Mr. Asper obtained leave, and asked permission to take our hero with him, to which Mr. Sawbridge consented.

Many other officers obtained leave, and, among others, this boatswain, who, aware that his services would be in request as soon as the equipment commenced, asked permission for this evening. And Mr. Sawbridge, feeling that he could be better spared at this than at any other time, consented. Asper and Jack went to an inn, dined, bespoke beds, and then dressed themselves for the ball, which was very brilliant, and, from the company of the others, it is ball, which was very brilliant, and, from the company of the others, it is ball, which was very pleasant. IN WHICH OUR HERO PREFERS GOING DOWN TO GOING UP; A CHOICE, IT IS TO BE HOPED, HE WILL REVERSE UPON A MORE IMPORTANT OCCASION.

The next day being Sunday, the hands were turned up to divisions; and the weather not being favourable, instead of the service the articles of war were read with all due respect shown to the same, the captain, officers, and crew with their hats or in a mizzling rain. Jack, who had been told by the captain that these articles of war were the rules and regulations of the service, by which the captain, officers, and men were equally, bound, listened to them as they were read by the clerk with the greatest at tention. He little thought that there were about twe hundred orders from the Admiralty tacked on to them, which, like the numerous codicils of some wills, like the numerous codicils of some wills, that is to say, if they last so long: and provided they do not I am able to replace them with another old toothpanion to a man beneath him in every way, but who, upon the strength of Jack's liberal opimons, presumed to be his equal. Jack's equality did not go so far as that; in theory it was all very well, but in practice it was only when it suited his own purpose.

But the purser's steward was not to be checked—a man who has belonged to the swell mob is not easily repulsed; and, although Jack would plainly show him that his company was not agreeable, Easthupp would constantly according to the forecastle and lower deck, with his arms folded, and with an air almost amounting to famili-The Harpy remained a fortnight in Gibraltar Bay, and Jack had occasionally a run on shore, and Mr. Asper inwith an air almost amounting to familiarity. At last Jack told him to go about his business, and not presume to about his business, and not presume to talk to him; whereupon Easthupp, re-joined, and after an exchange of hard words, it ended by Jack kicking Mr. Easthupp, as he called himself, down the after-fower-deck. This was but a board a man-of-war everybody and everything must find its level. There was on board of his majesty's sloop Harpy, a man of the name of Easthupp, who did the duty of purser's steward; this was the second ship that he had served in: in the former he had been sent with a draft of men from the commends it to the taste and intelligence of all classes.

F. I the benefit of those merchants at a distance who are not already familiar with the trading facilities and the great resources of the North shore Counties, it may not be inappropriate to state that the prospect of material prosperity for this district is remarkably hopeful. During the coming year nearly twe number dulies of Radlway—a portion of the Intercolonial Line from Quebes to Halifax—will be opened for traffic, communicating with all the principal business centres in five great Counties, and casuring the development of large tracts of country hitherto comparatively inaccessible. The Milling Interest, already very extensive and prosporous, is capable and certain of being largely developed, as it is an admitted fact that the fin st timber reserves of the Maritime Provinces are to be found in the Counties Indicated. The Fishing resources of the Gulf are unlimited and invaluable, and may be relied on for the basis of a great and flourishing industry for generations to come. Lines of Steamers between the Upper and Lower Provinces touch at the most prominent ports, affording, during the season of navigation, constant and rapid means of transportation of freight, while internal steam communication by water is well established and increasing.

ole column advertisements will be inserted at twice the above prices per inch and twenty per cen As the above prices will be strictly adhered to advertisers may send their orders by mail and know e Those who desire to take the paper on trial for two months can have the first nine numbers mailed to heir address on payment, through the mails or personally, of twenty-five cents to the subscriber.
