Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is Motion No. 19 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members have risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Is it the pleasure of the House that I call it one o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock.

At 12.56 p.m. the House took recess.

TAX REFORM

FOOD TAX—INVITATION TO ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA TO MEET REAL CITIZENS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Saint-Marie): Mr. Speaker, we have just learned today that, regardless of the wishes expressed by most Canadians, the Economic Council of Canada is urging the Conservative Government to tax bread, milk and butter.

Mr. Speaker, I want to dissociate myself from this kind of recommendation made by the Economic Council of Canada. It is all too easy for an economist sitting in his sixth-floor office in Ottawa to make such recommendations, he does not do anything but studies.

I would invite the Economic Council of Canada members to travel with me throughout Canada to meet with the real citizens who will be paying this tax on bread and butter. I am sure they will change their mind and make an altogether different recommendation to the Government.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ESSENTIAL SERVICES—BINDING ARBITRATION ADVOCATED TO SETTLE DISPUTES

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, the recent rail strike and the near-strike last night have started many Canadians thinking and talking once again about compulsory arbitration for essential services. The right to bargain collectively is a vital part of our economic, social and democratic way of life. Most labour disputes are settled. Few result in strikes. There are fewer strikes still in essential services.

Strikes in essential services affect not only the parties involved but the general public and national production as well. That is why we need a new procedure, not to prohibit strikes but, rather, to settle disputes in essential services, a procedure called binding arbitration. Neither management nor labour like binding arbitration. In my experience it usually results in higher than normal wages and benefits. But that is the price we pay to avoid the shut-down of an essential service.

Binding arbitration works for municipal fire-fighting services. It can work for all essential services. It is time for the Government to take a serious look at it.

AGRICULTURE

LACK OF REPRESENTATION ON PRIORITIES AND PLANNING COMMITTEE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the Hon. Member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blais) on his promotion to Minister of State for Agriculture. May he enjoy his new position, and may his answers always be succinct!

Now with three Ministers handling the agriculture portfolio we hope that the Government will give agriculture more attention than has been the case in the past. The Government keeps insisting that it is giving agriculture a very high priority. Yet even though we now have three Ministers in charge of agriculture not one in this so-called high priority sector sits on the Priorities and Planning Committee of Cabinet where all the decisions are made.

Even the hated Liberals had their Minister, their single Agriculture Minister, Eugene Whelan, on this very important committee. It is time the Government took priority for agriculture seriously, actually made it a priority and put one of these Ministers in a position where he can do something.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TRIBUTE TO RETIRING COMMISSIONER SIMMONDS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay special tribute to a distinguished Canadian, Bob Simmonds, who has provided outstanding service to the RCMP and to Canada.

Commissioner Simmonds, born and raised in Saskatchewan, joined the force in 1947. He began on highway patrol and rose through the ranks to become Commissioner in 1977. He retires today after 10 years of leading the force.

Bob Simmonds has been a trusted public official whose counsel and advice have been called on many times by different Governments. The current and previous Solicitors General have remarked on the professionalism, good judgment and overriding concern for the rights of Canadians which have characterized Bob Simmonds' work. The RCMP, under his leadership, has weathered difficult challenges and maintained its professionalism and formidable influence for good in Canadian society. We are very grateful to him for the leadership he has contributed to policing in Canada.

I am confident that the standards of excellence set by Commissioner Simmonds will be maintained by the new Commissioner, Norm Inkster.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

NEED FOR GOVERNMENT TO PRESENT GLOBAL POLICY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the Government and this House that, as I speak, groups interested in regional economic development are utterly confused. As you would know, in recent months the Government has unveiled piecemeal initiatives in Western Canada, in the Atlantic Provinces, in Northern Ontario; the Department itself has been plagued with major financial and management problems. It has become imperative for the Government to come up with a comprehensive regional development policy. Tell us exactly which direction it wants to take, and what kind of treatment it has in store for the underprivileged regions of this country.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we now have two kinds of Canada: the wealthy and prosperous Canada, and the suffering Canada made up of the economically disadvantaged regions which, unfortunately, cannot benefit from the economic recovery and which practically disappear behind unemployment statistics. Realities differ from coast to coast and, sad to say, owing to the confusion and probably the incompetence of the ex-Minister, nobody has a clear idea about the role the federal Government wants to play, the mandate it seeks to undertake, and especially the kind of assistance it can give these regions.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the Government to announce its over-all strategy as soon as possible instead of being satisfied with its week-to-week policies. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned, I am afraid the Tories keep their policies under wraps because of the free trade negotiations where they are quite prepared to abandon our country's disadvantaged regions just to please the Americans.

GROWTH RATE STATISTICS

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, the good news continues to roll in. Last week the OECD reported that Canada's economic performance in 1986 surpassed that of all major industrialized nations. Now, Statistics Canada reports this extraordinary growth rate has continued unabated. For the second quarter in a row, Canada's economy grew at an annual rate of 6 per cent.

All indicators have economists searching for superlatives. Consumer and business spending is up, labour income has risen, corporate profits have increased, and as a British Columbian I am encouraged by the news that capital spending is up in the vital forestry, mineral, and energy sectors.

This is excellent news for all Canadians. It is proof that the economic policies of the Government are working. I applaud the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) for cleaning up the fiscal mess that was left by the previous Government. His actions have restored confidence in our economy, and the results are clearly reaping benefits for Canadians from coast to coast.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

WINNIPEG SUGGESTED AS SITE FOR VIROLOGY LABORATORY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the proposed Canadian Virology Laboratory should be located in Winnipeg. Winnipeg already has a solid reputation in the health sciences. The federal Government has appropriately targeted health industries as a priority sector for growth in Manitoba, and it has been working with the Manitoba Government in this regard.

The CVL would serve this goal by its very existence, by attracting private sector activity that values its proximity, and by local subcontracting. Locating the laboratory in Winnipeg would demonstrate a real commitment by the Conservatives to decentralization, and to the policy of fostering regional economic development through the location of national purpose technological investment in areas other than central Canada. If western diversification means anything, surely it means that the CVL should be located in Winnipeg. I call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) to make sure that it does.

I remind all Members that the U.S. Centre for Disease Control is not located adjacent to the federal Health Department headquarters in the District of Columbia, but rather in Atlanta, Georgia, fulfilling a national role from a regional location.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN WITHDRAWAL FROM NATO—REPORTED STATEMENT BY FRENCH PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of France has made it clear to us what would happen if Canadians were to elect a New Democratic Government.

Mr. Jacques Chirac told us quite frankly that the NDP's proposal to have Canada withdraw from NATO was utopian, naïve and unrealistic, and that it could bring Canada under Soviet domination.

[English]

In regard to the NDP policy to pull Canada out of NATO, the Prime Minister of France stated:

> —there are always people who are idealists, who imagine that the world is good, the world is beautiful, that one can isolate oneself, that one risks nothing. We have known that in France.

The Prime Minister also stated:

> You have to be careful with this kind of Utopia.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

FORMULATION OF NATIONAL WATER POLICY URGED

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, two years ago the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) received the report of the Inquiry on Federal Water Policy. Canadians are puzzled by the lack of action by the Government to formulate a national water policy, given the urgency and importance of this report.

The report emphasizes that public consultation is only the first step in the development of a national water policy. The next step requires action by the Government.

• (1410)

Among the many recommendations, the report calls on the Government to encourage the development of corporate water conservation plans, to establish minimum quality standards for drinking water throughout Canada and to develop a policy on the export and diversion of water. If he wants to do more than just talk, it is high time for the Minister of the Environment to get going and develop for public debate a national water policy for Canadians.

GROWTH RATE STATISTICS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, according to the latest data provided by Statistics Canada, the country's economy is registering a remarkable growth rate this year. For the second consecutive quarter, the growth rate has been robust to say the least.

S. O. 21

During the second quarter, Canada's Gross Domestic Product expanded at a real or after inflation annual rate of 6 per cent. This performance, as an article in today's Toronto Star states, has left economists groping for superlatives to describe the health of the economy.

While the 6 per cent annual rate will not be sustained, Michael Manford, Chief Economist of Merrill Lynch Canada Inc., said that Canada will probably turn in the strongest economic performance of the world's seven big industrial countries.

One question being debated is: "Does the Government deserve some credit for this performance?" My answer is an unqualified yes. Beginning after September, 1984, the Government took several key steps to set the climate for strong economic recovery.

Fiscal restraint was established through three responsible Budgets. The deficit is being cut. The National Energy Program was dismantled. The Foreign Investment Review Agency's mandate was dramatically changed to welcome foreign investment. The Government favours divestment of Crown corporations which do not serve a public policy objective. That is why de Havilland was sold. Incidentally, de Havilland has never had a brighter economic outlook.

All these sound measures and others have generated a renewed confidence in Canada not just for foreigners but also for Canadians. Interest rates are down sharply and this is spurring economic activity, particularly new housing starts and small business investment. Last, one of the greatest benefits of all has been a significant lowering of the unemployment rate through the creation of over 850,000 jobs.

HUMAN RIGHTS

U.S.S.R.—INVITATION TO NOBEL PRIZE WINNER TO VISIT CANADA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, St. Boniface Hospital is the second largest teaching hospital in Winnipeg. Some years ago, people interested in medical research established the St. Boniface Hospital Research Foundation. Its purpose was to raise money for medical researchers to do their work over and above what they got from the Medical Research Council.

To a large extent this project has been a great success because the foundation has been able to bring in for its functions world known people like Prince Phillip, Mrs. Sadat and Dr. Christiaan Barnard. This year it proposes to invite Mr. Sakharov, the famous Soviet physicist and Nobel Prize winner. Unfortunately, the Soviet Government has not yet permitted Mr. Sakharov to leave for Canada.

I would urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to make representations on behalf of all Canadians by telling the Soviet Government that we would look with a great deal of interest and support at its permitting Mr. Sakharov to come to Canada.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

STAMP COMMEMORATING 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF AIR CANADA

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post today commemorates the 50th anniversary of Air Canada with the issuance of a stamp. The inaugural flight of Trans-Canada Airlines from Vancouver to Seattle was made on September 1, 1937, carrying mail as well as passengers. Airmail routes were established between Winnipeg and Vancouver, and Montreal was added in 1938.

TCA changed its name to Air Canada in 1964 and has grown to be the world's ninth largest commercial airline, flying to points in North America, Europe and beyond to Bombay and Singapore. Canada Post Corporation is its largest cargo customer.

The stamp was designed by Derrick Carter of Vancouver and Debbie Adams of Toronto. Some of Air Canada's many destinations are highlighted on a stylized version of the globe. In the foreground is an Air Canada Boeing 767 banking as if to land. The Canadian Bank Note company will print 15 million stamps in five colour lithography for all to enjoy.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

U.S.—U.S.S.R. NEGOTIATIONS—MONITORING OF NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, one of the serious impediments in the way of an agreement between the United States of America and the U.S.S.R. restricting nuclear proliferation has been the question of verification. Today's report attributed to General Nikolai Chervov that the Kremlin is seriously considering a United States proposal for monitoring nuclear tests, and may even allow the U.S. to explode its own device on the Soviet test range to calibrate its monitoring equipment in exchange for reciprocal privileges, is welcome news.

It is interesting to note the part played by Canada in these developments. Not only have our Energy, Mines and Resources seismic stations been active for many years in recording nuclear blasts, but we have co-operated with the Government of the United States in testing its remote monitoring equipment under Arctic conditions, similar to those which might be found in Soviet test areas. Let us hope, sir, that these initiatives prove beneficial for the future of mankind.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I would like to put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister about what the Government likes to call tax reform.

I acknowledge that some people are doing very well in Canada, and the Government will undoubtedly produce some encouraging statistics. But despite the fact that there are people prospering in our country, there are regions that are suffering and there are Canadians who are hurting. I want to remind the Deputy Prime Minister of the intolerably long line-ups at food banks across Canada and at soup kitchens.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister justify his colleague putting forward a series of tax proposals under the guise of reform that, in effect, really take money away from the poor in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, first, I think the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition will recognize that tax reform has to be considered as a package. In that package some 850,000 Canadians will be taken off the tax rolls. Nine out of ten aged 65 and over will find their taxes reduced. I believe that between 1984 and sometime in 1985 some 263,000 Canadians have been taken off the welfare rolls.

For the first time since 1981 real after-tax income has increased for Canadians, so I think it is fair to say that there has been a tremendous improvement since our Government assumed office.

I would also remind the Hon. Leader of the Opposition that some 875,000 new jobs have been created. The commitment of the Government is to create jobs and stimulate economic activity—

Mr. Broadbent: And it is a nice day outside too!

Mr. Mazankowski: —and that is recognized by the tremendous growth rate that has been reported in the first half of this year.

FOOD TAX ISSUE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister talks about 850,000 coming off the tax rolls as a result of the so-called tax reform proposals. He neglects to remind the House that during the last three years under this Government one million Canadians were added to the tax rolls.

Mr. McDermid: They found jobs.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We have repeatedly pointed out in this House that the tax policy of the Government has had, as a direct effect, the widening of the gap between rich and poor in Canada. There is a wealthy Canada but what about the other Canada? What about the poor, the homeless and the hungry? How in these circumstances can the Government even contemplate a tax on food? Where is the fairness in that? Where is the justification for it? Where is the understanding and compassionate position of the Government with respect to that issue?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows there is nothing in the tax reform proposals which specifically outlines a tax on food. He should not try to mislead the House in suggesting that. He also takes issue with the fact there are some one million Canadians, I think was his figure, who are now paying taxes.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Added to the rolls.

Mr. Mazankowski: In addition. I think they are a very welcome addition, because most of those people are now working rather than being on the unemployment roll. That is a positive fact.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT WANTS TO INCREASE TAXES FOR LOWER-INCOME CANADIANS AND MARRIED WOMEN

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, according to the latest report of the Economic Council of Canada, in addition to putting a burden on the poor, the Government's tax reform proposal would also penalize married women.

Are we going to help Canadian families by increasing taxes for married women? Are we going to promote equal rights for women by reducing their income? Why is the Government taking this immoral stance of increasing the taxes of low-income Canadians and married women?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House do not share that view. There are a number of elements in the tax reform proposals which help the poor and less fortunate. The establishment of more tax credits is, I think, a very positive element. We have moved to impose a minimum tax.

I might add that this issue was referred to a parliamentary committee for full study and public debate. I understand some 300 briefs have been submitted. Surely that is the appropriate forum and the appropriate way in which Canadians and the Parliament of Canada should be involved in realistic and legitimate tax reform. I invite the Hon. Member to participate in that process.

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, the point of view expressed by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was confirmed by the Economic Council of Canada yesterday. We are not picking that out of the air.

CHILD BENEFITS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, a leading expert on the Canadian child benefit system, Mr. Shillington, confirmed what I and the Official Opposition have stated time and time again, that the Government does not care about the average Canadian family. Why is the Government slashing child benefits by 46 per cent, from $955 in 1984 to only $508 in 1991 for the average middle-income family?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's allegations need a little more examination because he is using statistics in a fairly selective manner. For example, there were the changes to the child tax credit instituted by this Government. There was an increase in child tax credits as against changes in family allowances. Those changes gave more money to lower-income families. I remind him that we also paid a large part of the child tax credit at an early date so that, among other things, parents could buy winter clothing for their children.

The Hon. Member should remember that social policy groups generally, whether they agree with the tax reform package or not, have generally advocated movement from tax deductions to tax credits. This would benefit families, especially low-income families and the poor. If he wants to look at tax reform, he should look at it as a package based on those principles.

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister should read tax reform in the Bill adopted by this House. First, the child tax credit was not implemented by his Government but by Monique Bégin when she was a member of the Liberal Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, when I told the Minister that benefits for middle-income families had been cut by 46 per cent, I included, as did Mr. Shillington in his brief, the partial de-indexation of family allowances, reduction in tax deductions for dependent children, lowering of the cut-off point for the child tax credit and for the new child tax credit included in the tax reform proposals.

I will repeat the question for the Minister, since he seems to have forgotten what his Government has done. On the basis of all these factors, we have to conclude that the average Canadian family—and this was confirmed by an expert yesterday—will see its child care benefits drop from $955 in 1984 to $508 in 1991, a reduction of 46 per cent.

What does the Minister intend to do about this and what is he going to suggest the Minister of Finance do to make the system more sensible?

• (1425)

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Member essentially repeated his question and I, therefore, will essentially repeat the answer. He said that I indicated that it was this Government that instituted the child tax credit. I did not say that. I said that we had increased the child tax credit and that that was generally endorsed by social policy groups as more favourable than changes in the family allowance.

I also said that as a principle of social policy social policy groups have generally, for many years, endorsed a movement more toward credits relating directly to families as opposed to whether or not they are in tax-paying income brackets. I said that the tax reform package philosophically moves further in that direction than we are now as a society.

If the Hon. Member wishes to analyse those things he should analyse the entire package rather than selecting any one percentage.

FOOD TAX—OPINION OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. According to the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, the Government should tax food because the rich in Canada spend a lot of money on food. Someone should tell the Chairman that in Canada, the poor spend more on food as a percentage of their income than the rich.

My question is a simple one. Does the Government agree with the line of reasoning followed by the reactionary Chairman of the ECC?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question in response to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Broadbent: No, no.

Mr. Mazankowski: I most certainly did. I invite the Hon. Member to read the answer when he gets a chance.

We are again talking about a presentation before a standing committee which is studying the tax reform proposals. I am not sure whether we will be asked to respond to each and every individual presentation. This view has been expressed by a certain individual representing an institution.

The Government's position is very clear. The tax reform proposals do not contain any provision for the inclusion of a tax on food. Over 300 briefs have already been received. The process has started. I expect that all Hon. Members would want the process to be completed.

FOOD TAX QUERY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I will address my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Ninety-three per cent of Canadians have indicated that they are opposed to a tax on food. Even the Quebec caucus of the federal Conservative Party has indicated that it is opposed to a tax on food. The poverty groups are opposed to a tax on food.

Would it not facilitate rational and fair-minded discussion by the committee if the Government would make its position clear on this issue once and for all and say that it will not accept a recommendation for a tax on food? Answer it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Prime Minister responded to that question last week. I have responded to it today and other Ministers have responded to it. I can only assume that the NDP wishes that a tax would be imposed on food.

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Mazankowski: Notwithstanding the fact that they repeat their question, I am now coming to the conclusion that maybe it is the NDP that wants a tax on food so that it can create a political issue and have a little fun.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I can only assume that the Deputy Prime Minister cannot understand elementary English. Will he now admit that by refusing to say that the Government will rule out a tax on food, he has now said, to put it positively, that the Government is considering a tax on food? If the Government wants to clear the air, why does it not be candid for once and say that under no circumstances will the Conservative Government accept a tax on food? Come clean.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the NDP wants to come clean. They want to confuse the issue. There is no mention of a tax on food in the tax reform white paper.

Mr. Riis: You are going to tax everything.

Mr. Mazankowski: The only evidence of a tax on food has been that which has been proposed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and some members of the Liberal Party. That has been answered.

FISHERIES

INSHORE FISHERY LANDINGS—ESTABLISHMENT OF TASK FORCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, whoever that happens to be today. Yesterday, the Minister of Transport, with his usual bluster, told us that everything is okay in the inshore fishery in Newfoundland because large companies were making more money. However, if one checks with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, it shows a constant decline in inshore fish landings over the past four years.

If there is no crisis in the inshore fishery, why has the Minister set up within the past month or so a special task force on the inshore fishery? Is there a crisis in the inshore fishery or not? What is he doing about it?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member recognizes the Minister of Fisheries today. I appreciate his question.

He used the term "crisis". In fact we are concerned about the decline of landings in the inshore fishery, as I made very clear upon my visit to Newfoundland in early July.

I have struck a committee of international eminent scientific people who will spend two or three weeks in Newfoundland in September to provide to us a report determining the adequacy of our scientific data base and our present management approach to the inshore fishery, with a view to bringing amendments into our next year's fishing plans by November 15, when I receive that report.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, what we need are not eminent people and data bases; what we need are fish.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA-FRANCE NEGOTIATIONS—CANADIAN COD STOCK

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the Minister sets up a special task force of eminent people, admitting that there is a crisis in the inshore fishery, and leaves cod on the negotiating table in the negotiations with the French. Why is he taking Canadian cod at this time of crisis and giving it to the French? Why does he not stand up for Canada? That is what I want to know.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Hon. Member that the Prime Minister and all members of the Government are indeed standing up for Canada, quite unlike those members of the Government of which he was a part, who sold out our interest to France in 1972.

Furthermore, it is the Hon. Member who characterizes the problem as a crisis. In fact, earnings and the value of landings have increased over the previous year.

Mr. Rompkey: For the big companies.

Mr. Siddon: Nonetheless, there is a regional variation in the return of cod to the inshore fishery and we are attempting to find a solution to that problem.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

OVEREXPENDITURES—MONTHLY FORECASTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the overspending at DRIE. The former Minister said that as soon as he found out there was some difficulty he launched an inquiry. He noted that he began receiving monthly financial reports very soon after being sworn in as the Minister.

If the former Minister began reading these financial reports as soon as he said he did, and being a chartered accountant himself, why was he not suspicious when six of the eight monthly periods covered from August, 1986, to March, 1987, forecast an overexpenditure? Why did the Minister not notice this, and why did he not bring it to the attention of the Government?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer this question on behalf of the Minister. It is true that certain measures were implemented as soon as the warning signals were sounded. Of course the problem occurred as a result of the additional take-up of the programs we had modified. A lot of slippage had been experienced in the past. In other words, programs were committed but not taken up. The fact that 20 per cent to 30 per cent of the offers were never taken up caused the problem. It is now corrected.

Mr. Blaikie: It is my understanding that action was not taken until June of this year.

GOVERNMENT'S AWARENESS OF SITUATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister that the review stated that it was in August, 1986, that the first indication of a potential deficit arose and furthermore, starting in the fall of 1986, very real concerns were being expressed about potential problems in 1987-88. Why was the Government not aware of this much earlier?

Considering the statements by the new Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion on Friday, what other Departments are undergoing this kind of study now?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge no other Departments are undergoing this kind of study. As soon as the Government was aware of the real possibility of an over-run, the measures were taken and the funds were restored. As a result, DRIE will be spending significantly more money on programs that have been positively modified and will have significant benefit to the regions for which they were designed.

CITIZENSHIP

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE TO MONARCH

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It concerns a recent discussion paper from his Department about downgrading the sovereignty or eliminating any reference to Her Majesty in a new oath of citizenship.

Since there appears to be no consensus in Canada, or no group asking for this removal of allegiance to the Queen, will he assure the House that he has no intention of following this proposed report by officials in his Department?

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance. The position paper was put out for discussion purposes two months ago and dealt with a variety of issues affecting the Citizenship Act. One of those issues was the one mentioned by the Hon. Member. The volume of correspondence that I have received on it and a number of other matters has indicated clearly that Canadians are interested in continuing the reference to the Queen in the Oath of Allegiance. Therefore, I can assure the hon. gentleman, indeed all Members of the House, that it is not the Government's intention to withdraw Her Majesty from the Oath of Allegiance.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SALARIES OF JOURNALISTS ON FRENCH AND ENGLISH NETWORKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I have a question about yesterday's walk-out by reporters at the CBC French network, which deprived Canadians of their usual news program and public affairs programs such as Le Point.

As you know, one of the most controversial items in negotiations between the CBC and its reporters is the unacceptable gap between the salaries of reporters working for the French network and the salaries of reporters who work for the CBC's English network. This in a country where we support the policy of equal pay for equal work.

I want to ask the Government why it tolerates this discriminatory treatment of reporters working for the French network. What does the Government intend to do to help reporters of the French network get fair and equal treatment?

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer on behalf of the Minister of Communications who is in Quebec City at the summit on government business, of course. She will be there for a day or two and will then return to the House. I will bring the Hon. Member's question to her attention when she returns. At that time he may want to ask her the question directly.

EQUALITY BETWEEN WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, this is a fundamental issue and it is about equal pay for equal work.

Since the Minister is prepared to send a message to the Minister of Communications, could I ask him to send another one?

As you know, another very controversial item is that the CBC refuses to treat one-third of its reporters, and I am referring to those who work on contract, on the same footing, especially with respect to termination of employment, as its regular staff. These reporters are full members of the CBC reporters' union, accredited by the Canada Labour Relations Board, which was confirmed by the Courts and in fact by the Supreme Court.

How can the Government let the CBC break this country's laws and ignore decisions made by the Supreme Court? Could the Minister pass this message on to the Minister of Communications?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, of course, it is an important question. Of course, it is a fundamental question. That is why I think the Hon. Member should get his answer from the Minister responsible, who will be returning to the House, rather than trying to make some politics out of it.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

DEPARTMENT'S EXPENDITURES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister who, as a westerner, will be well aware that the prosperity experienced in parts of central Canada is not a prosperity that most Canadians have experienced. In recognition of the fact that 75 per cent of the budget of DRIE is expended in central Canada, would the Minister explain to the men and women of western Canada, as well as eastern and northern Canada, why his Government perpetuates this imbalance in terms of DRIE spending, focusing where it is needed the least as opposed to where it is needed the most?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether the Hon. Member is aware of the $1.2 billion Western Diversification Program that was announced in western Canada. Perhaps I will send him over a copy of the announcement which I think is a clear indication of this Government's commitment to the diversification and the broadening of the western economic base. If the Hon. Member dropped into Alberta once in a while—

Mr. Broadbent: We are.

Mr. Mazankowski: —he would find that drilling activity is increasing very much. The grants under the Canadian Exploration Development Incentives Program are flowing to the oil companies. There is a Special Grains Program of $1 billion which has been provided plus relief on transportation, relief on fuel taxes. The Minister responsible for agriculture and grains and oilseeds has been meeting with the farmers to work out another program—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: More, more!

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I can remind the Minister that my question was about DRIE funds, 75 per cent of DRIE funding going to central Canada.

WESTYERN DIVERSIFICATION FUND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): The Deputy Prime Minister mentions the Western Diversification Fund as presumably the Government's major initiative to assist and diversify the economy of western Canada. Perhaps he ought to go out to places like Kamloops, Red Deer, Medicine Hat and Flin Flon and explain to the people out there that this Government believes that spending $32 a year on every westerner is its commitment to western diversification. Is this the $32 solution for westerners in terms of diversifying that economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, coming from a gentleman whose Party supported the National Energy Program which devastated western Canada—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Wrong again.

Mr. Mazankowski: We certainly do not need to take any lessons from them.

Mr. Broadbent: You have a history problem.

Mr. Mazankowski: Money is money, and whether it comes from Agriculture, Energy, DRIE, or Western Diversification, western Canada is getting a good chunk of this—

Mr. Riis: Thirty-two dollars a person.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and it is using it well. It is stimulating activity.

Mr. Fulton: It is not even enough to buy two cases of beer, Don.

Mr. Broadbent: That is not even two cases of beer per capita out west.

An Hon. Member: That is all the NDP can think about.

Mr. Mazankowski: I simply say to the Hon. Member, because I take the Hon. Member's question seriously and I hope he takes my answer seriously, that the Western Diversification Office is not only providing additional funding, which is the top up, its role is to co-ordinate economic activities and act as a pathfinder, utilizing CIC, Energy, Agriculture, Communications and the various government programs, so westerners can go to Edmonton, Winnipeg or to Vancouver and those decisions can be made on the spot. It is a shift in the decision-making process. It is a co-ordinating role and it is topped up with dollars.

TRADE

CL-215T CONTRACT BETWEEN CANADAIR AND FRANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The decision of the federal Government to favour the Anglo-Italian consortium for the army helicopters has put the French Government in a bad mood and jeopardized a virtually assured contract between Canadair and the French Government for a dozen CL-215Ts, which would create 1,000 direct jobs in Quebec. What I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister for International Trade is this: During his walk in the woods with Prime Minister Chirac, did the Prime Minister apply any pressure to have the contract between Canadair and France signed as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the contract discussed is not expected to be ratified during the visit of Prime Minister Chirac to Canada. The negotiations are still taking place on the proposed sale and the final decision has not been taken.

INQUIRY WHETHER EVERYTHING POSSIBLE DONE TO FACILITATE SALE OF CL-215T

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister may reply that the contract was not supposed to be signed during the visit of Prime Minister Chirac, she should know that Mr. Chirac was supposed to visit the Canadair plant because the contract was about to be signed and this was a courtesy visit to finalize the CL-215T transaction, but that after the announcement that her Government favoured the Anglo-Italian consortium, the French have decided to drag their feet. I therefore ask the Minister whether or nor the Canadian Government has offered any excuses to the French and done everything possible to promote the sales of the CL-215Ts which could create 1,000 jobs in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that no apology was given and no apology is necessary in this case. I have met with the French Ambassador to Canada and have explained to him that the procedure was dealt with on technical merits only and that the competing bid passed the technical tests in this matter. I can only repeat what I said. The Canadair sale, about which we are very excited, is continuing in negotiations. We hope to have a final decision soon. It is not related to the helicopter sale to which the Hon. Member refers.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LEGAL AID—SASKATCHEWAN USER FEES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, if I could have his attention. The Minister should be aware that since user fees for legal aid services were introduced in Saskatchewan in early August, there has been a sharp increase in the number of people who have appeared in court without a lawyer because they cannot afford the fee. As well, people are pleading guilty to rather serious charges rather than paying the user fee.

Given this shameful situation, is the Minister prepared, in the negotiating process which is currently under way to renew the federal-provincial cost-sharing agreements on legal aid, to withhold the federal contributions until the Saskatchewan Legal Aid Commission withdraws its user fees?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think I should remind the House that legal aid is a matter of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Notwithstanding that fact, I have personally on behalf of the Government taken steps, manifested in real dollars, to show our commitment to an effective legal aid system.

I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that in terms of Saskatchewan, taking into account contributions with respect to young offenders as well as to legal aid generally, there has been a substantial increase in the amount of contributions to the point where, in this past year, the amount of our contributions to legal aid in the Province of Saskatchewan comes to $2.4 million. I think this demonstrates our commitment, in an area which is under provincial jurisdiction, to have a full and effective legal aid system, and the federal Government stands very firmly on that policy.

REQUEST THAT FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION BE WITHDRAWN

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is surely aware that there is an agreement with the province and that in that agreement provision is made that the province should not impose fees if they pose a real hardship and prevent access to legal counsel. Again I ask the Minister if he is prepared to use the fact that the federal contribution is so important, to withdraw that contribution until the Province of Saskatchewan ensures that anyone in need of legal counsel will be provided that counsel and that user fees will not be used as a deterrent, so that poor people will not have to appear in court without the advice of counsel?

• (1450)

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this is probably one of the most cockamamie suggestions I have heard from the NDP in a long time. What members of that Party are suggesting we do now is withdraw all support for legal aid in the Province of Saskatchewan. If I even thought of that or, if I dreamt of that at night, there would be whimpering from the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker, like you have never heard before.

I simply say to the Hon. Member that this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. There are other provinces which use user-fee systems whereby there is a collection of moneys—

Mr. de Jong: Is it not time you spoke out about it, Ray?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we make a very substantial contribution. If I walked into the province of the Hon. Member's friend, Roland Penner, and told him and the Province of Manitoba how to run their system, we would see convulsions opposite unequalled in the history of Parliament.

FOOD TAX—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION FROM MINISTER

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

A short while ago, the Deputy Prime Minister replied to questions about the intentions of the Government for a tax on food products, such as bread, milk and butter, that there was no evidence in the documents showing that the Government had such intentions.

I see here in black and white, on page 49 of the French version of the paper on the sales tax reform and on page 45 of the English versions of the leaflet sent to Canadians that the Government is considering imposing a tax on food.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us why he replied as he did earlier? Is he not aware of these documents or did he simply misinform us?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I responded to that question. I stand by my answer.

Ms. Copps: You misled the House.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT WANTS TO TAX FOOD

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, the public will be able to read the reply of the Deputy Prime Minister which clearly shows that he either is not familiar with the documents or that he simply tried to hide the facts.

My supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister did not reply to this, is as follows: Why is the Conservative Government maintaining its option to tax food in spite of the objections of 71 per cent of the population, in spite of the petitions prepared by the Liberal Party and signed by 25,000 taxpayers and in spite of the representations of the Quebec Conservative Caucus? Why put a tax on bread, milk and butter?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that is a repeat of a previous erroneous allegation. My answer still stands.

FRANCOPHONIE CONFERENCE—OMISSION FROM AGENDA

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question would have been addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence, which I understand, I guess I have to direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister. If he does not have an answer I hope that he might perhaps be able to inform the House about it tomorrow.

Since the Government has taken a very leading role in human rights in the Commonwealth can the Deputy Prime Minister please explain why the human rights question is not on the agenda of the Francophonie Summit?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is well aware of the efforts that have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the question of human rights. He has raised it, as does the Prime Minister, in every country on every opportunity.

As the Hon. Member is well aware, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already explained that this item is not on the agenda because it would be very divisive at this particular summit.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: The issue of human rights and the discussions of human rights will underlie all agenda items.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the new President of the Treasury Board concerning the political rights of federal government employees.

During the 1984 election campaign the Conservative Party promised, and I quote: A general abolition concerning the political activities of federal employees, particularly those who are protected by a collective agreement.

Is it still the position of the Conservative Government? When will we see a government Bill to fulfil this promise and give Public Service employees their political rights?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Hon. Member's interest in this matter. It is a matter that is of major interest and concern to the Government. I cannot give him a precise timeframe as to when we may be doing something. Suffice it to say that I will certainly review the situation and try to get back to the Hon. Member as quickly as possible.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister confirm that it is still the position of the Government to give to federal public employees the right of political participation that was promised by his Party in the 1984 election campaign? Now that he is President of the Treasury Board responsible for this dossier will he undertake to bring legislation in this fall so that federal public employees do not have to go through more provincial campaigns or even another federal campaign without the right to participate in the political process?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I thought I indicated that I was going to review the situation and get back to the Hon. Member as soon as I possibly can. I assure him that that will be the case.

IMMIGRATION

ARRIVAL OF HONDURANS AT VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Over the past two months an increasing number of Hondurans have been arriving in Vancouver through the Vancouver International Airport. In fact, last Thursday, a group of 22, the largest yet, arrived off a Japan Airlines flight through Mexico City.

As I understand it Honduras is not a country which we have considered traditionally to be a refugee-producing country. Obviously, this supports the need for quick passage of Bill C-84 and Bill C-55.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Collins: Given the increasing numbers and rates of arrivals in this manner would the Minister consider imposing a visa requirement on Honduras in order to deter those who might seek to come to Canada through the refugee process when in all fairness they should be applying through the regular immigration process?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that the number of people arriving in Vancouver from Honduras has doubled, particularly over the past two and a half months. Quite obviously we are facing the kind of situation we experienced last year in Toronto and Montreal, and we are seriously considering imposing a visa requirement in the near future. If the number of arrivals does not decline we will certainly consider the possibility of imposing visas on Hondurans.

FOOD TAX QUERY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. I realize that he is overworked now with all his many responsibilities. However, I would like to give him the benefit of the doubt because I understood him to have said today in the House that food tax was not being considered as part of the fiscal reform package. Again, I would like to repeat in English, in case he did not understand my colleague from Montreal—Sainte-Marie in French—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order.

Some Hon. Members: Cheap, cheap!

Ms. Copps: I would like to ask whether the Minister has read page 10—

Some Hon. Members: Cheap, cheap!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he has read page 10 of his own Government's little mini-document on sales tax in which it states:

> These issues are important in deciding what goods should be included in the sales tax base . . . These are illustrated below using food as a case in point.

Is this not part and parcel of the Government's strategy to introduce a tax on food? If it is not, why does he not repudiate a tax on food in the House today?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, insofar as the Hon. Member's observation that I am overworked, I remind her that I am in the House every day doing my job, which is more than I can say about—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Cheap, cheap!

• (1500)

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, normally, I would not respond, but given that the Deputy Prime Minister is making himself out to be a little bit holier than thou, I wish to ask him whether a member of his family is suffering from an illness?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: It's a cheap shot, and it deserves the response. I had reason to be away from the House because of family illness.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister once again to clarify—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville.

HEALTH

SALE OF BENZOYL PEROXIDE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some time ago I wrote to the Minister concerning the agent benzoyl peroxide. This potential carcinogen is sold over the counter, and it is widely used in the treatment of acne.

My question today is the same as it was in the letter. Why has the Minister not acted on the recommendation of the expert advisory committee that benzoyl peroxide be banned from over-the-counter sale?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will have to bring myself up to date both on the letter and that issue. At this stage I am not aware of the specific recommendation of the expert committee to which the Hon. Member refers. I will undertake to examine the dossier and get back to the Member.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): I must confess that I find it quite shocking that an expert advisory committee recommendation made back in April is unknown to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This is a potential carcinogen used by adolescents across the country. It is being advertised on television. The Minister is telling the House that he does not know about it, or about the letter.

Will the Minister urgently examine the recommendation of the advisory committee? Will the Minister go further and consider that, since it is a potential carcinogen, and in view of its ineffectiveness, it ought not to be available at all?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I stated in my first answer, I will look at the dossier. I will look at the evidence, and I will look at the expert advice. If there is expert advice in terms of a final recommendation, it comes through the regulatory process. I will look at that regulatory process and act according to the conditions and the manner in which a Minister has to react relative to that process.

Mr. Speaker: There will be one last question in Question Period. I recognize the Hon. Member for Hamilton East whom I interrupted a few moments ago. I know that the Hon. Member has one single question.

FOOD TAX QUERY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Given the fact that he did not respond in either English or French—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: —whether he can clarify for the House why on page 45—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the Hon. Member in posing her question does not seek to irritate the Minister, but we have to be careful in this Chamber if there is anything that may cause some concern by those whose first language is either English or French. I know that the Hon. Member would wish to put her question succinctly, and I will ask her to do so.

Ms. Copps: I wish to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he has read page 45 which gives a more elaborate account, including graphs and documents of the Government's intention to possibly impose a tax on food. Has the Minister read that paragraph? If so, why has he told the House that the Government is not considering that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure which question the Hon. Member wishes me to answer. After various interruptions, there have been approximately three questions posed.

I invite the Hon. Member to read my answer in Hansard tomorrow. Perhaps she can inform herself of precisely what I did say.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

That Bill C-84 be amended by deleting Clause 12.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I address Motion No. 20, I wish to draw to the attention of the Chair that there have been discussions with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Friesen), and the NDP immigration critic, that suggest following Motion No. 20, Motion No. 23 will be debated by the House, and then we will proceed to the other two amendments.

Motion No. 20 is a carry-through from Motion No. 19. Motion No. 19 was defeated by the Government in committee and again earlier this morning. That motion recommended that we retain the jurisdiction of the adjudicator, and provide the adjudicator with the proper flexibility and discretion in order to make a proper determination on the request for detainment by the Government.

Motion No. 20 would have the effect of deleting the current clause in Bill C-84, and retaining what is presently contained in the legislation. What is presently in the legislation would suggest that we automatically have the powers of detainment for 48 hours. Subsequent to that, we can go to an adjudicator and request permission for a further seven days.

It would seem to me, and to most moderate Canadians—which excludes most Conservatives—that those detainment powers are sufficient to protect our shores from so-called undesirables and unwanted individuals, and at the same time maintain a credibility under the human rights legislation, and protect civil liberties.

The Parliamentary Secretary when addressing Motion No. 19, suggested that it would not be unreasonable for a country like Uganda, which requires time to produce the documentation and the evidence, to be given the time required to do that. I believe that the Parliamentary Secretary, speaking on behalf of the Government, does not understand the premise of the problem. I am glad that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) is in the House to listen to me. It is not a question of the length of time required to obtain documentation as much as it is who decides, and in what manner it is decided. This legislation provides the Minister and the Government with unilateral excessive powers, which may be, or perhaps will be abused or misused.

A representative from the Canadian Association of Civil Liberties suggested that it was important to maintain the flexibility of an adjudicator to decide if the evidence is correct, and if the evidence warrants further detainment. In the present role, the adjudicator is politically disinterested. He is an objective player. He considers the concerns of government and tempers them with the concerns of the claimant based on the evidence submitted. A Minister of the Crown would be politically interested, not in a personal sense, but in a realistic sense that a politician is faced with pressures on either side of an issue. Mr. Borovoy suggested there should be a politically disinterested individual who makes the decisions on whether further detainments are required. That is the real premise of the problem, and that is the area that I believe we have to safeguard.

It is not a question of the Liberal Party being opposed to individual powers to detain people to find out identification or verify information that has come to the attention of the Government which could endanger anyone in Canada or pose a threat to the country. However, there is the question of the decision-maker which is very crucial in this instance.

I believe that most Canadians would like to retain a check and a balance; a check against anyone who wishes to do harm in or bring a threat to this country as well as a balance that would ensure that no one's rights are infringed and that a Minister or a Government would not move toughly over the rights of individuals.

The testimony of Mr. Borovoy of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association was very articulate and passionate. He said:

> It is a violation of democratic principle to create a power of jailing people—on the basis of a unilateral, essentially unreviewable decision of a politician . . . consider the incongruity this creates with our criminal law.

He went on to say:

> The powers created by this Bill are excessive, repressive and needless. No less gratuitous is the rush to get it enacted yesterday.

Those are the words of the representative of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association who also went on to say that an individual who either breaks into a bank or murders an individual is not treated as badly or detained as quickly without question as a refugee claimant. We are treating individual claimants much worse than individuals who would commit crimes on the streets in broad daylight.

I think all Hon. Members will agree that there should be a check and a balance on these powers. The Opposition is calling for the deletion of the current clause in Bill C-84 so that we may return to the existing legislation which provides all the detainment powers necessary to keep an individual legitimately detained for as long as the Government can prove the evidence merits it through an adjudicator. As proposed by Bill C-84, the adjudicator would have no discretion. He would become a mere rubber stamp.

In his earlier discussion, the Parliamentary Secretary implied that because some of the evidence that may be used against claimants is of a confidential nature, that evidence would not be given to an adjudicator. The Parliament Secretary is suggesting that somehow Canadians cannot trust their adjudicators. I do not believe that is the case. An adjudicator would have the same feelings as the rest of us about protecting our country from undesirables.

We are saying that we should allow the adjudicator to make the decision his position was created to make. In the process, we will ensure that there is a safeguard for Canada while at the same time respecting our Charter of Rights. Otherwise, as legal experts have predicted, this clause will be subjected to court challenges.

As the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) stated earlier and quite correctly, if we allow too many of these clauses to become legislation they will be challenged in the courts. The legislation will become paralyzed by the courts and Canadians will lose patience with a Government which again missed an opportunity to set the situation right. We would also undermine one of the two major responsibilities we have as parliamentarians, which are to create good laws and to ensure that Canadians' money is spent wisely.

It would be simply irresponsible to pass a piece of legislation which has received the wrath of the Canadian Bar Association, the Civil Liberties Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Inter-Church Committee and a wide range of leading authorities. They all predict that if this legislation goes unamended, it will go to the courts and make more disorderly the system that is presently in place. It is in that spirit that we have proposed to delete this clause and retain the powers that exist now to avoid any court challenges, and hopefully we will receive the co-operation of government Members on this.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the clause dealt with by Motion No. 20 is the same one that was the subject of Motion No. 19 and the problem is the same. My friend who just spoke reviewed the grounds for opposing either part of the clause or the whole clause.

The motion I moved previously opposed one specific part of the clause, the part I thought was the most troublesome.

However, the Government rejected that motion. Therefore, if we are to do anything to flag this problem, the alternative is to vote to delete the clause as a whole. That, of course, is not really the best alternative theoretically or ideally. What would have been best would have been for the Government to have allowed time for the consideration of this legislation.

The Government probably thinks it was very generous in allowing us a week but, in fact, every witness who came before us referred to the difficulty involved in getting a copy of the Bill, studying the Bill and preparing a considered presentation on it. Nevertheless, most of them did speak against this clause.

It would have been better to give the Bill more study. If the Government had slowed down a bit, perhaps it would have been able to think more cooly and calmly about the entire Bill.

The Government did create quite a furor in July with one-sided statements about the people who arrived in the ship Amelie. People who came through other means and manners were mixed up in that furor as well, but that furor has considerably cooled off.

If it were possible to continue consideration of the Bill, or if the Government had waited even a few days to allow further consideration of the Bill before taking up positions pro and con in the usual adversarial way of Parliament, I think a better job would have been done on the Bill. The Government chose for its own political purposes to rush the Bill through in the style of an emergency as though it were not 174 unarmed people who arrived on our shores but 174,000 armed troops invading us.

Experts have told us that this clause is a deprivation of the due process of law. It is a deprivation of the normal rights of a detained person to defend his interests, even while the Government pursues its suspicions or accusations.

It has been suggested that it does not do much harm to reduce or even take away the rights of these people because they are strangers. They are not Canadian citizens, nor are they Canadian residents. They are foreigners. They just came here and therefore we have very few obligations to them as far as human rights go.

That is not the position taken by the Supreme Court when dealing with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and it is not the position most Canadians have in fact taken toward strangers. In fact, the first Canadians who met the Amelie offered these people food and drink, throughout the world the traditional way to greet a stranger who may be in difficulty.

Treating strangers with an unusual amount of detention and a refusal of habeas corpus or the related rights of review may seem harmless because it is done to these people who have just arrived and whom the Government expects to get rid of. Of course, the Government is treating them as though guilty until they can prove themselves innocent.

I wish to point out that it is a matter of experience, not over years but over generations and centuries, that what we do to other people very often comes back to haunt us. If we deny the human rights and if we deny the humanity of strangers, we have undermined or jeopardized our claim to humanity, that is to say, we have called in question our belief in humanity and in the rights of humanity.

That is why it is risky to pass this law which takes away some, not all, of what our court has considered the basic human right of humanity, not of Canadians only, but of humanity. The court did not extend the application of its decision beyond Canada's borders, quite rightly, but it said that a human within our borders does have certain basic rights simply because of being human and being within our borders.

This law encroaches on that principle. It does not wipe it out entirely but it undermines it. I think it would be a mistake for Parliament to proceed with this law. I think it was a mistake to proceed so hastily with Bill C-84. This is one of the parts that should be withdrawn and given further consideration.

The Justice Department, which may have said it is just fine also said that while the law was just fine, it denied an oral hearing to refugee claimants. The Supreme Court said that that was not just fine. Therefore, the Government is not wise to proceed on the advice of the Justice Department against the advice of many reputable private citizens.

This Government, especially, makes a point of favouring the initiative of private citizens over Government. I wish it would remember that principle it preaches and consider the well credentialed and well respected private citizens who have warned the Government against either the whole of Clause 12 or certain parts of it. Therefore, I support the motion to have this Clause deleted from the Bill.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this is another motion made necessary by a repugnant approach in another portion of this Bill. I welcome the presence of the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) this afternoon in the House. He has finally found the courage to come here and defend his Bill. We have two Ministers of Immigration but neither has had the guts to defend the Bill during the two days that we have been debating it. They have been hiding behind the Parliamentary Secretary who is carrying the Bill in this House because the Ministers have not had the courage to speak up and explain some of the offensive, nasty, vile and mean clauses it contains. Clause 20 is one of them.

I looked forward to the intervention of the Minister of State for Immigration, hearing his voice in defence of this junk, Mr. Speaker. It is high time the Ministers came out from behind the curtains to defend their own bills instead of hiding behind the Parliamentary Secretary who is carrying the can for them.

We are here on Clause 20. The Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) has suggested that it be deleted, as has the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). They are quite right. In the committee hearings we heard interventions by the civil liberties people, the coalition and other organizations. They told us that clauses like this contain flagrant abuses of the Charter and that they will lead to action in the courts. Before you know it, the very intent of the Government in introducing legislation for the purpose that this Government has found absolutely necessary and urgent will be defeated, because there will be individuals and groups who will find measures such as the one contained in Clause 20 offensive from a constitutional and from the Charter point of view.

The Civil Liberties Association told us in committee that detention, search and seizure provisions probably also violate the Charter of Rights. What is the answer of the Minister to that observation on the part of the Civil Liberties Association?

We spent the morning talking about another measure in this Bill which does not make a distinction, so that people who help refugees for non-profit reasons are going to be brought before the law as criminals. We also argued that that clause ought to be deleted. Clause 20 is another offensive clause.

I think the Minister has an obligation, as a Minister of the Crown, to make sure he is not asking the House of Commons and the other place to pass a piece of legislation that is likely to be tied up in the courts, making this whole exercise futile perhaps for months and months or even for years. The Government has been warned, not just by the Opposition, but by credible well established individuals and organizations, that it is producing poor legislation, to put it mildly. It is seeding the elements for action in the higher courts.

Let us hear from the Minister of State for Immigration who has finally emerged out of nowhere after two days of debate. Let us hear from him as to how he will defend Clause 20 and the preceding clauses which we have brought to the attention of the Government in no uncertain terms.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) for following a certain pattern of logic in his argument. I may not agree with the premise on which his arguments are based but, given his premise, at least he has argued his position coherently from the starting point of the position that he has taken.

The Member for Spadina asks that the person in question be released. That motion being defeated, the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) asked that the entire section be taken out. If we consider it a security risk to relieve the person in question with which that section deals, how much greater is it a security risk to do away with the section altogether? There really is not much logic based upon this particular motion before us.

While I understand exactly from where the Hon. Member for Spadina is coming, it really does not help to accuse the Government by saying that it does not do much harm to take away the rights of strangers and foreigners. I would hope that the Member for Spadina would not make light accusations like that.

This section is here mainly to protect the rights of strangers and foreigners. If I could point out to the Member that the present Immigration Act, to which the Hon. Member for York West likes to refer and to which he would like to return, allows an immigration officer, without issue of a warrant, to detain people. The present provisions require the Minister to have a certificate based upon hard evidence presented in order to do that.

It seems to me that what we are doing in this section is preserving the not only Canadian security and the rights of Canadian individuals, but is, in effect and in fact, protecting the civil rights of the person being detained. A person cannot be detained willy-nilly at the whim of an immigration officer. There has to be conclusive evidence to believe that he is a risk. I hope the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) will be a little bit more careful about heavy accusations made lightly.

Since this motion would effectively emasculate the Canadian immigration security system we cannot support it.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary suggests that if this clause is removed we will have no system for monitoring those who wish to come to this country. He also says the current Act has these kinds of provisions. What he and the Minister do not want to face up to is the fact that it is not just opposition Members of Parliament who are critical of this Bill and this clause. It is just about everyone who has ever been interested in the question of immigration and refugees and who wants Canada to continue to take a humane and generous approach to both subjects.

This Bill was drafted and introduced by the Government in a hurry because it perceived that as a result of this last movement into Canada by ship of a fairly substantial number of Sikhs the public had turned against a humane and generous policy. In fact, that view was very temporarily held. Every single organization which can claim to represent large numbers of people and which can honestly and justifiably say it wants Canada to be generous has expressed its opposition to this Bill and this clause. I want to bring to the attention of the Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary the information contained in an article which appeared in today's Globe and Mail. The heading is "Coalition outlines alternative refugee bill". The article says in part:

> A group of prominent Canadians have formed a national coalition that will try to force the Progressive Conservative Government to withdraw the refugee-determination legislation introduced in May.
> They want Bill C-55 replaced by a "humane and just" alternative that the coalition has drawn up.

Who belongs to this coalition? Whom do they represent? The article says:

> The coalition includes Archbishop Edward Scott of the Anglican Church, president of the Canadian Council of Churches; Bishop Bernard Hubert, president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops; Shirley Carr, president of the Canadian Labour Congress; George Corn, president of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council; Dorothy Reitman, president of the Canadian Jewish Council; and Fleurette Osborne, an executive member of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

Could you get a more representative group speaking on behalf of millions of Canadians? The article continues:

Msgr. Hubert said at a news conference in Ottawa that he believes this is the first time that the president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops has publicly opposed a Government immigration bill.

He said the Church's involvement in shaping Government refugee policy goes back to the Second World War when it helped resettle many thousands of refugees in Canada.

Then they talk about the alternative which they want to see introduced in and passed by this Parliament. It:

—is based on the work of Rabbi Gunther Plaut, whose 1985 report on refugees has been widely applauded around the world, and the 1986 report of the Commons committee on labour, employment and immigration.

As we all know, that committee was made up of members of whom a large majority were and are Conservative government Members. Their advice is being ignored just as much as the advice we got from Rabbi Plaut. The group then lists a number of proposals which they think we ought to include in legislation, and again I quote:

A hearing for all refugee claimants within 10 days of setting foot in Canada before an independent two-member refugee board;

A review and a decision within 30 days if the board rejects the claim;

Removing from Canada, pending a Federal Court appeal, those claimants whose application is determined at the hearing and at the review to be "manifestly unfounded" according to the United Nations definition.

When we oppose this Bill we speak for a large number of people. I am glad the Parliamentary Secretary is here because about 10 days ago when we were debating this Bill I put through a call to the Mennonite Central Committee for Canada which happens to have its head office in Winnipeg. They told me they are opposed to this Bill. Not only that, they referred me to a Mennonite farmer living in or near the Town of Morden.

Mr. Friesen: Morden?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes. There is no area in Manitoba which has been more faithful to the Conservative Party than that area. I spoke to that farmer. He told me he and several others around Morden had helped refugees from Central America to settle and establish themselves in Morden. He felt they had done the right thing and he told me they would continue to do what they had done in the past. If that meant breaking the law which we are now debating, he was prepared to do it. If after he broke the law he was charged and brought to trial and found guilty, he was prepared to pay the penalty, which might well include going to prison. I also spoke to members of the Inter-Church Committee on Refugees in Winnipeg. One of the members, a Catholic, and one an Anglican, told me the same thing. They intend to continue their work in the way they always have. They are prepared, if what they do is contrary to this law, to pay the penalty.

Members on the government side ought to re-evaluate the Opposition to refugees which developed right after that ship brought those people to Canada and consider the views of the many Canadians who are well informed, who have worked in this field for many years. Those are the kind of people and organizations I referred to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 20. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

By agreement we will now proceed to Motion No. 23.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 4 to 6 at page 24 and substituting the following therefor:

"19. This Act shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation and shall cease to be in force six months after that day."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is my last motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Johnny Carson.

Mr. Marchi: Sits over there.

• (1540)

I was going to say that this is probably the most important motion. I am pleased that the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) is in the House. Like my colleague, the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), I welcome him and urge him, rather than his Parliamentary Secretary, to respond to some of these concerns at report stage.

Motion No. 23 contains a sunset clause which would give this legislation a lifespan of six months, after which time this Parliament would be able to review the workability of the policy, strike out clauses which are offensive and clearly unworkable, and retain those clauses which are reflective of our international obligations—which are probably few and far between—and of our Charter of Rights.

The sunset clause motion is moved as a result of a number of groups, including the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Civil Liberties Association and Rabbi Plaut, advocating it to the committee. It is fitting that we examine the reasons for this clause. There are three reasons for which I suggest that the Government should support this sunset clause.

The first is that most of the amendments presented by the Opposition and witnesses at committee have gone unheard. Amendments were suggested to allow priests, nuns, and other innocent Canadians who aid legitimate refugees coming in to this country to be exempt from fines and imprisonment. Amendments were suggested to allow boats loaded with refugees to be escorted into port, to allow for due processing of the passengers, the return of any passengers who have protection in other countries, the impounding of the boat, and the charging of the captain, thereby deterring other smugglers who would follow the same course.

The Bill still contains unnecessary detainment and deportation clauses. The existing legislation protects our country from undesirables and contains checks and balances to ensure that the rights of individual human beings are not infringed upon. The witnesses who suggested those amendments said that if their amendments were not accepted for the long term, at the very least at the eleventh hour let Parliament give this Bill a lifespan of only six months.

The second aspect is to try to avoid the Charter challenges which every legal expert and witness who came before the committee predicted would be made at the first opportunity by lawyers across the land.

Parliament was called back under the guise of an emergency. The Government has whipped up public frenzy to try to justify its own actions. What will happen 12, 16 or 18 months hence? What will the Government and the Minister of State for Immigration tell Canadians when this piece of legislation is gobbled up by the courts? What will the Minister say when the policy is paralyzed?

Canadians trusted the Government to pass a proper and fitting piece of legislation which would deal with the abuses while protecting rights and civil liberties and keeping the legislation out of the courts. How is the Government going to promote a more progressive immigration policy when every Canadian has lost confidence because this policy has been paralyzed and rendered null and void by the courts?

Apart from not listening to the amendments, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and his officials have refused to make public their legal opinion on this Bill. Until we exerted pressure in the House of Commons during Question Period, Justice officials refused to come before the legislative committee studying Bill C-84.

The implication of that is clear. It is obvious that the Department of Justice does not want to defend the indefensible. It knows that this Bill, drafted as poorly as it was, will not meet the test of our Charter and of our Constitution. I believe that the Government knows that, but it is willing to continue nonetheless. It will enjoy short-term gain in return for long-term political pain.

Charter challenges should be avoided. As a legislature we should take our responsibility of drafting proper legislation seriously. If we do not, the Government will pay a much higher price than it would pay now by accepting a number of sensible amendments.

The third and final reason for this sunset clause is in response to the Government's suggestion that it has introduced emergency legislation. My definition of an emergency is "short term", "temporary". An emergency does not last forever. Therefore, it is not necessary for emergency legislation to become permanent. Emergency legislation implies that the new revamped system which we hope to provide through Bill C-55 in an amended form will give us a system of refugee determination that will make Bill C-84 useless and redundant.

The best deterrent to any individual is a processing system of less than six months. No one will spend $15,000 and go to much trouble and pain to come to our shores if they know they will be able to stay for a maximum of only six months. The system presently takes years and, therefore, they take their chances. The ultimate deterrent is a proper, fair and expeditious determination system. If we put that into place, Bill C-84 will not be needed.

It is for those three reasons, Mr. Speaker, that we are suggesting at this eleventh hour at report stage that if the Government really wants to proceed without listening to the amendments suggested by Canadians it should put the legislation into force for only six months and allow Parliament and Canadians to determine the future course of the legislation.

I will conclude with a quote from Gunther Plaut. Some Members did not hear his testimony and I urge them to read it because he offered a very forceful and moving presentation. He said:

> Treat the stranger fairly; you should extend your love and friendship to him. Remember that you too were strangers once.
> I think that Draconian and emergency legislation gives the wrong signal, not only to the world but it gives the wrong word to our own people in Canada. I ask you to look carefully at some of the amendments suggested. Do not follow the worst instincts of people, follow the best instincts.
> I think the Bill was drawn in undue haste. This is why I think we need just a little more leisure to write legislation that makes sense.

• (1550)

I believe that the sunset clause for six months is more than a valiant compromise because there are principles here that are tough to swallow. If the legislation is only on the books for six months, at least it allows our country and this Parliament to escape with some degree of integrity. If it is permanent, long-term legislation, no dignity can possibly be salvaged from this legislation.

I sincerely request the Minister of State to reflect on this proposition. Perhaps, after he has heard the Member from the New Democratic Party and my colleague, the Member or Davenport, he will give the House a proper answer and send a signal to those Canadians who requested this clause that their concerns are being adhered to and their input counts for something.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, coincidentally, I have a motion on the same subject although its content is different. I was quite happy to let the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) proceed first because he has an urgent engagement.

I will support his motion even though I have a different motion in case this one should fail. I support the motion and recommend that our Party should support it, somewhat in the same sporting vein as was traditional with soldiers in World War I who were signed up for four years or the duration, whichever was shorter. I am willing to try six months or the duration of this Government. According to the newspapers, I think this may come to a test soon, and I am not sure which would be the quickest way to get rid of this Bill. In the meantime, I will support the motion of the Hon. Member for York West.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it really makes very little sense to pass legislation such as this, which includes having to establish additional machinery of Government to make sure that the system works properly, and then dismantle it in six months. I fail to see the merit of this kind of motion.

While I cannot support the motion of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), I see a little more merit in his motion. However, to pass legislation and put government machinery into operation, then kill it after six months, makes very little sense to me, and so we cannot support the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 23 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Am I to understand that Motion No. 21 has been withdrawn?

Mr. Heap: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved:

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 18 by striking out line 27 at page 23 and substituting the following therefor:

He said: Mr. Speaker, the principle of a sunset clause has been described by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi).

I wish to make only two points in support of my motion which is, in effect, a two-year sunset clause. First, I believe the general principle of a two-year sunset clause is good. I give credit to the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) for having first introduced an amendment in committee that would have brought the sunset at five years and for amending her own amendment to bring it down to four years. She had a good idea and was moving in the right direction. I would simply like to move it a bit farther.

I agree with the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary that six months would hardly give enough time for the public to realize what a very bad law this is. I believe two years would really convince the public that the Government, whether it was then in operation or not, had erred very badly. As an illustration of that, let me quote from a source that I hope the Hon. Member will not regard as biased in a hostile way. It is the Calgary Herald of August 26, which contains an editorial with the heading "Amending a Hasty Law".

It states that Bill C-84 is a bad law "because it will not in some respects deter abuse and because it is so sweepingly vague that it almost certainly violates the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, international treaties Canada has signed, and the rights of refugee support groups within Canada".

It goes on to state that the law "needs to spell out who is deemed to be involved in smuggling illegal immigrants".

One of the remarkable features of this Bill is that the Minister advertised for weeks ahead that it would stop smugglers. While the Minister talks about stopping smugglers in the first clause of the Bill, smugglers and smuggling are not mentioned in the Bill.

A smuggler is a person who brings somebody in, usually by stealth, but at any rate in violation of the laws. That is not spelled out in the Bill.

The editorial goes on to say that it should spell out who is deemed to be involved in smuggling illegal aliens for profit and make clear that it will in no way affect the activities of refugee supporters who aid those who legitimately flee persecution for safe haven in Canada.

Of course, those are amendments that the Government has refused to make, as I am sure the Calgary Herald takes note.

The editorial goes on to state that Bill C-84 traps the people who aid legitimate refugees while failing to spell out the crimes and punishments aimed at unscrupulous so-called immigration consultants who advise people in foreign lands to use the refugee stream as a means of coming to Canada. They may be pleased with Section 95.4 which arose out of our discussions and which was moved and therefore supported by the Government. At least it remembered for a week.

The editorial went on to state: "The detention provisions which allow officials to hold claimants for 28 days and longer without hearings deny the basic concept of habeas corpus".

I commend the editorial to the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary. The Calgary Herald is not one of the pressure groups or one of those who perhaps has a stake in this. I do not know whether the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary considers the Calgary Herald guilty of romanticism and wanting to race down to the American border for the fun of bringing across a refugee. I am not familiar with the Calgary Herald, but I hope the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary would give some consideration to their view.

I hope he would support my motion for a two-year sunset clause because I suggest it gives a fair chance to find out whether this law is really attacking the people whom the Government originally said it wanted to attack or whether it is attacking those whom the Government said it does not want to attack while missing the real smugglers.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I understand the reasoning and the motivation of the Hon. Member or Spadina (Mr. Heap) in trying to contain and manage the duration of this piece of legislation. Therefore, I understand his desire to put forward a motion for a sunset clause. The more I thought about it as I was listening to him, the more convinced I became that the sun will set on this Government at the next election and take care of the nefarious legislation and policies it has introduced during this Parliament, not just in terms of social policy but in terms of economic policies. There will be the day when the sun will set and take care of the ideology that is emanating from those benches opposite.

• (1600)

I am still waiting to hear from the Minister for Employment. The Government has two Ministers for that portfolio and the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) sits there reading his correspondence and perhaps signing Christmas cards, but has not entered into this debate in defence of his own piece of legislation. It is the second day of debate on this measure and we have not heard one peep out of the Minister of State for Immigration. He is hiding behind mother Friesen's skirts rather than standing up in his place and telling us why he is introducing some of these repugnant clauses in this piece of legislation. This legislation has prompted the Hon. Member for Spadina to rise in his place and ask for a sunset clause, and my colleague the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) is asking for a similar measure. The only difference is that one period of time is longer than the other.

This is the extent of the repugnance this Bill has awakened in the Opposition. As the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) mentioned earlier, this repugnance is not only felt by the Opposition.

It is reported in the Ottawa Citizen and in the Globe and Mail that a group of outstanding citizens met in the capital yesterday. They are not members of dangerous political movements, nor are they crypto Communists or radicals on the left, who came out and spoke against this Bill. They are a group of citizens which included the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, and the like. Anglican Archbishop Edward Scott, the President of the Canadian Council of Churches, is quoted as accusing the Government at the press conference of orchestrating an emergency. He suggested that there is clear evidence that the Government knew for some time that the boat was on its way. He is asking that this Bill be scrapped.

This is not the Opposition speaking. It is a group of citizens from across the nation speaking against this measure which is so outrageous in the context of some of the clauses we have been debating for two days. Not one but two Ministers of Immigration have been silent on this legislation, asking the Parliamentary Secretary to deliver the goods for them. The Government is hiding behind him. What kind of management is this? What a shame. What a lack of guts it takes to handle a piece of legislation in this manner.

In my 19 years in this House of Commons I have not seen a piece of legislation managed in this way. I cannot recall one instance when the Minister did not come into the House on a contested piece of legislation to defend it. I have never seen that before. In most instances we would only have one Minister, but here we have two Ministers and not one of the two has spoken at report stage despite the number of amendments which were brought forward.

What can we say? The Hon. Member for Spadina has done a very thorough job. The Hon. Member for York West has worked very hard with his amendments. There are about 23 amendments. We have now reached the end of report stage and I invite the Minister of State for Immigration to rise in his place and say something about these amendments, if he has the guts to speak.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I have just a short comment. I would point out to the Hon. Member for Spadina that the Calgary Herald has probably read most of the critics of this legislation but has evidently not read the Bill. It would be good for its editorial board to spend some time reading the legislation before it makes that kind of comment.

Second, I want to say that I agree with the principle of the Hon. Member's motion. As he pointed out, the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Collins) has already taken care of that principle in the legislation by introducing at committee stage a review clause which at first called for a five-year review and, as the Hon. Member pointed out, it was reduced in committee to four years. I think that is a reasonable length of time.

As I say, I can agree totally with the Hon. Member's principle, and that is a review of the legislation, because world circumstances change and domestic circumstances change. It is wholesome to review the provisions of the Bill in that context. However, I do think it is unrealistic to think of reviewing the legislation in two years. There are far too many undulations of circumstances. There is just not enough time to see the effects of the legislation through the administration of the Bill.

Therefore, I think it is impractical to think of a review process after two years of implementation. I would hold to the four year provision we passed in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 22 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 66, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Hon. Member for Don Valley East (Mr. Attewell)—Administration of Justice—Length of prison sentences—Granting of parole; the Hon. Member of York East (Mr. Redway)—Young Offenders Act—Maximum sentence for murder—Request that statute be amended; the Hon. Member for Montreal—Saint-Marie (Mr. Malépart)—Tax reform—Future of Minister of Finance—Old age exemption—Minister's position.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal code in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the Bill now before the House.

Call in the Members.

• (1640)

And the division bells having rung:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, the first question is on Motion No. 5. Mr. Heap moved:

That Bill C-84 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Heap), which was negatived on the following division.

Mr. Ouellet: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) on a point of order.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think that if you were to ask the House you would find that there is unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken to all the other motions you have before you.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we apply the vote just taken to all the other motions?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 8. Mr. Heap moved:

That Bill C-84 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 29 to 31 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"officer or an adjudicator shall make an order to detain or release the person named in the"

CANAGREX DISSOLUTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise that Bill C-2, an Act to dissolve Canagrex and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to add my voice to those concerned about this legislation which will remove Canagrex from the Canadian landscape.

There are a number of points I want to make. First and foremost, it comes at a rather opportune time. By any definition, a crisis in agriculture is pending or has arrived. The delegations which appeared before the Standing Committee on Agriculture over the last number of weeks made it perfectly clear that agriculture is at a very important point. There are some basic decisions that the Government and the Parliament of Canada must make. Are we going to take significant initiatives, unfortunately in some cases remedial action, to ensure that the family farm or family ranch remains a viable institution on the agricultural landscape of Canada? Or are we prepared to turn our back on rural Canada and turn it over to agri-business or corporate agriculture? Around the world some countries have made that decision. Some decided that the family farm as a production unit is worth preserving. As a result, they put in place a variety of programs to make that possible.

It is an incredibly competitive world and, in many respects, the competition is unfair. We are asking our farmers and ranchers to compete in a very unfair market-place. Heavy subsidies are given to the European farm community which make it virtually impossible for our producers to compete on international markets. Then we have the spectre of free trade talks and the possibility, because none of us really know what is going on, of initiatives which would result in the American agricultural community moving in to Canada and simply taking over. I refer specifically to the case made by poultry producers, egg producers, dairy producers, and a number of other sectors of the agricultural community who are very serious about the potential influence of a free trade agreement on their area.

I come from central British Columbia where agriculture plays an important role. The rural fabric of that area is dependent upon a healthy and viable agricultural community. We have the soft fruit industry, the hard fruit industry, the vineyards of the Okanagan Valley, and then the more exotic crops such as ginseng which are aimed at far eastern markets. We have traditional cattle ranching and vegetable producers who are just beginning, under incredibly competitive conditions, to make successful inroads into new markets. This is often done with the assistance of the provincial Government, the federal Government, and in some cases even local Governments.

Today we are discussing the abandonment of Canagrex. It is important that we remind ourselves what Canagrex was all about. It was an initiative taken by the federal Government to market Canadian agricultural products in a more effective and efficient way in new areas. Our food producers are among the most efficient in the world. They can compete in the international market-place. However, they have often required some assistance. The farmer raising a certain type of oil-seed, or a farmer raising rabbits or raspberries, whatever the crop may be, does not have the time or the capacity to go to Japan to develop a market.

Some other Hon. Members of this place and I had the good fortune to visit Japan some time back. We looked at the potential for Canadian food producers in that market. We learned that they are very pleased with the quality of foodstuffs from Canada. Not surprisingly, we found a considerable potential. As a matter of fact, wherever we went, food fairs were being conducted by our embassy introducing the Japanese to Canadian foods and recipes. The response was fantastic. That is why we feel that wherever Canadians have made the effort to develop and expand markets overseas for our food producers, it has been successful. Yet it is costly and time-consuming.

That was the point of Canagrex. It had a very modest budget to go out and sell our products overseas. A lot of people have asked why our farmers cannot do that. Obviously they do not have time or necessarily the expertise. Often their organizations are limited by their funding. We said, "Let us put aside a Crown corporation to do that for our food producers. They deserve nothing less. Let us put in place a mechanism whereby Canagrex is evaluated on a regular basis. Get farmers on the board of directors. Hold it accountable for its actions." It was a very progressive piece of work. Then, just as it was beginning its work and opening up new markets, providing hundreds and potentially tens of thousands of jobs, both directly and in supporting industries, what did the Government do? It pulled the rug out and decided to abandon it. It did so because, when it was set up, the Progressive Conservatives were in opposition. I recall them going on at some length about how this was not necessary, our farmers did not require that support. I do not think they said that farmers did not deserve the support, but they did say that they did not require it.

The success of Canagrex was something to behold. If anyone sat down and objectively evaluated what that small Crown corporation did in a very short period of time, it was nothing short of remarkable. Dedicated people wanted to see our agricultural sector expand.

It is with some reluctance that I discuss this today. It is with some sadness and sorrow that I have to comment on the deathbed of Canagrex. We have one more spike to drive into its coffin, and I guess that is in a sense what we are doing. However, I want to remind my friends on the government side that now is the time we need to rally behind the family farm. Now is the time to rally behind the food producers of Canada. Therefore, I plead at this last moment for my friends in the Conservative caucus to reconsider the abandonment of this initiative to assist Canadian food producers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ADVISABILITY OF PROMOTING PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of sponsoring a major initiative to enhance the opportunities for peace in Central America through steps including, but not necessarily limited to:

1. appointing a personal envoy of the Prime Minister to reinforce diplomatic efforts regionally and internationally;

2. establishing an embassy in Nicaragua;

3. establishing a "Peace Fund", with contributions from like-minded Western nations, to cover costs associated with implementation of the Contadora treaty; and

4. introducing at the UN a General Assembly Resolution calling on the Secretary-General to dispatch a civilian monitoring commission to the region.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on a motion that I introduced on June 19 of this year which calls on the Canadian Government to take specific and concrete steps to assist in the peace process in Central America. These steps, combined with some other suggestions which I am about to make, would amount to a major Canadian diplomatic initiative.

I hope that the Government will take seriously the possibility of a diplomatic initiative. Such a move would reinforce the initiatives that thousands of Canadians have been taking for many years and continue to undertake today.

In many of the Central American countries there are Canadians working for a just and lasting peace in practical and concrete ways. There are many Canadians in Canada working for charitable and solidarity projects in support of the people of Central America. I hope the Government will take seriously the initiative of so many concerned Canadians by responding with an initiative of its own.

I do not want to suggest for an instant that the Government has done nothing to promote a genuine Canadian desire for peace or Canadian action for peace. I want to acknowledge, for example, that the Government has offered technical assistance to the countries of Central America for peacekeeping and verification. I want to commend the Government for voting against Mr. Reagan in the United Nations on the motion calling on the U.S. to obey the international law and honour the International Court injunction against the mining of the harbours of Nicaragua. I want to recognize that the Government has provided both bilateral aid and assistance to non-governmental organizations to the Central American nations.

However, these actions do not amount to the kind of diplomatic initiative that Canada could and should take. I would like my suggestions to be taken as friendly suggestions and my criticism as constructive.

The weeks since I introduced this motion have been exciting ones. They were full of hope for the peoples of Central America and their sympathizers and supporters here in Canada. A peace plan has been adopted by the Central American Governments. Momentum for peace is growing. There are many obstacles to a just and lasting peace. Anything that Canada can do to help increase the momentum for peace must be done.

That increased momentum began, as you know, with the August 7 signing of an accord between the Presidents of the five Central American nations. This accord was reached despite the extensive last-minute efforts by Mr. Reagan to scuttle the talks. Some commentators have suggested, as a matter of fact, that his untimely intervention may have solidified the will of the Central American leaders to accomplish their own peace plan. This week we have seen some signs that Honduras may be showing cold feet, and Mr. Reagan has made it clear that he wishes to keep fighting in Nicaragua. It is clear that there are obstacles to peace for Central America.

The Foreign Ministers have made progress in their meetings in San Salvador. They are organizing working groups necessary to implement the various provisions of the agreement; the cease-fires, the amnesties, the end to guerrilla bases in one country for attack on another, the restoration of civil rights, a free press, and free elections throughout the region. This accomplishment may help overcome some of the obstacles to peace.

Eight other Latin American nations have been asked to sit on a regional peace commission to supervise the process. The United Nations and the Organization of American States will be part of this commission. In El Salvador the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front has agreed to meet with President Jose Napoleon Duarte on September 15 to discuss a cease fire. In Nicaragua the Sandanista Government has appointed the Cardinal of the Catholic church, Miguel Obando y Bravo, to serve on a commission of national reconciliation. Cardinal Obando is and has been a fervent critic of the Sandinista Government.

Also on that commission will be Mauricio Diaz Davila, leader of the popular Social Christian Party. Mr. Diaz will represent the largest block of opposition Parties in the legislature. The third member will be Dr. Gustavo Parajon, a physician and Baptist missionary who heads the Protestant Committee for Aid and Development. The Government will be represented by the vice President of Nicaragua, Sergio Ramirez. This commission may be able to overcome some of the obstacles to peace.

Unhappily, it is clear that Mr. Reagan is still looking for ways to scuttle the peace accord. He has dispatched a swarm of diplomats to the region. He has spoken on the Contra radio station. He has threatened to continue military aid to the terrorists even after the cease fire comes into force. Perhaps most important, he is leaning on governments in the region, particularly those of Honduras and El Salvador, to back out of the accord. This is unforgivable interference on the part of the Reagan administration and makes a mockery of Mr. Reagan's supposed interest in promoting peace in Central America.

Fortunately, in the aftermath of the Contragate hearings, the Central American accord gives the Democratic majority in the U.S. House of Representatives good grounds on which to limit or reject additional funding for the Contra terrorists when the current funding runs out in September.

For some time in the wake of Colonel North's testimony it looked as though American public opinion might be shifting towards supporting the Contras. However, I am pleased to report that according to the latest New York Times-CBS news poll only 33 per cent of Americans support such aid while half of Americans oppose it. There truly are obstacles to a fair and just peace in Central America, but there are also hopeful signs and a growing momentum for peace.

As a nation with an international reputation for peacekeeping and peacemaking Canada can help build on this momentum. We owe it to our Central American neighbours to do all we can to assist. They have suffered war and violence for too many years.

What can Canada do? We can help to mobilize international opinion. We can lend our moral suport to the people of Central America. We can lend practical support. We can make a difference. Canadians can help bring an end to those bloody wars. We can help to build a just and lasting peace.

In my motion submitted to the House on June 19 I first suggested that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) should send a personal envoy to Central America to reinforce our diplomatic efforts. In fact, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) sent not one but two envoys to offer Canada's technical expertise in peacekeeping and verification. This is a very practical form of aid which Canada has provided. I applaud that move and hope that the Minister will take up more New Democrat suggestions.

My second suggestion was that Canada should take a leading role in establishing a peace fund with contributions from western nations to help with the costs of implementation. Such a move would have both practical and diplomatic significance. Practically, the peace process, and especially the verification process, will cost money. We cannot expect the Reagan administration to make the same financial contribution to peace as it has to war. Diplomatically, such a move would send a clear signal of support to all parties in the region. I ask the Minister to seize this unparalleled opportunity.

My third suggestion was that the Canadian Government should introduce a resolution in the United Nations General Assembly in support of the Central American peace process. Representatives of the United Nations and the Organization of American States will sit on the Regional Verification Commission. These representatives are important in both symbolic and practical terms.

A United Nations General Assembly resolution would present the opportunity to mobilize international opinion. It would send another signal to the participants in this bloody conflict. It would signal international approval of the peace process. It would also signal a Canadian commitment to international law and international organizations as being crucial to peace.

My final suggestion is that Canada establish an embassy in Nicaragua. The Government has argued that our interests are adequately served by our embassy in San Jose, Costa Rica. Without casting aspersions on our embassy staff in Costa Rica, I can assure you that this claim is not well founded.

I was in Nicaragua with a parliamentary delegation in April of this year. Our embassy in Costa Rica organized a dinner so that we could meet the Canadians who are resident in Nicaragua, most of whom are working with non-governmental organizations in Canada or Nicaragua to help the people of Nicaragua. It was a good event and I commend the embassy for organizing it, but I was surprised, as they were, to discover that our embassy had no idea of how many Canadians were in Nicaragua. That is one small example of the lack of knowledge that our Government has about the realities of life in the most controversial country in Central America.

The Government is not even in contact with Canadians who work in Nicaragua and know the country. In case of emergency, moreover, Canadians in Nicaragua are expected to go to the American embassy for assistance in spite of the protests that many of them made against such advice. Given the divergence of U.S. and Canadian policy on that country, this is a very regrettable situation. Our embassy in Costa Rice is expected to cover our interest in Costa Rica, Nicaragua, El Salvador and Panama. In a region as volatile as Central America, it is too much to expect of the staff.

An embassy in Nicaragua would give our Government much more direct and complete information than it can get now. An embassy would enable Canada to engage in continuing and ongoing discussions with the Nicaraguan Government and the Nicaraguan people on matters of mutual concern. The goodwill created by the involvement of hundreds of individual Canadians can provide the base for our officials to have a real influence in Nicaragua.

Finally, an embassy would help promote trade between Nicaragua and Canada, trade that would be to both countries' advantage.

I have suggested moves that would be the beginning of a major diplomatic and practical initiative by Canada to promote and support peace in Central America. It would help to increase momentum for the peace process in Central America. It would be a positive response to the desires of thousands of Canadians who have, through their activities in Canadian solidarity organizations and non-governmental organizations, worked hard, sometimes risking their lives, to help the people of Central America.

This is an opportunity that Canada cannot afford to miss. The people of Central America deserve a just and lasting peace. Canadians can be and deserve to be known as peacemakers.

In addition to the steps I have suggested to the Government in my motion, there are other practical steps the Government should take. For example, we can make use of our bilateral aid program in the name of peace, just as Mr. Reagan does in the name of war. We can make it a condition of our aid that recipient countries adhere to the terms of the peace accord, which calls upon Central American countries to refuse their territory as bases for attacks on other countries.

Members will know that I primarily refer there to El Salvador and Honduras, since both Costa Rica recently, and Nicaragua some years ago, ceased to allow rebel bases on their territories.

Honduras is our major bilateral aid recipient in the region. Honduras has received some $37 million in Canadian aid over the last five years. Honduras is also the country most likely to violate the accord. Members of the Honduran military Government and business classes make money from skimming American aid to the Contras. The American bilateral aid program is clearly dependent on Honduran aid to the Contras. Eleven U.S.-built airstrips and almost continuous U.S. military manoeuvres dominate the economic and political posture of Honduras. Therefore, Honduras must choose. It can choose to conform to a posture set by the Reagan administration, or it can choose to honour its commitment to the peace process. Canada can help to make that choice easier.

We can link our aid to the participation of Honduras in the peace process. Of course, we cannot hope unilaterally to match the amount of aid that the U.S. provides, but we might be able to approach other countries in our hemisphere and in Europe, inviting them to put together an aid package—a sort of consortium for peace.

These are practical steps that would help overcome some of the obstacles to peace. But even if the countries of Central America are allowed to end the fighting without outside interference, efforts must still be made to ensure that peace is peace with justice. For without justice, there can be no lasting peace in Central America or anywhere else. The roots of war lie in injustice. We must learn from history.

Canadians are deeply committed to peace with justice in Central America. I have seen the commitment of Canadians when I visited the region, where I witnessed individual Canadians and Canadian organizations deeply committed to peace with justice. In Guatemala earlier this summer, I witnessed a woman of Guatemalan origin marching with the Organization of Mothers of the Disappeared, demanding an account of their relatives.

In Nicaragua this spring, I visited a young Canadian apiarist working with CARE Canada to help Nicaraguan farmers improve both their honey and crop yields. I visited farming co-ops, where Canadians were helping Nicaraguans improve their farming technique. A similar co-op, after being assisted by an Alberta group, Farmers for Peace, was attacked by Contras earlier this summer. Ten Nicaraguans were killed, four kidnapped, and many houses and buildings burned. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made a very strong protest against that action by the Contras and let the United States Government know of its protest.

Other Canadian projects have been attacked by Contras in Nicaragua as well. Last summer, for instance, a group of Ontario teachers travelled to the mountains to build a school in a remote village. Having made their contribution to the literacy program in Nicaragua, they returned home. Unfortunately, as they waited at the airport in Managua, word came that the Contras had burned the newly built school. Such are the acts of terror committed by the Contras, which the President of the United States continues to finance.

Canadians have put their lives on the line in support of the people of Central America. Earlier this summer, Professor George Sorger and Barbara Paleczny, associated with Amnesty International, visited El Salvador to investigate the numerous reports of human rights violations in that country. On their return, they were picked up and held by Honduran soldiers who threatened them with torture and stole the notes they had made in El Salvador. Fortunately, they were released unharmed.

In El Salvador on July 31, a group of Canadian teachers visiting the village of San Jose Las Flores were seized by government troops, held overnight, and denied medical attention for a sick colleague. I would like to quote from their report:

We were not prepared for the graphic details supplied by the soldiers, of the process of torture within the treasury police.

Canadians in this country are doing their part to build a just and lasting peace. As the New Democratic critic for Central American issues, I receive a constant stream of phone calls and correspondence on Central America. Many Canadians are well informed and knowledgeable.

Canadians here in Ottawa have twinned a day care centre, the Glebe Day Care, with a child care centre in Managua. Part of the funds raised by the Glebe Day Care are used to help their counterparts in Managua.

In British Columbia, fishermen are donating their time to build a prototype fishing boat to help modernize the Nicaragua fishing industry.

From one end of this country to the other, thousands of volunteers with tools for peace collect material goods, including blankets for hospitals, notebooks for schools, and money for tin to put roofs on houses, that is shipped from Vancouver to supply material needs in Nicaragua.

In May of this year I attended a conference on peace in Central America here in Ottawa which was organized by Canadians. This conference brought government, academic and other representatives to Ottawa from Honduras, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Mexico, Peru and other Latin American countries, and from Europe, to discuss the peace process. This conference may well have contributed to preparing the way for the peace accord.

Many of these projects are small by themselves but they have a cumulative impact. They provide practical support for the peoples of Central America. They provide symbolic support for the people to people level. They help to educate Canadians and help to build momentum for peace.

There is a Canadian initiative for peace, an intiative of the Canadian people. I am asking that there also be a distinct Canadian Government initiative for peace in Central America. I challenge this Government to show the kind of courage and imagination, the kind of dedication and vision that is shown by so many Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the Hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Clinch) followed by the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand).

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Clinch (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the House today about the progress made in achieving peace in Central America. In fact, progress is the correct word, if we consider recent events.

As Hon. Members are aware, the Presidents of five Central American countries recently agreed to a new peace plan for the region, with the support of the main parties concerned outside the region, namely the U.S., Cuba and the USSR. This is a very positive development.

However, I do not want to give the impression that the plan is a cure-all for the region's problems. In recent years, negotiations conducted by the countries of the Contadora group—Mexico, Panama, Colombia and Venezuela—have too often raised expectations and been followed by disillusionment and disappointment, which of course in no way diminishes the efforts of the Contadora group which, despite tremendous obstacles, has demonstrated its resolve and determination.

The most serious obstacle would seem to be the existence of serious socio-economic differences. Another obstacle to peace is the guerillas in El Salvador, Nicaragua and Guatemala. Finally, and this may be a decisive factor, we have the power struggle between the two superpowers, which tends to aggravate regional conflicts. Canada sincerely hopes that the goodwill shown by all parties in recent weeks will be reflected in a sincere effort to overcome these obstacles.

Canada has a clear-cut policy with respect to the situation in Central America. In a speech last year before the Inter-American Press Association, the Prime Minister referred to the Contadora initiative as the best instrument for reconciliation in Central America. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) also said in public statements, in Canada and abroad, that Canada firmly supported the Contadora process. The Secretary of State for External Affairs repeated his position during visits to Argentina, Uruguay and Venezuela in 1986.

In January 1987, in a message addressed to Foreign Affairs Ministers of the Contadora group and the Lima support group, and to the Secretaries General of the United Nations and the Organization for American States on the occasion of their visit to the Central American countries, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that the efforts of the Contadora group had sustained the hopes of the international community for a lasting solution to the crisis in Central America. In 1986, the Canadian delegation to the UN General Assembly made a statement in support of the Contadora group.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, Canada has provided constructive and practical support for the Contadora group and the general peace process. During his visit to Mexico in 1985, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was able to discuss the situation in Central America and the Contadora group's plan with President de la Madrid and the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He restated Canada's firm support for the Contadora initiative and its desire to play a constructive role in the peace process, when appropriate. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that Canada was prepared to share its experience in peacekeeping operations with the parties concerned. Since then, the Canadian Government, at the request of the Contadora group countries, has drafted a series of comments on the provisions of the Draft Convention on Security and Verification.

Those comments are based on a number of considerations, including the need to speak in a neutral, objective and unbiased way. We were also aware of the need to ensure the viability of any verification and follow-up commission that may be established under the Contadora Act. Specifically, we thought that the funding for such an operation should be carefully examined by all parties in order that the selected mechanism be as viable as possible, given the circumstances.

[English]

We believe that the concept of a regional solution to the current problem should be emphasized. In this regard we believe that the Central American parties themselves ought to be brought into the peacekeeping mechanisms as far as possible. As far as this contributes to the effective operation of a control and verification commission, the commission should enjoy specific and firm guarantees relating to its freedom of movement and access to the region. The commission's role should also permit free and open communication with the media as its members deem appropriate.

Finally, we believe there is a need to designate a sponsoring political authority for the commission and to establish a time limit for the mandate of the commission itself. The Government believes that the principles which were enunciated two years ago for control and verification can be usefully applied to the current peace plan.

On August 7, at the close of their historic summit meeting in Guatemala, the Central American Presidents announced that an agreement had been reached on a new peace plan for Central America. The plan called for a meeting of the foreign Ministers within 15 days to begin implementing an amnesty for insurgents, a cease-fire and dialogue with unarmed opposition groups. This was all to be achieved in 90 days, that is, by November 7. The Contradora countries were to be asked to design and implement a control and verification commission to supervise forest levels in the region.

We were delighted at this breakthrough agreement. Canada's support was made clear on the very day the agreement was signed, and a press release was issued by the Minister for External Affairs (Mr. Clark). The Minister subsequently dispatched two officials to the region during the week of August 17 to demonstrate Canada's support and to offer technical advice on the design of the peacekeeping mechanisms. The visit and the Canadian offer were warmly welcomed by all countries in the region.

There have been further hopeful signs. The agreement, as I have said, called for a Foreign Ministers' meeting within 15 days. That meeting took place on August 19 and 20 in San Salvador. The Foreign Ministers then met with their Contadora counterparts, as well as with Foreign Ministers from the Lima support group, and UN and OAS representatives in Caracas on August 22 and 23. They agreed to establish a verification commission.

Canada, being outside the Latin American area, is not a member of the commission. However, we have told all the Governments concerned that we stand ready to offer technical advice to the commission should its members wish us to do so.

I think we can safely conclude therefore that there has been real progress. That is clear from the fact that all five Central American presidents approved the Guatemala plan, demonstrating an unprecedented commitment and the political will to overcome the obstacles. We should be realistic, however, as to the limits of this progress. The guerilla wars continue, as does the superpower competition. The conditions of poverty persist and are exacerbated by massive flows of refugees who have been displaced by the conflicts. Respect for human rights, civil liberties and democratic institutions is still lacking in parts of the region.

This recent progress constitutes a positive but tentative step down a very long road. In this context, international support is vital to maintaining the momentum of the peace process. The Canadian Government will continue to provide encouragement, support and appropriate technical advice deemed useful by the Central American and Contadora countries.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, the intent behind this resolution to promote peace in Central America is good but, as has been recognized by its mover and by the speaker for the Government, it is out of date to a certain extent. It is out of date because the five principal countries in Central America concluded a peace agreement in Guatemala City on August 7, 1987, in which they provided for a cease-fire of civil wars within the countries of the region. In particular, that means civil wars in Nicaragua, Salvador and Guatemala. They also provided for a return to democratic government in these countries, as well as an amnesty for opponents of the Government. This means amnesty for the Contras in Nicaragua, as well as amnesty for members of the FMLN in El Salvador and in Guatemala. They provided for a halt to aid to insurgents from outside the country, which would mean stopping American aid to the Contras toward Nicaragua, a halt to any aid from Cuba or the Soviet Union to Nicaragua and, perhaps, to the insurgents in Salvador. Also, the countries that are signatories to the agreement renounced the use of their territory as a basis for struggle against neighbouring countries.

This is a very hopeful agreement. The signatories to the agreement stated that it would go into effect in 90 days from the date of signature. Since it was signed on August 7 of this year, it will go into effect on November 7, 1987. At that time all the provisions should go into effect simultaneously. In other words, the signatories to the agreement should be prepared to restore democratic rights as a cease-fire takes effect and amnesty should be given to all the opponents at the same time.

I failed to mention at the outset that the five signatories to this agreement are different from the countries involved in the Contadora process. While the resolution refers to the Contadora process, it is to a certain extent out of date because there were more countries involved, and in that case different countries. Here we have involved the five principal countries: Nicaragua, Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Costa Rica, with the plan having been put forward by the President of Costa Rica, Oscar Arias.

Of course, Canada has given support to this peace agreement. As was mentioned by the representative of the Government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) has already offered assistance to the signatories to the agreement in implementing the process, in providing assistance for verification and for monitoring and so on. This is all to the good.

However, I do not think that the principal problem is now with the five signatories to the agreement, or with Canada's effort, but will be with the United States. The United States has been, and I think continues to be, the principal road-block to peace in that area. I should make it clear that I am talking about the Government of the United States and not the Congress or the people of the United States. Just after the signature of this agreement on August 7, these words appeared in The New York Times of August 16, "President Reagan said today that American support for the Nicaraguan rebels should continue until a cease-fire has occurred and a verifiable process of democratization is under way in that Central American country". So President Reagan says that there must be a certain type of democratization in Nicaragua, if there is going to be a cease-fire, a stoppage of the assistance to the Contras, but he does not mention Salvador. He does not mention Guatemala. He does not put any demands on them to live up to certain conditions of democracy or else the agreement should not be supported. However, he puts this on Nicaragua in particular.

The President of the United States has done that all along. All along he has said to Nicaragua, "Either you live up to the standards of democracy that we are dictating to you or we will continue to intervene in your affairs. We will continue to fund the Contras". The President of the United States has laid a standard of democracy on Nicaragua that he does not lay on other countries with which he deals.

He does not insist on those conditions of democracy for Chile, for example. He does not lay those conditions on South Africa. Nor does he lay them on China, a communist country with which he deals consistently and with which he has been quite friendly of late. However, with respect to little Nicaragua, which is about the size of New Brunswick and which has a population of fewer than three million people, he insists that it live up to very high standards of democracy. We would all like to have pure systems of democracy, and we all hope to move in that direction. The President of Nicaragua has stated that he, too, would like to move in that direction.

This is rather odd for the United States, a country which is celebrating I am not certain what anniversary of its Constitution in Philadelphia, which took until 1954—some 150 years after the birth of that nation—for blacks to have the vote. Here is a country with only a two-Party system. It is almost impossible for a third Party to get elected in the United States. Yet that country is insisting that Nicaragua be a pluralist society, when in fact in the Nicaraguan Parliament there are five or six Parties represented because it has a system of proportional representation.

We can be a bit arrogant and a bit holier-than-thou when we start dictating to other countries that they should live up to standards of democracy that we ourselves have failed to live up to and that we do not insist upon for other countries. I refer here to the United States' dealings with South Africa, Chile, Nicaragua when Somoza was there, and the Philippines in previous times, and so on.

It seems to me that this peace agreement arrived at by the countries in the region with good faith will succeed if the United States, and in particular the President of the United States, will give it their support.

My plea in Parliament is not to the Government, because I think it is doing the correct thing in supporting the agreement, but my plea is to the United States Government to please give peace a chance in Central America, and in particular in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala, and to help those countries to proceed with the agreement that they arrived at. Please stop the funding of the Contras until the Government of Nicaragua is given a fair chance to do what it states it will do in the agreement. Do not fund the Contras through the back door when it cannot be done through the front door, as was found out in recent months during the great television extravaganza in the United States Congress.

I congratulate the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) for introducing the resolution last June. At that time there was no peace agreement proposed by President Arias which is now agreed to. That was not in effect then, but the Hon. Member's proposals are still legitimate. Canada must do all it can to support peace in Central America. The proposals of the Hon. Member are worth-while. Please let us convince the American Government to support this worth-while peace agreement in that region.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Government believes that the fundamental causes of tension and political conflicts in Central America are the deeply rooted socioeconomic disparities that are rampant to various degrees in each and every country in this area.

In the Government's view, Canada can contribute the most to promoting peace and stability in those areas by first providing for development assistance aimed at helping individuals and communities break the vicious circle of poverty and promote economic growth, and, secondly, by supporting a peace settlement for that area.

Other speakers have already referred to the support Canada has been and is still providing for the efforts towards reaching such a settlement.

I would like to take a few moments to point out to this House the help Canada is providing to the people of Central America. Canadian development assistance in Central America was initiated in 1966 with a loan to El Salvador. After the 1970 foreign policy review, when it was recommended that Canada intensify its presence in the area, assistance activities were undertaken in all the countries of the area. Following the regional program review in 1975, El Salvador and Honduras became program countries for CIDA. In 1979, the planning of new bilateral projects in El Salvador was suspended because of increasing violence and instability in that country. In 1981, the planning of new, bilateral projects in Guatemala also was suspended by reason of internal turmoil in that country.

In 1982, after an in-depth review of the relations between Canada and Central America, the Government decided to extend substantially its development assistance program for countries in that region. For instance, the Government decided to provide up to $106 million in bilateral Government to Government assistance to the region during the five year period between 1982-83 and 1986-87, which is triple the amount of bilateral assistance provided to the region during the previous five-year period.

As for the countries which would benefit from this assistance, it was decided that Honduras, the poorest country in Central America, would rank first as in the past. Costa Rica and Nicaragua would also receive increased assistance, while Guatemala and El Salvador would continue not to receive any assistance until their domestic situation improved. However, all countries in the region could receive assistance through other channels. This would include the Mission Administered Funds Program, the Non-Governmental Organizations Program, the Institutional Cooperation Program, the Industrial Cooperation Program, the Humanitarian Assistance Program and the International Development Research Centre.

In December 1984, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Hon. Joe Clark, announced reinstatement of Government-to-Government assistance to El Salvador. This decision was made because of the needs of thousands of displaced people, of the economic under-development of El Salvador, of a noted improvement in the respect of human rights in that country and of its return to democratic institutions.

In the five-year period between 1982-83 and 1986-87, or since the Government decided to increase substantially its assistance to Central America, Canada has extended approximately $106 million in Government-to-Government assistance to the population of this region. In other words, the Canadian Government has kept its commitment of tripling bilateral assistance to the region.

However, the amount of assistance provided is only part of the picture. The quality and effectiveness of this assistance are at least as important.

We firmly believe that Canadians bilateral assistance to Central America effectively meets the development needs and problems of the various countries in the region. In Honduras, Canadian Government-to-Government assistance supports the development and protection of renewable resources, rural job creation and the improvement of health care and food supplies in rural regions. In Costa Rica, this assistance has been used to improve a very unhealthy balance of payments and to finance a major rural housing program. In Nicaragua, bilateral assistance provided by Canada has been directed mostly toward basic human needs, such as the production of food and energy. In El Salvador, this assistance is directed especially at displaced persons and the poorest members of the population.

Besides Government-to-Government assistance, Canada has provided over the past five years more than $45 million in aid to Central American countries through such other direct assistance channels as the Non-Governmental Organizations Program, the Institutional Cooperation Programme, the Business Cooperation Program, the Petro Canada International Assistance Corporation and the International Development Research Centre.

Also, for the past five years, Canada has provided more than $15 million to multilateral organizations such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross for the programs they have developed to help refugees and displaced persons in Central America.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe that Canada, through its public development assistance programs, meets generously and effectively the social and economic needs of the peoples in Central America. This is one of the regions of the world where Canada provides the highest per capita public development assistance. The Canadian Government and people will continue to meet generously the social and economic needs of the peoples in Central America.

[English]

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed to have this opportunity to debate the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap).

The motion addresses a very difficult and complex situation which exists in Central America. This is an important issue, because Central America is the scene of some of the most tragic warfare in the world today, and it also has become the scene of serious East-West conflict. It is important to Canada because it is taking place in the western hemisphere, in that part of the Third World closest to Canada, and in a region with which Canada has growing social, economic, and political interests.

The emergence of a new peace plan which has been described, and the initiative of the countries of Central America themselves are the most encouraging development in the region for several years. As has already been pointed out, the Canadian Government has not stood idly by during those years. While recognizing that Canada has no direct role to play at this stage of the negotiations, we have gone to some lengths to give the maximum possible support and encouragement to the parties. The process of converting the commitments which have been made into a peace settlement will be a difficult one. Our support is more than rhetorical. The Government stands ready to provide technical advice, where it has the appropriate expertise to offer in the control and verification process which will follow a cease-fire in the region.

I wish to remind the House, however, that this is not a new approach by the Government. On the contrary, it is entirely consistent with the policies which the Government has pursued with respect to Central America since it was elected. Indeed, our recent effort in support of the new peace plan is a logical extension of the role Canada has sought to play for some time.

Canadian policy toward Central America is a distinct one, shaped by Canadian criteria. It has been developed in recognition of the geo-political realities of Central America and of the social and economic factors which are at the root of the current problems.

The Canadian Government opposes third party intervention anywhere in Central America and regrets deeply the intrusion into that region of East-West tensions and the related militarization of the area. Canada does not approve of the supply of armaments by any country to opposing factions in the region. Canada has constantly emphasized its firm belief that the countries of Central America must be free to seek their own solutions to their own problems without interference from any other country or any outside source.

We strongly share the view that the growth and development of democracy is an important issue in Central America. Canada welcomes the progress which has been made in several countries in the region while recognizing that there is still room for improvement.

We in Canada do not wish to see Nicaragua locked into the Soviet bloc or involved in destabilizing its neighbours. We encourage Nicaragua to move toward the original goals of the revolution which were recently restated in its new Constitution: a commitment to political pluralism, a mixed economy and non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries.

We believe that improvements must be made in the Nicaraguan civil and human rights record. The continued suspension of many basic civil rights under the state of emergency is profoundly disturbing to the people of Canada and Canada's Government. We encourage political pluralism in Nicaragua and we support the ability of legitimate domestic political opposition Parties to continue to function.

We have deplored the recent decision to close down La Prensa newspaper and the harassment of opposition groups and of churches. The recent arrest and sentencing of the head of the Nicaraguan Human Rights Commission and the head of the Nicaraguan Bar Association within days of the signing of the peace accord was a disturbing and potentially counter-productive development. It was not consistent with the spirit of the agreement and only served to emphasize the need for reforms within Nicaragua.

We hope that the implementation of the peace plan will result in the lifting of the state of emergency, the removal of current restrictions on the press and opposition groups, and an end to incidents such as that to which I have referred.

In conclusion, let me reiterate the Government's satisfaction that negotiations for a peaceful settlement in Central America are under way again. We are under no illusions about the obstacles which lie in the way of a just peace, but Canada stands ready to do what it can to support the process.

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate today, I would like to take the opportunity to thank the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) for bringing forward his resolution. I think we all know of his many years of interest in and concern for this issue and of his experience and involvement in Central America. I know it is a concern shared by many Canadians and indeed by the Government.

I appreciate the support of the Hon. Member for Spadina in the efforts of the Government in Central America over the past few years. Indeed, as other colleagues have said, we welcome the new peace agreement, but I would just like to say that that agreement was not easily won. It did not happen overnight and it was preceded by many years of hard work and by many disappointments. It was an important breakthrough, but there are many difficulties in the way of implementation and a great deal of hard work and good faith, both within and outside the region, will be essential to make it happen.

I would like to summarize briefly each of the four specific points made by the Hon. Member in his resolution. First, as he indicated and as other Hon. Members have already said, we have already sent two senior officials to the region to do precisely what the Hon. Member has suggested that a personal envoy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) should do. Their trip has indeed reinforced Canada's diplomatic efforts in the region and their message has been warmly received by all Central American Governments, including the Nicaraguan Government.

Second, while the Government would certainly like to have an embassy in Nicaragua, as it would in many other places, it is unable to do so for financial reasons. We cannot have embassies in every part of the world, and we have existing arrangements which are working very well for us and will proceed for the time being.

The establishment of a peace fund was proposed by my colleague. As Hon. Members are aware, Canada has already contributed significantly to bilateral development assistance and to multilateral efforts. In per capita terms, the amount of Canadian aid to Central America is considerable. Canadian aid to the region is given for developmental and compassionate reasons. It also serves to complement the Contadora peace objectives.

Finally, the proposal for the civilian monitoring commission has obviously been overtaken by the new peace agreement. What form the monitoring of the cease-fire will take is obviously up to the Central American Governments, but the Canadian Government has already taken constructive action in support of the peace agreement and offered its technical assistance and advice.

I think it is appropriate, in concluding, to summarize what has been said about Canada's policies and role in Central America as this is the main thrust of the resolution before the House. I believe that the suggestion that Canada is not doing enough is wrong. That suggestion is perhaps implicit in the resolution and the comments we have heard.

Canadians have been very active in the region for many years. We have observed closely the developments in the region. We have spoken out on issues as an informed and sympathetic observer to do wherever it has been appropriate for us to do so. Canada's voice has been loud and clear on many issues, including the external involvement in the region and the inappropriateness of seeking military solutions. There has been encouragement for negotiations and for human rights.

Canada has built up a large aid program carefully designed to meet the most pressing needs of the poorest people of the region. We have encouraged trade with the region because we believe that economic development is one of the most effective means of combatting the fundamental social and economic problems. We have provided active support for negotiations in the region by giving technical advice when required to do so.

This distinctly Canadian approach to Central America has been shown clearly in our prompt, positive reaction to the recently agreed to peace program. Canada expressed its strong support for the plan immediately after it was announced and followed up with visits by officials to capitals in the region. We have also renewed our offer to provide technical advice on verification and control.

As Hon. Members may recall, in a period of less than two weeks, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) issued three statements. The first was a message of support on the very eve of the Central American summit. Then he issued a statement reporting on the congratulatory messages he had sent to the Central American Governments. He also reported on statements relating to his decision to send officials to the region. This is indicative not only of the Minister's personal interest but also of his determination that Canada should react positively and constructively to these events.

As the hour draws near, I would hope that all Hon. Members on all sides of the House would join me in congratulating the Government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the strong, supportive stand taken toward countries in the troubled region of Central America and in urging the Government to continue to do all in its power to assist those countries in achieving a peaceful resolution to their disputes.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—LENGTH OF PRISON SENTENCES—GRANTING OF PAROLE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, on August 24, 1987, I rose in this House to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) regarding problems with the justice system in Canada. I was concerned about the Government's efforts in this area now that the question of capital punishment has been settled.

The amount of public outcry generated by the issue of capital punishment was a clear indication that Canadians are not satisfied with safety in our society and our justice system. Both supporters and opponents of the reinstatement of capital punishment agreed that there is a real need for reform. I am concerned, as are my constituents of Don Valley East, that prison terms are too lenient and parole is being granted too early in too many instances.

I was pleased with the Minister's response to my question on these two issues that the Government is, indeed, concerned with this problem and that steps are being taken to improve the sentencing and parole systems. I would like, however, to emphasize how strong Canadians feel about violent criminals and the inadequacies of our justice system in protecting innocent citizens.

According to a poll released by Maclean's magazine on June 29, 1987, 87 per cent of those questioned believe convicted murderers are allowed back into society too soon. The poll also indicates that the large majority of Canadians are deeply troubled by a rising incidence of murder and other violent crimes. The Canadian public has lost a great deal of faith in our criminal justice system.

The Canadian Sentencing Commission has reported a number of serious problems with sentencing in Canada. One of the basic problems it listed was a lack of public confidence in sentencing. The public's negative perceptions have led to some people taking the law into their own hands. Out of frustration and a belief that the justice system has failed them, many Canadian citizens are arming themselves and seeking their own methods of punishing criminals. A noted example of this is the recent case in Calgary of Mr. Steven Kesler, who shot a man who was attempting to rob him. If the public's confidence in our justice system is not improved quickly, I am afraid we will see more and more instances of vigilante type actions from the public.

The Canadian Sentencing Commission links some of the problems with the sentencing system to the "almost complete absence of policy from Parliament on the principles that should govern the determination of sentences". It also credits "parole and early release programs that fail to accomplish their goals" as well as "unrealistic maximum and minimum penalties that create injustices". I know that no justice system is infallible, Mr. Speaker, but it seems clear to me that our own system is in desperate need of improvements.

I am sure we are all familiar with the case of Ms. Celia Ruygrok whose tragic murder was an example of the justice system failing completely. Ms. Ruygrok was sexually assaulted and murdered by a man on parole after being convicted of a similar murder. He had violated his parole and threatened his former girlfriend just weeks before Celia's murder. However, due to confusion and a lack of communication, Celia's murderer was allowed his freedom and Celia Ruygrok was denied her right to live.

Just today, by coincidence, I received a letter from the President of Victims of Violence expressing concern that criminals with a history of violence are released back into the community after serving only a fraction of their sentences. The victims of these crimes feel that the justice system is cheating them. The residents of Don Valley East have made it clear to me that they want to see some government action. I would like to quote some of my constituents thoughts on this issue.

Earl and Winnifred Miller of Denrock Drive wrote: "We were in favour of the death penalty. If nothing else, the argument for retention has made Parliament aware that the majority of Canadians are fed up with our lax judicial system and want something done to improve it. Even abolitionists have had to admit that something is wrong and needs correcting."

Andrew and Audrey Mathews of Graydon Hall Drive wrote: "Parliament should be grappling with ways of answering the anger, anguish, suffering and material loss of those who are crime's victims".

• (1805)

Mr. Blair Kingsland of Cassandra Boulevard wrote: "I believe that my rights to live and breathe as a law-abiding Canadian citizen should be respected and protected before the rights of criminals."

Fred and Sue Olds of Wellesbourne Crescent wrote in reference to first degree murderers: "In our opinion, the problem would be better served with life sentences that mean life sentences with no parole."

Ms. Wendy Spencer of Yellow Birchway wrote: "I am convinced that our parole system is irrational and ridiculous and thus requires an immediate overhaul. It needs to be tightened up. It is ludicrous to allow dangerously violent people to roam the streets on passes."

And finally, Ms. Jean Dodds of Kestell Lane wrote: "There is, as you know, a glaring lack of rationale in both sentencing and parole and the intelligent voter is not only angry but alarmed at the disparities and injustices."

My constituents, indeed most Canadians, are demanding action. When Members of this House voted against reinstatement of capital punishment, we accepted the responsibility of developing alternative solutions to protect the Canadian public from violent criminals, and more specifically, repeat offenders.

I would like to emphasize the gravity of this issue and ask that the Government respond to the recommendations of the Canadian Sentencing Commission and the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General as soon as they are made available. The Canadian public expects us to make every effort to protect their rights and freedoms. I hope it will not take another tragic event like Celia Ruygrok's murder to realize that, up until now, our efforts have been too little, too late.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in his question the Hon. Member for Don Valley East (Mr. Attewell) mentioned that many Canadians feel the sentences handed down are too lenient.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Hon. Member is aware of the increasing number of sociological studies that have shown that Canadians who are sufficiently informed feel that the sentences handed down by the courts are severe enough and would even be inclined to be more lenient than the courts.

On March 25 this year, our esteemed Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Hnatyshyn) tabled in Parliament the report of the Canadian Sentencing Commission. This report is said to be the first comprehensive study of sentencing ever carried out in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I am informed that legal experts at the Department of Justice are proceeding with another series of consultations and extensive discussions on the recommendations of this report. When the process is complete, the Minister of Justice will be in a position to consider any changes that may be necessary to improve the effectiveness of the Canadian sentencing system.

Mr. Speaker, I believe you yourself are an expert in this field. In addition to examining the recommendations of the Sentencing Commission, this fall the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General will also consider the difficult question of parole.

And once again the recommendations contained in Judge Archambault's report will be considered, as will the merit of a parole system and the wisdom of the existing legislation under which it operates, including for example the regulations which set the jail term to be served by an inmate before he may become eligible for the various forms of parole.

The committee Members will scrutinize the wisdom of this legislation and the merit of the parole system. Still, Mr. Speaker, we must keep in mind the fact that sentencing and parole questions are closely related and that if any major change were to be made to the parole system it would have to be reflected in rules governing sentencing.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, the whole matter is still under consideration and a report will be made public in due time.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT—MAXIMUM SENTENCE FOR MURDER—REQUEST THAT STATUTE BE AMENDED

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that you may not be aware of a murder case that occurred in Port Credit, a small community near Metropolitan Toronto in the Mississauga area in May, 1985. That was a case of the murder of a mother, Paulina Zerger, and her 11-year old daughter Tanya. As a result of that case two charges of first degree murder were laid against a youth who was only 15 years old at the time. The youth was charged with murder under the Young Offenders Act.

As you well know, Mr. Speaker, there is a provision under the Young Offenders Act that the Crown Attorney may move to have a murder case moved up to adult court for trial. You may recall that a year or two ago that was a very controversial thing, at least in the Province of Ontario where, in a number of instances, a motion was not made to move the case up to adult court, the cases were tried in Young Offenders Court and, as a result, there was a great deal of criticism about the fact that the penalty provided for in the Young Offenders Act was too lenient in the case of a serious offence.

As a result of that, the Attorney General for the Province of Ontario gave instructions at that time to all of his Crown Attorneys, in every case of murder or a violent crime in which someone was charged under the Young Offenders Act, to make a motion to move those charges up to adult court. That has been the policy and procedure followed in recent months in the Province of Ontario.

In the Zerger murder case that motion was made by the Crown Attorney. The trial court judge granted the motion and allowed it to be moved up to adult court, but that decision was appealed to the Ontario Court of Appeal because the penalty for murder in an adult court which the young person faced was 25 years imprisonment subject, of course, to the recent Chartrand decision which might make him eligible for parole after only 15 years. In the Young Offenders Act the maximum sentence for a murder conviction is only three years.

The decision was appealed and the Court of Appeal for the Province of Ontario reversed the trial court's decision. In doing so the late Associate Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, Bert MacKinnon, said that when Parliament passed the Young Offenders Act in 1984, it must have intended that young people convicted of serious crimes would serve shorter sentences than adults.

That begs the question as to whether a young person between the ages of 12 and 18, in this particular case 15 years of age, when charged with first degree murder of two people, one of them being an 11-year old girl, should be facing a penalty of a maximum term of imprisonment of only three years or a maximum term of imprisonment of 25 years as they would be if they had reached adulthood and not been subject to the Young Offenders Act in the first place.

The Deputy Director of the Crown Law Office for the Ontario Attorney General has indicated that he believes that a three-year sentence is not long enough to protect the public in the case of a young offender convicted of murder.

I do not know about your constituents, Mr. Speaker, but my constituents certainly agree with the Deputy Director of the Crown Law Office. That is certainly the indication they have given me, not only in this case but in many other cases of a similar nature.

It is interesting to note as well that one of the major Toronto newspapers, The Toronto Star, indicated editorially that the Young Offenders Act should be amended to provide for a maximum sentence for a young offender of five, six, or seven years in the case of murder in order to avoid the appearance of too lenient sentences.

Even more interesting, the lawyer for this particular young offender in the Zerger case said after the trial and the Court of Appeal had reversed the lower court and sent it back to the young offenders court, that he did not feel that a three-year term was long enough. He felt that a term of eight to nine years would be more appropriate in the case of a young offender convicted of first degree murder.

In 1986, the Young Offenders Act was amended by the present Government. At that time there were a number of amendments introduced and it was indicated that if further amendments were necessary the Government was certainly prepared to consider those. In my view, it is time that the Government began to consider these further changes. For one thing, it certainly should be considering changes in the maximum penalty for a young offender convicted of first degree murder. If the courts will not let these proceed in adult court, surely we must make changes in the Young Offenders Act.

A second area that must be addressed is one that has been commented on by the Ontario high school principals and teachers association. It is the case of not being able to identify a young offender, thereby leaving the schools caught in the middle. According to the law, a young offender must attend school but cannot be identified to teachers and principals. Of course, they are concerned for the safety of the students and staff.

Finally, there is the area of offenders under the age of 12, which has been a controversial issue for some time. In the Province of Ontario, the public does not understand why a person under the age of 12 is not subject to the Young Offenders Act, particularly when there were 1,855 children under 12 involved in serious crimes in Metropolitan Toronto alone in 1985.

All of these areas need changes. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will indicate tonight on behalf of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), who is now responsible for the Young Offenders Act, that there will be some changes soon in this legislation.

• (1820)

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our very compassionate Minister of Justice (M. Hnatyshyn), I am happy to reply to the excellent question of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) about what is certainly a burning issue.

The Young Offenders Act has established a modern framework for the Canadian juvenile justice system. Several aspects of this legislation are innovative and have therefore given rise to much debate, both before and after its coming into force in 1982.

However, it is generally admitted that this Act constitutes a proper and balanced response to juvenile crime. For instance, the Young Offenders Act recognizes that the juvenile justice system created by the legislation is not always appropriate and that, in certain cases, serious criminal cases should be judged by the adult courts.

The Act provides a mechanism to transfer certain charges to the adult court, where the young offender is judged in accordance with the Criminal Code and is liable to the same penalties as an adult.

A transfer hearing is held when the Crown, or even the accused, in some cases, so requests, and the judge must consider several factors, such as the seriousness of the offence, the background of the accused and the existence of a previous criminal record.

During the consultations which led to the tabling of Bill C-106, which was debated and passed by this House in 1986, the then Solicitor General proposed some amendments to the transfer provisions of the legislation. More precisely, he proposed that the age at which trial could be moved up to adult court be lowered from 14 to 12 years old—which is very sad but, alas, realistic—and that for the most serious crimes there be, automatically, a hearing on the move up. These proposals where withdrawn following objections from authorities in the area of justice for the young, most notably provincial Solicitors General and Ministers of Justice.

Mr. Speaker, provincial authorities concluded that the move up clauses in the old Act and in the new one were more appropriate. The efficiency of the Act and of each of its clauses will continue to be carefully monitored and to be the subject of consultations by our Government in general and our Minister of Justice in particular, in order to keep our legislation in tune with the most recent needs and to take care of these unfortunate young people in the future.

TAX REFORM—FUTURE OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—OLD AGE EXEMPTION—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, tonight I would like to have answers. I was not satisfied with the one that was given to me by the then Minister of Finance on the amendments to his last budget and also on tax reform. I think it is important for each and everyone of us, and the Parliamentary Secretary, to remember that, at that time, the Government announced it was amending the income tax exemptions and converting them into tax credits.

We welcome that initiative because such was the recommendation made by the Liberal Party and by all groups who worked with the committee on consultation on social program reform, and it will be remembered unfortunately that at that point the Prime Minister misled both our senior citizens and families when he said that he would reinstate full indexation of old age security pensions and that the changes to the family income support program would not be used to reduce the deficit but rather to increase benefits to those who are most in need. We will remember unfortunately the attempt to partially deindex old age security pensions and, thanks to the Official Opposition and senior citizens, the Government's change of heart.

Next, through deindexing of family allowances, the Government will have cut as much as one billion dollars by 1991, preferring to use this money to lower the deficit and bail out the depositors with over $60,000 invested in a couple of Western Canada banking establishments.

We had agreed to replace the tax exemption with a tax credit, but it is unfortunately a non-refundable tax credit. Which means that a person who has not enough income will not be entitled to this tax credit, and there are as many as 1.4 million senior citizens in Canada who, in his last budget, will not be able to benefit from this tax credit. Hon. Members will remember that yesterday, the Forum of Senior Citizens, on the basis of a study it carried out on the tax policies which this Government has implemented in its budgets since September 4, 1984, clearly established that senior citizens and low and middle income families have been greatly affected. Also, the study of the Carleton University report clearly indicates that these people have been greatly affected compared with the more affluent.

I should like to know if the Parliamentary Secretary could further explain why this is not a refundable tax credit which replaced the old age exemption. Moreover, the Forum of Senior Citizens indicated that the $1,000 income deduction under a RRSP or a retirement-oriented investment would greatly affect senior citizens which now benefit from it, and that it was not replaced by a refundable tax credit. I dare hope, therefore, that the Parliamentary Secretary will be able to provide the right answer, not so much to the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie, but especially to the senior citizens who are listening to us and who would like to know whether the Government will grant them a refundable tax credit, and also whether it will join the Liberal Party in its campaign to oppose a tax on bread, milk and butter.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Right away, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that I am not going to join in such shadow boxing. For the leader of our party, who is also the leader of the Government, clearly indicated in the House this afternoon that this issue was thoroughly dealt with, and that we are not going to restrict the normal consultation of the Canadian people by limiting the debate and providing ready-made answers. When this Conservative Government seeks the advice of the people, Mr. Speaker, it offers them all necessary options and we believe that the Canadian people is adult enough to tell right from wrong.

However, Mr. Speaker, let me just give him and all senior citizens a few examples—in answer to the specific request made by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte Marie (Mr. Malépart)—of how to deal with fiscal reform. It is estimated for example that personal exemptions in 1988 will reach some $2,700. For taxpayers with incomes below $27,500, for example, who are quite numerous . . . That is to say, for that category of taxpayers who are uppermost in the mind of the Hon. Member, the rate of tax would be 17 percent. The value of the tax exemption for senior citizens would therefore come to some $454. In its place, the Government has opted for a tax credit of $550, which represents about $100 more. This means the tax break has improved by some 20 percent.

Mr. Speaker, another example can be given here. As indicated in the tables on pages 51 and 52 of the document on income tax reform, which deal with typical taxpayers, single persons and couples aged over 65 benefit substantially from tax reform. The tables show that income tax changes brought about by fiscal reform will mean savings of some $430 for single persons and of some $825 for couples, and this will represents savings of as much as 66 percent compared to the taxes which they paid previously.

Let me give you another example, Mr. Speaker. The minimum taxable income level for senior citizens will rise from $10,800 to $11,500 for single persons, and from $16,000 to $19,000 for married couples. About 250,000 Canadians 65 years old or more will no longer pay any federal income tax.

For instance, the conversion of the $1,000 pension income deduction to a credit of 17 per cent will have the same value for older peole whose income is less than $27,500, that is more than 80 per cent of senior citizens who file income tax returns.

I would like to give you a last example, Mr. Speaker. Low income senior citizens will benefit in 1988 from the higher sales tax refund which will be upped from $50 et $70 per adult.

Mr. Speaker, we have loads of other examples. The White Paper on Tax Reform proposes all kinds of increased tax exemptions, tax savings aimed particularly at senior citizens. They should be presented as they are, and some incidental parts should not be blown out of proportion and distorted from a purely political perspective. Scare tactics should stop. Our people, those of my beautiful riding of LaSalle are certainly better informed than that. Let me tell you that they are not taken in by false and vague theoretical promises. They put greater confidence in dollar savings such as those the future tax reform will bring them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

IMPACT OF LOW-LEVEL MILITARY TRAINING FLIGHTS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this week a Gallup poll reports that 95 per cent of Canadians support more government funding for the protection of wilderness. Yet wilderness areas are coming under attack, not only from logging, mining and development, but from the air as well compliments of the Government of Canada.

Fighter planes already roar across Labrador at tree-top level. If the Department of National Defence gets its way and Goose Bay becomes a NATO training base, the number of overflights will increase substantially.

• (1405)

This year approval was given for B-52 and B-1B bombers to fly at less than 100 metres above ground over Lady Evelyn-Smoothwater Wilderness Park near Temagami in northern Ontario. The latest proposal is for bombers and fighter jets to practise over the skies of British Columbia starting in December.

The Government should respect Canadian passion for the wilderness and stop low-level military flights instead of permitting the militarization of Canadian wilderness.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE—RETENTION WELCOMED

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked, depressed and infuriated when I read in a book issued by the Department of the Secretary of State that there would be a new Oath of Allegiance for new citizens. I was horrified by the two options suggested: one, delegating the monarchy to second place in the oath; and two, leaving the monarchy out altogether.

Why such an idea even appeared in a government booklet is incomprehensible. Surely when we take an Oath of Allegiance to Her Majesty, The Queen, we are pledging allegiance to Canada itself.

If the intention was to accommodate persons who want to become citizens of Canada and who object to taking our present Oath of Allegiance, they should go back to where they came from.

The monarchy stands for the highest and best principles of life and indeed binds our country with all other countries that form the great Commonwealth of Nations.

Every individual who takes our Oath of Allegiance by saying: "I do swear that I will be faithful and bear allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II" is following in the footsteps of thousands of Canadian soldiers, airmen and sailors who died for Canada in honouring that oath.

I commend the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) for saying yesterday in this Chamber: "It is not the Government's intention to withdraw Her Majesty from the Oath of Allegiance". Long live our Queen!

FRANCHISE OUTLETS—APPLICATION OF CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, Canadians got good news and bad news about Canada Post today. First, the good news. The Canadian Labour Relations Board decided unanimously that people working at postal franchise outlets must receive benefits and wages equal to those paid postal workers. This is a great victory for working Canadians and for Canada Post customers.

It is a victory for men and women in need of a living wage. It also means an end to cheap labour at franchise locations.

This is also a victory for the Canadian consumer. People in my riding, and Canadians from across the country, have been telling me that they want the Conservative Government to rethink the way it operates the Post Office. They want equality and uniformity of service for all Canadians whether they live in Thunder Bay, South Gillies, or Atikokan.

Now for the bad news. Canada Post has finally decided that the mail is slow, something that Canadians have known for years, and only now does it want to find out why. The real rub is that it is going to take Canada Post three years to find out why the mail is slow.

This study already has proven why the mail is slow; incompetent management led by an incompetent Conservative Government.

There is a real solution to this problem and it starts with getting rid of the Conservative Government.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

RELEASE OF CONVICTED MURDERER TO CELEBRATE BIRTHDAY

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, another inmate is again being charged with at least one murder and perhaps more after being released on a temporary pass by the National Parole Board, for his birthday, believe it or not. Surely a birthday is insufficient reason for permitting a convicted killer to mingle with innocent Canadians at a mall, who err simply by being in the wrong place at the wrong time.

As we have recently, in a democratic, parliamentary vote, rejected the return of capital punishment, surely we as legislators must accept full responsibility for bringing in tougher parole laws to ensure a greater degree of safety for Canadians. I, for one, have no intention of reneging on my responsibility in this area. We continually hear of the rights of the accused and the guilty, but as I have stated many times in this House, I believe it is high time we concentrate on the collective rights and the protection of society as a whole.

When we reflect on the Sweeney case in which a convicted murderer was released on parole to kill viciously again, and then this recent case in Edmonton, is this not a clear message that it must not happen again? We must toughen the system and protect innocent Canadians.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

EXPRESSION OF GOOD WISHES

Mrs. Lucie pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, a good many men and women from Quebec and other Canadian communities are attending today's official opening of the Francophone Summit in the Quebec capital. This summit is a gathering of 40-odd state leaders and government heads whose common tie is the use of the French language.

Several themes are on the agenda. The participants will attempt to emphasize international policy and the world economic situation. Special consideration will be given to the poorer countries of the francophone community. Linked though they may be by the French language, these countries still carry a heavy burden.

As Governor General Sauvé put it, what we are about to write is the history of francophones of the year 2000. Not only is it a matter of ensuring the continuity of the French language, but we must also promote dialogue among francophone countries. This is a major concern, and therefore political and economic co-operation has to be a foremost objective.

People of many countries have their eyes riveted on Quebec and Canada, and they closely follow the summit leaders to whom we extend our best wishes of success. Unfortunate though it may be, many of us Members of Parliament cannot attend the various events, but our hearts and minds are with the participants. We can only applaud and wish them good luck, hoping that this summit is a harbinger of many more such gatherings.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LIBERAL PARTY FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN—CALL FOR APOLOGY TO ALBERTAN CONSTITUENT

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a piece of electioneering and fund raising propaganda which I think is worth the attention of the House, if only because of the irresponsible nature of its handling.

I wish to quote from the letter which is addressed by a gentleman who, the last time we looked, was President of the Liberal Party of Canada, Mr. Michel Robert. He says in part:

> The best way to get this great country of ours back on track with caring, responsible government is by electing more Liberals to Parliament.
> Please accept the enclosed Sustaining Supporter card and make your donation today to help ensure a safer, more prosperous tomorrow.

The rest of the story is that this envelope was sent with a transparent window to a constituent of mine who is anything but a supporter of the Liberal Party. His name is on the card. Furthermore, this card was sent to his place of employment, which has caused him no shortage of embarrassment in a province such as Alberta.

I call upon the Leader of the Liberal Party to offer my constituent an apology for the invasion of his privacy.

SASKATCHEWAN—LEGAL AID USER FEES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in early August the Saskatchewan Legal Aid Commission introduced shameful user fees for legal aid services. The charges range from $60 to a whopping $400. The impact of the user fees is already being felt throughout the province. There has been a sharp increase in the number of people appearing in court without a lawyer simply because they cannot afford the fee. As well, people are pleading guilty to serious charges rather than paying the new user fees. Clearly the user fees are a deterrent to the very people the system was designed to protect, the poor.

Despite this disturbing situation, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) will do nothing to prevent the gutting of Saskatchewan's legal aid system. He knows the introduction of user fees violates long-standing federal-provincial cost sharing agreements, but he prefers to say and do nothing to ensure that equality before the law does not become just equality for those who can afford it.

By his inaction the Minister has given the green light to other provinces which are seriously considering introducing their own user fee schemes. It is apparent that this Minister is content to sit idly by while the legal aid system in Canada begins to crumble.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

1988 MODEL AUTOMOBILES—NEW EMISSION CONTROL STANDARDS

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, this month automobile manufacturers will be unveiling their 1988 models. These models will be required for the first time to comply with new emission standards aimed at significantly reducing the allowable emissions of nitrogen oxides from automobiles. These new emission standards, which came into effect yesterday, are another important step in the Government's fight against acid rain.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in March, 1985, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) announced a national program to reduce acid rain to 50 per cent of its 1980 levels by 1994. That program included $150 million for emission controls at smelters, $25 million for technology development, $70 million for cleaner use of coal, $18 million per year for research and monitoring, efforts to increase the use of low sulphur western Canadian coal, and new automobile emission standards to go into effect September 1, 1987, for 1988 car models.

While half of our acid rain emissions comes from the United States, the other half originates in our own country. These new automobile emission standards will help us to get our own house in order.

HISTORIC EVENTS

CEREMONIES COMMEMORATING DIEPPE RAID

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, recently a small group of Members from the House of Commons and the Senate accompanied the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Hees) and approximately 50 Dieppe veterans and officials from the Department of Veterans Affairs to the forty-fifth anniversary ceremonies commemorating the Dieppe Raid. We had many cenotaph remembrance events at cemeteries and battle sites during the course of the week.

I want to compliment the Minister of Veterans Affairs for the effective manner in which he conducted himself during the course of his official duties and for the sense of decency and the rapport with which he treated all of us in the delegation. The officials in the Department of Veterans Affairs deserve a big vote of congratulations on their organization.

The number of Canadian graves that we visited in Britain and in the Dieppe area of France tell the story of a terrible mission. Many other Canadian soldiers had to spend the war in captivity and, indeed, in a wounded state as a result of the raid. Our soldiers were given an impossible mission on that dreadful morning of August 19, 1942. But there is no dispute whatsoever about the fact that the Canadians involved in the Dieppe Raid could not have done more.

One has only to attend remembrance ceremonies at the many cenotaphs in Europe to realize fully what a wealth of Canadian leadership is resting in the well-kept military cemeteries of Europe. One reads the names and the ages: 19 years old; 21 years old; 30 years old; 24 years old; and 18 years old. These young people never really had a chance to participate in the life of their own beloved nation, Canada.

In the Act of Remembrance we state that: "We will remember them". But do we really remember them? Do we in this House of Commons fully realize that we are here because of them? Every day must be a remembrance day for such gallant Canadians and, indeed, for us. We have had the torch of freedom and responsibility passed to us to handle difficult problems in this country and in the world at large. How well we handle these challenges will be a reflection of how well we will remember them.

PUBLICATION ON FUTURE USE OF HYDROGEN

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of Parliament the recently published report of the Advisory Group on Hydrogen Opportunities chaired by Professor David Scott of the University of Toronto. The report is entitled Hydrogen—National Mission for Canada. The establishment of such a mission is its principal recommendation.

In the future it is likely that electricity and hydrogen, readily interchangeable, will be the forms or sources of energy in most common use. We are fortunate that these are largely non-polluting.

With its resources of natural gas for steam reforming and hydroelectricity for electrolysis, plus our brain power in industry and in universities, Canada stands poised to reap the opportunities in this new and exciting field. The positive reception of this report by the Government augurs well for the future of hydrogen technology in Canada.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

AWARDING OF CONTRACTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, British Columbians and British Columbia firms for many years have been anxious and keen to do business with the Canadian International Development Agency. British Columbians have the interest, the expertise, the skills and the experience to offer their services, goods and equipment to CIDA for Canadian overseas development projects. However, British Columbians have been and still are shut out of doing CIDA work.

While the Liberals were in office although British Columbia had 35 per cent of Ontario's population it received only 14 per cent of the number of contracts received by Ontario. However, under the Tories the situation has actually worsened with B.C. now receiving only 12 per cent of the number of contracts received by Ontario, and worth only 11 per cent of the value.

I urge the Progressive Conservative Government to have more faith in British Columbians and in British Columbia, to show an interest and to take initiatives to recognize British Columbian talent, expertise, experience and ability when it comes to filling CIDA contracts.

British Columbians ask not for any extraordinary consideration—only that they receive their fair share of CIDA service contracts, goods and equipment contracts and industrial co-operation contracts. British Columbians do not expect special treatment, only justice and fairness.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

MEMBER FOR SKEENA'S REPORTED REFERENCE TO NOVA SCOTIANS

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canadians heard an amazing admission from the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). He told us that he is closer to the people of Central and South America than to many other Canadians. He referred to countries in that region of the world as sister countries. He singled out Nova Scotians as a group to which he is not close. He did not call Nova Scotia a sister province. What must Nova Scotia do to become a sister province—elect a socialist government?

For whom does the Hon. Member speak? Is he representing the views of British Columbians when he says that they have a closer relationship to Central America than to Atlantic Canada? I do not think so. I am sure that my sister and my brother living in B.C. do not agree. I can assure Hon. Members that he is not speaking for Nova Scotians.

The Hon. Member's admission reflects his personal emotions. When he says that Central America has a closer relationship to B.C. than Nova Scotia he represents only the world as he sees it. It is a shameful comment on his Party's feelings for Atlantic Canadians and for our country—the greatest country in the world.

I ask the Hon. Member to stand in his place and apologize to his constituents for this gross misrepresentation of their loyalties, and for this slight to all Nova Scotians that he purports to offer on their behalf.

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—MILK COMMITTEE'S CONCERN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, recently the Russell County Milk Committee wrote a letter to the excellent Premier of Ontario, Mr. David Peterson. In the letter they state:

> The Russell County Milk Committee is quite concerned about the "free trade" and the impact it could do to the dairy industry.
> Everybody knows we have the best supply management in the world and it should not be traded away in whole or in part. There is no doubt it cannot be compared with the American system. It costs a lot less for the taxpayers to support a system like ours than what they have in the States, plus the fact that our financial stability is entirely due to our system.

The letter concludes by stating:

We have had a lot of pressure from concerned dairymen in the last months over the free trade issue, and we hope that your Government will keep an eye on our federal counterparts concerning this matter.

Yours truly,
Leo Brisson,
Russell County Milk Committee.

It is obvious that the Russell County Milk Committee is very concerned about the fact that the Government in Ottawa could trade away supply management, and it is counting on the excellent Liberal Government of Ontario to defend it, as does the excellent Liberal Party in Ottawa.

PETRO-CANADA

PRIVATIZATION URGED

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to urge the Minister of State for Privatization (Mrs. McDougall) to privatize Petro-Canada. But I wish it to be done in a unique, innovative manner, and not let it slip into foreign hands. I want to give Petro-Canada to the 25 million citizens of Canada.

My plan is deceptively simple. Every man, woman, and child would be given a proportionate share of the common shares owned by the federal Government. Canadians would be given first rights to future share issues.

I believe the Government has an obligation to ensure security of supply of oil and gas resources by ensuring that they are developed on a timely basis. I do not believe this means being in the retail gasoline station business.

Governments should only intrude in the market-place if it serves a public policy objective. In my wildest imagination, I cannot imagine how government ownership of retail gasoline pumps meets a public policy objective.

Let us give the shares of this corporation to the people of Canada. In a sense they already own it because Governments have poured hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars into this organization, and provided it with enormous tax concessions. Petro-Canada has been quick to raise prices at the pump when crude oil prices rise, but it is not so quick to drop prices when crude oil prices decline.

Who knows, we may even create a healthier, more competitive market-place with Canadians in charge, and keep control in this country.

SENIOR CITIZENS

SUGGESTIONS FOR MINISTER

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, after nearly three years in office this Conservative Government—ever mindful of its unbelievably stupid blunders concerning elderly Canadians, such as de-indexation of old age security pensions, unemployment insurance discrimination towards older workers, cut-backs of about $5 million in the New Horizons program—this Government, as I said, has decided to buy off elderly Canadians by appointing a Minister of State for Senior Citizens.

Mr. Speaker, a better man could not have been chosen for this job, but we want to be sure that the Government considers the well-being of senior citizens as something more than a smokescreen and window-dressing. Therefore I would urge the Minister responsible for Senior Citizens to eliminate discrimination with respect to the spouse's allowance, single, separated or divorced women, to cancel the New Horizons $5 million cut-back, and to correct the situation concerning the unfair treatment meted out to older workers seeking unemployment insurance benefits. Then people will have faith in this Government.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOOD TAX—MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In a reply to my question yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister said: "The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows there is nothing in the tax reform proposals which specifically outlines a tax on food. He should not try to mislead the House in suggesting that". Those were the words of the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the House on August 24 the Prime Minister said that any such suggestion of a tax on food was "absolutely false".

My question is based on the Minister's own document entitled Sales Tax Reform dated June 18, 1987, which specifically states that a tax on food is being considered. It appropriately uses a number of "pie" charts to set forth what a tax on food would do to household incomes.

• (1425)

Has the Minister of Finance been overruled, to his knowledge, by the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister? Or does he confirm what he produced in the House of Commons on budget night? Will he categorically say to the House whether there will be a tax on food, yes or no?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we should start from the point of departure of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition as well as of the NDP representatives. I quote what the right hon. gentleman has said: "There should be perhaps some shift to the consumption tax". I think all sides of the House agree that the present federal sales tax is a bad tax and should be changed.

The document which the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition referred to sets out some proposals—proposals—for sales tax reform. The specific proposal made is that we move from the existing tax to a multi-stage tax. Decisions on the composition of the tax base, the tax rate, and how the refundable sales tax would be designed have not been made. That is the subject of consultation involving the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs and the provinces, as well as other interested Canadians. Those consultations are progressing. People commented on Monday on whether or not the tax should include food. As a Government we want to listen. That is the purpose of consultation.

Mr. Broadbent: Tell the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Shields: Try and listen for a minute, Ed. You might learn something.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The document says: "These issues are important in deciding what goods should be included in the sales tax base. Before reaching any conclusions it is important to consider the factors that should be considered." What follows is an illustration of how the refundable sales tax credit would work and how it might relate to people with low incomes and those with higher incomes. I encourage the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to read the document before he jumps to conclusions.

WHITE PAPER DOCUMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): It is because I have read the document, and millions of other Canadians read it through reports in the media, that I do jump to a conclusion. The document says: "The prevailing view among Canadians has long been that exempting food from tax is required to help shield low-income families from a disproportionate burden of the sales tax. An important question, however, is whether or not an exemption is the best means to achieve this result." Then come the pie charts.

The Minister admitted again this afternoon that the food tax option is still open. He has not taken the opportunity to deny it and say the tax will not be imposed on Canadian families. He has in effect rejected the remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday and of his own Prime Minister on August 24.

Do we rely on this document as an option? By the way, the Minister made an interesting comment. He said he made a decision to move to the multi-stage tax. Has he abandoned the option of the value added tax and the consumption tax, or was that an inadvertent slip of what he is now thinking?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I am puzzled by that last question, Mr. Speaker. A multi-stage sales tax is a consumption tax. It is a value added tax. They are all part of that same generic term, multi-stage consumption tax. I am surprised that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, as a former Minister of Finance did not—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Three options.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There are three mechanisms to achieve a multi-stage tax. They are all described as consumption taxes, which the right hon. gentleman believes is the right way to go.

Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

• (1430)

INSURANCE POLICY TAX QUERY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the House can judge for itself that the Minister has not rejected the options to tax food, and his document supports that.

Despite what the Deputy Prime Minister might shout, let me see whether I can pursue another avenue under tax reform. As the Minister knows, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association has testified before the standing committee studying the Minister's proposals regarding a tax on insurance policies. I am not talking about a tax on the insurance companies. The Association has testified to the effect that that proposed tax on insurance policies will raise insurance premiums by about 20 per cent and will reduce survivor benefits. It points out that the tax will hit middle and lower-income families disproportionately, reducing the amount of benefit available to widows and widowers of lower and middle-income class families at a time when they need it the most.

In the Minister's study of these proposals, and in light of the testimony that he is receiving before that committee, will he withdraw the tax on insurance policies which will raise insurance premiums and reduce survivor benefits?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking a pretty fundamental question. We have a process under way in the Finance Committee of this House to review the White Paper on Tax Reform, specifically at this point income tax changes of which the insurance proposals would form a part.

Is the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition saying that this House should state today that certain parts just are not to be discussed? Or is the Leader of the Opposition saying let the democratic process continue that the duly appointed—duly elected, I guess it is—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You are appointed, we are elected.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —committee of this House of Commons is carrying out? Or should it have its work pulled away from it by this House through questions in the Question Period? Or should it be allowed to look at the tax reform package to see whether the different elements are fair and to see whether the balance between the impact on different sectors is fair? This is what the question is basically directed to, and I believe that process should continue because the life insurance industry has not been paying much tax.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I am not talking about the tax on the companies, I am talking about the tax on the policy holders.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is very clear that that tax is a tax at the company level.

UNITED STATES TARIFF ON CANADIAN POTASH—PRODUCTION CONTROLS PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade. Just over a week ago when the United States imposed perhaps the most punitive set of tariff and trade actions on this country the federal Government went into its habitual genuflective crouch, which means it did nothing about the matter, thereby forcing the Government of Saskatchewan to take very serious and drastic measures that will have major implications upon jobs in that province, upon the pricing of resources and, indeed, upon the whole free trade negotiations.

Mr. Crosbie: Speech? Question.

Mr. Axworthy: Is the Government now prepared to break its vow of silence and tell us what the Government of Canada's position is on this very important matter? Does it support the action taken by the Government of Saskatchewan in imposing production controls on this very important resource? Has the Government of Canada counselled the Government of Saskatchewan that that is a proper course of action in light of its free trade negotiations? In other words, what position can we expect the Government of Canada to take on this important matter or, when we ask the question who speaks for Canada, do we have to get the answer from the Premier of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the Hon. Member that the position of the Government of Canada is that we support the Constitution of Canada. Under that Constitution, provinces have the exclusive authority under Section 92(a) to make laws in relation to development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources. We encouraged Saskatchewan to exercise its constitutional rights over a provincial resource. That is what we have been doing.

CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister for International Trade has just announced a very important constitutional precedent which basically is saying that in the jurisdiction of the federal Government, which has responsibility for international trade where it affects a natural resource, we will now abdicate totally responsibility to make decisions to the provinces of Canada. That is an incredible retreat and surrender of a basic federal right and power.

I want the Minister to reflect upon that answer and tell us whether she is saying that at anytime when there is a trade action against this country that affects natural resources the Government of Canada will abdicate its responsibility and leave it to the provinces to respond.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what I find incredible, what I think the House will find incredible and I know what Canadians will find incredible is the position of the Liberal Party which is against provincial control of their resources. What Saskatchewan did was to bring in production measures. That is what it did in its own field and within its constitutional right. I think it is shocking that the Hon. Member cannot accept the Canadian Constitution.

FOOD TAX ISSUE—CONTENT OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday when I was attempting to get him to commit the Government not to levy a tax on food, he accused me of trying to confuse the issue and went on to say—and it is quite a serious matter:

> —the NDP wants to come clean . . . There is no mention of a tax on food in the tax reform white paper.

I went back and checked, Mr. Speaker, because I recalled not once but many times that it is mentioned. Since it says in the White Paper:

> Even though food is taxed in many other countries and some foods are now taxed in Canada, taxing food is understandably an emotional and controversial issue.

The paper goes on talking about the implications of a tax on food. In the interest of truth and clarification, will the Deputy Prime Minister now withdraw his statement made yesterday and acknowledge that there is a discussion about taxing food in the White Paper?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Yesterday, I said in response to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, which was confirmed here today by the Minister of Finance, that there is no proposal to tax food in the White Paper.

Mr. Broadbent: That is not what I quoted.

Mr. Mazankowski: I said that there is nothing in the tax reform proposals which specifically outline a tax on food. That is consistent with what the Prime Minister said in the House on August 24, 1987, in response to the Member for Ottawa Centre, which was:

> Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has just, no doubt, inadvertently, misled the House with the direct statement that the Government is considering a sales tax on food. That is false.
> The Government put out, as it ought to in a democracy, a White Paper dealing with a very complex issue. We set out some options for consideration and debate by parliamentarians and all Canadians. They are to be addressed, but not to be distorted and deformed as my hon. friend has just done.

I do not see anything inconsistent between that and what I said yesterday in response to questions.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I used to have full respect for the Minister and I hope that will continue.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I gave him a quote, not what he said to someone else in the House, but in reply to a question in which he accused me of misleading. The Minister said, and I quote again:

> There is no mention of a tax on food in the tax reform white paper.

That is from the Minister himself as reported at page 8659 of Hansard.

Does the Minister stand by that or will he have the honesty and integrity to withdraw that statement right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, may I simply challenge the Leader of the New Democratic Party to give in very specific terms where it outlines in a specific way a proposal to tax food?

Mr. Broadbent: I just did it.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is not in the paper and the Member should know that.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I will try a third time, and then there is a more serious recourse.

The Minister has asked me to cite the source and I will quote the White Paper for the Minister:

> Even though food is taxed in many other countries and some foods are now taxed in Canada, taxing food is understandably an emotional and controversial issue.

Then it goes on, not only on that page but on the previous page. There is a discussion, there is a mention of a tax on food. The Minister said—

• (1440)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it is a discussion.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that those words that I read with care to the Minister are in the White Paper but the Minister said in the House yesterday that there is no mention of a tax on food in the tax reform White Paper, will the Minister now admit, willingly or otherwise, that he was misleading the House of Commons and trying to mislead the people of Canada about what the Government is doing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I know that the Minister and the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party are trying as best they can to deal with what seems to be a divergence of views on a document. Hon. Members will know that in Question Period when we get into a protracted disagreement over what is meant to be said or what appears in a document, it does create some difficulty for the Chair. I know the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party would not want to leave the impression that the Minister is intentionally misleading anyone or—

Mr. Broadbent: No, he has a chance to clear it.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party in his comments is clearly putting forward his disagreement with what the Hon. Minister has said or with the Hon. Minister's interpretation, but I would not want the impression left, and I know the Hon. Member will assist the Chair in this, that there is any desire on the part of the Minister to deliberately mislead the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in my initial question I did not want to leave the impression that the Minister was deliberately misleading the House, nor do I want to do that. However, I read his words and I then quoted from the White Paper. It seems to me to be the case that there is a discussion or a mention of a tax on food in the White Paper. The Minister said flatly in an accusation of me that I was misleading. I gave him the opportunity as a respected Member of the House to withdraw what he said yesterday and to clarify the record; that is all.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had indicated on a number of occasions yesterday that there were no specific proposals contained in the White Paper with respect to taxing food. I have challenged the Hon. Member to outline in a clear, succinct way the details of any proposal to tax food. He has failed to do so. He failed to do so yesterday and he has failed to do so today.

Mr. Speaker: I think Hon. Members might consider that when these kinds of disputes are before the Chamber in Question Period, if they are to be pursued further there is of course another place to do it. I would ask Hon. Members to keep that in mind, including Members on the opposition side and Hon. Ministers.

TAX ON FOOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance or to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The matter is important, it is a question of intellectual honesty and truth. First I should like to recall that elderly Canadians did not forget the written trickery of the Prime Minister who once stated that he would restore the full indexation of old age security pensions.

In another document the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that allowance cut-backs would not be used to reduce the deficit.

We remember what the Minister of Finance—

And everybody knows that the Government, in its White Paper on page . . . in connection with the tax reform it says that one of the Government's option is to tax food. In other words, a tax on bread, milk and butter. On the same page they indicate how: an 8 per cent tax . . . People could be exempted.

My question to the Minister of Finance is quite simple: Can you be frank, honest and sincere, reassure Canadians, and tell us now whether you maintain your option to tax food?

[English]

Will you maintain the option to tax food, yes or no?

[Translation]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the booklet is very clear. There is no proposal to tax food. That is very clear.

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Minister that the House has been misled twice in these matters. But just to be sure, just so Canadians get the message—the Conservative caucus is against it, the Minister says there is no option to tax food—does he mean that Canadians can now be sure that, as the Liberals have been saying, there is nothing about taxing food in the tax reform? So if the Minister is sincere we can tear up this page and tell people: All Parties agree, there is no option to tax food. Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I have responded very clearly to this question. We have a process—

Mr. Malépart: Yes or no?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Perhaps the Hon. Member would care to listen to the answer to the question. A process is under way right now which is called the Finance Committee of the House of Commons. The committee is listening to the views of Canadians on the subject of whether or not we should go ahead with this or that form of income tax change.

In some cases there have been comments on some of the proposals for the reform of the sales tax system. In some cases there have been views stated as to whether or not there should be a tax on food. Some have declared themselves in favour of it. We want to listen to Canadians so that they can give us their views. I think the role of parliamentarians is to listen to the views of all Canadians. This is a tax reform package—

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Where do you stand?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre.

REFUNDABLE SALES TAX CREDIT

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are in a difficult situation because of the Government's refusal to state clearly whether or not it intends to tax food. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the lengthy discussion in his White Paper on whether or not food should be taxed. I would draw his attention to the argument made in the White Paper that it is better to tax food and provide a low-income tax credit than not to, and to this particular passage in the White Paper:

> A better way to make a sales tax fair is to offset the effects of the total tax paid by lower-income families with a refundable sales tax credit.

In other words, the White Paper argues that it is better to tax food and have a refundable sales tax credit than not to tax food. Is that the position of the Minister of Finance now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member would take the time to read it carefully, he would see that the White Paper takes no position on this. It is neutral on it. It does not make a proposal one way or the other. It sets out both sides of the option and the Hon. Member has just set out one side. The other side is not to tax food and to give everyone an exemption of the value of the tax they would pay if food were taxed. That would obviously benefit those with upper incomes to a greater extent than those with lower incomes and that is the question we want Canadians to consider. Which is fairer, which would they like to do?

We want to listen. We feel that that process should run its course. That is the role of the Finance Committee. The Hon.

Member is a member of that committee. He is listening to the views of Canadians. I would have thought that he would have liked to listen a bit more to make sure that when he makes his decision as a member of the committee it is a decision that is the right one.

REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL ASSURANCE

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has now admitted that a sales tax on food is an option being considered by the Government. He has also acknowledged that his White Paper leans toward having a sales tax on food despite the opinion of Canadians.

Can he give us a bottom-line assurance that he will now reject his leanings of a month and a half ago and that the Government will not impose a sales tax on food?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not leaning one way or the other a month and a half ago and I am not leaning one way or the other today. I believe it is the duty of Members of this House to make an objective and dispassionate judgment on which is the right way to go on this issue.

The Hon. Member says that he has made up his mind.

Mr. Broadbent: So has the Quebec caucus of your Party.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Perhaps the Hon. Member would like to drop off the Finance Committee and give his place to someone else who would want to listen and make a more objective judgment.

INQUIRY WHY CERTAIN ESSENTIAL SERVICES AT SAINT-LÉONARD WERE TRANSFERRED

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. At Saint-Léonard, Canada Post management have transferred some of the essential services to a drug store located two miles away and people who live in the vicinity of the post office are furious about this decision. Why transfer essential services instead of providing them in the post office which has the staff required to dispense them? Why deprive people of these services?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is talking about a service to allow people to pick up registered letters and parcels if they are not home when delivery is attempted. Transferring registered mail to sub-post offices which are generally open until nine or ten o'clock at night and have parking spaces available is an improvement in service to customers. It is in an effort to improve the services that these changes are being made across the country. The response of people across the country has been very good.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ORDER CORPORATION TO DROP FRANCHISE PLAN

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister checks his facts will he order Canada Post to drop its plan to franchise post offices now that the Labour Board has ruled that franchise owners must honour postal union contracts? Will he order the President of Canada Post to negotiate in good faith and stop announcing a strike as the Minister did last night? Is the Minister responsible for the Post Office or is he irresponsible?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is another clear position from the Liberal Party. The Member for Papineau says that the Government should cut the umbilical cord of Canada Post, and the Hon. Member who just asked the question suggests that we should dictate to the Post Office how it should manage its affairs.

It is my understanding that the corporation disagrees with the decision of the Canadian Labour Relations Board. An appeal has been filed. I understand further that the decision affects only one outlet, Shoppers Drug Mart in Willowdale. It is my sincere hope that this will not affect the plan to improve service to Canadians through franchising.

REQUEST FOR RE-EXAMINATION OF PRIVATIZATION PLANS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister responsible for the Post Office. The Canadian Labour Relations Board decision undercuts the Post Office's plans for privatization. Will the Minister not take advantage of the decision and re-examine the plan for privatizing the Post Office through retail outlets, in order to maintain service at the Post Office and to prevent a postal strike in the future?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have just said in response to a previous question, I think that franchising to shopping centres which are open in the evening, have better parking and so on, is essential to improved service for Canadians which I and the Government are in favour of.

This issue is at the table and is being discussed now. I would think a member of the New Democratic Party would not be counselling the Government to involve itself in issues which are presently being discussed at the table.

IMPENDING POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has been quoted by the media warning Canadians that there will be a strike in the Post Office two weeks from now. Is he just going to sit on his hands and wait for this postal strike to happen, or is he going to do something to prevent it? Why does he not take advantage of this Labour Relations Board decision to re-examine his plans for privatization?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that the leader of CUPW, Mr. Parrot, has said that there definitely will be a strike and estimated when that might happen. I said I hoped there would not be a strike, but Mr. Parrot apparently insists there will be one. The final decision is up to the union.

If the Hon. Member does not think there should be a strike, which would be in agreement with the Government's position, I suggest that he talk to his friends in that union and suggest that they not go on strike.

SPORTS

BEN JOHNSON—CANADIAN UNIFORM QUERY

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. When I say "Big Ben" to you, Mr. Speaker, you might think of a clock with 9.83 seconds on it. "Big Ben" is, of course, Ben Johnson, the fastest man alive today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): He ran the greatest race of his life in a Canadian team uniform. However, when he went to the podium to receive his gold medal in front of the world he was wearing an old dirty jersey. Why was he not wearing our proud Canadian colours?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to do publicly what the Prime Minister and I have already done privately, that is, congratulate Ben Johnson for his tremendous and historic achievement in Rome last weekend.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: With that attempt, Mr. Speaker, Ben brought pride, not only to himself, his family and his community but, judging by the reaction from around the world, tremendous pride and integrity to Canada and all Canadians. For that we are very thankful.

With regard to the question, Ben Johnson did run in a Canadian uniform. I was somewhat surprised that he did not put the rest of his uniform on when receiving his gold medal. The rest of the world did not seem to care. However, my surprise was due to the fact that I knew that all of our international athletes have received full uniforms under a contract with Adidas Canada. Nevertheless, I have asked the Canadian Track and Field Association to find out why Ben did not put that uniform on, and to report to me in due course.

In the meantime, I hope we have not put a cloud over Ben's achievement on behalf of all Canadians.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LUBICON BAND—OUTBREAK OF TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is also the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Lubicon Indian Band in northern Alberta is back in the news again and, as usual, it is very bad news. This time it is a serious tuberculosis epidemic. The Minister knows that this disease is directly linked to poor housing, lack of sanitation, unclean water, and overcrowding.

Why is the Government not getting on with the important task of settling the outstanding claim of the Lubicon Indian Band, especially when there is a workable set of recommendations at hand which were developed by no less a person than the Hon. E. Davie Fulton?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the health matter of the tuberculosis cases at Lubicon the Member is correct. We have medical staff on site at Lubicon giving professional medical assistance as well as studying outbreak causation and providing any other services which can be provided.

With regard to the question about land for the Lubicon Band not having yet been so designated, I think the Hon. Member knows as well as I that that point has been taken up actively not only by the present Minister but also by his predecessor. I think it would be only appropriate for the present Minister to make a full response, and I will advise him of this.

BAND'S CLAIM TO RESERVATION

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister who is a distinguished Member from the Province of Alberta where the Lubicon Band is suffering at the present time. Is he aware that the United Nations Committee on Human Rights has criticized the Government for the way it has handled the problem at Lubicon, and has called for immediate action? Why does the Government continue and persist in rejecting the obvious route to solving this problem? The band wants, and Davie Fulton has offered to act as a mediator. Why are the services of this distinguished gentleman being rejected?

Point of Order—Mr. Manly

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think Members on both sides of the House recognize the Hon. Member as being very responsible in these matters relating to Indian Affairs. He is aware of them fully, as I am to some degree. However, I think my colleague, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, recognizes the complexity of this issue and I am not saying that in terms of delay or a desire for delay. I think the Hon. Member recognizes those complexities.

In view of those complexities, I think it is only proper that the Minister be given the opportunity to make any announcement respecting Lubicon or any settlement. I believe all of us would very much like to see a settlement to this very difficult, long-standing problem. I think that is the way to proceed with this issue.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RESERVE

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Berger Report on Indian health that was commissioned by a previous Conservative Government established very clearly that Indian health is not simply a matter of pills, nurses and doctors, but is related to their total well-being.

Will the Minister acknowledge now that the outbreak of tuberculosis amongst the Lubicon Lake people is directly related to the frustrating fight they have had with the Government and previous Governments to establish a reserve for that band? That fight goes back 50 years. Will he acknowledge that fact and urge his cabinet colleagues to ensure that the situation is resolved with justice for the Lubicon people?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe all Members who know this issue crave justice and a solution to the issue relating to the Lubicon and reserve status.

Some very strong advances have been made with respect to Indian health, as he and most people who studied the issue should recognize. We have very professional people within the Medical Services Branch.

As a Minister I cannot stand up in the House and give that type of diagnosis which falls very much into a medical field and to which he wants me to give blanket coverage. Obviously, as Minister of National Health and Welfare, I have responsibility with respect to causes of disease and how we can ensure that it does not happen in the future. That is why my professionals and others are there right now.

Mr. Speaker: I must advise Hon. Members that the time for Question Period has expired.

POINT OF ORDER

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT BY MEMBER

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in Private Members' Hour on Friday, the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park (Mr. Witer) had a motion before the House. In speaking to that motion, I said, as reported at page 8583 of Hansard:

> —it was pointed out to me that last year when the Committee on Human Rights was holding hearings on the issue of human rights in South Africa the Hon. Member was the only one who voted against sanctions against South Africa. That, too, is a kind of silence which speaks very eloquently of support for the perpetrators of human rights violations in South Africa.

At that point, the Member for Parkdale—High Park rose on a point of order and said:

> If the Hon. Member will check the record he will see that the statement which he has just made about the way I voted in a committee is inaccurate. I am sure he would want to correct his statement.

I have checked the record and I understand that the Hon. Member did not vote against the motion, rather he abstained. I apologize for any misunderstanding that has resulted.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly) for bringing this to the attention of the Chamber. I commend him, of course, for conduct which is in the best tradition of this place.

PETITIONS

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians who are concerned that there are troubles in many parts of the world and people are seeking safety from persecution by coming to Canada. They believe that Canada has established standards for refugee status determination, but our existing procedures have obviously broken down under the unexpected strains.

The standing committee of the House has proposed a new procedure for refugee determination which is quicker and fairer than the one now in force. This proposal has the support of all Parties in Parliament, as well as the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress and many other groups and individuals.

Considering that procedures recently adopted that turn away refugee status claimants from ports of entry before their claims are examined put real refugees at serious risk, the petitioners are asking Parliament to ensure that the Government enact legislation that will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada, and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make these claims.

Again, a number of Canadians are asking the Government and, in a sense, Parliament to consider this recommendation seriously.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a duly certified petition from a number of Canadians concerned about changes to Canada's refugee policy.

They point out that increasing numbers of people from trouble spots throughout the world want to come to Canada to seek safety from persecution, that in the past we have had standards for refugee status determination but these have broken down under stress, and that the Government has introduced measures that take away from our tradition of being open to refugees.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that the Government and Parliament bring in legislation that will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission. There should be universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have here about 350 petitions from a number of residents of many parts of Canada who are concerned about Bill C-55 and the other refugee legislation which is before us.

The petitioners point out that because of troubles in many parts of the world people are coming to seek safety in Canada, and that the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration produced a report a year and a half ago with recommendations for dealing with this more quickly and fairly than before. The report has widespread public support from church, labour, the Bar Association and other groups.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that Government and Parliament enact legislation that will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board that is independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim. Wherefore the petitioners will ever pray.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a duly registered petition from people of Edmonton, Alberta.

Whereas the standing committee of Parliament has proposed a new procedure for refugee determination which is quicker and fairer than the one now in force, and that the proposal had the support of all Parties in Parliament as well as the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress and other groups and individuals, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that Government and Parliament enact legislation that will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada and make this claim.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate this opportunity to thank the Members of the legislative committee on Bill C-84 who, I think, worked long hours on this legislative measure. I would also like to thank the people, groups or individuals, who commented on this Bill.

[English]

As we all know, Canada's refugee determination system is under siege against a daily onslaught of illegal migrants arriving in Canada and making false claims to gain entrance. The number of claims in 1987 is expected to be some 30,000. Refugee determination is a complex and often emotional issue. The question of abuse and how to eliminate it is crucial to preserving Canada's humanitarian reputation and our tradition for law and order. That is why the Parliament of Canada was recalled in the middle of August. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I believe that was more than useful in order to take immediate, decisive action to put an end to the growing, flagrant abuse of our laws and generosity.

Over the past few weeks, Mr. Speaker, we have heard the views of a number of interest groups and individuals on the best way to correct the flaws they thought they had spotted in the Bill. I listened closely to their suggestions and concerns, and I take this opportunity to comment briefly on the amendments proposed by the legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker, I think it bears repeating that from the outset I gave Canadians and committee Members the assurance that I would consider the possibility of amending the Bill, on the condition that this would not weaken it in any way. I feel that the amendments endorsed by the House are useful and necessary explanations, and I support them unreservedly.

The Bill is aimed at severely cracking down on the operations of unscrupulous counsellors, smugglers who take advantage of the plight of illegal migrants, and carriers who fail to ensure, as they should, that their passengers carry the required documents. It is also aimed at curbing abuses on the part of economic migrants who try to jump ahead of refugees and immigrants who abide by the established procedure.

Mr. Speaker, proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2 are the key provisions of these legislative measures, enabling us as they will to put a stop to the activities of those who bring many illegal migrants into Canada.

[English]

There has been much discussion about amending these articles. We have insisted that lawyers and legal drafters consider different phrases. We have considered terms such as religious group, profit, reward, fraud and clandestine entry, but each option creates loopholes and reduces our capacity to prosecute the unscrupulous. The bottom line of this legislation, Mr. Speaker, is that we cannot permit these individuals to escape sanction by creating insurmountable problems of proof.

I reject the argument that proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2 open doors to prosecution which were not open before. The current Act had this general offence but it did not serve as a deterrent to Captain Nygren. Through proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2, we bring it forward as a clearly marked and highlighted offence with higher penalties.

There has been a great deal of talk about how this Bill would affect church groups. I would like to respond to these concerns. It has been said that because we have two new proposed Sections, we have opened up the door to the prosecution of church and humanitarian groups if they assist refugees. I reject this. Since 1976 there have been penalties in the Act for any person who brings undocumented people into Canada. Therefore, church groups have been liable to prosecution for the past 10 years. There have been no complaints before and, to my knowledge, no prosecutions. The reason is that the administration of this Act has always recognized and will continue to recognize the humanitarian nature of these activities.

What was true before is true now under the current legislation and under the new Bill. Bill C-84 does not create some new ground of prosecution for what church and humanitarian groups have been doing for years, presenting refugee claimants for examination, sponsoring refugees from abroad and providing settlement assistance.

Proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2 address both the enormity and the immediacy of the situation. They send strong signals that Canada will no longer tolerate abuse of our borders and our laws. The message is clear and the audience is specific. Those who seek to ignore or circumvent our laws will be prosecuted. It is as simple as that.

In connection with Clause 8, Mr. Speaker, I should like to stress that proposed Section 103.1 of the Bill empowers the Minister either to order a ship captain to sail into port or to send him back. This amendment, proposed by the Hon. Member for Calgary North (Mr. Gagnon), confirms the assurance I gave the High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Hocké, that the Government has every intention of exercising its power to send ships back, but without endangering human lives nor breaching the Geneva Convention.

I am sure the House will agree that the amendment proposed by the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Oostrom) to add a new proposed section, 95.4, will make it easier for us to take legal action against unscrupulous counsellors who urge refugee status claimants to make false statements. This amendment provides for stiffer penalties for this kind of infraction.

The House has accepted two other technical amendments which clarify the Bill.

[English]

To conclude, this Bill is designed to meet an urgent situation. It has been drafted to hit hard at a new type of criminal activity, namely, large scale smuggling. It also strengthens our ability to quickly remove criminal and security risks. It will allow us as well to slow down, and perhaps put an end to the increasing flood of people arriving in Canada without travel documents.

This legislation, together with Bill C-55, will provide a comprehensive, long-term solution to the difficulties and abuses currently surrounding the refugee determination process. It will enable us to concentrate on helping those refugees truly in need of our protection. It will enable us to continue our strategy of controlled growth in immigration.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this legislation is essential if we are to respect our humanitarian commitment towards refugees in the world and to prevent possible frauds against Canadians or Canadian laws. Bill C-84 will enable this country to do that.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my Party I am pleased to respond as the lead-off speaker in the final phase, in the House of Commons at any rate, of this Bill, namely third reading. The Bill received interesting treatment at second reading when Hon. Members actively participated. We have just come from very active deliberations in the legislative committee.

I regret that the attitude of the Minister is the same. It is the same inflexible position that was the position of the Government at second reading. It is the same inflexible position that was displayed during the study of Bill C-84 in legislative committee. It is the same inflexible position that was reflected in the clause-by-clause study of the Bill. Witness after witness came to Ottawa on short notice and prepared to help the Parliament of Canada in its deliberations to try to ensure a better, more fair and more effective Bill. Despite that the inflexibility persists. In the short 10 to 15 minutes that the Minister took in his speech on third reading the same inflexibility persisted. It rang out loud and clear. That is unfortunate because the issue is so sensitive.

In saying that I do not mean to suggest that any issue with which we deal in the House of Commons takes priority or second place to other issues. But certainly when we talk about immigration we must recognize the sensitivity and, beyond that, I believe the emotions that are attached to immigration policy.

I have spent only three years in this Chamber. Like every other Member of Parliament, when I go back to my riding I keep constituency appointments with people who live in my riding. Their problems range from trying to find employment, to trying to find a summer job, to an individual who cannot pay his tuition, to an individual who wants to collect Canada Pension Plan disability benefits because of an injury received on a construction site. All those issues are important. They mean the world to the individuals who bring them forward. However, with respect to immigration-related problems there is no doubt that the emotional level attached to them poses the most serious dilemma and problems for us as Members of Parliament.

When we talk about immigration outside of the refugee flow and the refugee program we are talking about people in Canada, Canadians who wish their families to join them, who want visitors to visit them, who want their cousins to attend the University of Toronto to obtain an education on a visitor's visa. We have all sorts of requests. It is emotionally difficult for persons to understand why their mothers, their grandmothers, their aunts, their cousins, their nephews or their friends were refused by the Department, by the bureaucracy. It becomes difficult because we are talking about human feelings and about human beings. That is why I thought that there could have been some movement, some sensitivity displayed by the Government of Canada in terms of responding to those, at many times, emotional pleas from a wide range of groups.

We heard from the Inter-Church Committee, from the clergy, from the Canadian Bar Association which gave a legal perspective, and from civil libertarians. We heard from Canadians who came on short notice to give a bit of themselves to the input and the drafting of this legislation. I am left to ask myself this question. Are we any richer for it as a Parliament if we continue, as the Government does, simply to play the charade, to pass the legislation in a vacuum, to explain it to one's caucus on a Wednesday morning as if nothing else mattered outside that room or on the drafting board in the Minister's office? We cannot continue to draft legislation in that sense.

While the purpose and objective of this legislation is certainly noble for everyone in the House, it is the process that has to be paid some respect and some regard since it is the process that has a way of affecting the substance. In this case there was little process. There was no respect given to the witnesses or to the testimony given during the process. As a result we have a piece of legislation which I believe is made poorer as a result of that indifference and intransigence. That is why at the eleventh hour of third reading there was still a trickle of hope that the Minister could have moved a number of amendments on a number of grounds.

On behalf of my Party I moved close to 20 amendments, not in an attempt to scuttle Bill C-84 or to suggest that the Liberal Party does not wish to clamp down on abuse. All Members in all Parties wish to clamp down on abuse. It was a way of achieving that without sacrificing many of the principles that I will be deliberating and outlining for the House.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), on behalf of his Party, presented a large number of amendments to improve and precisely target the objectives of Bill C-84. At different times, Members of the Minister's Government made various remarks or suggestions which reflected that perhaps there could be some movement. Yet, we are at third reading, and the Minister has articulated the same position today as he did at first and second readings.

If that was the intention of the Government, and it knew what it would say at third reading today, then I think it could have avoided putting Canadians, Members, research staff, and everyone else through the hoop; through a process that, in the end, counted for absolutely nothing.

The substance of the Bill is worrisome, but also the process taken by the Government is equally alarming. Today it is Bill C-84, tomorrow perhaps it will be Bill C-55 which may be treated in the same manner, and other Bills down the line. Therefore, we move away from participatory democracy because there is no public participation or involvement, and no accommodation of the input from the public. There is no respect for the opinion of anyone other than the Minister.

That is not the openness and the accessible Government preached by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in 1983 or 1984 when he was campaigning, visiting various towns and hamlets, and visiting the church basements which I do not think he will dare to step in after Bill C-84.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchi: The Prime Minister suggested that he would introduce an open Government, an accessible Government, a Government that will participate with Canadians and give Canadians what they deserve. Canadians deserve something better than Bill C-84. Canadians should not continuously be talked to and dictated to; they should participate with the Government in improving its legislation in order that the laws created and administered, if not agreed with, will be respected by Canadians.

The committee heard testimony from many people who suggested that they have no respect for the legislation, especially in the literal sense, in terms of those individuals who would now be liable to fines or imprisonment for assisting refugees who may not have visas. Those individuals have said that they will continue to pursue their legitimate work in assisting refugees.

Therefore, I ask the Minister, what is the purpose of drafting legislation which is not rooted and grounded with some degree of moral respectability from citizens? The process has been alarming and discouraging.

We talk about parliamentary reform and suggest that committees will have more political power and greater input; committees will be allowed to question the Minister on the laws, provide a check and balance, and make a Member of Parliament feel like a somebody. That is not evident in Bill C-84. Thus far it is not evident in Bill C-55. Four witnesses were jammed into a morning session which lasted two hours. What committee deals with four different witnesses, assuming that there will be two rounds of questioning from Members at the table? If we allow other legislation to be properly scrutinized, why should immigration Bills be the exception? Why should Bills C-84 and C-55 set a wrong and dangerous precedent? These questions of process impact in a very real manner on the substance that we are debating.

In terms of dealing with the substance, I would like to begin with a short quote from Rabbi Gunther Plaut. I do not suggest that his testimony was any better than any other witness, but it was an inspirational speech that he delivered to the legislative committee. He even impressed and touched Members on the government side, judging from the attention, the questions, and the duration of his speech, and from the compliments of the government chairman. Rabbi Plaut touched a nerve that day, and one would have thought his testimony would have moved the Government to realize that amendments in certain clauses were correct and necessary if we were to maintain the sense of justice that has prevailed in Canada.

At the beginning of his testimony to the legislative committee he stated:

> You can render the Canadian people and the refugee community of the world and causes of humanity in general a true service if you manage to eliminate from this Bill clauses that treat such people worse than the worst of criminals.

Rabbi Plaut further stated:

> Treat the stranger fairly; you should extend your love and friendship to him. Remember that you too were strangers once.

That last line which addresses the stranger among us left a five-second interval of silence at the committee. In fact, the stranger among us represents the history and the roots of this country.

We can engage in a numbers game as to how many people were born here, how many people immigrated here, how many are the sons and daughters of immigrants but born here; the numbers can be debated, but perhaps no agreement will be reached as to how many individuals constitute second, and third generations of Canadians of immigrant families.

Over-all it cannot be denied that in large measure this country was built by the impressive flows of immigrants to our shores. In a real and conscious way, Canada opened its doors to the world, invited and welcomed people to begin a new life, take a new lease on life and start anew in Canada. In the process of offering those individuals a new opportunity and a new life, we were breathing life into Canada and building a new, bigger, and better country. That is the role that immigration has played in this country. It is a national building block. It has been in the past, it continues to be in the present, and it will be so in the future.

It is important to have that perspective when dealing with this emergency legislation, and to give some thought as to what are the future implications for our immigration program overall, specifically with respect to refugees.

I think everybody would agree and recognize the reality that immigration played a tremendously large and significant role, particularly in the post-Second World War era. We also must recognize that immigration will play the same type of role in the future. We only need to look at the statistics and the realities of our country in 1987. There is a dwindling birth rate, and families are having fewer children compared to 15 or 20 years ago. That will have a very serious impact on population trends, as well as social and economic implications.

At the same time we have an aging population. As a percentage of our population we have many more older Canadians than 10 or 15 years ago. It is not difficult to see the economic and social implications for Canada as a result of those two trends.

As well, every single year 50,000 more people leave our country than return. That has been the trend. Combine all those facts with the physical size of this country and I think the results are very clear.

Then we have our economic needs. Obviously immigration has to be matched with the country's ability to absorb immigrants; that is, to employ people and produce the goods and services so that everyone can enjoy their share. Those economic needs are continually changing, yet our education system does not necessarily adapt to those changes. We have to ensure that we have people with the skills necessary to meet Canada's requirements.

One of the best examples I can give is one close to home. My father is a tool and die maker with a small shop. He produces the tools and dies that go into punch presses which in turn produce all sorts of goods. Yet when my father requires tool and die makers he cannot find them. We have to go to Great Britain to obtain people with expertise in tool and die making. I ask myself why. Immigration offers an answer.

Immigration can help build this country and bring about greater economic prosperity. If that is true, and I happen to believe it is, then you would think this House, together with Canadians, could have a mature and rational debate on the process we are talking about today. What role does immigration play? What kind of immigration do we want to initiate? How many people can we absorb? What kind of trades do we need which our education system lags behind in producing? What are the goals we wish to set for ourselves?

You get the impression from the Government that immigration is something that you somehow have to tolerate. I think that is the wrong approach. It should be a pro-active, positive approach which utilizes immigration as a tool—not over the short term, as we are doing now, but articulating a vision of things to come—a vision which is consistent, progressive, and tells the world we know what we want in the way of immigration policy. We should be able to say that for the next 10, 15 or 20 years this is our agenda. It would be subject to some changes, of course, here and there, but we would not be opening the doors today, closing them tomorrow, and opening them a bit the next day. That does not work to the benefit of Canada.

Defining immigration policy is not easy. It is a very complex part of government policy. It is a large and very sensitive program. Do Canadians want to open up family class reunification? That has been a cornerstone of immigration policy for a good many years. Do we wish to assist the brothers and sisters of Canadians, for example, in immigrating by providing them with a higher priority? Do we wish to offer more points to those with family in this country? I think most Canadians would agree that the family has a role to play.

The arguments of the detractors of immigration would perhaps be blunted if we suggest that if they are worried that the state is going to spend too much on immigrants, do not worry because we are encouraging more family related immigration and the family will take care of the immigrant, thank you very much, and do a much better job.

How many visitors do we want in Canada? Should we have visitors' visas? Should we have a limit on the number of people who can come to Canada, the length of time they can stay, and where they come from? Should we allow more student visas? Should we allow more foreign students to come to Canada? Some people ask, if we allow too many foreign students what happens to our students? People may be worried that students from some corner of the world will do better than their little Johnny. Is that fair? Does their little Johnny lose a place at university if we have too many foreign students?

Other people suggest that once these students obtain their degrees and go back to their own countries they become goodwill ambassadors for Canada. If a student from Hong Kong studies at the University of Toronto for four years, goes back and works for an international computer company, do you not think that he will have a good understanding of this country? It could be that that individual will make a trip here in his capacity as marketing manager for the Hong Kong computer company. How many jobs would that create? How much wealth will that bring in to Canada?

Do we allow more immigrants to come in on temporary work permits? A construction firm in my riding went to the employment centre and asked for some bricklayers and carpenters. A couple of months went by and no one could fill the bill. Then he went to Immigration Canada. He said since the employment centre did not send him any workers he wanted to have people come in on work permits so he could fulfil his 15 contracts over the next seven months. Immigration Canada said, "No, you cannot do that. You have to advertise throughout the country and make sure there is a Canadian able to do that rather than bringing someone from abroad." The short answer to the whole story is that that individual did not get enough workers, and he told me that he had to cancel some of his contracts. Is there any need for that in 1987, Mr. Speaker? I think not.

But there is merit in intellectual stimulation, in trying to use practical examples to create practical policies that work for Canadians. Do we want to encourage more independent immigrants, people who do not have family here but who have good professions? Do we penalize independents too harshly if they do not have family? Do we encourage more entrepreneurs, more business immigration? This Government has doubled the number of business immigrants. Some people say that is bad and other people say that is positive. Others say that business immigrants bring wealth into the country, they create jobs, build new shops and factories, while others say this approach is that of buying your way into the country. This country was also built by individuals who came here with very little in their financial pockets, but a lot upstairs, with will and determination.

What is the absorption rate of entrepreneurs? What is the philosophical argument about whether a person with $200,000 can get into Canada without perhaps showing the right guarantees that a factory will be built or that he will create the number of jobs purported? Should we perhaps base our policy more on accepting individuals who wish to come here and give of themselves, stay permanently, and so on?

What about domestic work? What numbers of domestic helpers should we have? We have a program just to deal with domestic help. From where should they come and how many? Should we perhaps try to encourage domestic help in Canada before going abroad to get people? Once those people are here, what kind of opportunities or rights do they have? Why can't they stay a little longer if they manage to have a family in Canada and want to put roots down here? What is the implication of the program?

Then we have refugees. How many refugees shall we allow into Canada and from where? How do we select them? Should we go only in the refugee camps? Should we have a system in place that allows a person who comes to our borders due process, so that he or she can be accepted? Do we not have the obligation to follow a number of refugees through the system to see where they end up five or ten years hence?

It is troubling, but we seem to be hearing from different quarters that the word refugee has become a dirty word all of a sudden, that refugees are queue-jumpers and abusers. Those are the sort of reactionary comments we hear. We have to define what is the true story of the refugee phenomenon in this country.

What about the Gunther Plaut who came to our committee? Gunther Plaut was a refugee himself, a lawyer and a rabbi. He is intelligent, moving and forceful. He sat on the committee with all of the other Members of Parliament who were not refugees. Not only did he hold his own, he went far beyond what the Members could in that room.

What is the reality and what is it that frightens us? Is that fear legitimate or is it perception? If it is a perception, how do we dispel the perception? That is what I mean when I say we have to define a vision of things to come. We have to do it maturely, in a vigorous and positive way. That is a responsibility of Government, but not exclusively. It is the responsibility of the communities, the churches and the non-profit organizations to be concerned and to reach out. By and large the ultimate decision must be that of the Government elected by Canadians.

In terms of performance; in educating, leading, inspiring, eliciting confidence, putting trust in an immigration policy that works, the Government's report card shows failure. I do not say that because I sit on this side of the House and the Government is on that side. I do not recall, but I urge Government Members to think of a time when a government of Canada, regardless of its political stripes, Conservative or Liberal, mismanaged the immigration policy as badly as we have seen in the last three years. This Government's policy has wreaked confusion in the minds of individuals. We have seen a policy under which family class reunification has lower priority while business class immigration has a higher one. There is confusion about the lack of clarity in our refugee policy. I think of those individuals in this country who have no business being here at all, and about the individuals with criminal backgrounds who have been getting special permits, compared to other individuals who were being left out. I have never seen, in three years, such a lack of confidence in an immigration policy. If you can ask you will find that most Canadians are confused about the direction the Government wants to set for itself in immigration policy. Beyond that confusion, there has been confusion purposely allowed to fester between what is an immigrant and what is a refugee. That is the second type of confusion. The first one is over-all, the second is very precise.

For the last three years this House, the Standing Committee on Employment, Labour and Immigration, and non-governmental organizations have said one thing very clearly. If we are going to make strides in refugee policy we have to delineate between who is a refugee and who is an immigrant. But that has not been done, Mr. Speaker. What have we had is the Prime Minister saying all of a sudden, when this boatload arrived, as reported in a Canadian Press article of July 31, 1987:

> These people by and large are illegal aliens. They are people jumping the queue and taking the place of other immigrants.

That is false. The Minister knows that is false. The Members who serve on the committee with me know that is false. An individual refugee does not take the place of an immigrant. If my cousin from Country x cannot come in, it is not because we have accepted two or 200 refugees but because the targets have either been met or the individual does not, for a wide range of reasons, come within the immigration class, but he is not refused because of any refugee being accepted or refused. That confusion is being manipulated.

One of the greatest frustrations Canadians experience is the sponsoring of family and friends. People cannot understand why a relative, who would be given room and board and a job, with financial responsibility for his or her shortcomings, cannot come to Canada. The Government has allowed to fester and has manipulated that frustration. We hear that persons cannot enter because we have so many refugees queue jumping. That was the word used by the Prime Minister. That is not fair. It is not right because there are two streams, one for immigrants and one for legitimate refugees.

Legitimate immigration applicants apply at embassies abroad, state their reasons for applying, get medical and security checks and an answer is provided. That answer is yes, no or conditional. The reality is that a true, legitimate refugee who is facing persecution, torture, imprisonment, loss of liberty or probable death does not have the luxury to line up for a visa or to get proper documentation. The only luxury that person has is the luxury of some time to remove himself and his family from his country.

We are all proud of our birthplaces. Given the opportunity and the choice, no one in his right mind would want to be an immigrant. Immigration is motivated by either poverty, war, lack of a job, lack of a future or a revolution. Under those circumstances people pack their bags and move. However, given the choice, they would rather enjoy the fruits of their efforts in their own countries. When they cannot, they move for the betterment of their families and themselves. They adopt a new country to which they are loyal and patriotic. That is the reality of immigration. Given a choice, my family would have preferred to remain in northeastern Italy but there was nothing there for them at that time. Times have changed, but my parents are now Canadians. They would not trade Canada for any other including their homeland, as much as they still feel emotions for it. As much as they feel a tingle when they get off the airplane in their homeland, they feel a tingle on the return trip to Canada as well.

Given an ideal world, there would be no immigrants. However, we do not live in that ideal world. In addition, true refugees do not even have the option of trying to weather the storms in their countries. They have to leave; some of them come to Canada, some go to the United States and others go to Europe.

We must admit to ourselves that it is intellectually dishonest to confuse immigrants with refugees and to suggest that refugees block other immigrants. They do not. We do not even reach our immigration targets. The Minister has said that there is a target of 115,000 for landed immigrants but the Department always falls short by 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000. There are not enough people working in our embassies abroad to process these immigrants. Targets go up but the number of workers in visa offices stay the same. Unless those people work 24 hours a day, they will not process any more. One cannot draw blood from a stone. Therefore, it is very dishonest to base policies on those kinds of manipulations.

When I say that this is the worst performance I have ever seen, I do not mean to say that other Conservative Governments have the same record. I say that this Conservative administration, whether intentionally, whether because there has been a series of different Ministers with different goals or whether it is the Prime Minister, has given one of the worst performances I have seen.

Compare its performance, for instance, to that of the Government of 1979 led by the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), followed after nine months by the Trudeau Government. The best example I can offer to show the dichotomy between the two administrations is the example of the boat people.

Within a three-year period, Canada accepted 106,000 Vietnamese boat people. Approximately half of these were sponsored by the Government and half sponsored by communities, Members of this Chamber, parish priests, local community groups and local ratepayers who found families who would take in a number of young Vietnamese children. The acceptance of that 106,000 in three years was begun by the Government of the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead, and finished by Mr. Trudeau's Government. That is leadership.

How was that accomplished? It was not accomplished through irrational thought. It was not accomplished by wondering what we would do with the boatloads of people who were coming. No, the Government clearly articulated for the nation the need to help these individuals. Other places in the world did the same. There was education. There was integration and acceptance by Canadians. Canadians demonstrated confidence that the Government would accomplish it in an orderly way. Canadians felt that these people really were refugees and we could absorb them into the community without there being an over-indulgence in the social welfare system if the Government would pay all the costs. All those barriers were taken into account and what was the result? The result was that Canadians moved progressively, sensibly and calmly. That is but one example of many in history.

There have been special refugee movements of people numbering in the thousands. After the Czechoslovakian revolution, there were 37,000 refugees. Again, through education, integration and a sense of balance, purpose and confidence in the Government, the system worked. If Canadians do not have confidence in policy, Governments are paralysed. If Canadians do not give the green light, the Government cannot move. Therefore, there must be a partnership. In the end, the Government can only go as far as the people want it to go. The process was a noble one.

Studies done by the Government in the 1980s attempted to track individual refugees after they had come to Canada. Those studies show that those refugees from Vietnam, who are loyal and proud Canadians today, have done very well. Many of them have opened up their own businesses and shops. Others are happy working, making a dollar. Their kids have done very well in the educational system. They are producing and contributing citizens, just like you and I, Mr. Speaker. If we see them walking down the street—we cannot call them refugees, given the stigma we have allowed the word "refugee" to take on in the last couple of months.

The Canadians who accepted the Vietnamese boat people in the late 1970s and early 1980s are the same Canadians who live here today. It is not a different population. It is not as if the Canadians who were here in the late 1970s and the early 1980s all left and were replaced with another set of Canadians who all of a sudden have a different vision of immigration. They are the same people. Canada is the same country. It is only four years after the fact. If the people are the same, why then are we getting such a drastically different reaction from the Government? Why is it an emergency when 300 people arrive in two boats over two summers? That is 300 compared to 106,000 in one special refugee flow. It is not acceptable for the Government to react in the way it did to those 300. We have a much prouder history than that.

I am not suggesting that we should not have orderly systems or should reward abuse. The checks and balances must be in place. If there are people who are illegitimately here and persist in circumventing the laws they should be deported instantly. I support that as do all Canadians.

We are here discussing an approach, evolving with the times and taking a humanitarian and responsible role. I find it unacceptable, with our history, that the Government, its Ministers and the Prime Minister should react in the fashion in which they have reacted.

