Being the 39th and 40th clauses of Magna Charta, 15th June, 1215, which is on everybody's lips, but in nobody's head.

KING JOHN was a rascal, he was an able, vicious, treacherous, tyrannical, ungrateful, lustful brute. It was this conduct which gave rise to "MAGNA CHARTA," by the aid of which English History took the direction of securing constitutional liberty by Administrative Law. It asserted the rights and powers of Englishmen to be greater than the king. It systematized the scattered fragments of liberty, and it formed the first and greatest Public Act of Anglo-Saxons, Normans and Englishmen, who by it established their identity and their unity for all time to come.

Abounds with scandal and interesting anecdotes of the great ones and other royal and loyal persons who turn night into day and day into night on account of their evil lives and dark deeds, and whose descendants, many without parents, continue to live on a GRATEFUL BRITISH PUBLIC. For proof of this assertion see ALLISON'S Essays, and also Blackwood's Magazine. Like a good man our author endured three months imprisonment and paid a fine of five hundred pounds.
