 (trover; defence, a contract of purchase different from that asserted by the plaintiff; the question whether the plaintiff had had "other transactions of a similar nature with other people dealing with him" was excluded, since the fact would not amount to "any such course of office or business as would suffice"); 1896, Jones v. Ellis, 68 id. 544, 35 Atl. 488 (to show that stock sold had been warranted, the fact of a warranty in sales of the same stock to another person was not admitted); 1897, Pictorial League v. Nelson, 69 id. 162, 37 Atl. 247 (representations to other persons in the same city in making similar contracts, excluded); 1901, Repass v. Richmond, 99 Va. 508, 39 S. E. 160 (action on a deputy-treasurer's bond; mode of execution of the other deputies' bonds, not admitted); 1893, Hartman v. Evans, 38 W. Va. 669, 673, 18 S. E. 810 (usury; that loans to others by the same person were usurious, excluded); 1884, Kellay v. Schupp, 60 Wis. 76, 18 N. W. 725 (services in

is that by which possession of a whole tract of land is sought to be inferred from specific instances of possession of parts of it. The inference seems to be genuinely one of the present sort, rather than one of mere prior or subsequent possession as a condition or state (post, § 382), because it involves the thought that the separate instances of conduct in relation to the land indicate a larger and habitual course of conduct. The conditions of admissibility are that the various acts should be so connected with each other, as to the topography of the place where they are done, that they suggest a system or course of conduct with reference to other parts of the adjacent land; i. e. that the various places where the acts are shown should be parts of one estate, manor, way, range, section, survey, or other entity, so that acts done upon these would naturally be done only as a part of a system to do them upon the other parts of the same entity. The doctrine has been fully developed in England:

1811, Ellenborough, L. C. J., in Stanley v. White, 14 East 332 (trespass for cutting trees; the title being in dispute, after evidence had been offered that the plaintiff's manor was surrounded on all sides by a belt of land extending fifteen feet beyond a circular hedge, the fact was offered by him of acts of ownership — involving prescriptive title — at parts of this belt other than that where the cutting had occurred; objection, that there was no connection proved between the titles of the several owners around the belt, without which no inference could be drawn in prejudice of one from acts of ownership exercised by the Stanley family against others): "The same law may be shown by general evidence to govern one entire district, though it may affect the rights of different persons in different parts. It is then one entire thing, quoad that district; as in the case of the Border-law. In this case the eye may see that there is one continuity of belt; and the witnesses' proving that the Stanley family have asserted the same right from time to time against different owners in different parts of the belt is evidence of their general right."

1837, Parke, B., in Jones v. Williams, 2 M. & W. 326 (issue between opposite owners as to the title to the bed of a stream, whether the plaintiff owned the whole or only up to the middle; the fact was received that, further down, where the plaintiff's riparian estate was opposite X's land, the former was owner of the whole bed and had done acts of repairing, by taking stones and the like): "[Acts of enjoyment, when used to prove extended possession, need not be precisely on the same spot,] provided there is such a common character of locality between those parts and the spot in question as would raise a reasonable inference in the minds of the jury that the place in dispute belonged to the plaintiff if the other parts did"; so that the plaintiff was "entitled to show the taking of stones not only at the spot in question but all along the bed of the river."[1] cutting logs, etc.; the defendant's promise to pay "one similarly situated," not admitted to show a promise to the plaintiff); 1893, Brunnell v. H. S. M. Co., 86 id. 587, 57 N. W. 364 (trimmer hired at a saw-mill; the contracts of service of other trimmers as to a drawback, excluded); 1897, Oliver v. Morawetz, 95 id. 1, 69 N. W. 977 (to show the price at which a real-estate agent was authorized to sell, the fact of the price so authorized for another agent for the same piece at the same time was not admitted).

Compare the citations ante, § 94, concerning habit as evidence, and also the citations of civil cases ante, §§ 300–370, concerning former instances of forgery, false representations, and the like, to evidence intent or design, and the citations post, § 379, concerning evidence of trade custom or usage. For market-value, as evidencing the probable price of a sale, see post, § 392. Compare also the citations p. t., § 462 (business patronage as evidence of another article's quality).