The Canadian Ethnocultural Council, an organization representing national ethnic groups across the country, presented a very thoughtful brief entitled, "Reason over Hysteria, Please". That title captures the essence of this very well. We have always been guided by moderation, reason, thoughtfulness and a sense of progressivity.

Ministers of the Crown and Members of Parliament are suggesting that Canada is the only country to which refugees are coming, that somehow Canada is a sucker for refugees. I do not mean to use that word impolitely, but that is what I hear on the streets. It is the responsibility of the Government to say that that is not true. The refugee movement is a world phenomenon.

Refugees are produced by uprisings, revolutions, dictatorships and war. When we listen to the national news in the evening and read the papers in the morning we learn about refugee uprisings, protests for peace and democracy, people put in prison, people killed and people tortured. We are bombarded with that. The world is in turmoil and is producing refugees as we speak.

The existence of refugees presents a world-wide problem which needs a world-wide solution. A domestic solution within Canada will do nothing to help the problem in the world. West Germany, Canada, Switzerland, the United States, Brazil and other countries must come together in a mood of co-operation to try and resolve the problem collectively. That is why we signed the Geneva Convention in the 1950s.

What is the Geneva Convention? When you strip away the technical and fancy words which Canadians may not understand, the Geneva Convention is a fancy way of saying that we are all besieged with the problem and in order to solve it we must all act in unison. That is why we signed the pact.

The agreement says, first, that we must be proactive, meaning that we have a responsibility to go to the various refugee camps in the world. I have had the opportunity of visiting some of them. It is not a pleasant sight to see a refugee camp surrounded by barbed wire. People live within those camps for five or six years, have children there, and are not able to leave. Countries within the pact send visa officers to refugee camps to select refugees to bring to their countries in hopes of diminishing the numbers of people in the camps.

In addition to being proactive we agreed to be reactive. We agreed not to send people back to their homeland who, upon their return, will face persecution, torture or death. Those are the two things to which we as a country agreed under the Geneva Convention. That is what the Government should be explaining. The Government should be honouring that agreement rather than breaking it.

The Government should be explaining the transition in the plight of refugees. There are a number of Members and Ministers who say that this is the fault of the Liberal Government, that we are in a mess in 1987 because of the policies of Pierre Elliott Trudeau or the inaction of the previous administration. I do not say this because I sit on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, but that is incorrect. The previous Government recognized that a transition was taking place. No longer were the majority of people waiting in the refugee camps. They were trying to get away from the camps, reach other countries, and ask for status. We did not have a system in place to handle such a large number of applicants coming to our shores.

When the previous administration saw the trickle of people arriving in Canada it tried to put in place a new structure. That is why it commissioned Rabbi Gunther Plaut to do a study and recommend a new system by which we could handle fairly and quickly the applicants coming to our shores. The report of Gunther Plaut was on the desk of the Government for close to three years before Rabbi Plaut was given the time of day.

In addition to the Plaut report the Liberal Party made specific recommendations in committee in a minority report. We suggested a liberal configuration. The New Democratic Party did the same thing. The Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration submitted a number of reports on overhauling and reforming the refugee determination system. The non-governmental organizations made recommendations as did the churches. The media played a role by indicating that the Government must make it a priority to move on the fundamental changes required in our system.

The Conservative Member of Parliament for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais), who is the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration and the Chairman of the Conservative immigration caucus committee, made recommendations. He wrote a letter to his colleagues on July 22. He said in that letter, "I am writing to you today to ask you not to leave indelible marks on Canadian society by adopting Bill C-84 without safeguards and without amendments that will benefit our Party in the future. I have looked at the Bill carefully and I can only recommend that you examine its clauses objectively in the interest of Canada and without emotion or without exaggeration". He went on to say, "Immigration officials must not be given abusive powers, the church groups must be protected, refugees without documents must not be penalized and the control of terrorists should be left to the proper officials".

That was written by a government Member of Parliament and Chairman of the Conservative immigration caucus committee.

All of these people, from Plaut to the Member of Parliament for La Prairie, and everyone between, have been largely ignored for close to three years. The refugee determination system and reform was not made a priority issue on the agenda of the Government. Rather than put in place an orderly, fair, and quick processing system, we are now paying the price for that inaction.

A new system is the only long-term viable solution, not only in terms of processing but in terms of being the best deterrent that any system could offer. It will be a deterrent because I do not believe many, if any, fraudulent refugees would be moved to spend up to $15,000 to be dropped on our coast if they knew that they could only stay here for a period of three to six months under a new system. I am sure someone would rather go to another country, where they could stay longer, than spend their life savings to travel 4,000 miles and stay here for only six months. Presently, individuals can stay here for years before their status is determined, whether or not they are bona fide refugees. The signal being sent by the present system is wrong.

The Government seems to be promoting its policy on the basis of curbing abuse. While the Government may suggest that it has a monopoly on the stand against abuse, I believe that no one in the House welcomes abuse, encourages it, or wishes to reward those who manipulate and circumvent our laws by smuggling, trafficking and trading in human lives.

Unfortunately, abuse exists in other areas of government responsibility. There are people who abuse unemployment insurance, the pension system, and the worker's compensation claims system. No one likes abuse, but, as in every other society, abuse sometimes permeates the very best system that a country and government can offer. The Government should be vigilant in attempting to stamp out abuse, as we have done in the Opposition. We did not sit quietly during the schemes and scams from Portugal, Turkey and Brazil, where individuals were selling visas and passports, counselling people to come here and make fraudulent claims based on religious persecutions that did not exist.

Why has the Government not acted? Why have people not been charged as a result of RCMP investigations? We were told, in answer to our questions on the floor of the House of Commons, not to worry, that we should have confidence that the Government will clamp down on those people and bring them to justice. What justice has there been in coming to grips with the abuse? The fact is that it is business as usual.

Those sleazy consultants, who make huge immoral profits from people like those we have met in our constituency offices who have paid thousands of dollars for nothing, are still in business. Even though they were raided by the RCMP they do not have to appear in court or face penalties.

These operators moved their tricks of the trade from Portugal to Turkey after we put a visa on Portugal, and moved to Brazil after we put a visa on Turkey. Now they have gone elsewhere. The people in communities in Toronto know who they are. Members of the same community provided evidence to government Members and the Minister at the Committee.

The Government knows the identity of those operators but there has been no action. If the Government is genuinely interested in stamping out abuse, why has not one person been fined or jailed in the last three years in light of the numerous schemes and scams in this country? Why has it not declared war on those white-collar criminals who live off the proceeds of human desperation? The Government must answer those questions because its policy is predicated on stamping out abuse.

We are asked to trust the Government, yet it has failed to come to grips with the situation. I challenge the Government to show me proof that it is serious about clamping down on abuse. If the Government is serious about stamping out abuse, why is it that not one person who has gone through the determination process and been refused a claim been removed from Canada? While the present system is faulty and must be improved, there are people who had the opportunity to go through the four or five stages of the process but were refused their claim. Why are they still here, just like those who were accepted? The message being sent is that it does not matter whether or not one is a refugee, one can stay in Canada. Why has the Government not curbed that abuse?

If the Government is serious about protecting legitimate refugees, why has it not acted to remove fraudulent claimants? If it does not want individuals to wait in line behind fraudulent claimants, why does it not remove them and give the message that Canada is open but it wishes to accept those who legitimately need our protection. So there were opportunities to show how serious the Government was in terms of curbing abuse, if there was the political will and if there was the intellectual honesty in what the Government was preaching to the Canadian public. However, in terms of morality and honesty, the Government is bankrupt. It says one thing and does another.

We had a boatload of refugee claimants in 1986. What was the response of the Government? The then Minister gave them ministerial permits which allowed them to stay in Canada. We had a fairly quick processing. We had a Prime Minister who welcomed them. Our Prime Minister declared very proudly, and I was happy to hear him, in terms of the Tamil refugee claimants: "If we err, we will always err on the side of justice and on the side of compassion". We all remember those words. That was the summer of 1986.

In the summer of 1987, the same Prime Minister, probably before he even talked to his Minister of Immigration—he has not even seen one of these individuals, he has not even participated in debate and he called the emergency—said: "These people by and large are illegal aliens". He also said: "I am not going to be pushed around or kicked around by these people". That was the summer of 1987. The summer of 1986 was radically different.

No one is suggesting that this Government be pushed around. No one in this Parliament would subscribe to that. We are all proud of protecting our shores, our sovereignty and our independence. However, that does not mean the Government has to prove its macho image. It does not have to prove how strong it is after giving up to the United States on lumber and free trade. It does not have to prove how strong it is by pushing around a boatload of people looking for a home.

The real dichotomy I wanted to address is the confusion of the electorate who are asking what our policy is. In 1986, in a very ad hoc way, the Government accepts. In 1987 it rejects, fabricating a crisis and bringing Parliament back, giving the whole situation an unreal and very fictitious air.

Which is real, the Prime Minister declaring the aliens illegal back in June, or his speeches at the various ethno-cultural picnics this past summer where he talked about tolerance and opening the door to immigration? Canadians want to know, and this Parliament should know, which is the policy of this Government and of this country. This is the confusion we have to address and eradicate. The Government has to be confident its policies are secure, that they have clarity and purpose, otherwise confidence will be undermined and mistrust will be the order of the day.

The first response of the Canadians to the boatload of 174 migrants just a few short months ago was not to call the police. It was not to call the immigration officer, nor to call the Coast Guard to remove these individuals. The very first act was of a Nova Scotian woman who offered the migrants on her lawn tea and cookies. That was the first Canadian response. The first natural reaction was to offer these people tea and cookies and, I believe, peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. Think of it, Mr. Speaker for a moment. We have gone from that natural and beautiful knee-jerk reaction of a Canadian woman, to Bill C-84, and we know what happened in between.

In terms of Bill C-84, we have to ask ourselves two questions, what and why. What is in Bill C-84, and why are those clauses drafted the way they are? Again, I preface my remarks by suggesting that if the objective of the exercise is to curb abuse, that is fair. If we wish to say that our country is open to asylum seekers and we wish to honour our obligations and responsibilities to legitimate refugees, but not to others, that is fair, legitimate and expected and no arguments will be offered from any quarter of this House. But does Bill C-84 do that? Who are the targets? That is why the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) and I, who attended those committees, moved the amendments. We tried to clarify the objectives with the reality, with the law. We tried to move amendments so that the Bill would actually do what the Government purports it will do.

I would like to take a moment to go over a number of the major clauses in the Bill. One clause heralded by the Government is that it gives new power to turn boats back. The Government wants to tell Canadians it is going to be tough, that it is going to put into its legislation the power to enable us to turn boats back. It expects applause for that bravado. But let us analyse what that will mean. What will that do to the process of our refugee system? How will you and I, Mr. Speaker, ever know who was on that boat? If that boat contained 100 passengers, how many were true refugees, 59, 73, 100 or none? How many had passports and proper visas, 6, 12, 14? What were their circumstances? Where were they coming from? What were they fleeing from? What were their circumstances in terms of the actual persecution they faced?

The answer, of course, is that we would not know. They would not be provided due process. There would be no hearing where they could go into details of their persecution. There would be total disrespect in this regard for any processing of that unknown passenger, and we may be participating in sending 100 persons, 15 or one person back to the country of origin to be tortured, to face imprisonment or to face death. I do not think Canadians really feel comfortable about that possibility.

The second aspect we have to analyse is that if the Government really wants to deter, is this the proper way to do it? Is it proper to simply say: "We are going to turn the boat around and that will end it"? Or do we need something else? I believe the latter. If I were a captain who was prepared to set sail from Europe, what would I be thinking if I knew the policy of Canada was simply to turn the boats around? I would do the following. Perhaps I would have room for 100 individuals. I would charge them each $10,000. I would pocket the money and I would say, "There is a 50 per cent chance that I am going to get in in the middle of the night, dump the passengers, return and perhaps fill up the boat again and go somewhere else or return to Canada. Or there is a 50 per cent chance that even if the Coast Guard finds me, the only thing that they will do, or the Minister will do, is simply to turn my boat around". Perhaps the captain of the boat will dump the passengers beyond the 12-mile limit. Perhaps he will dump them off in another country or bring them back to their country of origin. We must not forget that he has the money and the boat. He has made a profit. Thus the captain wins. He wins in all situations, whether or not he is turned back.

In an amendment we suggested that if there is a boat approaching our country that we board it and escort it into port, which will allow us to do two things. First, it will allow us to determine who the passengers are, whether or not they are refugees. If so, they will be determined as such, and if not, after processing, they will be asked to leave. Second, we will have the captain's boat. We can impound it or sell it. We can charge the captain or fine him. We can imprison the captain. In answer to those who suggest that it is not the captain who is the real organizer but someone else in another country, let me say that we can use the evidence that we obtain from the captain and the crew to try to track down that operator, smuggler number one, and use any powers that we have to extradite him or, through the use of pacts with other countries, ensure that we bring to justice those who are smuggling.

If one really wanted to deter the captain of a boat from leaving that European harbour, would it not make sense to try to approach it and escort it into port rather than turning it around, remaining ignorant of who is on board, who did the organizing and where these people come from? Ignorance and political darkness do not help us define what we are trying to stop. That is why we moved an amendment which would provide for escorting a boat into port rather than turning it around at sea. That would not discourage any captain or smuggler. It does not offer process. So we lose and we come up with a fat zero in terms of processing and in terms of dissuading people from smuggling.

The other factor, of course, is that it would create two types of refugee claimants. It would allow the person who comes in other than on a boat to have a processing system while those who arrive by boat may not have one. For example, if my family were fleeing a country facing political persecution and I left by boat and my brother left by plane, my brother would arrive through Pearson International Airport, declare his refugee status and would have a hearing. He would be processed and he could stay. Since I came by boat I could be turned away and I would not be able to tell my story. There is one policy which creates two classes of refugees.

As a policy we cannot suggest that it is the mode of transportation which will dictate the decision-making process. One cannot say, "If you take a bus, we will process you this way. If you take a plane, we will do it this way. If you take a boat, we will do it another way". There has to be one system for each refugee claimant. A person is either a refugee or not. Either the country provides processing or it does not. If we create two different types of refugees and a person wants to come here and abuse the system, do Hon. Members not think that those people will now take a plane rather than a boat until we deal with all transportation vehicles in the same way if we wish to curb abuse? I think it would be logical. Again, an amendment by my Party to achieve that end was defeated.

The third aspect of this point is this. What about the Geneva Convention and our international obligations? At the outset of my remarks I mentioned the two responsibilities that we enjoy as a country under the United Nations Convention. There is the policy of non-refoulement which is a very classy technical word which simply means that we will not send people back to a place unless we can guarantee or be certain that it will not be problematic, hazardous or fatal for that person. That is clear. The policy of turning back a boat will not guarantee the process of non-refoulement. So we would be violating very seriously that responsibility.

We asked the Government, "If you no longer believe in the conventions of the United Nations, if you do not believe in the agreement we signed in 1951, then tell Canadians that you want to break that agreement and that you want another configuration, that you do not believe in it any more, that you are going to go your own way". At least the Government should have the courage of its convictions to tell Canadians clearly and to allow Canadians to judge for themselves whether or not they would like to pull out of this United Nations pact. The Government should not do that in a backhanded way by trying to insert a clause in a piece of legislation which will do that very thing.

With respect to turning back boats, we moved amendments that would in fact curb real abuse while protecting the rights of claimants to tell their stories. That was rejected.

Another proposal in the Bill suggests that travel companies have to play the role of immigration officers. It is suggested that travel companies in Canada must confiscate all travel documents, all visas and all passports from incoming passengers. The representatives of companies who testified before the committee said that this proposal is unworkable. They said that they do not have the ability legally to confiscate documents belonging not only to a person but to the country of that person's origin. They argued with respect to liability, for example, if passports or visas are stolen, lost or misplaced. Whose responsibility would that be? Would it be the responsibility of the Canadian Government or of air transportation companies such as Air Canada or Air France?

They talked about the possibility of terrorist activities. They said that if there were a terrorist on board who wished to terrorize an individual of a certain denomination, sect or religion, it would be easy for such an individual to get a stewardess and go through all the documents in order to identify by picture the individuals belonging to that creed or denomination. They did not want to elicit or encourage terrorists by making life easier for those individuals who want to bring harm to passengers on board an airplane. They also talked about the inconvenience of collecting and then redistributing at the end of flights passports and other travel documents. The other message was that all passengers would run the risk of losing their documents for a period of time, including Canadians coming back to this country, unless there was an exception, and there was not.

Therefore, Canadians must ask themselves what kind of regulation would require the confiscation of all documents on airlines coming into Canada. Not even the Soviet Union or Iron Curtain countries ask that of their national airlines. Canadians and witnesses asked us as members of the committee, "Do you want to legislate that type of legislation which would place us in a very unique class all our own? Or do you want to set a standard of which we can be proud and try to work to curb abuse without infringing upon our values, our temperament, our way of doing things in this country?" The Government refused. It persisted and said, "No, all passengers, Canadians and non-Canadians, will have their passports confiscated. Airlines will be fined". The airlines are not paying fines now. I doubt that even Air Canada will pay fines, and it is the national airline owned by the Government which would actually fine its own airline, which probably would not pay. Is that a logical, workable policy? Are we to be proud of that policy? I think not.

Another area is the powers to detain individuals. My colleagues and I do not argue with the fact that if a person comes to Canada without identification, without proper documentation, does not co-operate, and perhaps there is information that that person is possibly a threat to this country, of course all Canadians would want the country to protect itself and assure its citizens that there is due regard for that potential threat. That is why in the present system there are automatic detainment powers for 48 hours. A Minister or officials can detain a person for 48 hours. After that time there can be an application to an adjudicator who, based on further evidence and information, can allow a further detainment of seven days which would follow for every seven-day period. That was passed by a former Parliament, and approved by the government Members who were then in opposition. It also met with the approval of Canadians who felt it was a good compromise to allow for the detainment powers and for the adjudicator to make the decision on whether there is proper evidence, not only suspicion, to detain a person. We are not only talking about the infringement of rights of potential new arrivals, but of the possible infringement of the rights of other Canadians and the manner in which the courts interpret them.

The Charter clearly specifies that no Canadian will be detained unreasonably without proper grounds and without a process where an adjudicator makes the determination. If the Government provides the adjudicator with well-founded reasons, evidence, and documentation, the adjudicator says, yes, we will detain. If the Government has a hunch or a suspicion that that person is an undesirable, that hunch or suspicion is not good enough in this country. No one would want to be locked up on a hunch or a suspicion.

Therefore, we suggested that the current law was adequate. It was doing the job. There were no problems. If there was evidence, there was a detainment. The Government proposes in Bill C-84 an automatic detainment of seven days, rather than the 48 hour detainment. After seven days, there can be an additional 21 day detainment without the adjudicator being in a position to say yes or no. The adjudicator would merely stamp the approval, because there is no flexibility in the Bill. There is no discretion that the adjudicator may not grant the detainment. The legislation clearly states that the adjudicator "shall" offer his or her approval. We must underline the word "shall". The adjudicator is a rubber stamp. In that case, I do not know why there would be an adjudicator. It gives excessive powers that the Government on a whim, a hunch, or a suspicion can detain a person for 28 days with no questions asked, no representation, no legal remedies, nothing.

I am suggesting that this is an infringement on those rights, and it is an infringement of the Charter. It is an infringement on Canadians' sense of justice and fair play. If detainment is needed, it can be granted, but it cannot be granted on a hunch or a suspicion. It will be a sad day if we allow this proposal to go through unchallenged. It will end up in the courts. Legal experts and witnesses have suggested that it will be challenged in the courts because it contravenes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Of course, if this clause is challenged together with other clauses, the Bill will be dragged through the courts. It will die a slow and agonizing death. Perhaps in a year or two we will have a policy that is paralysed. Then what will the Government tell Canadians? Will it say, "We were in a rush. We thought we could have done it. We now find out that the Supreme Court has said no. We have to return to the drawing board"? Is that the manner in which the Government should proceed?

If there is a hunch or a suspicion that a person may be an undesirable, there is the possibility of making a determination that that person should not enter the refugee process. That is very dangerous. What information will be relied upon? If Nelson Mandela arrived here, and the Government had information that he is considered an undesirable in South Africa, or was in prison in South Africa, which would therefore make him a criminal under South African law, and he is accused of the crime of standing up for human rights and democracy, does that mean that that information will be used against an individual? There is not one international code of law. That is the reason people flee and become refugees. A person standing up for democracy in Chile may be thrown in prison. A person standing up for democracy in Canada may be elected as a Member of Parliament. That information, and that recognition of our law compared to other laws has to be taken into account. The Government would rely on information provided by the government of a country from which that person is fleeing in order to fabricate an undesirable clause.

I am suggesting that this is not the manner in which to proceed. If there is information provided by that government or country, the refugee body should be allowed to make a determination. The commissioners can decide that the information is faulty and in fact that it proves that the person is a political refugee, or the refugee commissioner can say that the information is legitimate and it should be used against the person. We must allow the person the discretion to defend himself from information from a country or a government which states that he or she is guilty of a crime, which crime may have been to stand up for democracy, or to throw a rock through someone's office window.

We received enlightened testimony with respect to those excessive over-kill powers in this clause. Mr. Borovoy, the Chairman of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, stated:

> It is a violation of democratic principle to create a power of jailing people—on the basis of a unilateral, essentially unreviewable decision of a politician . . . consider the incongruity this creates with our criminal law.

He went on to say:

> The powers created by this Bill are excessive, repressive, and needless. No less gratuitous is the rush to get it enacted yesterday.

If the Canadian Civil Liberties Association is suggesting that this measure is repressive, why is the Government moving ahead? If the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and the Canadian Bar Association say that this will be challenged in the courts, why is the Government moving ahead? If the Government wishes to respect the reality of people who are fleeing and who are charged with so-called crimes because they wish to be free and have human dignity, why is this reason for detainment or refusal into the system? Is that not the reason that we have a refugee process? Are refugees not extradicted from their country because they cannot be free, they do not have freedom of choice, speech, assembly, all the things that we have in our Constitution? That is the very same Constitution that we patriated only a few short years ago. We brought it home and created a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that is the envy of the world.

We made amendments to clarify, refine, target, and bring it in line with our justice system. A right infringed upon today with respect to the 174 migrants is a right that infringes upon all of us. That is the manner in which to look at human rights.

The fourth area of concern is the powers given to immigration officers for the first time. On a whim or a suspicion they can kick down the doors or jump through the windows of any organization and seize any document without a warrant. They do not even need a tele-warrant, which is used when the officer concerned cannot get to a judge and so makes the request by telephone. These officers do not need to do even that. No warrants at all are required. We are going to have immigration officers playing Rambo on suspicion.

We in this Party said that at the very least the Government must accept the need for a mandatory warrant. The only exception would be when someone's life is in danger. Other than that, should we allow immigration officers to break down doors at whim? Will Canadians accept that? Or do Canadians accept that there should be checks and balances so that a warrant is required? That is what Canadians voted for in the past. That is why we have a Charter of Rights. We are protected from search and seizure without a warrant. Why should immigration officers be given the power to ransack a place because they have a hunch that a particular person is not a refugee? As the Canadian Civil Liberties Association said, it goes far beyond what is needed.

The Canadian Bar Association and professors of constitutional law have said that if this legislation is passed, it will be challenged in the courts. It will be eaten up by the courts. It will render our policy unworkable. Therefore, why do it? Requiring a search warrant is reasonable, moderate, in keeping with Canada's sense of justice, yet the Government turned it down.

The fifth area of great concern is that of proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2. Those sections epitomize the over-kill this Bill represents. According to those sections, any Canadian, whether a priest, a nun, a student or a farmer, who assists a refugee who may not have a document in his pocket showing he is a legitimate refugee, is liable to a fine or imprisonment. Imagine that. We are passing a law that would allow a priest to be imprisoned or fined for helping a refugee. What is the role of churches and non-governmental organizations? What has their role been in the food banks of this country? I do not think there is anything more embarrassing and undignifying for a human being than having to line up to ask for food. Imagine your feelings if you were in that position. What has been the reaction of the churches to the poor, those who do not have clothing, the homeless, those who are addicted to drugs or who are involved in prostitution? The reaction has been to try to complement government action in a humanitarian and compassionate way. We accept that. What would be the price if we did not have that network of volunteers? Yet now, all of a sudden, the church or individual who helps a refugee is liable to a fine or imprisonment. That is repugnant.

Is that the kind of law we want? Is it the kind of law we should be proud of? Or should we recognize that the action of a priest in helping a refugee is different from the action of a smuggler, a manipulator, or a consultant who trafficks in human beings for profit? Are we suggesting that the two actions are the same? Of course not. Canadians do not want that. The churches do not want that.

I am not suggesting that churches or any other group should be above the law. I am suggesting that the law is wrong and immoral and the target should not be those who aid refugees. The target should be those who circumvent our laws for profit. The churches came before the committee and said they have never, ever counselled fraudulent claims. They never tried to suggest to claimants that they rip up their documents. They never suggested that claimants arrive in the middle of the night. The Ministers responsible have said for two weeks now, "Do not worry, Member of Parliament for York West, we made the law such that it will get the real smugglers. Do not worry, our intentions are not to imprison or fine a priest or the organization involved".

If those are their intentions, why are their intentions not reflected in the law? If those are the speeches, why are they not the law of the country? You cannot say that the intention is not to fine a priest while at the same time you provide a law that allows a priest to be fined. It is either one or the other, Mr. Speaker. This country is not governed by speeches or intentions, it is governed by law. This law will create a new offence which is not there now. In 1987 or in any other year we cannot be proud of finding in our legislation a Bill that can fine and imprison individual Canadians who legitimately help refugees. What kind of a country do we want to become? Do we want to be like the United States where priests have to hide refugees in basements? Do we want to make the actions of a priest acts of civil disobedience? Are we suggesting that a priest who helps a refugee is a potential criminal, as that sort of law would imply if he were caught and charged? I do not think Canadians want that. They did not want it this summer, they did not want it 10 summers ago, and they will not want it in 10 years to come.

We tried to move an amendment to suggest that it should not be a crime for a priest to help a refugee but that it should be a crime to counsel fraudulent claims, to suggest tearing up documents, to smuggle people for profit and dump them in the seas. Let us fine people and put them in prison if we have to, but let us not create a law that suggests that we make the net so large and so encompassing that we can catch everybody potentially under the law. Again, intentions are one thing and laws are different. Intentions are useless when the law allows you to prosecute individual innocent Canadians.

With respect to the clause, we had a very moving brief presented by the Inter-Church Committee on Refugees. I would like to select what two individuals said. First, George Cram said:

> In our opinion Bill C-84 does not help the process.
> I do not want to be guilty of committing an offence for doing humanitarian work. I do not want to feel inside myself that what I am doing is illegal, and I do not want to be liable for prosecution. The offence is what you are creating, not the prosecution.

With him was Nancy Pocock, a member of the same Inter-Church Committee, who said:

> If my Government tells me it is a crime to help these people, I will have to say I am obeying a higher law and I am going to continue to help them when they need me.

Why are we making it an act of civil disobedience for the George Crams and Nancy Pococks of this country to do what they have been doing legitimately for years? We tried to suggest to the Government that there are words and clauses that one can use in the legislation under the law to distinguish very clearly between the act of a consultant or a smuggler and the Nancy Pococks and George Crams of Canada. We suggested the words "non-profit", "voluntary", "humanitarian", which have been used 38 different times in our federal statutes. What about the definition of churches? This was not only to make the intention known but to allow these individual Canadians not to have their legal rights infringed upon and not to lose their civil liberties for assisting people they had been assisting for years. Those phrases were all possible. We have the best legal minds in the Justice Department, I would think, or at least access to the best legal minds, and yet we were unable to get from the Government agreement to amend proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2 to state clearly that it is not the law in Canada to allow for prosecution of individuals who aid, abet or assist a refugee without a visa.

Government members were stubborn and inflexible, and the Minister, in his final address to the committee, has stubbornly refused to heed all the witnesses who had cited proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2. They said, "For goodness' sake, clean it up. Amend it. Make it clear in law that we are not your targets". Those sections are on the record, on the books, and they are about to become law. That type of drafting is irresponsible and unnecessary.

The international community passed judgment on this refugee Bill. We had not only witnesses from within Canada but representatives of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees who said very clearly that they were concerned with the direction of Canada's policy in Bill C-84. A letter was sent to the Government two days after the emergency was called. The concerns were outlined very clearly. In a letter from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Jean-Pierre Hocké, to the Government of Canada we find the following stated:

> Certain provisions of the proposed legislation, however, give rise to serious concern inasmuch as lack of procedural safeguards could risk exposing bona fide asylum seekers and refugees to forcible return to territories where their lives or freedom would be threatened—
> As you are no doubt aware the situations now being faced are not unique to Canada. Institution of the procedural safeguards referred to above would serve as an important example to the international community and help preserve the principle of asylum throughout the world.

What the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees was saying was, do not set a bad precedent, a bad example, which other countries will equal. If Canada has been a leader in the international community, as it has, this will allow the Great Britains, the Switzerlands and the United States of the world to say that if Canada can do it, we can do it. If everybody does it, what happens to the international solution to the problem? What happens to the 15 million people who are searching for a home who obviously cannot all come to Canada? If we have an international solution, it will allow Canada to breathe a little easier. If we have an international corridor of locked doors, Canada will be the worse for it because the desperation and the attempts to come in through our back door will be all the more aggressive. The human spirit never dies. If the human spirit has to select between torture, imprisonment, death and a bold attempt to get away at any cost, what will it be? Which one would you pick, Mr. Speaker, if you were in the same position? The answer is a very clear one.

We even have Stephen Lewis, the Ambassador to the United Nations, who was unable categorically to support Bill C-84. He refused, on the steps of the House of Commons when scrummed by the nation's media, to say very clearly, "I support the Bill and I will defend it and promote it at the United Nations, if I have to". Instead, he couched his language. He said, "Well, I hope the Bill will be amenable, be in keeping and made to be in keeping with our international obligations". He was suggesting very clearly between the lines that amendments were needed to make it acceptable, that it would be embarrassing for the United Nations Ambassador to go to the United Nations and be proud of Bill C-84 when Canada is thought to be a leader. Why follow the worst examples? Why not set the best examples?

If the Ambassador to the United Nations cannot sell this policy at the United Nations, I am not sure that it will work. What can Canadians conclude if one day the Minister says it is a great policy and the very next day the Ambassador to the United Nations refuses to give it a categorical and clear vote of confidence?

We must look at the responsibilities of parliamentarians, and there are many, as there are in any other job. What are the two most important responsibilities with which we in this Chamber are entrusted? The first is to ensure that Canadians' tax dollars are spent wisely and prudently. We try to do that through the checks and balances that exist and through accountability sessions with the Cabinet. The second responsibility is to draft the laws of the country, to create laws that will govern and administer the citizens of the land.

We have been told, and it has been clearly seen, that it is irresponsible to pass legislation that is poorly drafted and clearly subject to court challenges as soon as it is pronounced law. In this case, the Canadian Bar Association has said that every junior lawyer could take a shot at this Bill. The Civil Liberties Association has said that there will be challenges based on the liberties of Canadians. The Canadian Jewish Congress and the Inter-Church Committee on Refugees have said that they will challenge proposed Sections 95.1 and 95.2 in the court, and if they do not, others will take up the battle cry because the law tries to suggest that people who help legitimate refugees should be fined or thrown into jail.

We have heard that there will be challenges. However, what was the response of the Government? We asked the Government to make public the legal argument provided by the Department of Justice indicating that this legislation was in conformity with the Charter, but it did not. This legislation was drafted by officials of the Justice Department, but the Justice Department has refused to provide a legal rationale that would clarify the confusion surrounding the Bill and whether or not it is in keeping with the Charter.

One must ask oneself if the Department of Justice is in favour of this Bill. There have been reports that the Department of Justice was overruled by the Department of Immigration. Perhaps we will never know if that is so. However, I think part of it was given away when Justice officials were the only ones who refused the committee's invitation to appear before it.

I raised the matter on the floor of the House of Commons during Question Period by asking the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) why he would not allow his officials to testify before the committee in order to defend the Bill. I asked that question on Friday, and on Monday Justice officials arrived at the committee, but they were not prepared to say whether they agreed or disagreed with the drafting of the Bill or whether or not they had a legal opinion on it.

I am not confident that the Bill is legally foolproof. I am not confident that the Department of Justice is confident that this rambling legislation will make it through the courts.

Since the Government did not want to make public the legal opinion, we asked it to refer the legislation to the Supreme Court for a judicial review as soon as it is proclaimed. That has been done in the past and the objective of that is to have the Supreme Court of Canada give us a constitutional review on it rather than allow it to be challenged step by step through the various courts. At such a review, the Government could argue its case and the court would say whether it finds the legislation in keeping with the Charter or in violation of the Charter. If the Supreme Court decided that it violates the Charter, it would be sent back to the House and we would correct it. That would be better than having this piece of legislation challenged bit by bit in the courts, thus paralysing the policy, making it unworkable and putting the Government in the position of trying to explain to Canadians why it is in a mess again.

If I were at home watching the Government, I would hope that the Government would finally get it right. I would hope that the Government would have the courage to stop the delays and give us a refugee determination system that works, one in which we can have confidence. I would tell the Government that it has my confidence and that it should do what it has to do under the law to ensure that real refugees are protected and that fraudulent ones are kept out. I would think that that would be the reaction of any Canadian.

What would be the reaction of the average Canadian in two years' time when he reads in the paper that the policy which was approved by the Government is now paralysing the courts and we cannot do a darn thing about refugees because the court has ruled the legislation to be unconstitutional? Canadians will ask what happened two years ago. Parliament was called together in an emergency session. There was a debate. Canadians trusted the Government to move properly, but it abused that trust. It did not fulfil one of its more urgent responsibilities, which is to enact laws that are in keeping with the Constitution.

Canadians would have to ask themselves why the Government moved in an unconstitutional way. A judgment can only be made by the Canadian people. In addition to making judgments on elections or by-elections, judgments which are trivial in the larger scope, Canadians will react to a more progressive immigration policy. Would Canadians be confident in the Government's immigration policy? Would they want it to be progressive? Would their patience have run out? Would their frustration and anger not turn from the Government to the policy itself? I think there is a possibility that that may happen.

Many of my constituents are hoping that we finally come up with a system that works, but they do not want to see a policy that does not work two years down the road. What will we do then; call back Parliament again for another summer? Two summers in a row we have been here for emergencies. Every summer there is an emergency. If it is really an emergency, we should do it right.

There is an onus on the Government and on Members of Parliament to deal swiftly with abuse, to ensure that we target the real abusers. However, we should not pass into law the clauses for which I have concern and then allow those clauses to be subjected to the courts. The courts will say: "What kind of legislation is this? Why did you create a Charter of Rights in 1981 if you wanted to abuse it in 1987?"

It is very discouraging and disheartening that the Government has not listened, that it has not allowed the input of Members, churches, legal experts, civil libertarian groups and members of the Canadian Bar Associations who want to work with the Government to ensure that this is a good piece of legislation. Civil liberties groups do not have vested interests in putting down a policy for the sake of putting it down. They do not want to threaten or suggest that if a policy is not successful they will be heroes. These groups are interested in legislation which will work. Canadians have those interests as well, but they have not been listened to or heard.

Canada is a very privileged country. It is a great nation by all estimations. It is a tolerant and compassionate country. I do not think any Canadian would trade his or her place with anyone in any other country. Although the United States of America is our friend and ally and is more powerful and perhaps richer in certain respects, I do not think we would trade places with an American on any day of the week.

As my Leader has suggested quite articulately on many occasions, there is a price to be paid for being a Canadian, but it is a price worth paying. We do not mind paying that price for being a Canadian, enjoying the fruits of this country, and ensuring a certain type of life for our families and others who wish to come here.

I think we all aspire to make our country bigger and better. We should not rest on our laurels or those of former Governments which did noble things or enacted progressive legislation. We should always strive, whether in government or other spheres, to improve and to enjoy a lifestyle and reputation which is the envy of the world.

Canadians want to take our place in the international community in a forceful way. We believe that we have the dynamism, youth and vigour that goes with a youthful nation and the independence and ability to strive for an influential place in the world. We could be a moderating force on the international stage. Canada is not isolated from the world in a vacuum. When Canada speaks, we want other countries to have respect for our country, our Prime Minister and our institutions. That is the third characteristic of being a citizen of this country.

We have had that role with regard to the refugee policy which we are discussing. We have been a leader on the international stage. The people of Canada received the Nansen Medal. It was the first time that the Nansen Medal for assistance to refugees was awarded to a people rather than a person. That is international leadership and international respect. That is salesmanship of our country abroad.

We live in a global community. We interact, communicate and influence each other with every act and every word. The Nansen Medal speaks for our country. We are proud when we go abroad—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my hon. colleague and have for some time. I am always quite prepared to listen to my hon. friend at any time. However, to facilitate the business of the House, it was my understanding that there was an undertaking by the Hon. Member to speak for some time. Would he do us the courtesy of indicating whether he intends to wrap up his comments before six o'clock or to continue indefinitely? I ask this only to make life easier and more businesslike for his colleagues in the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think there should be negotiations in the House. Perhaps the Hon.

Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) will be concluding his remarks very soon. I would have to let him answer that.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to point out that witnesses have been waiting to be heard in committee for some time during this time. I want to thank the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) for adjusting his schedule in the House to go to the committee and spend time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, that is not a point of order. Under Standing Order 55(1) the Hon. Member has unlimited time. The Hon. Member has the floor. If there are to be negotiations, they should take place behind the curtains or in the lobby.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to reinforce what you said, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member has unlimited time under Standing Order 55(1). I do not see why Members would object to him taking advantage of his time. He has worth-while remarks to make. If Members want to learn something they may wish to be patient and listen to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have heard enough points of order. This is not a point of order but a point of debate. If there are to be negotiations with regard to the Hon. Member's time, they can take place among House Leaders behind the curtains. The Hon. Member has unlimited time under Standing Order 55(1). The Hon. Member for York West has the floor.

Mr. Marchi: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the House Leader of the NDP deserves an answer because that was an improper question. The Parliamentary Secretary is following the hypocritical tendencies of the Government which tries to deal with two Bills at the same time. He will pay the price and not Canadians. I had wanted to complete my remarks before six o'clock and I hope, notwithstanding the interventions of the NDP and the Parliamentary Secretary, that I will. If I do not, I do not.

I was speaking about the three characteristics of our citizenship and perhaps nationhood. The first one was with regard to the greatness of our country, the second was with regard to the desire to build it bigger and better and to improve it, and the third was with regard to our desire for a role of influence and respect in the international community. The fourth point is that we are a society which bases itself on orderly systems of procedure and the premise that our rules and laws should be respected.

I believe that while it is legitimate to cut out abuse and keep from our borders those who wish to smuggle in other human beings, that desire is not incompatible with the four characteristics which should clothe our citizenship. Helping refugees and attaining the other three characteristics does not detract from each other.

The only real solution to this problem is for the Government to get moving on a new refugee system which would recognize the transition of which I spoke earlier in my remarks. That is the only solution. We have had three years of inaction by the Government which has ignored the requests, pleas, suggestions, reports, commissions, studies, media, facts and figures. It is time that the Government made it a priority. That is what Canadians are demanding and that is what we, as the Opposition, are trying to ensure.

While we may lose every vote and every amendment, I do not think our arguments will be lost on the country. The debate we are trying to encourage throughout the country concerns the value of our amendments and our words.

While the Parliamentary Secretary and others on the government side may be smug in knowing that they have the numbers, the more important question concerns the attitude and the vision of this country. Canadians will not pay attention to whether Motion No. 4 lost or Motion No. 8 won; they will be looking at who speaks for them and for the type of country to which they want to belong. Is it the person who advocates making it illegal for a priest to help a refugee, or the person and the Party who supports that action as a noble one which has been part of our society for years? Will they support the Member who wants to turn away the boat without due process for the passengers, sending them back to probable death or persecution, or will their support go to the Member who would escort the boat back to port and allow the passengers to disembark so that we may know the stranger, look him in the eyes and make a determination while, at the same time, find the captain who dumped 174 people in the ocean at two in the morning and put him in prison if necessary? Which Member will Canadians listen to?

Is it the Member who suggests that immigration officers should play Rambo and break into church organizations without warrants, or the Member and Party that advocates that if there is reason to search and seize and there is a warrant, we should do so. If human life or safety is in danger, then it is not necessary to have a warrant. If it is not possible to get a typewritten warrant, then use the tele-warrant.

Which Member and Party will Canadians listen to? Is it the Party that advocates that all documents be confiscated on the airlines, putting us in a class not even equalled by the Soviet Union, or the Party that believes airlines should not confiscate all passports and documents? It is not right to remove the documents of a Canadian who returns from Florida after the winter. There must be another way.

Will Canadians listen to the Party that suggests people should be locked up for 28 days on a hunch, with no questions, or the Party that believes that if there is a substantial basis, proper documentation, and the adjudicator has numerous reasons for detainment, then there should be detainment?

The issue is not a question of Motion No. 4 versus Motion No. 8 and the fact that Liberals lost the amendments. It may warm the hearts of government Members that the Liberals presented 20 amendments and not one of them passed. Liberal Members may say they are depressed that they lost all 20 amendments. Neither reaction presents the real story. The real story is the vision of Canada that those amendments embodied. The real story is how legislation approved in this Chamber affects Canada, our people and our society.

Whether the legislation involves refugees, budgets, tax reforms, senior citizens or the Meech Lake Accord, the question is: how does it affect the lives of Canadians in our ridings and those wishing to come to our shores?

Is there not a responsibility for immigrants who are now Canadian citizens not to close the door after coming to Canada? Would I be responsible in suggesting that now that I am in Canada and enjoy the privileges of my society we should close the doors out of some fear?

We are not talking about abuse, because abuse should be eliminated in a very forceful way. However, under the laws and provisions of our Constitution, do those of us who are immigrants really want to close the doors behind us? Rather, as a privileged society in the world, should we not say that we cannot close the door? It was open when I came, there were regulations that I met, why cannot those same regulations apply to strangers wishing to come to our shore?

Is there not a price worth paying to be Canadian? Would you not rather live in a country that understood a refugee as a person who goes through disorder? There is a concept that the system would work better as a neat, tidy little package in which crystal-clear decisions can be made within two or three weeks. But what is the world of a refugee? It is one of disorder, disunity and cloudiness. They have no home or orientation. A refugee's world is one of fear and apprehension.

While we must have a system that curbs abuse and accepts legitimate refugees, we cannot believe that the system will be foolproof, tight, and inflexible. Perhaps that is a price we pay as Canadians.

Perhaps those of us who were born here and have the privilege and rights of citizenship in this country should imagine that we were born in another time or another place in the middle of a war or during strife. What would we do to come to this country?

Who are refugees? Do we make it a crime if someone does not have a document when he arrives? Should we not allow that person to explain why he or she fled without a document? Is it a crime for a priest to help a refugee who does not have a document? According to the Civil Liberties Association, someone who kills, rapes and steals in broad daylight has more rights than those afforded to a claimant under Bill C-84. Is that balanced and proper? Is that acceptable? I do not think it is.

The intention of the law should be to discourage those who wish to abuse the system and allow a fair processing for those who wish to enter and apply for refugee status.

I began my speech by quoting Gunther Plaut who suggested that we should not forget about these strangers because at one time we were all strangers. Perhaps that is the way I will close the remarks at third reading.

To be a Canadian means many things to many people. To be a new Canadian means to have been a stranger, to have come from the old to the new, to have left the familiar for the unfamiliar. Those of us, particularly we legislators, who deny the stranger also deny Canada and its future.

I would like simply to close my remarks with the hope that the Government will change its mind at the eleventh hour and modify some of the clauses in Bill C-84, or at the very least accept a sunset clause. If this legislation is an emergency, let us treat it as an emergency. Emergency by its very definition does not last forever. Emergencies are temporary. They are short term. Why should we have emergency legislation become permanent legislation? Why not have this emergency legislation specific and fixed, but when we deal with Bill C-55 and the real solution, Bill C-84 should become redundant, null and void. At the very least, I appeal to the definition of "emergency", temporary, short term and short lived. There is no reason we should have these legislative scars on the books of our laws. They should be stricken from the laws of a progressive Canadian society in 1987.

Perhaps the challenge is that we look at it in terms of the year 2000. What do we think now of the actions of a former Government which, in 1939, turned away the boat called the St. Louis carrying 900 Jews who were escaping the horrors which faced them in their countries? How does the Government's actions in 1939 stack up against this Government's actions in 1987? I think the first reaction must be to ask, why? Why would a government turn away a boatload of 900 Jews, most of whom never saw the light of day after they touched the shores from whence they came?

These 900 people could have made their homes in Canada. Some of them might have become Members of Parliament. Others could have been teachers, judges or scholars. They were denied that opportunity. We can make up for the actions of the Government in 1939 and live up to the expectations of those who will replace us here in the year 2000, so that they can be proud of the compassion demonstrated by the Government and the Parliament during the summer of 1987.

Let us not be the Government which is the architect of a piece of legislation about which in the year 2000 and beyond, the then Member for York West will rise and ask how the Government in 1987 ever passed Bill C-84? Let us find a better place for ourselves and for our country in the annals of history.

I simply want to conclude with the following comments of Rabbi Gunther Plaut to the committee:

> I think that Draconian and emergency legislation gives the wrong signal, not only to the world but it gives the wrong word to our own people in Canada.
> I think the Bill was drawn in undue haste. This is why I think we need just a little more leisure to write legislation that makes sense.

He then pleaded with the committee saying:

> I ask you to look carefully at some of the amendments suggested. Do not follow the worst instincts of people, follow the best instincts.

If we follow the best instincts of Canadians, their aspirations, feelings and their desire for our nation, we will not go wrong and the world will not get the wrong message. If we follow the worst instincts, we will pay a bigger price and that price will bring us shame.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion among the Parties. I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That on Thursday, September 3, 1987, the hours of sitting and business of the House shall be as set out in Standing Orders in relation to a Friday sitting day;
> And that when the House adjourns Thursday, September 3, 1987, it shall stand adjourned until two o'clock p.m. Wednesday, September 9, 1987.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the motion of the Hon. Minister of State. Is it so agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to the special order just adopted.

The House adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, September 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard that Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I regret the duty of speaking out against this very bad Bill. However, I am proud to speak up for refugees and for the many thousands of Canadians who have been supporting refugees and have indicated that they will continue to support refugees regardless of whether, as it appears, the Government has changed its policy.

I want to talk about the objectives of the Bill, with which I happen to agree. The objectives as outlined in Clause 1 are:

> (a) to preserve for persons in genuine need of protection access to the procedures for determining refugee claims;
> (b) to control widespread abuse of the procedures for determining refugee claims, particularly in light of organized incidents involving large-scale introduction of persons into Canada to take advantage of those procedures;
> (c) to deter the smuggling of persons into Canada and thereby minimize the exploitation of and risks to persons seeking to come to Canada; and
> (d) to respond to security concerns, including the fulfillment of Canada's obligations in respect of internationally protected persons.

Not only do I agree with those objectives, more important, they are in agreement, in conformity and in harmony with Canada's international undertakings to the United Nations, to the 1951 Convention relating to the status of refugees and the 1967 enlargement of that, which Canada helped to draft.

Let me refer to two sections of the convention for those who have not had the opportunity to study and become familiar with it. There is a general definition of a refugee as a person who, "owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country". In other words, that is an asylum seeker.

In later articles, Canada undertakes with about 100 other countries several obligations. The most important of them is in Article 33, prohibition of expulsion or return, which internationally is called refoulement. It states that "no contracting state shall expel or return (refouler) a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion". In other words, Canada has solemnly contracted not to return a refugee in any manner whatsoever. That means even indirectly, even by sending him to another country that will then send him back to the country where he was persecuted.

Canada, like many other countries, has developed a system for examining people who come to our borders claiming to be refugees to see whether, in fact, they are real refugees. Our obligation is not to return a real refugee. Therefore we cannot exercise that obligation, or we cannot keep that pledge unless we find out whether the person arriving at one of our airports, an American border-crossing point, a sea port or on our shore is a real refugee or not. We must not send him back directly or indirectly to the country where he claims he would be persecuted unless we have found out to our satisfaction and according to our laws that he is not a refugee. That is what is at issue in the Bill. Unfortunately, those good objectives which I read are not carried out in the rest of the clauses of the Bill.

With respect to preserving access, what the Bill does is limit access. With respect to controlling abuse, the Bill falls far short, even after the Government accepted some amendments originally proposed by members of the Opposition. Deterring smugglers was mentioned in the Minister's press statement of last month. He made much of smugglers. Smugglers are mentioned in the objectives yet they are nowhere mentioned in the Bill. There is no adequate provision action to be taken against them. With respect to security, yes, there is action. However, it is not the security of those international persons called refugees who we are obligated to protect but, rather, some other unnamed persons, as well as the security of Canada. Given the evidence, and the lack of evidence, about the dangers, I would say that the Government's provisions greatly over-react on that point.

How does this Bill limit the access of people to our refugee determination system? It does so mainly by threatening detention and deportation on suspicion of terrorism. We have been through a clause-by-clause study of the Bill. Therefore, what I will say in general is that there is provision for an enlarged use of the Minister's permit and for a different type of permit use.

Instead of the matter being referred to the security review committee, it is to be referred to the Federal Court, which is not experienced in handling decisions on security matters. Its expertise lies in finding out whether or not a correct procedure has been followed as opposed to examining the contents of a procedure. Therefore refugee claimants may be held, as is stated in the Bill, on suspicion, if the Minister certifies that he has reason to suspect them of being security risks.

They may be detained. They may be deported. They may be denied the opportunity to make a refugee claim, contrary to our obligations under the provisions of the United Nations Convention which states that no matter what, every person must have his refugee claim examined, even if we decide we are not going to let him stay for whatever reason, perhaps for security reasons. If we are going to send him away, then we must send him away in the knowledge that he is a refugee, if that is what has been decided by refugee determination, and we must notify the United Nations. The Government has refused to accept our amendments which would have implemented that part of the Convention which we signed.

Thus it is clear that the Government wants to send out the message, "Refugees not wanted in Canada". The message is that refugees are not wanted unless our overseas officers have selected them and they are economically and politically considered advantageous to Canada as immigrants. Otherwise, refugees are not wanted. The message is, "Do not come to our shores if you are in trouble, we intend to shut the door". That is the message being given to refugees, in violation of the first objective of the Bill.

As a matter of controlling abuse, the Bill could have used the expertise of the Justice Department and the Immigration Department to devise a clause which would punish people who plan to help bogus refugee claimants or bogus immigrants to evade or deceive our immigration authorities. We have had a great deal of trouble in that regard. In fact, the law now provides for that.

The Government has said that there needs to be bigger penalties. It could have simply imposed bigger penalties and allowed for different grades of penalties, depending on whether or not an offence is trivial or major. The Government did not do that.

There is already in the Act, Section 95(a), a provision that every person who comes into Canada at any place other than a port of entry and who fails to report to an immigration officer for examination as required is guilty of an offence and liable to punishment. The Act, Section 95(e), also states that every person who knowingly induces, aids or abets or attempts to induce, aid or abet any person to contravene any provision of the Act or the regulations is guilty of an offence.

What the Government undertook to do instead was to introduce the proposed Section 95.1 which does something quite different. What the Government undertakes to do is attack people who directly, honestly and openly bring a refugee claimant or advise a refugee claimant of the truth of the Canadian laws, to come to a border point and to offer himself as a refugee claimant to our immigration authorities. That is the right way to do it, as the Minister has said in the House. But that is not what the Bill states. It states:

> Every person who knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or attempts to organize, aid or abet the coming into Canada of a person who is not in possession of a valid and subsisting visa, passport or travel document where one is required by this Act or the regulations is guilty of an offence—

In other words, what this is saying is that if a person is on the run from the death squads in El Salvador and knows from the experience of his friends that he is not safe in the United States because that country sends back all but 2 per cent or 3 per cent of refugee claimants to El Salvador, where some of these people have been killed, and if that person decides to ask for safety in Canada and any Canadian helps him, then he is liable to two years in jail or a $5,000 fine. That is what the Bill states. The Minister promised he would never do that. Yet we do not know who will be the Minister of Immigration tomorrow. The Minister of Immigration often does not know what his officials are doing until it is too late to do anything about it. Therefore we should not write a law that the Minister says he does not intend to enforce most of the time. Thus the Bill does not do a good job of controlling abuse.

As I have said, it does a smashing job on security. But I think it over-reacts since the RCMP told us that there is no evidence that any of the undocumented people who came in over the past year, about 6,000 of them, were security risks. As the RCMP agreed, security risks do not come in as refugees and ask for their documents to be examined. They come in as expensive visitors with expensive forged documents. Those people are whisked right through, as any expensive visitor happens to be, unless there is some information against him.

Members of the public came to oppose the Bill. They came on as little as one-half a day's notice. There were members of churches, civil liberty associations, the Jewish Congress, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, the Coalition for a Just Refugee and Immigration Policy, Rabbi Plaut, who is at this moment in the next building speaking against Bill C-55 and who spoke against this Bill as well, la Coalition de Montréal pour les réfugiés, and the Canadian Bar Association which asked for amendments.

The Canadian Bar Association asked that the Bill be withdrawn and rewritten, but at the very least that it be amended. The two members of the Opposition who sat on the committee moved quite a number of amendments and then moved still other amendments at report stage earlier this week. I will mention just one of the amendments which I moved. It concerns proposed Section 95.1, of which I have spoken. The amendment that I asked for was turned down.

My amendment suggested that the clause be rewritten to say that everyone commits an offence "who knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or attempts to organize, induce, aid or abet a person to make a manifestly unfounded or fraudulent refugee claim". That is the situation we are talking about where 3,600 people came from one country and falsely claimed to be refugees, because we know that Jehovah's Witnesses are not persecuted in that country. Those 3,600 people made fraudulent claims, and they were organized to do so. That is what we are talking about, and as it stands that is what this Bill did not address.

I requested an amendment that would make it an offence to assist people to make a manifestly unfounded or fraudulent refugee claim with these larger penalties, and the Government would not rewrite proposed Section 95.1 in that way. The Government added it in as an extra offence. But not in the manner in which it would clarify the law, as suggested by the Hon. Member for Nanaimo—Alberni (Mr. Schellenberg) in his speech on second reading, as between honest people who are helping refugees and shysters. I quote the actual words of the Hon. Member for Nanaimo—Alberni on page 8017 of Hansard. He stated:

> We should ensure that those who traffic in illegal refugees for profit are separated from those who deal with refugees out of conscience. I believe that is one of the first amendments we should bring through.

The Hon. Member earlier stated that he "hoped to have the opportunity to sit on the legislative committee, and that this would be one of the first amendments we could make". For whatever reason, the Hon. Member was not put on the legislative committee on that Bill. However, he is on the legislative committee on Bill C-55. But in dealing with the amendments on that Bill, his colleagues did not listen to him.

There is another clause which also limits the country's response to our obligation to refugees. In Clause 8 the Minister is given the power to turn ships away. After we raised the point, as did many others, the Government did make an amendment which somewhat blunts the bad effect of that clause.

It now states that the Minister will have due regard, not only for the safety of the ship and the passengers but for the Convention, and it defines the Convention as the one from which I have read. If that clause is implemented, we will see how it stands up in court, and whether the phrase "having due regard" is a strong enough commitment to not turn away refugee claimants until it is determined whether or not they are refugees, and then not sending them back to the country from which they have fled.

Today we have news of the brief from Renaud Paquet, the National President of the Canada Employment and Immigration Union, to the committee studying Bill C-55 in which he states, among other things, that the members do not believe it is right to ask the immigration employees to do the things that would be required of them under Clause 8; for example, to board the ships, cause them to turn around, and search and seizure.

There is a labour problem with implementing it, which would have been averted if the Government had accepted our amendment to not turn the ship away and let the captain do what he wants with those people that he was paid to transport to Canada. In the south seas that has resulted in thousands of drownings. The ship should not be turned away, it should be escorted into port. The captain should be charged with whatever offences are outlined here or in other law, and a determination made as to whether the passengers are refugee claimants and, if so, if they are real refugees. That would ensure the safety of human lives, and it would be a big deterrent.

We received no response on the most important requests for amendment, therefore, we must ask what the Government is trying to do? The Canadian Ethnocultural Council gave us a clue in the brief that they presented to committee a couple of weeks ago, and a letter sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) on August 10, 1987, in which they state:

> We are deeply concerned that the result of the information campaign of the Minister and Department of Employment and Immigration has had ruinous effects well beyond C-55.

This was prior to the announcement of Bill C-84. They further state:

> Many critics have suggested that the purpose of the campaign was to silence criticism of, and gain support for C-55. If that is the case, the Government may well win the short term battle, but in the process will have done monumental damage to the harmonious race and ethnic relations in Canada.

They further state:

> Unlike the hospitable reception by the residents of Charlesville, Nova Scotia, the treatment and internment of the claimants has been mean.

They then list some of the actions that form a pattern. I will not read them all. They point out that reporters were warned not to take pictures in Charlesville. That, Mr. Speaker, is an innovation in Canadian law. They further point out that the arrivals were disallowed contact with the media or community people. They were not informed of their legal rights to see a lawyer. Access was only allowed after Toronto lawyer, Mendel Green, began proceedings for a court injunction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Redway): I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member, but perhaps he could bring his remarks to a conclusion as his time has expired.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I would ask for unanimous consent for a further five minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Redway): Is it the consent of the House to allow the Hon. Member five minutes longer?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Redway): It is agreed by unanimous consent to allow the Hon. Member five more minutes.

Mr. Heap: This list should be listened to. It is from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council. They also point out that when processing of the claimants began, the first and most controversial case, Mr. Amrik Dhinsa, a person earlier deported, was brought forward and made public. This smacked of the most blatant attempt at creating negative reaction.

When processing of claims began media were disallowed, in a further attempt to control information, and again court proceedings became necessary to gain access. A confidential report of the Task Force on Security and Enforcement of the Department, suggesting problems in recruiting clearance of immigrants for security, was leaked to several papers.

Information of another Sikh in a totally different case, dating back several months, which was received confidentially, was leaked by unidentified sources to The Globe and Mail. Other false information on the 174 claimants was leaked to Maclean's Magazine to the effect that 33 claimants had criminal records. The information has subsequently been proved to be false.

Throughout the time the 174 individuals were not called refugee claimants, but rather illegal aliens, illegal immigrants, migrants, Asians, Sikhs, and East Indians.

At the end of July, rumours persisted that another refugee carrying ship was coming to Canada and the Canadian navy, air force, and coast guard were dispatched, giving the image of an apprehended invasion. Hysteria was climaxed.

The Ethnocultural Council has made its point very well, that there was a campaign by the Government to misrepresent what was going on by wild exaggeration. The effect of that was to produce public hysteria which would force passage of this Bill.

One unfortunate effect of the Bill when it is put into law will be what was noted in yesterday's Globe and Mail and Citizen, that now our immigration officers in Europe are jammed with people who are seeking papers—people whose papers are considered false—airlines seeking information about possibly false visas, or officials who complain that they cannot do their regular work because of all the paper work they are asked to do now that Canada is busy shutting out every refugee claimant who does not have a visa to Canada.

The Bill will not only fail in its stated purposes, but it will help to further disrupt the immigration service of Canada. It is very unfortunate that the Government has taken such a hard-nosed line on it. I hope that Parliament will have the Government reconsider.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), for his comments. I would like to ask him a question about the process of developing law which will be applied selectively.

The Minister has said that he will not be prosecuting churches or other agencies which are involved in helping genuine refugees, that the intent of the law is to focus on people who are engaged in wrongful activities, in bringing refugee claimants into Canada under false pretences. However, the law still targets church workers and workers with refugee aid societies. The Minister may say that they will not be prosecuted, but the law is still there.

Could my colleague expand on the concept of developing law which has blanket coverage but, according to the Minister, will be applied very selectively? What are the implications of that for the rule of law in a country like Canada?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, it was pointed out by some officials that the decision to prosecute under certain laws is left to a senior official, such as an attorney general or a Minister, in order to avoid cases of mistake. That usually happens in very sensitive or politically related offences which are very difficult to define.

With regard to the immigration matter, the Minister seems to be terrified by the thought of a loophole. We now have loopholes through which elephants could march, but the Minister seems to be terrified of the slightest loophole, period.

The Minister and the Conservative Members of the committee would not make any attempt to make enquiries from legal experts in order to define in law the people who organized the Portugal scam, the Turkey scam, the Brazil scam, the Sikh scam, and whatever other scams of which the Department has been aware. They would make no attempt to define those they wish to prosecute. Instead, they defined a whole class of people comprised of thousands and thousands of Canadians and said that the Minister, in the privacy of his office, will decide which few of those he will prosecute.

Everyone who spoke to the committee, including the Civil Liberties Union and a professor of constitutional law from the University of Toronto, said that it was upside down to write a law to catch thousands when you only want to catch half a dozen. It is a bad precedent for Canadian law that a person cannot read the law to find out what is legal or illegal but will have to guess what the Minister would do in a particular case. That is not the rule of law in a democracy.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we were graced until a few minutes ago with the presence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard), who finally decided that it was time to show up and defend his Bill. I see that he is now hiding behind the curtains; I am glad that he can hear me. He came into the House yesterday and delivered a 10-minute speech from a well prepared text. He then disappeared again without taking the trouble to defend his own legislation. The Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) who usually sits behind him is afraid to get up and say one word about this piece of legislation. I have never seen, in the history of Parliament, such cowardly behaviour by any Minister. This has never happened before. The Minister came into the House for 10 minutes yesterday and informed us of a number of interesting things.

Mr. Bouchard: We know what you are.

Mr. Caccia: He told us yesterday that Canada's refugee determination system is under siege. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to cast your memory back to the summer of 1986 when a boatload of people arrived in Newfoundland. The Minister has the nerve to come into the House 13 months later, one year and one month later, and tell us that the system is under siege and this legislation is urgently needed. Where was the Minister during the year and one month since the first boatload arrived?

Mr. Boudria: It is a slow siege.

Mr. Caccia: What nerve he has, to come into the House and make the kind of speeches which he made on second and third reading. He told us that the system is under siege. If that is the case, why did he not act before? He had plenty of time to come forward with a thoughtful piece of legislation which would have the support of all Canadians, rather than being criticized as it has been.

In order to illustrate that criticism and the reputation which this legislation is gaining in our learned community, even before proclaimed, I will quote from Professors Angus and Hathaway in the Globe and Mail of August 25. They say:

> The problem with Bill C-84 is that it effectively guts this most basic international obligation by allowing the minister, acting alone, to decide that a ship should be forced back to sea without giving those on board a chance to show why they deserve protection.

What do you say to that, Mr. Speaker? Yesterday the Minister said:

> —Subclause 103.01 of the Bill empowers the Minister either to order a ship captain to sail into port or to send him back.

Why does the Minister not make a clear-cut decision? Why turn the ship around? Why not allow it to be taken in so that the captain can be fined and those who are benefiting from this trade can be brought to court rather than creating an ambiguous situation? If the Minister and the Government are serious about preventing the arrival of people who are not legitimate refugees, why not go to the root of the problem, bring the ship to port, and prosecute the captain and the owner of the boat? This ambiguous position leaves everyone wondering what the Minister really intends to do.

Professors Angus and Hathaway make the following observation about the Bill. They say:

> This Bill C-84, however, would make it impossible to sort out the real refugees from the bogus ones, and thus would put Canada in breach of international law.

What do you say to that, Mr. Speaker?

There are many observations in this article which I must skip over, but I will bring to your attention another one which struck me as being important, coming from learned legal people who certainly cannot be accused of having legal preferences. They say:

> —the law may make illegal the work of church and other humanitarian agencies that assist undocumented refugees to apply for status under Canadian law.

Why would we make illegal the work of organizations and individuals who are engaged in humanitarian work?

• (1040)

Professors Angus and Hathaway conclude here that the Canadian Government "has engaged in a form of legislative overkill". In all fairness, the Minister dealt with this matter yesterday. He rejected the notion that people will be prosecuted, that is, the prosecution of churches and humanitarian groups. You can find that on page 8708 of Hansard, Mr. Speaker.

But these are new sections in the Act. They were marked as new in the Bill itself by the department. The Minister cannot get away by saying, "Actually this is not a new measure, it always existed". If they existed, they cannot be new. If they are new, they are there for a purpose, to be invoked, and you as a lawyer, I suppose, appreciate that, Mr. Speaker.

If the Government does not intend to use these clauses, people cannot just rely on a promise, on the verbal reassurance given in committee, "Don't worry, it will not apply to the humanitarian engaged refugee organizations". You know very well that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is here today, but tomorrow it will be someone else who will have a different outlook and who will not be bound by the words of the present Minister.

What kind of business is this on the part of the Government, legislating one way and giving promises in the opposite direction, saying "The law is there, but do not take it seriously because we do not mean it for you." Is that your concept of law, Mr. Speaker? Are you then surprised why we are upset about this measure, why we have such a low respect for the Minister, who is not even here to defend the law on this matter, who is telling us that what is new is not new?

There must be some competence here and some way of sticking to what one really means. If the Minister does not mean what is in the proposed legislation, why not accede and accept the motions that emerged here at report stage and delete the clauses that are so offensive?

The two professors, Angus and Hathaway, went on in their analysis to conclude that:

> —Bill C-84 is a misguided and uninformed response to the legitimate concerns of Canadians . . . Yes, abuse should be deterred, but this can be done without violating international law, without infringing the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and without making a mockery of Canada's strong commitment to human rights.

This is heavy stuff appearing in a newspaper that is known across the nation. It puts into jeopardy and casts a shadow of doubt on the validity of this Bill. Will it be challenged on constitutional grounds?

At the conference of the Canadian Bar Association last week some of your colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I am told, were talking about the necessity of sending Bill C-84 to the Supreme Court of Canada for a constitutional reference to establish whether the Bill will work. Perhaps this Bill will be in the courts for a long time, thus making void this whole effort of allegedly protecting Canada from boatloads of refugees. What kind of reputation does the Government want to have with this kind of behaviour?

I am profoundly surprised, puzzled and upset, because yesterday the Minister in his speech did not clarify his points at all. He actually gave a set 10 minute speech in which he attempted to reply to days and days of submissions in committee and to days and days of debate here, and he then disappeared behind the curtains.

The Canadian Bar Association suggested that instead of the preamble we have now, it should be amended to read that the Bill is intended to ensure that genuine refugees are protected from removal to a country where their lives and freedom may be threatened. What did the Minister say to that? He ignored it. He did not say a word about it.

The Inter-Church Committee for Refugees came forward and said, determine the refugee status first and then decide the security issues, as it is done at the present time. First establish whether or not a person is a bona fide refugee. I think the vast majority of Canadians would find that sensible, desirable and a much quicker way of doing things. Then decide about security. But what did the Minister say about that? He said nothing. He just gave a short 10 minute speech.

We have already dealt with arresting a boat and escorting it to port to permit prosecution. Again, there is an ambivalent statement by the Minister in yesterday's speech which seems to come halfway at least in that direction. What upset us very much was that the Minister would not draw a distinction between racketeers and humanitarian groups. The Canadian Ethnocultural Council made that point, as did other organizations. Yet that input was ignored by a Government which made it a point in the 1984 election to proclaim that it would listen, consult and govern as a result of consultation and listening.

Here we are not talking of dangerous, radical organizations or extremist movements. We are talking of well established respected groups of Canadians, such as the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, even that august body of radicals to which you belong, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Bar Association, not dangerous, subversive types.

They came forward, but not one of their amendments or suggestions has found its way into Bill C-84 in its final form. What a sham. What a disappointment. What a poor performance, particularly when, as I mentioned to you a moment ago, there is a high degree of danger that this piece of legislation once proclaimed will be challenged in the courts and then the whole process will come to a grinding halt. How would you like to see that happen to you if you were the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mr. Speaker? You would not, I am sure, and no one else would, because it would make this bunch of Ministers look like fools for having insisted on proceeding with measures shaky in substance alone.

This is why your colleague, the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais), on August 13 when we were debating Bill C-84, raised a signal of warning. He had the courage to do it. As you know, he is the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Employment and Immigration. He made three very important points which must be repeated. He said some major changes must be made. It took a lot of courage for him to say that, being a backbencher in the Party in Government. He said:

> The changes in the refugee determination process which are proposed in this Bill are such that it would be practically impossible for a great number of legitimate refugees to apply for refugee status.

How do you like that, Mr. Speaker. That did not come from a Member of our Party or of the NDP, but from a Tory backbencher who is the chairman of one of our standing committees. The Member for La Prairie went on to say:

> There are, I am sure, other rational and appropriate solutions to this problem, solutions that would not have us break an international agreement on refugees and that could not be challenged in court on the basis of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That was the Hon. Member for La Prairie speaking in the House of Commons on August 13.

He made another observation which I thought was not only dead-on but very sensible. He said:

> The best way to put the smugglers out of business is to dry up the demand for their services. The best way to stop the queue-jumping is to shorten the queue. In short, if we want more orderly borders, we need more liberal borders.

I am sure he meant liberal, of course, in the small l sense. He has made good, sensible points. Evidently, they were not taken into account and that is very distressing.

The fact is that one year and one month after the ship landed in Newfoundland we are debating a measure which is called an emergency measure. We have been told that the refugee determination system is under siege. The Government had plenty of time to prepare something in a thoughtful manner in consultation with all those involved in the refugee movement. It had the time to produce something that would get the full support of the House, rather than produce panic legislation. It is panic legislation and that is what makes it so objectionable.

The legislation caters to fear. It caters to the lowest instincts in society. It is not funded on the advice of those who were in this business long before this Minister was appointed and who will be there long after the Minister, who has finally come to the House to hear the music, is gone. This kind of stuff will still be on the books, unless it is stopped in the higher courts.

It is legislation by pretending not to legislate. Earlier I gave the example of proposed Section 91(1). The Minister said that the Section is not new, yet it is new. Then he said that it is there, but he will not use it. He will not prosecute those who are engaged in refugee work. He will not make criminals of Canadians who have been active in that kind of work for years and years, as have the churches. That is legislation by pretending not to legislate.

It is legislation that is blind to international organizations. That is a matter that the Minister did not have the guts to touch upon even once yesterday. Not once in his 10-minute speech did he deal with Canada's international obligations. That kind of weakling is the kind of guy who does not even have the guts to come to the House to defend his own legislation.

Mr. Bouchard: You are as bad as you were when you were a Minister. You are not interesting.

Mr. Caccia: He can raise his voice and make empty noises because he is a bully, but he will not be a bully for long.

Mr. Bouchard: I was here for Heap because he's interesting, you're not.

Mr. Caccia: We put forward amendments saying that even though it is bad legislation and we don't like it, we will try it for six months and give it a sunset clause. I felt very uncomfortable with that because the sun will not set on this legislation. However, the sun will set on that Minister and the Government. It will take care of reactionary, backward measures like this.

I shall continue now with my intervention, after the interruption of the Minister. This is legislation by loopholes. It closes the loopholes surrounding those who arrive here on boats but, as my colleague, the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi), so eloquently put it yesterday afternoon, it allows for the same old process for those who arrive here by air or by land. If your brother, Mr. Speaker, is a refugee who arrives by boat, the boat on which he is travelling is likely to be turned around. However, if you are a potential refugee, Mr. Speaker, and you arrive by air, then you will not be treated the same way as your brother who came here by sea. How do you like that for equality of treatment?

It is also legislation by absenteeism, not on the part of one but on the part of two Ministers who chose to stay away when it got too hot in the kitchen. The poor Parliamentary Secretary was left here to steer this matter through in a rather compassionate and competent way. Perhaps the Government was served better by not having these two strange Ministers in the House to defend it.

In the end, it is legislation by cosmetics. It is smoke-and-mirror legislation which does not go to the root of the problem. It damages Canada's world reputation. It has said no to the thoughtful input of a number of organizations which appeared before the committee, the very same constituency that this Government said it would listen to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Redway): I regret that the Hon. Member's time is up. There is time for questions and comments.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments of the Hon. Member. I think we can agree that there has been a consensus across Canada that there have been abuses in the refugee system. This consensus across Canada calls for changes to correct those abuses. The consensus is based on public opinion and on the advice and concern of churches and organizations that are specifically involved in helping refugees.

Certainly Members of all three Parties in the House want to see the abuses of the refugee system corrected. There is no question that that consensus exists in Canada and in this House. Yet the Government chose not to proceed in a moderate, intelligent, deliberate manner to correct the abuses. Instead, it brought in such poorly drafted legislation that there is great concern among church groups and refugee-aid groups. It has certainly aroused the opposition of the two opposition Parties as well as a significant number of members of the Conservative Party, although only one or two have had the courage to speak out.

Given the fact that there is this consensus, why has the Government not proceeded in a more deliberate, rational, intelligent manner to correct the abuse? Why has it brought in such poorly drafted, Draconian legislation?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I wish I had the answer to that question. Usually a Minister who proposes a Bill answers that question, not only out of courtesy but out of a desire to explain why the legislation, no matter what it is, appears before the House. Usually the Minister defends it at report stage and third reading, and extensively so, and submits himself or herself to questions of this kind. It is regrettable and more than just unfortunate that this Minister would not do that.

Evidently, as the Hon. Member just said, there is a consensus across Canada for changes and improvements. The Government has chosen not to proceed in a competent and thoughtful manner. I hope that in the course of debate later today, Members on the government side will come forward with answers to the very thoughtful question put by the Hon. Member, because I am not in a position to give a full and comprehensive answer to it.

Mr. Speaker: We are just about at the stage of beginning Statements by Members, but I have a short announcement to make. I wish to alert Hon. Members of the House to the fact that no notice of Private Members' Business has been published for today. I have received a letter from the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) indicating that she is unable to proceed with her Motion M-61. Since it was impossible to arrange an exchange, the House will continue with the business before it prior to private Member's hour pursuant to Standing Order 39(3)(b). I am instructing the Table to drop this item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 19(4)—

SOCIAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT PERFORMANCE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, September 4 will, unfortunately for the Canadian population, mark the third anniversary of this Conservative Government. During these three years, the most neglected group in Canada has been low and middle income Canadians, including senior citizens and families.

Everyone recalls the de-indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit; everyone recalls the lowering of the limit set for being eligible to the full amount of the child tax credit; everyone recalls the one billion dollar cut-backs in these two programs; and everyone recalls the refusal of the Conservative Government to develop an effective child care program.

Moreover, senior citizens remember the de-indexation of Old Age Security Pensions, the refusal of this Government to provide the spouse allowance to single, separated or divorced claimants, the discrimination against older workers who are not entitled to full unemployment insurance benefits, and the five million dollar cut-backs under the New Horizons Program. The only thing that has been done for those people has been to give them a Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I shall close with these words, and I trust that the Conservative Members will wake up, otherwise they will all be defeated at the next election for not defending the interests of families and senior citizens.

SENIOR CITIZENS

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER WELCOMED

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, Thursday's appointment of a Minister of State for Seniors is a clear signal of the Government's commitment to a very important segment of society, our seniors. The newly appointed Minister, himself a senior, a veteran, a distinguished parliamentarian and, above all, a great Canadian, brings to this position a wealth of successful experience in areas such as housing and health care for veterans. His exemplary work is endorsed by all parliamentarians, indeed by all Canadians.

Seniors applaud this Government for continuing to recognize their concerns and needs. The Minister has started meeting with seniors and their organizations, including the National Advisory Council on Aging. I know he feels very strongly that his new Ministry should be shaped by the citizens concerned, the seniors of Canada. I look forward to working closely with him as he begins yet another challenge in his distinguished career of serving Canadians. I know all Canadians will benefit.

STOPPING OF SHIPS AT SEA—UNION'S OPPOSITION

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Government is almost finished with a Bill which will include the interdicting of ships at sea when the Minister thinks there are bogus refugees on board. I am sure the Minister has seen the brief from the Canada Employment and Immigration employees' union which says in part:

> On the second aspect, that of the interdicting of ships, we would oppose these provisions because of the commitment we have to the clients we serve.
> We do not believe that ships should be turned away from Canada without allowing passengers to make a claim to refugee status—if that is their desire. False claimants can be quickly removed.
> Ships can be seized, ships crews and captains can be fined and/or imprisoned. By turning away ships, Canada would run the risk of rejecting refugees, and the men and women who work on the front line would have to bear the public anger, which would no doubt ensue.
> We want to work in a system which is open and fair. We want to enforce Canada's immigration laws in a just and equitable manner. We believe that this can be met easily without the interdicting of ships. In any event, the number of such claimants coming by ship is such a small percentage of the overall "refugee" movement that this provision will not significantly alter the work-load and will only serve to exacerbate the tensions surrounding this Bill.

I hope the Government will listen to its employees on the front line.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

NEED FOR REVISION

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister is aware, the Bankruptcy Act was passed in 1949 and is hopelessly outdated.

In my constituency of London East I have a constituent who recently paid $1,000 on account at a furniture store, leaving a balance of $90 which he said he would pay upon picking up the furniture in two weeks. Upon returning to pick up the furniture and pay the final $90 he found the store closed and the bailiff's lock on the door, the store having declared bankruptcy. It is incidents like this, and many others, which clearly tell us that the bankruptcy laws must be changed to protect innocent victims so they are not taken advantage of by unscrupulous businessmen.

As well, I encourage the Minister to take measures in the new legislation to protect Canadian suppliers and wage-earners. I commend the Minister for reviewing this outdated legislation and urge him to move as quickly as possible in bringing the new legislation to the House.

TRIBUTE TO ROLE PLAYED BY LABOUR

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, labour in Canada has fought a long and tenacious battle to attain today's work standards. In that battle the working men and women stuck together through thick and thin, often in the face of insurmountable odds, to gain a better life for themselves and their families. In doing so there was often suffering, both mental and physical, deaths, hunger and breakdowns, and at the time many a good man or woman would have been unable to stand these pressures without the support of other workers. It is for those reasons that labour has grown so strong and united over the years.

To appreciate the role that labour plays in the running of our nation, try to imagine a Canada without coal produced by coal miners, steel manufactured by steelworkers, fish caught by fishermen and processed by fish plant workers, food grown by farmers, and taxis driven by taxi drivers. The list goes on. With this thought in mind one can easily appreciate the havoc, mass confusion and total breakdown which would occur if our labour force suddenly disappeared or stopped working. Therefore, let us pay tribute to the contributions of the labour movement both in the past and to come in the future, and focus our appreciation of labour on Labour Day next week.

THE LATE GERARD LAHAIE

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I rise to salute all those individuals who make us proud to be Canadian. There are many, from national heroes such as Rick Hansen, Terry Fox and Norman Bethune, to our honoured veterans, and those who so bravely fought and died for us, and as well, the many local citizens, those often unsung heroes, who give so much of themselves every day.

One such individual who deserves our special attention is Mr. Gerard Lahaie who this summer was tragically killed on the west island of Montreal when he stopped to help a stranger, a woman, repair a flat tire at the side of the highway. Gerard, said one of his co-workers, died the way he lived, helping someone else. He would have chosen no other way.

I know all Hon. Members, who are often so busy and hurried that they have little time for personal thought and reflection, will join me in saluting Mr. Lahaie and all the other great Canadians of their neighbourhoods. We appreciate their efforts and are proud of what they have done for their community and their country. To Gerard Lahaie and all local heroes, thank you.

FORESTRY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—USE OF SOFTWOOD LUMBER TAX REVENUE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Government of British Columbia will receive revenues in excess of $200 million this year from the recently imposed export tax on softwood lumber destined for the United States. It was intended that these new tax revenues would be used to maintain and nurture the forest resource. Yet in B.C. the funds continue to disappear into general revenue while the expenditure for forest management continues to be woefully inadequate.

Provisions for basic silviculture are still below the level required to regenerate all currently logged areas within a reasonable time. Insufficient restocking of newly logged areas is increasing by tens of thousands of hectares per year. Intensive forest management programs, including thinning and spacing, have proceeded by and large under federal government job-creation schemes. In the Kamloops forest district they have accomplished less than 15 per cent of what should be done, leaving a shortfall of more than 8,000 hectares per year. As well, tens of thousands of hectares of forest land are falling before the onslaught of pest infestation.

If we were managing and husbanding our forests as we should, not only would our forest reserves be expanded significantly, but tens of thousands of jobless people would be put to work. I urge the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines (Mr. Merrithew) to meet with his B.C. counterpart to ensure the $200 million is invested in a forest resource and therefore enable tens of thousands of unemployed to find long-term or permanent jobs.

SHIPBUILDING

PORT WELLER DRY DOCKS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, St. Catharines has been the gateway to the Welland Canal and the Upper Great Lakes from the early 1820s.

Shipbuilding has been part of our heritage for over 150 years with the Port Weller Dry Docks continuing that long tradition.

Rationalization of shipbuilding on the Great Lakes has already taken place to the extent that Port Weller Dry Docks is the only Canadian Great Lakes shipbuilding yard left.

The union at that yard telexed that its workforce is reduced to a skeleton force of 62, the lowest level in 20 years.

While Canada's coastal maritime history is long and rich, let us not forget this great waterway to the heart of the continent and the skilled workers waiting there for work at this last remaining yard on the entire Canadian Great Lakes.

I encourage the Government to recognize the importance of maintaining an inland shipyard. Award a contract now to Port Weller and keep some 300 experienced yard workers off the unemployment rolls.

HIRING OF REPLACEMENT WORKERS DURING LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): I want to read a letter addressed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) concerning the Post Office:

> As a taxpayer I must protest the way in which the Conservative government is handling the recent disputes at Canada Post. I am also dismayed to see the government allow Canada Post to privatize mail services.
> The government knows that violence will occur if Canada Post uses replacement workers, but the government is allowing it to happen. I believe these replacement workers have the right to work, but the Government should provide them with full-time employment instead of using them as pawns in labour disputes.
> Service has already decreased because of the privatization of mail services. To pick up a parcel or register I now have to stand in a long line-up—

The Government already created a strike in the Post Office last month. It is doing everything in its power to have another strike by the end of this month. That is the record of three years of Progressive Conservative government.

LUXEMBOURG—PROSPERITY RESULT OF FREE TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, the fast-track approach to a free trade agreement with the United States is quickly approaching and with it a genuine desire to secure the best deal possible for both countries.

Support for a free trade agreement between Canada and our American neighbour was echoed yesterday by Prime Minister Jacques Santer of Luxembourg who said: "It seems to me, from the purely economic point of view, Canada can only benefit from a free trading system with the U.S. and the rest of the world".

Luxembourg, with a population of only 367,000, has free trade agreements and prospers as a result. It has the highest standard of living in the European Community, the European Community's lowest unemployment rate of 1.3 per cent, and the lowest level of annual inflation at 0.3 per cent.

Luxembourg has historically forged trading ties with its neighbours while maintaining its cultural and political sovereignty. I hope the same will result for Canada.

FISHERIES

FRASER RIVER—EFFECT OF DREDGING OPERATIONS

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, fishermen on the West Coast are concerned about the many dredging operations that occur each year during openings on the Fraser River. The dredging performed by the Department of Public Works seriously hampers the gill-netting process and at times has cost the fishermen the loss of important income and the loss or damage of fishing gear.

Gill-netters on the Fraser River have asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McInnes) to consider rescheduling dredging operations from the current Monday to Friday schedule to a Tuesday to Saturday schedule for those few weeks each year that there are openings on the river.

In view of the fact that our fishermen contribute millions of dollars each year to our economy, I urge the Minister and his Department to review this situation immediately with an eye to reducing the impact that river dredging has upon fishing activities and fish habitat in the Fraser.

CRITICISM OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY POLICIES

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, where will the isolationist policies of the NDP end, and on how many international obligations will the NDP turn their backs?

First, Canadians heard the NDP policy that they would pull out of NATO and pull out of NORAD. NATO has been the expression of collective western defence since 1949, a multilateral deterrent that provides a stable framework for the management of superpower relations across Europe and the Atlantic.

As French Prime Minister Jacques Chirac said this week: "Isolationism is not desirable for any country in this era".

This week during the Ontario election, the NDP Leader said that an NDP provincial Government would pay up to 40 per cent more for Canadian-made goods over imports and require hospitals, school boards and libraries to do the same, at substantial public expense.

Recently, another isolationist policy emerged from the well-known NDP strategist, Gerald Caplan. He advocates Canada should withdraw from the Group of Seven industrial nations and presumably would have Canada forfeit its hard-won position as a member of the G-7 Finance Ministers as well.

This fortress or bunker mentality emerging from the collective minds of the NDP leaders needs to be seriously understood by Canadians. The NDP's true international allies are starting to emerge. Yesterday the Soviet news agency Tass accused Chirac of "harsh attacks on Canada's New Democratic Party" and also said he had accused the NDP of "dangerous neutrality".

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria).

THE ADMINISTRATION

THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will mark the third anniversary of the election of the Tory Government. If one word can be used to summarize these three years, my choice would be "disastrous".

Time constraints would not permit me to enumerate all of the blunders of the Government, but I am willing to give it a try. Ministers have resigned, were fired, or demoted. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has given new meaning to the word "patronage", making it a relative expression. There were thousands of appointments, so many that we have lost count.

Two banks have gone under, for the first time in 63 years. There has been abuse of power, conflict of interest, criminal charges, unprecedented waste of taxpayers' dollars for the lifestyle of the rich and famous, such as the Prime Minister, his friends and cronies.

This scandal-ridden Government will be remembered as the worst Government in the history of Canada. Luckily, time is running out and the country will once again, very soon, have the opportunity to elect a good, efficient, honest Liberal Government to replace this awful regime. It will do so under the distinguished leadership of the Right Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner).

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAX ON FOOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians have a long memory. This Government got elected by promising lower taxes. Yet, after three years of this Conservative Government, on average a Canadian family pays $1,000 in additional taxes every year. In spite of all that the Minister of Finance is still talking about taxing food.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, he told the House he wanted to consult Canadians. The one thing I can tell him is that Canadians did tell me how they feel about this issue, and they do not want a tax on food.

I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister why is the Government hiding behind this so-called consultation when it knows full well that Canadians do not want a food tax?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I thought that yesterday the Minister of Finance quite accurately outlined the process of tax reform and the necessity of tax reform. I think he also dealt with the suggestions of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition with respect to a tax on food. He said very categorically, as reported at page 8700 of Hansard:

> Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

The right hon. gentleman says he speaks on behalf of all Canadians, who suggest that there should not be a tax on food. I note that he is on record as stating that there should be a consumption tax. Most normal Canadians consume food, so I would assume that the right hon. gentleman is, in fact, advocating a tax on food.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This side of the House will not tolerate a tax on food.

Oral Questions

PROJECTED COST TO FAMILIES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Deputy Prime Minister that we gave the Minister of Finance every opportunity to deny that he was proposing such a tax. We have reminded the Government that a tax on food at current rates of sales tax would amount to an extra $453 on the yearly grocery bill for an average Canadian family. That is one month of groceries. Is the Deputy Prime Minister suggesting that Canadian families eat only 11 months of the year?

• (1120)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, and myself have all attempted to clear up the confusion that is being created by the right hon. gentleman and by some of his Members. I repeat what the Minister of Finance said yesterday:

> Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or in any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

In response to the question posed by the right hon. gentleman, as well as one asked by the Leader of the New Democratic Party who has selectively taken a phrase out of context, I said on September 1, in answer to the Leader of the NDP, as reported at page 8659 of Hansard:

> The tax reform proposals do not contain any provision for the inclusion of a tax on food.

On August 24, 1987, in response to a question asked by the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre the Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has just, no doubt inadvertently, misled the House with the direct statement that the Government is considering a sales tax on food. That is false.

I do not know how much clearer one can be. I wish that the Hon. Member would listen carefully to those answers rather than trying to confuse the issue by suggestions which are erroneous.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSURANCE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have listened carefully to what the Deputy Prime Minister has said and to what the Prime Minister has said. But the Minister of Finance refused to close the door yesterday on imposing a tax on food. He said that with all his tax reform proposals he wanted to consult the Canadian people before making any changes.

On Monday, before the committee hearings on the tax reform proposals even started, he issued an eight-page statement of tax changes to those reform proposals without any prior consultation with Canadians. If he can make those changes without consultation, why can he not make the simplest, easiest change of all? Will the Deputy Prime Minister stand up and give us the categorical statement: "There will not be a tax on food from this Government"? That would be the best three-year anniversary present he could give the Canadian people.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance made it very clear yesterday that there is no proposal in this document or in any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact. The right hon. gentleman advocates a consumption tax, as does his colleague from Westmount. Perhaps his Members on the Finance Committee are contemplating in the consumption tax the inclusion of a tax on food. If that is the case, then we will wait to see where they stand when the report comes out.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the tax reform proposals have been referred to a standing committee, and 300 or so briefs have already been submitted. The matter is under consideration. We will be interested to see where his Members stand on the whole issue of tax reform.

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Mrs. Denis and other senior citizens remember the Minister of Finance stating in this House when the old age pension de-indexation issue was making headlines that all the elderly Canadians he had met were in favour of de-indexation. As we recall, this statement prompted the Prime Minister to apologize publicly.

Here is my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It says so in so many words in the document, complete with explanations. In consultations on the Blue Paper the Government made commitments to the effect that universality was not debatable. Why does the Deputy Prime Minister or his Conservative Government refuse to promise that their Party will reject any suggestion that bread, milk and butter be taxed? Why not make that committment? Why maintain that option?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to refer the Hon. Member to my previous answer. May I also point out that he has sent a letter to La Presse indicating that the Government is advocating a tax on food. That is absolutely false.

REQUEST THAT DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER PROVIDE CLARIFICATION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Who in this Party is stupid? The Quebec Conservative caucus got together to study the documents of the Minister of Finance, and they told the Minister of Finance that imposing a tax would be a stupid move. Is the Deputy Prime Minister implying that Conservative caucus Members are completely off course, that they were mistaken when making their recommendation?

I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether the Conservative caucus, including the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, were mistaken and did not know how to read, or would it be quite simply that the Deputy Prime Minister does not want to tell the truth?

[English]

Mr. Lapierre: How about the Quebec caucus?

Mr. Mazankowski: The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and myself have all said the same thing.

Mr. Lapierre: We don't trust you!

Mr. Garneau: The Quebec caucus does not trust you either.

Mr. Nunziata: Would you buy a used car from the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I simply reinvite the Hon. Member to read the response that the Minister of Finance gave yesterday. I will repeat it. I am quoting from page 8700 of Hansard.

> Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or in any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

FOOD TAX QUERY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister. It relates to the matter of whether to tax food or not.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: When the question was put by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre, back on May 28 of this year, he asked the Minister of State for Finance a question which ended this way: "What about food?" Regarding the sales tax: "Is food in or out?" The Minister of State for Finance responded by saying: "You will find out on June 18" whether food tax is in or out. It is now September 3 and we are still asking the same question.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is as it was asked on May 28 by my colleague. Is food being contemplated? Is food being considered? Is it in or out of the proposals for a national sales tax?

WEEKLY FOOD BUDGETS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, we have seen the Deputy Prime Minister take a number of positions. He takes the position of Wayne Gretzky stickhandling around this issue. There is now a new position. It was not the New Democrats who raised this matter first. It is in the White Paper on Tax Reform which states:

> If food and other basic goods are taxed, they would cost more . . . If food and other basic goods are not taxed, their prices would be lower.

This is in his document. He raised it. Are the people of Canada now to expect that, unless there is a statement to the contrary, they can expect their weekly food budgets to be increased, because there is no comment that this tax is not being considered?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that is using the scare tactics that are quite customary of Members from that side of the House. The author of the White Paper on Tax Reform is the Minister of Finance. He made it very clear yesterday. I repeat again, for perhaps the fourth time, as reported at page 8700 of Hansard:

> Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or in any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

What could be more clear than that?

EXCLUSION OF FOOD FROM SALES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point that we did not raise this issue. The Minister of Finance raised the issue, and it is right here. There are diagrams, pages and pages which talk about a food tax. It was not we who talked about a food tax; it was members of the Government who talked about a food tax and who are considering it. Why raise it in the first place?

My question, then, is directed to the Chairman of the Finance Committee who has been studying this issue. My question is very straightforward. Do other countries which have a national sales tax—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Lewis: That is not in order and you know it.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that under the circumstances it is not in order to put the question to the Chairman of the Finance Committee. Perhaps the Hon. Member could find another way to put the question to ensure that a Minister does respond.

• (1130)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question is once again directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Is he aware that countries that have imposed a consumption tax have, in fact, excluded food? Today the provincial Governments that have a sales tax exclude food. A person going to the grocery store pays tax on certain goods but not on food.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that the chairman of the finance committee has a plan under way so that, when the Government does impose a consumption tax on the people of Canada, food can be excluded?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): I do not know what plan the chairman of the finance committee has. I know that he is a very capable and competent chairman. I know that he will be vitally interested in all points of view relating to tax reform. That is the job that he is challenged with, and that is the job that he will discharge with the greatest of effectiveness.

SOVEREIGNTY

BEAUFORT SEA—OIL AND GAS DRILLING—UNITED STATES' CALL FOR BIDS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we learned to our great horror that the federal Government had abandoned any defence of Canadian trade interests under the trade and commerce clause, and is now leaving it up to the provinces to represent Canada when it comes to the export of our resources.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister on another issue relating to the abandonment of our sovereignty.

On August 20 the Department of the Interior in the United States issued invitations for bids to drill on the Continental Shelf in the Beaufort Sea, including areas of Canadian territory. That is a clear transgression of every agreement. As the chief minister of the Yukon has said, it is a total abandonment of Canadian sovereignty.

Considering that those bids will be considered in four months from now, as of January 1, 1988, has the Canadian Government any intention to represent Canadians' interest in this steal of our territory?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): First of all, I do not agree with the premise of the question, the allegations, and the shrill rhetoric that the Hon. Member is advancing.

I am not fully up to date on this particular matter. I would be glad to take the question as notice, and I could provide a comprehensive answer to the Hon. Member. I regret that I am not up to date at this time.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER ISSUE PROTEST

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. There is nothing shrill in trying to represent the integrity of Canadian territory against incursion by another country which is now issuing bids to companies within its own jurisdiction to drill in our territory and in our jurisdiction.

I am surprised that the Deputy Prime Minister is not more conversant with this matter. When asked about this several months ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the federal Government would not be taking any direct action until such time as the environmental hearings were over, and bids would be considered. That point has now been reached. There is now an opening of bids on Canadian land by the U.S. Government.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister specifically if he will be in touch with the Prime Minister and ask him to issue immediately a notice of protest to the President of the United States against this unacceptable action by the Department of the Interior and the U.S. Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): I will take the Hon. Member's question as a representation. I will be raising the matter with my cabinet colleagues, including the Prime Minister.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

FAMILY BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Predictions that we made when family benefits were reviewed have come true. Will the Minister now admit that the evidence from the National Council of Welfare, CCSD, NAC, the Economic Council, and Tristat Resources all proves conclusively that families have lost significant income as a result of the Government's past tax policies? Those associations also predict that families may lose over $1 billion by 1991 as a result of new reforms, if implemented.

Is this evidence correct or not? The Minister should know.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the evidence that the Member puts forward is obviously selective on the one side, and in that respect it is not clear nor is it correct.

I wish to indicate to the Member that when she refers to these issues, she does not refer to the increases in the child tax benefits. She does not refer to the fact that today 860,000 Canadians are working who were not working three years ago on this anniversary. Obviously, that is a change.

The Deputy Prime Minister also indicated the other day that there are more taxpayers, and those are some of the reasons why. I should also say to the Hon. Member that when she looks at some of these papers and uses that in her own question in terms of predictions, I don't think one should stay with predictions, but one should look at actual facts. Those actual facts state that today 263,000 Canadians are above the poverty line who were below the poverty line three years ago.

INDEXATION—MINISTER'S POSITION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I would direct the Minister to Hansard. I was quoting five authorities on social policy, and the facts which primarily were concerned with family benefits. The Minister should know this.

Rather than defending his Government's anti-family tax policy, I wish—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member is straying into argument and going beyond the usual preamble. I would ask her to put her question to the Minister.

Ms. Mitchell: Since deindexation has the most negative impact on families, I wonder if the Minister would reverse his tax and become an advocate for families. Will he advocate full indexation of the family allowance, the child tax credit, the sales tax credit, and also the cut-off thresholds, as a beginning step toward greater tax fairness for families?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have been an advocate for that, that is why the Prime Minister and the Government have advocated increased credits, which we have already implemented—

Ms. Mitchell: Full indexation.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): —earlier payments of the increased child tax credits. The tax reform paper also looks at that question.

The last point I would make to the Hon. Member is that if she wishes to be an advocate, could she go back to Manitoba and ask the socialist Government why, when we increased the Canada Pension Plan benefit for disability, that Government does not forward it to the very poorest?

HEALTH

AIDS—TESTING OF IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Canadians are increasingly aware of the alarming growth in AIDS cases in Canada, and indeed in North America. In fact, in the United States it is projected that by 1991 there will be 23 million cases or carriers of the virus.

In light of recent legislation in the United States regarding AIDS tests for immigrants and refugees, will the Minister tell the House whether he is contemplating similar measures for Canada?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in respect to mandatory testing of any type, specifically for immigration, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and myself, along with our cabinet colleagues, are working very closely on this issue. On the surface when one looks at that issue, many people would say that it is a policy that we could implement, as some other countries are now considering, such as the United States, on December 1 of this year. There are a number of issues, whether medical, ethical, or administrative, and relating also to the type or the manner in which medical examinations are presently taking place in respect to immigration applications. The Immigration Medical Review Board had indicated previously hereto that mandatory testing was not recommended. It has now re-examined that policy and recommended that it in fact be implemented.

The World Health Organization, to which Canada has adhered very carefully, has so far not changed its policy from a voluntary system. I know Canadians are interested in this issue. We are considering the present policy but I am not yet in a position to change it and the status quo remains.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the past three years certainly have been the darkest in the history of regional development—the first Minister, the Hon. Member for York-Peel, was fired because of conflicts of interest; the second one, the Hon. Member for Langelier, was fired for incompetence; and the third one, who inherited a $350 million hole, now heads a department that is being phased out. In the circumstances, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Hon. Member could now ask his question?

Mr. Lapierre: Does his Government intend to issue a clear policy statement on regional development rather than taking makeshift measures or announcing piecemeal programs?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the people who were fired as a result of the failure of the Regional Development Act were fired on September 4, 1984, by the people of Canada. We have put in place a regional development incentive which is regionally oriented. It will build on the strength of western Canada and establish a basis for regional development in the east. It will be very successful.

FUTURE PROSPECTS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is fully aware that right now, as far as regional economic development is concerned no one who is involved has the slightest idea of the Government's direction and we even wonder whether the Government itself knows where it is going. My question to the Minister is this: Does this Government intend to come up with an overall policy, a policy enabling us to put an end to this situation of two Canadas, one rich and one poor? Does his Government have any vision of Canada and any idea about its responsibilities as a federal Government?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I thought I saw the pleasant face of the Hon. Member across the aisle. I do not know where his mind was when we announced a western diversification initiative of $1.2 billion over the next five years, an Atlantic Opportunities Agency with $1.2 billion over the next five years, and specific programs for regions in Quebec and northern Ontario. I wonder where the Hon. Member has been.

CAPITAL ASSETS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. As the result of the Government's initiative Canada's only national public broadcasting system, the CBC, has had major budget cuts, contracting out, and the decimation of production crews.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: The record will show that the Tories applaud.

Ms. McLaughlin: In her official response to the standing committee the Minister has now indicated a willingness to consider selling off the capital assets of the CBC as well. How does the Deputy Prime Minister reconcile the Minister's proposal with earlier commitments of the Prime Minister that the CBC is not for sale?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe that question was dealt with in the House a couple of days ago. I believe the Hon. Minister indicated that we want better synchronization of the private and public broadcasting systems. We are aiming at ways and means of delivering the best services to the people of Canada at the lowest possible cost. I think the Minister was speaking of certain aspects which may very well be achieved through the private sector.

In terms of privatizing the CBC, I think that statement was taken out of context. At the present time the Minister is putting together a new broadcasting policy which will be presented to the House in due course.

INTRODUCTION OF NEW BROADCASTING ACT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, since the new Broadcasting Act that the Minister mentioned will reflect the real intentions of the Government, when will the Government fulfil its Throne Speech commitment to introduce the Broadcasting Act?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the Minister is presently working on that and taking into consideration the report of the standing committee. I believe she has asked the standing committee for some further background work on the matter. As soon as that is completed I think you can expect a definitive policy statement, hopefully coupled with legislation.

EMPLOYMENT OF VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new President of the Treasury Board. One year ago the Government put in place, for the very first time in this country, employment equity legislation. At the same time, for the very first time, it introduced in the Public Service a program of affirmative action for visible minorities.

Will the President of the Treasury Board advise the House whether the Public Service of Canada now accurately reflects Canadian society as far as visible minorities are concerned? If it does not, is it his intention to introduce targets for hiring and promotion in the same way as has been done for women in the Public Service?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for that question. That is clearly the desire of the federal Government. Numerical target-setting quotas have been established by the Government. I think that was proven in August of 1987. This initiative would put the visible minority target group on an equal footing with other target groups in the Public Service.

That has been coupled with a series of measures, including a $10.5 million, 300 person-year special employment program, a visible minority employment office, a network of visible minority co-ordinators, special training modules and, as of June 30, 2,650 members of visible minority groups were registered in the Public Service's applicant inventory. Therefore, there is clearly progress which is the result of a deliberate policy of the Government.

ALLEGATION CONCERNING GRANTING OF IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I have a copy of a confidential letter written to the Prime Minister from Mr. Renaud Paquet, the President of the Immigration Union.

The letter alleges that the Deputy Minister of Immigration has flagrantly breached immigration regulations by forcing his officials to grant landed immigrant status, contrary to the Immigration Act, to a visiting professor so that he may remain in Canada in order to teach the children of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Minister at the Claudel Lycée in Ottawa.

As it is vital I will read into the record that which the President of the Employment and Immigration Union had to say:

> The employees at H.Q. Canada Immigration, are flabbergasted that, on your behalf, or on behalf of Mrs. Mila Mulroney, are abusing the queue jumping on behalf of Mr. George Grossman, who was given very favourble treatment on orders from Mr. Gatean Lussier, a close personal friend of Mr. Grossman, to accommodate the education of your own children at the Claudel Lycée in Ottawa.

These allegations are very serious and imply that the Prime Minister and Deputy Minister are above the law. Therefore, will the Deputy Prime Minister immediately order a full and public investigation into this affair so that Canadians may know the details and the appropriate action may be taken?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, until further notice it is my view that when Mr. Paquet has charges or comments or allegations to make, I suppose he will direct them where they belong.

Second, we will check the allegations behind that. Now, again, until further notice, this is part of the usual package from the Liberal Party.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister because we have received an unbelievable answer. We have a grievance—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member had a very lengthy preamble to his first question. I know he would want to be as concise as possible in putting the supplementary question.

Mr. Marchi: I subscribe to your orders, Mr. Speaker. This serious allegation is not made by opposition Members but by the President of the union and a grievance has been filed with the union suggesting that officials were pressured into sidestepping the law. In order to clarify the situation and in order to ensure Canadians that no one is above the law, I ask the Deputy Minister again whether he will order a full investigation so that we may in fact know the details and take appropriate action when necessary?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, same question, same answer. We will investigate.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Tens of thousands of Canadians have been persuaded that they could help to provide for their retirement years by putting savings into RRSPs as permitted by our income tax laws. Now because of the collapse of the Principal subsidiaries which were not covered by CDIC insurance, these Canadians will lose most of those savings.

Since so many of these people reside in the Deputy Prime Minister's province, isn't it time that the income tax law with respect to RRSPs was amended to require that such funds be invested in plans covered by CDIC coverage?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the issue which the Hon. Member raised is indeed regrettable but I think the Minister of State for Finance has responded to this issue.

The Principal Trust issue is regulated by provincial authorities to the extent that the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation was involved. The federal Government has covered those losses.

I might also take this opportunity to point out that when we experienced the collapse of the CCB and the Northland Banks the federal Government undertook to compensate those unsecured depositors, I must say to the objection of the New Democratic Party, which was most unfortunate. We have been clearly on record as demonstrating that we are serious about this.

We have tried to encourage provincial authorities to take whatever steps are necessary to accommodate these people, but in terms of the actual suggestion of the legislative changes which the Hon. Member has put forth, I will certainly advance that to the Minister of Finance and perhaps he can get back to the Member himself.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when people put money into RRSPs, they do not have to pay income tax at that time. They supposedly will pay the income tax when they begin to draw their benefits. These people have lost that money. They will not get their benefits and the Government of Canada at that time will not get the income tax which people would have paid. That money has been lost.

When will the Government change the law so that this kind of rip-off and fleecing of the public will not continue?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the Hon. Member is advancing a serious proposal that probably deserves serious attention. I will take that as a representation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONCTON—WORKFORCE SEPARATION PROGRAM

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

[English]

After the massive lay-offs announced by CN in Moncton and all hopes of saving those jobs were lost, CN and the railway unions agreed to a workforce separation program. All of this was done in good faith. However, CN has unilaterally accelerated the lay-offs and the workers feel they have been double-crossed. Is the Minister aware of this situation and what is he planning to do to protect those workers, the very few who are left in Moncton?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the so-called accelerated lay-offs to which the Hon. Member has referred. The Minister of Transport is in Moncton today, I believe, and I am sure the matter will be raised. Perhaps he may very well be dealing with that issue on the occasion of his visit.

LAY-OFFS AT GORDON WORKSHOPS IN MONCTON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Still along the same line of thought, Mr. Speaker, CN management continue to lay off people in Moncton even though there is more work than the workers can handle, particularly at the Gordon workshops. So why would the Conservative Government let CN act this way? Is it not the responsibility of the Government and the Minister of Transport to protect the jobs of workers, no matter where they are in this country, and to prevent these jobs from being transferred elsewhere?

In recent years the regions of Canada have been left to die a slow death. Is that the real regional development policy of the Conservative Government, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that the Government does not manage or run CNR. It is run by a Board of Directors, and a management team which is very competent and very effective. The Hon. Member would be the first one to criticize us if we were seen as unduly interfering with the management and operation of a Crown corporation. I know there has been a program put together funded by DRIE to support workers suffering dislocation.

I should also remind the Hon. Member that if he had been so concerned about the welfare of the workers of Moncton he would have done his bit to support the establishment of the General Electric locomotive manufacturing shop which would have provided long term jobs, jobs into the future. The Hon. Member chose to ridicule—

Mr. Robichaud: What did you do?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville.

RAILWAYS

ONTARIO-MICHIGAN TRAFFIC—SAFETY INSPECTIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, Windsor has become a paradigm of railway safety under the Government's deregulation policy and, in part, the deregulation policy in the United States.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, in lieu of the Minister of Transport. Is the Government aware that railway safety inspections have virtually ceased on international traffic between Ontario and Michigan? A great many cars have been found to have unsafe brakes, unsafe truck bolsters, defective wheels, many have had their safety cards removed, there have been some 20 derailments in the CP yard in Windsor, and a dangerous situation exists in the tunnel.

Mr. Hicks: Is that where you get your tunnel vision from?

Mr. McCurdy: Is the Government aware of this situation which not only indicates what has happened in international traffic but presages what may happen in railways across the country?

SAFETY INFRACTIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, deregulation has existed in the United States. This traffic is going to the United States. I have cited a number of instances of safety infractions of a very serious nature. They represent a danger not only to the workers but to the people of Windsor respecting the possibility of toxic spills.

Will the Government take a look at this situation and see whether there is a solution to the problem that is being created? Will the Government also look at the potential for similar problems in Canada as a result of Bills C-18 and C-19?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, primacy of safety is always first and foremost in the minds of this Government in any transportation policy, and it is clearly outlined in the preamble to the new National Transportation Act.

I think it is very clear as it applies to the air administration. We moved very quickly on the tightening of the Aeronautics Act. I believe there is a new railway safety Bill that is being considered. There have been a number of areas where safety in the railway system has been tightened up. Certainly if the Hon. Member has some specific cases I will be pleased to draw them to the Minister's attention. Let me assure the Member that we take this matter very seriously and advise him that a lot of progress and tightening up has occurred in the last two or three years.

Mr. Speaker: I would advise the House that there will be two more questions. The Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou and then a single question from the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

LABOUR RELATIONS—DECISION OF CANADIAN LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers said yesterday that the Canada Labour Relations Board's decision paves the way for an early settlement of their current negotiations with Canada Post, yet the Minister expressed disagreement with this decision. Why is the Minister intent on having a postal strike at any cost? Could he not tell Canada Post to accept the decision and bargain in good faith, thus giving Canadians the hope that there might not be a breakdown in postal services?

• (1200)

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that no one on this side of the House wants a strike. No sensible Canadian would want a strike. However, I can also tell the Hon. Member that the worst thing I could do is to follow his suggestion that I involve myself in the items that are at the table and under negotiation now. In fact, it is contrary to the advice of the former Postmaster General, his colleague, the Hon. Member for Papineau, who has suggested that the Government should cut the umbilical cord of Canada Post Corporation. That was a decision made by the House in 1981 and we are trying to do that. Why is the Hon. Member suggesting that we go back to the bad old days?

CANADIAN LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD RULING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, since Canada Post became a Crown corporation in 1981 there had been no strikes until the one last May which was caused by the Government. Why does the Minister not tell Canada Post to accept the ruling of the Canada Labour Board and avoid the next strike? Why does the Minister want a strike?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this Hon. Member and other Hon. Members on both sides of the House complained for literally decades about the service provided by Canada Post. Through franchising, the post office will be able to increase service to Canadians dramatically.

Why is the Hon. Member suggesting Canada Post should not carry through with this attempt to improve services to Canadians? Why is this Hon. Member being a mouthpiece for J.-C. Parrot?

FOOD TAX ISSUE—COMMITTEE EXAMINATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have a short, quick question for the Chairman of the Finance Committee. I wonder if he could indicate whether the Finance Committee has any plans to conduct an inquiry into a food tax or whether the Finance Committee plans to conduct any study into exempting food from a consumption tax.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, at the present time the committee is working on Phase 1 of the White Paper dealing with income tax and the relevant sales tax measures on the federal sales tax as it presently exists. After the first of the year, I expect the committee will take a look at Phase 2 and what may have occurred between now and then. Of course all items that might be taxed will be looked at, and how a new tax proposal might be put together will be examined in accordance with the proposal in the White Paper.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government House Leader to give us a statement of the business the Government expects to present to the House during the coming days.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my colleague's question, I would advise that the House will continue with debate on Bill C-84 today and, if it is not completed today, we would anticipate calling that Bill next week until it is completed.

If a message is received from the Senate requiring further debate on Bill C-22, we would then proceed to take up that item. As a backup to that would be second reading of Bill C-68 respecting the Bretton Woods Agreement and, if time permits next week, we would then move to second reading of Bill C-61, a Bill respecting measures dealing with the proceeds of crime.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PRESENTATION OF NINETEENTH, TWENTIETH, TWENTY-FIRST AND TWENTY-SECOND REPORTS OF CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 101, I have the honour to present to the House the Nineteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-first and Twenty-second reports of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, in both official languages.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians who recognize that there are troubles in many parts of the world causing people to seek safety in Canada from persecution.

Recognizing that Canada has established standards of refugee status determination but that existing procedures have broken down under the unexpected strains, also understanding that the Standing Committee of Parliament has proposed a new procedure for refugee determination which is quicker and fairer than the one now in force and has the support of the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress and other groups and individuals, they are asking that Parliament enact legislation that will embody the principles involved in this report.

They also recognize that the report encourages fair and quick oral hearings for refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, and provides universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

OPPOSITION TO TAX ON FOOD

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, considering that the Conservative Government intends to consider the possibility of saddling Canadians with a tax on goods and services, food included; and considering that the Leader of the Liberal Party (Mr. Turner) and the militants are against this tax, I have here a petition signed by residents of my riding who urge Parliament to reject any measure designed to levy a sales tax on food products.

I have another petition signed by residents of my riding, this time from the southern or lower region of the riding, who also urge Parliament to reject any measure designed to levy a sales tax on food products.

ENTRENCHMENT OF MULTICULTURAL HERITAGE IN THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from a number of people associated with Mosaic, a multiethnic service in Vancouver.

They ask that, whereas one-third of Canadians speak neither English nor French and are of neither English nor French ancestry, and multiculturalism has been an official national policy since 1971; whereas multiculturalism is one of the four cornerstones of Canadian society and has not been recognized as a fundamental characteristic in the Accord, they call upon Parliament to urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government to amend the constitutional Accord by entrenching our nation's multicultural heritage in reality as a fundamental characteristic in the opening clause of the Constitution.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and responsibility to present a petition from a number of Canadians who point out that troubles in many parts of the world cause people to seek safety and asylum in Canada and that Canada in the past has established refugee status determination procedures, that these have broken down under the strain of recent years and that a committee of the House has proposed a new procedure which is quicker and fairer than the one now in place and that this procedure has the support of all Parties in the House as well as a number of organizations. However, the Government put in place procedures which turned refugees away.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to bring in legislation which embodies the principle of fair and quick oral hearings before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings, and adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada and make the claim.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to present a petition on behalf of a group of citizens from Quebec who are concerned that Bill C-55 threatens the traditional commitment of Canada to assisting refugees. They suggest the Bill be withdrawn and legislation fair to refugees reaching our shores be substituted instead.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard that Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When debate was interrupted at eleven o'clock the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) had six minutes remaining in his question and comment period. I will entertain further questions and comments.

There being none, questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to make a few comments on Bill C-84. To begin with I would like to say a word of appreciation to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), for his hard work on this issue in committee as it dealt with Bill C-84, as it is working now on C-55, and for his continuing interest in this entire issue. In the spirit of non-partisanship, I should also say a word of appreciation for the work done by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi).

Similarly, I would like to have been able to say a word of appreciation for the work that the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) would have done on this Bill had he been permitted by the Government to sit on the committee. As we all know, the Hon. Member was the chairperson of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. Over the past few months, as he became more and more aware of the concerns of refugees and the problem of refugee status determination, he took a very active interest. At the same time he saw the Government going in a direction diametrically opposite to what his committee recommended and to that which is considered to be fair and just to the refugees.

The Government brought us back to deal with this legislation. It is the main item on the agenda. This is what constituted the crisis which justified the Government's calling the House back in August. Some 174 boat people landing off the coast of Nova Scotia constitute a crisis. There is a crisis but it is not in Canada particularly. It is a world crisis. It exists because there are over 13 million refugees around the world as defined by the UN Convention. If we look at other kinds of refugees, including those refugees from famine, ecological disaster, and internal causes, there would be many millions more. It has been pointed out that every day, 365 days a year, for the last 30 years, an average of 700 people have become refugees. Yet we create a crisis because 174 of them waded ashore in Nova Scotia.

I would like to share a few figures with you to give you some idea of the magnitude of the problem. In Central America today there are 1.5 million refugees. There are two million Palestinian refugees in the Middle East. Some of these refugees are second and third generation. Some three million Afghans have fled to Pakistan and Iran since the Russian invasion of 1979. Some two million people were displaced in Vietnam, Kampuchea and Laos over the last 10 years. Between 1980 and 1985, 400,000 people were forced to flee from Uganda. Millions of Africans have been displaced by war, internal oppression, famine and ecological disaster such as the advance of the Sahel. In the tragic split of the India subcontinent of 1947, at the time of the partition, over 14 million Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs were displaced. Some of them moved south into India from Pakistan and others moved the opposite way. This is the magnitude of the problem our world has faced in the last few years.

While we in Canada think we have a crisis, the heaviest impact of this crisis has fallen on Third World countries. There are 25 Third World countries where more than 50,000 unassimilated refugees live in camps. The 20 countries with the highest ratio of refugees to local population are all in the Third World, and those countries have a per capita annual income of less than $700.

Sudan is perhaps a particularly outstanding example of the pressure this puts on a poor country. Sudan is under stress politically, economically and ecologically. It has had to create a special department with more than 1,500 people to look after the more than one million refugees who flooded into Sudan from Chad, Ethiopia and Uganda. In some of its refugee camps in the south the mortality rate is about 285 per 1,000. In a 12-month period 285 refugees out of 1,000 would die. That is the tragic condition of refugees in some parts of our world today. Yet we feel we have a crisis in Canada because of 174 boat people.

In May of 1979 there was a special conference on refugees in Africa. President Nyerere of Tanzania spoke to that and I would like to share some of his words. He was speaking particularly to the African situation, but I think it applies to all of us. He said:

> Even if there was not a single new refugee in Africa from this day forward, it is relevant to remember that a refugee stays a refugee for up to 70 years if we do not make provision for his or her integration into our societies. Either we make arrangements whereby refugees can become self-supporting or they have to be fed for a lifetime . . . Refugees have only one thing in common—that they have fled from their country. Even the cause of their flight will be different. It may be persecution, or social upheaval, or war, or it may be famine which causes a disregard of borders. The refugees are usually, but not quite always, without property or means of earning a living.
> But apart from the fact of seeking refuge they are as varied as Africa's people are varied. They will be of many ideologies or of none, of many different religions, and many different cultures. They may be nomadic or pastoral, just as they may be agriculturalists or urban workers. They will have different levels of education; they will be different in ambition, and in character.
> All refugees are certainly victims, but they do not consequently lose their individual ideas about life and their own purpose. They will include the ambitious, the optimist, the pessimist, the honest hard-working man and the sly delinquent; the person who will make the best of things, and the man who will grumble about everything. And so on. Generalizations about refugees are very dangerous; all that can safely be said is that they have sought refuge.

• (1220)

He goes on to point out how refugees often create large problems for the countries in which they seek asylum. This is particularly the case for Third World countries. Then he says:

> Yet refugees are in no position to consider the problems of the country they flee to.

I suggest we should think about that as we debate this legislation; refugees are not in any position to think of the problems of the country to which they are fleeing because they are so preoccupied with their own desperate struggle for some kind of freedom and dignity.

Nyerere talks about the very slow progress that has been made in dealing with the problems of refugees. Indeed, on a world basis, we have fallen back in the last few years. Speaking of Africa, he asks why this is:

> I do not believe it is a result of ill will, but rather that all the governments of Africa are busy and hard-pressed, trying daily to perform the miracle of the five loaves and two fishes. They are subject to many pressures from their people and on behalf of economic interests elsewhere. And there is no countervailing pressure in support of the refugee victims of injustice and oppression. The only pressure is our own awareness of Africa's unity and of our common humanity with our brothers and sisters. It appears that this is not a very strong pressure in comparison with others to which we are subject.

I believe we can apply to our world what he said about the common awareness of Africa's unity. The only countervailing pressure to completely closing all doors to refugees is our awareness of our unity as humankind and our obligations as human beings to our brothers and sisters in our common humanity. The question we must ask, with Nyerere, is whether or not in Canada in 1987 it is enough to keep our doors open.

There has been less funding by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees to deal with long-term solutions for the refugee problems. Indeed, of the funding available to the UNHCR in 1970, 80 per cent was going to long-term solutions. However, as the result of the pressure of immediate problems in 1981, that had fallen from 80 per cent to 20 per cent. Last year it had risen again to 40 per cent, but we are still devoting far too little money to the long-term solution of the refugee problem. We then wonder why it is snowballing onto our doorsteps.

There is an important role for affluent countries in the north, such as Canada, to play in helping Third World countries cope with the refugee problems within their own borders. Instead of doing that, we are shutting the door. We are applying more restrictive measures.

Bill C-84 is supposed to deal with an emergency, but the Bill has been hastily drafted, rushed through committee, and the Government has refused to consider some of the well thought out amendments that were presented by opposition Parties. It has refused to listen to the kinds of interventions that have been made by a wide variety of Canadian organizations that appeared to give their testimony. These organizations included representatives of our churches, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Bar Association, and refugee aid organizations. The Government has refused to listen to these considered, well thought out concerns of people who want to correct the abuses but do not want it to create an unjust situation.

The only conclusion one can reach is that the Government is playing on the fears of Canadians. While the fears are real and there is a concern among Canadians, I do not believe that these fears can be justified by the facts. If the Government was responsible, instead of playing on those fears it would attempt to deal with the situation, seek to allay those fears and explain the real facts about refugees.

Canadians have nothing to fear from the number of refugees who have come into Canada over the last 40 years. In the late 1970s and early 1980s we received some 60,000 boat people from Southeast Asia. They have not destroyed the fabric of Canadian society.

Since the 1940s we have received almost 500,000 refugees. They have made an invaluable contribution to Canadian society. We do not have to fear the contribution that refugees will make.

The attitude that we bring to refugees is one of those issues that will determine what kind of people and society we will be in the future. We can either have a society that is open, multiracial and a model for the kind of world we must create if humankind is going to live and prosper on a globe with very finite resources, or we can react as this legislation seems to suggest and move back to a more closed society that characterized the societies of our ancestors.

In early times it was a trait to be afraid of the people who lived in the next village or community, afraid of people who belonged to a different tribe or spoke with a slightly different dialect. Do we want to move back to that kind of closed society?

We have often thought about the kind of contribution refugees and immigrants from different parts of the world have made to Canadian society. We often emphasize the economic and business contributions, but I would like to think about the contribution these people have made to our level of tolerance and understanding. Perhaps I could use an example from my own ancestry to illustrate this. Some of my ancestors came from Ireland over 100 years ago. Like many other people who came from the old country, I presume they brought their prejudices with them. We know that there was a good deal of prejudice between Protestants and Catholics in the early years in Canada. However, 140 years later, that prejudice is left far behind us in Canada. The very idea of Protestant and Catholic bigotry seems sadly outdated, but when we consider the history of Ireland and the current events there, we see that it is still happening. Canadians cannot understand why.

I suggest that we have moved beyond this kind of prejudice and bigotry because, with so many other people coming to our nation, it just did not make sense for two Irishmen to fight over obscure points of religion.

Today, there are interchurch committees on refugees, consisting of Protestant and Catholic churches that come before the House of Commons to request a more open refugee policy. Even 30 years ago, a United Church moderator would complain that there were too many catholic immigrants coming to Canada. There has been a tremendous change in some of our thinking.

I suggest that we owe that change to the fact that so many people have come to Canada and created a multicultural kind of society. Some people have developed new prejudices, but that is another matter. There is still a fear of the stranger, a kind of latent racism.

• (1230)

I would like to share a poem with you, Mr. Speaker, a poem written at the time of the rise of Hitler by W. H. Auden, the English poet. In the poem we see that all the concerns that we have today for documents, committees, politicians, racism, and the fear that refugees will take away our daily bread were there 40 and 50 years ago. The poem is entitled Refugee Blues. The poem is either a Jewish couple talking to each other or a Jewish parent talking to his or her child. The poem reads:

Say this city has ten million souls,
Some are living in mansions, some are living in holes:
Yet there's no place for us, my dear, yet there's no place for us.
Once we had a country and we thought it fair,
Look at the atlas and you'll find it there:
We cannot go there now, my dear, we cannot go there now.
In the village churchyard there grows an old yew,
Every spring it blossoms anew:
Old passports can't do that, my dear, old passports can't do that.
The consul banged the table and said:
'If you've got no passport you're officially dead':
But we are still alive, my dear, but we are still alive.
Went to a committee; they offered me a chair;
Asked me politely to return next year:
But where shall we go to-day, my dear, but where shall we go to-day?
Came to a public meeting; the speaker got up and said:
'If we let them in, they will steal our daily bread';
He was talking of you and me, my dear, he was talking of you and me.
Thought I heard the thunder rumbling in the sky;
It was Hitler over Europe, saying: 'They must die';
O we were in his mind, my dear, O we were in his mind.
Saw a poodle in a jacket fastened with a pin,
Saw a door opened and a cat let in:

But they weren't German Jews, my dear, but they weren't German Jews.
Went down the harbour and stood upon the quay,
Saw the fish swimming as if they were free:
Only ten feet away, my dear, only ten feet away.
Walked through a wood, saw the birds in the trees;
They had no politicians and sang at their ease:
They weren't the human race, my dear, they weren't the human race.
Dreamed I saw a building with a thousand floors,
A thousand windows and a thousand doors;
Not one of them was ours, my dear, not one of them was ours.
Stood on a great plain in the falling snow;
Ten thousand soldiers marched to and fro:
Looking for you and me, my dear, looking for you and me.

The situation is that refugees look to Canada, yet it is a country which is closing its doors to them. They are aware of the pressure that comes upon them from everywhere.

The objectives in the Bill are objectives which we can support. However, the measures which the Bill enshrines do not meet those objectives. Therefore we cannot support those measures. I urge the Government to try to look at this Bill from the perspective of refugees around the world who are in desperate need. I urge the Government to look at the issue from the point of view of an open and honest consideration of what Canada can do, not try to trump up more fears, not try to build upon those fears but let us have a sane, honest, open and fair refugee policy.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, in his very thoughtful intervention the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly) made a very strong case, revealing how this piece of legislation is based on fear and how it really does not go to the root of the problems that Canadians would like to see solved in an expedited and thoughtful manner.

The comments we have heard in committee, as well as in the debate at report stage, have been varied. However, one thing keeps recurring. It is a criticism that is being leveled at us by international organizations. It has to do with the fact that Canada has subscribed to a number of conventions that deal with refugees and that this piece of legislation, Bill C-84, is one that is likely to infringe upon our international obligations concerning refugees. That is likely to put Canada into the position of being criticized for not keeping our word with respect to these conventions.

These are of course very serious criticisms which were made as recently as a couple of weeks ago by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. I would be interested to hear the Hon. Member's comments on this particular aspect of the legislation as it affects our reputation in the world.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I think that Canada is not alone in developing this type of restrictive legislation. What we are doing with this legislation is jumping to the head of the pack. We are right in there with countries such as the United States, which is now shutting its doors to refugees. This legislation must certainly make groups such as the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, which awarded the Nansen Medal to Canada last year for our open door policy to refugees, wonder what impact awarding the medal had. It is like when parents praise a child for doing something good the child feels that it somehow has to compensate by doing something bad. The child does this to show that it is really not as good as what the parents had said it was. Canada was complimented for a good policy toward refugees and we now turn around and show that we are really not as good as what the Nansen Medal would indicate.

I am not a lawyer. I cannot say whether or not this law specifically violates the international covenants. I think that is a question in which the legal fraternity can engage. However, it certainly violates the spirit of those covenants. The spirit of those covenants is that Canada has a fair refugee determination process. That is being broken by this legislation.

The concept of being able to turn boats back, a provision which is contained in this Bill, violates the tradition that Canada had which spoke out against other nations which turned boats back when faced with a much more serious problem than was Canada. I refer to countries such as Malaysia and the Philippines. In those countries there was a steady flow of boat people arriving on their shores. To its credit Canada spoke out against that practice. We said that the boats should not be turned back, that that action put the lives of potential refugees in danger. We are now doing the same thing. Not only are we violating our commitments but we can also be accused of a form of international hypocrisy. We say one thing to Third World countries such as Malaysia and then we do the same thing ourselves.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly) has just outlined the difficulty that Canada is placing itself in internationally, in that it appears to be a hypocrite by saying one thing and then changing its policy with regard to refugees. Can the Hon. Member comment on the Bill from the standpoint—not as a lawyer, since he has disclaimed being a lawyer, but from the point of view of a minister of the church? Ministers also tend to learn something about the law and respect for the law. I wonder what his assessment is of the type of Bill that we have before us in Bill C-84. It lays out some very harsh penalties for people who aid and abet human beings who are seeking refuge in our country. How does the Hon. Member square that with the comments and the only defence from government Members when they say that they will blink their eyes at this particular law? What type of signals does that send out to Canadians from the standpoint of obeying and recognizing the law?

Mr. Manly: Certainly, it must be a confusing signal. In the past the Government has urged churches and refugee aid committees to help refugees. Now a law is being passed that makes helping people who have no proper documentation to be accepted as refugees an offence which carries severe penalties. We have encouraged them, and now we are passing a law that states it is illegal.

Then the Minister states, "We are not aiming this law at you, we are trying to get at the agents who are doing this for profit and commercial purposes". What are the people in the churches to think of this whole situation? On the one hand they have been encouraged to be involved in this activity, and now they are told that it is illegal, but not to worry, they will not be prosecuted. It puts the churches in the same category as young people who smoke dope. They never know when the heavy arm of the law will come down on them. It is a law that will be selectively applied. It is a bad law. It should not be accepted by any Government that has any respect for the rule of law in a free and democratic society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has expired. Debate. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria).

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this third reading debate on Bill C-84. Mr. Speaker, I did not have the opportunity to join the debate on second reading nor in the parliamentary committee which examined this issue over the past few weeks. Still I should like to make a few very brief comments in the House today—I do not intend to prolong the study of this legislative measure even though I do not agree with it—to let Hon. Members know that I am against the Bill as presented by the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I do not support the Bill, but nobody should conclude that I condone the activities of people who arrive here by circumventing the law. You know very well that I have no sympathy for people who break the laws of our country and that, like all other Canadians, I too wish Canada had the legislation required to curb such abuses, as I said a moment ago.

[English]

We should all remember that the situation brought to the attention of the Canadian public, largely because of the Tory Government, is not something new. It did not happen one day this summer. Indeed, a boatload of refugees arrived in Canada over one year ago. The Government did nothing. A year later, a second boatload arrives with 174 people from the Indian subcontinent. This time the Government is trying to cling to power desperately; it is right at the bottom of the public opinion totem pole, it is scandal-ridden, and defective in every single way, shape, and form, it has lost the confidence of the Canadian people, and it just happens that the Government decides that this second event is going to be a crisis of large proportion.

The Government failed to tell Canadians that that was not the only day in 1987 when refugees arrived on our shores. In the year 1986, 18,000 people claimed refugee status here. That is 346 people per week. However, 174 show up one day this year and the Government decides, that's it, right now there is a crisis, Parliament must be recalled. It just happens that the Government has this multinational drug Bill it wants to pass as well, but that is not the real reason, of course. It only wants to recall Parliament to deal with this issue, say the Tories across the way.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, being the objective non-partisan person that you are, one can never, ever believe a Tory, because they brought us here under those false pretences. What they really wanted to do was sweeten the pot for the free trade negotiations and pass the objectionable drug Bill. At the same time the Government thought it would use this issue to drum up some support. As the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) eloquently and correctly stated earlier today, the Government was using in every means possible in a desperate attempt to drum up support.

Earlier this summer the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) told us that it was an emergency and Parliament had to be recalled. The Prime Minister in his deep, serious voice, that few of us believe but with which we are all familiar, stated that Parliament had to be recalled quickly, right away. Two weeks later the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) found out that no one had advised the Speaker that Parliament had to be recalled. It slipped their minds. After all, it was only an emergency so one could not think of everything. The Prime Minister and his cronies were busy shining their Gucci shoes and did not have time to think of it. Finally, two weeks later, they advised the Speaker and, of course, Mr. Speaker did agree to recall Parliament within a few days.

The point I am making is that a boatload of refugees arrived a year before, and it is not an emergency. A year later a second boatload arrives, and then it is declared to be an emergency two weeks after the boat arrived, and two weeks later no one tells the Speaker that it was an emergency in order that the Speaker could recall Parliament.

We are supposed to believe that the Government is sincere in its approach? I am sure a few people believe the Government is sincere, but I am not one of them. I do not believe in the things that it does. I do not believe that the Government could decide one day this year that something was an emergency when 346 people per week for the last year have been claiming refugee status. In 1985, 8,000 people claimed refugee status; in 1986, 18,000 people claimed refugee status; in the first five months of 1987, 10,000 claimed refugee status. But it became an emergency in July at the time the Government was in a desperate position, trying to cling to power, at a time when it was in a desperate position trying to salvage its free trade negotiations, and everything else that was going wrong with the Tories.

Parliament was recalled to deal with this legislation. Many people have brought to your attention, Sir, and to the attention of the Canadian public and the House of Commons that the Bill is seriously flawed. The Bill states that we have to punish people who bring in refugees. I could be punished. In the mid-1970s I participated in bringing the boat people from South East Asia. I was one of the people who participated in Project 4000 under the leadership of the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar), who was then the Mayor of Ottawa. At that time as Mayor of Ottawa she directed a very successful project of which I was a member. If I did that today would I be a criminal, according to the Tories? That is what the Bill states. What it ought to do is provide punishment for the criminals or the people who have done something wrong. The Bill should provide for the punishment of people who try to bring others to Canada in a fraudulent manner for profit. That is wrong. I am the first to say that is wrong, but that does not mean that everyone who participates in helping the underprivileged of this world is a criminal. It is obvious that people who give of their time in an unselfish manner are not criminals.

Finally, one must wonder about the Government. For the second consecutive summer the Government has failed so miserably to accomplish its legislative agenda that it had to recall Parliament. What does that tell you, Mr. Speaker? It tells me, and I am sure you will agree, that the Prime Minister and the Government cannot get their act together. The Government cannot get organized in order to get its legislation through before the summer recess. If the Government had gotten things under control Parliament would not have been recalled for so-called emergency situations two summers in a row.

This was the second attempt this summer to recall Parliament on a so-called emergency. You will recall that the first time the Deputy Prime Minister wanted Parliament recalled to deal with the drug Bill. As you know, he was more or less told by the Speaker to get lost, and that did not work out. A few weeks later the second so-called emergency arose, and this time the Government succeeded in getting Parliament reconvened, the real reason being to deal with the so-called first emergency rather than the second one.

[Translation]

What I mean, Mr. Speaker, is that for the better part of the year the Government has been wasting the time of the House. Among other things, I would draw your attention to the many hours the House spent on capital punishment, an issue which should not have been brought before the House in the first place.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Why?

Mr. Boudria: Because the matter had been settled a decade earlier already, as the Hon. Member opposite would know. The Prime Minister was quite reluctant to revive the death penalty debate, but he had made a commitment, one of his 338 election promises, and he just had to live up to one of them.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There will be time for questions and comments after the Hon. Member finishes his remarks. I hope Hon. Members will allow him to finish in order that we can have a very quiet day.

Mr. Boudria: As I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government made 338 promises during the last electoral campaign. I have here a copy of these 338 promises. I shall be quite happy to give one to the Hon. Member opposite, if he has forgotten his own commitments, and to any Canadian listening to us who would like to have one. If they write to my office postage free, I shall be happy to send them a copy of the book containing these 338 promises.

The Government decided to waste the time of the House with the debate on capital punishment instead of dealing with many other serious issues, such as finding a valid solution to the refugee problem, and various other pieces of legislation which would have been useful to improve the lot of the Canadian population, which is now suffering under this Conservative Government, but that is only temporary. The Conservative Government has managed its timetable so badly that it has had to call back Parliament for so-called emergencies two summers in a row. Having done so, it introduced Bills which were seriously defective, at least this year. I indicated earlier some of the weaknesses of this Bill. While I am the first to say that we need new legislation to deal with refugees, we have no right to pass defective legislation under the pretext that we need something else.

We have to offer the Canadian population legislation which is effective and better than what was there before.

Now that the Government has refused all amendments introduced by the Members of this House, including the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi), whom I would like to congratulate for his excellent work on this issue, and various other Members, such as the Chairman of the Committee, a Government Member, who has had the courage to tell the Canadian people and all parliamentarians that this Bill is defective and could not and should not be supported by anyone, I invite all the Members of this House to reject this Bill and ask the Government opposite to prepare a Bill which makes sense and which can be supported by the majority of Canadians.

We should not forget that it was the Members of the Opposition who demanded one year ago that the Government introduce a Bill dealing with refugees. The Government dragged its feet, and one year later, introduced an excessive, defective and badly written Bill and refused all amendments which could have improved it.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore invite all Members of this House to reject Bill C-84 because the Conservative Government has refused the amendments which could have made this Bill more acceptable. In its present form, the Bill is totally unacceptable for the great majority of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria). The refugee legislation which we are debating today, Bill C-84, and the other Bill that is in committee, Bill C-55, will become the refugee determination system. The Member quite rightly pointed out that we need legislation which stops abuse, but not on the backs of legitimate refugees; legislation which makes that clear in legal terms.

There are many parts of Bill C-84 which will be challenged in the courts because they do not live up to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms within our Canadian Constitution. All Canadians are equal under the law. That is why I was very disturbed this morning to read a letter from the President of the Canada Employment and Immigration Union who alleges that the Deputy Minister of Immigration and others would have violated the immigration laws of this land for a personal return or as a personal favour. That allegation must be investigated. If it is left unaddressed and swept under the carpet it will give a very clear signal to Canadians that there is one law for the Deputy Minister and his friends and another law for all other Canadians and claimants.

I would like my hon. friend to address for a moment that very dangerous signal which can be sent out. At the very time the Government is talking about curbing abuse, we have heard an allegation by a union president that abuse is taking place in the higher offices of the Government. Would the Hon. Member share his comments on this issue with the House?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I first want to thank my colleague, the Member for York West for that excellent question. He is very rapidly becoming one of the most knowledgeable experts in this House on immigration and refugee issues. Very clearly what the Member is indicating to us is that the allegations made, albeit not thoroughly investigated yet, do give an indication at this very delicate time to many Canadians that certain individuals appear to act in a manner which suggests they are above the law. There is one law for ordinary Canadians in immigration policy, and there is another law for my constituent who is trying to get her mother and father into Canada. Some have to wait endlessly in a line—two years in one case of a constituent from Orleans to whom I spoke this morning. There is another law for those who want an individual to be here for what appears to be some form of personal reward. That gives a very dangerous signal to Canadians. Compound that fact with the two things I have just described, plus the two following issues: one, the arbitrary piece of legislation with which we are dealing now with its tremendous failing. Second, this country is not even meeting its immigration quotas it now has. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we are short by tens of thousands—I believe the number is somewhere in the order of some 40,000 or 50,000 people short of meeting the quotas—

Mr. Witer: The levels for 1987 are 115,000, up from 85,000 in 1984.

Mr. Boudria: The Member sitting to my extreme right, which is appropriate under the circumstance, could correct me if he says that we are meeting our immigration quotas. My understanding is that we are between 40,000 and 50,000 short of meeting our immigration quotas.

Mr. Redway: Immigration has increased in the last three years.

Mr. Boudria: Members will have their opportunities to state whether in fact the Government is meeting its quotas. The Government has increased the quota, yes. The target is increasing, but the shortcomings are worse, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Witer: The number of landings was 100,000 in 1986, up from 84,000 in 1984.

Mr. Boudria: We are desperately short of staff to handle the number of claimants in the area of refugees. We know how badly equipped we are there. We know that it takes a year and a half or so for the refugee determination process, and in the way of applications for immigration it is even worse.

It seems, at least from the allegation made by the union in this case, that if you know the right person at the right time for the right reason, the rest is irrelevant. You can get into Canada very quickly.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the other area of concern I would like to have the Member address is the concern that regardless of what the clauses purport to say, claim or do, many legal experts have testified before the committee that the legislation and the particular clauses are seriously flawed. This piece of legislation will be tied up by the courts, which would have the effect of paralyzing the policy which is the concern of the legal community. Here we have a Government that brought us together under the guise of an emergency only to have in 12 months, 16 months or 18 months this policy which will be made null and void and unworkable because there will be rulings by the Supreme Court or other courts that will make a determination that it is unconstitutional.

In light of that, would the Hon. Member support having the Government send this piece of legislation directly to the Supreme Court for a judicial review so that we can buy some time and alleviate having the legislation travelling a very slow and agonizing death in the courts? The purpose of a judicial review would be to get a Supreme Court ruling immediately so that we may determine whether this legislation is unconstitutional.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, with regard to this Bill, as reprehensible as it may be, as awful a piece of legislation as it is—and we all know that it is that—I think the Hon. Member is quite right in saying that if the Government wants to proceed with a Bill that is bad, we have to disagree with it. However, why not send it to the courts before proclamation and make a commitment now in the House? I invite the Minister to do that. We will not proclaim the Bill but send it to the courts and obtain the necessary rulings first and only then proceed with it. I am expressing a personal view here, with which I am sure my colleague, the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi), will agree. If the Bill is sent to the courts and the courts determine that it is not only reprehensible but unconstitutional, hopefully the Government will then drop the whole issue, start all over again and draft a proper piece of legislation which we all recognize we need.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment on the Hon. Member's suggestion. I might remind him that the legislation is intended indeed to end abuses and prevent a massive invasion of illegal immigrants into Canada.

I might remind him that while in 1980 the number of claims totaled 1,600, it reached 18,000 in 1986 and went up to 16,500 for the first seven months of this year.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill is aimed indeed at putting an end to all those abuses and to the entry of illegal immigrants into Canada. What we are proposing is to impose heavier penalties for smugglers and carriers and also possible detention until the identity of the person seeking entry into Canada can be established.

It would therefore seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that these are appropriate provisions in the circumstances, in view of the recent entry of illegal immigrants into Canada. So we have to act as a responsible nation to protect both our borders and the people of Canada.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member opposite just told us himself, no doubt inadvertently, that the legislation was not urgent. He just told us the number of refugee claims has increased gradually. So if there were something like 4,000 claims in 1984, 8,000 in 1985, 18,000 in 1986 and so on, this leads me to wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the increase was gradual, why the Government waited until six or seven weeks ago to decide there was an emergency. Obviously this is hypocrisy. Because the Hon. Member himself admitted the number of refugees or refugee claimants was 346 a week, for every week in 1987. So there was no urgency in any one week in August or July. Such was the case during all the other weeks. He just admitted inadvertently that the Conservative Government has been acting hypocritically, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the debate on Bill C-84. Like the previous Member, I was not in committee but I have listened carefully to the debaters on this motion. Having myself been involved in issues with refugees and having travelled abroad, I think I have an understanding of some of the issues.

First, I would like to congratulate my colleague, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) who has worked very hard on the committee and before this House to bring to the Canadian public's attention and that of the Members of this House some of the very serious issues related to this Bill. I would have to join others in a non-partisan vote of appreciation for the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) who very eloquently yesterday and today addressed the issues. Finally I would like to show my appreciation for the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais).

I think it is significant that Members from three Parties are commenting and raising concern about this Bill. It is particularly difficult, I am sure, for the Hon. Member for La Prairie to make his views known. I believe he has done so because, having heard the evidence, he can see some of the flaws that might rest in this legislation. That is a very significant point because the House was recalled on the basis of the situation being a national emergency. I would mention, if I can comment as a new Member, that that is not always reflected by the number of Hon. Members who are here.

First, I would like to say that—

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Far be it from me to chastise the Hon. Member because that would not be fair. Perhaps the Chair might wish to refer the new Hon. Member to the rules of the House as they apply to the presence or absence in the House of all Hon. Members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) is correct in rising on a point of order. The Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) is a new Member. I appreciate the fact that she is not quite aware that Hon. Members are not to reflect on who is present and who is not present in the Chamber. I am sure she will accordingly take heed of House rules.

Ms. McLaughlin: Thank you for drawing that to my attention, Mr. Speaker.

I do not assume that government Members have a malevolent view and are trying to do something harmful or be overly repressive. However, I would say that one must observe that in trying to redress an abuse, there seems to be somewhat of an absence of common sense. This reflects a misunderstanding or at least a naive understanding of world politics. I believe it does not address the real concerns of Canadians. I would like to focus on those points.

This Bill will be remembered as the Bill that turned back ships at sea and provided penalties for those church groups and interested citizens who acted in good conscience as world citizens to protect those people whose lives and livelihoods were in danger. We in Canada have been fortunate because for over 100 years, we have not experienced war. Our political process has been free. We have had the right to participate without loss of life or liberty.

I was born in Canada during the Second World War. My family is of Scottish and British heritage. While my family was not rich, we are privileged. We have never had to live in fear of authorities because of our political views. A member of our family has never been taken away in the middle of the night and never seen again. We have never been persecuted because of our religion, our colour, our ethnic origin or our culture.

In 1939, if I had been of a different ethnic origin, of a different religion, from a different country, I may have been one of those Jews who were turned away from Canadian shores to die in a concentration camp. However, I was fortunate. I was a Canadian.

Recently I spent time travelling in South and Central America. I met people who were afraid to speak, people who had been punished for speaking out against their Government, people who lived in fear, people who because they fight for what they believe in were not just ostracized by their society, not simply ridiculed by their peers but were put into a situation that was a matter of life and death. I suggest that very few Canadians can truly know what that means. Some people may feel that it has been exaggerated and that that is not the way it really is in other parts of the world today. Alas, this is not the case.

One of the most difficult challenges faced by citizens of free countries is first to acknowledge that we are privileged and second to acknowledge that this privilege carries with it a tremendous responsibility, a responsibility to understand what not being free means. As legislators, we are free to disagree publicly and to appear on television or in the media challenging the Government. We must accept responsibility and acknowledge that just because we are all right and safe, we should not become smug. Nor can we have the luxury of isolating ourselves from the realities of a harsher world.

We must accept that freedom undefended is freedom lost. Certainly we cannot have control over other countries, but we must do our utmost to give refuge to those who live in peril and fear because of their beliefs. We cannot turn a blind eye to them. I suggest that as Members not only of this House but of the media learn more about political life in countries outside Canada, we are forced to acknowledge that our safe, free world is not the whole world. One is reminded of Marshall McLuhan who wrote that the world is a global village.

Certainly few of us can be isolated. Few of us can simply say: "Just don't bother us because everything is fine here".

For a moment, let us review the history of refugees whose descendants make up part of our safe, free and democratic society today. They are the blacks who fled pre-Civil War America to escape from a system of slavery which was then legal south of the border. They are Irish immigrants who fled the famine in their native country in the 1800s. They are refugees from Marxist Russia, Mennonites, Hungarians, Czechoslovakians and Indo-Chinese boat people. All these people came here because they wanted to be free to participate in our democracy and in many cases, they were fleeing for their lives.

By and large, these people have integrated into society. I am sure many of their descendants are represented on legislatures all across Canada. In fact, one could suggest that for some of us, though not for myself, it might be very difficult to do in one's country of origin what one can do freely and openly in Canada, and that is, to argue against the Government and the Government's policies, something we are doing today in an open and democratic society.

Canadians have long had pride in our international reputation as a host to legitimate refugees. In past decades, refugees from many other places have formed a valued part of our social fabric. The Government's response makes a mockery of the contribution these former refugees have made to our country by offering a type of legislation in Bill C-84 that treats all potential refugees as criminals rather than as prospective citizens. It is based in many instances on a presumption of guilt as opposed to a presumption of innocence until, through a fair hearing, it can be proven whether or not a person is a legitimate refugee.

I suggest that the Government has generated a great deal of misinformation to justify anti-refugee legislation. Let me take a moment to discuss three of the most commonly heard myths used to justify this legislation. First, it has been said that refugee claimants in Canada are queue jumpers who make it more difficult for legitimate refugees to come to Canada. I do not know who first used the term "queue jumpers", but it gives a visual image of a nice, neat line-up of people standing there with documents in hand waiting to get into Canada. Then someone comes along and elbows them out of the way to get ahead. That is an image none of us like, and one can see the public's response. In fact, people who have gone through the immigration process do not see it as a nice, neat line. They waited many years and it is often a very complex process.

Problems in the immigration process certainly contribute to the current refugee question. We believe they are solvable and must be addressed. While the Government has attempted to do this, its tactics and methods are much more severe than necessary.

I have also heard expressed the opinion that Canada has too many immigrants. Other speakers have addressed this point. How many immigrants Canada should have is partly a matter of personal opinion. We in the north, for example, may have a different view than those in southern Canada. We have had a number of refugees in the north, in the Yukon, and they have been extremely important contributing members of our society. It is certainly not the most hospitable environment for some, perhaps, but I can say unequivocally that these people have contributed a tremendous amount to our society.

About 50,000 people emigrate from Canada to other countries every year. We do have our own out-migration. As other speakers have mentioned, while immigration increased to some extent, we have not reached our set limits. For example, the Government set a target of about 115,000 immigrants this year, and in 1986 there were slightly over 99,000.

The third comment one hears, which really has not been discouraged by the Government, is the suggestion that terrorists use the refugee system to get into Canada. That really does not make much sense because most modern terrorists are well-trained and well-funded. They can easily obtain counterfeit passports and visas, and it is not likely that a terrorist will go through the very uncomfortable process of passage in an overcrowded boat to land in Canada in the middle of the night when they could quite easily come here through more legitimate means.

I would like to address one other area of this Bill and its emergency nature that is, the impression that the Canadian people have been calling for the Government to do something about this problem. I agree, as other members of the NDP have agreed, that there is a need for better refugee legislation. I do not think anyone in this House can accurately say what all Canadians think. We have to form our opinions based on those who contact us, and the media, and so on. Therefore, I would like to share with the House the thoughts of Canadians who have contacted me. I have a number of letters but I will just read some excerpts from a few of them to give the tenor of what they are saying to me. I have not been selective in any way. Being a new Member I have not received a lot of mail on this subject but these do represent the general tenor of the letters I have received.

I have one from Whitehorse, Yukon, and the person talks in some detail about the refugee. She says there has been a lot in the news about the ship people who came to Canada illegally. She says we cannot turn away people who are in danger of losing their lives. There must be a way to control this so the system is fair to everyone concerned. She imagines that people who are trying to come to Canada legally are frustrated, but we cannot deny the refugees at the same time.

I also have a letter from Winnipeg, Manitoba, from someone who writes to express deep concern about the Bill to curb the flow of refugees coming into Canada. If passed, this law will result in thousands of legitimate refugee claimants being deported to the countries from which they fled, where many of them will face unjust imprisonment, torture and death. This person does not believe the Government's assertion that only bogus claimants will be turned away. A look at the provisions of the Bill makes that clear. All refugee claimant applicants will be given only one chance to make a claim when they arrive in Canada. The person goes on to describe some other concerns and summarizes by expressing great concern that we will be denying entry to people fleeing persecution in violation both of our commitment under the UN Convention and of Christian and humanitarian principles. The person is not at all concerned about the few would-be immigrants who might make false refugee claims in order to bypass regular immigration channels. If Canada's immigration laws were liberalized, there would be no need for these persons to attempt such desperate measures. It is ironic that even our present low immigration quotas are not being filled, while thousands around the world are waiting anxiously to come to Canada. He asks as both a Christian and a Canadian citizen that we cause this Bill to be withdrawn, defeated or amended.

I have another letter from Whitehorse, Yukon, again. Bona fide refugees should be able to find a safe haven in Canada, it says.

Another letter is from Quebec. Briefly stated, the concerns are as follows. Refugees who may arrive in desperate circumstances and without documented evidence of persecution in their homeland will be required to make a credible plea for refugee status within a very short period of time. If they are denied refugee status, if they give the determination panel the wrong answers out of fear of authority or because they are confused, their grounds for appeal are severely limited. This person goes on to express some other concerns and sums up by asking the Government to withdraw the Bill in order that it be replaced with legislation which will end current abuses.

I have another letter from North Bay, Ontario, which says that the ships landing refugees on our shore, the futile attempts of our Navy to intercept incoming refugees, all bring to mind what happened earlier in our history. It summarizes by saying, "Let these people in. These are lives we are talking about, not just written statistics. Do not let history repeat itself."

While I do not purport to speak for all Canadians, I have tried to reflect what some Canadians are saying, those who have contacted me. They are saying what the NDP is saying. We need good legislation. We do not need abusive or repressive legislation.

There are two concerns I would like to highlight and then speak briefly to some points which we believe would improve the legislation. The present law allows the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher) to sign a certificate saying that someone is a security risk without saying what the evidence against that person is. It is evident to anyone who might be in that position that this is obviously unacceptable in a free society. People have a right to know why they are being turned away.

Another area I would like to refer to is the necessity for documentation. It is quite impossible to have documentation when you are fleeing a country. That is only common sense.

• (1330)

In conclusion, I urge Members to think about improvements to this Bill. We can solve the problem without abusing others and being repressive.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): As I was listening to the remarks made by my hon. friend, I felt again it was necessary to remind the House of the reasons behind this Bill C-84 dealing with immigrants and refugees. Mr. Speaker, why did Canada come to the conclusion that it had to pass a new legislation in this area? It is because of the immigrants who were arriving in increasing number at our border points seeking refugee status while not being truly refugees. When you realize that there were 1,600 refugees in 1980, 18,000 in 1986, and as many as 16,500 over the past seven months, it is clear that the Government had to take steps to remedy the situation. It is still more pressing when we see boat people coming to our shores and trying to enter Canada illegally, while other people follow the usual channel, respecting our Canadian laws and regulations, and trying to enter Canada legally.

Faced with this wave of people coming to Canada seeking refugee status while not being necessarily true refugees, Canada had to act to remedy the situation.

Moreover, what the Bill is doing, Mr. Speaker, is to impose heavier penalties on smugglers who are helping people enter Canada illegally. In addition to imposing heavier penalties on them, it will make it possible for immigration authorities to detain these people until they make sure of their identities. I want to remind my hon. friend of this: When someone arrives in Canada without proper documents, we are going simply to detain him or her until we can make sure of his or her identity. It seems to me to be normal for us, as the Govenrment, to do our utmost to protect our fellow Canadians and make sure we know those who are coming to Canada. If they are true refugees, Mr. Speaker, they will be allowed to enter Canada. Otherwise, they will not be allowed to enter this country, and I suggest it is our duty as the Government—and I suggest the Opposition should support the Government in this endeavour—to make sure that the people entering this country do so legally, following the usual channels, and that they submit to the normal process to enter this country as immigrants.

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Hon. Member's comments. He asks if we should let people in without documentation. I would say yes, because it is very difficult to get documentation, receive a proper hearing and have a proper investigation. Anyone who has visited a country from which many refugees come would be naive to assume that one could simply go to the friendly immigration office or Minister of Immigration to obtain the proper papers in order to flee the country for being outspoken. Those people should simply be given a proper hearing, and if they are found not to be legitimate refugees, proper action can then be taken. However, they should be entitled to a fair and proper hearing.

Second, it has not often been stated that part of the problem may be with the immigration process as it exists. There is not enough processing of immigrants in many of the countries from which they come. Those who could apply under the regular immigration process are frustrated by the lack of personnel and delay in processing, and therefore try to use other routes.

Many refugees in the world are women. This is of special concern because often they are the most disadvantaged, subject to the most physical and mental abuse, and often have dependent children. They are frequently in dangerous situations, with no ability to control their fertility.

While they are perhaps one of the most disadvantaged people, our immigration policies have not looked upon them favourably.

We cannot be naive about the ability of refugees to obtain documents. Second, an improvement to the immigration process would greatly alleviate the problem of refugees attempting to enter by other means.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the Government introduced a Bill at a time when the House is supposed to be in recess. It says that we are faced with an emergency. The Hon. Member for Jonquière (Mr. Blackburn), voiced a similar sentiment a couple of minutes ago. He talked about the flood of refugees and how we must deal with them quickly.

Does my colleague not find this strange when the Government permitted hundreds of Portuguese people to come to Canada claiming refugee status because they were Jehovah's Witnesses and were being mistreated in Portugal, and permitted hundreds of Turks who, having lived through a military dictatorship were moving toward a democratic system and came to this country claiming refugee status? Yet the Government could not get its act together to pass a simple regulation that those coming from Turkey and Portugal who wanted to claim refugee status would at least need to have a Canadian visa before coming to Canada. If the Government did not believe quick action was necessary in those cases, how can it now say that we are facing an emergency and must pass the kind of repressive legislation it is proposing?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I am probably not very qualified to comment on what is and what is not an emergency in the House, having only been here for a few weeks. However, I refer again to the issue of immigration policy and the definition of who is a refugee and who is an immigrant. That has become very clouded, not only in the minds of the public but in the minds of those who are attempting to come to this country.

As a Canadian, I do not want to be seen as repressive and attempting to shut out people who are in fear of their lives while others can apply by jumping the line.

Obviously, the House was recalled on the basis of 174 Sikhs landing on our shores. An article in today's Ottawa Citizen dealt with comments from immigration workers who would be implementing these policies if they were passed. We should also be concerned that we are asking these employees to carry out some rather reprehensible tasks, including boarding boats and turning people away. We should consider if that is the way we want to operate in a free, democratic Canadian society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question and comment period is over. Debate. The Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou (Mr. Gagliano) has the floor.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this momentous debate because the future and life of Canada are on the line. Anyone familiar with certain polls or certain comments in the media and listening to this debate would get the impression that Canadians do not take kindly to refugees. That is where I beg to differ. Canadians are not against refugees, but they have no sympathy for any individual or group resorting to illegal tactics to enter this country.

Indeed, Canadians are against bogus refugees. Canada is now in a dilemma, Mr. Speaker, and in the 20 minutes I have I will attempt to explain why we have this phoney refugee dilemma. Precisely because our immigration policy makes it impossible for refugees to qualify, those who could very well qualify and contribute to the development of our country, it does not offer them the opportunity to settle here and become good Canadian citizens.

The Conservative approach to immigrants and refugees might be described as selective. Here is what I mean, Mr. Speaker. I would point out from the outset that the total number of immigrants who entered Canada in 1974 was in excess of 200,000, whereas only 86,000 arrived here in 1986. That is a significant difference, Mr. Speaker.

This Government gives greater priority to business-oriented immigrants than the previous administration did. For example, the number of such immigrants rose from 3,555 in 1984 to 5,369 in 1986. In addition, the Government lowered the eligibility criteria for this category.

When the Liberals were in office, business-oriented immigrants had to have more than money, they also had to have the kind of skills which would enable them to make a significant contribution to Canada's economic growth.

Mr. Speaker, we should not throw our doors wide open to these people simply because they bring money with them. I have nothing against money, and it stands to reason that any foreign capital entering Canada and invested in our economy should be welcome because it creates jobs and spurs economic growth to some extent.

Mr. Speaker, one thing to which I object is making money the sole criterion. When someone wants to come to Canada, apart from having some capital to invest, he should also have some ability, something which will allow him to create a new market, develop new products or services, so that we may develop our economy and create jobs without Canadians losing anything by it.

If someone enters Canada with some money and buys an existing store, he will compete with a Canadian business. In selecting immigrant investors, we of course have to look at financial considerations, but we must also look at some rather important criteria, such as their qualifications, capacities, knowledge and the new markets they could create if they came to Canada.

In contrast to the figures I quoted earlier for immigrant investors, the number of family class immigrants decreased by 10,000 between 1984 and 1986, falling from 51,981 in 1984 to 42,798 in 1986.

It should also be emphasized that the Government often refers to the number of immigrants who apply, which is substantially different from the number of immigrants accepted in fact. Many people apply to our immigration offices asking to immigrate to Canada, but they are not necessarily accepted.

Canadians complain increasingly about the system and the fact that the authorities do not allow them to sponsor immigrants. Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency where 40 per cent of the people come from minority ethnic groups, mostly Italian, of course, but also Polish, Haitian, Greek and Portuguese. The Saint-Leonard—Anjou constituency reflects the Canadian mosaic, with all ethnic groups being represented. Not too long ago, we held a multicultural youth festival. The weather was not very pleasant, but we were there anyway.

It is therefore normal, Mr. Speaker, that, as a Member of Parliament, I often have that frustration. And there lies the dilemma, when Canadians tell us they are against refugees. Not that they are against refugees, simply they do not understand how it is possible for groups to get to our borders. Those people who are good Canadian citizens, who have things of their own, who even have businesses, who are ready to give up their homes, everything they own to have their relatives come to Canada, have to wait a given period of time and in 95 per cent of cases, Mr. Speaker, their relatives are not even allowed entry. So they have to use that illegal way, to claim refugee status. Perhaps this honourable House would be amazed to hear that there are even refugees of Italian origin. It has come to this. Why? It so happens that the doors have been shut so tight in Canada that people who want to come here have to claim refugee status. There is no other way, unless you have money. In order to come to Canada, one must have loads of money or be a refugee.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if only we could have a policy that would allow both genuine refugees to come to Canada and enjoy protection, and people who have all the qualifications of a good Canadian, who have parents or relatives in Canada, to come without resorting to unrealistic and often illegal means, all would be well.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal Party oppose Bill C-84. Because actually Bill C-84 and Bill C-55 fail to solve the problem we are now facing in Canada. Why does the Government not address that immigration policy, the whole matter of immigration that is so vital to Canada? The reason I already gave in this House, Mr. Speaker, at second reading stage. If in 1958 Canada had had the immigration policy or what is proposed in Bill C-84 and then in Bill C-55, I for one would not be here today in Canada and in this House to speak on immigration policy. This is the problem we have, Mr. Speaker. We cannot afford, as a country that is so great, so vast, so generous, to have legislation as restrictive and repressive as Bill C-84.

Of course, Government Members will suggest: You Liberals only criticize. What would you propose? Mr. Speaker, I view Canadian immigration policy as so important, so vital a matter that if I may, I would like to state the Liberal Party's position—a position that is clear and tolerant, that reflects Canada's unique nature.

Let me make it quite clear that we strongly deplore the facts that a few unscrupulous counsellors and other similar profiteers abuse our refugee status determination system. We will support any reasonable measure designed to remove people who take advantage of refugees and of the system. However you should know that the legislation already contains certain provisions under which the Government can take legal action against these people. So we have to make sure that the new measures are an improvement over the existing legislative provisions.

Under Sections 19 to 32 of the Immigration Act, 1976, individuals with a criminal record or likely to indulge in criminal activity are inadmissible in this country. Before being deported pursuant to these sections, the individuals involved must be given a hearing. Subsections 95(i), (j) and (n) also provide that legal action will be taken against counsellors and other profiteers.

Subsection 95(n) under which action had been taken against the captain of the Amelia stipulates that the author of a criminal act may be fined a maximum of $5,000, or imprisoned for a term of less than two years, or both. In the case of summary conviction the subsection provides for a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment for a term of less than six months, or both. Criminal Code sections concerning fraud may also be invoqued.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the Government did have a law to take measures to enforce the legislation on the immigration of refugees to Canada. There is no emergency just because 174 people landed on our shores. In the past, Mr. Speaker, Canada did welcome hundreds of thousands of refugees. However, we never had to call back the House of Commons during the summer. It is not that I do not enjoy being here, but like every other Member of Parliament, I had planned to meet my constituents during the summer. However, we are now here to discuss a problem which the Government could have dealt with. Could there be other reasons? I do not want to discuss these reasons for the moment because I believe that the whole refugee issue is important for Canada and I shall use what time remains to speak about it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that, as early as in 1980, when our Party was in power, the former Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), had recognized the problems we are facing today. Studies had been made and changes were officially recommended, in 1984 by Ed Ratushny, and in 1985 by Rabbi Plaut, both of whom had been commissioned by the Liberal Government to find solutions before the refugee problem became a real crisis. We Liberals therefore ask for a quicker refugee determination process with universal access. We shall continue to demand two minimum guarantees: First, that there be a hearing for each claimant, which guarantee was ruled necessary by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1985 in the Singh case, and second, that we keep our international commitment as signatory of the United Nations Convention on Refugees never to extradite a claimant to a country where he might be in danger. We cannot give our support to any legislation which does not contain these two guarantees.

We also ask for an broader definition of the family class which better corresponds to the concept of the extended family held by many immigrants. For many of them, it is quite normal for a cousin to live under their roof and be considered a member of the immediate family. We are talking here about cousins, Mr. Speaker, but at the present time, neither the brothers nor the sisters are allowed to come to Canada. Often, even the parents—I shall never forget the first immigration case I had to deal within my riding. I did not even have furniture in my office when a man entered and told me this: I have a problem. My mother is 75 years old, and I have managed to bring her here as a tourist. I was in Italy attending my father's funeral and I just could not leave her all alone over there. I brought her here as a tourist. Upon her arrival, I went to the immigration office. The officer told me: You will have to send her back to Italy. She will have to submit there an application to come here. Mr. Speaker, you can easily imagine the anxiety of that woman. She was 75 years old and all her family was settled here in Canada. She had no one back there. Now, the immigration officer had said she had to go back to Italy.

Those are the policies which the Government should define. I am sure that once it has done so, and properly defined as well the enlarged families of Canadians with relatives abroad, established a system making it possible for these people to submit applications to enter Canada through our embassies and consulates abroad, following a process which is neither too long nor too complex, I am sure we will be able to deal with the false refugee problem, because we would be left only with true refugees. I think that Canada should do its share to help true refugees who are seeking asylum in this country.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we, as Liberals, are strongly urging the Government to take initiatives, either through the United Nations or a Commonwealth or francophonie conference, such as the one which is being held now, to convince the other countries whose refugee status determination systems are experiencing the same problems, to work together to develop a satisfactory and global solution for all countries.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the problem of false refugees or refugees generally is an international one which will exist until this Conservative Government takes the necessary steps and shows leadership to call on all other countries, either through the United Nations or such other organizations as the Commonwealth or francophonie to develop a global refugee policy, so that Canada, together with a great many other nations, can meet this human and international need. As a country, if we pass legislation like Bill C-84 we will be moving one step back, and everything previous Governments did, whether Liberal or Conservative, will be viewed as a thing of the past and Canada will be moving towards a closed-door policy, becoming in the process a country that does not accept people who have the will, the spirit, and the courage to settle in a new country. People often think that is an easy thing to do. I went through that experience, being an immigrant myself. I can tell you that when you come here, not knowing the language, having no money and having a hard time finding a job it takes courage to stay here to work. Today I am proud of having made that step in 1958. I am proud to be a Canadian. I am proud to be a Member of this House, and I hope we will keep on allowing people like myself to do what I have done.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Hon. Member not only as a fellow Member of Parliament but as a fellow immigrant, but before that I listened to the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria), and I listened to the new Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin). They spoke as Canadians. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, it was high time this House was recalled because after the arrival of illegal refugees, false refugees and I emphasize false, we as immigrants, we thought that by coming in—

Mr. Boudria: As you are!

Mr. Della Noce: If my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) is smart enough to listen . . . did we listen to him a moment ago? He might understand what we are talking about. I am not finished.

Mr. Speaker, people in our ridings were calling us—50 to 60 calls a day—and these people were on the war-path against genuine refugees. I am an immigrant, and when I first came to Canada I considered that I was privileged to be accepted by this country. In return I worked like a good Canadian. But today this privilege no longer means anything because anybody can enter this country.

This is why I say it had become imperative to recall the House, it was urgent. Are we expecting one boat, two, three or four boats? . . . that is the kind of things we did when we were going to school. It had to stop. I agree with my colleague from Saint-Léonard—Anjou (Mr. Gagliano) when he says that we probably have to open certain things.

But I am telling him that all those who apply for their card or their immigrant-refugee status arrive here as tourists. Yet the law states that they must apply from outside the country. This legislation was not passed by the Conservatives, it was already in force under the previous administration and, until further order, I am not a lawyer but as far as I know we have to abide by the existing legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that the people back home are glad to see that we are coming to grips with the problem. We are not trying to prevent people from coming to Canada, quite the contrary. We want to give a chance to those who have been waiting for years to become citizens before this privilege is taken away from them by others who come here illegally by boat. I had that privilege myself, and again I express my gratitude to Canada for having accepted me as an immigrant.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his comments and his questions. As I was trying to explain at the very beginning, the difficulty is that you have to differentiate between immigrants and refugees. The public now confuses these two groups.

Mr. Speaker, I can suggest a solution. I am convinced that if we have an open and well-established immigration policy with a faster selection system, there will definitely be fewer refugees and those who do come to Canada will be legitimate refugees.

However, Mr. Speaker, we must not take advantage of the public protests to pass repressive legislation.

As politicians, we have to play a leadership role and determine what type of society we want in Canada. Do we want a Canada with closed doors which will admit only people with money even if they do not have any technical qualifications? That is the issue, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, while I agree partly with the comments of my colleague, I believe that, as politicians, we cannot say: Yes, the public is right and we shall pass repressive legislation.

We have to explain the true situation to the public. The fact is that we find it difficult ourselves at times to differentiate between refugees and immigrants because the legislation is rather complex.

Finally, I would like to say that, naturally, the Government can always try to put all the blame on the Liberals. We were in power for just nine months under twenty years. Everything that has happened can therefore be blamed on the Liberals.

What I can tell my hon. colleague is that, when the Conservative Government came to power, two studies had been made which suggested specific solutions as to what should be done. The Government decided to do nothing and to make more studies. Three years have passed and the crisis continues.

We are now facing a serious problem, but if we could put party politics aside, I believe that we could develop a good immigration policy for Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the Hon. Members for York East (Mr. Redway), York West (Mr. Marchi) and Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy) for questions within the next five minutes.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question or two to the Hon. Member. On July 17, on The National on the CBC the Leader of the Member's Party said:

> That boat might well have been apprehended and could have been turned back because this is not a legitimate refugee process.

The reporter asked:

> Do we know that now?

The Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) replied:

> Well, we know that the boat apparently comes from Europe and I don't know of any country in Europe that's persecuting people. I mean, this is not a boat that came from a country of origin.

On July 19, on the CBC radio program Cross-Country Checkup, when asked by a reporter:

> But Mr. Turner, how do we know that some of these people wouldn't qualify under the Canadian system?

—the Hon. Leader of the Opposition said:

> Well, they're not—if they came from Europe they were not fleeing a situation where they were facing prosecution or imprisonment or death. Well, I think the burden of proof—in situations where you've got a commercial enterprise and obviously a fraudulent effort to manipulate and bypass our regular refugee or our immigration policy—is on the boat.

On The National on July 27, he said:

> The people on board could have been examined given some due processing, either at sea, or at port.

Does the Hon. Member agree with those statements by the Leader of his Party or does he, rather, agree with statements by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) who, when asked about those statements on July 20 on CBC's Newshour said:

> I have some difficulty in appreciating that position, in its entirety, because our position has been for the last two years, and that he's advocating as, is that there needs to be a processing.

On the same day on CBC's Newshour the Hon. Member for York West said:

> I don't concur with that. I believe that processing should be done, and one should be assured of the determination.

Subsequently, on August 1, when asked about the situation, the Hon. Member for York West said that the Leader of the Opposition never checked with him before speaking out.

Now, does the Hon. Member agree with the position of his Party Leader, does he agree with the position of the Hon. Member for York West or, alternatively, does he agree with the Director of Communications for the Liberal Party who, when asked about the situation, said:

> It was very windy that day.

Does the Hon. Member agree with his Leader on this position, does the agree with the Hon. Member for York West, or does he agree with Mr. Raymond Heard,the Opposition Leader's communications director?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, after the way in which the Hon. Member addressed the question I wonder whether I should continue in his vein and ask him if he agrees with his Leader who said that he considers those people to be illegal aliens as if they were coming from the moon.

The Member is trying to create the impression that there is a discrepancy between the statements of the Liberal Leader and those of our official spokesperson on immigration. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) for the fight he has been leading on behalf of the Liberal Party and for the speech he delivered in the House yesterday.

This is the Conservative way of doing things instead of standing up and stating a position. The other day the Member got up in the House and said that there were 10,000 Sicilians in his riding. I would like to remind the Member that Sicily is part of Italy, it has not yet separated. I also come from Sicily.

Instead of expressing the concerns of his constituents and proposing a solution to this crisis, he is trying to find a discrepancy among Liberal Members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to advise Hon. Members that the Hon. Member has exceeded the time for questions and comments, but I will allow the Hon. Members for York West and Windsor—Walkerville to ask questions if they will ease up on the preambles.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I followed with much interest and am very proud of the speech made by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou (Mr. Gagliano).

Proud because he spoke in a way that was both very emotional and very practical of his experience as an immigrant, and of the role played by the immigration process in developing and building this country. Because this country's history is based on the immigration process, and he explained in a very moving, very sensitive manner the immigrant's story. He has not travelled all over the world to find his new land. So if that immigrant had not enjoyed the life that is yours and mine in this country, we would have no immigrants in Parliament. But the Hon. Member rightly said that we need an immigration policy in order to make this country bigger and better than it is today.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou how he views an immigration policy, at the time when we have many people living in Canada, families with no boys or girls and a population that is getting so old. How does the Hon. Member view an immigration policy for this country's future?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for those encouraging words. In the past, Canada has always had a family immigration policy. It is partly because of this policy that we all came to this country, and without offending anyone, I would like to point out that we all came here from somewhere else, either in the fifties, in the 19th century or at another time.

We therefore have to remember what we were, what we are now and what we want to become.

I believe that, first, an extended family immigration policy would promote family reunion. Second, it would allow a selection of immigrants more appropriate to the development of Canada, and third, it would enable Canada to increase its population. There is a serious decrease in the birth rate. If we close our doors to immigrants, we shall have serious problems in the next century.

Immigration is therefore a development tool for Canada, and not only a development tool, but also a means of survival.

• (1410)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A very short question from the Member for Windsor—Walkerville.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, given that there is before the committee Bill C-55, a piece of legislation intended to speed up the refugee determination policy or process, and there is suggested as an alternative, and has been before the Government as an alternative, one variation or another of the refugee determination process recommended by the Canadian Council of Churches, does the Hon. Member really think that Bill C-84 is, in the final analysis, necessary?

If the Hon. Member regards it as unnecessary, would he be tempted to suspect, knowing that there is a great deal of fear because of unemployment and xenophobia and a measure in some quarters of fear mongering, that this Bill is not really intended to address the issue of abuse, abuse that is based on the extended time period heretofore required for refugee determination? Is it really a transparent effort to take advantage of a great deal of concern rather than to take the time to explain the cause for abuse and to communicate a better understanding, not only of the situation with respect to refugees and immigrants, but perhaps a better notion of where the future of this country lies if we are to continue to have a decreasing birth rate with its implications for the future economic and political stability of Canada?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer the questions briefly. I think some of the Hon. Member's questions I answered in my speech. I asked why we had two or three Bills, such as Bills C-84 and C-55. We need one policy in the global picture of our immigration policy, and without it I do not think we will solve any problems.

As to the birth rate and future population development, as I answered my colleague, the Hon. Member for York West, a good open immigration policy—I spoke about family reunification—is the cornerstone of our future development. If we continue in the same direction we are in now, we will have serious problems because of declining birth rates and fewer immigrants, and I go as far as to say that the survival of Canada might be in danger in future years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour).

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, about 20 years ago it was my honour to represent the Department of Justice and the Department of Immigration for the Immigration Appeal Board, and from that long time interest in immigration matters, I have some comments about why I will not be able to support this Bill when it comes to a vote, I take it, next week. I will not be here to vote in favour of this measure.

First, I fully support the fact that a legislative remedy is needed to the current problem of manifestly patent or bogus refugee claims being made in Canada. They are being made daily and in virtually every city in Canada. Indeed, Sir, the stated purposes of the Bill to protect genuine refugees in need of protection; to control widespread abuse of refugee procedures in light of organized large scale introduction of persons into Canada to take advantage of the refugee procedures; to deter smugglers and thereby minimize risk to and exploitation of persons seeking to come to Canada; to respond to security concerns, including our obligation to protect internationally protected persons, are widely supported, I believe, by people of good will across our nation. They set a good framework for what the Bill should contain.

For the most part, Sir, the objectives do not appear to me to have been addressed in the Bill. I understand—and if I am wrong, I hope I will be corrected—that the Bill was drafted in a hotel over a weekend à toute vitesse, and it contains many of its flaws because of that.

Let me give two examples of what I am getting at: first, on the interdiction of ships. Clause 8 of the Bill authorizes the Government of Canada to order ships thought to be carrying illegal immigrants to refrain from entering Canadian waters. If the ship is within 12 miles, the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) can order it to leave.

One of my concerns, and I think the concern of many people, is that as worded and despite the accepted amendment of the legislative committee making it subject to the UN Convention, the clause will in practice do little or nothing to stop smugglers and minimize the risk to persons being smuggled. This, of course, is because the ship's master who is ordered to leave Canadian waters under the Bill will neither have his or her ship seized nor be penalized in any substantive way. Why not instead authorize the arrest of such ships' masters, given reasonable and probable grounds, and authorize the sale of the ships upon conviction if so ordered by a court? It seems to me that that would really deter smugglers from attempting to bring people into Canada as they did in Nova Scotia.

Such a change is especially important, I believe, given the danger under the present wording of the Bill that ships' captains might simply abandon in international waters people they are carrying in their cargo holds after being ordered out of Canadian waters. This might well happen because of a fear that no other country would permit them to land. As Hon. Members know, this has happened in South Asian seas and I see in today's paper that immigration officials are also very concerned about what this Bill might do to their attempts to act as public servants of Canada.

Why not instead amend the clause to say something like the following: "Every person who, being the master or member of a crew of a vehicle used for transportation by sea, disembarks or allows the disembarkation or attempts to disembark or allow the disembarkation of a person or group of persons at sea is guilty of an offence"? Or perhaps the following wording would be better: "Every person who knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or attempts to organize, induce, aid or abet a person to come into Canada in a clandestine manner or to make a manifestly unfounded or fraudulent refugee claim is guilty of an offence".

It seems to me that clauses like that would give us the power to seize the ships of those scoundrels who have been doing these things and effectively deter such people from bringing people into Canada.

My second example deals with the questions of penalties for bringing undocumented aliens into Canada. Clause 9 provides large penalties for any person who knowingly helps someone come to Canada who does not have a valid visa, passport or travel document where one is so required. The way the clause is worded, it would not appear to catch the scoundrels who profit in bringing refugees for a fee.

Take, for example, the well-known cases of the Turks, Portuguese and Brazilian men and women who came here to claim refugee status. These people came to Canada with valid travel documents. They did not need visas at the time. They simply reported at ports of entry and applied for refugee status. The people who arranged those scams would not appear to be caught by the wording of the Bill as it is before us today, but they should be. It seems to me that other wording would make the clause deal more effectively with the situation I just mentioned. It is true that Section 95.3 would have caught the people who smuggled in the 174 refugees last month or those who brought the Tamils in last summer, but as I read the Bill, if the smuggling were done other than by ship, it would not be caught by the proposed wording.

It is important that many responsible individuals, including the former Primate of the Anglican Church, Bishop Bernard Hubert, President of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, and a great many other distinguished Canadians who have spoken against this Bill, feel that the Bill would catch church and other humanitarian or volunteer-aid groups who try to help undocumented refugees make refugee claims at the border. As well, the Canadian Bar Association has protested the Bill.

Many people aided by these volunteer groups do have well-founded refugee claims. Refugees cannot get valid travel documents from their countries. Can a Cambodian get a valid travel document? Can a Chilean who goes to the tenth floor of a downtown office building in Santiago get a valid travel document? Can an Afghan get a valid travel document to leave Kabul?

A great many responsible organizations and individuals have spoken out against this Bill, calling for it to be redrafted. Others have said that it violates the Charter of Rights. I can only say amen to the view voiced by so many citizens of good will that we should refer the Bill to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision as to its validity under the Charter of Rights.

Let me say a word about the so-called queue-jumping argument in favour of the Bill. As our laws have been, as they are now and as I trust they always will be, immigrants and refugees are in different queues. They do not mix. One does not jump from one line to the other. One is either in the immigrant system or in the refugee system. To argue that this Bill will stop refugee applicants from jumping into the immigrant queue is simply incorrect, to put it gently.

For the reasons indicated, I will not support this Bill when it comes to a vote next week.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the Hon. Member's comments, as I always am, and took considerable note of them. The reasons he pointed out for not supporting the Bill disturbed and bothered me. I wonder if perhaps he might elaborate on them.

The first reason he has suggested for his lack of support of the Bill is the fact that there is no provision in the Bill, as he says, for seizure of a ship in circumstances such as those we have seen this past summer. I am sure the Hon. Member has acquainted himself with the Bill and with Clause 11 and all that goes thereafter. All that refers to the question of seizure, and I would just like to quote from it. It reads:

> 103.01 (1) An immigration officer or a peace officer may, where the officer believes on reasonable grounds that a vehicle was used in any manner in connection with a contravention of section 95.2 or 95.3, seize the vehicle as forfeit.

Then it goes on to describe all the ways of seizure, all the ways the vehicle can be dealt with and what can and cannot be done as far as selling it goes.

The Hon. Member said that another reason he could not support the Bill was that there was no provision for dealing with unscrupulous consultants. I may be wrong, and I certainly do not claim to have the only legal opinion in the world, but it appears to me that Clause 9 of the Bill would deal with unscrupulous consultants. The Bill reads:

> "95.1 Every person who knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or attempts to organize, induce, aid or abet the coming into Canada of a person who is not in possession of a valid and subsisting visa, passport or travel document where one is required by this Act or the regulations is guilty of an offfence and is liable—

It seems to me that that provision as well as the subsequent provision in the clause could be used to lay charges against people in those circumstances.

• (1430)

The final point he raises deals with the lack of exclusion from the Bill of humanitarian groups, refugee aid groups, churches and others. He indicates this is a major reason for not supporting the Bill. I would not want to suggest that I can cite all of the instances where there have been exclusions of organizations of this sort, but in the Criminal Code of Canada there is a provision for something called theft. We do not exclude, say, a very poor mother from prosecution if she steals a loaf of bread to feed her family. Of course, as the Hon. Member knows from his long and distinguished legal career, the courts have their own way of dealing with those things if ever a charge were laid against such a person.

Given all that, I find it somewhat difficult to understand, and perhaps the Hon. Member could expand on his remarks, why he could not support the Bill for the reasons he gave.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), as he knows, and I take his question very seriously.

To start at the end, it is true that if a poor person steals bread that person is still liable to be charged. The Hon. Member knows as a lawyer that the court can give an absolute discharge or do all sorts of things. However, my concern is that you have such widespread concern among people in Edmonton, Toronto, in every city, town and probably village in Canada, that this Bill will hit someone in their congregation who tries to help a refugee. They have taken the trouble to come to Ottawa, many of them, to complain that they are being singled out or lumped together with traffickers in human beings, and that indicates there is probably something wrong with that part of the Bill. The library has a file that thick of material from people with concerns about the Bill. I think it is time to take another look at it.

The Hon. Member also referred to the fact that this Bill does not authorize the arresting or seizing of a vessel. He referred to the seizing of a vehicle. I refer to Clause 8 on page 7 where it says:

> Where the Minister believes on reasonable grounds that a vehicle—is bringing any person into Canada—the Minister may—direct the vehicle to leave or not to enter the internal waters of Canada—

That is what I was getting at and I have great concerns about that.

I have attempted only to give examples of my concerns. Perhaps he did not like my examples, but I believe they are true. I am sure he is aware that there are many people of intelligence, knowledge and experience who are concerned about this Bill. We want to be tough but we also want to be fair. This Bill certainly errs on the side of being tough. I am told by people over in the Department across the river that they call it the 3-D Bill: Detain, deter and deport.

As I indicated, I am not going to be here to vote against the Bill, but I have sufficient concerns about it that I am certainly not going to be here to vote for it.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) for his position. Given the nature of our political system, it takes courage to back up one's convictions. I believe he is the second member of the Government, the other being the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais), Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, to stand up and be forthright on this issue.

I do not say this lightly or in an attempt to take advantage politically of any statement of either of those two gentlemen. I simply wish to commend them because it has been a struggle to try to move the Government and a committee made up of largely government Members to amend the legislation, not to throw it away or go back to the drafting board but to allow those who wish to enhance and protect the refugee constituency and those serving that constituency to work within the system rather than simply stand there as witnesses to a process racing by them. I would like to commend the Hon. Member for being of assistance to that constituency.

I would also like to suggest he was quite correct with respect to Section 95.1. Unlike the example of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) with respect to someone stealing bread, we are not talking about one law applicable in general. This is the creation of a new offence. It is similar to creating a separate offence for stealing bread. That is the major difference. We are creating a new offence which places priests and nuns and others helping refugees in the same category. The operative words are "without a visa". We have had thousands of refugees without visas aided by priests and others. I commend the Hon. Member for his articulation of those two points.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to join with my friend from York West (Mr. Marchi) in expressing our appreciation for the position taken by the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). It is very much a question of ethics with respect to how we deal with individuals claiming persecution in other countries. We appreciate the leadership shown by the Hon. Member on this issue.

I know that the Hon. Member for a number of years has played a leadership role in a committee dealing with Soviet Jewry. He has for many years made great strides in advancing the goals of that organization. I was moved by his comments about how the Bill would allow the Minister to intercept ships coming to this country. I wonder if in the back of his mind there was not the image of one of the very few dark days in our past, I think it was 1939 when a ship—

Mr. Brisco: You weren't even born!

Mr. Riis: No, I was not.

Mr. Brisco: Of course, then why should we be apologizing for it now?

Mr. Riis: I do not understand, I thought I was asking a straightforward question in response to the thoughtful comments by the Hon. Member. I was referring to 1939 when the Government of Canada decided, in the wisdom of the day, to not allow that ship to dock with its Jewish passengers. Most of those people were killed at the hands of the wicked Nazi regime when they returned to Europe. Was that imagery not in his mind when he was making his comment?

Mr. Kilgour: It was a factor, and there was also a ship which landed in Vancouver that the Hon. Member will be aware of in, what, 1913? It was sent back to India. I am told that most of the people on that ship perished when they got back to India.

In response to the question, I have a bulletin from Amnesty International of which I am proud to be a member. Michael Schelew makes the point:

> The Government states that no genuine refugee will be turned away from Canada's shores. But how can the Government decide who is a genuine refugee if it does not hear the claims of all refugee claimants on the merits?
> The Government says that all genuine refugee claimants will be allowed to have a hearing on the merits. Once again this begs the question.
> How can the Government determine who is a genuine refugee claimant if the proper decision-making body does not hear the claim on the merits?

I am sure the Hon. Member would agree that the Bill is simply not one which represents the Nansen Medal for the spirit of tolerance and understanding that I believe now exists from Kamloops, to St. John's, to Aklavik.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy) on debate, may I just take this opportunity on behalf of the Speaker and all Members of the House of Commons to express our good wishes to the Pages who have been with us for one of the longest sessions we have had in Parliament. They will be leaving us, and I want to welcome the new recruits.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We wish them well. After two or three elections they will probably take some of the seats of Hon. Members who are here.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, of course, I would like to take a moment of my time to express my own gratitude to the Pages who are departing. I understand that some of them will continue to be around Ottawa, attending school here.

Like you, Mr. Speaker, I hope that some or even all of them will show up here on the right side of the House.

I want to take particular note of the fact that amongst the departing Pages is one Page from the City of Windsor. That person did such an excellent job that this year we will have two Pages from the Windsor area. I feel very proud of that fact.

I listened with great attention to the speech by the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). I hope his colleagues listened to him with equal care because we are facing an issue of extreme and fundamental moral importance.

It is very clear that the Member has struggled with this issue and examined it in terms of his own experience and understanding of others who have worked with refugees, and within the context of what he knows to be a serious refugee problem world-wide.

On the one hand, he asked whether there is a problem with respect to the refugee determination process in Canada and, on the other, he asked whether the remedy sought in Bill C-84 particularly, and in Bill C-55, is commensurate with the problem at hand. I am sure he engaged in a painful and difficult reflection.

I must say that his very dissent draws a rather sharp contrast to what we have experienced in the House in the last several weeks during the debate on this so-called emergency. I looked around the Chamber as he spoke and, no matter how dramatic the character of his intervention, I noticed that virtually none of his colleagues on the government side raised their heads to even listen to what their colleague had to say, in spite of the fact that the Member for Edmonton—Strathcona is not the only Member on the government side who has dealt with his own conscience, wrestled with the issue and expressed dissent.

It has also been mentioned that, as happened a moment ago, we have had thoughtless, mean interventions when attempts have been made to explain those concerns that have worried not only those of us on this side of the House, the Hon. Member and his colleague, but which have bothered a great many organizations, including churches, labour unions, lawyers and civil libertarians across the country.

Perhaps they do not recognize the seriousness of the arguments that have been advanced in opposition to this legislation. One must come to the conclusion that rather than treating this problem as an emergency, as it must be defined by virtue of our being called back to the House, it is being used as an opportunity. There is no question that there are many areas of our country in which there is great unemployment. Not only are people unemployed, they see no hope of ever being employed as a result of inaction by the Government, nor do they see a solution to the employment situation they face in their particular parts of the country. At the same time, it appears to them that others coming to this country from across the seas are getting jobs.

Experience tells us that when people face the kind of emotional stress caused by unemployment they begin to look for scapegoats and usually find them. In this area, the most frequent scapegoat has been the immigrant and the refugee, usually those who look a little different, whose collective behaviour arouses xenophobic suspicion. While these are realities, these episodes should not be mistaken as characterizing our country. I would prefer to believe that our country and its soul is characterized by the recognition accorded to it in the Nansen Medal.

One has to conclude that the Government has chosen to use an episode in Nova Scotia as a means of gaining political points. The Government has said: "Let's do it quick and dirty, never mind the details, never mind the fine points, never mind the Charter of Rights".

Earlier, my colleague cited the fact that although we have created a crisis in the country largely as a result of the failure of the Government to have designed an efficient, fast and fair refugee determination process, there is beyond this domestic requirement for a good process a real refugee crisis building up in the world. As my colleague indicated, there are millions of refugees in the world, particularly in the Third World, who are being produced as a result of any number of factors which include war, famine, and civil wars, which characterize too much of the world.

I cited the fact that ultimately my family and I are products of the flight of refugees, refugees from the United States. There is a lesson in that experience. In that instance refugees were produced as a result of slavery imposed upon a Third World continent. Of course, that terminology was not used then. In other words, the refugees of the 19th century were in large part a product of the actions of those who had to receive the refugees, that is, the western world.

When one looks at the refugee situation in the Third World and counts the number of refugees that are created as a result of wars against oppressive regimes supported by the West; when one considers the number of refugees that have been produced as a result of conflicts resulting from the contrived borders and the colonial manipulation in the Third World; and when one considers the number of countries in the world attempting to pay off their debts by converting vast agricultural areas to the production of exportable food at the cost of producing food for the people of those countries, one can adduce the very strong argument that the western world is in very large measure responsible for the refugees that do exist—not for all but for a very significant number. A large part of the refugee problem has been precipitated by those western nations which now have to deal with their huge numbers around the world. It is certainly clear that there has to be a unified international approach to deal with the causes of refugees and to deal properly with their fate.

There is no one who would suggest that Canada can take all the refugees in the world, nor all the potential immigrants of the world. But in a country with a decreasing birth rate, a country which needs people, a country which can thrive and build a new future for itself only if we increase our population, it is certainly clear that we need not be niggardly in the way in which we treat potential refugees or immigrants. I would suggest that this piece of legislation is both niggardly and unnecessary. It would cast a pall of shame over us all if we do not make the appropriate necessary changes to bring it into accord to those imperatives of morality, equality and humanity which I hope characterize this country in which I have the honour to be a Member of Parliament.

It is quite a contrast to envision the poor and the hungry who come from nations of the world which have so little with the arguments one hears about queue jumping and suggestions that there are those who are trying to weasel their way in by devious means to take advantage of us all. When we hear this from members of the Government we have to pause to reflect on the consistency, the seriousness and, indeed, the morality of those who advocate this sorry piece of legislation.

As you well know, Mr. Speaker, just today we found that among the most privileged in our country, and in order to ensure that their offspring are properly taught in the most exclusive schools, they managed to queue-jump a teacher, in whose stead no one else would do, to ensure that this very prominent individual and his family would not have to settle for something second-rate. Let me be frank. We have in the highest portion of the Government a manipulation of our immigration laws in order to do what? To queue-jump. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is more guilty of queue-jumping than any refugee trying to flee death or persecution. I think that that is sad to note.

Many have pointed out that this legislation is, first, unnecessary and fundamentally flawed measured against the criteria set out in the Charter of Rights. I do not want to burden you, Mr. Speaker, because I know that you have heard many times before the various respects in which this legislation is in conflict with the Charter of Rights. It is so fundamentally inconsistent with the Charter of Rights that there is no way to make it right.

There are three choices. The first is to withdraw the legislation altogether, which would not be particularly hurtful. If the Government were to adopt a rapid and fair refugee determination process, as is possible to derive from Bill C-55 with appropriate amendments to bring it into accord with what has been recommended by the Canadian Council of Churches, then this legislation would not be necessary. I know that the Government will not do this because, after all, it brought us back here for an emergency. The emergency was Bill C-84 and Bill C-22 and the Bill dealing with Canagrex, and half a dozen other Bills. But this is part of the emergency.

One will note in the papers prepared justifying this document that there are the most devious arguments imaginable which try to point out that the Charter of Rights does not play a part to those people out in the ships in the middle of the sea. There is here a clear attempt to circumvent the Charter of Rights. In other instances in which there are people on our shores, there are those who say that this matter could be tested in the Supreme Court. There are others, including Members opposite, who have suggested that this sorry piece of legislation should be presented to the Supreme Court to let it adjudicate whether or not it fails in its test when measured against the Charter of Rights. In all of Canada we have only one group of people who see this legislation as consistent with the Charter. That group is made up of members of the Government.

There was an honest way for the Government to approach the situation. But this is a Government that rejects honesty, just as it has rejected the Charter of Rights. If it wants to reject the Charter of Rights, then it has a means of doing so in Section 33, the notwithstanding clause. If Members opposite want this legislation, I suggest to them that they tell the people of Canada honestly that they want it exempted from the Charter and declare to the world and those who vote for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. It being three o'clock, pursuant to the order made Wednesday, September 2, 1987, the House stands adjourned until Wednesday, September 9, 1987, at two o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

CALL FOR STRICTER LAW ENFORCEMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in 1985 Environment Canada laid 18 charges for violations under Section 33 of the Fisheries Act. There were nine successful prosecutions for a total of $33,800 in fines. In 1986 there were 18 charges, 12 prosecutions and $93,950 in fines. The record of other federal Departments which administer environmental legislation is equally uninspiring. Fines are miniscule. Threat of prosecution is unlikely. Environmental charges are just seen by some as another way of doing business.

This trend must be reversed. Fines for violators of the law must be raised. In addition, the federal Government must make an effort to educate potential violators. It must provide funds for adequate inspectors, enforcers and field personnel, and demonstrate a will to prosecute offenders.

Environment Canada and the Minister have to move with strict enforcement and tougher laws to protect human health and our natural resources.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

LITERACY PROGRAM IN PENITENTIARIES

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Montreal—Mercier): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was World Literacy Day. Illiteracy is a serious problem, even here in Canada. In our society, one out of five adults has to face that problem.

In Canadian penitentiaries, half of the inmate population cannot read nor write, a problem to which Solicitor General Kelleher is giving very serious consideration. In an attempt to resolve the problem, he has launched a comprehensive literacy program in penitentiaries. By participating in this program, inmates increase their chances of successfully reintegrating society. They take every available means to learn how to read employment offers, how to answer questionnaires, and how to meet such simple requirements as knowing how to read instructions concerning a job.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to emphasize the early success of Mr. Kelleher's initiative, as mentioned in last Friday's Globe and Mail: the number of inmates who were awarded a diploma during the first three months of 1987 exceeds the total number of those who graduated during the twelve months of 1986.

This excellent initiative of the Government deserves recognition, and I take this opportunity to commend the Solicitor General for his interest in this issue.

HORTICULTURE

PLIGHT OF PRAIRIE BEEKEEPERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to report that things have not been improving for the Canadian beekeeper. Last fall, Health and Welfare Canada introduced a standard of one part per million for the commonly used anti-biotic sulfathiazole. This applies to shipments within Canada and to Europe.

Meanwhile the Province of Quebec has its own limit of just 0.2 parts per million. In early July the standard for U.S. exports was changed to match that in Quebec.

Producers are confused by all these different tolerance levels. They are also confounded by the different laboratory reports coming out of Portage, Calgary, and Ottawa. Prairie beekeepers have been virtually shut out of the U.S. market because of American subsidies. Much of their 1986 honey crop remains unsold. Since it was produced under the old rules much of it cannot meet the new U.S. and Quebec standards. Saskatchewan beekeepers, particularly those in the Nipawin area, seem to be the hardest hit.

I call upon the Government to straighten things out in the industry, while reminding it of the industry's previous request for funding to offset American subsidies.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION FUND

VOLUME OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) announced the Western Diversification Plan in Edmonton on August 4 of this year the effect was immediate and most welcome. A head office was established in Edmonton, with provincial offices in Winnipeg, Saskatoon, and Vancouver.

The main feature of the plan is that decisions regarding government programs will be made in the West, and Edmonton in particular.

Western Canadians were ecstatic and they responded immediately. In the first week the Edmonton office received 1,500 inquiries, and by today some 400 applications have been submitted. The doors to a federal ministry are open to westerners. My office in Edmonton East was also inundated with inquiries, as well as with applications.

The Minister in charge is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight), himself a westerner committed to western diversification.

We in the West have a renewed spirit of optimism about the federal Government's commitment to growth and diversification, and about western Canadian participation in Confederation.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT TO VIDEOTAPE BUSINESS EXCELLENCE AWARDS FUNCTION

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House yet another broken promise of the Government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). We all recall the words of the former Minister of Supply and Services, the Hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. McInnes), on February 28, 1986, when he announced the Atlantic Opportunities Program designed to increase the amount of goods and services purchased by the federal Government from Atlantic Canadian firms.

Imagine our surprise to learn that recently three highly qualified Atlantic-based companies, namely, Points East Productions of Charlottetown, Skerrett Communications of Dartmouth, and Sight and Sound Productions of Halifax, were passed over in favour of a Toronto-based company in the awarding of a contract to videotape the Business Excellence Awards slated for Halifax on September 22, 1987.

To make matters even worse we also learned that the Atlantic companies had only three days to complete the proposals while the successful Toronto company apparently had prior knowledge of the contract's details. Not only does this decision contradict the Government's own policy for Atlantic Canada, it also violates the basic rules of equality and fairness.

On behalf of these companies I demand that this competition be reopened now so that Atlantic companies are given an opportunity to meet Atlantic needs.

LITERACY

MEASURES TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister Responsible for Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind Hon. Members that yesterday was World Literacy Day. On that occasion the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) made a statement in Toronto to highlight the measures taken by the federal Government to honour the Speech from the Throne commitment concerning literacy skills.

The Secretary of State has undertaken nation-wide consultations to secure the participation of all Canadians with a view to consolidating support in the fight against illiteracy in this country. The outcome of these consultations has been the establishment of an action plan which is now being implemented.

First, to ensure that illiteracy remains one of our national priorities, a national literacy secretariat has been set up within the Department of the Secretary of State, and a national literacy council will be appointed to advise the Government on major related issues. In addition, development funds will be earmarked for the main community groups and research grants will be available to these national organizations.

Second, federal, provincial and territorial participation is a prerequisite to achieving concrete results in the fight against illiteracy. In the coming weeks specific projects will be unveiled by the Secretary of State and his provincial colleagues.

Third, Canada must remain a world-wide leader in this field. This fall the General Assembly of the United Nations will consider a proposal aimed at designating 1990 as international literacy year. Canada will express full support for this endeavour.

Fourth, since we must rely on sustained support from governments, volunteer organizations, labour unions and private sector interests, the Secretary of State will sponsor a national literacy conference in 1988.

Mr. Speaker, all these initiatives stem from the commitment of the federal Government and the personal pledge of the Secretary of State concerning illiteracy in Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I regret, but the time of the Hon. Member has expired. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North.

WORLD LITERACY DAY

MAJOR EFFORTS URGED TO ELIMINATE ILLITERACY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was World Literacy Day. The idea of designating such a day to highlight the problems of illiteracy was agreed to by an international conference which was held in Montreal in 1967.

Following 20 years of so-called efforts to deal with the millions of Canadians who are functionally illiterate, Canada still has one of the worst records of the industrialized countries of the world. Twenty per cent of all Canadians, 5 million people, are still functionally illiterate. Is it not time that the Government of Canada, including the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) stop making speeches and promises about illiteracy and put their money where their mouths are?

I call upon the federal Government to set aside the money that is required so that major efforts can be made to set up programs to be arranged by discussions between federal and provincial Governments, and voluntary groups that are working in that area, in order that over the next 10 years we may reduce sharply, if not completely eliminate, illiteracy in our country.

QUEBEC SUMMIT

IMPORTANCE OF EVENTUAL BENEFITS

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): The Quebec Summit which was held last week has demonstrated once again that when Brian Mulroney and Robert Bourassa, together with their respective governments, decide to put together a large scale project, they succeed in a remarkable fashion.

Some who unfortunately knew very little about the Quebec Summit described it as a superfluous, meaningless and grandstanding exercise. Today, they are astounded with the quality of the organization, the seriousness of the discussions and the impact of the decisions arrived at.

The Quebec Summit has demonstrated that it is essential for an industrialized nation such as Canada to establish and maintain ties with the rest of the world. Personally, I have always believed in the Quebec Summit, especially because of its economic benefits.

Beyond the rhetoric, I am now convinced that the Quebec Summit will benefit Canadian corporations which, as a result of this privileged contact, will be in a position to make deals with member countries.

Partisanship aside, Mr. Speaker, we should recognize that all member countries but Canada in particular will reap invaluable benefits from the Quebec Summit.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

RETENTION OF NATIONAL DAIRY POLICY ADVOCATED

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, during recent weeks and months dairy farmers have written to MPs on all sides of the House, and likely to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), expressing their concerns that the dairy industry in Canada could be wiped out under a free trade agreement with the United States.

We all know that the Ontario Tory Leader, Larry Grossman, is prepared to sacrifice anyone and anything in order to reach a free trade agreement. But now we want to know if the federal Government is also prepared to sell out dairy farmers. We need to receive a commitment here and now from the federal Government that the marketing boards, supply management, quotas, import restrictions, and all other components of Canada's national dairy policy will be kept. Dairy farmers need to know that today from the Government.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

ACHIEVEMENT OF CANADIAN PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the performance of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) in putting together the Second Francophone Summit in Quebec. It is thanks to his initiatives and his excellent relations, both internationally and with the provinces, that Canada's Ambassador to France, Lucien Bouchard, the Quebec Premier, Mr. Bourassa, and his Minister, Mr. Rémillard, were able to achieve with Ottawa what the previous federal Government had denied Quebec.

Because of this summit, we have been able to achieve common positions on political and economical international issues, as well as to define priority lines of cooperation and intervention in areas such as agriculture, energy, culture and communications. This summit has also facilitated commercial exchanges with other countries having the use of French in common. This is a priority for our international trade. We now realize that our Prime Minister can recognize the jurisdiction of the Canadian provinces in various areas, which is a major component of good relations, while the previous Liberal Government had failed miserably in this regard.

The architect of the Meech Lake Accord, our Prime Minister, has succeeded in bringing together people with different mentalities and from provinces or countries with diversified needs and interests. At the Francophone Summit in Quebec City, the Prime Minister of Canada was thus able to achieve a consensus on sensitive issues. I cannot believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people would one day put their confidence in political parties which are totally divided and torn on crucial issues such as the Meech Lake Accord or free trade.

THE LATE PAUL HIEBERT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, this past Sunday the creator of the Sweet Songstress of Saskatchewan, Paul Hiebert, passed away at the age of 95.

Born in 1892, Paul Hiebert lived all but his student life in Manitoba. Although his first love was philosophy, Mr. Hiebert was a professor of chemistry at the University of Manitoba for 28 years. Paul was proud of his teaching. He often said that his teaching was very methodical, very well organized, and very prone to deal with some chemistry and a great deal of philosophy.

Throughout life, Paul was accompanied by Dorothea, his wife of over 60 years. They had no children, a conscious decision for the couple who worried about the uncertainty of the world they lived in. Paul Hiebert feared war and nuclear holocaust and believed that pacifism was the only solution to the confrontation between one nation and another.

His literary accomplishments were many, writing his much acclaimed Sarah Binks, in 1947 and subsequently being awarded the Stephen Leacock Medal for Humour in 1948. His last book, Not as the Scribes, was written only three years ago.

Hiebert once said that the real satisfaction in life is being one of the community, not standing aloof from it. Paul Hiebert lived this thought, and this week Canada has lost a very special teacher, philosopher, and humanitarian.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, how long have French-speaking nations around the world been striving to create a Francophone Summit? Who was the catalyst who finally made that happen? Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

How long have our provincial and federal Governments been striving to obtain unanimous agreement on a Canadian Constitution? Who was the catalyst who finally made that happen? Our Prime Minister.

We Canadians expect a great deal from our Prime Ministers. Most of us realize that no one person can possibly live up to all those expectations, because no one is perfect. However, above all, we do want a Prime Minister of Canada to be able to unite our country and to keep it working together.

Few if any Canadian Prime Ministers have done that quite as well as our present Prime Minister.

OPPOSITION TO FOOD TAX

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, a study released by the Canadian council of food distributors and wholesalers clearly indicates that if the Government maintains its intention to tax food the result will be a 12 to 13 per cent increase in food prices.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Welfare Council study also points directly to the failure of the Conservative Government with respect to the food tax: a family earning $10,000 will have to cope with a $353 tax increase imposed by this Government, and even though there will be a tax credit the net increase will amount to $203.

I urge Conservative Members to convince the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to cancel this option to tax bread, milk and butter.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGATIONS CONCERNING GRANTING OF IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On July 31 in The Citizen and on August 4 in the The Montreal Gazette the Prime Minister stated:

> People jumping the queue unfairly, take other peoples rights and other peoples legitimate places. This breeds unfairness, and unfairness will destroy the system . . . The laws shall apply to all of us. Everyone must follow the procedures and the laws.

In light of these statements, and the serious allegations made by the president of the immigration union concerning the Mr. Grossmann case, this Prime Minister owes this House and the country a full explanation. If the Prime Minister wishes to be consistent with the statements that he made on queue jumping, will he agree to a full public inquiry into the Grossmann affair so that Canadians may assure themselves that the spirit and the immigration laws have not been violated and, if they have, that disciplinary action may be taken forcefully and immediately?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I categorically repudiate the allegations of that Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Weiner: There was no impropriety nor illegality in the handling of the application.

My office receives thousands of letters from Canadians across the country dealing with immigration matters and, in conformity with the Immigration Act, we act in certain few cases where there are criteria or conditions that warrant it. We have certainly published all correspondence dealing with the matter which should clarify it for that Member and all other Members in this House.

QUEUE JUMPING ALLEGATIONS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that the Prime Minister calls an emergency session during the summer to deal with what he terms as queue jumpers, yet he does not have the courage—

Some Hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind Hon. Members that there are necessary courtesies extended to those who ask questions in this House. I would also remind Hon. Members that the Hon. Member for York West is taking the lead for the Official Opposition and I would expect that courtesy to be extended to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Marchi: It is not the fact, Mr. Speaker, that representations are illegal, the allegations are that queue jumping has been condoned and practised in the higher offices of this country, and they come from the union president, not from this Opposition.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You are disowning them?

Mr. Marchi: Therefore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister again, if he doesn't want to agree to a public inquiry, can he explain to Canadians, who must wait six months and line up in Toronto at five o'clock in the morning, why the Immigration Department sent three separate orders to speed up the interview for Mr. Grossmann? What compelling humanitarian concerns existed to allow Mr. Grossmann to make an application in Canada rather than going the normal route for every other individual, namely, applying at our embassies abroad? Can he tell us that, at least?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I take particular issue with the sleazy, scurrilous manner in which the Member is raising the question.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have asked Hon. Members to extend the appropriate courtesies to questions that are being asked. I would also ask that in the reply the conventions of this place be considered. I know that the Hon. Minister understands them and I would ask him to continue his answer, perhaps with more careful language.

Mr. Weiner: The accusations, Mr. Speaker, are totally unfounded. I received 7,000 letters and representations in the last year, some of which have come from Members of Parliament. Here is one from the Member for York West.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Weiner: It says "Could we talk on this one? It would be appreciated if we could get together to see if I can get a permit for one or two weeks".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1425)

Mr. Weiner: The Hon. Member for York West wants favours which should not be available to any other Canadian.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the only sleaze is in not answering the question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think I have indicated to both sides that appropriate use of language would probably be more in keeping with the traditions of this place. I know the Hon. Member for York West can put a very good question.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I make no apologies for making representations to the Government, but it is when there is a second law, when orders are executed to circumvent the law, that there is impropriety and sleaze. I challenge the Member to show where my impropriety was any day of this week.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member for York West to put his question.

ACCUSATIONS AGAINST DEPARTMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would return to the Prime Minister who is not answering questions. Pretending that the problems do not exist only breeds more problems. Given the fact that we have had the John Quigley affair, a petition signed by 7,000 employees against the Deputy Minister, people tampering with the mail from the Department—

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Tobin: If you guys would shut up, you would get a question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York West will complete his question.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what is happening with our Immigration Department. Will the Government take special measures to clean up the mess in order to restore the confidence of Canadians in an immigration policy and a Government that is losing the trust of the people who are not naive enough to believe that there is not a double standard here? The quicker it is before a public inquiry, the better it will be for the Government.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, the accusations are unfair and untrue. There was never any involvement by the Prime Minister's Office in that particular dossier or in any dossier. What I have done has been recognized by other Hon. Members of the House. I have been complimented in speeches made by members of the very same Party as the Hon. Member, and by members of the New Democratic Party, on the quality of service they have received, as have all Hon. Members.

We looked at the justification of the case. It took some four months from the time I examined the file of this individual and we realized that there was a basis for inland processing. Each year, 15,000 Minister's permits are issued, almost 25 per cent of the cases—

Mr. Marchi: What are the justifications? What is the basis?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has, fulfilling the wishes of this place, given the Hon. Member for York West every opportunity to put the question. I think that fairness demands that Hon. Members on the other side give the Minister every chance to answer it.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to table this correspondence if my hon. friend would agree to it so that all Hon. Members would be able to read what he said to me.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Weiner: Do you agree?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister may have some more comments to make in answer to the question. I would ask him to answer the question.

Mr. Weiner: What I do recognize is the manner in which our refugee determination process is being received across the country. I recognize that it has almost universal acclaim, that it puts forward a process that is fair, reasonable and just, and that that is now bothering the Opposition. They are trying to open another front. Where is your credibility? Where is your honesty?

• (1430)

CRITERIA APPLICABLE TO DECISION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. He said in one of his answers that he acts in these matters "where criteria and conditions warrant it". Exactly what were the conditions and criteria that warranted the action taken on the Grossmann case? Give us a complete and clear answer right now.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was here under a Canada/France exchange program. He had received employment authorization permits for six consecutive years. The current permit would have expired on September 30. He has a son who is apparently married to a Canadian and I guess could have sponsored him. Those looked like good long-term prospects for remaining in this country given the kind of contribution he would make. It just seemed to me there would be no reason to have him leave the country when inland processing is a part of the way of doing business here.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): How many times did you extend it, Herb?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): —does the Minister not realize that every Member of Parliament has people coming to his or her office asking for permission to stay permanently because they can get a job? What real difference is there between those cases and the Grossman case? Is he saying it is now the policy of the Government that everyone here on a visitor's visa or work permit can apply for permanent landed immigrant status and be dealt with under ordinary immigrant criteria even if there are no true humanitarian or compassionate grounds? Is he not saying that people no longer have to apply at embassies? Is it not true that there is no real justification here, to use his word?

Mr. Mazankowski: You extended it! What is the matter with you?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, three of those employment authorizations were issued by a Minister of the Government of which the Hon. Member was a part. We continued the process for an additional three years.

There are consistent criteria that allow the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who delegates that authority to the Minister of State for Immigration, to act in a humane and compassionate fashion when it is warranted. That is done in a very few cases. Members of Parliament and other Canadians would not want that compassion removed from the Immigration Department.

SPECIAL TREATMENT QUERY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question, unfortunately, is on the same topic.

Mr. Shields: Get in the hole with the Liberals.

Mr. Riis: I would simply say that when the Prime Minister requested that Parliament be recalled he made the following comment: "People jumping the queue unfairly take other people's rights and other people's legitimate places. This breeds unfairness and unfairness will destroy the system." This is a very serious issue and I ask the Prime Minister to consider responding to the question.

At a time when tens of thousands of Canadians are seeking the opportunity to have their relatives come to Canada and obtain landed immigrant status, does he not think it unfair that Mr. Grossmann, who teaches the children of both the Prime Minister and the Deputy Minister of Immigration, would have received special treatment and became a landed immigrant by circumventing the usual immigration process?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, it is clear there has been no special treatment. As I indicated, 15,000 Minister's permits were issued, 99 per cent of the time by our officials in the regions or at head office, so that inland processing could advance. I have a suspicion the Hon. Member is mixing a regular immigrant program with a process of refugee determination which is chaotic, cumbersome and clogged. It is a non-functioning system left by the previous Government, and once and for all this Government has the guts and determination to clean it up.

We are bringing forward a refugee determination process which is just, fair, expeditious, will identify and welcome real refugees, and say no to illegal aliens and yes to real refugees.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has already agreed that the gentleman in question could have applied for landed immigrant status from France when he was there a few weeks ago. All of us have a long list of people who make that request and are regularly turned down because that is the law.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This one has been approved six times.

Mr. Riis: At a time when we are debating legislation which was motivated by queue jumpers—

Some Hon. Members: Refugees!

Mr. Bouchard: Refugees.

Mr. Riis: Refugees, but nevertheless it is queue jumpers we are concerned about.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members are of course aware that in Question Period there is ample opportunity to answer a question. The Hon. Member has the floor and I would ask the usual courtesies be extended. The Hon. Member will put his question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on the evidence it seems clear that senior officials intervened to allow an individual to jump the normal queue.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Are you making that charge?

Mr. Riis: At a time when Canadians are very sensitive to that charge would he say that queue jumping did occur, that special treatment was given? If he has nothing to hide, why not refer it to the standing committee for a complete and thorough investigation?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, in January a letter was sent to my office from an assistant in the Prime Minister's Office asking us to have a look at a certain file. It took us four months to take a look at it. I would venture to say that was handled about the same way as we would when the Leader of the NDP said to me: "I would appreciate your expediting the process of this case application and your providing me with a status report". As for the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap, does he want to forget the time he asked me for something this year?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Boy, oh, boy!

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has the floor.

Mr. Forrestall: Tell us all about it.

Mr. Riis: I agree, I have indeed made interventions.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: I have only asked that people be allowed to get into the line, not jump the line. That is what we are concerned about, jumping the line.

Mr. Mazankowski: Your Leader asked for it.

Miss MacDonald: Anyone is allowed into line, Nelson. That is stupid.

Mr. Speaker: I know Hon. Members would want to be of assistance to the Chair. There are difficult questions to be dealt with in Question Period. I would ask Hon. Members asking the questions to stay as far away from argument as possible, and I would ask other Hon. Members, in the interests of expediting questions and answers, to keep their comments to themselves unless they are recognized.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, obviously it is a very sensitive issue we are discussing in Question Period today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: For whom?

Mr. Riis: The Prime Minister is well aware that not only must justice be done, it must appear to be done.

• (1440)

In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, if the case of Mr. Grossmann is straightforward and there was no impropriety whatsoever, would he then refer it to the appropriate standing committee for a complete investigation in order to clear the air once and for all?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, when the Member for Oshawa asked me to expedite a case that seemed like queue-jumping to me.

The letter which was referred to me by the Prime Minister's assistant simply asked that the case be given consideration, as all Members of Parliament would like it to be. I notice many of you are very quiet today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair might observe that not all Members have been quiet today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—COMMONWEALTH SANCTIONS

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The comments made by the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom during the recent meeting which he had with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs seemed to have had a profound effect upon them. It appears that there is now a dramatic shift in the policy of the Prime Minister on South Africa as previously announced at the United Nations.

Is Canada now backing away from trying to get a comprehensive agreement on sanctions from all Commonwealth states? Is Canada instead going to follow Britain's lead and change its policy in midstream just before the convening of the Commonwealth Conference?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is no. I think the Hon. Member would find it very difficult to find any suggestion to that effect in the words of Mr. Howe.

The position of the Government is very clear on the question of sanctions. We believe they are effective economically and, more important, psychologically. We naturally believe that they would be more effective if they were more universal. We also believe in and are committed to having the Vancouver Conference of the Commonwealth continue to exert pressure on the Government of South Africa to bring an end to the system of apartheid.

We are trying to establish the most effective possible consensus among participants at that conference in order to increase pressure and bring an end to apartheid.

CANADIAN POLICY

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State is also reported to have indicated that Canada no longer feels it is committed to seeking further sanctions. I will direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

In light of the comments by the Foreign Secretary and those of his own Secretary of State for External Affairs, if the Commonwealth countries do not agree on further sanctions, will Canada make it known at that time that, in accordance with the Prime Minister's commitments to the United Nations two years ago, Canada, if need be, will act on its own?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member refers to quotations attributed to me. I do not know where they appeared, but they are false. I did not say or imply that, nor did the Prime Minister, and that is not our position.

I think it is important to reiterate the position of the Government of Canada which has been very consistent on this issue. We are prepared, if necessary, if other measures do not succeed, to disrupt, to end, economic and diplomatic relations with the Republic of South Africa.

It should be understood that to do that would take us out of influence on the pressures to try to bring an end to apartheid. We do not think it is yet the time for Canada to take itself out of influence on ending apartheid. Quite the contrary, we believe there is a very important role that we can play as we have, under the Prime Minister's leadership, already played in the Commonwealth and as we intend to play in the Commonwealth and elsewhere to hasten the end to the regime of apartheid.

CONDITIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he explain when is the time? Two years ago the Commonwealth Conference sent eminent persons to South Africa. Canada indicated at that time that it would sever all diplomatic and economic relations if other measures did not work.

The imprisonments continue in South Africa. Nelson Mandella is still in prison. There is continuing police brutality. Censorship has been gravely increased in South Africa over the course of the last year. There have been continuing attacks on the front line states.

When is the time for the Government to do what it said it would do, and stop acting like a patsy toward South Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, several months ago some spokesmen of the New Democratic Party, albeit not the official spokesmen, suggested that we should then completely disrupt relations with South Africa. Had we done that we would not have been able to persuade the Commonwealth to take the series of sanctions which the Commonwealth agreed to take during the meeting in London last August. There is a price to pay for declaratory diplomacy of that kind. The price to pay is that you make your views known but you lose your influence.

It is not enough simply to condemn apartheid. We all condemn apartheid. We want to end apartheid. We believe that there are practical steps that Canada can continue to take to bring an end to apartheid.

I have noticed that on a range of questions the position of the New Democratic Party is to get out of the field. That is what they want to do with NATO. That is what one of their spokesmen wants to do with regard to economic summits. They are now saying that we should no longer seek to have influence upon bringing an end to apartheid in South Africa.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, in September, 1985, the Minister promised full disruption of economic and diplomatic relations to end apartheid if other measures did not work. This was repeated by the Prime Minister in June, 1986. This was repeated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as recently as August 28, 1987. If we keep on saying these things and not acting, they will be empty threats.

I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the Government met with Mr. Tambo ten days ago, why did it focus on what it perceived as weaknesses in the African National Congress rather than talking about the real root of violence in South Africa, which is apartheid?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party is again expressing the isolationism which informs its policy on NATO, which leads it to want to get out of the economic summit, and which informs its policy on other international questions.

It is now suggesting that Canada has had no influence in the actions that we have taken, in the long list of sanctions that we have introduced, and in the influence that we have been able to bring to bear upon the actions of the European Community, the United States, Japan and others. That is a false accusation by the New Democratic Party.

We are not making nearly enough progress against apartheid in South Africa. The situation is getting worse. The depth of fear separating the black and the white communities is devastatingly deep. We must find some ways to bridge that gap. We do not do it by quitting, which is what the Hon. Member is suggesting.

Oral Questions

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE COMMAND

PHOTOFLASH EXPERIMENTAL BOMBING IN CANADIAN ARCTIC

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Could the Minister confirm that some 30 years ago the United States Air Force conducted experimental photoflash bombing in the Canadian Arctic without first advising the local inhabitants what was happening? Do we know whether or not there were any health hazards associated with these experiments?

Hon. Paul Dick (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that in the 1950s photoflash bombing was done by Strategic Air Command at a height of 15,000 feet over some isolated areas in the Northwest Territories. There should be no health hazards whatsoever associated with this as the photoflash explosions took place at 15,000 feet.

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—SCHEDULED VISIT BY LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, one week before the Francophone Summit was to take place in Quebec City the Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland was scheduled to make his annual courtesy trip to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. For the first time the Government of France informed the Government of Canada that the Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland was not welcome on St. Pierre and Miquelon. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us what the Government of Canada did when it received this insult from the Government of France? And why did the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister not publicly protest this slap in the face to Canada and to the Queen? Did the Prime Minister even bring it up with Mr. Chirac?

• (1450)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in his allegation the Hon. Member is wrong on two of his facts, which isn't bad for him.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): There is not an annual trip and there has not been. They did not say the Lieutenant Governor was not welcome in St. Pierre and Miquelon. What they said was that when he comes they would want him to come in a vessel other than a military vessel. They said that because this Government has taken the action of closing down our ports to French fishing vessels until such time as we are able to resolve a fishing dispute which is before us now because of the lack of foresight of Liberal Governments in the past.

CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, for the past 10 years the Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland has visited the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon on a naval vessel similar to the one to which the Government of France is now objecting. We are being insulted by the Government of France while the Secretary of State for External Affairs bends over backwards to please them.

Mr. Speaker: Order—

Mr. Baker: Now I ask—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: —the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he would not agree that it is impossible to maintain a position of strength in the fishing negotiations while we allow the French Government to insult us like that? How does he expect the Lieutenant Governor to get to St. Pierre and Miquelon, by a dory, by a canoe, or is he looking for the "Good Ship Lollipop"?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I might suggest, Mr. Speaker, we should take a very hard look at whether or not we can float him over on the hot air of the Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I had thought that the Hon. Member was running for the leadership of the Liberal Party like everyone else in that Party, but it appears that what he really wants is to be Lieutenant Governor. I can give him this guarantee. If he becomes the Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland, he will be welcome as the present Lieutenant Governor is welcome to visit St. Pierre and Miquelon.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications and it concerns the four groups which have protested very seriously the intervention of the Minister in a CRTC rate increase application on the part of Bell Canada. I wonder if the Minister would try to undo the damage she has done by prejudging the issue? I wonder if she will do what the groups have asked her to do, groups which themselves intend to intervene, feeling they are not going to get a hearing because she has prejudged the issue by asking and informing the CRTC that, if it does not come up with the decision she wants, there could be a reversal at Cabinet level?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think I would ask the Hon. Member to read my letter very carefully. In fact, if she does not have a copy of it, I would be glad to send her one.

That letter pointed out to the President of Bell Canada Enterprises that in fact the CRTC has an obligation to ensure that subscribers of Bell Canada do not subsidize the unregulated operations of Bell Canada Enterprises.

I want to make sure that subscribers do not have to pay extraordinary costs. In order to determine whether or not there is a subsidy of any kind, the CRTC has to have information. It has to have information about the direct and the indirect costs which are associated with it. Therefore, I urged Bell Canada Enterprises to submit those costs, validated, to the CRTC, substantive information it does not now have, so it can look at the ruling that has been made to see whether or not it is appropriate.

MINISTER'S LETTER TO COMMISSION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the letter says far more than this. I have the letter here. It suggests that the Minister would go to Cabinet over the decision if the CRTC did not do what she wanted it to do.

I ask her again if she will respond to the public interest and industry groups which want to see, as does our Party, the CRTC acting as an independent agency, able to judge the facts without a letter from the Minister saying she is going to go to Cabinet and see the decision is reversed if it does not come up with a decision she wants. That is inappropriate. Will she withdraw that letter?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of my withdrawing that letter. I would also like to point out to the Hon. Member that if any kind of decision is made by any agency where costs are imputed that do not relate to the direct and indirect costs which are a reality, then obviously the Government will question any such decision.

Costs have to be related to the direct and indirect costs that are the actuality in any situation.

CANADIAN JOBS STRATEGY

LACK OF SKILLED LABOUR—APPRENTICESHIP PROGRAM INQUIRY

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I am sure all Members of this House are enthused over the new unemployment figures which show a five-year low at 8.8 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jepson: I do commend the Minister for this. However, there are still many shortfalls within the small business industry for skilled labour. What consideration is the Minister giving to an apprenticeship program that is so sadly lacking in this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Of course we are delighted about the unemployment rate. I think that is what we call an achievement when we consider that 8.8 per cent is the lowest rate of unemployment in this country since 1982. I think it is something of which Canadians are proud.

At the same time I think the Hon. Member is right in terms of particular regions of the country, London, for example, where we face problems in skills shortages and skills development. For that reason we have invested I think it is $297 million in the Canadian Jobs Strategy in 1987-88. That means that with this program we will be able to deal with those cases, particularly in southern Ontario.

It is obvious we will continue to work with the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program because I think it is the Government's best achievement in employment for three years.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I also have here a copy of the letter which was signed by the Minister of Communications and sent to Mr. de Grandpré of Bell Canada. It clearly says that the Government would be prepared to overrule a decision that was not favourable. Given that the CRTC is a quasi-judicial body which should not be interfered with in that manner—granted appeals can be made to Cabinet later—does the Minister not feel that the action she took was improper? And will she not do the right thing and order that her letter be rescinded now?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Hon. Member has quite understood what is being done here. What we are doing is separating monopoly services, and the cost of monopoly services, from unregulated services. That in fact is what Bill C-13 did when we passed it in this House earlier this year. It separated the costs of one kind of operation from the costs of another kind of operation. That is the same policy I stipulated in this letter.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister refuses to rescind her letter, I will now ask her boss, the Prime Minister, to get involved in this issue.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST THAT MINISTER'S LETTER BE RESCINDED

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Moments ago we heard of tampering with the immigration process—

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Due to the hour, I am sure the Hon. Member will want to put his question.

Mr. Boudria: Now we hear of interference with the CRTC. I ask the Prime Minister if he will order his Minister of Communications here and now—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Boudria: —to rescind that kind of interference with a quasi-judicial body, the CRTC? Or is he going to allow this kind of abuse of power to continue? When will these Tories ever learn?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, during the passage of Bill C-13 I was of the impression that members of the Liberal Party were against the subscribers of Bell Canada, that they really did not want to see the subscribers to a telephone system in this country get a fair break. What I am saying in that letter is that there can be no subsidy paid by Canadian subscribers, the telephone users, to an international operation of Bell Canada International. We will not stand for that. I wish that the Liberal Party would have the same concern about the subscribers to our Canadian telephone system.

CONTRACT TO VIDEOTAPE BUSINESS EXCELLENCE AWARDS FUNCTION

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. It is based on a report in The Daily News of Halifax which reports that the Ministry of Supply and Services and DRIE failed to give companies in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island a fair opportunity to bid on a contract to videotape the 1987 Canada Awards for Business Excellence which will be held in Halifax on September 22.

The Halifax and Charlottetown companies had three days to prepare a bid while Toronto-based Steve Shaw Productions had been working on it for a month. My further information is that other companies based in Newfoundland—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will know that preambles are to set the stage for a question. I am sure that the Hon. Member will put his question.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Government's stated interest in regional development can the Minister give the House an explanation of why Atlantic companies are being treated unfairly in this way by the Government? Can he tell the House what he will do to prevent this type of thing from happening again?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, this question was brought to my attention last week. Having examined the situation and the various problems, I can assure my colleague that in this case all regular procedures were followed by the Department of Supply and Services.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF NEW TENDERING PROCESS

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, if all regular procedures were followed in this case, can the Minister tell us what new procedures he will put in place to make things more fair for Atlantic companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it must be recalled that this is a national event, five propositions were received and accepted. Of course, the best proposition was selected and awarded the contract.

I should also like to remind my colleague that this year's winner is the same as last year's. All instructions and provisions were adequately followed, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the House that this will be the last set of questions. The Hon. Member for Trinity.

FOOD TAX ISSUE—TRADE ASSOCIATION'S STUDY

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the assessment by a trade association that sales tax on food as described in the White Paper would push food prices up 12 per cent to 13 per cent. Will the Minister tell the House how he considers that low-income Canadians could handle such an increase without hardship?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is speculation on the part of that industry association. It does not know the results of the consultations that we are going through regarding the composition of the tax base for a new sales tax, nor does it know the rate or the refundable sales tax credit which, as the Hon. Member knows, will be paid regularly in advance. It is a speculative comment.

I encourage the association to wait until the end of the consultation process, as I encourage the Hon. Member, when those decisions will be taken.

REFUNDABLE SALES TAX CREDIT

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, a refundable sales tax credit is useful only if it is timely and if it is adequate. Can the Minister guarantee that in such a case a refundable sales tax credit would not be a matter whereby people starve for six months and then get an inadequate credit?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can give the Hon. Member absolute assurance. I have said time and time again that a refundable sales tax credit will be paid in advance of the needs of the individual receiving the credit. It will be paid regularly, and whether it is monthly or quarterly is something that is still subject to consultation. The sales tax credit will vary. The size will vary depending on what is in the sales tax base.

These are matters about which we will consult and about which we have been consulting. We also look forward to the conclusions to which the Finance Committee might come.

Mr. Speaker: A single question by the Hon. Member for Skeena.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—VIEWS ATTRIBUTED TO UNITED STATES SENATE REPUBLICAN LEADER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is a serious one. It is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure that he is aware by now that the Senate Republican Leader, Bob Dole, has confirmed that he was serious about his remarks regarding a "little three-day invasion of Nicaragua and the assassination of the President of Nicaragua". Will the Right Hon. Minister take this opportunity to distance Canada firmly and formally from any such views regarding the assassination of any political leader in the western hemisphere?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will not get involved in a domestic debate in the United States. Our view on the question of Central America differs markedly from that of the United States. That difference is well known.

Point of Order—Mrs. Finestone

ALLEGED FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH PROVISIONS OF S. O. 99(2)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am asking Your Honour for a ruling on the Government's response to the fifth and sixth reports of the House Standing Committee on Communications and Culture which I believe is in breach of Standing Order 99(2).

I am a member of that committee. I first brought this issue to the attention of the House over one week ago, but I deferred to a request by the office of the Deputy House Leader and by Your Honour to await the presence of the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) before proceeding. I welcome the Minister here today. I will proceed as Your Honour requested.

By way of background, the fifth and sixth reports of the House Standing Committee on Communications and Culture were tabled in the House on April 28 and May 6, 1987, respectively. These two reports contain more than 150 pages of carefully analysed documents and 107 separate recommendations. These reports represent countless hours of preparation by our committee and by members of our staff. They reflect the many hours that we took to hear hundreds of witnesses and to read many hundreds of pages of briefs from various business organizations and public and private institutions, as well as many concerned citizens.

In response to these in-depth reports tabled in the House by the standing committee under our dedicated chairman, the Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards), the Minister of Communications provided the Government's response in the form of a simple four and one-half page reply—I would suggest a smoke-screen, cynical response to cover a lack of action.

There is nothing in the Standing Orders of the House which allow the Government to provide a partial response to the reports of a committee. Standing Order 99(2) states:

> Within 150 days of the presentation of a report from a standing or special committee, the government shall, upon the request of the committee, table a comprehensive response thereto.

Your Honour will note that that Standing Order is drafted in mandatory terms—"the Government shall—table a comprehensive response". The Government is obliged to do so as long as the committee has requested such a comprehensive response.

Our committee has specifically made such a request. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that on the final page of each of the committee's two reports in question there appears these words: "The Committee requests that the Government provide a comprehensive response to this report in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 99(2)".

It is apparent that in approving this particular Standing Order Parliament attached considerable weight to the mandatory nature of the Government's obligations and to the duty to provide a comprehensive reply. The previous set of Standing Orders which were in effect on February 24, 1986, set forth the same duty but gave the Government only 120 days in which to respond to a committee report. The current version of this Standing Order came into effect in June of 1987 allowing the Government 150 days. I presume that it was felt that we needed that additional one month's time.

One would have thought, however, that that would have been ample time for the Minister to have prepared a detailed reply. If the Minister still was not ready to provide a full reply, then she should have come before the House to seek unanimous consent, which I think the committee would have been happy to grant, to extend that time to her under the rules so that she could have ample time. She has failed to do this.

The Government's response to our committee's report deals in vague terms with only some of the recommendations contained in part 2 of our fifth report. That is the part that dealt with the power of direction and civil remedies. The response dealt with none of the recommendations in part 1 of our fifth report on specialty services, the issue which is now before the CRTC, and none of the 86 recommendations contained in our sixth report on broadcasting legislation. Surely it is evident that the failure to respond to any of the 86 recommendations cannot comply with the Standing Order of the House, no matter how it is defined as comprehensive.

I am not suggesting that the Minister was obliged to advise us what specific actions she intended to take on each of the 107 recommendations. Surely, at the very least, the Minister owed a duty to the House, to the Members, to the committee, and to individual Canadians who came, to indicate whether she agreed or disagreed with our recommendations. Her response does not even meet this minimum standard. She neither accepted nor rejected most of our recommendations, nor does her response provide any indication of which of the committee's 107 specific recommendations she feels that she cannot respond to, or why she cannot respond.

The Minister's failure to respond to our recommendations for a new Broadcasting Act seems strangely inconsistent with the Minister's assurance to the committee on May 4, 1987, and I quote what the Minister stated: "I believe we can all agree on the main thrust of new legislation". The Minister was correct. We did agree on the main thrust of this legislation. In fact, our committee recommendations were unanimous. Apparently the Minister has either changed her mind, or chosen to abrogate her responsibility of policy making to the CRTC at this critical juncture in the evolution of Canadian broadcasting. She has failed to provide leadership in the legislative area, a mandate she stated was of utmost urgency. Perhaps it was better that she did not, if she has no vision.

The inaction of the Minister at this critical time leaves a serious void in addressing the new technological changes, for example, satellite to cable speciality services, the very issues which we addressed and the issues which will have a profound effect on the future of the Canadian broadcasting system. Many hearings have been scheduled and some direction is required.

It is important to note that last winter when our committee first embarked upon consideration of the broadcasting field, we had a choice of three issues or methods of procedure; start with broadcast policy, then look at the architecture of the system, and finally come up with some broadcasting legislation. That course seemed logical. The Minister of Communications urged us to begin with a fast-track study on broadcasting legislation in order that she would be able to produce a new Act. We, as a committee, would have preferred to follow the broadcasting policy route first.

The reference from the Minister of Communications to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture stated, as reported in Hansard on January 29, 1987, page 2855:

> That the committee report its findings and recommendations on all matters relevant to the development of broadcasting legislation no later than April 15, 1987.

During a session of the committee on February 5, 1987, the chairman, the Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards) stated, as reported in Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, February 5, 1987, page 18:4:

> We have a rigorous schedule. As the Minister indicated to us when she appeared in November, it is required for the Government to carry out its mission of bringing in a new Broadcasting Act. The reference from the House refers to recommendations leading to new Broadcasting Act.

In response to the remarks of Mr. Edwards, the Minister of Communications stated, as reported in Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, February 5, 1987, page 18:5:

> I was pleased to hear the Chairman stress the deadline date we have placed on the receipt of your report on the Caplan-Sauvageau Task Force. I should advise you now that I intend to hold you to that deadline. I am very keen to receive your views by then because I am determined to keep my deadline on seeking Cabinet approval for a broad policy framework on broadcasting after Easter, as well as authority to begin drafting a new Act over the summer.

Our committee rushed to meet the deadline imposed by the Minister, but the Minister did not rush to keep up with the committee's response. Now that the committee has complied with the request of the Minister to begin with broadcasting legislation, the Minister has the audacity to send us back to the drawing board with a new set of questions and objectives that are totally irrelevant. Some of the questions now posed by the Minister, for example, those questions relating to the CBC, are largely irrelevant to the formulation of broadcasting policy legislation, since the issues are operating and not legislative in nature.

With respect to the questions of the Minister on Telefilm and the National Film Board, these issues are outside the Broadcasting Act itself, and are therefore not germane to the issues addressed in our fifth and sixth reports.

With respect to the other questions of the Minister, written in bureaucratese, it is difficult to know if the Minister is contemplating deregulation of the CRTC, privatization, or what new incentive measures the Minister feels should be found in the broadcasting legislation.

As an active member of this committee, and an individual Member of the House, I ask the Minister now what type of incentives and respect can we expect from the public at large for a new round of studies when the Minister has responded with a cavalier attitude to our fifth and sixth reports.

If you should think that the case of the Minister of Communications is an isolated one, Mr. Speaker, let me remind you that the failure of Ministers to provide comprehensive reports is a malady which is not confined to this Minister.

Mr. Lewis: False.

Mrs. Finestone: During the previous month you already had before you for consideration two other alleged cases that different Ministers had failed to comply with the same standing order. I recognize as you wave that around that we have received an answer to one.

Mr. Lewis: Stick around.

Mrs. Finestone: I did not know that you are the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that the Hon. Member's remarks which were directed at another Member in the House ought not to be taken as if they were directed to the Chair.

Mrs. Finestone: Please do not misunderstand my representation.

In conclusion, I have made a fairly lengthy presentation because there is at stake a more fundamental issue than whether the Minister of Communications does or does not submit the long-awaited Broadcasting Act to Parliament. It is not for me to decide how many more crystal balls the Minister requires as well as the Caplan-Sauvageau report, and our committee's reports. The fundamental issue is the sanctity of the committee system. It is whether our much heralded reforms of the committee system are mere words, to be avoided at the whim of an individual Minister who wishes to thwart the will of the House, or whether these are true reforms in the interests of promoting the role of individual Members of the House and its committees, which will be given effect to by the Speaker of the House. The matter rests with you, and I know that we can count on your good judgment.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards) on the same point of order.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): I rise on the point of order in my capacity as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. On behalf of the committee, I would ask Your Honour to rule whether the response tabled in the House on August 26 by the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) constitutes a comprehensive response as required by the committee under Standing Order 99(2). It is the unanimous view of the committee that the Minister's response is not comprehensive, and thus not in keeping with the spirit or the letter of the reforms of Parliament.

Specifically, the response fails to deal with the substance of Part 1 of the committee's fifth report of April 27 which dealt with specialty services, a new satellite delivered generation of television services. The response neither accepts nor rejects any of the nine recommendations the committee made on the subject, nor comments on any of the analyses and findings of the committee, nor offers any reason why neither the recommendations nor the views expressed by the committee have been dealt with. To be fair and to be complete, the Minister agreed in principle with three recommendations made in Part II of the fifth report.

Both our fifth report, tabled April 27, and our sixth report, made May 6, dealt with matters pertaining to broadcasting, based on the recommendations of the task force thereon, the so-called Caplan-Sauvageau task force. That task force report, dealing with broadcasting policy and legislation, was tabled in the House by the Minister on January 29 of this year. On that date the Minister sought and obtained an order of reference that directed our committee to "report its findings and recommendations in all matters relevant to the development of broadcasting legislation no later than April 15, 1987".

A brief extension of deadline having been granted, the committee reported in full on May 6, outlining with unanimity 86 legislative recommendations in a detailed report comprising 117 pages of reasoned argument and representing 12 weeks of members' work in 42 sessions totalling over 100 hours of deliberations. The Ministry had 120 days or 17 weeks in which to prepare a response. Not one of the 86 recommendations was responded to.

The Minister in her response of August 26 has instead charged the committee with a fourfold new mission—to explore new technologies, to encourage Canadian programming within the limits of available resources, how to strengthen the CBC, and how to maximize use of government resources in program production.

These questions are pertinent, general ones designed to focus the committee's attention beyond the limits of the task force recommendations. They recall for the committee the fact that it must deal with broadcasting policy matters in addition to legislative matters. We know that; we have been studying policy matters since May 7. In fact, had we proceeded in logical order, we would have dealt with policy first, then legislation. However, the Minister wanted a Bill, she gave us a reference, and we complied.

I am mindful, Mr. Speaker, of the rulings made by your distinguished predecessor and by yourself on the issue of government response to reports of standing committees. I am aware, Sir, of Speaker Bosley's ruling of April 26, 1986 in which he said that Hon. Members would understand the Chair would be in a very difficult position were it to be called upon to rule on the quality of government responses as it is in similar difficulty ruling on the quality of questions or answers during Question Period.

Further, Sir, you yourself ruled on June 29 of this year on the question of whether the word "comprehensive" can be interpreted by the Chair. You found at that time that it was not for the Chair to determine what constituted a comprehensive response, as this would be tantamount to judging the acceptability of the response. You went on to say, Sir: "The nature of the response must be left to the discretion of the Government. If Hon. Members are dissatisfied, there are avenues available through which they can pursue the matter".

I defer to that judgment and I would ask, with all the respect I can summon, that you, Sir, reconsider that ruling. I would do so, not because of the specific issues before us, or because of the investment of work which has been made in this, or because I, as Chairman or as a Member of the House, have any issue to take with the Minister, but solely on the grounds that we have had reforms of the House, that those reforms are well known, that they are experimental, that they are tentative, and that they deserve to be nourished and encouraged. I would ask you, Sir, again with all respect, to consider whether the Chair might find, when 86 recommendations are made in response to a House reference and none of them is responded to in substance, that there has or has not been a comprehensive response.

In conclusion, if it is our duty to complete our task, may we see our duty through by our knowing, by an $8 billion industry knowing, and by the nation knowing whether a Minister, charged with responding in a comprehensive way to a committee report she herself ordered with urgency, is then obliged to respond in substance to the recommendations contained therein.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order regarding the failure of the Government to respond in any comprehensive way to the fifth and sixth reports of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. I want to support most heartily the points made by the two previous speakers and to add a few remarks of my own.

I find the Government's failure to respond most astonishing in the circumstances. Perhaps this is the most hard-working committee of the House in terms of number of meetings, in terms of effort, and in terms of all the work which has gone into these two reports.

These reports were delivered on time, with a very slight delay which was agreed upon by all. It was at the timing of the Minister that we deal first with the legislative questions and with the policy questions later. We did that because the Minister stated that it was her timetable and that she wanted to bring in a new Broadcasting Act. We divided up our work deliberately at her request to review legislative aspects first, which was probably not the order we would have used otherwise. In short, we did what she asked us to do.

It seems most astonishing and indeed insulting to the committee that there should be a complete reversal. After all the work which has gone into it, and after the very detailed and carefully researched and investigative points which have been made, we have not even obtained an answer on the substance.

You have said, Mr. Speaker, that you do not consider it your role to determine what constitutes "comprehensive" in terms of government response and likened it to Question Period and judging the quality of questions and answers. I suggest that in very flagrant cases like this it is very clear that when 86 recommendations in a very lengthy and very carefully prepared report are not responded to, there cannot be any doubt. It is not a question of judging the wisdom of a particular point here and there, it is a question of whether or not there has been an adequate response, a remotely adequate response.

I point out further that, with the failure to respond on these very important points of substance, the Minister has also thrown in complete asides. There are red herrings in this response. There are suggestions that we ought to look at other questions, that we ought to look at a policy on Telefilm and on the National Film Board. These are very important institutions, but that was not part of our mandate. The suggestion that the Government cannot respond because we have failed to do our work is total nonsense. It was not in our reference in the first place. The idea that we should take up these particular questions is totally inappropriate.

There is even a suggestion in the Government's response that our committee might like to reconsider certain points. There is a suggestion that possibly we have been frivolous ourselves and that we might change our minds. There is also a suggestion that the Government's policy must be forward looking, the implication being that the committee is not forward looking, that the committee has not done its work, that the committee would then go out and do some further work, and that the committee would come back with different conclusions. This is simply to insult the committee, that it has not done its work. This committee worked very hard and, with a great deal of effort, came to unanimous recommendations. The committee has worked together very effectively and wants to continue by going on to the policy questions.

Further, we have received no reason for not obtaining answers. We have received no objections. There is no interplay between the Minister and the committee, such as the suggestion, "I don't like recommendation 17, but recommendation 18 is all right for the following reasons". We have been given absolutely no guidance for us to continue our work, none whatsoever.

As I suggest, frivolous questions have been raised at this point, questions which have nothing to do with the legislation but concern legislation in a different area, such as the National Film Board or Telefilm. Some questions that have been raised in the Minister's response deal with the CBC Budget. That was not in our report. We might want to deal with the CBC Budget at a later date, but that was not part of it.

This is a very meagre four and a half pages. As well as not dealing with what it should be dealing with, it raises completely extraneous matters. The report has been padded to get to four and a half pages and made to look like it is addressing issues, in fact it is dealing with subjects that are not at issue right now, that are certainly not the business of the committee at the present time. They would take the committee off on a completely different tact.

This is an important subject, Mr. Speaker. The whole idea of parliamentary reform, committee reform and the idea of having the Government respond is to make meaningful the work of committees. We are not working in isolation to come up with reports that gather dust. The idea is that the committee's work would have relevance, and that the Government would study them.

We have a task force set up by the Government. We looked at that. We had hearings. We commissioned research. We came up with a report and the Government is supposed to carry on to the next step. It intended to, but now we have this complete about face. The Government does not want us to continue the work that way. It wants us to retract on certain suggestions. The Government wants us to investigate the CBC, the NFB or do other things that we were never asked to do, certainly not in connection with this order of reference. We have been left without any guidance whatsoever. Our time has been wasted and house time has been wasted.

In conclusion I would suggest that no doubt Standing Order 99 anticipates and requires the Government to make some sense of our work, to come back in a reasoned way with its response in order that the legislative process can proceed in a proper fashion and that people can work together in some kind of reasonable way. This is not what we have today.

We have a Minister who will intervene in particular cases, but is failing to give policy direction. These are extremely important matters, matters before the CRTC right now in which decisions will be made without any government input whatsoever. We very much regret this order of doing things. It is upside down. The Government should be giving policy direction at this stage before it is too late and not intervening in the process later, which is how this Minister wants to operate. This is a fundamental infringement of the process anticipated with these parliamentary committee reforms.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am pleased to see the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) in the House. She will know that I telephoned her the other day to commiserate with her on her recent accident. I am glad she is mobile and able to join us today.

I want to say at the outset that members of the committee have, indeed, worked hard and produced a number of reports, many of which I have already responded to, including reports on the status of artists, museums, CBC accountability et cetera. I want to deal today with comments that have been made about the fifth and sixth reports of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture and the point raised that the Government's response has not been as comprehensive as it should be.

It is the Government's opinion that the response tabled at this time is as comprehensive as it can be under the circumstances and I would like to deal with those circumstances because some very good points have been raised.

The report submitted by the committee dealt with the legislative aspects of the report of the task force on broadcasting policy, namely, the Caplan-Sauvageau report. Now the Committee is studying, as I understand it, other aspects of the task force report, particularly certain policy aspects.

I have to admit, as was raised here earlier today, that this sequence was at my instigation. I believed at the time the reference was made that it would be feasible to begin drafting legislation before all the policy aspects had been studied and dealt with. But as I looked at the report of the committee, as I followed its work during the months of May and June, and as I studied the reports throughout the summer, it became very clear to me that it would not be possible to proceed in that manner. In fact, I think it was as a result of some of the committee hearings across the country when other issues began being raised that I realized there were certain fundamental policy issues that had not been met or discussed that would have to be dealt with before legislation could be drafted and before a new broadcasting act could be brought in. In other words, the comprehensive policy matters had to be studied, examined and dealt with before the whole Broadcasting Act could be determined in its final stages.

The hearings, I think, pointed to the fact that the task force report itself was rooted in certain assumptions. Those assumptions are such that I feel obliged to question them. Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker. The first of these assumptions is that regulation, as we presently know it, will be more effective in getting private broadcasters to carry their weight with respect to Canadian programming, and the one way to do that would be to make regulation tougher. I have read a great deal in the last number of months about the impact of regulation on the private broadcasters; there have been many articles and letters written on this subject. I can cite, for instance, Robert Fulford, who has analyzed this matter very carefully and who points out that even with the kind of regulatory methods that are now in effect we have not had the kind of Canadian programming that we all desire.

I have questioned whether or not regulation is the only approach to the private broadcasting system. I have raised the question whether or not methods or incentives could be used, or a combination of incentives or regulations which would produce more and better Canadian programming. That question has not been answered. I look at that issue and ask myself, can I draft an act without that question being answered? I have asked the committee to look at that in its continuing study of policy.

The second assumption is that broadcasting will continue into the next century in the same way that most Canadians receive broadcasting and programming today. I have asked the committee to look at the way in which technologies are impacting our broadcasting system. Tremendous differences are taking place, whether through the carriage of programming or high definition television. In fact, I know that the committee has asked to meet with officials of the Department of Communications for further briefings on this issue.

The third assumption is that there are no better structures for the CBC within which to carry out its function as the cornerstone of Canadian cultural policy than the structure which exists today. We are looking at the CBC and at whether or not there can be some way in which more emphasis is put on programming, which is the goal of all of us, than on operations. I think there may be ways to do that, but that will have an impact on the mandate of the CBC which, of necessity, has to be built into legislation.

Since all of the Caplan-Sauvageau recommendations flow from these assumptions, I make no apology for wishing to look at what would happen under another set of assumptions. Revision of the Broadcasting Act is something which takes place, at most, once in a generation. The Broadcasting Act was overhauled 20 years ago. We are now looking at it and we know that it will have to carry us into the 21st century. Is the mandate of the CBC, developed some 50 years ago, relevant to the mandate of the CBC that must take it into the 21 century?

That having been said, there are certain legislative matters on which immediate action is advisable and I have responded to those measures. For instance, in its report of April 27 the committee urged prompt introduction of a power of direction over the CRTC. It recommended a limited review power as well as a private right of action under the Radio Act. Those were three major measures, particularly the power of direction, recommended by the committee.

The Government has agreed in principle with those recommendations. That in itself is a substantive response. The power of direction to the CRTC, which is an all-Party recommendation and had been recommended as well by the previous Government, will probably be one of the most profound moves that has ever been made in the field of broadcasting. We have dealt with that. We have said that we would accept that recommendation in principle.

We agreed earlier to another set of proposals made by the committee dealing with CBC accountability. The Government will be introducing legislation shortly to enact those changes.

There are some recommendations in the committee's report on which the Government does not now have the power to act. For example, the committee made a number of recommendations with regard to specialty services. The Government currently does not have a mechanism which would permit it to direct a quasi-judicial body like the CRTC to follow a particular course of action with regard to specialty services. There is, therefore, no concrete action that the Government can take on recommendations regarding these specialty services at the present time.

The response indicates to the CRTC that the Government expects the committee's recommendations to be taken into account. We have ensured that those recommendations were passed on to the CRTC, but we cannot direct it in its decision. Obviously, if decisions made on specialty services are appealed, the committee's recommendations would form an element of the Cabinet's review, but until there is a power of direction, the Government cannot act directly on these recommendations.

The Government has decided not to commit itself at this moment to the more than 100 detailed recommendations for changes to the Broadcasting Act but prefers to finalize the policy framework first. In other words, we do not want to put the cart before the horse. That indicates, I will agree, that there has been a rethinking of the appropriate order of the activity of the Government. I think that is a very appropriate approach to take on this very important issue. It does not indicate, and I want to assure Hon. Members of this, that the recommendations and the work of the committee will not be followed up in detail.

I may say that I am certainly as committed as members of the committee or any Member of the House to broadcasting reform. I have stated that before and I will state it again. I am committed to broadcasting reform based on the chief objective of the Government to ensure more and better Canadian programming in the system. It is for this reason that I have asked the committee to look more comprehensively at the assumptions that were contained in the Caplan-Sauvageau report. I feel that the Government's response was indeed perfectly consistent with a sincere effort to make its broadcasting review one that is truly directed to the future.

I hope that the committee would undertake, in its present and ongoing review, an analysis of these questions that I have posed. We are doing the same thing at this time. I have welcomed the work of the committee to date and I will welcome any comment it is able to make on these questions I have posed to it—questions which I think are so fundamental to the new broadcasting policy we are in the process of developing.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short intervention on the procedural aspects of this point of order. I think all Hon. Members of the House have made a contribution to the debate and it has been healthy for all sides.

The Government responded to the McGrath committee's report on parliamentary reform by expanding the mandate of parliamentary committees under Standing Order 96(2). This gave the standing committees of Parliament a much larger mandate than they had had in the past. In fact, it gave committees the opportunity to write their own mandates, as it were. They are now unfettered and unhindered and they have complete freedom to investigate whichever areas they wish. I think it is fair to say that this has been a benchmark in expanding the ability of the House as a whole and members from all Parties to hold the Government accountable.

Standing Order 99(2) requires the Government to respond to a standing committee report when the committee asks for a response. I point out that this was not part of the recommendations of the McGrath committee. This was something that was added by the Government to bolster that particular aspect of it.

I apologize for heckling the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) at the point that I did. I wanted to mention that the Hon. Member quite rightly pointed out that there had been a previous point of order on this issue. In fact, I believe there have been three points of order raised about it. Since there have been points of order raised on the question of the word "comprehensive" before, I would like to point out in fairness that there have been some 17 responses by the Government to committee reports since September 1986. In only three cases the question of whether or not the response was comprehensive has come up for debate. I know that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards), referred to previous rulings. I would like to expand upon that reference.

I would point out the comments you made, Sir, on June 29. At that time, you said:

> It is not for the Chair to determine what constitutes a comprehensive response as this would be tantamount to judging the acceptability of the response. Clearly the Chair could not examine every committee report and every government response in order to make this determination. The nature of the response must be left to the discretion of the Government and, if Hon. Members are dissatisfied, there are avenues available through which they can pursue the matter.

You then made reference to a similar point of order which was raised on April 18, 1986, and you indicated that Mr. Speaker Bosley said:

> —"that the Chair would be in a very difficult position were it called upon to rule on the quality of government responses".

You went on to say, Mr. Speaker, the following:

> Members are entitled to express dissatisfaction with government responses to committee reports—

I think it is fair to point out as well that a member of the Government and joined in the debate questioning the word "comprehensive", and I think that is an indication that we stand behind parliamentary reform. You went on to say, Mr. Speaker, the following:

> —but such complaints can only be pursued through the political process.

I suggest that by allowing this debate to go on now, the matter has been aired through the political process. The Government is content that that should take place. All Members of the House have had an opportunity to participate in the debate. I submit that your ruling of June 29 was sound and that this point of order should be ruled upon using that as a basis for your decision.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) rises to speak and I think it would be appropriate to allow her to make a short reply.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that it is very difficult for you to determine whether or not a report is comprehensive in the political sense of the word. Yet if we just look at the numerical sense, in this particular instance we can see a flagrant abuse of that word. There were 85 recommendations, and not one single word. The Minister used the House just now to elaborate on her thinking. Whether or not I agree with that thinking is not the point. The point is, if she had used that avenue to tell the committee why she felt she required further time and that she made an error in judgment in asking us to go the legislative investigative route rather than the policy and then legislative route, fine, there would have been no argument. Yet with a sort of "the back of her hand" she completely disregards the effort and time put in by volunteers and staff. That is extremely disrespectful of the points just made by the Deputy House Leader.

The Minister also said she could not direct that regulatory body, but she is prepared to go with a patchwork quilt on the same broadcasting matter, and tells us she is going to bring in some CBC legislation. One should have a degree of coherence in the presentation of an argument for one's point of view. I suggest Bill C-20 was the first Bill I got when I came to this House over three years ago; two Ministers had that Bill for consideration, prior to my ever getting here, two other ministers had it, so she certainly had an option.

As a matter of fact, the Hon. Member for Essex—Kent (Mr. Caldwell) specifically asked the Minister if she would split the Bill and bring in the power of direction under Bill C-20. I asked that of the Minister. She seemed to be interested but now in her report she indicates that the Government is confident that the Commission will take no action to foreclose fundamental options with respect to such important issues as the respective roles of specific industry sectors or the economic structure of the broadcasting environment. She goes on to say that the CRTC is well aware that the Government is engaged in a major review of broadcasting. If she has some concerns, bring in the power of direction. If she is worried about Canadian content, do something about it. Do not slough it off in this way and then pretend she cannot do anything.

The last point I would like to make is that when we are talking about a response the Minister said she wanted methods of incentives which would indicate to her the kinds of programs. It seems to me we spent one full day in this House defending what the National Film Board does. The Minister's Parliamentary Secretary gave a rousing speech on the role of the NFB, and I defended that. Furthermore, she just brought in permanent funding for Telefilm. We gave an impression as to how we felt artists should be supported. We told the Minister to bring in the cinema Act and a film policy. We said do not cut out capital cost allowances. How the heck did you ever get involved in a White Paper reform that is going to kill the film industry and broadcasting?

I do not know what more the Minister wants by way of directives from this side of the House or from a committee which is dedicated to Canadian culture. Either the Minister has absolutely been bought or is having her arm twisted—

Miss MacDonald: Oh, wait a moment. You withdraw that.

Mrs. Finestone: You are right. I am sorry, I do withdraw that.

Miss MacDonald: You ought to be ashamed.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the Hon. Member did not mean to cast aspersions on the character or integrity of the Minister and I thank her for immediately withdrawing that comment.

This may be of some help to the Hon. Member in concluding her remarks. The Chair has listened very carefully to this entire debate. As was pointed out by the Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis), it is not the first time it has been brought to the Chair's attention. I ask that the Hon. Member close off her remarks and stay exactly on the procedural point that I now have to decide.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, in no way did I intend that to be an attack on the Minister's credibility or integrity, for which she has a very fine reputation. If that is what it sounded like, I withdraw that and deeply apologize to the Minister.

My concern is that the Minister has constantly talked about the fact that we have 97 per cent of our screen time being used by non-Canadians, particularly Americans. She wants to do something about that. Then she came up with some ideas. The industry and the Canadian people were very excited about her cinema Act. They were pleased she was putting more money into a number of areas. Now they see this as a withdrawal of either interest or active participation in moving forward the cultural sector. We appreciate her very intense concern for the telecommunications sector but she has two mandates and the other one deals with broadcasting and other cultural issues.

I bring to your attention the fact that we have found this to be an inadequate report. The fundamental policy issues were not addressed. If the Minister felt she wanted it to be otherwise and she would now like us to deal with those policies, I suggest that would have been a more effective and efficient way to address the issue. To go about this in a patchwork way is not good and I certainly do not expect to see another Bill for the CBC.

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to intervene in this discussion, but as a member of the committee I would like to add a couple of comments.

I guess the question centres around what is a comprehensive reply and this is what the discussion is about. The chairman of the committee already indicated that we did not feel it was a comprehensive reply. However, as the Minister indicated, does a reply have to be given immediately or can she do it later? I feel there is a possibility of getting the answers from the Minister other than during this debate or through messages being sent back and forth.

The Minister indicated today that our work will be followed up in detail, which I am very pleased to hear. In the past the Minister, one of the hardest working Ministers, has taken our advice, for example on the museums corporation. I see she is now acting on that. I have no doubt she is willing to listen to our recommendations and I am very pleased with what she has said today.

As the Minister pointed out, this is a very complicated subject. She indicated some of the things she cannot do because there is no legislation to permit her to do them. I only wish she had said that in her reply, but I am pleased that she has indicated that she is going to follow up on some of these things. As a member of the committee, I can say we are going to hold her to that.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank all Hon. Members for their interventions on this important matter. I want to especially thank the Hon. Minister. We all know the demands on a Minister's time and she stayed throughout this entire debate. I am sure Hon. Members appreciate that. I want to thank the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) for so graciously accepting my invitation to adjourn this application some days ago in order to give the Minister an opportunity to be here. I think all Hon. Members are impressed that the chairman of the committee took part in these deliberations, as did the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) and the Hon. Member for Essex—Kent (Mr. Caldwell).

There is nothing particularly easy about these complaints which have been brought to the Speaker. The Minister of State (Mr. Lewis), in his succinct and I think apposite comments, noted the difficulty that the Chair could get into in trying to determine what is or is not comprehensive. However, we have a problem which has been brought to the Chair and the Chair will consider this matter, along with some others which are pending, and try and bring a comprehensive report to the House which will be of assistance to all Hon. Members.

CANADA POST—DELIVERY SERVICE IN WINNIPEG—OPPOSITION TO CORPORATE PLAN

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of petitions with regard to the Post Office. The first petition indicates that Canada Post is reducing delivery service in the City of Winnipeg for its business customers. The petitioners call upon the Government to stop this reduction of service and to restore the service that they have traditionally received from the Post Office. The second petition I have is also with regard to the Post Office and is from people across the country who indicate that the federal government proposal to seek financial self-sufficiency for the Canada Post corporation by 1988 will result in cutbacks and deterioration of service of the Post Office and will consequently be at the expense of service to Canadian consumers.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to instruct the Government to make improved service the highest priority of the Canada Post corporation and to instruct the Government to abandon this policy of closing rural post offices and cancelling rural routes.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard that Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in rising to debate Bill C-84 I must register the strongest possible concerns with what the Government is doing on the issue of refugees. I am appalled at the legislation before us today. I am appalled by the hypocrisy of the Government in dealing with this issue. The legislation before us today will not deal with the genuine concerns people have about fraudulent refugees and the smuggling of people into the country for commercial purposes in order to make money from the misery of others. The Bill will not accomplish the objective of Canadians to distinguish between genuine refugees and those posing as refugees in order to jump the queue.

I happen to represent a riding which, like many ridings in this country, has a very large number of recent immigrants and people who are trying to get their own families in. There is a great deal of concern that it is unfair for people to use the refugee process to subvert the ordinary immigration process. I and my Party would heartily concur with legislation that would make it possible to make this kind of distinction, and that would provide fair procedures for immigrants and refugees, and would crack down on the fraudulent practices that exist.

This legislation will not help with those problems. It will leave people extremely frustrated in that it is still possible for crooks and smugglers to abuse the system. Genuine refugees will not get into Canada. People will be turned away and returned to unsafe countries. Bill C-55 is a mockery of our international and Charter obligations and Bill C-84 is even worse than that.

I want to raise a number of very specific concerns. So many of our ancestors came to Canada under difficult circumstances. I am appalled that a country built on the basis of immigrants and refugees is so unsympathetic and unable now to develop a policy that would make the wise distinctions we do want to make. I am appalled that Canada has had such a bad record for so many years on the issue of refugees. Only fairly recently did we begin to reverse those trends. Very recently, in 1986, Canada was awarded the United Nations Nansen award for its work on refugees, marking the reversal of our bad history.

Now in 1987, only a year after winning an award for our humanitarian work on refugees, the Government wants to turn the clock back to that earlier and very disgraceful period during which Canada treated would-be refugees abominably.

In 1939 Jewish refugees from Hitler's Germany came to South America, the United States of America, and finally to Canada. Canada turned away 907 Jewish refugees, many of whom died in death camps as a result. There was also the case of would-be East Indian immigrants; they were the wrong colour under our racist policies of the past, and those desperate people were turned away. We now have legislation which will ensure that people are turned away at the ports, the bus stations, the airports and the train stations. Genuine refugees whose lives are at stake in countries which torture, imprison and kill people, could be turned away under the provisions of this Bill.

Let me get into some specifics of what is wrong with this Bill. First of all, Bill C-84 would introduce a new security certificate system for procuring deportation of certain recent arrivals. It would deny these people the right to apply for refugee status. It would turn ships away from our territorial waters if they were considered to be bringing in undocumented passengers. And, of course, there would be punishment for anyone helping those people come to Canada without the usual travel documents, documents which are available only in official offices that people would likely not be able to get to.

With respect to the new security certificates, the proposed law will allow a Minister of Employment and Immigration and a Solicitor General to sign a certificate saying that someone is a security risk without saying what he did or what is the evidence against him. The charge and the evidence would be reviewed in camera by the Security Intelligence Review Committee which would then tell the accused as much of the accusation as it thinks would not harm national security. The accused would reply and the Security Intelligence Review Committee would recommend to the Minister whether or not to sustain the certificate. Therefore, there are now provisions which can ensure that someone who is a security risk will not be allowed to stay in the country.

There are provisions for the security of Canada but, nonetheless, there are provisions which ensure that a person is not to be deported back to the country of origin, and ensure that security considerations are treated along with the refugee application. If necessary, a third country is considered to which the person could go rather than back to the country where that person's life may be very much at risk.

Bill C-84 would separate permanent residents from non-permanent arrivals and provide a different security certificate system for the non-permanent arrivals. They would be reviewed by the Federal Court and a judge would decide whether or not to quash the certificate. In terms of the substance of the matter, Federal Court judges do not have experience or expertise in this area. They will not be able to deal in an appropriate fashion with those applications. Their expertise and experience is on the legal reasoning, not on the substance of these cases. Therefore, we will see a procedure set up that is totally inappropriate for the question at hand.

With respect to denial of access to refugee status determination, Clause 5 of Bill C-84 would deprive people accused in the security certificate of eligibility to seek refugee status determination. They are not even going to get into the system whereby it would be decided whether or not they were genuine refugees. This, of course, is a callous way of saying that genuine refugees will not be turned away from the country because people who are genuine refugees will not even be considered. We will not even find out whether or not they are genuine refugees; they will be screened out right at the beginning.

Of course, this provision is contrary to international obligations that Canada has undertaken only fairly recently. Canada has signed the United Nations Convention. The United Nations Convention relating to the status of refugees requires that the refugee status claim be heard first and the security risk be examined as part of that procedure. That has been the case, and still is the case until the law is changed. Of course, the United Nations High Commission for Refugees would assist where there is such a problem of a security risk in a genuine refugee case. The representative of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees raised objections to Clause 5, and other clauses, in representations to the committee, but the Government has ignored those recommendations for amendment.

With respect to turning ships away, Clause 8 of Bill C-84 empowers the Minister to order any ship to be turned away from Canada's territorial waters by whatever force is necessary if he considers it is carrying bogus refugee claimants. My Party and the United States representative are concerned that real refugees may be turned away at the same time and the ship captains may unload their passengers in a country where they will be in danger, or they may simply be sent back to sea. Until this year, Canada strongly opposed countries such as Malaysia doing this very thing. We have made representations against the kind of activity the Government itself is now contemplating. That is disgraceful. It should not be allowed. A civilized country would not do that. Canada, in signing the United Nations Convention undertook not to do that sort of thing.

We have asked for an amendment requiring such a ship to be escorted into a Canadian port where the captain could be punished if he had a load of bogus refugees. Certainly, the captain ought to pay for that. One of the ironies of this Bill is that it threatens and is tough on the victims, the people who are exploited, yet it would let extremely unscrupulous people who are trading in human misery, such as ship captains with bogus refugees, off the hook. We suggested that instead, the Government ought to throw the book at such a captain and any people involved in this kind of activity. By all means, bring them into port and punish them. That would be the deterrent.

The Government has talked about the need for a deterrent in view of these organized ship loads of people coming. But where is the deterrent if a ship captain can organize some kind of bogus deal, bring people in, make a lot of money on them, and then is simply turned away? There is no risk to the captain in those circumstances. It would be far better to have the ship brought into port and have these captains face the music of a very heavy fine and prison sentence.

I might add that the inter-church groups which have appeared before the committee and have made representations on this subject were very clear on this point, as they were on other points. They say that what is necessary is to separate the real refugees from bogus refugees and to look very strenuously at measures to punish those who are using refugees for commercial purposes, to make money, by organizing these trips to Canada. By letting them off the hook, as the present legislation would, we are not going to solve that problem at all.

We also have the new provision, something we have never seen before in Canada, and something which is certainly startling to people who are helping refugees, that is, punishment for persons helping undocumented refugees to come to Canada. Under the present law, thousands of Canadians have advised and otherwise helped refugees to come to an immigration office at a Canadian port of entry, whether by land, sea or air. This has not been illegal. Bill C-84 would make it an offence, punishable by up to a $10,000 fine or five years in prison if the group is of 10 persons or more.

The Minister has promised never to prosecute humanitarian groups. Church groups have been told that in fact they are not going to be prosecuted, and they have not been prosecuted in the past. They have not been prosecuted in the past because they have not done anything against the law. Now we have the suggestion that there be a new offence simply for advising people of their right to apply for refugee status, people who do not have documents.

How does this happen? Many refugees do not have documents. They cannot get documents because in fact they are persecuted in their own countries. We should, therefore, not be surprised that we have refugees appearing in Canada who do not have appropriate documents. The Government should not be surprised by this. To say, however, that anyone who would help such a person must be helping someone who is an illegal refugee, not a genuine refugee, is to completely misunderstand the situation.

People who are really trying to get away from the system, to get around our rules, will probably be well able to get the necessary documents. This sort of thing is not going to help us deal with well financed terrorist groups, for example, who do not seem to have any trouble getting very good travel documents.

This type of legislation will not solve the problem of undesirables arriving on our shores with inadequate documentation. It will not do that at all. What it will do is punish people who in all good faith are serving to aid people for humanitarian reasons.

Refugees are among the most miserable, exploited and oppressed people in any part of the world. I commend those who work to help them to find new homes. The idea that these people should now be criminalized is really a scandal. The church representatives themselves tell us that they do not want just to be let off the hook by a Minister who will be too generous to see that they are prosecuted and that they can rely on his goodwill to ensure that the letter of the law is in fact not enforced. These people have said that they do not want to feel or believe that they have committed an offence. They want to be proud of the laws of Canada. They do not want to think that they are breaking the law, that it is only because of the goodwill of the Minister who has made an exception that they are not being prosecuted. That is not good enough for them. They are decent citizens.

I say that a law such as that is not a law good enough for Canada. It is wrong to have a law that is so pernicious, so extravagant and so unnecessary that the Minister promises in advance that it will very seldom be implemented. What kind of a law is that? Of course, there could be any type of change and such a law could in fact be implemented.

We know that people who work with refugees in the United States, members of church groups, members of churches which are now sanctuaries for refugees, are breaking the law and are risking prison sentences. We can see that happening in Canada because our good friends are saying that they will defy any such law which is implemented and passed by Parliament. They will defy it and risk criminal sanctions as a result.

I commend these people for putting conscience at such a high level. I hope that we do not pass a law that will force people in good conscience, because of their humanitarian concerns, to break the law in order to help a very needy and exploited person, a refugee.

The NDP offered amendments to clarify this matter so that it would be an offence only in the case of someone who tries to evade immigration examination, or someone who organizes people to make deliberately false refugee claims. I note that the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), advocated this in his speech in the House. He recommended that the law be rephrased to state that every person who knowingly organizes, induces, aids or abets or attempts to organize, induce, aid or abet a person to come to Canada in this fashion be guilty of an offence. He recommended that that not be so in the case of advice given by church organizations, Amnesty International and all other types of organizations to help people. That recommendation was made and the Government has refused to accept it.

This clause has offended Canadians widely since it seems created for the purpose of intimidating those who are helping people who are fleeing persecution. I am sad to see that the Government is persisting with this. I hope that it will see the error of its ways and change its mind on this very significant part of the legislation.

There are other parts of the legislation to which we certainly object. I refer to the areas of search and seizure and wire-tapping. We consider this a wholly scandalous piece of legislation. We have humanitarian obligations to refugees. I am proud of the church groups which are aiding them, and which see that as part of a civilized society we have obligations to people who are exploited, obligations beyond our own citizens. We are part of a world and we have strangers, refugees or exploited persons who come to our shores. We have obligations as fellow human beings living on this planet to aid them. We need wise legislation which will make a distinction between the genuine refugees and which will protect us from crooks who want to abuse the system. We do not have that with the present legislation. I urge Members to vote against Bill C-84 as it presently stands.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Are there questions or comments?

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I have just one brief question for the Hon. Member. One of the clauses that people from British Columbia who have contacted me have found most offensive is Clause 9. In relation to that clause, the Minister promised that he would never prosecute humanitarian groups or persons who were bringing people into Canada, smuggled or not. He said that he and some bureaucrats would decide who would be selectively prosecuted.

Many church groups and individuals in my constituency have been in touch with me with respect to that proposal. They have said that they find it to be one of the most offensive concepts in the Bill. They object to this idea of a Minister deciding selectively who to prosecute. Will he prosecute a nun from St. Catharines who brings a couple of people across from Central America? To leave an area such as that open to the political whim of the Minister of the day, and perhaps to what the Minister might have eaten the day before or whether he likes someone or not in a certain area, I find to be one of the most horrific and un-Canadian parts of the Bill. Will the Hon. member take a moment to comment on this selective prosecution process that is provided for in Bill C-84?

Ms. McDonald: Madam Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member has raised an extremely important point. Certainly organizations which have gotten in touch with me have raised this point as well. This is one of the most obnoxious parts of the legislation. There are several reasons why it is obnoxious.

One reason is that people do not want to be law-breakers, people who are doing good things out of conscience. These are church groups which are concerned. We have the Hebrew-Christian tradition which respects refugees. They are among the weakest and most oppressed members of any society. As a matter of conscience and religious belief they are obliged—it is not a matter of choice or ethics of deciding whether or not to go along with one rule or another—to aid refugees. Here, because of their religious convictions, they will do things that will make them law-breakers. It is outrageous in our society, our so-called Christian society, that we would have a law which will make law-breakers out of some of our most outstanding members of society, people who are doing very good work. That is outrageous.

We are then given the answer that this law will not be enforced. A Minister will decide, and will simply not choose to prosecute these good people, people who are acting in good conscience. Who says? This is a very inappropriate way to word a law. The Minister should not be making these types of decisions. Do we want our Minister of Justice to be phoning up judges, telling them who to convict and who not to convict? Or do we want him phoning up prosecutors to say, "I want prosecution here and there"? It is a role of the Government to propose legislation and to propose policy, but not to decide on particular cases.

With regard to church groups, these are groups which are lobbying the Government for change in social issues. The same people came before the committee with respect to refugees, and they are also lobbying on all other kinds of social issues. They are lobbying with respect to poverty issues and issues of equality rights. They could be sent off to jail, which would certainly shut them up for a while. They are being placed in a very difficult situation and being ordered to keep on the right side of the law in order not to be prosecuted. Perhaps they will be pressed not to lobby on other issues. This will certainly put them in a very difficult situation, simply because they are acting in good conscience. That is a scandalous thing for the Canadian Parliament to do.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, my question to the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) is a follow-up to the question on the church groups. I note that the Hon. Member was about to discuss the questions raised in this Bill on search and seizure. Most societies on this earth, regardless of their religion, society, or language, have viewed churches as a safe place, a sanctuary, and a refuge. Therefore, it is quite natural that refugees who are fleeing a regime for political reasons, or for their very lives tend to seek out churches when they come to Canada, or when they are on their way here.

I notice that there are some radical changes to the manner in which we generally handle the question of search and seizure. The process of warrants and orders for a search and seizure seem to be bypassed in this particular Bill.

Would the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood give us her analysis of what this Bill does both to the principle of sanctuary and providing a refuge through church groups, which is something recognized by most societies, and to the apparent change in the law proposed by this particular Bill?

Ms. McDonald: These are two quite different issues. The sanctuary issue is an extremely interesting one. People do go to churches for sanctuary. Historically over the centuries, churches have played the role of rescuing people. Because of the churches' belief in the sanctity of human life, they rescue people without asking questions and attempt to sort out the situation later. Churches have played that role, and increasingly they are playing that role.

The question of search and seizure raises many legal issues. Historically, Canada has had pretty Draconian laws on search and seizure. We then brought in the Charter of Rights which limited the state in its search and seizure ability and put constraints on it, and it did not happen soon enough. In the past we had been excessive on this subject. That has been reversed and some legal restraints have been brought in, and now in Bill C-84 there will be new search and seizure, and quite Draconian provisions.

Under Clause 11 of Bill C-84, the Immigration Commission may search and seize, even without a warrant, anything it considers related to the offences of smuggling 10 or more people, or disembarking them at sea. This could include lawyers' privileged solicitor-client documents, or a refugee's personal records. This could mean records that may be very dangerous if they fell into the wrong hands. In short, these provisions are excessive and could certainly pose serious dangers for the people involved.

I wish to add that these provisions will not do us any good because they are directed at the victims of exploitation. They are not directed in any constructive way to go after the culprits, the people who are organizing these refugee scams, which we know have happened. These provisions do not address that, they are excessive, and they will not accomplish any serious purpose we may wish to see accomplished with new refugee legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is one minute left. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Orlikow: I wish to direct a question to my hon. colleague. Earlier today during Question Period the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) in reply to a question made the statement that there was wide support for this refugee Bill.

In my City of Winnipeg I find that there is almost universal opposition to the Bill on the part of spokespersons for the ethnic communities, particularly those ethnic groups where people have entered Canada in recent years, and from virtually all the church groups, Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Mennonite to mention a few, who have been working to help refugees come to Canada. In this respect, what is the experience of my hon. colleague in her City of Toronto?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood on a very short answer, please.

Ms. McDonald: Very briefly, Madam Speaker, there is a great deal of concern among families who are waiting for relatives to come to Canada, and who are extremely frustrated by the slowness of the procedures, and sometimes the unfairness and restrictions of the procedures. I think that the Government is playing on the fear of a flood of refugees and a quite proper resentment from immigrants who are waiting for members of their families, and that it is making a scapegoat of refugees in order to justify a policy which is totally wrong. I hope people are beginning to distinguish between the fact that we need a fair policy, one that will distinguish between genuine and bogus refugees, and one that will respect the immigrants who are waiting for their own families to come to Canada, and not play on their resentment that they have been kept waiting while they see other people being able to jump the queue.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak to Bill C-84, a Bill which is among the most repressive legislation that I have seen in a long time. I find it hard to believe that in a situation where we know that there has been abuse and a misuse of the hospitality which Canadians are used to giving, instead of acting in the correct time and under the proper circumstances, the Government has waited for more than three years. It disregarded many reports, for example, the Robinson and Plaut reports. It waited until Members were on holiday, and with the arrival of 174 people in a boat off the coast of Nova Scotia all of a sudden it seemingly woke up and cried, "Hey, something is going on out there. We must do something".

I would suggest that this issue has been before us for some time. People were dropped off on the shores of Newfoundland, this boat had arrived, and daily people arrived by air, car, bus, train, and yet nothing was done.

The Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) has raised the issue of illegal immigrants or illegal migrants coming into Canada. We have heard from him about the use or abuse of these people who found themselves in difficult circumstances, whether they were true refugees in the definition sense of the United Nations, or whether they were economic refugees who were looking for a better life-style. What happened to these people was the trafficking in their flesh and in their misery by unconscionable smugglers who were taking money and using their misfortune to bring them illegally into Canada.

There is no question that that is not the manner in which Canadians wish to see their laws used or addressed. Canadians are fair-minded and open-minded people. Canadians expect to see a decent way of life and respect for law and order.

The Government had before it these unconscionable people, and instead of addressing the issue two and a half years ago and issuing visas, it ignored what were the proper types of approaches and bringing in a piece of legislation that would be a reflection of Canadian values at the same time as stopping the illegal use of our borders by people who do not deserve or should not have access to or be hosted in this land.

Essentially, in Bill C-84 we are talking about a very sensitive area. We are talking about refugees, people who are fleeing from perceived persecution, who have practically nothing but the clothes on their backs, and who often do not have papers because they could not do what the ads for American Express state, "Do not leave home without it". They could not run back home and pick up their identification papers. They could not apply at the door of the consulate. If they did that, there was no way they would come out of those countries alive.

We are looking at a situation where people who need and want to come to this country are mixed with people who have no business coming to this country and do not belong here, people whom we need not have to host. We have not found a fair and equitable system, a Canadian way, to address that issue.

What they have done is to put together an absolutely unconscionable Bill which reminds me of an unnecessary Draconian measure. They did not listen to Rabbi Plaut and his sensible approach to handling the situation or to the many church groups and human rights organizations that have a lot of experience, obviously much more than the Minister of Immigration and Employment (Mr. Bouchard) or his sidekick. Instead, we have a Bill which talks about a deportation certificate and turning back boats.

The hackles on the back of my neck go up when I hear the phrase, "turning back boats". There is not a Member of the House who is not reminded that this might be in the spirit of St. Louis and that we should have learned our lesson in 1939. Did we not turn back a boat with hundreds of innocent Jewish people who were merely seeking asylum? We turned our backs, we closed our eyes, we ignored the circumstances, and those people suffered very ugly consequences. Did we not learn from that incident that we should welcome people to our shores, that we should ask questions, and that those who do not deserve the good grace and the harbour of this land are sent away? That is the way we should handle it.

They say that if there is misrepresentation we have to use consultants; there is a whole procedure for that. There is also a procedure for smugglers. Instead of attacking only those people who are doing the smuggling, they are also attacking legitimate groups like churches. There is an application of responsibilities which are ministerial and governmental to transportation companies. Search and enter powers are suddenly being allowed in the interest of saving us from illegal refugees. We now have detention certificates and talk about a need for documentation and what happens if one does not have it. Many serious questions are raised by the proposed measures.

Do the proposals go too far? Of course they do. Are they specific enough to eliminate the real abusers and exploiters? No, they are not. Does it penalize those in the genuine assistance of refugees? Yes, it does—church groups, priests, nuns, volunteer groups, amnesty groups, and other kinds of such groups. Was the piece of legislation poorly drafted by a Department rushed into meeting the claim of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) that it was an emergency situation and the need for special measures? Was it intentional?

I give the following proposition. Yes, it was intentional. It was a bogus issue used to inflame the population. It was a misrepresentation of the real issues. It was a way in which the Government could get the House to come back to address what it considered to be a major piece of legislation, that is, the drug Bill. It was used as a false premise. It played on the lowest and basest of our human instincts instead of rising to the traditional fineness in Canadian values.

Will the Bill encourage a series of court challenges if implemented? The United Nations has said that it will. Human rights groups have said that it will. People who are knowledgeable about the law have said that it will, such as the Canadian Jewish Congress and Amnesty International.

What more does the Minister need to tell him that he was on the wrong track? What more does he need to back up and say he made a mistake and that he will redraft it? What more does he need to say, "You were right and I made an error; I was poorly guided by the justice people in my Department"? Did he really discuss it with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the Department of Justice? I doubt it. I am sure they are all red-faced to see a Minister abuse his Justice officials.

If the Government were genuinely interested in stopping real abuse, why did it wait until this summer to deal with it? Why did it not deal with this aspect under Bill C-55? It has certainly had plenty of time.

The Government cannot use the excuse any longer that it is a new government and does not know its way around, that it has to learn, and that it is entitled to its mistakes. It is entitled to nothing now. It should know how to use its legislative agenda. It should not have had to call us back on this kind of excuse. It should have put its house in order to meet what Canada considers to be fair.

Are refugee applicants being dealt with as human beings with human rights? I do not think so, Madam Speaker; wait until we look at the remedies and special detention measures designed for refugees. They are worse than what we do with our worst criminals right here in Canada.

Do you know, Madam Speaker, that there is a need for special detention certificates? Presently the law provides that if the Government or the Minister feels that there is a lack of identification or the possibility of a security risk—and that could be a case in point—there is the possibility of detaining the person for 48 hours. After 48 hours, there is a request to a special immigration adjudicator and a mechanism to request an additional seven-day period of detention. I think that is fair and that there are people in the world who would try to abuse our borders. I also think that we must have a mechanism to stop it.

However, to what point does one go? That procedure has worked well for years. Now the Government wants to move from 48 hours to seven days without any question. After seven days and after a special detention certificate, it would permit the Minister to ask for a person to be detained for 21 days. The adjudicator has no discretion whatsoever to overrule that request. Madam Speaker, you realize that the Minister is taking unto himself or abrogating unto himself these special powers, powers which are outside the elected process. I think the Minister is making a serious and grave mistake. It will leave him open to unnecessary manipulation. I think it is wrong.

The Minister now calls the shots. It is dangerous. He has done that because we were faced with 174 immigrants off the shores of Nova Scotia where the people came out and welcomed them. I really think that is pushing it a little too far.

I think that those moves are un-Canadian. I also think that they run afoul of our human rights code. However, in respect of documentation, just what do they expect? Most refugees are suffering from the trauma of running away, the trauma of dislocation, and the trauma of leaving their families, their language, their culture, and their life-style. Who in his right mind wants to pick himself up and move, unless circumstances are detrimental to his daily living, to his future and to the future of his children? It is not a choice which people make lightly. Then, to be harassed in the way the Bill harasses them, goes beyond my ability to find credible anything the Minister has proposed.

Do they think refugees will fall outside our Charter provisions? Do we not believe that individual rights, once one is on Canadian land, belong to everybody and that they should be treated with cordial decency? If one needs to be sent away because one is an undesirable, there are ways to do it.

Will the Canadian public realize the full impact of these proposals, or will it assume that Bill C-84 is needed to deal with the abusers and the exploiters? I think there has been a lot of misinformation out there. There are people in my riding who are desperately looking to family rejoinder and have been thwarted in that desire. They see the family structure differently than we do. We think of the family in terms of the nuclear family, but the extended family is their perception. They want their brothers, their sisters, and their children who are over 18 years of age to be here. This is quite normal. These people have, for the most part, brought wealth, industry and have promoted business in Canada.

One-third of this country has been built by immigrants, many of whom came as refugees. I can only hearken to my experience in my own Jewish community in the City of Montreal. We were 45,000 Jews in Montreal prior to 1939. We more than tripled our numbers, and I think in Montreal itself we have brought economic prosperity, civility, culture and enrichment to it. I am proud of what the refugees from the camps of Europe brought to Canada. They came as refugees, and it was not easy for them to get in here because it was hard to get past the front door. They were true refugees. These are true refugees in Asia, Vietnam, Cambodia, Afghanistan, Lebanon, Iran, Iraq, El Salvador and Chile. The people in my riding, no matter what colour, language or cultural persuasion, want us not only to treat refugees fairly and decently but to tell smugglers, "No". The people want us to link this whole thing into amendments that are sensible and fair.

I think as people have talked over the summer they have begun to realize that the true evil at the door is this Bill, not the refugees who are knocking at the door. If the Government receives parliamentary approval for this Bill, what will the Government do about Bill C-55? Will it die on the Order Paper? Again, what about family rejoinder, which we have been looking for, the promulgation of extension to older children, the extended family, which we have been awaiting?

There are all kinds of things that have been put on hold while we debate Bill C-84. I am not happy with it. I could go into great detail but there are others far more expert on this matter. Certainly the committee heard expert witnesses. I would suggest that the Minister and the Government would do well to hearken to the voice of reason and find ways to fine and penalize the smugglers, the abusers. I hope the Government will open its heart to the real refugees who need to come to our shores.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled that in this country of ours, a country so large with such a small population and with material and human resources to provide a good life for all its people if it were planned with common sense, a country which in recent years, at least, has had a generous and humane approach to immigrants and refugees, would be at the point of enacting a Bill dealing with refugees and potential refugees that is so inhumane and mean-spirited that we will be despised by people of good faith all over the world.

This is a country which was established in the way we know it now by the coming of immigrants and refugees to this part of the continent. All of us, with the exception of the native people of Canada, are either immigrants ourselves or descendants of immigrants or refugees or descendants of refugees. I said a moment ago that in recent years we have had a relatively good record with regard to the entry into Canada of immigrants and refugees. But up to World War II and, indeed, for a number of years after World War II, our record was a very bad record because it was not until the late 1950s and the early 1960s that we adopted policies on immigration and refugees which were not discriminatory. Until the late 1950s, immigrants who were permitted and encouraged to come to this country were essentially from countries in northern and western Europe and were white. Through our laws and regulations and through the way in which senior employees in the Departments which controlled immigration dealt with immigration we discouraged and prohibited people from eastern and southern Europe and from Africa, Asia, Central and South America and India from coming here. Indeed, it was fair to say that it was almost impossible to permit the coming to Canada before the late 1950s or the early 1960s of people who were non-white.

But we changed our approach in the late 1950s and early 1960s and permitted a large number of immigrants to come here from eastern and southern Europe, Africa, Asia, South and Central America. One has only to travel around any city in Canada to see the changes that have taken place because we permitted large numbers of refugees and a much broader group of immigrants to come here. After all, we reacted to events in Poland, Hungary, Uganda, Chile and more recently El Salvador and Guatemala in a relatively generous way.

On my way home from Ottawa a couple of weeks ago, I stopped to make a few purchases at a supermarket which happens to be located in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre. As I stood waiting at the cash register I could not help but notice that among others who were waiting to pay for their purchases were people who came originally from Asia, either Chinese or Vietnamese, from India, the Philippines, Africa and from Central or South America. Canada has changed in a major way and that change will continue and accelerate.

Why suddenly do we get this Bill and these very restrictive proposals that are contained it it? The Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) said earlier today that there was widespread support for Bill C-84. I do not know where he comes from but I know in my City of Winnipeg that this Bill has been met by universal opposition. I am certain that for every letter I have received indicating support for this Bill, I have received 25 expressing opposition.

Ethnic organizations, labour organizations and all of the major church organizations have expressed their opposition to what is contained in this Bill. I must ask why the Government brought this Bill forward. Is it based upon some kind of principles it has adopted? I cannot believe that. After all, just over a year ago when a boatload of Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka who had apparently spent some time in Holland and Germany arrived on the East Coast, they were greeted and welcomed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who said that Canada would always welcome genuine refugees. A year later, there was a similar situation. The only difference was that instead of Tamils from Sri Lanka, there were some 150 refugees from India who arrived on the East Coast. This time the reaction of the Government was to bring in this very tough, regressive Bill.

What has changed? Nothing has changed except that the Government now perceives itself to be in a great deal of difficulty with the Canadian public. It has read the polls and has realized that after the people gave them the largest majority the country has ever seen, it is now and has been for some considerable time in third place according to the polls. That is why we have got this Bill.

Mr. Jepson: Temporary insanity.

Mr. Orlikow: The Hon. Member has said that it is temporary. If the Hon. Member wants to keep on whistling in the dark, he is welcome to it. When a Party has been in third place for almost 18 months, it will take some pretty drastic changes to get it back on top.

Let us look at some of the things for which this Bill provides. Let us remember that legislation dealing with refugees could have been brought in long ago. It could have been brought in a year ago or more. Let us remember that without changing the legislation, the regulations could have been changed.

A year or so ago, several thousand phoney refugee claimants came to Canada, not stealthily by boat but by plane from Portugal, Turkey and Brazil. Everyone who was interested in immigration and refugee problems knew that these were phoney claimants. Everyone knew that there are not thousands of Jehovah's Witnesses in Portugal, to take just one example of the people who came here claiming refugee status, and that Jehovah's Witnesses are not persecuted or prosecuted in Portugal. These people came here because they were told, probably by people who made a substantial amount of money for giving this advice and making the arrangements for them, that by coming to Canada to claim refugee status, they would probably be permitted to settle here and to stay as landed immigrants, whereas they would not be permitted to do so if they applied to come as immigrants in the normal and legal way.

The Government could have and should have dealt with that situation immediately by requiring people coming from those countries to get visas to come here. However, the Government dithered and delayed so several thousand, not 150 like the Sikhs or the Tamils, phoney claimants were permitted to come here and to stay, if not permanently, then certainly for some considerable time, because the Government could not get its act together.

That Bill gives public servants the power to turn back ships without permitting those on the ships who would like to claim that they should be permitted to stay in Canada because they are refugees to do so. I am certain that this power is a violation of our obligations under the agreements made by and through the United Nations. I think that this kind of provision is absolutely unacceptable. Even if it is legal, and I believe it is not, it is certainly morally inexcusable.

Let me deal with another clause which I find hard to understand. In fact, I cannot understand how any Government in this day and age would include in a Bill this kind of provision. I am talking about the provision in the Bill which makes it an offence punishable by fines and by prison if those found guilty refuse to pay fines for anyone to help a person to come into Canada without a visa, a passport or a travel document. I could understand that kind of clause if the people who would be liable to arrest, trial and conviction were only the people who did that sort of thing for financial gain. Undoubtedly there are unscrupulous, dishonest individuals, ships' captains, lawyers and immigration consultants—not many but enough of them—who have done these things for financial gain.

This clause applies to the kind of people I have listed above, but it also applies to members of ethnic organizations and particularly of the newer ethnic organizations whose members still have family and friends who want to come to Canada, and this provision would apply to people in every city and town in Canada who are involved through church organizations in helping refugees who come to Canada establish themselves. I find the clause to be completely inexcusable and unacceptable. I am not satisfied, nor are the members of my Party and the people involved in this kind of work, with leaving it to the good will and good intentions of this Minister or any other Minister to decide that because they have done their work for humanitarian reasons, these people will not be prosecuted. That clause alone would convince me that I ought to vote, as I will, against this Bill.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak about Bill C-84 because I think it is bad legislation. As Canadians come to hear more about it and the supposed emergency for which this House was recalled, they will have a better idea of why the Government is providing bad leadership and bad legislation.

This is an example of what I would describe as real low-road politics. The way the Government handled this matter was designed to prey on those irrational, hateful or racist feelings many people harbour. It was also designed to create the illusion that this approach would likely speed up family reunification for those who have waited many months or years for that to come about.

I want to talk for a moment about when the Government, in July, attempted to have the House recalled supposedly to deal with an emergency involving the drug legislation. The Speaker, properly interpreting the rules of this House, did not agree to a recall. Then the Government saw another opportunity when a ship entered Canadian waters with 174 refugee claimants on board and landed them in eastern Canada. It was an opportunity to whip up a reaction among Canadians and create the impression or, as we have now learned, the illusion that there was an emergency for which Members should be recalled.

Many Canadians wondered how great was this emergency. We learned the answer to that, of course, on the first vote on this legislation when only 84 government Members voted. Many Canadians wonder why, first, so few government Members voted on the Bill and more than half were away on business which they felt was more important, and, second, why those same government Members failed to speak on the Bill. That number included the Chairman of the committee, who has done so much good work in pointing out the flaws in this terribly Draconian Bill.

Canadians want legislation which provides law and order and goes after the real smugglers who benefit financially at the expense of the oppressed and persecuted. Canadians do support going after those who trade in human tragedy and create financial gain for themselves while doing it. However, one of the points raised time and again with me by church groups and others in my constituency is Clause 9 of this Bill which allows selective prosecution of those involved in bringing refugees into Canada. Many Canadians were shocked and continue to shudder at the Minister's promise that he would never prosecute humanitarian groups or persons. He was only intending to prosecute obvious scoundrels who might try and smuggle people in, for example, by landing them at night on a deserted coast.

It is quite contrary to Canadian law, British common law, and the traditions of this country for this House to draft and pass legislation which allows a Minister, without regulation or direction, to decide unilaterally who should or should not be prosecuted. As many of those groups said, they make their decisions on refugee matters based on conscience and will continue to do so whether or not they are branded by the Parliament of Canada as law-breakers and criminals. It is so wrong for that kind of selective use of power to remain in legislation that I would vote against this Bill on that basis alone.

Of course, the media created the story around the 174 mainly East Indians who arrived on the East Coast and created the illusion that there were security risks and a flood of refugees and so on. Most Canadians know now that the number of refugees we were talking about would add only one-half of 1 per cent to the existing backlog of refugees. In addition, not a single one of those 174 continue to be held because of any kind of security risk or security violation. We have to ask ourselves how good was the information the Government was operating on. Obviously it was not very good. The profound claims which were made and which created so much hysteria have not proven to be true.

One of the presentations made to the legislative committee dealing with Bill C-84 came from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council. All Canadians interested in this matter would be well advised to have a look at the document. It is not that long and is available through the House. That group represents the following organizations: The Armenian National Federation, Byelorussians, the Canadian Arab Federation, Vietnamese associations, the Hispanic Congress, the Jewish Congress, the Polish Congress, the Chinese Canadian National Council, the Council of Muslim Communities, Croatians, Cypriots, Czechoslovakians, Estonians, the Federation of Danish Associations, Koreans, Sikhs, Portuguese, Finns, Germans, Hellenics, Icelanders, Lithuanians, Latvians, Indians, Japanese Canadians, the National Black Coalition, Italian Canadians, Barbadian associations, Pakistani Canadians, Russian Canadians, Serbian National Shield Committee, Slovaks, Slovenians, Ukrainians and the United Council of Filipino Associations, to name just a few. They made some very important points. On the very first page they pointed out that 75 per cent of Canadians support entry for genuine refugees and want to be assured that the new legislation complies with that desire. It clearly does not. Based on almost all the tests those drafting the legislation would use, it fails.

Not only is it wrong-headed and malicious, as I intend to point out, but it is unconstitutional and contravenes at least three sections of the Canadian Charter of Rights. It breaches our agreements with the UN. As other Members have pointed out, it also sends out a very dark signal to countries around the world about how Draconian they can be with refugees arriving on their shores.

If a ship is considered to be bringing undocumented passengers to Canada, it can be turned away from our territorial waters. We have heard both inside and outside this House that we will have someone from the Coast Guard board the ship and see whether or not these people should be allowed to land or whether the ship should be turned back. That does not answer some questions. What if the ocean is rough? What if the captain decides simply to discharge the passengers within Canada's 12-mile limit? What if, after being turned back, the ship comes in somewhere else? Why not take a sensible approach which Canadians expect and respect and accompany that ship either with a Fisheries vessel, a Coast Guard vessel or a military vessel into a Canadian port, hold the captain and crew and all passengers on board, and have someone who is trained in refugee determination policy go on board, review the documents, speak to the passengers and find out just exactly what is going on? If the captain and crew or some other group were surreptitiously involved in the smuggling of people who would not be eligible, those now known as queue jumpers, then the ship could be impounded, fines or jail sentence imposed, and so on.

I must say I was saddened to hear the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) say that turning them back is perhaps what we should have done with the 174 refugees. That sent shock waves throughout his own Party and through other Canadians. Certainly it was a popular comment to make. It made a good 30-second clip and hummed through the newspapers for a few days. Yet it certainly sent the wrong signal to many caring Canadians. Other than Canada's first citizens, the Inuit and the aboriginal people who lived here for thousands if not tens of thousands of years before us, all Canadians are immigrants from the United States, Europe or other parts of the world. Most Canadians would do well to take a closer look at this piece of legislation which is so wrong-headed and Draconian.

One of the other key intentions of this Bill is to punish, in various ways, those who come to Canada without documents to claim refugee status. They can be held without any kind of hearing for up to 28 days. They can be turned back, and in some cases not even to a safe third country. Many Members in this House, including members of the government side, in particular the Chairman of the Government's immigration committee, disagree with this legislation and have made the point that many bona fide refugees dare not try to get official documents from the country they intend to leave because they might just disappear, as happens in many Central and South American countries and other areas of the world.

Those who are already being persecuted for religious, political, economic or other reasons cannot simply go into the local motor vehicle branch and ask for a driver's licence then drop down to the passport office and say, "I am taking off for Canada, I am going to be a refugee, give me my passport". Any government that is sound, enlightened and intelligent knows that those who are really being persecuted are the last ones who can possibly get bona fide documents. On any test, whether constitutional, in terms of our agreements with the United Nations, or even in terms of our own history, that clause fails miserably for many refugees who come to Canada.

One of the few clauses that has any justification at all is that which provides for an increase in the punishment for ship captains and crews for disembarking passengers at sea or attempting to do so. It is obviously wise to provide for that, although there are all kinds of international laws prohibiting captains and ship owners from doing that. However, in terms of Canada's territorial waters that may well be one of the few useful clauses within Bill C-84.

The new search and seizure powers are worth looking at as well. Other Members have pointed out that the search and seizure powers provided by this legislation go far beyond those provided in almost any other country in the world. There is provision for search and seizure, even without warrant, of anything considered to be related to the offence of smuggling 10 or more people or disembarking at sea.

It has been pointed out by many lawyers that that could include the search and seizure of lawyers' privileged solicitor-client documents or even a refugee's personal records, which, we have sadly learned, often endangers the family and friends of refugees in the countries from which they have fled. Often the names and addresses of the people who have assisted them in escaping from persecution are carried in those documents.

The legislation provides for more wire-tapping. One must wonder why, after passing the Charter as we did in 1982 with provision in relation to search and seizure, the Government is jamming in that which is, of course, unconstitutional. Would it not be appropriate to include a standard clause providing that immigration or police officials who believed that there was some kind of surreptitious smuggling activity going on would provide that information to a judge as is required under the common law in almost every other circumstance to obtain a warrant to wire-tap? In my view the extent of the wire-tapping powers are clearly excessive.

The intention of the Bill, as the Minister originally tried to explain it in those early days of August when we were recalled here, Madam Speaker, was "to deter the smuggling of persons into Canada and thereby minimize the exploitation of and risks to persons seeking to come to Canada". That sounded very good and I know some government Members attempted to sell the Bill on that premise.

Speaking about the incident which occurred on the East Coast early in the summer and that which was happening in other areas of the world where boat people were arriving by the tens of thousands, the Government created the impression that there was an exodus of refugees from various parts of the globe heading to Canada by any possible means of transportation. They said that there was a national emergency for which Parliament must be recalled, that we must pass laws to stop these hordes of refugees heading toward Canada.

It is worth recalling the number of refugees which Canada accepted during the late 1970s and early 1980s from Southeast Asia, the boat people. Over 40,000 of those refugees were happily taken into the homes and communities of Canadians from coast to coast. Every province participated in giving assistance to the boat people. In many communities in my own constituency it turned out to be a very happy and progressive opportunity for us to learn more about what was going on in various areas of the world.

With regard to rescue at sea, the Executive Committee of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said:

> It is recalled that there is a fundamental obligation under international law for ships' masters to rescue any persons in distress at sea, including asylum seekers, and to render them all necessary assistance. Seafaring States should take all appropriate measures to ensure that masters of vessels observe this obligation strictly.

Why would the Government propose to do completely the opposite of what has been agreed by the UN? As we all know, most countries of the world participate in the UN and it is only through the collective pressure of nations around the world that we can maintain the often bruised and abused fabric of the UN and its agreements.

The Executive Committee said also:

> In accordance with established international practice, supported by the relevant international instruments, persons rescued at sea should normally be disembarked at the next port of call. This practice should also be applied in the case of asylum seekers rescued at sea. In cases of large-scale influx, asylum seekers rescued at sea should always be admitted, at least on a temporary basis. States should assist in facilitating their disembarkation by acting in accordance with the principles of international solidarity and burden-sharing in granting resettlement opportunities.

Once again, this piece of legislation proposed by the Conservative Government of Canada runs completely contrary to the requests and suggestions of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

With regard to safe third counties and countries of origin, we found that in Bill C-55, which has not yet been passed by this House, there are some safeguards for people returned to a safe third country. However, Bill C-84 contains none. There is no functional opportunity, no legislative or real mechanism to assist in that. If a ship which sailed from a so-called safe third country is turned around, there is no way of knowing whether its passengers will be permitted to enter that country should they return there. It is possible that they would not. If they are permitted to enter, there is no assurance that they will have an opportunity to present their refugee claim and no protection against return to their country of origin.

We must ask ourselves what exactly is going on. The United States produced and passed somewhat similar, although nowhere near as Draconian, legislation a few years ago. The Minister says, for example, that humanitarian groups will not be prosecuted. We have found that that was precisely the intention of the legislation in the United States. The same arguments were used. They said they would not prosecute the churches and so on. However, in order to assist certain totalitarian regimes in Central and South America the United States has prosecuted and made criminals of church people and groups which, for reasons of conscience, have attempted for many decades to assist those who are persecuted around the world.

In conclusion, I did not believe at the time and certainly do not believe now that there was an emergency which required the recall of Parliament. Bill C-84 certainly does not address the real concerns of Canadians with regard to queue jumping, the real smugglers and so on. It acts in a malicious, vicious and wrong-headed way against those people who require the compassion which Canada has shown for so many decades to refugees from around the world.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I note that at the beginning of his speech the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) discussed the 174 people of East Indian descent, mostly Sikhs, who, coming to our shores, appeared to have precipitated this so-called emergency. After their initial welcome by Nova Scotians and after they were fed, these people were held with no access to lawyers. They were processed thoroughly over a period of several weeks, given security checks, and, from my observations, were given the most thorough testing, to the point of almost being harassed, of any group of people who have come to our country seeking refugee status. It is now a bit over a month and a half from that date and I note with some surprise, given the hysteria emanating from the government benches and from some of the press, that all of the 174 persons have now gained conditional access to Canada as refugees.

I am a little curious and I wonder if my hon. friend could tell me, what would protect us more from refugees coming into this country, if that is what the Government is proposing to do under Bill C-84? It seems to me that the same procedures would still be in place, with more difficulty for the refugees. The ship's captain, in this case, was tried, fined and jailed. The fines for a ship captain, I understand, would be higher. But would not these genuine refugees still be in the country? Would they not still be allowed in? Is not the difficulty the Government faces in deciding who will be a refugee? And does this particular Bill make that any more clearer?

Mr. Fulton: Well, Madam Speaker, I think the Hon. Member's question is right to the point. There are really two queues being formed under the legislation brought forward by the Conservative Government since it came to office. There is the queue for the rich. If one has $250,000, one can apply through various operations in Vancouver, Toronto or Montreal and simply come in as a business landed immigrant.

The other queue, as the Hon. Member pointed out, is somewhat different. The fact is that with the passage of Bill C-84, should it happen today or in a few days, the situation will not in fact change enormously other than the situation for the refugees themselves. What they will find after this Bill is passed is that their condition will be worse. They can be held for up to 28 days without counsel, without any kind of adjudication hearing, no question about their documents or where they come from or anything else.

I would like to read one short paragraph from an evaluation done recently by the Library of Parliament on the 174 East Indian refugees. It reads:

> Events in Nova Scotia with the East Indians may well illustrate the importance of having a detention review at an early stage. Initially, a very high percentage of the arrivals were claimed by immigration officials to be security risks. Yet ultimately not one was detained beyond two detention reviews by the adjudicators, officials who have been sometimes criticized for favouring the Immigration Department. An adjudicator was quoted in the press as saying that there was insufficient evidence to justify the continued detention of the six individuals detained beyond the initial review. This episode illustrates the importance of prompt and regular review of all detention cases.

In fact, quite the opposite is going to occur in terms of this legislation. The refugees will be held even longer. There are Canadians who thought for one brief moment that perhaps the period within which refugees would come and stay in Canada would be shortened to perhaps a couple of months, from what has grown to be three, four, five, eight, or ten years. Many Canadians have objected, and in many cases quite properly so, to that process which has dragged out for decades, certainly for years. But the Government completely fails to address that.

In terms of the history of the ship issue, which is directly related of course to the 174 refugees, a situation which supposedly stimulated this legislation, I do not think any British Columbian can forget the turning back of the Komagata Maru from Vancouver in 1914 when a boatload of 376 Sikhs were expelled from Canadian waters, 26 of whom went to their deaths. I think many Hon. Members, including the Hon. Member who spoke earlier from Montreal, remembers the boatload of 907 Jewish refugees on the St. Louis who were refused entry in June, 1939 and were all returned to the Nazi gas chambers. Why would a government want to bring in a clause in a Bill in relation to turning back vessels where a Coast Guard official or someone else might or might not even go on board, but the vessel is simply turned back without to any of the refugee claimants, being talked to, without ever any of their documents, being seen, or without any information about them? How can Canadians forget the St. Louis and the Komagata Maru? In terms of solving anything, again, it simply creates a more horrific problem.

I think the Government is trying to sell Canadians a real bill of goods, first, the emergency for which this House is still sitting today, a month after the recall, with no attempt by government Members to participate seriously in the debate, or even to turn up for the votes. Only 84 government Members even bothered to turn up on the first vote. This is a fine emergency. Where were the other 110 Members?

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I know the House and all Canadians, especially those in the Atlantic Provinces, have been amazed at the new policy of the New Democratic Party. I wonder if the Hon. Member would elaborate on his comment of September 1, 1987, wherein he indicated that some of the bona fide refugees that came from Central and South America, sister countries, "are in fact closer to my constituency and my Province of British Columbia, if you think particularly of Central America, than it is Nova Scotia or other parts of our country".

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I can give the Hon. Member a very simple geography lesson. The cost of travel from Vancouver to Mexico, or to Guatemala or Nicaragua, is considerably cheaper. I would encourage the Hon. Member at some point to fly to the Queen Charlotte Islands or to Whitehorse and to come into my constituency. He would find out that in fact from some parts of my constituency, taking the Polar route, it would be easier for me to sit in the Japanese Diet in Tokyo than it would be to sit in Ottawa, in terms of geography.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the House that Parliament was called back as a result of a growing concern in the country about the abuse of Canada's traditional hospitality to refugees, and that there was great concern about a illegal immigrants who were jumping the queue. There has been ample debate of Bill C-84 at second reading and in committee. We have endeavoured to move the debate along. However, unfortunately, we have not been able to move the debate on third reading to a close.

Therefore, I wish to indicate that since an agreement could not be reached, under the provisions of Standing Order 115 and Standing order 116 with respect to an allocation of time to the third reading of Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, under the provisions of Standing Order 117, I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage of the Bill.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Deputy Government House Leader read out a motion—

Mr. Lewis: A notice of motion.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): —a notice of motion—which has as its premise the fact that there was consultation with the other Parties in the House and that they were unable to agree on a time allocation order. I regret to say that I took part in no such consultation for that purpose.

I have consulted with my colleagues, the Deputy House Leader of the Official Opposition and the Whip of the Official Opposition, who say that they did not take part in any such consultation. That being the case, I have to tell Your Honour that I think that the notice is defective. I suggest that if the Deputy Government House Leader wants to avoid some embarrassment in this matter he may want to consider withdrawing his notice.

Mr. Lewis: Not at all, Madam Speaker. I am prepared to advise the House that I discussed this matter with the Deputy House Leader of the Official Opposition. He indicated to me that the Official Opposition had no further speakers. I then discussed the matter with the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, who indicated to me that we would not have a vote on the Bill by six o'clock this evening. The discussions took place under those circumstances. I understand the position of the opposition Parties and I am sure that they understand the position of the Government.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Speaker, I cannot let this go as it is. There was no official consultation on this matter. If the Minister believes that he can go around in the House and ask whether or not there are speakers and so on and believe that that is a bona fide House Leaders' meeting, then I think that he is wrong. I cannot say that I have been officially consulted on this matter. We gave him signals that we had not many speakers to go. As a matter of fact, after what I told him I am surprised that he has come forward with this notice of motion which states that at a formal House Leaders' meeting there was no possibility of an agreement between the Parties. To my knowledge that has not occurred. Therefore, the motion is defective.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): When I want to speak in the House of Commons, with all due respect to the Minister, I can state my position by myself without his help.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, this is a rather unfortunate turn of events at a crucial point in this very important debate. I think Your Honour will find that in fact the motion is defective in that in its introductory comment it states that agreement could not be reached. As previous speakers have already indicated, there was no attempt to reach an agreement.

To be fair to my colleague, the following questions were put to us: "Do you have speakers? Can we expect a vote on this Bill today?" My response was that as far as I knew we had enough speakers interested in participating in the debate that we would not likely be voting before six o'clock. However, that is not my idea of a discussion with respect to whether or not we could come to an agreement, and perhaps we could, depending on what the Government had to offer.

I think it is important for Your Honour's purposes in ruling on the admissibility and advisability of this motion, since it states that an agreement could not be reached, to say that there was no discussion regarding an agreement. There was no attempt made to come to an agreement. Simply put, the question we were asked was: "Are there speakers to speak on this particular Bill or are there not?" There are obviously sufficient reasons to rule the motion out of order in that it was introduced inappropriately, in that it contains wording that is simply not accurate and which is in fact quite false.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I submit that there were discussions. No agreement was reached. In fact, the Standing Order simply requires that notice be given. Notice has been given. The notice states that the House Leaders were not able to reach an agreement. I submit that the notice is in order and that debate should continue, even if Your Honour wishes to reserve. If my colleagues wish to tell me how many more days or hours they need, then we will take that into account when we set the timetable with respect to how much more time is required.

The debate has carried on for some time. It is about time that we reached a decision in this place, a decision which the Canadian people are awaiting with great anticipation.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the rules clearly intend that, if the Government is going to move a motion for time allocation, there has to be consultation with the other Parties. Consultation does not mean that the Government House Leader or his deputy go around asking whether or not the Parties have other speakers. Surely, that has not been the practice over the two and a half years that I have had this job.

I think it has been the case as well, since the rule has been in the rule book, that the Government House Leader, or the Deputy House Leader, meets with his opposite numbers and specifically asks them: "Can we reach an agreement on an allocation of time?" The rule does not intend, and as far as I am aware has never been used in the way that the Deputy Government House Leader has used it, that he skulk around and say one thing while intending another. If he wants to find out whether or not it is possible to reach an agreement or not as the basis for moving a time allocation motion, then he should have the guts to get together with his colleagues face to face and say to them: "I am asking you formally whether we can reach an understanding for the purpose of seeing whether there can be an order agreed to for the allocation of time. If not, I will take my responsibilities". He did not do that, and he has admitted that.

I want to say that it is obvious that the Deputy House Leader is under a great deal of stress already. I can tell him that it will get worse for him if he continues to act like this.

I wish to say on the basis of what the rules state and on the basis of the practice followed in the past and what is intended by the rules that it is clear that the Deputy Government House Leader has not followed the rules or the practice on which the rules are based. Clearly, his notice is out of order.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I believe we are at a very important juncture. The Minister of State was recently appointed to his new position. I think that it is in the best interests of everyone concerned that we very quickly develop a good working relationship. We will be in the House of Commons for many months, perhaps for as long as another two years. It is important that, while the opposition Parties and the Government fulfil their responsibilities and obligations in terms of the parliamentary tradition, there be an understanding that we will facilitate the business of the House as much as we can.

The motion before you, Madam Speaker, states that an agreement could not be reached. I know that my hon. friend knows that we had no discussions with respect to whether or not an agreement could be reached. As a matter of fact, he should have suggested that there be a House Leaders' meeting to discuss whether or not we could agree on some allotment of time to facilitate the completion of this stage of Bill C-84. If that is impossible then I think it is fair to say that an agreement could not be reached and the Government could then take whatever steps it feels appropriate under the circumstances.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, in your position as a person who is obviously interested in facilitating the business of the House in the most positive and creative way to rule that this particular motion is out of order and, in terms of carrying out the future business of the House to the best of our ability, that we in fact have a House Leaders' meeting to discuss whether or not an agreement can be reached.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Obviously the Chair wishes to facilitate the proceedings of the House. At this time it is a rather difficult decision to make. The Standing Order does not state exactly what consultation or discussion should imply. The Chair would also like a little more time to examine the notice itself. The manner in which the notice is written, the actual form of it, is causing some difficulty.

With the approval of the House, I would like to reserve on this and discuss it with Mr. Speaker.

Continuing debate with the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate, and this is true, I have no notes but—

[English]

In order to assist in your deliberations, and in order to assist the new Deputy House Leader who seems to be agonizing with our House Leader, and the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, I will try to be helpful and make a few comments in order that tomorrow they may meet and, therefore, of course, the question on the Bill will not be put today.

It is true that almost everything has been said, but I wish to make some personal comments on the Bill.

For the past 25 years I have been involved in matters relating to immigration and refugees. Publicly, I would state today that a recent book published in New York told those who wished to read it of my involvement a long time ago with the American deserters and draft dodgers. It is true that I was highly involved. I must have helped a few thousand, most likely without knowing, to come to Canada who are now extraordinarily good Canadians.

Recently I attended some of the meetings run by my distinguished colleague, the official critic for immigration. Something that fascinated me one morning was that 10 Conservative Members were present when the Hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) was present. That Minister had voted for the abolition of the death penalty. But when I started looking around at those who were attending the meeting I suddenly thought it was strange that this gentleman had made a very vigorous speech, which is true to democracy, for the death penalty.

I called my office and asked them to send me the list of those who voted for the death penalty and those who voted against the death penalty. Coincidentally, the 10 Conservative Members present, with not one exception, from the very distinguished Chairman, who is a good colleague of mine, to the Vice-Chairman of the Management and Members' Services Committee, and to every other Member present, were all Members who had voted for the death penalty. That is only a coincidence, but it does indicate a feeling that not one Member out of ten who was present that morning to question the Minister had voted for the abolition of the death penalty. What is the link? The link is that a Member who voted against the death penalty may have had more understanding of what a refugee has to go through.

In my evaluation, we in my Party are no fools. There is abuse and there are people who abuse the good laws of Canada. Those people should be punished. There are people who come to this country in the most illegal fashion. They may not even be refugees. They should be punished. But it is the manner in which it was done. This type of urgency reminds me of the role of a Minister. When I was the critic, I remember stating to the Hon. Member for Frontenac (Mr. Masse) when he was the Minister of Communications that he had a duty not only to be a good administrator, but also to be a good communicator. He had to be a good educator and explain to Canadians the importance of the artist, the importance of CBC, our national symbol, and not only attend in Cabinet and be the echo of Cabinet outside, but take his responsibility as a Minister and return to Cabinet and explain the worries of all the people of Canada.

Today I see the same difficulty. Sometimes we deal with things that are very unpopular among Canadians. I dare say to you, Madam Speaker, that we know that in the short run this Bill has every aspect of being popular, but in the long run when Canadians recover from their first feeling, they will see that this is a bad Bill. Of course, it is obvious that the Minister has to be a good administrator.

As Minister responsible the Minister must be a good administrator. But the Minister, particularly the Minister of Immigration, has a heavy responsibility, and that is to explain to all Canadians and all Quebecers, men and women alike, the importance of immigration, the importance of refugees, and of course to say: We will punish those who abuse the system.

I am looking at one of our colleagues here, the Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce), and I am very sincere in what I am about to say, is he not an extraordinary example of what my Canada is all about? Now there is a Member who was not born in this country and who sits in the House of Commons. I have colleagues here, the Hon. Member, my immigration critic, he was not born in Canada. Our justice critic was not born in Canada. The former Minister of the Environment was not born in Canada. Then our champion of small businesses, he was not born in Canada. I singled out five Members of Italian origin, five, six, none of them was born in Canada.

So we must know how to explain to Canadians and Quebecers what immigration means, what the refugee programs means, and not confuse everything because a boat landed on our shores, an incident which got everybody excited and stirred passions, and led some to say: We will take action, we will show you we will control that because it is uncontrollable. When a major country like Canada gets excited because there was a boat last year and another one this year, quite frankly this is not the Canada we know. It is not the Canada my Quebec colleague knows well. Canada is an open country, a generous country, a country which must build its future every day. That is what must be appreciated in the immigration field. That is what must be understood in the refugee program.

Monday morning, on a television program at Telemedia, I spent one hour telling Mathias Rioux, an interviewer who does not share my political views, that we have to explain to Canadians and Quebecers the importance of immigration and the refugee program. Our conscience must tell us what this program means and our future interests must make us aware of the importance of immigration.

If I may Madam Speaker, I shall use the last 30 seconds to conclude logically. We know that Canada has an aging population. We know that its declining birth rate problem is comparable to, or even worse than those of all other Western countries. It is therefore in the interests of Canadians and Quebecers to understand the importance of immigration, the importance of their obligations to refugees, and how well off we are in Canada, while saying that abuses should not be tolerated.

This Bill has been passed incredibly quickly.

I attended a few of the committee meetings, and because we received representations quite quickly, we could quite easily spend a few days more discussing this issue, and this is what we shall do tomorrow to explain further what we would like to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): With the priceless assistance of the House of Commons staff, we were able to check certain aspects of the notice given by the Hon. Minister of State which were causing some concern to the Chair.

We now conclude that the notice is in order. We have therefore received it officially, which should not prevent the three Parties from discussing the matter further to reach an agreement acceptable to everyone.

It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the House that I have had a question of privilege brought to my attention, with sufficient notice. I recognize the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice of a question of privilege because of an incident that occurred yesterday a few minutes before the House recessed.

Since then I have had conversations with the Hon. Minister of State for Treasury Board (Mr. Lewis) who assured me that in no way was he trying to misrepresent a conversation we had with regard to the time left in the debate on Bill C-84. I will take this explanation at face value.

In the spirit of goodwill, and especially in the spirit of maintaining cordial relations between House Leaders of Parties, I will say that it is a dead issue.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that those very courteous words do not lead to another intervention.

I wish to thank the Hon. Member for his comments. I wish to remark that while there are sometimes disagreements in this place, often they are solved by amicable discussions between Members. That is part of the tradition of this place. I wish to thank both the Minister of State and the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques for their goodwill.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard that Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying last night . . . I am sorry, truth is always the easiest thing. Well, I just came in to join the procedural debate which, I thought, would last longer.

Last night I was saying that one of the roles of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) . . . And I am not directing my remarks to him personally because he is here this morning, but such is my idea of a Minister of Immigration. Like at the time I was arts critic I used to say that defending Cabinet decisions before the artistic community and people who are more directly involved in arts and who create hundreds of thousands of jobs was not the only role of the Minister responsible for arts in Canada. He also had to reflect and champion the concerns and wishes of that community before Cabinet, I am saying that as far as immigration is concerned, I think the situation is the reverse.

Indeed I began Monday morning during a TV program in Montreal—Mathias Rioux was the host—concerning immigration when I could have taken the easy way out . . . I know it would have been easier to keep repeating during the whole hour that the situation is frightening, that there are abuses which must be eliminated, so we will come to grips with the problem and take firm action. I know the Minister feels that I am missing the point, but he knows how much I enjoy having rational and civilized discussions with him on these issues. I was trying to make Quebecers understand the importance of immigration, as well as the importance of the refugee program. I will not shirk my responsibility to say that if there is corruption we must take corrective measures. And corruption there is.

Toronto and Montreal consultants are now making a fortune telling prospective applicants that thanks to them they can rest assured that they will be given immigrant or refugee status if they follow their advice. Their fees are out of this world, and if there are abuses they must be eliminated. But what I would like to see is the Government and the Ministers responsible for immigration taking the initiative and telling the public at large all about the radical changes which Canada is experiencing with respect to immigrants and refugees. They have to tell the people that the problem we have in this country is a western problem.

Our once very high birth rate has fallen to new lows and our demographic situation is such that Canadians are growing ever older. What are the practical implications? This means that, until a few years ago, the life expectancy of Canadian women—and I can see my good friend, the former Minister of National Defence, who is in excellent shape. I have always said that one of the mistakes made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister was not to have appointed this man, and I mean Mr. McKinnon, Minister of National Defence because he has the knowledge, the level-headedness and the elegance required to have made an extraordinary minister. As I was saying, women who had a life expectancy of 62 a few years ago now have a life expectancy of 79.6. I look at our young pages who have just come in. A few years ago, they could have expected to live until the age of 62, but they can now expect to live until the age of 79. Men, who used to have a life expectancy of 60 a few years ago, can now hope to reach the age of 72. This means that we have an aging population. This means that our hospitalization, social security and pension costs will go on increasing.

On the other hand, we have to look at our birth rate. Quebec used to have the highest birth rate in Canada, North America and the Western world. Now, it has the lowest birth rate not only in Canada and North America, but also in the Western world. There is a widening gap between the two which can be narrowed only with a policy aimed at supporting a rising birth rate, but it would be very difficult to implement such a policy.

We shall therefore have to make up the difference with an appropriate immigration policy. If we want such an immigration policy, we have to look to those regions of the world which can produce immigrants. The Western world is facing the same problem as Canada and we shall therefore have to look for immigrants, not in Europe, but in the new world, in Africa, Asia, the Middle East and Latin America. This is where we can find a pool of immigrants. The Minister of Immigration, the Cabinet, myself and the other Members of Parliament shall therefore have to begin to educate the public and to prepare their hearts and minds to receive new Canadian citizens whose skin will not be the same colour as ours.

If we want to maintain on the one hand our social security system and on the other everything that is good in Canada, we shall need immigrants, and we therefore have to ask ourselves where they will come from. What I find regrettable about this Bill is that people are confusing everything. People say that there have been abuses. There have indeed been abuses, but people are confusing everything: immigrants, refugees, illegals and the illegal actions committed this summer and the previous one. After one boat, everyone went crazy. Yet, this incident seems rather innocent to me. If there is one thing I like about being a Canadian, and this might be true in the United States, but certainly not in the other Western countries, it is that when I look at my colleague who is now smiling at me, I know that he was not born in Canada. The greatest honour for a Canadian is to be elected to this House. I have always said so. It is not necessary to be appointed minister, but only to be elected to this House to represent fellow citizens. The fact that new Canadians can be elected to this House is rather indicative of the change in Canadian attitudes.

Of the 40 Members in this party, I would say there are six, seven, or eight who were not born in Canada and they are just as good MPs, just as good Canadians as those who claim to have been here since time immemorial.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, what I would like or what I would hope is that we put an end to those abuses. With the legislation now before us there are abuses to be remedied—as much as we would like to support it, we do not understand why it was put together with such speed, and railroaded, to frighten people. It is that scary aspect I find offensive in this Bill. It is assumed that people will like it because we will be doing something and that we will be still more popular. That policy is short-sighted because once Canadians, once Quebecers have thought things over, a few months from now, they will see we panicked for nothing.

There were abuses that had to be stopped and they can be stopped, but not with the kind of shotgun approach that is taken in this legislation.

When we enter that debate as we will soon be doing— I have always been fond of concrete proposals, having already attended hearings across Canada on a piece of legislation, said to be a Green Paper on immigration. The then Government also had to deal with a problem. Instead of having a legislation, instead of having a White Paper, a statement of intent, because that is what a white paper is all about, people still have to be informed, and the Green Paper includes all the alternatives available to a government—they are brought before the people, or before a committee, which is asked to select those it finds most suitable. At that point the Government is not commiting itself. So we travelled all across Canada, and that was a kind of experience I will never forget. I did the same thing on the constitutional issue, but on immigration matters I travelled across Canada. And it is my hope, in view of the Canadian public's frame of mind—

• (1120)

Knowing how Canadians feel at the moment about refugee matters, I am wondering whether the time has come again to have an all-Party committee travelling across Canada and coming up with a kind of Green Paper. This would provide the committee with an opportunity to learn the feelings of Canadians and not only to receive but to give and to explain to Canadians in major cities and some well chosen rural areas across Canada, as we did some years ago, what refugees and immigration really mean to Canada.

I see a Minister of the Crown listening to what I am saying at the moment. I say to him that if we do not do that, we will have immense difficulty in Canada. More and more immigrants will not be the kinds of immigrants to which we are accustomed. We may require another kind of immigration in Canada if we are to continue to prosper and develop, as we have done so far, with an aging population and a low rate of mortality.

In conclusion, the time may have come for an educational process. I say openly—and I did not consult with my Party; I just rushed in here this morning—that I would be more than happy, if I were asked by my Party, to sit on that committee. It is not easy, but I would be willing to do that because I feel strongly about the matter and I feel convinced that we must do that.

The committee could travel across Canada. Its members could be well chosen for their openness, not people, as Rabbi Plaut said, who call on the bad sentiment which exists in every human being, including myself. We have people in all three Parties who are open-minded. The majority would accept appointments to such a committee to go across Canada, to listen to Canadians, and especially to answer them in a non-partisan way. It would give Canadians a better opinion on what immigration, refugees, and citizenship are all about.

An Hon. Member: Soon.

Mr. Prud'homme: I hear the word "soon". The Minister responsible for citizenship is in the House.

That would be the kind of process in which I would prefer to participate, rather than a debate in which everyone clashes with each other, which I would call useless and non-productive.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me a minute more, but let me repeat that it is the responsibility of certain Ministers to be educators, not only good administrators. Of course we expect a Minister to do a good job. However, in certain cases, especially in matters where human feelings are involved, it is the duty of a Minister to take the lead in the educational process to educate Canadians about their responsibilities.

If there is a subject which is highly important, it is that of immigration. I hope that the two Ministers responsible would see, as one of their major tasks, the educational part of the process and not only reflect in a tough law what Canadians may be feeling at the moment when they see illegals or a boat or two coming into Canada. At the same time, they should take measures to correct and should explain to Canadians what will be the Canada of tomorrow.

In order for the Canada of tomorrow to be the kind of Canada we would like to see—prosperous, open, and generous—we will have to start going on the road and explaining the difficulties.

I hope the two Ministers responsible for Immigration Canada will agree in a non-partisan way that they are not only administrators but also educators.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in third reading debate of Bill C-84.

This Bill was put forward in response to what was deemed to be a national emergency and resulted in the recalling of Parliament from its summer recess. It deals with, if we listen to the Government, queue-jumping and coping with a massive influx of people who are attempting to enter the country illegally.

I will get to some of the details which led up to this Bill in a moment, but I want to begin my comments by pointing out that we in Canada have always had difficulty in dealing with the concept of "refugee". It has always been tinged, to a certain amount, by politics, depending upon the politics of the day and the reading of the Government of the day on what would be acceptable to the population. The term "refugee" has been broadly interpreted and at other times it has been very tight.

I should like to point to some of the periods in our history of which I am proud. For example, we permitted entry of refugees who were former slaves in the United States. We did that willingly and with open arms. They did not require the necessary papers which we are now saying must be available, because those people did not have papers. They did not even have a piece of paper saying who they were. The only paper about them which existed might have been a title saying that they belonged to a certain land owner in one of the southern states. They had no visas. They had no passports. They had nothing to indicate who in fact they were. Yet we, being wise at the time, permitted them to come into Canada. We were also quite open about accepting something like 60,000 boat people from southeast Asia.

Those were a couple of the good periods in Canadian history, but there were also bad ones. In 1914 we turned away a shipload of Sikhs from India, many of whom went back to their death simply because the Government of the day, for racial, religious, and other reasons, decided not to allow these people into Canada as either immigrants or refugees, even though by some definitions of the day they were refugees. The fact that many of them went back to their death shows that they were in genuine fear and had a right to fear for their lives in their home country of India.

In 1939 a shipload of Jewish people, some 900 souls, was turned away from our soil because Canada at that time refused to believe that Jews in Germany were in danger. Most of them went to the gas chambers, and Canada fulfilled its then perceived role of protection from immigrants and unwarranted refugees.

A year ago we had some people who were basically Tamil from Sri Lanka who came by way of Europe. I want to dwell on that for a moment, Mr. Speaker. The Government and some of the critics of our immigration policy and our policy concerning refugees makes much of the fact that the Tamils stopped in another country. There is an attempt by the Government to treat differently those refugees who have stopped at what is called a safe third country. I simply point out that it is almost impossible to move people from the subcontinent of India to Canada without putting in somewhere, in what would probably be deemed a safe third country, for refueling purposes.

To a certain extent this particular policy Canada has been attempting to adopt, of not permitting refugees to enter our country if they have stopped at a "safe third country" means in effect that most Asians and Africans cannot come here as refugees even though they are genuine refugees simply because they have had to stop to refuel en route. It is a very neat and tidy, I am afraid, repeat of the kind of racial decision-making that occurred in 1914 and 1939, this policy of keeping out some people of certain racial and religious origins on the basis of a so-called stop in a safe third country excuse.

I know that governmental and, indeed, national acceptability of certain races and nationalities does vary over time. I know from experience with my own family who came to this country as immigrants, as did a lot of western, northern, and central Europeans at the turn of the last century and the beginning of this one, that they were welcomed at that time because they were considered to be good immigrants. Looking back to 1914, it probably had something to do with the fact that their skins were the right colour as were their religions. During the war years of 1914 to 1918 and again from 1939 to 1945, because my grandparents and their Canadian children were of German origin, they were looked upon very sceptically by the official Government in Canada. In fact my grandparents spent the First World War years on the U.S. border because they had taken five of their children to visit the great grandparents and made the mistake of not watching international politics. The war broke out during their visit and they were not allowed back into Canada, even though they had been Canadian citizens for something like 12 years; that did not make any difference.

I only point that out to show that there are times, unfortunately, when our definition of who is a Canadian citizen and who is a refugee is so flexible that the political feelings of the day predominate over the definitions and practices that are supposed to be in effect.

In part for that reason, we have attempted with the coming of the Charter of Rights and the Constitution to set out rules that go above the law and above the Government of the day so that people who are citizens can appeal to the courts. That was not possible for my grandparents because it was 80 years later before that possibility existed.

With this proposed law we are attempting to keep people who are claiming refugee status from going before the courts to have their cases heard. We have an attempt to generate hysteria in Canada over the arrival of some 174 East Indians, mostly of the Sikh religion near Charlesville, Nova Scotia. I want to show how this matter appears to have been manipulated in the eyes of those who have entered Canada in the last generation or two.

Let me review a letter from the Ethnocultural Council to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) over the matters that led up to the so-called crisis that brought this Parliament back this summer. The council points out that after initial reaction of common courtesy and greeting with food and shelter offered by the residents of Charlesville, Nova Scotia, the Government people moved in and reporters were warned not to take pictures. It was made impossible for the media to conduct interviews. The claimants were immediately bused to a military base instead of to the usual moderate cost hotel and were kept under heavy guard providing the instant image of criminality. They were disallowed contact with the media or any further contact with community people. They were not informed of their legal right to see a lawyer. Access to lawyers was allowed only after a Toronto lawyer, Mendel Green, began proceedings for a court injunction to ensure that these people could get legal advice. When processing of the claimants began, the first and most controversial case, that of Mr. Amrik Dhinsa, a person who had been deported earlier from Canada, was brought forward and made public. I think this smacked of the most flagrant attempt at creating a negative image on the part of the officials of the Department. When processing of claims began, members of the media were disallowed in a further attempt to control information. Again court proceedings became necessary to gain access to what was going on.

In the second case, that of Amarjit Singh, a person alleged to be ready to kill, the information was obtained through questionable means. That information, by the way, was released immediately. The interpretation later was found to have been faulty and the questions were taken out of context. The gentleman involved was permitted to enter Canada because there was nothing to stop him from coming in. That is what happened, Mr. Speaker. But that did not gain very much footage on the television or in the newspapers.

A confidential report of the Task Force on Security and Enforcement of the Department suggesting problems in recruiting clearance of immigrants was leaked to several papers showing that there were difficulties handling the number of immigrants who were waiting at the door. At the same time, the Government began talking about the use of refugees as queue-jumpers, ignoring the fact that there are two queues, one for immigrants and a separate, quite different, procedure for those claiming refugee status.

During this period of time, information was released on another Sikh in a totally different case, a Mr. Kulbir Singh Yirk, dating back several months. This information was received in confidentiality but leaked by unidentified sources to The Globe and Mail which reported on it. Other false information on that 174 claimants was leaked to Maclean's magazine. This information was to the effect that 33 claimants had criminal records. It was subsequently proven to be false, but the record stands. People have read the article in Maclean's and retractions tend to be missed.

Throughout that time, the 174 individuals were not called refugee claimants at all but rather were referred to in the press and by some departmental officials as illegal aliens, illegal immigrants, migrants, Asians, Sikhs and East Indians. The term queue-jumpers was used when we all know it was inaccurate as there are two lines, one for immigrants and a separate one for refugees.

This approach was used by some people to stir up immigrant communities and to stir up resentment between ethnic groups. One of the saddest developments of the whole so-called emergency was the kind of racial clashes that were being precipitated by some people, for whatever reasons.

By the end of July, rumours persisted that there was yet another refugee ship carrying no one knew how many people to Canada. The Canadian Navy, the Air Force and the Coast Guard were dispatched to try to intercept this ship. The hysteria came to a climax. However, it was found that the ship for which people were looking was actually docked somewhere in Great Britain. It was a private ship that had been converted to a yacht by a Canadian of Haitian origin. I think the whole process was capped by absurdity when it was found that, in spite of all this sudden searching for all these people who were suddenly going to invade our shores, they were looking for one Canadian of Haitian origin who was trying to move his personal boat from Europe to North America. He had been delayed and was in fact sitting in Great Britain.

About this time, Parliament was recalled, creating an atmosphere of a national emergency. To be fair, I think that a sense of national emergency did not seem to penetrate this Chamber very thoroughly. Less than half of the government Members were here for the first votes and less than half of the Opposition showed up. Members did not really consider it to be a national emergency and I think Canadians never perceived it as a national emergency either, in spite of it being so portrayed by some Members on the government side.

To their credit, some Hon. Members on the government side did see this farce for what it was, and to his credit, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration made his views known and attempted to further the cause of a more clear-cut procedure for handling refugee claimants and a better method of dealing with immigrant claimants. Unfortunately for the House and for Canada, his proposal seems to have been overrun by this so-called sense of urgency and by the Government's attempts to put this Bill and its companion Bill, Bill C-55, through the House post-haste.

The procedure the House normally follows has been complied with on this Bill. We did have a debate on second reading at which time Hon. Members posed their opposition, or support in some cases for the Bill. It did go to a legislative committee and amendments were offered and routinely rejected by the government side. There were one or two small exceptions to that. The one exception that I recall is the acceptance of the amendment to the sunset clause.

Some Canadians may be surprised to know that this Bill, which was so necessary to protect us from illegal aliens and refugees, actually contains a sunset clause. This means that it will no longer be in effect after a certain period of time. The original Bill had a five-year sunset clause and that was amended to four years. I think some progress was made by doing that, but amending the sunset clause to a matter of weeks would have been equally effective.

I am concerned that by the introduction of this Bill, the Government has attempted, knowingly or otherwise, to precipitate some racial feelings that need not have been heightened at this time. More important, I am concerned that it has raised questions about our role as a nation that complies with the rules agreed to under the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. The Executive Committee of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has made some conclusions which point out that this Bill runs counter to its recommendations. The first relevant paragraph of that conclusion is as follows:

> It is recalled that there is a fundamental obligation under international law for ships' masters to rescue any persons in distress at sea, including asylum seekers, and to render them all necessary assistance.
> Seafaring States should take all appropriate measures to ensure that masters of vessels observe this obligation strictly.

Yet this Bill proposes to give the Government the power to turn away such vessels. I think that is contrary to the recommendations of the Executive Committee of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

A second relevant paragraph is paragraph No. 3 of the Executive Committee's report which reads as follows:

In accordance with established international practice, supported by the relevant international instruments, persons rescued at sea should normally be disembarked at the next port of call. This practice should also be applied in the case of asylum seekers rescued at sea. In cases of large-scale influx, asylum seekers rescued at sea should always be admitted, at least on a temporary basis.

The Bill's proposal that they be turned away runs contrary to that.

I see your signal, Mr. Speaker, and I realize that my time is up. I regret that this Bill has been proposed by the Canadian Government. In my opinion, it is not a good portrayal of the country in which I believe. The Bill does not attempt to keep Canada's doors open to asylum seekers and genuine refugees who have well-founded fears of persecution or death in their home countries. I think we have taken a very negative, backward step with the introduction of this legislation and I deeply regret it.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of getting involved in this debate at this time but, because of some of the points raised by the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse), I find it necessary to tell the right side of the story about several things he mentioned. I want to deal briefly with those things.

The Hon. Member finished his remarks by talking about people being rescued at sea. There is nothing in this Bill that will stop us from being compassionate toward people rescued at sea. People sneaking into the country, having destroyed their documents, are not being rescued. They have sneaked into the country. Not one of those people, if they were genuine refugees, would have been stopped from applying properly.

The Hon. Member went on to say that the first newspaper stories about these people was that one had been deported before. A second one was a murderer. The press brought these things out. This Government does not control the press. Why is he complaining to the Government? Why does he not complain to CBC and the socialist press which publishes these things? I did not hear one Hon. Member from that Party say anything about the ridiculous way the press ignored 2,000 people demonstrating on this Hill simply because they happened to be supporting the Government. If he wants the press to be honest and fair to everyone, I am with him. I am opposed to it being slanted to the socialist side all the time. In any case, his point is not applicable to this Bill at all.

He also said there was no national emergency. I happened to be mainstreeting in my constituency starting the day after these Sikhs arrived in Nova Scotia. In the 52 or 53 towns and villages I visited, where I spent a half an hour to an hour on the streets, three-quarters of the people who came up to me said how much they resented these people sneaking into our country. They wanted to know what the Government was going to do about it—not next year but now. I was one of those who wrote to the Hon. Minister and told him how my constituents felt.

Then the Hon. Member talked about all kinds of things that were going to happen. Is he a mind-reader? Does he have a Ouija-board or something? This Government has no intention of turning down any genuine refugee no matter where they come from. The Hon. Member talked about different colours and nationalities. They are human beings and this Government recognizes that. They will be treated as human beings as long as they are honest and sincere. We do not want murderers from other countries coming to Canada. We do not want thieves. We do not want people who are determined to sneak into this country after having destroyed their documents, because if they are dishonest in one thing, they may be dishonest in other things.

How does the Hon. Member rationalize some of the things he said with what I have just said?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, we have a good juxtaposition of our two points of view regarding refugees. The Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) says what we have here is a bunch of people who were sneaking in—

Mr. Taylor: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I never at any time said these people were murderers or sneakers. You are the one that put in the murder part. I said we do not want that kind in the country and we have every right to keep that kind out.

Mr. Althouse: There has never been any argument about that. The process is quite clear. Under the existing law, which has been very effective in screening people with criminal records, those people have not been permitted into the country in most cases.

The point I would make in response is that this particular boatload of people, and I thought he said his constituents used the words "sneaked in", all passed the initial scrutiny under the old Act. I suspect most of them would pass under the new Act. I do not see anything in the new Act that would have been effective at keeping these people out.

The Hon. Member's comments demonstrate the point I made initially in my remarks, that the perception of Government and government officials changes over time. It has been extremely difficult for Canada to set out procedures and definitions regarding refugees at any point in time. We apparently decided that Tamils were in danger of losing their lives in Sri Lanka. We have still not decided, apparently, whether they will be granted full refugee status in Canada. They have been allowed to stay here for a year. The peace plan in that country is still being worked through and it is apparently unclear whether those Tamils, even though they have all gotten jobs in Canada and some have even provided employment for other people, will be permitted to become immigrants.

The Hon. Member indicated there was no intention of turning people away. I am not a lawyer but I have had lawyers interpret this Bill for me. The language in the legislation seems fairly clear. The power exists to turn ships away. If it is not the intention of the Government or any future Government to implement that power, I wish it was not in the law. I think it is quite counter-productive to the democratic process to write laws which go far beyond what any Government intends to enforce. It confuses the public as to what actually is the law. Writing laws and penalties far beyond what anyone intends to impose is not particularly useful in providing a legal or moral outlook for the country's population.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a bit about C-84 in the context of the recent handling of an application for immigration by a French national who had been here on a work permit teaching for six years and who requested assistance from the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) wife in order to have his application for landed immigrant status expedited by the Department of Immigration. I raise that because I think there is a double standard being applied.

On the one hand this House was brought together in an emergency session in order to deal with Bill C-84, which is what we are debating right now. This Bill says, despite all the evidence, that refugees are some kind of risk to Canadian security. Effectively, it allows a person to be designated a security risk. It introduces penalties for helping a person to come into Canada without a visa, passport or travel document as required by the Immigration Act. Yet at the same time the Prime Minister's wife intervenes through her office in order to help someone jump the queue and be considered for landed immigrant status while here in Canada, and this despite the fact that Mr. Grossmann, the man in question, was actually in France for two and a half months over the course of the summer—

Mr. Malone: Sleaze, sleaze.

Mr. Cassidy: This is a legitimate issue. The Hon. Member suggests that it is improper to raise this issue. Yet Canadians are asking why we turn away refugees who are in fear of their lives in Central America, Africa and Asia and bring in legislation which allows boats to be turned away without even knowing whether the passengers have any claim to Canada's commitments under the international treaties governing refugees, while on the other hand someone who happens to be personally acquainted with the family of the Prime Minister can get intervention before an application is even submitted.

I have been thinking about this at some length because of the statements made by the junior Minister of Immigration yesterday. He said there was no intervention by the Prime Minister's office. However, the documents which were reported on in The Globe and Mail today make it quite clear that there was a series of telexes sent and that the letter which Mr. Grossmann originally sent was forwarded from the Prime Minister's office. When the arrangements made by the Immigration Department were not convenient for Mr. Grossmann after he had failed to keep the appointment made for him in Paris for August 20, there was further intervention from high quarters.

What distinguishes one person from somebody else? This person is in no fear of his life, oppression or exploitation were he to return to his native country, but wants to stay here in Canada. That is an understandable desire, but we have a very tight clamp on regular immigration to this country right now. I believe it is too tight, but one of the criteria is whether or not there is a substantial demand for people with the job expertise held by an applicant.

As a resident of Ottawa I can tell you that in the last five or six years there have been almost no job openings in this community for teachers. It is extremely difficult for teachers to get jobs. There are probably thousands of teachers who are unemployed or have had to go into other professions because they were unable to get jobs as teachers in the national capital region. Yet with the help of this intervention someone who was teaching here was able to jump the queue and have his application considered earlier this month.

Mr. Malone: Tell the truth.

Mr. Cassidy: The Hon. Member is obviously feeling rather sensitive about this particular question, as he well should. Ordinary Canadians wonder why some Canadians have extraordinary influence when they are not elected to an office.

Mrs. Collins: How many do you ask for?

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) asks specifically how many people I have assisted. The answer is a number. I want to tell about the experience of ordinary Members of Parliament in terms of immigration applications. We receive calls from people asking for assistance, saying that they want to become landed immigrants in Canada and have been working here for four or five years.

In such a case my first step would be to explain the way the situation works and the difficulties, explaining that although I am not entirely in support of the difficulties, that is the situation as it is. I would ask them if they had put in an application. If they had not I would say that I can hardly seek to intervene when no application has been made and there is no evidence that they are being unfairly or unreasonably dealt with.

If it was a case of a person who is resident in Canada but did not have landed immigrant status, as was the case of Mr. Grossmann, I would suggest that they consider arranging with the Department to make the application in New York City, Atlanta or Buffalo, rather than having to spend the money to go over to France. If I learned that they were taking a holiday in France I would suggest that they make their application there and that it would not be unreasonable to determine whether it were possible to extend their work permit. There are various ways in which this could be handled which are perfectly reasonable without seeking to bend or break the rules.

However, the cases which I get are not like that, for the most part. If I do get a case like that I tell them what to do if they encounter any problems, and then to come back to me if they still have problems. Nine times out of ten I do not hear from the constituent again.

I had one case of an elderly woman who was here visiting her family from Hong Kong and became sick. Because she was in Canada as a visitor she was not entitled to any medical treatment but she was certainly too ill to go back to Hong Kong where she would be able to get treatment. In that case I talked to the Minister personally and she was accepted on a Minister's permit. She certainly was not going to leave Canada and was probably going to die in a few months. Because she was accepted on a Minister's permit she was entitled to coverage under medicare in the Province of Ontario. We were assured by the provincial authorities, with whom we were in contact, that they would give that treatment. That is a humanitarian case in which I intervened.

I intervened in another case of a constituent who is a manager of a restaurant in downtown Ottawa. He is very hard working. He has been working for 14 or 16 hours a day, six days a week, in order to save enough money to fulfil his dream of bringing the rest of his family to Canada, as he is entitled to do. However, in this case there were all kinds of hassles from the Canadian High Commission in Pakistan. I cannot remember the details, but it had gone on for four and a half years. I intervened and eventually spoke to the Minister. The Minister's office became upset about it and sent cables to the office in Pakistan. I am happy to say that this family has finally been reunited here in Canada.

There is a great difference between the two cases I have just cited and the case of someone who had a perfectly normal opportunity to apply and who would have had absolutely no difficulty submitting an application and having it considered in the normal way.

Let us suppose that Mr. Grossmann's application for landed immigrant status was refused. Let us suppose it was refused because the law said that where there is an ample supply of people to fill the demand in a particular occupation we do not accept people from another country. What happens then? Hon. Members opposite say that because this individual was the grade seven teacher of one of the Mulroney kids the rules should be bent.

I would be quite open to a suggestion that perhaps we should change the rules and have more open immigration, that someone like Mr. Grossmann can make a contribution to our country even if there does not happen to be a great demand for teachers at this time. However, that would mean widening the doors to all applicants, not only one applicant who happens to be acquainted with the family of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, today's debate deals with Bill C-84. And, as everyone knows, this legislation is aimed at restricting the entry of refugees and refugee claimants that are entering Canada. It is a bill that is offensive, and it is opposed by the churches and all the groups that help refugees.

Mr. Speaker, this House was called back here in mid-August because of what this Government called the immigration crisis, the refugee crisis. But I believe it was a political crisis for a Government that had fallen down to third place in the polls. And it still holds third place today, and for good reasons.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress the situation that prevails today, the double standard imposed by the Conservative Party. On the one hand, they turn down legitimate refugee claims, under the agreements entered by Canada with countries all around the world.

On the one hand it does this, but on the other it demonstrates very clearly that if you know an acquaintance of the Prime Minister or his family, you may be allowed, thanks to the direct intervention of the Prime Minister's Office, to do some queue jumping and have your application considered ahead of any other.

If someone who is here as a student or on a minister's work permit comes to see me because he or she wants to become an immigrant in this country, I feel compelled to advise him or her in the proper fashion by telling him or her to go back home. If your country of origin is very far away, go to England then, or Atlanta, New York or Buffalo, anywhere in the United States where there are immigration offices which are accustomed to accepting applications from people residing in Canada but who have to leave the country in order to apply for landed immigrant status following the normal process.

Now, if this is the normal procedure for everybody, I wonder why it is not the case for someone who is an acquaintance of Mrs. Mulroney or her son who is attending school?

Mr. Malone: False.

Mr. Cassidy: If the Hon. Member does not agree with current immigration procedures, he should make sure that changes are made on a general basis, but his constituents would not appreciate at all that someone who lives here in Ottawa and knows the Prime Minister personally be entitled to have his application considered in this country ahead of those submitted by some constituents of the Hon. Member who do not enjoy the same privilege.

Mr. Malone: You are a phoney!

Mr. Cassidy: I challenge the Hon. Member to have the application of someone living in his riding considered on the same basis as that of Mr. Grossmann, thanks to the intervention of Mrs. Mulroney and the Prime Minister's Office.

• (1210)

I challenge all Hon. Members, particularly from the government Party, to say how many Hon. Members have been able to get treatment for someone resident in their riding, comparable to what the Prime Minister's wife could get for her contact in her riding.

All of us become involved in these cases from time to time. I have a central city riding and deal with many immigration cases. However, these involve legitimate, humanitarian considerations when there has been a foul-up and red tape in the immigration process. The rules simply do not apply to this particular situation.

If Mr. Grossmann was a priest who was penniless in Canada and wanted consideration because he could not afford to go back to France to apply, it would be a different situation. However, he is a teacher with a salary on which he can afford to take a two-month vacation with his family in France during the summer. Surely, if he was that keen to become a Canadian, at the very least he would have been able to go to the embassy in Paris or the consular office in Marseilles to make the necessary application. Surely, one half day during a two-month trip is enough time for someone who wants to make a commitment to this country.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening with great care to the Hon. Member's remarks. It strikes me that first, he is shifting significantly from the Bill that is on the floor of the House for debate. More important, he is making accusations that do not relate to the facts whatsoever.

If he is suggesting that any Canadian, including the wife of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) cannot make representations through her office on behalf of immigrants, then there is something wrong with the Hon. Member and those who espouse the views he is making on the floor of the House. I think it is a shame, because all of us make representations on a regular basis on behalf of Canadians, on behalf of our constituents, and certainly on behalf of legal immigrants. There is nothing wrong with that. I do it all the time, as a Minister of the Crown.

The Hon. Member makes similar representations all the time and I think it is time that he and others who are trying to blow this matter well out of proportion realize that he is taking away the rights of an individual, the wife of the Prime Minister of Canada in this case. They are saying she is not allowed to make representations through her office on behalf of immigrants.

Second, he is swaying from the discussion on the Bill that is before the House at this time. I wish he would get back to the issue in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) has the floor on debate.

Mr. Cassidy: I would be much happier if the Prime Minister's Office had a line item in its budget saying that it is allocating staff and certain amounts of resources to Mrs. Mulroney, since circumstances have changed from the days when the Prime Minister's wife was not a public personage at all. Alternatively, the Conservative Party could pay the expenses for Mrs. Mulroney. She is in a special place by virtue of being the Prime Minister's wife. I acknowledge that it is a very difficult situation. She is not a Member of Parliament, yet she had half a dozen interventions by the Minister and the Prime Minister's Office on behalf of someone who had not even made an application when she made her first intervention on his behalf.

When I must deal with a case of a person who has not gone through the normal process I suggest that the person go through the normal process because that is where they must begin. There is a double standard. There are thousands of teachers who are unemployed across the country. Perhaps some of them should have had an opportunity to apply for the job at Lycée Claudel. The Government's current policy does not seem to apply in this particular case.

Yesterday, the Minister indicated that there had been no intervention from the Prime Minister's Office. I want to put on the record quite clearly that the facts are not in accordance with what was said by the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner). I regret that he apparently misled the House, perhaps unintentionally, because the facts appear to be otherwise.

Bill C-84 will be contested in the courts at great expense to everyone involved. The Bill raises many questions in terms of Canada's sincerity about welcoming legitimate refugees. Since the publication of the Plaut report two years ago, there has been a consensus on how to expedite the processing of people seeking to be refugees, and on how to assure that people who are making applications that are not justified will be returned quickly so that they will not try to use this as a device for avoiding the regular channels of immigration.

Our Party has made it clear that we favour that type of solution which has been supported by the churches and refugee groups. We acknowledge that problems exist, but the Government must not trample over human rights and create the kind of oppressive and offensive situation that will result from Bill C-84 and Bill C-55. These steps are not necessary in order to develop a better way to handle refugees.

If this was an urgent matter, the Government could have followed the recommendations of Rabbi Plaut almost two years ago. Yet, the legislation was not submitted at that time. When it finally introduced legislation, the Government suddenly said there was a major problem and the House of Commons must be resumed in order to deal with the crisis.

We believe the Government could have attempted to follow the procedure proposed by the churches for a couple of years. If that system did not work, it would have been justified in saying that another system was required. However, not to try such a system is to abandon our responsibility to persons who are in genuine fear of death, imprisonment, or torture in many countries throughout the world which are producing refugees. That is why we profoundly believe that the real crisis we are addressing in Bill C-84 is a political crisis.

This is a political crisis orchestrated by the Progressive Conservative Party which is seeking ways to rally the support of the Canadian people.

Now, on the basis of the very last polls, it is clear that the debate which lasted for the greater part of August has not helped the Conservative Party. It stands exactly as it did in August before Bill C-84 was introduced. In other words if this bill was to be used as a means to regain first place, it has failed miserably. And by so doing, the international reputation of Canada as an open country doing its utmost to help the refugees, the exploited, the oppressed everywhere in the world has been jeopardized.

That is the reason why my party and I oppose Bill C-84, Mr. Speaker.

• (1220)

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I rise as much in sorrow as in anger to ask a question of the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy). I have never heard such a speech marinated in cynicism as was delivered by the Hon. Member. Its objective clearly has to be one of attacking people personally and without evidence. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am disgusted with the tone of what I heard from the Hon. Member. He wanted to imply that somehow there was something wrong and abnormal with an attempt to assist a person to become a Canadian citizen when he knows that it is the duty of each and every one of us as Canadians to be helpful to one another and to help the country to build and to grow. He also knows that the very person about whom he spoke who asked for assistance to come to Canada is a person who has a son and who is married to a Canadian living in this country. In and of itself a great part of the reason that a person is admitted to Canada is for family reunification, something in which we all sincerely believe.

I rise at this point because I can no longer tolerate the cynicism and the holier than thou notion of the members of the NDP. They pretend that they are the great protectors of human rights. I will tell Hon. Members about human rights. Where it is failing is in the New Democratic Party where in its policy it talks about a population redistribution plan. Members of that Party would relocate immigrants across the country to give balance to population settlement. In the name of human rights I dare the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre to begin to defend that NDP policy, to say that that is justifiable, that when people come here as landed immigrants or new people coming to our country, as stated in the policy—

Mr. Cassidy: That is completely false. Prove it.

Mr. Malone: I will read it to the Hon. Member. It comes from my office and is part of the policy of the Hon. Member's Party. It is from the resolutions reference book of the NDP. I have read it and it states that that Party would take the authority and the power to allocate people to different regions of the country for population settlement.

I ask the Hon. Member to tell that to an immigrant community anywhere in Canada where people want to settle for their own personal reasons. Yet the NDP has the audacity to come here and claim that they are the only people interested in human rights. I dare the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre to stand in his place and tell us that he can justify his Party's policy which, for population settlement reasons, would put new immigrants wherever a Government of Canada formed by that Party in its interventionist and state-control thinking could justify it.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I am appalled by the comments of the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) who has not proven any of the allegations he has made. I point out to him that I have many cases in my office and elsewhere regarding people who are Canadian citizens or landed immigrants who wish to bring their parents to Canada and cannot do so. They cannot do so because their parents are under the age of 60 or 65 and are therefore considered to be still economically active. Thus they have to be considered essentially on their own merits. The fact that they may have a married son or daughter in Canada does not assist them in any appreciable degree in terms of landing in Canada.

The Hon. Member asks, should we not have some openness in that regard? Yes, we should. But it is the immigration policy perpetuated by the Government that makes it difficult for the likes of this French teacher from France to establish himself in Canada. But if he did not happen to have an acquaintance who is the Prime Minister's wife then in fact he probably would not even be able to enter Canada. That is the real issue. He would certainly not be able to do it from within Canada. He might have to wait for several years.

I met a constituent the other day who told me that his girlfriend wants to come to Canada. She is English and has a university degree. She has two or three years of work experience. It seemed to me from the description that she would make a good Canadian and a good contribution to Canada. She cannot gain entry into Canada. There is something wrong with an immigration policy such as that which bars people who would make good Canadian citizens. There is no justification in having one rule for someone connected to the Prime Minister and another rule for everyone else.

I wish to be thoughtful and reflective about this matter. Mrs. Mulroney is in a very unusual situation. Maybe she just simply put a letter into the hopper and everyone jumped as though she were saying, "Jump, jump, jump". Perhaps she is unaware of the degree to which departments and so on respond. However, the succession of telexes, letters and phone calls from the Prime Minister's office and from the office of the junior Minister of Immigration is quite extraordinary in this particular case. It is far more than what would occur if I had made that same request. Certainly, it is infinitely more than what would occur if Susan Brown of Vancouver had made a similar request on behalf of the teacher of her child in grade seven in a French school in Vancouver.

With respect to the other question, I do not know from where the allegations of the Hon. Member are coming. I would point out that his Government has agreed, and I think most Parties agree, with the proposals in the Meech Lake Accord which would assure to Quebec a certain proportion of immigration coming into Canada relative to its population. If that is what the Hon. Member is referring to as population relocation, then he should repudiate the Meech Lake Accord, something for which I believe all Parties have indicated their support.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the Hon. Member's remarks, particularly those which indicated that he felt he has a grasp and a certain expertise on the way that all inquiries and concerns from constituents, friends or acquaintances should be handled. When the Hon. Member receives an inquiry himself concerning an immigration matter, or with respect to any other problem for that matter, does he take the approach of writing back to the person, returning their letter and stating, "I am sorry, I cannot help you because if I made some inquiries on your behalf to the Government or to a department or some official because I am a Member of Parliament they might very well feel that I am trying to influence them improperly in some way, shape or form? As a result of that, of course, I cannot help you. I am sorry, but I am just going to have to return your letter and your inquiry because there is nothing I can do about it".

Is that the approach the Hon. Member takes? Is that the approach that he feels all Members of Parliament should take when they are approached by their constituents who have problems or questions? Is that the approach he believes a human being should take if another human being approaches one with a problem? Does he in fact turn them away and say, "I cannot help you because this might leave the impression if I tried that I was trying to use my influence as a Member of Parliament in some way"?

Mr. Cassidy: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not. I have respect for the Hon. Member. I am sure that he also takes cases such as this and seeks to assist people when he feels that assistance is justified. In my case I begin by looking through the case in order to determine whether I am convinced that there is some merit in pursuing it. In certain cases I say, "Look, I really do not think I should help you because, for example, I cannot help you until your application is in. Please submit your application and then if you are having problems after that come back and I will see if I can help at that time".

There is one very substantial difference in the two cases to which the Hon. Member refers. I do not believe that on September 4, 1984, Mila Mulroney was elected to the House of Commons. I have not seen her take her seat on either side of the House. She is certainly not a member of my caucus, and I do not believe that she is a member of the caucus of the Hon. Member either.

I was elected as a Member of Parliament. Among other things, people expect me to perform the role of an ombudsman. For example, if a person came to my wife and she referred something to me, I would ask her to advise the constituent to contact me. She is not an ombudsman for the riding of Ottawa Centre. I am as the elected Member of Parliament.

If Mrs. Mulroney decides that in future she will handle cases from Baie Comeau, and the riding of Manicouagan, and refer them through her husband's office, I suppose that is legitimate. But let us have this clarified exactly. One of the problems is the very ambiguous nature of the influence which appears to be wielded by someone who holds no elected office, and yet has an office in prime real estate in downtown Ottawa, and has the office expenses and staff paid for by the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate with the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in today's debate on Bill C-84. I wish to preface my remarks by stating that I have had an opportunity to study the proceedings of the committee that considered Bill C-84 clause by clause and item by item. Experts in the field of immigration and refugee determination appeared before the committee, many on very short notice. They made excellent presentations. I have looked through all of the transcripts of the evidence of the witnesses. I have found no one who spoke in favour of the Bill.

Perhaps there is someone in Canada who has studied this Bill and who says it is a good Bill and it should be passed. If there are those people, I would ask them to make themselves known. I would ask the Members in the House, particularly those on the government benches who have not spoken against this Bill, to indicate what reasons they have for supporting the Bill, other than perhaps their own inclinations. I would ask if they know people who have studied the Bill, people who are knowledgeable in this area and who say that this is good legislation. I have been unable to determine who those people are.

I have looked at the presentations made by 13 different churches including the Lutheran Church, the Anglican Church, the United Church, the Roman Catholic Church, the Mennonite Church, the Presbyterian Church, and the Baptist Church. I have also had an opportunity to look at the briefs presented by the Inter-Church Committee for Refugees, the Canadian Bar Association, Amnesty International, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Civil Liberties Association, the Canadian Labour Congress, the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, and Rabbi Gunther Plaut. I could go on.

As a matter of fact, I wish to mention one group that made an excellent presentation. I would encourage all Members to look at the transcript of the evidence of the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council. By definition, this council obviously has a profound interest in immigration and refugee determination. It represents hundreds of thousands of Canadians. Some of the groups that were represented include the Armenian National Federation, the Canadian Arab Federation, various Vietnamese associations, the Hispanic Congress, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Polish Congress, the Chinese Canadian National Council, the Council of Muslim Communities, Croatians, Cypriots, Czechoslovakians, Estonians, the Federation of Danish Associations, Koreans, Sikhs, Portuguese, Finns, Germans, Icelanders, Lithuanians, Latvians, Indians, Japanese Canadians, the National Black Coalition, Italian Canadians, Barbadian associations, Pakistani Canadians, Russian Canadians, Serbian National Shield Committee, Slovaks, Slovenians, Ukrainians, the United Council of Filipino Associations, to name only a few. In unanimity, all those organizations oppose this legislation.

As Members of Parliament who are asked to comment and to present views on a variety of very complex issues, I think it is fair to say that we take counsel from those who appear before the legislative committees. After all, we have the opportunity in the legislative process to hear those who are knowledgeable, and have expertise in these areas to advise Members of Parliament, the Government, and members of the opposition Parties.

Having studied all of the material put before the legislative committee, I find that every single witness or group who appeared as a witness opposed the legislation for a whole set of what they determined to be critical areas that they take great pains to specifically point out. There is no group, agency, or individual who is recognized to be knowledgeable with expertise in this area who supports the Bill. Therefore, it is reasonable, having looked at the evidence, to oppose this Bill in its present form. My caucus opposes this Bill in its present form.

When I studied Bill C-84, I had the opportunity, as did everyone else, to look at the purposes of this Bill as laid out in the beginning clause. Proposed Section 2.1 states:

> (a) to preserve for persons in genuine need of protection access to the procedures for determining refugee claims;

I support that objective. It further states that another purpose is:

> (b) to control widespread abuse of the procedures for determining refugee claims, particularly in light of organized incidents involving large-scale introduction of persons into Canada to take advantage of those procedures;

Obviously, I support that objective, as does my caucus. It further states that another purpose is:

> (c) to deter the smuggling of persons into Canada and thereby minimize the exploitation of and risks to persons seeking to come to Canada;

Of course we support that objective. It further states:

> (d) to respond to security concerns, including the fulfilment of Canada's obligations in respect of internationally protected persons.

My caucus and I support that objective. But those are the purposes of the legislation as presented in stage one. When one looks at the Bill, all those objectives are excluded. For example, one objective was to deal with smugglers. There is no mention in the entire Bill of smugglers who are dealing in human cargo. There is something funny going on. All serious-minded parliamentarians would support the objectives, the goals, and the purposes of this legislation, but when one looks through the clauses of the Bill itself they are simply not there.

People who are knowledgeable in this area have said that this Bill is unconstitutional, it goes against the Constitution of Canada, it breaches the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it breaks our agreements with the United Nations in a whole set of different areas dealing with refugees.

The Canadian Bar Association played an important role when it said that this legislation, once enacted, because of course the Government can use its huge majority to enact this legislation, will be struck down in the courts because it is unconstitutional. It contravenes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of Canada. This will be very costly. The most prestigious legal organization in Canada has said that this Bill is unconstitutional, it is unlawful, and it will be struck down in the superior courts of the country. Yet incredibly the Government goes merrily on its way ignoring that advice.

This Bill has sent out a Draconian message to people across the world that Canada is closing its doors to refugees. One of the nicest things about being a Canadian citizen is being able to look at our history and see the many times in the past that we have been a haven for those who are seeking refuge from oppression, or certain death and torture in their countries of origin, for example, the 106,000 boat people from Vietnam and other parts of Southeast Asia who found refuge in Canada. This initiative was supported by the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) and his Government, and subsequently followed with support by Mr. Trudeau and his Government. In a sense, the Liberal and Conservative Governments in the past have shown some compassion when it came to the Vietnamese and Southeast Asian boat people.

I do not have to remind parliamentarians of the Czechoslovakian refugees, those refugees from the United States fleeing slavery, the Hungarian and Polish refugees, the Ugandan refugees, the Tamils fleeing oppression in Sri Lanka, and most recently the 174 refugee claimants who landed on the coast of Nova Scotia which brought this whole matter to our attention.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) went on to say, among a number of things, that this incident needed special consideration. He indicated that these people were obviously breaking the law, that there was a need to recall Parliament because an emergency had been created in the country, and that people were abusing the refugee laws of Canada.

I looked at the facts and found, for example, that in 1985 thousands and thousands of people applied for refugee status or made refugee claims. In 1986, 18,000 people made claims. In the first five months of this year, there were 10,000 such claims. In other words, year after year the number was about the same, the number of people claiming that they were refugees, that they would be persecuted in their countries of origin and asking Canada for a safe haven.

The situation has gone on for at least the three years in which the Government has been in power. Suddenly, for some reason in July, 1987, there is a crisis or an emergency deemed by the Prime Minister. What made it an emergency? Was it the fact that 174 more people were claiming refugee status in Canada? No, it was not that. I think it was a very dark day for the country when the Prime Minister saw a political opportunity to inflame some of the most negative passions, some racist passions in people, and found some groups to blame for problems in terms of employment. The Prime Minister then decided to recall Parliament to deal with the so-called crisis.

Presumably we have dealt with the crisis for weeks and weeks, and all those people who are knowledgeable in these areas have told us that this was not the Bill which should have been introduced. I believe it was two years ago when a whole set of recommendations on how to improve the refugee claimant process in Canada was ignored by the Government. I do not think a single one of us here or a single Canadian would want to say that we are not in favour of supporting real refugees. Most Canadians, with maybe a handful of exceptions, are compassionate, decent people who feel that people fleeing death, persecution, torture, jail, and labour camps in their countries of origin are welcome in Canada. As I indicated earlier, our history proves that.

However, we are opposed to that handful of people who will abuse any system, including the refugee claimant system. All serious thinking Canadians are opposed to people using and abusing the system. I hate to mention this—as a matter of fact, I am reluctant to do so but I feel I must—but after the Prime Minister recalled Parliament to deal with what he called queue-jumpers, which of course was a misnomer, what did he do from his office? He queue-jumped; he made a request on his letterhead asking for special consideration to be given to the French teacher of his children. That is the ultimate in hypocrisy, and that is the kind of thing Canadians find so disagreeable. Once again we have been reminded in the last number of days that what the Prime Minister says on Monday does not necessarily determine what he does on Tuesday.

We have also been reminded, in what I think are some of the most thoughtful speeches I have heard in the House for a long time, about some incidents in the past which we do not want to repeat, incidents which we as parliamentarians recognize as black marks on our history, dark days in our country's past. I refer, of course, to the Kamagata Maru incident in 1914 when 376 Sikhs sailed to Canada from Bombay. They arrived at the Port of Vancouver and were refused entry. They stayed in the harbour for weeks and weeks trying to negotiate with the immigration people and the Government of the day. The Government said, "No, we will not allow you to land", and these 376 Sikhs were forced by Canadian gunboats to return to Bombay and the Punjab. I am sad to say that many of those people met their death when they returned home.

The most obvious incident in recent history occurred in 1939 with the St. Louis when we saw over 900 Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi terror in Europe. Immigration officials and the Canadian Government of the day said that they did not believe there was anything wrong with the Nazi regime or that they would be persecuted, tortured, or killed. In retrospect we know that what they were fleeing was in fact very authentic. Every one of the Jewish refugees who came to our shores and were forced back to Europe returned to certain death in the gas chambers of the Nazi terror. Again it was a dark day. In retrospect we regret that it happened, but there are people who are saying that we do not want that to happen again, that we do not want those events to be replayed.

However, a provision in Bill C-84 allows for something like that to happen. It says that a ship suspected of having illegal refugees on board can be stopped on the open sea by Canadian gunboats and forced to turn around and go back. The national president of employees working for the Department of Immigration has spoken out and said, "We don't want to do that". They think it is inappropriate to ask people working for the Department of Immigration to determine whether a boat is filled with illegal refugees without ever talking to them.

The Bill also makes the following an offence. If some unscrupulous person involved in smuggling people was to dump those people at sea in lifeboats or open boats, and if someone from Canada for compassionate reasons went out to rescue them, he or she would be subject to fine and/or imprisonment.

That is not the kind of country we have. That is not the kind of country we want in the future. This is why so many of us are speaking out. I say "so many of us" because certainly all my colleagues in the New Democratic Party caucus feel very strongly about the abuse of human rights embodied in this piece of legislation. I have listened to the speeches of those in the Liberal Party and assume that they will also oppose it. As well, I heard speeches from members on the government backbenches. In fact, the chairperson of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, a Progressive Conservative Member of Parliament, stood in his place on many occasions and said that this Bill is wrong, that what the Government is doing is wrong, and that the legislation is inappropriate. One of the most knowledgeable people on the government benches who lives and breathes immigration policy day after day has said that we should not pass this Bill.

Who is it that wants to pass this Bill? Who supports this Bill? This so-called thoughtful person when it comes to these matters has yet to be identified.

I simply say that there are areas in the Bill which are inappropriate and have been severely criticized for what they do. I do not need to repeat what my colleagues have stated on a number of occasions, but I want to bring one problem area into focus. Those people—and almost inevitably they are church people—who are motivated by compassion and humanitarian concerns have most recently seen people in South America fleeing death squads, torture, death, and persecution and coming to Canada. Such people do not often leave with all their documents in order. They appear at our borders documentless because they are fleeing a horror story in their communities and villages in Central America. As a result of this Bill, the people who assist them, and Central Americans, by taking them to the nearest immigration office, will be supporting what is now described as a criminal act, an act which is illegal. They will be subject to years in jail or thousands of dollars in fines. Those men and women who want to help people come to Canada, people who are escaping death and torture, will now be liable to imprisonment or fines. Is that the kind of country Canada ought to be? No, it is not.

It is for these reasons and many others that we oppose this piece of legislation. Quite frankly, I am proud today to be part of a caucus which says that it is quite prepared to deal with the problems associated with refugee claimants. We know how to deal with them; we have had advice laid out by knowledgeable people. However, we are not prepared to co-operate on a Bill which can only be described by one term—extremely Draconian.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I want to make one comment about what was said by the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) on the immigration policies of the New Democratic Party. In response to his allegations here in the House, I have checked and I have had staff check the policy of the New Democratic Party since the foundation of the Party in 1961. There is no reference at all to the question of population relocation—I made a note of the Member's words—or to any desire by the New Democratic Party to force immigrants who come into Canada to go to a particular part of the country. Nor can I conceivably imagine how that kind of reference could have been made.