[1] 1811, Stanley v. White (quoted supra); 1813, Barnes v. Mawson, 1 M. & S. 85 (Ellenborough, L. C. J.: "In the case of an encroachment on a waste, it might not be proved that any acts of ownership had been exercised by the lord upon the very spot; but showing acts of ownership upon other parts within the general ambit of the waste has always been deemed sufficient"); 1831, Doe v. Kemp, 7 Bing. 332 (issue as to the title to a slip of waste alongside

Where the possession of the part is under a deed which covers a larger tract, the principle is the same,[2] but here the inference is stronger, because the deed, by marking the singleness of the entire tract, supplies the place of other evidence of unity of character.

The same principle seems to operate where, from the condition or bearing of a boundary or survey at one point, its condition or bearing at another point may be inferred, provided there is a unity between the two in the sense that the former is a part of the same general line or system of lines (township, range, section, or the like) as the latter is.[3]

§ 379. Custom or Usage, in Trade and Commerce. In evidencing a custom or usage (i.e. the habit of a body of persons) by specific instances, the same general principle as before is applicable; that is, the instances offered (a) should be sufficiently numerous to indicate a fairly regular course of business, and (b) should occur under conditions substantially similar to that in question.

a road; evidence offered for the defendant, as lord of the manor, of acts of ownership upon similar slips further along for several hundred yards, to a bridge, and again beyond it to a common; rejected, as to parts beyond the bridge, since the defendant, though owning enclosed lands adjacent to the slips of waste up to the bridge, owned none beyond it; Bosanquet, J.: "Where evidence is offered of acts done in other places than the place in dispute, it is for the judge to decide, in the first instance, whether there is such a unity of character in the different parts as to render evidence affecting a part not in dispute admissible with reference to the part in dispute"); 1837, Jones v. Williams (quoted supra); 1844, Doe v. Roberts, 13 M. & W. 520, 530 (Parke, B.: "How can you show a title to the whole estate except by acts of ownership in different parts?" Counsel: "That would be only where there is some evidence of a general right." Parke, B.: "There is such evidence here"); 1878, Lord Blackburn, in Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 670 ("Acts of ownership on parts of a tract are evidence to prove ownership on the whole [quoting Parke, B., in Jones v. Williams]. This, which I think is the right rule, makes the weight of the evidence depend on the nature of the locality and of the acts, and on what it is reasonable for a jury to infer"); 1882, Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 151, 166 (acts of fishery in several other parts of a river, admitted, there being evidence that the whole region was treated "as unum quid"); 1902, South v. Deaton, — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 137 (possession of part of a tract, treated as evidence of possession of the whole); 1847, Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 633, 746 (a series of acts of possession over a large district were apparently used on the present principle); 1867, Abeel v. Van Gelder, 36 N. Y. 513, 515 ("The defendants offered to show that for a great number of years they had cut wood and timber yearly on the premises adjoining the locus in quo and up to and along the line thereof, for the use of their adjoining premises. . . . Where the locus in quo and the territory on which the acts indicating ownership were done are similarly situated as regards inclosures and other circumstances, such acts may be proved with a view to show occupation of the land in dispute and an intention to maintain and assert their right of ownership").

The principle is equally applicable to the possession of personalty: 1827, Moon v. Hawks, 2 Aik. 390 (issue as to the title to a mare possessed by R., and claimed by him to be a gift from the plaintiff; R.'s possession and claim being prima facie sufficient to show title, his possession and claim of another mare, delivered to him at the same time by the plaintiff in payment of a legacy, were admitted; "any act of ownership over either . . . would be evidence as it respects the other").

[2] E.g., 1884, Lancey v. Brock, 110 Ill. 609, 612. But this use is seldom judicially distinguished from the rule of substantive law by which possession of a part, under a deed, is deemed legally equivalent to possession of the whole, i.e. a constructive possession; 1866, Bowman v. Wettig, 39 Ill. 416, 426 (possession of part under a deed to the whole is possession of the whole, and thus prima facie evidence of title to whole, as against a mere trespasser showing no paper title). Here the deed is used, as a verbal act, to color the possession, under the principle of § 1778, post; see Sedgwick and Wait, Trial of Title to Land, §§ 761–781.