I believe that reference made by the Member for Crowfoot is not only false but is also demeaning to this House and to his Party. I believe as well that it is open to misinterpretation and misunderstanding within ethnocultural communities. I would call on the Member for Crowfoot, if he cannot substantiate his allegations, to withdraw them and to withdraw them immediately. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to intervene with the Member for Crowfoot in order to ensure that he does that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair feels that this is a matter of debate, and the Chair does not intend to intervene.

Questions and comments.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, how would the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) compare the legislation that we have before us, which he points out would make it possible for the Government to charge and prosecute and for the courts to fine people who are members of various churches who help refugees settle in Canada and would be guilty of breaking a provision of this Bill, with the situation in the United States? There is legislation in the U.S. under which members of various churches involved with what is called the sanctuary movement, which is a movement where refugees from Central America coming to the southern American States, such as New Mexico, Arizona and California, are helped by members of various religious denominations, the Mennonites, the Roman Catholics and certain Protestant churches, have already been charged, brought to trial and I think found guilty.

Does the Member think that what is included in this Bill is similar to the legislation in the United States which may well lead to the same kinds of results?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). The point was raised by a number of witnesses during the legislative committee hearings that the very repugnant situation that exists in some parts of the United States would be permitted in Canada and would almost be encouraged and facilitated as a result of this legislation. It is that type of accusation by those with expertise in this area that caused a great deal of concern among members of the committee studying the legislation, particularly the chairperson of the Standing Committee for Immigration. During conversations I have had with him this was an area of some concern, something which this Bill would not rule heavily against. As some have indicated, it would encourage and virtually facilitate the situation.

That is one reason that I feel, as do Members of the NDP caucus, that this Bill ought not to be passed in its present form. Some of the amendments put forward by the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) would have dealt with this issue, but amendment after amendment was rejected as Members tried to improve the legislation. I thought the purpose of the legislative committees' work was to improve drafted legislation.

As the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) indicated, this Bill was drafted in a hotel room over a weekend and its very drafters have said they drafted it in a hurry on the assumption that it would be improved through debate and clause by clause analysis in the legislative committee. Such was not the case. The fact that these thoughtful amendments, which were put forward by all sides of the House, were not supported creates even greater motivation to oppose this legislation, badly drafted at the beginning and which, unfortunately, at the this third and final stage remains badly drafted.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, could the Hon. Member tell me whether he has had the same experience that I have had; that is, members of the Mennonite, the Roman Catholic and the Anglican churches who have been involved in helping refugees settle in Winnipeg and other parts of Manitoba have made it very clear to me, and I think to other Members of Parliament from all three Parties in Manitoba, that they consider that what they have been doing is something based on the best of motives, namely, for humanitarian reasons and they do not believe that their action breaks the provision of any reasonable law? They intend to continue to help refugees who come to Manitoba. If that means breaking the law, they are prepared to pay whatever the price is for breaking the law. Has the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap had similar experience in discussion with people in his area of Canada?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, one of the interventions that I received on Bill C-84, as well as its complementary legislation, Bill C-55, was by various church groups in my constituency and, perhaps more appropriately, by various religious groups. I had passages pointed out to me from the Koran, the Bible, the holy books of the Sikh religion and others that the basic tenets of virtually every religion is to help those experiencing persecution and in serious need. That is all we are asking. Witnesses before the committee asked that as a decent society we do our best to help and facilitate those who have experienced such terribly horrible times in their own countries. The compassion shown by the Government of Canada under two administrations, regarding the boat people, the willingness of Canadians to sponsor boat people with the Government of Canada and the welcoming initiatives that occurred in communities right across Canada, was something to behold and about which all of us felt very proud. That tradition is being challenged today. This Bill erodes the tradition of giving, caring, compassion and decency.

I urge Government Members who, for whatever reason, are supporting this legislation—and I say for whatever reason because I have not seen a shred of evidence that this is good legislation—to reconsider their position. As respectable, hard working, decent parliamentarians I hope that when the third reading vote comes sometime in the future the majority of Members of the House of Commons will vote against the Bill so we can proceed to develop a Bill that will meet the real needs of Canadian society and the refugees coming to our shores.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock.

At 12.59 p.m. the House took recess.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

SENATE INVITED TO PASS BILL C-22

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, Montreal was the site of a meeting to form a coalition representing management, labour, community organizations, the Fédération de l'Âge d'Or du Québec, as well as spokesmen for political circles. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this coalition is to urge the Senate to stop blocking Bill C-22 on drug patents.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with this coalition and urge the senators to say: Enough is enough! We have wasted too much time as it is, we must respect the decision of the elected Members of the House of Commons.

Although I do not fully support the Bill as drafted, Mr. Speaker, I think the joke is getting stale. The coalition of Quebecers wants the senators to show respect for the elected House and pass this Bill at the earliest opportunity.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF PAPERMILL IN MATANE—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, my constituents are hoping that the green light will soon be given to a major project which could put an end to obvious economic stagnation in the region.

The Quebec Government and the Donohue Company, which is planning to locate a papermill in Matane, have already done a lot of work on this project. It is now up to us, politicians, to authorize this regional project at the Cabinet level. The promoters have until now demonstrated their will to help the region, and they would like some assistance from our Government.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues in the Cabinet to this issue, which they will be examining in the near future. I remind them that our Government promised to bring this project forward if the investors did their share.

Mr. Speaker, my constituents have been very patient and they now expect an answer.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SOUTH AFRICA—PLIGHT OF POLITICAL ACTIVIST THERESA RAN ASHAMOLA

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of New Democrats and I hope other Hon. Members of the House, I join in solidarity with thousands of Canadian petitioners as well as members of Socialist International Women from around the world in asking the Canadian Government to intervene to save the life of Theresa Ran Ashamola, a political activist in South Africa.

Theresa, aged 25, is the first black South African woman to be condemned to death as a political prisoner. She along with five others has been sentenced to hang for a politician's killing although she claims she had left the rent protest march before the killing took place. Many witnesses contradicted the prosecution witness who accused her.

Theresa has been subjected to torture and abuse by police since her imprisonment. I ask fellow Members of Parliament to join with me in sending telegrams of protest to the South African Government requesting that Theresa Ran Ashamola's life be saved and her appeal for justice be heard.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR AFRICAN COUNTRIES

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the statement by External Affairs officials that they are considering military assistance to states in southern Africa is almost unbelievable. The quicker they reject this ill-advised scheme, the better.

Canada has no business poking into African powder magazines with a lighted match. Any aid we give to African countries should be humanitarian, not military.

Canadians do not want African blood on their hands. I call upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to reject categorically any military aid, lethal or otherwise, to Africa.

BRITISH COLUMBIA COURT JUDGMENT

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, about ten days ago, the British Columbia Family Court made a ruling which established a serious precedent and totally ignored the basic human rights we now enjoy in Canada.

This case involves a woman with a drug habit who was on the point of delivering her fifth child. She was arrested at a time when the authorities did not know that they were also arresting the child she was bearing. She went through surgery without her written consent. What was at issue was not whether she would be a good mother or would be able to care for her child. The ruling was made on the basis that the rights of child had to prevail against the mother's rights.

I ask the Department of Justice and the Canadian Bar to review this unacceptable ruling which threatens all future mothers in Canada because they could become the property of the state on the basis of a ruling by a judge if people around them object to their behaviour. They could also have to submit to surgery or pre-natal care imposed on them without their consent.

I therefore believe that it is important that the basic rights of women and future mothers no longer be threatened as happened in British Columbia, and I think that it is shameful for such rulings to be made in Canada.

GOVERNMENT ACTIONS TO ASSIST PRAIRIE ECONOMY

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note how the Government dealt with recent concerns of western Canada. With the prairie economy battered by depressed world grain prices, western Canadians spoke of the need for diversification of our economy. The federal Government responded by establishing a Western Diversification Office and injecting $1.2 billion into the economy of western Canada.

When 48,000 railway workers went on strike, the Canadian rail network was completely paralyzed and threatened to strangle the western farm economy. The federal Government acted quickly and legislated the strikers back to work.

Those are just two recent examples of the federal Government's sensitivity to the needs of western Canada. This Government has a commitment to act quickly and responsibly in solving regional problems and concerns. It is clear—when western Canada speaks, the Mulroney Government listens.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

TREATMENT OF EASTERN ONTARIO FARM FAMILY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise the case of an eastern Ontario farm family in financial trouble. The family applied to the Farm Debt Review Board rather than wait for the lender to foreclose. The panel studied the farm's resources and recommended the Farm Credit Corporation write down some of the interest arrears and set aside the mortgage until the family is more financially viable. FCC refused, saying that is like writing down principal, something the Government will not let it do.

Local officials have as much as said the couple makes trouble and they do not want them around. FCC stands to lose about $80,000 as a result of this decision. It calls it cutting its losses. It also refuses to lease the farm back to the family which would allow them to continue in their newly established bull testing business. Why does the Government not give FCC the flexibility it needs to accept the board's recommendations and allow this family to live in dignity and continue to serve their community?

EMPLOYMENT

INCREASED JOB CREATION—NEWSPAPER EDITORIAL

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, I quote from a recent Globe and Mail editorial:

> Between the election of September, 1984 and July, 1987, 865,000 jobs were created in Canada, an average of 25,400 jobs per month. And the pace of job creation is increasing, with 246,000 new jobs in the first half of 1987, an average of 40,000 jobs per month—most of these jobs are fulltime.
> The Conservatives would get all the blame if the economy were lagging, but are reaping little of the credit as Canada leads the industrialized world in economic growth. This is unfair, because federal policies on deregulation, deficit control, privatization, foreign investment, tax reform and free trade are very much part of the environment in which jobs are appearing and incomes are rising.
> Canadians should not take present economic conditions and the policies that support them for granted. A federal government that returned to the high-spending, interventionist and discriminatory policies of the last Liberal regime would quickly depress economic prospects for Canada. The Mulroney government has its faults, but its record on the economy is impressive, and could be more impressive still.
> Not something to be taken lightly; not something to be thrown away.

The press is waking up, Mr. Speaker.

MEDICAL CARE

SHORTAGE OF NURSES ON INDIAN RESERVES IN NORTHERN MANITOBA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member for Churchill, I am deeply concerned about the current lack of adequate health services available to many of my constituents, particularly those who live on remote northern reserves. The chronic shortage of nurses has become a constant threat to the health and well-being of my constituents. It is the inaction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) which threatens these residents' lives.

In northern Manitoba there are at least 13 to 15 vacant positions in remote communities, yet the Minister and his Government are not actively recruiting more nurses. There are no incentives to encourage nurses to move north. Neither is there increased training opportunities for northerners to become registered or degree nurses. In fact, fewer nurses graduate every year. I am aware, however, that the Swampee Cree Tribal Council proposed the creation of a bachelor of nursing program to be established in the North. I fully support that proposal and I urge the Minister to do the same.

Finally, I call upon the Minister to act immediately to alleviate the crisis facing many northern bands, including Oxford House Band and the Churchill Indian Band where there are no nurses or medical services whatsoever.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

IMPORTANCE OF FRANCOPHONE SOLIDARITY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Thank you Mr. Speaker for giving me an opportunity to rise today. I had the privilege last week to witness an historical event of international scale: The second Francophone Summit that was held in Quebec City. As a member of the Canadian delegation, I had the privilege to attend the debates of the heads of state for several hours.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has demonstrated once again the great importance it attaches to the Francophonie and has shown leadership in paving the way for the emerging of a francophone solidarity that is more dialogue and action oriented. Canada is the only country to be a member of the Commonwealth, of the Francophonie and of the group of the seven most industrialized countries, and the latest Summit has served to increase even more its influence at the international level. Also, the success of the Summit was made possible by the close co-operation between the Quebec, New Brunswick and Canadian Governments and this achievement is yet another concrete proof that the national reconciliation that has been promised has indeed become a reality.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that this organization will become even stronger and will serve as a powerful tool to help keeping alive the French language in the forty odd countries where it is spoken and that it will also become an instrument for fostering peace and development throughout the world. May the leadership shown by the Canadian Government be continuously strengthened all over the world.

CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

NATURE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): Mr. Speaker, I rise to denounce the false, partisan, irresponsible and anti-American message the CLC's President, Ms. Shirley Carr, delivered on Labour Day.

In 1984 we received a clear mandate from all the classes of society, including the union members Ms. Carr represents.

Canadians did not vote for the NDP and their socialist, big-brother, anti-American policies Ms. Carr personally supports.

Canadians chose to get out of those corporative, state-planning and state-controlled shackles that generate bankruptcy, unemployment and hardship.

By voting Progressive Conservative, they opted for private entrepreneurship, personal freedom and progress under a responsible administration.

To support free trade is to believe in Canada and its ability to invent, to innovate, to produce and to compete with the best in the world.

To negotiate with the United States is to protect existing jobs, to create hundreds of thousands of new jobs, to provide for tomorrow by preparing Canada's entry into the 21st century.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed the John Quigley affair, a petition signed by 7,000 employees of the Deputy Minister of Immigration who have no confidence in his leadership, a refugee backlog which is out of control, individuals checking up on offices within the Department of Immigration, and the latest allegations concerning special treatment.

Now the Deputy Minister is appointing "champions among his senior bureaucrats in Employment and Immigration to inspire leadership, improve internal communications and reward employees". The Deputy Minister said:

> I have asked Yvon Charlebois to be our Champion of Internal Communication"

He said that Brian Hill, executive director for Manitoba, is "our Champion of Rewards". He said that a "Champion of Leadership" had yet to be acclaimed.

With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, the "Champion of Leadership" must come from the top. There is a vacuum in leadership, integrity and vision in this Department. Canadians have lost confidence and trust in the direction and vision of the Government. It is time for a commission to investigate the Department leaving no stone unturned in order to restore to this Department the confidence, trust and leadership which it enjoyed under previous administrations.

STATISTICS ON UNEMPLOYMENT BETWEEN 1981 AND 1984

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, results of a survey conducted in January, 1986, dealing with work experience in the years preceding the election of this Government—1981 to 1984—and recently released by Statistics Canada, reveal some facts of which I believe all Canadians should be aware.

In the years 1981 to 1984 about 430,000 Canadians became unemployed. Of those who lost their jobs 36 per cent became unemployed due to plant closings or relocation. Manufacturing, construction and mining were the hardest hit. Workers under age 34 suffered the most serious dislocation and older workers had the greatest difficulty in finding new jobs.

Finding new jobs took an average of six months, with earnings in the new jobs being reduced by 7 per cent from the previous ones.

Only 30 per cent of those displaced were able to find employment in the same industry. This transfer in sectors resulted in wages being reduced on average by about 14 per cent.

This study points out that during 1981 to 1984 the cost of overspending and the resultant inflation inflicted very serious casualties among employables in Canada.

This Government can therefore be commended for creating 907,000 jobs since September 4, 1984. That is more than 25,000 jobs per month that are being created by this Government. I say it is to be congratulated.

FORESTRY

BRITISH COLUMBIA'S USE OF PROCEEDS FROM LUMBER EXPORT TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the recently imposed export tax on softwood, the Province of British Columbia is receiving $540,000 every day of the year in windfall new tax. The unfortunate side of this, however, is that while the money was destined to be reinvested in developing the forest resource, it is simply going into general revenue.

I think it is time that the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines (Mr. Merrithew) apply whatever pressure he can to encourage the British Columbia Government to begin reinvesting that money in silviculture, thinning and spacing programs, disease control, pest control, fire control, silviculture research, and research into new markets and new product lines.

Communities such as Prince Rupert, Castlegar, Vanderhoof, Prince George, Dawson Creek, St. John, Kamloops, just to name a few, would benefit from such a program.

In an effort to reduce the unemployment levels in British Columbia by tens of thousands, I encourage the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines to take action with his British Columbia counterpart to ensure that these moneys are reinvested in the forest resource of British Columbia.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APARTHEID IN SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, two years ago the Prime Minister of Canada stated before the United Nations that the Canadian Government was prepared to impose full economic sanctions and break all diplomatic relations with South Africa, as the Prime Minister put it, "—if radical changes are not made in South Africa."

Yesterday the Secretary of state for External Affairs stated, and I use his own words: "We are not making nearly enough progress against apartheid. The situation is getting worse." Those are the words of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Prime Minister tell us what position he will take at the forthcoming Vancouver Commonwealth Conference with respect to South Africa? Will he sever relations with that country and impose Canada's full economic sanctions before the end of the year, unless the Government of that country takes concrete and visible measures to put an end to the apartheid regime?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canada will continue to show firm leadership with respect to South Africa, as it has been the policy for a number of years, more particularly so, I would suggest, in the past three or four years.

In Nassau, Canada showed leadership, in London, and again very recently when the Secretary of State for External Affairs visited South Africa, during recent meetings with Mr. Tambo, and over the last weekend the Secretary and I had meetings with Mr. Howe.

We are trying to do two things: maintain ever more sustained pressure on South Africa and, second, make consequential radical changes in the apartheid system which is so deplorable and unacceptable to all the citizens of this country and of the whole world.

This is a complete program which is being applied in many sectors and which Canada will continue to implement to the benefit of South Africa's black population.

IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know I need not recall to the Prime Minister his words before the session of the United Nations where he received great applause on that occasion. He said: "We are prepared to invoke total sanctions against that country and its repressive regime. If there is no progress in the dismantling of apartheid, our relations with South Africa may have to be severed absolutely".

Yesterday, his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, admitted that the situation has not improved but that it has deteriorated. What the Government is trying to do here is to play both sides of the street on a very fundamental, sensitive human rights issue. Yesterday, I regret to say, the Secretary of State for External Affairs took some cheap partisan shots at anyone who suggested that total sanctions, diplomatic and economic, were not in order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Quite seriously, I ask the Prime Minister is he still speaking for the Government on the issue of South Africa? Does he hold to his commitment made two years ago before the United Nations? Will that be the position he takes at the Commonwealth meeting in Vancouver?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat bizarre to see the Leader of the Opposition accuse the Government of playing both sides of the street on this "sensitive" issue, and then in the same breath accuse the Secretary of State for External Affairs of taking cheap political shots. Surely nothing could discredit the Right Hon. Leader's thesis more than the manner in which he has just set it out. It should be evident to him and to members of his Party that in a number of areas, including this very sensitive area, the leadership provided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is well known here and around the world. I think the right hon. gentleman should be applauding that fact.

With regard to what we are trying to accomplish, it is what the Secretary of State set out yesterday. There has been no change from the position that I set out on behalf of the Government to the United Nations. There has been no wavering in our commitment to attempt to secure the lessening and the ultimate removal of the system of apartheid in South Africa.

We provided a leadership role, to some modest extent, in Nassau and in London. The Secretary of State has just returned from southern Africa. I think it is a comment on the effectiveness of Canada that, within the space of 24 hours, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was able to meet with leaders of the frontline states, leaders of the ANC, and the leadership of the Government in Pretoria, seeking a constructive solution. Everyone acknowledges that a negotiated solution would, of course, be the best.

In the absence of that, and if we are unable to persuade Pretoria of that, Canada shall not hesitate to implement fully the sanctions and the attitudes that I expressed at the United Nations. I think that is an honourable course for Canada to pursue.

FORTHCOMING COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's commitment on behalf of the country before the leading forum of the world, the United Nations, two years ago was that if the situation continued to deteriorate he would lead the country into total economic sanctions against South Africa and a breach of diplomatic relations.

Now, two years later, there seems to be a backing off from that position by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Prime Minister will have an admirable opportunity in Vancouver to exercise the leadership role that his rhetoric seemed to symbolize two years ago. Is that his position now? Is that the position that he will advance in Vancouver in order to give some credence to the words he uttered before the United Nations on behalf of our country two years ago?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my recollection of the statement to the United Nations was that, indeed, in the absence of progress, that relationship "I think may have to be severed". That is still very strongly our position. We have taken just about—and I may be wrong—every conceivable sanction that a western Government can take or has taken. We are interested in applying further sanctions.

Our view is not that sanctions do not work; our view is that if all countries applied sanctions as effectively and vigorously as Canada there would be more movement in South Africa. We would like to take that attitude, together with any other instruments that would be designed to provoke beneficial change in South Africa.

• (1425)

That is the position that the leadership of Canada will attempt to bring about at the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver; most recently at La Francophonie in Quebec City there was a little further progress. Constant efforts and movement by countries such as Canada toward the solution that we all seek, from all corners in this House, will be beneficial to the people of South Africa, particularly those people in South Africa who have been deprived of their most fundamental rights for so long.

GRANTING OF IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the Grossmann affair.

In the House yesterday in response to my question, the Minister of State for Immigration stated:

> There was never any involvement by the Prime Minister's Office in that particular dossier or in any dossier.

However, The Globe and Mail has obtained a letter dated January 16 from the Prime Minister's special assistant to the office of the Minister, and an additional June 3 memorandum from the Deputy Minister's office which states, "that the Prime Minister's Office requests facilitation in getting Mr. Grossmann's family landed status."

I wish to ask the Prime Minister very directly and simply, will he categorically confirm or deny his involvement in the Grossmann file? Does he not think it is high time that he break his silence on this issue, rather than passing notes to his junior Minister?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): For those who were not here yesterday let me make it perfectly clear—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We did not miss much.

Mr. Weiner: There were some who were not here—there was no involvement. Here are the facts. The Member refers to a letter that a special assistant in the Prime Minister's Office sent to my chief of staff which states, "Please find enclosed copy of correspondence—" for my attention. "The family wish to reside here. I thank you for your kind assistance".

If that is the type of representation that is bothering the Member, it is the right of every Member of Parliament to divert pieces of correspondence, as other Members have done, and some 7,000 have been received in my office in the last 13 months.

JUSTIFICATION FOR DECISION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): As a result of government orders, the Ottawa immigration counsellor wrote in her notes, "I thought we were employed by the Treasury Board and not a political Party"—and the Justice Minister laughs.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are a joke. You are a disgrace.

Mr. Marchi: Therefore, I wish to ask the Minister why were there special orders and a ministerial permit issued on behalf of Mr. Grossmann when the gentleman had not even submitted an application form to the Ottawa office, and furthermore had failed to make the appropriate request at a scheduled appointment at our Canadian Embassy in Paris? What possible reasons justify such a flagrant disregard of the process and of our Immigration Act?

An Hon. Member: Resign!

Mr. Marchi: I will put my seat on the line.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): John, there goes another one.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why there has been such a fuss about this case.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rossi: You should know, Gerry.

Mr. Weiner: There are provisions in the Act to apply for immigrant status.

The Leader of the Opposition perhaps remembers the time he called my office and wished some attention.

Mr. Mazankowski: Shame on you, John!

An Hon. Member: Resign!

An Hon. Member: No, don't resign. Stay right there.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the Hon. Minister will answer the question as briefly as possible.

Mr. Weiner: This case is no different from hundreds of others that are handled in a routine manner.

The immigration guidelines are public, and they contain specific instructions for dealing with people like Mr. Grossmann who have good prospects for employment, have established a home, and have raised and educated children here. I wish to quote from the guidelines of instructions to our officers which state:

> Officers may consider sympathetically the situation of long-term employment authorization holders who request processing of their application for permanent residence from within Canada.

I am prepared to table those guidelines, Mr. Speaker.

• (1430)

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns what signal Canada is giving to the black majority in South Africa—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps Hon. Members on the government side and in the ranks of Her Majesty's Official Opposition might wait until the next round when they could carry on their discussions.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—ISSUE OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns what signal Canada is giving to the black majority in South Africa, first relating to violent struggle.

The Prime Minister has said that while we don't condone violence, we can understand why South African blacks sometimes resort to violence when violence sanctioned by the state is used to maintain the apartheid regime.

In late August the Minister told Oliver Tambo, I understand, that the ANC should abandon violent struggle in return for Canadian support.

What is the black majority in South Africa to believe?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have written today to The Globe and Mail with regard to the article which the Hon. Member is citing, pointing out the inaccuracy of the suggestion she has just made that was made in The Globe and Mail with regard to the conversations with Mr. Tambo.

One thing that the black community in South Africa should not believe is the news reports occasionally filed by Mr. Windsor. I regret to say that.

The signal that we are trying to send to them, essentially, is that we expect and will do everything we can to achieve the result that the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver will continue to increase the pressure for change in the apartheid system upon the Government of South Africa.

ROOT OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister not agree with the black majority in South Africa that the real root of violence in South Africa is the apartheid regime itself?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question about that. The Hon. Member would probably be aware of a study recently done by the University of Pretoria which indicated that in a period, I believe beginning in 1985, while it was possible to attribute something between 100 and 200 deaths to the ANC, it was possible in that same period to attribute between 1,000 and 2,000 deaths to the activities of the South African Government.

Not only is violence at the heart and core of apartheid, but violence is also being practised in a deathly fashion by the Government of South Africa.

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same Minister. To make this amply clear, since we do want one message to go to the black majority in South Africa, will the Minister also agree that since the root of the violence is apartheid itself sometimes a resort to violence is absolutely essential in the struggle?

Some Hon. Members: No, no!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made clear and I have made clear that this Government does not and will not condone the use of violence.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We do, however, understand those frustrations and those forces which can cause violence to be resorted to. We understand that violence is at the heart of the apartheid system, and that is why we are determined to do everything we can, while there is still a breath of influence left in Canada, to bring an end to the apartheid system.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of Hon. Members the presence in the gallery today of the Honourable Helmut Schäfer, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs for the Federal Republic of Germany.

IMMIGRATION

GROSSMANN AFFAIR—ALLEGED HUMANITARIAN CONSIDERATIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the Minister of State (Immigration) and ask him the following question. We know that under the Immigration Act, whoever wants to submit an application for landed immigrant status must do so outside Canada. We know also that Mr. Grossmann never submitted an official application while outside Canada. On the basis of some press reports, as well as comments made by the Minister himself, we know that irregularities were committed.

In view of what the Minister replied yesterday when asked about the compassionate or humanitarian grounds which brought about this decision, I should like him to share with the House today and identify what these compassionate and humanitarian grounds were.

Mr. Rossi: Well, he knows the Prime Minister!

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the Hon. Member, I have already tabled the guidelines under which this particular case was considered. Just as a refresher, because obviously the Member should be as completely clear about the facts as I am, from the time that letter was referred to my office in January it took us some four months to act. That is not exactly expeditious treatment, that is not exactly jumping to attention. If that is the kind of favouritism somebody in the Prime Minister's Office asked them to get, that is just normal processing.

I made a decision on May 4—

Mr. Marchi: Jump higher, Gerry.

Mr. Weiner: I was not involved in any technical details beyond that decision, but that was a decision to allow inland processing in this case. That is completely normal. Fifteen thousand Minister's permits are issued. Something like 20 per cent or 25 per cent of all immigrants are landed by that process through Order in Council, and it is completely within the immigration law.

DEMAND FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to find out from the Minister why they went over the heads of officials. Why did they use intimidating measures with the officials? Why were pressures brought to bear from high above to accelerate the processing of the Georges Grossmann file? And why does the Minister refuse to answer the following question: What were the humanitarian considerations which prevailed and weighed heavily in this case?

Mr. Malépart: Why it is Mila and not Brian!

Mr. Rossi: It's the Prime Minister who told him to let the man in.

An Hon. Member: Carlo, listen!

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): What a shameful and deplorable attack! What an issue of petty politics I have ever seen in my life! Things must look pretty good out in the country during this summer—the jobs we have created, the lower interest rates—

Mr. Gauthier: Answer the question or sit down.

Mr. Rossi: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Riis: You are on record, Gerry.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister.

Mr. Weiner: We are running the country so well, as even the editorialists have had to admit, that it must be shaking up the Hon. Members—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

REASONS FOR DECISION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of State for Immigration and concerns the Grossmann immigration scandal.

When the local immigration office made a special provision for Mr. Grossmann to be interviewed in Paris, when he was holidaying in Paris during the summer, he did not even bother to show up for his interview.

Mr. Grossmann applied for some special consideration. The Minister says that he looked into the case and considered that there was indeed an opportunity for him to intervene. Was it because there is a lack of French teachers in the Ottawa area, or just what were the special circumstances which enabled the Minister to make his decision?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, clearly Mr. Grossmann had been here on employment authorization, the first one given by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry—so was the second one and so was the third one—in his capacity as Minister. We had three renewals. Now, it seemed to me that with that kind of long-term stay in the country, with children who had grown up here, a son who is apparently married to a Canadian and could have sponsored him—

Mr. Fulton: Why only "apparently"?

Mr. Weiner: —his prospects were pretty good.

When the case was referred to me, it looked perfectly normal that we should allow an inland processing. I asked my officials to do so through a Minister's permit. There was no further follow-up on the part of myself or my office because I know, once it is asked there is nothing further that has to be asked, and I knew that everything was going well.

• (1440)

INVOLVEMENT OF OFFICIALS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Minister gives the impression that this case is a very straightforward case.

Some Hon. Members: It is.

Mr. Shields: You have finally got it.

Mr. Riis: We have had the Prime Minister's office, the Minister of State's office, the Deputy Minister of Immigration's office, the Executive Director of Immigration's Office, the Deputy Minister's executive assistant's office, the Minister's office and countless other senior officials all intervening in this case. Will the Minister explain why it took all of these people's interventions to process what he says is a very straightforward immigration case?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, every Member in the House has received communication, perhaps he or she has had a letter dropped off, which has been advanced through to my office, as have many other Canadians, journalists, elected people at all levels, academics, businessmen—this is an everyday routine—all knowing that in the Immigration Act the Minister of Employment and Immigration has the authority to act on humanitarian and compassionate conditions.

Mr. Keeper: Name the journalists.

OPPORTUNITY NOT TO TAX FOOD

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Canadian Food Supply Association states that food costs will increase by 12 to 13 per cent if the Government goes along with its option to put an 8 per cent tax on food. Moreover, the Canadian Council of Social Welfare has stated that the present sales tax credit is inadequate, and has clearly shown that a family with a $10,000 income has to pay, as a result of increasing consumer taxes levied by this Tory Government, $353 while only getting a $150 tax credit.

Considering the failure and the inadequacy of the sales tax credit and in view of the position of the Canadian people, will the Minister not believe that it would be advisable to scrap this idea of taxing food?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure where the Hon. Member was yesterday, but I answered part of the same question to his colleague from Trinity. The Hon. Member in the course of his preamble said that the tax credit, the existing refundable sales tax credit, today is insufficient. We agree with that. That is why we have said that there will be a major increase—so it will be in the hundreds of dollars—in the refundable sales tax credit. It will be paid regularly to recipients. It will be paid in advance to recipients.

Those are the key elements of the proposal. These are the things on which we want to consult with members of the general public through the activities of the Finance Committee and that way come up with an appropriate combination of factors which will result in a fairer, more effective sales tax system than we have today.

The Hon. Member, I am sure, is very well aware that the position of his Party, as is the position of the New Democratic Party, is to change the existing sales tax system because the existing system is not equitable.

COMPLETE REIMBURSEMENT OF CONSUMER TAXES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Minister admits the failure of his sales tax credit and all the taxes he has levied, and that he also acknowledges that families with children are penalized. My question is simple. In view of this failure and the acknowledgement he just made before carrying out his proposal and adding an extra tax on food and imposing new taxes, would the Minister be ready to table a motion aimed at refunding completely the consumer taxes levied by his Government since Septembre 4, 1984, and not 50 per cent like he is doing now, since the Minister has admitted that the tax credit is not high enough?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely stunned by the allegations which the Hon. Member has just made. There has been a sales tax in this country for 62 years. A refundable sales tax credit was brought in this past year, in 1986. The previous Government had been around many, many years. The Government which the Member supported for many years had opportunities to bring in a refundable sales tax credit. If the Hon. Member could close his mouth and just listen for a while he might learn something.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I know it is difficult for him to do that because I know he has to be out there making a lot of noise, but let me tell him—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Skeena.

ENERGY

GAS EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—ELIMINATION OF SURPLUS TEST

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Up until May, 1986, there was a 25-year surplus test for gas exports, a policy kept in place while the Hon. Member for Yellowhead was the Prime Minister of Canada. It was dropped a year ago to a 15-year surplus test and, as of today, there is no longer a surplus test.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain why no surplus test is required for this non-renewable resource, or is the removal of the 15-year surplus test part of the free trade deal whereby energy policy will be set in Washington?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's suggestion is absolutely false. The National Energy Board has come down with a ruling. The Government welcomes the new procedure which is fully compatible and co-existent with the market oriented policy that we have established for oil and gas. The procedure clearly has sufficient protective provisions in it for Canadian consumers. When there are any difficulties, the NEB can intervene whenever it finds an increase in exports would impair the ability to serve the Canadian market.

EFFECT OF POLICY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister. Would he explain that part of his market policy? At the present time the Canadian gas industry has twice the export volume permits as it is able to sell and B.C. consumers are paying five cents a gigacoule more for B.C. gas than Americans pay to get the same B.C. gas. Would the Deputy Prime Minister explain to Canadians why on those two counts this deregulation policy, and this policy of no longer having a surplus test, is good for Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I just indicated that the National Energy Board has a feature whereby it can intervene if the market is such that it would impair the Canadian consumer.

I know the New Democratic Party policy is to phase out all exports of natural gas and oil. That is something certainly not consistent with the oil energy policy.

Mr. Riis: What a phoney.

Mr. Mazankowski: As a matter of fact, if the Hon. Member would familiarize himself with the reality in the producing provinces, he would know that this has gone over very well. The ruling is likely to kick off a gas boom. I am sure that is what the Hon. Member would want. Let me quote, "Benefits offset costs from new gas rules". It is good for the consumer. It is good for the producer, and it should be good for everybody in Canada, except the NDP, and we don't mind that at all.

BEAUFORT SEA—UNITED STATES SALE OF OIL AND GAS LEASES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On August 20 the Minerals Management Service of the United States Department of the Interior published a notice of sales of oil and gas leases for certain areas of the Beaufort Sea, part of which is Canadian territory.

On September 3 the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment were asked about this notice of sale and about the oil and gas leases. They didn't know anything about them at that time. Surely the United States Government notified the Canadian Government about this notice of sales of oil and gas leases. When did the United States Government notify the Canadian Government that this notice of sales would be published and that it would be considering bids? What is the Government's response? What response did it give the United States Government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is an old issue which has been discussed in the House before but that does not make it any less important. The situation is, as I think the Hon. Member might know, that any bids that have to do with disputed territory will be put in escrow until the dispute is resolved. That position has been adopted by the Government of the United States as a result of the representations made by myself on behalf of the Government of Canada nearly nine or ten months ago.

With regard to the decision that was taken in August which extends the application of bids to areas in disputed waters and areas not in disputed waters, the same rules apply. Just to make doubly certain of that, I have been in touch again with the United States Government to indicate that we require and expect that bids in disputed waters in this case will go into escrow.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he would not be taking any direct action while environmental hearings were going on and would wait until there was a consideration of bids. I think that point has arrived.

I am concerned that the United States is strengthening its case in this disputed territory. What will Canada do to strengthen its case in this disputed territory, or will this be another blatant giveaway in an attempt to secure a free trade agreement with the United States?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, it will not be any kind of a giveaway. The Hon. Member may not have understood my earlier answer and I am sure that was my fault.

The situation is that there has been and is a policy in place providing that any bids relating to the disputed waters, precisely because they are disputed, will be put in escrow. That does not affect the question of the dispute.

SENIOR CITIZENS

MINISTER'S DISCHARGE OF RESPONSIBILITIES

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, a certain Hon. Member opposite has suggested that the new Ministry for Senior Citizens might have more to do with cutting ribbons than with helping seniors. I would like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs who is the Minister responsible for senior citizens.

Can the Minister assure the House that he will bring to the administration of seniors' affairs the same skill and resolve, consultation, compassion and sensitivity that he has demonstrated in his Veterans Affairs portfolio?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs and Minister of State (Senior Citizens)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon.

Member's question has caused me to do something I have not done in this House in my 37 years here, and that is to blush with modesty. I thank him very much for this very constructive question.

The Hon. Member has always shown a great interest in seniors. Year by year, naturally people like me are more and more pleased to hear of that kind of interest.

I can assure him and all Hon. Members that I will be doing everything possible to encourage seniors and seniors' organizations, including the National Advisory Council on Aging, to let me know what thoughts, suggestions, and ideas they have for improvements in life for seniors, so that these can be given very serious consideration by the Government with a view to bringing in measures of this kind as soon as they can be afforded and are practical.

Our seniors have made this country what it is today, and are continuing to make a very important contribution to our country day by day. That is why they fully deserve our very best efforts on their behalf, and I can assure you that they are damned well going to get them!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure all Hon. Members on the opposition side that I will arrange to give them equal time.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PAYMENT OF TRAINEE STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Post Office. He will be aware that an arbitrator has indicated to Canada Post that it has to pay the people it has been training as strike-breakers union rates rather than the minimum wage. I wonder if the Minister has considered asking the Post Office not only to abandon its policy of using strike-breakers but also to abandon its policy of poverty-level wages? Does he not recognize that a person who works for a public service in Canada has a reasonable expectation of receiving a livable wage?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is the first time I have ever heard it suggested that post office employees were underpaid. This is amazing. I believe the Marchment committee identified post office wages as being 14 to 22 per cent above national industrial averages.

Regarding the specific question about the ruling of the arbitrator, I am informed by the Post Office that it is looking into the decision to see in fact what it means. It is still not clear on what it means and is considering things like whether or not to appeal.

As to the Hon. Member's suggestion that I intervene in the management of the Post Office, I would be in contempt of Parliament if I did that because in 1981, his Party, the Liberal Party, and this Party all agreed that Canada Post should become a Crown corporation and that we should try to avoid political interference of the kind he is now suggesting I engage in.

FRANCHISE POLICY—REQUEST FOR RE-EXAMINATION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister is aware that his own plan calls for franchising which implies the use of people paid a minimum wage. Will he not then recognize that it is his own policy that is driving Canada Post to a poverty-level wage strategy? Will he take the opportunity to re-examine his policy in light of the ruling of the arbitrator and the ruling made by the Canadian Labour Relations Board last week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the corporate plan which was approved by the Government does indeed call for the opening of 6,000 new postal outlets over the next 10 years in order to give customers better service. These outlets will be in shopping centres where people go for their normal commercial activities. There will be parking and they will be open from ten o'clock in the morning to ten o'clock at night. It will be more convenient for the public. Is it the position of the NDP that the public be damned, what we must look after is J. C. Parrot?

CHILDREN

TELEVISION DOCUMENTARY ON RUNAWAYS

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last night thousands of Canadians watched an extremely disturbing television documentary production entitled Runaways which told the story of teenagers who run away from home and live on the streets in cities right across Canada. The social problems that were portrayed in that documentary are obviously national in scope and demand immediate and urgent attention. What will the Minister do about it?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I saw part of that program yesterday. I believe it was a two-hour program and I saw approximately half of it. This is not done very often, but I think we should commend the people who produced that program.

What many of us recognize is that this is a multidisciplinary problem. I am not trying in any way to minimize the difficulties related to missing children. As a Government, we have tried to address some components of the issue. For example, we have named a director for the Child Abuse Centre. There have been family violence initiatives and a missing children registry has been instituted. Special studies are now being done in four cities relating to missing children. I cannot give any more detail about that program because of time constraints. We are dealing with the matters of pornography and drug abuse.

I hope that once and for all, at least in this House, we could put aside the question of whether or not there is a drug problem. I do not care about the numbers, what I care about is that there are kids on the streets who have drug problems and we have to address that. We are trying to do so as best we can, not only as a Government but as a society.

While it is a multidisciplinary approach, we have to be as supportive as we can in our policy to families and parents. From time to time we make mistakes, but these are complex issues and I think support for non-governmental agencies, parents and different levels of government is essential if we can at least prevent some of the tragedies that were displayed yesterday, as well as rehabilitate some of those people.

CANADA POST

POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT NOT TO HIRE STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, during the strike staged by letter carriers in May last, which was the first postal strike since the creation of the Canada Post Corporation in 1981, the Government has allowed Canada Post to hire scabs and to stir up violence in our post offices.

Given that we are facing a possible strike by postal workers, is the Minister prepared to give a commitment today in this House that he will forbid Canada Post to hire scabs in order to avoid the shameful incidents that we have witnessed during the last strike?

• (1500)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just to refresh the memory of both the Hon. Member and the House, the conciliation commissioner dealing with the LCUC dispute, Mr. Swan, commented in his report that the Post Office has a social obligation to try to deliver the mail even in the face of a strike. It attempted to fulfil that obligation and by and large did so through the use of replacement workers, which is perfectly consistent with the law. Is the Hon. Member suggesting we go beyond that?

The instructions to the Post Office are very clear. They must obey the law. They have a social obligation to deliver the mail. If the Hon. Member is suggesting we should perhaps shut down the Post Office in the face of a strike, then let him say that on behalf of his Party.

Perhaps he is suggesting we give the union everything it wants. Let him say that.

Perhaps he is suggesting that we outlaw strikes. Let him take that position. The Hon. Member cannot have the luxury of being critical without looking at the alternatives.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear from that answer that the Minister condones Canada Post hiring scabs. Is the Minister a scab? If not, why does he not order Canada Post not to hire scabs?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I suggest the Hon. Member have a conversation with his colleague, the Hon. Member for Papineau.

Mr. Ouellet: No, no, I never authorized scabs.

Mr. Andre: He stated publicly in an interview that the Government ought not to get itself involved in the operations of the Post Office. We are not getting ourselves involved in the operations of the Post Office.

Mr. Gagliano: Then resign. We do not need a Minister.

Mr. Andre: We require Canada Post, like every other Crown corporation, to obey the law. They have a social obligation to deliver the mail, as pointed out by Commissioner Swan, and they attempted to do that.

I question the wisdom which says if someone threatens violence, that is enough to require you to take actions contrary to what your social obligations dictate.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

TIMING OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. The Bankruptcy Act was introduced in 1949 and has not been changed since. Many Canadians are being burned by this hopelessly outdated piece of legislation. Can the Minister tell the House when we might expect the legislation he is presently working on to be brought forward so we can bring progressive changes to this hopelessly outdated Act?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Hopefully very soon, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member is right. There have been six attempts to amend the Act and all have died on the Order Paper. We are trying to avoid that fate for the proposals we are bringing forward. I will be making a presentation to my cabinet colleagues this month and hopefully there will soon be legislation before the House which will correct most, if not all, of the inadequacies of the current law.

Mr. Speaker: This will be the last question. The Hon. Member for Regina East.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

PRINCIPAL GROUP BANKRUPTCY—CONDUCT OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. He has repeatedly assured this House and thousands of Principal Group investors that a federal investigation of possible misrepresentations by First Investors and Associated Investors would be completed by the end of August. We are well into the second week of September and investors are still waiting to be told if the investigation is completed. Can the Minister now report to the House that the investigation has been completed and, if so, will the Attorney General be laying any charges?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am unable to make that report although I wish I could. I am informed by the Competition Bureau, which has the mandate for this investigation, that they are proceeding with it as extensively and expeditiously as possible. Although they hesitate to put a date on it, they tell me they will soon be making recommendations to the Attorney General.

REQUEST THAT INVESTIGATION BE ACCELERATED

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is aware that his Department has been aware of allegations of misrepresentation as early as July 14. Again I urge the Minister to speed up the investigation, and can he explain why it is taking so long?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Unfortunately, I cannot explain. The Marketing Practices Branch of the Competition Bureau has a relationship with me much like the Solicitor General and the RCMP. It is contrary to law for me to intervene and tell them to proceed in this or that fashion. What I have said is based on information they have given me about their expectations. I have transmitted that to the House, and I will ask them to try to live up to that obligation. I cannot legally lean on them.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would now like to ask the usual question that is put on Thursday. I would ask the spokesmen for the Government to give us a statement of the business the Government expects to present to the House during the coming week.

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, we are making good progress on third reading of Bill C-84. In the event that it passes today, we will proceed tomorrow to Bill C-68, also known as the Bretton Woods Agreements, and thereafter to Bill C-61, proceeds of crime; then to two other justice Bills, C-53, amendments to the Supreme Court Act, and C-58, mutual legal assistance. We will continue with those on Monday, and it is my intention to get together with the other House Leaders to try and arrange the orderly procedure of business for next week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the same point of order, the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton)?

Mr. Fulton: It is a separate point of order. During Question Period the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) incorrectly stated that the policy of the NDP is that we oppose any gas or oil exports from Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Debate.

Mr. Fulton: That is not factually correct.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Orders of the day.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard that Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I understand I am the last speaker to rise in this debate and I do so in solidarity with my colleagues in the NDP. We want to take this opportunity to make a final appeal to the Government to not pass Bill C-84 without amendments. I know at this stage it is impossible to move new amendments, but we want to say once again for the record that we believe a grievous error is being made here. There are many injustices in this Bill which we will all live to regret, including the Conservatives. By and large it brings shame on Canada as a humanitarian nation, one committed to a refugee policy established under UN conventions.

We have all spoken on this Bill many times, as well as on Bill C-55, but I would like to review the main points for the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Thank you. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) has the floor.

Ms. Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

First, Bill C-84 was tabled in an atmosphere of panic. It was apparently drafted in a few days time and presented when the Government had no other order of business. Or, perhaps the Government had other business but did not want to deal with it at that time. The Government focused on the landing of 174 refugees in Nova Scotia.

The Bill not only creates harsh restrictions for refugee claimants, it also eased the way for the Government to try and push through its companion Bill, C-55, which we feel very strongly, along with groups who have considerable expertise in the matter, to be even harsher. We know, of course, that the Government was not able to push this through in June and has been using this so-called emergency session this summer to deal with that Bill as well.

Bill C-84 will provide for a number of things which I would like to summarize quickly. First, a new security certificate system will be required for procuring deportation of certain recent arrivals.

Second, we are very concerned about denying those people the right to apply for refugee status. Many people will not have a chance to be processed to determine whether they are legitimate refugees.

Third, the Bill provides for the turning away of ships from our territorial waters if it is believed that they are bringing undocumented passengers. Although there was a small amendment to this particular clause of the Bill which refers to giving due regard to the UN conventions, by and large this was not changed.

Fourth, the Bill provides for the punishment of anyone helping people to come to Canada without the usual passport and visa. As we have said repeatedly, often the turmoil, fear, and situation of having to leave the country on very short notice means that people cannot obtain the full documentation which is expected. We wanted that clause amended but were refused.

Fifth, the Bill establishes punishment for disembarking passengers at sea. It provides for quite excessive new search and seizure powers and more wire-tapping powers.

Finally, the Bill provides for a sunset clause. The day has come when this Bill will be pushed through by the Government despite all our concerns and those of the public of Canada. Therefore, it is more important for this piece of legislation than perhaps any other that it be carefully monitored. All cases which are processed as a result of this Bill should be carefully documented and there should be an independent evaluation of its effectiveness and the challenge to human rights which we believe will result from this legislation. It is very important that it be evaluated and that a reformed piece of legislation be introduced to correct the errors of this Bill. I predict that a new Government would place that very early on its agenda.

I will not take the time to go into the details of these measures. My colleagues have done that in great detail, particularly the Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) to whom I would like to pay tribute. He has given outstanding leadership and has been the conscience of Parliament in this matter. I commend him for his very hard work on behalf of refugees and Canada. Canadians want to believe that they are doing the right thing and are carrying out the provisions of our Charter which apply to people, whether or not they are Canadian citizens.

We oppose the new security certificates on the ground that the Federal Court lacks the expertise of the new security service in dealing with security matters. We believe it would be better to use a trained police force which is dealing with international security matters than to leave it to the court to decide.

We oppose the denial of access to refugee status because it offends the UN Convention by disregarding danger to life and liberty of a person whose alleged security offence is never thoroughly reviewed and may in fact be based on distorted accusations by his or her persecutors in the country from which the person has fled.

We have concerns about many other areas as well. We moved 12 amendments, not one of which was accepted by the Government. We were making a sincere attempt to make this Bill usable without discriminating against people coming to Canada and without disregarding UN Conventions.

We had some sympathy for the clause dealing with punishment for helping undocumented refugees to come to Canada. We offered amendments to clarify this provision and ensure that only those who tried to evade immigration examination, or organized people to make deliberately false refugee claims were found to be offenders. This was another attempt to be more fair. Of course the Government again refused our amendments.

We oppose the provision of new search and seizure powers because we feel it is a very bad precedent. With regard to the provision for more wire-tapping, we did support two clauses in relation to that, although we do not believe they are adequate to justify the Bill as a whole. That is a summary of Bill C-84 now that we are facing closure and a final vote this afternoon.

I would like to refer to the experience that most of us had in July of this year. Many people phoned our offices with angry reactions. Many angry calls were received in my constituency office in Vancouver East. It was very interesting that many of the callers used the same phrases which the Minister was using. There is a definite relationship there. Callers talked about people jumping queues, used the phrase "illegal aliens" over and over again, and talked about "sending people back on the boat".

I sympathized very much with many of the callers, although certainly not with those who expressed racist views. However, many of the people with whom I spoke expressed the concern that they wanted an immigration policy which would be fair and which would seem to be fair to Canadians and to those waiting to come to Canada. I hope they also meant that it should be fair for people who are in fear for their lives or suffering economic deprivation and are seeking to come to Canada as refugees.

We on this side of the House still believe that it is very important to ensure that procedures are clearly understood by people before they come to Canada. That has not been the case. There is still a perception that people can exploit the system, as they certainly have. The point is that we do not know whether they are genuine refugees until they get here and have had due process of examination. Those who do qualify as refugees can then go through the proper procedures in order to remain here. New Democrats believe that after having had a fair hearing with the opportunity of having counsel and appeal, any person who is not a legitimate refugee should not be allowed to stay permanently in Canada. To be able to do so would certainly be unfair and an abuse of the policy. I repeat that we do not know this unless these people have an opportunity to be examined and have their case reviewed.

Canadians are very proud of our humanitarian tradition. We opened the doors for Hungarian refugees. I had personal experience in working in refugee camps in Vienna and elsewhere in Austria and saw the generosity of Canadians. While perhaps not generous enough to take people who were unhealthy or could not adjust as easily, we took as many as we could.

It is interesting that this summer we are talking about boat people because we opened our doors to boat people in the South Seas. We welcomed as many people from Southeast Asia as possible and sped up the refugee policy at that time. We tried to bring them here and do much of the processing in Canada. We should not forget that Canadians approved of this and welcomed those people.

I hope Canadians feel the same way in this case. Certainly, in my part of Canada along the western coastline many people are coming from Latin American countries. These are people who suffered a great deal of hardship, and I feel particular concern for a number of women with young children who have had a great struggle in coming through the United States.

Much of the outcry from Canadians about this incident is based on media reports and some of the angry statements by the two Ministers, which really made it difficult for people to look rationally at some other requirements that are needed in a fair immigration policy for refugees. We believe very strongly that this incident would not have occurred had the Government proceeded a year ago to reform the refugee processing policy and procedures and implemented the recommendations of Rabbi Plaut and the recommendations of the all-party parliamentary committee that was concerned with improving the refugee processing system.

People would have known that the Government was taking action, and I believe that people outside Canada, including agents who are exploiting people and telling them to distort the truth in some cases, would have been much more reluctant about encouraging people to come here if they knew the refugee determination process would take two or three months rather than two or three years.

Let us consider present public opinion as a result of the debate in the House and in view of the period in which people have been able to consider the details of these Bills. Canadians have been able to read reports in the media from many experts who appeared at the committee. They have also heard many speeches in the House which I hope have raised very legitimate points.

When I was in Vancouver East last week fulfilling appointments in my office I found quite a change in public opinion. I would be interested to know if this has happened with other Members of Parliament, because it seems to me that tempers have cooled down and people are looking at this issue more reasonably. In fact, many people said that we should make sure that we maintain the kind of justice and humanitarian policies that we believe are so important for Canada.

For example, last week churches, many support organizations and individuals in Vancouver held a major protest asking the Government to modify these Bills and provide protection for people coming to Canada. One young man came to my office saying that he and his mother would have been charged under this Bill since they have given accommodation to refugees from Latin America until they could apply officially.

A Portuguese constituent of mine, now a Canadian citizen, expressed concern that the Government was misleading people by making the general public think that refugees are the same as landed immigrants and are jumping ahead of landed immigrants on the list. He is quite right that there are two different waiting lists. I hope people are more aware of this now.

An organization in Vancouver, Casa Latinoamericana, has expressed a particular concern. I want to read some of the highlights from a very urgent notice they published during the summer. They are very concerned about the recent news that death squads are operating out of Los Angeles. They state:

> According to articles publicized in The Globe and Mail, The Province and other sources, people actively involved in denouncing U.S. policy in Central America as well as human rights abuses are under attack by death squads. Such acts of violence include torture, abductions and threats.

Those squads operate the same way as in El Salvador. Therefore, it is suspected that they are not operating on their own but enjoy the support and protection of those individuals who also finance this type of operations in Central America. It also seems evident that LA's death squads members do not fear any reaction on the part of the police department. Finally, these operations might as well be considered as a new psychological approach to crack-down on the flow of Central American refugees to the United States.

In spite of the given situation, refugees seeking safety in Canada might be sent back to an uncertain fate in the U.S.—

That is why we are so worried about Bill C-84 and Bill C-55 which would require some people at our borders to be sent back to the United States. Certainly they could be subject to the death squads.

Casa Latinoamericana urges people to oppose Bill C-55 and Bill C-84 which deprive people of the right to be refugees. They ask that all of us write to the U.S. embassy as well as to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and government officials.

I must repeat that it is with great concern and sadness that as Canadians we have to rush through a Bill that was not carefully considered. I am ashamed that the Government has chosen to ignore the appeals and the expertise of various church representatives, refugee support groups and experienced lawyers in this field who have pointed out the errors and dangers in this legislation.

I am also concerned that the Government has brought in closure without really explaining clearly and honestly some of the procedures and impacts these policies will have on people seeking refuge in Canada.

On behalf of my Party, we regret that the Government has made so little effort to change and improve this Bill.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment on the remarks of my colleague. Let me say how very disappointed I am to see that Bill C-84 will pass through the House. I fully expected that, being recalled for an emergency piece of legislation, we would see genuine debate and consideration by the Government to any objections that might be raised to what is very hastily arranged legislation to deal with an emergency. There has been much comment from learned groups, in newspapers and from leaders from across the country pointing out shortcomings in the legislation which has been put forward. I refer to the denial of counsel, the denial of the right to determination, and the creation of offences for humanitarian work. These are extreme actions on the part of the Government. The turning back of ships at sea in potentially dangerous circumstances is another shortcoming of this legislation. I expected that the Government would have listened to these groups and individuals who wholeheartedly and almost unanimously suggested that this measure is extreme. I thought that the Government would have made some changes to remove these extreme measures.

• (1530)

The Government has taken the position, and we heard the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) on national television the other day repeat it, that the people of Canada wanted action, and we have acted. This is a justification for this action, a justification that could be used for any action that a government might take. It can justify very extreme measures. The people of Canada had better be very wary in asking the Government to take action. We are afraid that it will not be considered action and that it will not listen to reasonable objections to the actions that it proposes.

Those are my comments. I am very disappointed in seeing the Government not listen to the objections to this Bill.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I must say to my colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. Harris), that he said very succinctly and much more skillfully than I what I raised in my remarks. I wish that he had time to make a full speech on this matter. I think that with his expertise in the legal field, as well as his humanitarian instincts in being a New Democrat, the House would have a lot to learn from him. I want to thank him for his comments.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

Mr. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)) moved that Bill C-68, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to move second reading of Bill C-68. The House will know that the purpose of this Bill is to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act in three ways. First, it would provide legislative authority for Canada's participation in the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency. Second, it would provide funds for the purchase of shares in the agency. Third, it would incorporate an amendment to the articles of agreement of the World Bank into the existing legislation.

The principal objective of this Bill is to establish legislative authority for Canada's participation in the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency, also known as MIGA. The convention establishing the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency was negotiated under the auspices of the World Bank and opened for signature on October 11, 1986. MIGA's goal will be to help Third World countries find much needed additional resources to finance their development by tapping the private sector. The agency's mandate will be to promote private investment in developing countries and to help create in these countries a climate conducive to foreign investment.

The agency will provide foreign investors with insurance against non-commercial risks, such as currency transfer risk, expropriation and similar measures, breach of contract, and war and civil disturbance. The agency also has a responsibility to conduct research and disseminate information on investment opportunities in developing member countries as well as to undertake other activities to promote foreign investment.

Foreign private investment will enhance the developmental prospects of host countries through the provision of non-debt-creating transfers of resources as well as a transfer of technology and managerial skills. This Government has emphasized the importance of the private sector to Third World development and the role to be played by non-debt-creating foreign investment. The benefits of MIGA for the developing countries are substantial. Canadians will also benefit from Canada's participation in MIGA. Over time, MIGA is expected to help improve economic conditions in developing countries. Canadians would stand to benefit from improved export opportunities, and there is no question about that, Mr. Speaker. More immediately, Canadian companies investing abroad will be able to compete on an equal footing with companies from other countries that have joined MIGA.

The Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency will complement national and regional programs rather than compete with them. Canada's Export Development Corporation, EDC, already provides insurance and guarantee cover for some non-commercial risks. MIGA is therefore expected to focus on guaranteeing investments from members without a national program, co-guaranteeing with national and regional agencies, providing re-insurance for national and regional agencies, and guaranteeing investment jointly financed by investors from different member countries. The convention establishes MIGA as an autonomous international organization. Although legally separate from the World Bank, the president of the World Bank would be ex officio chairman of the board of directors and would nominate MIGA's president. In addition, MIGA is expected to draw heavily on the services of the World Bank group. This relationship is intended to promote the agency as an international developmental institution and assist it to gain recognition.

Canada is entitled to purchase 2,965 shares in the agency at a total cost of $32,081,300 U.S. Within 90 days of the convention establishing MIGA coming into force, Canada will be required to pay 10 per cent of the above amount in cash, a further 10 per cent in non-negotiable, non-interest bearing demand notes. The remaining 80 per cent is subject to call. Accordingly, Bill C-68 also authorizes the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to pay up to $6,416,260 U.S. for the purchase of the shares allotted to Canada under the convention. These funds would come from Canada's official development assistance program.

The Bill also provides for a minor amendment to the articles of agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which is the main component of the World Bank group. The amendment raises the share of the total voting power required to accept amendments to the institution's articles of agreement from 80 per cent to 85 per cent. This amendment was agreed to by Canada and the other industrialized countries as part of the recent negotiations for the funding of the International Development Association, the arm of the World Bank which provides concessional loans to the poorest countries.

This Bill will help developing countries marshal the resources they need to finance development. It will do this without creating new debt and obligations for these hard-pressed countries and, at the same time, it will provide useful investment opportunities for Canadians. It is a Bill which deserves our strong support.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by congratulating the Hon. Minister on the first speech he has delivered since he has been elevated to the Cabinet.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, today, perhaps more than at any other time since World War II, Canadians are aware that their own well-being is inextricably linked to the economic and political security of other parts of the world. The Bill before us today is a reflection of that recognition and of Canada's involvement in international organizations.

The idea for an international insurance scheme has been around since 1948 but was first given serious study from 1960 onward. In 1973, with the rise of protectionism, discussions were suspended. As well, there were ideological differences between the rich and the poor countries, which interfered with negotiations.

In 1981, the then World Bank President raised the idea again and, at that time, it received general acceptance, particularly among countries suffering under crippling foreign debts. In March 1985, a draft convention on the establishment of the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency was circulated to member Governments of the World Bank. Since then, more than 20 countries have signed the convention, and Canada signed it on April 10, 1986. Parliament is now being asked to ratify the convention.

At this time, at least 15 developing countries have ratified the convention. In order to be established, it is also required that five developed countries sign it. Of the developed countries, only Japan and West Germany have ratified it. In the United States, both the House of Representatives and the Senate have approved the convention, but the Senate added some conditions which have complicated matters. The conditions are designed to protect U.S. employment and production against possible competition from investments covered by this new agency.

The new Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency, which is known by it acronym, MIGA, has two main purposes: to guarantee non-commercial risks and to enhance mutual understanding between host Governments and foreign investors. It is designed to be self-sustaining after the original investment. It will be able to vary its premiums charged to investors in accordance with the actual risks assumed, and only investments which are economically sound are to be insured.

MIGA is not meant to compete with national insurance agencies. Rather, it is meant to supplement and to complement them. In Canada, the Crown-owned Export Development Corporation already insures some types of investments, mainly against commercial risks. Most capital exporting countries have investment insurance schemes of their own, but the coverage they provide is far from adequate. It is estimated that all the national programs combined cover less than 20 per cent of current direct investment flowing to developing countries. Moreover, private coverage is often very expensive and limited to the short term.

If MIGA were successfully established, it has been estimated that by 1990, about $2 billion-worth of MIGA guaranteed projects could be in place, many of which would not have been undertaken otherwise. It would appear at first blush that this agency will fill an obvious gap since developing countries are in great need of funds to finance their investments.

The volume of investments directed to developing countries has been substantially reduced in recent years from more than $17 billion in 1980 to some $10 billion in 1983. Commercial bank loans have plummeted since 1981 and are not expected to regain earlier levels in the foreseeable future. Official aid flows are also stagnating.

Developing countries have traditionally viewed foreign direct investments with mixed feelings, but the world debt crisis made many realize some of the advantages that equity investments have over commercial bank loans. Loans must be regularly serviced by the recipient country regardless of whether or not the money was well invested. Foreign direct investments on the other hand must first produce a net benefit before any payment abroad must be contemplated. However, many countries still continue to see foreign investment as a threat to sovereignty, and this probably explains why some countries have not shown any indication of wanting to join this new organization. Conscious of these problems, those who are organizing the new agency have written into its statutes that it will not conclude any contract or guarantee before the host Government or the recipient country approves the issuance of the guarantee.

In Canada, the Foreign Affairs Committee in the other place released a report last May on the debt problem of developing countries. The position taken on MIGA was somewhat neutral. The committee did not see MIGA as being a major player in solving the Third World debt problem, but it thought that it could be a positive factor in encouraging needed private investment capital into Third World enterprises. As I said, the Senate committee here did not have a specific recommendation on MIGA.

As was said earlier, the mandate of the new agency will be to promote private investment in developing countries and to help create in those countries a climate conducive to foreign investment. The agency will provide foreign investors with insurance against non-commercial risks in developing countries, risks such as currency transfer risks, expropriation, breach of contract and war or civil disturbance. The agency will also carry out other promotional activities. It is hoped that foreign private investment will enhance the developmental prospects of host countries through the provision of non-debt-creating transfers of resources as well as a transfer of technology and managerial skills.

MIGA will be the third affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, generally known as the World Bank. Canada has always supported the activities of the World Bank since its foundation in the 1940s. Canadian staff have rendered distinguished service to the World Bank and its affiliates.

The Bill before us provides for Canadian membership in MIGA, as the Hon. Minister said. It designates the Bank of Canada as the depository in Canada for the holding of Canadian currency and other assets of MIGA. It also provides the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) with authority to provide financial assistance to MIGA for the purpose of purchasing shares.

The immediate question that comes to mind is, why are we looking today at new expenditures which were not in the Estimates? Why are we having a surprise in September? The reason given by officials is that they had no authority to put it in the Estimates before the Bill was brought to Parliament and the convention ratified. That is logical, but it illustrates a continuing problem for parliamentarians in trying to determine the proposed expenditures of the Government and matching them with actual results.

Since the foundation of this new agency has been in the works for many years and the convention was signed by Canada almost a year ago, I think in future it is incumbent upon the Department of Finance to find a way to give Members of Parliament advance notice of proposed disbursements. This can be done by including them in the Estimates as a possible disbursement. The money involved here, as government expenditures go, is not very large, but there is a principle that if Members of Parliament are responsible for the public purse we need solid information and it needs to be timely.

Canada is entitled to purchase 2,965 shares in the agency at a total cost of some $32 million U.S. The customary arrangement is that only a small portion of this is paid immediately. Within 90 days of the convention coming into force, Canada will be required to pay 10 per cent of that amount in cash and a further 10 per cent in non-negotiable, non-interest bearing demand notes. The remaining 80 per cent is subject to call. Therefore, the Bill also authorizes the Minister of Finance to pay up to $6,416,260 for the purchase of shares allotted to Canada under the convention.

As I said earlier, this convention requires ratification by five developed and 15 developing countries whose subscriptions total one-third of MIGA's authorized capital. In a report last July it was said that 15 of the developing countries had already ratified the convention and many others were interested. As I said earlier, the developed countries have been slower to respond.

The broad objectives of MIGA are such that most people in this House would support them. The encouragement of investment flows for productive purposes among developing countries is a mandate which goes past merely being an insurer against political risks. Most countries are interested in having an international agency which will work towards the improvement of investment conditions in member countries through a number of advisory and technical services which go hand in hand with the guarantee operations.

As I said earlier, Canada was one of the founding members of the World Bank and has supported it with both money and personnel over the years. It is therefore logical that we want to be involved in this extension of the bank's activities, particularly at a time when the world economy is not functioning particularly well. Over the past decade, even the richest countries have had to face unemployment, stagnant rates of economic growth, and spiralling inflation. However, the weaker countries have suffered far more. We have seen developing countries crushed under debt, partly because of the rapid increases in energy prices, and partly because of attempts to service a load of international debt. Recently we have seen some major banks write off some of that debt in an effort to assist the developing countries to get a little above water.

I hope this measure before us, by encouraging investment and the development of technological advice and assistance to less developed countries, will continue the aid to those countries. This is something in which we all have an interest, not only for humanitarian reasons but also for reasons of self-interest. It is in the interests of all of us that other human beings in other countries have the same rights to education, to a level of prosperity, and to developing their own goals and aims that we do. The more prosperous the developing countries are, the more markets we have for our products and the more we are able to look forward to alliances with strong functioning partners.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have this opportunity to say something about Bill C-68. I want to join with my friend, the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), in congratulating the new Minister of State for the Treasury Board (Mr. Lewis) on his first speech in that capacity. I look forward to hearing many more speeches, particularly of this nature, when we are adding something positive to the Government's program. Let us hope that it is a harbinger of good things to come.

I do not know if you remember back in 1948 when this whole discussion began. It was then that the idea of an international insurance scheme was first suggested. In the 1960s, serious study was given to the concept of encouraging international investment, particularly in the developing countries. The idea was then shelved in 1972 by and large because of lack of interest by the various member states. Perhaps the real reason was the profound ideological differences between the northern countries and the southern countries, the well-to-do and the lesser developed. Those ideological differences really set this whole concept of an international commercial insurance scheme on the back burner for a number of years. In 1981, the then World Bank President, Mr. Clausen, raised the idea again and found relative acceptance.

I think it has been a surprise to most of us to see the relative haste with which various countries got on board and said that now is the time. I have asked myself what on earth led to this enthusiastic response after so many years of receiving little support. I think it may have to do with the growing international debt which causes extreme economic hardship in the developing countries and has caused us some concern as well. It affects international financial institutions and, more specifically, Canadian banks which have become very seriously exposed as a result of many loans to the developing countries which were unsecured.

Although I am not sure it is all that altruistic, we have decided to come on board. In April of last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) indicated that Canada was willing to participate in the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency. The Minister of Finance agreed at that time that Canada would be a participant, which would require legislation passed by the House of Commons. We are aiming at an October 30 deadline and it looks as though we are pretty well on target.

The purpose of Bill C-68 is to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act to provide the authority for Canada's membership in the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency with a target date of October 30, 1987. If the legislation is approved the Minister of Finance will be allowed to purchase shares under the convention for up to $6,416,260 U.S. It will also amend Section 6 of the Bretton Woods Act, the articles of agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. That is a very important amendment for obvious reasons which do not necessarily require elaboration at this point.

The Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency will provide foreign investors with insurance against non-commercial risk in developing countries such as currency transfer risk, expropriation, breach of contract, war and civil disturbances. It will also carry out other promotional activities to facilitate investment in many of these developing countries. The agency will also supplement Canada's Export Development Corporation which already provides insurance and guarantee cover for non-commercial risks. It will be able to give guarantees in countries the EDC will presently not cover.

Many people have been asking why Canada needs to participate in this international agency when we have the Export Development Corporation doing, in a sense, the same work. There are some areas of the world in which the EDC is very reluctant to operate and some areas in which it simply refuses to offer insurance because of the high risk nature of those areas. If Canadian investors are interested in participating in those countries they will now be able to have the appropriate insurance.

New Democrats support this initiative. Canada's participation in this proposal of the World Bank to guarantee activity in developing countries is not costly to the Canadian taxpayer and we believe could be of some assistance, albeit small, in encouraging investment activity by less developed countries.

In real cash terms, our investment will be only a little more than $3 million U.S., with a total commitment of $30 million U.S. To make a comparison, that is a small percentage of what it would cost to construct a new prison. As this would be a step in the right direction in terms of facilitating Canadian investors, developers and enterprises to participate in third world development, I think it would be $3 million well invested by the federal Government.

Canada's EDC already has extensive coverage for investment in developing countries. Therefore, we do not expect to see a very large change in Canadian investment patterns as a result of MIGA's activities.

I think all Members of Parliament have been involved in a variety of activities of Canadians overseas. Canadians in many developing countries have taken advantage of what the EDC has to offer. Therefore, I do not think we can expect a major shift in investment or a major increase in economic activities by Canadians overseas as a result of this initiative. However, we believe it is a step in the right direction and an appropriate initiative to be taken at this time to widen insurance coverage and to widen the promotional and development support which the EDC provides in some countries. We will now be able to have the same support in other countries.

The benefit of MIGA derives not so much from what it will do directly for Canadians and Canadian companies in their foreign investments; it is more important in that it is an international organization and Canada is able to confirm its long-standing commitment to participate and encourage participation in world organizations. We will, at relatively small cost, be encouraging further much needed collaboration on this front by countries working together to assist those countries which find themselves in dire economic straits.

MIGA will also encourage attention to the role of foreign investment in developing countries. We have argued that this ought to have been examined in detail for many years. It would be naive to assume that all foreign investment is automatically good. That is not the case. We have seen too many of our investment programs and, I am sad to say, some of our international assistance from government and in some cases non- governmental organizations not result in the best interest of some people in some countries.

We hope that this international agency will encourage the Government and the people of Canada to focus more attention than ever on the role of foreign investment in developing countries. Steps ought to be taken to ensure that investment which takes place is done, not only in our best interest, but in the best interest of the people in those countries.

To the extent that MIGA will allow investment by one less developed country in another, it will improve south-to-south trade and enhance trade flow within the lesser developed countries. We believe that this is an important initiative. When we look at economic development in the lesser developed countries we assume that there is only a one-way flow that is of any benefit to the developing countries. Such is not the case, and anything we can do to facilitate international trade between the lesser developed countries will be of benefit to them in improving their economic infrastructure. For that reason as well we support this initiative.

The agreement requires that at least five developed countries and 15 developing countries participate. To date, 15 developing countries have ratified the convention. Japan and Germany have now ratified the convention, and the Netherlands and, of course, Canada, are well on the way to doing the same. I notice with interest that when President Reagan tabled his budget it included moneys for MIGA. That is an important initiative for the American administration and Congress to take. I only hope it is not stalled in the Senate.

However, at the moment, while the Senate has attached some amendments to the Bill for ratification and the House did not, I think there is still hope that they will come up with something consistent with the MIGA Convention. It looks encouraging that by the October 30 deadline, five developed countries and 15 developing countries will have placed their signatures to the convention.

It is important that in passing this Bill we do not construe this initiative as a replacement for real economic aid to these developing countries. While MIGA may be of some assistance to the economy of the developing world by providing insurance for investors, we must be careful not to mistake this kind of activity for aid.

I sense a rather enthusiastic response by members of the Government in particular in that they believe this will be a major aid initiative. In fact, it is not an aid initiative but an economic, business initiative. To the extent that it will help the developing country economically in terms of job-creation and tax and financial flows within that country, we support it. However, let us not ever consider that this ought to be termed any sort of real Canadian aid for the developing countries.

We agree that aid must not be tied to domestic export development. What developing countries need most is commitment from countries like Canada to long-term infrastructural development assistance of the kind that will allow a broad based and self-sustainable economic and social development in the recipient countries.

We have learned in the last while that many of our traditional aid projects have often provided a hindrance to economic and social development in developing countries. Now we can make our greatest contribution by assisting in the development of a sophisticated economic and social infrastructure.

I was pleased to see our community college in Kamloops, one of the communities I represent, accepting a number of international students to study there for the first time. They bring with them not only a renewed and increased cultural awareness for Canadians, but also they create the much needed links between ourselves and other countries, including developing countries. It is in this area that Canada can and has been using its expertise in technological development and instruction to make a real contribution both through official government aid and through the NGOs.

I believe we all have to share some disappointment about the fact that Canada's percentage of Gross National Product devoted to development has been slipping in recent years. While we find this disturbing at a time when it is essential that Canada display its commitment to long-term development, let us hope that this downward slide will be reversed and we will see a renewed commitment to Canada placing aside sums of money toward real development aid so that our aid as a percentage of our GNP will reach the target set by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) three years ago. I do not have to remind the House that the Prime Minister was quite specific as to what he believed that target ought to be in terms of government aid to assist less developed countries than ours. I only hope that by the end of his administration we will have reached that target.

In conclusion, I look forward to this Bill going to a legislative committee where we can study it in detail and ensure that it will be effective. As I indicated earlier, I noticed that the American Senate has looked at the convention and decided in its wisdom that improvements could be made in terms of the American commitment. I think it behooves us to follow that initiative, and to consider this carefully in the legislative committee to see if it cannot be made more effective in facilitating Canadian investment in developing countries.

I want to ensure that the legislative committee calls witnesses such as the Canadian Exporters Association, which has strong views on this legislation. We would also like to hear from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which obviously has a direct interest, in some cases even a vested interest, in the final outcome of this legislation. Of course, we want to hear from the Canadian International Development Agency and other outside experts on developing countries.

It is a pleasure to participate in a debate of this kind, to see the Government put its signature to this Convention and follow up with this initiative in Bill C-68. We look forward to completing discussion and debate at the legislative committee stage as well as at third reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C-68, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act. Last June 17, when the Minister of State tabled in the House of Commons a Bill to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements, he gave us to understand that this legislative measure would be called for debate in the fall, and I have to say he has kept his word. Here we are today debating this important Bill, and although I do not think it is a contentious issue it does require a minumum of debate, long enough to explain the purpose of the Bill, which is to secure the ratification of Canada and its participation in the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency, MIGA for short.

MIGA's mandate will be to promote private investment in developing countries and help create in these countries a climate likely to attract foreign capital. MIGA will provide foreign investors with insurance against non-commercial risks in developing countries. Currency transfer, expropriation, breach of contract, war and civil disturbance are some examples of non-commercial risks. MIGA will also have other promotion activities. Foreign private investment will contribute to enhance the development prospects of host countries through the transfer of non-debt-generating resources, technology, and sound management.

The Canadian Export Development Corporation, the EDC, already provides major insurance coverage and guarantees against non-commercial risks. The Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency (MIGA) will be in a position to increase and complete that coverage for possible Canadian investors. For instance, MIGA could cover investments in countries that are not insured by the EDC.

MIGA will be the third affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The two other affiliates are the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation. Since MIGA is an affiliate of the World Bank, this Bill implements the agreement establishing MIGA by amending the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act. That Act deals with Canada's participation in the institutions set up under the Bretton Woods Agreements, namely the International Monetary Fund and the three World Bank institutions, IBRD, IDA and IFC.

Bill C-68 provides for Canada's participation in MIGA, first by adding MIGA's name to the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act's full title; second, by including MIGA in the Act's preamble, Section 2; third, by adding the Convention establishing the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency in the Fifth Schedule, Articles 3 and 7; four, by instituting the Bank of Canada as the depository in Canada for the holdings of Canadian currency and other assets of MIGA, section 4; finally, by granting to the Minister of Finance authority to extend financial assistance to MIGA for the subscription of shares.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is authorized to purchase 2,965 shares of the Agency, for a total $32,081,300 U.S. Within 90 days from the date on which the Convention establishing the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency, Canada shall pay in cash 10 per cent of said amount, and an additional 10 per cent in the form of non-negotiable, non-interest bearing notes. The remaining 80 per cent shall be subject to call by the Agency when required. Similarly, Bill C-68 grants the Minister of Finance authority to subscribe shares allotted to Canada under the Convention for a total cost of $6,416,260 U.S.

The Convention establishing MIGA was presented for signature in October, 1985. Canada signed it in April, 1986. It should come into force before October 11, 1987. Therefore Canada must have ratified the Convention by then in order to attend MIGA's first meetings, which will deal with the drafting of regulations.

Bill C-68 also includes a minor amendment to the IBRD's articles included in the Second Schedule to the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act. That amendment raises from 80 to 85 per cent the percentage of votes needed to carry an amendment to the IBRD's articles. Canada and the other industrialized nations have agreed to that amendment during the negotiations on the eighth replenishment of the resources of the International Development Association, a World Bank agency that, as we know, extends loans under favourable terms.

The clauses of the Bill dealing with MIGA will come into force at the same time as the agency itself. The amendment to the schedule including IBRD's articles would come into force at a date set down by proclamation.

If I may give some background, Mr. Speaker, the idea for an international insurance scheme has been around since 1948, but was first given serious study from 1960 on. In 1973, discussions were suspended because of a lack of interest from member countries and ideological differences in the rich and developing countries. In 1981, then World Bank President A.W. Clausen raised the idea again, and at that time, it received general acceptance, particularly among countries suffering under crippling debts. In March 1985, member countries received a draft convention on the establishment of the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency. On October 11, 1985, after an animated debate, the Governors of the World Bank agreed to the existing convention and invited the participant countries to sign it. More than 20 countries have already signed the Convention, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance, the Hon. Michael Wilson, signed it himself on behalf of the Canadian Government on April 10, 1986. Parliament is now being asked to ratify the Convention, which will come into effect when it has been ratified by at least five developed countries and 15 developing countries on the understanding that these countries will provide at least one-third of the capital authorized by MIGA.

At this time, at least 15 developing countries have ratified the Convention. Of the developed countries, only Japan and West Germany have ratified it. In the United States, both the House of Representatives and the Senate have approved the Convention, which is now being considered by a joint committee of Congress. In contrast with the version adopted by the House of Representatives in the United States, the Senate Bill sets various conditions to ratification by the United States, which are designed mostly to protect U.S. employment and production against possible competition from investments covered by MIGA.

MIGA has two main purposes: To guarantee non-commercial risks and to enhance mutual understanding between host Governments and foreign investors. It is designed to be self-sustaining. It will have to operate in accordance with the principles of sound commercial practice and sensible financial management. It will be able to vary its premiums charged to investors in accordance with the actual risks assumed, and only investments which are economically sound are to be ensured. MIGA is not meant to compete with national insurance agencies. Rather it is meant to supplement and to complement them.

In Canada, the Crown-owned Export Development Corporation already insures some types of investments, mainly against commercial risks.

Most capital exporting countries have investment insurance schemes of their own—either public or private—but the coverage they provide is far from adequate. It is estimated that all the national programs combined cover less than 20 per cent of current direct investment flowing to developing countries. Moreover, private coverage is often very expensive and limited to the short term. If MIGA were successfully established, it has been estimated that by 1990, about $2 billion-worth of MIGA guaranteed projects could be in place, many of which would not have been undertaken otherwise.

It would appear that MIGA will fill an obvious gap since developing countries are in great need of funds to finance their investments. The volume of investments directed to developing countries has been substantially reduced in recent years from more than $17 billion in 1981 to some $10 billion in 1983 according to conservative estimates. Commercial bank loans have plummeted since 1981 and are not expected to regain earlier levels in the foreseeable future. Official aid flows are also stagnating.

Developing countries have traditionally viewed foreign direct investments with mixed feelings but the world debt crisis made many realize some of the advantages that equity investments have over commercial bank loans. Loans must be regularly serviced by the recipient country regardless of whether the money was well invested or not or whether mistakes were made or not. Foreign direct investments on the other hand must first produce a net benefit before any payment abroad must be comtemplated. However, many countries still continue to see foreign investment as a threat to sovereignty and this probably explains why some countries such as India and some Latin American countries have not shown any indication of wanting to join this new organization. Conscious of these problems, those who are organizing the new agency have written into its statutes that it will not conclude any contract or guarantee before the host Government or the recipient country approves the issuance of the garantee.

Mr. Speaker, the Foreign Affairs Committee in the other place released a report on May 13, 1987 on the debt problem of developing countries. The committee did not see MIGA as being a major player in solving the Third World debt problem but it thought that it could be a positive factor in encouraging needed private investment capital into Third World enterprises. The Senate committee here did not have a specific recommendation on MIGA.

Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to have this opportunity to comment briefly on Bill C-68. I hope that in the coming days the House will adopt this measure which I think is serious, a legislative measure which we feel is altogether acceptable and which will be of great help to all these developing countries. Canada will contribute to development loans which will be generously guaranteed so that these countries may get their fair share of international trade, develop their local economies, and create the jobs they so badly need.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

ADVISABILITY OF SIGNING PROTOCOL TO CONTADORA TREATY

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of signing the protocol to the draft Contadora Treaty and thus become an active member of the Contadora Support Group.

● (1700)

She said: Mr. Speaker, no region of the world and no foreign policy issue is of more concern to Canadians than the continuing and tragic conflict in Central America.

As a member of the External Affairs and International Trade Committee of the House, and last year as a member of the special joint committee of the House and Senate studying Canada's international relations, I have been repeatedly impressed by the well articulated and deep concern of thousands of Canadians about Central America. It was Central America that was the issue for which we received the largest number of briefs and presentations at the meetings of the special joint committee.

There is no question about the concern of vast numbers of Canadians. When speaking in the House a week or so ago, my colleague, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), outlined in great detail the expressions of concern of Canadians and how they were taking real form. He said, "Thousands have been involved for years in the struggle for a just and lasting peace in Central America. They have donated their time, energy, money, and sometimes risked their lives to help Central Americans. There is a Canadian people-to-people peace initiative".

At the present time there is a mission for peace in Nicaragua. This mission for peace is sponsored by Oxfam and the Canadian churches. I am sorry to say that although both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party sent Members of Parliament on this fact-finding mission for peace, for some reason that I do not understand, the Conservatives refused an invitation to have one of their Members go on this mission for peace this week. According to a newspaper story, apparently the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) refused the invitation to send any Tories with opposition MPs and church groups on the mission for peace to Nicaragua.

As we were recently reminded by the excellent documentary on the CBC television current affairs program The Journal, since 1978, 200,000 people have died as a result of the political violence in Guatemala, El Salvador and Nicaragua. Domestic injustice, poverty, oppression, and in some cases state terrorism and violence between states, continue to threaten to escalate further.

In the past, there has been a complete absence of peaceful solutions to the critical problems of the region. The possibilities of escalating military conflict, the absence of peaceful conflict resolution, and the escalating foreign military intervention, primarily from the United States in the form of military support for the Contras, led to an initiative by Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama.

This initiative sought the creation of a process for conflict resolution and the creation of a peace treaty among the five Central American republics. The initiative was named after the Panamanian island, Contadora, where the Ministers from Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama initially met. The Contadora initiative provided much needed diplomatic impetus in the region. These efforts resulted in a draft peace treaty, which, I remind the House, met with full Nicaraguan support and the initial support of the other republics. However, the support of Honduras and El Salvador cooled under pressure from Washington.

The Contadora Peace Treaty calls for the reduction and eventual elimination of all foreign military advisers and bases in Central America; a freeze, and then reduction of the level of arms and armed forces in the region; the elimination of arms traffic; and the establishment of verification and control measures with international supervision.

All major Latin American countries quickly formally endorsed the treaty, as did Sweden and France, and formed themselves into the Contadora support group, or the Lima support group, as it is sometimes called.

I, and others in my Party, have repeatedly called on the Government of Canada to endorse the Contadora Treaty and lend Canada's diplomatic weight and concrete efforts to peace in Central America. My Party called for such efforts in great detail at its convention in Ottawa in 1985. In 1985, I also called on the Government to support the plea of the Contadora support group for the resumption of bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua.

We have repeatedly urged that Canada actively discourage the United States from its military and financial aid to the Contras. I am sorry to say that we have met with little success. Apparently the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) does raise the issue with the Secretary of State for the United States at their frequent meetings, but the Secretary of State for External Affairs is told that that is simply not an item on the agenda, and the Americans do not wish to listen to what he has to say on that subject.

At an important meeting held recently in southern California, I received copies of all the press coverage on the public part of the meetings. Unfortunately, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said nothing publicly about what he has privately said he opposes vehemently, namely, U.S. administration military support for the Contras who are fighting to overthrow the democratically elected Government of Nicaragua.

When this motion was originally presented in October, 1986, there was widespread Canadian and international concern about war and peace in Central America, and in particular on the survival of Contadora. Since that time we have seen the creation of the Arias Peace Plan drawn from Contadora, and the acceptance of the plan by the five Central American Presidents in Guatemala last month. The Contadora support group has since endorsed the plan, and moves have begun to implement parts of it. I remind the House of the agreement to talks that have now taken place between the Government and Opposition in El Salavador, and I remind the House of the Nicaraguans setting up a commission of national reconciliation in Nicaragua, and other activities that have taken place.

The Canadian Government has declared its support for the Arias Peace Plan, and has long been on record as supporting, in theory at least, the Contadora peace process. In one specific area, Canada has offered verification and other advice in this peace effort.

Now it is even more timely, urgent, and useful for the Government to record its support for the original Contadora Treaty, and to join with the Contadora support group in its endorsement of the Arias Peace Plan. A clear message from the Government that Canada will sign the Contadora Treaty protocol, and join in an active way with the Contadora support group would be consistent with government policy and activities to date, and would be consistent with the general position of all three Parties. It would be an important response to widespread interest and concern of Canadians in Central America, as I have already mentioned. It would send a clear, important, and positive signal to our sister nations in the hemisphere that Canada and Canadians are deeply committed to the urgent task of creating peace in Central America. It would support Canada's development assistance efforts and refugee concerns in the region.

This would be an important expression of the will and interest of Canada, and an important reaffirmation of the commitment of Canadians to peace and conflict resolution.

On August 17, I noted in the House that External Affairs officials were going to Central America. Indeed, I asked the Minister at that time whether this was not a fairly good indication of our need for a more permanent and stronger diplomatic presence in Central America, the fact that we had to send officials down there to see what the different countries were doing in connection with the Arias Peace Plan. Once again I urged the Minister to strengthen Canada's diplomatic presence in the region and called specifically for the long overdue opening of an embassy in Managua.

Mr. Prud'homme: I agree with you.

Ms. Jewett: I regret that once again the Minister rejected the suggestion. I am delighted that the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) agrees, because he once objected to it, too.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. Doctor of Political Science is just teasing me. I am clearly on record in that regard; I have always supported the idea.

I know she is just teasing, but in a few years from now those who read her speech will think that I opposed it. I never opposed it, and she knows that I did not.

Ms. Jewett: Canada must do more for peace than just rhetoric, the kind of rhetoric we have just heard. Canada must be seen as willing to do more, and I agree with the Minister that Canada has the capacity to do more. I continue to call upon him and the Government to use that capacity.

I call upon them to sign the protocol to the Contadora Treaty; to offer technical, financial and diplomatic help to the Central American Republics in meeting the requirements of the Arias Peace Plan in respect of amnesties, refugees, civil rights and press freedom, the conduct of elections, negotiations, arms control, and reduction verification; to urge the United States and Nicaragua to resume their essential bilateral talks, including offering Canada as a site for such talks; and to offer to increase direct economic assistance to the region, especially to Nicaragua, because of the vast foreign interference in that country, the U.S. economic blockade, the destabilizing and bankrupting of the economy, recognizing that a collapsing Nicaraguan economy and heightened security concerns will impede any peace settlement.

In conclusion, Canadians expect—and Central America desperately needs it—some greater Canadian diplomatic and political initiative. One initiative mentioned by the Hon. Member for Spadina was that we should take a leading role in rallying international support through the United Nations and in organizing a multilateral support group and peace fund in support of the peace accord verification process. On September 1 in the House my colleague said that such steps would help to sustain the Central American peace accord against attacks from the Reagan administration.

We want to help build and secure peace in our hemisphere. As I mentioned, Canadians do a great deal as individuals. Just the other day in Vancouver I visited a group of fishermen, longshoremen, carpenters, and other workers who in their spare time—perhaps it is a couple of hours a day; in some cases it is only a couple of hours a week—are building a great fishing boat for a village in Nicaragua. The villagers are expecting it. They do not have any boats now except ones which have long since ceased to be useful or practical. They still need money for the engine, and we are hoping to be able to raise it. However, we have that strong feeling of Canadians wanting to give help.

The Government can respond more. Signing the protocol to the Contadora Treaty would be an illuminating expression of the Government's concern for the building and securing of peace in our hemisphere.

Finally, Canada's resources and strong traditions enable and indeed require us to play such a role.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to bring the House up to date on progress accomplished in the peace process in Central America. I am all the more pleased that "progress" is the right word, if recent events are taken into account. As Hon. Members would know, the presidents of the five Central American countries recently agreed on a new peace plan for the region, supported by the other major interested countries, particularly the United States, Cuba and the Soviet Union. This is an extremely positive development.

Still I would not want to create the impression that this plan will solve all the problems of the region. In recent years the negotiations sponsored by the countries of the Contadora Group—Mexico, Panama, Columbia and Venezuela—raised expectations which too often turned into disillusions. Of course this does not take anything away from the efforts of the countries of the Contadora Group which, despite huge obstacles, displayed resolution and determination.

It seems to us that the worst of these obstacles is the existence of serious socio-economic disparities. Guerillas in Salvador, Nicaragua and Guatemala also stand in the way of a peaceful settlement. Finally, and this may be the key factor, the influence fight between the two superpowers tends to make regional conflicts even worse. Canada sincerely hopes that the good will shown by all parties in recent weeks will lead to an honest effort to overcome the obstacles.

Canada has a clear policy as concerns the situation in Central America. In his speech last year before the Inter-American Press Association, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) described the Contadora initiative as the best tool for reconciliation in Central America. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) has also expressed in public statements both in Canada and abroad the firm support of Canada for the Contadora process. Mr. Clark re-affirmed his position during his visits to Argentina, Uruguay and Venezuela in 1986. In January 1987, in a message addressed to the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Contadora Group and the Lima Support Group, as well as the Secretaries General of the United Nations and the Organization of American States on the occasion of their mission to the countries of Central America, Mr. Clark stated that the efforts of the Contadora Group have sustained the hope of the international community to see a lasting solution to the crisis in Central America. Moreover, in 1986, the Canadian delegation to the General Asembly of the United Nations made a statement in support of the Contadora Group.

Canada has also provided constructive and practical support to the Contadora Group and the peace process in general. During his visit to Mexico in 1985, Mr. Clark had an opportunity to discuss the situation in Central America and the Contadora Group plan with President de la Madrid and his Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Sepulveda. He emphasized the firm support of Canada to the Contadora initiative and its desire to play in due time a constructive role in the peace process. Mr. Clark stated that Canada is willing to share its peace-keeping operations experience with the parties involved. Since then, the Canadian Government has written at the request of the Contadora Group countries a series of comments on the provisions of the draft act on security and follow-up.

These comments are based on a number of considerations, such as the need to impart to our observations a neutral, objective and impartial character.

We also were aware of the need to ensure the viability of any verification and follow-up commission that could be established under the Contadora Act. More specifically, we thought that the funding for such an operation should be closely examined by all the parties involved for the selected mechanisms to be as efficient as possible in the circumstances.

We believe that the concept of a regional solution to that problem needs to be emphasized. In that respect, we feel that the Central American parties themselves should be involved as much as possible in the peacekeeping mechanisms, inasmuch as such involvement contributes to the efficient operation of a verification and follow-up commission. The commission should have specific and firm guarantees as to its freedom to travel within the area, and should also enjoy unimpaired communications with the media. Finally, we believe that a political authority should of necessity be appointed to sponsor the commission, whose mandate would be for a specific period.

The Government feels that the principles stated two years ago for the follow-up and verification are still relevant and should be applied to the present peace plan.

On August 7, at the end of the historic Guatemala Summit, the Central American nations' Presidents announced the conclusion of an agreement on a new peace plan for the area. The plan provides that the Ministers of Foreign Affairs will meet within fifteen days after the agreement is signed, to initiate the implementation of provisions dealing with an amnesty for the insurgents, a cease-fire, a dialogue with the unarmed opposition groups, which should come to an end after ninety days, that is November 7. The Contadora Group countries among others will be called upon to set up a verification and follow-up commission that will be responsible for monitoring the level of forces in place.

Mr. Speaker, the same day it was signed, we welcomed that Agreement which was supported by Mr. Clark. Later on, two envoys sent by Mr. Clark went to the area to express Canada's support and to offer technical advice on the development of the peace-keeping mechanisms. Countries in the area welcomed the envoys and Canada's offer.

Other facts provide hope. As I said, under the Agreement, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs were to meet within fifteen days. That meeting took place on August 19 and 20, in San Salvador. Later, on August 22 and 23, in Caracas, the Ministers met their counterparts from the Contadora Group and the Lima Support Group, as well as representatives from the United Nations and the OAS, and agreed to set up a verification commission. Not being part of the area, Canada is not a member of the commission. However, we informed all the governments involved that we were willing if need be to provide the commission with technical advice.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we may safely conclude that real progress has been made. However, we should avoid deceiving ourselves. Guerilla warfare continues, as well as competition between the superpowers. The problem of poverty remains and is compounded by the massive influx of refugees fleeing the conflicts. Human rights, civil liberties and democratic institutions are still trampled in certain parts of the area. The latest events are a positive, albeit hesitating step in the right direction. The Canadian Government will continue to encourage and support Central America and Contadora Group countries and extend any technical advice they will deem useful.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments of both of my colleagues. I must say that I and others in this House undoubtedly have been heartened and encouraged by the positive developments that one sees emerging from the Guatemala peace plan of August 7. However, I must say that I am not quite as sanguine as the spokesman for the Government with respect to the evolution of the plan as it is designed. I say that largely because of my concerns with the continuing policy of our good neighbour to the south, the United States. Only today Mr. Shultz has testified that the Government wishes to increase its funding to the Contras by $270 million over the forthcoming 18 month period, which is an escalation over the amount of $100 million, the timetable for which expires on September 30. In fact, as I read the press report as it came over the wire, it appeared that Mr. Shultz justifies this because of the timetable. The cease-fire does not take effect until November 7. Hence it is the argument of the U.S. administration that this would leave the Nicaraguan Sandinista regime unconstrained by the threat of the rebel Contra forces during that period, playing into the hands of the Communists. I can only say that this is hardly the basis upon which we should be building a secure and lasting peace in Central America.

I will go back and talk a bit about the history of some of the issues in a moment, but I would like to emphasize to the Conservative Government, and I am sure my colleague, the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), will agree with me, that one thing Canada can do concretely is to exercise our supposed good offices in Washington to bring a stop to this increased funding to the extent possible. In that regard I am confident that the efforts of the Government will be supported by many if not an overwhelming majority of Americans as well as Congressmen.

I need not remind this House of the tremendous opposition which was expressed not only here but in the United States to the funding of the Contras in the first instance. Here, on the very eve of a major breakthrough, we are faced with a reaffirmation and an escalation of that policy which all of us in this House on both sides condemned in the first instance.

I commend the Government on any steps it may take to make Canadian expertise available for the purposes of verification. We know that Canada enjoys an international reputation in that regard, well earned in many corners of the Globe over many many, years, and I am happy that we have officials in Central America at the present time, but there is one major obstacle going far beyond the issue of verification, and that is, the current policy of the U.S. administration. It is with respect to that policy that Canada is in a unique position to exercise influence.

I can say to this House in a personal vein that I am gratified and have been gratified by the tremendous concern shown by my constituents and by Canadians across this land for the circumstances in Central America. I know that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) feels the same way. He has many constituents who continue to make representations to him saying Canada has a major role to play.

Apart from the human tragedy to which we must respond, the refugee issues, the suffering, the fact that a surrogate war is being conducted by untrained teenagers, the great human tragedy of the situation also must be placed in the context of a potential widespread armed confrontation in the western hemisphere; our own Vietnam. The situation in Central America hangs like sword of Damocles over the peace and security of the western hemisphere. It is a matter of the most urgent priority. Hence, the Contadora process which we have all supported seemed almost at one point in recent months to have ceased being a process altogether. There seemed to be so little movement in that regard. Now we have seen in the region itself five Presidents agreeing upon a plan, which is ambiguous in many respects and is perhaps somewhat obscure but basically contains very significant elements which could provide for a major breakthrough. These elements include a ceasefire within 90 days, the agreement from each nation not to supply any rebel group which would try to overthrow any existing Central American Government, no attacks to be launched from other Central American countries, reconciliation and amnesty for rebel forces and a process of democratization, internationally-supervised free elections at the end of each Government's present term of office.

How wonderful it would be if each of these constituent elements could be addressed by those countries in the region. The situation could become stable and there would be the long-term peace and security that the region so desperately requires. However, already we see that there has been a certain amount of equivocation on the part of Honduras. Again, people might suspect that that might be because of the U.S. policy in the region. Honduras might feel itself obligated and perhaps economically indebted to the United States and it has already raised some questions with respect to verification procedures, allegedly for fear of establishing that there are indeed bases located strategically within its frontiers.

That merely points to the great flaw in this plan which is that it requires more than the support of the region, it desperately requires that of the United States. The United States has said that it is supportive, but Mr. Shultz has said: "We are committed to working with its signatories," referring to the signatories to the Guatemalan peace plan, "to strengthen it, to deal with issues not covered by the agreement, to help gain broad support for its purposes and provisions, but," he said, "it is simply not in our national interest to leave the Sandinista regime unconstrained by credible resistance forces on the basis of a hope or a premise".

In conclusion, let me say that that glimmer of hope which we saw emerging in August must be fanned by goodwill. It must be supported by this Government and, as I have said, apart from the technical assistance and other specific steps we can take in that regard, I believe we must send a strong message to Washington.

Over the last several years, my criticism of the posture of the Government has been that while its policies and its rhetoric in the House against aid to Contras, urging the United States basically to withdraw that support and to help bring a peaceful resolution to the problems in Nicaragua have been supported by all of us and while we continue to provide foreign aid to the area, I do not think that our voice has been heard. I think there has been a reluctance to speak out and to deliver a message to our good friends in Washington as good neighbours and friends should. We should speak frankly and candidly to the Americans on this issue and we should support those Members of Congress and those areas of American public opinion with which we are very much in agreement.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to debate the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett). Although the motion has been largely overtaken by events, it still addresses the very difficult and complex situation in Central America. This is an important issue because Central America is the scene of some of the most tragic internecine warfare in the world today and it also has become the scene of serious East-West conflict. It is also important to Canada because it is taking place in the western hemisphere, in that part of the third world closest to Canada and in a region with which Canada has growing social, economic and political interests.

My hon. friend, the Member for Beauharnois—Salaberry (Mr. Hudon), has very ably explained the Government's response to the most recent developments in Central America. The emergence of a new peace plan, the initiative of the countries of Central America themselves, is the most encouraging development in the region for several years. As has already been pointed out, the Canadian Government has not stood idly by. While recognizing that Canada has no direct role to play at this stage of the negotiations, we have gone to some lengths to give the maximum possible support and encouragement to the parties. The process of converting the commitments which have been made into a peace settlement will be a difficult one. Our support is more than just rhetorical: the Government stands ready to provide technical advice, where we have the appropriate expertise to offer, in the control and verification process which follows a cease fire in the region.

I want to remind the House, however, that this is not a new approach by the Government. On the contrary, it is entirely consistent with the policies which this Government has pursued with respect to Central America since it was elected. Indeed, our recent effort in support of the new peace plan is a logical extension of the role Canada has sought to play for some time.

Canadian policy towards Central America is a distinct one, shaped by Canadian criteria. It has been developed in recognition of the geopolitical realities of Central America and of the social and economic factors which are at the root of the current problems.

The Canadian Government opposes third party intervention anywhere in Central America and regrets the intrusion into the region of East-West tensions and the related militarization of the area.

Canada does not approve of the supply of armaments by any country to opposing factions in the region. This position has been expressed on numerous occasions to the Governments of Central America, to the United States Government and to the other governments concerned. The United States' decision to provide additional aid to the Contras runs counter to our position. Canada has constantly emphasized its firm belief that the countries of Central America must be free to seek their own solution to their own problems without interference from any outside source.

We strongly share the view that the growth and development of democracy is an important issue in Central America. Canada welcomes the progress which has been made in several countries in the region, while recognizing that there is still room for improvement, particularly in Nicaragua.

Canada does not wish to see Nicaragua locked into the Soviet bloc or involved in destablizing its neighbours. We encourage Nicaragua to move toward the original goals of the Sandinistra revolution which were recently restated in its new constitution: a commitment to political pluralism, a mixed economy and non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries.

We believe that improvements must be made in the Nicaraguan civil and human rights record. The continued suspension of many basic civil rights under the State of Emergency is profoundly disturbing. We encourage political pluralism in Nicaragua and we support the ability of legitimate domestic political opposition parties to continue to function. We have deplored the decision to close down the La Prensa newspaper, and the harrassment of opposition groups and of the churches. The recent arrest and sentencing of the head of the Nicaraguan Human Rights Commission and the head of the Nicaraguan Bar Association within days of the signing of the peace accord was a disturbing and potentially counterproductive development. It was not consistent with the spirit of the agreement and only served to emphasize the need for reforms within Nicaragua. We hope that the implementation of the peace plan will result in the lifting of the State of Emergency and the removal of the current restrictions on the press and opposition groups and an end to incidents such as that to which I have referred.

The achievement of social justice ranks with the promotion of peace and economic development as one of the highest priorities for Canadian policy in the region. We welcome the fact that the peace plan includes a commitment to representative and pluralist democratic systems of government in all countries in the region.

Human rights violations in Guatemala and El Salvador continue also to be of great concern to the Canadian Government. Canada has been monitoring the human rights situation in both countries, and we have also pursued investigations of a number of cases of particular interest to Canada. Canada has co-sponsored UN General Assembly resolutions expressing deep concern at the continuing violations of human rights in Guatemala, and has voted in favour of resolutions expressing similar concerns in El Salvador.

Canada maintains normal commercial relations with Nicaragua and provides the usual assistance to Canadian firms seeking to do business there. Canada does not support the U.S.A. embargo on trade with Nicaragua, nor has the Government introduced special programs to increase Canadian trade by exploiting the embargo. Nicaragua has established a trading company in Toronto and it is hoped that this initiative will enhance trade opportunities for both countries.

Some critics of the Government's policy on Central America, including the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), have also raised the question of whether Canada should have an embassy in Nicaragua. At present Canada maintains two embassies in Central America, one in San José, Costa Rica, accredited to Costa Rica, Panama, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, and one in Guatemala City.

The fact that we do not maintain a resident mission in Nicaragua, or indeed in several other Central American countries, does not reflect a political decision on the part of the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government enjoys an excellent working relationship with the Government of Nicaragua, notwithstanding the absence of a resident Canadian Embassy in Managua itself. Ideally, we should like to have resident diplomatic missions in virtually every capital of the world. Economic constraints rule this out. Especially in the current atmosphere of austerity, as the Governement attempts to reduce the national deficit, it would be unrealistic to consider adding to the number of diplomatic posts. In fact, the Government has recently closed a number of missions abroad.

Nevertheless, as a reflection of Canada's growing concern for stability in Central America, the personnel resources of our Embassy in San José have been augmented and program responsibilities rearranged in order to be able to devote more attention to Nicaraguan affairs.

It is our view that, through frequent visits to Nicaragua by our Ambassador and his staff (every two weeks on average), we receive accurate and detailed reporting on Nicaragua's domestic political situation, its economic problems and international outreach. Our Embassy has built a wide network of close contacts including, of course, government leaders and senior officials. In addition, the Department of External Affairs maintains close relations with Nicaraguan diplomatic staff in Ottawa, and we discuss Central American issues with many other governments as well as with private organizations in Canada.

There are approximately 50 Canadians residing in Nicaragua who have registered with the embassy in Costa Rica. In addition, a large number of Canadians visit Nicaragua, most in organized groups. Routine consular services of an immediate nature (passport renewal, replacement of stolen documents, et cetera) are provided the British Embassy in Managua. In case of a major emergency, contingency plans are in place to help Canadians leave the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate the Government's satisfaction that negotiations for a peaceful settlement in Central America are underway again. We are under no illusions about the serious obstacles which lie in the way of a just peace but Canada stands ready to do what it can to support the process, as the Government has done since it took office.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the introduction of the subject of peace in Central America by my colleague, the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), and move to ask and answer, if I can, the question of why Central America is important to the peace of Canadians. It seems strange in a way. For myself, I have to admit that five and a half years ago I did not know where Tegucigalpa, capital of Honduras, was. I did not know where Managua, capital of Nicaragua, was. However, over the last few years, with many other Canadians, I have been learning fast about the importance of those small countries in Central America.

I found the Central American people to be very lively. I am not referring just to their colours and their dancing and music. I mean the refugees I have met are hardy, they survive, and they are loving. They are human, intensely human. In each country a few million people are standing up against the United States and refusing to submit. The Central American peace plan reflects that. That agreement was made despite the pressure of Reagan's diplomats and military threats and dollar subsidies. The churches are also active in both those countries, helping the common people and moving back and forth between those countries and North America, making us aware of what is going on. This enables us to interact and aid each other.

It is a fact that Central Americans in their conduct inspire many Canadians, but the question still remains. I am forced to reflect that our world is emerging from colonialism. Since World War II, India and most of the colonies of the nations of western Europe and North America achieved formal political independence. Economic independence still lags behind. That, after all, was basic. The interest of the European explorers in the Caribbean islands, Central and South America, Africa, India, Southeast Asia and the islands of the Pacific was not mainly a search for political power. Columbus, Vasco Da Gama, Drake, Pizarro and their successors sought spices, gold, sugar, tea, timber, rubber, and a thousand other riches lying plentifully in those countries. They also sought cheap labour to harvest this wealth. They first enslaved the local people so far as it was possible, and then later resurrected the ancient custom of outright slavery and brought an entire black population from Africa to slave in the Western Hemisphere.

Since World War II, European and North American powers have found it inconvenient to continue ruling or controlling these countries directly. The people in these former colonies are no longer satisfied. Yet the controlling countries found it possible for a few years to continue with unequal economic arrangements, unequal sales arrangements, and when necessary enforcing these arrangements through arming or financing and politically supporting whatever local gang of thugs would sell out the goods and labour of their fellow countrymen cheap.

That whole network of post-world war, post-colonial indirect control of the economies of Central America and other colonies is now falling apart. Cuba signalled 28 years ago that it would no longer support us in the style to which we were accustomed. French Indo-China made itself independent from the Japanese by the end of World War II. It was reconquered by Great Britain and France, defeated French rule in 1954, was reinvaded by the U.S., and defeated them in 1975. Many other former colonial lands have won their economic, military and political freedom or are bent on winning it. Therefore, we have continuing upheavals; local wars, civil wars, revolutions and refugees.

Refugees coming to Canada used to be mainly from eastern Europe and were received respectfully. Now they come mainly from Central America, Africa, Southeast Asia and places like that. Our Government, following the Governments of the U.S. and other NATO countries, now tries to shut them out. These refugees are in fact messengers of the colonial liberation movements. No wonder they bring hope to many Canadians who feel dominated and exploited by the United States of America. No wonder, equally, they bring fear to those who want to continue the old order at home and abroad.

We are finding that a growing number of Canadians who support peace also generally support refugees. They realize that the refugees, regardless of their own intentions sometimes, but because of the reality of their circumstances and the terror which they had to flee in countries like El Salvador, are a symbol of the rejection of the life and rule of war, military control, and the exploitation of men, women and children by the men of war and big business.

The refugees are here. They will continue to come until Canada and Canadians, along with the United States and countries of western Europe recognize that those countries from which the refugees come must be free or we will have no peace.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Government believes that the basic cause of tension and political conflict in Central America is the deeply rooted socio-economic disparities present in varying degrees in each of the countries in the region. In the Government's view, the most appropriate contribution that Canada can make to the promotion of regional peace and stability is, on the one hand, the provision of development assistance aimed at helping individuals and communities break out of their cycle of poverty and at promoting economic growth in the region and, on the other hand, through support for a regional peace settlement.

Other speakers today have already spoken about the support that Canada has provided and is providing to efforts to achieve a regional peace settlement. I wish to speak for a few moments about Canadian aid to the people of Central America.

Canadian development assistance to Central America began in 1968 with a loan to El Salvador. Following the 1970 foreign policy review, which recommended a higher Canadian profile in the region, aid activities were initiated in all other countries in the region. After the regional program review in 1975, El Salvador and Honduras became CIDA program countries. In 1979, planning for new bilateral projects in El Salvador was suspended as a consequence of the increasingly violent and unstable situation in that country. In 1981, planning for new bilateral projects in Guatemala was also suspended because of internal disorder in that country.

In 1982, following a comprehensive review of Canada's relations with Central America, the Government decided to expand significantly its development assistance program to the countries of Central America. Specifically, the Government decided to allocate up to $106 million in government-to-government aid to the region over the five-year period from 1982-83 to 1986-87. This represented a tripling of the level of bilateral aid provided to the region over the previous five-year period.

With respect to the countries which would benefit from this assistance, it was decided that Honduras, the poorest country in Central America, would be the largest recipient of assistance, as it had been in the past. Costa Rica and Nicaragua would also receive increased allocations of aid. Bilateral aid would remain suspended in Guatemala and El Salvador pending improvements in the internal conditions in those countries.

Further, all countries in the region would be eligible for assistance through other aid channels—the Mission Administered Fund Program, the Non-Governmental Organizations Program, the Institutional Co-operation Program, the Industrial Co-operation Program, the Humanitarian Assistance Program, and the International Development Research Centre.

In December, 1984, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) announced that government-to-government aid to El Salvador would be resumed. This decision was taken in light of the humanitarian needs of the hundreds of thousands of displaced persons, the economic underdevelopment of El Salvador, the marked improvement in the human rights situation in that country, and the successful return in that country to democratic institutions.

In the five years from 1982-83 to 1986-87, since the Government decided to increase substantially aid to Central America Canada has provided about $106 million in government-to-government aid to the people of Central America. In other words, the Government has met its commitment to triple the level of government-to-government aid to the region. However, the volume of aid is only half the story. The quality and effectiveness of the aid provided is just as, if not more, important.

We believe that Canada's government-to-government aid to Central America is responding effectively to the particular developmental needs and problems of the individual countries in the region. In Honduras, Canadian government-to-government aid is supporting the development and conservation of renewable resources, the creation of rural employment, and the improvement of health care and food supplies in rural areas.

In Costa Rica, Canadian government-to-government aid has been used to provide much needed balance of payments support and to fund an important rural housing program. In Nicaragua, Canada's government-to-government aid has concentrated on basic human needs, food production and energy. In El Salvador, the focus of the government-to-government aid program is assistance to displaced persons and the most disadvantaged.

In addition to the government-to-government aid, during the past five years Canada has provided substantial assistance to the countries of Central America, more than $45 million through other direct assistance channels. These include the Non-Governmental Organizations Program, the Institutional Co-operation Program, the Business Co-operation Program, the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation, and the International Development Research Centre.

Further, during the past five years Canada has provided more than $15 million to multilateral organizations such as the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross for their programs to assist refugees and displaced people in Central America.

I believe that Canada, through its official development assistance programs, is responding generously and effectively to the social and economic needs of the people of Central America. On a regional basis Central America is now one of the highest per capita recipients of Canadian official development assistance. The Government and the people of Canada will continue to respond generously to the social and economic needs of the Central American people.

This debate is lacking in that speakers have not pointed out the United States' concern with Communist involvement in Central America. That cannot be ignored. Many Canadians are concerned about the Communist involvement there. It is not one-sided. There are genuine concerns in the United States and here about the Communist infiltration in Central America. The United States must protect itself in that area. That should be on the record. We must lay upon the table that there are genuine concerns and genuine reasons why the United States has involvement in Central America.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Thirty seconds left. The Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme).

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I am very glad to have the remaining thirty seconds to say at the outset that I do not share the views of my colleague, especially with respect to his last remarks. I would suggest that what must be understood in all these problems of Latin America, of Central America, I would suggest that what must be understood in the defence of human rights in the whole world is that when a people is tortured, when a people is denied the most elementary things, when a people is deprived of freedom, when a people suffers from illiteracy and is being exploited, then the liberation movements spring up. So this is a matter—and I know the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté) ought to take an interest in these things, it must be understood that the exploitation of man by man can only lead to the kind of events we are witnessing throughout the world, more particularly in Central America. If my colleagues were living in that part of the world and were seeing their families exploited, thrown in jail, tortured, deprived of the most elementary things, I would suggest that if they still had any intestinal fortitude left they would do exactly what those people are doing!

And to us more particularly, Quebec francophones, Latin America is a very important part of the world. For us Canadians it was the Commonwealth, that is very good. But all of a sudden to maintain our balance, and I conclude, it was said:

• (1800)

[English]

The British Commonwealth is important for a part of Canada. Let us look at La Francophonie, Africaine and others. One of the most important areas to us in one part of Canada is Latin America and Central America. We should understand the true meaning of what is going on there and not only believe what the Member from Winnipeg just said.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—CONTRACT TO VIDEOTAPE BUSINESS EXCELLENCE AWARDS FUNCTION—REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF NEW TENDERING PROCESS

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to expand on a question I asked the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Côté) in the House yesterday concerning the contract in Halifax for the Canadian Awards for Business Excellence to be held in September.

The Minister responded in two ways. First, he said that he had examined the case when he heard about it last week and that all regular procedures were followed.

He rather patronizingly suggested in response to my supplementary question that this is, after all, a national event and a Toronto company was given the contract. That is not the point at all. Let me give a few details about this contract. The complaint came from two Nova Scotia companies and one Prince Edward Island company. On July 2, they were given an invitation to tender for this videotaping of an event to be held at the Halifax Sheraton Hotel. They had to provide information on their tendering price by July 6, which gave them three days to prepare their bid in order to submit it on the fourth day.

In the course of their determining prices for suppliers they discovered that approximately one month previous a company from Toronto had been in Halifax making inquiries and preparing their own bid for this same contract.

One of the companies involved also discovered from an official from the Department of Supply and Services that the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion who was organizing the event had asked that this particular contractor from Toronto, who eventually got the contract, be asked to tender. This person from DRIE who was making this suggestion was also on the committee to select the contractor.

What we have heard from the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island companies is that this was obviously prearranged so that the Toronto company would get the contract and that between July 2 and July 6, the Department of Supply and Services went through the motions to have a tendering process.

This is the kind of action that is totally contrary to any notion of the Government trying to be fair in contracting to all contractors in the first instance, but certainly contrary to a government whose former Minister of Supply and Services said that his Department will be going out of its way to ensure that companies in the regions which are in need of assistance from the Government for regional disparity purposes are provided with opportunities to take advantage of federal government spending. If all regular procedures had been followed in this case, then obviously those procedures are inadequate. The question put to the Minister yesterday was quite simply this. What procedures are going to be put in place to ensure that there is fairness for Atlantic Canadian companies?

It is quite clear that if the Government wishes to give preference to local companies in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, or wherever these events take place, then it can do so. In this case all these companies were seeking was fairness, for the same opportunity to put in a competitive bid for a contract for work that was to take place in Halifax.

It is not good enough for the Minister to say to the House that, after all, this is a national event. The implication must be that if it is a national event then a Nova Scotia, a Prince Edward Island or a Newfoundland company cannot do it. That is utter nonsense. If that is the attitude of the Government, then we will not see any regional development take place, certainly not through government spending of this type.

I would like to have a more full explanation from the Parliamentary Secretary who I understand will be replying to my question. I would like to see a more full explanation as to what happened in this case, as well as a better explanation as to what procedures are in place and what procedures will be put in place to rectify this situation.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Awards for Business Excellence is an annual national celebration of excellence in Canadian business and is a program of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. Each year a national awards ceremony is held and the winning companies are featured in an audio-visual presentation.

The Department of Supply and Services assists in the selection of the audio-visual production company through requesting and evaluating proposals from industry. This year proposals were requested from five companies—one in Ontario, one in Quebec, and three companies from Atlantic Canada. This is a good cross-section of the industry. Given that the event is national in scope and as three Atlantic production companies were included, this part of the country was more than fairly represented. Indeed, it has been the practice of the Department of Supply and Services through the Atlantic Opportunities Program to extend greater opportunities to companies in Atlantic Canada for participation in national business opportunities.

In the film and video production field alone the Department of Supply and Services increased its contract business volume to Atlantic Canada by 143 per cent during the 1986-87 fiscal year. I can assure the Hon. Member that the Atlantic Opportunities Program launched in April, 1986, is high on the Government's list of priorities.

As Hon. Members are aware, this program represents a new and innovative approach to support regional economic development. In the first year of the program the Department has been successful in bringing new economic opportunities to Atlantic Canada. The bottom-line results of our efforts is that we purchase $573 million worth of goods and services from Atlantic businesses. This represents a $167 million increase over our purchases in 1984-85, the program's base year.

The Department of Supply and Services took a three-pronged approach to generating new procurement opportunities in Atlantic Canada. We organized trade shows, business conferences and seminars throughout Atlantic Canada to ensure that businesses were aware of all business opportunities associated with federal procurement needs. I think the Hon. Member will agree that the $167 million increase in all purchasing in Atlantic Canada is something about which we can be proud.

• (1810)

Our efforts to use new policies to bring more contracting opportunities to Atlantic Canadian firms resulted in the following contracts: Ven Rez Products Ltd., Shelbourne, Nova Scotia, $199,947 for modular furniture; Wajax Industries Ltd., Saint John, New Brunswick, $192,360 for a hydraulic crane; Domtar Packaging Inc., Moncton, New Brunswick, $38,428 for shipping boxes; GEC Diesel Inc., St. John's, Newfoundland, $37,500 for a diesel generator.

Our supplier development efforts have helped Novation Information Corp. of Halifax to develop a business information service, and BPL Manufacturing of Spring Hill, Nova Scotia, to develop a new ammunition capability for the Armed Forces.

AGRICULTURE—SPECIAL CANADIAN GRAINS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on June 18 last I asked the Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) a question on the Special Canadian Grains Program. The Minister replied that this program was being administered in accordance with the rules, guidelines, and criteria that had been established by the Government in close co-operation with 35 or 40 farm leaders.

Today I wish to deal with the administration of this program. First, I wish to stress the fact that this program helped to partially correct the intolerable situation that was created by the subsidy war between the EEC and the U.S. Farm Bill and that this program is helping hundreds of our farmers to stay on the land. At the same time, the program has hurt other farmers. I wish to deal with some of these items now in the hope that correction will be made in any future pay-out, and hopefully in the last one.

During the first pay-out some hay farmers were hurt, and it is questionable as to whether they will be able to stay on the land. Administrators of the program refused to make payments to hay producers. At the same time, the program did recognize farmers who cut their grain crops early and sold it as green feed at lower prices because of the subsidy to feed lots, the major purchasers of hay, thus denying the hay producers their market.

Although the feed lots preferred hay, they could not resist the opportunity to buy feed at a lower price. By the same token, the hay producers could not match the subsidized prices which were below the cost of producing the hay. Consequently, the program helped farmers who produced green feed instead of letting the crops mature and selling the grain, or because weather or other factors prevented the proper maturing of the grain. Properly, the barley producers were helped, but the hay producers had to survive on prices that did not even pay for the production of the hay.

In my constituency, some hay farmers in an attempt to survive tried to sell hay to Japan. They were advised that compressed hay was being subsidized by the Americans. Consequently, again the hay producers could not meet the prices that were being subsidized with public money.

The Hon. Minister advised that he had checked with his farm leaders who were convinced that compressed hay was not being so subsidized. I am presently expecting a letter from the U.S. administrators as to whether it is. If it is not, someone in the United States led our hay farmers down the garden path.

In making payment to farmers, the same average yield was used for crops grown on summer fallowed land as was grown on stubble or on irrigated land. Yields on all three are different. While the average for crops grown on stubble and on summer fallow might be reasonably close, they could also be quite different. But yields on irrigated lands may be three or four times higher than those grown on summer fallow or stubble. After the first pay-out, this was brought to the attention of the Minister. This spring in the second pay-out, the error in the payment for irrigated lands was partially corrected. I commend the Minister and his administrators for listening to what the farmers had to say, and for making the necessary adjustments.

However, in paying farmers who irrigate on their actual average yield, the administrators decided to limit the payment to farmers who received the water from an irrigation district, while all private irrigators were excluded. This resulted in some 200 or 300 farmers in my riding in southern Alberta being denied the subsidy. These farmers are termed "private" irrigators because they do not belong to an irrigation district, even though they grow the same crops, have equal yields, use the same type of equipment, and have similar costs as those in an irrigation district and have been denied the subsidy.

One difference between farmers who irrigate from a river and those who belong to a district is that a water distribution system of canals and ditches is not necessary. Canals and ditches in irrigation districts are highly subsidized by Governments, whereas the farmers who are being denied any subsidy pay for their machinery and needed equipment.

In my view if land is irrigated and other factors are equal or similar, then payment should also be made to those who are irrigating "privately", as the administrators call it. The so-called "private" farmers in my constituency—and I suppose it is the same elsewhere in Canada—pay a fee to the provincial Government annually for the specific amount of water taken from a river. I have heard that farmers could be dishonest and say that they used more water than they actually did. This would not be possible where the provincial Government or some other municipal district is paid for the water rights and for the amount of water taken out of the river.

Another excuse for no payment to water users is that private irrigators had accepted payment under the drought program in 1985. This is strange, as some farmers who belong to an irrigation district were also paid drought money and properly so. This is unfair treatment of farmers who, through an association or privately, irrigate their land. I am sure every reasonable Canadian will view it as such.

Another unfair item in both payments that was not corrected in the second payment was the yield on summer fallow being the same as that on stubble. There is a difference in production yields.

In addition, the Province of Alberta, by using this method, is taking the chance that some farmers may be paid twice for the same grain—once from the Special Canadian Grains Program and once from the Feed Freight Assistance Program which is operated in Alberta and maybe in other provinces. This is an excuse rather than a reason.

Paying on the seeded acreage encourages farmers to seed to the hilt which in turn this leads to "mining" the soil, which is certainly not in the best interests of the country. Payment on the total acreage is the recommendation of many experienced farmers, and this would not add to the surplus.

Other farmers, including mustard producers and other pulse farmers, now claim that their income was adversely affected because of the depressed climate in agriculture and are very angry at being left out.

In conclusion, I urge the Ministers involved in this program to heed the material in this debate, as the points mentioned are not only the views of a Member of Parliament but of a large body of practical farmers who are Canadians too.

Mr. Pat Binns (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) has certainly raised some important points in his remarks in relation to the inclusion of hay in this program. I appreciate some of the arguments he has made, especially situations where grain crops were cut as green feed, which of course in turn displaced the hay crop in feed lots and in other areas.

Let me point out again that the $1 billion Special Canadian Grains Program is an interim assistance measure to cushion the impact of the current trade dispute between the European Economic Community and the United States of America. Grain and oilseed prices have been depressed severely because of that subsidy war. Grain and oilseed prices on world markets have been driven down very substantially because of unfair subsidies.

Of course the Government responded by implementing the $1 billion Special Canadian Grains Program. As of September 8, $966 million of that $1 billion program had been mailed out to 200,609 producers. Nearly all the $1 billion has been taken up at this point.

The Special Canadian Grains Program was developed through broad consultation with farm organizations across Canada. It was a consensus of those groups that program benefits should be paid to producers who have been directly and seriously affected by the international subsidy practices, particularly between the EEC and the United States.

Hay was considered when the list of eligible commodities was established. However, the lower prices received for hay last year were felt to be largely the result of normal supply and demand forces.

Canadian hay producers enjoyed an unusually good harvest and today there is still an abundance of hay on domestic markets. Hay prices have not been depressed by international subsidy practices. For this reason, hay was not included in the list of eligible commodities for the Special Canadian Grains Program. Clearly, the aim of this program is not to reward grains and oilseeds producers or to penalize hay producers. The program simply is providing much needed assistance to individuals most seriously affected by the depressed prices on world markets.

• (1820)

As a result of surplus hay production in Canada, the federal Government is currently providing assistance to develop export markets for hay products. One major initiative in this area has been the provision of transportation assistance through the inclusion of pellets and cubes and eligible commodities under the Western Grain Transportation Act. The Government continues to support the efforts of hay producers to maintain and expand markets abroad, and I am pleased to note that despite fierce competition in 1986, the industry successfully maintained its share of foreign markets.

In closing, the Special Canadian Grains Program was an interim measure to deal immediately with lower returns for 1986 crops. One billion dollars was put in place to meet that special need. Our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) along with the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds (Mr. Mayer) since that time and in recent weeks and months have been meeting with farm leaders to discuss possible assistance covering the 1987 crop and beyond. It is quite obvious that our Government is committed to helping our farmers. In fact, our assistance has been second to no other government in the past. I know that our Ministers will continue to assist Canadian farmers.

Several options are being considered for the future, and I am sure the remarks of the Hon. Member for Bow River will be given serious consideration by the Ministers in future deliberations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

CANAGREX DISSOLUTION ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise that Bill C-2, an Act to dissolve Canagrex and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to complete my remarks regarding the death of Canagrex.

The only thing that we can hope for is that the Mulroney Government will call an election soon in order that we can get on with re-establishing some form of Canagrex to assist the Canadian family farm, and the small exporters of the country. Based on the results of recent times, I suspect that that is in the offing. I hope that an election is called as soon as possible in order that we can complete this discussion of Canagrex and move to something more positive.

It is important that we recognize what Canagrex did in the very short time that it was in existence. I remember in the winter of 1984, after the Government had shifted, some questions were put to the Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise). One question was, what were the total expenditures on Canagrex? Another question was, what was the result of those expenditures? Did we receive our money's worth? Did the taxpayers of Canada receive what they deserved in terms of their investment in Canagrex?

The Minister of Agriculture advised that the total expenditures to establish Canagrex had amounted to $2.6 million. He then went on to add how delighted he was with the accomplishments of this federal agency. He advised that when the corporation began operations in the spring of 1984, policy focused on facilitating sales by bringing a willing buyer and a seller into a negotiating position rather than on purchasing products or selling for the corporation's account.

I wish to remind Members that Canagrex was not involved in buying and selling agricultural products. That was clearly to be left to the private sector, to the international exporting companies as well as the commodity groups themselves, with one exception. The Hon. Member from Fraser Valley, who is obviously interested in agricultural exports, will remember that many countries arranged food or agricultural exports and imports on a government to government basis, and simply did not work with specific companies or individual firms. For that reason Canagrex was playing a rather unique role, because it could move a Government of Canada arrangement with the government of country x. Again, that would facilitate the export of our excellent agricultural products.

The Hon. Minister went on to say that Canagrex was involved in negotiations leading to the facilitation of sales worth $16 million, and in addition there were transactions in progress worth a potential $100 million to be finalized on March 31, 1985.

Considering the red tape and the hurdles that were thrown up in front of Canagrex in its first few weeks and months of operation, the fact that it accomplished so much in so little time is really quite astounding, quite amazing. The response from the family farms across Canada, and the small exporters was quite phenomenal.

I remember touring my constituency of Kamloops—Shuswap where we raise a lot of food, beef, poultry, poultry by-products, dairy products, berry products, some grains, many vegetables, soft fruits—I could go on in terms of incredibly productive farms; almost inevitably they are family operations, and they were struggling and continue to struggle against the subsidized agricultural exporters of Europe, and particularly the United States. I remember we were up against the American GSM-102 and GSM-105 programs which literally made it impossible for our family farms to compete head to head with the operations in the United States, and particularly in Europe, in countries such as the United Kingdom, France, and Germany. We needed some help then, and we still do.

Unless something quite dramatic is done by the Government in a very short period of time, I am afraid that our commitment to the family farm operation in this country will go the way of the dinosaur. We cannot compete under present conditions. We need to recognize the reality of the international commodity market-place. Therefore, I think that Canagrex was a step in the right direction.

My hon. friends opposite disagree. That is fair enough; that is why we are here. If we agreed on everything it simply would not be the Parliament of Canada. I say that the track record of Canagrex was second to none.

In digging through my files in preparation for this speech—and perhaps I should have dug a little deeper—I came across the first thing that happened with Canagrex, and it happened day after day. I have a stack of press releases in my office showing the successes of Canagrex. On August 29, 1984, the Minister of Agriculture announced a $50 million line of credit to export the sale of food and agricultural products from Canada. They had facilitated a line of credit with a Canadian bank and a foreign bank which the Minister thought would result in $25 million of Canadian agri-food products flowing out of Canada within a few weeks, including such products as soya bean meal, corn, seed potatoes, beans, and turkeys. This is only one press release, but it is important to remember that these exports would not have taken place had Canagrex not been in the international market-place opening up market opportunities for our farmers.

It did not operate in competition with existing systems. We have private exporters and private firms opening up new markets. We have Agriculture Canada, CIDA, and trade offices trying to find more markets. Canagrex was designed to fill in the cracks, because there were many countries in which we were not—and we still are not—attempting to open up new markets for Canadian food products. We have a long way to go.

I cannot imagine why anyone would have opposed such a paltry sum of $12.4 million being set aside for Canagrex over a three-year period to facilitate this federal agency in the opening of new markets. I have not met a single person in the food producing sector who says that Canada should not have a federal agency like every other food producing country in the western world to facilitate the establishment of new markets.

Where is the evidence that this is wrong? One of the last farm groups to appear before the committee when we looked at the demise of Canagrex was the National Farmers Union, represented by Mr. Wayne Easter. He indicated how this was a slap in the face to Canadian farmers.

In some sectors the industry is virtually in a crisis or emergency situation. In many respects it requires rescue money because of the problems in which it finds itself. However, here was a relatively inexpensive initiative to provide assistance to the family farm operation in east, west and central Canada. However, the Conservative Government mysteriously wants to abandon this initiative. It was given a paltry sum of $12.4 million over a three-year period, and now we are driving the last spike into the coffin of Canagrex.

In conclusion, every shred of evidence when it comes to Canagrex indicates that it is a good idea, concept, and initiative. It is a good agency. It is something the Government of Canada could be and should be doing for our farmers, not abandoning the agency and by definition abandoning Canadian food producers who rank highest in the world in terms of their ability to produce food in efficient and effective ways.

I look forward to the demise of the Progressive Conservative Government so that whatever replaces it—and hopefully it will be a New Democratic Party Government—will be able to reinstitute a new version of Canagrex, a version which will enable it to fulfil its mandate to assist the family farm operation in Canada.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) spent some time talking about the role which Canagrex was attempting to play before the Government brought it to an untimely end.

I should like to note that the decision to oppose Canagrex came slowly to the Conservatives. Upon the introduction of the Bill by the then Minister of Agriculture, Eugene Whelan, the then House Leader of the Conservative Party, Erik Nielsen, in a very unusual step, rose in the House and welcomed the initiative on behalf of the Government and indicated that Canagrex was something for which the Hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) had been preparing when he was Minister of Agriculture in the short term 1979 Conservative Government. He indicated that his Party welcomed with open arms the initiative.

The first several speakers from the Tory benches in that period of time also spoke in favour of Canagrex, until the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre, the current Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), made a speech damning the whole concept. Conservative attitudes gradually changed until they became very firmly entrenched against the institution of Canagrex.

One reason for indicating that it was not necessary in their opinion was that we have commercial counsellors in some of our embassies overseas who can direct interest in agricultural business back to Canada. These counsellors have been at work since the demise of Canagrex, and there has virtually been no indication that their work has resulted in more exports. On occasion they contact the Canadian Wheat Board, which is one of the better marketing agencies in the world. They are able to complete sales, but these commercial counsellors have no one to turn to for other commodities. That was a role Canagrex could play.

One of the first things it did was to establish with the buyers and sellers in the industry the fact that Canagrex would play a facilitating role and that the buying, selling, and taking of commissions, an important concern of the Minister of Finance, would be left as is. Canagrex was simply to have the list of buyers and sellers and put the two together, and normal commercial channels would carry out the actual finalization of sales.

Canagrex no longer exists as a facilitator. Unfortunately for trading operations that spoke against Canagrex, they do not have the business. Nobody gains.

Could the Hon. Member tell me what advantage the country seems to be getting now that the Conservative Government has done away with Canagrex? How do honey producers complete sales overseas? How do potato producers or some of the small bean operators do so when they do not have a very large marketing organization of their own?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) has put his finger on the nub of the problem. The clientele of Canagrex tended to be small, independent producers, the fledgling enterprises in our producing sector that were trying to get established; in other words, where the growth and the future of agriculture lie. Canagrex was really interested in helping these groups, individuals, and organizations. Large agricultural organizations had their markets established and perhaps did not need the same kind of assistance.

I should like to refer to a press release when the Government first indicated that it planned to do away with Canagrex. It noted that Canagrex saw the need for a federal agency that would facilitate the export of Canadian foodstuffs. Farmers and small exporters defended it enthusiastically while larger established corporate agriculture opposed it, and here perhaps we have the real essence of the matter.

The large corporate agri-business said, "We don't want any more competition, we have the market sewn up, the financial cash flows, the organizations, the cartels and monopolies in place. We don't want competition. We don't want the small enterpriser, the small operator or the small exporter getting involved. We have been working on this for a long time and we have it set up."

But whose side ought we be on? Whose side should Parliament be supporting, large agri-corporate business or the small independent producer? We say we should be supporting the small independent producer whenever and wherever possible. We should be assisting that individual farmer, that small agency, the small co-op. That is who we should be supporting, not agri-business. Is the Government saying in this Bill that we support our corporate friends but we are prepared to abandon the small family farm?

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a producing country. Agriculture is very important for our economy. We are fighting the demise of the family farm. We want to see agriculture remain a very important part of Canada. That is why we are very disturbed with the sudden death of Canagrex, a death ordered by the Conservative Government in spite of the fact that in times past when the Conservatives were a little more practical they were in favour of Canagrex.

Why were the Conservatives in favour and why did they change their minds? They were in favour of Canagrex for the same reasons we were initially—there was a clear need for it. Marketing boards did not cover all subjects. Independent producers needed assistance in selling their produce.

In 1982 we had $9.5 billion worth of exports in agriculture and a surplus of $3.1 billion, 60 per cent of which was in grains and oilseeds with a very serious trade deficit in the non-grain area of $2 billion. There was an opportunity to do something about that; to improve our exports in the other areas, those outside wheat where there are strong marketing facilities already through the Wheat Board. Canagrex was to fill this gap in our marketing strategy. To have a sane agricultural policy we must have production and marketing. It does not make sense to have one without the other. A comprehensive policy and very practical measures are needed to ensure that the whole system works, and Canagrex was designed to fill that gap.

Interestingly when the Bill was introduced at first reading, the Conservatives supported it. The Bill was brought in by the Liberals and at that time at first reading the Conservative House Leader rose to speak and pointed out that the Conservatives in the brief period they were in government had already worked on Canagrex and were in favour of it. The Conservatives were trying to do practical things at that time. Then suddenly, midstage, for ideological reasons, there was an about-face. The Conservatives opposed Canagrex. When the Conservatives returned to office in 1984, Canagrex had already been set up. It had not been in operation very long. Suddenly the Conservative Government wanted to chop it and indeed it did. The Government did not give Canagrex a chance to show how effective it could be. The decision was made within a matter of months and Canagrex was told to wind up its operation.

In the very brief time that Canagrex was in operation, however, it was beginning to have a positive impact which was helping farmers. Built into the legislation was the fact that buying and selling would be left to the private sector and Canagrex's objective was to facilitate sales and provide information. Canagrex gathered the information. It prepared a survey of Canadian commodities available for export. This important information was essential, especially since the number of commodities in surplus supply or which were available for export since 1984 was very limited. That source list of Canadian commodities is probably the most comprehensive and up to date available anywhere today.

Canagrex developed a market survey program. This meant in-depth research on specific market areas which were considered to be potentially promising for Canadian farm exports. The market research people travelled to countries accompanied by producers who could talk about their products on the spot. For example, Canagrex had a pork producer accompany its mission to Singapore and a potato producer travelled to Cuba for sales. Canagrex prepared comprehensive studies to identify market prospects for a number of important export commodities. A major study was prepared on pork, which was well-received by the Canadian industry. Other studies were prepared on the export potential for honey and processed foods. Again, these studies were done in co-operation with the industry groups. The people in the know, doing the work and producing, had input into sales preparation.

Canagrex undertook a program to stimulate export sales abroad. It defrayed some of the costs involved in transporting high quality breeding swine to Italy on the understanding that out of any subsequent sales Canagrex would recover its expenses. There was a happy result from this one. The Canadian swine won several medals at a Milan exhibition and foreign buyers visited Canada to investigate further purchases. This very modest initiative resulted in buyers coming to Canada to make their own deals of Canadian stock purchases.

Another example was a buyers credit guarantee program. Under this program Canagrex agreed to share a certain amount of the risk involved in providing credit to a buyer to purchase Canadian agricultural commodities in addition to its normal purchases. Under this program, Canagrex sought to have the risks shared among the exporters, the banks or the insurance companies and the foreign buyer. A Canagrex guarantee was provided when it was deemed absolutely necessary. It was to be used sparingly but available as one thing that could be done to increase exports for our producers. A combination of aid and trade at lower effective interest rates was part of the strategy.

In certain instances Canagrex was faced with similar programs offered by the French, German and British Governments which made selling certain commodities on a cash basis virtually impossible. Our producers have to compete with producers in other countries. When other countries have programs supporting their producers, we fail our producers if we do not meet them in kind. Our producers, especially grain producers, face the enormous subsidy programs that other countries have for their producers. That is the world, and how very nice it would be to change it and change the rules, but while other countries are providing support, we have to ensure that our own producers do not lose out in the process.

Canadian agricultural exporters were desperate for some assistance to maintain and increase their market sales and Canagrex was there to help in situations when other countries were able to do very much more for their producers.

One of the things that is most disturbing about the Government is the very rapid way it has proceeded without consultation. It made a decision on ideological grounds. The agency had been set up, it was starting to work and to be effective. The Government did not give it a chance to complete a fiscal year and have a proper review of its successes to that date. The Government did not call for public hearings or ask the producers what they wanted done. Nor did it ask the Canagrex people themselves. The decision was made, the guillotine fell and that was tough luck.

But that is not an appropriate way to operate, Mr. Speaker. People were in place making a contribution and doing the job that Parliament gave them to do. It seems to me that it would have been very much more sensible if the Conservatives felt for ideological reasons that they were against Canagrex to review the situation and look at the actual record before making the decision. Why not at least ensure that the right decision is being made? We in this Party do not like to see these kinds of abstract, ideological decisions made without reference to the actual facts, the real situation in the industry itself.

Certainly the farmers themselves and the National Farmers Union, for example, were very concerned that they were not consulted. Wayne Easter, the President of the National Farmers Union, criticized the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) for playing politics in his Budget speech and for moving so quickly to eliminate the newly created Crown agency. He said:

> "The new government is obviously playing politics," explained Easter. "While the Tories were opposed to the creation of Canagrex on ideological grounds, there is no justification for closing down the agency while it is still in its infancy. Canagrex should be given some time to prove its worth both to farmers and to the Canadian public."

It seems to me that that is a perfectly reasonable approach. Even in the face of the Conservative ideological position, the Government could have held off for a few months and given Canagrex a chance. It could have given the producers themselves the opportunity to say whether or not it was helping their sales abroad.

The National Farmers Union President noted that the move to slash Canagrex illustrated the Government's misguided priorities in regard to the agriculture sector. Rather than taking action on very pressing issues like farm finance, low commodity prices and interest rates, the Government chose instead to talk about the problem. Other areas which would more properly be dealt with through greater discussion, such as Canagrex, were instead subjected to immediate and damaging action.

I think this is one of the things we are concerned about. Prompt action was taken for ideological reasons on something that was not a problem. We certainly have not had any reason to think that there was a problem with Canagrex because it was not in operation for long enough to see if it was a problem. Certainly the first reports indicated that Canagrex was acting efficiently and effectively. Yet all these other far more important problems were not dealt with. Problems like farmers losing their farms, suffering from low prices and not being able to pay off their bank loans are crucial problems, but they are being neglected so that the Conservatives can pursue a policy determined abstractly in a back room somewhere after reading the works of Margaret Thatcher or something to that effect.

The President of the National Farmers Union suggested that the Government should at least have waited until March 31, the end of the Government's fiscal year, in order to give the agency time to get established. Then the more appropriate course would have been to put Canagrex on the carpet by holding public hearings to assess the value of the agency. By giving Canagrex the opportunity to justify its existence and by allowing farmers to make an informed choice on whether or not the agency is worth while, an educated decision could have been made.

I am sorry to see that the decision that has been made is not an educated one. It is an abstract, theoretical, ideological decision and that is not what Canadians want. Canadians want practicality, particularly for smaller, independent producers who do not have big business behind them, the ones who do not have access to stronger marketing agencies. Those are the people Parliament ought to have foremost in its mind when providing assistance to agriculture.

There seems to be no doubt among people who have followed Canagrex's very short career that even during the period it was in operation, it demonstrated that there was an important need for export assistance for agricultural producers. Most other sectors of Canada's exporting community have specific instruments which can provide assistance in selling their products abroad. Of course, in big business, the corporations themselves are strong. In other sectors, there is government assistance in marketing.

For example, the industrial sector has the Export Development Corporation which has a budget that allows it to provide enormous assistance by way of loans, insurance, marketing advice and contacts. All of these kinds of things are provided in other sectors. It seems to be extremely unfair that this very modest agency in the agricultural sector with its very small budget which had begun to meet a need should be chopped.

Producers need assistance in selling their very fine products. The problem is not with production, it is with exports. The problem is in getting those crops out into the markets and starting to reverse the very substantial trade deficit in non-grain agricultural products. This of course can be absolutely vital to the economy.

We already have efficient producers in the renewable resources. We depend so much for our exports on resources that are not renewable while agriculture is renewable. This is the kind of economic measure we would like to see developed. We want to see more emphasis put on renewable resources in a concerted way through production, sales and marketing to ensure that our producers can actually sell their products abroad.

The producers of military products and capital projects have another Crown corporation, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which provides them specific assistance in implementing projects abroad. This sector that is not making the same kind of wholesome contribution is favoured by government assistance in marketing its products.

The need for Canagrex was recognized because the agricultural community had no instrument available to it that could provide assistance in attacking the complex world of international trade. It was apparent that the agricultural community, considered by some to be the least sophisticated in looking beyond Canada's borders for foreign markets, needed expertise and financial instruments to open up new opportunities for its very excellent producers, who needed to widen their markets so they could get their products sold. This would have reversed the trade deficit in non-grain agricultural products.

The Minister of Agriculture at the time Canagrex was brought in, the Hon. Eugene Whelan, had held the portfolio for some 12 years and had recognized very soon after his appointment that Canada had not recognized its potential as a bread-basket of the world. In the late 1970s, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture complained about missed opportunities for Canadian producers in export markets. It was also seen that most other major agricultural exporting nations had organizations as part of their Governments or created by their Governments to provide export assistance in agriculture.

Seeing what other countries were doing and recognizing pressure from the producers, Canada finally moved in the late 1970s and eventually in 1981, brought Canagrex in for approval. We were finally starting to give our farmers the kind of assistance that other countries were giving theirs.

I can see that my time is just about up. I want to register very clearly my opposition and that of my Party to this very precipitous move on the part of the Government to chop Canagrex before it has had a chance to prove itself in a concerted way, and after initial reports of its success have shown that it was making a contribution. In fact, it was acting as producers had hoped it would. It was acting as an advocate for agriculture. I will certainly be opposing the Government's move to shut down this agency that our producers very much need.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to the speech of the Hon. Member. I want to compliment her for speaking so eloquently about this erroneous initiative on the part of the Tories. It is not the first time they have been wrong-headed, as you know, being the objective person you are.

The Tories want to abolish Canagrex at a time when there has been an onslaught of farm subsidies by the U.S. It comes at a time when the U.S. is taking a particular initiative, one we do not like, in assisting its farmers in the export market. I am thinking of the provisions of the U.S. Farm Bill, specifically designed to displace the exports of other countries. This has the effect of lowering commodity prices for our farmers. At the same time our Government is embarking on another wrong-headed initiative, the free trade negotiations.

Given all that, would it not be more appropriate for the Tories to support Canagrex in order to increase our multilateral trade and ensure that we do not become even more dependent upon the U.S. than we are now? We would have some ability to defend ourselves when the U.S., or any other country for that matter, brings in the kind of initiatives we see in the U.S. Farm Bill which amount to some $70 billion worth of subsidies to displace the exports of other countries.

Would the Hon. Member not agree that the Government would be far better advised to do that rather than take this approach which has lost them support both federally and provincially, as we saw last night?

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member raises a number of extremely important questions in his remarks. I share the suspicion of many people that the abolition of Canagrex is perhaps one offering by the Conservative Party to the Americans in order to obtain a free trade deal. The Government likes to say it is not, but of course we are not in the room when these things are discussed so we cannot verify it one way or another.

Pursuing a trade deal with the U.S. will mean we will be dominated even more by the American economy. The U.S. is already our major trading partner and probably will be for the foreseeable future, but we would like to see more multilateral trade and a diversification of our export markets. Canagrex would have been part of that diversification. In a sense it is needed now more than ever.

The Hon. Member referred to the mass of subsidies to American producers. While Canagrex by itself cannot cope with that kind of situation, it would at least help our farmers market their products around the world. We need to be diversifying into new markets and Canagrex would help us achieve that goal.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I represent an urban constituency but I feel it important that I speak on this issue because so many of the people I represent work for the railways or work in the plants which produce agricultural machinery. Their well-being is to a large extent dependent upon the well-being of the farmers they serve.

I could not help but be surprised by the laughter from the Conservative benches when my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), spoke in support of this Bill. It seems to me that our Conservative friends will never learn, no matter what happens to them. Given the disaster they suffered yesterday in the Province of Ontario where they went from governing that province for more than 40 years to being the third Party, surely they should have realized that the people have demonstrated that they do not accept the Conservative philosophy that the best Government is a Government that does the least; just let the free enterprise system operate without interference or direction by Government and everything will be fine according to the Conservatives. Surely they should have learned from yesterday's election, as they will learn in the soon to be held New Brunswick election, that the people of Canada do not accept that principle and are not going to support a Party which endorses it.

We are not living in paradise. We are not living in some theoretical world. The facts of life are that almost every country, whether it has a Government of the supposed right or left, has intervened very substantially to help its agricultural sector. Whether it be the U.S., France, Germany, Great Britain or Japan, to mention just a few of the major countries, it is realized that the free enterprise system does not always work in ways which help people. For that reason they have all become involved in a variety of ways, through tariffs, quotas or the extension of cheap credit, in plans to help their people.

Let us look just at agriculture. The world is producing more food than it ever did before and we have more hungry people. It has been estimated that there are at least 500 million hungry people in the world. We have great food surpluses, not because people do not need the food but because many of those people cannot afford to buy it.

The agricultural sector of our economy is in great trouble. When our grain farmers can sell their grain they are selling it at the lowest prices we have seen since the hungry thirties. They are taking a loss on every bushel of grain they sell. Our fruit farmers, vegetable farmers and dairy farmers are all in great difficulty, not because they are not efficient and cannot produce a high quality product but because of the support given to farmers of other countries.

The Americans have taken over markets which Canada has had for many years by subsidizing the price of grain to their farmers. The European Economic Community has mountains of butter because it has subsidized the production of it as it has beef and many other products. That is the situation our farmers have to face.

It is not as though our governments, federal and provincial, have followed the free market approach in the field of agriculture. We have marketing boards and agencies at both levels established over the years by Liberal, Conservative, NDP, Parti Quebecois and Social Credit governments. Most of those governments believed in a free enterprise system but realized that the reality of life for agricultural producers is that we need forms of supply management if farmers are to continue to produce and not have to cut back on their standard of living or declare bankruptcy, as thousands, if not tens of thousands, of them have done.

Canagrex was one of the few good ideas brought forward by the former Liberal Government. It was a way of helping Canadian farmers sell their products on the export markets. That proposal received the support of a number of the major farm organizations in this country. The President of the National Farmers Union, Mr. Wayne Easter, said in a statement issued March 14, 1985:

> The Canadian farmer for which Canagrex was established deserves better, and the federal government's unwillingness to consult either the industry or Canagrex officials prior to the November 8/84 announcement by the Minister of Agriculture is nothing more than a slap in the face to farmers across Canada.

He was talking, of course, about the announcement by the Conservative Government that it proposed to do away with Canagrex.

The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the Manitoba Wheat Pool, which represent a majority of the grain farmers in those two provinces, have spoken up in favour of the establishment and continued operation of Canagrex.

We must ask ourselves why the Government is doing this. It is doing it, as I have indicated, in part because of its fixation with the idea that the free enterprise system and getting government out of the running of the economy as much as possible is a fundamental part of its principle? Another reason was mentioned by my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. She talked about the insane desire and determination of the Conservative Government to press ahead for a free trade agreement with the United States on almost any terms.

Last night on The National, after quite a bit of time spent relating the disaster which the Conservatives suffered in the Ontario election, we heard some news from Washington. In answer to a question from Republican Senator Lugar of Indiana and the American Secretary of State, George Shultz, made it very clear that the United States would not agree, in a free trade agreement with Canada, to give up the power which the American Congress has to countervail. What kind of free trade agreement will we have if every time some American industry believes it is being hurt by Canadian competition it can put on a tariff?

We need only look at the Province of Saskatchewan. There was no stronger supporter of free trade than Conservative Premier Devine of Saskatchewan. When the producers of potash in New Mexico said that they could not compete with the much more efficient potash industry in Saskatchewan a tariff of 68 per cent, if my memory is correct, was suddenly imposed.

That great defender of free trade, Mr. Devine, then brought in legislation which no federal or provincial government in Canada has ever before brought forward. I am not being critical. I am not sure he made the right decision, but he realized he had to take very drastic action to protect that industry which has sales of several billion dollars a year and employs 4,000 Saskatchewan workers. This approach to free trade is another illustration of the absolute irresponsibility and stupidity of the Conservative Government.

Some may have thought that Canagrex, which was established by the Liberal Government with the approval of the NDP and the initial approval at least of the Conservatives, would eliminate the private sector and interfere with the ability of the private companies involved in the grain, beef or pork industries to continue to operate as they always have. Nothing could be further from the truth. The role of Canagrex was simply to help the Canadian producers of grain, pork, beef and tobacco, and the companies involved in those industries, to make sales overseas. It was beginning to play a very useful and important role until the Government, in its mad insistence on the free enterprise system, decided that Canagrex should be abolished.

Mr. Speaker, it is 11 o'clock.

PLEA ON BEHALF OF IRIS PADILLA MASON

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Today, Mr. Speaker, I have a request to make to the Minister responsible for citizenship. I am referring to Mrs. Iris Padilla Mason who was born in Santiago, Chile, who taught for 20 years, and who was imprisoned in 1974.

On the occasion of the international Liberal meeting she came to make representations this morning and to tell us how she had been victimized, but also to ask for her Canadian citizenship. She first came to Canada in 1976 as a refugee and then became an immigrant, but she has been unable to obtain her citizenship papers. She told us that for two years now she has been making every attempt to become a Canadian citizen but that the Department has failed to respond.

I therefore urge the Minister responsible for citizenship—I know he gives due consideration to such requests!—to pay particular attention to the case of Mrs. Iris Padilla Mason.

PROSTITUTION

JUVENILE PROSTITUTION RING—POLICE FORCES COMMENDED

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the appreciation of the House of Commons ought to be extended to the police forces of Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa who have co-operated successfully to break up a juvenile prostitution ring which was operating in those cities.

The very idea of child prostitution is abhorrent to Canadians, and adults who lure children into the practice and then live off the avails should be dealt with as forcefully as the law allows. Since many of the young people involved in this particular case were wards of the Children's Aid Society, perhaps there is a need to review our system of child welfare.

HEALTH

IRRADIATION OF FOOD—COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the committee investigating the irradiation of food in Canada studied the issue for many months. It received many briefs and held hearings in Ottawa and other parts of Canada.

The evidence which they examined included over 800 studies of the food irradiation issue. The overwhelming majority of those studies either opposed food irradiation or were neutral in terms of posing all sorts of unanswered questions regarding the irradiation of food. Those very few in favour tended to be linked in some way to the nuclear industry.

After hard work in a non-partisan atmosphere, the committee made important recommendations to the Minister and the Government regarding what it should do in terms of food irradiation. Yesterday, the Minister essentially turned his back on the recommendations and has ignored them all.

At a time when states in the U.S. are passing legislation to ban the irradiation of food and when other countries are looking into it and seriously considering similar steps, Canada appears to be moving ahead. I urge the Minister to consider the recommendations of the committee and accept them.

VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

OPENING OF UNITED WAY CAMPAIGN IN OTTAWA-CARLETON

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this morning, together with my colleagues, the Member for Ottawa—Carleton (Mr. Turner), the Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney), and the Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), I attended a breakfast with 1,000 volunteers to kick off the United Way campaign in Ottawa-Carleton. This year the goal is some $9.2 million in support of 70 programs delivered through 48 agencies.

The United Way is a volunteer non-profit organization that pulls our community together. It matches the human care needs with our resources through one annual fund-raising drive. Volunteers determine its standards, direction, and priorities.

Mr. Speaker, I welcomed your recent endorsement of the United Way campaign among employees who work for Parliament.

Similar campaigns will be starting all across Canada. As Members of Parliament, I urge each of us to recognize their importance and to support this most valuable program in our towns and cities across the nation.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

ELECTION OF LIBERAL GOVERNMENT IN ONTARIO

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the people of Ontario gave this province its first majority Liberal Government in 50 years. They did so with a resounding majority. They said no to Larry Grossman's pro free trade, anti-bilingualism campaign. This morning there is nothing left to do but to sweep up the blue ashes.

The messiah from Oshawa, who leads the NDP in Ottawa, was no more successful as his Party lost a large number of seats in this provincial election, under the great Liberal tide that swept Ontario yesterday.

Throughout Ontario, from Prescott—Russell to the southwestern part of our province, and from the north to Lake Ontario, the people said no to Larry Grossman and said yes to David Peterson. They said yes to good Liberal government, and very shortly the same people will say no to those Tory pro freetraders from Ottawa and will say yes to another great Liberal Party led by the Right Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner).

TRIBUTE TO HULL ATHLETE, MICHEL CAREAU

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to draw the attention of the House to a major and notable achievement which has received very little publicity in Canada, except from the sports media. Last June, Hull athlete Michel Careau accumulated more miles in an organized race than any other Canadian marathoner or ultramarathoner. In fact, he came in second in the New York race, which puts him in second place among the best runners in the world over very long distances. Only three runners have succeeded in breaking the psychological 1,000-mile barrier in a race against the clock: The winner, Marty Sprengelmeyer of the United States, Michel Careau of Canada in second place, and Dan Coffey of Britain in third place.

Mr. Careau, a senior public servant at the federal Department of National Health and Welfare, often takes part in races held for charity and humanitarian causes. Last August 8, he made a speech on peace at the United Nations on the occasion of an international race for peace held in 57 countries.

Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to join with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), who is very proud and happy to have Mr. Michel Careau on his team, in paying a public tribute to this great Canadian who brings us honour, not only in Canada, but everywhere he goes to run against the best known athletes in the sport of long distance running.

FRANCHISING POLICY—EFFECT ON WOMEN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Post Office's policy of franchising rural post offices is not only causing a loss of service in rural Canada, it is also bringing about drastic cuts in income for rural post office employees.

If that is not enough to call this policy into question, we must keep in mind the fact that 80 per cent of post office workers in rural Canada are women.

Will the Government continue the policy of asking women to subsidize Canadian society unfairly? Will it fight the deficit in the Post Office on the backs of women who, in some cases, are being asked to have their wages cut by one-fifth? It is time for this injustice to stop.

It is time to question the policy of franchising when, rather than achieve equality, it increases inequality for women in our society.

INFORMATION AND POPULARIZATION EFFORT FOR UPCOMING GENERATION

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, last week, the Young Farmers' Regional Centre of the Lac-Saint-Jean constituency launched the game "Défi-Relève".

The purpose of this game is to make players aware of the difficulties of farming. It also provides information on the farming relief groups in Quebec and explains the work of the farmer, in addition to promoting dialogue in farming families and educating people who are not familiar with farming.

I wish to underline the information and popularization effort this game represents.

The farming community is of vital importance for Canada and it is essential for the whole population to know something about it, and I believe that this game can contribute to this end. Congratulations on this initiative!

BILINGUALISM

UNEQUIVOCAL CHOICE OF ONTARIO

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte Marie): Both as a Canadian and Francophone Quebecer, Mr. Speaker, I am proud of the choice Ontario people made yesterday. I am proud not because they elected Liberals—that is for sure—but because they rejected all those who opposed bilingualism. They rejected outright and unquestionably all those men and women who would not progress with the Canadian people as a whole. You can rest assured that as a Francophone Quebecer, I am proud and I congratulate my federal colleagues from Ontario, as well as the people from Ontario for their choice. As the Honourable Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) was saying, the Ontario people have heard the message of such pioneers as the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier and the Hon. Member for Glengarrry—Prescott—Russell who have fought for the Francophone minority. I think that as Quebecers, we can be proud to have remained in Canada!

MARINE SAFETY

RETENTION OF LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS URGED

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, of the many reasons for the Mulroney Government's unpopularity, one reason must surely be because of its continued efforts to automate Canada's lightstations in order to end the long tradition of service performed by our nation's lightkeepers. This week the government-appointed Leblond review on the impact of de-staffing the B.C. lightstations concluded: "Sufficient evidence has been found to conclude that a human presence is not absolutely necessary to keep lights and foghorns functioning at a satisfactory level of reliability".

While this view may agree with the continued wish of the Mulroney Government to eliminate important services wherever and whenever possible, it is not the view of ordinary British Columbians. The British Columbians who sail our coast have spoken with one voice against any further decrease in marine safety and against the elimination of lightkeepers.

Lightkeepers have logged hundreds upon hundreds of hours of lifesaving search and rescue work, work that could never be done by a machine. No one but this Government has been willing to suggest that lightkeepers are a waste of money and that their functions should be automated.

One month from now the Coast Guard will table its final plans for de-staffing West Coast lightstations. As long as the reliability of automated equipment remains in doubt, as long as lightkeepers continue to deliver an important service to our nation's mariners, the Government must give up its life-threatening policy of ignoring the needs of our coastal residents.

No more closures. No more reductions. British Columbians say that today and they will say it again in the next election.

THE SENATE

CALL FOR PASSAGE OF BILL C-22 TO AMEND PATENT ACT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the unelected Senate has decided to stall Bill C-22 by referring it to its Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I agree the Senate does have a role to play, but by sending Bill C-22 back the first time with amendments, it has already utilized its powers. It has not been elected by Canadians to be the Government, and by repeating its tactics it just serves to prove that changes must be made to the Upper Chamber.

The facts are clear. The same committee, which is now going to examine the legislation, refused to pre-study it last November 28. After more than 150 hours of Senate debate, there is now nothing further to study or review. This legislation has also received more time in debate in our Chamber than any other Bill this session.

The Senate is jeopardizing at least 3,000 jobs and $1.4 billion in investment. By its first delay alone, companies which had announced plans to expand operations pending the passage of Bill C-22 have now had to put their plans on hold. Universities and teaching hospitals were also counting on the millions of dollars in promised new research funds for this fall's curricula and programs. They must now wait longer.

This Government was elected by the majority of Canadians who want research and development to grow in Canada. The Senate does not have the support of any one in this country to continue stalling Bill C-22. It does not even have the support of its Leader, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner). I call on Members of the other Chamber to come to their senses and pass Bill C-22.

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

VISIT TO CANADA BY HEAD OF CHINA WELFARE FUND FOR THE HANDICAPPED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, next week Deng Pufang, the son of Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping, is visiting Canada. I would like to welcome him to Canada. This is an important visit. Mr. Deng is the Director General of the China Welfare Fund for the Handicapped. He himself is handicapped. He is confined to a wheelchair after being crippled when he was thrown out of an upper-storey window at Beijing University during the excesses of the Cultural Revolution. He is returning to Ottawa where he was treated in the Ottawa Civic Hospital.

Our relations with China are very important. I think it will be the country of the 21st Century, along with Canada. We have made great progress in Canada, particularly in the House of Commons, with our facilities for the handicapped in the last couple of years. Let us show Mr. Deng the progress we have made. Let us co-operate with the Chinese so we can perhaps give to them some of the ideas we have developed, and they can use them in their own country where there are 20 million handicapped people.

For the fourth month in a row the number of help-wanted ads in Canada has increased. That shows there are jobs around. In Ontario we are having difficulty filling construction jobs and jobs in the service industry. There is a prosperity in Canada that began September 4, 1984, when this Government was elected.

Our Leader was laughed at for promising "jobs, jobs, jobs". What a laugh for a million jobs! Our prosperity will continue as long as we have the good management of this Government. I know the confidence of all Canadians has been restored with respect to investment in Canada.

POLITICAL PARTIES

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY'S POLICY ON USE OF VIOLENCE IN AFRICA

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the Ottawa Citizen this morning there is a Canadian Press article which states:

> The New Democratic Party's external affairs spokesman said Thursday her Party supports the use of violence by black Africans as a way to end South Africa's apartheid regime.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that I spent many years living and working in east and central Africa. I have travelled throughout most of Commonwealth Africa. I ask you, Sir, the question: is violence the key to the solution in Uganda, Chad, Zaire or the Sudan? It is certainly not the key to the solution, and it is also not the key to the solution in Central America where there is tremendous violence going on.

The Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) went on to say that sometimes a resort to violence is absolutely essential in the struggle. That may be true, but to endorse violence in the House of Commons of Canada is completely barbaric and unacceptable. This comes from the Party that wanted to invade St. Pierre and Miquelon, that wanted to bring in the gunboats and go to war with France over the fishing disagreement between Newfoundland and Canada. That is absolutely unbelievable. It calls itself the Party of the common people. Pretty soon it is going to be inciting violence in Canada against some policies of the Government of Canada.

Now I know why the New Democrats want to pull out of NATO and NORAD and bring the troops home, because they are going to incite violence in Canada because they disagree with some of the things we as the Government are doing. This is unbelievable.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—USE OF VIOLENCE—SEVERANCE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Conservative position on South Africa is all over the map, and I want to give the Government another opportunity to come clean with Canadians. The Prime Minister, to the great applause of the United Nations at the session two years ago, promised total economic sanctions. He promised a breach of diplomatic relations if the situation continued to deteriorate.

Mr. Riis: Take a stand today. Don't wimp out.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Secretary of State for External Affairs has taken a different position. He did impose some sanctions. He now says that sanctions are not the answer. Yet he admits that Canada believes that the situation in South Africa is deteriorating.

I heard an interjection from my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap. The official position of the New Democratic Party on South Africa is dangerous. The NDP says that severing diplomatic relations with South Africa would be too harsh, yet it supports violence as a solution.

Does the Government reject violence out of hand as a solution to the South Africa problem? And when will the Prime Minister get the Government's act together, fulfil the commitment made to the United Nations, and advance the case in Vancouver that there must be total diplomatic sanctions and there has to be a breach of diplomatic relations, on a firm schedule?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position articulated by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is, in my judgment, calculated to achieve headlines in Canada rather than progress in South Africa.

What we are attempting to do is to continue to build pressure for change, pressure upon the South African Government to bring an end to the apartheid regime. We have been able to use Canada's influence constructively in that regard at Nassau, and at the Venice Summit. We expect to be able to contribute substantially and significantly to that process at the Heads of Government meeting in Vancouver.

With regard to the position concerning violence, I made that position clear yesterday in response to the NDP endorsement of violence.

VIOLATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS OF BLACK AFRICANS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister received his share of favourable headlines two years ago when he made his speech in the United Nations to which I referred.

I met with Oliver Tambo recently, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister had their own meeting with him. Mr. Tambo did not ask me to have Canada provide military aid to the front-line states, nor did he ask Canada to encourage violence. What he asked our country for was an imposition of total economic sanctions and for a breach of diplomatic relations. The Prime Minister said he would impose such sanctions, both economically and diplomatically, if the situation deteriorated.

• (1120)

The prime and moral issue for the world is that the human rights of 26 million black Africans are being violated and trampled upon year by year, month by month, and day by day.

Therefore, why has the Prime Minister reversed the position he advanced on behalf of Canada at the United Nations, and why is the Government not fulfilling that commitment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I say, with all affection for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, that if he wishes to improve his standing in the country, he should choose some other issue. The charge he is making against the Prime Minister is not only false, but it is known to be false across this country and, more important, it is known to be false across and throughout Africa.

Under this Prime Minister the constructive role that Canada has played in attempting to build effective pressure against South Africa to bring about an end to apartheid is understood, for example, by President Houphouet-Boigny of Côte d'Ivoire, it is understood by President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, and it is understood by President Chissano of Mozambique. It is understood in the front-line states throughout Africa.

They may not understand the imperative of a Canadian politician seeking headlines at home, but they understand and applaud what Canada is doing internationally.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): With the greatest respect, if not affection, that I have for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I am not misstating the position of the Prime Minister; I am reciting his speech to the United Nations on behalf of our country. That record will bear me out.

SOUTH AFRICA—IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS—CONSEQUENCES FOR CANADA

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Government claims that our country will lose its influence if we impose total economic sanctions or break off diplomatic ties with South Africa. But what influence did we have in South Africa over the past two years? And what influence are we going to lose by insisting on a moral position on human rights in South Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Again, Mr. Speaker, I can quote the words of South Africa United Democratic Front spokesman Alan Boesack. I had a meeting with Mr. Boesack when I was there and he stated that the activities of Canada, and even my presence in South Africa, were a strong encouragement to those who are opposed to apartheid in South Africa.

I can also indicate that since the Commonwealth Conference in Nassau the Canadian Government has played a leading role by establishing a sanction program endorsed by the Commonwealth and the United States, and adopted in part by the European Economic Community.

There have been sanctions with an economic impact in South Africa. There have been sanctions with a psychological impact in South Africa. What we must seek now are other means to maintain pressure. Leaving the House is no way to maintain pressure.

IMMIGRATION

GROSSMANN AFFAIR—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and deals with the George Grossmann issue. The House was recalled as a matter of emergency this summer to consider two Bills, C-84 and C-85, in order to put an end to so-called immigration abuses. They have been considered and passed. Everyone says that in the Georges Grossmann case, there were three interventions—one at least from the Minister's office, and another one from the Prime Minister's Office, to speed up matters and have Mr. Grossmann's application jump the line.

I am asking the Deputy Prime Minister, today in all fairness and in order to clear up the matter, whether he does not feel the time has come to refer the whole matter to a public commission of inquiry in order to shed full light on this case.

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, again let me categorically repudiate those allegations of impropriety or illegality which I have clearly set out this week.

Over 7,000 letters are received by my office. There are criteria under which certain concerns may be considered, usually on humanitarian and compassionate conditions. In Mr. Grossmann's case I will again clearly lay out what took place for those who were not with us yesterday.

In January a letter was referred to my office for our attention. In the month of May I decided to proceed with inland processing by asking that the Deputy Minister see that a Minister's permit was issued. From then on nothing further has to be done on my part, it is a routine and normal processing. I do not follow it up. I know that all goes well. I know that this takes place over 15,000 times a year, 99 per cent of the time by officials who advance such a permit.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On that issue I side with Renaud Paquet, the president of the union, who stated yesterday that "when we receive a letter from the Prime Minister's Office it has more impact than a letter that is received from anybody else". The Minister has to admit that fact. In this case the Prime Minister's Office intervened.

My question to the Minister—

Mr. Shields: Is he no longer a Member of Parliament? Is that what you are saying? You have got to be crazy.

An Hon. Member: How many have you put forward?

Mr. Gauthier: The whole thing flies in the face of the Government. It makes a mockery of recalling Parliament this summer supposedly to study alleged abuse of the immigration system.

Why does the Minister not follow the recommendations of the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Immigration who stated yesterday that he feels the whole matter should be referred to the committee for study and consideration? Why does he not follow the advice of his own Member?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I tabled the guidelines for conditions under which we are able to act. I guess I have already given the answer, and it is no use repeating what I said.

Clearly we have a case here where the individual has been in the country for over six years, employment authorizations had been renewed each time for six consecutive years, his long-term prospects are good in the country, and he has a son who is apparently married to a Canadian who could have sponsored him. Everything to do with this case was completely normal. It took us four months of review, and that is how we had to act in a very appropriate fashion.

I might say that business is as usual. The Members are still continuing to send in their representations, make phone calls, and send letters. I guess they feel that they are the only ones who can do so, ordinary Canadians cannot. But I reserve the right to be able to receive representations from any Canadian, journalist, lawyer, or elected people who have a concern to bring to us. On Global Television Peter Trueman stated that "more than once as a citizen I have written letters and even telephoned various federal-provincial Ministers to try to get what I believed would be fairer treatment for a deserving individual or organization. In my view there are too many glass houses around for this frenzy of stone-throwing to be safely continued".

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—BINDING DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of International Trade.

The U.S. Secretary of State, George Shultz, was reported by the CBC this morning—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh! Come on!

Mr. Keeper: What have you got against the CBC, boys?

Mr. Langdon: —the national network of the country, to have rejected a binding dispute settlement mechanism as part of any free trade arrangement with the United States.

Because the Minister has not recently had the opportunity to put it clearly before the House, I wish to ask her if she could state that the Government will not sign any deal which does not have within it a complete and ironclad dispute settlement mechanism which is binding on the United States.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the CBC quote that the Hon. Member referred to is, as is not unusual, incorrect in the analysis of Secretary of State Shultz's statement. I have that statement here. Secretary of State Shultz was welcoming the chance to discuss this, underlining how important it was, underlining the Prime Minister's and President Reagan's meeting at the summit, and saying that he hopes we will reach an agreement in a very short period of time. He describes the fact that the dispute settlement process is of concern to both countries, and is very important.

I can only repeat what the Prime Minister has said in the clearest way possible, that even the CBC should be able to transcribe the message. What I have said and what others have said is that there is little point in a trade treaty that does not include a way of settling disputes in an impartial and binding manner on both countries. Otherwise the trade treaty would have no real effect.

• (1130)

That is why it is central to our position. The Prime Minister has made that clear, we have made it clear in the House, and Ambassador Reisman has made it clear.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to see that the Conservative Party is clearly now running against the CBC as well as the Opposition.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, so far—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We will stop short of violence.

Mr. Langdon: —the polls have turned against free trade. Key labour and business groups reject it. The U.S. is playing hardball on it, and provinces like Ontario have set very harsh conditions on the issue.

Does the Minister not think that it is time to back off and adopt a whole new trade strategy?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are satisfied that our two-track trade policy is working. We are pushing ahead with the U.S. bilateral. We are pushing ahead with our multilateral efforts.

I would like to correct the Hon. Member who has been absent and may not be aware of this. We have just released a poll today which shows that the majority of Canadians continue to support the position on free trade. A poll commissioned by our Department in late August reports that 50 per cent of Canadians continue to think that the idea of free trade is a good one. That is essentially unchanged from June.

In terms of the harsh conditions which the Hon. Member supports, may I point out that the conditions about which Premier Peterson is talking are very similar and very supportive of the motion we passed in the House, wherein we said that the House supports negotiation of a bilateral trading arrangement with the United States as part of the Government's multilateral trade policy, while protecting our political sovereignty, our social programs, our agricultural marketing systems, our auto industry, and our unique cultural identity. I am pleased that Premier Peterson is supportive of our national objectives.

Mr. Langdon: Especially after the election this may turn out to be true, but I hope not.

REQUEST THAT GENERAL ELECTION BE HELD ON ISSUE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister and the Government have no popular mandate for free trade, will the Government agree that any potential deal will be taken to the country in a general election before Canada is locked in by treaty?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, our mandate for free trade comes from the 211 Members that Canadians elected three years ago to run the country. That is where our mandate came from.

In terms of his suggestion of a general election, it is not within my powers as Trade Minister to accommodate the Hon. Member on this issue. I can only point out that the Prime Minister has promised that there will be a full debate on the issue in the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MADAME SIMONE VEIL, MR. RODRIGUE ESQUIVAL, HON. STEINGRIMUR HERMANNSON, RIGHT HON. DAVID STEELE, AND SENATOR GIOVANNI MALAGODI

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! I would like to call the Hon. Members' attention to the presence in our gallery of Mr. Rodrigue Esquival, Vice President and Leader of the Liberal Party of Panama, Madame Simone Veil, former President of the European Parliament,

[English]

—the Honourable Steingrimur Hermannson, Minister of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade and former Prime Minister of Iceland; the Right Honourable David Steele, Leader of the British Liberal Party; and Senator Giovanni Malagodi of Italy, President of Liberal International.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF CHINESE TRADE DELEGATION

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw the attention of Hon. Members to the presence in the gallery today of a trade delegation from China, led by the Vice-Mayor of Shanghai, Mr. Zhao-Ji Li.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to the issue of free trade with the United States. With respect to a mandate, and just as a preamble to my question, I should like to ask the Hon. Minister how she can say that there is a mandate for free trade when it was not mentioned during the last election and her Leader campaigned against it when he sought the leadership of his Party.

In particular, is it not correct that Secretary of State Shultz said that any dispute settlement mechanism with his country will have to be consistent with United States trade laws?

How can there be a dispute settlement mechanism whose rulings are binding on both countries and still be consistent with American trade laws? Is he not clearly telling the Government that a supposed key condition for a free trade deal simply is not on? Is this not a signal that there is no deal unless the Government is going to cave in on this key demand?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker.

CONTINUATION OF TALKS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if there have already been signals from key American Senators and from Secretary of State Shultz that this supposed key demand by the Government for a mechanism whose rulings will be binding on both Governments in trade disputes is unacceptable, why is the Minister continuing these talks when it is clear that these talks will lead to a result which will not be in the best interests of Canada and contrary to the needs of Canadians on jobs and sovereignty? Why is she continuing on this path without any real mandate from the Canadian people?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, when the Government ran for office successfully we ran on the mandate of creating jobs, and we have been very successful in that issue. We will shortly be creating the millionth job since the Government took office.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Do you have one for Mr. Grossman?

Miss Carney: May I point out that the free trade initiative is about jobs; that is what it is. It is about jobs in all regions of the country. The Economic Council of Canada has estimated that there will be 350,000 new jobs created by this initiative and that, in the absence of it, Canadians stand to lose jobs because of protectionism in the United States.

Our mandate comes from our promise to create jobs, and we are delivering on that mandate.

IMMIGRATION

GRANTING OF LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS—INVOLVEMENT OF OFFICIALS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Immigration and concerns the Grossmann issue—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Which one?

Mr. Riis: The immigration issue. Yesterday the Minister left a very crucial question unanswered. The Minister stated that this was a very simple, straightforward, and routine immigration case. As a matter of fact he stated that again today, as he has on a number of occasions.

If that is the case, would the Minister then explain to the House, and to the people of Canada who are very interested in the issue, why it was that every senior immigration officer in the country, from the Prime Minister's Office down, was involved in it? If this was simple, straightforward, and routine, why were all the senior people involved in this particular Grossmann issue?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, what is very simple and straightforward is that on May 4 I indicate my intention by Minister's permit to advance inland processing. I do that by asking the Deputy Minister to carry through with the process. I do not follow up what procedures may then take place. That is not for me to do. That is technical.

Perhaps the Hon. Member has not had a complete briefing on how the Immigration Department functions, but we know that everything goes well following my asking the Deputy Minister to do what is my intention.

It is a normal part of immigration processing. As I said, almost 16,000 times a year this is carried on. I only wish that the Hon. Member and others would not try to confuse the issue with other issues that may be on the table dealing with the arrival of illegal migrants in the country.

• (1140)

DISCHARGE OF MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, we are all familiar with individuals who are caught in very unpredictable circumstances and require various kinds of interventions. Is the Minister of State for Immigration saying today that in all cases, particularly those involving family reunification, that the Minister will give equal consideration—

Mr. Shields: He does now.

Mr. Riis: —in allowing people to qualify for landed immigrant status from within Canada? In other words, will he treat all similar cases to the Grossmann case with the same enthusiasm and commitment?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, what I am proud of is the commitment that I have given to all Members of Parliament, how dedicated and with integrity we carry forward on petitions they make to my office. I hang my head high—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Weiner: I hold my head high, excuse me.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Weiner: The Member will recognize that members of his Party and the other Party have praised the quality of the work they have received from our office.

I would like to state very, very quickly that what we have done is completely normal. It is what is expected. It is why Members continue to write and to call and why we reserve that right for all other Canadians, because the Immigration Act gives the Minister the opportunity to act on compassionate and humanitarian grounds. It is that that shows we are a caring and concerned nation.

HONDURAN GROUPS CLAIMING REFUGEE STATUS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Immigration. During the past few weeks there have been a number of groups of Hondurans who have arrived in Vancouver and, upon arriving, have claimed refugee status. It is now reported that another group from Central America has either been detained or turned back at Mexico City.

Can the Minister tell us what steps are being taken to make sure that no bona fide claims are being stopped?

Mr. Keeper: Write Mila.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly very aware of the arrival of the increasing number of Hondurans, more particularly on the West Coast. We are monitoring the situation very carefully.

My information is that more than 1,000 have now come to make a refugee claim in Canada. It is part of the increasing abuse and I say this without trying to predispose whether these people may be refugees or not because I do not make that determination.

The Hon. Member has seen a Government that has now been bombarded with an increasing flow of refugee claimants. The advice that I have been getting from my Refugee Status Advisory Committee is that almost 90 per cent of them are non-bona fide claimants. It is for that reason that, once and for all, this House should get on with the business of passing Bill C-55 and putting in place a refugee determination process that makes sense, that balances fairness with compassion and will offer genuine protection to those who need it. This will keep the abusers out, will stop the traffic and profiteering, and will maintain our proud tradition of being of help to the real refugees of the world.

CITIZENSHIP

REQUEST ON BEHALF OF REFUGEE FAMILY FROM CHILE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State who is responsible for the granting of citizenship. This morning, in the presence of Liberal International, the National Women's Liberal Commission adopted the cause of the family of Iris Mason, a family which has arrived from Chile and has landed immigrant status. This family came from Chile where its members suffered horrible oppression and torture. They have been refused Canadian citizenship by the Government on national security grounds.

The family members appealed to the Security Intelligence Review Committee which recommended that they be given citizenship, but the Government has still refused. I gave the Secretary of State notice of my question which follows.

In light of the tragic circumstances which brought the Mason family to Canada will he accept the advice of the Government's own review committee and grant Canadian citizenship?

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, let me thank the Hon. Member for being in touch with my office just prior to Question Period. It allowed me the opportunity to call for the file. I will take the opportunity to read it over the weekend, and I invite the Hon. Member to meet with me on Monday morning.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE STATEMENT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I would simply like to ask whether the Minister would be willing to make a statement before the end of next week as to whether he is denying citizenship, to let Canadians know his reasons for doing so.

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that what I do is review the file before any action is taken. I am sure the Hon. Member understands that. I have not seen the file. The Member's office called half an hour before Question Period. As I am sure he knows, I was not aware of the case. The responsible course of action is for me to read the file, which I will do over the weekend, and meet with the Hon. Member on Monday morning. At that time we can make a decision which is fair to all.

An Hon. Member: Good answer.

IMMIGRATION

VISITORS FROM CENTRAL AMERICA—VISA REQUIREMENT SUGGESTED

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of State for Immigration. Would the Minister consider requiring visas for visitors coming from Central America to Canada?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, over the last year we have instituted a number of control measures. Obviously some of them have been visas and they have been effective. Those issues are now being studied within the annals and powers of the Government. At the appropriate time, announcements may have to be made.

SENIOR CITIZENS

WIDOWS BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION TO SINGLE WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new Minister of State for Senior Citizens, and I would like to congratulate him on his new job.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Mitchell: Would the Minister take action on two very important matters that were raised repeatedly by the Hon. Stanley Knowles in the past and which have still not been dealt with?

Since most older women who are living alone experience excruciating poverty, will he act immediately to extend the benefits which now are available to widows to cover single women at age 60? Why should benefits be based on whether or not a woman has a man?

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs and Minister of State (Senior Citizens)): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look into this representation and do whatever I can to do what is proper in this case.

OPTIONAL OLD AGE PENSIONS REQUEST

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of policy that we want. This is not just a simple case. We want government policy and we want some change in legislation.

Since more and more older workers are becoming redundant through no fault of their own, will the Minister consider extending optional old age pensions for unemployed persons at age 60? This policy could also open jobs for younger workers.

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs and Minister of State (Senior Citizens)): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look into that representation also.

INJUSTICES TO ELDERLY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister, the Minister of Veterans' Affairs and Minister of State (Senior Citizens). I want to commend him and express the hope that we can work closely together. But I must add right now that the Minister has a long way to go to remedy the inequities inflicted upon senior citizens by his Conservative Government.

In view of present political tendencies, can the Minister state whether he can undertake today to allow senior citizens the right to the spouse's allowance if they are either single, separated or divorced, something this Conservative Government has been denying them?

Secondly, can the Minister promise that he will ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to put an end to this discrimination against older workers who are not entitled to full UI benefits?

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs and Minister of State (Senior Citizens)): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday I have asked seniors and seniors' organizations to get in touch with me and let me know the kinds of things they think should be done to make life better for seniors. I will take the representations I have heard this morning, including that of the Hon. Member who has just made a representation, and I can assure him his representation will be given very good consideration.

MINISTER OF STATE'S RESPONSIBILITIES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): I have a supplementary for the Minister, Mr. Speaker. The Minister says he will consult. Mrs. Denis came to Parliament Hill and told us what senior citizens want. People have now been protesting for three or four years, signing petitions, but what I would like to know is what the Minister's responsibilities are. Is the Minister in charge of the portfolio coming under the Department of National Health and Welfare that involves the New Horizons programs, from which the Government, the Minister of Finance slashed $5 million, or does the Minister simply holds the title of Minister of State (Senior Citizens) without any responsibilities whatsoever?

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs and Minister of State (Senior Citizens)): Mr. Speaker, I will be working very closely with the Department of National Health and Welfare and its very able Minister. We have already started having meetings together. It is with the co-operation of the Department of National Health and Welfare that the new Department of State for Seniors will be working. I am confident that between the two of us we will be able to produce some very good results.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

RADIOCHEMICAL COMPANY—IRRADIATION OF FOOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Government announced that it was backing the wider use of irradiated food. We would like to know why and who in Canada really wants this.

I direct my question to the Minister of State for Privatization. Would she confirm that she said the Government is considering privatizing Radiochemical Company, the arm of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited which is responsible for food irradiation? The Minister knows that AECL is bankrupt without government subsidies. Is this why the Government favours food irradiation? In other words, does it favour it to save the hide of AECL, putting Canadians at risk in the process?

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is out of the House today on business and therefore is not able to respond appropriately, as I am sure he would, to the Hon. Member's question. The reason I am responding is that it struck me as being less a question of privatization and more a question of politics. The Hon. Member can practise that when the Minister returns to the House on Monday.

Mr. Waddell: We are just trying to figure out why the Government is doing this.

[Translation]

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Why does the Minister ignore the recommendations made by the Committee of the House of Commons? Why does the government jeorpadize the health of Canadians to save the hide of Atomic Energy of Canada? Because that is really the reason why the government has decided to favour food irradiation.

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I recall the issue with respect to the recommendations of the committee, the Minister of National Health and Welfare indeed accepted some recommendations and did not accept others, but that is the kind of information—

Mr. Waddell: Thirty-three he rejected.

Mr. Crombie: I can give the Hon. Member an answer if he would give me a chance. When the Minister returns, I am sure that in his normal good fashion he will explain that to the Hon. Member. The Hon. Member knows that the Minister is not here, and that kind of imputation of why the Minister is acting a certain way is clearly out of order, at least in my opinion.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade a question specifically on the subject of opinion polls on free trade. May I say that I too hold my head high. I am still proud to be a Conservative from Ontario.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): However, last night's results in my province are being interpreted by some people as a poll of concern about free trade. Can the Minister comment further on the other poll released earlier this week which suggests that the Government has no mandate to enter a free trade deal with the United States? Has either poll changed the Government's mind?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated, we will be releasing the results of our August poll today. It shows that the support for free trade at the end of August was at 50 per cent which is unchanged from June. I think it is interesting that the greatest support for free trade comes from Quebec where 64 per cent support the idea. I would like to emphasize that.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—NORTHERN COD STOCK

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Recently Mr. Fortier, the Canadian negotiator with the French on the fish talks, was in Newfoundland and consulted with the Government of Newfoundland. The position of the Newfoundland Government is very clear. Northern cod is not to be begged, borrowed or stolen. Mr. Fortier would not comment one way or the other on that position.

What is the position of the Government of Canada in view of the importance of that resource to the fishermen of Newfoundland and to Atlantic Canada? Is northern cod on the table? Is it to be bargained away to the French?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government of Canada is that this is a matter that has to be negotiated between Canada and France. As a result of a meeting between Prime Minister Chirac and the Prime Minister of Canada, negotiations were opened again. They had been cut off by the French but they are opened again and will begin tomorrow in Paris.

As we have committed regularly in the House, any negotiations by Canada will involve continuous consultation with the interested parties including, the Province of Newfoundland. Those consultations will occur. Representatives of the Province of Newfoundland and other groups will be present as part of the Canadian delegation involved in the negotiations.

I do not propose to publish in the House of Commons the negotiating position Canada will take into the discussions with France tomorrow. To do that would be to jeopardize the Canadian and Newfoundland position. I would not want to do that.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the position of the Newfoundland Government is very clear. Not only that, but yesterday the Minister of Fisheries in Newfoundland, the poorest province in Canada, put up $1 million to alleviate the crisis in the inshore fishery.

How can the Government of Canada allocate billions of dollars to protect Canadian sovereignty in the North and at the same time give away, propose to give away, or allow to give away the most important northern resource we have which is northern cod? How can he justify that?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the premise, of course, is false. We are dealing with the problem. We have a negotiation under way now because the earlier arrangement put in place by a Government of which the Hon. Member was a part was insufficient. It did not provide adequate protection for Canada. It left a problem that must be resolved by negotiations. We are carrying out those negotiations now.

In the past when negotiations were carried out by Liberal Governments, the provinces and other interested parties were excluded. We have changed that practice. We have brought the Province of Newfoundland, other provinces and other interested groups into the consultation and the delegation for the negotiation. That is what is happening with regard to the negotiations in Paris this weekend and I make the commitment that we will be protecting the Canadian and the Newfoundland interests in those negotiations.

NATIONAL REVENUE

BILL C-51—TOBACCO COMPANIES' ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue who may know that tobacco companies are spending about $5 million in advertising and promotion to oppose Bill C-51 and they do this, of course, thanks to the rules, with the taxpayers' aid because it is a business deduction. Would the Minister tell us why this unfairness exists? Individuals who would like to lobby in favour of a health Bill, be it Bill C-51 or Bill C-204, do not get any tax advantages whatsoever and charities risk losing their charitable status if they spend more than 10 per cent of their money on advocacy. Why is there this anomaly? Will he do something about that unfairness?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member realizes that these rules and regulations are put in place for a purpose. We are always willing to examine the appropriateness of them in light of current conditions. I will take the representations she has made very seriously and will see if there is something appropriate that can be done.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have a bit of clarification on that. I appreciate the Minister saying that the matter will be looked at, but would the Minister not agree in principle that this is an anomaly and that it is unfair? Would he not agree either that there ought to be some tax breaks for individuals and charities who ought to have an opportunity to put forward their health and educational concerns, or that the advantage corporations have is totally inappropriate and should be removed so that people will be on a fair and even footing?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows that our Department is constantly seeking ways to interpret income tax and other regulations in an equitable way. It is part of the testimony that has come forward from many quarters which justifies the proposal for tax reform and for the kind of initiatives on which the Minister of Finance and our Department are working.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION CAUSED BY AUTOMOBILES—PROPOSAL MADE BY WEST GERMANY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the Secretary of State probably knows, acid rain is probably the main environmental preoccupation of Canadians. Despite that fact, last week at the United Nations acid rain group when West Germany made a proposition to cut car and truck pollution by 30 per cent by 1995, Canada decided to turn down that proposal. Would the Secretary of State please explain why the Canadian Government has not supported this important proposition?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if we turned down that proposition we must have had a good reason for it, but I must confess to the Hon. Member that I do not know what it was. I will try to find out and I will let him know as quickly as I know.

AIR POLLUTION CAUSED BY AUTOMOBILES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): When we consider that the government of Canada played a major role in 1984 in establishing a club to reduce sulphur pollution by as much as 30 per cent, Mr. Speaker, we really wonder why the government of Canada does not support the same protocol intended to limit air pollution caused by automobiles. That is the same question, but it is very important.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is the same question, but formulated differently. The answer remains the same. I will try to find out. Once I have done so I can assure the Hon. Member that I will convey the information to him and all other interested parties. But it is quite clear that the Canadian commitment to pollution control is well established. I do not apologize for not being informed. It is my duty. However, I do apologize for not having the information today. I intend to obtain it as soon as possible.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He does not want to tell the people of Canada what the Canadian Government position is in these negotiations before he tells the Government of France. The negotiations begin tomorrow in France and the French Government will then know what the Canadian Government position is. Will he then make that position public so that the people of Newfoundland know their interests are being protected by the Government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Bring in the gunboats.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —our position has been discussed with representatives of the industry, fishermen, and the Government of Newfoundland, as well as the other Atlantic provinces concerned. The process we have been following for the last several months has been to involve them closely in the discussions. Representatives of all or most of those groups are part of the delegation now in Paris. We want to be sure we have a position which can command as much respect and support as possible in Canada.

While on my feet and in response to an earlier question which elicited NDP interest in sending gunboats, may I ask whether the NDP position on violence—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): — also extends to violence in Central America, the Middle East, and on picket lines in Canada?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSULTATION WITH INTERESTED PARTIES

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister told us that these groups have discussed our position. How can he assure us that not only those groups are being consulted but that they are aware Canada is taking a very strong position in view of the fact that the insult extended to the Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland occurred at the same time the Government of Canada was trying to cosy up to Prime Minister Chirac for la Francophonie?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for a new Member the Hon. Member has adopted the practice of disinformation very quickly. I regret to have to congratulate him on his speed in placing false information and false implications on the floor of the House of Commons. The reason—

Mr. Keeper: You just did it yourself.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The quotation from yesterday was: "Sometimes a resort to violence is absolutely essential—"

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Right Hon. Minister could complete the answer.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am sorry, I do not want this discussion to become violent.

The answer is that there was discussion involving the negotiator and representatives of the fishermen, the industry and the provinces earlier this week prior to departure of the delegation for Paris. Those groups are represented directly on the Canadian delegation. They are in Paris and in constant contact with the negotiator. I do not think as a practical matter, when we want to conduct an effective negotiation and we know we cannot publish the details in advance of entering the negotiating room, there is much more that we can do.

We are doing this to try to ensure that if we secure an agreement on this difficult issue, it will be an agreement which results from the widest possible consultation in Canada.

PRIVILEGE

REQUEST TO WITHDRAW STATEMENT ALLEGEDLY MADE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question I put to a different Minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) said I was out of order in putting that question when the Minister was away.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): In his opinion.

Mr. Waddell: My question dealt with privatization and there is a Minister responsible for privatization and that is the Minister to whom I put the question. I asked her if she would confirm a statement that she allegedly made and I do not understand why she did not answer.

However, that is not my question of privilege. My question of privilege is that the Minister said I was out of order, and I would ask him to stand tall in this House and withdraw that allegation.

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I was not trying to assume either the role or mantle of the Chair in declaring that the Hon. Member was out of order. That is not my job. I was simply offering an opinion with which obviously the Chair did not agree. Consequently, I do not think there is any reason for me to withdraw it. I do not declare whether or not the Member is out of order, that is the business of the Hon. Member or the Chair.

Mr. Waddell: But you did.

Mr. Crombie: Well, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for believing I have the capacity to call him out of order. If he reads the rule book he will find that that is for him and the Chair to determine.

Mr. Keeper: You are short on grace.

Mr. Althouse: Too.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) is—

An Hon. Member: Out of order.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member felt the Hon. Minister was arrogating the responsibilities of the Chair. The Hon. Minister said he did not intend to do that. Perhaps having heard the Minister and the Hon. Member the position of the Chair is that the Minister meant it was not appropriate for the Hon. Member to ask the question when some Minister was not here. That is not a matter of being out of order and that of course, as the Minister said, was only his opinion. The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) pointed out that there were other Ministers here, at least one other, that might have dealt with the matter. That Minister might have but did not.

In any event, I think I have to rule that while there is a complaint here, it seems to be based on some sort of misunderstanding. It is not a question of privilege but it does signal the necessity for all Hon. Members to be clear in the use of language, otherwise there is some confusion. It goes even beyond that on occasion and then the Chair has to take up the time of all Hon. Members to clarify the situation. I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention and the Hon. Minister for his response.

CANAGREX DISSOLUTION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise that Bill C-2, an Act to dissolve Canagrex and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of establishing Canagrex was not to interfere with private sector operations in this industry, it was not to hurt it but to help it. I would like to put on the record some of the comments of the President and Chief Executive Officer of Canagrex, Mr. A. E. Story, when he appeared before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture on March 11, 1985. He said in part as follows:

> Immediately upon opening the offices of Canagrex on January 3rd, 1984, we set about preparing a corporate plan which was later approved by our board of directors and signed by the Minister of Agriculture. It was my firm intention to carry out the corporate plan and operate the corporation based upon private sector principles. I hired the most results-oriented people I could find.

He said further:

> The suggestions expressed by many of the agricultural associations and industry groups such as the Canadian Exporters Association were very helpful.

In other words, he consulted with them. He said further:

> Concern was often expressed that we would exercise the powers in the Canagrex Act to undertake direct buying and selling. We were determined that we would leave the buying and selling to the private sector. We did not interfere in the marketplace.

Mr. Story went on to explain what they were doing and said:

> We prepared a survey of Canadian commodities available for export. This source list of Canadian commodities is probably the most comprehensive and up-to-date available anywhere today.

Surely we have the right to ask why other departments did not prepare such a list. Why did the Department of Agriculture not do it? Why destroy the organization which prepared this very important list? He continued:

> We developed a market survey program. This entailed in-depth research on specific market areas which we considered as potentially promising and most interested in buying Canadian products.

He went on to illustrate what he meant. He said:

> For example, we had a pork producer accompany our mission to Singapore, we had a potato producer travel with us to Cuba. We also had tobacco producers travel with our group to Egypt, Hungary and Czechoslovakia, where we initiated the negotiation process to assist in selling to these markets.
> The valuable market information which we gathered was fed back to the Canadian industry.

Why would the Government put a stop to that kind of valuable assistance?

He continued:

> We undertook a program to stimulate export sales abroad. For example, Canagrex defrayed some of the cost involved in transporting high quality breeding swine to Italy on the understanding that out of any subsequent sales, Canagrex would recover their expenses. As it turned out, the Canadian swine won several medals at the Milano exhibition. As a result of these efforts, foreign buyers visited Canada to investigate further purchases of Canadian swine.

Farmers in my province of Manitoba produce a substantial number of pigs and would like to expand their production. However, there is no use expanding production if they cannot make sales. If Canagrex could help sell more swine in Italy, why would the Conservative Government destroy it? Mr. Story said further:

> The Buyers Credit Guarantee Program was an important area of Canagrex operations. We sought to have the risks shared among the Canadian exporters, the banks or the insurance companies and the foreign buyer. A Canagrex guarantee was provided when it was deemed absolutely necessary.

That is what all the other governments are doing. They help their producers by providing loans at low interest rates and providing subsidies. They do everything they can to help their producers. Surely to God, given the tremendous difficulties which Canadian producers of agricultural products are facing, we should be doing everything we can. Instead, blinded by the Government's mystic belief in the free market, its opposition to government involvement, and its belief that the best government is the government which does the least, the Government has taken the completely irresponsible and wrong decision to destroy Canagrex.

We intend to vote against this Bill for all the reasons which I and other members of the New Democratic Party have listed. We believe that the establishment of Canagrex was a good idea. It made a good start and should have been helped to expand its activities rather than being destroyed as it will be when this Bill is passed.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, in its annual report Canagrex indicated that it was having difficulty getting backing from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in order to provide financing for the exporting of a number of different agricultural products. It had asked the Ministry of Finance for a global figure beyond which it could not provide financing by way of export guarantees. The Ministry of Finance kept dragging its feet and refusing that financing until finally the Minister of Finance, in his first financial statement to the House, indicated that the Government had made a decision to do away with Canagrex.

Does the Hon. Member believe that the idea of the Minister of Finance was to make the performance of Canagrex's functions as difficult as possible by inaction on approving the export financing arrangements which the Act provided for Canagrex?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I can, of course, only speculate on the thinking of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). However, he did to Canagrex what he had done in so many other cases. The Minister of Finance is so fixed with the need to reduce the deficit that he would not give Canagrex the go-ahead by giving it the money it needed. He did the same thing in the field of scientific research which, of course, includes agricultural research. I have never heard such devastating criticism of a Minister of Finance as I did in the documents released recently by the Canadian Association of University Teachers, who go into great detail about how the cut-backs in funding have hurt scientific research. The refusal of the Minister of Finance to supply the funds for Canagrex is just part and parcel of his whole approach that he must cut the deficit, regardless of the very serious and adverse effects it has on Canagrex and all other government organizations which need adequate financing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 13(5) the recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock Monday, September 14, 1987.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could you give us a ruling as to the acceptability of Members shouting their assent to a Bill when they are not in their seats?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will get back to the Hon. Member's point of order quickly.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties. THE SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A REVITALIZATION SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie) moved:

That a special committee of this House be established to consider the problems affecting the shipbuilding industry, with a view to initiating a revitalization of that industry in Quebec.

He said: First, Mr. Speaker, I want to explain why this committee should be established. Let it be known from the outset that I would be prepared to accept an amendment motion if the Government wanted to extend the committee's terms of reference to the whole country. I am convinced that my colleague from Saint-Maurice (Mr. Grondin) would support this amendment because I think that Quebec's shipbuilding industry problems have a similar impact in the Maritime Provinces, in Ontario, and in Western Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out why... Hon. Members will recall that before the 1984 election the previous Liberal administration used to spread contracts around to make sure that none of Canada's shipyards would remain idle.

We have three major shipyards in Quebec: Lauzon near Quebec City, Sorel, and Vickers in Montreal. Back in 1984, before the election brought the Conservative Government to power, these three shipyards had landed contracts—frigates for the Montreal and Sorel shipyards, and a contract for the Caribou ferry which had been awarded to Lauzon's shipyards. However, there had been a transaction in the meantime. The owners of the Lauzon shipyard purchased the Montreal shipyard, and without the agreement of the Government and without advising anyone, transferred all the Montreal contracts to the Lauzon shipyard in Quebec City, which could have meant the closing of the Vickers shipyard in Montreal, which shipyard had historically provided jobs and enjoyed a certain influence.

We all recall the lethargic attitude of the Conservative Government in the case of the Gulf refinery and of Bombardier. Then, we had the announcement of the closing of this shipyard and of several businesses and the loss of 5,000 jobs. With the provincial and federal representatives of East Montreal, I created a survival committee to force the Conservative Government to take action on these issues, stop the closing of these industries and save 5,000 jobs.

Unfortunately, the Government approved what meant virtually a death warrant for the Gulf refinery in East Montreal by allowing a foreign company to purchase the refinery with the purpose of closing it. Thank God, the provincial Government, led by Mr. Robert Bourassa and Mr. Ciaccia, took over and prevented the Gulf refinery in East Montreal from closing completely! As regards the lethargy of the Conservative Government on the matter of the shipyards, I have to say quite honestly that there were certainly rather complex problems in this industry.

Unfortunately, the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, the Hon. Member for Langelier (Mr. Côté), who is himself from Quebec, had plotted to ensure that the president of Versatile Vickers would be in charge of coordinating the rationalization of shipyards in Quebec. The Government told him, and this is what I found unacceptable, that if he wanted the contract for the Caribou, he had to bring together the three Quebec shipyards which I mentioned earlier, that is the two belonging to him, and one, the Sorel Shipyard, owned by the Quebec Government. Only on this condition would the Government grant him the contract for the Caribou ferry. Mr. Saunders then launched a private crusade and went to see the only other competitor, the Quebec Government, and said: "Listen, you should get into another line of work. I have a mandate from the federal Government and you should go into another field. I shall take care of the major work at the Lauzon Shipyard in Quebec City, do the little jobs in Montreal and make a lot of money, and you can do something else.

Unfortunately, I had been told about that and I must commend the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) who also worked with the local union—and even the people, the Conservative Member had wind of the matter and he exposed that attitude. Unfortunately, the former Minister of State for Regional Industrial Expansion, the Hon. Member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Bissonnette) at that time had called me a liar, saying that it was false. But I was sure of my facts, and indeed, through the access to Information Act, I obtained the documents where it was written in black and white that the Government was committed, everything was signed, and we know what happened to the Hon. Member for Saint-Jean! When it is his word against mine—I do not think it takes very long to know who is telling the truth.

But the impact of all this is that despite this fiddling about by those politicians, or their lack of experience, the result is that today people are still talking to each other in our Quebec shipyards. Even though there are announcements of huge contracts in Quebec City, the jobs just are not there—400 employees out of 2,000 have just been recalled. In Montreal the shipyards are empty, again there are 35 employees left out of 1,500, and I know there is a problem, yes, there is a problem in the shipyard industry. Instead of having a strategy, and it is at that point that I tabled the motion, instead of this double dealing behind the workers' back, behind the union's back, when a Minister of the Crown strikes a deal with a company president and says he will give him a contract if he shuts down that one—that does not work, it will not work, the results are there. Those three scheming Ministers, where are they now? Two of them have lost their portfolios, and one has just been fired. What did that back-alley scheming produce? Nothing at all, and thank God, it shed light on the matter! This is why the proposal is that the House ask the Government to strike a committee, made up of representatives from the federal Government, the Opposition in the House of Commons, the provincial Government, the Opposition in the National Assembly, the municipalities in those areas. That is important, whether it is Sorel, Quebec City, or Montreal, because those people are the area's economic future. They should be on this committee. As well as representatives from the industry, from management of course, but also from the workers.

I am confident that once such a group is set up and everyone honestly analyzes the conditions in the shipyard industry, we will discover what the problems are in Quebec, in the Atlantic region, in Ontario and in Western Canada, and what sort of work is to be done, since the contracts come under federal jurisdiction. The Mayor of Quebec City is not the one who builds boats. He may be hoodwinked by the federal Government, but he does not build boats, only the federal Government does so for the Department of National Defence or the Department of Transport, ferries and other such things.

Then the Government is aware of the new boats that are needed, of repairs which have to be done and of the orders which have to be placed. If that had been better structure than what we see now, there would not have been any crisis. Then those people would know what the capacities and the number of workers are in those shipyards. Are there too many shipyards and not enough contracts? If so, what is to be done? However, the first decision made by this Conservative Government, by the former Minister, the Member for Saint-Jean, as well as another Minister who has been sacked, the Hon. Member for Langelier (Mr. Côté) was that we had too many shipyards. They decided to close down some of them. They even schemed about which one was to be closed down and the finger was pointed at Sorel. The same thing was done in the Maritimes and in Ontario and one shipyard was expected to be closed down in the West, but the file was closed and all those changes were set aside.

Presently the shipyards in Quebec are working, but once again it is thanks to the Bourassa government, a good liberal government, thanks to Ministers like Marc-Yvan Côté, thanks to Ministers who said: Wait a minute, we cannot allow those shipyards to close down. In the Quebec City area, it was thanks to Marc-Yvan Côté that the Lauzon shipyard was kept open. It was not thanks to any Conservative Member, they did not even know where they were going. So at the provincial level they got their act together and told the federal government: Wait a minute, those shipyards have to be kept going. They created a committee and they told the federal government: We will pick up the pieces, but we do want the money. You have tampered enough with this whole matter, we want the money to have the work done.

But then again that was the provincial government which is continuously dependent on the contracts from the federal government. To top it off, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), after his predecessor had said there was too many shipyards, is now developing and modernizing the shipyards in his riding, in his own area. Pretty soon, this shipyard will be able to compete with the shipyards in Quebec for the maintenance of the Caribou I and Caribou II.

And governments come and go, depending on patronage, depending on the Minister, depending on the area. For all these reasons, at this moment we cannot trust anybody in this Cabinet. And I believe this is reflected in the public opinion polls.

There is nobody left with some intellectual credibility and honesty, nobody that can be trusted by the population.

In order to solve the problems shipyards are facing, there is an absolute need to set up a committee and I wish it would be a national committee. However, in this kind of matter, I believe there are regional implications, the needs are different in Quebec, in Western Canada and in the Maritimes.

But I believe it is urgent to act because in two or three years from now the same problems will arise if we do not go to the bottom of the matter.

Let us remember that during the last electoral campaign, Conservative candidates had promised to bring back full indexation of old age security pensions. You have misled the people and you promised the same thing in the shipbuilding industry.

And always the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), with one hand over his heart and the other on the Gospel: I promise you that we are going to increase the subsidies to help upgrade the shipbuilding industry. What has he done? He has done the contrary.

Well, if today the Prime Minister tells Canadiens who are listening to us: I am going to give you this. You can tell yourself right away: He has made a mistake, for he wants to take it away from us. If he says that he is going to take it away from you, it is because he is going to give it to you. Such has been the case in every matter.

I beg Hon. Members to understand that these jobs—

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Foul mouth!

Mr. Malépart: The Hon. Member for Lac-St-Jean (Mr. Côté) is shouting: They don't care! He knows that he is beaten, that he will lose, so that he does not care and thinks only of filling his own pockets until the next election.

Mr. Speaker, but the workers at the Lauzon shipyard near Quebec City do care. Those at the Vickers shipyard in Montreal do care too. Because they are former employees, they are there.

It is the same under the Work Adjustment Training Program. The Sorel people . . . It was a designated area which was eligible to the pre-retirement program. Again, this Conservative government, the Minister of Labour abolished this program last year and announced another one. But the new one was never implemented.

There are people in this shipyard who, after being on unemployment insurance for one year under the Work Adjustment Training Program, became eligible to unemployment insurance benefits up to age 65 when they could not find new jobs. This was the rule of the game.

Unfortunately, the Conservative government has eliminated this program. This has contributed again to a greater number of unemployed in the area.

I dare hope that Conservative Members will agree at least—Perhaps the Hon. Member representing the Quebec area will be allowed to speak out, for I am sure he must have good ideas.

I suggest, however, that it is important to set up a committee. I am well aware of the procedure and I know that if Conservative Members object, they will talk for an hour to kill the Bill on the Order Paper. They will say: Yes, we have a committee of Conservative Members. But what about it? What good has it done so far?

The Conservative Committee they had in Ontario was soundly defeated. The same thing will happen in New Brunswick: Get out, Tories! Wake up if you want to save your skin! Do not try to hide behind your Ministers, or even your Prime Minister, for he is finished, dead and buried!

But join others within a committee. I am not asking you to join only Liberals, but also municipal, union and workers representatives. They will tell you what went wrong, and describe in no uncertain terms that people no longer trust either you or the Prime Minister. Wake up: We should not give you a break, but we are willing to do so for the sake of workers; we are willing to go beyond party consideration and ask that such a committee be established and made up of representatives from the federal and provincial governments, of the opposition parties whatever they may be, as well as specialists. But it is not possible to continue like this. I see that the Quebec people are getting ready to stand up. They will beat their breasts and say: We have so many contracts. So many contracts! The guys are not working and are on welfare. What is the Hon. Member doing? It is not enough to say that there are so many contracts and that so many millions of dollars will be spent. There is no work. There are 1600 workers in the Quebec region who were employed by the shipyards and who are now out of work. There are some who are on welfare. And it is not because they have elected to be so. They are on welfare because this Conservative Government has thrown them there.

The situation is the same in Sorel. I wish the Hon. Member for that riding were here, because he would not be afraid to contradict his colleagues. For he was the one who made public the first letter which revealed his colleagues' plot to close the Sorel shipyard. If he were here, I am sure he would support my proposal, because he would know he could participate, because he himself no longer trusts the Cabinet. He knows he was fooled once. I remember when the workers came here, the Hon. Member for St-Jean had promised them: Yes, you are going to see . . . He had even supported and signed a deal to close it. That is why you are no longer popular.

Indeed, this committee could be made up of municipal and provincial representatives who, together, could find ways to ensure that the Quebec shipbuilding industry continues to exist. Our qualified labour force is an asset. The men and women who make up the labour force in this industry can compare with anybody in the world in terms of competence, quality, effectiveness and productivity. I know the Conservative Members who associate with the bosses will tell us: "They are not productive, because of three or four strikes and such and such a thing". However, that is all they care about, money. But in fact, it is not true. Just look at the figures.

Our Quebec shipyards are the most productive in all of Canada. And the quality of the job they do is superior to that of many others. We cannot give up that industry which generation after generation has been part of Quebec's heritage.

I think that one of the best ways, unless better alternatives are suggested, and I would be ready to approve them, would be to call together all parties concerned at the federal, provincial and municipal levels, labour and corporate representatives, as well as subcontractors involved as well as representatives of businessmen's groups in those areas with a specific aim, that is to keep the three Quebec shipyards in operation—and not try to close one down—but to review the orientation of those three shipyards and maintain the employment. And I am sure that with such qualified people gathered around the table, ways will be found to resolve the three above-mentioned issues that is to enable our three Quebec shipyards to maintain their orientation, to keep up employment in those shipyards at their present levels and to continue to uphold the prestige and reputation of Quebec shipyards throughout the world.

• (1240)

Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Quebec Est): Mr. Speaker, the issue which has been raised by the Hon. Member is an important one and is one to which this government has recently devoted much attention. There is little doubt that this is an important industry to Canada and the severe decline in the demand for its products is not a development that can be ignored, and it will not be ignored by this government.

While the value of vessel construction work in canadian shipbuilding and ship repairing yards averaged $191 million between 1976 and 1985 in 1971 dollars this industry suffered a 47 per cent decline from 1982 to 1984. From 1984 to 1985 the commercial order book fell by 63 per cent to a post-war low. There now remain 18 major yards in Canada following the closure or the placing in receivership of several yards in Canada: Breton Industrial Marine in Nova Scotia, the Collingwood Shipyard in Ontario, and the Bel-Aire Shipyard and two Rivtow owned yards of British Columbia. This is a direct reflection of the difficulties facing the industry.

Another indication of the problems facing this industry has been the decline in overall yard employment. While the average employment level for 1976 to 1985 stood at 15,000, by 1985 the average employment figure had declined to only 8,000. As of the end of may 1987 it totalled somewhat less than 7,000. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that demand is not expected to recover to the levels reached in the 1970's in the foreseeable future.

The current problems facing Canadian yards also have been felt throughout the world. The levels of orders and completions throughout the world have declined so drastically since the peak levels of the 1970's that today it is estimated there exists a 40 per cent overcapacity in shipbuilding. Specifically, while world tonnage of ships completed in 1975 was 34.2 million gross tonnes, in 1986 the tonnage completed represented about 49 per cent of that figure.

In the past year, this decline has been even more severe. For example, according to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) orders in Japan declined 14 per cent in the first half of 1986 in comparison to the same period in 1985. Orders declined 69 per cent in European yards over the same period. In Korea, a 77 per cent drop in the value of new shipbuilding orders was recorded over this period.

It should be noted that part of the decline in capacity utilization in some of the countries with older shipbuilding industries is due to the entrance of new aggressive competitors. Korea, China and Taiwan have all made significant additions to their shipbuilding capacities in recent years which has eroded the domination of the international market by the Western European nations and Japan.

Forecasts indicate that the world overcapacity situation will continue into the mid 1990's. As a result of the past declines in orders and the continuing difficult climate forecast for the industry, a number of countries have taken a variety of measures to address the problem.

In Japan, in the past decade there has been a 45 per cent reduction in the direct labour force involved in shipbuilding activities. Recently, a government panel called for a 20 per cent reduction in shipbuilding capacity by the end of 1987. The panel also called for mergers among builders to consolidate and rationalize the business structure of the industry and to decrease excessive competition. Two leading shipyards, Mitsui and Nippon Kokan are apparently discussing the possibility of joint capacity reductions along these lines. Kawasaki, Hitachi, and Sumitomo are talking of mergers.

In West Germany the total shipbuilding industry workforce declined from 73,000 persons in 1975 to 43,000 in 1985. It is anticipated that employment in the shipbuilding sector will fall further by roughly a quarter, or approximately 10,000 jobs. This employment is concentrated in the northern coastal areas and the German government has indicated it does not inted to attempt to maintain all of the shipbuilding capacity in these states. Instead, it looks to indutry to propose how it plans to restructure itself. To this effect the German government has announced it will provide substantial infrastructure and regional structural aid to the four northern coastal states.

In Sweden, one of the world's leading shipbuilding nations only 10 years ago, Kockums, the only remaining large new building yard, ceased new merchant vessel construction at the end of 1986.

Returning to the canadian situation, I note the Hon. Member's request that a special committee of the house be established to consider the problems affecting the shipbuilding industry with a view to initiating a revitalization of the industry in Quebec. Such a special committee is not required since the Standing Committee on Regional Industrial Expansion is empowered, with its mandate, to study this situation. Moreover, the government is doing all that is possible to initiate a revitalization in this sector without interfering unduly in what is essentially a private sector matter. However, I welcome this opportunity to discuss the approach which the government is taking to assist the industry workers in meeting the challenge of the new environment.

There are three elements to the government strategy to deal with the situation. First, the government will continue to offer protection for the domestic market. The 25 per cent duty which applies to most vessels offers protection to Canadian shipbuilders.

Second, the government will continue to support the shipbuilding industry through its own purchases. We are fully cognizant of the important role which the government's marine requirements have had and will continue to have for this industry.

Over the past five years federal government procurements accounted for approximately 20-25 per cent of the employment in Canadian yards. The relative importance of federal procurement has been increasing steadily as commercial orders declined. As of May 26, 1987, all new building work being carried out or on order were government-related contracts.

Over the next 5 years an estimated $1.6 billion in defence procurements are expected to come on stream, accounting for approximately 38 per cent of work in canadian shipyards. A further $700 to $1,200 million in non defence government procurements are also possible which could comprise another 25-33 per cent of total revenues in canadian yards during the same period.

Mr. Speaker, we are working with the industry to ensure that our marine requirements are met in a fashion which acknowledges the importance of this demand to the ongoing strength of the industries while at the same time ensuring that these procurements will be provided in a manner which is cost effective to the Government.

Third, the Government has indicated that it is prepared to assist industry with a full array of its programming in adjusting itself to these new circumstances. To respond to the changed market environment and strengthen their competitive position for the future, yards will have to reduce capacity. In some cases this may require closures. In other cases, mergers, specialization, diversification or other approaches may be more appropriate. However, initiatives for responding to the new situation must come from industry.

In particular, the Government is ready to assist in industry-led restructuring plans that put canadian yards in a better position to compete and that minimize any adverse consequences for affected workers and communities.

The first concrete instance of the application of this policy involved a restructuring proposal from the Ontario shipbuilding industry. The owners of the Collingwood shipyard came to the conclusion that they could not maintain operations in that yard. Together with owners of the other major shipyard in Ontario, they developed a plan to restructure their activities in view of the lack of demand for their products. In essence this provided that Collingwood would cease its operation and that the port Weller and port Arthur shipyards would be merged and modernized in order to be more competitive in the international market.

The Federal Government through its programs was able to assist the companies in the implementation of their plan. This was comprised of assistance under the shipbuilding industry assistance program (SIAP) for the company to move some of the more technologically advanced equipment operated in Collingwood to other facilities in Ontario. It is expected that this will result in a more competitive Ontario industry capable of servicing the needs of Great Lakes operators and better able to compete for major Crown procurements.

An area of concern to the Federal Government as well as the companies was the impact that this restructuring plan would have on the affected workers and communities. In order to minimize any possible negative effects, my colleague the Honourable Minister for Employment and Immigration selected Collingwood under the community futures program of the Canadian jobs strategy.

As you may know, the community futures program builds on the existing strengths of communities supporting the private sector and local community initiatives through a wide variety of programs. It involves a flexible cooperative effects approach and emphasizes entrepreneurial strengths.

The Government of Ontario also helped to implement the plans of the companies, by offering assistance to make the remaining yards more competitive.

The Government has also assisted owners of Quebec shipyards in reaching an agreement to consolidate ownership under Marine Industries Limited (MIL). The Government played a key role in bringing the parties together and assisted by facilitating the smooth transfer of its own contracts.

Marine Industries Limited, with its proven successful experience in the management of diversified operations, with the technological and manufacturing strengths possessed by the versatile operations and with the strong order book provided by Federal Government requirements I am sure will create a revitalized Quebec shipbuilding industry.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to re-iterate that we recognize that the shipbuilding industry is facing difficult times. The Federal Government stands ready to respond to proposals to assist the community, worker and industry to adjust to changing industry conditions. The initiatives, however must come from the private sector. The recent developments in Ontario and Quebec are clear indications of the Government's commitments in this regard.

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion of the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart). I cannot support it fully although I agree with the Hon. Member that the shipbuilding industry is in a crisis situation.

The motion would limit the consideration of the problems affecting the shipbuilding industry and the revitalization of that industry to the Province of Quebec. While I am sure, as the Hon. Member has stated, that the shipbuilding industry in Quebec has serious problems which need to be addressed by the Government of Canada, so too does the shipbuilding industry in the rest of the country, particularly in the Atlantic provinces where there is a serious shipbuilding crisis and also on the West Coast of Canada where shipyards are closing, the workforce is growing older, and great skills associated with the shipbuilding trade are being lost.

Shipbuilding is an industry which has roots in the history of the country, from the earliest days in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland as a part of our great maritime industry. We are a country which borders on three oceans. We have skills associated with the industry. In the past we have had a great shipbuilding industry, but it is in a crisis. The Government of Canada should do more than give lip service to its development.

While the previous speaker indicated that the Government does its procurement through Canadian shipyards, surely it is not enough, nor is it enough to relegate it to other existing programs.

In August, 1984, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) made a promise to the people of Canada that he would pay attention to the shipbuilding industry. In fact, at that time he said that a top priority of the PC Government would be to create a more viable and prosperous shipbuilding industry. This indicates to me that the Government of Canada made a commitment to the people of Canada back in 1984 to put into place a national shipbuilding policy.

What do we have three years later? We have an industry in crisis. Shipyards are closing in British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, for example, the one at Marystown and the dockyard at St. John's, Newfoundland. They are in very serious trouble, lurching in some cases from one contract to the next and always operating very precariously without any long-term plan to guarantee jobs for skilled workers in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, and British Columbia.

We need a comprehensive policy which clearly sets out what assistance the Government will provide to the shipbuilding industry. As well we need a commitment not just to procure the shipping needs of the Government from Canadian shipyards, but to ensure the survival of the yards and the job skills for Canadians.

We have a situation, as previous speakers have indicated, where the number of people employed in the Canadian shipbuilding industry has been reduced by approximately a third over the last 10 years. We now have 7,000 or fewer people employed in that industry, whereas some 10 years of 15 years ago there were in excess of 20,000 employees. I am using the figures supplied by the General Manager of the Pictou Industries who said in a recent article that in the last 10 years 250 foreign-built vessels were registered in Canada, that is 25 a year for the last 10 years, and if those vessels had been built in Canada all Canadian shipbuilding yards would have been working to capacity. It does not seem like a great number of ships in one year, 25 for all of Canada, but if those ships had have been built in Canada instead of being registered in Canada and built in foreign countries, it would have revitalized the Canadian shipbuilding industry. We have not had the kind of commitment from this Government that would see that brought about.

• (1300)

The motion asks for a special committee of the House to consider the shipbuilding industry in the Province of Quebec. But there ought to be a special committee of the House not just looking at the industry in Quebec but having regard to the problems of the industry, nationally, and working toward the development promised by the Government in 1984 when it was seeking a mandate from Canadians. In other words, the entire shipbuilding industry across the country should be looked at. With the expert advice and assistance of studies that can be undertaken by such a committee a shipbuilding policy could be put together for Canada that would guarantee its survival.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate today but first, if I may, I should like to refresh the memory of the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) about the sequence of some of the events.

As I recall, Mr. Speaker, I was with my colleague from Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) the Member and Minister responsible for the Quebec region, (Mr. Côté) and all my colleagues from the greater Quebec City area when we met with the management and labour unions of Lauzon's shipyards. Mr. Speaker, I must say that, unlike my colleague from Montreal—Sainte-Marie, we were not thrown out of the yards, quite the contrary, we were warmly greated as people who were intent on helping them. Indeed I remember that the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie had been singled out for having been a member of the Liberal Government—it had been in office for 20 years—which had let the situation deteriorate in Canada's shipyards. They could not have cared less.

As it happens, Mr. Speaker, I am the son of a Lauzon shipyard worker. My father worked there for years, from the onset of the war and for years after that, and I have always felt a certain awareness of shipyard problems. Again recently my father was telling me that the only governments which really tried to help and solve the shipyard problems have been Conservative governments.

He reminded me that the only Government which had been willing to give contracts to the Canadian shipyards after the war was the one led by Mr. John Diefenbaker. We have to remember when the last contracts for frigates and ships were awarded by the Department National Defence. If I am not mistaken, our youngest ship was built in 1963, and the contract was awarded under the Government of Mr. John Diefenbaker. Afterwards, when the Liberals were in power, they never tried to develop a long term shipbuilding policy. As usual, they allowed the situation to deteriorate and did not try to support the modernization efforts of the shipyards or take into account the fact that most Canadian shipyards had been created because of the war effort.

These are facts which the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie did not mention. He tried instead to play at petty politics. Once again, he has suggested that we establish a committee. This is the latest thing among the Liberals. They create a committee when they do not want to solve a problem.

Mr. Speaker, as for creating a committee to consult, especially with members of the Opposition, I can tell you that we have better things to do! The members of the Conservative caucus of the Quebec region, with the full support of their regional minister, have not been content to consult. We worked together and as a team to find long term solutions for the Quebec shipyards, not only for the one in Lauzon, but also for the other two major shipyards in Quebec.

It might be appropriate to note, Mr. Speaker, that between 1976 and 1985, the yearly production of the shipyards affilitated with the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association averaged $191 million in constant 1971 dollars. However, this figure decreased by 47 per cent between 1982 and 1984, and the orders received by the industry went down by 63 per cent between 1984 and 1985 to reach their lowest level since the end of the Second World War.

Such is the present situation, Mr. Speaker.

Since the recent closing of five shipyards, there are now only 18 major shipyards in operation in Canada. Those which have closed recently are the Breton Industrial Marine Shipyard in Nova Scotia, the Collingwood Shipyard in Ontario, the Bel-Aire Shipyard and two Rivtow shipyards in British Columbia.

These closings, combined with the job losses incurred in all shipyards, directly reflect the problems the whole industry is facing. The average number of jobs in the industry went down from 15,000 jobs to 8,000 during the last ten years and by the end of May, 1987, there was less than 7,000 jobs left. This phenomenon is not temporary. No recovery is anticipated until the mid-1990's.

These problems are not peculiar to Canada. Naval production has suffered a significant drop in all countries, in all shipyards since the 1970's when it had reached record levels.

The worldwide industry had an overcapacity of some 40 per cent. In 1975, ships built had a total gross tonnage of some 34.2 million tonnes; the tonnage was only half as much in 1986. Last year, the drop was even more significant.

For example, according to the Organization for Economic Co-0peration and Development, OECD, orders received by shipyards in Japan among others had registered a 14 per cent drop in the first quarter of 1986 over the same period in 1985. During that period, orders received by European shipyards had dropped 69 per cent.

This worldwide drop in the orders received by shipyards reflects not only the slump the market is going through but also the changes that have occurred in the geographic distribution of the worldwide industry. The domination of the world market by Japan and Western Europe countries is challenged by the emergence of new countries, including Korea, China and Taiwan. It should be noted, however, that even Korean shipyards have suffered the repercussions of the worldwide crisis. During the last year, Korea has seen its orders drop by 77 per cent.

In the last decade, there was a 45 per cent drop in the number of direct jobs created by the shipbuilding industry in Japan. Given the circumstances, a working group set up by the Japanese Government has recommended reducing by another 20 per cent the total capacity of shipyards in Japan by the end of 1987. It has also recommended that some shipyards be merged with a view to consolidating and streamlining the industry. For instance, two major shipyards operated by the Mitsui and Nippon Kokan corporations are said to be currently discussing the possibility of jointly reducing the capacities in that order. And Kawasaki, Hitachi and Sumitomo corporations are looking at the possibilility of merging their shipyards.

In West Germany, the total manpower employed by the shipbuilding industry has declined from 73,000 in 1975 to 43,000 in 1985. And 10,000 more jobs are expected to be lost. This loss of jobs has mainly affected Northern Germany's coastal areas, and the German Government has decided it would not attempt to maintain the industry's current capacity in those areas. Instead it is relying on the industry to submit new ways of restructuring itself to that end.

Sweden's shipbuilding industry was one of the most prosperous in the world ten years ago. Kockums, the last major shipyard, stopped building new merchant ships at the end of 1986.

In Canada, the Government did all it could to revitalize the shipbuilding industry without interfering with something that is primarily a private sector matter. However, I want to take this opportunity to explain how this Government is trying to help workers.

The Government has developed a three-prong strategy to review the situation. Firstly, the Government will continue protecting the Canadian market by imposing an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent on most ships.

Secondly, the Government will pursue a supply policy encouraging the Canadian shipbuilding industry. We are fully aware of the role Government supply practices have played and will continue to play in the shipbuilding area.

For the past five years, Government purchases have allowed domestic shipyards to keep 20 to 25 per cent of their jobs. The relative significance of Government purchases has been increasing regularly as commercial orders have declined. As of May 26, 1987, all orders for new construction came either from the Government itself or from Government agencies.

Purchases estimated at $1.6 billion should be made over the next five years in the defence sector, and those contracts will account for some 38 per cent of all Canadian shipyard orders. The Government may also make additional purchases valued between $700 million and $1.2 billion. Those orders would account for an extra 25 to 33 per cent share of total domestic shipyard revenues during that period.

Thirdly, the Government has already indicated it was willing to help the shipbuilding industry better face the declining demand. However, the industry will have to reduce its capacity, which may force it to close down some yards or take alternative steps such as mergers, specializing or diversifying. The initiative however must come from the industry.

The Government is willing to help the industry implement restructuring programs capable of helping shipyards better compete, thereby reducing the negative impact on workers and communities.

The restructuring program developed by the Ontario shipbuilding industry was the first concrete result of that offer. The owners of the Collingwood shipyard have come to the conclusion that they could no longer operate the shipyard. With the owners of another major Ontario shipyard, they developed a program to reorganize their operations, essentially by closing the Collingwood shipyard and merging and modernizing the Port Weller and Port Arthur shipyards to make them more competitive.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on for quite some time speaking about various matters related to the shipyards, but we have to remember that, especially in the case of the Quebec shipyards, when the Lauzon workers had major problems last winter and were expecting some assistance, the federal Government did not hesitate to try to help them through various training and retraining programs, and so on, especially in the great region of Quebec. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I would like to underline the hard work of my colleague for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine), who right from the start, has taken an interest in the shipyards and worked vigorously with the full support of all his colleagues from the Quebec Conservative caucus to find rational, logical and effective solutions to the real problems of shipbuilding in Canada, and it is not by creating so-called committees, such as suggested by the well-known Liberal prophet of doom and gloom, the Hon. Member for Montréal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart), that we can find real answers to the problems affecting the shipbuilding industry in Canada.

Mr. Gilles Grondin (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, although we have heard a number of remarks aimed at undermining the suggestion advocated by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart), I should like to indicate that what concerns me most after listening to Hon. Members who rose after my colleague from Montreal—Sainte-Marie is the fact that the Government has no intention of responding to the legitimate request that a committee be established to make an exhaustive study of measures required to keep Quebec's shipyards in operation. Everybody knows—and I think my colleague from Montreal—Sainte-Marie has described the situation in unequivocal terms—the difficulties experienced by all employees and workers in the shipbuilding industry.

The only thing we are asking the Government to do is to strike a committee which would provide these workers and these regions which have been hard hit—shutdowns, fewer contracts, series of measures taken by governments or management—which would provide these people with an opportunity to sit at a table and attempt to find solutions to the problems which have plagued these regions which I call designated. Sadly enough, the fact that the Government is not interested in entertaining this request will probably lead to a situation such that things will simply grow worse, and the first thing we will know is that there will be yet more lay-offs in the various regions involved, be it in Quebec City, Montreal or Sorel.

I think that if the government had agreed or would agree to consider this proposal seriously, it would provide representatives of both the government and the official Opposition with an opportunity to sit down not only to complain about what was not done or could have been done, but also to get together with representatives of the municipal and provincial governments. I suggest that if the government had agreed or would agree to this proposal, the workers of these shipyards would be delighted to say that the federal government is assuming at last its responsibilities and taking some action to help preserve and protect their jobs.

The situation is about the same in other industries, so that when representatives from various groups . . . The situation is almost identical in the case of the pollution of the Saint-Maurice River where groups should meet and for which the department or government should create a sort of committee on which they could sit. Unfortunately, we are aware that the Government is unwilling to give individuals faced with a problem a chance to discuss it, to sit around a table and find solutions to problems about which there is no co-operation and when I say co-operation, I mean at the local, regional, municipal, provincial and federal levels. I believe this is the best way to find solutions and it is not by hiding or letting a motion such as the one introduced by the Hon. Member for Montréal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) die on the Order Paper that we will find an adequate solution and, more particularly, that we will meet the needs of the workers in those shipyards for whom some sort of positive action from the Goverment would have shown its goodwill or at least its interest in their fate.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, obviously this government recognizes the tragic situation facing the shipbuilding industry, but the same solution is always offered, namely that we should establish a committee to address the problem.

With opposite members, the choice is either to establish a committee or to build ships. We heard the same old thing a moment ago from a guy who long on empty and ludicrous rhetoric blamed everybody around to finally come up with a nice solution of his own.

Mr. Speaker, I think that in spite of all the wonderful solutions we might have, we should still take into consideration the world situation. At the present time there is an overcapacity in shipbuilding, when supply exceeds demand, and in fact, on the international market, we build more ships than we need.

That does not mean we should stop shipbuilding altogether. But I fail to see how a committee could solve that problem. It might put forward some answers.

I listened to my colleagues from the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party when they said that the good Liberal provincial government had decided to act on its own. But let them go ahead and build ships for they too have a shipbuilding industry. The federal government operates Coast Guard vessels and icebreakers and also ferries. Let them build many ferries and we will then have a better service between Matane and Rivière-du-Loup, every half hour for instance. These obviously are not practical solutions but that's the story.

It is not the government responsibility to make up for the international market's deficiencies. But if there is now an overproduction of ships, if other countries build them at lower costs, will a policy oblige Canadian shipowners, if there are any, to buy strictly Canadian products? That does not work either. Should we build ships just for the sake of keeping shipyards in operation? It is not workable either.

So we must pick more realistic options. The only one is to establish an economic climate which will bring about an improvement of the situation.

Mr. Speaker, more jobs have been created over the past three years than in the previous decade and a half. Interest rates, the inflation level are some of the factors which will allow those people to survive or retrain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

The House stands adjourned until next Monday, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-264, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (instruments and literature for illicit drug use).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the said Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Bill is to prohibit commerce in drug paraphernalia which enhances and promotes the use of illicit drugs.

At the present time, although narcotics and certain drugs are outlawed, literature glamourizing their use and devices and kits facilitating it are freely available in so-called "head shops" throughout Canada.

The Bill proposes amendments to the Criminal Code such that the sale of these instruments and literature would be an offence. I hope it will receive the support of every Member of the House.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987

EXTENSION OF REPORTING DATE FOR SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Motions to advise the House of a situation. The House will be aware that the constitutional committee considering the Meech Lake Accord, has been holding extensive hearings throughout the summer, that it adjourned the hearing of witnesses to prepare its report, and that there have been some difficulties in the translation.

Because of the importance of the particular document—the committee report and the wording therein—we felt it was appropriate that the wording be as exact as possible. I have had discussions with the other House Leaders regarding the report and, in order to allow all of the members of the committee to satisfy themselves that the English and French versions are compatible, I think you will find agreement to the following motion, Mr. Speaker:

• (1110)

That the reporting date for the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord be extended to no later than Thursday, September 17, 1987.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present two petitions on this last day that there is an opportunity to do so regarding the refugee legislation before the House of Commons.

Petitioners from central Canada as well as from western Canada call upon Parliament to enact legislation that will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings for refugee claimants before a refugee board, independent of the Immigration Commission, providing universal access to such hearings for every claimant in Canada, and an adequate opportunity to arrive in Canada to make this claim.

Since Canada has established standards of refugee status determination, they believe that our existing procedures have broken down and are under unexpected strains. Recognizing that the standing committee of Parliament dealing with this issue has proposed a new procedure for refugee determination which is quicker and fairer than the one now in force, the petitioners are asking the Government to consider the recommendations of that special committee which has the support of groups such as the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Council of Churches and others.

CRIMINAL CODE, FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AND NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, just for a moment my heart almost stopped because I thought we were going to pass this enlightened legislation without any speeches on second reading. However, I am very pleased and honoured to introduce the debate on second reading of this important legislation.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada understand that our Government has committed itself to a comprehensive approach with respect to the problem of illicit drugs in Canada. One of the initiatives that we are taking in this whole area involves amendments to our Criminal Code to allow forfeiture and seizure of the realization of illicit proceeds of crime. While this Bill is not restricted in the area of drugs, it is a Bill which addresses crime motivated by the desire to accumulate wealth and generate profit from the commission of criminal activity. The Bill uses the term "enterprise crime" to describe this type of activity. What we are dealing with in this legislation are crimes of greed.

Increasingly we are seeing the effects of criminal organizations operating both from within and without this country that are totally dedicated to the commission of crime for profit. These organizations take advantage of modern communications, transportation and corporate structuring to frustrate the reach of national legal systems to amass illicit and illegal wealth.

[Translation]

One of the reasons why this type of criminal activity is spreading is that the various administrations have been slow in adapting their legislation to changing circumstances. But now the western world acknowledges ever more readily that it is becoming imperative to adapt and revise national legislation and to negotiate international agreements to fill the gaps which now favour criminals.

[English]

On an international level, this legislation is in compliance with the draft United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychoactive Substances. Similar legislation has either been passed or has been presented to the legislatures of Britain, Australia and the United States. This uniquely Canadian proposal will strike a balanced middle ground in dealing with the reality of enterprise crime. Except for very limited situations, Canadian courts are powerless to strip an offender of the proceeds of criminal activity.

Lengthy terms of imprisonment and substantial fines may not be sufficient deterrents to criminals who believe that they may acquire and keep their ill-gotten gains. If, on the other hand, the offender knows that, in addition to the punishment he or she would normally receive for the crime, he or she is going to lose those proceeds and profits generated through such activity, he or she may think twice before deciding to become involved in such unlawful conduct.

Accordingly, the main feature of this legislation is to provide the courts with the power to confiscate from an offender those assets that are found to be derived from criminal activity. This would normally be done after an individual has been found guilty of a criminal offence and would be done at the sentencing stage of the proceeding.

All of the protections that have developed over the centuries such as trial by jury, presumption of innocence and the requirement that guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt would continue to apply to the guilt determination stage of the proceeding. However, once the offender has been found guilty according to all of these time-honoured guarantees, he or she would be subject to a hearing to determine the question of the forfeiture of his or her criminally-derived assets. At that time, the prosecution would have to prove the criminal taint on a balance of probabilities. Normally, this taint would already have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt during the trial itself, as happens on a charge of possession of proceeds from a specified criminal activity.

There is an additional feature of the legislation that attempts to deal with the covert nature of enterprise crime. If at the forfeiture hearing it turns out that the proceeds of crime are from an offence other than the offence for which the offender has been convicted, the court will still be empowered to forfeit. This is designed to deal with cases in which the offender is engaged in a wide range of illicit activities and seeks to protect his profits by claiming that they were derived from an illegal source other than that for which he has been convicted. It must be underlined that in this situation, proof beyond a reasonable doubt applies to the prosecution.

The forfeiture power of the courts will also exist in two limited situations when the forfeiture will not have to be preceded by a conviction but where a charge has been laid. When an offender has died or has fled from the jurisdiction of the court, it is obvious that the state has no control over either of these circumstances. However, to be consistent with the principle that an offender should not be entitled to benefit from his or her own wrong, in those limited cases the illegal profits should be confiscated by the court without the finding of personal guilt. Again, I wish to emphasize that the onus of proof on the prosecution will be proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Translation]

A system of forfeiture of proceeds of crime cannot operate adequately if the court is unable to intervene to seize and freeze them before the trial. Accordingly the Bill empowers the court to authorize police to seize goods which can be the subject of a sworn affidavit, based on reasonable grounds, that they are indeed the proceeds of crime. This procedure is extant in the case of certain elements of proof pursuant to the Criminal Code, Section 443, and has been on the statute books for centuries.

[English]

To supplement this seizure power, the legislation has borrowed from the equitable jurisdiction of the civil courts to create a judicially authorized system of restraining orders. Such measures are available to claimants in the civil context and are sometimes referred to as the Mareva injunctions. These civil remedies create court-authorized restraints on the disposition of assets in order to make them available for the future trial of a civil action. They recognize the fact of life that unless courts authorize a restraint on disposition, assets which may be subject to forfeiture after a trial that will take place sometime in the future may be disposed of or hidden. The same comment can be made in a criminal context. The argument is even stronger in favour of restraint because of the wider public interest as opposed to the private interest of a civil litigant.

The criminal law has long recognized that in certain circumstances the public interest demands that action be taken prior to the completion of a trial proceedings. The most clear example of this is the pre-trial detention of the accused when it is shown that he or she may not show up for his or her trial if released, or that for other good and sufficient reasons it is not in the public interest to release the accused. The courts have consistently upheld this power as a valid exercise of the criminal law and surely the protection of property can be put on no higher plane than that of the liberty of the individual.

Under the provisions of this Bill, the powers of pre-trial seizure and restraint will be scrutinized and authorized by only the most senior levels of judges. An application can only be made by the Attorney General or his or her representative and must be accompanied by a sworn affidavit. A very important element of the legislation is that the courts can require the Attorney General to give an undertaking relating to the payment of costs and damages in respect of the execution of an inappropriate seizure or restraining order. All of these measures guarantee that these powers will only be exercised in those cases where there is merit to the request.

At this time I would like to deal with those aspects of the legislation that establish a system of protection of the rights of innocent third parties who may be affected by the seizure, restraining or forfeiture orders.

First, before a seizure of restraining order is issued, the judge can require that third parties, owners, persons in possession and the accused be notified of the application to enable them to put their positions before the court and protect their interests.

Second, once such an order is issued, any person affected by it can apply for an immediate review subject to a minimal two-day notice to the Attorney General which can be waived by the Attorney General.

Third, at the forfeiture hearing itself, the court is obligated to consider notifying any person with an interest in the property who has not been given an opportunity to defend that interest.

Fourth, a third party is entitled to apply for relief from forfeiture within a 30-day period after an order is made. In effect, an execution of the order is automatically suspended under the legislation for that purpose.

Fifth, at the time the court is considering its residual power of disposal of property; that is, when there has been no forfeiture or restoration order in relation to the property, any third party that appears to have an interest in the property is entitled to be heard by the court prior to its disposing of the property.

Finally, there is a provision in the legislation for an automatic expiry of the order after six months unless the Attorney General satisfies the judge that the order should continue for the purposes of a forfeiture or other proceeding.

Of course, third parties as well as accused persons and the Attorney General are given full rights to appeal orders of forfeiture if they feel aggrieved by them.

[Translation]

Such are the general provisions of the legislative measures which, in my opinion, will be considered as strong but equitable means to come to grips with the ever more urgent problems of organized crime.

And now, Madam Speaker, I should like to review some of the particular aspects of these legislative measures which, I hope, much as the general provisions, will make of this initiative a mechanism to fight against individuals who benefit from criminal activities.

[English]

To prevent Canada from becoming a haven for the proceeds of crime, the legislation will forfeit assets on Canadian soil no matter where the criminal conduct has taken place. In order to assist the courts in tracing the assets of such criminal activities, the legislation creates an inference that entitles a court to find that an increase in the net worth of an individual is derived from criminal activity when such activity is established and there is no legitimate explanation for that increase.

• (1130)

Several new offences are created in this Bill. First, the offence of laundering the proceeds of crime is created to deal with increasingly sophisticated means of hiding the illegitimate sources of assets.

Second, there are new offences in the drug statutes analogous to Section 312 of the Criminal Code relating to the possession of property obtained by crime. There is a provision for obtaining, at the investigative stage of a designated drug offence, a court authorized order of disclosure of income tax information.

Finally, in order to encourage the investigation of enterprise crime, the legislation includes a provision creating a legal defence or shield against a complaint of breach of confidentiality for an individual, such as a banker or a credit union manager, who discloses suspicious transactions by a client who appears to be laundering his money in that institution.

[Translation]

I am aware that after the introduction of this Bill some people pointed out that it does not contain any specific requirement pertaining to the identification of cash transactions. Madam Speaker, I can tell you that, having examined American experience in that respect, I still am not convinced that their legislation on identification and tracking down of illegal funds has been effective enough to justify, for the time being, the enormous amount of work such a measure would impose on financial institutions and the expenditures which Canadian taxpayers would face if it were decided to set up a system to analyze this kind of information.

Instead of imposing constraints on the banking system by forcing it to produce reports, I thought it would be better to encourage representatives to co-operate by protecting them against claims which criminal clients might file against them for helping to uncover money laundering activities.

[English]

There are questions of cost and very complex regulatory intrusion involved in compulsory reporting of financial transactions. In committee we will have the opportunity of examining this aspect more closely. I would simply say that, after examination, it occurs to me that we are not simply dealing with our banks. This legislation will impact upon credit unions and other financial institutions, lawyers, accountants, and financial advisers involved in individual transactions across the country. The reporting itself would involve us, certainly from initial investigation, in a very costly and complex system. We want to be very careful, before we move into this area, to make sure we can work on a voluntary basis with all those involved, and I have been assured that they are prepared to co-operate on a voluntary basis. If we find after some experience that the system is not as effective as it may be and there is a legitimate reason to involve ourselves in what I would call very substantial compulsory reporting requirements, then we can look at that.

Organized crime attempts to get around the existing rules and, if I may be permitted to dwell on this particular point, it seems to me that whatever the limit is with respect to compulsory reporting, the question is whether or not it is going to be an effective tool to assist us in what we all want to achieve, the seizure of illicit profits. I simply say to Hon. Members that we will have an opportunity of examining this question in committee.

I am inclined to hope that we will give this legislation quick and early passage because it is the culmination of considerable effort by both the federal and provincial Governments. There is a principle which I believe can be traced back to Roman law, which is: ex turpi causa non oritur actio. Roughly translated, that means an offender is not entitled to benefit from his or her wrongdoing. No phrase could be more applicable in the context of enterprise crime. This legislation, which is simply an application of that principle, will go a long way toward making this a reality in our country.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, we in Canada spent a long time, decades in fact, denying that organized crime existed in our country. Provincial attorneys-general would have a stock answer, when asked, which indicated organized crime did not exist. We were able to do this for many decades because in the country to the south, whose news is often read by Canadians more than their own, organized crime was such a visible, palpable phenomena, that whatever the level of that type of criminal activity in Canada it was so much less that it seemed one could say there was none. I think law enforcement suffered in that period, in particular, in relation to enterprise crime.

It is long overdue that we recognize that criminal organizations and organized crime, by which one simply means criminal activities or more than one incident carried on by the same group and always, as the Minister indicated, with its principal purpose being financial gain, exists in our country. We would have been able to deal with it better had we addressed it sooner with the type of measures now proposed.

However, here we are bringing forward and offering to the police forces of this country what may be a powerful new instrument for dealing with a phenomena which, yes, exists in our country and which has existed for some time, and which the ordinary provisions of the Criminal Code allowed too often to go unprosecuted and unpunished.

The Minister will be aware, although I do not believe he mentioned it, that the legislation he introduced today was the mandate of the task force set up within the Government of Canada by me back in the early 1980s, and by my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I regret very much that we were unable to complete our work and produce this very important legislation during the period we were in office. I say that only to indicate to the Minister how much we support the spirit of this legislation and how important we think it is that we proceed very carefully.

The Minister in his excellent remarks indicated all of the difficult, complicated considerations involved when you come to deal with an individual's property before that individual has been convicted of a crime.

[Translation]

For instance, Madam Speaker, I recall that when the Constitution was patriated and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms proclaimed some people had advocated the acknowledgement of property rights. At the time our task force on this very important project expressed concerns because it feared that, if property rights were included in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this might throw everything out of kilter and slow down progress in the fight against criminals.

• (1140)

[English]

Even at the time we were drafting the Charter we wanted to be certain that the weapon which was being shaped by this work would still be produced and still be useful. The Liberal Government concluded that legislation in form similar to that which is now before the House could have been brought forward even if the Charter had included the rights of property and the protection of those rights. That is going a long way.

Many Canadians ought to be interested in this legislation, not because they are criminals or will be the targets of any investigations but because we are going to give the police forces of our country tools which they have never had before. Before the conviction of an individual the police will be permitted to apprehend that individual's property. This is worth while and necessary legislation. It is even overdue.

Whatever the difficulties, I hope that we will be able to come up with a very strong way of dealing with the fact, which no reasonable or knowledgeable Canadian can deny, that crime has produced some very rich people in our country. These rich people have long been in the process of converting the proceeds of crime into innocent businesses and ordinary assets such as homes and boats which have nothing to do with crime other than that they are entirely the proceeds of those crimes. If this legislation is effective it will ensure that no one profits from their illegal acts and that the law is capable of pursuing profits as they are laundered.

[Translation]

Laundering of crime proceeds has become a growing trend—and this activity can be seen ever more often in our country—so we urgently need a mechanism to do something about it.

[English]

In order to help Members understand the delicate nature of the intrusions into private property which will result from this legislation, I will recount, without identifying the actual cases, a couple of incidents in which the Government was involved over the past few years.

In one case we were informed by representatives of a friendly government that an official of that country had come to Canada and opened a number of bank accounts into which he had deposited corrupt money, proceeds of bribery. That government was preparing all the legal work to lay charges against the individual. They intended to come to Canada to launch legal proceedings to try to recover that money. They asked us to help them by asking the banks to freeze the accounts while this process was ongoing. They knew the individual was well advised and that if he became suspicious that his government was pursuing this money it would be quickly moved to another country.

I received that foreign delegation and talked to my colleagues in Cabinet and then to the banks. I got something of a lecture about how little power the federal Government had to interfere with the business of a bank in relation to one of its clients. We could not get even the information that the bank account existed. We had some information from the government which had been robbed, but did not have confirmation of that from the bank.

In one way and or other during the weeks before that money was shifted from our country to another country I came personally to the realization that some kind of tool is needed in our world, with the complications which exist and the opportunities which are available to rich criminals to get legal advice and move money from one form to another. Crime pays unless we are able to do exactly what this legislation proposes to do.

I do not expect banks to serve government. A bank is there to serve its customers. If we as a society want the banks to do something different from what the law tells them to do now, we have to change the laws. I mean no criticism of banks. However, I think the Minister will agree, and I know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) would agree as well, that our banks are among the most customer-oriented of any banks in the world. Even in the United States, where people think free enterprise and respect for the individual goes furthest, banks are obliged by law to turn over certain information about large deposits in cash and movements from one branch to another. Canadian banks have no corresponding reporting obligations.

We should not require this because the Americans require it. They do so because organized crime is a much more serious problem there. However, because it is a serious problem here the time has come for us to do this as well. Today at second reading we are taking the step of asking the banks not only to be responsible to their customers but to assume an element of social responsibility to reporting and disclosure requirements which they have not been expected to assume until now.

Life being what it is, there is no doubt that some innocent people will wrongly fall under the purview of this legislation. For that reason it will be very important for us to be sure that the legislation respects the individual as much as possible, that rights of privacy are compromised only to the minimum extent needed to make sure that the law is effective and that it can actually do its job.

I also want to talk about the problems which can arise when a third party's interests are affected in the assets seized. Even rich criminals may have mortgages on their boats, cars or houses. When that property is seized we have to be certain that the rights of innocent people who have loaned money in the normal course of business are also taken into account and that they get some notice and opportunity to do something to protect their innocent involvement in the establishment of the asset being targeted.

That was one of the toughest problems our administration worked on. We had many meetings to discuss the ways in which to deal with the rights of innocent people involved in these property matters. It was not an easy problem and we were not able to provide a solution prior to the summer of 1984.

I am glad this legislation is before the House. I have been looking forward to it. I am pleased that no hard deadline is being put on it as is so typical of the Government in other matters. We will have all the time we need and will be able to call witnesses. I certainly hope banks and financial institutions will give this the attention it deserves. Some of their customers certainly will want to categorize this legislation as anti-private property and anti-individual privacy. We must be certain that in this place, where we have the power to invade those very important rights, we do it for good reason and only to the limited extent needed to give effect to this very important tool so necessary if we are to have effective law enforcement in the age of the rich established criminal.

I commend the legislation to the House. We will be very interested in seeing it come forward and I look forward to participating in the work of the committee to be established.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to debate this important legislation that will ensure that Canada finally takes the long overdue step to recognize that those who profit from organized crime in many cases are able to use weak and inadequate legislation as a means of laundering the profits of that crime.

The Government has indicated that this particular Bill, Bill C-61, is part of its over-all package in an approach to the abuse of drugs in Canada. Certainly we in this Party welcome a sensitive and thoughtful approach to the abuse of drugs in Canada, but I must say that the Government has failed to recognize that the most serious drug abuse in Canada today relates to alcohol and prescription drugs, and that there must be adequate funding, particularly for treatment facilities, to deal with those who are abusing these drugs. That failure on the part of the Government is a serious shortcoming and makes its so-called drug strategy in many respects very seriously flawed.

I would have hoped as well that in legislation to amend the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act, the Government would have recognized that this is indeed an appropriate time to amend those two important pieces of legislation to respond to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Oakes. That decision was one which struck down the provisions of both those Acts, conferring in effect a reverse onus on the accused. In my view, it was recognized quite properly that that heavy reverse onus was in conflict with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Surely when the Government brings forward legislation to amend these two Acts with respect to drugs, that is an appropriate time to respond to that concern and to repeal the reverse onus provisions of the drug legislation. I thought and hoped that the Government would recognize that, instead of simply ignoring the court decision and saying it is bound by it but will not bring in that legislative change before the House at this time, when it is most appropriate.

I also suggest that an important element of a comprehensive drug strategy in Canada must be recognition as well of the serious inadequacies of Canada's legislation with respect to marijuana. Surely we must recognize as a society the enormous toll that is taken by the current provisions of the Narcotic Control Act which impose harsh criminal sanctions and a criminal record on young people that can act as a very serious barrier to future employment as well as in a number of other respects.

Many people believe that an absolute discharge means there are no consequences for the young person involved. That is not the case. Many others believe that the police are not, in fact, busting young people for simple possession of small quantities of marijuana. That is not the case either.

I hope that we as a society recognize that, while we must do everything in our power to discourage the use of marijuana and other illicit drugs, particularly by our young people, we must put far more resources into education and prevention.

The present provisions of the Narcotic Control Act, which impose a heavy criminal sanction and criminal record for these offences, must be re-examined. I would have hoped that as part of a comprehensive drug strategy, the Government would have moved forward on this.

We do not need a lot of evidence. The chief drug policy researcher at the Addiction Research Foundation, Patricia Erikson, points out that at least 20,000 young people in Canada are still convicted of these offences of simple possession each year. She suggested that the harm in saddling them with a criminal record outweighs any deterrent benefits that may exist. As well, she points out that each year in Canada over 2,000 young people are subject to terms of imprisonment as a result of these Draconian laws.

Once again, I would have hoped that the Government, in its review of drug legislation in Canada, would have come to grips with this very serious problem. I regret the silence and inaction of the Government in this important area of law.

Turning to the provisions of Bill C-61 itself, there are essentially two major thrusts of the legislation. The first is to extend significant new search and restraint powers to the police in their attempt to deal with the profits of organized crime. Certainly there is no question that the existing law is inadequate and must be strengthened in order to permit us to deal with the profits of organized crime. We want to be very sure in doing that that the rights of innocent third parties are not unduly impaired. That is the second major area of the legislation.

The first area of concern with respect to the Bill is its effectiveness in dealing with the proceeds of crime and in achieving its stated objective. The second area of concern is the possible implication of this legislation for the rights of accused persons and, most important, of innocent third parties who may have inadvertently and entirely innocently come into the possession of the proceeds of organized crime. We want to make sure that this legislation balances those serious concerns.

There are a number of important questions that should be addressed in committee about the effectiveness of the legislation. Of course, we know that the seizure and restraint order provisions allow for pre-trial and even pre-charge sequestration of property. Even before an information has been laid the property can, in fact, be seized under the provisions of this legislation. Of particular importance in this regard are the restraint orders. For the first time, intangible property will not be beyond the reach of law enforcement officials, which is an important step forward and certainly something we support. The general powers of forfeiture are also an improvement and a significant step forward.

Finally, the new laundering offence attempts to get at a very significant problem in the present law. That is, the impunity with which those who are handling the proceeds of crime can simply carry on their business as usual.

However, questions remain to be answered about the effectiveness of the legislation. For instance, what is the standard of information which will be required for the issuance of a warrant or an order? The provisions of this legislation would allow for a warrant for wiretap. We have seen just recently some of the concerns which have been raised with respect to information that is provided on wiretap applications.

Given the potential for abuse in this area, and the fact that these applications are made on the basis of sworn affidavits, I think it is time that we in Canada look at the suggestion that has been made by a number of civil liberties groups and a number of those active before the Bar that there should be a respected independent third party present in the courtroom to ask the tough questions that should be asked with respect to the affidavits that are filed to obtain warrants for these intrusive powers, including wiretaps. As I say, we saw a recent example in CSIS of the very serious abuse of these powers. I believe we must consider the possibility that there should be a third party in a courtroom, representing the interests of the public, to make sure that these sweeping powers are not abused.

I wonder as well why it is that under the legislation the provisions with respect to the disclosure of tax information are limited to the investigation of offences in relation to drugs? What about some of the other enterprise crimes which are set out in the legislation, some of the fraud related enterprise crimes, for example? I would suggest the committee will want to look at this as one area. If we see the importance of disclosure in certain circumstance of tax information with respect to offences in relation to drugs, why not the other serious enterprise crimes which are included under the umbrella of this legislation?

Another area which we must surely examine in committee is the whole question of the reporting requirements for banks as a result of the provisions of the Bill. It is in this area that the Government, I believe, has been weakest in its response to the importance of dealing with the proceeds of organized crime. The Minister will know the history of this particular question of whether or not banks should be required to report substantial transactions.

Under the Bank Search Act in the United States there is such a requirement. In fact, it has proved to be very effective. The FBI has used the provisions of the Bank Search Act to help it spot money laundering schemes, and in fact, it has been instrumental in a number of major drug arrests in the United States.

Under the provisions of American legislation, records of payments which exceed $10,000 made to U.S. financial institutions from abroad, have to be retained. As well, records which indicate transfers of credit outside the country exceeding $10,000 must be kept for five years. Probably one of the most important provisions is that banks must report deposits, withdrawals, currency exchanges or transfers involving amounts above $10,000 originating outside the United States to the Treasury Department. These provisions have proved to be very effective in the United States in dealing with the profits of organized crime.

As long ago as 1981, the former Government embarked upon a federal-provincial study to examine enterprise crime or organized crime. That study came up with its report to the Justice Department in 1983. The report stated in part:

> —Without clear track and identify the movement of profits earned by sophisticated criminals, it will be hard for police and the courts to effectively use the—"freeze and seize" provisions.
> Without clear powers to identify and track the proceeds of crime, it is difficult to connect the proceeds to a particular offence or to a particular criminal.
> Given this obstacle, it follows that it would be equally difficult to apply provisions for freezing, seizure and forfeiture of criminal proceeds.

What the report is saying is that we can bring forward legislation empowering the freezing, seizure and tracing of these proceeds of organized crimes, but unless we have a mechanism in place to identify them in the first place, the legislation will be very seriously weakened.

The Deputy Solicitor General less than two years ago in a letter to the then Federal Inspector General of Banks said:

> Canadian legislation that would permit the freezing, seizure, and forfeiture of the profits of enterprise crime would have little effect unless there were mechanisms in place whereby these profits could be traced. The profits are used to finance other illegal activities or are laundered through financial institutions in Canada and abroad, and infiltrate legitimate business.

One would have hoped the Government, if it was serious about its commitment to track the profits of organized crime, would have accepted the recommendation of this federal-provincial working group and brought forward provisions requiring Canadian banks to report these kinds of transactions. But the Government did not. The Conservative Government knuckled under to the banks and said, "We are not going to impose a reporting requirement on you as the United States has imposed a reporting requirement on its banking system". I remind you, Madam Speaker, that the United States does not exactly have a wild-eyed socialist as President. Yet even the United States, with its President and with its Attorney General Ed Messe—who is not exactly known as a great leftist or great state intervener—recognized that it was important, if the United States was going to be serious about the profits of organized crime, to take on the banks, to tell them they have to report these transactions.

What does the Conservative Government do? It caves into the Canadian banking system. Some cynics have suggested that it is perhaps because the links between the Conservative Party and the major banks are very close, that it receives substantial financial contributions from each of the banks. That is a rather cynical approach and I certainly would not want to suggest that.

Let us look at what the Government's spokespeople have said about the imposition of a requirement on the banks to report. Ross Christensen, director general of police and law enforcement policy for the Department of the Solicitor General, said:

> To impose that kind of reporting requirement on the banking community would be a major step. We are aware of that and we do not want any confrontation.

We in this Party believe that if we are going to be serious about attacking organized crime, we have to take seriously our responsibilities to identify its profits. That means dealing with the banks of this country and imposing the same reporting requirements on them as the Americans have imposed on American banks. The effect of not doing this is quite clear.

Indeed, some of this laundering of profits from organized crime may indeed be filtered through Canadian banks with their extensive network in Europe and the Caribbean as well. I hope that the Government will recognize that it made a mistake, that it should not have knuckled under to the Canadian banks, and that it will accept the amendment I intend to propose in committee, that is, to impose a reporting requirement on the banks.

It is interesting to see what the banks themselves have to say about this particular question. Richard Marshall, senior international counsel at the Bank of Nova Scotia, said about money laundering:

> It can't be done without a bank . . . But usually not just any bank will do. Money launderers prefer banks that have an international network of branches, including some in tax havens, and computers to shuttle money around the world—

And guess which banking system in the entire world is most suited to do that? You guessed it, Madam Speaker, it is the Canadian banking system. Guess which Government is refusing to impose on that banking system the requirement to report these transactions? It is its friends in the Conservative Government. The Minister responsible for senior citizens shakes his head in disbelief. I can understand that because it is a shocking caving in to the banking system.

Richard Marshall, the senior international counsel at the Bank of Nova Scotia says:

> We're efficient at what we do. As such, we're a good target of money launderers.

The senior international counsel at the Bank of Nova Scotia admits they are a prime target for money launderers. Yet what does this Government do? It does nothing to impose this basic requirement of reporting transactions. We are not talking about reporting nickel and dime transactions. We are talking about taking effective steps to ensure that those banks who do launder large amounts of money as a result of organized crime are required to report these transactions. If the banks are not required to report these transactions, then all of the sweeping powers in this legislation will in fact go for naught.

I want to deal for a moment in the final part of my remarks with some of the concerns which do arise with respect to the legislation and its implications for innocent third parties. The legislation does not just impact on persons who are accused of crimes—in some cases those who have not even been charged yet—but it may touch on innocent third parties as well. The legislation which was introduced prior to this, in 1984, Bill C-19, required that the sweeping powers of search and seizure could only be exercised after a criminal information had been laid. However, this legislation merely requires a statement of "grounds to believe" that property may be forfeitable. In committee, we will have to ask ourselves whether that standard is in fact high enough or whether there should not be some enquiry at least as to the likelihood of criminal proceedings.

It is also important that, if innocent third parties are subject to seizure, the onus should not be placed on them to challenge it. There should be an early review of such seizures by the courts so that these people do not have to hire lawyers, go to court and complain that they are innocent third parties and that their businesses or their personal affairs are being jeopardized as a result of this seizure.

We all know that going to court can be an expensive proposition. We all know that hiring a lawyer and appearing before the court costs money. Why should an innocent third party be put in the position of having to spend the funds to defend oneself in a situation such as that? I suggest that there should be an early provision for a judicial review to ensure that this onus is not placed on those who in fact are innocent third parties.

We should also look at a provision with respect to renewal of the seizure and restraint orders. Under the Bill as it is worded they can be renewed over and over again for a six-month period. I suggest that the Attorney General should have to meet a more substantial burden of proof after the initial six-month period.

As well, concerns have been raised with respect to the scope of the legislation and, in particular, the extent to which Canada, unlike other jurisdictions which have enacted similar legislation—jurisdictions such as Australia, the United States and Britain—would include within the definition of "enterprise crime" the proceeds from the bawdy-house provisions of the Criminal Code. It is one thing to attack the profits of those who would exploit prostitutes, that is, the pimps. All of us in the House would not disagree that those who exploit individuals in that way should certainly be subject to the provisions of this legislation. However, this legislation goes beyond that. It would lump in with the pimp the prostitute as well. In effect, it would treat the proceeds and the property of the prostitute in exactly the same way as the proceeds and the property of the pimp who is exploiting the prostitute. I suggest that that is an undue extension of the criminal law.

What we are saying with these provisions—these harsh and, I suggest, unconstitutional provisions of earlier legislation adopted by the House to sweep the streets clear of prostitutes and, in effect, to deny any form of communication for the purposes of prostitution—is that we want the streets clear. What the Government is saying is, "We will sweep you off the streets but now if you engage in an act of prostitution in your own home or anywhere else we will subject you to forfeiture of those proceeds as well". Subject to forfeiture, for example, is a car or anything else. I suggest that this is a serious and unwarranted extension of the powers under this legislation. I hope that the Government will reconsider that fact when this matter goes to committee.

The Government has said that it is cracking down on the proceeds of organized crime, that it is coming to grips with white-collar crime. That is a myth. We know that if the Government were serious about coming to grips with white-collar crime, we would be looking at legislation to deal with the proceeds of organized crime. But what about those in the corporate boardrooms who profit from other criminal activity or activity which we have not yet defined as criminal? I refer to those in the corporate boardrooms who are responsible for the pollution and the destruction of the environment, those who in their search for maximizing profits and greed are responsible for the production of substandard and hazardous products which threaten lives, safety or health. I refer to those who are responsible for working conditions which result in injury or death to workers. What about dealing with the proceeds of those particular offences? What about dealing with the profits from those crimes? I suggest that if the Government is serious about tackling white-collar crime and the proceeds of it, it is about time it recognized that these other offences should be dealt with in a tough manner as well.

In conclusion, we in this Party certainly support effective legislation that will deal with the proceeds of organized crime. We welcome the opportunity to give this legislation the careful scrutiny that it clearly warrants in committee. I am pleased that the Minister has indicated, as my colleague from York Centre stated, that he is not holding a gun to the head of the committee, that he will allow the committee to conduct its study with the kind of thoughtful deliberation that is necessary for such important legislation. Thus we in this Party look forward to raising a number of these issues in committee. We look forward to hearing from witnesses with respect to the provisions of the legislation, in particular the friends of the Conservative Government from the Canadian Bankers' Association. We look forward to questioning them. Hopefully, as a result of this type of careful scrutiny we will have a Bill which Members on all sides of the House can support.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a couple of questions and lay out some terms on which I would have him comment on the Government's legislation. The first matter involves the seizure of assets used in the commission of crime—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member. I remind him that he can speak on debate but that there is no question and comment period following the speech of Hon. Members. If the Hon. Member wishes to have the floor on debate, then I will certainly recognize him.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I think that legislation that moves in the direction of removing the assets and profit motivation from crime is positive. It is a move which we can support. Certainly, a number of shortcomings have been pointed out in areas we would like to see some improvements. But I think that those matters will come up in committee where they can be given serious consideration. I see the Minister responsible nodding in the affirmative in that respect.

I would like to ask the Government to reply to the general question about assets used in criminal offences. I cast my mind back to provincial legislation, and in particular to the game legislation of British Columbia. If one happens to be in a car with a firearm and does not have a hunting licence then one's vehicle can be seized, as well as anything within it. This is treated as an extremely serious matter. The Government has talked about its concern for the victims of crime and about restitution. However, in many instances equipment used to perpetrate an offence and the assets related to it are not seized. If in fact those were subject to seizure and the proceeds were made available as an element of restitution to victims then a positive move would be taken.

Having regard to a Bill such as this, we must consider not only the profit motivation in the commission of the crime, but seizure of the assets involved. We should consider an expansion of the penalty to the criminal with the possibility of providing restitution to the victim. This is something which should be carefully examined when the matter goes to committee.

There has been a massive campaign across the country with respect to drunk driving. Under the liquor legislation of British Columbia, if one is roaming around with a case of beer in the back of one's car, that car can be seized. However, at the same time we do not provide a provision in the Criminal Code which states that if one is convicted of drunk driving one loses one's car. Introducing such a provision would provide enormous incentives to people not to drive an automobile under the influence of alcohol. I think there would be an immediate and dramatic impact on such behaviour. When the committee studies this Bill it should look at expanding some of its provisions in this respect since it is a matter of serious concern.

I want to expand upon a concept at which the Government has looked by flagging a very serious issue. Just recently a murder took place in Port Hardy, British Columbia, an area which I represent. An individual had been offended in a local bar. He went down to the fishing vessel on which he worked as a deck-hand, obtained a firearm which was not secured, sawed 14 inches off the barrel, returned to the bar, and killed two people. Property was involved in this offence. We have strict provisions in the Criminal Code about the use of firearms, but unfortunately there is no requirement locally by the RCMP for individuals to secure firearms properly. There is no responsibility on the part of individuals to do it. I presume down the road there can be civil action. Obviously, according to people who are involved, the owners of firearms must have guidelines which are enforceable by sanctions. There must be guidelines for the securing of firearms; locking them up and removing the ammunition and firing mechanism. If that individual in Port Hardy had not been aware that another person had a firearm which could be readily obtained, perhaps these dire circumstances would not have been brought about.

Let us look at several incidents in British Columbia where firearms have been obtained by children and have resulted in fatalities. Again it is a question of control of specific assets which should be the subject of criminal sanctions. There should be clear guidelines enforceable by law and there should be consequences, especially in terms of restitution for victims.

The whole question of white collar crime was raised by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) who did an excellent job in his presentation. He mentioned the serious dilemma of adequate penalties in the case of white collar crime. Quite often millions of dollars are misused; for example, in a breach of trust they are stolen outright from individuals, and the most that happens to the perpetrator is a slap on the wrist. There are serious shortcomings in this area, which the Hon. Member eloquently set forth.

Another consideration is the size of investigatory, agencies and the environment which the Government has created in cutting the Public Service, restraining expansion of the Public Service, and restraining the Budget. It is my understanding that there has not been proper expansion of RCMP facilities in the investigation of white collar crime—commercial crime squad groups. Along with Bill C-61 and the crackdown which everyone in the House would like to see, there must be an increase in the resources given to the RCMP to enforce the law and do an effective job.

I should like to reiterate, on the issue of drunken driving, that if the House placed a requirement in the Criminal Code to seize the vehicle involved in an impaired driving situation, there would be a massive disincentive for people to drive while under the influence of alcohol. If a provision were included in the Criminal Code under which the owner of a firearm who failed to properly secure would be guilty of a criminal offence, there would not be the kinds of things we have seen occurring in British Columbia, such as the shooting in Port Hardy. The possibility or probability of that would be diminished. Also there would be a major disincentive for owners in relation to the availability of firearms in tragic situations involving the accidental shooting of children.

I know the committee will examine the Bill diligently. I hope it will look at the prospects of expanding it to cover the areas I have mentioned.

EXTENSION OF REPORTING TIME OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Madam Speaker, I should like to revert to an earlier discussion this morning respecting the motion for the reporting date of the constitutional committee.

There have been further discussions among House Leaders and the Parties with a view to determining a date which would give the committee adequate time to prepare accurate translations and to fixing a date so that the Parties that wish to comment on the report can fix their schedules.

Under the circumstances I think Your Honour would find agreement to the following motion being moved and put at this time:

That the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord shall report on Monday, September 21, 1987, notwithstanding any previous order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the amendment. Is there unanimous consent to amend the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn that Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Madam Speaker, we should re-emphasize that the legislation before us today constitutes a part of the national drug strategy announced by the Government quite some time ago. The first overture was a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) that Canada faced a drug epidemic.

Of course the statement which precipitated the national drug strategy was copied from a similar statement by the President of the United States, once again reflecting a peculiar habit of the Government sensing political advantage in something occurring on the other side of the border, particularly when times are bad, and borrowing from that jurisdiction in order to enhance the political status of a Government severely in need of political status.

As it happened, the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare had an opportunity over the last year to examine the issue. I think we must direct our attention to the picture or image conjured up by the Prime Minister at that time, that there was massive use of crack and that marijuana, heroin, and cocaine were the chief areas of abuse in this country.

It was indicated that somehow young people were out of control and that by taking vigorous action we could change a situation which was imaged, within the same context, as the situation in the United States, a situation which was further exaggerated by the projection of the image on television in Canada, as if what appears on television from the United States reflects the situation in Canada.

Within that context there was a great deal of quick and automatic support in the population for a government attack on a situation which, quite frankly, it was possible to suggest even at the beginning was not the same in Canada as it was in the United States.

The Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare held a number of hearings and listened to many witnesses across the country. No expert, no one working intimately with those involved in chemical abuse, could agree that Canada was presented with a drug crisis predicated upon the predominant use of cocaine, heroin, or marijuana. However, it was indicated that 95 per cent of the chemical abuse problem in Canada was attributable to alcohol. Secondly, there was not evidence of the stereotyped image of youth gone wild but, rather, that the ordinary housewife, the ordinary middle-class individual had been convinced by the medical community and the drug companies to seek, through the use of agents such as Valium and other tranquilizers, some relief from the pressures of modern day life.

In short, the two most abused classes of chemicals in Canada are alcohol and over the counter/prescription drugs, abused not by young people or teenagers, but by adults considered to be responsible citizens in the country and, indeed, perhaps in the House.

If one wants to look at where chemical abuse has caused disruption in families, look at alcohol. If one wants to find chemical abuse that has caused death and suffering, look at alcohol. If one wants to look at what has led to 20 per cent of the occupied beds in hospitals, look at alcohol. If one wants to find the source of terrible suffering among the Indian and native peoples, look at alcohol. If one wants to find the chief cause of death and injury due to accident and family abuse, look at alcohol. Perhaps there is not an epidemic but there is a long-standing endemic occurrence of chemical abuse, namely, alcohol.

The problems posed by alcohol are difficult and complex. It is an agent accepted by our society; it is a part of society. Recognizing the serious difficulties and evils with which it is associated, nevertheless, 95 per cent of the population can use alcoholic beverages with impunity and enjoyment without harm. Yet we have been told by the Government, by the Prime Minister, and in a variety of ways, that the serious problem is to be found in the streets and at the parties of our youth. But the key to the problem is to look at the behaviour of adults. I think this needs emphasis, and it will be given emphasis in the committee's report.

To have made this argument and to have pointed out the facts is not to dismiss the problem of illicit drugs and the huge profits made through the suffering of those addicted to narcotics, which is a part of the international criminal profiteering in the world. There are elements of the national drug strategy that we support. Indeed, we can support the vast majority of those elements which constitute the national drug strategy.

Given that we have a government which believes that the use of illicit drugs is a national epidemic, we should put what it is planning to do within reasonable perspective. Two hundred and ten million additional dollars will be spent fighting drug trafficking in Canada. That sounds like an awful lot of money. One would have thought that what this indicates is an urgent response to an epidemic, created in the minds of the Conservative Government, until we recognize that that $210 million will be spent over five years, that $170 million per annum is being spent now, and the first component of the $210 million expenditure will be an additional expenditure of $20 million over the $170 million. Most would agree, I think that that is not a dramatic increase in the devotion of federal resources to combatting drug trafficking.

The committee intimated that if one looks at the reality and the way this money will be distributed over geography, jurisdictions and years, we hardly have a total commitment to a problem to which the Government has found it must respond. Certainly the legislation with which we are dealing today is another example of an inadequate response. It is, I guess, an example of speaking loudly and carrying a very small stick; yes, we will attack money laundering, yes, we will make people forfeit the proceeds of crime, yes, we will freeze what are suspected proceeds from crime.

Anyone who has examined the issue of money laundering from the proceeds of criminal activity will agree that something similar to the bank secrecy act, implemented in the United States, must also be implemented in Canada. It is to the credit of those members of the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare from all sides of the House that they recognized that the necessity of a reporting system, as has been enacted in United States, is needed in Canada as well. Cash transactions over $10,000, along with all international transactions, should require reporting, recording and maintaining.

Given the tremendous support from those well informed on this issue, given the clear necessity for having a system of reporting financial transactions which would enable us to detect that the laundering of the proceeds of criminal activity is taking place, it is beyond me and beyond Members on this side of the House why the Government should stop short of doing what is evidently necessary to ensure the effective enforcement of anti-money laundering measures. There are those who have suggested collusion between the Government and the banks. I would disavow any such suggestion, because it is a suggestion of unnecessary interaction. The Government is so evidently in tune with the banking community that it knows what is wanted and what is not wanted, as surely as a mother knows the needs of her child and so responds, and would reject what is an inconvenience to the banks. I know the banks say that such a reporting system might be expensive.

If we can make nice, neat tax and accounting arrangements for the banks to handle their international Third World debt in a convenient way, surely it would be trivial by comparison to have the expenditure process that would enable Canada and this Government to attack the issue of money laundering and effectively gain what has been achieved in the United States, namely, a means of detecting criminal activity through the identification of money laundering through a proper reporting and recording system. It is not too much to ask, Madam Speaker.

I join with my colleague in expressing the hope, in contrast to the refugee Bill and the other things with which we have been dealing over the last few weeks, over which the Government has disregarded all positive contributions, that the Government will see that this is not a partisan issue, even for this partisan Government. I hope the Government will engage in a co-operative effort to create an effective attack on the laundering of profits from illicit activities, most particularly those profits gained by trafficking in drugs.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I wish my colleague who made an excellent presentation might pursue an element of extremely serious concern, that is, that the weight placed by the Government on drug abuse and drug trafficking is not necessarily a misapplication of resources, but that it is certainly a failure to recognize the most serious problem in Canada, that of alcohol abuse. Being very knowledgeable about the activities of the Health and Welfare Committee, I would ask the Hon. Member whether or not the Government is co-ordinating its activity. One hand seems to be moving in a direction without the other hand knowing what is going on.

One of the most serious problems in Canada is not teenage drug abuse, but teenage alcohol abuse, and it is not just a problem with teenagers but with children in elementary schools. Many parents have told us that there are all kinds of programs in Canada for the treatment of adults who abuse alcohol. For example, the Armed Forces has an excellent program of rehabilitation. Enlightened industrial leaders are developing modern programs for adults, but there is nothing for children. The problem is growing by leaps and bounds.

There is one particular group in my own area, the North Island Alcohol and Drug Information Society, that has had to beg for funds. It is doing a magnificent job of informing young people of the problems, but it has had to beg employment development for funds and has been rejected occasionally. It has not been able to get anything out of the Department of Health.

I wonder if my colleague, the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy) could tell us what the Committee on National Health and Welfare has recommended we do about the question of teenage alcoholism and the treatment of teenage alcohol abusers, a problem which is far more serious at this point than the problem of drug abuse. Does the Hon. Member have any personal opinions, given the experience he has had on that committee, about what we should be doing about funding volunteer groups and other community agencies that are trying to deal with this critical problem?

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, I would be hesitant to give a complete preview of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare on the issue of chemical abuse. However, the committee does recognize the inadequacy of programs intended to provide young people in particular with the kind of education that would enable them to make lifestyle choices which would permit them to deal in moderation with a number of potentially abusable substances and, indeed, experiences faced by youth these days. As my colleague has said, my Party would support these recommendations. I must say that the recommendations of the committee will be found to be constructive and that all sides of the House will be able to support them. I hope the issue will be regarded in a non-partisan way, as I have said before.

One of the things we must recognize is that chemical abuse and the abuse of opportunities in life are parts of the fabric of behaviour. This behaviour does not require that we go to the schools and say, "Don't drink, don't drink and drive, don't use marijuana, don't use heroin or don't use cocaine". What we must do is recognize that excesses of all sorts are at least partially attributable to family experiences, peer pressures and the failure to recognize that there is a new responsibility in the school system to provide young people with the wherewithal to make proper judgments about choices. They must make judgments about which choices will be beneficial to them, and which will be dangerous.

Certainly it is also true that the committee has recognized that there is inadequate funding and inadequate co-ordination. As well, there is an inadequate definition of national priorities, priorities that would allow organizations, such as the one cited by my hon. colleague, to contribute significantly and positively to this very serious problem that plagues so much of our population. We are particularly concerned about youth, but adults as well face problems with respect to the treatment of drug abuse.

I can only tell the Hon. Member that he should wait for the committee's report. I think he will find that the issues he has raised have been identified and addressed and are the subject of positive recommendations.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I wonder if my hon. friend could tell the House if the committee spent any time analyzing the effect of television advertising on supplementing the perception young people already seem to get from their parents and from society that one cannot have a good time, a party or a gathering without alcohol. I notice that most of the public advertising on television at least leaves the very clear impression that friends cannot gather for a good time without the introduction of alcohol. Did the committee spend any time looking at that aspect of the problem or did it simply look in general at the societal acceptance or promotion of that particular drug in society?

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, the answer to the substantive question is yes.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to respond to Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act.

This particular Bill received first reading in the House on May 29 of this year and the Government has indicated that this is part of its plan to combat drug abuse in Canada and to take whatever steps necessary to encourage more and more people, particularly young people, to move away from an interest in drugs. On balance, it is a step in that direction. For that reason, my hon. friend for Burnaby has indicated that the principle of this Bill is one we of course support.

However, there are certainly major shortcomings in the Bill. A number of speakers have already outlined in some detail the specific concerns they have about what is lacking in this legislation. Of course, that is the role of an effective and efficient Opposition. Its role is to agree in principle with a Bill while working hard to improve legislation.

I certainly have confidence that Hon. Members, whether of the New Democratic Party, of the Liberal Party or of the Conservative Party, will all be motivated by the need to improve this legislation and to make it the best legislation possible. I believe all parliamentarians can be unified by doing anything possible to enact legislation that will save the people of Canada from falling victim to drugs and drug abuse. That would certainly be an appropriate initiative.

I look forward to seeing real progress made on this Bill. At this stage, of course, we are simply dealing with the Bill in principle and, therefore, I think it is appropriate to discuss not only the principle of the Bill but also to use the opportunity to point out two or three of its major shortcomings. I plan to focus my comments on one area of particular interest to me.

I remember, and I am sure you will recall, that not many months ago we had brought to our attention, through some incredibly good investigative journalism, the problem of laundering of drug money. Drug traffickers are unscrupulous characters who take advantage of young people, by and large—but not just young people—and encourage them to use drugs, thereby reaping exorbitant profits. There was quite a furor in the House of Commons at that time about whether or not Canadian bank branches in the Bahamas were involved. The investigation pointed the finger at a number of Canadian banks, and I will not name them, who were operating in the Caribbean. You have to look long and hard to find any real economic activity in some of these banks, but of course a considerable amount of money was moving through them. It seemed that the word on the street was that people were walking into bank branches in the Caribbean with suitcases filled with $100 bills, depositing them, and through a number of intricate financial transaction they found their way into more legitimate investments.

The interesting thing is that there was never any real action taken on those allegations. Of course, the banks denied any involvement. Yet the evidence suggested there was something here that needed to be dealt with, and so the banks took the initiative and promised they would implement procedures requiring more scrutiny of deposits exceeding $10,000. That is fine. The banks may have their own internal systems to deal with this, but I think on balance we would agree that this is not an appropriate response.

That is particularly true, given some of the financial skullduggery, and some have referred to it as financial piracy, which has been going on at the senior level of some of our financial institutions, particularly in western Canada, where people were behaving in ways not expected of senior officials of our major financial institutions. In other words, the fact that a bank might have an internal procedure does not bring us much comfort in some areas.

This legislation takes steps to deal with money raised through drug trafficking because the present provisions of the Criminal Code are totally inadequate to deal with that problem, and convicted traffickers may emerge from prison free to enjoy the proceeds of their crime. That is what is really troubling people like our justice critic, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). This is obviously wrong and it must be changed. It is for that reason that we support the principle of this Bill.

Bill C-61 will not require financial institutions to disclose information which could help police detect money laundered by international narcotics traffickers. In other words, it will not oblige our banks, here or elsewhere, or other financial institutions, to record and report to authorities all of their large cash and foreign currency transactions. If the Government is serious about taking steps to uncover the illicit trafficking of drugs, it should seek the assistance of our financial institutions. After all, if a person makes $2 million or $3 million from a major drug transaction, that person is probably not going to put it in the mattress or carry it around in a pocket. He is going to deposit it some place, and some of those deposits are going to be made in Canadian financial institutions. All we are suggesting is that the legislation ought to require financial institutions to report on a regular basis, confidentially in some respects, on these transactions as they occur.

People ask if this is a reasonable expectation. Is this something we can reasonably expect banks to do? It takes place in the U.S. The U.S. has taken steps to work with its financial institutions to help uncover these types of transactions. Reading from the May 29 Globe and Mail article by Andrew McIntosh, he says:

> Sources who did not wish to be identified told the Globe this week that strong opposition within the banking community figured largely in the government's decision not to introduce reporting requirements in Canada.

That is a very serious allegation.

It might interest you to know that the U.S. Bank Secrecy Act requires banks to report to federal treasury officials most banking and currency transactions involving amounts that exceed $10,000 and to keep records of many banking transactions for at least five years. That will help facilitate the uncovering of drug trafficking activity.

There have been a number of occasions when that particular provision helped the Federal Bureau of Investigation crack several big drug trafficking rings in the U.S. The record there is well-known and the committee suggested that this be considered here in Canada. It has worked effectively in the U.S.

Obviously the lack of this provision in the legislation is a drafting oversight. While some pressure might have been brought to bear, given that this Bill will be sent to a legislative committee and receive proper scrutiny, I am certain the Government will see the benefit of including the appropriate clauses in this legislation to require banks and other financial institutions to report large cash and foreign currency transactions.

There are another four or five areas I would like to flag. I do not want to go into detail because I do not think this is the appropriate time. However, there are things which need to be brought to the Government's attention in order to improve the legislation.

Before doing that, I simply want to mention that the Bill will create several new offences which would generally prohibit the laundering of proceeds of enterprise crimes and illicit drug activities. In particular, the Bill would create the offence of laundering the proceeds of enterprise crimes to complement the existing offence of possession of proceeds of crime under Section 312 of the Criminal Code. The Bill would also create the new offences of possession of property obtained by trafficking in controlled or restricted drugs under the Food and Drugs Act and the laundering of proceeds of such trafficking.

I believe you are indicating I should wrap up my remarks. Perhaps I will have an opportunity to complete them later.

HOUSING

THE HOMELESS—GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSIBILITY

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, my intervention concerns homeless people. Unlike Britain and Australia, Canada has no legislation to define government responsibility with respect to the obligation to shelter the homeless. The United States are now considering the possibility of passing such legislation, despite the pronouncements of the Reagan administration. In Canada this obligation does not exist at either government level, federal or provincial. In the meantime the federal and provincial administrations are throwing the ball back and forth in their respective courts.

What matters is to secure a commitment to settle the problem of homeless people in the next few years, particularly before winter sets in. If nobody is held responsible the problem will not be solved and the solutions advocated will not be co-ordinated, very likely leading to yet another waste of public funds.

I therefore urge the Canadian Government to define government responsibility. Homeless people are already on the fringe of society. Does the Government want to integrate them? Where is the political will?

THE LATE LORNE GREENE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most famous Canadian in history died last Friday. I am sure all Members of this House would want to join me in paying tribute to Lorne Greene. A generation of Americans and Canadians, indeed millions of people around the world, grew up believing that Lorne Greene was Ben Cartwright, that somewhat stern but altogether wholesome father figure in the Bonanza series on American television.

That was undoubtedly his most famous role in which he was reputedly seen by 400 million people a week.

Lorne Greene was more than that, however. He was the son of Russian immigrant parents and grew up here in Ottawa where his father was a shoemaker. He began his interest in theatre in the early 1930s when he attended Queen's University. After graduation and further study in New York he joined the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as an actor but within three months was hired as the announcer on the national news.

During the war years I remember, as countless other millions of Canadians will, hearing Lorne Greene tell us of the latest troop movements, the latest catastrophe, and the latest triumph, in that deep sombre voice which was his trademark. He was called "The Voice of Doom", and an entire country listened.

He was also devoted to talent. He started his own school for announcers in Toronto and was a respected classical actor both on Broadway and at Stratford. He starred in many television series and plays.

Although he lived in Hollywood he never forgot his Canadian roots. He was constantly seeking opportunities for young Canadian artists and actors. I personally know that during the 1984 Olympics Lorne extended his good wishes, help, and active participation in Los Angeles to aid our athletes there.

Having known Lorne personally I know that he enjoyed the respect and affection of all his colleagues and the admiration of followers and fans everywhere. Just as he never forgot Canada in all his years in the United States, I am sure Canadians will never forget him. On behalf of myself personally and millions of Canadians, I extend to his family our heartfelt condolences. We assure them that we will never forget Ben Cartwright, or Lorne Greene.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

OPENING OF GLENBURN CO-OPERATIVE HOME IN TORONTO

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, ironically, while hundreds of Metro Toronto residents were lining up for hours yesterday hoping for a chance to buy an expensive and yet-to-be-built house, I was attending the official opening of the Glenburn Co-operative Home in my riding which was established to provide affordable housing for low and moderate income families.

The six-storey 50-unit apartment building, long the subject of maintenance complaints from residents and neighbours alike, has now been completely renovated by the initiative of the former tenants who bought the building and turned it into a non-profit co-op with financial assistance from the federal Government through CMHC.

The Glenburn Co-op is an excellent example of how residents working together with government can provide desperately needed affordable housing. We need a lot more of the same.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—CBC PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, last night CBC provided a national broadcast forum for the Ambassador from South Africa. We heard the official voice of a land in which the voices of both the press and the oppressed are silenced. Thus we replay for this reincarnated Nazi regime the innocent collusion of the thirties that allowed the propagandists of Hitler to shield us from the Holocaust. What is happening here?

• (1405)

A people are oppressed and we raise the ogre of Marxism as if the political philosophy of the victims of any oppression is of relevance to the justice of their cause.

A people are jailed, tortured, mutilated and killed by a regime that denies them their very humanity, and we say that the use of violence by the oppressed should not be condoned while the West's inaction condones the violence of the oppressor.

A victimized people turns against collaborators and demonstrates that the denial of humanity will breed inhumanity, and again we condemn the victims, forgetting the fate of traitors at the hands of European mobs in 1945. What is happening here?

Are we being led to a lessening resolve in our support of democracy in southern Africa? Is our Government abandoning its promises? Is our Foreign Minister now, after returning from Africa, prepared to seek compromise with South Africa and those other Governments which profit from apartheid in order to preserve, in southern Africa and for the world, peace in our time"?

THE LATE LORNE GREENE

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, like the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner), I am sure that all Canadians and Members of the House will join me in extending our condolences to the family of Lorne Greene, a great Canadian.

Mr. Greene was and will remain a superb role model for all Canadians who wish to achieve success on an international level. Mr. Greene became one of Hollywood's most prominent Canadians, yet he was so proud of his Canadian roots that he retained his Canadian citizenship despite all the success the United States had brought him.

Last year Mr. Greene stated: "I feel close to Canada". He returned to Canada to film and produce a television series on CTV called Lorne Greene's New Wilderness.

He has left us with a standard of love and loyalty for Canada of which we certainly can be proud. With his passing Canada has lost one of its greatest ambassadors-at-large.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POLITICAL PARTIES

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—POSITION ON VIOLENCE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, last week the NDP endorsed the position that sometimes a resort to violence is absolutely essential in the struggle against apartheid. Over the weekend the NDP dumped the Member who put that position and at the same time restated this pro-violence position.

May I humbly suggest that they have it backwards. They ought to have dropped the pro-violence position and retained the critic, who at least raised this important question and brought the NDP out of the shadows.

Every Member of Parliament can empathize with the feelings of those who in frustration may be driven to consider the use of violence to obtain fundamental justice. However, as much as we may seek to understand the seeds of violence, we must never condone it.

All over the world there are those with causes who seek to legitimize the power of the gun, the use of violence in obtaining their ends.

Violence begets violence in South Africa, the Middle East, Central and South America, Asia, Europe, or indeed North America. We cannot pick and choose, whether it be the PLO, the IRA, the Contras, the ANC, the Basques separatists, or the FLQ. Our response in this Chamber must be a resounding no to violence.

STRONGEST GROWTH OF INDUSTRIALIZED COUNTRIES

Mr. W. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it is now three years since the Progressive Conservative Government was elected. In those three years, Canada has had the strongest economic growth record among all industrialized countries.

The results are now in for the period ending June 30. In the 12 months ending June 30, Canada had the strongest economic growth. In the 24 months ending June 30, Canada had the strongest economic growth. In the 36 months ending June 30, the entire period of the Government, Canada had the strongest economic growth among industrialized countries.

Not only did we have the strongest economic growth, we have had the largest proportionate increase in employment among all industrialized countries for the last 12 months, the last 24 months, and the last 36 months.

Indeed, when we formed the Government I recall the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) suggesting that the Government should take on an unemployment reduction target. The target he would be happy to set for himself would be a 1 per cent reduction in unemployment each year.

At the time we became the Government, the unemployment rate was 11.7 per cent. At the end of the first year, the average unemployment rate was 10.5 per cent. At the end of our third year, the average unemployment rate was 9.6 per cent. We have met that target set by the NDP Leader in terms of reduction of unemployment.

The Toronto Star today reported a very interesting poll. Canadians across the country were asked if they felt the country's economy was better off now than three years ago. In every region of the country except one; in Atlantic Canada, in Quebec, in the Prairies and British Columbia, an overwhelming number of Canadians recognized the job the Government was doing.

In Ontario the results indicated that only 44 per cent felt the Canadian economy was strong. I wonder whether the results do not indicate that the reporting of The Toronto Star itself is part of the reason Canadians do not understand the impressive growth we have had over this last three years.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—INTERROGATION OF CANADIAN CHARGED WITH SMUGGLING WEAPONS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, a young Canadian of the Sikh faith has been charged with weapons smuggling in India. He is reported to have made a full confession after five days of rigorous interrogation by Indian anti-terrorist forces. This report appeared about the same time the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was admitting it had used false information to put a wiretap on the telephone of a Sikh Canadian in British Columbia.

There is clearly a powerful temptation to obtain the result wanted, whether it be a wiretap or a confession, by any means that will work when security forces are under pressure to do their job effectively. Truth and justice can easily become casualties in the rush to show results.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to enquire carefully into the interrogation of Daljit Singh Sekhon and to ensure that proper procedures have been followed. The rights of all Canadians need the protection of the Canadian Government, especially when the hunt is on for terrorists.

REDUCTION IN GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, final deficit figures are now available for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987. It is encouraging that, due to the policy of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) of fiscal restraint, the deficit was $30.6 billion, or $400 million less than forecast.

When this Government took control three years ago in 1984, the 1984-85 deficit was $38.3 billion and climbing rapidly because of the out of control spending policies of the former Liberal Government. Its irresponsible, reckless spending habits launched this country into awesome increases in the national debt through year after year increases in annual deficits.

Regrettably, the total accumulated national debt is now $280 billion, or $11,000 for every man, woman and child in the country. Almost 35 cents of every tax dollar collected is now required to pay the interest on this monstrous debt. Canadians should never forget, nor forgive the former Liberal Government for the enormity and tragic cost of its fiscal mismanagement. Our children and grandchildren will be paying the price for decades to come.

WAR CRIMINALS

SPEEDY PROSECUTIONS URGED

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in 1985 I originally proposed amendments to the Criminal Code to allow for the prosecution of war criminals, which found favour with the Deschênes Commission. I am pleased to compliment Canada's Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and all Parties in this House, on the quick passage of the War Crimes Bill.

The passage of the Bill does not, however, bring the process to an end. The Government must now show it is committed to using the new powers contained in the Bill to prosecute war criminals in Canada. In a sense, the term "war criminal" is somewhat of a misnomer because we are not talking in the main about the killing of combatants in the course of a war but about the murder of innocents and the persecution of a race.

Exceptional crimes justify exceptional pursuit within the framework of our legal system. The Minister of Justice, having expressed his resolve on this issue, has no time to lose in bringing war criminals to justice. There is a new urgency in the search for war criminals, not out of vengeance but for the sake of remembrance. Remembrance remains a powerful tool, a censure against extremism. The Deschênes Commission has kept alive the flame of the memory of the victims of the Holocaust. Let us be sure its light of justice is not left to flicker out.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON NATURAL GAS EXPORTS

Mr. Paul Gagnon (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, one of our major policies during the 1984 election campaign was reconciliation. We promised to end discriminatory practices such as the national energy policy. This Government ended the NEP. Crude oil can be sold at market prices. Unfair and unjust taxes were terminated.

This Government requested the National Energy Board to review the discriminatory restrictions on exporting natural gas. Last week's announcement by the NEB removing these restrictions is indeed welcome news in western Canada. It means greater exports, more jobs and more prosperity.

We have delivered on reconciliation.

HOUSING

PLIGHT OF HOMELESS—CALL FOR INCREASED FUNDING

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, this week at the Ottawa Congress Centre the Canadian conference to observe the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless has brought together representatives of all levels of government, non-governmental organizations, and service agencies, to discuss solutions to the problems of homelessness in Canada and, indeed, around the world. I call upon the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing, a major sponsor of this conference, to commit the Government to fund additional units for the hard-to-house in Canada as a substantial and meaningful contribution to the homeless in the country.

Also marking the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, community-based groups from Ottawa, Montreal and other Canadian cities are assembling on Lebreton Flats to remind the Government of Canada that the Flats once provided affordable housing, and that future redevelopment plans must include such housing.

I further call upon the Minister responsible for the National Capital Commission, which is the land-owner of Lebreton Flats, to commit the Government to providing land to co-operative and non-profit housing agencies to construct such housing as part of any redevelopment plan on the Flats.

PLIGHT OF HOMELESS—CALL FOR INCREASED CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, in 1983, when the Liberals were in power, a contribution of $300,000 was made to the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. Canada took its role seriously and was the first largest contributor among the ranks of developed countries.

However, by mid-1986, 80 per cent of the pledges had originated in developing nations where, as we know, shelter requirements are most intense. Today the Canadian commitment must go beyond this International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. We must act as a beacon among industrialized nations in the quest for a solution to the homeless problem abroad and, indeed, at home.

I call upon the Government to recommit Canada to the resolution of homelessness in the world, and to present the appropriate measures to solve the problem at home. The Government must show as strong commitment in 1987 as the Liberals did in 1983. Instead, the Conservative Government has increased taxes for Canadians by $22 billion since taking power just three years ago, and it has neglected the homeless.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

RESPONSIBILITY OF FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. What personal investigation did the former Solicitor General, now Minister of National Revenue, make before signing the application to allow wiretapping of telephone conversations of alleged terrorists? Who are the individuals questioned by the former Solicitor General? What questions did he ask them? Considering that, under the legislation, the former Solicitor General was personally responsible for signing the wiretap application, that the application was misleading and that it was his duty to revise it personally, why did the Minister not resign from this Government?

[English]

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman well knows, the affidavit in support of the warrant was sworn in June of 1985. The incident did not come to light until August 26 of this year.

I advise the right hon. gentleman that at that time the then Solicitor General followed the procedure that was in place. He went through all the steps. I have discussed this personally with the then Solicitor General who advised me that he read the affidavit in question, as is required by him, and went through it.

The foundation upon which the affidavit relied was matters of fact. He, like other people, and properly so, assumed that the facts were correct. They were subsequently proven not to be correct.

• (1420)

RESIGNATIONS FROM SECURITY SERVICE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that in a matter of this importance arising from the disaster which preceded it the ex-Solicitor General would have personally interrogated those who prepared the affidavit and signed it, and personally interrogated his senior people, in order to assure himself that the facts were substantiated.

My question as to whether that had been done was directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Since there is no response on that issue, and since the Solicitor General himself replied, I want to ask him a question about the current state of his security service. Was the head of that service fired? Did he resign for wider reasons than have become public? Why was he immediately rehired as a special adviser to the Solicitor General? Why have three of the five deputy directors of the security service resigned in recent months? Why is the security service in effect under trusteeship after the appointment of Gordon Osbaldeston? Where is the ministerial accountability here? Why do public servants resign? Why doesn't the current Minister take his responsibility and resign as well?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the Right Hon. Member again that indeed this Minister takes his responsibilities extremely seriously.

The inaccuracies in the affidavit first came to the attention of CSIS on August 26. I was notified on August 27. I immediately directed the then Director of CSIS, Mr. Finn, to conduct an internal investigation immediately. I immediately directed the Inspector General to conduct an investigation, and I immediately asked the Osbaldeston team to look specifically into this matter.

Swift and decisive action was taken. In addition to that, I have notified SIRC, I have notified the courts, and I have had interim measures put in place to tighten up the warrant process further and to implement other necessary measures. I do take my responsibilities seriously. That is evidence of it.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The evidence is that the Solicitor General is presiding over complete chaos in the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

POSITION OF MINISTERS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I turn again to the Deputy Prime Minister? The simple fact, Your Honour, is that the former Solicitor General signed an application for a warrant based upon a false affidavit.

This action has apparently compromised a trial for attempted murder. It may also have jeopardized the whole investigation into the Air India crash, which resulted in the loss of 329 lives, mostly Canadian.

In light of the incredible error on the matter of the affidavit, and in light of the apparent widespread disorganization, disarray, and dissatisfaction within the Canadian Security Intelligence Service itself, why is it—and I put this to the Deputy Prime Minister—that the two Ministers in question are still in the Government?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is making unwarranted suppositions. They bear no resemblance to the facts whatsoever.

The Government acted quickly and decisively to look at the problem, to send in investigative teams, and to take interim measures to see that the integrity of the service and the security of Canada are being upheld. That is what the Government is doing. We have acted, as usual, with great alacrity.

INVESTIGATION OF AIR INDIA CRASH

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's Department is out of control, and he knows it. Because of the gross negligence of the Minister and his predecessor, those responsible for the most hideous, the most gruesome crime ever in Canadian history, may go unpunished.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Would he not agree that, because of the gross negligence of the present Solicitor General and his predecessor, those responsible for the serious Air India crash may go unpunished, because they approved of an affidavit which was an attempt to mislead the court deliberately?

• (1425)

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am having some difficulty as to my gross negligence when I was not the Solicitor General at the time the incident occurred.

Again, what the Hon. Member is doing is attempting in his usual fashion to confuse Parliament. He is trying to confuse an incident of the alleged shooting of an Indian cabinet Minister with the downing of the Air India plane. I do not think that is proper. The facts should not be confused in that manner, and the Member knows better.

ERRORS IN AFFIDAVIT LEADING TO WIRE-TAP APPLICATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that it is a serious criminal offence, first, to swear a false affidavit and, second, to attempt to deliberately mislead a court.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You are changing your ground.

Mr. Nunziata: I have an affidavit sworn by Francis Elmer Saunders, Regional Director General of the Toronto Region of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. He points out in this particular affidavit that in the previous application, in order to secure judicial authority to wire-tap a certain individual's telephone, there were at least six factual errors in the affidavit. Is the Solicitor General suggesting that the six errors were mere oversights or typographical errors? Would he not agree that it was a deliberate attempt to mislead the court?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the Hon. Member was not kind enough to tell the House that I supplied you with that affidavit in order to assist you, and without any request or prompting from you.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Thanks for a public document.

Mr. Tobin: He is supplying his own rope.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to take anything away, of course, from the information the Minister is giving. I would remind the Minister that in this Chamber we do not refer to other Hon. Members as "you" but as the "Hon. Member", and I think things will go better if we all remember that. The Hon. Minister.

Mr. Kelleher: Certainly I am prepared to correct that, Mr. Speaker.

I did indeed supply the affidavit to the Hon. Member without any request or prompting from him. In any event, the full facts upon being discovered by CSIS were immediately relayed to me as Solicitor General and I immediately instructed CSIS to advise the court. All those facts were brought forward by us to the court in a good and proper manner.

TRANSFER OF SECURITY AGENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister something that is very pertinent to the question of ministerial responsibility. The Minister has said he has provided a document that was already available to the press. We all find that very encouraging.

I want to ask the Minister about his responsibility. Since CSIS apparently has simply transferred an agent who we now have learned not only provided false information to the courts but was the same person who failed to inform the RCMP of certain information that may have prevented the shooting in Canada of a visiting cabinet Minister from India a year ago, has the Minister pursued this matter? Does he think it is appropriate simply to transfer this person instead of firing him? Has he asked or talked to the agent directly and, if not, why not?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the veracity of that particular allegation. I can certainly advise this House that following the shooting incident my predecessor ordered an investigation into it and a report was supplied. As the Hon. Member knows, this case is presently before the courts and, as such, is sub judice, and I am not in a position to discuss it further at this time.

• (1430)

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY REVIEW OF SERVICE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, there is what can only be described as a scandalous situation in the agency. There has been, on public record revealed in the courts, deliberate lying by people working for CSIS. We are told that instead of being fired forthwith, the same people have simply been transferred elsewhere.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Name names.

Mr. Broadbent: I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Director of the agency himself resigned before the weekend. He acknowledges how serious the situation is.

Given the fact that the legislation passed in 1984 provided for a parliamentary review of the operations of CSIS within five years, does the Minister not think that the time for that parliamentary review is now rather than in another two years in view of the kinds of disasters we have now had described to us?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to clear up an allegation the Hon. Member persists in making which is that there was a deliberate action or some deliberate falsification of the facts to mislead the court. I am certainly not aware that there was anything deliberate nor is there any evidence to date from our investigations to substantiate that allegation. I think the Hon. Member should be aware of that.

Second, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that I am well aware of the five-year review process and I will welcome that when the time comes. At this particular juncture the evidence indicates human error, faulty procedures or a lack of following procedures. It is not something which the Act itself corrects. It is something that must be corrected within CSIS and we have moved very decisively to do that. Three investigations are going on. We have advised the court and I have also advised the Security Intelligence Review Committee which, being set up as the parliamentary watchdog, I am sure will take care of this matter in an adequate way to the satisfaction of all parties.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE REVIEW

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, because his Party was in opposition at the time this agency was being set up, the Minister knows that it was agreed by all Parties at the time that it was essential not simply to have the Government as the judge in its own case when it comes to the Security Service and that is why a parliamentary review was spelled out as being desirable and was supported by all Parties. Given the seriousness of the problems that have been revealed to everyone and their implications for civil liberties in Canada, will the Minister now do the correct thing and agree to have a parliamentary review of CSIS operations forthwith?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I trust the Hon. Member is not suggesting that SIRC is not independent. I trust he is not suggesting that the Inspector General is not independent. They were set up under the Act as independent watchdogs. They will be carrying out their investigations and I am quite prepared, when the investigations have been completed, if I am invited, and I am sure I will be, to appear before the Justice and Solicitor General Committee to discuss the matter with that committee.

RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. When one looks at the story of CSIS, one sees criticism in two annual reports of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, serious problems with senior personnel, resignations at the very top of CSIS in addition to that of Ted Finn, the filing of dozens of employee grievances complaining about employment, and finally the Osbaldeston team having been set up with a mandate that the Minister indicated just today has been made even wider. Is the Minister asking us to believe that Ted Finn's resignation was related only to the affidavit that was referred to in the Air India matter and in the Atwal matter?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Finn, the former Director of CSIS, undertook a very difficult task for this Government three years ago. He faced the task of taking over a brand new agency that had to be up and running from day one for the security of Canada. He is a man of integrity and character. He has performed his job extremely well. As soon as he learned of this incident, there was no cover-up or any hesitation on his part. He immediately advised me. He co-operated fully with the investigation. He submitted his resignation as he was the man responsible for the operation of CSIS, and his resignation was accepted.

REASON FOR RESIGNATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I must ask the Minister again, is he telling us that the only reason Ted Finn resigned and that the Solicitor General accepted his resignation was the serious problems with this affidavit?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat my first answer. Mr. Finn submitted his resignation and it was accepted.

ACCURACY OF AFFIDAVITS—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I might just say by way of preamble that I find it interesting to hear the author of the CSIS legislation asking questions that result clearly from abuses for which that legislation he authored was responsible.

My question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the most recent annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee which states:

> We are informed that the Solicitor General makes sure, in reviewing warrant applications, that everything being sworn to is an ascertainable fact, not merely a conclusion the investigator has drawn from the facts, and he sends some applications back for amendment before he lets them go to the Federal Court . . . We welcome his vigilance.

In view of the suggestion that the Solicitor General himself is personally responsible for the accuracy of affidavits sworn in request for warrants, and having fired the Director of CSIS, does he not accept his responsibility for this deceitful warrant? If so, why does he not do the honourable thing and resign as Solicitor General?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have already pointed out to the House earlier and I will repeat again, the affidavit which supported this warrant was reviewed and sworn in June of 1985. Immediately upon it coming to this Solicitor General's attention, I initiated the actions of which I told the House. I think we and the Government have acted quickly, fairly and decisively in this matter.

I can assure the Hon. Member that it has been my practice since I became Solicitor General carefully to review and read each affidavit in support of an application for warrant that comes before me. It has always been my practice to discuss the warrant before signing it with the Director or the Acting Director in concert with other officers of CSIS.

PARLIAMENTARY REVIEW—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, given the history of CSIS, it is a security agency which is clearly in a state of crisis and disarray. There have been problems with civilianization, with bilingualism, and with bungled investigations in the case of the Sikh situation. There have been fights with the RCMP, and targeting of individuals who should not have been targeted. There has been serious criticism by SIRC.

• (1440)

Why is the Minister afraid to allow Parliament to review comprehensively the actions of CSIS today? Why is he insisting we wait two more years for the review of an agency in disarray? In light of his refusal to allow Parliament to conduct this comprehensive review today, why on earth does he not resign? He is obviously not in control of the agency for which he is responsible.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not share the opinion of the Hon. Member that CSIS is in a state of disarray. That is unfair to the Service. I think it is doing a commendable job, and that is contained in the latest SIRC report, parts of which he chose not to read.

The language issue is being dealt with decisively. An action plan is now ready and I hope to present it within the next few weeks. The Osbaldeston committee is looking into the matters of counter-subversion and civilianization. I think the agency is alive and well. There are some minor problems and they are being dealt with.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—ARREST OF CANADIAN CHARGED WITH GUN SMUGGLING

Mr. W. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week a Canadian Sikh from Mississauga, Daljit Singh, also known as Gurmukh Sekhon, was arrested in the Punjab and detained for gun smuggling. While I abhor the increasing violence in the Punjab, it is a fundamental precept of any justice system that an accused has the right to legal representation and that any individual is innocent until proven guilty.

Has the Minister confirmed that this Canadian citizen has been arrested in the Punjab and has the Canadian High Commissioner had consular access to the individual? If not, how much time has expired since we made our initial request?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the arrest occurred. We have sought consular access. We made the first application orally four days ago on September 10. Since there has not yet been a response we made another written application today. I have instructed officials of my Department to call in the High Commissioner or the chargé d'affaires for India because it is essential that the right of Canadian citizens to consular access be respected.

HOUSING

THE HOMELESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister responsible for housing, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last August 28, in response to one of my questions concerning the homeless, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said he would bring my question to the attention of the Minister responsible for Housing.

Yesterday at the International Conference of the Homeless the Minister did not say anything particularly noteworthy, except that it is a question of having the political will to solve the problem of homeless people.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us today what concrete evidence of this political will we can expect to see? What initiative, what policy, or what program does he have in mind, particularly now that winter will soon be with us?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, this Government certainly did not wait for the International Year of the Homeless to launch a plan of action. In fact we did so back in 1985. Under the previous administration, only 40 per cent of new units were for the homeless, whereas we implemented a plan of action to give priority to homeless people.

Mr. Speaker, the result is that more than $1.5 billion will be earmarked for the homeless this year.

MEASURES GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO TAKE

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, my second question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Australian and British Governments have enacted legislation to define their jurisdiction with respect to sheltering the homeless. The United States is about to pass similar laws.

We in Canada have not defined either federal or provincial jurisdiction concerning homeless people. If the Government considers this to be a serious issue, can the Deputy Prime Minister assure us today that he will do whatever is required to establish the responsibilities of each government level, especially since the Government has failed to take its responsibilities and dumped the whole problem in the lap of the provinces? And if the Government considers the matter important enough, is it prepared to legislate to guarantee this protection?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the premises of the question of my colleague are faulty. I am sure she knows full well that more than a hundred-odd delegates from every corner of the world will be debating the issue during the conference taking place this week. Canada has always been acknowledged as a world leader in this respect and we intend to take this opportunity to champion the cause of the homeless and pave the way for building more shelters and creating still more jobs. Again I might point out that more than 900,000 jobs have been created in Canada since the advent of the Conservative Government. We will maintain our pace in spite of the fact that certain non-elected elements of the Party opposite continue to thwart such initiatives as Bill C-22 which we are trying to get through.

Oral Question

[English]

LITERACY

ILLITERACY STATISTICS—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PROGRAM

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A survey on illiteracy in Canada by Southam Inc. revealed these shocking and devastating results. Some 24 per cent of Canadians over 18 years of age are illiterate in English and French.

Earlier this year the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration recommended in its report in response to the Forget Commission report that those illiterates who may be collecting unemployment insurance be allowed to take basic education at the same time. Is the Minister prepared to move his butt now and start to change the Unemployment Insurance Program so as to give hope to some of these people who are living a life of darkness?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Hon. Member two things.

First, I would have thought that, as NDP critic for Employment and Immigration, he would have known that we have now signed agreements with all the provinces under the Social Assistance Program, to ensure that unemployment insurance recipients are covered by the program. In co-operation with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and all Canadian provinces, we have multiplied the opportunities for these people to receive training under various programs to give them the means of improving their situation.

Second, the Secretary of State is now putting together, in co-operation with various interested parties, not only studies, but also mechanisms to deal with these problems.

Instead of criticizing, I believe that his Party would do better to co-operate with us to deal with this problem, which is admittedly a national one.

[English]

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I find it absolutely incredible that the Minister is not even aware of his own legislation with respect to unemployment insurance benefits and basic education programs. We are not talking about people who are on welfare, we are talking about people who are illiterate and collecting unemployment insurance. These people are the last hired and the first fired. They are trapped in a cul-de-sac of no education and no opportunity to move themselves out.

Is the Minister prepared to respond specifically to that unanimous committee recommendation which would permit those who are collecting unemployment insurance benefits to do so and take basic education programs if they so desire? A specific question, and no bullfeathers about it!

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I replied to this question about the reform of unemployment—

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT END TALKS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The United States has repeatedly demanded that the auto pact, cultural industries and regional development programs, amongst others, be part of the free trade deal. The U.S. has consistently refused to enter into a binding trade dispute resolving mechanism with Canada.

When will the Government relieve Canadians of their anxiety and put the Government out of its self-inflicted misery by formally declaring an end to these failed free trade talks?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Liberal Party grows more and more curious. We are three to four weeks from the conclusion of a trade negotiation which, if successful, can have a very positive impact upon the economic security and availability of jobs for Canadians. As we draw near the end of the negotiation they want us to quit. That is nuts.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party grows rather embarrassed at the spectacle of the Minister swinging from the end of a rope at the tail end of these negotiations. We would rather see him out of his misery quickly.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BINDING TRADE DISPUTE RESOLUTION MECHANISM

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister categorically tell the House and Canadians whether or not Canada will say "no" to any trade deal that does not include a binding trade dispute resolution mechanism? Last week the Secretary of State of the United States was telling us that no such provision can be included in a free trade agreement.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have made it clear on a number of occasions that in our judgment a binding mechanism to resolve disputes is essential to an acceptable trade negotiation. That has been the position for a long time. It has become such a popular position that it has now been adopted by the Premier of Ontario. I presume it will soon be picked up by members of the Liberal Party in opposition. That is our position, has been our position, and remains our position.

Mr. Marchi: That's nuts.

HOUSING

PLIGHT OF HOMELESS—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister responsible for housing I will direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. If the Minister has been paying any attention at all to the conferences going on across the way here about homelessness, not only in Canada but around the world, he will know that at a conservative estimate there are some 40,000 Canadians who are considered homeless. That does not include thousands who are living with parents or friends because they cannot find housing.

The one clear message emanating from this conference is that a large infusion of government money is needed to correct a serious problem. Is the Government prepared to commit the kind of money which any responsible Government would commit in the face of this particular crisis?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have already replied to this question. I said that the Government would continue to deal with this issue, that we would be at the conference this week, that Canada is already recognized as a world leader in this area and that we shall continue to ensure all Canadians of our on-going concern and desire to take part. However, there is no immediate solution and it cannot come from the federal Government alone. There will have to be a consensus among all those involved.

LEBRETON FLATS, OTTAWA—CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING PROJECT

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I will address my supplementary question to the same Minister. Expressing a desire is all good and well but these people are looking for a real commitment. Will the Government commit itself to a very simple project at Lebreton Flats, which the Government owns? Will it commit, within the next week, if not immediately, to provide moneys to the developers of housing on Lebreton Flats to construct co-operative and affordable social housing there?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that 19,000 units would be built this year. Moreover, we have brought about economic conditions which promote lower interest rates and various other favourable conditions. We are therefore very much concerned about this issue.

PRIVATIZATION INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for privatization and is about Petro-Canada. What is the status of the review of the privatization of this Crown corporation? Specifically, has she considered the idea I put forth in this House on September 2 that we essentially give it back to Canadians? That would not only help ensure self-sufficiency of oil and gas but would keep it in Canadian hands. The real bonus may be that it would get the Government out of the retail gasoline pump business.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I will consider the Hon. Member's question as a representation. I have read his statement made pursuant to Standing Order 21 on September 2. It is advice which I am certainly prepared to take back to the Government.

As the House knows, we have not reached a decision on Petro-Canada. We are studying the issue very carefully. I have made no secret of the fact and have stated publicly that if we do sell this company I would prefer a broadly based public share issue. However, I am very prepared to treat the Hon. Member's suggestion with respect.

FILM INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF TAX REFORM

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The private sector Canadian film and television industry is in trouble, not because it does not produce good, competitive, world-class films but because this young, labour-intensive industry has had the basic incentive pins knocked out from under it by the Government's ill-conceived tax reform proposals.

Instead of listening to the free trade talks and that siren song, why does the Minister not listen to the Canadian film and television industry? Will he change his tax reform proposals to allow this industry to continue to grow and prosper, instead of opening the door to more American films and closing the door on Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the way the Hon. Member has phrased the question suggesting that I am not listening. I have a letter here from Mr. Samuel C. Jephcott, the Executive Director of the Canadian Film & Television Associates, who is pleased about the consultation process—

Ms. Copps: That's not a letter, it's a newspaper clipping.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Hon. Members are little reluctant to hear the truth.

Ms. Copps: It's a newspaper clipping.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Jephcott disagrees with Mr. Sid Adilman's comments that the federal Government is not—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Is that the former Conservative Minister in Toronto?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I will take the Leader of the Opposition aside too. I will pass the letter over to the Hon. Member but the point of it is that we are listening to the industry. We are giving careful consideration to the comments that it has made. As the Hon. Member is very much aware, we have made some changes which will ease the transition to the new rules. As Mr. Jephcott has said, the reality is not that we are ignoring the plight of the industry.

MINISTER'S PLANS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the industry needs a more equitable playing field. I will address my supplementary question to the Minister of Communications.

If the Government is concerned about the cultural industries, why can it not stand up to the U.S. demands at the free trade table for restrictions on the broadcasting, publishing and film industries? Why has the Minister abandoned her promise to introduce legislation to stimulate the Canadian film distribution industry?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have to say that once again the Hon. Member is wrong. I have not abandoned any plans that I have in place. I want to reiterate that the Minister of Finance and I, in consultation with the film industry, have already made certain changes that they have requested. In addition, we are discussing other long-term proposals with them. We intend to keep in touch with the film industry on an ongoing basis because our goal is to ensure more and better Canadian films in movie houses all across the country.

HEALTH

IRRADIATION OF FOOD

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This is the first opportunity we have had to question him on the Government's response to the report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs which examined the question of food irradiation and the labelling of irradiated foods.

Given that the government response largely rejected all but a couple of recommendations concerning labelling, will the Minister explain what sort of rationale he used for rejecting the recommendations and, in effect, unilaterally making decisions for himself and his Department which run completely contrary to that four-month study?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it was not a unilateral decision, and the Member knows that.

The report was brought forward by a committee that was chaired by the Member for Capilano. It was a very comprehensive report for which I thank the committee.

There were a number of issues on which there was agreement. I think that the evidence of the studies which have been used by the Department, as well as the number of years that irradiated technology had been studied and used in a very limited manner in some countries, clearly pointed to the decision that was taken.

I also said very clearly in the response that there would not be an extension of any irradiation on any foods subject to a case-by-case study, based again on the regulatory process.

The Hon. Member must keep in mind that I take the regulatory process very seriously and that scientific and health considerations are the overriding considerations. I believe those have been dealt with clearly. I was very straightforward in my response on that issue.

REVIEW OF PROCESSES—COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister explain to the House what criteria he used in rejecting the committee's recommendation to strike a public committee to review these processes in favour of an in-department committee that did not have to be responsible to anyone other than himself?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the last comment that a committee of experts in the Government are not responsible to anyone but themselves or the Minister is a very poor evaluation of scientists and medical officers within my Department or other organizations within government.

Mr. Hovdebo: What happened to Parliament?

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Calm down and I will give you an answer. The Hon. Member should keep in mind that the Department of Health and Welfare and its officials have not compromised health and have been very keen about that.

I hear the Hon. Member for Prince Albert. He should keep in mind that he gets up in the House every day he can asking for more wheat sales. Yet part of the wheat sales in the international field possibly involves irradiated food. I wish he would be consistent one way or the other, and not try to speak out of both sides of his mouth.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn that Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, be read the second time and referred to a Legislative Committee.

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock, the Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) had the floor.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks on Bill C-61, I was pointing out a major flaw in the Bill that I believe all Parties will want to change. While there are many flaws in Bill C-61, the New Democratic Party supports its principle. It will allow the Government to take serious steps toward eliminating drug abuse and drug trafficking in our country.

Of course, under the present legislation, drug traffickers can easily invest and use the banking system to launder money. While they may serve some time in prison, they can come out to resume their business with substantial amounts of income that they have invested in various ways, not only in Canada but throughout the world.

The major flaw in this legislation is that it does not encompass the banking and financial communities. Serious allegations have been made in the press in the last number of months about money from illicit drug trafficking finding its way into various deposits in Canadian financial institutions. There is no definite proof of this since the books are closed. The RCMP and other law enforcement agencies do not have access to those bank accounts, unlike the United States where financial institutions are required to report their deposits over a certain amount on a regular basis. As a matter of fact, they must report a number of items. This allows the law enforcement authorities in the United States to identify where drug money is being laundered through financial institutions.

We assumed that appropriate legislation reflecting that situation would be introduced. However, such is not the case. Bill C-61 does not include Canadian financial institutions as part of the monitoring system. When this matter goes before the appropriate legislative committee, I urge my honourable colleagues to consider using the experience in the United States, where drug rings have been smashed as a result of the information provided by the reporting systems of the American financial institutions.

While this might require some new responsibilities for banking personnel, as well as some systems for that accounting, I am convinced that if such a request was made of the Canadian Bankers' Association and the organizations of other financial institutions, they would co-operate. It would be in the best interest of Canada, particularly in terms of Canada's young people, if we could put a stop or at least inhibit the running of illicit drugs that presently occurs in our schools, colleges, universities, as well as on the streets of Canada.

If this legislation can be amended in that area, it would certainly have the support of New Democrats on the committee. I am sure it would also have the support of other political parties because stopping the traffic in illicit drugs on the streets of Canada surely is not a partisan issue but something all parliamentarians would endorse.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I already asked the Government in regard to its drug reform program and legislative changes. Would it not be a good idea to take into consideration as part of drug abuse the glue sniffing that goes on in many communities across this country?

• (1510)

In Winnipeg, at the City Hall level, we had a by-law for a short time regulating the sale of products which could be abused by youngsters. They were put behind the counter and the age level at which they could be purchased was restricted. This by-law had a positive effect in Winnipeg by reducing the abuse of products on which children could get high by sniffing which, of course, has a detrimental effect on their health and mental capacity.

I wonder if my colleague would not agree that it is a little strange that the Government, which is attacking drug abuse, is not at the same time taking the opportunity to amend federal laws which could reduce the abuse of products that children use to get high, thereby destroying their health?

The by-law which existed in Winnipeg was ruled ultra vires by the court in that it fell within federal jurisdiction. Would this not be a good area for initiative by the federal Government at this time?

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, my friend, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) makes a good suggestion, and it is not the first time he has made it. I recall that he suggested it on numerous occasions, both in public and private. He has put that question in committee and many times on the floor of the House of Commons, trying to encourage the Government to take a variety of steps which would bring to an end that type of activity by young people, not only in Winnipeg but right across the country.

I can only imagine his level of frustration today when once again there is a missed opportunity. Here is an opportunity for the Government to take steps, to indicate in the introductory speeches by government Members how the Government plans to deal with this problem. But once again it has turned its back on something which is very serious. Perhaps we will have an opportunity during debate on this legislation, and more particularly during the work which will be done in the legislative committee, to raise the importance of taking fast action in this critical area.

I also think that when we deal with legislation such as Bill C-61, finding ways and means of legislating the reduction in the amount of illicit drugs sold, drug trafficking and the abuse of drugs, that we do not lose sight of the need to fight the reasons for drug abuse. I think all too often we get too caught up in the mechanics of legislation, in our role as legislators, trying to stem the tide, to fight the symptoms of a much deeper concern. We as responsible parliamentarians should ask the question, what is it that is driving our young people to sniff glue? What is it that drives our young people in high schools and, more unfortunately, in our elementary schools, to pursue drugs and get caught up in the dastardly web of drug abuse? What is it that exists in our society that causes people to require this particular outlet?

Mr. Young: This Government.

Mr. Riis: My friend, the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young), perhaps not so humourously, says perhaps it is the Government's inaction on a whole number of fronts. You recall, Madam Speaker, the questions raised about illiteracy when the shocking facts recently came out in terms of the incredibly high level of illiteracy among Canadian adults. In some provinces it was in excess of 40 per cent of the adult population. We have tens of thousands, I must say even hundreds of thousands of Canadians in the workforce who are illiterate and, consequently, are the last hired and first fired. This is one of the fundamental problems which results in drug abuse. It provides an incentive for those who would exploit these people and, therefore, the illicit trafficking of drugs increases. That is what we are trying to deal with in this legislation. Of course, it is far down the list of consequences that result from a deeper concern in today's society.

I take with appreciation the suggestion made by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre. I suspect his wise counsel will be listened to by those who work on this Bill in the legislative committee.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I would also like to ask about the question raised this morning with respect to the Government spending $210 million on enforcement in the drug offence area and its failure to address the major problem of chemical addiction. I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) for his comments on the failure of the Government to address the major problem of alcohol abuse.

I would like to outline a small area of which I know he is familiar, that is, the community of Bella Coola. An alcohol rehabiltation counsellor in that community is paid $12,000 a year, yet saves both the federal and provincial Governments hundreds of thousands of dollars a year by helping people with an alcohol problem. If it is a parent, the parent can go to work, and the family is assisted.

The Government saves thousands of dollars in health and social services. However, The federal Government will not pay those salaries for people to assist and treat alcoholics. In the community of Bella Coola one of the largest single causes of crime is abuse of alcohol. Everything else stems from it, from child abuse to murder, to assault, to impaired driving. Only $12,000 is the cost of an alcohol abuse counsellor. These alcohol abuse counsellors have a track record of saving hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I ask the opinion of the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap. Is the Government not being extremely short-sighted in dealing with the small end of the spectrum instead of contributing the resources of the people of Canada to the other problem areas? We are not begrudging the efforts made to curb the serious problem of drug abuse, drug trafficking and drug offences. However, we want money spent in the area of alcohol rehabilitation and treatment so we can realize the savings in human terms, in health terms and in financial terms for the people of Canada.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, once again, I appreciate the most thoughtful interjection of the Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly) on this very critical issue. It is an issue of profound interest to us all. I think too often when it comes to requests for funding of facilities to treat the victims of alcohol and drug abuse we do not have the money to spend—the treasury is bare. Spending in these areas, while it is certainly a concern, is not necessarily a high priority. I think the word "priority" itself betrays a particular attitude. I think we have to see money used to move people away from a dependency on chemicals. Money used to move people away from a reliance on alcohol and drugs is not money spent, but money invested. That money, when it saves a young man or woman, will result in vast savings because they will not spend their time in centres of care later on or cause other problems in terms of death on our highways and so on.

I think we have to see this as an investment in our future in terms of preventive action. It is an non-partisan issue. I will use as an example the non-partisan way in which this ought to be treated. There are communities around the country, as we stand here, taking the initiative to open up treatment centres for those people who are caught up in the web of chemical dependencies. I do not have to refer to any other place than the community of Logan Lake in western Canada. People such as my colleague, the Hon. Member for Cariboo—Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway), myself and others are working hard to obtain the necessary financial support to assist people in that part of western Canada so that they can be treated for their dependency on chemicals of one kind or other. I am hopeful that as this Bill moves on to the legislative committee stage, we will be taking off our partisan hats and working to obtain the necessary changes and, of course, in the long term, the necessary funding, to bring drug and alcohol abuse in Canada to an end.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is as follows. Mr. Hnatyshyn, seconded by Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands), moves that Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

SUPREME COURT ACT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-53, an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and to amend various other Acts in consequence thereof, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak briefly on this important legislation. Bill C-53 is a Bill to amend the Supreme Court Act and to amend various other Acts in consequence thereof. The aim of the Bill, while simple, is of considerable importance to the administration of justice in Canada. It is to alter the procedure for appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada so as to ensure that the court can continue deciding issues of fundamental national importance in an effective and timely manner.

The considerable increase in recent years in the number of cases heard by the court, particularly appeals based on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, has underlined the fact that the court's time is a limited resource. A glance at a Canadian newspaper on almost any given day will show the fundamental important questions that the court must decide. The amendments proposed in this Bill are necessary if the court is to continue dealing effectively with the growing number of cases referred to it. Without such amendments the court is increasingly likely to find itself unable to decide some of the important legal and constitutional issues of our time.

The Bill proposes six basic amendments. I would like to summarize them. First, the Bill provides that applications for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in both civil and criminal matters may be determined on written submissions by the parties, if it is clear from such written submissions that an oral hearing is not warranted.

This amendment is designed to allow the court to make decisions on applications for leave to appeal without it being necessary to hold an oral hearing in cases where it is clear from the written submissions that the application should be granted or that it should be dismissed. At present, all applications for leave to appeal are heard by a three-member panel of the court. I should point out that 400 to 500 applications for leave are brought each year. The court grants leave to appeal in no more than 20 per cent to 30 per cent of these cases. Pursuant to the provisions of this Bill, if the court dispenses with even a small percentage of oral hearings, a substantial saving in time could be accomplished. The discretion will rest with the court to determine whether an oral hearing is warranted or not pursuant to the provisions of the Bill. Nothing in the Bill precludes the court from ordering an oral hearing where such is warranted.

Second, in order to allow the Supreme Court to handle its proceedings more effectively the Bill provides that the court may deliver a judgment either in open court or, as is the case with many courts across the land, by depositing a copy with the Registrar. This amendment will give the court the same discretion to deliver a judgment by depositing it with the Registrar, which is something that all provincial courts of appeal now do. I think it applies to all courts across the country.

Mr. Kaplan: An Member opposite is shaking his head.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Member opposite has probably not appeared in every court of appeal across the land, either as a lawyer or as an accused. I will accept his acknowledgement that he does not know exactly the procedure in all cases.

The Supreme Court Act presently requires that judgments be delivered in open court and that the majority of the judges who presided at the hearing of the appeal be present for the delivery of that judgment. Obviously, this involves the time of members of the court, as well as the time and expense of counsel attending the court to receive the judgment. In all reason the court should have the discretion to determine whether the rendering of judgment in open court is necessary or appropriate.

Third, the Bill will give to the Supreme Court the authority to assign counsel to act on behalf of an unrepresented accused. Under this amendment, the Attorney General involved will bear the cost where legal aid is not granted to the accused. Furthermore, the fees of counsel may be taxed by the Registrar of the court. This proposal extends to the Supreme Court of Canada an authority that has already been given to the provincial courts of appeal by Section 611 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

In recent years the number of inmates appearing before the Supreme Court to conduct their own appeals has been increasing. Real concerns have been raised about the ability of inmates to present legal arguments. Furthermore, in those cases where the unrepresented inmate does not appear, Crown counsel argues both for the appellant inmate and the respondent Crown. Bill C-53 responds to these concerns regarding fairness by providing legislative authority for the provision of counsel to ensure that important questions are fully and thoroughly argued.

Fourth, since all appeals to the court involve questions of law, and given the amendment to permit the assignment of counsel to unrepresented accused, the Bill provides that an appellant who is in custody and who is respresented by counsel will not be entitled as of right to be present at an appeal or any preliminary or incidental proceeding. However, provision is made for the rules of court to allow attendance by inmates and for the court or a judge thereof to grant leave for the inmate to attend. This change to the Act gives the Supreme Court of Canada the same discretion as is presently available to courts of appeal pursuant to Section 615(2) of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Fifth, the Bill proposes that certain appeals as of right provided for in the Criminal Code and other statutes be abolished. Under the proposal an appellant who can now appeal to the Supreme Court as of right would thus henceforth first have to obtain leave to appeal from the court. I have received certain representations making known to me concerns with this particular element of the Bill. After careful consideration I have decided that I will bring forward an amendment to preserve the present practice regarding appeals as of right. I will bring those forward at the time that this Bill is considered in committee.

Finally, in order to overcome the present problems with the time limits for bringing an appeal, the Bill proposes amendments to make the time limits for bringing an appeal and for filing an application for leave to appeal more reasonable and practical. The time limits for obtaining leave to appeal and bringing an appeal in a criminal matter are difficult to meet. For instance, under Section 618 of the Criminal Code an appellant is given 21 days to bring an application for leave to appeal and to obtain the leave of the court. Because of the difficulty in meeting this time period, applications for an extension of the time period are routinely brought and granted.

In addition to this problem, the fact that different time periods are applicable to criminal and civil matters causes unnecessary difficulties and confusion. Bill C-53 standardizes the time periods applicable to both civil and criminal matters and places them within one statute, that is, the Supreme Court Act.

In conclusion, Bill C-53 is intended to ensure that our Supreme Court will retain its ability to deal effectively with questions of fundamental national importance while ensuring fairness.

I should like to draw to the attention of all Hon. Members the fact that the Canadian Bar Association has called for reform. In 1985, the Canadian Bar Association, at its annual meeting in Halifax, approved a resolution which called for all applications for leave to appeal, criminal and civil, to be determined by the Supreme Court of Canada on written submissions unless an oral hearing was ordered. The Bar recognized the need to improve accessibility for questions of national importance.

I should like to refer to the Canadian Bar Association Committee's report under the chairmanship of Mr. Claude R. Thomson. In part page 55 reads:

> Bill C-53, first reading, May 4, 1987, by clause 4, would authorize the Court to dispense with an oral hearing in those cases where "it is clear from the written material" that the criteria for leave are, or are not, satisfied. In all other cases, the present practice of an oral hearing would continue.
> The Committee endorses the change proposed by Bill C-53. The Bill preserves the general principle that there ought to be an oral hearing for every application for which an oral hearing could be useful. But it dispenses with an oral hearing in those cases where the hearing would be a waste of the Court's time.
> Not only will the Bill C-53 proposal save hearing time for the Court, it will spare the parties much of the cost of an application for leave—the Committee is satisfied that Bill C-53 is a desirable reform that ought to be proceeded with now.

I think lawyers and Hon. Members interested in the operation of our courts, particularly the Supreme Court of Canada, would agree that we should take steps as quickly as possible to allow the court to deal with and to spend the time on substantive issues, particularly with the impact of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms on the Supreme Court and the additional onus it places upon the court to give considered views in respect of very important issues.

I would say that this Bill is a first initiative on the part of the Government to help the court to husband its time and to allow it to direct its attention to important national legal issues facing it.

I will be glad to discuss in committee further details in respect of this matter. However, I simply wanted to say at this time that there has been much consideration of a wide range of issues respecting what we might do in terms of our court system in order to ensure that these matters are dealt with by the court on a proper and timely basis.

I am very much aware of my obligations as Minister of Justice—and they are obligations of those of us in the House—to consider what can be done to facilitate the court system, to ensure that things go through expeditiously at a minimum amount of cost, and to ensure that the people of Canada are well served by the highest court in the land.

We are well served by the Supreme Court of Canada. All Hon. Members would share the view that the men and women of that court have displayed great dedication, ability, and competence. They are a credit to us. It is a central institution of Canada. I know I reflect the views of all Hon. Members of the House when I pay tribute to the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. They have a Canadian perspective. They have dealt with the laws of our lands in a very learned and Canadian way. I think these are high compliments to the court, and I think these views would be shared by all Members of the House.

I ask Hon. Members to support these amendments so that we can all share in working toward an improvement of the system to ensure that the Supreme Court of Canada in fact has the ability to serve the best interests of all Canadians.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, over the years Parliament has done very little to improve the life of the Supreme Court of Canada. In fact, it has been the opposite. We have, with an ever increasing frequency, passed laws of increasing sophistication and complexity. We have amended our Constitution and have proposed to re-amend it. The burden faced by the Supreme Court of Canada, compared with the burden at any period in the past, can only be described in comparative terms as overwhelming.

Therefore, when a thoughtful and serious collection of improvements is put forward, as it is before the House now, to improve the efficiency of the court in some ways without purportedly taking anything away from its fairness, I think we must take it very seriously and do everything we can in this place to facilitate the work of the court.

When I talk about efficiency and fairness, I think account has to be had, as the Minister indicated, of the cost of the system of justice and ways in which that cost can be kept to a minimum and can be reduced. I think those principles have animated the amendments which are before us. While I want to express some reservations about them, I want to say also that it is a timely Bill. It is one that I suggest on behalf of the Official Opposition will be given expeditious treatment. We look forward to hearing from the Minister. In dealing with the recommendations of the Canadian Bar Association, we ought to be open to the Bar if it wants to appear before us. I have seen the Claude Thomson report. I think it is excellent and may in fact obviate even the necessity of having the Canadian Bar Association appear before us.

It must be said, however, that something is being lost from the point of view of the citizen in what we are doing today—and if it is necessary that it be lost, it is nonetheless regrettable—that is, the ancient right, which few countries have been able to preserve but which we have preserved to this day, of getting a hearing on a request for leave to appeal. I know that some concern has been expressed across the country about this being lost. When we look at the amount of work involved in maintaining that ancient right, we must recognize that perhaps its time has come.

I should like to see the statistics—I am sure the Minister will have them—and to see the evidence. I am looking forward to deciding whether we can hold up our heads and go back to our constituents to tell them that a great historic right has been taken away from them in the interest of ensuring that the court has the time to consider properly the cases which merit real consideration.

The Minister referred to his plan to introduce amendments of his own to the fifth amendment proposed in the Bill. I will not take time to talk about it; I am glad it is being done. It is a reasonable response, but of course I should like to see the amendments he is proposing.

Finally, I want to say a word about the provision with which I had some experience as Solicitor General when inmates had to be brought to the Supreme Court of Canada from wherever they were in the country in connection with even very peripheral aspects relating to their cases before the Supreme Court of Canada. Ordinary citizens in the same situation could ill afford to come to Ottawa to be present for matters which were truly peripheral by any definition of the word. Yet, because of the existing Act, we had the practice of bringing them to the nation's capital at great expense and, in some cases, at considerable danger to themselves or to others, when we were talking about very violent criminals whose appeals were the issues before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Taxpayers should welcome this particular amendment because it takes nothing substantial away from the offender. It puts him more or less in the same position as the ordinary citizen in deciding whether he can afford to follow his lawyer to the nation's capital to make the case on a relatively minor aspect of his cause before the Supreme Court of Canada.

We will not, in the Official Opposition, rubber-stamp the Bill. We recognize all of the pressures that make it desirable at this time for the Supreme Court of Canada to undertake this amount of streamlining, which I hope we will find at the end of our investigation takes nothing away from fairness toward the applicants who are seeking the attention of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court of Canada is an ornament of Canadian society. One can see by the controversy around the Meech Lake proposals that affect the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada how precious that institution is to Canadians and how much they want it to work and work well.

I will not use this occasion to make comments about the impact of the Meech Lake Accord on the Supreme Court of Canada, but I think it was significant that so many Canadians responded emotionally and with a sense of patriotism to measures that might adversely affect the institution.

The Supreme Court has an ever more important role to play in adjudicating claims between the provincial level of government and the federal level. It also has this very important responsibility under the Charter of adjudicating the limits of government, where it is that a citizen can stand and not have his or her rights or privacy invaded any further by the state. I look forward to the consideration of this Bill in committee, and I hope we will be able to undertake it very soon.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, at the outset of my remarks on Bill C-53 I want to join in the remarks and the tributes made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), the Justice spokesperson for his Party, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

[Translation]

There is no doubt that the men and women who sit on the Supreme Court of Canada serve with high distinction on the highest court in this country. We are very pleased that the Government has appointed two women to this most important tribunal. However, I hope that, in the very near future, at least half the members of this court will be women.

[English]

Traditionally, the Supreme Court of Canada has appointed on a non-partisan basis the most outstanding jurists from across Canada, obviously in conjuction with the provisions governing the Supreme Court of Canada. We in this Party, however, certainly join in acknowledging the outstanding contribution that has been made historically and is being made today by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is also important to note that the role of the Supreme Court of Canada today has been significantly enhanced as a result of the adoption in Canada of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is now up to the Supreme Court of Canada ultimately to decide the full meaning of the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to decide, for example, what are the limits on the rights and freedoms set out in the Charter which are demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. I would like to be able to say as well that the Supreme Court of Canada on these questions of fundamental civil liberties and human rights is, in fact, the final voice. It is there in a position to defend the rights of minorities against the occasional tyranny of the majority. I very much regret, however, as does my Party that that is not the case.

As a result of the inclusion of the so-called override provision in the Charter of Rights, Section 33, the most basic, fundamental and precious human rights and freedoms in Canada can be wiped out at the stroke of a legislative pen. If a simple majority, and I emphasize a simple majority, of parliamentarians at the federal level or at the provincial level disagree with a decision of the highest court of the land, the Supreme Court of Canada can overturn that decision merely by a majority vote.

We in this Party believe profoundly that this provision of the Charter of Rights, Section 33, fundamentally undermines that commitment to equality, to justice and to civil liberties which is so essential. We strongly urge the Government as a top priority to take the necessary steps to meet with its provincial counterparts, in other words, for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to meet with the First Ministers and do whatever he can to improve Section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The price that was paid for adoption is one that could potentially seriously threaten civil liberties.

We believe that the role of the Supreme Court is important not only in the area of criminal and civil appeals but in particular in putting flesh and substance on the Charter of Rights, explaining to Canadians clearly what is meant and being prepared, when necessary, to act as a check on Governments which override those fundamental provisions in the Charter of Rights. My colleague from York Centre, the Justice spokesperson for the Liberal Party, indicated that he believes the legislation with which we are now dealing is a thoughtful and serious piece of legislation, as he put it. He said, and he is absolutely right, that this is one of the first pieces of legislation to come before this House to deal in any substantive way with the Supreme Court for many years. I want to disagree very strongly with my colleague's from York Centre characterization of this legislation as thoughtful and serious. Rather, this legislation, were it to be adopted by this House, would instead constitute a fundamental erosion of some very precious and important rights of Canadian men and women. I will explain why I believe that to be the case, why I believe that this legislation is wrong in principle, and why we in the New Democratic Party are not prepared to support the legislation as it is presently worded.

We all understand the sense of frustration and at times of annoyance perhaps that the Supreme Court of Canada feels at a work-load that is clearly a very heavy work-load. Under the existing provisions of the Supreme Court Act individuals are entitled to an oral hearing on an application of leave to appeal. As well, the discretion of the court to decide for itself which cases it wishes to hear is to some extent fettered. Let me suggest that when one examines the history of these provisions and looks at why it is, with respect to certain appeals, that the appeal goes as a right, it would be a profound mistake, a tragic mistake and a move backwards for this Parliament to deny those appeals as a right.

There are certainly provisions in the legislation with which we have no quarrel. There are provisions that would allow the Supreme Court of Canada to deliver judgment by depositing a judgment with the Registrar. As those lawyers who practise before the court are well aware, at the present time there are certain judgment days, something like 12 or more each year. During those judgment days lawyers queue up, the court is jammed with people and the judgments are handed down one after the other.

The present provisions of the Supreme Court Act require that judgments be delivered in open court. There is a certain amount of drama and excitement that attends to the handing down of judgments in open court. In addition to this particular provision, a majority of the judges who preside at the hearing of an appeal must be present for the delivery of the judgment. Practically speaking, the entire Supreme Court is present for the handing down of judgments or, in any event, a substantial majority of Members. In the case of provincial courts of appeal, however, they are entitled to deliver judgments either in open court or by depositing them with the Registrar. The amendment to the Supreme Court Act which would give to the highest court in the land the same discretion to deliver judgment by deposit that the courts of appeal already enjoy is certainly one that we support and recognize will go some way towards saving the time of that very important court.

The next major clause of the Bill would provide that the court determine applications for leave to appeal on the written submissions of the parties unless it orders an oral hearing. It would allow the court to fix the time within which an oral hearing must be held and would provide for quorum for applications for leave to appeal.

Superficially, perhaps, this particular amendment is somewhat attractive. The case-load of the Supreme Court of Canada is a very heavy one. Indeed, it is growing each year. However, I suggest that this particular provision is one that we will want to examine very carefully in committee. We will want to hear evidence from witnesses before agreeing to this provision.

Yes, it is true that there may be applications for leave to appeal which, in the words of the clause, make it clear from the written material that the application does not come within the provisions of Section 41 and therefore does not warrant an oral hearing. There may similarly be other applications which, quite obviously, given the significance and importance of the issues raised in the appeal, do come within those provisions and thus should give rise almost as a right to an appeal.

We must ask ourselves what we are sacrificing in achieving these objectives of speed and of cutting down on the number of oral hearings on leave to appeal. I believe that the price we are paying is one which may very well be too high. I will certainly want to hear evidence on this question in the legislative committee.

Let us take a moment to examine some of the arguments, and quite compelling ones, that have been raised against this particular provision. There can be no substitute for the court itself hearing from counsel rather than pouring over page after page of written material. Frequently a point that can be made effectively in an oral hearing simply cannot be made as effectively in writing. The skills of advocacy are often brought to bear in a far more effective way at a direct, oral hearing rather than at one in which judges simply review written material.

Yes, it is true that in some cases these hearings result in additional expense and some additional delay, but the reality as well is that the court has recently moved to a system of hearings by remote video. This has occurred in areas in British Columbia, and if it is not already happening in Newfoundland and the Maritime Provinces, I am sure it will be happening there in the near future as well. Those hearings have in fact proven to be very effective.

The Supreme Court has shown that it is able to adapt modern technology in a way that will assist it in providing hearings on leave to appeal and in cutting down the costs to litigants. However, I believe it is important that counsel should be in a position to present his or her argument cogently and clearly in an oral way at an oral hearing and not simply by means of written material.

There is another problem with this as well. There is a danger that judges will simply delegate the reading of motion papers on applications for leave to appeal to their clerks. There is no question whatsoever that this is already happening in the Supreme Court of the United States. I am not suggesting that clerks are not quite able to assist the judiciary in this important task, but the fact is that at the end of the day, it is the judges' job and responsibility. Surely a litigant who goes to the highest court of the land is entitled to know that his or her motion for leave was determined by the judge himself or herself and not by one of the judge's clerks.

I think we must also look ahead to the implications of this amendment on possible changes of a more fundamental nature to hearings before the Supreme Court of Canada. I am afraid that if we accept this clause, we will next hear arguments that appeals themselves should be limited. This in effect will turn appeals into paper wars. This has happened already in the Supreme Court of the United States where in even the most significant and important cases, oral argument is limited to 30 minutes for each side. In the United States, it is the consideration of written briefs by judges and clerks that plays the most important role in the final decision.

Obviously, given the population of the United States which is 10 times that of Canada and the fact that the American court is the same size as the Canadian court, perhaps it has been driven to that expedient. However, in our country, I suggest that this cannot be justified. I am concerned that were we to adopt the proposal which is presently before the House, it could lead to pressure for limitations on the actual appeal hearings as well.

Thomas Berger, a distinguished lawyer who also served on the Supreme Court of British Columbia for 11 years, I believe, has seen this question from both sides. As he has stated:

> To reduce the whole matter to paper seems to me to downgrade the role of advocacy; this is not in keeping with the traditions of our bar.
> It is not simply that this contributes to the openness of the justice system at the very highest level; my argument is that it enables the court better to understand the exact question that is before it. This contributes to better decision making.

I believe that Thomas Berger is absolutely right. When this Bill does go to committee, it will be up to the Government to bring forward compelling arguments indicating why we should not accept the counsel of Thomas Berger, given his perspective as counsel and as a distinguished former member of the judiciary. It should allow those who are seeking leave to appeal at the highest court of the land the opportunity to be heard orally on that application.

What are the other major provisions of the legislation? There are a couple of other provisions with respect to time limits for bringing appeals and applications for leave to appeal before the Supreme Court of Canada. Once again, we certainly have no objection to this. This is a provision that is overdue and in effect would attempt to make more uniform the time periods for appeal, particularly in criminal and civil matters. This amendment responds to those problems, and we support it.

There are provisions as well with respect to the attendance by inmates before the Supreme Court of Canada. Given the other new provision which would allow for the authority to assign counsel explicitly to the Supreme Court of Canada, it may very well be that these are provisions which can be supported as well. We will certainly want to hear further evidence on that point.

At the present time, while the rules of the Supreme Court of Canada allow for the appointment of counsel to act on behalf of an accused appearing before the court, that is not explicitly set out in the Supreme Court of Canada Act. We agree that when appearing before the highest court of the land which deals with such important and serious questions as come before it, no one should be denied access to the court because of inability to afford counsel. Once again, we welcome the provision that explicitly allows the court to appoint counsel.

Those are the major provisions of the legislation, save and except one other clause which I suggest is profoundly wrong and which would deny Canadians who are seeking justice, fairness and equity from the highest court of the land an opportunity to be heard when they are fully entitled to that right to be so heard. I was surprised to hear the Justice spokesman for the Liberal Party describing this legislation as thoughtful and serious while not raising any concern whatsoever about a provision in this Bill which would profoundly and seriously change the existing rights of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is one thing to say Canadians will no longer have the automatic right to an oral hearing before the Supreme Court of Canada. We have serious questions about that, but they can be studied in committee. It is something else to examine with care some of the procedural changes which, in most cases, are long overdue to facilitate the work of the Supreme Court of Canada. However, that part of this Bill which would fundamentally change the right of Canadians to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in certain circumstances, which I will set out, we in this Party totally reject. We say it is wrong in principle and fundamentally undermines this legislation. For that reason we cannot possibly support this Bill on second reading.

• (1600)

Clauses 11 through 13 would abolish the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in two particular circumstances. First, when there has been a dissent before the Court of Appeal and, second, when a person has been acquitted of an indictable offence and the acquittal has been set aside by the Court of Appeal. These rights have been fought for by Canadians. Indeed, they have been at the corner-stone of the Canadian system of justice. My colleague from St. John's East, a very distinguished barrister in the Province of Newfoundland, will be commenting further with respect to these provisions.

The right of appeal in these circumstances has existed for a very important reason. We presume that provincial Court of Appeal judges are respected, knowledgeable and outstanding jurists. If one of those judges should disagree with his or her colleagues on an appeal, surely it is not good enough to say that the litigant should simply accept the fact that there is a difference of opinion and go no further. You can imagine the situation in which an individual is before the court seeking justice. He or she has persuaded a judge that there is a foundation to the appeal, only to be told that they can go no further or that they must seek the discretion of the Supreme Court of Canada before they can go any further.

There are many examples of the importance of this provision. One of the most recent is the appeal of Colin Thatcher, the former Saskatchewan politician now serving a life sentence for the first degree murder of his wife. When he appealed, four of the five judges on the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed it. One member of the court, however, was prepared to grant his appeal. It would have been profoundly wrong to say to him, or indeed any other litigant, that he has no right to seek the opinion of the highest court of the land when one of the judges at the appeal court level indicated dissent.

That brings me to another point. In many cases these appeals will go in circumstances in which an individual has been convicted of murder. Parliament has decreed that there is to be a 25-year minimum sentence before one can even be considered for parole. That was the price paid for the abolition of capital punishment in 1976. Many of us would argue that the price was very high, indeed, quite likely too high. That being said, surely an individual who faces the possibility of 25 years behind bars before even being eligible for parole, an individual who persuades an appellant court judge of the merits of that appeal, is entitled, before being locked up, to have it considered by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Similarly with respect to circumstances in which there has been an acquittal set aside by a provincial Court of Appeal. We all remember the profound injustice with respect to Dr. Henry Morgentaler. The amendment brought in by Ron Basford, then Minister of Justice, at the strong urging of my predecessor as Justice critic, Stuart Leggatt, came too late for Henry Morgentaler. He quite unjustly served time in prison because, even though he had been acquitted by a jury of his peers, the Court of Appeal overturned the acquittal. That was a serious injustice and Parliament ruled that individuals would have the right to an automatic appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in those circumstances. I suggest that in seeking to withdraw that right, the Government is taking a serious step backwards and diminishing the quality of justice in this country. We vigorously protest this provision in the Bill.

I was pleased to hear the undertaking of the Minister that he intends to support an amendment to delete those odious provisions. I made strong representations to the Minister on this point. I indicated that I intend to propose an amendment to delete this provision and I welcome his agreement to support my amendment and agree to the deletion of this very backward and regressive provision of the legislation.

In conclusion, while we in the NDP recognize that changes must be made, clearly we do not accept the Bill as worded. We must deal with the legislation before us, not with promises by the Minister for changes in committee. As it now stands, the Bill is so fundamentally flawed and would deny significant and important rights, that we in this Party will be voting against it on second reading.

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I wish to follow the lead of other speakers in this debate in commending the Supreme Court of Canada for its great work and to acknowledge that it has the respect of all parts of the country for not only maintaining an appropriate balance between the laws of this country but for acting with great deliberation in making known and resolving major issues of not only constitutional but civil and criminal law. We all recognize the extent of their work-load and the fact that it has increased very dramatically in the last several years as a result of the introduction and passage of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We see the need for and welcome certain measures which would make their work easier and take away some aspects of that work which appear to be unnecessary. I would like to look at all aspects of the Act to determine whether it will accomplish that without damaging the fundamental rights of Canadians.

There is, for example, a restriction on oral hearings or permission to restrict oral hearings on leave to appeal. My information is that oral hearings on leave to appeal applications take perhaps 12 days a year of court time. This may be a long period of time but it is not a great period of time. A similar amount of time is used in the delivery of judgments.

I believe, as do my colleague and many barristers across the country, that the oral hearing is a very important tool of the advocate, particularly in appeals before the Supreme Court of Canada. If the Supreme Court of Canada were predisposed, based on written material presented to it, to grant leave to appeal, time could be saved by dispensing with the oral hearing. Such a measure would speed up proceedings and save the time of the judges of the Supreme Court which could more properly and fruitfully be spent dealing with the weighty matters before them.

However, the provision of an oral hearing is of very great importance. As an advocate who has appeared before many courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada on a leave application, I attest to the value of an oral presentation. I myself have been convinced by oral presentations of advocates in cases where I was not persuaded by written material.

This Bill also contains the procedure for the assignment of counsel. This can be done under the existing rules, but we are told it is not done very often. We would look forward to it being done more often and the inclusion of it in the Act may result in some improvement. However, it is really window dressing as the court already has the right to assign counsel when necessary.

There is also the provision for the delivery of judgments in written form by deposit in the registry instead of waiting for a judgment day, which sounds rather formidable. Some very important and weighty cases of great national significance may well benefit from the learned judges of the Supreme Court of Canada assembling together and making a verbal judgment.

However, in many cases the filing of a judgment, as is done in the provincial courts of appeal, would be perfectly adequate and may result in judgments being handed down more quickly. In fact, I know it would because quite often judgments are ready but cannot be delivered until the next judgment day. In matters of great national importance which affect the Constitution or more than just the litigants and establish very serious principles, the court may well prefer to read the judgments from the court itself.

There are a number of things in this Bill which, with a few amendments, could provide for the streamlining of court activity, save the court some time, and enable the work of the judges and the court to be conducted in a more fruitful way. We would support that sort of thing, but cannot support legislation which contains very serious regressive steps in terms of justice. The most significant are the removal of the automatic right of appeal in two cases, the first where there has been dissent in the provincial court of appeal, and the other where there has been acquittal by a jury.

The right of appeal, when there has been assent at the provincial court level, is, I believe, designed to provide uniformity in our laws across the country. A learned trial judge of the court of appeal of a province dissents from his colleagues when there is a serious divergence of opinion on a matter of great importance, a matter which may well be before the courts of other provinces in other ways.

Two of three judges in a Newfoundland court may decide a particular question one way while two of three judges in the Province of Ontario may decide the question in another way. The purpose of having automatic appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is to provide uniformity of laws across the country. We cannot have one criminal law for Newfoundland, another for Ontario and another for British Columbia. The law must be uniform across the country in terms of its interpretation and application. That fundamental change is thrown into this legislation under the guise of streamlining matters at the Supreme Court level.

The second exception which is more fundamental with regard to rights is with regard to acquittals by a jury when the provincial court of appeal has overthrown an acquittal and sent it back for a new trial. This is a matter of great fundamental importance which involves more than a change in procedure at the Supreme Court level. This is a matter of fundamental justice with regard to the approach to jury trials in this country.

We have adopted the centuries-old institution of the jury trial from the British legal tradition. In Britain if one is acquitted by a jury of one's peers chosen to hear the case, there is no appeal by the Crown allowed. In preserving the liberty of the subject and attempting to bring to justice someone who has committed a crime the state has only one opportunity to present the case properly.

In this country the Crown has the right of appeal from such an acquittal. A person acquitted by a jury of his peers is tried again if the Court of Appeal of a province decides that there has been a technical error in a case. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), has referred to the Morgentaler amendment as it has become known. Until that amendment, we had an even more fundamental problem in our country. The Court of Appeal could substitute a verdict of guilty after an individual had been acquitted by a jury of his peers. Thankfully, that amendment has removed that diminution of the great jury system.

The institution of the jury is one of the great preserves of the liberty of the subject. It has been said that the institution of the jury preserves the liberty of the subject sometimes in the face of the tyranny of the state. It is such a fundamental institution in our society that it would be a backward step from the progress that has been made to remove the automatic right of an individual to go to the Supreme Court of Canada to have an appeal heard when his acquittal by a jury has been repealed by a Court of Appeal as a result of a technicality.

It would be a backward step for us, after having passed an amendment which prevented the acquittal by a jury from being reversed by a Court of Appeal. That right of appeal to the Supreme Court upholds the institution of the jury at least to some extent. I and my Party would prefer to see the jury system be given the respect that it has been given in Britain so that there would be no appeal at all. We support the institution of the jury in which its unanimous finding of acquittal is the end of the matter. At least, the current automatic right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is some protection. Its removal is a fundamental change in our law and ought not to be part of any Bill that is purported to streamline the operations of court.

I understand that we have an undertaking from the Minister that there will be a response to amendments of this nature at committee level. I am pleased to hear that. Legislation with this fundamental flaw should not be before the House for second reading.

I am sympathetic to the importance of streamlining matters because the Supreme Court of Canada is overloaded with appeals. However, perhaps if the Government did not introduce some highly questionable Bills before the House, such as Bill C-84, there would not be so many appeals before the Supreme Court of Canada in an attempt to sort out the mistakes. In terms of procedure, I support the Government's measures to make it easier for the Supreme Court of Canada. However, I cannot and will not support in principle a Bill which has three fundamental flaws that affect the rights of Canadians under the guise of procedural changes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been consultations. I believe you will find unanimous consent to have the vote on this Bill at six o'clock together with the other votes on Bill C-84 and Bill C-2. The House could suspend the sitting until five o'clock, at which time we will deal with Private Members' Hour.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, there have indeed been consultations and we agree to the proposal that has been made.

Mr. Gerin: That is agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There being unanimous consent, the vote will be held at six o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until five o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

At 4.27 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS--PUBLIC BILLS

PATENT EXTENSION (ASPARTAME) ACT

On the Order: June 18, 1987—Bill C-259, Patent Extension (Aspartame) Act.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as Bill C-259 has been returned to the House by the Senate with an amendment, with the unanimous consent of the House, I would like to move that the order for consideration of an amendment proposed by the Senate to Bill C-259, entitled an Act to amend the term of a patent relating to a certain food additive, commonly called Aspartame, Nutrasweet or Nutrasuc, be revoked and that the Bill be withdrawn, as the amendment proposed by the Senate is unworkable.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Member to move this motion?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, without wanting to editorialize or to provide explanations, I understand that the Hon. Member wants to have this Bill withdrawn. Needless to add that he does not agree with the amendments, but as I understand it, the motion is as follows: That Bill C-259 be now withdrawn. I can give my consent to this motion, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Lanthier: That is right, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, order revoked and Bill withdrawn.

MARRIAGE PROHIBITED DEGREES ACT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls) moved that Bill S-5, an Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to say a few words on this Bill, which, as you know, originated in the other place, as it is referred to in this Chamber. It concerns the laws with respect to the capacity to marry.

When the British North America Act was passed in 1867, Parliament was given exclusive jurisdiction to legislate with respect to marriage and divorce and, more specifically, with respect to the capacity to marry. The provinces are involved in this area as well inasmuch as they have exclusive jurisdiction with respect to the solemnization of marriage. It is Parliament's prerogative to legislate in this particular area and it is on that basis that this Bill is presently before Parliament.

I believe it would be prudent at this point for Members of the House to reflect on some of the historical background to the question of prohibited degrees of marriage. It is, I would guess, one of the oldest areas of law still in effect in this country. A look at the historical aspects is especially important because although there are certain legal questions and arguments to consider, consideration of social ideals and norms that have developed throughout our history is important.

Our laws with respect to prohibited degrees of marriage, and the state's involvement in this area, goes back to Biblical times. In fact there are references in the Old Testament, the Book of Leviticus, Chapter 18, indicating what person another person could or could not marry.

As well, from the earliest times of Christianity and the involvement of the Christian Church with marriage, along with the solemnization of marriage conducted by the church, several norms grew up which indicated which related or non-related person, a person related, as we say in the legal profession, by consanguinity or affinity, someone could or could not marry. As the years went on, the Christian Church at various stages in its history, expanded or contracted the list according to the times. For instance, at one point in canon law one was prohibited from marrying a person within the seventh degree. I have not quite figured that out. I think it would be one's third or fourth cousin. The present law in Canada originates from about the time of the so-called Reformation. At that time in the event of the church's history, Henry VIII and his Ministers set out a number of specific prohibitions. I suppose he is one monarch who had plenty to do with the subject of marriage, so it is somewhat appropriate he lend his hand to the statutory provisions. In 1563, a table of prohibited degrees was implemented in England. The table listed all the possible relationships up to and including the third degree, arising out of either blood or marriage, that would be prohibited. This table eventually found its way into the Anglican Book of Common Prayer. Eventually, the table was utilized by the ecclesiastical courts of England in annulment actions. Finally, the Lord Lyndhurst Act of 1835 indicated, among other things: "All marriages which shall hereafter be celebrated between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever". Such became the law of England in 1835. It was this law that was adopted by the common law jurisdictions of Canada and was then subsequently assumed, as I indicated, by the federal Government in 1867.

I should say that the laws were not exactly the same between the colonies and the provinces within the common law jurisdiction, but fortunately, they were very close to each other and, fortunately, as well, a civil law jurisdiction in Canada, namely, the Province of Quebec, had adopted laws that were essentially the same as its common law counterparts.

With the jurisdiction having passed to the federal Government in 1867, Parliament at various times tried its hand at the subject of the capacity to marry. In 1882, Parliament enacted a statute that removed various prohibited grounds. This was a feat of legislation known as the Marriage Act, which has descended to the present time. However, there were certainly inadequacies in the law as it existed then and as it has continued to exist up to the present time. Some of these laws and prohibited grounds have touched people very deeply.

I know that several of my colleagues who will be making comments in this debate will be referring to some of the genuine hardships people have suffered as a result of this somewhat antiquated law. However, for those of us who concern ourselves with this law, it has become clear that there is a vagueness in the law as it exists in Canada and there are certain inadequacies which, hopefully, this Bill will meet.

• (1710)

As an example of problems with the current law, there are approximately 30 petitions now before the other place, petitions of individuals who have used their right to petition either a member of the Senate or a Member of the House of Commons asking for relief from some of the prohibited grounds. In my discussions with other Members of Parliament, the number of petitions has increased over the years. I think that is the reason we now have before us the present legislation. The Bill as proposed would remove the need for these petitions.

The Bill that is presently before us is just the latest attempt to consolidate and update the laws with respect to marriage. There have been several attempts made in the past to achieve this end, and many of us hope that it will not be necessary to make more attempts. There are many of us who hope that this will be perhaps the last kick at the can, so to speak.

The law before us contains a number of measures which I think are helpful. Clause 4 of the Bill states that unless a prohibition is outlined in the law, then all other unions between individuals are all right. The prohibitions that remain fall into two categories. Clause 2(2) states:

> No person shall marry another person if they are related
> (a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption—

That is the first category. What that does is to place an absolute prohibition on what we refer to as lineal descendants, one's children, grandchildren or great-grandchildren. Obviously it prohibits marriage between one's parents and one's great-grandparents.

There is one other prohibited category. The Bill states:

> No person shall marry another person if they are related—
> (b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood.

There is an absolute prohibition on marriage between siblings who are related by blood or by the half-blood. That only makes sense. These are prohibitions which we have traditionally frowned upon. Of course, there are genetic reasons as well why society frowns on marriages within those categories.

Hon. Members may have noticed that in the second prohibition there is not a reference to adopted siblings. I suggest that if there is a controversial part in the Bill, and I know that it has been referred to as a housekeeping Bill, it resides in that clause. There are a number of arguments on either side of this issue. One could argue that siblings by adoption have had no choice in their relationship, a parent has made the decision as to what the relationship between the two of them is and therefore there should not be a legal prohibition against their eventual marriage. The trend in provincial law, which has jurisdiction in the area of adoption, is to treat the adopted child as much as possible as a natural child. Most people would agree that that is something that we should pursue. In any case, the committee of the other House that looked at this clause came to the conclusion that at the present time there is not a prohibition against adopted siblings marrying each other.

This matter was studied. A couple appeared before a committee of the other place with a petition asking for permission to marry. Members of the committee looked into the law and concluded that adoption is only a 20th century concept. The law with which we are working was developed in the 19th century and in the centuries before when there was no concept of adoption. Therefore there was no need for this couple to petition the other place because the proposed marriage was not prohibited. In any event, this is the one area that I would like to see looked at again.

Some have pointed to the fact that in Australia the question has been considered. The Australian Government chose to look at the adoptive relationship in exactly the same way as a consanguinity relationship for the purpose of determining capacity to marry. In Australia it was asked why these children should be treated any differently. I believe there is some merit to that argument.

The Bill contains no prohibitions other than the ones I have mentioned. I would suggest that no other prohibitions are necessary. They are not necessary from what we know of genetics. People have gone into the degrees of relationships and have concluded that there is no necessity to prohibit marriage in other categories.

I suggest that social attitudes have changed with respect to how we perceive relationships. As the law stands now, after a divorce one cannot marry one's divorced spouse's uncle or aunt. That is clearly not necessary. Social attitudes have changed in Canada. I think that the number of petitions that are presently before the other place is indicative of that.

We are dealing here with an area that was long within the purview of the churches, and certainly the churches continue to have their laws and rules within their own denominations as to whom they will allow to marry. I think that is all well and good and as it should be. At the same time, I think that we should not attempt to have our civil law conform to the rules of one or more religious denominations. I think most people will agree with that.

To conclude, I believe that the provisions in the Bill are positive. I believe that they are worthy of the attention of the House.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, I have been motivated to enter this debate on Bill S-5 because of a serious problem that was presented to me by a constituent, a problem that I was incapable of solving because the law needs to be changed in order to solve it. It is her personal problem caused by the present Marriage Act which is prompting me now to speak in this debate and to urge all Hon. Members to consider seriously passing this Bill as quickly as possible.

The Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Nicholson) has given an indication to the House that there may be a difficulty with one part of the Bill, the part dealing with adopted children. If that is the case, then I suggest that we deal with that one probable difficulty expeditiously and then bring the Bill back to the House as quickly as possible in order to pass it.

Before I outline the problem of my constituent, I want to commend the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls for being the sponsor of this legislation. He sponsors the Bill from the Senate as a Private Member's Bill. I believe that he is leading the way in helping a considerable number of people in the country who are facing a problem because of the current Marriage Act. We all recognize that it is necessary and proper that the Marriage Act should prohibit those who are closely related by blood from marrying. That is not what we are talking about here at all. I want to ask the House what sense there is in refusing the right to marry to those who have become related through marriage and that marriage is then dissolved by divorce.

• (1720)

For example, as the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls indicated, the Marriage Act prohibits a woman from marrying her former husband's uncle. I would ask Hon. Members why. What sense is there in that?

Bill S-5 would clarify the law among other situations whereby a person whose marriage has been dissolved by divorce may marry the brother, the sister, the nephew, the niece, the uncle, or the aunt of the divorced spouse.

As has already been indicated, the only procedure available in the past to such couples who wished to be married was to petition Parliament for an exemption. This has been done successfully in the past in quite a number of cases, but the Senate no longer wishes to make such a remedy available. Of course, why should Parliament be burdened with such a cumbersome procedure? How much more logical it is to change the law to make it reasonable and sensible. I am advised, having looked at the time spent in the consideration of Bill S-5, that the Senate has given the Bill the closest possible scrutiny over a considerable period of time. Its purpose, I repeat, is to end confusion in the Marriage Act. It attempts to change the law. These attempts have been under way since 1983, a very long period of time to make what is a straightforward and reasonable change.

The Senate has polled religious groups, legal experts, geneticists, and others, and it has found no serious or major objections to the Bill.

I want to say again that after discussion with the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls and with the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), I recognize the problem already referred to in respect of the provision that a relationship by adoption is no prohibition to marriage, that is, marriage among siblings. I concur fully that we must examine that carefully, but I do not believe that we need to take years to do it. I think that we can do it in a matter of a few weeks at most.

In conclusion, I want to share with the House part of a letter which I received from a constituent so that the House will understand how our refusal to change antiquated laws can create great difficulties and burdens for our citizens. The letter is addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and reads in part:

Dear Sir:

When the House of Commons meets in September, and the Marriage Laws of Canada are brought up for discussion, your knowledge of my situation would be greatly appreciated.

I was married in 1980, and divorced in April of 1986.

I am now engaged to my—(ex-husband's uncle), and I was to be married on August 29th, 1987—

I personally picked up the marriage licence in June. Number 17 on the back of the licence states, "A man may not marry his nephew's wife".

Approximately one week after I picked up the marriage licence, I returned to the town office—and spoke with the Town Clerk—about the validity of number 17. At that time he was unaware of our situation and said he would contact—the Deputy Registrar General in Toronto—

I was told to return our marriage licence for a refund—and then I was to be commended on my honesty—

I was informed that the marriage law had been passed through the Senate three times, and all that was required, was a short discussion and a stamp of approval—

Our plans were void. The invitations and the hall had to be cancelled immediately. The marriage licence had to be returned by a friend as a refund of thirty-five dollars seemed to be trivial and embarrassing.

The only hope seemed to be having our banns read in the Church. Some of the laws in the Church are different from the laws of the government.

—(Our priest) told me that if this was the law of the land there was absolutely nothing that he could do.

When the new Constitution of Human Rights came into effect, our Minister, the Bishop, (and ourselves) assumed that an archaic law such as this would be obsolete—

Marriage takes priority in our lives before a family. I am 26, and my (husband-to-be) is 27, we feel that we should be able to make our own decision—.

When the tears stopped, the only alternative was to be married out of our country Canada.

With the help of my Minister and an American Minister, arrangements were made to be married in the U.S.A. Canada considers this to be legal. The laws in the U.S.A. do not pertain to our case—

The House of Commons meets in September. We have decided to explain our situation and hope that in September you will consider us when the House meets again.

It is not our choice to marry in the U.S.A., but if the law is not changed, you leave us no alternative.

We were informed that this law has been brought up for debate since 1983, and we do not want to wait for four more years in case it will never be changed. We were also informed that this law was probably dating back to the 14th Century.

—(We) are literally begging you to take time and change the law in September—

Please take into consideration our situation:. We are not blood related, I have been legally divorced for over a year, and my ex-husband has remarried.

The letter ends by indicating that they are looking forward to a favourable reply. It is on the basis of that problem that I rose to speak this afternoon. I hope the House will respond with care and with consideration to the serious problem facing some of our citizens.

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this debate concerning marriage prohibitions between persons who are too closely related either by consanguinity, affinity or adoption but would like to get married in spite of these prohibitions.

That is a matter that may concern a very small fraction of the population, however it is of very great concern for the people involved. It is easy to understand that marriage prohibitions can have great implications in the life of these people on the psychological level.

Since this Bill touches on the perception that we have of the family life, it is vitally important, Madam Speaker, that this House review the matter very carefully.

We must ask ourselves whether our society must continue to be governed by a legislation that is considered by some to be archaic and outdated, given the changes that have happened in our modern canadian society that is more and more cosmopolitan. For instance, why should a woman be forbidden to marry her uncle or, if she is divorced, her ex-husband's brother or uncle?

To this day couples who were prohibited from marrying each other, especially the first group referred to above, could have their marriage validated if they wished by having the Senate pass a special Bill or an act granting an exception to the general rule. However, in order to do so, these people had to go through a long and difficult process which was also very costly.

For these reasons, the Senate has deemed appropriate to pass Bill S-5, an act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons.

Thus the marriage legislation has been streamlined and made more accessible while still maintaining a number of basic prohibitions.

The only prohibitions that have been kept regarding persons related by consanguinity concern parents, grandparents and children as well as grandchildren and brothers and sisters or half-brother and half-sister. On the other hand, an aunt will be able to marry her nephew and a niece will be able to marry her uncle.