[3] 1898, Olsen v. Rogers, 121 Cal. 225, 52 Pac. 486 (boundary line making uniform subdivisions; survey of one lot received to indicate the lines of an adjacent one); 1893, Goldsborough v. Pidduck, 87 Ia. 599, 601, 54 N. W. 431 (adjacent lines, etc., used to determine lines of connected blocks); 1844, Overton's Heirs v. Davisson, 1 Gratt. 211, 227 (the description of another survey of a coterminous tract, admissible to show the boundary); 1856, Clements v. Kyles, 13 id. 468, 479 (same); 1895, Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 21 S. E. 347 (same).

(a) Under the first head, no difficulty seems to arise; the discretion of the trial Court should control.[1]

(b) Under the second head, it is obvious that there must be such a similarity or unity of conditions that what is done by one or more persons or sets of persons may be taken as indicating the probable general habit of the class of persons under similar circumstances. Here there is much opportunity for difference of opinion in given cases. The precedents illustrate all sorts of trades and usages, and no detailed generalization seems feasible. It is enough to point out (1) that no particular circumstance is conclusive either pro or con; (2) that instances from another trade or another region are not necessarily without probative value, while instances from the same trade and the same locality are not necessarily admissible; and (3) that the question is not whether the offered instances fully prove the custom alleged, but merely whether they are receivable as having probative value:

1780, Noble v. Kennoway, 2 Doug. 510, the plaintiff's vessel, bound to Labrador, delayed landing her cargo and was captured; to show that the delay was reasonable and customary, and thus could not forfeit the insurance, the custom was offered in the Newfoundland trade to keep their goods on board several months; it was objected that "Newfoundland and Labrador are distant and discontiguous, and although the object of the voyages to both may be the fishery, yet the fishing trade is conducted very differently at different places; would the practice at Greenland, Nova Zembla, on the coast of Scotland, or in the new whale fishery in the Mediterranean, be evidence in this case?" Lord Mansfield, C. J.: "The trade of fishing on the coast of Newfoundland, especially from the west of England, has been known and practised for many years. Since the treaty of Paris, a new trade has been opened to Labrador. . . . It is well known that the fishery is the object of the voyage, and the same sort of fishing is carried on in the same way at Newfoundland. I still think the evidence was properly admitted to show the nature of the trade"; Buller, J.: "If it can be shown that the time [of delay] would have been reasonable in one place, that is a degree of evidence to prove that it was so in another; the effect of such evidence may be taken off by proof of a difference of circumstances"

1867, Pigot, C. B., in M'Fadden v. Murdock, 1 Ir. C. L. 218 (the question being as to proof from other trades of the fact and amount of loss in handling particular goods by retail): "It was argued that Mr. C. ought not to have been allowed to give evidence of what occurred in his own trade, or of the losses which he himself had sustained in the course of his own experience. If he founded his judgment on facts not similar to those which were proved in the present case, the argument would be most cogent. But if he stated (as I think he did) what occurred in his own trade in matters similar to those which, on the very point of controversy, were proved to have existed in the trade of the defendant, then the evidence would appear to be admissible."

1895, Gaines, C. J., in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Reed, 88 Tex. 439, 31 S. W. 1058 (excluding evidence of the custom on other railroads as to a foreman's authority over railroad hands): "Did the fact that other railroad companies gave that authority to such servants tend to throw light upon the question? We think not. It is a matter of policy in the management of internal affairs upon which one manager would have one opinion, while another or all others might pursue a different course. One owner of a plantation might intrust his superintendent with power to employ and discharge hands; another might reserve that right to himself, or commit it to another agent. . . . [As to excluding evidence of the custom on the same road at large stations, while admitting the custom at small stations like the one in question,] the conditions at large stations, where much freight and many cars were to be handled, are so different from those at small places that we are of opinion that the practice at the latter raises no presumption that the same practice existed at the former." [2]

[1] Of course individual instances, offered one at a time, are receivable; the practical question is commonly whether enough have been offered to suffice to go to the jury (post, § 2494). But even a single one may suffice for this purpose: 1770, Doe v. Mason, 3 Wils. 63 (custom of descent); 1813, Roe v. Jeffery, 2 M. & S. 92 (custom to bar entails; Ellenborough, L. C. J.: "It is true that one act undisturbed does not make a custom; but it will be evidence of a custom"). There was an old French law maxim, "une fois n'est pas coutume" (Glasson, Hist. du droit, etc. de la Fr., vi, 546).

For the different question whether one witness' testimony may suffice to establish a custom, see post, § 2053.