There will no longer be any prohibition concerning persons related by affinity or marriage. The Act also provides that a person whose marriage has been dissolved by divorce can get remarried to the divorced spouse's brother or sister, nephew or niece, uncle or aunt.

In the case of adoption, Bill S-5 prohibits marriage between grandparents, parents, children and grandchildren. That prohibition however would not apply to brothers and sisters by adoption, who would be free to intermarry.

It will always be difficult to have unanimity on those matters, Madam Speaker. Some people would prefer the status quo for reasons of moral, social or religious rectitude. On the other hand, others feel that this area of our legislation should be taken out of the dust of former times and brought into line with this new era, in order to address various situations. Anyway, more often than not, couples will elect to live together in common law marriage if they cannot obtain dispensation from the Senate.

It must be realized, Madam Speaker, that the practice of prohibiting marriage between persons who are related to a certain degree either by consanguinity or adoption stems from the ancient Judeic religious law, which was enshrined later in a number of statutes adopted under Henry VIII.

So is was that the Canadian provinces which entered Confederation in 1867 adopted that British Common Law tradition. Such is the situation now prevailing in nine provinces out of ten. As far as Quebec is concerned, marriage prohibitions are to be found in Sections 124 to 126 of the Code civil—but they are identical to those in other provinces and those that prevailed at Confederation.

Marriage and divorce are a federal matter under Section 91(26) of the Constitution Act, 1867. And to this day, the law has remained practically unchanged, since the federal Government has elected not to get involved in that area, excepting the Marriage Act, 1970, which only brought in minor amendments.

I will conclude, Madam Speaker, by urging Hon. Members to give particular attention to that matter, in view of its importance to those couples who are looking forward to a legal solution to their problems or who expect an answer that would allow them to clarify their situation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. Bill S-5 was brought before the House by the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Nicholson) and, in my view, is certainly worthy of passage. We in the New Democratic Party are prepared to support the legislation and to see it adopted this afternoon.

It has been subject to a very serious and comprehensive study by the Senate which, as long as it exists, occasionally does some positive, constructive committee work. This is an example of an area in which we are able to benefit from the work done by the Senate. The Senators have heard an extensive number of witnesses and consulted with all the provinces and the two territorial Governments, and we are now able in this Chamber to take advantage of that work.

Having done that, Madam Speaker, I suggest that the time to move forward on this legislation is now, not to delay further the adoption of the legislation.

While I recognize the concern raised by the Hon. Member from Niagara Falls who sponsored the Bill—and I want to pay tribute to him for bringing the Bill before the House—as well as the concern raised by the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) with respect to adopted siblings, I do want to make it very clear that while we recognize those concerns, we are prepared to see the legislation adopted in all stages this afternoon.

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, with the consent of the House, I would like to propose a motion which will not deprive me of my right to speak if it cannot receive unanimous consent.

I would like to move the following motion:

That the motion be amended by striking all words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

Bill S-5, an Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, be not now read for the second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject-matter referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

I seek the consent the House to have this motion adopted.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the Hon. Member have the unanimous consent of the House to present this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill withdrawn and subject-matter referred to Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): We shall now suspend the sitting until six o'clock.

At 5.37 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 13(5), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on the motion for third reading of Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof; and on the motion for third reading of Bill C-2, an Act to dissolve Canagrex and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof; and on the motion for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-53, an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and to amend various other Acts in consequence thereof.

Call in the Members.

CANAGREX DISSOLUTION ACT

The House resumed from Friday, September 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise that Bill C-2, an Act to dissolve Canagrex and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I wonder if you would seek the sense of the House as to whether it would care to have the vote as recorded on the Bill we have just dealt with apply to this one on the understanding that each vote would be recorded separately.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) seeking the floor?

Mr. Riis: No, Madam Speaker, I am not seeking the floor.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I imagine that the House can well understand that the Chair did not know whether or not the Hon. Member was seeking the floor. He was neither sitting nor standing.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That's their position.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Am I to understand that there is unanimous consent to apply the vote?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jourdenais: Yes, Madam Speaker, if you use the same count as for Bill C-84, I can say that, had there been a separate vote, I would have voted with the Government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Therefore the vote will be dealt with accordingly, adding the vote of the Hon. Member for Lapierre (Mr. Jourdenais).

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

STRIKING—PRESENTATION OF TWENTY-EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the twenty-eighth report of the Striking Committee.

BILL C-55—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, I have the honour to present the Bill to the House with amendments.

I would like to tell the House that the committee sat for fifty-five and a half hours and heard over 30 witnesses. I would like to thank all the members of the committee for their diligent work on the study of this Bill. It must be especially noted that the co-operation and compromise between all Parties made the study of this piece of legislation more fruitful. In particular, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) and the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), for imparting their long-standing and extensive knowledge of immigration matters to our deliberations.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties. I have two motions that I would like to put to the House at this time. I think you will find there is consent to put the motions and that they will pass unanimously.

The first motion is:

That the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Stockholm, Sweden; The Hague, The Netherlands; and Bonn, Federal Republic of Germany, from November 6 to 18, 1987 inclusive, to meet with its counterpart committees and the Auditors General of those countries, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Minister of State have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, the second motion is as follows:

That the Standing Committee on National Defence be authorized to travel to West Germany, Belgium and Switzerland between October 15 and 23, 1987, inclusive in relation to its consideration of the White Paper on National Defence pursuant to Standing Order 96(2), and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Minister of State have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO EFFECT A SETTLEMENT WITH FRED TURNER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to table, pursuant to Standing Order 106, a petition which is certified correct. It is from residents throughout the Northwest Territories on behalf of Mr. Fred Turner.

The petitioners hold the opinion that the Government of Canada has inflicted a severe injustice to one of its citizens by wrongfully depriving Fred Turner of his right to earn a living through the operation of his family business.

Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) agreed to examine the situation but has chosen instead to avoid the issue and to hide behind the courts, the petitioners call upon the House to take whatever actions possible to find an equitable settlement to assist Fred Turner and his family after this unfair and perhaps illegal loss.

RIGHT TO LIFE OF UNBORN BABIES—PROTECTION OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to present a petition signed by over 100 individuals who attended the Fourth International Youth Pro-Life Congress held at Niagara Falls, Ontario. They call upon the Members of the House to support and to initiate reforms of the Constitution Act, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Criminal Code in order to protect the rights and dignity of unborn human persons in Canada. With those sentiments, I completely agree.

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO CLOSURE OF POST OFFICE—WILNO, ONT.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Wilno, Ontario, and indeed of the Canadian-Polish community of Canada at large. Canada Post is attempting to reduce the service if not close down the post office at Wilno, Ontario, in the County of Renfrew. Wilno is the oldest community of Polish origin in Canada. The national campgrounds of the Canadian Polish community are just six miles away from the general store in Wilno where this post office is located.

The petitioners have asked me to present this petition to the Parliament of Canada asking, for heritage and historical reasons, and indeed for community service reasons, that this post office remain open and that the rural route remain as it is now and that the postmaster remain on salary so that he can handle the post office. It is very important to all these people in Canada because they come to Wilno to visit every year from all major parts of Canada.

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL AID FOR CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING PROGRAMS

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of my Montreal riding, Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic, who are opposed to the Government's housing policy. This being International Year of the Homeless, they believe that this Government's definition of essential needs prevents hundreds of thousands of Canadians living below the threshold of poverty from getting housing assistance from the Government.

For all these reasons the petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to authorize an immediate increase in funds for co-operative housing programs.

[English]

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO CORPORATE PLAN

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague from the Ottawa Valley, the Hon. Member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins), in presenting a petition pursuant to Standing Order 106 which meets the requirements.

Canada Post Corporation has already started reducing services in certain rural areas and intends to continue systematically closing an important number of post offices in small municipalities including Wilno. The population is firmly opposed to any reduction in postal personnel and the normal services to which rural citizens are entitled. The population does not accept at any time that small communities be penalized by the planned reductions.

For those reasons, the petitioners ask Parliament to give an immediate answer to the request regarding the fact that rural communities will not have to suffer any form of discrimination to the quality of their postal services and ask that Parliament agree that the rural municipalities will not be penalized by the closing of the post offices, and finally ask Parliament that the rural communities which have already been badly affected by reductions will recover complete postal services to which they are accustomed, and the petition is humbly submitted.

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO REMOVAL OF RURAL ROUTE SERVICE—WILNO, ONT.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague from the Ottawa Valley in protesting the recent decision by Canada Post concerning the residents of Wilno, Ontario, which is also the oldest community of Polish origin in Canada.

At this time the post office is in the general store and there is a rural route running out of it. Canada Post wants to remove the rural route starting point to another community. The community in that area wants to retain the post office as it now is. The National Polish Congress also wants it retained. On behalf of the petitioners, I duly pray that the Government come to its senses and rectify this obvious error on its part.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MUTUAL LEGAL ASSISTANCE IN CRIMINAL MATTERS ACT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-58, an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks dealing with this third important justice initiative we have considered, I would like to draw to the attention of the House the fact that I do appreciate very much the co-operation of the House in dealing with these matters. While they are different pieces of legislation, they are all important in their own right and deal with some tangible realities we face in today's society.

Legal Assistance

It has long been recognized that no nation can exist in isolation. Indeed, states have always regarded international co-operation as being essential to their good relations. In criminal matters, such co-operation has traditionally taken the following forms: extradition, commissioned evidence, service of documents issued by a foreign court and informal co-operation between police forces.

These types of assistance, although still useful and necessary, were developed at a time when crimes were not normally committed beyond the boundaries of any one country. Because of the spectacular increase in means of communication and transportation, criminals are no longer inhibited by territorial boundaries. Quite the contrary, criminals take advantage of the traditional notion of territorial jurisdiction to escape detection and prosecution.

Crime is no longer a local or national affair. It is now transnational. A transnational crime can be described as a crime whose planning or execution has taken place in two or more countries. Obvious examples of such crimes would include drug trafficking, crimes associated with terrorism, tax evasion, money laundering, fraud and organized crime.

Transnational crime has become an international problem which requires a solution at an international level. Hence, the purpose of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters.

• (1120)

You will recall that an important treaty was signed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and President Reagan on March 18, 1985, in Quebec City. The Bill we are dealing with today sets out the appropriate legal framework necessary to implement in Canada the provisions of the Canada-U.S. treaty on mutual legal assistance and those of any other treaty to which Canada may become a party. The Bill is not itself a code of mutual legal assistance but enables implementation of treaties.

Let me now describe what mutual legal assistance is. Simply put, it is an arrangement whereby a country, the requested state, at the request of another country, the requesting state, agrees to gather in its own territory evidence of a crime which is largely or entirely committed in the requesting state. As the words themselves imply, it must be stressed that mutual legal assistance is not a one-way street. It benefits, on a reciprocal basis, all those involved. This means Canada will obtain the same kind of assistance for Canadian investigations as we are able to provide for foreign investigations.

The new scheme encompasses every possible means of legal assistance. By way of illustration, let me read Article 2, paragraph 2 of the Canada-U.S. treaty:

> Assistance shall include:
> (a) examining objects and sights;
> (b) exchanging information and objects;
> (c) locating or identifying persons;
> (d) serving documents;

(e) taking evidence of persons;

(f) providing documents and records;

(g) transferring persons in custody;

(h) executing requests for searches and seizures.

I wish to assure all Canadians that the Bill does not open up Canadian borders to foreign police forces. Important safeguards have been developed to that effect. Foreign requests for assistance may be denied by the Minister of Justice if he or she is of the view that they are contrary to Canadian public interest. Where a foreign request for assistance is accepted, it will be executed by Canadian police officers and supervised, in the case of compulsory measures of assistance, by Canadian courts pursuant to Canadian standards and Canadian laws.

We must recognize mutual legal assistance as a tool which is both modern and essential to the fight against transnational or international crime.

Canada has chosen to base its system of mutual legal assistance on a network of bilateral treaties which will specify for each treaty partner those measures of assistance, compulsory or not, that Canada has agreed to make available, and the offences for which Canada will provide assistance. The Government is of the view that this procedure is the most appropriate because it is flexible enough to produce treaties that are tailor-made, so to speak, to the particular needs of both Canada and its treaty partner.

The Bill provides for the listing in a schedule of foreign states which have signed a mutual legal assistance treaty with Canada and the publication of such treaties in The Canada Gazette for the courts to take judicial note of. In essence, mutual legal assistance is of benefit to our own country and to the country with whom we enter into the treaty.

[Translation]

However the signature of a treaty does not mean that existing co-operation agreements between Canadian and foreign police forces will no longer be honoured. Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the Bill expressly acknowledges that informal mutual legal assistance will be maintained; the treaty will complement it on a more official basis, but without replacing it.

[English]

It should also be noted that the treaty approach chosen by Canada will not prevent the Government from providing assistance to non-treaty countries when assistance is warranted in the international context. Indeed, where there is no treaty between Canada and another country, the Bill recognizes that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), with agreement of the Minister of Justice, may enter into an administrative arrangement with that foreign country. Such an arrangement will be executed like a treaty and will be valid for a specific purpose and a limited period of time, not exceeding six months. This will provide Canada with the flexibility to respond, on a case-by-case basis, to unforeseen situations of a serious nature, such as terrorist acts for which a foreign state may require Canadian assistance in uncovering evidence located in our territory. Moreover, in exceptional circumstances, administrative arrangements will also be available to treaty countries for non-listed offences when the treaty so provides.

Let me review the main provisions of the Bill. Under the Bill the responsibility for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters has been assigned to the Minister of Justice. He has been designated as the central authority for Canada. Upon receipt of the request, the Department of Justice of the requested state as central authority, if it accepts the request, is obliged to carry it out. This is done by transmittal of the request to appropriate competent authorities, that is police agencies or prosecutors, for execution according to the laws of the requested state.

As I indicated earlier, mutual legal assistance encompasses both non-compulsory and compulsory means of assistance. The Bill will only apply to compulsory assistance. There are four categories of so-called compulsory measures of assistance: search warrants, summoning of witnesses, temporary transfer of persons in custody, and the lending of Canadian exhibits to a foreign state.

The Bill sets out the procedure applicable to each of these categories of compulsory measures of assistance. These measures, however, will not be made available, as a matter of course, to every country in the world. Indeed, before a compulsory measure of assistance is made available to a foreign country several conditions will have to be met. The requesting state must be a party to a treaty with Canada. Such treaty must provide for the measure of assistance sought. The measure of assistance must be requested for an offence covered by the treaty. The request for assistance must be in conformity with provisions of the applicable treaty. The request for assistance must not be contrary to Canadian public interest as determined by the Minister of Justice. Finally, the safeguards contained in the Bill, including an order from a Canadian judge, must have been respected.

Let me now describe briefly the procedure made applicable in the Bill to the four general categories of compulsory measures of assistance, firstly with respect to the matter of the search warrant.

[Translation]

The Bill provides the possibility of securing in Canada a search warrant to gather information or evidence for a foreign investigation. The relevant procedure set forth in the Bill is in keeping with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and our legal principles, and it provides strong guarantees because the search is conducted within the scope of a foreign investigation.

• (1130)

These safeguards are as follows. First, the application must be made to a Canadian Superior Court judge. Second, the judge must be satisfied that no other less intrusive means would be appropriate to gather the evidence sought. Third, the judge must be satisfied that an offence within the treaty was committed in the requesting state and that evidence of that offence can be found in Canada.

If the judge is satisfied that these conditions are met and issues a search warrant, it must be executed by a Canadian peace officer named in the warrant. The person who has been the object of the search may make representations to the judge who issued the warrant either to have it set aside or to request that before the things seized are sent abroad conditions be imposed in respect of the rights of owners or third parties and with respect to the preservation and return of these things to Canada.

In that regard, because the Canadian judge has no jurisdiction over the foreign country, the Bill also provides that no object or thing will be sent abroad until the Minister of Justice is satisfied that the foreign state will respect the conditions imposed by the Canadian judge.

Dealing with the evidence-gathering order provisions of the Bill, the purpose of this judicial order is to compel a person to testify or to produce a record, document or other article. Again, provision is made for terms and conditions to be imposed by the judge, including the manner in which a refusal by the witness to answer questions is to be dealt with where such refusal is based on a law in force in Canada or in the requesting state.

In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, where the objection is based on a law in force in Canada it will be decided by the judge. However, if the objection relates to a possible breach of a privilege recognized by a law in force in the requesting state, or to a possible breach of a criminal provision in force in the foreign state, the objection will be taken down in writing and will be sent to the requesting state for decision. If the objection is overruled, the witness will be obliged to answer. If he still persists in his refusal he could then, of course, be guilty of contempt of court.

It is worth mentioning at this point that both the search warrant and the evidence-gathering order will also be available to gather information which may reveal the whereabouts of a person who is suspected of having committed an offence covered by the treaty.

Dealing with the provisions concerning transfer of persons in custody, the Bill would allow the temporary transfer of a detained person from a Canadian jail to a foreign country for the purpose of testifying or helping in an investigation. Such a transfer will only take place with the express consent of the detained person. It should also be mentioned that young persons within the meaning of the Young Offenders Act will not be subject to transfer even if they consent.

Measures are provided to ensure that the detention of the Canadian inmate in a foreign country does not imperil his or her rights with respect to any remission which would have accrued to him or her had it not been for the transfer to a foreign country. Conversely, when a foreign prisoner is transferred to Canada pursuant to a Canadian request for assistance, provisions have been made for his or her entry into Canada, his or her continued detention, and his or her return to the requested country.

Moving to the provisions with respect to the lending of exhibits, exhibits that have been admitted in evidence in a criminal proceeding in Canada would be lent to a foreign state if the court which has possession of the exhibits so orders. If a loan order is made it would be subjected to several conditions in respect of a test to be performed on the exhibits, its preservation and its return to Canada. Again, since the court has no jurisdiction over the foreign state, no loan order will be made until the court is satisfied that the foreign state has agreed to the conditions.

Besides setting out the procedures applicable to the compulsory measures of assistance, the Bill allows foreign states to apply to Canadian courts to enforce payment of fines imposed in criminal matters in those countries. It contains provisions to protect foreign records sent to Canada pursuant to a Canadian request by creating a privilege for those records until such records are made public or are admitted in evidence in compliance with the conditions on which they were sent to Canada.

The Bill also contains a consequential amendment which would authorize Canadian police officers to disclose to a foreign police force or prosecutor private communications which have been intercepted in Canada if such disclosure is intended to be in the best interests of the administration of justice.

I must underline why I have described the provisions with respect to the operation within Canada. That is for the purpose of understanding the provisions of the Bill because they are reciprocal. Accordingly, the same measures of assistance which are made available to a foreign state in the execution of search warrants, evidence gathering, lending of exhibits, and the transfer of detained persons will also be made available to Canadian authorities by the foreign state as a recognition of its treaty obligations toward Canada.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to lay more emphasis on the importance of the legislative measures I am tabling today. They will provide Canada with a legal framework whose scope will enable us to respond efficiently to the ever present and growing threats of terrorism and international drug trafficking, while at the same time giving us sufficient leeway to be in a position to implement the provisions of the Canada/United States treaty and any other similar treaty which Canada might negotiate in the future with a common law or civil right country.

[English]

I am confident that this Bill, in conjunction with mutual legal assistance treaties, will enhance the existing co-operation between Canada and other nations and is a major step forward in Canada's efforts to deal effectively with international crime.

This Bill provides the framework for important advances in law enforcement in our country. As I said at the outset, international and transnational crime is, regrettably, very much in existence. I believe this legislation is a responsible approach to questions of mutual legal assistance. We are now moving toward a legislative framework which will be available for the protection of Canadian citizens and will allow for procedures to be put in place and the scrutiny of our own courts in the case of applications by those foreign states with which we have treaties.

On the other hand, Canadians will be the beneficiaries because we know that in order to prosecute successfully serious crimes under our criminal code it becomes more and more necessary in today's society for us to acquire foreign evidence. This Bill will provide us with the framework for that inasmuch as we will not have to rely on the goodwill of foreign law enforcement agencies. Under the provisions of this Bill and the treaties which accompany it we will have the ability to obtain evidence in other countries to assist our prosecutors to prosecute successfully crimes which were committed within our territory, therefore serving the interests of justice in our country.

I have always been a great believer in having these matters spelled out in the law of the land. In that way parliamentarians can ensure that safeguards for our citizens are included. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, to Members of the House and to Canadians in general that we must take these steps nowadays in order to ensure that we in Canada have the tools available to us to attack successfully the international trafficking of drugs and organized crime which knows no boundaries but operates transnationally. We have to take these steps in order to enhance our ability to serve the Canadian public through our law enforcement agencies, by providing them with the best tools available in order to prosecute illicit and illegal activity in our country.

I ask that Members of the House give this legislation favourable consideration so that we can move forward to the committee stage and examine the provisions of the Bill, and in the final analysis be able to serve our fellow citizens by bringing forward legislation that will best serve the interest of proper law enforcement in Canada.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister made compassioned concluding remarks with a perfectly straight face. I will open in the same vein and take him out of his suspense and agony by indicating that Her Majesty's Official Opposition intends to support this Bill in principle.

We support the Bill in principle, although I refer to the Minister's straight face because I think it has to be acknowledged that this legislation is largely a public relations exercise by the Government. It results from an agreement at the Shamrock Summit to the effect that mutual assistance in police matters and criminal investigations would be undertaken between Canada and the United States.

While the treaty was signed in Quebec City, perhaps the Minister could correct me now if my understanding is wrong that the treaty has not been ratified by the American Congress and is not yet in effect in the United States. However, here we are, not only with a treaty which is in effect, because it is binding in Canada without ratification, but with legislation that is brought forward by the Government to give effect to the important measures that will improve Canada's ability to assist other countries in the war against crime.

The Minister also ought to recognize that virtually all of the measures which this Bill provides for by way of legislation are already part of the practice in our country— primarily established by judicial orders—and well known in the common law and in the civil law in every province. This Bill legislates things that are already provided for in Canadian law, although not until now provided for in Canadian statute law.

On behalf of the Official Opposition I want to indicate that we are in favour of this legislative advance in principle. We hope that the United States takes this treaty as seriously as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and ratifies the treaty as well and proceeds to introduce similar legislation. It seems that this is another one of those cases where the Americans do not take those things agreed to as seriously—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member asked me to correct him if he was wrong in his assumption. The American process is somewhat different than ours. We are in fact dealing with this matter by legislation. They do not require the same legislative route in order to ratify the treaty. Before we are in a position to properly bring about the effect of this treaty, we require legislation to be presented in the House. The Americans have indicated that they are prepared, through their own procedures, to ratify it as soon as we are in a position to move forward with the passage of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since that has been clarified, we can carry on with the Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

Mr. Kaplan: Recently the President of the United States set out his vision for his remaining term of office. I noted his remarks with interest, and the ratification of this treaty and the bringing in of legislation to give effect to it was not mentioned, nor was the Conservative Government free trade initiative. My point is that we are taking this matter seriously even if the Americans do not. Let me indicate that we approve of that.

The Minister indicated that legislation is necessary to implement the treaty. While that is true, certainly no legislation is needed to give effect to any of the types of procedures that are now going to be provided for by legislation. As the Minister knows, we already have extradition procedures and a well developed common law system by which the four types of assistance that are provided for in this legislation are already available.

I want to express my concerns, which I will enlarge upon when the measure goes to committee. I hope at that time we will be able to get satisfactory answers.

One must begin with the principle that any measures that will assist in law enforcement and in the war against crime, international crime or organized crime, are welcome and ought to be supported. Certainly we will do so. We can begin by providing for this assistance between Canada and the United States because there are no two stronger allies than Canada and the United States. However, I would remind the House that even in our relations with the United States there are crimes to which they take a different attitude than do we.

I am glad to say that the law reserves the discretion on the Canadian side to decide how far we want to go in helping the United States achieve their law enforcement objectives. We do not have the same criminal laws as the United States. We do not have the same foreign policy in every respect as they do. Our law must take account of that and therefore it does not provide for automatic assistance.

An example of this is the draft dodger situation that arises between Canada and the United States every few decades, hopefully less often in the future than in the past. At the beginning of World War II, Canadians went to the United States and were immune from being extradited back to Canada to be punished for not fighting in our war. Similarly, during the Vietnam war when Americans came to Canada to escape the draft in that country, whether or not we welcomed them, we certainly provided a haven for them from prosecution in the United States provided they met our immigration standards.

In our opinion, even the American justice system, as fine and admirable as it is, sometimes goes astray. That happened in the Peltier case, where a Canadian Indian is in the United States being punished for a crime, when in our opinion false evidence had admittedly been used to obtain his conviction. We have a different view of the situation than the Americans. We want to be certain that signing a treaty and passing a statute does not simply mean we will be delivering people to the United States to fit in with their foreign policy priorities and their criminal law system, as much as we admire them.

I think also of the FLQ incidents in which the United States is currently seeking extradition of airplane hijackers whom we know as the FLQ, 18 years after the fact. It is important in such a situation that it be our system of justice that makes a Canadian decision about whether and how far we propose to co-operate with the United States.

Finally, when considering our relations with the United States I think the issue of the death penalty must bear on the considerations of the Government about extradition to the United States. We recently decided in this Chamber that the death penalty is not an acceptable punishment for even the most serious crimes. In the United States literally hundreds of people are convicted and are awaiting execution. If requests come to us from the United States for candidates for eventual execution under the criminal justice system of the United States—and I am not saying we should automatically oppose it because I do not feel we should—I believe in those circumstances a Canadian decision will have to be made and this treaty and legislation should not be taken as a waiver of the Canadian interest in cases like that.

I examined some other circumstances involving Canada and third countries, because this legislation, while it relates to the Shamrock Summit agreement, has a wider scope. It will permit Canada to sign mutual assistance treaties with other countries in the world and provide assistance to them in law enforcement objectives. I would like to say that there are many countries with which we would have a law enforcement interest, and I am thinking about drugs, evasion of family responsibilities, escaping with children, a marriage to a person from a third country—there are many reasons why it is in the interests of Canada to have treaties with other countries. However, we must at the same time remember that in respect of many of the countries with which we would want to co-operate on police matters, in some cases, there are very good reasons to be extremely guarded.

Recently, for example, there was a request from Argentina to extradite a florist living in Canada for the murder of his wife which occurred 11 years ago. I would urge that in a case like that, where we would want a murderer to be returned to face the music for what he did, we should bear in mind that there could be a political dimension to the demand. He may well have a defence that he would not be allowed to make, or could not freely make, even in a democracy like Argentina, or in Chile, or in other countries with which we have a police interest, in many ways, but where there is such a fundamental differences in values to those in our system of government and in our definition of dissent and protest.

While we might sign a treaty, we would only do so if we could be very certain that a Canadian standard of respect for fundamental human rights and values would be part of the consideration of the government. That would have to be a consideration with respect to how far we wanted to play ball with these countries in achieving what they would characterize as a straightforward law enforcement or anti-criminal objective.

We would want to be certain, in connection with all of these treaty countries, that confidential information would not be made public and not be transferred to countries except in very circumscribed and controlled situations. When we think about it, the Government of Canada has access in its records, and in related records, by computers and so on, to the most intimate details of the private life of every person in this country; if they have had an abortion, if they have been bankrupt or failed to pay ordinary private debts, if they have had mental problems or complaints against them by neighbours, justified or unjustified. All of this information is becoming easily accessible in relation to every individual within our borders.

That pool of information, which is not even available, or should not be available, to other Canadians or other Canadian agencies, should certainly not now suddenly become available to foreign governments which might want to abuse it or which might not have the same kind of safeguards we have to ensure that the information is not used to violate the privacy of an individual for no good purpose at all.

[Translation]

In conclusion, although I may have sounded rather negative I should like to emphasize that the Official Opposition will support the Bill under consideration. Still I express our concern over the fact that the measure relates to a field of individual privacy, that it affects the property of probably just about anybody in this country; we want to make sure that the Government is very much aware of these values, that the treaty or the legislation will give us free reign to restrict the access of foreigners to our citizenship and to individuals in this country.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, again I offer our support and express our interest in seeing this piece of legislation adopted in due time. We endorse this measure.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, as already explained by the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), this Bill stems from the March 1985 treaty signed in Quebec City by Ronald Reagan and our Prime Minister at the so-called Shamrock Summit. We in the New Democratic Party know very well that a number of agreements signed and advocated during that summit are not in the interest of Canadians. For this reason, of course, we are acutely aware of our responsibility to scrutinize the treaty which has just been signed concerning the exchange of information between the United States and Canada, not only between the United States and Canada but also, as indicated in this measure, with other as yet unnamed countries. As the Hon. Member for York Centre pointed out, we want to know exactly which other countries we are talking about because, on the strength of Clause 4 of the Bill, for instance, it will be left to the Government or the Governor in Council, meaning Cabinet, to add other countries covered under this Bill. As we see it, such a decision might indeed have an impact on the civil liberties of Canadians and it must be made by Parliament, not only by the Government or Cabinet.

[English]

Recognizing that this legislation flows from the treaty which was signed in March of 1985 by Ronald Reagan, the President of the United States, and the Canadian Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), and recognizing as well the extent to which the Canadian Prime Minister, the head of the Conservative Government, has been prepared to cede fundamental aspects of Canadian sovereignty, we naturally are concerned; we are concerned about the implications of legislation which flows from that Shamrock Summit.

There is a broader question here. The Liberal justice critic has said we have some concerns about this Bill, but we like it and will support it in principle. However, when we start to examine carefully, not only the legislation itself but more importantly the history of the Government's negotiations with the United States, its failure to stand up for the interests of Canadians, then surely we must recognize the potential for serious abuse of the civil liberties, rights and privacy of Canadians which exists with respect to this legislation.

I would like to say a few words about the Government's failure to negotiate on behalf of Canadians, its failure to take effective action in dealing with the United States to protect Canadians from the laws and policies of the United States which are manifestly unjust and work to the detriment of our people here in Canada. Let me give two examples and ask why the Government of Canada and its Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) are prepared to give significant new powers to United States law enforcement officers without insisting, on behalf of Canadians, on action in other areas?

One of those areas is the provision of American legislation in the area of immigration. I refer here to the provisions of the McCarran-Walter Act. This is a United States law which was basically passed at the height of the cold war in the 1950s. It is a law which has been used to bar Canadian citizens from visiting the United States.

Who are these dangerous, subversive citizens who have been denied entry to the United States, denied even the right to pass through the United States as a result of this piece of legislation that is so reprehensible and constitutes such a denial of the civil liberties, not only of Canadians but of all others who would seek to visit the United States?

• (1200)

One of those dangerous subversives is a Canadian author named Farley Mowat. Under the provisions of the McCarran-Walter Act, this United States law which is still on the books today, Farley Mowat was told that he could not enter the United States to promote a book he had written. He wanted to board a Los Angeles-bound flight in Toronto in 1985. At that time the American authorities told him that the door was closed to him.

Why was the door closed to Farley Mowat? In 1968, in a jocular and offhand manner, Farley Mowat threatened to shoot down U.S. aircraft flying through Canadian air space.

As a result of that joke, which clearly is all it was, he was denied the right to enter the United States. In fact, this American law, and the discretionary powers under it, have been used to stifle debate by denying entry to foreigners, including Canadians, whose views do not necessarily coincide with the views of the American Government.

There was also another person, a person from Saskatchewan, who was denied entry to the United States as well under the provisions of the McCarran-Walter Act. I refer to a professor from the University of Regina School of Human Justice, a professor named Jim Harding, a good friend of the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom). He is obviously a dangerous radical and a subversive. He was denied the right to even pass through the United States en route to a United Nations conference in Costa Rica.

Why was that? Why was Professor Jim Harding turned away by U.S. immigration officials in Calgary when he wanted to board a flight for Mexico via Los Angeles? He was told that he was on a list of Canadians who were not admissible to the United States. He asked the Americans for an explanation. He asked why it was that he could not even pass through the United States en route to a conference. He was told that apparently the American authorities considered him to be a communist because in 1961 he had attended a conference on disarmament in the Soviet Union with a number of other Canadian students.

I remind Hon. Members that this incident of being refused entry to the United States occurred at the beginning of this year. Also attending that conference were people such as Lord Bertrand Russell and Jean-Paul Sartre. Because of that law which still exists in the United States Professor Jim Harding, who has a long and distinguished involvement in the peace movement, was refused the right even to pass through the United States in transit to Central America.

What did the Canadian Department of External Affairs do to stand up for the rights of this Canadian? It did not do anything at all. It said that it regretted the incident but it respects the sovereign right of the United States to decide who can come and go in that country. That type of kowtowing to legislation which is reprehensible and which denies Canadians the right to visit the United States, or even to pass through it, that type of knuckling under is clearly not acceptable to those of us in this Party. Our Government should be saying to Ronald Reagan, look, Ronnie, if you want new powers under the mutual legal assistance legislation you are going to have to do something about a law which has been on the books of your country since 1950, a law which has denied access to your country to Farley Mowat, to Professor Jim Harding, and to many other Canadians, a law which is being used and has been used to stifle political debate, a law which poses a threat to international scholarship.

We say that if the Government wants to extend new powers to the United States to engage in investigative activity in Canada then let it do some tough-minded and serious negotiation, let it tell the Americans that we do not accept this outdated and dangerous law. Let the Government tell the Americans that they owe an apology to the Canadians who have been excluded from the United States as a result of this law and that we are not prepared to co-operate with them in the manner in which they are now seeking unless they take steps to deal with this matter.

There is an opportunity for the Government to act. United States Congressman Barney Frank from Massachusetts has a Bill before the American Congress that would in fact repeal the most repugnant provisions of this legislation.

I suggest that the Government and the Prime Minister go back to the bargaining table to suggest to the President of the United States that if he wants our co-operation in this area then how about some co-operation in supporting the legislation that is before the United States Congress today to get rid of it? That is the first point. Let us have some serious negotiations here instead of just giving in to the Americans, as the Government has done on so many issues in the past, and as it is continuing to do, we fear, in the free trade negotiations.

One other example of actions which could and should have been taken by the Government in the context of negotiation of this treaty is looking at the question of one of the most serious abuses of the rights of Canadians citizens by American authorities. I am talking here about the psychic brainwashing experiments that were carried out by the CIA in the late 1950s and early 1960s. These were experiments that used Canadians as human guinea pigs, experiments in mind control that were carried out by Dr. Ewen Cameron at the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal. We know the tragic history of this particular series of events. Cameron, in researching brainwashing techniques, took advantage of men and women, primarily women. Three-quarters of his victims were women. He took advantage of people who came to him as a doctor, people who were depressed and in need of psychiatric help. Instead of helping those people he used them in his grisly mind control experiments without informing them that that is what he was doing.

This research was dreamed up at the height of the cold war in the United States. The CIA was funding this research. One of the victims of these terrible experiments was the wife of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), one of the best known victims. She was subjected to the following treatment by Dr. Ewen Cameron. She was subjected to a taped message being repeated over and over and over again which told her, "You are a bad mother. You are a bad wife". To this day, of course, she feels the effects of that type of experimentation. The coalition that has been attempting to seek justice and compensation for these people alleges that some others were not as lucky. They have committed suicide. Most cannot work. One of the victims has died. Many others are permanently scarred by these terrible experiments.

What is the Government of Canada doing to stand up on behalf of these Canadians who were the victims of these terrible experiments? The Conservative Government appointed a former Conservative Member of Parliament from Nova Scotia to conduct a study into the implications of this particular matter. But that study was nothing less than a complete whitewash. He came to the conclusion that there was no proof that anyone was damaged by the experiments. In fact, in arriving at his conclusion he did not even speak to a single victim of the experiments. He said that the Canadian Government had no responsibility toward these victims. We fundamentally disagree.

We believe that the Government of Canada should release all the information it possesses to the victims of those experiments to assist them in their lawsuit against the CIA in the United States. We are also insisting that Canada should financially assist the victims of these brainwashing experiments. For some time we have been waiting for the Government to live up to the promise it made, that at the very least it would help these people pay for their legal expenses in bringing action against the CIA.

It is thanks to the tremendous dedication, courage, and unflagging commitment of their United States attorney, Joseph Rauh, that this action is still alive before the United States courts. But the Canadians who are pursuing this action are still waiting for the Government to live up to its promise to assist them financially in pursuing their lawsuit.

I put a question to the Minister of Justice in June, and the Minister stated that he was in the process of consulting, looking at this matter, and that he hoped to be able to come forward with some concrete results in the very near future. That was four months ago, and still no action has been taken on the part of the Government.

I wish to link this to the Bill before the House at this time, and to ask the Government, whether the Prime Minister of Canada said to his good friend, Ronald Reagan, look, Ronnie, we are going to give you some new powers under the Mutual Legal Assistance Act, but your Government, and your intelligence agency, the CIA, is still refusing to recognize its responsibility to compensate the victims of experiments by the CIA in Canada during the late 1950s? Did our Prime Minister stand up for these Canadians? Did he say that if the United States wanted these new powers, it was not going to receive them unless the Americans accepted their moral, ethical, and legal responsibility to compensate these victims?

We do not know what happened at the Shamrock conference. We do know that the victims of these experiments have so far received absolutely no assistance whatsoever from the Government of Canada. Until the Government comes to grips with this serious question and recognizes its responsibility to our citizens who are the victims of these brainwashing experiments by the CIA without their consent, why should we co-operate in granting new powers to the Government of the United States?

Let us say to the American authorities, the Attorney General of the United States, and the President of the United States, if you wish these new powers it is about time that you took action to assist us. That is the type of hard-headed, tough negotiating that we believe should have been undertaken, and that we believe was not undertaken before this Act was brought forward.

It may well be that this is another little bone that is being tossed to the American Government as part of the price that we pay for free trade in Canada, together with the legislation on generic drugs, and the Minister of Communications knuckling under on the Broadcasting Act. I could go on with a litany of areas in which the Government has caved in to the Americans. We are afraid that perhaps this Bill is part of that pattern of knuckling under to United States pressure. We do not believe we should be giving in to that pressure. We certainly believe that Canada should be standing up for Canadians.

There are a number of other areas of concern with respect to this legislation. First, I wish to point out that the Liberal spokesperson indicated that the Liberal Party intends to support this Bill in principle. Once again the Liberals and the Conservatives are in bed together on a matter that fundamentally affects the rights and sovereignty of Canadians. The Liberal justice critic said that this Bill is simply implementing what is presently being done informally. Quite obviously the Liberal justice critic has not read the Bill, if that is the position that he has taken. There are at least two significant elements of this Bill which do extend the powers of the United States investigative authorities.

The new Canada-United States treaty which would come into effect as a result of this Bill would allow the collection of evidence in Canada by United States police at a far earlier stage than is presently permitted. Presently under Canadian law the United States enforcement agencies are only permitted to seek Canadian co-operation in the gathering of evidence after charges have been laid, or after a trial has begun in the United States. The Prime Minister is now saying, come on in even before charges have been laid. We will allow you to investigate, and to use all of the powers in this new Act under this new treaty at the investigation stage. That is a significant change. It is not just putting into effect something which is informally taking place now, because if it is informally taking place now Canadian laws are being broken.

Another element in which this changes the law, and not just putting into effect a law which is already utilized in practice, as the Liberal justice critic has suggested, is the extent to which currently Canadian legislation denies American police access to search warrants for wholly foreign offences which are committed in the United States. This law would also change that.

What are the types of offences we are talking about here? We do not have to go back too far to find instances of Americans being guilty of offences in the United States who came to Canada and when, fortunately, we said that we were not prepared to turn our backs on those Americans, but rather we welcomed them. They were Americans who did not want to participate in fighting an immoral war in Vietnam. They came to Canada in large numbers. In doing so, they were breaking American laws.

Under the provisions of this treaty, and particularly this legislation, the Canadian Government would be involved. The Canadian police forces and the RCMP would be involved in helping authorities in the United States bring those people before American courts. I do not believe we should be involved in that type of thing. I do not believe we should be involved in a situation in which Americans who are seeking to assist refugees fleeing from Central America should be subject to investigation by Canadian authorities working hand in hand with the FBI. I do not believe that Americans who are seeking to peacefully protest American policy in Central America, and who subsequently may come to Canada, should be subject to investigation by Canadian authorities at the instance of the American police.

Last week in a hospital in Walnut Creek, California, I visited a very courageous and dedicated young man named Brian Willson. He is a veteran of the war in Vietnam. He realizes the immorality of that war, and has dedicated his life to doing what he can to ensure that the United States does not participate in other immoral, unjust military actions. Along with a number of other American men and women, Brian Willson peacefully demonstrated outside the Concord naval weapons base, in Concord, California. They gave notice to the naval authorities that they intended to peacefully erect a banner and stand by that banner on the train tracks which were transporting weapons to Central America, which ultimately may very well have been used by the Contras in their murderous attacks on civilians in Nicaragua.

Brian Willson was run down by a naval train carrying weapons as he peacefully demonstrated. He lost both legs and fractured his skull. In engaging in that act of peaceful civil disobedience he did break American law.

I do not want Canada to be helping the United States authorities prosecute the Brian Willsons of the United States should they come to Canada. I do not want to see Canada assisting the FBI in ferreting out refugees who are fleeing from Central America and who seek sanctuary in Canada. I do not believe that Canadian law should be used in a manner that would subvert all of the finest traditions and principles of Canadian justice. I do not believe that Canadian law should be used to assist in the gathering of evidence in a manner that may indeed involve serious invasions of the privacy of Canadians.

Under this law there will be access to a wide-ranging array of information. A most important point is that this legislation does not just deal with the United States, but would allow the Canadian Government to enter into similar treaties or agreements with any other country in the world. The Government does not even have to come back to Parliament to do so. Once the Cabinet decides it wants to enter into such an agreement, it merely passes an Order in Council, and that is it.

What if this Government of Canada or a future Government decided it wanted to pass a similar agreement with say a brutal military junta similar to the one governing Chile today? Such an agreement could facilitate the very serious abuse of the rights of Chileans who have sought refuge in Canada from that bloody dictatorship. We know already that Canada's CSIS is co-operating in a shameful way with the Chilean intelligence agency, the CNI.

I do not want to be responsible for the passage of a piece of legislation that ultimately could lead to Canada co-operating with military regimes in Chile or elsewhere, co-operating with police forces against citizens who have sought refuge in this country. Fifteen Chilean are possibly subject to the death penalty as a result of certain allegations. Those trials have taken place under a system of military justice which denies all of the basic rights accorded under any sensible and decent system of justice. If one of those people were to show up in Canada, I would hope that Canada would not co-operate in the manner envisaged by this legislation in sending these people back.

This Bill is wrong in principle because of the possible dangers it poses, not just to Canadians but to people from other countries who may seek refuge in Canada and who may have committed acts recognized as offences in those jurisdictions, but by no means offences that we may want to involve ourselves with in Canada.

Obviously when we are talking about co-operation respecting offences involving organized crime, that is another question and Canada should extend its fullest possible co-operation in those areas. But this legislation, Mr. Speaker, is dangerous because it has the potential to go far, far beyond that.

Because of the reasons I have outlined, because of the failure of the Government to stand up for Canadians—and before adopting this legislation we should insist upon the Americans taking their obligations seriously concerning the victims of the CIA brainwashing experiments and the McCarran-Walter Act—and because of serious concerns about the substance of this legislation and the potential of very grave abuse of civil liberties in Canada, we in the New Democratic Party are strongly opposed to this Bill and will be opposing it in principle. The Government should go back to the drawing-board, go back to the Americans and insist on justice.

Mr. Skelly: Are there any questions or comments, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Not for the first three speakers.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Therefore, the Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has the floor on debate. Before we proceed—after the conversation is finished—perhaps I could direct the Hon. Member to Standing Order 55(2). The Hon. Member will now have 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for questions and comments. If there are any further conversations, I wish Hon. Members would have them in the lobbies. The Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I will speak to my colleagues about this massive breach of etiquette in the House of Commons. One of our colleagues from the other side of the House seems to want to speak. Undoubtedly she will speak on this Bill; we will listen breathless and spellbound to her contributions.

I would like to offer congratulations to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), who expressed some very serious concerns in a number of areas about the legislation before the House today. First, is Canada negotiating effectively with the United States in the development of the number of treaties and arrangements that we have seen come through the House? He gave examples to show that the answer is no.

In the minds of most Members of this House on all sides, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) of Canada has involved himself in a massive giveaway. To the Americans, without question and without an attempt to negotiate, have gone such things as the salmon interception treaty on the West Coast and the present legislation before us today. In the minds of most Canadians the Conservative Government and the Prime Minister are involved in a massive giveaway in an attempt to secure a free trade agreement. It is time that we as Canadians dug in and began to negotiate effectively.

This Parliament should not pass this Bill without changes. The Prime Minister should be digging in his heels with the Americans on the question of the salmon interception treaty on the West Coast. We have no effective authority over our resources in the Yukon River. That was an omission. The problem was known but we heard that it might offend the Americans and the President if we began to ask for things that belonged to us and which might jeopardize the free trade agreement.

There were the summit meetings between the Prime Minister and the United States President. Instead of dealing effectively with Canadian resources in the transboundary rivers that cross southeast Alaska flowing into the Province of British Columbia, which rivers contain large fish stock originating in Canadian waters, the Prime Minister gave those away without a thought. In addition, we have a very poor interception agreement with the United States.

At the present time Canadians are losers in this massive giveaway in the attempt to obtain a free trade agreement with the United States. The legislation presently before the House is another example of failure to negotiate effectively. We are involved in other serious matters of negotiations with the United States, and we could use this Bill and the arrangements as leverage. I am speaking of what is called the A-B line, the boundary between Canada and the United States, between southeast Alaska and British Columbia. There have been numerous provocations in that disputed area by the U.S. Coast Guard. The U.S. Coast Guard has arrested Canadian fishermen, seized their catches and hauled them into court in Ketchikan, Alaska, in a completely unjust manner. Canadian fishermen who had been fishing in areas designated on Canadian maps as being Canadian territory have been arrested by the U.S. Coast Guard, hauled into Ketchikan, Alaska, and had their catches seized. There have been a great many threats of violence against them.

If the Prime Minister of Canada were fulfilling his obligations to Canadians, he would be raising these matters with the American President and suggesting that proper processes be used by the Americans in disputes. We would be prepared to co-operate with the Americans in many areas of legitimate negotiations if in fact their behaviour in certain areas was acceptable.

As well, the Americans gave petroleum leases across the A-B line in absolute rejection of anything that would seem reasonable. Yet it seems we did not raise any kind of concern about that at the Shamrock Summit. No, indeed, the Prime Minister of Canada is quite prepared to give away points on the salmon interception treaty and quite prepared to fail to observe the kinds of infractions that are going on in the northwest corner of British Columbia over the A-B line.

We do not negotiate with the United States. The Conservative Government and the Prime Minister and, indeed, the past Liberal Government have virtually given away Canadian rights and Canadian sovereignty without raising substantial efforts at negotiation. This is the record, and I think it was shown effectively by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby, when he spoke today. He pointed out that this is a result of a treaty which is a give-away and that we as Canadians under the present Conservative Government are being badly served in our negotiations with the United States.

The legislation before the House assists in law enforcement matters. It was pointed out that this legislation is too far reaching and allows the involvement of law-enforcement procedures from a foreign country in Canada too early. The Hon. Member pointed out the problems involved with having demands for investigative action taking place in Canada before charges are laid, a new item over which there is concern.

As well, he pointed out that under the present legislation certain regimes will probably come forward since the legislation envisions a wider view of which countries can obtain these benefits in Canada. He pointed to the cases of Chile and Argentina. The Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) as well pointed out that these regimes could approach Canada and ask for law-enforcement activity within Canada targeted against individuals whose activities would not be considered criminal in Canada.

For example, there are a great many Canadians of Chilean origin, many of whom were judged to have committed crimes in that country which are not crimes in this country. They fear that regime and have been subjected to severe repression. Ultimately, the thought of our law-enforcement agencies co-operating in any way with that regime is absolutely intolerable.

As far as my colleagues and I are concerned, when this legislation goes to committee it will be given very serious scrutiny. We will look to tightening the legislation so that it is targeted at specific areas of concern. We will be very careful with any rights it allows foreign law-enforcement agencies in Canada.

There is a positive side to this legislation that I am surprised has not been discussed or has not been envisioned by the Government. Some Canadians have asked Canadian law enforcement agencies to become more involved with American law enforcement agencies in the search for missing persons, family members who have disappeared. In this case, there seems to be a great reluctance on the part of the Americans to participate effectively with Canadian authorities. It has become a matter of concern for individuals in my constituency where there is not good co-operation with American authorities in assisting in attempts to reunite family members.

In the search for missing children, law-enforcement agencies are the effective agencies. I believe this Bill could be used to encourage the United States by indicating we would certainly be prepared to assist here if we could see a much larger initiative in assistance from them.

As well, there are people who have gone to the United States to avoid family obligations imposed by Canadian courts. Assistance in solving that problem could definitely be improved by this legislation. Given the concerns in respect of those issues which exist on all sides of the House and certainly on both sides of the border, that should be looked into.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby, mentioned a matter of serious concern on which the Canadian Government should take the initiative with the American Government. The Canadian Government should suggest that the list of excluded Canadians under the McCarran-Walter Act should be re-examined. Indeed, some of the absolutely frivolous reasons for excluding Canadians from the United States should be removed. Those Canadians should have the right to go back and forth across the boundary. Many people who live in Canada have family, contacts and friends in the United States. It becomes a very serious matter when a family member is excluded. At least half of my own family are citizens of the United States.

During the Vietnam war, many people who lived in the United States were severely tested by the war and were under pressure of the draft and their absolute abhorrence of that war. Many were likely candidates to avoid the draft by coming to Canada. Those who did are now unable to visit immediate members of their families in the United States.

This legislation is of particular concern to me. I personally would like to see it made much tighter. Although it does not apply in my particular case, I can understand the concerns of other people over the McCarran-Walter Act. They are unable to visit family members or travel in the United States for the most absolutely frivolous reasons. It is a time both Governments approached this from a reasonable point of view and eliminated that list.

We as Members of the House of Commons know of a very tragic example of the failure of the Canadian Government to pressure, through the negotiation process, a quid pro quo approach to the question of the LSD experiments. We should indicate to the United States that we will move on areas that are of interest and concern to Americans if they will address the things that concern us as Canadians. This must be done.

The LSD experiments are an example of something that was intolerable. Great damage was done and compensation must be addressed. That issue should have been raised by the Prime Minister. There should have been a clear-cut agreement that that matter will be resolved and put to rest.

I believe we should pursue these issues as we consider the legislation through committee and report stages and on to third reading. Quite honestly, I think American officials should be invited to appear before the committee to tell us why these other items have not been addressed if we are expected to pass this legislation.

The timing of the legislation has been mentioned as an issue. The United States has not passed reciprocal legislation. In the case of the salmon interception agreement we had to make amendments to our legislation before the Americans would consider passing theirs. We do not know what they will do with their legislation. They may amend it or reject it outright. It would be better to have agreements which are worked out between Canada and the U.S. considered and ratified simultaneously and avoid this problem.

The matter before us today is of very serious concern. The Liberal Party appears prepared to move ahead quickly on this legislation. I know it was probably a slip of the tongue, but the Hon. Member for York Centre said he could see some problems when the Government was faced with requests for law enforcement assistance in Canada from democracies like Argentina and Chile. I was quite shocked when I heard that. It would be a simple matter for the Hon. Member to check and correct the "blues" to make sure that the word "democracy" is not associated with Chile. Perhaps we might not have heard that if the previous Liberal Government had not been so co-operative with Chile.

The failure of the previous Liberal Government to negotiate effectively with the U.S. is clearly evident when we have matters such as this before us. My colleague from Burnaby indicated that in this situation the Liberals and Conservatives were largely in bed together on their failure to negotiate effectively with the U.S. Yet it is to the credit of the previous Government that we did not see a sell-out on such a massive scale as we see with the present Government in its effort to obtain a free trade agreement. Canadians are not prepared to see that continue. If you look at the polls you can see that the record of the Government is very dismal in the eyes of Canadians. It is time to turn things around, and this legislation could be an example.

We are certainly prepared to pass acceptable legislation. That acceptability can be worked out in committee. However, there are certain irritants and even severe problems in our relationship with the U.S. which, as I said, could be dealt with in order to reach an understanding. I think that concludes my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to hear the observations of my friend from Comox—Powell River on various aspects of this Bill. He has outlined the dangers on the side of political pursuits and I would ask him to expand on that. He also was concerned about the possibility of mutual legal assistance in family matters. These of course are two different problems. I suppose the latter is not, strictly speaking, a matter of criminal law but it could have potential value in the pursuit of mutual legal assistance.

I wonder whether he could tell us something about the British Columbia experience with general criminal matters. I have a vague memory and a more recent memory of specific cases in that province where co-operation between Canada and U.S. enforcement authorities occurred. Since he has referred to some of the dangers inherent in this legislation as well as its unrealized potential, I wonder if he could offer some observations on the extent to which operations over the last few years have reassured him or otherwise about the way in which the authorities actually do operate and how they might operate under this new legislation?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the difficulties in family matters and the cases involving disappeared children is a matter of record. One parent takes the children to the U.S. and the other parent begins a search. As has been demonstrated in a number of cases, it is extremely difficult to obtain what I would call serious effort by American law enforcement agencies in the search for those individuals. I know the task at hand is very large, but so are the law enforcement agency resources, and I think the agreement between the President and the Prime Minister could have explored that particular issue much more.

How can we become more effective in recovering missing children on both sides of the border? How can we apply the strength of our law enforcement agencies and bring in other resources in support of them? When this legislation goes to committee those are items I would like to see raised. I intend to pursue the matter vigorously through our critic, or directly if I participate on the committee. It is a logical place to do it and I would hope other Members with the same experience will pursue it as well.

Another aspect of that same problem is the situation where a parent has obligations imposed by the courts for maintenance of the family and then moves to the U.S. For all intents and purposes that could be defined as criminal activity, because that person is failing to live up to an obligation imposed by the court. I think arrangements to deal with that problem should be pursued. Probably every Member of this House has had experience at one time or another with that kind of situation. It is almost futile to pursue it unless the individual involved has a large amount of money. This particular legislative mechanism would be appropriate in dealing with that problem as well. That is an item which I would like to flag for attention in committee in order that the legislation can be expanded or made more precise to include this matter.

I am not certain which incidents in British Columbia the Member speaks about, but a number come to mind in which law enforcement co-operation between the two countries has been a little too informal and may need some legislative action. The FBI in Seattle has phoned the RCMP in Vancouver asking them to pick up and drop off in Blaine one of their "nasties" who was living in Vancouver, this without benefit of a court appearance. We have experienced that a number of times. That is certainly not acceptable under our system of justice. People have a right to a day in court. The RCMP has participated in such completely unacceptable activity.

With regard to the political situation, I do not think there are many Members of this House who have not been confronted with the problem of assisting refugees from regimes such as those in El Salvador and Chile. These people often have difficulties dealing with immigration. The immigration people say that if they have a criminal record or criminal charges pending in their country of origin they cannot enter this country. It would be very difficult to check with a regime such as that in Chile to determine whether a refugee has a criminal record.

It is dead wrong to allow the Cabinet of Canada to expand the list of countries which could enjoy the powers of this legislation without reference to Parliament. We should work at every stage of this Bill to stop that. Conceivably the Soviet Union could request law enforcement action in Canada. That is not what Parliament has in mind with this legislation.

The Government has gone too far in the drafting of this Bill. If this Bill is passed at second reading, I would hope that an agreement could be made to drop that particular aspect.

Certain regimes consider activities to be criminal which bear no relation to criminal activity in Canada. These include free speech, protest and demonstration, and active involvement in trade union activities. These are rights which are worthy of guaranteeing constitutionally in a democratic country but are prohibited in regimes such as those in South Africa and Chile.

Under this legislation their law enforcement agencies could come to Canada and suggest that because an individual has committed that nature of a crime in their country they wish to enjoy the benefits of this legislation and have Canadian enforcement officials gather evidence against them and move to extradite them. This is the kind of thing that could result from the wide open, loose and sloppy drafting of this legislation.

We would have much more confidence in this legislation and the Government's application of it if we did not know that the Government is already involved with those regimes and very reluctant to criticize their most heinous and obscene actions. The Liberal Government opened trade with the regime in Chile which almost encourages its continuance. The Conservative Government has certainly done nothing to indicate that we should not expect the Chilean police forces to operate in Canada.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-58 with regard to mutual legal assistance in criminal matters between Canada and other countries. The "other countries" aspect will be the focus of my comments. My friends from Burnaby and Comox—Powell River have addressed, in particular, concerns involving Canada's relationship with the United States. That is understandable and always acceptable or forgivable depending upon one's perspective because we share the continent of North America with our powerful friends in the United States. Being a much smaller country in terms of population, we are always concerned about how Canadian interests will be defended by our Government vis-a-vis the United States.

I hardly need expand on the concerns that many Canadians have felt over the last three years as they have watched the present Government, and particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), dealing with the U.S. President. They have wondered whether Canada's interests were not being sold out in those various contexts. I will not spend any more time on that this afternoon.

We are dealing with general legislation which raises concerns, which I want to explore, involving other countries. If there is any doubt about the validity of these observations I note that in the interpretation section of the Bill, where definitions are provided, "foreign state" is defined as "a state that is a party to a treaty". Clearly that could be any state at all. Treaty means "a treaty, convention or other international agreement that is in force and to which Canada is a party, the primary purpose of which is to provide for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters". In those two definitions in the interpretation section we have obvious evidence that this Bill could be applied to any country at all.

The provisions of this Bill, if it becomes law, will be quite far-reaching. I note in the next section the following statement in the first clause:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Act and the provisions of another Act of Parliament, other than the provisions of an Act prohibiting the disclosure of information or prohibiting its disclosure except under certain conditions, the provisions of this Act prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

I recognize, of course, that disclosure of information is a large part of criminal investigation, but there are in fact many other areas upon which it could touch. In all of those other areas this is the Act that will govern.

In looking at Clause 6 of the Bill, within which are provisions for administrative arrangements, we will appreciate exactly how far-reaching this Bill is. We are told in of Clause 6(1):

> Where there is no treaty between Canada and another state, the Secretary of State for External Affairs may, with the agreement of the Minister, enter into an administrative arrangement with that other state providing for legal assistance with respect to an investigation specified therein relating to an act that, if committed in Canada, would be an indictable offence.

In Clause 6(1) we have provision for the development of special arrangements in instances of countries that do not already have a treaty negotiated with Canada. The Bill, of course, does not have attached to it in a schedule a list of countries with which Canada has a treaty. Once passed, and if proclaimed, that would obviously be appended to it for useful reference.

In Clause 6(1) authorization is being requested which would allow Canada to make arrangements with any country at all. That, of course, provides a basis for asking what the ramifications of this Bill might be, how far-reaching its powers might be, and what its consequences might be.

Shall I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it one o'clock, the Hon. Member will have 15 minutes left for debate after three o'clock, plus the 10-minute question and comment period.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

INDUSTRY

HAMILTON FIRESTONE PLANT—OFFER TO PURCHASE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Hamilton is a lucky town. It is lucky for Liberal politicians and also lucky for hockey players, as Wayne Gretzky and Mario Lemieux found out only two days ago. I can say that they will do it again tonight and will blow the Russians out of the water.

At the same time that the Canadian team is trouncing the Russians at the Copps Coliseum, I ask the Government to look also at saving jobs for 1,300 workers in the same city of Hamilton. Firestone has received an offer from Cooper Tire Company in the United States. It is clear that it is a valid, bona fide offer.

The Minister should show some leadership in this area, as the Canadian hockey team has shown leadership, and go to Akron, convince Firestone to sell, and save 1,300 jobs for Hamilton workers who deserve them. Our hockey players deserve our support, so do our Firestone workers.

MARINE SAFETY

RETENTION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS ADVOCATED

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Coast Guard is currently examining the possibility of automating some of British Columbia's lighthouses. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) has received a report recommending that ten of the 41 lighthouses in British Columbia be considered for unmanning.

I recognize the expertise of Doctor Paul Leblond who authored the report, and I realize that technological developments have lessened the need for permanent lighthouse keepers in some areas. Nevertheless, I have some very serious concerns about any proposals to automate lighthouse light stations on the West Coast.

Apart from their duties to maintain the light, its power supply and fog horn, light keepers perform a multitude of duties, including marine weather monitoring, and participation in search and rescue operations.

I am proud to say that a lighthouse keeper at Port Atkinson in my riding, Mr. Don Graham, has authored several major books documenting the role of light keepers on the West Coast.

Of equal importance to the duties performed by light keepers is the feeling of confidence that they inspire. Mariners know that behind the beacon of light there lies a capable and courageous individual who will render assistance if need be, something which no machine can do.

I therefore urge the Minister of Transport, in considering whether or not to automate light stations, to examine not only the technological factors but the very important historical and human contributions made by British Columbia's keepers of the light.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—DETENTION OF CANADIAN CITIZEN ON SUSPICION OF GUN SMUGGLING

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest violation of the human rights of a Canadian Sikh being held by the Indian police. The interrogation of Daljit Singh Sekhon by Indian anti-terrorist forces spotlights the excesses to which even sister nations of the Commonwealth sink when they fight terrorism.

The 1985 Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Preventive) Act gives police sweeping powers to detain people without charging them or bringing them to trial. Indian human rights groups have protested this Act which allows persons to be held without being charged for a year in India generally and for up to two years in the Punjab.

These groups have protested the way police interrogate persons under severe threats or worse, without any possibility of assistance from legal counsel.

I call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to intensify his efforts to protect the human rights of Mr. Sekkon. India's 1985 Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Preventive) Act is clearly tyrannical. It is as unfair to Indian citizens as it is to Canadian citizens. Defence of the rights of Canadians will enable the Canadian Government to seek repeal of this Draconian measure by the Government of India.

RAILWAYS

FATAL ACCIDENT AT SASKATOON RAIL CROSSING

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my deep concern over the death of a fellow Saskatonian which occurred as a result of a railway-vehicle collision at the Sutherland crossing at Saskatoon last week.

It is my understanding that the Canadian Transport Commission has already identified this crossing as a location for upgrading, with the federal Government sharing 80 per cent of the cost and the remainder being shared by the City of Saskatoon and the railway.

I intend to raise this issue with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) and the Canadian Transport Commission, to ensure the immediate installation of a traffic barrier for this crossing. Although we recognize that the ultimate solution lies in the construction of a grade separation, which I fully support, the implementation of traffic barriers would prohibit similar fatalities from occurring in the future.

Considering that across Canada there were 525 related accidents in 1986, I strongly believe safety procedures should be given top priority by the Canadian Transport Commission.

• (1405)

On a more personal note, I wish to take this opportunity to extend my deepest sympathy to the Carriere family.

HOUSING

THE YOUNG HOMELESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Grondin (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, a survey on homeless youths in Montreal done between January and June 1985 gives us a clear picture of the problems faced by these young people aged 18 to 30. Half of them have lived in foster homes or in institutions. Generally speaking, 80.3 per cent of these homeless youths have broken all ties with their family, and they have to cope with two major problems: alcoholism and/or drug abuse, and mental illness.

As a matter of fact, 23 per cent of cases studied have already undergone psychiatric treatment. Suicide attempts are common. Under such conditions, these young people find it hard to hang on to steady jobs.

The Governor of the State of Massachusetts stated recently: "Not only do homeless youths fall victim to violence and family problems, alcohol and drug abuse, and mental illness, but they also suffer from an economy which fails to provide economic benefits for everybody."

What is the Conservative Government waiting for before helping homeless youths during International Year of the Homeless?

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

REPORT ON EARLY PAROLE OF CONVICTED MURDERERS—TIMING OF RELEASE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, further to a story in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen, it has become apparent that a study from the National Parole Board shows that early-leave prisoners have been responsible for 130 murders in Canada in the past 12 years. The most disturbing aspect of the report is the fact that it had been completed since early this year but had not been released to Members of Parliament, nor to the public, at a time when a national debate on the whole issue of capital punishment was before this House of Commons.

Why were we as parliamentarians denied facts so important to the recent debate? I believe that Members of Parliament should have been aware of facts which detail the reality that murderers are being released to do it again.

This is in addition to a Corrections Canada study which shows an average of one murder every 50 days in prison populations of 1,000 men or less. Some murderers do not wait for parole. They repeat this heinous crime right inside the various institutions which are supposed to be reforming them.

Why did the Government release statistics showing a drop in the Canadian murder rate and fail to give equal exposure to the high rate of repeat murderers?

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

TRAGEDY OF THE HOMELESS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1987, the Canadian Council on Social Development's survey of social agencies indicated 757 homeless people in Manitoba, 728 of whom were found in Winnipeg.

There are many tragedies in the phenomena of the homeless. I want to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, three of them. First, the homeless are becoming younger and younger. A survey of the clientele of the Main Street Project Hostel in Winnipeg indicated that half the people using the hostel were between 18 and 33 years of age. Second, 57 per cent of those who sought refuge at the hostel are native Canadians. The third tragedy concerns women. The average age of homeless women is less than 35 years of age.

What does this say about Canada? Let us take the opportunity that the International Year for the Shelter of the Homeless provides in order to take a good look at our social policies, to take a good look at ourselves as a nation, and to adjust our policies to the needs of those Canadians who are in dire need of our help.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—CONDITIONS FOR ACCEPTANCE OF TREATY

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, the Canada-United States trade negotiations are now at a very crucial stage. However, Premier Peterson and Premier Pawley notwithstanding, Canadians need not fear that "the store" is about to be given away. It is worth reiterating the exact terms of the March 16 motion tabled by the Mulroney Government, namely:

> That this House supports the negotiation of a bilateral trading arrangement with the United States, as part of the Government's multilateral trade policy, while protecting our political sovereignty, social programs, agricultural marketing systems, the auto industry, and our unique cultural identity.

These are the very explicit conditions under which an agreement would be acceptable to the federal Government. It is self-evident that the conditions outlined by Premier Peterson have already been addressed by the federal Government and I would, therefore, encourage him to get fully on board and support the Government's efforts toward improved trade and, thereby, greater economic growth.

• (1410)

To conclude, let it be emphasized that these negotiations are within federal jurisdiction and are being undertaken with this nation's best interests in view. Anything less than that will simply not be acceptable.

U.S.S.R.—PLIGHT OF DISSIDENTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, today Parliament celebrates the presence in our city of Mr. Natan Shcharansky whose current freedom is a tribute to Mr. Shcharansky's enormous personal courage and determination, and a sign to all who cherish human rights that persistent international pressure such as this Parliament helped to generate in the case of Mr. Shcharansky can and does have an effect.

Mr. Shcharansky's message to Canadians, as I understand it, is that though we should be encouraged by glasnost in the Soviet Union we should not grow becalmed, that the notoriety of his release and that of others should not cause us to forget or diminish our efforts on behalf of the many others who have yet to be released, who have yet to receive the freedom that is theirs by virtue of being human, whether it be Jews who want to go to Israel, or Ukrainians, Baltic peoples, or others who want more political freedom. I am sure that I speak for all parliamentarians when I call on the Soviet Union to redress this moral flaw in the life of their country and heed the prophetic message of old to "set the captives free".

VISIT OF SOVIET DISSIDENT TO OTTAWA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for Soviet Jewry, I would like to welcome officially Natan, or as we know him Anatoly, Shcharansky to the nation's capital and to the House of Commons.

Mr. Shcharansky, a leading activist in the Soviet Union, was arrested in 1977 and convicted of treason, espionage and anti-Soviet activities, and sentenced to 13 years in prison. From the start his wife Avital began a lonely world-wide vigil to tell the true story of the injustice which had been committed by the U.S.S.R. Canada was the first country in the world to recognize the plight of Anatoly Shcharansky and to speak out against the Soviet Union for its human rights violations.

The release of Shcharansky on February 11, 1986, marked the end of a nine-year, world-wide campaign to secure his release. None of us can imagine the pain, anguish and loneliness which Anatoly endured during his incarceration. Two lengthy hunger strikes may have compromised his long-term health. But Shcharansky, who had become a symbol of the fight for human rights, never gave up hope. Mr. Shcharansky's journey to freedom continues to give hope to the many thousands of refuseniks and prisoners of conscience who are still being denied their basic human rights.

I believe we should withhold any premature widespread condemnation or applause for Gorbachev's new policy of openness, or glasnost, even though we welcome the recent release of several prominent refuseniks.

I want to advise Mr. Shcharansky that he can count on Canadian parliamentarians, together with Canadians throughout the country, to continue the battle for human rights in the Soviet Union.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

INTEREST RATE INCREASE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) raised the long-term lending rate for Farm Credit Corporation loans for the second time this summer to 12.25 per cent. At a time when the inflation rate in our country is only 4 per cent this means that the real rate of interest for farm loans is over 8 per cent, one of the highest rates in history.

Last week a confidential report of the Farm Credit Corporation revealed that over 11,500 farm mortgages, involving $1.5 billion, are in serious financial difficulty, cash flow problems, or subject to foreclosure.

The move to raise FCC interest rates at a time when thousands of farm families are facing the loss of their farms is a cruel and mean-minded act by the Minister of Agriculture. I call on the Government to take action and to put the Farm Credit Corporation on a sound financial footing so that it can help farm families stay on the land.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

REPORT ON PAROLE OF CONVICTED MURDERERS

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, more than 100 killings over the past 12 years were committed by inmates released from prisons on parole or mandatory supervision, a National Parole Board study has found. Between 1975 and 1976 there were 473 releases on parole of convicted murderers. There were 457 actual murderers paroled but, believe it or not, 15 were released twice or three times.

In the same 12 years, 130 inmates released on mandatory supervision or parole were returned to prison before the end of their supervision for killing again—90 for murder and 40 for manslaughter. It is hard to believe that we could be so lax in carrying out justice in our country for those taking another person's life.

It is high time that a life sentence of 25 years meant just that, not 10 or 15 years if a person qualifies with good behaviour for parole. Again I say that it is time to focus on the protection and rights of the public at large rather than the rights of those who would indiscriminately take an innocent person's life.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION FUND

CRITERIA APPLICABLE TO PROJECTS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my comments to the Government concerning the Western Diversification Fund, and the desperate need of single-industry communities in western Canada, particularly in British Columbia, to receive fair consideration under this program, and not only the major cities.

The Western Diversification Fund managers should not only use the budget of $1.2 billion to enhance programs in western Canada, but they must also use their influence with other federal Departments to have them pay greater attention to western Canada and to single-industry communities. They must encourage those Departments to remove discriminatory and harmful criteria such as cost recovery to the federal Government, in considering major projects. Many of those communities may not be able to pay the cost recovery but they need federal infrastructure to draw down additional business in the diversification process.

I would point to communities such as Tahsis, which needs a road to offset the negative effects of a sawmill shut-down; Port Hardy which needs a federal wharf to offset the massive impact of the closure of a mine; Bella Bella, a native community, which needs a roll-off, roll-on ferry loading facility to cut an enormous cost of living in that community.

This fund, and the influence of the managers, can do a great service to western Canada, and to single-industry communities. Hopefully the Minister and the Government will recognize that and act.

NATURAL RESOURCES

AGREEMENT ON USE OF NECHAKO RIVER WATER

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Vancouver the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) announced a three-party, out-of-court settlement to the protracted legal dispute over Alcan Aluminum Limited's use of water flows from the Nechako River in north central British Columbia.

It is gratifying to note that the Minister, the Province of British Columbia and Alcan, were able to reach this agreement which is an intelligent and environmentally responsive solution to a long-standing, counter-productive legal dispute. This settlement will result in the conservation and protection of the fish stocks of the Nechako water systems, while ensuring that Alcan will be able to proceed with the hydroelectric development.

The adjacent Nanika-Morice river systems which feed the Skeena River will be saved in perpetuity from future damming and diversion by Alcan.

Once again this shows that when both senior levels of government and industry together with our fishery scientists put their heads together to work through a problem, we do not have to subject ourselves to a long legal struggle and court battles.

My congratulations to all of the parties involved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO UNITED STATES SENATOR

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, we all know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is a close friend of the United States President, Ronald Reagan, and other Republicans in high places.

Today I have a copy of a newspaper article in hand from The Press Democrat Empire News—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member may wish to refer to some words in an article, but I ask that he not wave the newspaper around.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to read an article from the newspaper which is very embarrassing to the Tories who are grunting across the way. The article is entitled, "Sen. Wilson lambastes Canada", and in part it states:

> Wilson, the author of legislation attacking what he sees as overseas trade barriers, said "the next market we've really got to crack is the Canadians'. They are turning from being good neighbours to being absolute bastards."

On behalf of all Canadians I demand an apology from that United States Senator. I think that the Prime Minister should issue a letter of protest to President Reagan, and demand an apology on behalf of all Canadians for that insult to every single Canadian citizen.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—AUTO PACT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, for the past two and a half years when we in the House have directed questions to the Prime Minister or members of his Government asking whether the Auto Pact was on the table in the free trade negotiations with the United States, we have been improperly accused by the Prime Minister and his Ministers, and I use some of the words, of "cheap shots, insults, sniping, scare tactics, fear mongering, continual harping, and scurrilous comments".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1420)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Time and again the Government has said, Mr. Speaker, and I quote from Hansard: "The Auto Pact is not on the table".

Some Hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): "The Auto Pact is not on the table".

Some Hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): "The Auto Pact is not on the table".

Some Hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): "The Auto Pact is not on the table".

Some Hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Now we learn, Mr. Speaker, no thanks to the Prime Minister, that the Auto Pact is on the table.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): When will the Prime Minister tell Canadians why it is that he has been misleading this House and Canadians for the last two and a half years, or has he been incredibly naive throughout these negotiations?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it very clear to this House that the Auto Pact is not on the table. I can also assure the House that we have seen no proposals from the Americans.

I can only repeat what we have said many, many times in this House. The latest example would be June 22 when I told the House that Canada does not intend to put the Auto Pact on the table. We believe, as I have told the House, that it is working well. If the Americans wish to make any proposals, which they have not yet done, to increase employment, increase production and increase investment in Canada, we will look at them. That was the position then, and that is the position today.

REQUEST THAT CANADA WITHDRAW FROM NEGOTIATIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a Canadian Press story confirms—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Confirms?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —"U.S. negotiators have given official notice that they intend to discuss automotive issues in the free trade talks with the United States, a federal official confirmed today". That was confirmed by several of the Premiers last night and again this morning on television.

Let me say to the Prime Minister that the Americans have outnegotiated us during the course of these negotiations, on almost everything. We have given away an energy policy; we have given away a foreign investment review policy; we have given away book publishing, we have given away drug prices—

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the National Energy Program?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —we have given away softwood lumber, we have given away potash—

Mr. Mazankowski: And what about the NEP?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —and now we are going to give away the Auto Pact. In return the Prime Minister and his Minister haven't got a single thing for Canada throughout the course of these negotiations.

Will the Prime Minister tell Canadians that he is prepared to walk away from these negotiations if the United States refuses to take the Auto Pact off the table and refuses to take it away as a matter of discussion in these free trade negotiations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend began by saying that the Auto Pact was on the table. Then he issued as a justification for his statement a CP story which said that "automotive issues" will be discussed.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Well?

Mr. Mulroney: My right hon. friend says "Well". There is a world of difference between the two. The fact of the matter is that my right hon. friend has just contradicted his first question. The Americans indicated on Friday night that they intended to submit for our considerations views on automotive issues.

An Hon. Member: Such as?

Mr. Mulroney: As the Minister has indicated, if those issues result in advantages to Canada, if they result in greater employment in Canada, greater opportunities for Canada, we will take a look at them. That is the objective of the exercise. There is nothing at all that has been said or done at the table that is inconsistent with the views expressed by the Minister or myself on behalf of the Government.

A comprehensive trade agreement is one that we are seeking in the national interests of Canada. If it creates jobs, brings greater employment to our regions, a greater sense of fairness, new prosperity, as an instrument then we will bring it forward for consideration. If it does not, as I have said from the beginning, there will be no deal. We believe that we should pursue, seek to pursue and continue to pursue an instrument that possibly, possibly, could bring greater prosperity to Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S STATEMENT—FUTURE OF AUTO WORKERS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister neglected to use the opportunity given to him in the House to deny that the Auto Pact was on the table. Several of the Premiers have indicated quite strongly that that was the communication they received during their meeting with the Prime Minister yesterday.

[Translation]

Although on June 23 the Minister of International Trade stated, to quote her own terms: "The Auto Pact is not on the table", today the Government is vague—to put it mildly—on that matter. Does that mean that the workers employed in the automobile industry should have to face the same situation as those employed in the lumber industry or in the potash industry?

• (1425)

[English]

Does that mean that our automobile workers will have the same fate awaiting them as the lumber workers and fishermen had, and as those in the potash industry have already endured?

[Translation]

Is the Prime Minister so desperately bent on reaching an agreement with the United States that he will trade off anything to reach that goal?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is difficult reasoning to follow when the OECD has just announced that Canada has the strongest, most powerful growing economy in the western industrialized world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It is even stranger when one considers that in excess of 900,000 new jobs have been created in the less than three years since this Government was sworn in and that 417,000 of them have been created in Ontario, largely as a part of this Government's strong support for the Auto Pact and our defence of the automotive industry.

In terms of employment prospects, my right hon. friend may want to give me some information if he has some. I can only refer to the objective data that are available. For example, if a free trade arrangement is secured and if it is brought forward, the Economic Council of Canada says that it could mean in excess of 350,000 new jobs in Canada, and many of those tens of thousands of jobs will be in regions such as Newfoundland, the interior of British Columbia, the Prairies and northern Quebec, where jobs are desperately required. Unemployment is now down to 5.8 per cent in Ontario and we hope that that kind of prosperity can be shared across the country.

DISCUSSION OF AUTOMOTIVE ISSUES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. A Canadian Press dispatch reports as follows:

> U.S. negotiators have given official notice they intend to discuss automotive issues in free trade talks with Canada, a federal official confirmed today.
> Tim Ralfe, spokesman for Trade Minister Pat Carney, said the U.S. negotiating team raised the issue Friday night as two days of talks with Canadian officials ended in Washington.

How can the United States discuss automotive issues with Canada without at the same time discussing, directly or indirectly, the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact? Surely there is no way to discuss auto issues between our two countries without the Auto Pact coming up. Why does the Prime Minister not admit this and say now that he will insist that the Auto Pact not come onto the table, directly or indirectly? Why does the Prime Minister not take a stand now for Canada and Canadian workers?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has just confirmed the contradictions and the confusion in his own Party. I can simply repeat what we have said before. There are no proposals on the table. We do not know what the Americans are proposing to put on the table. We have said repeatedly that we are not prepared to put any proposals on the table. If the Americans do put proposals on the table, we will look at them and, if they are in the national interest and are good for Canada, we will consider them.

The Hon. Member should be the one person in this House who knows that according to the Auto Pact, "at any time at the request of either Government, the two Governments shall consult"—and I am reading from the text—"with respect to any matter relating to this agreement". They are free to bring this forward at any time.

• (1430)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister not just admitted that what the Americans did Friday night was to give notice they want to discuss the Auto Pact? Does she not stand condemned out of her own mouth—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): —in saying that the Americans are ready to discuss the Auto Pact and the Government is ready to sit down with them for that purpose?

I want to ask the Minister specifically why it was necessary for the Americans to give notice Friday night that they wanted to discuss automotive issues if this was simply part of an ongoing discussion. Let the Minister now admit that there is a new and disastrous turn to the discussions—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You are a joke, Herb.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): —and if the Government is not going to take a stand against that turn, it will be irreparably harmful to the Canadian economy and Canadian workers.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker.

POSITION OF UNITED STATES NEGOTIATORS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, someone noticed, and probably Bill Jarvis will remark, that I have taken a significant step to the left, but I—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: My question is directed to the Prime Minister. I want to say at the outset—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why not move down a few more seats?

Mr. Broadbent: I want to say—

Mr. Fennell: Lloyd is not here today.

Mr. Broadbent: —that he has observed the Ontario economy has been doing well. The reason is we have had in place since 1965—

Some Hon. Members: Free trade!

Mr. Broadbent: —an automotive agreement. It is not a free trade agreement. It required investment in Canada and we do not want to put an end to it.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You were against it then.

Mr. Broadbent: It seems pretty clear that most of the Premiers came out of the meeting yesterday concerned that the Government was heading for a desperate deal rather than a good deal with the U.S.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Name one.

Mr. Broadbent: The Americans are boasting—

Mr. McDermid: Who said that, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: —that they have four concessions from the Canadians so far, including—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Americans are boasting they got four major concessions, including slashing Canadian tariffs, opening new sectors of the Canadian economy to U.S. investment, changes in our drug patent legislation, and changes in investment as it affects services, during the discussions on a free trade initiative with Canada. They have made all these significant gains in the discussions. Could the Prime Minister assure Canadians that he is not heading for a desperate deal by giving us a similar list of gains Canada made in those discussions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the significant gains will be submitted to the House at the conclusion of the negotiations. If the transaction, a very important commercial transaction, is deemed to be in the national interest by the Government of Canada, it will be brought forward for consideration, as it should be.

Oftentimes opinions change. For example, when the federal Government went in 22 years ago to unilaterally, without consultation with the Province of Ontario, negotiate the Auto Pact, that was denounced by many members of the NDP as being inimical to the interests of Ontario. It turned out to be the greatest bonanza Ontario and Canada have ever seen. The Hon. Member may want to wait to see the final text because a few years from now he will probably be saluting me as one of the finest Prime Ministers negotiating—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Even Maz is laughing.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, all I would say to the Prime Minister is: Sir, don't hold your breath.

Mr. Nystrom: Even Joe laughed.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Joe wants him to hold his breath.

Mr. Lewis: You did better in the other seat, Ed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it is appropriate for the Chair to note that some of the Members who have not been recognized but who insist on exchanging views with others are on lists I have here to ask questions later on.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONCESSIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister himself stated yesterday that the Americans had not addressed Canadian concerns. Can he explain to the people of Canada why the Canadian Government has made all the concessions, while the Americans have not made any?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, that is a totally erroneous statement by the New Democratic Leader. In fact, we will be in a position to make a value judgement on the contents of the documents only after the negotiations are completed. I already made a formal commitment that if the document were to be consistent with our national interest, the Government of course would submit it to the Canadian Parliament. Three weeks before the deadline is not the time to state whether it is good or not. While referring to the First Ministers, the New Democratic Leader said——that they were desperate coming out of the meeting. That is very far removed from the truth. We had very good and careful discussions with the First Ministers.

On something of compelling national interest, the conduct of this Government in negotiating a complex free trade deal with the U.S., trying to create jobs and bring greater prosperity to Canada, and doing it in consultation with the provinces, is a far cry from some years ago when a predecessor Government went in and unilaterally imposed that kind of decision without so much as a by-your-leave from the Government and people of Ontario.

Mr. Tobin: You just said it was a good deal.

Mr. Mulroney: Indeed, it was a good deal. It is the philosophy of free trade in automotive products that we are trying to spread across the country to engender wealth throughout the regions of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, our notion of trade certainly does not include the notion that Canada is up for sale. That is the deal the Prime Minister is making.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Government has already made concessions in pulp and paper, tubular steel, pharmaceutical products, publishing and, in the last 48 hours, in agricultural programs and the Auto Pact. The Prime Minister cannot name a single concession the Americans have made. Therefore, can he explain to the people of Canada why we should accept his word that he is winning these negotiations with the Americans?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would just remind my hon. friend that on behalf of the Government the Minister for International Trade offered to take the Leader of the NDP into her full confidence regarding the details of the trade negotiations.

Mr. McDermid: After it was requested.

Mr. Mulroney: After a request by a member of his own Party. We thought that was a mature and sensible way to proceed.

Mr. Broadbent: To shut us up.

Mr. Mulroney: No, so you would have all the information on a confidential basis in support of the Canadian negotiators.

My hon. friend throws off quite easily scare tactics and shibboleths, for example: "Canada is not for sale", the implication being, of course, that Canada is opposed to foreign investment. The Hon. Member is opposed to foreign investment in Canada unless it is in Oshawa, in which case he is very much in favour of it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind Hon. Members that on March 26, 1982, and again on November 4, 1982, the Canadian House of Commons resolved unanimously to call on the Soviet Union to immediately grant the release from detention of Anatoly Shcharansky pursuant to the terms of the Helsinki Accord.

It is therefore my pleasure to draw all Hon. Members' attention to the presence in the Speaker's Gallery of Mr. Anatoly Shcharansky.

REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the conduct of the Solicitor General. He knows that Canadians are fast losing confidence in the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and it is all because of the negligence of the Solicitor General. Yesterday in the House the Solicitor General said that there are some minor problems in the Security Service and that they are being dealt with.

The Solicitor General made those comments in light of the departure last week of Ted Finn, the Director, in light of the departure of four of the five directors, in light of false affidavits, in light of jurisdictional battles between the Security Service and the RCMP, in light of low morale, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

Will the Prime Minister not immediately seek the resignation of the Solicitor General for conduct unbecoming a Solicitor General of Canada and for his gross negligence in the handling of the Air India investigation?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be an allegation of some negligence in the handling of the Air India investigation. I am not aware of such negligence. If he has some evidence to support that rather startling statement I wish he would supply it to me and I will undertake an immediate investigation in that regard.

PREPARATION OF FALSE AFFIDAVIT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General knows that the Liberal Party has asked for a Royal commission inquiry on seven separate occasions over the last 12 months because of some very serious allegations regarding the conduct of the Security Intelligence Service. He knows that the Review Committee has also expressed serious concerns about intelligence gathering with regard to that particular investigation.

We now know that the Security Intelligence Service—

Mr. Speaker: I ask the Hon. Member to put his question.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister indicate to the House why a false affidavit was sworn by Mr. Archie Barr and why the Minister's predecessor, the present Minister of National Revenue, endorsed a particular application for a search warrant? Can he indicate whether the previous Solicitor General was aware that the affidavit was false?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Wiggle and slide.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to know what question to answer. The Member began by asking about the Air India investigation. The Member talks about serious allegations. If he has such allegations I ask him to please make them in this House. I would also like to hear him make them outside the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

FREE TRADE—AGRICULTURE—STABILIZATION PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Premier Devine has indicated that the United States had requested that in the area of agriculture, a free trade agreement should abolish the stabilization programs that are so important to our farmers. I would like a specific answer from the Prime Minister. Can he promise that those programs will not be included in that agreement, despite the requests by the Americans?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that if we are successful in concluding this agreement with the U.S. it will be the largest trade agreement in history. It will be of major significance. In assessing that agreement the Prime Minister has regularly told the House, as have I and other Ministers, that if it is not in the interests of Canada, if it is not good for the country, there will be no deal.

The scare tactics which the NDP is engaged in will be seen by Canadians for what they are, attempts to scuttle a deal which is good for Canada by an Opposition which is flatly against it.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is not a humble man.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Not like the rest of us.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member, having made that assertion, could put his question very succinctly.

Mr. Langdon: I agree, Mr. Speaker, that it might be argumentative.

In view of this, would the Prime Minister be prepared to look at the list of concessions which we have lost in these negotiations and take this opportunity to boast a little to the Canadian people and tell us of one concession which the Canadian people have managed to get from the Americans through this negotiation process?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say in all humility—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: —and that is difficult—to my hon. friend that, as he knows and as the Minister for International Trade has indicated, we are trying to negotiate a complex and challenging document which could have very beneficial effects for Canadians.

As my hon. friend knows, one of the serious problems in Canada is a tremendous concentration of prosperity in some of the central provinces with that degree of prosperity not being equally shared in the regions from Newfoundland to British Columbia. One of the ways to diminish this disparity and provide for greater prosperity in the regions is to provide for greater trade in and to attract greater investment to the regions.

All of the studies so far have indicated that there would be a tremendously beneficial effect upon employment across Canada if we were able to conclude this kind of an agreement. Surely my hon. friend will not reproach the Government of Canada for having the vision and courage to engage in an important international negotiation which may very well bring much needed prosperity, growth, opportunity and equality to the regions of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RELATIONSHIP WITH ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General is responsible for two agencies which share responsibility for national security. If the Minister wants allegations, I allege that the relationship has failed. The RCMP is withholding police information, files, and CPIC access from the security agency and the security agency has been withholding intelligence about a major security matter from the RCMP.

In light of this failed relationship which is responsible for a total deterioration of national security, how can he not do the honourable thing and resign?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of what is behind the allegations the Hon. Member has made. If he would be good enough to provide that to me I would be more than happy to look into it.

With regard to the relationship between the RCMP and CSIS, I can advise the Hon. Member that one of the first things I attended to upon becoming Solicitor General was to call both parties in and discuss the problem of their relationship. We installed new programs and procedures. We have liaison officers appointed now in each service. We have a major liaison committee which oversees their activities. I am happy to advise him that today there is a good and complete sharing of information between the two agencies.

MINISTER'S ANSWER

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. This is the first occasion of a Minister in trouble where the Prime Minister has not rushed to his feet to defend the Minister. I invite him to do so in this case. Is he satisfied with the answer that the Minister has just given, that there are no problems in the relationship between the RCMP and the security service?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has complete confidence in me to be able to answer such a scurrilous question.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Etobicoke North.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. Today I gave the Minister notice of questions I intend to place on the Order Paper related to the possible conflict of interest at the senior management level of the CBC.

In light of the delays which might result in obtaining answers, and the very serious nature of this, will the Minister take action now to initiate an immediate investigation?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Hon. Member has said he is submitting questions for the Order Paper. I want to assure him and you, Mr. Speaker, that I will look at those questions as soon as I receive them and provide whatever answers are possible.

Mr. Pennock: Supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Burnaby.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF WARRANTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. He will know that, according to the Security Intelligence Review Committee, it is the Solicitor General's personal responsibility to ensure the accuracy of information contained in affidavits which are used for warrants.

In view of the obvious failure of his predecessor to exercise his responsibilities to review these assertions carefully, will he undertake to the House and the people of Canada that he will review all of the warrants which were issued under the tenure of his predecessor, to ensure that they were not similarly the subject of lies, of reliance on unreliable informants? Will he not accept that there is a very serious risk that the civil liberties of Canadians have been violated because of the derogation of responsibility by his predecessor?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the Hon. Member's question that there was any derogation on the part of the former Solicitor General in question, or indeed any Solicitor General.

The Hon. Member knows full well that the Solicitor General's role under the Act is to ensure that the request for a warrant meets the test of Section 12 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act and is strictly necessary for the security of Canada. I am quite satisfied from my investigation that all former Solicitors General indeed met that test of their responsibility.

However, with respect to the veracity of the facts contained in the affidavit, as I advised the Hon. Member in this House the other day, I have ordered a complete audit of all warrants to ensure that no other inaccuracies exist.

ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF CNTU BY DOUBLE AGENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is facing a crisis and that this Minister is incompetent and should resign.

Last Friday, the Crown Attorney in the Marc Boivin case openly confirmed that Mr. Boivin was a double agent infiltrated into the CNTU and paid by the CSIS.

My question is this: How can this Minister explain that infiltration of the Quebec labour movement by the CSIS, an infiltration that recalls the worst days of RCMP abuse in Quebec in the past? How can he justify that infiltration?

[English]

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have answered similar questions from the Hon. Member on other occasions. All I can do is repeat what I said on previous occasions. Mr. Boivin himself has admitted that he was a source. He was never an agent of CSIS. We do not have the authority under the CSIS Act to target a labour union. We never have and we never will. If he has evidence to that effect, I would ask him to please put forward the facts on which that allegation is made.

MATANE PAPERMILL—JOB CREATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-Des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and the Minister of State for Science and Technology, I shall address my question to the Prime Minister.

My question concerns regional development in the Gaspe Peninsula and the North Shore region. The Journal de Montréal had an article some time ago saying that the federal Government was dragging its feet about the Matane project. There was also an article quoting the comments of the Conservative Member for Matane who had reportedly stated that this issue had become essentially political. He invited his Government to respect the commitments made to the population of Matapedia—Matane.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to keep this commitment, as requested by the Conservative Member of Parliament for this constituency, and when his Government will make an announcement about providing assistance for a paper mill in the Matane region, which would create 300 jobs.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Matane project is now being considered. It is an important project as it involves job creation in a region which greatly needs more jobs. I presume that there will be an announcement in due time by both Governments and by the private sector.

In view of the situation in Quebec, the important thing would be for the Quebec leader of the Liberal Party to tell us exactly his position on Bill C-22, which would create 1,300 new jobs in the Montreal region. At this very moment, the non-elected Liberal sernators are strangling economic development in Greater Montreal, and I invite the Hon. Member to take a position for the Quebec population and to say no to the Liberal Senate.

MINERAL EXPLORATION IN SCHEFFERVILLE AND SEPT-ÎLES REGIONS—FLOW-THROUGH SHARES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague is pointing out, this is not of much help to the Matane workers who are trying to find a job. My question is not about pharmaceutical products. If the Prime Minister wants to know my position on that issue, he just has to read Hansard as I have already spoken about it.

Mr. Speaker, the Matane project is important, but unemployment has reached 25 percent in Sept-Îles. I was there a few days ago. Houses are boarded up and unemployment is over 25 percent. This is what I want to ask the Prime Minister. Could he sit down with his Minister of Finance to consider giving the North Shore region, as in the case of the Abitibi, the possibility of using flow-through shares to promote mining development in the Schefferville and Sept-Îles regions and to stimulate the economy of a region whose unemployment rate is totally unacceptable even though the population has gone down from 40,000 to 25,000?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that the Hon. Member, who is Leader of the Liberal Party for Quebec, is now saying that he would like the Liberal Senate to give approval to this legislation so that we may create 1,300 jobs in the Montreal region?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Right Hon. Prime Minister, but both the question and, as a consequence perhaps, the answer, are getting very argumentative.

NATURAL RESOURCES

MANAGEMENT OF NECHAKO RIVER FLOW—NATIVE REPRESENTATION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. While opposing in principle the private ownership and control of rivers anywhere in Canada, I, as many others, would like to congratulate the Minister for saving in perpetuity the Nanika-Morice river systems in their natural state.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fulton: In the face of the profound historic sensitivity and interest in the effects of the Alcan hydroelectric project on the Nechako and Fraser systems, why has the Minister chosen not to involve or appoint even one northern or native representative to participate directly in the flow management of the Nechako?

• (1500)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Skeena, my thanks for the compliment he has paid in having reached what I think is a landmark settlement of a difficult problem which will permit development to proceed in northwestern British Columbia while at the same time ensuring that the fish stocks are conserved, maintained and enhanced in the future. I thank him for that.

I also want to compliment the Hon. Member in his new capacity as spokesman for the energy industry on behalf of the New Democratic Party. It is going to make for some pretty interesting debates in the House.

In the process of consultation, which led up to the conclusion of this agreement yesterday in Vancouver, we have had many hours of discussion with affected groups in northern British Columbia, in the Hon. Member's own constituency, and that dialogue will continue, as it is continuing today as my colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology, travels to meet many of these groups to ensure that they know of our invitation to become fully involved in the plan to implement measures to preserve and enhance fish values. That involvement will continue unobstructed into the long term future.

HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT BENEFITS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. Since Alcan did not deliver on the vague promises it made some 37 years ago in 1950, I would like to ask the Minister why he failed to include in the agreement any terms of reference for Alcan's new hydro project to ensure that the substantial benefits of the development accrue to those northern communities and groups which are affected by this development.

Mr. St. Germain: They will. Come on, Jim, you know they will.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I think the question has been answered from the rear here.

As the Vice-President of Alcan for British Columbia conceded yesterday, much has changed in 37 years. I am convinced of the commitment of Alcan and the Government of British Columbia, and all parties to this agreement, and of their willingness to live up to the spirit of our fish habitat policy in the agreement they signed yesterday to ensure that benefits flow to the native communities and to all the communities in that important part of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: This is the last question of Question Period. The Hon. Member for Algoma.

Point of Order—Mr. Riis

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—DOMESTIC PRICE OF WHEAT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Last night the provincial Premiers indicated a great deal of pessimism about progress in the free trade talks with the United States concerning agricultural programs and indicated that different formulas are being considered to get an agreement. What assurance can the Minister give that the Canadian Wheat Board and Canada's right to set the domestic price of wheat will not be bartered away in the free trade negotiations?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, these negotiations are in their most critical and sensitive stage. The negotiators are meeting all the time and Cabinet is meeting all the time on this issue. It would not be in the national interest to give specific positions at any given time on any given issue. That would hurt and harm the national interest in the negotiations.

I can only assure the Hon. Member by repeating what the Prime Minister has said on many occasions. It has to be a good deal for all of Canada. It has got to benefit all of Canada. It has got to meet our objectives. I am sure the Hon. Member can be reassured by that viewpoint.

Mr. Speaker: The final question.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, since these various scenarios are being considered by the Government, I wonder what it might trade off to get a deal, since that is being proposed by the Government? Can the Minister make it clear that agricultural programs, our supply management system, marketing boards and support programs will not be bartered away in the final hours of the negotiations a couple of weeks from this Sunday evening, or whenever that occurs?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there are no such scenarios. There are no such trade-offs.

Mr. Foster: Premier Bourassa says there are.

Miss Carney: There is no agreement until there is an agreement. So the suggestion that there are trade-offs is simply not true. We have been explicit in this House on our position on these issues of marketing boards. Once again I refer the Hon. Member to the debate which took place in this House on March 16 and the motion we introduced which states:

> That this House supports the negotiation of a bilateral trading arrangement with the United States, as part of the Government's multilateral trade policy, while protecting our policy sovereignty, social programs, agricultural marketing systems, the auto industry, and our unique cultural identity.

Those are the goals of the free trade agreement. Those are the goals we must achieve if there is to be a free trade agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the ruling which it is my obligation to bring to the House, I want to indicate to the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. Harris) that occasionally a Speaker perhaps does depart from the list. I know the Hon. Member will understand that. I am sure that tomorrow or at another time, I will endeavour—in fact, I will make a commitment—he will be recognized. I know he will understand.

POINT OF ORDER

COMPLIANCE WITH S. O. 13(2)—EXTENSION OF BELLS—MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On September 1, 1987, the Hon. Member for Kamploops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) raised a point of order relating to the circumstances surrounding the taking of a deferred division at six o'clock p.m. on August 31, specifically his concern that the bells had rung for longer than the 15 minute period provided for under the terms of Standing Order 13(5) under which the division was being taken. He spoke of the disruption to "orderly business" when Members expecting a division at a given time were made to wait beyond the appointed hour.

The Chair welcomes the Hon. Member's timely intervention on this important matter and wishes to thank other Hon. Members who offered their views on the same point.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques referred to the provisions of the Standing Order which specifically states that the bells must be rung for 15 minutes at the most. He also mentioned the time-honoured tradition of the Whips' simultaneous entrance into the House to indicate that Hon. Members are ready to vote.

[English]

The Hon. Minister of State for the Treasury Board (Mr. Lewis) pointed out that "this is one of the rules of the House which works both ways at various times", and that this flexibility was not, in his view, being abused by the Opposition Parties, or by the Government.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) referred to the informal agreement which governs the Whips' entrance.

[English]

The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) reminded the House of the extensive scrutiny which the special committee on reform of the House had given to division bells.

[Translation]

The Chair thanks all Hon. Members for their contribution to this question.

[English]

The concept of divisions lies at the very heart of the work of any deliberative assembly. Here in this place, the process whereby the House decides the questions before it has, at various times, been the focus of considerable attention by Hon. Members. Our procedure is, of course, laid down in the Standing Orders, but this codification is mitigated by the practice which has grown up over time. Thus, there is the time-honoured convention whereby the entrance of the Government and Opposition Whips to the Chamber signals to the Chair they are ready for the division to be taken.

This convention is nowhere codified, but it is regularly invoked, and its judicious use provides a practical mechanism for taking into account unexpected circumstances affecting one side or another and for allowing ad hoc arrangements to be made by the Whips in coping with these exigencies. The sort of accommodation this tradition permits represents the best traditions of this place in extending courtesies from one Party to another. There is always, however, the danger that in so doing we stray too far beyond the parameters of the rules. This is clearly what happened on August 31 where a 15-minute bell rang for 30 minutes before the Whips entered and the division was called.

A review of the recorded divisions in the second session of this Parliament provides a revealing and, I believe, reassuring glimpse of our current practice. Of 148 designated division bells—that is, bells to be rung for no more than 15 or 30 minutes in accordance with the Standing Orders—60 per cent were rung precisely for the designated time, while the time ran over in some 40 per cent of the cases. It is important to note, however, that in the great majority of these overruns—52 out of 59 instances—the extra time taken was less than five minutes and, in the seven worst cases, the longest overrun was 11 minutes on a 30-minute bell. These figures offer compelling evidence of the good faith of Hon. Members and testify to the even-handedness that has guided the Parties and their Whips in responsibly exercising the flexibility afforded them by convention.

The division on August 31 represents, in the light of these figures, an egregious example. The Chair realizes that, even in this instance, the Whips' decision to delay their entrance was made in a spirit of generosity and courtesy and that there was no intention to thwart the spirit of the Standing Orders. But even if the August 31 incident is an anomaly, and the evidence suggests that it is, the Chair shares with Hon. Members profound misgivings about the direction that such an incident might eventually portend. Since the circumstances of this particular instance are devoid of controversy, it is perhaps an opportune time to step back and examine the larger dilemma that the Chair faces with regard to division bells.

[Translation]

While reviewing precedents in this respect, the Chair examined a similar case which occurred on November 2, 1982 when the 15-minute bell actually lasted for 33 minutes. Responding to a point of order, the Chair referred to the agreement between Whips and stated that it felt bound by it and would act accordingly.

By contrast, the McGrath Committee's third report, in discussing the stringent time limitations that electronic voting would impose, took the opposite view, stating:

> Some may feel that this limiting of time for voting removes flexibility from the House. Your committee is of the opinion that the House of Commons can no longer enjoy the luxury of waiting for a few Members to arrive for a vote.

These conflicting approaches neatly summarize two options: rigid adherence to the letter of the Standing Orders versus unflagging support for the Whips' convention. In the opinion of the Chair, under current circumstances and with prevailing attitudes, either option is extreme and each carries with it its own perils.

On the one hand, strict adherence to the terms of the Standing Orders constrains the Whips from exercising their judgment and accommodating circumstances on a case-by-case basis. On the other hand, the surrender of the matter entirely to the Whips' convention potentially leaves the House thrall to the political climate of the moment, and to the possibility of questions not being decided expeditiously.

The Chair accepts the responsibility for ensuring the orderly conduct of House business, but would be reluctant independently to invoke the letter of the Standing Orders when it appears that the House, in its wisdom, has chosen to give itself some leeway. At the same time, as I said on September 1, I deeply regret the incident on August 31. It does seem to me that we cannot permit ourselves to stray so far beyond the bounds of the Standing Orders without incurring grave risks. If the House should choose to direct the Chair to enforce strict adherence to the designated times for division bells, then we would proceed accordingly. But the Chair is reluctant to intervene unilaterally to set aside the Whips' convention which, on balance, has served Hon. Members well. With the continued co-operation of all Parties, and the continued vigilance of all Hon. Members, the Chair is convinced that the House can maintain the delicate balance which fully respects the spirit of the Standing Orders with regard to designated times for division bells without doing violence to the Whips' traditional role.

Having said that, I think that the intervention led by the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap was a serious one and, under the circumstances, was very much warranted. The Chair will be diligent to ensure that no Hon. Member will feel the necessity to raise the matter again. I thank all Hon. Members.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn that Bill C-58, an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at 1 p.m. the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp) had the floor.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to pursue the subject matter of Bill C-58 which we all recognize deals with the possibility of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters between Canada and any other country of the world with which Canada has a treaty or, as Clause 6 of the Bill allows, with any other country with which an agreement is made. I suggested that this deserved some exploration in order to clarify the reasons for concern that my colleagues and I in the New Democratic caucus feel about this Bill, and that will lead us later this afternoon, I expect, to oppose it when the question of a vote actually arises.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) in introducing this Bill this morning observed that it was not or did not provide a code of mutual legal assistance. That particular phrase from his speech caught my ear. Because of the dangers involved in relations between countries with different legal systems and different standards of procedure in the areas of policing and the judiciary, Canada may find itself caught up in abuses of the legal process, something which I want to pursue this afternoon.

With the knowledge of Canadians over the last several years there is reason to ask some of the following questions. I was reminded in thinking of this matter of the concern that arose when the royal commission to investigate the alleged presence in Canada of war criminals, the Deschênes Commission, came to the question of whether or not it should consider evidence in its deliberations which was located within the Soviet Union or countries of eastern Europe in which the Soviet Union has a great deal of influence. The reason for that concern was of course easy enough to understand.

The royal commission was empowered to look for Nazi war criminals. It was clear that in the profound ideological divisions that prevailed in Europe in the 1930s and the 1940s there were people in various countries who made alliances with Nazi Germany for their own political purposes without necessarily becoming guilty of crimes against humanity or laying themselves open by their actions to charges of being war criminals. Of course, there was the very real possibility that these nationalistic or right-wing activities which were so repugnant to the Soviet Government, or to the communist party in various countries, might open these persons, if they were resident now in Canada, to the possibility of a hunt by the Soviet authorities or by the Soviet secret police to try to get at them. Of course, the concern was that evidence might be fabricated and put forward for consideration by the Deschênes Commission or, conceivably, by the Canadian Department of Justice for use against these persons.

This was a concern which arose in the deliberations of the royal commission. Given that this was a royal commission headed by a notable jurist of the Province of Quebec, Mr. Justice Jules Deschênes, this was a concern with which the Justice dealt in a most impressive way. Having considered the matter carefully, he put forward a number of points which evidence, testimony or documents, whatever it might be, being put forward out of the Soviet context would have to pass before it would be considered by his commission. One could presumably construct that that is what should be applied before it was considered by the Department of Justice, which is now considering these matters.

I know particularly that the commission required that it be allowed to examine the original documents which were to be the basis for charges against persons of having taken part in war crimes. There was a requirement that witnesses be examined under Canadian rules of evidence. That was a matter of attempting to impose on the proceedings in the Soviet Union or other countries, in addition to countries in western Europe where we may expect the rules of evidence to be more compatible, the rules of evidence that prevail in Canadian courts. Canadian judicial procedure needed to operate there, if there was to be an appropriate and proper gathering of evidence.

Third, there was a requirement that the Soviet judicial authorities allow the video-taping of all the proceedings that may occur in this context.

There were a number of other conditions, but I note these first three particularly as evidence of concern which Mr. Justice Deschênes recognized as requiring response from his commission in order to ensure that any proceedings for the investigation of charges against persons in Canada, or any potential laying of charges against such persons, would be sure to be proper and based on genuine evidence and not based on fabrication.

I expanded on this a little, because here we have a clear case of concern expressed by Canadians in such a manner that most of us, if not all of us, can understand their political concern. It found response from a noted jurist who was operating in the public spotlight, although much of his deliberations were in confidence when it came to individuals. The response by Mr. Justice Deschênes deserves recognition in the House of Commons as we look at the potential operation of Bill C-58.

I wish to turn from this particular instance to generalize the concern that I am expressing by looking at a different situation, or I will let Members judge how different it is. It is the matter of the disputes into which Sikhs have long been drawn, and the proceedings against Sikhs in Canada and in India during the last few days. After all, the activities of our Canadian Security Intelligence Service have been intensely controversial for several days. Those activities have led to an admission by the Crown that untrue statements were used as a basis for obtaining a wiretap order in Canada.

In another situation altogether, a Sikh who is a Canadian citizen from the Toronto area and who was travelling in the subcontinent was arrested and subjected to interrogation, how severe we do not know. He made a confession after five days of intense interrogation. One shudders to think what that may have involved. His family has stated he was preoccupied with his work and too busy to be involved in politics.

When one thinks of those two cases, one where a person may spend two years in detention without any charge being laid—and who knows when he may have legal counsel in those circumstances if it were not for the intervention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark)—surely it is reasonable to consider very seriously what the possibilities of Bill C-58 may be.

I wish to bring into this discussion some concerns which I raised earlier this year with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At the time that the Canadian Government arrived at an extradition treaty with the Indian Government I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State in which I expressed some concern. In part I stated:

> I share the concern of many Canadians that this treaty could lead to abuse of the civil and human rights of Canadian citizens.
> I have heard that Canadian immigration officers processing applications in India sometimes have to deal with rather skillful forgeries. One trusts that they spot all the forgeries, although their failure to do so would only "condemn" a person to the desirable fate of a new life in Canada.

I began with that complex of things. I then suggested to the Secretary of State:

> The presentation of fabricated documentation to support an application for extradition of a Canadian citizen or resident could have far more tragic consequences.

I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> What resources does the Government of Canada possess to unmask forgeries? Will the Government ensure that persons will only be extradited when the charges against them are well-authenticated?

In my concluding paragraph I recognized the sensitivity of these matters, given that I was inquiring about a government of a sister nation of the Commonwealth, and where one would not wish to think that anything of this type could happen. As I said a few moments ago, events in the last days in the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and in the Indian context, it appears, leave one more leeway to pursue these matters.

Legal Assistance

Several weeks later the Secretary of State for External Affairs responded. At first I was impressed by his statement. He said:

> You are indeed correct in your suggestion that Canadian immigration officers are sometimes faced with forged documents, not only in India, but in many other countries as well. Our officers receive specialized training designed to help them identify the fraudulent documentation.

The Secretary of State then addressed my particular question and stated:

> In terms of your question about the possibility of forgeries being an aspect in extradition requests, I can assure you that such a situation would be highly unlikely. Extradition treaties are a fundamental and valued element in international relations and I would doubt that any country would seek to misuse such arrangements through fraudulent documentation. The treaty with India is reflective of the changes in Canadian law of the past five years, specifically, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and, as such, incorporates greater safeguards for the individual than any of our previous treaties.

I noted those assurances to me. I also obtained from the research branch of the Library of Parliament an assessment of the extradition treaty with India which came into force on February 10, 1987, in order to determine what special features this particular treaty may have. Of course, I was concerned in the context of Canada wishing to increase its trade with India, which is a concern expressed to me by Canadian citizens, particularly those of Indian origin, and the Indian Government for its part wishing to put an end to or suppress the Sikh dissidents that exist in the Republic of India. Much of the treaty is similar to other treaties, but the extradition treaty with India does have a number of novel and unusual features. I wish to note a few of those.

The treaty is silent on the question of whether nationals can be extradited. This is not the only treaty in which that is the case. The treaties with Israel and the United States are similar. The treaties with Denmark and Sweden which the researcher used for comparison do not include that.

There is then the possibility that a Canadian national could be extradited to India. Of course, that opens the possibility that a Canadian of Indian origin may be so extradited. That is one area of potential danger.

There is a further and unusual provision in that all the other Canadian treaties have a specified list of extradition crimes. However, the Canada-India treaty simply states that an offence "punishable by the laws of both contracting states by a term of imprisonment for a period of more than one year", is one under which extradition may take place. There is a very broad sweep here. There is a provision allowing for the extradition of persons for offences relating to taxation or revenue, or an offence of a purely fiscal character.

These two provisions are not unprecedented in terms of the development of extradition treaties these days, including those in Europe, but they are additional novel features in the treaty that the Canadian Government arrived at with the Indian Government and which came into force in February. Incidentally, on the monetary side this treaty is matched in Canada's other treaties only by one with Finland. In respect of the provisions for bail pending trial, the researcher notes, the limitation here is for six months. She trusts that anyone who would be held longer than that would obtain freedom thanks to Indian press coverage of violations. We have a nice example of an area in which there probably will not be that type of action. Considering the comments of the researcher on the political offences that the treaty covers—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Hon. Member is aware that he should not pass between the Speaker and the Member speaking. I would appreciate very much if I could see the debater, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

• (1530)

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, when we come to the section of the treaty that deals with political offences, we have a clause which is so drawn, recognizing the way in which terrorism is treated these days, that there are next to no protections.

In summing up, I want to point out that a careful comparison of the extradition treaty with India and with other treaties Canada has leaves cause for concern. Recognizing that the treaty was arrived at by the Government with the Government of India and that there is a possibility of other treaties being added to the list provided by Section 4 of the Act, I am worried about the way in which Bill C-58 might operate. I want to indicate that my colleagues and I are opposing the Bill. Assuming it receives second reading here, thanks to the action of others, we want to give it the most vigorous possible consideration in committee in order to ensure that the fewest possible dangers arise under the operation of it.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few observations about the Bill and express my concern about the way in which friendly relationship between our country and our neighbours to the south has been misused in the past and may be even more misused in the future as a result of the passage of Bill C-58. We are friends of the United States and we want to continue to be friends. After all, there is no other example of a border between two countries of more than 3,000 miles which is undefended, and we want that to continue.

We know, as the Americans know, that there is no country with whom we have greater and more important trade relations than we have with the United States and they have with us. We try to maintain good a relationship with the Americans, but it becomes obvious when we look at the record that our friendship is misused and mistreated. We want that friendship to continue, but not at the price which we have in the past and may again in the future have to pay, and I do not think we can continue to be friends with the Americans if we have to crawl on our bellies to please them.

When I look at some of the actions which the Americans have taken by using and misusing information obtained from Canadians, particularly from the Canadian security services, I am very dubious about what is proposed in Bill C-58 and what will be permitted under the terms of it. I will not repeat in any detail the information put on the record earlier today by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). He referred to the decision by the American Government to forbid Farley Mowat, a very well known and highly respected author who is a Canadian, travelling to the United States because of some comments he made about the foreign affairs approach of the American Government. Similarly, the Saskatchewan professor, Jim Harding, is not permitted to go to the United States because, according to the Americans, he attended a conference in the Soviet Union.

I want however, to speak about a much more serious blot on the record, namely, the tragedy which occurred in the life of a very distinguished Canadian diplomat, one of the best known and ablest that we ever had, namely, Mr. Herbert Norman. He was a very close friend of former Prime Minister Pearson. Mr. Norman worked with Mr. Pearson for many years in our External Affairs Department. He was harassed and maligned in the U.S.A. His reputation was dragged through the dirt in American congressional committees. He was accused of being a communist and of being a spy. Those accusations came from Congressmen and Senators in the United States who would consider anybody to the left of Genghis Khan a communist. On what did they base their claims? They based them on the allegation that when Mr. Norman was young and studying at Oxford he had been a member of a communist cell. They were talking about something Mr. Norman may or may not have done some 30 or more years before the time when these charges were laid.

From where did these Congressmen and Senators get this information? There were only two ways, Mr. Speaker. First, the Americans could have obtained the information if they had had security service agents working in Canada. As far as I know, there has never been any evidence that Americans have agents working in Canada except, I suppose, a few the CIA agents who are here in Ottawa in the American Embassy. Second, the Americans get information, which they get about many Canadians and other citizens of other countries, by the exchange of information between the security service in Canada, previously the RCMP and now the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and agents and representatives of agencies of the United States, either the FBI or the CIA.

One expects security agencies operating in countries which are friendly with each other to exchange information. One also expects that that information is kept within the walls and files of the respective security agencies, particularly when so much of the so-called information contained in the files is there on the basis of unsubstantiated, unproven, often completely false information given to security agencies. As far as I know, and I have been interested in the subject for a number of years, no information which the Canadian security agencies have on Canadians or anybody else has been leaked or made public in any other way to the media, the radio, TV or newspapers.

However, that is not what happened for so many years in the United States. In the 40 or more years that Herbert Hoover was the Director of the FBI, because of his concept of what constituted communism and whom he believed to be communist, all kinds of information, not just about American citizens but about citizens of many other countries, was leaked by the FBI and perhaps by the CIA when it suited its purposes to media people, Congressmen and Senators.

I do not intend to go through the entire record, but Mr. Norman became a victim of U.S. McCarthyism. His loyalties were questioned. He was accused not only of having been a communist but of having continued to be a communist. In fact, he was accused of being a spy. That allegation made publicly in the United States at meetings of congressional and senatorial committees was of course looked into by Canadian authorities.

I am certain that when Mr. Pearson was our Secretary of State for External Affairs and when he was the Prime Minister, he had the opportunity, the right and the ability to look at the files, and I am certain he exercised that ability. I am certain as well that if Mr. Pearson had any reason to believe that Mr. Norman was all or any of these things of which he was being accused, Mr. Pearson would have taken decisive action. Of course, no action was taken by the Canadian Government because no action was required.

However, these allegations, false accusations and innuendoes were spread so widely that they adversely affected the ability of Mr. Norman to do his work. They affected so adversely his whole life that eventually he committed suicide while serving his country as our representative in Egypt.

That is what happened in the past. I am not saying that I am certain it will happen in the future. However, it can happen and I believe that the provisions of this Bill give our security agencies and the Government a power which could be misused, either wittingly or unwittingly.

I want to take a moment to thank my colleague from Vancouver for his very kind words and for his very detailed and moving description of the mistreatment of nine Canadians, of whom my wife is one, by experiments conducted in Montreal at the Allan Memorial Institute, experiments which went a long way toward destroying or certainly making difficult the lives of the more than 50 people who were involved in those experiments. That is just one illustration of what a security agency acting without supervision and without any real principles can do.

I worry a great deal about what can happen in the future based on the experience we have had in the past with our American friends. My colleague from Thunder Bay discussed possible problems that could arise in our relationship with the Government of India. I am sure the same questions could be asked about our possible relationships with many other countries. For all these reasons, it is my intention to vote against this Bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-58. I must say at the outset—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I called for questions and comments. The Hon. Member is not questioning or commenting. Therefore, if there are no questions or comments, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) has the floor on debate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I could have used that Standing Order since I do not plan to say much on Bill C-58 in order to allow it to proceed to committee as quickly as possible.

There are obviously a number of serious shortcomings attached to Bill C-58, and it is for that reason that we have been encouraged to co-operate and to facilitate the consideration of this Bill at this stage so that the legislative committee can hear the appropriate witnesses with the appropriate expertise to improve the Bill. I sense a willingness on all sides of the House to improve the legislation. Some serious errors have already been brought to the attention of Members of the House.

Basically, Bill C-58 is an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976. I want to say at the outset that I oppose this Bill in its present form for a whole number of reasons. Some of them have been mentioned already and, as the debate continues, some of the more technical concerns will be brought to the attention of the legislative committee and presumably the appropriate amendments will be moved.

I think it pays to look at the background of this legislation since this is the stage when we have an opportunity to debate the principle of the Bill. For that reason, I think it is appropriate that we look at the motivation behind Bill C-58.

Of course, we go back to the famous Shamrock Summit at which the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States met in Quebec City to sing When Irish Eyes are Smiling and to come to some agreements on the need for free trade negotiations. At that time, the President made some requests of the Prime Minister, and this Bill basically flows out of the request that the United States be given authority to extend powers of investigation into Canada beyond the existing laws. I think this is the result of one more of the ongoing demands that President Reagan made to the Prime Minister of Canada in order to open the door to some free trade negotiations. It is essentially another concession.

Bill C-58 is a very serious concession. It does not allow only countries like the United States to carry on investigations in Canada, but it is open-ended so that it provides the Government of Canada with the authority to enter into a treaty to allow another country to enter Canada to carry out police investigations or various other kinds of law-enforcement investigations without ever coming to Parliament for authorization. In a rather extreme case, that would mean that if the Government of Canada wished, it could enter into negotiations with the military junta in Chile and allow the Chilean national police to infiltrate organizations in Canada. That is an extreme example, but it makes the case that the Chilean security forces would be allowed to operate in Canada. That would of course pose a very serious threat to the freedom and well-being of people who have fled the oppressive military regime there and found sanctuary in Canada.

The Bill would allow that regime or any other tinpot dictatorship to enter into an agreement with the Government of Canada without scrutiny, monitoring or even the knowledge of Parliament until after the fact. I do not think that is in the best interests of Canadian security or our concern for those who have fled oppressive regimes. If we are talking only about the United States, then let the legislation express it as being the U.S. and limit it to that country.

Someone might say, if it were only the U.S., would we have any concerns? Yes, we would. You will recall a number of occasions when decent law-abiding Canadian citizens have attempted to enter the U.S., or in some cases simply pass through, and have been turned back. Who are some of these people? I just want to give a couple of examples to indicate how oppressive American law can be when it is applied in cases like this.

You will recall that back in 1985 a Canadian was denied entry to the U.S. This incident received a fair bit of publicity at the time. This dangerous person was none other than Farley Mowat, the famous Canadian author.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I got him in, Nelson.

Mr. Riis: The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) says he got him in. We appreciate that intervention, but the point is that the U.S. deemed this man to be dangerous. All he wanted to do was to go down to the U.S. and promote his most recent book. Why was he denied entry? I remember speaking with him a few days later at a function here on the Hill. He was still kind of leaping with delight at the fact he had caused so much concern to the American authorities. Apparently he had at one time threatened to shoot down some American bombers with his .22 rifle. He had had enough of their invading our airspace and he was going to take some steps himself and take on the United States' Strategic Air Command.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Did his book sales go up?

Mr. Riis: I suppose they might have increased as a result of this publicity. Knowing Farley Mowat, he would have taken advantage of this rather peculiar event at the American border.

It is peculiar that we would not be concerned about that kind of situation and have taken steps to negotiate with the U.S. so that this kind of silliness does not occur.

Another example occurred last year when Professor Jim Harding from one of the Saskatchewan universities wanted to travel from Calgary to Los Angeles to Mexico City to Costa Rica to participate in a UN conference. When he arrived in Calgary and was about to depart for Los Angeles, the American authorities said they did not want him passing through their country. They considered him to be a dangerous person. The reason was that in his youth he had participated in a peace conference in the Soviet Union. As a student he joined with other students from around the world to discuss peace. He was obviously identified then as a Communist and an undesirable and denied entry.

I could go on with a whole list of similar incidents. Certainly the Minister does not need to have me lay out that list. Perhaps later on he could do us a service and stand up and give us some other peculiar events. That would encourage us, before we fall all over ourselves facilitating the U.S. in carrying out investigations here, to come up with a little bit of balance between the two countries.

Under existing law, U.S. enforcement agencies, before they can come into Canada to carry out investigations, must ensure that charges have been laid in the U.S. against the individual or individuals concerned. This legislation will change that. No, you do not have to have been accused or have charges laid against you. As long as the American investigative authorities believe there is some problem, they can enter Canada to investigate. The FBI can come in at that stage before any charges occur in the U.S. That will place a considerable number of Canadians at risk. Given the activities of some U.S. law enforcement agencies which have become public recently, I am not certain that we can have a lot of faith in the above-board nature of their operations.

Think, for example, of all those individuals who left the U.S. because they refused to serve in that immoral war in Vietnam. They made a very difficult decision and a number of them decided to seek sanctuary in Canada. They came here and are now citizens, and I suspect most of us know a number of them because they often play influential roles in our communities. These people would obviously be targets for this kind of undercover investigative work.

Then we have the people in the U.S. right now who oppose some of their country's foreign policy, particularly that aggressive foreign policy in places like Central America where the administration is bound and determined to fund the Contra movement and overthrow the Government of Nicaragua by force. I am pleased that our Secretary of State for External Affairs has on a number of occasions spoken out and indicated that Canada opposes that intervention. Yet the U.S. administration under President Reagan is doing everything it can to get arms and explosives to make that attempt more vicious and murderous than ever. Peaceful protesters in the U.S. speaking out against the administration in the U.S. might come under investigation, and if they were to flee to Canada for safety they would, as a result of this Bill, be investigated by those organizations here in Canada.

I do not want to take up valuable time on this legislation because the same points will be made at subsequent stages. Let me say that I believe Members of the House recognize that the few points I have made in the last moment or two are sufficient to warrant voting against this Bill in its present form. Certainly everything I have heard so far indicates that this Bill is inappropriate. We should not pass this Bill. The Government should go back to the drafting board and draft a Bill which is fair, just, decent and compassionate and bring it forward. For goodness' sakes, let us stop this Bill from proceeding and get on with the real business of Canada.

• (1600)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: On division.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT AND CURRENCY ACT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (for the Minister of Supply and Services) moved that Bill C-46, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act and the Currency Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-46 is designed to accomplish several specific objectives which I will outline in a moment. When considered in their entirety, however, three general themes are evident. Certain housekeeping measures are proposed to consolidate, within one piece of legislation, and to modernize all technical matters pertaining to coins. Second, several proposals are included to improve financial arrangements for the Mint and to give it more operational flexibility. Finally, several modifications are proposed to provide a framework for new marketing initiatives the Mint may wish to pursue.

Among legislative housekeeping matters relating to coinage, I believe it is desirable to simplify the approval process for minor changes in size and composition of existing Canadian circulating coins. Governor in council authority to effect such changes will allow the Mint to respond relatively quickly to situations of metal shortages and to benefit from new technologies, thereby ensuring adequate supplies of domestic coinage and positive seignorage revenues. As well, all technical matters, some of which are now found in the Currency Act, should be consolidated within the Mint Act while leaving the primary responsibility for matters relating to our monetary system with the Minister of Finance.

Among the second group of proposals to improve the financial and operational flexibility of the Mint is an amendment that would permit the Mint to bank in the private sector. Current practice whereby the Mint conducts its financial transactions through a special account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund distorts the Mint's true financial picture by not recognizing interest which could be earned on deposits. Additionally, most of the Mint's financial transactions are in foreign currencies, and being allowed to make its own direct arrangements for these transactions would be administratively and financially advantageous to the Mint.

To create a proper capital structure the Minister is proposing to permit the Mint to issue $40 million in shares which would be purchased by the Minister of Supply and Services. These shares would be redeemable at face value. This would provide the Mint with a level of capitalization to meet its needs consistent with accepted norms for determining private sector capitalization financing requirements.

Accordingly, the Mint will also be given authority to borrow up to $50 million from the private sector or from the Consolidated Revenue Fund as may be approved by the Minister of Finance. This amount is consistent with the Mint's recent history and with projections for future requirements of its approved five-year corporate plan.

The Mint will also be authorized to seek additional borrowing authority through appropriations in future, if such an increase is required. This would provide further financial and operational flexibility without requiring changes in enabling legislation but would still ensure that the exercise of such authority would remain subject to Parliament's approval. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that such authority would remain subject to Parliament's approval.

The Minister is proposing that we eliminate the requirement that all corporate profits be paid to Canada at the end of each fiscal year, which has not been done in any event. Rather, earnings should be applied to meet approved investment requirements and, under the capitalization structure, dividends would return a portion of profits to Canada.

The third group of changes are designed to improve the Mint's marketing framework. Governor in council approval should provide authority for the Mint to respond more quickly to market opportunities and imperatives to produce precious metal coins. Moreover, we wish to remove any doubt that the Mint may borrow, rent or lease precious metals for its internal working inventory, thus ensuring its continuing role in stimulating Canada's mining industry.

The existing 1991 sunset clause on production of the very successful gold maple leaf bullion investment coin will be removed to ensure continued world-wide investor confidence in a product with long-term market liquidity. There will also be changes in the public reporting requirements in connection with the production of precious metal coins. Current requirements jeopardize the confidentiality of the Mint's marketing and production programs in an environment of ever-increasing world competition.

Finally, the Minister proposes that the Mint's Board of Directors be enlarged from 7 to 11 members and that the discrimination favouring membership from the Public Service be removed. Both these changes will allow for greater expertise to participate in making direction-setting decisions for an organization that has become highly market-driven. Appointments to the board will continue to be approved by the Governor in council.

These proposed changes are the result of a comprehensive review of the Mint's legislative environment and, if adopted, will constitute the first major revision to minting legislation in the past 18 years.

I would like to conclude my remarks with the hope that the revised legislation will serve to give the Mint an up-to-date legislative environment that will permit it to continue its record of success. That success will rebound to the benefit of the Mint, its many customers and, most important, the shareholders who are, of course, the people of Canada.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be participating in this debate on Bill C-46 which makes certain amendments to the Acts governing the Royal Canadian Mint. Not many Canadians know very much about all the activities of the Royal Canadian Mint. It is a tremendous organization and I think it should have a higher profile in the eyes of the public of Canada.

The Mint has some outstanding people working for it. It certainly has the country's interests at heart and is to be congratulated for the tremendous job it is doing in promoting its business in the international markets of the world.

Following upon what the Parliamentary Secretary has just stated, I think it is important to note that the production of the Centennial coins by the Mint in 1967 was a great step forward and proved to many people what a solid, business-like structure existed within the Royal Canadian Mint. Further things came to light in 1976 during the Olympic Games in Canada. The Olympic Games presented an open opportunity to produce many more coins for the international market and allow the Mint not only to pay its own way or break even, but indeed to make a huge profit. Following 1976, with the experience of the Olympic coins, the Liberal Government of the day put a marketing structure into place, which really started the boom in coins at the Royal Canadian Mint.

As a result of that legislation in 1976, the income at the Royal Canadian Mint is some $990 million, compared to the $50 million in income and business in the early 1970s. The reason for that huge increase in business is that the people at the Royal Canadian Mint and others in government since 1976 not only sold their professionalism and expertise but indeed marketed Canadian bullion which was in serious trouble.

Between 1979 and 1984, Canada exported some one million ounces of gold coins annually. This helped the gold market tremendously in Canada. Last year, 1.5 million ounces of gold were put into coins in Canada, which represents a fantastic growth in a Crown corporation that has demonstrated its expertise.

I want to compliment the people at the Royal Canadian Mint for the work they have done and hope they will continue with the initiatives they have shown.

I must admit that for a number of years as a Member of Parliament I had not paid much attention to our Canadian Mint until I went there to get a briefing. It was a rather pleasant experience to go through the entire plant where everything was described to me. I was shown the various types of coins they were making, including coins for India, Australia and Japan.

People may not think that Canadians would do much coinage business for Japan, but the Royal Canadian Mint does a lot of business making coins for Japan.

As well, it makes coins for Britain and several European countries where the technology is supposed to be so great that one would think they would do it for themselves.

Canada has increased its markets for coinage greatly throughout the Asian rim and Europe, which indeed has been very beneficial for gold production in Canada.

During my visit to the Mint the officials showed me the carts where the gold bars were kept. I was permitted to pick one of them up, but the officials smiled at me when I tried to do it with one hand. One requires two hands to pick up a gold bar which is valued at about $250,000. It is a unique experience to hold $250,000 in one's hand for the first and probably only time in one's life. I only hope that the Mint is not robbed because my fingerprints may still be on that gold bar.

I believe it is appropriate to provide the Royal Canadian Mint with added powers in order to be more flexible in its operations. The change in metal prices in the world is very important to the Mint because it must depend on the low cost of metals to keep its costs down. When the price of silver or gold increases greatly, the cost to the Mint rises dramatically.

It is interesting to note that outside factors over which the Mint has no control account for 94 per cent of its cost of producing coins. The Mint cannot control the price of gold or silver. It has its labour costs and assaying costs, as well as the wages for its professional engineers and tradesmen. Therefore, only 6 per cent of the costs are under the control of the Mint.

What is the difference between the Mint Act and the Currency Act? The Mint Act deals with the production and issuance of coins and gives the Mint the authority to make and sell coins.

The Currency Act deals with the use of coin and paper currency in the money system. Of course, the Currency Act is very much related to the Department of Finance. There are many other areas of government activity which either control or share a certain amount of power within its administration.

I want to refer to one part of the summary of the Royal Canadian Mint corporate plan of 1987, which deals with Canadian circulation coinage. I stated a moment ago that the production of coins makes much money for the Mint. However, the Mint does not make a big profit on the production of Canadian currency in order to keep costs down. Its profits are made on the foreign coinage that it is able to sell. It states under "Canadian Circulation Coinage":

> This product line constitutes the basic "raison d'etre" of the RCM. While all other activities of the Mint are profit-motivated, the overriding objectives with respect to this activity are to produce and supply coins of the currency of Canada, of the highest quality and at the lowest possible cost. Therefore this product is not a significant contributor to the profitability of the Corporation. The Mint must exercise discretion, and take the necessary initiative, to ensure that an adequate supply of coinage in all denominations is available to meet the demand.

With regard to bullion products, it is important to note that in 1979 the Royal Canadian Mint introduced the gold maple leaf bullion coins, as was mentioned by the Parliamentary Secretary. From 1979 to 1984, on average, one million ounces of gold coins were sold annually. In 1985, in an environment of reaction to South Africa, 1.8 million ounces of gold maple leaf coins were sold, making us the market leader. In 1986, 1.5 million ounces of gold coins were sold. A lot of the reason for our being a world leader is the expertise, of the Royal Canadian Mint, the ability to produce, and the ability to look after the markets. We owe it a mark of credit there.

Other countries are going to enter into competition with us on the coin market, undoubtedly with many other coins such as Olympic coins, but with the expertise we have in this field and the experience the Mint people have here in Canada, I do not think we should be overly concerned about its ability to compete. As Britain, Australia and others come on stream, I think Canadians will be able to compete very well in the market-place as far as coins are concerned.

With regard to numismatic products, the report tells us that the major marketing thrust will be in the international collectors' market where the Royal Canadian Mint expects to increase significantly its number of collector customers. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we have great stamp collectors and coin collectors and so on and this market will undoubtedly grow.

The Bill at hand in its provisions withdraws the sunset clause mentioned by the Parliamentary Secretary which called for an end to the gold bullion maple leaf program in 1991 and provided for public accountability of sales. That will give the Mint a chance to go ahead and continue to sell that coin. The approximate total amount of business done by the Royal Canadian Mint up to now is $990 million. I believe that some $800 million of that is due to the sale of the gold maple leaf coin. So this is a very important amendment to this Bill. The elimination of this clause, of course, will enable the Mint to remain competitive internationally. The Mint still remains accountable to Parliament, as has been mentioned, not only through its five-year corporate plan, but it will continue to report annually to the Parliament of Canada.

I think it is important that the appropriate parliamentary committee take those reports and at least extend to the Mint the courtesy of having a couple of meetings or a hearing, if for no other reason than to educate ourselves as Members of Parliament as to what it is doing in the country and on the international scene, and also to give it a profile, telling Canadians what the Royal Canadian Mint is doing. We have a responsibility to get that information out there as well.

The Bill would allow the Canadian Mint to react more quickly to the imperatives to produce coins in certain metals and sizes, giving it more flexibility, and the amendments to the Act would allow changes to be made to the type of metal used in the production process and to the size of the coins. For example, size changes of up to 10 per cent would be permitted. There are no restrictions on the type of metal used to produce a coin, only that the colour of the coin must remain the same.

The amendments allow the Mint to respond quickly to cost changes in metals, thus guaranteeing a positive seigniorage—the difference between the cost of production and the face value of the coin—to accrue to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Finally, they would allow the Mint to effect these changes through Order in Council rather than having to come before Parliament in the form of special legislation. Today, with all the Orders in Council that go through, I do not know whether that is speeding up the process. However, we certainly do know that if it had to rely on the House of Commons for flexibility, it might wait a long time with the amount of business and priorities given to particular pieces of legislation.

Because the international market in precious metal coinage is very competitive, the Mint wants flexibility to respond to changes in the market and to mint new precious coins. That in part is related to what I said a while ago, that the Mint has no control over the cost of these metals and, therefore, from time to time it may have to change to another metal or to another coin in order to remain competitive.

The Bill proposes a general authority to go into precious coin production, which is another step forward. It gives the Mint added initiative.

In addition to all of this, we have an increase in the board of directors. At present we have seven members on the board of directors of the Mint, but it is overloaded with public servants. The thrust of this particular amendment is to allow the government of the day to go out into private enterprise and into other industrial areas of Canadian life and pick people to go on that board. I would hope that, since this is the beginning of the increase in the board—and these amendments provide for that increase—serious thought will be given to the appointment of these people now. Those four additional positions on the board of directors of the Royal Canadian Mint should be filled in the future by well qualified, well trained, experienced people. They should not be used as patronage positions for people who are looking for a little fame for the moment. Given the record of the Royal Canadian Mint and its expertise, and considering what it has given to Canada with respect to coins and money abroad, it is very important that these people be well qualified for those positions and that they always have the best interests of the Royal Canadian Mint at heart.

I think this is a good step as a follow-up to 1976. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary would have a few more words to say about the $40 million capitalization before we close off debate. The authorized capital of the Mint is $40 million divided into 4,000 shares of $10,000 each. The Government, through the appropriate Minister, is permitted to buy those shares. Under what conditions would that happen? Under what conditions would the Mint want to buy them back from the Government? What triggers these sorts of things? I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary could give us an example of how this would operate, because I think it is very important. We know that when Crown corporations need money, the Government of Canada is there and it has a certain onus to lend these corporations money.

It also gives the Mint the opportunity to go into the private market-place to borrow up to $50 million. We would like to think, however, given the positive financial picture of the Mint at the present time, that this will not be necessary, especially if the markets of the world continue to treat us favourably, if the Canadian Mint remains competitive to the extent I mentioned earlier, if its expertise is well used, production is on target and quality is good. We certainly must mention quality here. The metals must be absolutely pure, flawless. They are simply not used if they are not. We must compliment the people in the Mint who have implemented quality control as part of their job. Obviously they are doing a very good job in this area.

I leave these questions with the Parliamentary Secretary. What would trigger the purchase of shares from the Royal Canadian Mint by the Government of Canada through the appropriate Minister? What would trigger the Mint to buy them back, other than perhaps their being a bit more flush at that time as opposed to others? Are there any other factors to be considered?

I hope that it will not be a case of the Government buying a number of shares with the hope of having more control over the operations of the Mint since these people have been doing a good job. We want them to be free to exercise their goodwill in the international market-place as well as their ability to sell as long as they keep their good record which they have had until now.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate all personnel at the Royal Canadian Mint for the tremendous job they have done over the years. I hope that through this Bill and through other activities they will be able to gain a higher profile in the public domain so that the people of Canada will fully appreciate just what kind of people we have working in that Crown corporation and, indeed, others in our Government who do not always get the just rewards and compliments that they deserve.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak today on Bill C-46, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act and the Currency Act. As I understand it, the Royal Canadian Mint operates under three Acts, the two Acts to which I have already referred and the Financial Administration Act, an Act with which all organizations in the Government are required to deal.

We in the New Democratic Party have no quarrel at all with this particular legislation. However, we do want it to go to committee. I suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary that with a little preparation we could probably pass it at just one meeting of the committee. I say this in light of the fact that we have a number of questions that we want to ask and, like the Hon. Member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins), we want the opportunity to ask those questions and to receive answers to them.

What we are really wanting to find out is why in many cases in many parts of this Bill the Government has made the moves that it has made. For instance, in which direction does it intend to go? What are its intentions as far as the Mint is concerned? As suggested by the previous speaker, the members of the committee will have an opportunity to take a good look at the operations of the Royal Canadian Mint and understand better than they do at present why the changes are being made.

The clauses of the Bill are straightforward. The Parliamentary Secretary gave us an outline which indicated the main changes being made. However, the reasons for some of the changes are somewhat obscure. We would like those reasons to be aired and to be reported by the Government. The opportunity of going before a legislative committee will allow us to do that.

The Bill itself establishes a very clear and straightforward objective. In fact, the changes to the Acts are more direct and in simpler language than we have had before. The objectives of the Mint are to mint coins in anticipation of profit and to carry out other related activities. We would like to question the officers of the Mint as to exactly what is meant by "other related activities".

Clause 3 of the Bill talks about capitalization. Although we recognize that the Government is bringing the structure of this Crown corporation more in line with the general structure of corporations both private and public, the Mint got along without that structure for a good many years. It will be interesting to find out exactly why at this moment the Government feels that it is important to move in this direction.

The Mint operated from 1908 as an agency of the Government. It was not until 1969 that it was made into a Crown corporation. Even at that time it was given no capitalization since it was recognized that the relationship between the Government and the body that produced parts of our legal currency had to be very close and under strict government control. Consequently, even when the Crown corporation was formed in April of 1969, the need for a corporate structure was not recognized, or was found not to be pressing to the extent that not up until this particular Bill was introduced was a change to its structure considered.

The Royal Canadian Mint has been one of the most flexible Mints in the world. Consequently, besides refining precious metals and treating them it produces coins of all varieties. This change of capitalization is something that we would like to look into. For instance, as the previous speaker suggested, although it is probably just a requirement to tidy up the situation that is presently in place, if one reads that particular clause thoroughly one could ask why we have these shares being put in place since they are all to be purchased by the Minister of Supply and Services. However, Clause 3.2 allows the sale of shares back to the Mint, it would appear, or possibly to some other purchaser, although it is indicated that that cannot happen at this time. That particular possibility is one of the questions that I wish discussed.

Although this Bill does not allow privatization at the moment, the structure being put in place would suggest that at some time it is possible. I do not think that even this Government with its policy and ideology of privatization would move toward privatization of this particular industry. That would seem to be an incredible idea, and one that I hope the Government is not thinking about. It is one that does not make a great deal of sense.

The second area that we may wish to question concerns the board of directors. There are two ideologically different positions in the approach to Crown corporations and boards of directors. In the past the Government has often allowed and even encouraged placing senior public servants on boards of directors. A couple of years ago I was on the public accounts committee which took a good look at the Canadair situation. The committee found that some of the problems of Canadair were no doubt closely related to the fact that the board of directors found itself so closely linked to the Minister responsible at that particular time that some of the members of that board of directors did not feel that they should or could make decisions which would be opposed to the story that they were receiving from the Deputy Minister who was on the board of directors.

That particular position has been questioned. In its weighing it can be suggested that it is a good idea, particularly in this type of corporation which must be close to the Government in its development. I gather that the position taken by the Government in this particular Bill is to set up a board of directors entirely separate from the Government, and through some other process give the instructions which it thinks necessary.

Even under those circumstances, and this is the reason we would like to have an opportunity to question the Government on its position, and even in its precision the Government has taken the step of moving away and then putting in place requirements for relationships with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Supply and Services, which almost return it to the situation that previously existed.

Under those circumstances we need to question if there is any real justification for raising the number of directors from 7 to 11. Why was this particular change made? Previously the board of directors included the Chairman, the Master of the Mint, and five directors. The board of directors has been changed to include the chairman, the Master of the Mint, and nine directors, but with a further suggested requirement that there will be no "favourites" in the sense of public servants. In fact, there is an elimination of public servants from the board of directors almost entirely.

The other main changes are mostly housekeeping, but to some extent perhaps we should look at those changes. In the Bill there are a number of things we should look at and question, but probably they will not make any difference in the direction. The removal of the sunset clause for the production of gold coins makes sense. It makes sense for any business organization, which is what the Mint has become in the last 20 years, to have the ability to plan ahead instead of saying that this operation will stop in 1991 and after 1991 we will not have any more maple leaf coins, or else make that decision a month or so before and consequently cause a number of problems. Instead of that, the sunset clause is worth while.

I have a great desire to ask why the idea of Canadian content in coins that will be used in Canada is not part of the Bill. I know that the Bill states that making it a requirement as far as all coins produced by the Mint are concerned would probably cause some problems. I know that the Mint has a policy requiring Canadian content in coins that become legal tender in Canada. But that is not part of the Bill, and it is one of the questions that I wish to ask or even to suggest an amendment which may make that a requirement.

Many of the coins for other parts of the world are produced with metals other than Canadian metals. In fact, the refining of metals has become a fairly large part of the money-making portion of the Mint. I would appreciate the opportunity to find out why that has not been made part of the Bill. The Canadian content as a policy only could leave it open under certain circumstances, particularly where the distance is being increased in the relationship with the Government of Canada. The type of control which the Government will have is being decreased.

Other than that, as I have stated, I have no particular concerns about the Bill. I recognize that the officers of the Mint do an adequate or even an outstanding job in operating the Mint as a business. They have brought in revenues of $1 billion with a $33 million profit last year, or they plan on a profit of $33 million in 1987. The Mint made approximately $16 million last year. The markets of the world have affected the business within the Mint, both positively and negatively. The fact that the United States produced an eagle coin in 1986 possibly has or will cut into sales by the Mint of the maple leaf coin.

In the end the chances are that, as my dad told me many years ago, "If you could make money you would be doing better than the rest of us". This is one way in which Canada and the Canadian Government is making money and showing a profit. I am pleased, therefore, to allow this Bill to go to committee.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, is there a question and comment period?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions and comments.

Mr. Skelly: On debate, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate. The Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to raise with my colleague and other Members in the House the concern I have about the activities of the Mint. I hope that in committee the issue can be raised of the nature of Canadian coinage in relation to the corporate structure of the Mint. In this House we have discussed at great length the introduction of the dollar coin by the loonies—

Mr. Nystrom: The loonies?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Skelly: I am sorry, the Conservatives. We have a situation that is serious. It is quite interesting to see people's reaction to the dollar coin. I was upstairs in the cafeteria purchasing lunch when the cashier attempted to give one of the more prominent Conservative Members of the House a handful of loonies as change. The individual refused to accept it. I represent in my constituency an area of senior citizens. There are vending machines in senior citizen residences and it has been found that there is a movement toward dollar coins in machines away from smaller denominations. For example, washing machines which used to cost 50 cents and 75 cents to run, now cost one dollar. It is much more convenient to stuff a dollar coin into a machine, and this has meant a 25 per cent increase in cost to senior citizens in many areas.

Mr. Stewart: You are really reaching.

Mr. Skelly: I hear my colleague on the other side of the House saying that I am really reaching. The people who are reaching are the senior citizens, who are reaching into their pockets more often to respond to a policy of the Government that has harmed them. This 25 per cent inflationary increase is now finding its way into the the operation of other types of vending machines.

The Member on the other side who is smiling at my presentation might himself have been involved in business and would have enjoyed an increase to one dollar, but this is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker.

I had hoped to ask my colleagues a number of questions about the thrust of discussion in committee on this issue. Rarely in the House of Commons does one get an opportunity to discuss the activities of the Mint, the policy direction it strikes and the recommendations it makes to Government. I hope my colleague and other colleagues will consider the inflationary effect of the change in coinage in Canada. I can see there are Conservatives on the other side of the House who hope that we will go to a two dollar coin and so have a 125 per cent increase in inflation.

There are matters where other changes in this House have been seriously inflationary. For example, when the Liberals made the conversion to the metric system of measurement, Conservatives howled about this. Many Canadians were under the whip of the oil companies when that industry converted from gallons to litres, which caused a substantial increase in the price of fuel at that time.

I hope that when this Bill goes to committee there will be a discussion of the inflationary effect of the loonie.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could we call it five o'clock and proceed to Private Members' hour?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to proceed with the introduction of the next Bill and then call it five o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Elmer MacKay (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-74, an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. Browes) will be recognized.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby) moved that Bill C-207, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (gun control) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of my Private Members' Bill, Bill C-207, which is an Act to amend the Criminal Code with respect to the sensitive and important issue of gun control. I want to emphasize, because I think it is particularly important in the discussion of this legislation, that this is a Private Members' Bill. This Bill is one which I am putting forward not on behalf of the New Democratic Party, not on behalf of the federal caucus of the New Democratic Party, but which I am putting forward as a private Member of this House. Each and every Member of this House is entitled to bring to the attention of the House issues which are of concern to that Member. I emphasize that because I know there are very strong feelings in different parts of the country respecting gun control.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), has himself introduced legislation on gun control, but his Bill would move in exactly the opposite direction from mine. I am attempting to tighten gun control in Canada to make gun control more effective. My colleague from Skeena has decided in his Private Member's Bill that he wants to eliminate entirely the requirement for firearms acquisition certificates for residents in northern Canada. I know that my colleague from Skeena will explain to this House and to the people of Canada why he believes that in northern Canada there should not even be the most minimal restriction to ensure that those who have a history of previous involvement with violent crime, those who have a history of being involved in serious indictable offences, those who have a history of psychiatric imbalance, and those who to happen to be living in a Schedule III riding should not be required to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate.

A few minutes ago, we were talking about loonies. I would not characterize this particular proposition as a loony proposition, but I certainly believe that the suggestion that we eliminate entirely in northern Canada the requirement for even the minimal safeguard of a firearms acquisition certificate is not one that I could possibly support. Rather, I believe the time has come to recognize that we should tighten up and make more effective gun control legislation. We should recognize that there are a number of provisions in the present gun control law which should be made more effective. The purpose of my Bill is to do precisely that.

The purpose of my Bill is to heed the call of coroners' juries across the land who time after time have drawn to the attention of Parliament the existing weaknesses and shortcomings of gun control legislation. It is to heed the call as well of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. That association has proposed to Parliament on a number of occasions that we make more effective Canadian gun-control legislation. For example, it adopted the following resolution at a recent annual conference:

> Therefore be it resolved that the Solicitor General of Canada now address these concerns in conjunction with his provincial counterparts and take the steps necessary to end this increase in available weapons.

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police has said that Parliament should recognize that it is too easy to buy a gun in Canada and that that results in unnecessary death, suffering, additional crime and suicide. As well, there are more accidents involving children coming across loaded weapons, accidentally discharging them and being critically injured or in some cases killed.

Chief Bob Stewart, the Chief of the Vancouver Police Department and the former head of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, has himself spoken out very strongly on this question. He said, as quoted in a newspaper article:

> "The proliferation of handguns is reason for concern," said Vancouver police chief Bob Stewart—
> "If we don't try to control this at this stage, it will get to the point of being like the U.S. problem and there will be no way to turn it around," Stewart said.

There are today at least 850,000 firearms registered in Canada and it is unclear just how many rifles and shotguns are in circulation because, unlike handguns, they do not require any form of registration with local police departments or the RCMP. My Private Members' Bill would recognize that problem and tighten the law in that particular area.

There are other areas of concern as well. A coroner's jury in Toronto was recently very critical of Canada's gun legislation. It pointed out that even after a person has been convicted of an offence involving firearms, as long as he has a firearms acquisition certificate, he can go right back out and buy another gun. That does not make any sense whatsoever. The coroner's inquest into the death of Scarborough musician Alan Boyarski who was shot dead by police on August 11, 1985, made it very clear that there is a serious loophole in the law in this respect.

In fact, the law should require that a person's right to own a firearm following such a conviction would be limited. Surely we should take away the firearms acquisition certificate of a person convicted of such a crime for an extended period of time to prevent similar incidents from taking place in the future.

There are other areas as well that should be looked at in our examination of Canadian gun control legislation, and I would like to touch on two or three of them. There is the question of combat schools in Canada, an alarming recent development. In a number of areas, schools have sprung up to train people in combat techniques. In some cases, this involves the use of guns.

As well, there are concerns about suicide. The Centre for Suicide Prevention in the Province of Quebec has called upon federal and provincial Governments to impose stricter regulations on who can obtain firearms. The centre points out that firearms were used in one-third of all suicides in Quebec between 1975 and 1979.

Another concern is the rapidity with which individuals may obtain a firearm. A person may acquire a firearms certificate, and a matter of a few hours later go into a store and buy a gun. That person may be in a state of extreme anger or in an unbalanced state and may go right out and shoot someone or in some cases commit suicide. Surely there should be a minimum period of time between the acquisition of the certificate and the actual purchase of the weapon in order to ensure that the possibility of death is not as great.

As well, we must look at tighter controls on the use of guns by police involved, for example, in chases. The former Chief of Staff of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Bill Neville, lost his 20-year-old son Lindsay on an isolated stretch of Highway 38 near Parham, Ontario. He pleaded with the coroner's jury to recommend to the Government tighter controls on the inappropriate use of firearms by the police in certain situations.

Another problem that has been highlighted by a number of police authorities is the problem of the illegal acquisition of firearms. It has been pointed out that in a number of cases, people have obtained very seriously lethal weapons without even going through the procedure of obtaining a firearms acquisition certificate.

Our judiciary may not be applying as rigorously as one would have hoped the provisions of the Criminal Code requiring prohibition orders and mandatory minimum sentences for convictions involving the use of firearms. As well, there is a provision in the existing gun control law requiring that a course in firearms safety be taken before a certificate can be issued.

This particular provision was referred to in a recent evaluation. Decision Dynamics Corporation conducted a very comprehensive review of gun control provisions in Canada and pointed out that the 1977 legislation includes a provision which has still not been proclaimed 10 years later. That is the provision that requires the completion of a safety course or a test in the safe use and handling of firearms as approved by the provincial Attorney General as prerequisite to obtaining a firearms acquisition certificate. Ten years later, that provision has not yet been proclaimed. I would have hoped that the Government would have moved forward quickly on that.

It is important to note that my proposed tougher gun control legislation would in no way impair the rights of those who enjoy hunting in a safe manner. This legislation would in no way diminish their rights. Indeed, many hunting clubs in Canada have been at the forefront of the call for safety courses, and indeed many have educated their members themselves in the safe use of firearms. Those are not the people targeted, if I may use that word in the context of this debate, by this legislation. Rather, the purpose of the legislation is to recognize that far too many people in Canada are dying as a result of the widespread abuse of firearms.

Statistics speak loudly and clearly on this question. Let us compare the situation in Britain with that in the United States. In the U.S. of course it is wide open. We all know about the incredibly high level of crime there involving the use of handguns. Thousands of people are murdered every year as a result of the proliferation of handguns in that society. The Rambo mentality is alive and well. We do not want to see that in Canada.

• (1710)

By contrast, in the U.K. there are far tougher gun-control laws than we have here in Canada. What are the statistics? Hand guns were involved in 10,728 deaths in the U.S. in 1979. In England it was eight. I think that figure speaks for itself.

I would point out as well that Canadians themselves are calling for tougher gun-control legislation. A Gallup poll conducted in February of 1982 shows that 70 per cent of those questioned believed the gun-control law should be made more effective. I say more effective. Certainly these laws should not be weakened.

Mr. Witer: What about the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton)?

Mr. Robinson: The Conservative Government has indicated that it is prepared to examine gun control laws. The Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) is present and I want to commend him for the work he has done in prodding his Government into taking some action. Yet his efforts have fallen on deaf ears. The Conservative Government has refused to take any action whatsoever to tighten up gun-control legislation. In February of 1986 the Hon. Member for York East asked the then Minister of Justice what action he was going to take with respect to the recommendation of the coroner's inquest into the death of Allan Boyarski. That man had purchased two hand guns less than five months after he was convicted of illegally carrying another hand gun. The Minister, rising up to his full height, said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss the specific case—but amendments to the firearm control provisions of the Criminal Code—have been under consideration by the Department of Justice—they are to be discussed this week—The hon. gentleman's concerns will be looked into then.

They may have been looked into but no action was taken.

An Hon. Member made reference to the Hon. Member for Skeena. He is reflecting the views of many of his constituents and bringing forward a Private Members' Bill, which he has every right to do, reflecting the serious concerns of the people of Skeena. He does an outstanding job. The fact that I happen to disagree with the contents of his Bill is neither here or there. I say again, he has done a terrific job of representing his constituents on this important question, but it is the Conservatives who are in government. It is not up to the Hon. Member for Skeena to pass legislation, any more than it is up to me. Why has the Government failed to act?

The Hon. Member for York East was at it again in October of 1986. He pointed out that the Minister had said the previous spring that he was going to be reviewing gun-control legislation. He asked the Minister when he was going to take action. What did the Minister say? Indeed, a review was taking place. He hoped to have the recommendations in his hands very shortly. Undoubtedly that would lead to legislation. Since then more coroner's juries have recommended tightening gun-control laws. More people have died through the use of firearms. More children have been killed accidentally through the use of firearms. How much longer is the Government going to wait? How much longer is he going to refuse to heed the plea of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, coroner's juries, members of his own caucus, before the Minister finally takes action to tighten gun-control laws?

In conclusion, I want to acknowledge the contribution made in this area of the law by another Member of this House, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). He has been subject to a great deal of criticism as a result of the leadership role he took in the search for tough gun-control legislation. The Hon. Member introduced legislation which in no way impinges on the right of hunters to continue to hunt safely as they see fit. Indeed, as Solicitor General he was responsible for the adoption of the original gun control legislation. It is members from all Parties, Members such as the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East, Members such as the Hon. Member for York East, and myself as an NDP Member, who again appeal to the Government to take action. Let it recognize that the time is long overdue for effective gun-control legislation. The evaluation report of the committee that looked into the existing laws found that the number of firearms charges has increased. The severity of sentences for firearms offences has increased. Most important, murder by firearms as a percentage of all murders has declined since the new legislation came into effect.

As a society which values human life, surely we have an obligation to ensure that we have the most effective gun-control laws in this country. That is the purpose of my Bill and I hope at the very least, if it is not adopted at second reading today, that it will be sent to the appropriate standing committee where the subject matter can be studied carefully and thoughtfully. Canadians can be given an opportunity to appear before that committee to voice their concerns. As a result of that process, perhaps we can adopt effective gun-control legislation.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity this evening to speak on Bill C-207. The Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) talks about loony Bills. This is a loony Bill. However, it does touch on matters of real interest not only to my constituents but to all Canadians. This is so because gun control affects the very fabric of our rights and freedoms in this democratic society. It also touches on issues of public safety, indeed, life and death. It is no wonder that when changes to Canada's gun-control legislation are under consideration, there is a very lively debate.

It remains a controversial subject and continues to inspire sharply divided opinion. Under this Bill, the Hon. Member proposes to toughen the system by replacing acquisition certificates with possession certificates. Just recently, as the Hon. Member said, Bill C-213 was debated during Private Members' hour. That Bill, sponsored by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), proposed to relax gun control in certain parts of the country. It is interesting to note that members of the same Party, the NDP, can have such divergent views. That is typical of their inconsistent and scrambled egg approach to most things of importance. It also illustrates, in all fairness, that this is a controversial subject.

In this country it is difficult to propose measures relating to firearms control. Canada is diverse, and the interests of those major urban centres such as Montreal and Vancouver are not the same as those of more remote communities. The trapper in northern Alberta and the Inuit of Baffin Island have far different interests in gun control than do people in Montreal or Vancouver. For that matter, the people in my constituency have a far different interest in gun control than do people in major urban centres.

One should also not forget the millions of Canadians who safely and responsibly enjoy firearms in sport and recreation. Let us not forget that target shooting is a very important part of the Olympic Games. I think all Canadians were justifiably proud when Linda Thom won the gold medal in pistol shooting for Canada in the 1984 Olympics. When we consider gun control let us also not forget that the use of firearms in sport, recreation, and as a means of livelihood has been part of Canada's heritage for over 400 years. Hunting and target shooting remain legitimate pastimes today enjoyed by millions of Canadians from coast to coast.

It should be emphasized that it is not the concept of gun control which is at issue here. The principles and objectives of gun control designed to prevent criminal and irresponsible use are supported by the vast majority of Canadians and deserve our full support. Any change to the legislation must recognize the legitimate interests of millions of Canadians who own and use firearms responsibly. I believe a careful balance must be struck. It is important that all those affected are carefully considered before the House brings any change in gun-control legislation.

It is as a result of my concern for the millions of honest, law-abiding Canadians who enjoy the use of firearms that I must speak out strongly against the main thrust of this Bill. I am informed that over 6,000 letters were received by the Government when a Private Member's Bill identical to this one was before this House. My own office was flooded with letters on the subject. Typically, they expressed concern about what most people perceived as proposals to place further restrictions on the use and ownership of guns in Canada. The majority of those letters indicated that we already have sufficient gun-control laws and strongly opposed greater restrictions on the use of guns.

People living in rural areas of Canada are dependent on their guns, some for their living and others simply as a means of protection of property and a form of recreation. It is worth remembering that firearms are very important to a large number of Canadians. It is an unusual farm truck in my constituency which does not have a gun rack and guns in the cab which are used daily for the legitimate purposes of sport, recreation, hunting or protection of farms from animals. The people in my constituency of Okanagan North have a strong interest in legislation which proposes to restrict their activities in this area.

Let us consider for a moment the many Canadians who would be affected by Bill C-207. In the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec alone there are over one million hunting licences issued each year. Hunting is a very popular sport and, in many cases, a means of livelihood from coast to coast in Canada. Indeed, hunting is truly a unique part of Canada's heritage. It is a pastime enjoyed by fathers and sons and, I am pleased to note, an increasing number of women are also participating in this sport.

I am talking about law-abiding citizens. Many hunters have had their firearms in their families for many years. All of these people would be required to get firearm possession certificates under this proposal. These many people have presented no problem in the way in which they use guns, and this Bill does not attack the problem areas. This Bill would only unnecessarily inconvenience millions of responsible gun owners.

Experience before 1979 and since then with the firearms acquisition certificate system does not indicate that any problem exists for which more stringent controls would be justified. This system has been in force for just over eight years, and it is still too early to determine how effective the system has been. It is certainly premature to consider introducing even more restrictive legislation.

The objectives of the gun-control legislation seem to have been forgotten when Bill C-207 was drafted. The Bill does not deal at all with the criminal element. It deals with millions of Canadians who use their firearms responsibly.

There are many implications of this Bill which concern me. I would like to make it clear that bureaucratic red tape would ensnarl the many citizens who would be affected under this Bill. First, they would have to get an application form and then present themselves to a firearms officer to make application. This can cause considerable hardship for many people in outlying areas where the nearest police station may be many miles away. They must make application during normal working hours, which would mean that many people would lose wages. This procedure would have to be carried out by millions of people.

My investigations indicate that one million man-hours would be required for the issuance of the certificate to all those who do not now hold one. That represents the equivalent of 645 police officers working full-time for one year. I think the House will agree that the time of our police can be put to better use.

Under these circumstances I urge that Members of this House treat this Bill as the loony Bill it is and reject it in favour of the present legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased as well to have this opportunity to speak to Bill C-207 concerning gun control.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that Canada has long since had legislative measures on gun control and that these measures have been endorsed by a number of previous administrations. The aims of these measures deserve our support and I think they bear repeating. Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, they are designed to prevent potentially dangerous individuals from having access to firearms, to promote—and this is very important—the sense of responsibility among owners and users of firearms, and of course to discourage criminal use of firearms as much as possible.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the measures advocated in Bill C-207 fall somewhat short of these aims and do not justify imposing additional restrictions on responsible users. This Bill does not come to grips with the real issue, which is the use of firearms for criminal purposes. All things considered, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that I will not be able to support the Bill sponsored by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

The firearms acquisition certificate system set up in 1979 was designed to single out any individual seeking to acquire a firearm by any means whatever. The provision concerning firearms acquisition certificates applies to any person over age 16 who wants to buy a firearm for the first time. It also applies to people who already owned firearms before 1979 and who now wish to purchase additional firearms or to borrow one from a friend. The existing legislation on firearms acquisition certificates already covers a lot of ground.

The Criminal Code now includes additional provisions for another mechanism to identify firearm owners who could be dangerous and prevent them from owning and using these firearms.

First and foremost, Mr. Speaker, these measures include important preventive measures which reinforce the prohibition powers of the court.

In several cases, the court can issue an order of prohibition, which is a court order prohibiting a person from owning a firearm, ammunition or an explosive substance, as its name would indicate.

First, the court must impose a prohibition of at least five years when an offender has been convicted or released under Section 662.1, that is in relation with:

-an offence involving acts of violence punishable by a maximum penalty of at least ten years of imprisonment, or

-an indictable offence covered by Section 83, that is use of a firearm in committing an indictable offence.

Second, subsection 98(2) of the Criminal Code gives to the courts the discretionary power to issue an order of prohibition when a person is convicted or released under Section 662.1, that is in relation with:

-an offence committed accompanied by violence or by an attempt or threat of violence against another person, or

-an offence involving the use, carrying, possession, handling, shipping or storing of a firearm or ammunition.

For neither of these prohibitions is it necessary for the person involved to have used violence. It is enough for that person to have threatened to use it, such as in the case of aggravated theft, or to have attempted to do so.

A third provision also allows for preventive prohibition. If a peace officer has reasonable grounds to believe that public safety justifies it, he can make such a request to a provincial court judge. If the judge of the provincial court agrees to this request, he can prohibit someone from owning firearms, ammunitions or explosive substances for a maximum period of five years. This order can be issued following or without a conviction for an indictable offence.

Finally, the Criminal Code also provides a power of prohibition in cases where the firearms officer is asked to refer to a judge of the provincial court a refusal to grant a firearms acquisition certificate. If the judge of the provincial court agrees to such a refusal, he can prohibit the claimant from owning firearms for a maximum period of five years.

It is therefore obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the courts already have extensive powers to deal with the criminal and irresponsible elements in of our society. It must be emphasized that those provisions only apply, in a very selective way, to persons who, there are reasons to believe, are a danger to themselves or to society. As opposed to the provisions in Bill C-207, prohibition provisions do not decry the vast majority of firearm owners who in the last analysis are honest, law-abiding, responsible citizens, Mr. Speaker. And the available data indeed support that contention.

The annual report on firearms issued by the RCMP Commissioner includes pertinent and interesting statistics. In 1986, more than 184,000 firearm acquisition applications have been filed, of which 1,339 were rejected, less than 1 per cent. The fact that more than 99 per cent of all applications are approved confirms that the vast majority of firearm owners in Canada are responsible and do not endanger public safety.

Prohibition order statistics also are very interesting and revealing. During 1986, 5,378 persons were prohibited from owning firearms, ammunition or explosive substances. By the end of 1986, such prohibitions involved a cumulative total of 20,307 people.

Mr. Speaker, it is my personal view that those data are self-explanatory. Thanks to the current legislative measures which identify all those who wish to acquire firearms and forbid selectively those who are a public security risk from possessing firearms, Bill C-207 would be superfluous. The purpose of this Bill is not to deal with criminals and irresponsible individuals. It would only impose an unfair and unnecessary burden on legitimate firearm users.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we would better achieve the true objectives of firearm control by strictly imposing heavy penalties on all those convicted of an offence involving the improper, criminal or reckless use of firearms. In other words, I think that it would be better to punish severely all criminals and irresponsible individuals, and not create new obstacles for law-abiding citizens wishing to possess firearms for legitimate sporting or leisure activities, as would be the case with Bill C-207.

The current legislation includes, in the area of sentencing, a whole series of provisions to dissuade criminals from using firearms. The Criminal Code, as amended in 1977, has reinforced the penalties which the courts may impose. The most significant of these new means provides, under Section 83 of the Criminal Code, in the case of a first offence, for a penalty of not less than one year and not more than 14 years, to every one who, and I quote: "uses a firearm while committing or attempting to commit an indictable offence". This new section, which came into force on January 1, 1978, provides that a sentence so imposed on a person would be served consecutively to any other punishment imposed on him or her.

In the case of subsequent offences, the minimum penalty is increased to three years and should also be served consecutively to any other punishment.

Also, the legislation provides for the following offences and penalties: a fine or imprisonment of not more than two years for permit related offences; a fine or imprisonment of no more than five years for the possession of a firearm by a person who is prohibited from owning one; the possession of a prohibited weapon, pointing a gun at another person, carrying a concealed weapon without a permit; and also an imprisonment of no more than ten years for carrying a weapon or an imitation thereof for a purpose dangerous to the public peace or for the purpose of committing an offence.

In addition to the penalties I have just mentioned, there are safety related offences dealing with the handling, storage and sale of firearms.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the whole series of offences and penalties which I have just described may effectively achieve the essential goals of firearm control, which are to dissuade their criminal and ill-advised use and discourage their irresponsible and inconsiderate use.

According to an independent evaluation carried out every three years of the current legislative measures, these provisions have had positive results.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the provisions of Bill C-207 are not aimed at facing the true problem which is the criminal and irresponsible use of firearms. It would introduce bureaucratic complications which would prove expensive by absorbing the modest resources of the criminal justice system and represent an unfair burden for millions of honest and law-abiding users. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I will vote against Bill C-207.

[English]

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-207, a proposal to amend the gun-control provisions of the Criminal Code.

When I was born in a teacherage in a remote spot in Alberta, we had a gun in the house. We have always had guns and have handled them safely and well. They have given us a great deal of pleasure and have provided a great deal of food.

Guns have not proven to be any problem to us. The only person ever killed violently in our family was my grandfather who died in a car accident in 1929. No one has ever been killed due to the use of a gun in our family.

I have always believed that guns are an essential part of our lives in western Canada, and Alberta in particular.

In essence, the proposed amendments to the legislation would extend the current law in three ways. First, individuals who owned a firearm prior to 1979 and who have not subsequently obtained a firearms acquisition certificate would be required, if they wished to retain possession of the firearm, to submit themselves to screening by police. The purpose of this screening would be to determine if their possession of a firearm constitutes a hazard to their safety or to the safety of others. Second, it would mean that the mere possession of ammunition by anyone who has not passed this screening will be an offence under the Criminal Code of Canada. Finally, the amendment would require anyone who has a firearm or ammunition in a motor vehicle to have a firearms possession certificate. I would like to use the time available to outline some very serious reservations I have regarding these proposed changes.

• (1740)

The current legislation provides the legal basis to deny individuals who wish to acquire a firearm the right to do so if there is reasonable cause to believe, for the safety of the public, that they should not have one. It is intended to prevent convicted criminals who have used violence against another person, or who have used firearms in the commission of their crimes, and individuals who have been treated for mental disorders associated with violent behaviour, or who have attempted or threatened violence against others, all within a previous five-year period, from legally acquiring firearms.

At the time the current legislation was being drafted, a choice had to be made as to whether or not this screening should apply to everyone who possessed a firearm or only to those who would acquire one after the legislation came into effect. For a number of reasons, and as a result of a delicate compromise, it was decided to follow the latter course.

It is implied in the explanatory notes to the Bill that the current law does not apply these screening provisions to individuals who acquired their firearms prior to its inception, and the proposed change is necessary to correct this lacuna. While it is true that the screening provisions do not apply with respect to individuals who possessed firearms prior to 1979, and who do not intend to acquire another one, there are, however, other adequate existing procedures which are intended to achieve the same end result. I am referring here to the actions which may be taken under the provisions of Section 98 and Section 101 of the Criminal Code.

Section 98 provides the authority under various circumstances for the courts to impose a prohibition order which prohibits individuals subjected to the order from possessing firearms, ammunition or an explosive substance for a specified period of time. In some cases, these orders are mandatory additions to sentences imposed upon convictions for crimes in which violence against a person is used. In other cases, a peace officer or a firearms officer, who has reason to believe that it would not be desirable in the interest of public safety for a person to possess any firearm, ammunition or explosive substance, may apply to a provincial court judge for an order prohibiting that person from possessing any of these items.

Not only do these procedures exist, but they are being used for the purposes intended. I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the latest annual firearms report to the Solicitor General of Canada by the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Page 13 of this report states that in Canada, during 1986, there were 3,474 people prohibited from possessing firearms, ammunition or explosive substances pursuant to the provisions of subsection 98(1).

These are mandatory prohibition orders imposed as a result of a conviction of an indictable offence where the offender might have been sentenced to 10 years imprisonment or more. Such orders do not take effect until the offender's release from imprisonment. There were also 951 of what are termed "discretionary prohibition orders" issued in 1986 pursuant to subsection 98(2) of the Criminal Code. Under this subsection the courts have the discretion to prohibit an individual who has been convicted of an offence involving the use, carriage, possession, handling, shipping or storage of any firearm, ammunition or any offence, other than an offence referred to in subsection (1), in the commission of which violence against a person was used, threatened or attempted, and where they believe it is not reasonable for the person to possess firearms.

The courts have made good use of the prohibition orders available to them in the Criminal Code.

In addition to these procedures, I can inform you, Mr. Speaker, that there is another procedure with far-reaching implications which exists in the code for the protection of us all. Under Section 101, a peace officer may apply to a magistrate for a warrant to search for and to seize any firearm, ammunition or explosive substance or offensive weapon which he believes would be dangerous to the public peace if it were to be in the possession or control of a person. Furthermore, a peace officer may carry out a search and seizure without a warrant in circumstances where application for the warrant would be rendered impracticable by exigent circumstances. Such a right, surely, was not conferred lightly. It impinges on our basic desire for freedom from intrusion into the sanctity of our homes.

Law with force such as this does not need the additional restrictions contemplated in Bill C-207. The control of ammunition is also an issue which apparently the Bill's author would like to inject into the Criminal Code. I think it is important for us to realize that more restrictions and controls are not necessarily solutions to all our problems. If firearms are adequately controlled, the question of ammunition should not be a problem.

Furthermore, if it is the Hon. Member's intention to control ammunition, I think Bill C-207 needs further drafting in order to avoid some real problems. Ammunition is not defined. We have in the country thousands of persons using muzzle-loading firearms. Are their black powder or lead balls considered to be ammunition? Other shooters, for economy and quality control purposes, assemble their own ammunition. I have spent hours and hours making bullets. Are ammunition components to be controlled or only assembled ammunition?

I am particularly disturbed by another effect of the amendment which would impose a type of de facto carrying permit regime for firearms such as any rifle or shotgun and, worse still, could turn law-abiding citizens into criminals. The Bill would not only require everyone who possesses a firearm to have a possession certificate but would also require that anyone who possesses one, or ammunition for that matter, in a motor vehicle have such a certificate.

Furthermore, the proposed amendment would require any occupant of a motor vehicle, if he becomes aware that a firearm or ammunition is present in the vehicle, to have reason to believe that some occupant of the vehicle is the holder of a possession certificate. The reasonable action of anyone finding himself in these circumstances would be to determine if indeed some occupant did possess a certificate. Ordinary citizens, in consequence of such an obligation, must become involved in the enforcement process, because if they fail to do so, they can be charged with committing an indictable offence. Enough said, I believe, of the possible dangers posed by this type of legislation.

In conclusion, let me say that this Bill does not improve the current legislation. Worse, it encumbers it with unnecessary additions and further unwarranted restrictions. I believe it is not deserving of our support.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a word or two in connection with Bill C-

207, which, as you know, is an Act to amend the Criminal Code with respect to gun-control laws and legislation.

The Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has pointed out that I have had a great interest in this area of the law, along with other areas of the criminal justice system, since I came here as a Member of Parliament some three years ago. I did not come lacking in interest in this area, I came bringing my interest in this area of the criminal justice system with me when I came to Ottawa.

• (1750)

I recognize as you do, Sir, and as has been outlined in the House this afternoon, that this is a very controversial area in which there is a wide divergence of opinion as to just what should be done with respect to gun control. We have heard this afternoon, and I have heard in the past on many occasions, that in fact rather than tightening gun-control laws we should be loosening them up or, at the very minimum, we should leave them alone.

Mr. Lesick: Hear, hear!

Mr. Redway: The Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Lesick) has said, "Hear, hear!". Of course, during his own remarks he said that in all his long career in using and having guns in his family none of them have ever lost their lives as a result of the use of firearms. Thank goodness that that has been the case. We would be devastated to learn that the Hon. Member or any member of his family had lost their lives through the use of guns. I am sure that, very fortunately, the Hon. Member has never had the opportunity to walk down the street during a bank robbery or the hold-up of a gas bar. There are people who have had other experiences in this respect, particularly police officers whom we all call upon to aid and to assist us when we are faced with dangerous situations such as people carrying and using firearms in an improper fashion.

As I indicated, I have listened carefully to this debate. I have listened to such debates many times in the past. There are those who feel that we should tighten up gun-control legislation. There are those who feel that we should leave it alone. There are those who feel that we should loosen it up. Surely, we can come up with some laws that deal with all of the concerns and all of the situations that have been pointed out this afternoon, concerns which are pointed out on the many occasions when this subject is raised.

There are certainly legitimate concerns on the part of hunters and target-shooters. That is something which we all understand. However, at the same time there are other legitimate problems that exist with the use of firearms. We have to have some gun-control legislation to deal with those problems. I think perhaps the most pressing of these at the present time are the ones that have been pointed out by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. My friend, the Hon. Member for Burnaby, referred to the resolution dealing with firearms that was passed one year ago in August of 1986 by the eighty-first annual conference of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. At that time the chiefs of police were calling upon the Solicitor General of Canada to address their concerns in conjunction with his provincial counterparts and to take the steps necessary to end the increase in available weapons, as well as to review the present gun-control laws.

In their resolution they pointed out a number of situations with which they are concerned. One concern in particular, that which causes the greatest concern to them—I know it does to the Chief of Police in my own city of metropolitan Toronto—is expressed in the following resolution:

> WHEREAS there is presently a worldwide surplus of automatic and semi-automatic weapons primarily designed for purposes of warfare now finding their way into the Canadian market place—

Obviously, that is the area of greatest concern to the police. What police officer, chief of police or otherwise, would want to see any one of his compatriots or colleagues on the police force face in a show-down someone armed with an automatic or a semi-automatic machine gun when that police officer had in response to defend him or herself a revolver in order to serve and protect the public as they are sworn to do? The growing number and the world-wide surplus of automatic and semi-automatic weapons is an area that really has to be addressed, and addressed seriously by the Government.

In order to try to express my own concerns with this situation, as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, I have raised questions in the House on two occasions dealing with gun control. The first occasion was about a year and a half ago. It came about immediately after the Boyarski case in Metropolitan Toronto in which guns were used, guns that had been used which did not comply with the present gun-control legislation. At that time the Solicitor General, who was then the law officer in charge of this legislation, indicated that there would be some changes made to our gun-control laws, and made very promptly. That was about a year and a half ago.

Subsequently, one year ago, I raised the issue again in a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who had then assumed the responsibilities for gun-control legislation. At that time the Minister indicated that there would be prompt action in this regard. Now, almost two years have passed since the Government indicated that we would be seeing something in the way of new gun-control legislation, and we have not seen anything of the sort. I know it is disturbing to the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

Although hunters and target-shooters are content with what we have now, I believe that it is disturbing to the average Canadian. The average Canadian now lives in an urban area and is faced with these potential dangers, not the danger of someone hunting ducks or deer or of someone shooting a clay pigeon or shooting at targets on a range, but with the problems of people running around the streets with weapons that may very well cause problems, and very serious ones.

It is long overdue that the Government start to address this problem and to introduce some legislation to deal with it. I hope that the Minister of Justice intends to do so, and to do so in the reasonably near future.

I have to say that I have had a research assistant trying to deal with this problem for the past six months and to liase with the Minister. He has been unable to meet with the staff of the Department on this subject because of one problem after another that has presented itself. The time has come to deal with this matter, and to deal with it promptly. I hope that we will not have another delay as referred to by the Minister of Justice in the press just yesterday. He was quoted as saying that he agrees that there is a demand for criminal justice law reform but he feels that it has to be a slow and laborious exercise. Heavens, Mr. Speaker, the time for slow and laborious exercise has certainly passed in the case of gun control.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to read a statement to the House at this time concerning Private Members' Business for Thursday, September 17, 1987.

The Hon. Member for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier) has withdrawn his Bill, Bill C-259, which, according to the order of precedence, would be scheduled for debate on Thursday, September 17, 1987. It has been impossible to arrange for any other item of Private Members' Business to take its place on that day. Therefore, no notice will be published for Private Members' Hour on Thursday. The House will continue with the business before it prior to that time pursuant to Standing Order 39(3)(b).

The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—SENTENCE IN QUEBEC NATIONAL ASSEMBLY MURDER CASE—CALL FOR REFORM OF CRIMINAL LAW

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I know that you are well aware of the infamous case of Denis Lortie. You will recall that he is the man who, some three years ago, burst into the Quebec National Assembly carrying two sub-machine guns. Interestingly enough, we were just talking about gun control legislation. Mr. Lortie stormed into the Quebec National Assembly carrying two sub-machine guns, and within the space of some 45 minutes he had killed three innocent government employees and wounded some 13 others.

At that time Lortie was convicted of first degree murder. He appealed that conviction, was granted a new trial, and finally in May of this year he pleaded guilty to three charges of second degree murder and nine charges of attempted murder. At that time he was sentenced by Mr. Justice Desjardins to a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment.

I do not know what you think of, Mr. Speaker, when you hear the words "life in prison". What do they in fact mean in the case of Lortie? Well, in the Lortie case a life sentence means that he can apply for parole after 10 years. Not only can he apply for parole after 10 years, but it has been decided that the three years he has already spent in prison will be part of that 10 years. In fact, he can apply for parole, and will likely be out on parole after seven years at the most, and that for the murder, whether first or second degree, of three people, and a conviction on the charge of attempted murder of nine others.

Is that life in prison? It does not mean life imprisonment to me. I suspect it does not mean life imprisonment to you, Mr. Speaker. I venture to say that it does not mean life imprisonment to the vast majority of Canadians. I suspect that Canadians probably think life imprisonment means what happened in the case of Rudolf Hess. Once sentenced to life imprisonment, he did serve the rest of his natural life in prison. Of course, that is not what life imprisonment means in the case of the sentence of Denis Lortie, even though the judge used the words "life in prison".

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will recall another case that occurred very recently, the case of one Yves Trudeau. He has two nicknames. Some people know him as "Apache" Trudeau, and some people call him the "Mad Bumper". Yves Trudeau is a biker. He has confessed to murdering 43 people, and he is believed to have been involved in the murder of 40 others.

In exchange for turning police informer, Yves Trudeau was allowed to plead guilty to manslaughter. And he was sentenced, you guessed it, to life in prison. What does life in prison mean as far as Apache Trudeau is concerned? In his case, it means parole after seven years. This man admitted to killing 43 people and he is suspected of killing another 40, a total of 83 people. His sentence "life imprisonment" is seven years. Can you believe that, Mr. Speaker? Well, I cannot believe it. I know that by and large Canadians cannot believe it either.

Obviously we need something in the way of a major reform, at least in our sentencing in criminal cases and in our criminal justice system. The previous Government thought so too. It appointed something called the Canadian Sentencing Commission to study that problem. The Commission reported in March of this year. It said that there was a lack of public confidence in criminal sentencing, that there were great differences in sentencing for the same offences and that there were too many people being sent to jail for non-violent offences.

The commission came up with a long list of recommendations which basically were aimed at restoring public confidence in our criminal justice system. How can we restore the confidence of the great Canadian public in our criminal justice system? I believe there are certain basic things we should be thinking of here. We should be wanting to make sure that a person who commits a serious offence pays a proper penalty for it by spending a substantial part of that person's life in prison.

I believe that we should be looking at longer sentences for violent crimes, particularly murder. I believe that we should not be trivializing murder and other serious offences, particularly violent crimes, by rapid paroles. I believe that we should be trying to put more certainty into the sentencing procedure. We should limit the discretion that judges have in imposing sentences, not tying their hands altogether, but putting some definite limitations on their discretion and we should make them spell out specifically what sort of sentences they are imposing. We should not kid the troops by saying life imprisonment when we mean only 10, 15, 25 or even 7 years. We should make judges spell out specifically when parole of any sort is applicable and for how long a period. That is the sort of thing we should be doing.

I hope tonight that we will have from the Parliamentary Secretary some specific words on the subject, that he will tell us that that is what the Government will do and that it will do it fast. I hope he will not tell us, as reported in the newspaper yesterday, that although this report of the Sentencing Commission came out in March of this year that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is not going to meet with his provincial counterparts on this until 1988. Surely the Government can do better than that.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for raising this issue because I must say at the outset that his remarks faithfully mirror the concerns of many Canadians in this respect. As it happens, they often find it hard to understand why an individual sentenced to five years should be paroled after a year and a half under conditions with which they are not familiar.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice shares the concerns not only of the Hon. Member but of many Canadians, and I think he has made a commitment to take vigourous action to prevent crime, and violent crime more specifically. Perhaps the sanctions provided under the criminal Code ought to be more in line with the seriousness of the criminal act involved.

Last March 27 the Minister of Justice tabled in the House the report of the Canadian Sentencing Commission, a complex document of 592 pages containing 91 recommendations. We must take time to make an in-depth analysis of this report and give it all the attention it deserves. The report recommendations have significant implications concerning every aspect of the criminal justice system, from police work to sentence serving. Its consequences for the provinces are particularly significant because they have jurisdiction over the administration of justice and the enforcement of many sanctions prescribed under the Criminal Code. This is why the provinces must have enough time to analyze the full impact of the report and have an opportunity to express their views at length. The Minister of Justice is therefore planning to have extensive consultations with the provincial Governments.

In addition, in view of the importance of this matter for all those involved with our criminal justice system, the Minister of Justice wants to consult all of them. These consultations should include the judiciary, the associations of defence counsels, the various provinces, the correctional authorities and certain organizations, such as the John Howard Society, which play an active role in the criminal justice system.

Finally, we must not forget the new draft of the Criminal Code prepared by the Law Reform Commission. Major reform proposals such as the new Code and the report of the Commission on sentencing cannot be examined independently. Comments about one must necessarily take the other into account.

However, in view of their importance as far as determining the direction to be given to the Canadian justice system, I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that whatever the time it takes to prepare a responsible reply to the recommendations of the Commission, this time will not be wasted.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION—COVERAGE OF REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS—REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the 67,000 Canadians who entrusted their savings and RRSP funds to Principal Trust and its affiliated companies will lose $191 million as a result of the bankruptcies of these companies and particularly of First Investors and Associated Investors.

Speaking for the Government, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) has denied any real responsibility for this disaster by pointing out that with the exception of Principal Savings and Trust, whose depositors had their funds insured by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, all the other subsidiaries of that original trust company were established under the laws of the Province of Alberta and their depositors were not covered by CDIC. That claim is factually and legally correct.

There is at least one group of people who invested their savings in subsidiary companies and who had every right to expect that their money would be protected. I am referring to the thousands of people who put part or all of their savings into registered retirement savings plans through these Principal subsidiaries.

These people were encouraged to put their money into these plans by federal legislation which told them that if they did so, they would not have to pay any income tax on that money until after retirement, when the plan would begin to give them an income which, together with the old age assistance and Canada Pension Plan, would permit them to live in relative comfort. Of course, at that time they would begin to pay income tax on that money.

It was not surprising that thousands of people put their RRSP funds into affiliated companies on the advice of the salesmen. The salesmen were paid a 3 per cent commission for making sales in these companies rather than the 1.5 per cent commission they were paid for sales in Principal Trust itself. Naturally they pushed the subsidiaries, and it is not surprising that they often did not warn their customers about the lack of protection in those companies.

Thousands have now had their retirement incomes wiped out. The tax they would have had to pay when they retired will also disappear. Surely it is time to amend the income tax law so that moneys put into RRSPs are required to be put into plans which are covered by CDIC.

The stories of some of the people who were hurt are just unbelievably sad. Let me put on record a few of the cases of which I have heard.

A 71-year-old man and his wife had over $17,000 in RRSPs and $20,000 in term certificates with First Investors. They were hoping for a small monthly income in their old age. Now everything is gone.

A senior citizen had $77,000 in RRSPs and term certificates with Associated Investors and First Investors. He now has only $200 in the bank. His entire life savings are gone.

A senior citizen had $12,000 in term certificates with First Investors. This amount was originally in Principal Savings and Trust Company and was insured. Without permission and with specific instructions not to do so, it was transferred over to the subsidiary companies that had no insurance.

An older gentleman had $15,000 in RRSPs. This represented his savings from over 20 years. He was told that the investment was guaranteed, but obviously it was not and his money is all or in large part gone.

A widower who is over 70 years invested all his life savings with First Investors. That money has disappeared.

• (1815)

I call on the Government to take its responsibilities seriously and act on behalf of ordinary Canadians who have been persuaded, and often duped, into investing in uninsured funds. The money involved was saved with great difficulty in order that they could live with some dignity and comfort in their retirement years. The least the Government can do is to amend the Income Tax Act with respect to RRSPs to ensure that the money invested in that way is covered by CDIC insurance. I call on the Government to take action and not delay any longer. Enough people have been seriously and grievously hurt.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has always been to protect the deposits of Canadians against the loss of funds they could incur if the institution holding their deposits should go bankrupt.

Until now, full insurance coverage by the CDIC has been limited to certain types of deposits whose total amount does not exceed an amount set in the Act, which amount is now $60,000. The reason for this is that, contrary to small depositors, individuals and corporations having very large deposits or other types of investments normally have the knowledge and capacity to diversify their risks and avoid undue losses which could result from the bankruptcy of a financial institution. In other words, the purpose of deposit insurance is not to guarantee the types of investments made by corporations and wealthy individuals.

Members of this House will certainly agree that this reasoning still holds and applies just as well to RRSPs as to ordinary deposits. I especially wish to remind the Hon. Member that, if the Government maintained the present ceiling of $60,000 for full insurance coverage by the CDIC in Bill C-42, it was precisely because it wanted to make certain that the majority of small RRSP owners, that is those who invest only in regular deposit instruments and guaranteed investment certificates, would still be fully insured.

However, the solution proposed by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is less than satisfactory. Under the Income Tax Act, Canadians are now entitled to choose among a large number of investment instruments with a savings retirement program associated with a RRSP. Any initiative to limit RRSP investments to insurable deposits under the Deposit Insurance Corporation Act would be too restrictive. It would probably result in the disappearance of self-managed RRSPs and reduce the possibility for RRSP owners of obtaining higher returns thanks to a more diversified investment strategy.

It is also important to provide similar protection when non-member corporations are involved. There is now an investigation in Alberta on the misrepresentations which could have occured in relation with Principal Trust, which is a member institution of the Deposit Insurance Corporation, and its non-member affiliates, First Investors and Associated Investors. In addition, the Government of Canada has already taken certain initiatives in Bills C-42 and C-56 to increase protection of consumers in general, and it is planning to take other such initiatives in the next legislative package on the reform of the financial sector.

We also recognize the need to co-ordinate consumer protection measures in view of the sharing of jurisdiction over financial services. This is why this matter is also the subject of ongoing discussions with the provinces.

THE CONSTITUTION—1987 CONSTITUTION ACCORD—LANGUAGE MINORITY GROUPS—REPRESENTATION OF LANGUAGE MINORITY GROUPS IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked last June 5 had to do with the Constitutional Accord, more particularly with the provisions concerning the protection of the rights of official language minority groups. It will be recalled that the accord was tabled in the House on June 3. On June 4 I put a question to the Prime Minister, and I raised the issue again on June 5.

Mr. Speaker, I have already explained the problem we are faced with, either here in the House or before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitutional Accord. I have had an opportunity to explain the problem facing minorities.

The only thing mentioned in the accord is the obligation of the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures to protect the rights of official language minority groups. There is no question of promotion. To me, that is insufficient.

Protecting the present situation is tantamount to protecting the status quo, which is just another way of saying that, because of the rapid rate of assimilation which will be threatening us in the coming years, we of the Canadian Diaspora, it threatens with disappearance groups who are important for the survival of this country, our Canada, with two official languages.

We believe that the Meech Lake Accord must be amended so as to include, in addition to the notion of protection of the linguistic duality, the notion of promotion of that duality. This is a crucial aspect, especially for the francophone minorities outside Quebec.

If we are prepared to include in our Constitution the notion of linguistic duality, as suggested in the accord and as a fundamental characteristic of Canada, it seems to me the least we can say is that we must make sure that this fundamental characteristic will endure and be the subject of some kind of promotion on the part of both federal and provincial government levels. This requires the assurance that there will be promotion in addition to preservation.

Yet, notwithstanding all the evidence heard by the special committee to urge the Government to amend the accord, it has been to no avail. The Prime Minister keeps saying that the accord cannot be amended lest it be compromised.

But what was the specific purpose of this new constitutional round? It was to redress the situation where Quebec was not a full-fledged member of the Canadian constitutional family. Therefore, negotiations were based on the five proposals submitted by the Quebec Government: first, the specific recognition of Quebec as a distinct society; second, the guarantee that Quebec's powers in the area of immigration will be widened; third, a limitation to the Canadian Government's spending powers; four, a review of the constitutional amendment process, including the recognition of Quebec's veto right; and five, Quebec's involvement in the appointment of Supreme Court justices.

We in the Liberal Party support all those principles. But as our Leader the Right Hon. John Turner stated last week, and I quote:

> We want to provide better protection to official language minorities by ensuring that the Canadian Government has a responsibility not only to protect, but also to promote the rights of official language minorities across Canada. Provinces also would have an opportunity to commit themselves not only to the protection but also to the promotion of our linguistic duality.

Mr. Speaker, we accept the Meech Lake Agreement because we accept Quebec's five claims. However, I cannot see how the amendment we are proposing on the obligation, at least at the federal level, to promote language duality might conflict with Quebec's demands. In my view, this creates no problem as far as adopting the Meech Lake Agreement is concerned.

Moreover, I cannot see how this amendment can be rejected by other provinces because only those that would want to would be committing themselves. If they do not want to, no problem, they will not have to. The idea would be that the federal level, the Canadian Parliament would undertake to promote official languages across the country and that provinces in due course, when they feel like it, would do the same.

If they are generous enough towards their minority and if they really believe in what they signed when they recognized this language duality as a basic feature of Canada, then they could and should prove their good intentions by becoming promoters of that language duality.

To me, Mr. Speaker, as to many experts we heard here and in committee, there is no problem with that amendment. The Government would have us believe that we want to foul up the Agreement. That is not true! We wholeheartedly want Quebec to join Canada again in an atmosphere of good will.

If there are problems, and I feel that I have just demonstrated that there are none with the addition of the word "promotion", those who are saying that there are problems should provide proof of that: the onus is on them, not on us.

A newspaperman wrote this morning in the Montreal Gazette—and I was quite surprised to read that Mr. William Johnson could write anything like that—and I quote in English from the Montreal Gazette of September 12, 1987:

• (1825)

[English]

> So the come-from-behind Liberals propose to give to Ottawa and all the provinces the responsibility for "promoting" as well as preserving minority language rights and linguistic duality.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the "come-from-behind" label. The day following the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord, I raised in the House the issue of adding promotion to the Accord in addition to ensuring the protection of minorities.

I suggest, therefore, that Mr. Johnson should read these documents and make sure he realizes that what we want is neither more nor less, and that if we say that there will be protection, Mr. Speaker, it is quite normal to say that there must be also promotion if we are really serious about this Accord.

Mr. Speaker, the Government which resists any amendment refuses to share the legal opinions it has received from many specialists on the real impact the definition of "distinct society" may have.

Mr. Speaker, are the rights of women, natives, linguistic minorities truly subject to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms? I think so, but the Government adds: We have authorities, legal opinions which support this position.

If such legal opinions exist, why does the Government not share them with us and tell us exactly where this difficult question which is the subject of a national debate comes from?

The Government has recognized that promoting a linguistic duality is essential. I simply refer you to the Official Languages Act which incorporates in a Parliament's statute the obligation for the Federal Government to get involved in promotion.

Well, we are all aware that a statute may be amended, but a constitution is strong and resistant. All we want is: Make sure that not only the constitutional concept is accepted and enshrined, that the Federal Government is really committed to preserve the French reality outside Quebec and the English reality inside Quebec, but that it is obligated to promote this concept.

I feel this is not difficult to understand and does not seem to affect the Meech Lake Accord in anyway, except that it will give something very strong and reinforce the obligation for the Federal Government not only in a statutory fashion, but also in a Constitutional fashion, also to promote preservation.

Mr. François Gérin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand anything anymore.

My colleague has been promoting the official languages, his record is impressive in that respect and I commend him for that. But now he is getting mixed up and tripping over carpet flowers. Listen, all he has to do is look it up in the official languages measure which was tabled recently, Bill C-72, which says in so many words that the Government will have to promote this Canadian duality in its institutions. But that is already a fait accompli. Where my friend gets all mixed up is when he starts talking about the Meech Lake Accord. That is where he trips, falls down, and does not know how to get back on his feet. I can understand him to a certain extent because to them and to Quebec, what did distinct society mean in 1982? In 1982, "distinct society" meant that Quebec was being left right out of the Constitutionbal Accord, it simply was not there. What you did was unspeakable, and you signed that without Quebec.

Today we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who gets along with the ten provincial premiers, he comes up with an accord, you admit it is a nice accord but in fact you are saying it lacks this and lacks that. Everything was lacking when you signed the accord because Quebec was left out, half of Canada was missing, one of the founding peoples was missing , everything was missing. And today you are telling us that we ought to add promotion . . . not the other provinces but only Quebec. But it is included in Bill C-72.

Well, make up your mind on this question, make up your mind about the Meech Lake Accord, take a definite position, stop straddling the issue. The Meech Lake Accord is the perfect constitutional accord for 1987. In 1995, in 1992, at the next constitutional round we can amend it, Mr. Speaker. Do not back both horses. It is a perfect accord. It is a perfect accord today, it is endorsed by nearly all Canadians.

The Liberals simply cannot make up their mind. Stop confusing people.

Mr. Gauthier: You do not understand anything!

Mr. Gérin: Be a man, as we say. Be a man. If you are to support it, do so without reservations. After that we will work together to build a better Canada. For the time being remember the very serious mistake you made by leaving Quebec out in 1982. Neither the Conservatives nor the New Democrats did that. You Liberals did that. So remember that and continue to promote linguistic duality, but without bringing in issues which are irrelevant. Congratulations to the Prime Minister for his Meech Lake Accord!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

YOUTH

KATIMAVIK TRAINING CENTRE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Grondin (Saint-Maurice): Last Sunday, Mr. Speaker, La Presse published an article on the Katimavik training centre. Overnight, Katimavik was cut off from public funding by the Conservative Government and forced to rely on its own financial resources to maintain activities at a recreational centre located near Montreal. So for the last two years the activities of what used to be one of Canada's most popular youth projects have been reduced to a bare minimum.

Yet the people responsible for Katimavik categorically state that the $19 million budget they had under the Liberal administration could be slashed down to $15 million and they would still be able to sponsor a Canada-wide trip for 150 groups of 12 young people, feed and house them during three three-month stages.

Although it seems that the private sector is more than willing to do its share, businessmen rightfully claim that the federal Government must first ante up to finance the program.

It is astonishing and somewhat disconcerting to realize that, although the Conservative Government did pull the rug from under this program, a number of OECD countries are taking a leaf out of this program to launch similar projects.

The Conservatives misled young Canadians by making them believe they would create a replacement program for Katimavik, but in fact nothing has been announced after two years.

Katimavik was once known as the university of life. Sad to say, young Canadians soon found out that the Conservative Government did not want to have anything to do with this kind of education.

SIGNING OF INTERNATIONAL PROTOCOL ON MEASURES TO PRESERVE OZONE LAYER

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my congratulations to those countries which have succeeded in the achievement of an international protocol concerning regulatory measures for the protection of the ozone layer.

• (1405)

Earlier this afternoon in Montreal, Canada, represented by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), plus more than 50 other nations, as well as the European Economic Community, concluded the Montreal protocol on substances which deplete the ozone layer.

This agreement will see a scheduled reduction over 10 years of 50 per cent of the 1986 production levels of CFCs, or chloroflurocarbons. This chemical is closely linked with the destruction of the ozone layer which protects the earth from harmful ultraviolet rays of the sun.

To succeed in reaching an agreement among so many countries with different economic and production needs and obligations is no mean feat. Canada has been acknowledged for the important role it played in this achievement. Although we are responsible for only 2 per cent to 3 per cent of world production of CFCs, we took other nations to task to respond to the problem of the destruction of the ozone layer. I congratulate the Minister of the Environment and the whole Canadian delegation for their strong leadership, not only in getting the show on the road but seeing it through to its successful culmination.

CANADA CUP

QUALITY OF COMPETING TEAMS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): On behalf of the New Democratic Party and all our constituents, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank most sincerely all the teams which took part in the Canada Cup tournament—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Angus: Team Canada kept everyone on tenterhooks every night but in the final seconds of the last game they won it, and they won it in style. Showing tremendous courage and skill and making believers out of hockey fans everywhere, they demonstrated that you do not have to be Canadian to play hockey but it sure helps. To the players on Team Canada, thank you. Inside and outside Canada, on and off the ice, you are number one. Félicitation!

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

EARLY AND TEMPORARY RELEASE OF PRISON INMATES—TOUGHER APPROACH URGED

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the National Parole Board study found that more than 100 killings over the past 12 years were committed by inmates released early from prison.

Recently a day pass was granted to a convicted killer serving time in the Edmonton maximum security facility so that he could spend his birthday enjoying the thrills of the West Edmonton Mall. Although he was escorted he managed to escape and remained at large for some two and a half months before being recaptured. He has now been charged with two more counts of murder which he allegedly committed during his time at large.

I do not envy the National Parole Board. Their work is the kind where a 100 per cent success rate is impossible, but I must ask how many more innocent victims must pay the price before we toughen our approach to early and temporary release?

I said it on June 30 following the capital punishment vote and I say it again today: let us turn our attention to reform of the penal system. A life sentence should mean exactly that. Let us make the law work to protect Canadians.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED PRESSURING OF EMPLOYEES TO SIGN PETITION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the scandalous goings-on in the Immigration Department go from bad to worse. Following the Grossmann affair I received an anonymous letter from a department employee which stated: "This note is to let you know that employees of Employment and Immigration are being pressured to sign a petition supporting the Deputy Minister." I also received a copy of that disgusting and intimidating document, together with a copy of a letter from the President of the Immigration Union to the Deputy Minister which says: " . . . we would like to make you aware of our indignation as a result of the pressures which are being exerted upon our members by certain management officials to make them sign these petitions. Believe me, it is extremely difficult for an employee to refuse to sign such a petition when his or her refusal is seen as a refusal to support the Deputy Minister. The action in itself constitutes undue pressure upon our members."

The Government must clean up this ongoing mess. It must dismiss officials who are at the heart of these abusive actions. The Deputy Minister has gone too far and the Government needs to corral him in. More important, the Government must stop the haemorrhaging of public confidence in our institution and immigration policy.

ENERGY

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON NATURAL GAS EXPORTS

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, a great decision has been made for Canada. The National Energy Board announced on September 9 a new procedure for determining the surplus of natural gas in Canada available for export. This is history being made. This is freeing the natural gas industry from government regulation.

Under the old system producers could not sell to the U.S. market unless they had a 15-year supply of gas available for sale in Canada. The Board has announced it will scrap the surplus test and allow exports to be determined by supply and demand. Market forces will operate freely as long as they are serving Canadian needs adequately and fairly. The Board can intervene if it finds increased exports could cause market difficulty in meeting Canadians' gas requirements.

• (1410)

This decision is a win for everyone. It shows that the free enterprise system can and will work. Congratulations to the Board and to the Chairman of the National Energy Board, Mr. Roland Priddle.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CUSTOMS OFFICER'S INTENTION TO RUN IN NEW BRUNSWICK PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the House the case of Mr. Garth Brewer, a customs officer who would like to become a provincial candidate for the Carleton South riding in the New Brunswick provincial election. This week the Public Service Commission informed Mr. Brewer that he can get leave to run provided that he agree, if not elected, to move to Halifax after the election, an intolerable condition upon which to be allowed to participate.

The Public Service Commission informed my staff today that if someone in Mr. Brewer's position living in Ottawa had sought a nomination in the Ottawa area they would have been allowed to run without being required to move. During the 1984 election campaign the Progressive Conservative Party made explicit promises to grant federal public servants the right to participate fully in the political process. I regret that those promises have not been fulfilled. It is time they were because it is not fair that men and women who work for the Government of Canada are discriminated against in the way that Mr. Brewer is being discriminated against in New Brunswick.

"I SAT RIGHT DOWN AND WROTE MYSELF A POSTCARD"

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as Members of Parliament we all get mail, some of it positive and some of it negative. When I was in my riding this summer I received, through my home mail slot, a mailing from the postal union. It contained four separate cards that were to be mailed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) and "your own MP" Each postcard demanded that the Government instruct Canada Post to improve and expand postal service and to put an end to privatization measures.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I have an opportunity to write to myself, so I filled in my own name on the MP card and wrote across the front: "I think you're doing an excellent job!" On the back I wrote: "I understand what your government is doing to improve postal service". This is a photocopy of that card.

I then mailed the original card in my own riding of Nanaimo—Alberni. Much to my surprise the postcard did not arrive at my Ottawa office the next week, nor the week after that, nor the week after that, nor this week.

Some Hon. Members: No, no!

S. O. 21

Mr. Schellenberg: When, oh when, will Canada Post deliver this positive message to my door? Whatever happened to the great communication with my own MP? I am still waiting, Mr. Speaker. It has been over a month. It should arrive any day now.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY—PARLIAMENTARY NEWS SERVICE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, is there anything more tragic than the formerly great and historic Conservative Party of Canada so reduced in self-esteem and so removed from the values of a fundamental parliamentary democracy than to see this same Party stoop to the propaganda tactics which have historically been the hallmark of the zealous or the desperate?

The Conservative Party's Parliamentary News Service is an affront and insult to any self-respecting news organization in this country. As a former regional news reporter I want to say, on behalf of all regional news reporters, that this Tory pap will be received with the scorn, cynicism, and contempt it deserves when it comes over the satellite at four o'clock every day.

ALLEGED STRATEGY OF LIBERAL PARTY CAUCUS

Mr. Clément Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): While watching the Le Point program last night, Mr. Speaker, we heard from the mouth of Senator Jacques Hébert that the Liberal caucus strategy was for Liberal senators to do their utmost to boycott the work of the elected Members of Parliament.

The Senator even went so far as to say and I quote: The truth of the matter is that all the recent actions taken by Liberal Senators have always been discussed with the national caucus, that is to say, in the presence of the Liberal Members of the House and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner); moreover, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Liberal Leader in the Senate keep in touch at all times. He added that the Leader of the Official Opposition never asked the Liberal Senators to keep quiet and that the actions of the Liberal Senators while dealing with Bill C-22 and soon with Bill C-84, had his full support.

Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed with such behaviour on the part of Liberal elected Members of the House who are conspiring with appointed Senators to unduly delay the business of the House, and I think that the Leader of the Official Opposition will have to come clean with the Canadian people.

SIGNING OF INTERNATIONAL PROTOCOL ON MEASURES TO PROTECT OZONE LAYER

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the adoption of an international protocol on ozone in Montreal is a historic step for all humanity and indeed all creatures of our planet.

Canadians can be justly proud of the role of our experts and officials in the difficult negotiations to reach this end.

[Translation]

As an Arctic country, Canada has more reasons than any other country to want the production of substances which are destroying the ozone in the atmosphere to be reduced or all together stopped. Our farms, fisheries, health and cities along the shores are the most quickly affected by the erosion of the ozone layer.

[English]

While we can be pleased with the adoption of a protocol, we would be fools to be satisfied with it.

Already much damage has been done and the CFCs which cause ozone destruction have a life span of 100 years.

Further vigorous measures will be required for our survival. May Canada continue to play a leading role in taking these next vital steps.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SCIENCE WORLD IN VANCOUVER

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, last year when millions of people visited Expo 86 in Vancouver, they were delighted by a glittering golf ball. I am pleased to commend the federal Government for its decision to provide $5 million to transform that Expo Globe into a world-class science centre for British Columbia.

It is appropriate that the spherical structure which was a symbol for Expo 86 will now become home to Science World. Science World will be a showcase of British Columbia's and Canada's achievement in science and technology, and as a hands-on facility will offer a unique opportunity to learn about the world of science.

Science World will also provide significant economic benefits. As a major tourist attraction it will attract thousands of visitors to thrill and wonder in the marvellous setting of the Expo Globe.

I want to pay special tribute to the efforts of British Columbia's Arts, Sciences and Technology Society which has developed this project and will operate Science World when it opens in May, 1989.

Science World is an excellent example of how all levels of government and the private sector can work together to advance the interests of British Columbia and create delights for young and old alike.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LANGUAGE USED BY CONSERVATIVE MEMBERS FROM QUEBEC

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Tory Members from Quebec, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), played truant and travelled by bus to Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, how frustrating and humiliating it was to see those Members holding a press conference and using such foul language—

An Hon. Member: A howling swarm!

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, you know that it has been a degrading example set for our children and I think that such abusive language is due to the panic prevailing among the Tories. My grandmother would have said that they are ill-mannered, especially in their criticism of the legitimate action taken by parliamentarians in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the Tory Members from Quebec that this is not the way to improve their standing in the polls and they are only downgrading their own situation. And if, Mr. Speaker, that is the level of courtesy which the Prime Minister has advised Canadians to maintain, he should tell his Tory Members to learn how to improve their manners.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF CLERK, DEPUTY CLERK, AND CLERK EMERITUS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Governor General in Council has appointed Robert Marleau, Esquire, as Clerk of the House of Commons in the place of Charles Beverley Koester, Esquire, C.D., M.A., Ph.D., who has been appointed Clerk Emeritus.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Before joining the House in 1975, Dr. Koester, who holds a Ph.D. in history from the University of Alberta, had distinguished careers as a naval officer, scholar and teacher, and Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of Saskatchewan.

• (1420)

[English]

As Clerk Emeritus, Dr. Koester will constitute a unique resource of parliamentary insight and procedural knowledge. He will direct a critical research undertaking aimed ultimately at publishing an original comprehensive manual of procedure and practice in the House of Commons to serve as a definitive reference document for the Speaker and Members of the House of Commons. This project, known as the "Bourinot Project", was initially launched by Dr. Koester and involves an in-depth review and update of procedural reference material which has not been updated since 1916. The Project also involves the development of an extensive computerized database of procedural decisions of Speakers of the House of Commons going back to 1867.

[Translation]

Robert Marleau who succeeds Dr. Koester as Clerk of the House has, since joining the House staff in 1970, served in various positions in the procedural sector. In addition to Mr. Marleau's appointment as Clerk, the Governor in Council has also appointed Mary Anne Griffith as Deputy Clerk of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: She also has served the House for the past 17 years, in a variety of different positions.

[English]

I am also pleased to introduce to Hon. Members two new Clerks at the Table, Audrey O'Brien and William Corbett. Ms. O'Brien will perform the duties of Principal Clerk of the Table Research Branch and Mr. Corbett the duties as Principal Clerk of the Committees and Private Legislation Branch.

I am sure that Hon. Members will join with me in wishing the former Clerk of the House, Dr. Koester, every success in his new duties and in congratulating the new appointees and wishing them well in their new responsibilities.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with you in paying tribute to Dr. Koester whose devotion to this House has been an inspiration to all of us.

Institutions are above all what individuals make of them and this place, Mr. Speaker, this House of Commons, owes a part of its special character to the dignity, the selflessness and devotion Dr. Koester brought to the difficult position of Clerk. As a relative newcomer to this House I have special reason to thank Dr. Koester, in particular for his great assistance in preparing me to assume the parliamentary responsibilities of Leader of the Opposition and of Prime Minister.

I must confess there were moments during Question Period, to be precise, that I thought to myself: "Dr. Koester never told me there would be days like this", but I cannot fault a teacher of Dr. Koester's stature for these few thoughts. In fact, I suspect the accelerated circumstances of my parliamentary apprenticeship are more likely to be blamed, although some credit must be given to the enthusiasm demonstrated by colleagues on the opposition benches.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have also had opportunities to appreciate the personal qualities and professional skill of Mr. Robert Marleau, and to him I extend my best wishes of success in his duties as Clerk of the House of Commons.

I want to assure Mr. Marleau that he can count on my full co-operation and that of my political Party in the discharge of his very delicate duties.

[English]

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, seconded by my friend, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner):

> That the House, desiring to record its deep appreciation of the distinguished and faithful service of Charles Beverley Koester, Esquire, as Clerk of the House of Commons, designate him an Honorary Officer of the House of Commons with an entrée to the Chamber and a seat at the Table on ceremonial occasions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1425)

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted, as are all Hon. Members on this side of the House, to second the motion and to advise the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) in passing that we will not take advantage of the fact that it is debatable, something which might well influence the future course of the next few days in terms of what we might be able to say.

It is appropriate that the House indicate today its appreciation of Dr. Koester's services by awarding him a unique honour in his appointment as an honorary officer of the House. It recognizes not only his eight years as Clerk of the House, preceded by four as Assistant Clerk, but almost 30 years of service to the parliamentary institutions of the Commonwealth, and 45 years of service in other capacities to his country.

[Translation]

As you pointed out, Mr. Speaker, Dr. Koester was not even 20 years old when he began serving Canada as a naval officer during World War II. He was then Reserve Officer for a number of years. A learned man, distinguished educator, he had also been Clerk of the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly and the Parliament of Westminster before coming to Ottawa.

[English]

We can recall when Dr. Koester was being mooted for the appointment here at the Table of the House of Commons how impressive and varied was his support. When someone receives the support simultaneously of Allan Blakeney, Otto Lang, and the late John George Diefenbaker, then we know we have something. That certainly impressed us on this side of the House.

Dr. Koester has served the House at a time when, after much struggle and much debate, both its procedural and administrative services have been moved up to truly professional standards. It was in pursuit of such professional standards that Dr. Koester made one of his principal goals the establishment of a firm career pattern for officers of the House. It must have been satisfying for him, then, that the Government appointed as his successor the first career-long employee of the House of Commons to become Clerk of the House.

[Translation]

Although he is still young, Mr. Robert Marleau has been serving the House almost constantly over the past two decades. He began his career here after university graduation and has worked in all major procedure sectors. The knowledge and experience he has gained over years of practice will serve him well in his new duties. He knows and understands Parliament and, perhaps more important still, he knows and understands parliamentarians. He has both the vigour of youth and the wisdom of a man of experience.

[English]

I want to add my congratulations to Ms. Griffith, Ms. O'Brien and Mr. Corbett, and to wish them a fruitful time in service at the Table.

We in the Opposition join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in wishing Dr. Koester a long, happy and healthy retirement. We are looking forward to seeing him here from time to time. We congratulate him on his service to Parliament, his service to the Commonwealth and, more important, 45 years of service to his country.

• (1430)

We welcome Mr. Marleau and look forward to working with him in his new role, which is a very important role, at the Table of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I wish to indicate our complete support of the motion moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and seconded by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner).

First, I wish to say that we offer our best wishes and cooperation to the newly appointed Clerk of the House of Commons, Mr. Marleau. He is no stranger to those of us who serve in this Chamber. We welcome him warmly, and look forward to his guidance for many sessions to come.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Today, on behalf of my Party, in particular I wish to say farewell and express our appreciation to Dr. Koester on the occasion of his retirement after eight years of exemplary service as Clerk of the House. Dr. Koester was appointed Assistant Clerk in 1975. He has served as a valued colleague ever since that time.

Dr. Koester has been seen, not only by Members of the House but by those outside who follow proceedings, as an outstanding officer of the House, a man who could be relied upon for accurate and fair counsel at all times. He was ever helpful, always prepared to sit down and take the time to explain decisions in detail to many of us who have what could be called less than complete expertise in terms of knowledge of the rules. He acquitted himself with honour, dignity, and a deeply held commitment to the democratic traditions of Parliament.

Dr. Koester has a long record of distinguished public service to Canada. He is a native of Saskatchewan, and was Clerk of the Legislative Assembly in his home province for some nine years. His interests and contributions to Canadian life have been wide-ranging; as a teacher, decorated member of the Canadian Navy, historian, university professor, author, and, of course, as one of the country's leading parliamentary experts.

Dr. Koester has written extensively about one of Canada's most fascinating politicians, the first MP for Assiniboia, Nicholas Flood Davin.

If I may add a particular note on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we have a special appreciation for his extensive work on the political history of his home Province of Saskatchewan, including his book, The Measure of the Man: Selected Speeches of Woodrow Stanley Lloyd.

Dr. Koester will assume new duties here. We thank him for his great contribution in the past, and wish him well for the future.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John W. Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you and the House would indulge me for 30 seconds.

The House may not know, Sir, that there have been some 32 or 33 Speakers, and almost as many Prime Ministers. But Mr. Marleau makes only the ninth Clerk of the House of Commons.

Perhaps the House would allow me to express—as one who knows, as only you know, Sir, the importance of the Clerk of the House of Commons—my personal best wishes to Dr. Koester, to the new Clerk, and to the new Deputy Clerk, all of whom have and will serve this institution nobly and well.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

TRADE

FREE TRADE—AUTOMOTIVE ISSUE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is denying Canadians the right to know the most basic facts on the free trade negotiations. This Government's attitude is not open, it is even undemocratic. Now that the Prime Minister, under pressure from the Opposition, has asked Canadians to believe that the Auto Pact is not on the table but the automobile issue is, I would like to ask him what automobile issues that are not included in the Auto Pact are being considered by the Canadian and American negotiators? The Prime Minister will have to skate faster than Wayne Gretzky and Mario Lemieux to answer that question!

The Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will try in due time—not today but in due time—to do as Gretzky and Lemieux, and I think I will shoot and score, but in due time—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Thank you, Michel!

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says there is an undemocratic attitude with respect to international trade, but that is not the truth as suggested yesterday by Mr. Bourassa, Quebec's premier. Quebec's Liberal Premier says that everything is proceeding in the most democratic way. He is quite pleased with the Canadian Government's position. Premier Bourassa says that free trade is in the best interest of Quebecers and Canadians, and such a negative attitude on the part of the Leader of the Opposition is passing strange.

As far as automobile matters are concerned, we have been informed that the Americans intend to refer to them and raise the question, as it is their right. On our side, our right and duty is to continue fighting, as we have been since the beginning, for Canadian interests in that area.

[English]

NEGOTIATED ISSUES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, vague as that response is, I can only interpret it as an admission by the Prime Minister that the Auto Pact is on the table.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Prime Minister has neglected every opportunity we have attempted to give him to say no.

Mr. McDermid: You're flogging a dead horse.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It appears that the arrangement that the Prime Minister has with the Americans is that they can put on the bargaining table anything that they want, and they can take off the bargaining table anything that they do not want.

Why did the Prime Minister allow the Americans to take off the subject of American Government procurement policies when the Americans wanted that off the table, and why allow the Auto Pact on the table because they want that item on the table?

Would the Prime Minister answer that question and explain the manner in which his priorities on these negotiations are arranged?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that the Leader of the Liberal Party is against a free trade arrangement with the United States of America.

It is also well known that this Party and this Government are in favour. We are seeking to secure better access and the benefits that come from a free trade arrangement with the United States. That fact is well known.

At an appropriate time the people will decide whether the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Liberal Party were correct in adopting this attitude, or whether the attitude demonstrated by the Government was an appropriate one.

Ms. Copps: Call an election.

Mr. Mulroney: Yesterday the Liberal Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, said in supporting the concept of free trade:

Mr. Bourassa told reporters before the hearings got underway. "It's not a question of a party against another party. It's a question of economic common sense."

That is exactly what we have been doing from the very beginning. We have refused to become the apostles of a status quo that is diminishing. We have refused to preach protectionism. We have had the vision and the courage to take initiatives on behalf of Canada that speak to the potential of this nation and the growth that is possible. That is what we have been doing.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): During the course of these negotiations the Prime Minister has also allowed our nation to sell out on energy, to sell out on lumber, to sell out on potash, to sell out on our book publishing industry, and to sell out on shakes and shingles.

I think Canadians will want to have an opportunity to say something about this. When the Prime Minister states that we will only strike a deal if it is in the national interest, Canadians are asking right now, which nation?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we all have our moments of ambition. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will ensure that, in the future in his moments of ambition, he does not impugn the integrity and the motives of other Members of the House.

It is well known that patriotism, to coin a phrase, is the final refuge of a scoundrel. That is being proved here today.

Mr. Broadbent: No one would ever accuse you of that.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Have you read any of your own speeches?

• (1440)

Mr. Mulroney: My right hon. friend stands up every day and begins this litany of sell-outs, and he always begins with the question: "Did you sell out energy", presumably by getting rid of the NEP. Absolutely we got rid of the NEP, because the NEP was destroying Canada's interests, and it was very much in the interest of western Canada and the nation that we did it.

That is the kind of attitude of openness and courage that the Government will bring to the table in trying to bring about a comprehensive trade arrangement with the United States.

DURATION OF POSSIBLE AGREEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Did Canada originally ask for a free trade deal with a term from 10 years to 20 years, and has it dropped that demand in the most recent stage of discussions with the United States?

If so, why has the Government caved in, yet again, to the United States without getting anything of value in return? In short, why isn't the Prime Minister willing to be a patriot? Why isn't he standing up for Canada?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Riis: Pat is standing up for Canada.

Miss Carney: —I think the Hon. Member is confusing the duration—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: If they do not want to hear an answer, I am not obligated to give one.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: I think the Hon. Member—

Mr. Speaker: I know that Hon. Members would want to extend the appropriate courtesies to Ministers when they are responding to questions asked by Hon. Members.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, negotiations are still continuing on a number of issues. I think it is important for the House to understand that there is a distinct difference between the duration of an international agreement and the termination clause.

For instance, the Auto Pact, as we have said in the House, has been with us for the duration of 22 years. It has a one-year termination clause.

NORAD, which will be with us for as long as we need it, also has a termination clause of one year.

We expect that the free trade agreement will be with us as long as it benefits both countries, should we successfully negotiate one, and the matter of a termination clause will be a technicality.

BINDING DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is strange that what the Minister used to mention as a flaw in the Auto Pact, its one-year termination clause, has now suddenly become a virtue for a general free trade pact, even though the Auto Pact is not free trade and it deals with only one sector.

Has the Government now also given up its basic demand for a trade dispute settlement mechanism whose rulings would be binding on both the United States and Canada, apart from U.S. trade remedy laws, without getting anything in return?

If that is the case, why is it continuing these talks which, each day, are leading Canada further and further into disaster for its people?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is saying that termination clauses are "a virtue" or "a flaw". I am saying that termination clauses are a reality.

In response to his question about whether we are giving up our position on a binding dispute settlement mechanism, which is a way of settling disputes between both countries in an impartial manner and in a binding way, of course the answer is no.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED COUNTER-TERRORIST ACTIVITY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. According to a news report today, the RCMP has been running its own counter-terrorist activity in apparent contradiction to the mandate given to CSIS.

This is being done, according to the source, because the then Commissioner "decided to gather his own intelligence in this area".

Is this allegation true? If it is true, when did the Minister become aware of it, and what did he do about it?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy and pleased to be able to advise the Hon. Member that I became aware of this allegation this morning when I read the article in The Ottawa Citizen. So I did the normal and natural thing—I phoned the Commissioner—and asked him, and he categorically denied it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say quite sincerely to the Minister that I hope that that denial turns out to be accurate—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Poor Joe is at it again.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What are you accusing the superintendent of? Take a look at the record, Ed.

An Hon. Member: Take a deep breath, Joe.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party and his colleague and friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, could continue this private discussion after Question Period.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In the meantime, perhaps the Hon. Member could put his question.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister. Considering that this serious allegation has been denied by the RCMP, is the Minister going to leave the matter there and accept completely, on the say-so of the person with whom he has consulted, what has been said?

The evidence, I say to the Minister as he knows, in terms of conflicting obligations and allegations of interference about which we have some evidence in other matters between the two services, is quite serious.

I want to ask the Minister: Does he intend to let the matter rest there?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is shameful.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset to the Right Hon.—

Some Hon. Members: Right Honourable?

Mr. Kelleher: —I am sorry, to the Hon. Member and any other Member in the House who has any doubt about the integrity of the RCMP or the new Commissioner, that I do not have any doubts whatsoever in that regard.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): You never read the McDonald Commission report.

An Hon. Member: Let's hear you make an accusation, Ed.

Mr. Kelleher: Since I have denied it on the advice of the Commissioner, if the Hon. Member happens to have any information that is inconsistent with the answer I have given, I ask him please to advise me of it immediately, and I will take appropriate action.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S ANSWER

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that we had the resignation of the head of CSIS before the weekend and that there has been, in the long and notable tradition of the RCMP, some incidents which have been anything but noble. The Minister knows that as well as I do.

Considering that the Minister wants to maintain a service which is beyond reproach in terms of concern with civil liberties—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Always against the Mounted Police.

Mr. Broadbent: —I want the Minister to be quite clear. He is saying that he has no reason to pursue this matter any further; is that what the Minister is saying?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, what I am saying—and I will repeat it—is that I am prepared to rely upon the integrity of the RCMP and the new Commissioner. If the Hon. Member has evidence to the contrary, any innuendoes or suggestions—

Mr. Broadbent: Come on!

Mr. Kelleher: —then it is his duty and obligation as a Member of the House to bring that information to me, and I will see that it is properly dealt with.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Mazankowski: Get out of the gutter Ed; you are too nice for that.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Shameful.

Ms. Copps: Down, boys.

Mr. Broadbent: Take the McDonald Commission report home and read it tonight.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it would be helpful if the Chair remarked that in the event that this line of questioning is continuing—and the Chair has been listening very carefully to the questions and the answers—the Chair, of course, would not want questions or answers to exceed the bounds of propriety in respect of the honour of any person. If any suggestions are to be made that reflect on that, then, of course, there are other more appropriate places to make them and there are ways to do so. I am sure Hon. Members would want to keep that in mind.

REQUEST FOR RESIGNATIONS OF MINISTERS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General's Department is in an absolute mess and he knows it. Today Canadians are outraged that a serious criminal case involving attempted murder is not proceeding in British Columbia because of a so-called technicality. That so-called technicality is the incompetence and negligence of Ministers of this Conservative Government.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister, on behalf of the Government, admit responsibility for this miscarriage of justice and seek the resignations of the Ministers responsible? In the name of justice, will he do that?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member would get his facts straight. In the first case, the miscarriage, as you allege it, is not with respect to charges—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the Hon. Minister is engaged in a lot of work during this Question Period and perhaps forgets that we do not refer to other Hon. Members as "you". I see the Hon. Minister is nodding. I know he will restrain himself.

An Hon. Member: Jerk would be more appropriate.

Mr. Kelleher: I will not listen to the advice of some of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker.

In the first instance, the charges were not attempted murder. The four people charged with attempted murder were convicted and sentenced to prison for 20 years. The charges are with respect to conspiracy to murder. The charges have not been dropped. The proceedings have been stayed. In other words, it is an "adjournment".

The charges have not been dropped. The charges have not been dismissed. There is a stay of proceedings for one year. At any particular time the Attorney General of British Columbia can continue on with the case. I spoke to the Attorney General of British Columbia this morning and he advised me that it is his intention to continue to pursue the investigation vigorously and hopefully that will enable him to continue the case.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I call on the Prime Minister to take charge and put that Minister out of his misery.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FORTHCOMING COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—SAFETY OF INDIAN PRIME MINISTER

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India is scheduled to attend the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver next month. Can the Prime Minister guarantee the safety and security of Prime Minister Gandhi during his scheduled visit to Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member has any evidence to place before Canadian authorities that would cause that to be a genuine question rather than a grasp for headlines, he has a duty to make that evidence available. It is about time that Hon. Member began to perform his duty.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGENT RESPONSIBLE FOR WIRETAPS—REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Solicitor General concerning evidence which is indeed available. Is the Solicitor General now aware that on May 17, 1986, and on May 24, 1986, CSIS agents intercepted telephone communications which clearly indicated that a visiting Punjabi Minister would be on Vancouver Island and might be subject to threat? In light of the fact that there is clear documentation of these wiretaps, why is the agent who was responsible for these wiretaps still working for CSIS? Why will the Minister not accept his responsibilities, order a full parliamentary inquiry into the activities of CSIS and finally make some sense out of the bungling of this very serious investigation?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member well knows that the four people convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to jail for 20 years each are presently appealing their convictions and their sentences. Second, the Hon. Member well knows that the nine people including the four already convicted of attempted murder have been charged with conspiracy to attempt murder. Those charges have not been dismissed. There is a stay. The matter is still before the court. The investigation is proceeding and there is no way that I, as Solicitor General, given the importance of the case of a visiting cabinet Minister from another country being wounded, can discuss at this time the evidence concerning that investigation without jeopardizing a trial on a matter that is very, very important to this country.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely appalling that this Minister does not recognize that the fundamental issue is the bungling of CSIS and the fact that Ministers of the Crown rose in the House to state that the Government of Canada did not know that this Minister was in Canada, when CSIS was well aware of his presence because of wiretaps. This Minister does not understand that.

REQUEST FOR DISMISSAL OF MINISTER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn to the Prime Minister. In view of the history of incompetence within CSIS and in view of the fact that this Minister clearly does not recognize the seriousness of the problems within CSIS, does the Prime Minister not recognize that one of the biggest threats to the security of Canada and to the civil liberties of Canadians comes from the Solicitor General of Canada? Will he not do the honourable thing by firing this Minister and ordering a full parliamentary inquiry into the actions of CSIS?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that, first, the information with respect to the false affidavit was brought to me by CSIS itself. As soon as it discovered the error in the affidavit, it came forward. The director came to me within 24 hours. Within another 24 hours I had launched three or four investigations, investigations by the Inspector General and by the Osbaldeston committee, an independent inquiry by the Ministry itself, and also an investigation by the Security Intelligence Review Committee. Give the checks and balances a chance to work.

In conclusion, if I may, let me just briefly state what the Security Intelligence Review Committee has said about CSIS. It has said that it "is an important national institution worthy of continued public support"—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

DIRECTOR'S RESIGNATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General. The Minister said the other day that he felt justified in accepting the resignation of Ted Finn, the former head of the Security Service. Ted Finn held Deputy Minister status and the resignation was submitted, we are told, because of mistakes if not outright wrongdoings by someone else in the Minister's Department. The good faith and competence of Ted Finn have not been questioned at all.

When, in our parliamentary tradition, does a Deputy Minister resign because of wrongdoings or mistakes in the Department? If the Minister feels that a resignation is justified, and he said that he felt that a resignation was justified, why should that resignation not be his own?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member well knows, Mr. Finn was the Director of CSIS. He had the control and management of its operations. There was obviously a breakdown. He did the honourable thing. He accepted his responsibilities. He tendered his resignation and it was accepted.

PARLIAMENTARY ACCOUNTABILITY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly true that the Director of the agency who is a Deputy Minister has control and management of his agency but it is part of the Minister's Department and the Minister is the one who is accountable to Parliament. When a resignation is in order, and the Minister obviously felt that was the case, how could he accept the resignation of a Deputy Minister? Where is the precedent? What happens to parliamentary accountability when Deputy Ministers are looked to by their Ministers as scapegoats when the individual Minister is accountable to Parliament?

• (1500)

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): As the Hon. Member well knows, Mr. Speaker, the incident in question occurred several years ago. I first learned of it August 27 of this year. As I said on many occasions and will say again, upon learning of it I immediately took action. I launched approximately four different investigations. I have already instituted interim procedures to tighten up on the warrant process. I have accepted in principle the appointment of devil's advocates to further strengthen the warrant review process.

We have done everything required of us. We did it quickly and efficiently.

HOUSING

AFFORDABLE HOUSING FOR WOMEN

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the status of women.

[Translation]

Yesterday, the Minister expressed the hope that the International Conference on Housing for the Homeless will help improve the housing situation as concerns women.

[English]

Women and children suffer the most from the lack of affordable housing. The Minister has expressed her concern about the lack of affordable housing for women. Therefore, will she be proposing a specific program to her cabinet colleagues in order to relieve these women of the suffering they are enduring?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for her first question to me. This is something of great concern to this Government. I am fortunate to have colleagues responsible for housing who recognize the significance of housing to women. That is one of the reasons we increased the co-operative housing program. We know that is the way women can participate.

Housing is related as well to our other policies to give women more economic independence, including training for women which will enable them to earn better salaries. All those things are related to the needs of women to participate more fully.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister not see some conflict in her role of Minister responsible for privatization when we know that private developers are not building affordable housing—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Dewar: —and the Government is not increasing its quota for affordable housing? Would the Minister please tell the House whether she is willing to work with the Minister responsible for CMHC to see there are more units on the market?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, as I said in this House before, that is one of the things that differentiates this Government from the former Government and other Parties, that is, the Ministers in this Government do work together and do have the support of the housing department in developing housing for women. We have the support of the Prime Minister in all our efforts for women, and that is going to continue for many years to come.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MATANE PAPERMILL—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT IMMEDIATELY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, he ridiculed the legitimate demands of the people of Matane who want to ensure the creation of nearly 900 jobs in their region and consolidate 1,200 jobs in the sawmills.

The federal Government has been considering the Matane papermill project for months, while the province has been ready to provide assistance immediately.

My question to the Prime Minister is as follows, especially today since the Matane delegation is in Ottawa: Can the Prime Minister order the Minister involved to provide immediately the assistance required to carry out this most important project for the Matane region?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was nothing in my statements yesterday that can be interpreted as ridiculing the proposals of the Matane people. On the contrary! The people of Matane requested federal assistance for their region from the Liberal Government for 19 years. For nearly two decades, the Liberal Party refused to provide such assistance for a major project.

I am, therefore, rather surprised to hear today such comments from a former Liberal Minister who could have done a lot more at the time to help the people of Matane.

A project was submitted by the private sector to the Quebec Government, discussions are now going on with the federal authorities to examine this proposal, and in spite of the lack of action during the two previous decades, we shall do our best to help the Matane people with these concrete proposals.

ASSISTANCE FOR MATANE PAPERMILL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the statements of the Prime Minister are not very reassuring for the workers who are now on the unemployment lists in Matane and who are waiting for jobs.

Let me ask the Prime Minister this. Such a concrete project has not been on the desk of the Minister for two decades. There is now a group willing to get moving. The provincial Minister of Energy has accused Ottawa of dragging its feet. What I am asking the Prime Minister is not to give me a history lesson, but to think about the present and the future right now as he is responsible for the management of public funds and for helping the have-not regions. Why is he still dilly-dallying instead of announcing immediately some assistance for the Matane papermill project as this would create jobs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the Quebec Liberal caucus is not as virulent in promoting the adoption of Bill C-22 which would create jobs in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion is now examining the Matane project. We are analyzing all the data, and this naturally includes a feasibility study which has to be completed by the promoter before a decision can be made.

PORNOGRAPHY

PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice and concerns a lead story in Monday's Globe and Mail which revealed the findings of an American study on pornography to be presented today to the U.S. House Select Committee on Children, Youth and the Family. The study found that all forms of pornography, not just violent pornography, have a negative impact on society. In view of these findings, when can we expect the Minister to bring to second reading and speedy passage this Government's tough legislation on pornography?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for his continuing interest in this very important topic. It is of great concern not only to his constituents but to people across the country. I read with interest the findings of the report and I know this Government wants to proceed with this legislation at the earliest possible date. My colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister and Government House Leader, will be discussing the timing of this legislation with his opposition counterparts. I know I have had calls from Members on both sides of the House to proceed with it forthwith and I hope it will be at an early date.

ENERGY

PRICE OF NATURAL GAS IN MANITOBA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy I would like to direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

As of November 1 this year natural gas from Alberta, after passing through the pipeline across Manitoba, will be sold in Minnesota for $1.80 per 1,000 cubic feet while it will cost Manitobans $3.00 per 1,000 cubic feet. Given the promise the Prime Minister made at Prince Albert during the election campaign that Canadian gas would never cost Canadians more than it does Americans, how does he explain this situation? What steps will the Government take to ensure that the promise will be kept?

• (1510)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board has just made a recommendation with respect to the pricing and export policy of natural gas which is consistent with the market oriented policies of the Government. There are clearly provisions within the ruling which provide adequate protection for consumers while at the same time stimulating the exploration, further development, and sale of natural gas.

My understanding is that there are negotiations going on between the Province of Alberta and the Province of Manitoba with regard to this. It is my view that this will be resolved on a bilateral basis between the two provinces.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, according to the first official monitoring report released two weeks ago British Columbia gas users are paying more for B.C. natural gas shipped to the western United States than are U.S. buyers. Does the Government believe that Canadian users of natural gas, either in their homes or their businesses, will believe that the Government's deregulation of the energy industry is working in their favour?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think we all know the position of the New Democratic Party. It would like to control market prices and production and phase out any export of natural gas or oil from the country.

Mr. Broadbent: Another lie. Keep it up. Do you ever tell the truth? Just once tell the truth.

Mr. Riis: It is not true.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: You'll go down to 20 per cent. Keep it up.

Mr. Mazankowski: Just keep attacking the RCMP and you know where you'll go. You'll be right down.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House that due to the tributes and announcements which were made, which took up a good deal of time, Question Period will be extended to 18 minutes after three o'clock.

DIRECTOR'S RESIGNATION—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will take advantage of your indulgence and direct two questions to the Prime Minister.

A senior public servant, indeed a man of deputy ministerial rank, resigned in honourable fashion accepting responsibility for improper action within his Department. Is it the Prime Minister's understanding of ministerial accountability and is it the style of his Government to allow senior public servants to take the heat when Ministers should take the heat?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has been fully accountable to the House of Commons and the people of Canada. He has been responsive to all questions in the House and has answered fully any questions and suggestions that have been raised.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): It takes a lot of nerve to stand up and say that.

Mr. Mulroney: If my right hon. friend has any doubt about that and would like to be more specific, I will be happy to try to respond. However, the responsibility of the Minister is to the people of Canada and the House of Commons and the Minister has fulfilled it very well.

SIGNING OF APPLICATION FOR WIRE-TAPPING WARRANT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the admission of improper action within the Department was recognized by Mr. Finn who resigned, taking responsibility for that. At issue here is the second highest ranking law officer of the Crown, ranking only after the Attorney General. That law officer of the Crown signed an application for a warrant which misled a judge.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You're inventing a new theory.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): In the opinion of the Prime Minister is that not grounds for a resignation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to comment on some of the allegations which were made by my right hon. friend. I would want to ask the security service, the Solicitor General and others whether they are in fact all in keeping with the requirements of accuracy.

With regard to the issue, I have responded that ministerial responsibility has been adequately and faithfully discharged by the Solicitor General at all times and in all circumstances.

The head of an independent agency decided to submit his resignation and the resignation was accepted. The Minister of the Crown has fully and faithfully responded to all of the requirements of ministerial responsibility in a manner totally consistent with the highest traditions of Parliament.

TAX REFORM

CONSULTATION WITH MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Recently the Board of Directors of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities expressed concern over the possible impact of adopting a two-stage approach to tax reform on the new system of municipal services and costs.

The Minister of Finance has emphasized the importance of extensive consultation in developing and implementing the new sales tax for Canada. Does the Minister plan to include representatives of Canada's municipalities in his discussions on the second stage of tax reform?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to the question is yes. I have consulted with the Federation prior to each of my Budgets and look forward to consulting with them prior to any implementation of tax reform. It is still early days, as the Hon. Member knows, in the process leading up to stage two, the sales tax reform. There is ample opportunity for me to hear the views of the Federation of Municipalities.

ALLEGED AIR CANADA SABOTAGE THREAT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Press reports indicate that documents filed with the Ontario Supreme Court suggest that senior Canadian air security officials were notified of a sabotage threat against Air India about two weeks before the June, 1985, crash.

Did the senior air security officials notify either CSIS or the RCMP? If they did, what action was taken to determine whether or not the threat was valid or to ensure that nothing happened?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am met with a rather difficult situation at the present time. As the Hon. Member may or may not be aware, there is civil litigation presently pending in the courts in which the Government of Canada has been named as a defendant along with a number of Ministers. The matter is, therefore, sub judice and I cannot comment on it.

However, I would be more than pleased to receive those allegations. If the Member has any information to give me in that regard I will arrange for RCMP officers to be at his office within hours to obtain the necessary information and I will follow up on anything which is improper or illegal.

REQUEST THAT INQUIRY BE CONDUCTED

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it seems that CSIS is not communicating with the RCMP or the Government. We do not even know if it is talking to officials in air security. Is this not yet another reason for a full parliamentary inquiry into the whole area of security in this country? Would the Minister not agree that it is about time that he takes his responsibilities and calls a public inquiry?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have two things to say in response to the supplementary question. First, immediately upon taking office I was concerned about the lack of co-operation, as it has been termed, or the lack of liaison between CSIS and the RCMP. Within weeks of taking office I met with the parties. I have instituted new procedures. Liaison officers are now within each other's force and a liaison committee has been set up. I am satisfied today that there is a satisfactory working relationship.

I can also advise the House that as soon as the various investigations which I have instigated are completed I will be pleased, upon invitation, to appear before the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General to discuss the whole incident.

SPORTS

CANADA CUP WON BY TEAM CANADA

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, last night Canadians witnessed what I believe to be a new high in international hockey, if not in international sport. Of course, I am referring to the final game between Team Canada and the team for the Soviet Union in which Canada retained the Canada Cup.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: I want to take this opportunity on behalf of the Government of Canada first to congratulate Team Canada for that smashing victory. I also want to thank and congratulate the team from the Soviet Union for providing us with the highest quality competition. In fact, had the competition been even a little better than it was last night, many Canadians today would be suffering from cardiac arrest.

In any event, the game itself—in fact the last three games—provided an example of sportsmanship at its best and an inspiration to all, particularly to the youth of this nation and around the world. They were hard-hitting games, yet they were fair. They were emotional games, yet they were controlled. They were entertaining to say the least, yet competitive.

I have always said that sports, perhaps more than anything else, transcends differences between nations and between peoples. Last night, without any doubt, this fact came home in spades across this great nation and around the world. As a result, today Canadians are a bit happier and a lot prouder.

We thank organizer Alan Eagleson and all of those associated with bringing us the Canada Cup series for giving us the opportunity to share with each other the pride in Canada and Canadians. We thank them, we thank all the teams that participated, particularly those great heroes from Team Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, what a great year it has been for Canada in sports—first Ben Johnson, now Team Canada.

As usual, The Toronto Star said it right: "Team Canada rules the world". Permit me for a moment to share my personal pride as a Hamiltonian in the show that I think our city gave to Canada and the world, in a fantastic coliseum which happens to be named after my father, for which I am of course very proud.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Copps: Last night the eyes of the world were riveted on that game, on the team on which not only Mario Lemieux and Wayne Gretzky but all the Canadians, as well as the Russians, showed us the finest brand of hockey we have ever seen. We did not see the penalties or the violence, we saw class hockey.

As the Minister said, sport is one thing that joins us from coast to coast and country to country. I only hope that yesterday's final game in what has been an incredibly exciting series not only for Canada and Russia but other participating countries will be the first of many that will precede the establishment of an NHL hockey franchise in my great community and our great coliseum in the City of Hamilton.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member well, because I do not think Thunder Bay is quite ready to go after that kind of venture.

I want to continue the remarks I made earlier today and congratulate Team Canada and, in fact, all the teams that participated; the Soviet Union, the United States, Sweden, Czechoslovakia and Finland. I believe it is a great credit to us all that people who perhaps have ideological differences are able to put them aside and be brought together to show us what hockey is all about. I know there are not many television sets in the country that were not tuned into those games during the entire series.

I am pleased that Canada did so well. I want to congratulate the coaches Mike Keenan and Jean Perron, and the players, particularly the two stars of the series, Mario Lemieux and Wayne Gretzky. We always hear about the great star from out west, but he showed clearly how much of a team player he is by making sure that he was passing to others so they could put the puck into the net. I believe that is symbolic of the series we saw and the hockey players we have.

I also want to congratulate the Soviet Union team for its fine sportsmanship and display of hockey. To Victor Tikhonov, we say "thank you" and also look forward to seeing in future years the Makarovs, Fetisovs and Laronovs fighting it out on the ice with Canada, when hopefully we will come out victorious again.

I also want to thank the NHL and the various clubs that allowed their players to participate in this series, as well as the organizers of the event.

In conclusion, let me repeat to the players on Team Canada: "Thank you. Inside and outside Canada, on and off the ice, you are number one".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REVOCATION OF LOUIS DAVID RIEL CONVICTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-265, an Act to revoke the conviction of Louis David Riel.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the said Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to introduce a Private Members' Bill calling for the conviction of Louis David Riel for the offence of high treason to be revoked.

I want to make a brief statement about a man who, for a variety of reasons, is recognized as the founder of Manitoba. He is a man who struggled for French language rights, western rights, the rights of Métis people, provincial rights, religious rights, and indeed for Métis land claims. The issues for which he fought in the 1870s and 1880s must not be forgotten. Unfortunately, to a certain extent these issues remain even to this day.

This Bill attempts to undo a deed that was in fact conferred by the House of Commons in the 1880s and suggests that the offence of high treason be revoked.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

OPPOSITION TO TAX ON FOOD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106, it is my duty to present another petition concerning the proposed tax on food. Your petitioners humbly shew that:

Whereas since September, 1984, the federal Government has imposed on Canadian taxpayers 25 new taxes or tax increases, in particular on medical and dental supplies, snack foods, candy and soft drinks;

Whereas the federal Government in its tax reform proposal has studied the possibility of imposing on Canadians a general tax on goods and services, including food;

And whereas food constitutes a vital element of day-to-day life and imposition of this tax would have the effect of seriously penalizing certain categories of taxpayers, such as the aged, families, the unemployed, low income taxpayers, youth and students;

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject all measures that would have the effect of imposing a sales tax on food products.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa
September 16, 1987

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gérard V.J. LaForest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 16th day of September, 1987, at 4:30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

Yours sincerely,
Anthony P. Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy and Program

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions back and forth among the Parties and I believe that you would find it in order for the House to proceed to Government Bill C-52 prior to dealing with Bill C-74 as listed on the particular order of business.

Mr. Caccia: No, no. I am sorry.

Ms. McDonald: Why?

Mr. Caccia: There are four speakers on Bill C-52, not just one.

Mr. Lewis: I can go with either one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) will shed some light on this point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I will shed any light on this matter, however, while there have been some discussions, the understanding has been for a number of hours that we would begin Bill C-52, and when we complete debate on Bill C-52 then we will begin the debate on Bill C-74. That has been the understanding all along. It was the understanding before Question Period began. Since that is the order in which they appear on the Order Paper, that is the reason we approach it in that way. We are anticipating at this point that we will begin debating Bill C-52.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, in oral conversations with the Minister yesterday, it was understood that we would proceed this afternoon right after Question Period with Bill C-74. We have discussed the reasons for that. It is my understanding, in addition, that there will be more than one speaker from each Party on Bill C-52, There may be even as many as four from one Party. Therefore, we urge the Minister to return to the original agreement and understanding and proceed first with Bill C-74.

Mr. Lewis: I regret, Mr. Speaker, that subsequent to my discussions, when the Hon. Member approached me yesterday, there were discussions among the House Leaders and also among the officials. It was felt that this was the most reasonable arrangement of the business in order to accommodate the most Members of the House. Obviously, the Government is in a position to go with either Bill. However, since it is on the Order Paper in this manner, we will proceed with Bill C-52.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of a Ministerial statement, this day's sitting will be extended by six minutes.

COASTING TRADE AND COMMERCIAL MARINE ACTIVITIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)) moved that Bill C-52, an Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade and in other marine activities of a commercial nature, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on Bill C-52, which is a Bill with which most Members will not be familiar, with the possible exception of the Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) who will be sitting on the legislative committee. I suspect, with his long experience in the House, he has run across this Bill because it goes back to the early times of Canadian history.

I know members of the committee will find it to be a fascinating Bill and I can assure members of the Opposition from both Parties—I believe they have already had delivered to their office complete briefing books with the same information I have as Parliamentary Secretary—that there is no intent at all that this be a partisan-type Bill. I think over-all it is in the best interests of the country. I can give Hon. Members the unreserved commitment that we are prepared to have any witnesses the Opposition Parties would like, as well as some of our own government Members, on parts of the Bill in order to have a clear explanation as to why any particular exception may be listed in the statute. I believe at committee stage we can have a full explanation of the Bill, all the same briefing information, and we will make whatever changes are appropriate at that time.

Provisions concerning the Canadian coasting trade are currently contained in Part XV of the Canada Shipping Act which goes back, I believe, to the turn of the century. Recently we adopted Bill C-39 which amended part of the Canada

Shipping Act to allow the Governor in Council to make regulations concerning the granting of waivers to foreign ships and the prescribing of terms, conditions and circumstances for the granting of those waivers. These amendments did not include, however, the substantive changes which are included in Bill C-52.

The purpose of this Bill is to reserve what is commonly known as the coasting trade and other commercial marine activities to Canadian ships in waters over which we have jurisdiction. Within the 12 mile territorial sea, all commercial marine activities will be reserved to Canadian ships in the offshore. Beyond the 12 mile territorial sea, all commercial marine activities related to the exploration and exploitation of non-living resources will be reserved to Canadian ships.

In my briefing, I wondered why it said: "non-living" resources. It means minerals because there is another law, the law of the sea, which applies, while the Fisheries Protection Act and other statutes apply to living resources. All of this can be clarified for any Member of the House who is interested when we get to committee stage.

I should point out that the Canadian Government recognizes the usefulness and, indeed, the necessity of allowing foreign flag ships to enter the Canadian coasting trade and the offshore to carry out work when no suitable Canadian flagship is available. Accordingly, a waiver system to ensure the availability of adequate shipping services under such conditions is an integral part of the new legislation. This waiver system reflects current practice under Part XV of the Canada Shipping Act and it is expected that no disruption to the industry will occur in the transition to the system proposed.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, you will be delighted to know that approximately 99 per cent of Canadian coasting trade is carried in Canadian ships.

"Coasting Trade" is defined in the Canada Shipping Act as including the carriage by water of goods or passengers from one port or place in Canada to another port or place in Canada. This Bill will expand this definition to include all commercial marine activities in the territorial sea and to cover resource related activities beyond the territorial sea to the edge of the continental shelf, or 200 miles, whichever is greater. I gather that there was some uncertainty in the existing statute as to whether dredging and the laying of cables could be said to be moving from place to place within Canada. This Bill has a more clear definition bringing these matters within the scope of the law.

With respect to the waters beyond the 12-mile territorial sea, Hon. Members will know that international law allows nations to legislate only with respect to the exploration and exploitation of natural resources. We have addressed this issue in the following ways.

Bill C-52 will reserve in this area all commercial marine activities related to resource exploration or exploitation to Canadian ships, always keeping in mind that the waiver system which I described earlier in the case of there being no adequate or appropriate Canadian ship available, with the exception of hydrocarbon production platforms. Hon. Members will note that the exception is not for drilling rigs, drill ships or other vessels in the exploration phase, but only for production platforms used in the exploitation phase.

Being interested in this industry I wondered why we would have that exception. I think that other Members will also want to have a clear explanation at the committee stage in this respect. We will come prepared to give such an explanation. If it is not adequate, then we may well make changes, if that is appropriate.

Our extension of coasting trade provisions to the continental shelf is intended to make the flag regime generally compatible with the tariff regime, which has been in effect since June 30, 1983. There are three exceptions to this. They are, production platforms, large cruise ships, and seismic ships. In addition, the inclusion of activity on the continental shelf will ensure maximum employment of the Canadian supply boat fleet, which has grown in anticipation of the development of Canada's offshore oil and gas activities. For we laymen, that means more jobs for Canadians and Canadian seamen—good news for us all.

Within the 12-mile territorial sea all commercial marine activities are reserved to Canadian ships. This makes it clear that ships carrying goods or passengers from one port or place in Canada to the same port or place in Canada are part of the coasting trade.

As an example, a cruise ship with overnight accommodations for fewer than 100 passengers which leaves from Montreal and returns to Montreal will be subject to the provisions of this Bill. In the previous statute under Part XV that was not clear. The Bill specifically exempts large cruise ships, those with overnight accommodation for 100 passengers or more from its application. This exemption recognizes that international cruise ships must carry on their business in a world-wide context and not exclusively in a Canadian one.

On the matter of exemptions to the legislation, a specific exemption is made for fishing vessels covered by the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, and for ships engaged in ocean research activity commissioned by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Similarly, exceptions are made for ships owned by foreign Governments wishing to conduct marine scientific research in waters over which Canada has jurisdiction, if they have been authorized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This will ensure that conflicts with other legislation are minimized.

I know that Members opposite, like myself, will be seeking a clear explanation as to how all of these statutes fit together so that we do have a clear understanding of how this Bill fits into the whole scheme of legislation dealing with the sea.

In both offshore and Canadian waters ships assisting ships in distress will not be subject to the provisions of this Bill. This, of course, is normal international maritime practice.

The Bill will also eliminate the historic anomaly in Canadian legislation of referring to "British" ships rather than "Canadian" ships. Currently, only three British ships remain in the coasting trade.

I wish to address briefly the tariff implications of this Bill. At present, all tariff matters are the responsibility of my colleague, the Hon. Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin). It therefore follows that the new coasting trade Bill contains no direct tariff provisions of any kind. This Bill will make flag requirements for ships compatible with the Canadian customs regime. These two regimes while not identical are very closely aligned. In fact, this Bill will ease the situation for those wishing to operate ships in waters under Canadian jurisdiction by clarifying the flag requirements which must be observed. The tariff schedule requirements are already well known.

Department officials have consulted the provinces on this Bill and I am advised that they support its thrust.

To summarize, the proposed coasting trade and commercial marine activities Bill will extend the jurisdiction of the existing coasting trade laws to include all commercial marine activities within 12 miles, with the exceptions I have already noted, and all commercial marine activities related to resource exploration and exploitation out to 200 miles, again with the exceptions I have noted.

This Bill will protect operators of Canadian flagships wishing to work in Canadian waters and on the continental shelf. As a consequence, jobs for Canadian seamen will be protected. As markets improve more job opportunities will be created for seamen and those in related industries.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on second reading of Bill C-52, also known as the Coasting Trade and Commercial Marine Activities Act. Technically speaking, this Bill will enable us to update the Canada Shipping Act, Part XV, concerning the coasting trade in Canada. As a result of the adoption of this Bill, old Part XV will be repealed and replaced by a new legislation dealing specifically with coasting trade.

The basic aim of this measure is to modernize and update a piece of legislation which has not been revised for 50-odd years. It is obvious that a law reflecting post-war realities no longer meets the needs of Canada's merchant marine. I am therefore very pleased to join this debate today, and I can say that in this respect we are going through what I would call a very acceptable and even worthwhile exercise.

I commend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, (Mr. Thacker) for keeping in mind that, before proceeding with the consideration of this Bill, Opposition Members would appreciate receiving the kind of background information which will certainly help us gain a better understanding of the legislation. Such consideration on the part of the Parliamentary Secretary cannot however make up for the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) who seems to make it a point to stay away from the House whenever we are considering a measure which concerns his department. Again I must deplore this fact, but since I have had opportunities to get to know the Parliamentary Secretary even better and to appreciate his availability and competence, I will not hold it against the Government and the ever absent Minister.

But things get somewhat sour when, over and above the mere technical provisions of this Bill, we get to the basics of this legislative endeavour which, all things considered, is aimed at promoting the use of Canadian ships for coasting trade. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that this is getting interesting. It is interesting because we can now examine more closely the whole shipbuilding policy of the Conservative Government, and I shall come back to this later on.

If I may go back a bit and look at Bill C-52 now under consideration, we find that the whole substance of this Bill resides in Clauses 3 and 4. Clause 3, for instance, prohibits any foreign ship or non-duty paid ship, except under and in accordance with a licence, to engage in the coasting trade or, and I quote:

> (a) in Canadian waters, engage in any marine activity of a commercial nature; or
> (b) in waters above the continental shelf of Canada, engage in any marine activities of a commercial nature relating to the exploration, development, production or transportation of the mineral or non-living natural resources of the continental shelf.

• (1550)

In order to obtain a licence to operate in Canada, a foreign ship must meet certain requirements set out in Clause 4, the most important being that the Canadian Transport Commission must have determined that no Canadian ship or non-duty ship is suitable to provide the service or perform the activity described in the application. In other words, it is to give priority to Canadian ships in the coasting trade of Canada.

We of the Liberal Party welcome this initiative. Indeed, we accept that it is an appropriate objective for the Government of Canada. On this side of the House we welcome any initiative which will strengthen Canada's shipping and shipbuilding industry. To ensure that this objective could be met, we had hoped that the Bill would have gone further in protecting Canada's interest in this crucial economic sector. Had the Minister read the American Jones Act of 1920, perhaps he may have been tempted to strengthen the Canadian legislation. He may have wished to fashion it in order to be more in tune with what the Americans have done to protect their shipping and shipbuilding interests.

As it presently stands, Americans will be able to do business in our waters on American-built ships while Canadians do not have the same cabotage rights. While we welcome the legislative initiative, we had hoped that it would have been more in tune with American law which states that domestic trade between United States ports must be carried out by vessels which are registered in the United States, owned by Americans, built in the United States, and the employees of the shipyards and the crews must be American citizens.

We had hoped that the Conservative Government, while still hungry for a free trade deal, would have had sufficient courage to say to the Americans, enough. We had hoped that the Government would have found the vision and sufficient commitment to Canada to say to the Americans; we gave you our railways through the deregulation act, Bill C-18, we gave you FIRA in the early stage of the Conservative administration, and we just gave you our pharmaceutical industry. All of this was attempting to placate you and convince you that Canadians are good sports. Enough is enough. Our shipbuilding industry is ours, and we will protect it. Ease your barriers to trade in this area and we will ease ours.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, the Minister of Transport and this Conservative Government did not have the courage to do so. The Minister of Transport chose the middle ground. He provides some protection, but the Americans and other foreign shippers will still be able to operate in Canada at the expense of our own Canadian industry.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not dwell on this issue for too long. I presume that there will be ample opportunity to come back to it when the Bill goes to committee, where we shall be examining closely each amendment and each clause of this Bill.

However, I would like to come back to the weak commitment of this Conservative Government as concerns the Canadian shipbuilding industry. Hon. Members will probably remember that the Conservative Government approached Mr. Pierre-Paul Saunders, President of Versatile Davie Shipyard, which operates a shipyard in Lauzon, and required, in return for a contract, that he rationalize the operations of Quebec shipyards and, in particular, that he close the Montreal shipyard.

I see the Minister of Trade has just left his seat. I wish he had stayed in his place because I wanted to ask him if he was doing a serious thing when he called on the president of a company which owned a number of shipyards in Canada for the purpose of pressuring him and telling him: We as a Government will give you a contract, provided you rationalize your operations and close down one shipyard, because we in the Government feel there are too many shipyards in Canada and it has become difficult to get enough contracts to go around, in order to meet the needs of a few thousand workers in the various shipyards across Canada.

The evidence is there, clear and undeniable, that this Tory Government has attempted to close down shipyards in Canada, and more especially the Montreal shipyard. The Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart), my colleague, rose in vain on a number of occasions in this House to defend the interests of workers in the Montreal shipyard.

I must therefore suggest that, speaking of commitments to Canadian shipyard workers, that one is no great shakes. Because last year, Mr. Henry Walsh, who at that point was Chairman of the Canadian Shipyard Association, had this to say:

> "Our recommendations, requests and appeals to the Government during the past 17 months have remained unanswered". "Shipowners keep on buying abroad, taking advantage of subsidies and favourable financing terms that they do not find here in Canada". "Since the 1984 elections, since this Tory Government was elected, > we have on a number of occasions called the Government's attention to our desperate situation, but in vain" added Mr. Walsh, who at the same time published a number of letters and telexes sent to this Tory Government. And to quote him again:

> "Those one-way communications show how much the Government has failed to honour its commitments, is looking for excuses and going back on its word—

Mr. Speaker, that suggestion is not mine, it came from the Chairman of the Canadian Shipyard Association, who says this Tory Government > "—has failed to honour its commitments, is looking for excuses and going back on its word. It is time the public was informed of the situation before a larger number of shipyards and related industries are forced to shut down. The industry is going down the drain while the Conservative Government remains inactive and unconcerned".

> "Canada is the only shipbuilding nation not to offer attractive financing facilities and not to reserve Government contracts to its own industry. Our nearest neighbour, the United States, totally forbids importing foreign-built ships". "The Government should realize that the ships we need should be built in Canada, so that our shipbuilding firms may survive the world crisis the industry is now in."

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the Conservative Government has chosen to ignore these pressing requests from the President of the Canadian Shipbuilding Association.

We have heard the silly statements made by the Hon. Member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) who managed to convince his constituents that under a Conservative Government, they would all become affluent and that the Lauzon shipbuilding yards would be awarded a whole series of contracts, while in fact there are fewer and fewer workers at the Lauzon yard.

Recently, my colleague—for the information of the public which is watching us, I had better give the name of his riding, for our Standing Order does not allow me to call him by his name—the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan) rose in the House to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McInnes) and also to ask the Government why it was not keeping the promises it had made to the workers of the Maritime shipbuilding yard. Our colleague the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys could bear witness to the fact that the number of workers presently employed by the Atlantic shipbuilding yards had considerably decreased. In spite of the promises made by the Conservative Government, the situation had not been remedied. Well, two Liberal Members of Parliament, namely the Hon. Member for Montreal—Ste-Marie and the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys rose quite recently in the House to make representations to the Government on behalf of the workers of the Atlantic and Quebec shipbuilding yards who have been abandoned by this Conservative Government which, again, in this area as in many others, has not kept its promises.

May I add that as recently as June 16 last, in a press release, the new President of the Canadian Shipbuilding Association indicated that the Government should develop immediately a national shipbuilding policy. Mr. Clarke, the new President, mentioned the promises made by the Conservative Party and urged the Government to develop as soon as possible a national shipbuilding policy.

He emphasized that the shipyard order books for ships ordered or being built at the end of 1986 indicated a total of 40,350 tons, that is less than half the figure for 1985, which had been itself a record low for the nearly 25 years during which the Canadian Shipbuilding Association had kept detailed records. In other words, for the past 25 years, the Canadian Shipbuilding Association has kept data on the number of workers and the number of contracts awarded by the Canadian Government or the private sector to the various shipbuilding yards in Canada.

Well, the very worst record is that of this Conservative Government.

As President Clarke emphasized, and I quote:

> As demonstrated by the closing of several shipbuilding yards and related businesses in 1986 and the fact that the labour force was down to 6,948 workers, the situation in our industry at the end of the year was the most serious.

• (1600)

[English]

This is a clear indictment of the Conservative Government's shipbuilding policy or lack thereof. It is also a clear reflection of the dismay of Canadians at the broken promises which have characterized three long years of Conservative Government. It has been three long years for workers in the shipbuilding industry who, like many other Canadians, had high hopes when the Government obtained its mandate in 1984. They are now very disappointed, discouraged, and fed up with a terrible Government which cannot get its act together and work constructively in the interest of Canadians.

The shipbuilding industry is in a terrible mess. The Government has done nothing to alleviate the situation, except to talk with the presidents of a few companies and ask them to close shipyards. This was a shameless act on the part of some Ministers of the Government. Indeed, they tried to convince these businessmen to reduce their operations, on the backs of workers, to put some order in the shipbuilding industry.

I very much regret the actions or lack of action on the part of the Government. I certainly hope that it will wake up to its commitments and fulfil some of its promises at last.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-52 respecting the Coasting Trade and Commercial Marine Activities Act.

Let me say at the outset that the concept of restricting coastal trading to Canadians is obviously one we support. We have argued for years for the need in the marine sector and in other sectors to enhance the ability of Canadians to build, to operate, and to improve the country. The same applies to coastal shipping.

This applies not only to coastal shipping, but to shipping within Canada. Although we talk about the Great Lakes as the fourth sea coast in terms of maritime law, we cannot describe it as such. However, I understand that the Bill will clearly deal with that matter as well. Therefore all our coasts are involved.

I think it is important to put on record some of the components of the Bill so that we develop an understanding of the steps through which we go. Let me start with the definition of "Canadian ship". In part Clause 2 reads:

> —"Canadian ship" means a ship
> (a) registered in Canada in respect of which all duties and taxes under the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act have been paid, or
> (b) built in Canada and exempted from registration pursuant to section 8 of the Canada Shipping Act—

That sounds great. What it really means, though, is that it does not have to be built in Canada. It does not have to be owned by Canadians. It does, however, have to be crewed by Canadian citizens and it must be registered.

• (1610)

Let us compare that with the American Jones Act of 1920. When we see a good thing, I wonder why we are sometimes so slow to pick up on it. The Jones Act was enacted 67 years ago. It requires that domestic trade between U.S. ports must be carried by U.S.-registered vessels. There is no difference between that legislation and our legislation in that respect. The American legislation goes on to say that the ships must be owned by Americans and built in U.S. shipyards. Our legislation is different in those respects. The American legislation says that the boats must be crewed by American citizens and there is no difference there with our legislation.

The American law gives the maximum protection to American workers and maritime industries including shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities. We in this Party believe that we should do whatever we can to reach that same ideal. We should give the workers the maximum protection and the maximum incentive.

We all know that the Canadian shipbuilding and ship repair industries are in a crisis. The Government of Canada is making a conscious effort to rationalize the shipyards because their capacity is in excess of the contracts that exist.

Legislation is a tool that may be used for economic purposes. My colleagues and I believe that we should use this particular Bill as a tool to improve the lot of those people who work in our maritime industries, particularly those whose jobs and whose very existences depend on the ability of the industry to create new vessels, whether they be lakers, salters, icebreakers, fishing vessels or tugs.

We as a country have a responsibility to do what we can to help maritime facilities in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and even Manitoba which has a small shipbuilding sector. All these facilities would be enhanced by a piece of legislation that would maximize our ability to build Canadian ships, to crew Canadian ships, to own Canadian ships and not to bring vessels and crews from offshore. We should not allow vessels of other countries to trade between Canadian ports unless they get an exemption.

Let me deal with the regulations that would allow exemptions for foreign ships and for what are called non-duty-paid ships. First let us define a foreign ship. It means a ship other than a Canadian ship or a non-duty-paid ship. What is a non-duty-paid ship? It is a ship registered in Canada in respect of which all duties and taxes under the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act have not been paid.

If the powers that be have been told that there is not a Canadian vessel available or in fact even in existence to carry a certain commodity from one Canadian port to another Canadian port, an exemption can be sought. That exemption allows those ships to trade within our waters for a set period of time after paying certain dues or tariffs, I would suspect. However, this means that in the short term, that income is not available to Canadian vessels and workers.

I understand that in certain cases, there may not be vessels capable of carrying some unique cargoes. Over the last number of years, I have been aware of one such vessel that has been plying the Great Lakes during the winter months. It comes from overseas and is specially equipped to deal with icebreaking. It carries a chemical of sorts. It has been allowed an exemption for at least two years and perhaps for longer. I am not aware, though, of any attempt on the part of any arm of the Government to see an opportunity for a shipyard. Obviously there is a market for the movement of this commodity. The Government should see if it can put something together, perhaps totally under the private sector or under a mix of public and private sectors, to build such a vessel in Canada so that it can be crewed and owned by Canadians.

The situation could go on and on. It is kind of like imposing quotas to protect an industry that is either fledgling or does not yet exist in Canada. I can think of at least one industry that did not exist in Canada a few years ago, in one of the sporting goods fields. However, we never took the second step which is to build up that fledgling industry so that it could compete not just in Canada but in the world market-place.

Let me deal with some of the other exemptions. I wish to express some concern about them. I appreciate the comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary earlier today about looking at this Bill in detail when we get into a legislative committee, and I look forward to that.

Clause 3 contains a list of exemptions to this particular clause. The clause does not apply to any foreign ship or to a non-duty-paid ship that is used as a hydrocarbon production platform. For those who are unfamiliar with the nuances of the search for oil and gas in the coastal areas of Canada, a drilling rig goes in first and then once whatever energy substance being sought is struck, the drilling rig is replaced with a platform. This exemption provides permission to bring a platform to Canada from some other country. It does not force the companies to build platforms here in Canada and to create jobs here in Canada.

I understand that the kind of platform that is used in the Atlantic is made to a certain extent out of concrete and can in fact be constructed in Newfoundland. Perhaps that is the case. I hope that testimony before the legislative committee will offer us the evidence we need to tell the Government that this exemption is no longer appropriate and must be removed from the Bill so that we can create jobs in Atlantic Canada and particularly in Newfoundland.

• (1620)

Another area I want to deal with is one I am less sure of because I have not had the opportunity to compare this Bill with previous legislation. However, some of my colleagues have expressed concern to me, and I hope during their presentations today they will be in a position to more forcefully and more knowledgeably explain those concerns. That area is with respect to Clause 3(2) which says in part:

> (3) Subsection (1) does not apply to any foreign ship or non-duty paid ship that is
> (b) used as a fishing vessel, as defined by the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, in any activity governed by that Act and that does not carry any goods or passengers other than incidental to any activity governed by that Act;

The fear we have is that that kind of exemption would allow the continued importation of fishing vessels in excess of 100 feet. I gather if they are less than 100 feet they have to be built in Canada. However, the paying of duty on vessels over 100 feet does not create jobs on the West Coast, the East Coast, in Quebec or Ontario. It is important that we look at this exemption to make sure we are not continuing a loophole which, quite frankly, I think the Government would not want to continue.

I am not talking about a vessel which might come in for a month to replace a Canadian vessel under repair. I do not think any of us would suggest that. However, when we talk about additional capacity for harvesting of our marine resources on an ongoing basis, then clearly those vessels should be constructed here and the jobs created here.

The other exemptions I think make a lot of sense, although perhaps there might be some reason to use a particular exemption as a triggering mechanism. For example, exemption (c) deals with a ship, as it states:

> engaged in cruising, where the ship has overnight accommodation for one hundred passengers or more;

Again, it is a balancing act.

I will give you an example. The City of Thunder Bay has applied to host the Commonwealth Games. Part of its proposal is to use cruise ships to provide 5,000 beds in order to accommodate the influx of tourists to watch the games. Part of the package involves a possible cruise up to Thunder Bay, perhaps from St. John's, bringing people to the games. Those people would then leave Thunder Bay by air, rail or bus. We probably do not have available in Canada enough vessels so we would have to get an exemption. If, on the other hand, should it happen that we rekindle the days of the Noronic and other passenger vessels which plyed the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence, and it became apparent that this was going to be a permanent arrangement, then that is when we say we must have a Canadian built, Canadian manned, and Canadian registered vessel. Some lead time would have to be allowed for financing and construction and you would not want to interrupt the ongoing service, but once the ships were ready we could say thank you to the people who loaned us the vessel or vessels and get on with doing our own job. We think that kind of thing is worth looking at.

Exemption (d) and (e) states:

> engaged in any ocean research activity commissioned by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans;
> (e) operated or sponsored by a foreign government that has sought and received the consent of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to conduct marine scientific research;

I assume that is the Jacques Cousteau clause. Exemption (f):

> engaged in salvage operations, except where such operations are performed in Canadian waters.

I suspect that means within the 200-mile limit. We might want to look at those once we get this into committee. I say to the Parliamentary Secretary that there may be a need to allow for some additional protection. We have an ever growing industry in Canada that deals with robotics, underwater research, underwater manipulation of equipment, mini-subs and what have you. Perhaps we have to look at that as well to see whether we should be using this legislation as a tool to enhance that fledgling industry.

I do not want to continue dealing with this Bill clause by clause. I have made my point. Hopefully I have been able to plant some seeds in the minds of officials who I know are watching this debate and who will be appearing before us in committee, as well as the Parliamentary Secretary and his Minister. I recognize that the Minister is not in Ottawa, but is out performing his duties. We will take those things into account.

Let us come up with an even better Bill. Let us improve this so that when we finish third reading we can say we have done our share to promote the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry in this country. We have done it for Canadians, with Canadians. That is the goal we have to aim for.

One or two of my colleagues will want to add their comments. I think the Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly) will give us the perspective of the Pacific Coast and the impact there. The Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. Harris) will of course want to deal with Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada. Perhaps we will even hear from the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

I do not want to prolong the debate because I think it makes sense to get this Bill into committee and give time for those concerned and who have not yet seen the legislation, which is unfortunate, to have a chance to indicate what improvements we can make. I look forward to the rest of the debate and the improvements that will ensue over the next little while.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate on the coasting trade in Canada. I would like to make the linkage between this legislation and the necessity for strengthening shipbuilding in Canada, and comment on some of the things we can do to improve this Bill in order to strengthen that industry. However, before I commence my remarks, I would like to comment on the remarks of the Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet).

When that Member was part of the Cabinet in previous Liberal Governments, those Governments visited a disaster on the shipbuilding industry and coastal trade in Canada. I sat in my seat amazed at the speech he gave in this House criticizing the Government. That criticism was absolutely ridiculous. The people who heard it must have been amazed. I met with delegations from regions of the country where shipbuilding was absolutely flattened, which delegations the Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), his Cabinet colleagues, and many elected Liberal Members of Parliament refused to even see. They refused to consider in any way, shape, or form the appeals they made to have some attention paid to the industry in order to have it strengthened.

• (1630)

The record of that Government was extremely bad with regard to the shipbuilding industry. It ignored and treated with contempt delegations from the industry, the communities which depended upon shipbuilding, and the workers who were laid off from the shipyards. Quite frankly, the record of that Government was disgusting.

During the election campaign of 1984 there was a great deal of optimism which was underpinned by Conservative promises made from one end of the country to the other. Those promises were not fulfilled. There was great optimism and enormous support for Conservative candidates during the election campaign. The people in the shipbuilding industry and the communities which depend upon it feel betrayed. There is, however, still time to honour the hard and fast commitments which were made.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bill:

Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Citizenship Act—Chapter Nos. 37.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

COASTING TRADE AND COMMERCIAL MARINE ACTIVITIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Crosbie that Bill C-52, an Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade and in other marine activities of a commercial nature, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I was about to comment on the treatment of the shipbuilding industry by previous Liberal Governments. I wanted to point out, as have many of my Conservative colleagues, the misdirection of the decision that Canada could acquire its shipping, its ships and marine platforms more cheaply from other countries. That Liberal government policy badly wounded shipbuilding in Canada.

It is clear that that attitude on the part of Liberal Governments, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Masse) to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. de Cotret), has seriously harmed many communities in eastern Canada, western Canada, the Great Lakes region as well as the Arctic coast which they ignored as a site for marine development and technology.

There was great optimism when the Conservatives came to power that shipbuilding and the marine trades would gain an ally with a government and a group of individuals who would act in a strong, effective and consistent manner to get that sector of the industry back on its feet and moving in the right direction.

Canada, with one of the longest sea coasts in the world, is a maritime nation. Most of the small vessels and some of the larger ones in our coasting trade are Canadian built and operated. However, there are some notable exceptions. It was our hope that the new Government which made such firm promises would break those exceptions and create an atmosphere of expansion for Canadian maritime operators and seamen. That has not happened.

The new legislation today is riddled with exceptions. When this Bill goes to committee it must deal with those exceptions and allow those to whom the Government made its promises to come before the committee and say why the continuance of those exceptions will deny them employment and economic benefits. They must be allowed to explain why the removal of those exceptions would allow Canadians to build vessels and obtain the technology that will lead to a position of strength in the future.

The Government made promises about the coasting trade. While we will support all the positive aspects of this Bill, we want the exceptions removed. Furthermore, we want the Government to expand its involvement and interest in this sector.

Canada needs a deep sea fleet. Conservative Members who have been in the House a long time have said that a deep sea fleet must be developed for Canada. Where are they today? Where are the provisions in the Bill to develop that deep sea fleet?

The Government is quite prepared to allow major shipping interests in Canada to take their vessels offshore and register them in Great Britain, Bermuda and Third World countries to avoid paying decent salaries to the men and women who operate those vessels and to avoid the requirements of proper safety and health conditions on those vessels.

We must build, refit and maintain those vessels in Canada in order to provide that work to Canadians and ensure that our shipyards will have a sufficient volume of work to keep the technology of shipbuilding alive and thriving in this country. This is necessary so that the shipyards can remain economically viable and the communities that depend on those shipyards can continue to thrive rather than disappear, as has happened to so many single-industry towns in this country.

When this Bill goes to committee we will ask the Government what it will do about its promises of a nationally based deep sea fleet of ships that are built in Canada. Canadian Pacific, while not alone, is one of the most disgusting companies in this country in terms of the operation of an offshore fleet. That must be corrected.

The majority of Canadians want action on the Government's promises. The only ones who benefit from offshore operations are companies like CP which operate seagoing sweat-shops and forest companies that make large profits by taking advantage of those seagoing sweat-shops. We have to stop that practice so that the benefits will accrue to the people who work in those shipyards and the communities in which they live.

When the House debated the national energy policy under Bill C-48, we dealt with a major part of industrial benefits accruing to Canada. During that stage of development in Canada, many rigs involved in exploration and many of the vessels that supplied those rigs and production units of oil companies operating in Canada were built abroad. The opportunity for Canadian companies to participate in the increasing volume of business gradually declined.

The previous Liberal Government, in its wisdom, decided that it would be cheaper to obtain that equipment offshore because there was not enough in the Canadian market to supply the demand. While an office was developed to determine where Canadian industrial benefits would be derived and to co-ordinate the effort among government Departments to ensure that some of the benefits accrued to Canada, those who looked at it seriously recognized it as the farce it was. That office did not produce the benefits that Canadians should have expected.

The Liberal Government implemented a provision to allow for the acquisition of material and platforms on the basis that Canada did not have the capacity to build them. The reason we lost the capacity is that we permitted the companies to go offshore in the beginning. Those shipyards that had been in the business began to lose it and gradually went under. Then, of course, there was not sufficient business to sustain shipbuilding, so they acquired ships offshore. What happened because of the failure to protect that area was that instead of encouraging and developing growth in the industry to a point where it could stand on its own, harnessing and using the technology of marine platform development, the companies could not afford it and they shrank, and so the whole industry imploded. This was done at the hands of a Liberal Government that was callous and certainly did not care about that particular industry. There were louder voices saying: "It is more important that we profit rather than Canadians as a whole" and they caught that Government's attention.

I think we have to expose that wrong-headed logic that guided the previous Government. We have to indicate to the people who come before the committee that the present House and the present Government, which made so many promises, will in fact listen to them and will remove the exceptions from this legislation. We must prove that we will expand the potential for Canadians in the operation of a deep sea fleet, that there will be an improvement of the shipbuilding industry and the allied industries along with it, that we will indeed pay careful attention to see that Canadians build the offshore exploration and production units to harvest our resources offshore, and we will build the supply ships that service that industry and the infrastructure which supports it.

We are looking at major initiatives in the coming years. At the present time we are going through a depressed price situation with natural gas and petroleum, but that will certainly turn around. We have perhaps found ourselves lucky from the marine industry's point of view that we have some breathing time, that the pace of development offshore has slackened somewhat. However, we know that the pace will pick up again, and when that pace begins to drive forward, the question which must be asked is, will Canadians benefit from the increased activity in the Arctic Ocean and the offshore in the Atlantic? In order to benefit from the increased activity that will take place in the decades to come, the legal infrastructure has to be in place. We need to have a coastal trade legislation that models the Jones Act, that says, you cannot build, you cannot operate coasting ships that have not been built in Canada, and you cannot crew those ships with anyone other than Canadians.

We must move forward now to improve the legislation before us. We must ensure that Canada has a national deep sea fleet. We must also ensure that the offshore development that goes on, exploration, supply and production, not include but be composed of Canadian content, Canadian workers and the Canadian communities which benefit from it.

If the Government is going to live up to its promise to strengthen that sector of industry in Canada, to harness the employment available and the economic opportunity, this Bill is only the first step. The first step with this Bill is to remove the exceptions that exist, the same exceptions that the Liberal Party held to for years and years with such callous contempt for that industry.

I look forward to working in the committee and testing the resolve of government Members in facing the people who work in the shipyard industry and who represent the communities in which those industries are based, the shipowners and shipbuilders who come before the committee.

Let us see the Government's commitment now, three years after the election, to the promises it made. Let us see the Government convince those people that it does in fact have concern, that it will in fact live up to the promises made in the 1984 election campaign. We do not want to hear that those promises will be maintained in some other Parliament. At the present level of honouring promises, the present Government will not exist in another Parliament at least in the form of the Conservative Party of Canada. One of the reasons is that people who live in shipbuilding communities will not be voting for the Conservatives on the basis of their track record to date.

That can be changed, however. We will assist this Bill to move on to committee so these things can be examined in detail.

Something else that is important is the question of treatment by the Government of the marine industries. Items of safety were put into the Canada Shipping Act, but with respect to the cost recovery program, and I think that in opening up this Bill with the coasting trade and allowing it to move to committee, we should begin to look at the Government's treatment of marine industries. We should be encouraging that infrastructure and assisting people who operate coasting vessels to supply small communities. I would take as an example a community such as Bella Bella on the coast of British Columbia which my colleague, the Hon. Member for Cariboo—Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway) knows well. He is from the central coast, a native of the area, a person who has demonstrated serious concern over the years. The outfit that services the coasting operation which services that community has been hampered by extremely large cost-recovery programs which are going to continue to increase. All that does is to harm the communities such as Bella Bella. All that essentially comes out of that kind of short-sighted cost-recovery program is that the cost of living in Bella Bella and other communties, which was inordinately high to begin with, becomes even worse.

What I probably should have at this point to show the direction is a short note giving an indication of intention. However, what we have is something that involves the safety of the operation of coasting vessels. When we go to committee I, for one, will be raising the issue of lighthouses on the coast of British Columbia. For short-sighted cost-recovery and the desire to cut out public servants, the Government is going to shut down a number of lighthouses in the sense that the operators will be removed. Mark my words, this is going to be a loss in the safety of operation on the coast of British Columbia. This is going to create a situation where the available information to mariners will be limited.

The short-sighted attitude that a lighthouse in this day and age of modern technology is simply a light and a horn is absolutely wrong. It is an important part of weather information. It is an important part of communication. It is an important part of search and rescue and, indeed, it has become an integral part of the operation of marine and air safety on the coast of British Columbia. The Government's intention to shut those lighthouses down, to remove the operators and put in an automated process with which we will only gain a light that works some of the time and a foghorn which works some of the time, reminds me to a large degree of the front bench of the Conservative Party. It is of very limited use to anyone and certainly a detriment to the safety of Canadians.

In conclusion, I would like to deal with the area of sovereignty in the north and what that has to do with the coasting trade. What we are concerned about is the idea of putting nuclear submarines under the icecap. Someone suggested that the Cabinet had been smoking its running shoes the day it came up with that decision. What we have is a situation that is completely irrational, if in fact we were looking at developing Canadian communities and assisting Canadian companies to operate in the north. We have Americans and international operations there, but restricting that operation strictly to northern Canada, would certainly be far ahead of providing the nuclear submarine idea to northern Canada. The construction of ice-breakers, the development and retaining in Canada of the ice-hardened hull and the ice-breaker technology is an absolute must.

We have a situation in which the Government could launch Canadians on a path of critical stupidity with respect to the nuclear submarine issue. At the same time we have a golden opportunity, if the Government is willing to expend that much capital on something that will provide absolutely no benefit to Canada, no benefit to the security of Canada, North America, or to the world, to expend it in marine technology, shipbuilding and securing the communities that are based on shipbuilding. This would give us tremendous benefits.

I suggest that the Government should not only not follow the destructive path that the Liberal Government took in previous years but, indeed, it must fulfil the promises which made sense, the promises of the 1984 election campaign. It recognized the flaws of the previous Government. It was aware of what was required by the shipbuilding industries, the people who worked in that industry and the communities which depended on it. It was keenly aware of this and made the appropriate promises. Three years have now passed and nothing has happened—absolutely nothing.

When this legislation goes before committee those groups which depend on the coasting trade, shipbuilding, the deep sea fleet and the development of northern transportation in northern communities must be allowed to come before the committee, not only to provide the information that the committee needs to bring this Bill up to speed but to hear from government Members on the committee why their promises have not been kept to date. They must be told why the proposed exceptions in the Bill today are being allowed to continue, to continue the negative, wrong-headed policy of the previous Liberal Government. That has to be explained. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus), nods his head in agreement, as does the Hon. Member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), who is an intelligent and perceptive individual. As his head drops off to the side, he says that it is this kind of a nod. That was his standard procedure in the House for many years. But I notice that his interest picked up when the shipbuilding subject came up.

This is a critical and serious subject. I for one will be participating in the deliberations of the committee. Other colleagues here today wish to speak further on the matter. I am prepared at this point to relinquish the floor to hear others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Hicks).

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Speaker, I listened to most of the Hon. Member's comments. I listened to his criticisms. We all want Canadians to develop a greater fishing fleet, a first-class fishing fleet. The Hon. Member took a great deal of time to criticize the Government and its lack of commitment to the development of the shipping industry in Canada which would, in turn, create jobs. Surely, the Hon. Member is forgetting two or three things. He is forgetting that the Government has created 900,000 jobs since it was elected three years ago.

With respect to the shipbuilding industry in Canada, I think the Hon. Member alluded to the Class 8 ice-breaker that is being built, which will be one of the leading ice-breakers in the world. It will be built in Canada.

He also alluded to the 10 submarines, which involves a $7.5 billion program to take place over the next few years. They will be developed in Canada. One cannot say that the Government is ignoring the shipbuilding industry. He called it irrational because the submarines will go under the ice. I hope the Hon. Member realizes that this is a three-ocean country with a two-ocean navy and that these nuclear-powered submarines will have the capability of defending Canada in all three oceans at any one time.

The Hon. Member forgot to make reference to the six Canadian patrol frigates that are being developed in Canada. The first six Canadian patrol frigates are being developed at a cost of, I believe, about $5 billion, and there will be another six additional patrol frigates built after that.

The Hon. Member forgot the reference in the White Paper that was tabled in the House on June 5 to the fact that Canada would develop mine-sweepers.

I make reference to these matters to point out that at no time has the Government turned its back on the shipbuilding industry. It is developing the shipbuilding industry, and it will continue to develop it.

Canada does not have any mine-sweepers. If our harbours were to be mined, we would find that we do not have the capability of clearing the mines out. This is why that commitment was made in the White Paper. This is why many items were overlooked, and I hope Members of the House and all Canadians realize that the Government is doing everything it can at the moment for the shipbuilding industry and that it will continue to do so.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I will take the Hon. Member's comments in sequence. He first referred to the Conservative Government having created 900,000 jobs. The only response to that, one which most Canadians are giving, is one of shoulders shrugging and saying: "Truth like beauty is a phenomenon that occurs only in the eye of the beholder". I do not think that anyone seriously and credibly accepts that. The method of tallying jobs and employment has been so doctored in the country by the present Government and in the dying days of the past Government that one cannot recognize adequate job statistics. Quite frankly, most people say: "Nonsense".

The Hon. Member's second comment was with respect to the ice-breaker and the patrol frigate program. These are previous Liberal programs.

Mr. Mayer: I think you have been smelling your own running shoes to make statements like that!

Mr. Skelly: Come on, Charlie—

Mr. Mayer: What a goof!

Mr. Skelly: I suggest that the Minister relax. He should take a look at who is at the 24 per cent mark in the polls, if we are talking about goofs.

I hope that the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board will take a more responsible position when he appears in Cabinet and begins to look at the communities. When the individuals come down from communities such as Vancouver, Saint John and various other places to demand that the Government live up to its promises, hopefully he will be there to explain to them, not to me, why the Government has failed to live up to its promises. Perhaps he will be able to explain why the exceptions are in this legislation, the exceptions that we have been fighting for years. The Minister does not have to explain or comment on my comments. These are the comments put forward by the people who live in those communities and work in those yards.

Mr. Mayer: He does not think that 900,000 jobs is important.

Mr. Skelly: We do not believe the Government, yet it believes its own rhetoric. I am prepared to admit that truth like beauty occurs in the eye of the beholder. If that is what the Hon. Member sees, it is not what other people see. It is not what is reflected in the Gallup polls or in other polls.

Mr. Mayer: The NDP does not care about jobs!

Mr. Skelly: I wish the Minister would relax, Mr. Speaker, and let me deal with the other two comments.

I think that if we go to the people and say: "Look, do we want nuclear-powered submarines? Do we see that as one of the first priorities in the country?" The people will say quite clearly: "Nonsense".

We do have a sovereignty problem in the Arctic, and it is an important one. The question we must ask is whether or not Americans will begin to drill for oil and gas and other resources in territory that Canada claims. It has done that. Will it completely run the northern seaways unfettered by Canadian regulations in waters that we believe are Canadian? Will nuclear submarines do anything to deal with the basic bread and butter sovereignty issues that we have? The answer to those questions is no. The ice-breaker was a positive move. Announcing the ice-breaker in western Canada was a positive move, and I say that not just because I am from western Canada. The use of some major technology in the Arctic is a start in the right direction. We have to recognize what those priorities are to establish an effective operation by Canadians and the ability to work and operate there, not with nuclear submarines, but with equipment that services and develops the communities.

• (1710)

Why is the Conservative Government at 24 per cent in the polls? The reason is that it has not read the wishes of the people. It has moved in a direction diametrically opposed to where the people want to go. I can appreciate the excitement, concern, and distress of some Members who have spoken today, but it is not an attack on me or the NDP; it is a closer listening to the wishes of the people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On debate, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. Harris).

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in the debate and it gives me pleasure to have an opportunity to speak on the Bill. I wish to commend the Government for providing the opportunity for a debate of this nature.

In looking at the Bill itself, the primary reasons, as suggested by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), are to replace our current legislation which provides for coastal trade being reserved to British ships, and to change that to Canadian ships.

I suppose one may say that that is progress. It does sound good. As a result of this Bill, we will Canadianize our fleet and have a great upsurge in activity of Canadian ships and trading. That is not the case. In suggesting that this be changed, the Government has told us that the policies that it has been pursuing, which I presume includes its predecessors, has led to a situation where 99 per cent of the Canadian coasting trade is done by a domestic fleet.

What will this Bill do? Where is the beef? Where is the action? On this issue, if we compare ourselves to our American neighbours, we see a different approach taken by the Americans in the Jones Act of 1920. In order to protect its coastal trade, shipbuilding industry, and jobs for its seafarers, the Americans said that their coastal trade must be carried out by American registered vessels, built in the United States, owned by American interests, and crewed by American citizens. Since 1920 that Act has protected American coastal shipping and trade in a strong manner.

In Canada we have Canadian registered vessels now required to carry out the coastal trade. I am told that all but two vessels that are involved in the coastal trade in Canada are presently registered here. I am also told that we have two or three British ships involved in the coastal trade. We are forcing them to change their registration and perhaps pay a duty in order to continue to be involved in the coastal trade.

In economic terms this does not provide any real progress. It does sound good. We now say that all of our coastal trade must be carried out by Canadian registered vessels. We are throwing off the motherland and the British ship notion. We are throwing away our ties, our dependence, our connections to Britain, and our favouritism towards British ships as opposed to Canadian ships. I say, let us do it, yes, but let us not beat our breasts and brag about what wonderful things we are doing to change the economy of Canada.

We have a desperate situation in this country, as was brought forward in the debate the other day on a motion moved by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart). His motion was to set up a special inquiry on the shipbuilding industry in Quebec. I spoke in that debate and reiterated the concerns about the shipbuilding industry.

When the Government was seeking a mandate from the people of Canada, it promised the Canadian people that it would put together a shipbuilding policy for Canada. We have not seen action on that. There have been piecemeal bits of legislation which are window-dressing. By requiring Canadian registered ships to engage in coastal trade when 99 per cent of the coastal trade is done by Canadian registered ships is merely window-dressing and is fooling the people of Canada, particularly those people who are in such desperate need of employment in this economically unsafe industry.

For example, the two shipyards operating in Newfoundland are in a very precarious situation. There have been lay-offs in the dockyard in St. John's, and further lay-offs are predicted. The shipyard in Marystown is experiencing more satisfactory performance in this last little while, but this industry is precarious all over the country. The Government, and the former Minister of Supply and Services have suggested that we ought to have one shipyard closed down in Atlantic Canada.

Instead of having a window-dressing policy such as changing the registration, there ought to be a vigorous policy which will lead to the development and the stability of the shipbuilding industry.

The last speaker from the government side spoke about the frigates and the procurement program of the Canadian Government. It is right and just that the procurement program of the Canadian Government ought to have ships built in Canada. That is only what we expect. It is certainly not satisfactory to have only government procurement as part of the Government's policy on shipbuilding. There is not a comprehensive policy, or a policy that ensures stability in that industry.

I hope that the committee stage of this Bill will provide an opportunity for amendments to be made to strengthen the Bill, the opportunity to discuss the exemptions, and the very problematic exemptions if some of those are removed that may have an effect and bring about some change.

As the Bill presently stands it brings about no real change in the economy and no real change in the desperate situation of shipbuilders and the shipping industry. I would also suggest that it brings about no significant improvement for the thousands of Canadian seafarers who are unemployed and desperately seeking work.

We need leadership from the Government, not a limp-noodle approach which suggests changing the names on the registration of a ship with no Canadian ownership requirements and no insistence that the ships be built in Canada. We need something strong which will be a real initiative for shipbuilding and seafarers in this country.

I wish to advise the House of one of the most outrageous things that I have heard concerning shipping and the care that we have for the Canadian seamen's involvement in shipping and shipping under Canadian control. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly), mentioned that Canadian Pacific was a great offender in the area of using foreign ships in what he called "a force of seagoing sweatboxes". I heard from an organization which is concerned with providing jobs for seafarers. I was told a story of a Canadian seaman who was out of work and looking for a job with Canadian Pacific Ships. He was told that the jobs on CP ships were being handled out of England, so he made it his business to contact the people running these Canadian-owned ships, the shipping agent in London, and was told the following: "Sorry, we can't hire you; we don't hire foreigners". That must have come as a very great shock to that Canadian seaman who was looking for a job on a Canadian ship.

It was the policy of that company not to hire Canadians. The shipping agent, charged with staffing and crewing vessels, regarded that Canadian as a foreigner and, therefore, no job was available to him.

If that is the state of the Canadian Government's interest in the shipbuilding industry and concern about jobs for Canadians in the Canadian shipbuilding industry, we need more than a Bill or a measure which will change the registration of two ships. We need more than window-dressing with a list of exemptions, which leaves us with the status quo.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. McMillan that Bill C-74, an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the Parties in order to try to assist the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), the environment critic of the Official Opposition.

We are proposing that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Browes) continue from the other day and immediately thereafter the floor be granted to the Hon. Member for Davenport. We would suggest that the House not see the clock in order to allow the Hon. Member for Davenport to complete his remarks.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I just want to indicate that there have been some discussions in an effort to ensure that the Parliamentary Secretary has an opportunity to complete her remarks and that the environment critic of the Official Opposition has an opportunity to complete his remarks. We have agreed not to see the clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the unanimous consent to that effect?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Government and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), I am honoured and pleased today to be able to speak on Bill C-74 respecting the proposed Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

In the Speech from the Throne on October 1, 1986, the Government clearly acknowledged the essential relationship between a clean and healthy environment and the quality of Canadian life. We recognize the interdependence of environment and the economy. A clean and healthy environment is essential to the survival of Canada's resource-based economy.

The Government then signalled the high priority that it attaches to protecting and preserving the Canadian environment and made a commitment to introduce a new comprehensive federal environmental protection Act, to improve our country's capacity to deal effectively with pollution, particularly from toxic chemicals.

The very title of the Act tells Canadians what it will do—protect our environment. That is one of the most important challenges facing our society today.

Environmental protection involves each and every one of us. No one has a priority on the air we breathe or the water we drink. Our environment is a precious and delicate balance between human activity and nature. Unfortunately, human activity is tipping the scales in a dangerous direction.

Every year the Province of Ontario alone produces 1.5 million tonnes of wastes. The Great Lakes contain some 800 highly toxic chemicals. Rivers such as the St. Clair and Niagara contain a deadly mix of pollutants. Air pollution is threatening our wildlife, lakes, and forests.

This week in Montreal over 40 nations gathered to discuss the growing problem of the depletion of the earth's ozone layer. Canada is proud to host this major international environmental conference, and the Minister of the Environment has taken a leading role in getting the conference to reach a binding protocol.

Chemicals like chlorofluorocarbons, PCBs, Mirex, and ozone are all around us. From the clothes we wear to the food we eat and to the very paper I have in my hand, these chemicals and thousands of others play an important role in our daily lives.

There are over 100,000 known chemicals in use in the world today. How we develop, market, distribute, and dispose of them is vital to the proper protection of our environment. As new chemicals come into use, Canadians deserve to know what effect they will have on their environment. Canadians also deserve effective laws which punish those who deliberately pollute our air, land, and water.

Two years ago, 11,000 litres of dry-cleaning fluid were dumped into the St. Clair River, causing what has come to be known as the blob. Underwater disposal sites have left toxics seeping into our waterways. Uncontrolled smoke-stacks dump thousands of tonnes of sulphur dioxide into the air, causing acid rain which is killing our forests, lakes, and rivers. The Windermere Basin and the Sydney tar sands also present severe strains on our environment.

The Government has acted to clean up each of these spills with effective programs, but we need legislation in place which prevents this kind of thing from occurring. We need laws that concentrate on prevention and not on reaction. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act will do just that.

Industry wants this legislation in order to improve credibility with its workers, its clients, and the public. Industry is also looking forward to the predictable regulatory process which the Canadian Environmental Protection Act will provide. Labour wants it because, coupled with the workplace hazardous materials information system recently enshrined in law by this Government, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act will increase protection for workers who are often exposed to the highest concentration of chemicals, biotechnology products and radio-nucleides and the like.

Environmental groups also want to see this legislation in place because it strengthens the federal environmental legislative base. Bill C-74 is good news for all Canadians. It is a tangible response to the public's concerns and those of industry, labour and environmental groups as well as other sectors of society.

In view of the importance of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act as a legislative initiative, we regret that the Minister of the Environment is unable to be here with us today. However, the House will be pleased to know that the Minister of the Environment is indeed heading the Canadian delegation to the United Nations environment program diplomatic conference on the ozone layer in Montreal. I know I speak for the House in congratulating the Minister of the Environment on his efforts in reaching this major international agreement. Getting over 40 nations from every corner of the world to agree on a program that will reduce the threat to the ozone layer is indeed, as the Minister said, an historic event.

The ozone layer is crucial to the very survival of this planet. Its shield protects our agricultural crops, our wildlife and ourselves from the very harmful effects of the sun's rays. Bill C-74 will give us the legislative tool we need to meet our international commitments. We can stop depletion of the atmospheric ozone through stricter control of the manufacture, importation, use and export of CFCs and other ozone-depleting substances. We are indeed pleased about this and we congratulate the Minister.

The proposed Canadian Environmental Protection Act is not an omnibus Bill which will consolidate all the environmental protection authorities of the federal Government. It was never intended to do so. Environmental protection provisions are found and will continue to exist in other federal statutes that address and regulate activities in such sectors as agriculture, transportation and energy.

The environmental considerations in these statutes are an integral part of the over-all regulations of these sectors and cannot be separated from the other aspects. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act will, however, provide the framework to enable federal Ministers to integrate environmental considerations more effectively into their policy-development activities and programs.

Bill C-74 represents the outcome of a consensus-building process that began two years ago with the creation of the Environmental Contaminants Act amendments consultative committee and of the multi-stakeholder group that produced the report entitled From Cradle to Grave: A Management Approach for Chemicals. The tabling on December 18, 1986, of a draft Environmental Protection Act for discussion and consultation followed.

The consultation process that took place following the December tabling that brought us the Canadian Environmental Protection Act has been both extensive and intensive. Information and consultation sessions were held across the country. Bilateral and multilateral meetings included representatives from provincial and territorial Governments, industry, labour, environmental groups and indeed the general public. These meetings resulted in over 300 briefs being submitted to the Minister of the Environment for consideration.

The culmination of this consultation process was the national consultation meeting that was held in Ottawa on March 22 and 23 of this year at which there were over 200 participants. The Minister listened and acted. A short six months and seven days after releasing the draft Bill, on June 26 the Government introduced for first reading in the House of Commons Bill C-74, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

The proposed Canadian Environmental Protection Act will stand us in excellent stead through the closing years of this century and into the next one. It is a forward-looking piece of legislation with a firm foundation for a nation-wide approach to environmental protection in Canada.

Bill C-74 will plug the gaps identified in Cradle to Grave: The Management Approach for Chemicals. It will require industry to provide an assessment of a substance's potential for environmental and health impacts and the ways of containing them before they introduce the substance to Canadians.

The Bill will provide greater information-gathering powers and clean-up provisions for those chemicals suspected of adverse environmental or human health impacts so that Canadians will not be left at risk from those substances. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act will control the processes and products of biotechnology. The new Act will be vigorously enforced and will reverse the belief of Canadians that industry freely pollutes the environment and is allowed to continue to do so.

The first steps to achieving comprehensive management of substances are the compiling of a priority substance list identifying chemicals and other materials requiring urgent assessment and evaluation and the preparation of a domestic substances list naming all substances governed by the Act in commercial use in Canada. The latter list will likely include more than 30,000 substances.

An important area for extensive federal-provincial territorial-industrial co-operation is the requirement for the Minister to develop environmental quality guidelines and codes of practice. The federal teamwork approach to environmental protection will be pursued with the provision in the new Act of authority to develop regulations and guidelines to govern activities and operations on federal lands and for federal undertakings. The Minister has emergency powers under this Act to act immediately where an urgent response to an environmental problem is called for. He is also empowered to order recalls of any product containing a prohibited substance.

The opportunity for public participation in the enforcement of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is extensive. Some examples are: The right of a person who has or may sustain a loss or damage as the result of action prohibited by the Act to seek an injunction in the courts to stop or prevent the action; the right of 12 persons to petition the Minister to investigate any alleged violation—the Minister must respond with his findings; the right of a person to have his or her identity kept confidential when reporting an alleged violation to an inspector or other official; the right to petition the Minister to have a substance included on the priority substance list—the Minister must respond with his decision; The right of a person to appeal a decision not to regulate a substance as toxic—the appeal will be considered by a board of review.

Public participation in the enforcement of CEPA will be crucial to its success. Canadians are well aware of the pollution problems around them. They deserve an opportunity to bring those concerns to the Minister's attention for action. Public involvement in enforcing this Act can and will work. A community group in Scarborough recently brought their concerns about a factory in the city to the attention of the company involved, and after several meetings between the North Bendale Community Association and the A.G. Simpson Company, the company agreed to install a thermal incinerator that will reduce the fumes from that plant and recover some heat loss which will help to lower their operating costs. With Bill C-74, more and more Canadians will be able to bring those kinds of concerns to the attention of the Minister for prompt consideration.

Maximum penalties under the Act are the stiffest ever in any federal environmental protection statute. The most serious violations involving death of a person can be prosecuted under Canada's Criminal Code with a maximum penalty of life imprisonment; unlimited fines or up to five years' imprisonment or both following conviction for recklessly causing an environmental disaster or wantonly risking the death of or harm to another person; fines of up to $1 million or up to three years in jail or both for failing to provide requested information on a substance that may be toxic; fines of up to $1 million or up to three years' imprisonment or both for manufacturing or importing a prohibited substance; fines up to $200,000 or up to six months' imprisonment or both for failing to assist an inspector or for knowingly providing an inspector with false information. As well, each day of a violation can be considered a separate offence and corporate officers can be held personally responsible for actions of their companies.

One of the most important features of this new Act is the authority given to the federal Government to sign agreements with the provinces and territories for administration of the legislation. Responsibility for jurisdiction over environmental protection in Canada is shared between the federal and provincial Governments. Bill C-74 recognizes that shared responsibility. First, in Clause 5, the Bill authorizes establishment of a federal-provincial advisory committee to provide counsel to federal Ministers on regulatory initiatives under the legislation. Second, other provisions of the Bill obligate the federal Government to consult with the provinces and territories before undertaking regulatory action in such areas as release and disposal of substances. This mechanism will afford provincial and territorial Governments an opportunity to provide important input in advance of final regulations. Third, the administrative agreements permitted under Clause 90 of the Bill will provide for explicit specification of how the federal and provincial and territorial Governments will work together to administer this very important legislation. These provisions are designed to avoid overlap and duplication with the administration of provincial environment statutes.

Bill C-74 incorporates major improvements to much of the environmental protection legislation administered by the Minister of the Environment. However, good legislation alone and of itself is not enough. There must be proper and effective yet fair and predictable enforcement. There must be commitment of financial and human resources to support and enforce the legislation. On June 26, the Minister of the Environment released a draft enforcement and compliance policy for public review and discussion. The policy explains how the Government intends to encourage co-operation and compliance with the law, and that enforcement officials will deal severely with those who violate this new Act.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act is central to this Government's total environmental program. With this in mind we have already announced that Cabinet has approved $37 million in new funding over five years to implement, achieve compliance with, and enforce the Act effectively. This final allocation will allow for the hiring of the necessary inspectors, chemical toxicologists, and other personnel.

It is clear, I am sure, to all Members of the House that the Canadian public wants and deserves better environmental protection. This Government is committed to ensuring that Canadians receive better environmental protection.

• (1750)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we heard the assessment of Bill C-74 from the government side, and I submit that it was an Alice in Wonderland rendition of what this Bill will do. Unfortunately, the measures on paper in this Bill are not backed up by the political will required to enforce them. In my remarks I will touch upon these aspects because it is very important that Canadians understand what is going on here.

First, let me put the Bill before us tonight in the context of the process. This is the fourth year that the so-called Progressive Conservative Party has been in power, and this is the first time that we are debating, at second reading, an environmental measure. In this period of time a number of non-environmental measures and Bills have been introduced. I mention, for example, taxes on gasoline which favour the sale of leaded gasoline over unleaded, changes in the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, and other fiscal measures which do not take into account environmental values and considerations. The list goes on at some length.

Until today the only time environmental issues or measures were debated in this House was on opposition days. The record of the Government on protection of the environment from chemical products is not one to be proud of taking into account what has happened since 1984. In November of that year, a number of cuts were made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) which affected research in the field of environmental protection vis-à-vis chemical products.

I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary will remember the cancellation of the Guelph-Toronto Toxicology Centre in November of that year. There were several incidents of muzzling of scientists in Environment Canada who were engaged in matters related to toxic chemicals. There was, first, the cancellation of and then the changes in publication of storm warnings. At the present time there is limited consultation on the renegotiation of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement.

If you put all these measures together and include the cuts to the Canadian Wildlife Service in the branch which is engaged in measuring the impact of chemicals on wildlife in order to draw conclusions on the impact of chemicals on human health, you come to the conclusion that the record of the Government is abysmal in the field of the protection of human health from the presence of chemical products.

It is important, therefore, that as we debate Bill C-74 we remind the Parliamentary Secretary and, through her, the Minister about the record to date before they get too carried away. Contrary to the claims made this afternoon by the Parliamentary Secretary this Bill will not clean up the St. Clair River, this Bill will not clean up the Niagara River, this Bill will not stop daily emissions into the air or the water, and this Bill will not clean up the Sydney tar ponds.

In her speech today the Parliamentary Secretary tried to create the same impression which her Minister tried to create when he announced this Bill last year, that being that this Bill would be the cure-all of all our problems in the environment. In December of last year the Minister called it the toughest pollution legislation in the western hemisphere. By June of 1987, after consultations, the description of the Minister had become a little more realistic. He called it a first step toward cleaning up the environment.

We welcome that, because if the description of the Bill is honest it will not raise false expectations in Canadians and will strengthen rather than weaken the credibility of the Minister and the Department on this very important matter of public protection. The wording was toned down because this Bill does not do the great things which the Parliamentary Secretary suggested in her speech that it would.

The Minister also promised an environmental Bill of rights. Instead he was forced, I suppose, to deliver a preamble to the Bill in which, in elegant prose, certain principles are stated which have no legal status. None of the "whereases" that we see on page 2 of the Bill refer to compliance and enforcement. That is a very serious shortcoming for reasons upon which I will touch in a little while.

There are presently 24 federal Departments which administer some 57 environmental laws. The Minister claimed that Bill C-74 streamlines this situation.

The reality is that Bill C-74 includes the Clean Air Act, the Ocean Dumping Control Act, the Environmental Contaminants Act, and parts, albeit not all, of the Clean Water Act and the Department of the Environment Act.

Through this consolidation, when this Bill is given final approval, instead of 57 environmental laws we will have 55. We will, however, have the same 24 federal Departments administering separate legislation. If this is the Minister of the Environment's (Mr. McMillan) concept for untangling a mess in the environment, I submit that we are in trouble.

Although the preamble to the Bill is not a Bill of rights, it is at least an expression of intention and sets a tone which is better than nothing at all. In all fairness I must also say that it has been commented upon by people who are knowledgeable in the matter of an environmental Bill of rights, which has been discussed in this House for many years.

• (1800)

In the case of the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the House ought to note that Toby Vigod of that organization pointed out that while preambles may provide a limited aid to the interpretation of the meaning of the provisions inside this Bill, that preamble does not confer any rights on citizens to protect their environment. There should not be any illusions about that.

At the national consultations in March of this year, all parties, including industry, agreed that if a bill of rights could not be included in the legislation, there should be at least formal guarantees for a greater degree of public input at key decision-making points. So far, these guarantees have not been given. We are waiting for them because that commitment is very important.

Proceeding to the Parliamentary Secretary's reference to information, the amount of information required in this Bill by government for the assessment of toxicity of a new chemical in order to decide whether a chemical should be regulated or even banned is determined by the quantity of chemical used or manufactured or imported into Canada.

The information to be given to the Government should not be guided by the quantity of chemicals. It should be the same regardless of quantity. The initiative of bringing on to the market-place a new product should be enough to require all the information possible and should not be geared to the quantity that that particular producer wants to market.

One can do a lot of harm with very small quantities, or very little harm with very large quantities. Therefore, the information should not be triggered by the quantity to be put on the market, but on the merits of the product and whether or not it should enter the market at all. That is a very serious shortcoming in the Bill.

Let us turn to export notification. I hope the Government will consider amendments in committee because what is being proposed here is bad legislation. If a chemical is banned in Canada, according to Bill C-74 it can be exported to another country, provided that the Government of Canada notifies the receiving nation. I am sure that this is not a position with which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), who I am pleased is in the House tonight, would be in agreement. If a chemical is too toxic to be used in Canada, it is surely too toxic to be used anywhere else.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will agree that we should not engage in the export of products which we ourselves do not want to be used in Canada. The Bill should be amended so that the Minister will have the power to ban the export of chemicals that have been banned in Canada. This would be consistent with the report by the World Commission on Environment and Development, which I am sure the Minister endorses. The Government will probably endorse that next month at the General Assembly of the United Nations and, therefore, the necessity of being consistent on that front is even more urgent.

There is another aspect of the Bill which we would like to raise tonight. It concerns the inclusion of other Acts. It seems to us that the Minister and the Government missed an opportunity to improve existing legislation which is now being rolled into Bill C-74. The Ocean Dumping Control Act, which is currently the subject of a Supreme Court challenge by Crown Zellerbach and the British Columbia Government, could have been strengthened instead of simply added.

It is also important to raise the question of ministerial discretion in this Bill. There are several clauses which ought to be the object of examination in the committee because there is a potential for bad decisions. The Minister will have the power to deal with toxic chemicals in a manner that may be contrary to the public interest. I am not referring to the Minister in particular, but to the fact that there are certain ministerial discretionary powers which should not be given to the Minister of the day, particularly when it comes to matters of this importance.

Clause 29(4) would allow the Minister to waive the requirement for any information he decides is unnecessary. Why? Clause 15(4) and Clause 16(3) would allow the Minister, on request of an applicant, to extend the time allowed to meet information requirements or other acts of compliance without public explanation or consultation. Why would that be necessary?

Clause 37(2)(a) and Clause 37(2)(b) would allow the Minister to exempt chemicals from regulation at his discretion. If this Bill is as important, significant and such a landmark as the Parliamentary Secretary would have us believe in her intervention earlier, there would not be these discretionary powers in the hands of the Minister of the day.

I also want to draw the attention of the House to clauses that concern federal-provincial relations, particularly Clause 2, Clause 37(4) and Clause 90. They define the relationship between the federal and provincial Governments. In essence, this Bill would give each province a veto over the application of the proposed Act in its jurisdiction if a province feels that it has comparable legislation.

The report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, which I am pleased the Government endorses, stresses that what is needed is strong national standards that are enforced on a national basis.

In the Canadian context, I suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary that Bill C-74 should propose strong national standards that can only be superseded by provincial legislation when it is stronger than the federal legislation, but not when it is weaker. That would not serve the public interest.

This particular aspect which troubles us was also interestingly defined in a letter signed on September 10 by the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the Citizens Network on Waste Management, Pollution Probe and Energy Probe in Toronto. The four signatories expressed concern that Section 106(a)(2) of the Constitution Act may discourage the federal Government from assuming its responsibility to protect the nation's environment if it can be argued that an initiative may be in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Somehow this comment on Section 106(a)(2) in the Constitution Act seems to reinforce the notion that in Bill C-74 the federal Government is going to give in to lower provincial lower standards and thus create a checkerboard type of standards across the nation, which would not be desirable and which we should not endorse. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will convey to her Minister these preoccupations which have been registered by these organizations.

There was a reference to the Meech Lake Accord in an editorial in the Sunday Star which is relevant to this particular passage in the Bill. A reference was made on August 16 to the fact that two clauses in Bill C-74 would require the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) to consult all the provinces before he drafts regulations or issues emergency orders to control toxic chemicals.

While Ottawa would retain the right to act on its own after the consultations, the provisions invite Ottawa to take the weakest possible action so that everyone can agree. I admit we are dealing in the realm of the hypothetical, but nevertheless when we are preparing legislation we must try to face every possible circumstance. I am sure we want to have legislation which strengthens the national standards, in consultation with the provinces, and sets the highest possible standards rather than setting the lowest common denominator, as this Bill, I am afraid, will inevitably tend to do.

I must move on to other aspects of this Bill. The Minister on earlier occasions promised a comprehensive Bill to deal with toxic chemicals. It must be put on record that if Canadians believe, as a result of Bill C-74, that pesticides or chemicals used in the food and drug industry, or chemicals regulated by any other federal statute, or even nuclear waste, are in this Bill, this notion has to be put to rest. Pesticides and chemicals in the food and drug industry, nuclear waste and any chemical which is regulated by other federal statutes, are not included in this piece of legislation.

In the consultations which took place last winter, and which were very productive and extremely well run, there were several public interest groups which called for the reform of the process of environmental assessment and review. We agree that Bill C-74 is not the vehicle for enshrining a process of environmental assessment and review. However, we would urge the Government to table a companion Bill in which the question of environmental assessment and review is dealt with.

The Minister did promise as recently as March of this year a White Paper proposal for the reform and improvement of the environmental assessment and review process. It is now September and the White Paper seems to be reduced to the status of a discussion paper. It is still absent from the parliamentary timetable. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary will refresh the Minister's memory on this matter.

We come now to what seems to me to be the weakest part of this Bill, that is the enforcement and compliance. The record over the past two years is not one to write home about. In reply to a question on the Order Paper, the Government in May supplied me with an answer with regard to the violation of federal pollution legislation. I would like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, what that answer brings to light, which I found rather astonishing, I must say. In 1985 there were 18 charges laid under the Fisheries Act. Nine charges resulted in successful prosecution. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how much was paid in fines in these nine successful prosecutions? A total of $33,800 was collected. Under the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, one charge was laid. That charge was successful and the fine was $14,000. In 1986, 18 charges were laid under Section 33 of the Fisheries Act. There were 12 successful prosecutions for a total of $93,950 in penalties.

Under the Ocean Dumping Control Act, there was one charge laid and no successful prosecution. This is a pretty weak record, I must say. How can we believe that this Government is serious about a $1 million fine, which is in this Bill, if it has such a weak record of compliance and enforcement? It is one thing to have the fine on paper and in the statute. It is another thing to make it work. It is another thing to see to it that the fine does not just remain as an idea on paper.

Therefore, I have some very serious reservations about the approach which was dealt with in January of this year by way of a report by the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council entitled "Enforcement Practices of Environment Canada". It brings out in a succinct manner the criticism—and I think it was well intended, as it should be. It was meant in constructive terms—that the federal delegation of environmental enforcement amounts to a virtual abdication of responsibility for enforcement and has promoted discrepancies in the nature of enforcement responses across Canada.

In essence, what the council is saying is that our enforcement approach is lacking and weak because we tend to yield, or we tend to be shy or hesitant, with respect to the provinces doing it for us, or being seen as doing it in place of the provinces, or even to be seen as interfering, stepping into provincial jurisdiction.

That is a very serious matter which was brought to light by the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council. In conclusion, the report expressed the opinion that some current trends such as the delegation of administrative powers to provincial authorities, and excessive fears of federal-provincial conflicts, are having a negative effect on the implementation of Environment Canada's legislating mandate and undermines the confidence of Canadians in the Department. These are hard words. Canadians would like to have confidence in Environment Canada. It would be a great pity if the stiff fines of up to $1 million envisaged in the Bill remain a dead letter. This may be so because of the fear of federal-provincial legislation, or because the provinces are not equipped to enforce the regulations in the Bill, if it is decided that a certain province should do it instead of the federal Government, or because of other reasons that emerge.

The fact is that tough national standards recommended by the World Commission on Environment and Development are the essence of the answers to the problems that we have in the environment. With this Bill I am afraid that the Government is going in the opposite direction to the recommendations made by the World Commission on Environment and Development by delegating, as it seems to be delegating as a result of this Bill, this responsibility to the provinces. Some provinces will have weaker enforcement capacity. Some provinces will have none. We will have a checkerboard enforcement rather than a national standard that is strong, determined and controlled from the centre.

We then come to the famous $37 million which has been allocated to three agencies over five years to cover the costs of enforcing this legislation. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what can one do over five years with $37 million when one has to distribute it between three different agencies or departments? One can do very little if one is serious about the implemention of this Bill. That is why I said earlier that the interpretation of this Bill, the version given to us by the Parliamentary Secretary, sounded a bit to me like Alice in Wonderland. I say that because the financial resources are not there to do the job. Some $37 million over five years between three agencies will not do the job of dealing with 60,000 chemicals that are out there in the universe which surrounds us. In addition to that, there is the matter of dealing with the 1,000 chemicals that are produced every year and enter the market-place. This is a phenomenal task that we face.

It is interesting to study some of the observations put on paper by a professor from McMaster University in Hamilton. I refer to Professor Ross Hume Hall who was also a member of the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council. He expresses despair in an article produced in the spring of this year about the approach in this Bill which he calls the single-chemical approach. By that he means that each product will be examined by the Department according to a procedure that has been well established by the Department of National Health and Welfare and administered under the Food and Drugs Act.

He feels that this approach will not be able to cope with the shear weight of the 60,000 existing industrial chemicals. He says that to illustrate the absurdity of trying to regulate industrial chemicals in this manner, one should make a quick calculation. The bureaucratic team of the Contaminants Control Branch consists of 19 persons. It took them 10 years to assess five chemicals. Thus by a quick calculation of multiplying 10 by 19, which results in 190, it took that many person-years to come up with five regulations. He comes to the conclusion that Environment Canada's 10,000 employees, from janitors to the Deputy Minister, could write 260 regulations per year. That would not allow the branch to keep up with the 1,000 new chemicals that enter the market every year, let alone the other 60,000. It is an analysis that is compelling because it is based on experience gained thus far which questions the validity in the year 1987 of approaching the situation by way of a single-chemical analysis which is by its very nature a slow process and very heavy in terms of the requirements of scientists. It leaves out so many chemicals before they can be tackled in this manner.

I express the hope that this analysis by Professor Ross Hume Hall can be rebutted by the Department. I hope that it can be demonstrated that the laboratory technology of today allows bureaucrats to proceed at a much faster pace and that this assumption will not become a reality.

It is important to find ways of implementing this Bill in a manner that will tackle the real world out there and not force future generations of politicians 10 or 20 years from now to come to the conclusion that with Bill C-74 we actually applied the same formula and the same methodology that was applied in 1976 when the first contaminants legislation was debated and approved in the House. I hope that it will not be seen that we were not able in the intervening years between 1976 and 1986 to come up with a better methodology to deal with a very complex chemical world out there.

I conclude by saying that in committee we will put forward amendments. We hope that the Government because of its strength will come forward with amendments based on what I am sure will be a well-reasoned debate. It is one that wants to look after the interests of Canadians at large. It wants to ensure that future generations of Canadians will not suffer the consequences of chemicals allowed in the environment that should not be allowed and that the process of determining what is to be allowed in the environment will be a very strict process based on long-term consequences on human health and not on the health of laboratory rats.

It is our hope that this Bill will not raise the hopes of Canadians, as the Government sometimes tends to do, and that the committee will listen to witnesses who will appear before it. It is our hope that witnesses from every walk of life will be invited to bring forward their suggestions to improve this legislation and that we will not with Bill C-74 go through the experience that we had with Bill C-84. The committee studying that Bill invited witnessess but did not adopt even one amendment through that very important process.

I look forward to the interventions of other colleagues in the House, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that if the Government is motivated by goodwill and it has the intention of making this Bill into something of substance and durability, and it wishes to achieve or move toward some of the ideals outlined in the preamble, then we may come out with something of significance and substance.

I submit to you that we have a long way to go.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6.30 p.m., the House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

OPPOSITION TO TAX ON FOOD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106, it is my duty once more today to present a petition which meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form and content.

Your petitioners humbly sheweth that:

Whereas, since September 1984, the federal Government has imposed on Canadian taxpayers 24 new taxes or tax increases, in particular on medical and dental supplies, snack foods, candy and soft drinks;

Whereas the federal Government in its tax reform proposal has studied the possibility of imposing on Canadians a general tax on goods and services, including food;

And whereas food constitutes a vital element of day-to-day life and imposition of this tax would have the effect of seriously penalizing certain categories of taxpayers, such as the aged, families, the unemployed, low income taxpayers, youth and students;

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject all measures that would have the effect of imposing a sales tax on food products.

GRANTS AND/OR LOANS TO TORONTO AREA

Question No. 178—Mr. Redway:

Since September 4, 1984, did the Department of Finance make grants and/or loans to persons or corporations, non-governmental organizations and governments within Metropolitan Toronto and, if so, in each case, in what amount and for what purpose?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): In so far as the Department of Finance is concerned: nil.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 29

NATIONAL SECURITY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 29 I ask leave to propose a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the crisis in public confidence in the Government's ability to assure national security and to maintain a satisfactory security and intelligence service. This comes at a particularly sensitive time, that is, immediately before the Commonwealth heads of government meeting.

If I could refer to an earlier phase of your own career, Mr. Speaker, in which you participated, along with me and others in this House, in the creation of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, I can be certain that you will have the same sensitivity that I do to the importance of that agency being properly launched and properly supported by the Government and to the very critical nature of the work that it does.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) has brought to the attention of the Chair an application for an emergency debate under Standing Order 29. As he has stated, and as is stated in the letter which he most properly delivered to the Chair earlier this morning, the motion is to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the crisis in public confidence in the Government's ability to assure national security and maintain a satisfactory security and intelligence service, which, as he has pointed out, comes at a particularly sensitive time, that is, immediately before the Commonwealth heads of government meeting.

The Hon. Member for York Centre referred, probably quite improperly, to debates in which the Chair had taken part with regard to the security service. I, of course, have to put out of my mind completely, in terms of this ruling, those debates and any position that I took in them.

I can say to the Hon. Member for York Centre that I view the application seriously. However, at least for today, it is the disposition of the Chair to say that perhaps it is not quite appropriate to get into it in an emergency debate. As always on important matters, I will hear the Hon. Member or other Hon. Members again if it is appropriate to do so.

I thank the Hon. member for bringing this matter to the attention of the Chair and to the attention of the House. The matter is serious. The Chair views it as such, but, as I say, the application for an emergency debate is declined at this time.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, September 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. McMillan that Bill C-74, an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, since this is my first opportunity as the newly appointed critic in the area of the environment for the New Democratic caucus, I would like to begin by setting out some general views as to how I am going to approach environmental questions.

I say very frankly that I am a committed environmentalist. I feel compassionately about the question of the environment. Not only do I like to hike, canoe, and cross country ski, I am a former member of the board of Energy Probe and was, therefore, active on environmental issues before becoming a parliamentarian. I also have a strong religious commitment to the environment. I have beliefs which require human beings to look at the world as one which we do not own, one in which we live, work, and have certain rights, but where we have obligations to future generations. We are stewards of the earth and not the owners able to do with it what we wish.

I do not think this or other governments have paid adequate attention to our obligations to future generations. I do not think we should approach the question of resources as purely commercial commodities for sale. I am scandalized when Conservative Members get up and brag about deregulation in gas sales to the United States on the grounds that this will mean more sales, saying that we have a surplus. I do not believe that we can have a surplus of a non-renewable resource.

I think we should be changing our vocabulary. We should not be talking about producing resources which are non-renewable. We extract them, we may sell them, we may use them, but we also have responsibilities and will have to answer for them one day.

Philosophically I am very much a conservative on the environment. I believe that resources must be conserved. It is not that I think economic considerations should be dismissed, but we must look at the long-term economic considerations. It is not only business and sales for today which must be considered but the livelihood of future generations of farmers, fishermen, fisherwomen, all the people who live on the land and work in the tourist industry. All kinds of people will be affected by the economy of the future. Therefore, looking after our environment makes very good economic sense. We must put it in the context not only of economic decisions for today but of the long-term ones to which we must attend.

Our earth was created with adequate energy from the sun to make it last for four billion years. Our policies on management of the environment ought to ensure that we can continue to live on the earth as long as we have this major source of energy. I think that our time scale has been altogether too short.

[Translation]

Bill C-74 now under consideration is entitled an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, but this title is nothing but a false promise. This Bill does not protect the environment, not in a comprehensive sense. Rather, the Bill provides for a reorganization of Government measures and for the enforcement of new measures as regards toxic substances, or rather some toxic substances, as the Bill excludes all nuclear substances and pesticides. Of course, it is a step forward, but this is not the Bill required to protect the environment and human life. This is not the Bill required by environmental groups.

There is no Charter of environmental rights, which the experts and defenders of the environment have been requesting for a long time, especially the volonteer groups. The role projected for citizens and volunteer groups remains very limited in this Bill. There would be no legal recourse in the case of inaction by Government agencies. Human resources, especially the knowledge and good will of citizens involved in the ecological movement, will not be used adequately. Their advice would have been useful in preparing this Bill. Unfortunately, the recommendations of environmental groups were rejected. Only a very few of their proposals for amendments were accepted, and only on minor points.

Bill C-74 represents a very small step forward in protecting our environment. It is nearly incredible, but this Bill does not cover pesticides, insecticides and radioactive substances. A person who has suffered losses or damages or who might suffer such losses or damages because of action prohibited by this Act can obtain a court injunction to prevent this action. However, the new legislation should give all Canadians the right to take legal action when the law is being broken and the environment threatened.

The Bill provides for the evaluation of any new chemical before it is put on the market. In the case of existing chemicals, there will be a possibility of review. A list of priority substances will be established.

These are the most useful practical measures contained in this Bill, and they are not very impressive.

• (1120)

[English]

Let us look for a few minutes at the process of development of Bill C-74. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) introduced a draft environmental protection Bill last December, without public consultation before bringing it in. Public consultation had been limited to the very much needed amendments to the 1975 Environmental Contaminants Act, but they were not broadly based consultations. The proposed Bill was circulated without much new material and was largely an amalgamation of previous laws.

When finally a public meeting was held on the subject in Ottawa in March of this year, there was vigorous discussion with a large number of groups from across the country and strong recommendations for amendments were made. Chief among these recommendations for change was an environmental bill of rights. There is no environmental bill of rights in the Bill before us today. Instead, there is a very weak version of that, which is a preamble, some of which I will read:

> It is hereby declared that the protection of the environment is essential to the well-being of Canada.

Who would dispute that? It goes on:

> Whereas the presence of toxic substances in the environment is a matter of national concern;
> Whereas the toxic substances, once introduced into the environment, cannot always be contained within geographic boundaries;—

That makes eminent good sense, of course. It goes on:

> Whereas the Government of Canada in demonstrating national leadership should establish national environmental quality objectives, guidelines and codes of practice;
> Whereas it is necessary to control the dispersal of nutrients in Canadian waters;
> Whereas some of the laws under which federal lands, works and undertakings are administered or regulated do not make provision for environmental protection in respect of federal lands, works and undertakings;
> And whereas Canada must be able to fulfil its international obligations in respect of the environment;

Then we go into the Bill itself.

While these are all very laudable objectives and useful as guidelines, they have no force in law. The law still states that one must be able to prove individual damages in order to have a case. We still have a situation where environmental pollution destruction is treated as a matter of interfering with commercial rights. If one is going to lose money as a result of toxic substance pollution one has a case.

In the long term the concerns should involve jobs and the health of future generations. This Bill does not go far enough. It is still based on the old notion that resources are there in order to make money rather than the notion that we must sustain our environment for four billion years, hopefully, but certainly for a longer period of time than what is envisaged here.

Environmental groups that were consulted stressed very strongly that they wanted an opportunity for the public to be involved in the enforcement of environmental law. The current provisions for private prosecution are too cumbersome and inadequate, and focus entirely on commercial considerations. They wanted to see rights to participation in environmental decision-making. The Bill gives the Minister enormous rights and responsibilities, as well as discretionary powers. According to the process that is set up, the Minister can evade certain parts of this protection process and environmental groups do not have the right to take the Minister to court to require that he enforce and administer the law as set out.

The preamble talks about the obligation of the Minister to set these guidelines, but they are permissive and have no force in law. We know that enforcement of environmental law has been very slack under previous Liberal Governments as well as the present Government, so we do not have confidence that the Government will vigorously enforce these laws.

The groups that came before the Minister for consultation on March 23, 1987 released a statement which I think is worth considering. They said that the proposed federal Environmental Protection Act is simply not acceptable as it is currently drafted. They go on to state:

> Canadians want a real Environmental Protection Act. The content of the proposed Act does not merit the title Environmental Protection Act. The federal Government must assert its responsibility to protect the environment for its own sake.
> A real Environmental Protection Act should include an Environmental Bill of Rights to establish Canadians right to a clean and healthy environment and the right to go to court to protect it. This environmental right should include government funding for public interest participants in environmental decision making.

Environmental groups call for improvements to the Environmental Contaminants Act to be passed immediately in order to achieve these objectives.

This statement is endorsed by a large number of organizations, such as the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the Conservation Council of New Brunswick, native studies groups, the Nova Scotia Coalition for Alternatives to Pesticides, Pollution Probe, Energy Probe, and the Yukon Conservation Society, to name a few. The major groups are united in their criticism of the Bill we have before us today. Very few of the recommendations of these groups have been incorporated in the new Bill, so their concerns remain the same today.

The Bill amalgamates previous environmental measures to a certain extent, but only the ones that previously were under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of the Environment. There are 24 departments which have environmental responsibilities and 57 laws dealing with environmental questions. There will be 55 laws as a result of this Bill, so we cannot consider this a very thorough amalgamation. Other Departments, such as the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and National Defence—which is a complete exception—will still deal with environmental problems.

What is wrong with having other Departments involved? The Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are most oriented to people whose livelihood immediately depends upon prices. They do not have an economic interest in what is going to happen in the long-term. They are interested in their immediate survival. We know agriculture and the fisheries have survival problems so we have to be sympathetic to those concerns. My point would simply be that we also have to think of the long-term and the future jobs of fishermen, fisherwomen and farmers.

We need to have a Department of the Environment that is strong enough to stand up for the environment for future generations, one which will not be too much under pressure because of what the immediate prices are this year. It should be able to speak strongly for the environment. This Bill does not do that. It is a housekeeping measure of the Department of the Environment itself. It is amalgamating things which previously were in a number of different Acts, bringing them together in one Act.

Another major criticism of this Bill is that there is a certain tendency to deregulation. There are certain areas in which there is a strengthening, but there are also areas which could be looked at as showing a trend to deregulation and devolution to provincial jurisdiction.

Many organizations have raised objections to Bill C-74 saying it is a step backward. Admittedly, this is a complicated matter. The British North America Act back in 1867 did not state whether the environment was a federal or provincial matter. At that time the environment could be taken for granted. They were not worried about chemical substances or about nuclear waste disposal. This subject was not awarded to Section 91 or Section 92 of the British North America Act. After that there was a tendency to treat the environment as a provincial matter because resources are provincial and commerce is provincial.

The point is that we cannot think of resources as being purely commercial commodities. It is hard to think of an environmental question that can be dealt with solely at the provincial level. Provinces should certainly have the right to set stringent standards. If they have, for their own provincial requirements, the need to have a particularly high standard, they should certainly have that right and we should applaud it. No one would want to interfere with their right to protect their particular interests.

However, it is necessary to have strong national standards because the problem of pollution is national—indeed, it is international. I think, for example, of the St. Clair River, the Great Lakes, and most of the major river systems which cross provincial and territorial boundaries. Of course, the Great Lakes are very much an international question. We need a very strong federal presence in the area of the environment because of the nature of the problem itself.

The Canadian Labour Congress Workplace Health and Safety Group has criticized Bill C-74 on grounds of it being a step backward in terms of regulation. I would like to cite a few of its comments which I think are very pertinent to our discussion today:

> We are most concerned about Section 37(4), which provides that consultation must take place with the provinces before any regulation goes forward.
> We believe that this is a step backwards from existing environmental legislation, such as the Clean Air Act which provides for the federal Government to enact national ambient air emission standards without the necessity of consulting the provinces. We contend that Section 37 in fact will ensure what we have been afraid of all along—that the federal Government has no intention of regulating in the toxic chemical area. We feel that the Minister of the Environment has been getting extremely conservative advice as to federal constitutional authority to protect the environment.

Obviously, the Canadian Labour Congress Workplace Health and Safety group takes the view, as I do, that we have to get away from treating this matter as a provincial-commercial question and begin treating it as a national question of ongoing concerns.

The ClC further states:

> It is our opinion that the federal Government should be setting national standards to ensure that Canada does not create pollution havens.

It actually states that it thinks Clause 37 is an impediment to what has been called "cradle to grave" legislation of chemical substances, that in fact it will not be as thorough and comprehensive as the Government has claimed it will be. The CLC goes further:

> The general principal ought to be: Unless the provinces have stronger legislation, the federal Government should move in to establish minimum—but strong and effective—national standards of environmental cleanliness.
> There should be consultation with the interested parties, certainly; but this should not prevent speedy and effective federal Government action on the environment at the national level.

I would heartily concur with that kind of analysis. Apart from the amalgamation parts of this Bill and its non-mandatory guidelines, there is one compulsory part and one new part which does bring in new measures, that is on toxic substances or, let us be very clear, some toxic substances, because even here there are exceptions.

The Environmental Contaminates Act did have deficiencies. It did not allow the Minister to obtain information from industry or from importers unless there was virtual proof that the substance was toxic. In short, there had to be enough information before hand, and, of course, the point is, how do we get the information if we do not have a process? The onus on the Government was to build the case and it could not ask for information from the industry to establish the case.

With respect to new chemicals imported into Canada, and there are about 100 a year—we have 30,000 in Canada already out of some 100,000 chemicals in use globally—existing legislation will require manufacturers or importers to report to Government. The new legislation would set reporting requirements on toxicity, on potential impacts on the environment, on biodegradability, on health studies. The importer would have 90 days to provide this material and, of course, would not be authorized to sell it or import it during this period. The Government would then make the decision whether to allow, prohibit, restrict or to require further information on the chemical.

Because of the great backlog of chemicals already in use which have not been properly scrutinized, there will be a priority substances list established of chemicals which have already been allowed in for use which possible should not be. Once items get on this list, the Government will be assessing them.

Those are the new departures in the Bill. Certainly, I am pleased to see them there. However, I think we will have to look very carefully at the process at committee to ensure that the loopholes which have been built-in, and the possibilities of waiver, and so forth, are not excessive. We have to make sure this process which has been set up is one which will really be effective. I have a few questions about it. I think it is something about which we are going to need some expert advice.

Let me go into a few other very specific points which I think demonstrate the weaknesses of Bill C-74. Right at the beginning of the Bill, after the very weak preamble, Part 1 begins. It refers to the Minister's environmental data and research obligations. Clause 7 states:

> (1) The Minister may
> a) establish, operate and maintain a system of environmental quality monitoring stations;

There are then a whole list of good things the Minister may do. But the Minister is not required to do so. I think this is what we are very concerned about. The Minister may collect, process, correlate data, conduct research and studies and so forth. This is non-mandatory, and it is simply not adequate when we realize the severity of the problem right now.

Clause 7(3) states that the Minister may, in exercising the powers conferred, act alone or in co-operation with any government, government department, and so on. I have very specific criticisms with respect to the following subclauses of the Bill. When the groups which may be consulted are listed, the environmental groups are not included. Clause 7(3) states that the Minister may, in exercising his powers, consult with any government, government department or agency, institution or person and may sponsor or assist in any research, studies or planning by any government institution or person in Canada. But it does not mention the environmental groups. I am surprised and somewhat distressed at the omission. Obviously, an environmentalist is an individual who can be consulted.

• (1140)

On page 7 Clause 8(3) states:

> (3) In carrying out the responsibilities conferred by subsection (1), the Minister may—

Again, it is not mandatory.

(a) consult with the government of any province, any government department or agency or any person interested in the quality of the environment—

It does not mention environmental organizations. Subsection (b) states that the Minister may:

(b) organize conferences of representatives of industry and labour, provincial and municipal authorities and any interested persons described in paragraph (a).

Again, there is an omission. I hope that it was just an omission by inadvertence and that environmental and public interest groups can be added to the list.

The Bill goes on and on with respect to consulting with governments and provinces, organizing conferences with industry and labour, provincial and municipal authorities, and any persons interested in the preservation and improvement of public health. There are organizations directly involved in environmental public health. They have experts who are very committed people. One of the things the Government ought to realize is that one of the resources that we have available is public spirit and knowledge, the commitment of people. Canada has a great history of voluntary organizations working in all types of areas. These people give their expertise to Government, as well as their knowledge and passion in working on these questions over the years. We should be grateful and pleased that we have the benefit of this type of advice. We should be pleased to receive it and not omit it from the list, having them come to us importuning to be consulted. We would like to see some changes in language to include these people.

The Liberal critic in his remarks yesterday on this subject noted that as well as dealing with imports and with manufacturing of toxic substances there ought to be regulations with respect to exports. I do not know how extensive a problem this is, but on principle I agree that if a substance is too toxic to import to Canada and to manufacture here then any of it that we already have ought not to be exported but ought to be dealt with in some other way. It would certainly be very wrong to consider it all right to get rid of it by exporting it to some other country.

Although I agree with a good part of the substance of the Liberal spokesperson's remarks, I cannot entirely understand his outrage at the Government's failure to enact many of the measures which he has urged it to enact. The environmental problems we have did not begin to develop after September 4, 1984 when the Conservative Party was elected to form the Government. These problems have been around for a very long time, and they have been increasing gradually.

Almost everything that the Hon. Member recommended that ought to be done encompassed measures that he himself could have undertaken when he was Minister. It is unfortunate that this matter should be seen as a politically partisan one. It would be far better to ensure that we work together on these issues. Certainly, his outrage at the Government's failure to act when he had the opportunity to do so is quite unjustified.

[Translation]

Naturally, we have to pass this Bill, and I hope that we can pass it with amendments which will make it stronger and more effective. In any case, I shall oppose no measure to protect the environment, even one as weak as this Bill.

I shall be proposing amendments at the committee. I invite the environmental groups to play a vigorous role in the consideration by the committee. The New Democratic Party will continue to fight to achieve real protection of the environment.

[English]

Let us get on with this Bill. The Government could help enormously by announcing very promptly its willingness to accept amendments now. I would be pleased to see the Government announce a willingness to work with opposition Members and ecology groups to make this as effective a Bill as it can be, given the limitations of the subject matter.

I hope that the Government will also give an undertaking of its willingness to bring in a real charter of rights for the environment, as well as really strong and effective measures to make the environment the top consideration and to give citizens the right to protest, to go to court to insist that the Minister act to enforce and to implement the Bill. We must ensure that the Department of the Environment is the Department which will be involved in the enforcement of environmental measures, that the powers in the Bill will not be dispersed to those who will have conflicting obligations in the here and now as opposed to the long term. I hope that the Government will give this type of undertaking.

Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned about the environment. I do not have to urge the Government to read the public opinion polls with respect to this subject. I just hope it will look at them seriously and see that they reflect changing opinions, opinions that are developing for very good reasons. Jobs depend on the environment, as do future jobs. People are concerned about health, the health of their children, their grandchildren as well as their economic health, not to mention their day-to-day health. As we have an increasingly diseased environment, the enjoyment of life decreases. People are beginning to say, "We have to take steps now. We cannot afford to have this slack approach of everything will take care of itself and all we have to do is make money and the environment will clean itself up". People know that that does not work. They realize the extent of the damage that has already been done. Canadians want strong national standards for water, air and land. They want stronger enforcement measures.

This Bill introduces the beginning of criminal sanctions for environmental destruction. Ten years ago that would have been unthinkable. At that time public opinion was not there. Environmental destruction was just considered to be something that happened in the process of business. People do not see it that way now. People want strong standards. Nobody wants to see criminal sanctions actually used, but people are prepared to use them where there is a need, because environmental protection is that important.

The ultimate importance of attaching criminal sanctions to such destruction is that we can say to people, "You are a criminal if you violate this law". It will not be as if they have broken just an administrative law, but they will become enemies of society. It is like saying, "We give you the ultimate in our disapproval in establishing criminal sanctions". Canadians have reached that stage. They have seen that other measures have not been adequate to do the job. Canadians demand criminal penalties and they want stronger enforcement. They want to reverse the trends of slack enforcement. Canadians believe that too many mistakes have been made already and that we have to start to undo those mistakes and the damage they have caused. We must set up mechanisms to ensure that those mistakes do not continue to be made. Canadians want action and leadership from the Government. I will not refuse a one-quarter, one-half or one-sixteenth measure, the kind that we have before us in Bill C-74 today.

In conclusion, I want to assure Hon. Members that my Party and I will continue to work very hard for stronger, better and more effective environmental protection so that Canadians will have a truly safe and healthy environment in which to live and work.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this morning to say a few words in support of Bill C-74, a Bill which is entitled an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health. This Bill is commonly known as the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. I am pleased that there is a Bill of this nature before us at long last.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the Government has taken very strong action to put together this legislation. Back in December of last year it issued a draft Bill for discussion purposes. At that time the Minister stated that he would be introducing a specific Bill on this subject in the spring of this year.

I waited patiently, and you may remember, Mr. Speaker, that on June 23 I rose in the House and asked the Minister what was happening to the Bill, since two days before, spring had passed into summer. Well, I am very pleased that here we are in September, not quite into fall but getting close to it, and finally we are dealing with second reading of the Bill. I hope today it will be moved to committee stage in order that it can be in place before much longer has passed.

I listened with interest to the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) when she referred to the Bill from the point of view of the New Democratic Party. Yesterday I listened to the comments of the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) from the point of view of the Liberal Party. Quite understandably, as you as and I, and all members of the public can realize, their job is to point out some of their concerns with the legislation. It is quite normal for them to raise areas of concern. Personally, I am looking forward to the opportunity to deal in detail with those areas of concern in committee. Today my purpose is to deal with another aspect of the Bill, so I will not be specifically dealing with all those concerns.

I do wish to comment on one concern raised by the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood. The Hon. Member pointed out concerns about a citizens' environmental bill of rights. She also pointed out that in the whole area of the environment there is a constitutional problem. Unfortunately, in her remarks she did not link the two. She pointed out that there is a constitutional problem, but did not link that with the problem of attempting to put together a Canadian citizens' environmental bill of rights. That is one of the serious difficulties in trying to do that.

The other question raised by the Hon. Member dealt with the rights of citizens to take action to protect the environment, apart from government action or from criminal action. The Criminal Code as you know, Mr. Speaker, is the underpinning of the rights of the federal Government to deal with environmental matters.

I had hoped that the Hon. Member would point out that this legislation does have some provisions in it to deal with that concern, including the right of any 12 persons to petition the Minister to investigate an alleged violation, and that the Minister must respond with his findings. There is also the right to petition the Minister to have a substance included on the priority substance list, and that the Minister must respond with this decision. There is a right of a person to appeal the decision not to regulate a substance as toxic. That appeal must be considered by a board of review.

Although there may not be all of the provisions and the rights for the ordinary citizen that the Hon. Member would wish, there are a good many not included previously that have been included in this legislation by the Minister and the Government.

Yesterday I listened with interest to the Parliamentary Secretary outlining all the benefits and features of this legislation. Of course, that is of great significance. But you, Mr. Speaker, the official critic for the Liberal Party, the official critic for the New Democratic Party, myself, all Canadians, and all Members of the House know that you do not get effective legislation and protection unless there is enforcement. The manner in which environmental protection legislation of any type has been enforced by any government, whether provincial or federal, has been of great concern to Canadians.

In the past there has been a concern that perhaps the regulatory bodies, the enforcement bodies, have been in bed with the polluters. The time has come to make a clear distinction and get on with the proposed Act, and the question of strictly enforcing this legislation in order to ensure that Canadians are truly protected.

In that regard the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) has unequivocally stated his intention to get tough with those who by design or through carelessness allow dangerous substances to enter the environment. The Minister is aware that reviews of past enforcement practices have been critical; specific criticisms have focused on a lack of national consistency and concentrated effort devoted to enforcement. The Minister has indicated that in the future the Government will be more vigilant about pursuing violations than governments have been in the past, while at the same time continuing efforts to encourage voluntary compliance. Both the aspect of encouraging compliance through education and co-operative efforts, and the vigorous enforcement in the face of violations are important. Environment Canada intends to continue its approach of collaboration with provinces, territories, industries, and environmental groups. But the Department will respond to public concern that the flouting of environmental laws is a serious crime.

At the same time the Minister introduced Bill C-74 for first reading he also introduced a draft enforcement and compliance policy which is in harmony with both the public's concern and the Government's intention as far as enforcement is concerned. The general guiding principles that are the underpinning of that draft policy are quite clear and unambiguous.

First, compliance is mandatory with the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and its regulations. This means that Environment Canada will put in place a planned program of regular inspections complemented by spot checks. The frequency of the inspections will be determined by the risk to the environment or to human health, and by the compliance record of the individual or the company involved.

Second, as set out in this draft enforcement policy, enforcement officials will apply the legislation with an emphasis on prevention of damage to the environment. Serious violations will be subject to the full force of the law to ensure the protection of the environment and human health. Enforcement officials will examine every suspected violation and will take action consistent with the policy. They will use rules, sanctions, and processes securely founded in law and in keeping with the Canadian Charter of Rights and the citizens' code of regulatory fairness. They will respond to the violations in a manner proportionate to the nature and the gravity of the offence.

This will require the development of procedural manuals, expanded training and investigative techniques, and the proper gathering of evidence and legal matters such as rules of evidence and court procedures. In addition, inspection personnel will be augmented to handle the increased responsibilities that will result from the scope of requirements under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. That is where the extra funding of $37 million announced by the Minister will be used to beef up the inspection and prosecution portion of the Ministry.

Third, the federal Government will use education and information as preventive tools to achieve compliance with the Act. Environment Canada is already planning a more far-reaching information program in order to provide, upon request, copies of the new Act, its regulations and the enforcement and compliance policy. It will also provide bulletins on specific enforcement and compliance procedures, a registry of court actions under the Act, including injunctions, convictions, court orders, copies of case law as precedents are established, and state of the environment reports, fact sheets, et cetera.

Finally, in order to ensure consistency of enforcement across Canada, which is essential under the Charter provisions, the enforcement and compliance policy will be a major feature of the administrative agreements to be negotiated with provincial and territorial Governments. The agreements will spell out procedures for audit and evaluation of enforcement and compliance activities.

Environment Canada and its partners in enforcement, namely, those provinces and territories which elected to sign agreements for administration of the Act, will iron out procedures for auditing of enforcement and compliance activities, because consistency and predictability are keys to fair enforcement practices and to making those enforcement practices stick.

While we want vigorous enforcement, the Government and the Canadian public also want fair enforcement. Under the enforcement compliance policy, when they encounter or are informed of a violation of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, enforcement officials are required to consider four factors when deciding what enforcement action they should be taking.

The first of these is the nature of the violation, which includes consideration of the seriousness of the harm or potential harm to the environment; the intent of the alleged violator; whether it is a repeated occurrence; and whether there have been attempts to conceal information or otherwise subvert the objectives and requirements of the Act.

The second of these is the question of effectiveness in achieving the desired result with the violator. The "desired result" is compliance with the Act within the shortest possible time and with no further occurrence of violation.

The aspects to be considered here include the alleged violator's history of compliance—does the individual or company have a history of violation of the Act, or does the firm or person normally operate in compliance with the Act—the violator's willingness to co-operate, evidence of corrective action already taken, past experience in achieving compliance through the use of particular enforcement action, and whether other federal, provincial, or territorial authorities have taken administrative or court related action for the same offence.

The third factor is the effectiveness in generally promoting compliance by others, that is, whether the enforcement action taken in this case will serve as an example and deterrent to other potential violators.

The fourth factor is the cost effectiveness of alternative procedures, that is, whether a warning or other enforcement action short of prosecution or injunction will achieve compliance within the same or a shorter period of time and at less cost.

However, cost effectiveness or alternative procedures will be weighed extremely carefully against the nature of the violation and the consideration of achieving compliance within the shortest possible time frame, with no recurrence of the violation. I think that is most important because Canadians expect firm, strong, and unwavering enforcement. They do not want the Government or a regulatory body to fool around or to keep giving violators extensions and time to comply. They want firmness. Although we look at cost effective alternative measures, it is important that we do not use that as an excuse for delaying what the public is looking for—effective enforcement.

Under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, enforcement officials will have at their disposal several different enforcement measures. I want to comment on three of them—compliance guarantees, prosecution, and special court orders upon conviction for an offence under the Act.

Compliance guarantees are a new approach on which Environment Canada is seeking input from the public and other stakeholders during the consultation period for the enforcement and compliance policy. A compliance guarantee is a written commitment to compliance made by an individual or company which has failed to meet a requirement of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The purpose of the guarantee is to ensure compliance and to prevent repetition of the offence. A guarantee will contain technical details of corrective measures which the individual or firm must undertake to attain compliance or ensure continued compliance.

These measures could include such things as putting in place technology to prevent unauthorized releases of substances, and establishing programs. We heard from the Parliamentary Secretary yesterday about one of the effective ways in which some new technology was put in place in her own constituency in order to deal with a problem of this sort.

The compliance guarantee will also contain a condition requiring reports to the Minister on the progress in implementing the required measures.

When deciding whether or not to accept a compliance guarantee, enforcement officials will take into account several factors: First, whether the degree of harm to the environment, human life or health appears to be minimal; second, whether the individual or company has a history of good compliance with the Act; third, whether the individual or company has cooperated fully with enforcement officials; fourth, whether the person or firm has made reasonable efforts to remedy or mitigate the consequences of the offence; and, finally, whether court related action is necessary as a general or as a particular deterrent.

A compliance guarantee will not be a licence to pollute or violate the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. Considerable forethought and evaluation of the case in question will be required before enforcement officials agree to accept a compliance guarantee. It is not intended that compliance guarantees will be renewed or extended. Again, it seems to me that that is very important and very significant, because if Canadians are to feel confident that effective and strong enforcement is taking place, they must feel that there is no waffling around or no extensions. It must not be the kind of situation which we saw recently in the Province of Ontario with pulp and paper companies, where extensions were given which undermined public confidence in the enforcement of environmental protection legislation.

Turning to prosecutions, where a violation of the Act meets the criteria of the enforcement and compliance policy for prosecution or other court related action such as an injunction, enforcement officials will pursue these avenues. The draft policy specifies those instances in which enforcement officials will always recommend prosecution proceedings.

These are where the death of a person occurs; where there is serious harm or risk of harm to the environment, human life, or health; where there is fraud; where the violation is deliberate; where the alleged violator did not take all reasonable measures to avoid the violation before the fact; where the history of compliance of the alleged violator indicates that he or she might repeat the offence; where the alleged violator obstructed the inspector in the carrying out of his or her duties and responsibilities under the Act; where the alleged violator concealed or attempted to conceal evidence or relevant information after the offence occurred; where the alleged violator did not take all reasonable measures to comply with a ministerial order issued under the Act or a direction by an inspector; where the alleged violator interfered with a substance seized and detained by an inspector; where the deterrent effect of prosecution on the alleged violator or other regulatees is high; or where a person or company convicted of an offence under the Act has not complied with a court order.

In all these cases the Canadian Environmental Protection Act stipulates that certain offences are to be prosecuted by summary conviction, and others by way of indictment. In the case of the so-called "hybrid" offences, where prosecution can take place by either means, of course it is up to the Crown prosecutor to decide whether to proceed by summary conviction or by way of indictment.

• (1210)

This Government has ensured that under this Bill the Crown prosecutor must always proceed by indictment where the alleged violation has led to the death of or to serious harm to a person, where the risk exists or where there is loss of the use of the environment due to a disaster caused by negligent or reckless activity.

Those are a few of the situations concerning some of the enforcement provisions of the Act. I could go on to deal with a great many more but I think as we get into committee on this Bill we will see quite clearly that the Government means business. I for one intend to be monitoring the Government to make sure it does mean business. I am confident that this Bill is the kind of Bill that will help restore the faith of the Canadian people in environmental protection legislation and government enforcement actions.

Having said that, I think we on the government side and all members of the Opposition as well, if they mean business in cleaning up the environment, should get on with passing this legislation as quickly as possible. Having heard the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood, I am sure there will be no delay on the part of the New Democratic Party. I am sure too that my hon. friend who is about to speak for the Liberal Party will tell us that the Liberals want the Bill in committee just as quickly as possible so we can put it into place.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Hon. Member. I ask them knowing that the Hon. Member is one of the strongest supporters for cleaning up our environment. It seems to me that there are a number of omissions and deficiencies in the Bill and I would like to ask the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) about these.

As he knows, there are thousands of workers who may very well be in contact with hazardous chemicals daily. Does the Hon. Member not find it strange that the Bill does not provide for an advisory council on which workers would have representation by law through their unions so that they can be consulted, over the priority list for existing chemicals as reported in the ECA report?

Second, regarding the part of this Bill which provides that consultation must be placed with the provinces before regulations go forward, is this not a step backward from the existing environmental legislation, such as the Clean Air Act, which provides for the federal Government to enact national air emission standards without having to consult with the provinces?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his questions. As the Hon. Member knows, there is provision in the Bill, and I am dealing now with the Hon. Member's first question, concerning the question of consultation with workers about the right to put particular chemicals on the priority list. As the Hon. Member knows, this legislation allows the Government to establish a priority list. The Government would be placing on the priority list at its own initiative chemicals which it feels are of the greatest concern. After that there will be the right, and there is the right provided in the legislation, for anyone to petition the Minister to have a substance included on the priority substances list. The Minister must respond with his decision.

Although there may not be a consultation process in the same sense that the Hon. Member would normally envisage it by people sitting down and talking about what should be on the list, there is the right in the legislation for any worker or group of workers to put forward a specific substance, having it either put on the list or having the Minister give them the reasons why not.

That to my mind is actually stronger than merely a consultative committee, because the committee may or may not get a response from the Minister—certainly it may or may not get one publicly—and would not have the right to put forward specific substances of this sort under the legislation. The only right would be that of consulting. I think the legislation goes much further than the Hon. Member is suggesting it should go. I am sure he will be happy when he examines this matter closely.

As the Hon. Member is aware, as his critic for environmental matters has pointed out, there are some constitutional difficulties in dealing with problems in the area of the environment. These have become more significant perhaps with the establishment of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that sort of legislation. On top of that, the Government has taken the approach of trying to be co-operative and consultative with people, instead of telling them what they are going to do, whether they like it or not—either accept it or lump it. The combination of those factors is at the root of the legislation with which we are dealing here. The Government expects to be co-operative and consult but there are some legal difficulties in not doing that.

There is some residual power in the legislation for the Government to take action if the field has been left vacant. That normally would be an area in which the Government would be taking action but would be consulting with the provinces in the first place, because if there is a constitutional difficulty as to whether this is a federal or provincial matter, it would be much better to have the province agree to put the provision in place and not have to run into court challenges which could tie the matter up and prevent the effective enforcement of the legislation for many years. I know the Hon. Member is interested in effective enforcement and I know he is not interested in seeing all these things dragged through the courts to delay and discourage the effective enforcement of this kind of legislation.

Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) who is very knowledgeable on the issue. If one checks the record over the past three years, it is obvious that the Hon. Member has been a strong advocate of environmental issues from the beginning. It is also obvious that the control and compliance provisions are extensive and comprehensive and will be of benefit to the life and health of all Canadians.

I have two brief questions to pose to the Hon. Member. First, what financial and human resources does Environment Canada intend to devote to the enforcement of this Act? Second, does he feel that Environment Canada's new attitude about enforcement means the end of the collaborative approach with industry which the Government has had in the past?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his questions and his kind reference. He may recall that at the time the Minister introduced this Bill for first reading in June of this year he indicated that the Government had agreed to commit some new money for enforcement of this legislation, something in the vicinity of some $37 million, which was not there before. This is in addition to the funds already in the Department of the Environment and in other Departments, which will be called upon to enforce environmental legislation. Some $37 million of new money was committed to beef up the enforcement provisions and allow for the hiring of new inspectors and enforcement officers. That is a very strong commitment to making sure this legislation is strongly enforced.

So far as the consultative process is concerned, certainly it is quite clear the Government intends to continue that process with the provinces and industry. There is no intention whatsoever to ride roughshod over other people. If you can obtain rapid compliance in the first place, that is the best way to do it, rather than getting into long harangues and struggles at constitutional conferences, federal-provincial conferences, or meetings between Ministers. It is much better to consult and try and work out common ground. The Government is committed to that principle and the legislation embodies that principle.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the difficulty of the Hon. Member when I asked my question, but I ask him to think about the situation in New Brunswick. It is a poor province which has to try and encourage as much development as it can. Yet it is run almost as a feudal empire by the Irvings. They have continuously flouted, ignored or rejected any attempts by the province, or I suppose the federal Government, to make them live up to any kind of environmental standard. If the provinces are to be consulted, is there not a danger that nothing will be done?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows from examining the Act, it provides tremendous penalties for polluting. It provides not only for fines but jail terms of up to life imprisonment. Environmental offences are now being treated for the first time as serious offences.

Mr. Orlikow: I would love to see one of the Irvings in jail.

Mr. Redway: The Hon. Member knows that provisions are in place to take firm and strong action, and I know he will be holding the Government accountable to make sure that is done. I can assure him that I will as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to add my grain of salt and take part in this debate on Bill C-74. In the first place, I should like to point out that the Opposition welcomes Bill C-74, I would not say joyfully since its scope is limited, but we acknowledge that it is a step in the right direction. I will now reply immediately to the question asked by my colleague from York East (Mr. Redway) upon completing his comments a while ago; he said he hoped the Opposition parties would pass that Bill quickly in the House of Commons and send it to a committee. The reply to this is: yes of course. However, this being said I would like to put things back into their context.

We should not imagine that this Bill is a cure-all that will solve all our environmental problems. On the contrary, considering that it is the first bill dealing with environment which the Government has deigned to table in the House of Commons at the beginning of the fourth year of its term of office, we cannot say in the first place that it is too soon. We have been waiting such a long time for the Government to do something about the environment and nothing had been done till Bill C-74 was tabled. Secondly, the environmental problems faced by Canadians are tremendous. The Bill is very narrow in its enforcement; in fact, to be realistic it only deals with a small part of our problems. Indeed, it will be regulating the new toxic chemicals which could enter the market place. We should not then exaggerate and suggest that it is a great feat.

[English]

It is not the big thing that Ministers would like Canadians to believe. It is not the best invention since sliced bread. It is not bad. It is a step in the right direction. I tell my friend from York East, yes, we will vote for the Bill. My God, if we did not, what else would we be voting for in this Parliament in this area? Nothing else has come before the House.

I am going to describe some of the things this Bill does not do and that Canadians would like to see it do. I do not have to spend much time heralding its virtues. They are not too numerous, and besides, my friend from York East has been on his feet doing just that. He focused his remarks on compliance. I heard the words "compliance" and "enforcement" about 20 or 30 times. He is very honest in doing that because that is what the Bill does. It does nothing else.

For example, this Bill is not going to clean up the environment. When he completed his remarks, my friend said something about if opposition Parties are serious about cleaning up the environment. That is the only mistake he made in his speech. He is always very honest, but that was a bit of overkill. This will not remove the blob in the St. Clair River. This will not remove toxic pollution lying at the bottom of the St. Lawrence River which I can look at from my riding. I remember the Minister in Montreal calling the St. Lawrence River an open sewer. Sure, he made headlines, but this Bill is not going to clean up my St. Lawrence River where I used to swim when I was a kid.

Mr. Riis: Can't now.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): I cannot swim in it now and I will not be able to swim in it after this legislation is passed, or even 10 years after this legislation is passed. Why? Because the legislation is an attempt to stop the use of new toxic chemicals. That is a step in the right direction, I agree, but it does not solve the problem of toxic chemicals presently in our rivers and lakes.

Let us not take this Bill as a cure-all, or as the best thing on earth. I am not even sure this will be carried on the new Tory news network. I jokingly call it the TGNN, or Tory Good News Network. I do not think it is good enough to be heralded on that new network.

Another thing this Bill does not do is provide the superfund which both the Minister and environmentalists across the country have been talking about. We know we need a lot of money to deal with buried toxic chemicals leaking into our rivers after rain storms and so on.

• (1230)

We have been saying time and again that in order to improve our environment we do not need the rhetoric on which the Minister has been extremely strong, what we need is money. That is what he has been short of. I do not know how to say it any more clearly. To clean up our environment we need money, whether you call it funds, dollars, greenbacks, mazuma or millions of coins.

The only concrete action which the Government has taken, aside from this Bill, which is a step in the right direction, has been cuts in environmental budgets. What good is it to bring forth legislation to control toxic chemicals if we are not sure that it will be properly enforced? Will there be enough people to police the polluters? This Bill does not say that more people will come on stream to enforce this legislation.

[Translation]

This Bill does not provide either a Charter of rights for the Environment. Still, the Minister had referred to that with much enthusiasm.

In the opening lines of the Bill—if we go through the trouble of looking at it—there is a little prose or rhetoric, but that has nothing to do with a Charter of Rights for the Environment, it would not give Canadians clear legal rights to use them against polluters.

I listened a while ago to the spokesman for the NDP who dealt at length with the matter. On this level alone, we can say that the Minister has not delivered all of his program.

[English]

There is not much in this Bill which remotely resembles an environmental bill of rights. There is a bit of rhetoric about it, but there are no teeth and there is nothing precise. I realize that I am being negative, but I am here to point out the failings of this Bill. My friend, the Member for York East, and the Parliamentary Secretary, have been very kind with regard to the Bill. They are trying to lead Canadians to believe that this Bill will solve a lot of things. I say that it will not.

For example, this Bill will not regulate some of the toxic chemicals which are closest to people in every day life, because some of these materials are regulated by other legislation. For example, people use herbicides and pesticides every day on their lawns. People eat additives in their food every day. These things are specifically excluded from this piece of legislation.

This Bill does not consolidate many pieces of environmental legislation as we were led to believe it would. If we had not been led to believe that, I would accept the Bill for what it is, but we were told that this would be an Environmental Protection Act. That is a big title, but that is not the fact.

There are about 24 departments of the Government which somehow administer legislation which has an impact on the environment. There are 57 different environmental laws. We thought that if this Bill were to wear the impressive name of Environmental Protection Act it would streamline everything. It does not. It controls new toxic chemicals, which we support, and merges two existing Acts, the Clean Air Act and the Ocean Dumping Act, with the existing Environmental Contaminants Act. This Bill is not even worth being heralded on the Tory "good news network".

[Translation]

Another thing that the Bill fails to do, and I was commenting on it in English, is that this is not really a piece of legislation which protects the global environment. Instead, it is a solution to a future use of new chemicals—perhaps we had to start there—to prevent new chimicals from being discharged in the environment. But, for goodness' sake, when are we going to start doing what must be done, and clean what is already within our environment to prevent us from enjoying it and which is a threat to our health?

And this is the reason why we will not delay passage of this Bill. If we were to do that, well, the Government might not bring in another environment bill before the end of its mandate. There remains virtually a year or a year and a half, and without being nasty, Mr. Speaker, anyone reading the polls must conclude that this Government does not have much time left to honour its commitments and clean up the environment. It might be that after the next election Government Members would not be in a position to deliver the rest of their program.

Finally, the legislation does next address the very important issues like acid rain, because toxic chemicals are present in acid rain. But this legislation will have no impact on acid rain.

On the other hand, the Bill prohibits the export of substances that are prohibited for use in Canada, or rather it does not prevent their export—it would prevent the use of those substances, and that is good. But it would not prevent us from exporting them. Morally, that is a major omission. If those substances are too dangerous to be used in Canada, why allow manufacturers or distributors to export them either to Third World countries or to our neighbours down South, the Americans, to punish them because we are not satisfied with the free trade negotiations? That flaw in the legislations I find amazing, because if those substances are too dangerous and must not be used in Canada, we should also ban their export in my view. If it is not good for us, it is not good for the others either.

[English]

I do not want to drag this debate out too long. This Bill has to be passed quickly. In conclusion, let us call a spade a spade. This Bill deals well with a narrow aspect of pollution. Let us vote for it because it does that. However, let us not start pretending that it will clean up the environment, because it will not. In the long run it will control polluters better so that we will have less pollution from toxic chemicals, and that is good.

Let us pass this Bill quickly so that we can be back on our feet in this House pressing the Government for a genuine Environmental Protection Act and for the money which must accompany it in order to start removing some of the pollutants from our environment. That is the reason we will not be dragging our feet with this Bill. We wish it a speedy passage through this House so that we can see what the Government will be bringing in as the second piece of environmental legislation during this term.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my hon. friend with respect to this Bill and its speedy passage. I was concerned, however, that he may have left the impression—and I am sure he did not really want to leave that impression—that this was the only action with respect to the environment the Government has taken in the past three years it has been in office. There is no question but that this legislation deals only with one aspect of environmental problems. It deals with the present and future. It does not deal with the clean-up aspect. However, my hon. friend is well aware that there have been other actions taken by the Government in the past three years with respect to the clean-up aspect of environmental problems. I know he would not want the public to be left with the wrong impression.

For instance, I know the Hon. Member would want me to remind him, and the public of Canada, about the program the Government undertook starting in March of 1985, a program to reduce acid rain by 50 per cent of its 1980 levels by 1994. That program included, as you know, Mr. Speaker, a commitment of funds—$150 million for emission controls at smelters, $25 million for technology development, $70 million for a cleaner use of coal, $18 million per year for research and monitoring efforts, and an effort to increase the use of low-sulphur western coal. My hon. friend knows that there are discussions presently going on between the Premier of the Province of Ontario (Mr. Peterson), the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), and their representatives, with respect to increasing the immediate use of low-sulphur western coal in the Province of Ontario, particularly for Ontario Hydro, which will generate thousands of jobs in western Canada as well as in eastern Canada and at the same time cut acid rain emissions.

Those are some of the things which have been going on. The Hon. Member knows as well that on September 1 of this year, just a few days ago, new automobile emissions standards were put into effect to reduce acid rain emissions. He knows as well that last spring there was an agreement reached between the federal Government and the Province of Ontario, the Government of the State of New York and the American federal Government with respect to the reduction of pollution and toxic chemicals going into the Niagara River and the monitoring of it. He knows as well that the Government has put in place during its term of office new regulations to restrict and regulate the transportation of dangerous goods by rail.

The Hon. Member is well aware, therefore, as are the Canadian public, that there have been a good many other initiatives taken in the area of the environment and environmental control by this Government. I know he would want to give the Government credit for those things.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, the litany of things listed by the Hon. Member again are not measures which would clean up anything. I am not against, for example, all the measures on acid rain which were started before 1984 by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), a previous Minister of the Environment. I agree with the figures mentioned by the Hon. Member. I think they square with reality. This will reduce future emissions of acid rain. That is fine. But that is not the point I was making.

The point I was making is that there is nothing in this Bill, and nothing in the measures which have been taken by the Government so far, that clean up the environment. It is good to bring in measures so that there will be less future emissions, but that does not remove the blob in the St. Clair River. It does not solve my problem of not being able to swim in the St. Lawrence River which borders my riding. Canadians want these contaminants in the environment removed and the Government has done absolutely nothing in that respect.

The measures mentioned by my colleague, the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), are all measures that deal with future contaminants in that they will be better controlled. That is good. I am not saying we should not do that. I think we should do more of it. I think we should increase, for example, our pressure on the Americans, because so far all this Government has been able to accomplish is a recognition by the President of the United States that the problem is there. That is not much. Having regard to one research project, we have looked at the United States budgets from time to time and have found out and disclosed to this House that some of the funds which were promised were not there.

There is still a lot to be done in that area. There are toxic chemicals buried in the ground at various locations in Canada which seep and leak into our rivers. Something has to be done to either remove these contaminates and bury them somewhere else or to improve the sites where they are buried so they stop seeping into our rivers and lakes. I am not trying to downgrade what has been done. I am just saying this does just a narrow part of the job. Let us call a spade a spade, because that is what it is.

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the comments of the Hon. Member. I am sorry to hear him being so negative about this very important subject. We have an opportunity now to really do something positive. I am pleased to see that the Hon. Member is willing to pass this legislation quickly, and we look forward to getting it passed quickly. However, just to set the record straight, with the negative aspects referred to by the Hon. Member, let me give Members a few of the positive points.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act has components such as authority to control the introduction into Canadian commerce of chemical and other substances that are new to Canada, anything that is coming on-stream, and the authority to obtain information and require testing on both new substances and substances already existing in Canadian commerce. We have some 100,000 chemicals in use today. We want to be able to get information on them to the Canadian people and to control it. The Act has provisions allowing control of all aspects of the life cycle of toxic chemicals from the development, through the manufacture, the importation, transportation, distribution, storage and use, the release to the environment as emissions at various stages of the life cycle and their ultimate disposal as waste.

We also have the authority to establish regulations; we have the authority to establish guidelines. Indeed, this Bill is very good news for Canadians. I would think the Hon. Member of the Liberal Party would see this very much as good news legislation. I would like to characterize his comments as the "DNN"—done nothing network, really and truly, as we listen to the Liberal Party speaking about environmental issues and look at that Party's record, which is indeed very dismal. I think we should look at the Liberal Party as the "DNN", done nothing network".

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): I have no objection to the description the Parliamentary Secretary has given of the Bill. That is in fact what is included in the legislation. And this is why we will support it. However, she should understand that when, after more than three years in power, a government for the first time brings in legislation on environment matters, such a legislation is too narrow in scope. Even if it is good, we cannot be completely satisfied with the Government's performance, and its action on environment matters. Since after three years in power this is their first environment legislation before Parliament, it gives Opposition parties an opportunity to review the whole environment situation in Canada. And this is where the Government's performance is less than brilliant.

I will therefore recognize the merit of this Bill to that extent, and I know the Parliamentary Secretary probably has worked on the drafting of the Bill. If she did, I commend her—she is then worth her salt and the extra pay she is getting as Parliamentary Secretary. But let us not be carried away, let us not blow this Bill out of its true proportions. We will support it for what it is, not for what it should be.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, will the Hon. Member comment on the prohibition of commercial manufacturing and processing uses of dodecachloropentacyclo decane, chlorobiphenyls, polybrominated biphenyls and, of course, the famous polychlorinated terphenyls?

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, it is an extremely interesting question. I do not know if my colleague has a degree in chemistry or if he knows the meaning of these words. While I know what BPCs are, I must admit that I do not know some of these other chemicals. When a Bill contains thousands of chemicals, obviously we do not know many of them. Therefore, I cannot do much more than laugh at the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland).

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in today's debate on Bill C-74. I was somewhat disappointed by the reaction of the previous speaker, the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), and like him I simply cannot pretend to be an expert on all toxic products. Mr. Speaker, what disappointed me in the remarks of the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques—he who represents a highly urbanized riding, who, if memory serves me right, has been a Member of Parliament for at least twelve-odd years, if not more, who belonged to a government which way back could have taken preventive measures to curb environmental pollution—is the fact that he now berates this Government and our Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) for failing to introduce Bill C-74 before today, a measure which is the outcome of consultations. Perhaps I might point out something which my colleague from Saint-Jacques would certainly remember: his Party had never been overly enthusiastic about consulting interest groups or the public at large to find out whether the Government should come up with a legislative measure to meet real needs.

A moment ago he referred to the fact that this Bill does not cover all pollutants already in the ground, on river beds, or wherever. Perhaps he should have asked himself this question when he first came to Parliament, and perhaps he should have urged his own government during all those years it was in office to introduce a measure like Bill C-74, not today but 15 or 16 years ago when he first came to this House. We all know how easy it is to criticize the Conservative Government, indeed it has become a habit. But why do they rake the Conservative Government over the coals? Because it dares take action. It is not afraid to consult Canadians on contentious issues, and the environment happens to be one of them.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to this House about my concern for the potential effects of toxic chemicals on the environment and on present and future generations of Canadians. Unlike my Liberal friends I am concerned about the people who will soon be replacing us. Over the past several years, we have all had numerous opportunities to witness the kinds of mayhem that can result from the use of a wide range of chemical products. Past toxic waste disposal practices were inadequate and have resulted in the release of toxic contaminants to surface and ground waters, threatening the supplies of drinking water for millions of people. We have realized that acid rain can wreak havoc with our lakes and forests and Canada is taking action to minimize these effects. However, we are now just awakening to the prospect that toxic chemicals may also be transported over long distances through the atmosphere and can harm humans, animals and fish.

I believe that the time is right for this government to show leadership in tackling the problem of toxic chemicals management. We need a national approach—one that respects the interests and responsibilities of all levels of government, and all sectors of our society. We must prevent problems rather than react to them. We must learn to live with chemicals from the point that they are created in the laboratory, through their introduction to the market-place and our homes, and to see that adequate disposal practices are followed. It is only through such measures, Mr. Speaker that we can sustain the health of our population and the quality of our environment and, as a consequence, the economic viability of our place in the world market.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act that we are discussing today, is the result of over 3 years of deliberations with all sectors of Canadian society. I want the Liberal Members to know that we have had consultations. It reflects the concern of this government for the potential effects of toxic chemicals on the environment and on present and future generations of Canadians. This legislation is the result of two consultative exercises than began in 1985. The first initiative began in February 1985 when the Ministers of the Environment and of National Health and Welfare released for public review and comment, proposals for amendments to the Environmental Contaminants Act.

In response to the comments received during this public review period, the Ministers established in June 1985 a Consultative Committee with twelve representatives drawn from business, labour, public interest groups, and federal and provincial governments. It was not a habit of our predecessors to seek the advice of provincial governments. The committee was taken with reviewing the original government proposals and the submissions received during the public comments period, and recommending proposed amendments to the Ministers. The Committee met for the first time in September 1985 and, after a series of meetings and considerable study, submitted a final report to the Ministers on August 29, 1986. In this report, the committee made a series of recommendations to increase the scope of the Environmental Contaminants Act and to strengthen the role of the Federal Government in dealing with the problems of toxic cheminals.

The Second initiative began in September 1985 when a second consultative group started to address the problems associated with the management of all aspects of toxic chemicals in order to minimize risks to human health.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that I will have to continue after the lunch break.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

WOMEN

SEXUAL ABUSE

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, a Manotick physician has been cleared of sexual assault charges concerning a 21-year-old female patient in the emergency ward of his hospital.

Anyone making a study of recent publications on the subject will discover that the veil of silence on this taboo—physicians sexually abusing their female patients—is being raised.

In the case of the patient from Perth, an attempt was made to show that, far from calming her, the Valium prescribed by her physician had been the source of a libidinous perception.

Mr. Speaker, since when is Valium a stimulant, given the fact that evidence gathered over a number of years proves that the depressive conditions of many women can be traced back to this drug?

Allow me to question the soundness of comments on Valium. Even the judge has stated that he still entertains reasonable doubts in his mind.

What more do we need, what kind of evidence must be submitted when we know that the facts which were corroborated are the same as those which are accepted in cases of sexual abuse of children by adults?

So when will justice prevail in cases of sexual abuse against women, and what more de we need to make judges fully aware of this approach?

HOUSING

PLIGHT OF THE HOMELESS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Conference to Observe the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless ended its deliberations in Ottawa yesterday. This conference heard firsthand about the crisis of homelessness here in Canada and, indeed, around the world.

In 1982, when the United Nations designated 1987 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, one of the objectives was to have every country achieve a measure of improvement in the actual living conditions of those who are at the low end of the income scale. Today, there is every indication that in Canada conditions are even worse than they were in 1982.

There is no doubt at all that homelessness and the risk of being homeless are affecting a greater number of Canadians today than at any time since the Great Depression. The crisis crosses all segments of our society and impacts most heavily on women, natives, young people and the poor.

The Government's obligation to this international year did not end when the conference concluded. The problem was known to it before it was highlighted by this conference. What is needed now is action and the political will to ensure that homes for the homeless become a right and not simply a commodity on which a profit can be made.

NATIONAL DRUG STRATEGY

CALL FOR SUPPORT

Mr. Andrew Witer (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, drug abuse is a growing problem in Canada, a problem which affects all segments of society. RCMP drug intelligence reports that the number of major cocaine traffickers is increasing and that the use of potent cocaine derivatives and combinations with other substances is becoming more prevalent, while domestic production of cannabis and chemical drugs is on the rise.

Law enforcement officers have faced a task of tremendous proportions in their efforts to crack down on the drug trade. The National Drug Strategy and, in particular, the new legislation to confiscate the proceeds of crime have at last provided Canadian enforcement officers with the resources and tools to confront and to overcome the growing danger that drug abuse poses to society. New initiatives in public education, treatment and rehabilitation, law enforcement and research, will provide an effective and comprehensive offensive against drug abuse.

I call upon all Canadians and all Members of the House to put aside partisan politics and support the Government in the fight against drugs.

HOUSING

PLIGHT OF THE HOMELESS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, a couple of days ago over 500 people converged on Parliament Hill to protest the lack of shelter that 12,000 or more Canadians face every night. In this the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless we must try to come to terms with this national tragedy.

The plight of the homeless and the poor goes to the core of the issue of human dignity and the right to the basics of life. Deprived of acceptable lodging and adequate food, how can the poor feel that they are an integral part of a developed and humanitarian society?

Soup kitchens, churches and charitable organizations have been left with the burden of helping the needy in our society. It is time that all Canadians and, in particular, all Governments, especially the national Government of Canada, help out and take part in ending what has become a national disgrace.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SIGNING OF INTERNATIONAL PROTOCOL ON MEASURES TO PROTECT OZONE LAYER

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), and the representatives of 43 other countries who drafted an international agreement yesterday. This agreement will help to preserve the earth's ozone layer, the protective layer of gases which shields the earth from the harmful rays of the sun.

This agreement comes none too soon. Already there are huge holes in the ozone layer over the Arctic and the Antarctic. Without controls on those chemicals which destroy the ozone layer, the problem will begin to move further into countries like Canada. A depletion in the ozone layer could have a devastating impact on agricultural production in this country, changing weather patterns, and turning the Prairies into a vast desert. Other results would be a significant increase in cases of skin cancer and eye disease.

The successful negotiation of this treaty is proof of the continuing role of the United Nations in establishing international environmental agreements. It is also an indication of the growing awareness of most, if not all Governments that the environment must be preserved in order that future generations will be able to enjoy a healthy environment on this planet, an environment which all too often we take for granted.

HEALTH

USE OF ESTROGEN HORMONE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, one of the most misunderstood women's health issues is menopause, and the aging process which brings fears of osteoporosis. This week at two separate health conferences the use of the female hormone estrogen for treatment of women was raised.

The Osteoporosis Society of Canada claims that estrogen is a safe and effective way for selected women to prevent the debilitating bone disease osteoporosis. At another conference a radically different message was delivered that women can safely thwart the natural aging process by using estrogen treatment. This message presumes that menopause is the end of health, vigour, attractiveness, and libido, and that women should seek to remain adolescent beauties all their lives.

I applaud Dr. Joan Harrison who said, "I think staying young is an attitude of mind, and keeping fit and alive and active and interested in life is far more important than any agent".

Let us have more research into the opportunities to age healthfully and gracefully, and less poppycock based on sexist stereotypes of female beauty.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM—EXTENSIVE REFORM ADVOCATED

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission—Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, once again the cries are being heard clear across Canada for extensive reform of the criminal justice system in our country. These cries for reform are well founded and deserving of serious attention from all Members of the House.

A report recently released by the National Parole Board indicates that in the last 12 years 130 killings have been committed by prisoners who were on parole or who were under mandatory supervision. In a recent and absolutely appalling incident the Parole Board issued an individual, serving a 10-year sentence, a one-day parole pass in order that he could celebrate a special personal occasion. On the same day of his release this individual appears to have committed murder, and two additional serious crimes.

How many lives must be taken, and how many more families must be destroyed before we, as the lawmakers of the country, take concrete action to reform this shamefully ineffective collection of pacifist nonsense we call our justice system?

In Medicine Hat, Alberta, a family is suffering because of our inept system and our failure to deal with the premeditated repeat murderers. I for one will continue to fight for the reinstatement of capital punishment and a proper justice system.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT—EFFECT OF ENFORCEMENT

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, aboriginal rights to hunt, fish, trap and gather were confirmed by the Royal Proclamation of 1763 which is now part of the Constitution, and guaranteed in the treaties signed with Indian First Nations. Those treaties are also recognized and affirmed in the Constitution.

Over the years these rights have been eroded by certain laws, including the Migratory Birds Convention Act, a convention between Canada and the United States.

In a judgment given on May 13, 1987, in the provincial court at The Pas, Manitoba, Judge William R. Martin stated:

> In my opinion the Migratory Birds Convention Act cannot be used to extinguish the Indian's right to hunt migratory birds for food at all seasons. To the extent that the Migratory Birds Convention Act is inconsistent with the Constitution—it has no force and effect.

• (1410)

Therefore I call upon the Government of Canada to bring to an immediate end the harassment by RCMP officers of Indian persons in the James Bay area of northern Ontario, whose treaty and constitutional rights are being denied through enforcement of the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELEVISION—EMMY AWARD FOR CANADIAN TECHNOLOGICAL ACHIEVEMENT

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pleasure that I rise to inform Hon. Members that last night in New York the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) accepted, on behalf of the Department of Communications, an Emmy Award for technological achievement in television.

This award was for technology that pioneered the use of small low-cost antennae, which provided services to remote communities in the Canadian North.

Today there are 14 North American satellites using this technology all over the continent—in Canada, the United States, and Mexico.

In fact it seems as if everybody is using this technology now. However, nobody would be doing so if a small number of enterprising Canadians had not been willing to accept the risk, the risk that had to be taken, to show the world that this technology could work. It shows what Canadian ingenuity, backed by a far-seeing research program, can accomplish.

I believe that all of us in the House can be justifiably proud of this noteworthy achievement and of the Canadian scientists and officials who made it possible.

DISARMAMENT

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND SOVIET UNION

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the talks in Washington this week between the Soviets and Americans on an arms agreement eliminating medium and short-range nuclear missiles are very heartening. A treaty may well be worked out by the end of the year.

We are encouraged, too, by Mr. Gorbachev's proposal that a United Nations mechanism be created for monitoring compliance with arms control accords. This is very much in line with Canadian proposals in the past, and we look forward to hearing the Minister's response when he addresses the U.N. next Tuesday.

Lest we get carried away, however, we must remind ourselves that enormous arsenals of strategic nuclear arms remain, arsenals capable of destroying the planet many times over, and growing daily in technological sophistication and offensive capabilities.

When will we see a halt to the growth in such weapons as air and submarine-launched Cruise missiles? When will we see massive reductions in all strategic offensive arms? When will we see the end of SDI?

What is happening in Washington this week is a prelude, an important prelude but still a prelude, to the enormous tasks that lie ahead.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

FUTURE OF WILNO, ONT., POST OFFICE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the hamlet of Wilno in the County of Renfrew is the oldest community of Polish origin in Canada. The post office is in the general store and Rural Route No. 1, Wilno, originates in that location.

Canada Post wants to take the postmaster off salary and replace this position with a contract which will give the postmaster a commission on the sale of stamps, money orders, et cetera. She will receive about 83 cents an hour on a really heavy day.

The National Camp Grounds of the 400,000 Canadians of Polish origin in Canada, named Kaszuby, is just six miles from Wilno, and people come there from all over Canada.

Both the community of Wilno and the Canadian Polish Congress of Canada want the post office retained as is, with Rural Route No. 1, Wilno, kept intact.

The people of Wilno have asked me to tell the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) that they are insulted and angry at his Conservative Government's action.

In a letter to the Chairman of Canada Post Corporation, the President of the Canadian Polish Congress states:

> The closing down of the Wilno community post office would be interpreted as an insult not only to the people of that community, but to all Canadians of Polish descent.

In the name of Canadian history, and in the name of Canadian heritage, I call upon the Prime Minister to call off the wolves and leave the Wilno post office alone.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACCORD ON REDUCTION OF CHEMICAL PRODUCTS DESTROYING OZONE SHIELD IN STRATOSPHERE

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, more than 50 countries signed a treaty aimed at reducing by half the chemical products which destroy the ozone layer in the stratosphere. "For the first time in history we now have a global treaty under which the nations of the world have decided to take very specific measures to reduce the production of a product harmful to the environment." This statement was made by Mr. Winfried Lang who chaired the September 8-to-16 conference held in Montreal under the aegis of the United Nations Environment Program. According to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan): "The treaty shows that countries can indeed afford to forget about their diverging views in their quest for a common goal—the preservation of life on earth".

Last April the World Commission on Environment and Development released a report linking international economic and environmental needs.

We have just been witness to the seriousness with which Canada and other countries take this link.

We must commend the Minister of the Environment and all others who worked hard towards the signature of this important treaty which is the kind of tool we need to protect our planet.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—CALL FOR INCREASED PRESSURE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, on September 12, 1977, Stephen Biko, the heroic advocate of black independence in South Africa, died of savage injuries sustained while in police custody. Ten years later little has changed.

This week in the South African Parliament two proposals are being debated. One offers blacks throughout the country the opportunity to elect their own representatives to a National Advisory Council, and the other is a report on changes to the Group Areas Act which is the basis of residential segregation. The first has been rejected by black leaders. The second appears to be a token gesture.

Black leaders such as Oliver Tambo, Alan Boesak and Thabo Mbeki have repeatedly called for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions and a break in diplomatic ties, although this might mean isolation.

Now is the time to step up the pressure on South Africa before it is too late.

GROWTH IN 1984-1987 PERIOD

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, today marks the third anniversary of the swearing in of the Mulroney administration. The quantity and significance of the legislation introduced and passed by this Government is without parallel in the history of Canadian federal politics.

The employment and economic record since September, 1984, is nothing short of remarkable. Nine hundred and seven thousand new jobs have been created; 88 per cent of these new jobs are full-time. There were more newspaper pages devoted to help-wanted ads in July of this year than at any point during the past 25 years. Interest rates have fallen 3 per cent. Five-year mortgages are down 2.75 per cent. Housing starts are up 86 per cent. Consumer spending has increased 32 per cent. Inflation is steady at 4 per cent. The deficit has declined in three consecutive years for the first time in 30 years.

Indeed, our economic growth now exceeds that of all major western industrialized nations. The Government has contributed to this outstanding economic growth by sensible policies on deficit and spending controls, deregulation, and foreign investment. It has also laid the foundation for continued growth by its leadership and vision in pursuing freer trade with the United States, and tax reform.

I admit that we, as a Government, have made some mistakes. However, no one can deny the outstanding record of these past three years.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's approval of the performance of his Solicitor General and that gentleman's predecessor is based upon a dangerous ignorance of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and a dangerous ignorance of the law. I want to recite the Prime Minister's answer to me yesterday, for the benefit of Your Honour:

> —ministerial responsibility has been adequately and faithfully discharged by the Solicitor General at all times and in all circumstances.
> The head of an independent agency decided to submit his resignation and the resignation was accepted.

Those were the Prime Minister's words. The Prime Minister is dead wrong, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Intelligence Service is not an independent agency like the CBC is. It is directly responsible to a Minister of the Government. Section 6 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Act—and I will be glad to hand it to the Minister of Justice to refresh his limited memory—reads:

> The Director, under the direction of the Minister, has the control and management of the Service and all matters connected therewith.

In other words, there is a direct ministerial responsibility here. Hopefully the Deputy Prime Minister is aware of the ministerial responsibility of the Solicitor General. Will he confer with the Prime Minister and obtain that gentleman's resignation?

• (1420)

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Right Hon.—

An Hon. Member: Whatever.

Mr. Kelleher: —Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Gormley: For now, anyway.

Mr. Kelleher: —I am certainly not resigned to the problems in CSIS. I have been taking action. Whenever a problem has come to our attention I have acted. I can mention what I did after the matter of the affidavit. Immediately upon learning of it we advised the court. I immediately asked the Inspector General to conduct an investigation. I immediately asked the Osbaldeston team to look at this and recommend a plan of action. I also advised the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

Mr. Speaker: I am very reluctant to interrupt the Minister. While what he is saying is of course important, it does not relate to the question asked.

Mr. McDermid: Let him speak.

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian—

Mr. Gormley: Page two of the speech.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —Security Intelligence Service Act was changed at the instance of the then opposition critic, now Minister of Justice. He caused the Bill to be amended to make the Minister accountable, and I want to recite his words.

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This is found at page 1279 of Hansard of February 10, 1984:

> —the agency should be an open book to the Minister. There is absolutely no question that that is how it must be. The Minister must have full political responsibility. Accountability must be absolute.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Hear, hear! Absolutely.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): In accordance with the Minister's eloquence, the Bill was changed and the Minister was made accountable to Parliament.

Once again I ask will the Deputy Prime Minister secure that Minister's resignation, and in particular the resignation of his predecessor for signing that false application to the court?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has been accountable to Parliament. He has been here every day answering the questions the Opposition have been putting forward, and rightly so.

Mr. Nunziata: Why not a judicial inquiry?

Mr. Clark (Yellowknife): Look who is creeping up to the second row!

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has asked a question and the Deputy Prime Minister is in the midst of answering it. That answer is not made any easier by colleagues of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition interrupting with comments.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to remind you, Sir, and Members of this House, that the Minister has been accountable to this House. He has taken firm and definitive action. He has accepted responsibility and outlined a course of action. I am not sure what more the Opposition wants. It is now talking about a judicial inquiry. The Minister went as far yesterday as to say he was prepared to appear before a parliamentary committee to deal with this whole matter to its fullest extent. If that is not accountability then the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has a different version of it than I have.

[Translation]

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): What we want, Mr. Speaker, is ministerial responsibility on the part of the Minister and his predecessor who threw a public employee to the wolves to save their hide. Now that the Prime Minister himself, ultimately responsible for national security, chairs the Cabinet committee on national security, why is the Prime Minister not aware of ministerial responsibility, and why do the present Solicitor General and especially his predecessor refuse to accept their ministerial responsibility, and why do they not resign as a result of this incident?

• (1425)

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is not interested in the facts and in getting to the bottom of this issue. All he is interested in is the removal of a Minister. This Minister is not going to resign. He is going to resolve the differences and difficulties which are inherent in the organization.

This organization was put in place in 1984. There was a difficult transitional period within which it had to operate. This Minister and previous Ministers have dealt with that. The Minister is taking action and will continue to take action.

The answers are clear. I am sorry to disappoint the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition but the resignation of the Minister will certainly not satisfy his requirements if he is interested in getting all the information and facts with regard to this situation.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—POSITION OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister assured this House that the federal position in the fishing talks between Canada and France would be in accordance with the wishes of the fishermen and the provincial Governments of eastern Canada.

I will direct my attention to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he explain to this House why the position of the federal Government, during talks which took place this past weekend in Paris, was not in accordance with the wishes of the fishermen and provincial Governments of eastern Canada? The fishermen do not want northern cod on the bargaining table.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange that a political Party which is now in the process of backing away from the Meech Lake Accord is putting forward in the House of Commons the proposition that the completion of international negotiations in federal jurisdiction is a matter subject to provincial veto. We have involved the Province of Newfoundland and other provinces fully in preparations for these negotiations and in the negotiations themselves.

WITHDRAWAL OF NEWFOUNDLAND FROM TALKS

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Newfoundland has announced this very hour that it will withdraw from talks between Canada and France because Canada has agreed to discuss, at talks to begin October 6 in Ottawa, giving France more fishing rights than it ever had before.

Why did the Government of Canada renege on a commitment made by the Prime Minister to the fishermen and Governments of eastern Canada? We know what is on the menu for the French on October 6. It is cod au gratis.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's allegation is false. Premier Peckford had asked that he be involved in the negotiations. We involved him in the negotiations. He had asked to be part of the delegation. His representatives were part of the delegation. The Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador has taken a position to withdraw his negotiator from the Canadian delegation.

Some Hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is his decision. We regret it.

We want to make two things clear. First, we would welcome the return of the Newfoundland representative to the Canadian delegation involved in this very important negotiation. Second, the negotiation which we are conducting with France to resolve a question left unresolved as a result of the failures of former Liberal administrations is being conducted with the purpose of serving, protecting, and advancing the interests of the fishermen and the fishing industry of Atlantic Canada, including Newfoundland.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

TRADE UNIONS—REVIEW COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN'S COMMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Mr. Ronald Atkey, head of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, has indicated that as soon as he heard of Mr. Marc Boivin's connections with our security services the review office began an inquiry into the matter which has now extended to a number of trade unions in Canada. On Tuesday in the House the Minister said categorically that the security services do not target trade unions.

In light of what Mr. Atkey has said does the Minister stand by what he said in the House on Tuesday? If so, what is Mr. Atkey investigating?

• (1430)

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the article referred to by the Hon. Member is not new. This is nothing more than what Mr. Atkey said at a press conference following the tabling of his annual report in June of this year. I have already begun to act on that because immediately upon learning of Mr. Boivin's activities I asked the Inspector General to launch an investigation into that matter. That also forms part of the mandate of the Osbaldeston review committee.

What I said with respect to targeting of labour unions, and what I say again, is that under the Act CSIS cannot target labour unions because they are a labour union. It is not within its mandate and it would not do so.

Mr. Broadbent: It is not because they are a labour union that perhaps CSIS has targeted them, but they are a free organization and the people in this country believe non-violent democratic organizations in this country ought to be free and not infiltrated by the security services.

[Translation]

QUERY CONCERNING WHO IS RIGHT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Atkey believes that certain individuals who work for our security service in one capacity or another did infiltrate unions in Canada. Who is right about this issue, the Minister of Mr. Atkey? Which one?

[English]

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Hon. Member, as he well knows, that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act permits CSIS to investigate anybody who is a security threat to Canada. That is far different from suggesting that it has the right to target labour unions because they are a labour union. I repeat again that they do not and they cannot.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF ACT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has been correct in citing the Act. He will know that the McDonald Royal Commission, all the Attorneys General of the provinces of Canada at the time, the Official Opposition which was his Party at the time, as well as the New Democratic Party said that the Act he just quoted has been defined too broadly because it gives the security services the right—which they should not have—to monitor people who do not believe in or advocate violence in any form.

Considering that this is the case, and that the security services evidently are clearly running amok now, will the Minister agree to accept the recommendation of the McDonald Commission and his own Party's recommendation at the time, and introduce an amendment that will change the Act to restrict the security services only to those kinds of activities that should be monitored in a free society?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows well that there is a five-year review called for under the CSIS Act. Second, the Hon. Member is talking as if the review by Mr. Atkey's committee has already arrived at and finalized its conclusions and that what he is suggesting is in fact true. That is not the case.

The investigation is barely under way. We too are concerned about that. That is why I have asked the Inspector General to carry out a review of Mr. Boivin's conditions of service. That is why I made that part of the mandate of the Osbaldeston committee, to give me a plan of action with respect to counter-subversion activities which I will implement immediately upon receiving the report.

AIR-INDIA CRASH—ADVANCE WARNING QUERY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Solicitor General was asked about advance knowledge which government officials may have had with regard to the Air- India tragedy two years ago. Yesterday the Solicitor General refused to answer, suggesting that because the matter was sub judice he would not be able to answer questions in the House of Commons.

He knows that in a civil matter the sub judice rule only applies when the matter is at trial. Therefore, he ought to be answering questions in this regard.

I want to ask the question again. Did the RCMP or Canadian Security Intelligence Service have any advance warning with regard to the Air-India tragedy?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's legal opinion is obviously at variance with the opinion I have received from the Department of Justice. Frankly, I am prepared to accept the latter over the Hon. Member's. For that reason I cannot get into the facts. However, I can quote the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister, former Minister of Transport, from Hansard on June 25, 1985, when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, from to time there were requests for additional security by Air-India authorities. There were extra RCMP deployed both at Toronto and at Mirabel, as there has been for some time. I should point out to the House that there was no indication that there was a specific threat to Flight 182 and, as a result, the extraordinary precautionary measures were not put in place.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, on the question of whether or not the matter is sub judice, Beauchesne says at page 118—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair is aware of what Beauchesne says. This is not the time to argue it. The Hon. Member will put his question and I will hear the reply that is forthcoming from the Minister.

Mr. Nunziata: Perhaps I could rise on a point of order later.

ACTIVITIES OF UNION INFORMER

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I will ask another question of the Solicitor General with regard to Mr. Boivin. Mr. Boivin, who was a paid informer of the Security Intelligence Service of Canada, has pleaded guilty to four charges of conspiracy to bomb motels in Chicoutimi, Ste. Foy, Drummondville and Montreal, and two charges of conspiracy to cause explosions in hotels in Chicoutimi and Ste. Foy. All the while he was a paid informer of the security service of Canada. Was the security service aware of Mr. Boivin's criminal activity at the time?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have already said to another Hon. Member, immediately upon learning of Mr. Boivin's activities I utilized the Inspector General—it was his Party that brought in the Act and set up the office of the Inspector General to do those very things I asked of him—to investigate and report to me. I think the Hon. Member should give the Act and this Solicitor General a chance to operate properly.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the Secretary of State for External Affairs assured the House that the position of the Government of Canada with respect to the Canada-France negotiations had been discussed with representatives of the industry, fishermen, and the Government in Newfoundland. When the Government went to Paris did it change its position to the detriment of Newfoundland, to cause the Government of Newfoundland to withdraw from those talks?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government of Canada did not change. I want to make it very clear that the negotiations are not at all to the detriment of Newfoundland. What would be to the detriment of Newfoundland would be for us to fail to try to resolve this very serious difficulty that has been left with us as a result of the failure of the inadequate earlier negotiations. We are trying to resolve the problem. We are trying to bring security, stability, and growth to the fishing industry and to the lives of fishermen in Newfoundland and elsewhere in Atlantic Canada.

REQUEST FOR HALT TO NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, since the Newfoundland Government has withdrawn its team from the negotiations because of the position taken by the Government of Canada, will the Minister not call off the negotiations until it comes up with a position that is acceptable to the people and the Government of Newfoundland?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party has made its position known on a range of international obligations. They want to run away from NATO, they want to run away from the trade negotiations, they want to run away from fisheries negotiations. The only cause they are prepared to espouse is the cause of violence, such as was put forward by their former spokesperson for international affairs earlier.

• (1440)

REQUEST FOR COMMON STRATEGY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. May I say there has never been a more shameful attempt to run away from a legitimate question. The question here is the Prime Minister's word and its worth. Every Member heard the Prime Minister apologize to the Government and to the people of Newfoundland for having signed a deal with France behind Newfoundland's back. Every Member heard the Prime Minister say that in future no deal shall be reached until the people and the Government of Newfoundland agree with the contents of that deal.

We now have at least one of the Atlantic Governments walking away from the table. The question then becomes what is the worth of the Prime Minister's word? Will these talks be suspended until the Canadian negotiating team, that is, the federal Government and all of the provinces involved, can get their act together and agree upon a common strategy at the negotiating table?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the quite extraordinary position being put forward, I presume on behalf of the Liberal Party, is that every province should have a veto over every international negotiation in which the Government of Canada participates. That is not the undertaking which was given by the Government of Canada. The undertaken given by the Government of Canada was that we were going to involve fully the industry, the fishermen, and the provinces affected. We have involved fully the industry, the fishermen, and the provinces affected.

The Premier of Newfoundland had been consulted, has been involved, had sent representatives to the negotiations in France. We regret he has taken the decision. We hope he will understand that we would welcome him and his representatives to come back into the negotiations.

We are negotiating to try to bring benefit to the fishermen of Atlantic Canada, the fishermen of Newfoundland, the fishermen of Canada. Those negotiations are continuing. If it appears we are not able through those negotiations to help and advance the interests of the fishermen of Newfoundland, naturally there will be no conclusion to those negotiations, but we are trying to get a good deal for Canada.

REQUEST THAT CANADA-FRANCE MEETINGS BE ENDED

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the extraordinary position being put forward by the Liberal Party—extraordinary given the history of this place—is that the people of Canada should be able to expect that when the Prime Minister gives his word he will keep it.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Fisheries, and the Minister of Transport, Newfoundland's Cabinet representative, have all said that northern cod is not on the table and no deal shall be signed without the consent of the Government and people of Newfoundland. That is now not possible without Newfoundland at the table.

Will the Government immediately put an end to the scheduled meetings next month between Canada and France, convene a meeting of all of the players involved, that is, the Government of Canada and the Atlantic Provinces, and see whether or not a common strategy can be found? If a common strategy cannot be found, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs ensure that his Prime Minister keeps his word, solemnly given, I presume, in this House to the people and Government of Newfoundland?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have just read the statement by the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador. The position being taken by the Hon. Member is considerably more extreme than the position put forward by the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador. The reason for that is evident. The Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador is interested in protecting the legitimate interests of the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador. The Hon. Member is interested only in hurling accusations across the floor of this House.

INDIAN CABINET MINISTER—KNOWLEDGE OF PRESENCE IN CANADA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, on May 26 of last year, after a visiting Punjabi cabinet Minister was shot and seriously wounded in British Columbia, two Ministers of the Crown rose in this House and said no security protection was provided because his presence in the country was not known.

Today I provided to the Minister a transcript of wiretaps showing that CSIS clearly knew at least a week beforehand that the Minister was in Canada. Given this confirmation in the transcript of dangerous CSIS bungling that led to serious injury, will the Minister now finally fire those agents responsible and order a full parliamentary Inquiry into this very serious matter?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Hon. Member was kind enough to deliver some transcripts of something to me at about 2.15 p.m., and for this I thank him. I will certainly have these reviewed by my officials to ascertain what they contain and the accuracy of them. But let me state that immediately following the shooting incident, the then Solicitor General immediately asked the Inspector General to conduct an investigation, as he is mandated to do. I received that report and immediately implemented the recommendations contained therein to improve the system.

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is shocking that this Minister is now admitting that the first time he even bothered to look at the transcripts of the wiretaps of these conversations was when I presented them to him. That is shameful. That is absolutely shameful.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is not what he said. Tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker: The Member will put his question.

Mr. Robinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that these transcripts have been available to the Minister for several months now, and in view of the very serious nature of this allegation, the fact that Ministers of the Crown stood in their place in the House and denied that the Government knew what was going on, how much more will it take before this Minister accepts his responsibility and recognizes there must be a full parliamentary inquiry? If he does not, why on earth does he not do the honourable thing and resign, because he is utterly incompetent?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): In the first instance, with respect to the Member's preamble, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I said. What I said was I have not as yet had an opportunity to review the documents, myself or my officials, which were delivered to me at 2.15.

Mr. Riis: Take your time, Jim.

Mr. Broadbent: Take a few more months.

Mr. Kelleher: If anyone is shocked and dismayed, it is this Minister, at the Hon. Member who may very well be jeopardizing the investigation into this heinous crime which we are presently carrying out.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Come on!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONVICTED MURDERERS—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF PAROLE

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Last evening many Canadians watched on television the discovery of yet another Canadian who was brutally murdered, dismembered, and dumped along highway 417 near Ottawa. We read in the newspapers and see on television virtually daily occurrences of such savage murders in our country. It is imperative that a life sentence mean that.

In light of this ongoing travesty, would the Minister consider removing parole for any individual who commits a premeditated first-degree murder?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think we all in the House share a sense of horror and disgust with respect to these brutal acts that take place in our society. We as legislators have an opportunity to improve our judicial and justice system. Indeed, the Hon. Member will know, as a leading member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, that we have in fact launched into a very thorough and intensive examination with respect to the whole question of sentencing.

The committee itself, of its own volition and initiative, is in fact looking at the whole question of parole. We have the Archambault Sentencing Commission which is now the subject of intensive discussion not only with Members of Parliament but with my provincial counterparts. I can assure the Hon. Member of the commitment of this Government to move forward as quickly as possible in areas of improving our system of justice and I thank him for his great interest in this area.

DIRECTOR'S RESIGNATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I want to ask the Minister about the resignation of Ted Finn, who was a Deputy Minister. The Solicitor General is asking the House to accept the resignation of the Deputy Minister as parliamentary accountability for the problems in the Security Intelligence Service. If the Minister is asking us to do that, at the very least I think he ought to have come clean with the House and told us all the reasons why the resignation was offered and all the reasons why the resignation was accepted.

I would like to ask him about that. What were the reasons for Ted Finn offering his resignation to the Government?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on many occasions, Mr. Finn submitted his resignation and it was accepted.

REASONS FOR RESIGNATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is not the kind of accountability the Prime Minister wants, or offered to the House in explanation or accountability for all the things that have gone wrong within the Security Intelligence Service. What were the reasons the resignation was given? Surely we are entitled to them. At least we are entitled to know in particular if the resignation of Ted Finn was solicited by the Government, by the Minister, or by anyone on his behalf.

Mr. Rossi: Who are you covering up for?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, again I will repeat what I originally said and have been saying all along. Mr. Finn submitted his resignation and it was accepted.

Mr. Nunziata: Why?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—FUNDING OF CONTRA FORCES BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Mission for Peace has just returned from Nicaragua where we found that the Government and the people are very committed to the peace process. They very much fear that a resumption of Contra funding will not only continue to devastate the countryside but will destroy the peace process itself.

When the Minister speaks to the General Assembly of the United Nations next Tuesday will he not only condemn in general terms all foreign interference and military support in Central America but will he make explicit Canadian opposition to further funding of the Contras by the United States of America?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question has been asked and answered before. Our position has not changed.

While I am on my feet I would like to commend the initiative taken by the Hon. Member, his colleague from Winnipeg—Fort Garry, and others, in visiting Nicaragua and holding those kinds of conversations. If there is particular information that they think would be useful to convey to me, I would be most appreciative of receiving it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we will be glad to speak with the Minister personally.

We visited a co-operative farm and we saw burned buildings and destroyed equipment. This is the result of a Contra war against development. Does the Minister not recognize that continued funding of the Contras is a major act of bad faith? Why, then, will he not speak out loudly and clearly now when Canada's voice can make a real difference to the peace process?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just so that we are absolutely clear, I think that there are some things that Canada can do to make a real contribution to the peace process. That is why I sent representatives down immediately after the plan was accepted by the five Central American Presidents. That is why I genuinely welcome the active initiative that was taken by the Hon. Member, his colleague and others. That is why I am trying to do whatever will turn out to be practical. That involves making clear our view that the presence of foreign powers in that conflict and in that region is not helpful.

I do not believe that what the Hon. Member proposes we do would be constructive, helpful, or have an effect. Consequently, I want to maintain our capacity to look at and to pursue those avenues which will have an effect.

HARBOURS AND PORTS

DREDGING OF PICTOU HARBOUR, N. S.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the dredging of Pictou Harbour in Pictou County, Nova Scotia.

The Deputy Prime Minister should be aware that officials from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have made very strong and specific recommendations to Environment Canada on the proper and safest ways to dump quantities of PCBs, heavy metal, and other pollutants so as to protect marine life. Can the Minister give a clear assurance to the House that the recommendations of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans will be followed to the letter with regard to protecting the health of Canadians, as well as marine life and tourism in that particular area? Can he give us that assurance?

Mr. Pat Binns (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I can indicate to the Hon. Member that the Government of Canada is indeed very sensitive to the situation which the Hon. Member mentions in relation to the possibility of PCB contamination. On previous occasions the Government has taken every step to ensure that PCB contamination was handled with every precaution.

I know that in the constituency of Cardigan, at Georgetown, in the last couple of years the Government has taken extraordinary measures to ensure that PCB contamination is adequately handled. I assure him that the same situation will prevail here.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONTAMINATION HAZARD

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. In the briefing book of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans it states that Environment Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are under pressure from the local Member of Parliament, the Minister of National Revenue, to ease the requirements for ocean dumping recommended by DFO because of the added cost associated with the stipulations.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister what advice will be followed. Will it be the advice and recommendations of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans with regard to PCB contamination? Or will it be the advice of the Minister of National Revenue? Whose advice will be followed?

Mr. Pat Binns (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, once again I assure the Hon. Member that, first and foremost, the Government of Canada is concerned about the protection of the environment. All measures necessary will be undertaken to ensure that there is no PCB contamination which can be avoided.

CANADA LABOUR CODE—APPLICATION DURING STRIKE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. It refers to the decision yesterday by the Canada Labour Relations Board that Canada Post forced its workers in the last strike to do work that would normally be done by striking employees. The Canada Labour Relations Board ruled that that was illegal and went against the Canada Labour Code.

Further to that, I have a Canada Post document in which it states that among the problems with that strike was intimidation used to provoke employees to obey instructions, often against their own better judgment or personal fears. It also states that intimidation often consisted of threat of dismissal, reprimands, or damage to the Canada Post careers of these people.

In that Canada Post is obviously breaking the law of the land will the Minister of Labour personally intervene to ensure that the law is obeyed?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will definitely look into the situation and act according to the law, if the law is not being followed.

OBSERVANCE OF LAW

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this. Since this is a Canada Post document, since it admits that this is happening and that there has been a Canada Labour Relations Board decision on this matter, will the Minister ensure that if postal negotiations break down—and there could be another strike next week—the Post Office will not be allowed to break the law of the land again?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any side is entitled to disobey the law of the land. I will look into the situation referred to by my hon. colleague and see what has to be done, if anything.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA—SECURITY OF NEIGHBOURING STATES

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In recent years in the face of carnage, chaos, and destruction, Canadian development aid to Mozambique has been totally inadequate. Much of the little we have sent has been destroyed by South African-backed rebels. Last week our High Commissioner in London suggested that Canada was considering sending boots and other non-lethal military aid to help the front-line states resist South African aggression.

Does the Minister share the views expressed by the Secretary General of the Commonwealth, Mr. Ramphal, who stated that Canada and other Commonwealth countries "will have to provide more than army boots if they are serious about meeting the security needs" of these front-line states?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, evidently, I share the view expressed by the Secretary General. The Secretary General understands, as does the House, I think, that there has been in Canada for some time a reluctance to become involved in what is traditionally called military aid. We do have the MTAP program that has very limited application. I do not think there would be much support in Canada for going beyond that kind of program, just as I do not think that there would be much support in Canada for the Government of Canada endorsing, as the New Democratic Party has, the resort to violence.

I do make the case, as I have to the Secretary General, and I want to assure the House, that we are looking with other Commonwealth countries, including countries such as Britain which has a different policy with respect to military aid, at ways in which we can work together to bring stability and certainty, particularly to transportation corridors, in Mozambique. Obviously that would have a very real impact on the economic viability of the other front-line states.

• (1500)

MOZAMBIQUE—SUGGESTED STATIONING OF PEACEKEEPING FORCES

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): As the Minister has stated, Mozambique requires more than good words, it requires economic stability and secure borders.

Will the Minister undertake to get the Commonwealth to support the stationing of Commonwealth or United Nations peacekeeping forces in Mozambique to prevent further South African incursions and raids, and block South African weapons and supplies from reaching the roving bands of terrorist rebels operating within Mozambique? This move would help to derail South Africa's plan to destabilize the front-line states.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, regrettably it is not that easy. There are troops of Commonwealth countries operating, providing training, and located in Mozambique. We are seriously looking at practical actions that the Commonwealth Countries can take together that may contribute significantly to stability in the front-line states, and in particular may provide some guarantees with regard to the security of one or more transportation corridors through Mozambique.

I cannot yet indicate to the House whether there is a reasonable prospect of us being able to reach agreement on that type of package from the heads of government meeting in the Commonwealth. That is what the Prime Minister is looking for, and that is what we are attempting to achieve.

RAILWAYS

SASKATOON RAILWAY CROSSING ACCIDENT

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

As the Hon. Member is aware, last week in Saskatoon there was a senseless and fatal accident involving a vehicle and train collision which occurred due to the lack of a mechanical traffic barrier.

Considering the fact that there were 525 rail related accidents in 1986, can the Parliamentary Secretary explain to the House what steps have been taken by the Department of Transport, and the Canadian Transport Commission, to avoid the recurrence of such an accident, in particular at this crossing in Saskatoon?

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know that all Members regret the tragic death of Mr. Carriere at this crossing in Saskatoon. There are hundreds of railway highway crossings in Canada; each one is potentially dangerous. As a result, Parliament has set aside a fund of money, administered by the CTC, and it can direct or order the installation of flashing lights, barriers, overpasses, or underpasses, depending on the criteria.

I know that as a result of the accident and the intervention of the Member, the CTC is looking at this crossing. That could lead to a change from a flashing light to a barrier, or some other technical advance which I hope will improve the crossing.

Mr. Speaker: This will be the last question. The Hon. Member for Beaches.

HOUSING

FAMILIES WITHOUT ADEQUATE HOUSING

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, my question is addressed to the Minister of Supply and Services.

The Minister will be aware that yesterday in Ottawa the international conference on the UN resolution on the homeless ended. The Minister will also be aware that the Government itself has advised that approximately 750,000 Canadian families suffer from either inadequate housing, or a total lack of housing.

Will the Minister advise the House and Canadians what the Government intends to do in order to provide the type of measures which will alleviate the crisis facing those 750,000 Canadian families?

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government did not wait for this conference to be held in Ottawa before looking after destitute Canadians. All the Hon. Member need do is review what has been announced to help these many people.

As to the conference which has just ended in Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, it was supported not only by the federal Government but also by spokesmen for Canadian society as well as Department of National Health and Welfare representatives, and we are looking forward to receiving the report of conference delegates.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): The Government is aware that it has done virtually nothing to alleviate this crisis in housing. I wish to ask the simple, clear question, does the Government fully expect Canadians to accept that throwing a couple of thousand bucks to organize a conference on the homeless in this country is the end of the Government's obligation? It should be ashamed of itself.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, the preamble of the question is totally unfair. The Conservative Governnent did not wait for this conference before taking action. Through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Government has already made a commitment to make as much money as possible available to help the most destitute. That is what we did, that is what we will continue to do, and the conference itself cannot be construed as a guideline for Government policy.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday I should like to ask the Government the traditional question, to wit: What House business has the Government in mind for the coming week?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will call Bill C-68, known as the Bretton Woods Agreements, which has returned from committee. There is some suggestion that that will move very quickly and it can go off to the other place.

We will then begin the report stage on Bill C-55. On Monday, we will continue with Bill C-55 at report and third reading stage until it is completed.

On Monday, I will be meeting with the other House Leaders to discuss future business, and make some arrangements for an orderly debate on the constitutional resolution.

POINT OF ORDER

ROYAL VISIT—ATTENDANCE AT STATE DINNER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski). On October 10, Canada will honour Her Majesty's visit to Canada with a state dinner on the West Coast. A state dinner is a non-partisan gathering. It is an occasion to provide an opportunity for people from various regions of the country who represent various groups in our society to participate in such an event.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister indicate what steps are being taken to ensure that equal distribution will be pursued, and that this occasion does not become a Social Credit Party event on the West Coast of Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): In response to the Hon. Member, I wonder if he would feel comfortable at a non-partisan event.

I will certainly take the Hon. Member's comments as a representation. Perhaps I can get back to him.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McMillan that Bill C-74, an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: When the House suspended the sitting at one o'clock the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) had the floor.

Mr. Ferland: I was saying before lunch that the second initiative began in September 1985 when a second consultative group started to address the problems associated with the management of all aspects of toxic chemicals in order to minimize risks to human health and the environment while supporting industrial productivity and competiveness. This committee developed a report entitled "From Cradle to Grave: A Management Approach to Chemicals". This report establishes the "life-cycle" concept as the key analytical tool for managing chemicals as they proceed from their creation through research and development efforts, are introduced to the market place, manufactured, transported, distributed, used and, eventually, disposed of.

The draft legislation before us incorporates many of the recommendations contained in these two committee reports. We accept the principle that we must have measures to anticipate and prevent the problems of environmental contamination as well as be prepared to remedy harm when it has been done.

To this end the following provisions of the draft legislation are notable.

A brand new provision has been included to deal with the beginning of the life-cycle of a chemical: a strict regulatory program is proposed that would require industry to notify the federal government when a chemical substance is going to be manufactured in or imported into Canada for the first time. Sufficient information would be provided to clearly identify the chemical and to allow scientists within the Department of the Environment and the Department of National Health and Welfare to carry out a preliminary assessment of the potential of the chemical to create a health or environmental threat. This program would allow Canada to live up to international commitments made at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. The details of this proposed scheme were developed by the consultative committee under the Environmental Contaminants Act and have the support of representatives of both industry and public interest groups and should merit the support of all members of this House.

To complement the proposed measures for "new" chemicals, is a series of measures designed to cope with the problems associated with the thousands of chemicals currently in use in our society. The draft Environmental Protection Act would obligate the Minister of the Environment to develop and publicize a list of chemicals that would be assessed for health and environmental hazards on a priority basis. Any member of the public could make representations to the Minister of the Environment to include specific chemicals on the Priority List and the Minister must reply to each request. This system would provide for strong public input and accountability for the process of selecting chemicals for review. As hazard assessments are completed, they must be made public and all decisions to regulate or not to regulate a chemical will be open to an appeal process. This procedure for selecting and assessing chemicals should maintain public participation and restore the public's confidence that the Federal Government is making a timely and appropriate response to the potential threats posed by the chemicals that have become an integral part of our life in this country.

One of the purposes of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is to control toxic chemicals in Canada. This draft legislation contains provisions to regulate virtually any of the foreseeable events in the life of a toxic chemical. In addition to the provisions I have already mentioned for controlling the entry of new chemicals to Canada, controls could be placed on the use, manufacture, import, release or disposal of toxic substances.

If toxic substances are imported, manufactured or distributed in contravention of any of the provisions of the Act, a recall, and possibly disposal, of all products containing the substance could be required by the Minister of the Environment. This type of provision is not found in any other current federal legislation and should encourage industry to comply with regulatory provisions of the Act and thus to prevent the contamination of our environment.

Another new provision would give the Federal Government the power to intervene when a spill or release of a toxic chemical is imminent or has occurred. This measure is designed to minimize or, hopefully, prevent damage to the environment that may be caused by the sudden release of large quantities of chemicals that are commonly used at industrial sites. This is another example of the kind of anticipatory measures that are part and parcel of a comprehensive cradle-to-grave approach to managing chemicals.

Mr. Speaker, as we attempt to protect the Canadian environment, we must realize that we are part of an international community. The ongoing international conference on ozone in Montreal is a prime example of the necessity for collective action on some environmental problems. We now recognize that some chemicals have the physical or chemical characteristics that allow them to become distributed about this planet of ours regardless of the original localized area of their use.

Recognizing this need for international cooperation, the draft Environmental Protection Act contains a measure that would require Canadian industry to notify foreign countries if a toxic chemical listed under the Act is to be exported. This practice should ensure that recipients of Canadian exports are aware that we have regulated a chemical and the reasons why we have done so and, thus, can evaluate the need for any measures they may deem necessary. There are many international aspects to controlling the hazards of existing chemicals and an important part of implementing this new Act involves Canadian participation as a leader in such organizations as the World Health Organization, the United Nations Environment Program and the Organization for Enonomic Cooperation and Development.

Mr. Speaker. The current laws for protection of the environment from toxic chemicals were conceived in the social, political and scientific milieu of the late 1960's and early 1970's. We have learned a lot over the past 20 years—a good deal of that from our failure to cope successfully with the insidious and ever-present problems of environmental contamination.

Mr. Speaker, there is no need to recall the lethargy and apathy of our Liberal predecessors, and the complicity of our NDP colleagues, there is no need to recall how these people failed to live up to their responsibilities; aware at the time of the existence of certain very important files, denouncing a wide variety of chemical products, that Liberal government propped up by the New Democrats never did anything to curb this scourge. The people of Canada are demanding a stronger and more effective approach to prevent the contamination of our environment by the chemicals we have collectively chosen to live with in our society.

We have employed a novel approach over the last three years, involving representatives of the various sectors of our society in the development of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. While this Act deals with other threats to the environment, those portions relating to toxic chemicals assessment and control are, I believe, comprehensive, forward looking, and with the support of the members of this House, should be implemented in a timely fashion. These measures should help us progress to the twenty-first century in such a manner that we can assert to our children that we have not misused their inheritance, Mr. Speaker, and not the kind of inheritance which you and I and the whole Government were left with when we came here in September 1984, faced as we were with the consequences of the outright apathy of the previous administration which had never had the gumption to get a handle on such serious issues as that of the environment.

Mr. Speaker, this morning I heard Opposition Members say that this Government has not done anything. In the course of my remarks I indicated that we began to deal with environmental problems as early as in February 1985. With respect to acid rain our Government signed agreements with the seven provinces which were the worst offenders in terms of acid pollutant emissions. We did manage to conclude an agreement with the Government of Quebec, something which our predecessors had always deemed unthinkable, unworkable. Well, this Government and this Minister did manage to negotiate an agreement under which it will be possible to reduce acid fallout by 50 per cent in Quebec. That is the kind of constructive measures we took.

I realize that my time is very limited, but still I would like to highlight the efforts of this Government to enhance the environment. We have now been in office for three years, and I believe we have created the highest number of parks in this country, more than ever before in the last hundred years, if I am not mistaken. Recent announcements were made concerning South Moresby Park in British Columbia, Ellesmere in the Northwest Territories, Bruce in Ontario. More projects are on the negotiation table and the Minister is committed to develop marine parks. All these initiatives to protect the environment reflect the commitment which our Government, our Minister and our Prime Minister have always advocated to show that we as a Government, as Members of the Progressive Conservative Party, are intent on leaving as a legacy for our children an environment which will be in better condition than what we found on September 4, 1984 when the people gave us a very specific mandate: first, to try to set the Canadian economy on an even keel and, second, to try to repair the damage which had been done to the environment.

• (1520)

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the Hon. Member. I agree it is a good first step in this very complicated subject of toxins which change frequently with new technology. It is an area with which we have to keep up. I certainly laud the sentiments and the commitments which the Hon. Member sees as reflected in the Bill.

Could he comment on the enforcement aspects? We have seen many attempts made with good intentions, but it is very difficult unless things are well enforced.

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, about the same question was asked to one of my colleagues this morning. The Minister has stated that it is not enough to introduce this Bill, even though it is quite impressive and important, as well as a first in Canada, contains clear commitments and also provides for very clear penalties, because we also need the means to implement it. Hon. Members will recall that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) made such a commitment and mentioned new funds of $37 million. This was not an empty promise as action has already been taken. We have taken action and showed some courage while our predecessors never had the courage to face Canadian businesses and polluters and tell them: Enough is enough! Hon. Members should recognize that we have had that courage.

The new Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) has at least had the courage, with her Party, to recognize that we have made these efforts, but I have to remind the House that we need more money. We also have to remember the last agreements signed in relation with acid rain, another pollutant which attacks not only our forests, but also the water resources which are the very basis of survival on this planet. We have signed agreements with the private sector and the Quebec Government and we have decreased substantially the level of acid rain.

[English]

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member is a very knowledgeable Member on environmental affairs. Although this Bill does not deal with the issue of acid rain, a number of speakers from the Official Opposition have indicated that during the past three years the Government has not taken any steps whatsoever with respect to the environment, apart from the introduction of this one Bill.

I believe the Hon. Member is a member of the House committee on acid rain. He has outlined a few of the things the Government has been doing in the area of acid rain. I know he is aware that 50 per cent of the acid rain emissions that cause problems in Canada originate here and the other 50 per cent originate in the United States. I know he is aware as well that this is the very first Government that has placed the question of acid rain as a first priority in discussions between the United States and Canada. I believe the Member was in Washington not too long ago in an effort to try to convince Americans to take some action in this respect.

Would he outline to the House, particularly for those in the Official Opposition, who do not seem to be aware of the efforts that have been taken respecting the environment and other issues, some of the steps that have been taken and what progress is being made?

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for York East (Mr. Redway). People often have the impression that those who are concerned with environmental problems live mostly in rural areas. However, my colleague is from the city, and I appreciate the interest he has always shown for the quality of our environment. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is essential for Members of Parliament representing urban areas to become more aware of this issue. I went to Washington with my colleagues of the Committee on Acid Rain to make the American legislators aware of their responsibility to their good Northern neighbours, as they like to call us. I must say that we had very serious meetings. I believe that the American Senators and Congressmen saw in our comments a very firm will on our part to have them develop policies similar to those applied in Canada. We clearly told them that the fact that they were our good southern neighbours did not give them any right to destroy our lakes, rivers, forests and fauna, and that they had no right to threaten the health of Canadians. I should not have to remind the House of the reports received by the Committee on Acid Rain which state that, each year, about 15,000 people in Canada die because of acid rain, toxic emissions, holes in the ozone layer, and so on.

I see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to thank the Hon. Member for his questions as well as the Members opposite, and I encourage all Members of this House to give very quick passage to Bill C-74. It is one of the tools that our young people need to protect their future.

[English]

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, the proposed law, of course, will deal with toxic substances or a certain number of them and ensure, we hope, as it is enforced, that they do not come into Canada and are not manufactured here. We know that there are many toxic substances already here in the Great Lakes system at the bottom of the rivers and lakes and so forth. What does this Bill do, if anything, to get rid of the enormous accumulation of toxic substances already in place, particularly in our rivers and lakes?

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I see that the New Democratic Member who has been here for a number of years is asking the same questions as his colleague from Montreal was this morning, the latter however being a Liberal.

I would like to remind him that this is the first time a Government has the courage to table a bill. And it deals both with existing toxic materials and others that will be produced in the future. I am asked what we are doing about what is already under water, on river beds. I must tell you that quite a number of scientists have quite different opinions as to whether we should go down to the river beds and, by means of a siphoning process or whatever technique, remove the substances that have collected on those river beds, or whether we should simply leave them there. I must tell you that this debate is not over yet, and you may rest assured that we will continue, and the Government will continue performing the analyses and studies required before reaching the proper decision at the proper time in order to correct the errors made in years past.

If we must remove what is at the bottom of rivers, at the bottom of lakes, we will do so, although we must know whether, when stirring up the sediments at the bottom of those rivers, we will not multiply by 10, 20, or 30 the level of pollution and whether we will not be accelerating problems rather than trying to find a long-term solution.

I therefore feel this legislation is aimed at preventing what is being done as of now. But as to what was done in the past, I think we still need to have much more accurate analyses in order to develop the right technology and the right technique. And you may rest assured that the minute we know exactly what is the best means of bringing back to the environment its former quality, this Government will need no prompting, especially from the Opposition. We will on our own assume our responsibilities and will be the first to table in this House a legislation with the relevant funding, in order to be in a position to give back to our youth, our future children the opportunity to enjoy a quality environment.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have mixed feelings about rising today to debate Bill C-74 which essentially proposes the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. It should be renamed because it is a minute step towards development of an environmental protection Act.

• (1530)

It is fair to say that we feel encouraged to support this legislation at this stage when we are discussing the principle of the Bill. However, it falls far short of the goals laid out in the first part. It sounds great when you read that first part, but as you go through it to determine what it actually accomplishes, that is unfortunately not much. I would not say it does not accomplish anything, but it is only a minute step in the right direction. We are thankful for at least that, but we have a long way to go.

I remember that for years and years in this House, particularly when the Liberal Government was in office, we called for a major initiative by the federal Government to develop a comprehensive environmental protection Act. All of us as responsible citizens recognize that without an environment which is clean, pristine, safe and healthy, we have nothing. We have been reminded just in the last few days about the dangers involved in the gradual disappearance of the ozone layer surrounding the earth and what that can do to the ecology and to people.

We spend hours and hours debating all sorts of things in this House. Some are more interesting than others. Some are more useful than others. Yet on critical issues affecting the environment, I notice that the only time it is debated is on opposition days. The Government has never introduced something which would give us an opportunity to discuss the state of the environment in Canada. That is a tragedy. That has been the case under the Conservative Government and that was the case for years and years under Liberal Governments. It is time we changed that and gave priority to our environment. We should place it before all other matters requiring consideration. If we do not preserve our pristine environment as we know it in most parts of Canada, we will have nothing in the long run. We owe it not only to our citizens today; what is more important, we owe it to our children and their children and generations yet to come.

Having said that by way of introduction, I want to point out that this Bill comes along at a time when Canadians generally are not encouraged by this Government's commitment to serious environmental protection. One of the most popular environmental issues across this country is that of leaded and unleaded gasoline. Most Canadians buy gasoline every few days. When you go to the pumps you have a choice between the two. Yet when the Government has had the opportunity to change the tax regime to encourage Canadians to use one over the other, what do we do? We take steps to encourage them to use more leaded gasoline because it is cheaper. People see their purchasing power erode year after year and have to cut corners, and we encourage them through our tax system to purchase the worst kind of gasoline, the high lead content kind. That sends a very clear signal that the Government is not particularly concerned about lead in our environment.

I could talk about lead in other substances on which no action has been taken. I could talk about the fact that one of the major initiatives by the Government when it took office was to cut the plan to develop a Canadian toxicology centre. If we require anything, it is a centre doing research into toxic chemicals. Cutting the funding for that centre does not send a clear signal that the Government is concerned about the environment, past, present or future.

I could go on and talk about major cuts to the Canadian Wildlife Service. Many ecological and environmental activities had to be cut as a result. I could talk about the inaction of the Government on the St. Clair River blob, that great big gob of chemicals sitting in the river. Year after year we poke away at it and so on, but nothing much ever happens.

I could go on and on but I think the point is clear. Our track record in dealing effectively with environmental issues facing Canadians, indeed all people around the world, has been anything but good.

That is not to say the Government has not done anything. It would be inappropriate to say that. Yet when you look at what we should be doing, you will find that we are falling far short.

A major concern for those in the environmental movement has been the commitment of the Government to deregulation. It makes some of us sick to think, as we stand here today, that hundreds of thousands of gallons of untreated sewage is being dumped into the St. Lawrence River. The same is true of the Fraser River and others across this country. Nothing much is being done about it. We have had proposals from municipalities to deal with this critical issue which will only grow worse in the future.

The proposals involve not only cleaning up the environment but also providing thousands of jobs. They suggested a sharing arrangement such as we have had in the past where provincial Governments pay one-third, municipal Governments pay one-third, and the federal Government pays one-third to develop the necessary sewage treatment facilities. The cities were in unanimous agreement. Then the provinces all came onside. There was only one group which held out and said it was not prepared to co-operate: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the present federal Government. That is a missed opportunity if ever there was one.

You would have to look long and hard to find a single country that does not have a program where the three levels of Government, sometimes four, share in funding of municipal infrastructure. Yet in Canada we stand alone. The federal Government says that this is not our responsibility. We will stand by and watch the rivers die from pollution because the local tax base is simply inadequate to provide funding. Yet we have done it in the past. The federal Government used to participate in these plans. As an alderman in Kamloops I would submit proposals along with my colleagues, and they were granted, one after the other, to upgrade sewage treatment plants. However, deregulation and an unwillingness to co-operate have caused major concern and sent a negative image across the country with respect to this Government's commitment to cleaning up the environment and protecting it in the future.

I guess it was brought home to me this past summer just how critical it is to develop a federal environmental protection Act. I was out sailing in the Gulf Islands of British Columbia. As someone who travels a great deal across Canada you have probably been there and know about the pristine environment I talk about in the Gulf Islands. Clean beaches, unpolluted, no smoke-stacks, beautiful trees. A fantastically beautiful environment. I remember getting up one morning and there were about 50 pleasure craft, some very large and some very modest, in a small cove. They had lain there overnight. I was going to jump in and have an invigorating swim in the Pacific Ocean. I got to the side of the boat and was about to dive in when I looked at the water. The surface was covered with small pieces of thin paper and chunks of human excrement, along with all kinds of other things. People on these boats were going to the bathroom in the morning and dumping it all overboard. It was floating around all over the place. It almost made me sick. That the laws of our country, provincial, federal, or regional in this case, allow this to happen is absolutely unacceptable. This is a rather horrible description of the need for legislators at the various levels to take action immediately.

Every day when I am in Vancouver I see big barges loaded with garbage going out to dump it beyond visual limits. I shudder to think of what is going on on the ocean floor with the hundreds of thousands of tons of garbage being dumped there.

I do not want to go on about the obvious need for a decent environmental protection Act. I am sorry that this is not it. This legislation falls far short of that, but it is a step forward. I will talk about the little baby step which this legislation does take. It does take a step forward in dealing with toxic substances, because the burden of proof will lie with the company importing new toxic substances as opposed to lying with the federal Government. Until recently the federal Government had to prove that a particular industrial chemical was bad. The onus of proof will now lie on the manufacturer, and that is a step forward.

However, what about the over 60,000 industrial chemicals already in this country? I assume that some of these substances are toxic and not good for us. I believe there are 19 people in the office which looks after this. If 19 people are to evaluate in excess of 60,000 chemicals, it may take centuries. In the meantime, this list is being added to by in excess of 1,000 new chemicals every year. We are faced with serious problems.

Anyone who has tried to figure out who is responsible for environmental protection knows what an incredibly tangled web there is of contradictory jurisdictional regulations. In the Department of the Environment alone there are 57 different laws dealing with environmental issues. There are 24 federal Departments dealing with environmental responsibilities. The assumption was that an intelligent government bringing forward a federal Environmental Protection Act would consolidate these.

However, nothing is done to consolidate those 24 different federal Departments. The 57 laws were reduced to 55. That is not much of a gain. People who understand what a federal environmental protection Act should be are perplexed when they learn that this tangled web will remain.

There is, of course, a dispute over who is responsible. For three years I have been working with the Shuswap Concerned Citizens Committee. You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that there are hundreds of house boats which float on the large Shuswap Lake complex in central British Columbia. All sorts of things enter the water from these boats. This is a large lake, but when the people on hundreds of house boats and thousands of pleasure craft dump things into the water a serious problem develops.

The various jurisdictions have been trying to determine who is responsible for ensuring that this water remains clean. Is it the local regional district? Is it the various provincial departments? Are federal Departments involved and, if so, which Departments? For three years I have been trying to figure that out and still have not been able to determine who is responsible because no one accepts responsibility. Due to the overlapping jurisdictional regions we find a great deal of buck-passing going on.

I want to read from a report by the Canadian Environmental Law Association to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitutional Accord. It says:

> The Constitution Act, 1987, which reflected the problems and concerns of 1867 when it was enacted, did not allocate legislative authority for the environment to either the federal or provincial governments. As a result, there is a large degree of overlapping jurisdiction because of the generality of the federal and provincial powers as defined in the Constitution. Without clear responsibility for environmental concerns, both levels of government have been able to disclaim authority for dealing with environmental problems by alleging that it is within the other's jurisdiction. This has resulted in "jurisdictional buck-passing."

Such is the case, Mr. Speaker. It is now time for the federal Government to exert a strong federal presence to deal with environmental problems which are national in scope. The Canadian Environmental Law Association said further:

> We have also maintained that the federal government has the clear constitutional authority to take action in regard to many of the environmental problems of the 1980s. This is especially the case in the area of toxic chemicals, which do not respect provincial boundaries.

They go on to point out that this situation, bad at the moment, could get even worse in the future as a result of the Meech Lake Accord.

The solution to this problem is obvious. It requires a federal government which has the will and commitment to deal effectively with environmental issues. I suspect that if we were to take on that responsibility, our provincial colleagues would be quite pleased to agree that this is a federal responsibility and would allow us to get on with dealing with it to ensure that our land, water, and air remain clean or are cleaned up.

As Canadians become more and more involved with pleasure crafts on the waters of Canada, particularly the inland waters, the matter of gray water becomes more of a problem. Gray water is dishwater, shower water, or soapy water as opposed to black water which contains human excrement. At the moment there is absolutely no restriction on gray water in the Shuswap area and only vague restrictions on black water. Slowly but surely the entire Shuswap Lake system is being polluted. Once we reach a point of no return the lake will be finished, as has already happened to some waters in central Canada.

My friend, the Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald), was pointing out to this House how odd it is to see in the summer, in the great City of Toronto, people on the beaches lining up to swim in the swimming pools because the water at the shoreline is polluted. That is a tragedy which we must take action collectively to change.

I also want to comment on PCBs. It has been brought to my attention that PCBs are entering the underground water system in parts of Canada. Many submersible pumps, particularly those imported from the United States, have PCBs in their insulation and wiring. These pumps are lowered into wells where they operate near the groundwater level. They are often abandoned as they break down or properties are sold. These pumps then deteriorate and PCBs leak into the water system.

There is only way for people buying these properties to determine whether there are PCBs in the water and that is to give the pump to Environment Canada which will analyse the pump by destroying it. It is not an encouragement for people to have such an analysis done to know that Environment Canada will destroy their $3,000 pump in order to tell them whether or not there are PCBs in the water. There must be a greater commitment to deal with PCBs in the underground water system by establishing a decent investigation process to determine whether or not these elements are in our water supply.

The whole area of pesticides has been left out of this legislation. A great deal of work must be done in this area, and I do not believe anyone would suggest that the federal Government does not have a responsibility to deal with this.

One of the greatest shortcomings of Bill C-74 is that it does not include an environmental Bill of rights. Environmentalists and others who are concerned about the environment for many reasons strongly believe that there is a need for a Bill of environmental rights and the ability to resort to the courts to ensure that our environment is preserved in a clean and pristine nature.

Considering the absence of a Bill of environmental rights, which we feel is an absolute necessity, the fact that major sectors have been ignored, and the fact that the Bill does nothing to consolidate this vast web of interlocking jurisdictions and regulations, we will be offering amendments at the legislative committee stage in order to improve the Bill.

The best we can do at this stage is to pass the Bill quickly, realizing that it is a small step toward an Environmental Protection Act. We can begin from scratch again and, with proper consultation this time, bring forward a Bill that does represent what an Environmental protection Act ought to represent.

Mr. Redway: As always, I listened with interest to the Hon. Member's comments. I feel compelled to respond to each comment, but time will not permit me to do so. However, let me attempt to respond quickly to a few of his points.

First, he expressed great concern about the lack of time made available in this Parliament to debate environmental matters. In fact, one year ago, the issue of environmental protection was very much an integral and significant part of the Speech from the Throne. The Government provided some eight days after the Speech from the Throne in which the Hon. Member, any of his colleagues, or anyone in the House, could have debated matters of environmental affairs if they wished to do so. While I have not looked at the record, I suspect that there was very little time devoted by the Hon. Member and his colleagues to the question of environmental affairs during that debate on the Speech from the Throne.

The Hon. Member repeated a comment which had been made in the House on a number of occasions yesterday and today by opposition Members, that is, that the Government has done virtually nothing with respect to the environment in the past three years. The Member knows that that is certainly far from the truth. The Government has taken many actions in that respect. This includes action on acid rain, with a national program to reduce acid rain by 50 per cent of its 1980 levels by 1994. They include a commitment to spend $150 million for emission controls at smelters, $25 million for technology development, $70 million for cleaner use of coal, and $18 million per year in research and monitoring.

There is a commitment to increase the use of western low-sulphur coal. The Hon. Member knows that great strides have been made in negotiations between the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) and the Premier of the Province of Ontario with respect to the use by Ontario Hydro of low-sulphur western coal.

On September 1, new automobile emission standards to reduce acid rain were introduced. In addition, there was an agreement between the federal Government, the Province of Ontario, the Government of the United States and the Government of New York State with respect to reducing the flow of toxic chemicals from the dumps along the Niagara River into the Niagara River and Lake Ontario. Furthermore, there has been the tightening up of standards with respect to the transportation of dangerous goods by rail.

Just within the last day or so we saw the international ozone treaty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member. Could he put his question, please?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I have had a chance only to mention a few things.

However, there is one matter that really bothered me. The Hon. Member indicated that he, as a councillor in the City of Kamloops, was able to obtain federal funding on numerous occasions for the reduction of pollution as far as water treatment and sewage were concerned. That interested me specifically because I know that in my municipality, in spite of years and years of trying, the only time we were able to get any federal money was when the former Government was so desperate to get re-elected in the last years of its mandate that it went around making special grants to very selected municipalities, including ours. Will the Hon. Member give me some examples of the federal Government in the past sharing these projects? I would like to have the opportunity to make that case with the Government.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it would be my pleasure to answer the last question first. In 1968 or 1969, the Liberal federal Government at the time offered to enter into an agreement on a cost-sharing formula with provincial Governments. The federal Government made an offer to enter into an agreement with the Government of British Columbia which, in turn, entered into an agreement with the municipalities, according to the constitutional jurisdictions of the country.

The critical factor was an agreement first being made between the federal and provincial Governments. I believe the Conservative Government in Ontario at the time was unwilling to participate in that program, so that perhaps it never existed in the Province of Ontario. However, it did exist in Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

The provincial Governments signed separate agreements with the federal Government and then signed separate agreements with the various municipalities to participate in a three-way cost-sharing for a municipal infrastructure, not only for sewage treatment facilities, but for water upgrading facilities generally and roads, sidewalks, lights and so on. Obviously, the Ontario Conservative Government at the time did not want to participate.

At the outset, I said that the fact that issues of environmental concern were only debated when the Opposition chose to do so was an indication of the federal Government's commitment to environmental concerns. My hon. friend said there were opportunities to debate this during the Throne Speech. I was waiting for him to indicate other occasions on which this has been debated because we are required to debate countless issues that are included in a Throne Speech. Rather than an environmental debate, it is a Throne Speech debate. However, the Hon. Member did not mention any other occasions on which environmental issues were debated. It is a pathetic state of affairs when the only argument the Hon. Member can make is to say that we had a Throne Speech debate a year and a half ago.

Finally, in the fourth year of the administration, we welcome the opportunity to begin a debate on this matter of environmental protection.

The Hon. Member mentioned western coal as one of the initiatives of the Government. In all fairness, I believe I said that the Government has taken some initiatives. Incidentally, this initiative was introduced by one of my New Democratic Party colleagues from the Kootenay area in British Columbia in 1981. At that time, we felt that this was an appropriate initiative to take and began the process.

It is interesting that the Hon. Member raised this question because the head of the miners' union for that area is in the lobby listening to the debate right now. He just happens to be here at this time. He also worked with the NDP Member from the Kootenays at the time to begin this process moving with the previous administration and the Ontario Government. I am pleased to say we are still moving. Perhaps sometime in the next little while we will have an agreement. However, I do know that the report which was done by the special task force looking into this matter made not a single recommendation for further study, further deliberations and so on. Again, if the Government meant what it says it means, it would take action, not study, study, study.

• (1600)

Here is a situation where we can improve the acid rain phenomenon in central Canada, we can provide the much needed jobs in both central and western Canada. Let us get on with it. What are we waiting for?

This proposal was introduced by my colleague from the Kootenay region of British Columbia in 1981, and we are pleased that we are debating this again today. But let us recognize that we have a long way to go. What is required is a federal Government with a will and commitment to deal with these difficult and major issues. Quite frankly, we do not have any alternative. We must deal with these issues.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member quoted from a letter from the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the Citizens' Network on Waste Management, Pollution Probe and Energy Probe, who are concerned that the Meech Lake Agreement and, in particular, the right of the provinces to opt out of shared-cost programs, may discourage the federal Government from assuming its responsibility to protect the nation's environment. They are particularly concerned that the uncertainty created by the ambiguous nature of Section 106 relating to shared-cost programs, may affect such potential shared-cost programs as setting up a super fund to clean up toxic waste dump sites.

The letter is addressed to the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord. It is dated September 10 of this year. I believe the committee wrapped up its work by September 10 and the report was to be published last week. However, it has been delayed because of translation problems. In the concluding paragraph of the letter they urge the committee to proceed with caution and to consider substantive revisions to the sections relating to shared-cost programs to clarify that the Accord does not take away from the federal Government's authority to set national standards for environmental protection.

I would like to ask the Member, first, if he shares those concerns. He quoted from the letter, so I presume he shares those concerns, but I would like him to state so specifically, if that is indeed the case. Second, I would like to know what he and his Party are prepared to do about it. Will his Party be proposing an amendment to the Meech Lake Accord in that respect? I would be very pleased to hear his views in this regard.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, first, I think the point made by my hon. friend when he quoted from the letter of the Canadian Environmental Law Association is accurate. It is concerned that Section 106(a)(2), which states that the section does not alter the existing division of powers, again does not help us in defining what is exclusive provincial jurisdiction in environmental matters. In terms of the point the Hon. Member makes regarding the national shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, I think it has been demonstrated by the work of the committee. I recall reading a transcript of the proceedings which indicated that this matter was dealt with, and in fact national cost-shared programs may even be enhanced, so that it was decided by the all-Party committee that it was not of critical concern.

However, I do not think that this is the issue here. I think the issue is that even if it were—which of course it is—a concern, if the federal Government took the initiative and said: "We are not going to turn Canada into a toxic waste dump for North America or wherever", and made that commitment and then put into place a federal program to provide that special fund to provide for the clean-up of existing hazardous waste sites and abandoned and enclosed waste sites, it would develop a sense in our country that this is something that must be done. If the Government said this is something that must be done and something we are prepared to fund, any province daring to opt out of that program, or any province that would dare not to implement its own program of even increased standards, would be severely condemned by the electorate in that province or territory.

I think the concern is a serious one. It has been one of concern to my caucus. During the deliberations, on balance, we felt that it is a concern that was simply flagged, but in reality that is not the case. Even if it were, it is the will of this Parliament and the will of this Government combined that would ensure that such would not take place, and the concerns that were brought to the joint committee's attention by the Canadian Environmental Law Association, if we do our job properly, would never have to be a concern.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 66, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Employment of visible Minorities; the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald)—Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission—Bell Canada rate increase application—Minister's letter to Commission; the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner)—Small Businesses—Native economic development—Consultation process—Minister's position.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed considertion of the motion of Mr. McMillan that Bill C-74, an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure this afternoon to have the opportunity to speak on this legislation, something about which all Canadians are concerned.

I would like to say that this Bill, on which the Minister has done considerable work, will receive support right across the country. The legislation introduced by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) will unquestionably make Canada a leader in the battle to prevent pollution from toxic chemicals and thereby protect the public from adverse health effects which could result from exposure to such pollution.

Protecting the environment is not the sole responsibility of any one Department, one Government, one province, or even one nation. Toxic chemical pollution is a world-wide problem and demands intra-national as well as international co-operation to achieve solutions.

There is another more obvious reason, however, why this is a joint effort. This legislation is intended not only to protect our environment for its own sake, but also to protect the environment because of its direct link with human health.

It has been realized for some time that there are numerous opportunities for the wide variety of complex chemical products in use in Canada today to be released into the environment during manufacture, use, transportation and eventual disposal. These releases can result in contamination of the food, air and drinking water on which humans depend for their well-being and, indeed, survival. Exposure to environmental contaminants can have serious effects on health and long-term social and economic consequences.

The primary concern of the Department of Health and Welfare is the threat posed to the health and well-being of the Canadian population by either short-term or long-term exposure to the environmental contaminants, which are often present at relatively low levels. Of particular concern is the prospect that health effects may only be observed after long periods of exposure or long after exposure has ceased to occur.

Chemicals can bestow enormous benefits on mankind, but we must ensure that our health is not compromised in the process. This is a major thrust in this legislation. This Bill will provide the necessary power to move much further than before in developing objectives and guidelines for environmental quality that are designed to ensure that our environment remains in a healthful condition.

There are several factors which contribute to the complexity of toxic chemical problems. The number of chemicals in use is very large and is constantly increasing. Individual chemicals are complex in nature. There are numerous sources and mechanisms for release of chemicals to the environment. The Canadian population is being exposed to a complex mixture of chemicals, and the effects of exposure are difficult to estimate. Some chemicals that are likely to have minimal impact on the health of most Canadians may have great impact on the health of groups within the general population who, for reasons of age, sex or genetic composition, economic status, occupation, lifestyle or geographical location are more sensitive to the effects of certain toxic chemicals.

My concern, and of course the concern of all Canadians, is over health hazards associated with chemicals in the environment, which can well be illustrated by examples such as the contamination of edible fish with mercury compounds that leaked from plants formerly used to produce chlorine and alkali used in the manufacture of pulp and paper. It was the consumption of fish tainted with mercury in this way that placed the residents of Grassy Narrows in northwestern Ontario at risk.

Another widely dispersed metal which poses a threat to human health is lead. The toxic effects of lead are well known. The major source of lead in our environment is the burning of leaded gasoline in motor vehicles. While measures have been taken to reduce exposure to lead by phasing out the use of leaded gasolines and, indeed, to reduce exposure from other sources of lead in the environment, we must remain vigilant and reassure ourselves that substitute products are safe both from an environmental and health viewpoint.

I am sure that all of us are aware of the threats posed by synthetic organic chemicals such as PCBs which, by virtue of their resistance to degradation, can persist and accumulate in living organisms. From a health standpoint PCBs are not extremely toxic in terms of short-term exposure. Long-term exposure is of concern because of the effects on the liver, reproduction, the immune system and the possibility that PCBs, or impurities contained in them, may be associated with cancer.

Over the years the federal Government has enacted several laws to combat the effects of toxic chemicals. Control of toxic substances is required from manufacture to disposal. Legislative control, federal and provincial, must cover the following elements: manufacture, importation, transportation, storage and handling, use and sale, discharge to water, air and land, spills, occupational health, and ultimate disposal.

There are some 24 federal statutes which exercise some form of control respecting toxic substances. For example, the basic regulations for contaminants in food and drug products are found in regulations under the Food and Drugs Act.

The Fisheries Act prohibits the deposition of a "deleterious substance" of any type in water frequented by fish. The Hazardous Products Act is a product-oriented statute which prohibits the advertisement, sale and information of certain hazardous products, and which was recently amended to ensure that workers are given information relating to work-place hazardous products.

The Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act has been designed to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, including chemicals. The Ocean Dumping Control Act is designed to control dumping of waste and other substances into the ocean.

Notwithstanding the scope of these various statutes, the proposed Canadian Environmental Protection Act provides a focused and integrated approach to toxic chemicals. It will allow the federal Government, in co-operation with the provinces, industry, labour, and the public, to identify different ways to reduce human exposure to chemicals at each stage of their life cycle. The control of toxic chemicals as envisaged in this Bill was not possible under the provisions of the Environmental Contaminants Act, the Clean Air Act, and the parts of the Canada Water Act which are now incorporated into this proposed legislation.

The public is deeply concerned about what is sometimes viewed as a fragmented approach to dealing with chemicals. Our laws do not meet public expectations. Often, they are products of dealing with the problems of past decades. They are inadequate for dealing with the problems of today. They must be revamped, streamlined, consolidated, and they must address the real problems of environmental protection.

I believe that Canadians need and deserve a comprehensive management approach for toxic chemicals, an approach that manages chemicals throughout their life cycle in a manner that prevents them from leaking into the environment. It will mean that at any stage in the life of a chemical from cradle to grave—whether it is its introduction into trade and commerce, its manufacturing, its transportation, its use or disposal—all participants who use and care for that chemical must act in a responsible manner to protect the environment and the health of Canadians.

When consumers such as ourselves use chemicals, we must be equipped with the best information to use them properly, to dispose of them safely, to act in an emergency situation, and to choose alternative products and practices.

Chemicals must be transported and stored in a manner that eliminates leakage to the environment. If accidents do happen, clean-up must be fast and effective and victims must be compensated in a just and equitable fashion.

We must not forget disposal, both for the chemical itself after its useful life and for wastes. Waste cannot continue to be added to the environment in the naive hope that the environment can safely accommodate it and cleanse itself. We can no longer say that the solution to pollution is dilution. There must be adequate destruction facilities operating in this country to dispose of hazardous waste.

In particular, I am encouraged by the process whereby the legislation that is before us today has been developed. All affected segments of society, including representatives of industry, workers and environmental interest groups alike, have taken part in developing a scheme that relies upon good scientific knowledge to develop the regulations that will underpin this legislation. The result of this is agreement by all parties concerned on the need for adequate testing of chemicals, and a basic understanding of the way in which the knowledge that emerges can be most effectively used to prevent injury, disease and death from accidents and pollution problems.

The sheer number of chemicals we use is intimidating. Over 65,000 are produced commercially on the global market with over 1,000 new ones added annually. Only a small fraction have been tested for the environmental and health consequences. We must clearly define the ground rules for allowing a chemical to enter the Canadian market. Since we are part of the global chemical market, we are promoting the adoption and utilization of common international approaches to evaluating chemicals and to setting standards. We must also promote alternatives to the use of high-risk chemicals.

Canada alone cannot test all the chemicals we use in a reasonable timeframe. It has to be an international effort. It is one we are committed to put in place and we are working hard through the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development and the International Program of Chemical Safety to do just that. There is a lack of public confidence in the country when it comes to chemical management. Our ability to solve the problems has not kept pace with our ability to detect the problems.

• (1620)

The proposed Canadian Environmental Protection Act represents a crucial step in developing a comprehensive strategy to control toxic chemicals in the environment. The extensive consultation which followed the introduction in Parliament in December, 1986, of the proposed environmental protection Act, has indeed been invaluable in helping to attain this objective. As a result of these consultations and submission of numerous briefs, the legislation now proposed has been broadened to incorporate the provisions of the Ocean Dumping Control Act; increase the emphasis on evaluating and controlling existing chemicals; include provisions to deal with the products of biotechnology; require the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) to develop guidelines, objectives, and codes of practice to protect health and the environment; provide for enhanced public participation in implementing provisions of the Act; and provide for working cooperatively with provincial Governments to avoid duplication and overlap.

We have already mentioned the value of developing an environmental protection strategy that allows for the control of toxic chemicals from the time that they are introduced into commerce until their ultimate disposal.

One of the key factors of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is that it focuses on preventing the introduction into commerce of chemicals that will constitute a danger to public health or the environment. For example, the "new chemicals" provisions of this legislation will place the onus on industry to demonstrate the safety of new chemicals prior to their use in Canada.

The new Canadian Environmental Protection Act puts human health and safety where it should be, before everything else. Under the new life cycle management approach, decisions affecting human health will be incorporated into the decision-making process. They will no longer be relegated to the realm of afterthoughts.

In addition, the new Act will extend the Government's authority to set national environmental standards, guidelines, and objectives. These guidelines presently exist for the emission of toxic substances into the atmosphere and would be retained in the new Act. The new Act would be expanded to include water and land, using the Clean Air Act as a model.

The new national standards would be developed in co-operation with provincial Governments. They could be used by provinces and municipalities as the basis for regulations to provide minimum levels of environmental quality across the country.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act will also help Canada meets its international obligations with such bodies as the United Nations Environment Program, and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Under the new legislation, exporters who intend to ship toxic chemicals to a foreign country would be required to inform the country of that intention. We will benefit in Canada because participating countries will extend the same courtesy to us. This will allow us to better prepare for and control the amount of toxic chemicals that come into Canada, and thus better protect human life.

I wish to conclude by saying that ultimately our society will have to come to grips with the fact that many of our environmental problems are rooted in the lifestyles that we have chosen. We have chosen a chemical society, and with it, the responsibility to protect our life support system from our dependence on these chemicals.

I believe that Canadians are ready to take a major step toward learning to live successfully and respectfully with chemicals. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act represents a major contribution to this endeavour.

Ms. Mitchell: I wish to ask my hon. colleague a question since he represents the government side of the House. I am glad to see that a senior Minister from British Columbia is also present, and I am sure she is interested.

Does the Hon. Member think that the federal Government has a responsibility to ensure that government agencies do not contribute to environmental pollution?

I wish to give an example. In Vancouver East, the Port of Vancouver which is a federal jurisdiction contains a large garbage incinerator on a barge that is moored very close to a residential neighbourhood. This barge is the method by which all the garbage is burned from the cruise ships in the Port of Vancouver. It emits a foul smell and smoke which pollutes the neighbourhood for many blocks.

Since this is a federal jurisdiction, the Port Corporation for Vancouver is a federal agency, and the manager of the Port Corporation refuses to take any action. I wonder what are the views of the Hon. Member. Does he think that the federal Government should intervene? If so, what action can be taken?

Mr. MacDougall: First, I wish to say to the Hon. Member that I believe both the federal Government and the federal Crown corporation should be involved. The legislation that we have put forward today gives an opportunity to those involved. I would say that in the Hon. Member's riding, representation should be made under the new guidelines, and certainly it should be looked at.

Ms. McDonald: The Hon. Member for Timiskaming (Mr. MacDougall) has raised a number of sensible points in his speech. I wish to ask the Hon. Member a specific question which perplexes us. The preamble to Bill C-74 is very specific on the federal responsibility for environmental pollution. It refers to the environment as a matter of national concern; toxic substances once introduced into the environment cannot always be contained within geographical boundaries, particularly provincial boundaries. The Government of Canada in demonstrating national leadership should establish national environmental quality objectives, guidelines and practices. It refers to Canadian waters and other federal responsibilities.

Yet Members on the government side have used constitutional excuses for government inaction. One Hon. Member even stated that the Charter of Rights was an excuse for the federal Government not to take action on environmental protection. It is an absolutely astounding idea that we should be gaining civil rights but losing the power to protect the environment. I think that is quite an astonishing development.

I wish to ask the Hon. Member how he can justify the statement of national priority concern and responsibility with the cop-out on the part of the federal Government, and the willingness to leave it up to the provinces. If they do not legislate adequately, tough luck, use the constitutional excuse that the federal Government has not been given the specific power to act in this area and somehow it does not have a responsibility to act for our environmental protection.

Mr. MacDougall: In a short period of time this Government has taken many steps in many directions to attempt to make a better way for all Canadians. The Bill before us indicates that the Government and this Minister are prepared to sit down with both the provinces and the industry in order to start to work together to solve some of these real problems.

These problems did not happen today. They have developed over the last many years. It is with this type of legislation and this Government that we will be able to sit down and negotiate with the provinces and the industries to make sure that there is a happy medium. Those individuals who may be involved within an industry will still have the opportunity to have the employment that is required, and the provinces will be able to adapt to the guidelines within this legislation.

Mr. Brightwell: The Hon. Member for Timiskaming (Mr. MacDougall) has ably set out the factors involved in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. He has touched on the aspect of a number of chemicals in the environment, and touched a raw nerve with me. I am very concerned about the fact that chemicals are there. We do not know what they are presently doing, or what they will do in the future. Will the Hon. Member comment further on the manner in which the new Canadian Environmental Protection Act will deal with chemicals that are already in use?

Mr. MacDougall: We are aware that someone who comes from a northern region, or other parts of the country, has great concerns. What we should look to is that the Minister of the Environment place an increased emphasis on screening the chemicals to ensure that the products are ones that we feel comfortable with, ones that perhaps we are looking at coming in, and that they be screened before Canadians make use of them. This is one part of the Bill with which I feel very comfortable. We will be screening those chemicals which are coming in and those chemicals which are here now to make certain that the environment is looked after properly.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Hon. Member. First, he talked about consultation on the part of the Government, provincial Governments, and organizations interested in the environment. He left the impression that the Bill, as a result of consultations, meets the objections, questions, and criticisms of past practices made by many of these organizations.

Is the Hon. Member aware of the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian Environmental Law Association, two major organizations, are very critical of the Bill because so much of what needs to be done is not covered in it?

I have another question for the Hon. Member because he represents part of northern Ontario in which there are a number of mines and a number of pulp and paper mills, two industries that have been notorious for their ability to maximize their profits by dumping waste products into our rivers and lakes.

Is there anything in this Bill, or in any other Bill, which gives Canadians any confidence that in the next 10 years or 15 years such irresponsible activity will cease to continue?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this Bill is certainly a step forward which has not been taken by any previous Government. I think that is the first thing we must recognize.

I am interested in some of the items about which the Hon. Member talked, such as the Canadian Labour Congress. We have come quite a distance in bringing forth this piece of legislation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government always believe in going out to speak with Canadians, whether in provincial Government, labour, or business, to ensure that they know the thoughts of Canadians before moving forward. The Hon. Member must realize that the Canadian Labour Congress certainly has its views, but we are taking a step which is very positive for the environment.

The Hon. Member referred to mines and paper mills in northern Ontario. There has been quite a change in the last three years to five years with regard to upgrading and in terms of pollution going into our waters. Filtration plants in the mills have been changed.

With regard to mines, I think the industry itself has recognized that changes were required. However, on the other hand, I ask the Hon. Member how far we can go and be able to compete in the international market with other countries.

Would he sooner see individuals in the mines and pulp and paper industries not having jobs, or would he sooner see the Government and the provinces working toward a goal to clean up the environment as best we can yet still be competitive in the international market?

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay tribute to the non-governmental organizations which are dedicated to protecting our environment. Mr. Speaker, you are certainly aware that hundreds of organizations from coast to coast play a fundamental role in educating and motivating the public, as well as in lobbying the Government and parliamentarians. All these efforts contribute to creating a public opinion which is highly receptive and fully aware of the need to protect the environment. I feel confident that you agree with me that an enlightened public opinion is prerequisite to any government action.

Canadians often ask themselves the question: What can I do? This question has often been put to me, by younger people particularly. The answer is simple. Get involved in non-governmental organizations like the Greenpeace Foundation whose Montreal regional office is located in my own riding of Laurier, or the Canadian Wildlife Federation, Pollution Probe, hundreds of suchlike organizations which are active throughout this country. The impact and benefits of this kind of commitment cannot be understated.

When the World Commission on Environment released their report last spring the Canadian representative, Mr. Maurice Strong, came here to Ottawa to meet with parliamentarians and spokesmen for organizations actively working in the environment and wildlife sector. Sad to say, only two or three Members attended this meeting.

What struck me most in the message conveyed by the World Commission on Environment is that we must divorce ourselves from segmentation in our approach to environmental issues. Environmental problems cannot be tackled on an isolated basis. For example, hydro power plants produce electricity in many regions, but other people are made responsible for eliminating the resulting acid rains.

Mr. Speaker, the challenge facing us today is twofold: first, making economic development agencies—and even the Minister of Finance—responsible for that sector of the environment which is affected by their decisions; and, second, environment ministries in the various countries must wield more power to fight pollution.

[English]

The sense I got from the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development was that the most difficult challenge we are facing is to develop management systems on national and international levels to deal with environmental and developmental problems which defy simple, compartmentalized ways of looking at things.

This is the standard against which we must measure the Bill we are studying today. Is it forward looking? Is it innovative? Will it provide the means to come to grips with urgent environmental problems posed by economic development?

It is also particularly important to remember that environmental legislation in Canada is reviewed only once every 10 years or so. We must use the opportunity before us at the present time to get it right. This point was made by Toby Vigod of the Canadian Environmental Law Association.

While Bill C-74 establishes procedures to deal with new chemicals, it is not particularly innovative and does not get around the institutional and management problems which have plagued us in the past. On the contrary—the Conservative Government abdicates its responsibility to set national standards and leaves environmental protection up to the provinces.

Take, for example, the idea of an environmental Bill of rights, which the Minister has in the not so distant past espoused. In fact, very recently he was an advocate of such an environmental Bill of rights. This novel approach has been abandoned in Bill C-74. What we have instead is a preamble to this Bill which is not legally enforceable. It does not confer rights on citizens to protect their environment, which is what every group has been asking for. It does not provide a right to protect the environment in cases where personal damage has not occurred. Yet as far back as 1970, other jurisdictions have given citizens the right to take polluters to court even in cases where they have not suffered direct damage.

Some of the most striking provisions of this Bill are those that would require the Minister to consult all the provinces before he or she drafts regulations or issues emergency orders to control toxic chemicals. It is laughable that even in the event of an emergency, there are stringent consultation requirements before the Minister of the Environment for Canada (Mr. McMillan) can take action. Even in the event of an emergency he is obliged to go through a painstaking consultation process. The Minister, furthermore, is allowed to regulate only if he is satisfied that not all of the provincial Governments are prepared to implement provisions, and I am quoting here "substantially the same as those contained in the regulation" which the Minister proposes to adopt. Here we come to the $64,000 question. What is meant by "substantially the same"? Who will decide what is meant by that? The Minister? The provinces? The courts after extensive legal challenges? What if the provinces argue that their regulations are substantially the same, even if their standards are much lower? Will this not ensure that any national program will amount to the lowest common denominator, to which all of the provinces may agree?

Is this language not strangely reminiscent of the Meech Lake Agreement in which the federal Government has transferred enormous powers to the provinces? Does this same spirit not doom the idea of a super fund to clean up abandoned waste disposal sites? The Canadian Environmental Law Association proposed that such a fund be created through a tax on chemical feed stocks and waste disposal owners and operators. Presumably such an initiative to create a super fund to clean up toxic waste dumps would require some kind of provincial participation, even if it is limited to the road leading up to the dump. Before you can say Meech Lake, Mr. Speaker, we will have a shared-cost program. I hate to say so, but before you know it, the provinces will be able to say, "Well, we, under the Meech Lake Agreement, will set up our own program. We will opt out of the federal program". Again, it will take years of litigation before we determine whether a provincial program is substantially the same or is compatible with the objectives set out in the federal initiative, which I think reflects the language in the Meech Lake Agreement.

This concern was raised by the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the Citizens' Network on Waste Management, Pollution Probe and Energy Probe in a recent letter to the Clerk of the standing joint committee on the Constitution. They feel that the right of the provinces to opt out of shared-cost programs may discourage the federal Government from assuming its responsibility in the area of environmental protection if it can be argued that an initiative may be in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Even a program in an area of concurrent jurisdiction where both the federal and provincial Governments have jurisdiction may be affected by this provision, as was noted by the groups in their letter.

As our spokesman for the environment, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), stated yesterday, Bill C-74 should propose strong national standards that can only be superseded by provincial legislation which is stronger than federal legislation, but surely not by provincial legislation which is weaker. Instead, what we have with Bill C-74 is legislation which will ensure that the federal Government will give in to lower provincial standards and, therefore, create a chequerboard type of treatment of the environment across Canada, in other words, better protection of the environment in one province than in the other, which defies the nature of pollution which very often cuts across boundaries and artificial boundaries.

What about water, Mr. Speaker? Apart from our hockey players, I think you would agree with me that water is Canada's greatest natural resource. Yet this Bill contains no provisions to establish national water quality standards and no authority to set drinking water quality standards. Furthermore, the major provisions of the federal water pollution law currently found in the Fisheries Act have not been incorporated into this Bill, and therefore some of the progressive and innovative sentencing techniques found in this Bill will not apply to those who pollute our waters. Bill C-74 does not deal with the hundreds of toxic chemicals found today in Canada's waterways.

This Bill will be referred to a legislative committee for study, Mr. Speaker. I hope that members of the committee take full advantage of the opportunity to improve the Bill, particularly in light of the fact that it is only once in a decade when Canada's environmental laws are revised and we get to study a Bill of this nature. I hope the Bill will be turned into the kind of forward-looking, innovative legislation that will provide the means for Canada to deal with the urgent environmental problems which face us today.

[Translation]

In considering what amendments should be made, the committee can do no better than to refer to the recommendations of the environmental groups of Canada which met on June 25 and focussed on three proposals for amendments.

First, that we recognize the legal right of citizens to take legal action; and included in the same recommendation, that we provide financial assistance to ordinary citizens so that they may take part in the decision-making process. As everyone knows, the companies involved in the decision-making process can deduct their expenses from their taxable income, which means that half their legal costs are paid by Canadian taxpayers. Ordinary citizens and environmental groups do not have the same financial resources as companies and should receive some financial assistance from the Government.

Second, that we reinforce the power of the Government to apply anti-pollution standards. There should be national standards, and this should not be left under the sole jurisdiction of the provinces.

Third, these groups emphasized the importance of creating a data bank to which those involved would have access and which would include the standards for the quality of life and the protection of the environment which the Government intends to apply.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying it is a pleasure to speak to this Bill, an Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health. As my colleague from Kamloops—Shuswap said, there is certainly no issue more important than this on which the time of this House should be spent.

• (1650)

As my colleagues have said, we are happy to see the Government introducing a first step, yet it reflects what we have seen from all Governments historically in Canada, a form of crisis management as opposed to a strong political will to deal with this very serious issue. Because of that, we see a general lack of faith by the public in the environmental information we receive. This has very serious consequences. It means that much of the information Governments of all Parties give out may be received with less than enthusiastic acceptance. There have been many cover-ups, not necessarily by Governments or political Parties, in an attempt to avoid alarming the public over particular environmental issues. Again, the legislation is positive but it reflects an attitude of crisis management.

There are a few areas I would like to address which illustrate that. First, I would like to speak to a particular issue relative to the area I represent north of the 60th parallel. Nowhere else do we see the importance of good environmental legislation which balances the need for development and the need for preserving the environment. I happen to be one of those who believe that this is possible if the political will is there. It does not have to be a choice between jobs or the environment. We need both for our life and health, and both must be in balance. For example, I quote Don Gamble, Executive Director of the Ottawa-based Rassion Academy of Aquatic Science, speaking in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories. He said, concerning water pollution, that:

> Governments must do more than collect water data and regulate effluents. Their efforts should be based on what is called an eco-systems approach which recognizes that all economic activity ultimately depends on a viable environment.

It is therefore my belief that legislation can achieve both these objectives and do it well. If we do not, the future of our economy and our health is in jeopardy.

Canada has a long history of resource extraction without proper controls. This has resulted in legal uncertainty for both the industry and those involved with the environment. North of 60 is often referred to as the last frontier. I suggest that for many people it is the last frontier environmentally as well as in other respects. It is the last chance to do things the right way. We have not totally polluted the environment and we must be particularly vigilant.

To some extent I agree that this Bill begins to address the important area of toxins. That, after all, is the major thrust of the Bill. Yet one of the things it omits is a Bill of rights for environmental health. I strongly believe that an Act presented as protecting human life and health must include that Bill of rights. The history of our country is such that medical care has been the right of all Canadian citizens. Surely environmental protection, a clean and unpolluted environment, is the concomitant Bill of rights, otherwise a medical care Bill of rights does not make much sense.

I would like to address three areas in the Bill which I think warrant greater discussion in committee. First is the question of enforcement. I have seen many instances where we have had really quite good laws on the books but neither the resources to carry out enforcement nor in some cases the will. Certainly the Government will have to commit itself to putting forward adequate resources for enforcement. Otherwise, it again underscores the lack of faith the public has in laws and regulations, and undermines the public's faith in the bureaucracy and politicians, as well as generates a sense of hopelessness over the question of whether anything can really be done about the environment.

That is something one sees as having happened through the 1970s when there was a great environmental movement. As we move through the 1980s the problems become more complex because of new chemicals being created every day, a problem which this Bill attempts to address. Yet there is an increasing sense of hopelessness. What can we do? Therefore, legislation must ensure enforcement in order to give hope to people.

I feel that this Bill does not illustrate as strong a commitment to enforcement as we would like to see. Clause 7 says that the Minister "may" do certain things with respect to enforcement. That illustrates the point I was making earlier. There are adequate laws on the books, but they are not enforced. It is not necessarily so because people do not want to enforce them; there may not be the personnel and so on. In order to maintain the public faith and send the message that the Government is serious, the objectives outlined in Clause 7 should be made much stronger and I hope this will be given consideration when the Bill is in committee.

North of 60 we have had a number of examples of a lack of enforcement. That is why I feel so strongly about it. We have territorial water boards under the Northern Inland Waters Act. That Act is fairly adequate. However, the enforcement capability of those water boards is really not very strong and is subject to a lot of controversy involving the industries affected, involving legal certainty, as well as the public at large who ask, what is the point in having hearings, interventions and guidelines if in the end nothing can be enforced? There is no recourse for those who are concerned that such guidelines and regulations be carried out.

With regard to Clause 7, which provides that the Minister may do a number of important things which I think should be done, an issue right now which is of consequence to all of Canada, in particular the North, is the proposed transport of plutonium between the United States and Japan. I think anyone would consider plutonium to be a toxic substance. There is a lot of concern about what Canada can and should do about that. This legislation does not particularly address that issue, of course, but I see nothing in it which would allow the Minister of the Environment to intervene. I realize that this also affects other Ministries, and that leads to my next point about the strength of this legislation with regard to co-ordination.

North of 60 there is probably no greater problem in environmental and industrial issues than the lack of co-ordination. Other speakers have mentioned that this Bill reduces the number of laws from 58 to 55, but I do not think that will cause rejoicing in the general public. The lack of co-ordination is extremely confusing for both industry and individuals and leads to the most serious problem of lack of accountability and responsibility.

When there are 24 Departments and 55 laws involved, finding the committee, board or Department which will accept responsibility is virtually impossible unless one is a lawyer, and perhaps even then. This legislation does not send out a strong signal that the Government is committed to taking over the management of the environment, that it will not allow it to be destroyed but will spend a great amount of time and resources cleaning up the mess that has been allowed to develop. This is not an area in which mistakes are easily redressed. We have seen many examples of that, some of which other speakers have mentioned. This is an area in which we must anticipate as well as work. While there are some parts of the Act which do that, I am very concerned about the lack of co-ordination, the lack of one identifiable source which is committed to taking this on seriously.

I certainly agree with the preamble of the Bill which states that environment is one area which really is a federal national concern. Air pollution, pollutants in the soil, and pollutants in the water are no respecter of territorial, provincial or international boundaries. That is an area in which we must be very vigilant. I find that section particularly vague and hope the committee will find it within its purview to study it. North of 60, international relations concerning the environment, particularly with Greenland and the United States, are very serious, as many people here will know.

Again on the issue of co-ordination, there have been many recent examples in my own riding of problems with this. One example is the dumping of raw sewage into the Yukon River. Millions of tonnes were dumped before anyone knew about it. The reason given by one level of Government was that it did not want to alert the people downriver because they might get upset. Given that they drank the water that came downriver, you can be darned sure that they were upset when they eventually found out. There were a number of federal, municipal and territorial Departments involved in that issue. That illustrates the need for good communications, good co-ordination, and having someone in charge. I hope the committee will very seriously address the issue of co-ordination.

Environment is one of the issues which is closest to everyone. Everyone knows something about the environment and has some opinion on it. The more complex we make legislation, the more difficult we make the consultative or advisory process, the further we are from doing something meaningful about the environment. Although it is very important for the federal Government to take the initiative and the responsibility, it will only work if everyone participates in it.

I will again use the health analogy. We can have very good health programs and a national medicare system, but unless people take some responsibility for their own health, these programs are very difficult to implement. Therefore, the federal Government must send out strong signals of leadership in terms of proposed legislation.

I suggest that our success with enforcement and the public perception of the Government's commitment to enforcing environmental legislation has been undermined somewhat by our history. As an example, an article in the Edmonton Journal in April of this year reported the first ever conviction of a firm for Arctic pollution. There has been a lot of pollution in the Arctic, as many people will know. The judge in that case said that with the great potential for harm to the northern environment people in businesses operating in the northern extremes of Canada have a substantial burden to take precautions to protect the delicate balance of nature.

The fine in that case was $14,000. It was certainly a symbolic fine and I do not suggest that this was the responsibility of the federal Government. However, the public perception is that this issue has not been taken seriously. I believe that the public is looking for leadership and a strong commitment to the environment. While we support the step being taken by the Government in this legislation, I do not believe that it signals to the public the strong commitment that the public is seeking for the protection of all of us, our health, our agriculture, our water, and all that sustains us.

In Clause 5 of the Bill, the consultation processes, the establishment of advisory committees, and so on are being discussed. I realize that much of this is in the legislation, but I think that when these committees are being considered it is important to recognize that aboriginal people who have lived on and with the land, particularly north of 60, but in the south of Canada as well, have much to contribute to this consultative process. I hope that in some way this legislation, and the regulations in particular, will reflect that significant participation which would be essential to good and useful legislation.

In conclusion, I concur with my colleagues who have stated that this is a good first step. However, there are some amendments which should be made which we will propose during committee stage. I hope the Government will take a much stronger position and demonstrate to the Canadian public a political will to show leadership on environmental issues beyond this small piece of legislation.

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Member on her excellent speech. She touched upon some very important points. Enforcement is indeed a very important issue as is co-ordination, both of which she brought to the attention of the House.

• (1710)

The Hon. Member mentioned the enforcement mechanisms in Clause 5 and Clause 7. Clause 5 deals with advisory committees and Clause 7 deals with objectives, guidelines and codes of practice. The real enforcement clauses are Clause 100, Clause 101, and Clause 102 under investigation of offences. Clauses 103 to 107 under offences and punishment are also very strong.

I believe this Bill is very tough in terms of enforcement when one considers the various punishments of offences that are outlined. I believe the Government should be congratulated for what it has brought forward in terms of punishment for those who pollute the environment.

Furthermore, individuals have various rights. There is the right of a person who has or may sustain a loss or damage as a result of action prohibited by the Act to seek an injunction from the courts to stop or prevent the action. There is the right of 12 persons to petition the Minister to investigate an alleged violation. The Minister must respond with his findings. There is the right of a person to have his or her identity kept confidential.

The legislation provides for fines of $1 million and the punishment of life imprisonment. The chief financial officers of companies can be subject to jail sentences. The enforcement sections of this Bill are very extensive, and I want to bring that to the attention of the Hon. Member who spoke very eloquently on a number of points. This Bill is very loud and clear in its enforcement sections. She may wish to review those clauses of the Bill.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I have read the clauses which the Hon. Member has highlighted. I agree that they are good clauses.

My point is that we must ensure that there are sufficient resources in order to carry out those investigations and so that complaints can be promptly investigated and considered. However, I realize that that may deal with regulations more than the Bill itself.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is the New Democratic Party spokesperson on tourism. Would she give us some of her views about what this Bill will do for tourism?

We all depend on better environmental protection, but people in the tourist industry, including small business people and others, have a more immediate dependence on the environment being healthy in order to attract people to their part of the country.

Does she believe the measures in this legislation are adequate to take care of environmental pollution and will be welcomed by the tourist industry? Does she think that these measures will achieve the significant results they need? In other words, how beneficial will this be to tourism in Canada?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has raised an extremely important point. During my speech I referred to the importance of the environment and economic development. I certainly include tourism potential in that area.

One of the difficulties with environmental issues is that many environmental problems are not readily identified. Therefore, it is important that experts in the area anticipate these problems before the environment is too polluted to be restored.

While it is extremely important to preserve our environment for ourselves primarily, it is also important to take into account the enormous tourism potential of our environment. Many people visit all parts of Canada, not only the North, and come here to see the wilderness. They want a clean environment, with clean air.

For example, I talked to American tourists who came to the North and were awed by our clean environment and clean cities. That is one of the reasons that they visit us.

I believe in a Bill of environmental rights that guarantees a clean, healthy environment for all of us, not just to develop economic possibilities. However, a clean environment is certainly a consideration for economic development where tourism is concerned. It is extremely important to remember that tourism is a big industry in Canada and represents some 10 per cent of our employment.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the Hon. Member's comments with respect to the whole question of enforcement in this Bill and in environmental legislation in general. I was also interested in her concern about the commitment, including the commitment of resources, that is necessary if environmental legislation is to be actually enforced.

We know that there has been a great deal of criticism by various environmental groups and the public at large about the commitment and effort that has been made in the past by previous Governments in enforcing this kind of legislation. However, the Hon. Member referred to the one and only conviction for ocean dumping that was registered very recently in the Beaufort Sea near her own constituency. It was a conviction against the Gulf Oil Company, with a fine of almost $200,000.

I suggest that because this occurred recently for the first time, as far as enforcement of legislation in those Arctic waters is concerned, it is an indication that there is a commitment to enforce environmental laws, particularly those that deal with the area north of 60. Furthermore, the Minister announced in June a commitment of a further $37 million over and above the existing budget to be directed specifically toward that commitment to the enforcement of environmental legislation.

Would the Hon. Member not agree that there has been, specifically through that Gulf Oil prosecution and the further commitment of funds, a very substantial and positive indication on the part of the Minister and the Government that they are serious about the matter of enforcement of this legislation?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the case to which I was referring occurred last spring, in which there was a $14,000 fine. However, the Member's point is well taken and I believe the examples he has given are positive ones. I hope we will see more of them. It is the public's perception that such convictions have been limited in the past, and I hope the kinds of examples which the Hon. Member gives will increase so that we are not simply discussing one or two isolated cases.

Mr. Peter Peterson (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to join in the debate on Bill C-74 as presented by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan). Matters relating to the environment are very important to the people of the City of Hamilton. The Department has indeed been very active and visible in the City of Hamilton over the last little while. It was just in January of this year that the Minister came to the city to open an energy-from-waste pilot plant located at the Canadian Centre for Inland Waters right on Hamilton Harbour. This is a very important and new technology. It is one which demonstrates a technique that imitates the natural process of oil synthesis by converting at least 90 per cent to 95 per cent of the carbon in the sludge to a usable form of energy. To date, approximately $3 million has been spent by the federal Government on this particular project.

• (1720)

The federal Government has also agreed to provide at least $1.25 million towards the clean-up of the Windermere Basin in Hamilton Harbour. That is being done as part of its international commitment to the Great Lakes Water Quality Board and the International Joint Commission. The Department of the Environment, in keeping with its theme of consultation, of course, has consulted with a 45 member stake holders' group to define uses of the harbour and to seek advice during the development of a remedial action plan to clean up the harbour.

Water is an important issue for Hamiltonians. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we border on one of Canada's Great Lakes and we are constantly reminded of the importance of this valuable natural resource. I want to speak today about the implications of Bill C-74 for the protection of water resources from environmental pollution.

There is an old saying with a lesson for us all: "You don't miss your water until the well runs dry". It is a fact that our fresh water resources, particularly along the Canada-U.S. border, are an overused and often abused resource. We depend on these resources for drinking water, recreational and industrial uses, and, of course, tourism. This is more true of Canada than the United States as 50 per cent of the Canadian population lives within the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence basins, whereas just 12 per cent of Americans live in the same area. Industries on the Canadian side of the border represent over 50 per cent of Canada's Gross National Product, and again the corresponding figures for the United States are much lower.

These national comparisons, however, contrast sharply with absolute statistics compiled on a regional basis. Americans consume six times as much water as Canadians in the Great Lakes Water Basin and are responsible, in my opinion, for a great deal more of the pollution that occurs in that area.

Therefore, it is not surprising that support in this country, especially in the City of Hamilton, is strong for initiatives such as the Canada-U.S. Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement and the joint Canada-U.S. plan to monitor and reduce toxic loadings to the Niagara River.

It is also then understandable that the Government of Canada is anxious to put in place more effective national environmental protection legislation. The Minister of the Environment brought into Parliament on June 26, 1987, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act to begin the process towards legislative approval and enactment. This legislation is important for us in the City of Hamilton, and for all of Canada, because it does a number of things and I would like to outline just what they are. First it gives authority to control the introduction into Canadian commerce of substances, whether they be chemical, organic, inorganic, animate or inanimate that are new to Canada. It also gives authority to obtain information on and to require testing both of new substances and substances already existing in Canadian commerce.

It contains provisions allowing control of all aspects of the life cycle of toxic chemicals, including fuels, from development through manufacture or importation, transportation, distribution, storage and use, their release to the environment in such forms as emissions, and their ultimate disposal as waste.

It also contains provisions for regulations governing federal works and undertakings and for regulations to protect federal lands and waters within the legislative authority of Parliament where legislation administered by federal Departments or agencies does not provide for making regulations to protect our very important environment.

There are also provisions to create national objectives and guidelines setting desirable levels of environmental quality as well as release guidelines and codes of practice. The Act also allows control of sources of air pollution in Canada which would likely result in violations of international agreements or which affect another country, and where reciprocal legislation exists to control the sources of that pollution.

It contains provisions for control of nutrients such as phosphates in water conditioners or cleaning products which can interfere with the use of water by humans, animals, fish or plants. There are also provisions to issue permits to control dumping at sea from ships, barges, aircraft and man-made structures, excluding normal discharges from offshore energy facilities.

The Act also contains the authority for the federal Government to sign agreements with the provinces and territories of Canada for the administration of the legislation.

A lot of public attention has been given to the sections of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act that deal with toxic substances. We have been asked how the new Act differs from Canada's current legislation covering these chemicals. That legislation is called the Environmental Contaminants Act. While both the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and the Environmental Contaminants Act are based on the criminal law power assigned to the federal Government under Canada's Constitution, the Environmental Contaminants Act is residual legislation. That means that under that Act, the Minister is obliged to ascertain whether action to alleviate the danger could be undertaken by other federal agencies or the provinces under their specific legislation. It is clearly back-stop legislation.

The new Act is pro-active and much broader in scope. The definition of "environment" contained in the Act is a clear indication of this breadth. In the context of the new legislation, "environment" means the components of the earth and includes air, land and water, all layers of the atmosphere, all organic and inorganic matter and living organisms, and the interacting natural systems that include components referred to in paragraphs of the Act.

With respect to its pro-active character, the new Act allows the federal Government to deal with substances at all points of their life cycle. For example, where the Environmental Contaminants Act had only limited provisions for submission of information on, and review of, new chemicals, the new Act has stringent requirements for submission of information on substances that manufacturers and importers are seeking to introduce to Canadian commerce for the first time. In contrast to the Environmental Contaminants Act, the new Act empowers the federal Minister of the Environment to do certain things, and this is extremely important: first, to issue orders prohibiting an activity involving a substance new to Canada where he or she has reasonable grounds to believe that the substance has been manufactured in or imported into Canada in violation of the Act; second, it empowers the Minister to make emergency orders to prevent release to the environment of a substance believed to be toxic where the substance presents a significant danger in Canada to the environment or to human life or health. It also empowers the Minister to issue orders requiring remedial measures to manufacturers, processors, importers, distributors or retailers. These remedial measures may direct an individual or a company to undertake such measures as giving public notice of any danger to the environment, human life or health, accepting return of the substance or product and reimbursing the purchase price to the purchaser, or recalling the substance or product and replacing it by one that does not present a danger to the environment, human life or health.

What are the implications of the new Canadian Environmental Protection Act for water and control of water pollution? Because the Act gives new authority to the Government of Canada, it can better control substances throughout their life cycle. This will ensure prevention of the release of harmful substances directly to water, from both surface and underground water sources and indirectly through emissions or from the land due to run-off, leachates, and so on.

Phosphates, as a nutrient, will be regulated under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act at the time of its passage. Federal authorities may also consider controls for other nutrients such as organic carbon compounds if these substances are shown to have an adverse effect on the aquatic environment.

As I explained earlier, under the new Act, the Minister of the Environment is required to create environmental quality objectives, guidelines and codes of practice. While these objectives, guidelines and codes do not have the force of law, they will influence the direction and level of environmental protection efforts right across Canada.

• (1730)

Environmental quality objectives can apply to specific areas of Canada, or be clearly national in scope. In the short term, federal efforts will likely focus on inter-jurisdictional, that is, Canada-U.S., and interprovincial matters. Codes of practice may specify design operating and decommissioning procedures, or all of these for industrial and municipal facilities, as well as operations involving any form and handling of chemicals, disposal of wastes, et cetera.

Opposition Members in their contributions to this debate have been led astray in their observation that co-operation with the provinces in the protection of our environment will lessen the efficacy of the implication of this legislation. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), for example, suggested that what we need are strong national standards. He wants legislation that will be an imposition on the provinces and not one which is an agreed upon Bill by all parties involved.

The federal environmental authorities will consult with the provinces, as well as with industry, municipalities, labour, environmental groups, and all other interested parties across Canada on the development of these objectives, guidelines and codes. This is in keeping with Environment Canada's traditional approach of consulting first with affected stake-holders, such as provincial Governments and others, in order to understand their concerns and build consensus in both the process and the result.

This legislation is the environmental legislation which we believe will see us into the 21st century. It has the general support of industry which participated fully in the consultation process that over the last five years has led to the creation of this Bill. The preservation and maintenance of environmental quality are the shared responsibilities of Governments, industry and individuals. Canadian society now understands this and understands that further environmental quality is essential to protect Canada's resource-based economy and the many and varied in-stream uses of our virtually priceless water resources.

This Bill, along with co-operation and consultation with all Governments in Canada, is the tool for solving environmental problems and preventing those of tomorrow. This Bill is clearly good news for Canada, and especially good news for the City of Hamilton.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member pointed out quite correctly that the spokespersons for both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, joined by environmental organizations and the Canadian Labour Congress, have expressed concerns about a provision in the Bill which calls for consultation, and I suppose agreement, between the federal and provincial Governments before much can be done. They see this as a serious drawback to effective action being taken. I want to point out a specific case to the Hon. Member and ask him to tell us how he thinks we could deal with it.

We have in the Province of New Brunswick, which is a have-not province, a province in which a large percentage of its people are unemployed, one family, the Irving family, which controls virtually all the pulp and paper industry, the mining industry and the energy industry in that province. It has repeatedly, in its determination to maximize its profits, ignored recommendations, studies—and I am speaking from memory when I say this but I think I am correct—and court orders requiring it to improve its methods of operation so that it can begin to reduce the waste products which it dumps into the rivers of that province and the way in which it pollutes the water, the air and the earth of the province. That family has simply refused to do anything to move in the right direction.

I ask the Hon. Member how he thinks that, without a good deal of federal authority, that disgraceful situation in the Province of New Brunswick can be changed.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for his questions. He has obviously asked several. The first thing I want to say is that the approach of the Government in federal-provincial relations is very much one based on consensus-building as opposed to confrontation, an approach that was adopted by the previous administration. He clearly knows that what we are endeavouring to do is to build a consensus so that all Canadians are onside with respect to matters relating to the cleaning up of the environment.

I think the Hon. Member would agree with me that the construction of regulations, guidelines and codes should be based on a program of consensus with the specific government bodies which have jurisdiction over matters concerning the environment, that is, both federal and provincial Governments.

In terms of the Hon. Member's reference to the Province of New Brunswick, I think the Hon. Member will agree that this legislation gives the federal Government authority to act. If he examines the penalties and the enforcement provisions in the Bill he will agree that once this legislation has been passed there will be significant penalties and clout available to address some of the matters he has raised.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, can the Hon. Member tell us how this Bill will clean up Hamilton Harbour? How will it respond to the stake-holders' concerns, the International Joint Commission?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, the federal Department of the Environment has already made some significant improvements in terms of improving the quality of the water in Hamilton Harbour. I made reference to two of them at the beginning of my remarks. There is a commitment to spend $1.25 million on the clean-up of the Windermere Basin, as well as the energy from waste operation at the Canadian Centre for Inland Waters.

I think the Hon. Member will agree that the process of building a consensus toward cleaning up the environment, enforcement of the legislation and penalties, will now be available to the federal Government as a result of this Bill, specifically in terms of dealing with some of the problems that we are experiencing in the City of Hamilton.

It took the initiatives of the Government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) as well as the Minister of the Environment to get these types of measures under way. We waited for over 20 years while the previous administration did not have the guts to bring forward a comprehensive environmental protection Bill.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, in terms of a body of water, Hamilton Harbour has been cited as one of the 10 most important trouble spots in North America. How can the Hon. Member stand up and talk about $1.25 million? What type of effect will that sum of money have on solving this very serious problem?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the $1.25 million contribution by the federal Government was a contribution shared by the regional municipality and the province. It was the amount of money required to deal with cleaning up the Windermere Basin.

The Hon. Member should also be aware that there were 45 stake-holders and a remedial plan of action being developed with respect to Hamilton Harbour. The Minister of the Environment's commitment to the City of Hamilton and to some of the pollution problems we face is that when these remedial plans of action are available the federal Government will be there to deal with them.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the Hon. Member's remarks, specifically with respect to Hamilton Bay and the problems surrounding it. The federal Department of the Environment has been in place now for some 15 years. It dates back to 1972. I understand that the former Government, which was in power for some 12 years of that period of time, had nine separate Ministers of the Environment during those 12 years. Can the Hon. Member tell us what action was taken during that 12-year period with respect to Hamilton Bay?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I just want to correct the Hon. Member. He referred to Hamilton Bay. The residents of Burlington refer to it as Hamilton Bay. We in Hamilton refer to it as Hamilton Harbour. I stated earlier that the federal Government has agreed to contribute to some of the plans outlined by the municipality and the provinces. This Government and this Minister are taking some definite action in moving toward the eventual clean-up of Hamilton Harbour.

I am not aware of any programs during the past 12 years undertaken by the previous administration to attempt to address this problem, which is very important to all the residents of the City of Hamilton.

Ms. McDonald: Reference has been made to Hamilton Harbour. I wish to ask the Hon. Member a question on a waterway a little further along the Great Lakes system in the Toronto area. Year after year there are beaches where no one is allowed to swim because of the pollution. We rely on Lake Ontario for our drinking water. I wish to ask the Hon. Member, what good will this Bill do when enacted for these serious problems regarding water quality and recreation, the ability to use the natural beaches that we have in the Great Lake system, particularly in the Toronto area?

Mr. Peterson: I am certain that the Hon. Member is aware that there is a provision in the Bill where we will now be able to identify the substances fully. There is an additional $37 million to be spent in the Ministry of the Environment for enhanced inspection facilities and personnel. If the Hon. Member understands the provisions of the Bill, she will know exactly what is available to clean up that problem.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would have loved debating the Hon. Member for Hamilton West (Mr. Peterson) on the sequence of events that led to the federal Government's final awakening to the difficulties in Hamilton Harbour.

The Hon. Member should be aware, since Hamilton Harbour abuts on our ridings, that there was a report tabled which was put together by the City of Hamilton and the region in which they sought from the city, the region, the province, and the federal Government a total package which would amount to approximately $4 million to lead to the clean-up in the Windermere Basin, which is in my riding.

The city and the region got together, because of the nature of the serious problem, and the fact that the International Joint Commission has stated that Windermere Basin is one of the most polluted bodies of water in North America. According to the IJC report, the basin itself contains PCB concentrations which exceed the Ministry of the Environment guidelines by up to 68 times. Immediately the City of Hamilton and the Regional Municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth agreed to contribute $750,000 to cover their portion of the clean-up costs.

Following that decision in September, 1986, the provincial Minister of the Environment, Mr. James Bradley, immediately agreed that the province would commit approximately $1.2 million. The Ontario Government immediately came in with a commitment. The federal Government and this federal Minister, who made many promises that he was going to clean up the environment, refused to do so.

I have stacks of correspondence in my office where he suggested that he is studying the matter and looking at it. In fact it was not until I managed, as the Member for Hamilton East, to get the whole matter referred to the intelligent Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry that it was agreed the matter would be put before committee because the federal Government was stalling on its contribution.

Meanwhile, another relevant event entered the picture which in a positive manner changed the outlook of the Minister on the difficult situation in the Windermere Basin. It was called the by-election.

After the full Liberal caucus went to Hamilton, met with the Mayor, reviewed the evidence of the serious contamination and pollution in the Windermere Basin, and after the Hon. Member for Hamilton East convinced the committee Chairman, I must admit that he was very quick to accept the suggestion that there be a reference. The Regional Chairman wrote to the Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry seeking an opportunity to appear before the committee to present the case of the City of Hamilton. The Department of the Environment was dragging its feet on coming up with its portion of a mere, piddling, measly, miniscule $1.2 million to help clean up one of the most polluted bodies of water in North America. The by-election was called, and I am glad that the Minister finally agreed.

I was also glad to hear the Hon. Member for Hamilton West state that the Minister will be prepared to follow up on the recommendations from the stake-holders' report. I assume that that means the Minister will follow up financially. If the Minister is prepared to follow up financially, we on this side of the House will be looking for significant financial contributions from the federal Government far in excess of the rather piddling $1.2 million set aside to assist the city. The city and the region have taken the initiative in this area in completing their proposal to clean up the Windermere Basin.

The Windermere Basin is probably a microcosm of the whole problem that the Government faces in terms of credibility. The Minister of the Environment himself started his tenure by saying that environmental protection in Bill C-74 would be the strongest piece of legislation in the western world. In the same manner as the Government said it was committed to cleaning up the Hamilton Harbour and the Windermere Basin, we have seen foot-dragging. Surprisingly, and even shockingly, this is the fourth year of the Government's mandate. This is the first piece of environmental legislation to be introduced for second reading and debated in the House.

On the one hand, the Minister can say that he is committed to the environment and his Government makes it a priority, but the reality is that for three years in this Chamber we have not had a second reading debate on an environmental Bill at a time when the environment is one of the issues uppermost in the minds of most Canadians. That is not to say that there has been no activity in the Department of the Environment. Unfortunately, that activity has been of a negative nature.

In November, 1984, we raised in the House the issue of the Canadian Wildlife Service. The Government and the Ministers of the Crown said that there was no problem cutting back on the Canadian Wildlife Service. It will not have any effect. In particular, the Canadian Wildlife Service was in the throes of researching and analysing the eggs of certain gulls and birds that flew over Lake Ontario in order to determine when toxic chemicals in the water and in the air actually caused cancer, mutations, and deformations.

The scientists felt that if they could see those conditions in the birds first, they would be able to predict what may happen to human beings if we do not start to clean up our act. The Canadian Wildlife Service was performing a valuable and critical service when one considers the present state of some of the Great Lakes. That service was cut back. The Minister said it was no problem, it is just a few scientists studying gull eggs. What difference does that make?

At the same time, the Government cancelled funding for the Guelph Toxicology Research Centre. One would think that the Minister would be proposing positive legislation to help clean up the environment, but instead he seemed to be more interested in moving on his own public relations campaign. We will remember when the Minister was flown to the Laurentians during some type of environmental conference. He absented himself from the conference in order to fly to the Laurentians to be filmed singing a song about the environment for Canada's Environment Week.

However, what happened when his scientists wanted to tell the story about what was happening with chemical and toxic chemical contamination? When one scientist—and I think it is the most notable example, Mr. Speaker—dared talk about contamination in the St. Clair River, he issued an order that scientists should keep their mouths shut, not because their information was incorrect or inaccurate, but because they were telling the truth, the truth was actually getting to the Canadian public, and the Canadian public was becoming rather concerned about it.

Instead, we have had a Government and a Minister who have neglected to tell the public about the real crisis we are now facing in our environment in terms of chemical contamination of air, water, and land. The Minister has neglected to bring forward positive legislation. While the Bill before us today is supportable, it is certainly in no way near the legislation which he claimed would streamline the system and be the toughest legislation in the western world.

In fact, it must be frustrating for people in the public who are trying to understand what legislation governs the water we drink, the air we breathe, and the factories in which we work.

Let me refer to what I was rather stunned to discover. I know this will prompt the Hon. Member from Toronto to jump to his feet with his oft repeated question: "What did you do for the last 16 years?" I think the public is getting a little tired of that tune and would like to hear what the Conservatives are doing. In any event, I have presupposed the question and answered it in advance.

I was rather stunned to discover that there are 24 federal Departments administering 57 environmental laws. It is no wonder that Canadians get frustrated when they want to find out if they can swim in their beaches or drink water. The Government is bringing in legislation which is supposed to streamline the law, but Bill C-74, as it now is, will result in 24 federal Departments administering 55 laws. Three laws will be merged into one law, which will give us 55 laws administered by 24 federal Departments.

However, it is a step forward, albeit a baby step; of course I have babies on my mind these days. It is not even a small step forward; it is a baby step for man and mankind, but we shall support it.

We support the fact that there will be a system to assess the impact of new chemicals on human health and the environment. This is one reason that I, as health critic, was so pleased to speak on the legislation. We believe that for any legislation to be effective, there must be in place a system to assess the ultimate impact of new chemicals on human health.

The shortcoming in this piece of legislation is that it will not deal with existing chemicals. In particular, if we consider the fact that fertilizers, weed-killers, and such chemicals are specifically exempted from the legislation, of course it is a cause for some concern. However, the Bill will allow for the assessment of 60,000 chemicals which are in use today.

If we look at the financial resources which have been set aside for this assessment, we wonder whether it is really practical to expect that with $2 million to $3 million being set aside in each of three Departments we will actually have the teeth to be able to assess 60,000 chemicals in use today and the chemicals coming on stream so quickly. In many cases it is almost impossible to keep up with them.

We also support the fact that the legislation will at least begin the process of allowing the public to understand what is happening with the chemicals in use today, but we are most concerned that the financial resources are simply not available.

We also believe, in respect of Bill C-74, that instead of just englobing a rather rambling preamble, the Minister should have lived up to his promise and his obligation to bring forth a legislative environmental Bill of rights. He has talked about it in the past. We were waiting for it to be in this piece of legislation. Frankly, he just did not deliver.

I am sure another point would interest those involved in the area of human rights as well as foreign policy for Canada. It is rather bizarre that we are bringing forth legislation which could set in place mechanisms to ban a chemical in Canada, but there is no concurrent mechanism to ban the chemical for export to other countries, most specifically the Third World.

In other words, if we say that a certain chemical should not be used in Canada because it will cause cancer, mutations in the limbs of children born to women exposed to the chemical, or other health problems, it will also cause those health problems in other countries. We think it is immoral that Bill C-74 does not contain a requirement that any banned chemical should be banned for sale and production in Canada and for production and export abroad. For Canada to say that a chemical is good enough for the Third World but not good enough for Canadians is wrong. I am sure my colleague from Toronto would agree with that assessment and would support the amendments we will be bringing forward.

We are also very concerned about the issue of ministerial discretion.

[Translation]

For over three years, and this Government is now entering the fourth year of its mandate, this Government and this Minister have not attempted to introduce for second reading in this House any bill on the environment.

Mr. Speaker, no one can blame us for being afraid that the fact that the Minister wants to provide too much power and too much discretion for himself could create problems.

If we look at Section 29.4, we find that the Minister may waive any of the requirements for information to assess whether a substance is toxic if he considers that it is not needed. If a new chemical comes on the market and the Minister considers that there is no problem as the manufacturer is a good company which he knows and does not want to examine, he can waive the review process without any possibility of appeal by ordinary citizens. This is what frightens us. As the Minister has introduced no bill on the environment until now and has not had the courage to fight to protect the environment for the last three years, we do not want to provide him with any personal discretionnary powers now.

Elsewhere, in paragraphs A) and B) of subsection 37.2, we see that the Minister has a power of exemption to say that any chemical can be exempted from the regulations if he so desires. We find this a bit frightening as we do not trust the Minister in view of the way he is drawn his feet for the last three years and we do not want to give him too much discretionnary power.

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, we shall support this Bill, but we shall also put him on notice that we are not satisfied with his speeches and his rhetoric and we would prefer more practical, substantive and financial action. The little he is now spending is not enough to protect our environment.

I shall have to close on these last comments.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—EMPLOYMENT OF VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that you will not recall the Buddy Evans case which occurred in Metropolitan Toronto in 1979 or 1980. Because it has been a number of years now, my own memory is somewhat hazy about the particular case. Buddy Evans was a Canadian black. He was not too highly thought of by the police department. He became a cause célèbre as a result of a shooting which occurred when the police felt that Buddy Evans was perhaps going to do them some harm, and they shot him. As a result, an inquest was held.

That inquest touched off a great furore of marches, demonstrations and counter-demonstrations, some in support of the police department of Metropolitan Toronto and some in support of Buddy Evans. At that time, Metropolitan Toronto came as close as it has ever been in the time that I can recall to having racial violence. It was very disturbing. It led to some major and dramatic changes in our society, particularly in Metropolitan Toronto. It led to the creation of a number of race-relation committees in the community. In fact, each one of the six municipalities in Metropolitan Toronto established race-relation committees as a result of that situation. It led to the establishment, for the very first time in this country, of a civilian police complaint review board in Metropolitan Toronto.

You will recall that since we have come to this House, Mr. Speaker, the RCMP Act has been amended to provide for that same sort of mechanism for the RCMP. It provided as well for liaison committees to be set up between the visible minority communities in Metropolitan Toronto and the police department. It also provided for increased efforts to be made to try to establish and augment the numbers of visible minorities who were members of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department. All of this was a reflection of the fact that there was systemic discrimination within the police department and, for that matter, within virtually all employment in our own municipality.

Systemic discrimination was the same kind of problem as that of stereotyping, for example, with which women have had a great difficulty over a long, long time. It was one of the reasons that women could not break into many occupations and many fields. We are delighted that the new Deputy Clerk of this House is a woman.

If there is one thing on which my Party, your Party, the Progressive Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker, is founded upon, surely it is the principle of equality of opportunity. That is why for the very first time ever in Canada the present Government introduced employment equity legislation for the purpose of dealing with federally-regulated companies. It is why for the very first time the Government introduced an affirmative action program for the Public Service and it is why for the very first time it introduced an affirmative action program as part of the contract compliance regulations with which a business has to comply when contracting with the federal Government.

This legislation and policies were based on the fact that women, disabled people, native people, and the visible minorities should all be given equal opportunity as far as hiring, promotion, training and pay is concerned. Included was the concept of setting targets to ensure equality of opportunity. That was not for the purpose of giving priority to people who were not clever or not the best or the brightest. It was for the purpose of stemming and stamping out systemic discrimination in our society.

In August of this year Treasury Board set targets for visible minorities for the Public Service for the very first time, and next June federally-regulated companies will have to comply with those same laws. What about the RCMP? What is their place in this? A study was done recently by Professor Jain of McMaster University. He reported that although 7 per cent of the population of this country are visible minorities and 45 per cent of the labour force are visible minorities, only 1.7 per cent of the federal Public Service are visible minorities, and the RCMP would not even tell Professor Jain who the visible minorities were or how many there were in the RCMP.

When I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher) in this House if he could tell me why the RCMP would not give this information to a study of this sort, he said it was contrary to the Canadian Human Rights legislation. That shocked me, because after all this Government will require the private sector to provide this information. It will require by way of an affirmative action policy the Public Service of Canada to provide this information. Why, then, would the RCMP not provide it?

I would like to know from the Parliamentary Secretary tonight when the RCMP is going to comply with the law of the land. Why will the RCMP, in a concrete and forthcoming manner, not demonstrate whether or not there is equal opportunity of employment in the RCMP? It is only through providing that information publicly that we are going to know whether the RCMP complies with the law of Canada or not.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, Treasury Board affirmative action guidelines and the employment equity legislation constitute comprehensive government policy designed to eliminate discriminatory barriers in areas of federal jurisdiction and to improve the participation of qualified women, natives, the disabled and under-represented visible minorities in the workplace. However, I should point out that neither the RCMP nor the Canadian Forces are subject to policy direction from Treasury Board on affirmative action or to the equal employment legislation because of the unique nature of the jobs performed by these institutions.

It should be made clear that I am referring here to the regular member and civilian member categories of employees as opposed to the public servant. These institutions have, nevertheless, attempted in the past to design personnel policies and practices which are in keeping with the spirit and principles which apply elsewhere.

In the case of the RCMP, special affirmative action measures have been developed where a particular need has been identified. For example, the RCMP, because of its extensive involvement in policing rural and northern wilderness areas, has a well-developed native constable employment program. The force employs approximately 240 native special constables to assist in providing policing services to native communities in the eight provinces and two territories where the force serves under contract.

RCMP recruitment policies also ensure that women are recruited equitably in proportion to the number of women seeking to gain entry into the force. While the demanding physical nature of police work precludes disabled persons from becoming regular members, the RCMP has one of the highest employment rates for disabled persons among its public servants.

With respect to visible minorities, the RCMP does not currently have a formal affirmative action program. In the absence of such a program, the RCMP could not legitimately collect information on the racial background or ethnic origin of prospective recruits or current members. Thus, the RCMP, at this time does not have data on the number of visible minorities serving in the force.

The absence of formal affirmative action programs does not mean the RCMP has been inactive in the area. The RCMP has been a forerunner in the police community in its efforts to overcoming cultural barriers through the development of cross-cultural training programs. The force has also been successful in overcoming the reluctance on the part of certain visible minority groups from seeking employment as police officers through its contacts with ethnic groups, as well as through the use of the ethnic press in its recruitment campaign.

On May 19, 1987, a report was made by Dr. Harish Jain of McMaster University to a congress of the International Society for Intercultural Training and Research in Montreal. Professor Jain found that visible minorities were under-represented in most major Canadian police forces as compared to their representation in the communities being policed. On May 26, 1987, when appearing before the Committee on Multiculturalism, Professor Jain asked that the RCMP comply with the employment equality legislation and collect statistics on the status of visible minorities in the force.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher) has been made aware of Professor Jain's proposals. In keeping with the RCMP's commendable leadership in meeting the needs of visible minorities and in attracting recruits from their midst, every effort will be made to respond to Professor Jain's suggestions. I believe I can safely say that the RCMP recognizes the importance of Canada's national police force being representative of the Canadian mosaic and that appropriate initiatives will be developed where required to achieve this objective.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION MINISTER'S LETTER TO COMMISSION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I recently raised a question with the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) concerning a letter which she sent on behalf of Bell Canada to Bell Canada Enterprises and which has been objected to very strenuously by four organizations, namely, the Consumers' Association of Canada, the Canadian Business Telecommunications Alliance, the Public Interest Advocacy Centre and the Association of Competitive Telecommunications Suppliers, a group which does not often get together but which is extremely concerned with the Minister's interference in a hearing before the CRTC for Bell Canada rates.

When the Minister responded to my question, she actually dug herself in deeper. She did not agree to withdraw her letter, which is what these organizations have asked her to do. The letter itself is very clear as to the nature of the intervention. She says:

> In accordance with this policy—

—which she cites—

> —and provided that Bell Canada submits, as evidence, an audited verification that the costs associated with the temporary transfer of its employees to BCI are recovered fully by Bell Canada, I would be prepared to review any future decision of the CRTC, which failed to reflect these principles.
> So, for example, were the Commission to establish or impute a level of compensation from BCI to Bell Canada that exceeded the audited costs directly and indirectly associated with these transfers, I would be prepared to recommend to the Governor in Council appropriate action—

The only action the Minister can take is to recommend that Cabinet overturn that decision. I understand that the letter was also sent to the chairperson of CRTC directly and it was submitted in the documents in Bell Canada's rate case.

This letter is, of course, totally unwarranted interference in a procedure which was already in progress. I note that the decision which the CRTC had previously made had gone against Bell Canada. Bell Canada was incorrectly told that it had to allow $25 million more for expenses on account of risk undertaking by Bell Canada International, the whole point being that one should not shunt a risky business, from which the profits would go to certain shareholders, to the consumers who are the telephone subscribers in a monopoly service. That is a very fundamental principle as the Minister admits.

However, the decision was made by the CRTC. Bell Canada did not appeal that decision, which was an avenue open to it. Instead the Chairperson of Bell Canada Enterprises, Mr. de Grandpré, had a little chat with the Minister. As a result of that little chat the Minister came up with a very convenient letter, which is appended to the rate application. If the CRTC takes the Minister's advice, one of the results would be an additional burden of $25 million on the subscribers. That is very unfair.

• (1815)

There are other issues at stake as well. The Minister is interfering in the process. When the decision is made by the CRTC, it could then go back to Cabinet for a decision. At that point, the Minister is supposed to advise Cabinet as to whether or not it should uphold the CRTC. How can she give impartial advice to Cabinet in a matter on which she has already taken a position? How can she work with the CRTC, with which she is supposed to be dealing on a policy basis, when she is giving it a very strong hint that it had better make a certain decision?

Whatever the decision, she could be in trouble with the courts should she deal with the matter before Cabinet. If the consumers lose, they could go to the courts and ask that the decision be overturned since the Minister was involved in the case inappropriately. She has made it impossible to properly fulfil her role in this whole process.

The Minister's letter puts the CRTC in an impossible position. If it knuckles under and adopts Bell Canada's arguments, it will lose its credibility completely because it is supposed to be an independent agency. If it does not give in to the Minister, it will harm its ongoing relationship with the Minister.

There are a number of unanswered questions. Why does the Minister want telephone consumer rates to go up by $25 million so that the Government of Saudi Arabia can get cheaper telephone service? If Bell Canada was not satisfied with the decision of the CRTC, why did it not appeal? If Bell Canada International needs a $25 million hand-out, why does it not apply for a government grant?

I am extremely disappointed with the Minister's decision in the first place, and the fact that she is digging herself in deeper. When I raised the question, she responded with a gratuitous insult that hers was a balanced letter which I only need read, suggesting that I would raise a question about her letter without having read it in the first place.

In the view of these organizations that are active in the area of rate setting and very knowledgeable about CRTC processes, the Minister has abused her position by attempting to intimidate the CRTC and dictate its decision on this issue.

The Minister should be giving policy directions to the CRTC and has failed to do that in numerous areas of broadcasting policy and specialty services. She should abdicate the role of interfering in particular cases and take on the role of giving policy direction where it is needed. She has failed utterly to carry out her responsibility and is interfering in a most inappropriate manner in an independent regulatory agency.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member alleged in her question in the House on September 9 that the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) had improperly intervened in a CRTC procedure on the part of Bell Canada. This is simply not the case. I am surprised that the Hon. Member, given that she has had ample time to review the Minister's letter to the Chairman of Bell Canada Enterprises, would raise this matter again.

The Minister's letter refers Mr. de Grandpré to the forthcoming CRTC proceedings as the proper opportunity for this matter to be resolved. It goes on to clearly state that the Government supports the CRTCs role in ensuring that Bell Canada subscribers do not subsidize the competitive activities of Bell Canada Enterprises.

Furthermore, the Minister reminds the BCE chairman that the onus is on Bell Canada to provide information to the CRTC that would allow the Commission to make the most informed decisions.

I fail to see how the Hon. Member can arrive at the conclusion that the Minister has taken the side of Bell Canada. On the contrary, she has told Bell Canada that it must take this matter up with the CRTC, that the Government fully supports the CRTC's role in protecting the telephone subscriber from unfair costs, and that Bell should provide additional information to the Commission.

• (1820)

The role of the CRTC is clear and has in no way been affected by the Minister's correspondence. As the Minister pointed out in her return letter to the group which had written to her about the issue, the Commission has full authority to determine this matter according to its statutory responsibility, and she fully supports its duty to make an informed, objective assessment.

The Hon. Member is very familiar with the Bell Canada Reorganization Act, Bill C-13, which dealt with the principle of separating Bell's monopoly and competitive activities. This principle exists in part to ensure that telephone subscribers do not subsidize BCE's competitive activities. The Minister has been entirely consistent with this policy.

I think that on careful reading of the Minister's letter, it is clear that rather than somehow compromising the regulatory process, as some Hon. Members have implied, in fact the Minister has expressed a great deal of confidence in the regulatory process and that she has clearly stated her belief that the normal regulatory process is the appropriate form in which to resolve this issue.

SMALL BUSINESSES—NATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—CONSULTATION PROCESS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, it was on August 11 that I asked questions concerning native economic development and a certain consultation process launched by the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Valcourt). This process of consultation was to help develop a native economic development program within his Department. I want to take the opportunity now to raise some concerns about native economic development in general and its priority with the Government in particular.

I found it interesting that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight), in response to my supplementary question to him on that date, chose to quote an excerpt from a resolution passed by the Assembly of First Nations in June 1987. The Minister read in part:

> Federal initiatives to date have further entangled the First Nations in a complex web—short sightedness and jurisdictional disputes. Federal Departments responsible for supporting First Nation's economic development are unable to effectively co-ordinate their activities.

Of course, that is all true. The Minister used that statement to justify the very narrow approach being taken to develop a plan for native economic development. It is interesting, however, to read what the Minister left out of that very same resolution. The same resolution from the Assembly of First Nations states in full:

> The federal Government continues to give lip service to the ideas of local control, self-determination, comprehensive community planning and adequate resources to establish appropriate infrastructures at the community level.

It went on to say:

> —that the Assembly of First Nations would prefer a Government wide review of federal support for native economic development rather than the consultation being planned by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion on the future of its native economic programs.

The resolution then goes on to suggest that what should be happening is that native people should identify the goals they want to achieve and the means by which to achieve those goals, including what funding would be required and what changes are necessary to existing policies and programs.

I do not think the Government can logically argue that we need anything less than a comprehensive approach. Consultation on DRIE's native economic development program is not sufficient. I argue that all programs of all Departments of Government which affect native economic development must be looked at. Indian people must be intimately involved in all aspects, actively participating.

It is clear that often one part of the Government does not know what the other is doing. Programs from one source can deliberately frustrate the efforts of another Department. For example, it is not possible to deny the link between post-secondary education and future employment and economic development. Yet we know that the Department of Indian Affairs has put a cap on its post-secondary budget and students are being turned away from colleges and universities. I ask the Government, then, how it expects to provide the supply of Indian tradesmen, administrators, professionals and managers that are required. The Government knows, and it has revealed it in an important briefing note to the Minister, which states that effective delivery of devolved Indian programs, advances and local autonomy and increased employability are dependent upon effective training and education of Indians.

• (1825)

The statistics are supportive of that assertion. Some 140,000 natives will become eligible to join the labour force over the next 10 years. The problems this will create cannot be underestimated. Just to maintain employment rates at the present low levels will require 8,000 new jobs annually. Most of the new jobs will be required in rural areas where opportunities have, to date, been very limited. Operational and policy linkages between labour market programming and economic development will continue to be extremely important.

That deals with education, Mr. Speaker. Second, no one can deny the link between adequate infrastructure in a community and economic development. Yet all Hon. Members know that basic water and sewer services are lacking in the majority of Indian communities in Canada.

Third, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) has persistently refused to make available to Indian bands the employment funds that they were able to obtain under the former Canada Works program to build houses in their communities. The Canadian Jobs Strategy program is not in most cases applicable to Indian communities. Yet here is where unemployment is the highest.

When the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) was the Minister of Indian Affairs, he commissioned a task force on Indian economic development. It was to prepare a data base on the state of Indian economic development in Canada. The task force determined that economic development in all respects falls far short of the national average.

I would like to quote Douglas Sanders from the Faculty of Law, University of British Columbia, who said:

> The failure to deal seriously with the questions of Indian economies is the single most glaring failure of national policy in both the United States and Canada.

I conclude by saying that what the Government is doing is conducting a very narrow review and avoiding consultation. Behind it all is the present motivation of how it can reduce expenditures in this area or, if I may put it in the euphemistic terms of the Government, how to stabilize economic development resourcing at present levels.

What the Government is trying to do is to save money and to hide behind the consultative process. In the long run it is denying Indian people the economic independence that they need to run their own lives and to get out from under a system of dependency that robs them of their own dignity, political power and the right to have the control over their own lives that they are seeking in a wide variety of ways.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that the Hon. Member would treat so offhandedly the consultation process announced on July 24.

[English]

The consultation process which was announced on July 24 is now being branded by the Hon. Member as not comprehensive enough. What is important for natives and what we have undertaken to do is to go to the grass roots, to seek from them their views regarding the economic development program which is administered by DRIE. The Hon. Member refers to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to CEIC, and other departments that have an interest in economic development. That is the very reason these departments are also part of this consultation process. They are part of the review group which will be able to take into account the views of natives and possibly influence the report which will be submitted to me and from which I in turn will go to the Government with recommendations.

• (1830)

In his statement, the Hon. Member has embraced a whole range of topics which are important to economic development for natives. Of course, I can appreciate the political reasons for the Hon. Member saying that our agenda is this and that. The fact remains that we are committed to working with natives to ensure that they can become economically self-reliant. It is promising to see the reception that the consultation process received from bands and tribal councils. I look forward to the results of the consultation process. If, under the previous Government a department was doing things which the other departments did not know, under this Government we work en unisson and we know what we do as a Government. Cabinet reviews the conclusions of this consultation process. I hope that we will come up with measures that will improve and render more efficient the programs that we wish to put in place to ensure economic development among natives in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Tom Hockin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-68, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act, as reported (without amendments) from a legislative committee, be concurred in.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the House will know, this matter was sent to committee last week. The committee moved very expeditiously and reported the Bill yesterday without amendment. After discussions with the opposition Parties, it is our understanding that it would be possible to seek consent to have the Bill proceed today and send it over to the other place.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Tom Hockin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to thank all my colleagues on the legislative committee that studied this Bill for their willingness to deal so expeditiously with it. I thank them for their co-operation in moving it through the House so quickly. Because of this co-operation Canada will have ratified the convention creating MIGA, the political risk insurance organization, by October 11 and will therefore participate in the first meetings at which time the rules and regulations for the institution will be established.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) for probably one of the shortest ministerial speeches on record. I beg the indulgence of the House if I do not quite follow his standard because I believe third reading of this Bill is an opportunity to comment and deal with issues arising out of the Act and the present state of the international financial system. I believe this House should spend a few minutes in contemplation and examination of where we stand as a country and where the system itself stands.

As some Members of the House will know, both I and the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly) returned yesterday from a quite extensive trip to Central America, Nicaragua in particular. We had an opportunity to view first hand a Third World country struggling with enormous economic problems, to say nothing of the war which is viciously exacerbating those problems. We saw the importance of the international economic system to a small country like that and how poorly the system is working for those countries at this time.

We had an opportunity to speak with the Minister of Economic Development who said that coffee, the major export commodity of that country, had suffered a price decline in the last several months. As a result, that country will be facing an additional shortfall of some $250 million in its current accounts. Such a drop in national income goes beyond the abstract statistics for a country of three million people with a GNP of $3 billion. It means that people there can no longer have the foreign exchange to buy replacement machinery parts for their tractors. It means that consumer goods such as toothpaste and shampoo which must be imported can no longer be afforded except with the use of American dollars.

In other words, the shortfalls in the system create the kinds of pressures in a country like that which not only result in major inconvenience in the daily lives of its people, but also eviscerate the economic capacity of that country.

It is not that there is a lack of effort, because the will and the expectation to rebuild the economy is foremost in everyone's mind. One cannot be anything but full of admiration for a poor country that is making every possible effort for land reform, to transfer land into the hands of the peasants of that country so they can, for the first time, have the responsibility to be independent and responsible for their self-sufficiency. But how can they do so when they do not have tractors or irrigation pumps?

First, there is an embargo by the U.S., which we implicitly accept, and second, the international economic system no longer affords them the ability to sell their commodities at a fair rate in order to achieve the kind of economic revenue that is required to maintain a minimum of growth.

When considering this Bill, the purpose of which is to set up a new credit system, we must ask whether we are lecturing on navigation while the ship is going down. Are we tinkering with minor repairs to the system when the system itself has some very basic flaws?

It is time for a new Bretton Woods Agreement. It is time to rethink the agreement, rather than simply tinker around the margins of the system.

When the major countries of the world came together at Bretton Woods to sign a new economic agreement on trade and international finance in 1944, conditions were very different from what they are now. The United States not only had a generosity of spirit and a belief and commitment to multilateralism, the American dollar stood as the primary and unassailable world currency. Both those conditions have changed. Certainly, the attitude of the present U.S. administration does not reflect that same commitment to multilateralism and generosity of spirit. Rather, we see an attempt to play Rambo-like politics on the economic frontiers.

In addition, the United States no longer has the economic dominance it had 30 or 40 years ago. One need only look at their own situation. They have gone from being the largest creditor nation in the world to the largest debtor nation in the world, running the largest trade deficit of any country. The only way the United States is able to support that huge deficit is by borrowing from abroad, primarily from the Japanese who now hold some $55 billion of equity and holdings in the United States economy alone.

The obvious result is that there is no longer a world currency that can stabilize and facilitate the operation of the international economy. The dollar is subject to pressures and instabilities, as evidenced by the insecurity on the world stock markets. We are seeing a curious situation in which we are trying to evade the issue of incredible problems in Third World countries. We have been trying to manage these situations on a case-by-case basis, yet knowing that every major international bank, including Canadian banks, have outstanding debts. If a bank decided to pull a card from the deck representing these outstanding debts, the whole deck would fall.

Recently, major Canadian banks had to set aside hundreds of millions of dollars, which only represent approximately one-quarter of those outstanding debts. The debt problem is being managed in a way that is designed almost to put a Draconian discipline on the debtor nations, and to serve the banking interests more than to encourage economic growth in these countries.

These countries are in a Catch 22 situation. They cannot stimulate growth in their economies because of the restrictive measures imposed upon them. All their export earnings must go to servicing the debt, so there is nothing left to reinvest into those countries to stimulate further development.

At the same time, economic aid is being pulled back by the wealthy nations in the world and commodity prices are falling. One would have to refer to the Book of Job for a text on the international economic system, where it states: "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

This deluge of incredible problems requires a reorganization of the system by the major players in the world. They must recognize that the U.S. currency is no longer the foundation of the international system and certainly cannot be in the future. There must be a different arrangement on our exchange rates. We must find a better solution to the debt problem than the case-by-case approach which has been adopted thus far. We must find a way of dealing with the commodity problems in the world economy, recognizing that the so-called market system we have adopted has only resulted in driving prices down and creating more instability, of which we are partly victim, and from which there is no result. The longer we simply try to tinker with the system, the worse the problem will get.

This brings me to the matter of political management. I believe the problems of the world economy have far superseded the capacity to manage them. Once again, it is a case where economics is far ahead of politics. We have not yet combined our ideas and resources to find ways to manage the system. In fact, looking at recent events, we would have to conclude that we are going in reverse. We may be running the risk of falling back even further, with ruptures in the system and a retreat back into the era of the 1930s where we had country pitted against country and regional block against regional block.

I suppose what I regret most is that that is a reflection also of what seems to be happening in our own country. Clearly, the case we tried to make over the past two and one-half years is that the present Government of Canada has fallen into a basic fallacy, that is, that our economic interests could be best served through bilateral relationships. Most obvious, was the attempt to negotiate a free trade deal with the United States. Instead of using our efforts, energies and imagination to try to provide leadership in the international economic system, we were also part of that retreat into protectionism, into the North America fortress. We were pulling our commitments back and that was a tragedy because at the original Bretton Woods Agreement, our own country was one of the major advocates of a new international economic order. We were one of the architects of that system. We provided much of the intelligence and recommendations which helped build Bretton Woods at the outset.

It has been of great regret to my Party, and we have said this right from the beginning that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) announced that the economic priority of Canada was a free trade deal with the United States. We asked if this meant we were abandoning our multilateral commitment? Are we retreating from the international priority we once had? The answer, of course, is yes. The people who have won out in the decision-making councils of Ottawa have been the bilateralists, the Simon Reismans and the Derek Burneys, the Brian Mulroneys and the others—and I use the name in a generic sense, Mr. Speaker, in referring to the Prime Minister—the North Americans, the continentalists who have dominated our economic thinking; not the internationalists not the multilateralists, not those who saw in this country the opportunity and responsibility to try to reforge, remake, redefine and help reform the international economic system.

We have made a fundamental mistake. We have taken the wrong course and we have applied our energies in the wrong direction. As a result, we are now paying the price. We do not know what kind of strange combination arrangement will emerge on October 5, but we know now that the promises and expectations that were raised for that North American trade deal have been shot through with holes. It is not going to be the great economic cornucopia, and resolution to all the problems. It will not have a dispute settling mechanism. It is not going to provide for that open access. It is not going to provide for all those promises that were made. The fact is that we have allowed three years to go by and have won nothing as a result.

In the meantime, we have had to face a growing cloud and shadow in the international economic environment. We have abandoned many of our allies and friends. We have pulled back on our economic interests. One example is the trade performance of Canada last year. In every single region of the world, with the exception of the United States, our trade fell drastically, sometimes as much as 30 per cent and 40 per cent. At the same time, the Department of External Affairs was cutting back 30 per cent on our Export Development Fund, closing embassies, and consulates, and cutting back on export promotion everywhere except the United States of America. As a result, the dependency we have on that one country for our own trade was even more severe and extreme.

We have been abandoning our international commitments. We have gone asleep at the switch in terms of opening up new trade opportunities. The fastest growing economic region of the world has been in the Pacific Rim. The OECD country which has the lowest rate of trade in the Pacific Rim is our own country. We are making very little effort to try to recapture that area. The drops are severe.

At the same time, we have been facing, along with many Third World countries, major declines in the prices for our commodities. In certain respects we have a lot more in common with Malaysia, Latin America and Asia than we do with the United States, because our major exports are still earned through our commodities sales—our grain, forest products and minerals. Those are the commodities which have been suffering the ravages of an international economic system which is out of order.

Instead of applying ourselves and trying to come to grips with the need to get new commodity agreements, to provide stability of prices, to secure access to markets internationally, we have been spending all our time negotiating with the United States. Our eye has been on the wrong spiral. We have substantially missed the target. As a result, I think the world has lost a country which has in the past provided economic leadership in these matters, one which has reached out to establish a commitment and understanding and belief in international economic order.

Perhaps the primary missing ingredient is that voice in international councils trying to bring together a new meaning to a Bretton Woods type agreement. Obviously, it would be more complicated and more difficult than it was in 1944. Obviously, it is one that would have to include a much broader range of participants, with a much broader and more varied range of economic interests.

The world is not the oyster of the western hemisphere. We in the western hemisphere and Europe can no longer set the pace and dominate the world as we once could. There are many more increasingly influential economic players in the economic game, so of course the rules will have to be changed. The rules will not always be our own way. It is time we faced up to that reality. It is time we stopped hiding from that reality and began to apply ourselves in an effort to reorganize and reform the international system to meet that reality.

The Bill before us is acceptable. No one is arguing with it. There is some modest repair of the system. But it does not tackle the fact that presently there is an obvious and clear discrimination in the international banking system towards Third World countries, particularly if they are politically unacceptable to the United States. If the United States does not like the policies of a Third World country, it is not going to get loans from the International Development Bank. That is very clear. We cannot tolerate that. That is not the way an international rule of law should operate. It should not have ideological overtones. That is not the new international economic reality we must face. But we say nothing about that.

We know that the incredible weakness of the commodity markets is forcing many of those Third World countries into positions of utter desperation. Again, the voice of Canada has been stilled on that matter. We are not arguing, as we should be, in world council for effective commodity agreements. We buy once again a position from our ideological friend to the south, and everything has to be the open-market system. It is not working for us and it is not working for them. It is time we began to look at the need for forms of agreements which would provide that stability.

The international banking system is no longer dealing effectively with the debt problems of the Third World. We are simply putting off the accounting to a future date, perhaps for another generation. It is interesting when we talk about domestic orders, from time to time to hear Conservative Members of Parliament saying we have to control the debt here domestically because we do not want future generations to pay the bill.

• (1030)

Should we not raise the same question internationally? Should we not be asking the same type of questions with respect to how we propose to do that in the world market which, in many ways, has far more impact on us? Should we not also be asking what currency will make the world go round? What will be the medium of exchange if the U.S. dollar falls and falters as it has been for the last few years? It has been devalued by almost 20 per cent against the Japanese yen.

I suppose my regret is that those were not the kinds of issues or questions I heard or saw addressed by the Minister of State for Finance or by the Government in bringing this Bill before us.

I pay my compliments to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade who is in the Chamber. His committee will study this issue in the fall. It is an important issue. I pay my compliments to the Chairman for giving leadership in this area. However, we now have a Bill before us on this matter. It is here in the House today at third reading stage. I thought that the opportunity to raise these matters would have been before us. As I say, I know the reason why it was not. I know the preoccupation and obsession that has so dominated the thinking of the Government in terms of the North American economic trade system. Its relationships only with the United States has pushed out consideration of all other matters. It has blinded us to the wider perspectives of those international responsibilities.

I hope that as we approach the dénouement of that particular preoccupation and members of the Conservative caucus realize just what a tortured road they have been following and what kind of false expectations and hopes they have been creating we can get back to reality and get back to what I believe is the Canadian stewardship and task; that is to say, to provide leadership on the multilateral international economic front where we can do some good, where we can try to reorganize the rules as well as try to reformulate the Bretton Woods Agreements in trade and finance. We can try to use the capacity of our leadership to mobilize other countries to bring about that type of commitment to reform. I believe that is an honourable, useful and important calling for Canada. It is one that I hope we will soon adopt.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few remarks on third reading of Bill C-68, which introduces changes to the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act which will give Canada authority to participate in the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency, or MIGA as it is known.

MIGA will be able to provide insurance for foreign investors in Third World countries against non-commercial risks. The annual report of the World Bank for 1986 states that there are four categories of non-commercial risk which will be covered in particular. They are: the transfer risk resulting from host government restrictions on conversion and transfer; the risk of loss resulting from legislative or administrative action or omission of the host government which has the effect of depriving the investor of ownership, control, or substantial benefit from his investment; the risk resulting from the repudiation of a contract by the host government when the investor has no access to a competent forum, faces unreasonable delays in such a forum, or is unable to enforce a final judgment; and, finally, the risk of war and civil disturbances.

The establishment of MIGA is in general accord with the recommendations of the Brandt Commission on north-south relations. Certainly, there are advantages to seeing this type of an insurance scheme that we hope will promote increased investment in the Third World. That kind of investment flow is very important. On the face of it there are advantages both to developing and developed countries in this type of process. There are advantages to Canadian business in establishing MIGA.

MIGA has particular advantages in view of the problems that have developed in terms of loans to Third World countries over the last few years. These loans have crippled the economies of Third World countries. We have the debt crisis where countries such as Mexico, Brazil and Peru face astronomical debt servicing charges that no one expects they will be able to meet in any reasonable way. The countries of Africa, which have been crippled by famine and drought, have also been crippled by the debt loads that they have upon them. At the same time this debt structure threatens the stability of the financial system in the developed world because if some of these debtors default, that can cause a major problem with the banking systems of North America and Europe.

There are a great many advantages, on the face of it, to a system that instead of providing loans to Third World countries looks to equity investment. This means that developing countries would see only an out-flow of dollars when a venture had become profitable instead of payments having to be made whether the venture is profitable or not, as with a loan. From the point of view of the developed countries that we hope will be doing the investing, the investors would realize that a profit was required. They would invest only after they had looked twice. There would be a more realistic assessment of the risk, something that did not happen in the heady days of making some of the loans that took place in the late 1970s.

Equity investment can also create major long-term problems for the countries that receive the immediate stimulus of the investment. There can be the loss of control over key economic sectors, which is something that the present Conservative Government does not seem to recognize, or does not care about, when it comes to Canada's own economy. However, it is something that is of concern to several Third World countries. They find themselves between a rock and hard place. They know that on the one hand they need the in-flow of capital, while on the other they are very concerned that equity investment can result in a permanent loss of any control over their own economies.

This is the crux of the whole international economic situation. Are countries in the Third World going to have some control over their own economies or will those economies be managed out of New York, London, Tokyo and West Germany?

The major situation that we need to face in terms of the developing countries is that while there are increasing costs for inputs they face declining commodity prices. I would just like to quote from the World Bank annual report which discusses non-oil commodity prices:

> The dollar price of nonoil commodity exports from the developing countries declined by about 10 percent in 1985.

A decline of 10 per cent in commodity prices for countries that are already poor means that these countries have to cut back their standard of living by at least 10 per cent and more when we consider that the inputs they require in terms of oil and machinery have all gone up in price. The report goes on:

> This drop was caused both by slow demand growth since early 1985 in industrial countries and, in the case of grains, cotton, and oilseeds, by excess supply resulting from exceptionally bountiful crops or shifts in the price-support and export policies of major suppliers.

• (1040)

When prices drop for Third World countries they often respond by producing more. Our whole economic system is based on the fact that in order to compete people have to produce more. When everybody produces more it creates a glut in the market and, as a result, commodity prices fall further.

The report also stated:

> Producing countries, in need of export earnings to finance imports and debt service, have given few signs of restraining production in the face of falling prices. The average dollar price of metals and minerals fell by 5 per cent and has declined by about 30 per cent since 1980.
> Tin prices fell dramatically, and trading in tin was suspended at the London Metal Exchange in late October when the International Tin Council ran into financial difficulties and could no longer support the price of tin.
> Food prices in dollar terms declined by an average of 12 per cent, after a 6 per cent increase in 1984. The price of beverages, however, picked up substantially during the fourth quarter of 1985, influenced strongly by the coffee boom, the result of a severe drought that is expected to reduce Brazil's 1986/87 coffee crop by between 30 per cent and 50 per cent.

Bad news in Brazil where there was a drought meant good news for coffee producers in other parts of the world. That was the only possibility of good news. Since then the price of coffee has gone down. The report further states:

> The price of tea, however, declined to about half its 1984 level by the end of 1985, following large increases in production in tea producing countries. The prices of cereals and fats and oils dropped by 66 per cent and 24 per cent, respectively.

Imagine a drop of 24 per cent in the price of basic commodity exports. The report further states:

> World cotton acreage increased by 11 per cent in 1984/85 in response to favourable prices the year before; world prices for cotton then fell 21 per cent in the 1984/85 season. Since then, however, the United States and China, both major cotton producers, have taken measures to reduce cotton production.

That report is from The World Bank, a conservative organization that is not given to making extravagant claims.

The drop in commodity prices and the effect on Third World countries is the primary problem that we face. While we pat ourselves on the back for passing this law which will make it easier for investors to move into Third World countries, we must ask if it would have made any difference if the inflow of funds in the late 1970s to Third World countries had been in the form of equity investment, as this law provides for and gives some assurance for, or if it had been in the form of loans, as happened.

When commodity prices drop and input prices increase, it does not matter what the situation is. The economies of those countries are in serious difficulty. Sooner or later we will have to confront that situation. We cannot have it both ways. We cannot have an international trading structure that robs developing countries of a fair price for their commodities, and at the same time hope to have a stable investment and loan climate in those same countries.

I wish to turn to the analogy of the prairie farm in the late 1930s. My father lost a farm in Saskatchewan at that time. I do not think it would have mattered a great deal if he had had someone else who had invested and taken a share of the farm profits, rather than having a mortgage that he was unable to pay because of poor crops and prices. It would have meant that he was a sharecropper instead of a bankrupt farmer. I do not think there is a great deal of difference in the economic status of those two.

The Bretton Woods agreements were reached at the end of the Second World War in order to attempt to stabilize the international economic situation. It would be interesting to look at some of the expectations that we had at that time.

In July, 1943, Henry Morgenthau, the then Secretary of the Treasury in the United States, produced a preliminary draft outline of a proposal for an international stabilization fund of the United Associated Nations. At that time he stated that "monetary stabilization, commercial policy, the provision of long-term international credit, promotion of stability in the prices of primary products, and arrangements for relief and rehabilitation are problems that join at innumerable points", and that they had to be dealt with separately and then integrated.

He also stated that there were, "three inseparable monetary tasks: to prevent the disruption of foreign exchanges, to avoid the collapse of monetary systems, and to facilitate the restoration and balanced growth of international trade", which all required international action.

He pointed to the need to avoid the "repetition of exchange instability and monetary collapse that followed the last war", that is, the 1914-1918 war. He called for an international stabilization fund. He pointed out that while some people wished to have one agency look after all the different concerns, the United States wished to have separate agencies. He also stated that for the fund to work needs co-operation "to reduce trade barriers and to terminate discriminatory practices that have in the past hampered the balanced growth of international trade. The nations of the world can be prosperous only if they are good neighbours in their economic as well as their political relations".

He also stated, "world prosperity like world peace is indivisible". We need to learn that lesson, yet we have a system where we are attempting to defend and develop a fortress-like mentality that allows some people in some nations of the world to exist in a degree of prosperity, and even in our own nation, there are huge gaps of poor people, while other nations live in total and absolute poverty with very little hope of getting out of the morass of debt and underdevelopment. As long as we have a system that perpetuates unjust commodity prices compared with high input costs, this situation will continue.

Like the previous speaker, I had a chance to visit Nicaragua last week with the Canadian Mission for Peace. One of the things that impressed me most, apart from the spirit of the people and their commitment to the revolution and the hope for peace, was the inflation. We had to carry a small bag of money in order to purchase lunch or supper.

That country is suffering from a United States embargo designed to cripple its economy. It is suffering a surrogate war with the United States paying the mercenary Contras to fight against and destroy development.

We visited a small co-operative in the hills of Nicaragua far from anywhere where a group of some 11 families were attempting to develop self-sufficiency and an economy where they could look after themselves. This was not a strategic economic unit in Nicaragua, except from the point of view that it was enabling those people to feed themselves. This place, where 11 families were living, was the target of a Contra attack, financed by the United States. The Contras came down in the middle of the night, attacked these people, destroyed their homes, burnt their tractors, and forced them to flee. Then those families returned and tried to rebuild.

This is the reality of what is happening in Nicaragua where the Government is trying to work with its people to develop a decent economy and where the United States is doing everything it can to destabilize that economy. The result is the kind of inflation about which I was speaking, inflation which is making it very difficult for that country to survive and for ordinary people to survive.

This is very germane to the topic which we are discussing. We hope that there will be increased investment in Third World countries, and we hope that it will result in improvements in the living standards of those countries. I emphasize that we must address the fundamental problems of peace and the fundamental problems of an unjust economic structure. Unless we are prepared to do that, the proposals for increased investment and for providing insurance for that investment will not amount to very much.

While we support the proposal, we urge the Government to make its voice heard on the international scene and to speak out in favour of peace for countries like Nicaragua, which means no more funding for the Contras who are waging war on the people of Nicaragua. Also our country must speak out for a just economic policy which will provide fair commodity prices.

As well our country must realize the commitment made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) during the last election, the commitment which was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) when he spoke before the United Nations in 1984, that is, to move toward .7 per cent of our Gross National Product being provided for official development assistance. That commitment was made in good faith before the United Nations, but they have done nothing but welsh and back away from it. Other nations are doing the same thing, but that does not make it any better for Canada to be doing it.

Developing nations need an infusion of development assistance to develop their own economies. I urge the Government not to pat itself on the back for providing this insurance system for private investment in Third World countries. I think that is important, but even more important is tackling the question of commodity prices and reducing the threat of war and military expenditures in Third World countries.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I was very glad to hear both previous speakers on this subject, but I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly) to explain further his concern about trading debt for equity, having Canadian, American, or other lending countries buy up local industries or utilities with the debt that the country owes us where those industries and utilities exist. I assume the reason it would be worth while acquiring that equity is that the owners of the money in our country would expect to make money; they do not expect to lose money.

Does the Hon. Member envisage that when those countries give up the equity in their factories, their railways, or whatever it may be in exchange for their foreign debt, it will mean that they have less income in the country, lower wages perhaps, and less dividend? Second, will it have any effect in reducing inflation? Third, will there still be more debt? Will it stop the debt process, or will the debt arise again? Finally, what will happen when there is no more equity to sell off?

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question. I think this is an extremely important situation.

Given the very high debts of a number of countries, there is a process by which other people are purchasing those in exchange for equity. What we need to realize is that Third World countries are not poor countries when it comes to resources. Third World countries are often extremely rich in resources. What they do not have is control over the development of their own resources and control over the prices for which those resources are being sold on the international market.

When some of the oil producing countries got control back in the 1970s and OPEC became a very powerful cartel, we saw how the price of oil immediately went up very significantly, which resulted in some very severe shocks to all parts of the world.

If developing countries had more control over their own resources, we would be in a completely different situation. However, when people purchase equity, they are really purchasing control over resources. We have seen it in Canada in the past where our resources ended up being in the hands of foreign multinationals. This means that we as a nation have not had the capacity or ability to mould our own economic future in the way we would have liked.

I think the purchase of loans for equity will result in less control and will result in a continuing outflow of money from Third World countries, because the people who are making the purchases are still looking to get a good return. There will be a continuing outflow of money and, in addition, there will be a loss of control.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I have just a short question for the Hon. Member. When the Hon. Member travelled to Nicaragua, did he visit the jails and the people who were incarcerated?

Why does he not talk about free elections in Nicaragua so that people can really choose the Government they deserve instead of having a dictatorship? Why does he not talk about Guatemala, a democratic country of which he should be supportive?

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, the people of Nicaragua have had a free election. They have not had a blood bath following their revolution.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Manly: I would advise more members of the Conservative caucus to visit Nicaragua and see for themselves.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 19(4) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 21.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 21

THE HOMELESS

SITUATION OF WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, 22 per cent of homeless Canadians are women—older women, single mothers, sick women. Before a national conference on accommodation for the homeless, National Action Committee on the Status of Women President Louise Dulude and Mrs. Claudette Godley, co-ordinator of Montreal's "Chez Doris" home for women, both stated that poverty is the main reason why women are homeless or living in substandard housing. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women (Mrs. McDougall) issued a press release full of pious wishes in which she concludes by expressing hope that the conference will go a long way towards improving housing conditions for women.

Mr. Speaker, knowing as we do that the Minister responsible for housing did not announce anything new at the conference, that the Minister responsible for the Status of Women paid lip service to the cause, and that this Government did not even bother to address the 600 demonstrators of the Front d'action populaire en réaménagement urbain who marched on Parliament Hill last Tuesday, we can only conclude that this Government simply does not have the political will to solve the homeless problem.

MINES AND MINING

CONDOLENCES TO FAMILIES OF THREE VICTIMS OF NORITA MINE ACCIDENT AT MATAGAMI

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the people of Abitibi were shocked when they heard about the fatal accident which took the lives of three men working 2,000 feet underground on a drilling platform at Matagami's Norita Mine, a subsidiary of Noranda.

The victims are Marco Turcotte, a 22-year old married man, and two single men, Gilles Laplante and Henri Widz, aged 32 and 30 respectively. All three were Val-d'Or residents working for R.M. Limited, a drilling firm.

One third of the work had been completed when the accident occurred. The team had finished its shift and the platform was halfway up level 11—50 feet from ground level—when one of the walls of the hole collapsed above them, dragging them down their fatal fall.

The drilling company has been operating in Val-d'Or for six years and this is the first such accident.

As a former miner I can appreciate how these families feel and I offer them my condolences in their great hardshsip.

MULTICULTURALISM

CRITICISM OF ADVERTISEMENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in a Globe and Mail ad of September 17, Mr. Abbott, former director of the Canadian Immigration Service, downgrades those Canadians who are not Anglophones or Francophones of the professional class. Even though his poll contained many questions biased against immigrants, the multiculturalism answer nevertheless showed a clear majority of Canadians who want Canada to be made up of a diversity of people. In spite of that, Mr. Abbott and his wealthy friends want to shut out those coming from what he dismisses as the Third World.

By implication they ignore and insult Canada's Amerindians and Inuit whose land we continue to steal, they ignore and insult Canadians from China who put Canada's railway through the Rockies, Canadians from Japan who made the West Coast bloom till our Government imprisoned and robbed them, Canadians from northern, central and eastern Europe who ploughed and populated our Prairies, Canadians from Italy, Portugal, Greece and the Middle East who built and service our post-war cities, and Canadians from the Caribbean, Latin America and Asia who now do so many of our lowest paid jobs.

I call on the Government to repudiate this destructive action by a former director of the Canadian Immigration Service.

CANADIAN SPACE AGENCY

NATIONAL CAPITAL LOCATION URGED

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the new frontier of space is upon us all, and as we as a nation take a quantum leap into the future we must make sure that we land with our collective feet on terra firma.

The proposed Canadian Space Agency will play the vital role in co-ordinating, managing and administering all of Canada's efforts in this exciting new challenge. The location of this agency is, therefore, vital.

Close, continuous co-operative efforts with many federal Departments, foreign countries, such as the U.S.A., Japan, the Soviet Union and members of the European Space Agency, are essential. Immediate access to the critical mass of scientists, scientific knowledge and many of Canada's leading research organizations, such as the National Research Council, the Department of Communications and many high technology firms, is essential.

My colleagues, the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney), the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper), and myself agree that the logical, rational, neutral and least expensive option for Canada's Space Agency is within our National Capital Region.

ILLITERACY

CALL FOR NATIONAL ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, recent studies show that one in five Canadians are illiterate. More than four million people cannot read or write well enough to function adequately in our society and one million more cannot read or write at all.

The problem of illiteracy spreads across all groups in society, regardless of age, economics or region. Some 60 per cent of the Canadian illiterate population are unemployed and are not looking for work. Most do not even qualify for government training programs because they have not accumulated enough years in school.

All Canadians can help solve the problem of illiteracy, but the federal Government has an especially critical role to play. The federal Government has the influence and resources necessary to begin a national war against illiteracy. The Government of Canada should begin by developing a national advertising campaign on illiteracy. Then the Government should follow it up with concrete, specific programs to assist those countless thousands of Canadians.

NORTH AMERICAN AEROSPACE DEFENCE COMMAND

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF INAUGURATION

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, today we are celebrating the birthday of an organization, an organization dedicated to preserving peace and security for the people of the North American continent.

This year we observe the thirtieth anniversary of the inauguration of the North American Aerospace Defence Command. I am pleased that our Government's defence White Paper commits Canada to continuing our partnership in NORAD. Like any good partnership, NORAD is an experience in sharing, sharing the duties, sharing information, sharing the risks, and sharing the satisfaction of contributing to a strong and vigilant North America. NORAD is a successful, vibrant, binational commitment.

On this thirtieth anniversary I congratulate all those who have contributed to this success, to the future benefits to which we look forward, and to the way in which NORAD enhances our prospects for peace and security.

SPORTS

VIOLENCE IN HOCKEY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, this week Canadians have received four strong messages regarding hockey violence.

Yesterday the NHL, finally succumbing to public pressure, has moved to try to end bench-clearing brawls by instituting hefty fines and suspensions. Unfortunately, the NHL has not chosen to deal directly with individual fighting. Yesterday as well the federal Government's Commission on Fair Play unveiled its media campaign aimed at reducing violence in minor hockey through a series of shock-value ads that show it as repulsive. It is a good start, Mr. Speaker.

We also received bad news. In Estevan, Saskatchewan, this week a junior hockey player from North Dakota received a fractured vertebra during an exhibition game Wednesday night. There have been 107 spinal cord injuries in the past 13 years. Half of these hockey players have become paraplegics or quadriplegics.

Finally, Canada and the world saw that you can play hockey hard and fight-free of violence and draw millions of viewers. The Canada Cup showed us that if hockey is good, fast, clean, and most of all competitive, we do not need the goons at any level to attract the crowds.

Let us continue the campaign to remove violence and injury from our ice rinks.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

IN FASHION

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, will the House of Commons become the proper setting for a fashion show? Until recently the very original socialist Members had always taken positions contrary to what is normal, and the way they used to dress had an eccentric touch. Opportunist as they are and ever prepared to shift with the winds—Aquilon or Zephir—they went to see their haidresser, their make-up artist, and their tailor.

Such is the new look of the socialists, Mr. Speaker. Henceforth they will hide their pins, their stickers, and their original colour.

In short, Mr. Speaker, they will now betray the dissident minority of society which they were trying to represent. Their new American advisor said so: You have to do this!

Anyone who refuses to toe the line will have to leave the front benches of this ever more chameleon-coloured Party.

THE HOMELESS

URGENT NEED TO REMEDY SITUATION

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, a good many newspaper articles recently drew our attention to the plight of homeless men and women who are denied access to temporary shelter. In a number of cases these are psychiatric patients who are not sick enough to be given a bed in an institution, but who are unable to live alone. In other cases they are individuals suffering from chronic alcoholism or drug abuse. In all cases, Mr. Speaker, they create a major problem: they are very likely to disturb other tranquility-seeking homeless people.

The Ottawa Citizen related the case of six women who were denied access to temporary shelter. Last week, 49-year-old Kenneth Ryan of Halifax, a vagrant well known to the police and suffering from particular problems, was killed.

This week, Mr. Speaker, in Montreal's Jeanne-Mance Park, a seriously injured older woman was found lying in a sleeping bag next to a suitcase containing all her personal belongings.

Can such destitute people be abandoned on the streets? I urge the Government to show leadership and provide community homes before winter for these homeless people who are suffering from problems which prevent them from using the same facilities as other homeless people.

POLITICAL PARTIES

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—MINING—POSITION ON FLOW-THROUGH SHARES

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the mining exploration depletion allowance is a critical component of the tax rules which make flow-through shares attractive to investors. On December 16 last, in considering Bill C-23, the NDP finance critic denounced the flow-through shares. He said:

> I decided that where you have a measure which should fundamentally be rethought, we should simply tell the Government to stop it, take the measure away, start all over again and strike out the loophole.

Last night during finance hearings on tax reform and the specific proposal to phase out the mining exploration depletion allowance, the same NDP finance critic was heard to endorse flow-through shares, the same flow-through shares he asked the Government to strike out nine short months earlier.

Why this flip-flop? The NDP finance critic answered the question himself last night when he said that it had been brought to his attention that there are 25 or 30 ridings across northern Canada in which this is an important issue.

Let no one think members of the NDP are prepared to let principles stand in the way of political expediency. Just watch them change their policies as often as they change their clothes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—MISSION FOR PEACE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, following our visit to Nicaragua last week, the Mission for Peace is convinced that Canada can play a key role both in persuading the United States that a peaceful solution in that area is possible, and in reinforcing international momentum for peace.

Specifically, the mission recommends that Canada take a stronger, more clear position against any further funding of the Contras.

Second, it recommends that Canada should offer to participate directly in the verification process through multilateral channels, including the United Nations, and to provide financial resources to the process in addition to the offer of technical expertise.

Third, it recommends that Canada take the lead in forming a special emergency reconstruction fund as recommended by the Caracas, meeting and fourth, establish a diplomatic presence in Managua.

Fifth, it recommends that Canada increase bilateral aid to Nicaragua based on Nicaragua's proven ability to administer and effectively deliver aid and the urgent needs which exist in the country, and that Canada examine ways to improve export-import relationships in Central America.

Sixth, the committee recommended that Canada urge the United States to lift the trade embargo as a sign of good faith in the peace process, and examine ways of improving the means of transportation between Nicaragua and Canada.

Seventh, Canada should offer aid for transitional measures such as the reconciliation commissions and the resettlement and integration of those granted amnesty, and eighth, develop a comprehensive Central American policy. I urge the Government to follow these recommendations.

POLITICAL PARTIES

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY'S PARLIAMENTARY NEWS SERVICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will now be offered two types of news services, one bulletin that deals with the truth and the other which should be called the "Tainted News Network". The "Tainted News Network", or TNN as it should be referred to henceforth, will report facts the way the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) likes them. That will probably save a lot of money considering he will not have to kick in his television set quite so often.

Here are a few examples of "Tainted" news coverage. The true version: The Prime Minister's ship is sinking fast. The TNN version: There was a slight drizzle on the deck of the SS Tory.

The true version: Minister forced to resign after wife obtains a $2 million interest-free loan. The TNN version: Minister takes sabbatical to study wife's creative financing skills.

True version: Prime Minister spends $350,000 of Tory funds to renovate house and build closet for Gucci shoes. TNN version: Prime Minister creates jobs, jobs, jobs for European shoe manufacturer.

The day after the next election the true version will be: Scandal-ridden Tory Government takes a beating at the polls. The TNN version will say: Inaccurate news coverage has led Canadians to believe that that there was a slight decrease in Tory popularity.

Claire Hoy's book will come out shortly as well. It will lambaste the Prime Minister for patronage and lifestyle—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

INDUSTRY

FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, almost two weeks have elapsed since a valid offer was presented for the purchase of Firestone Canada Inc. and almost 1,300 workers are waiting to hear whether that offer will be accepted. In light of the fact that Firestone has not given an indication one way or the other, what action has the federal Government taken to ensure that Firestone is operating in good faith?

I have suggested on numerous occasions that rather than have the Minister for Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. de Cotret) send civil servants to Akron, Ohio, in order to get the message to Firestone that the company had better bargain in good faith and be prepared to do everything possible to save those 1,300 jobs, he should carry that message himself to Akron, Ohio. It is not enough to leave 1,300 jobs up to civil servants. The Minister and the Government must show some leadership. I urge the Minister to book a flight to Akron this weekend to ensure that Firestone is bargaining in good faith in order to save those 1,300 Hamilton jobs.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—UNITED STATES STUDY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Sulphuric gas pollution in the United States is affecting our health and our economy, our lakes, our rivers and our forests, and our buildings and agriculture. Last April President Reagan made a statement in this Chamber which led the Prime Minister to conclude that there had been a tremendous breakthrough for Canada on acid rain.

Given those facts, will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that the Prime Minister wrongly led Canadians to believe that progress had taken place by saying that an agreement with the United States was a realistic possibility? Does he admit that, in substance, the bottom line is that no progress has been made on acid rain with the United States as indicated by the publication today of this study and scientific report by NAPAP?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, those accusations are absolutely false, but what is perhaps even more disquieting is that when we are faced again with a major challenge on the acid rain question, a question which is vital to the future of Canada, the official spokesman for the Official Opposition, instead of trying to join with the Government of Canada in pressing the case for alleviation of the acid rain problem, chooses to try to make petty, partisan points out of an issue that is too important for petty politics.

My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, who is unavoidably out of the House today because of a long-standing engagement with the Liberal Premier of Prince Edward Island, issued a strong press release and statement this morning. We are challenging on a scientific basis the scientific evidence put forward by NAPAP. We understand it is not the position of the President of the United States. We intend to carry Canada's case and to protect Canada's interest. I would invite the co-operation of other Hon. Members of the House.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would join in supporting the Government if its policies on acid rain had been credible so far, but they have been just a sequence of public relation stunts and nothing more than that.

CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs seems to believe, the NAPAP report is a report that was paid for by the U.S. administration, not by the scientific community of the U.S. Therefore, it is a political report.

I must ask the Secretary of State why he and the Prime Minister have been silent for the past week since John Campbell, an assistant administrator in the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, appeared before a U.S. congressional committee in opposition to an acid rain Bill that is being proposed there. What kind of attitude is that considering the promises made in this Chamber by President Reagan and the enthusiastic demonstrations of success the Prime Minister seemed to convey to the Canadian public? He made a big deal out of it.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the highly partisan spokesman for the Official Opposition and I are in agreement on one thing—the NAPAP report is a political report, not a scientific report. It pretends to be a scientific report. We are challenging its scientific basis.

I should make clear how that report came to be. It was not mandated by the administration, it was the result of an act of Congress. It is not yet the position of the U.S. administration. We trust it will not become so. However, if we are to ensure that Canada's interest in fighting acid rain is advanced, we have to continue the fight vigorously and not walk away from the table as the Hon. Member did when he was Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Caccia: We always laugh at these desperate attempts of the Progressive Conservative Party to rewrite history. The Minister should know that the NAPAP report was written by 12 federal agencies, four national laboratories, and four presidential appointees. If that is not a statement by the administration I do not know what it is.

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN LAUNCHED BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I now have to raise with the Minister this sudden decision to spend money on a U.S. publicity campaign. In what is almost a deathbed repentance the Government decides in its fourth year to launch a publicity campaign on acid rain. Why did it not do it in its first year? As well, why not enlarge the budget to carry the campaign to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia where the Tory Governments have not yet signed the agreement?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope historians, when they read Hansard, will take a careful look at that question because it began by accusing the Government of doing nothing but public relations on acid rain throughout our first three years, and ended by asking why we did not mount a public relations campaign earlier in our mandate rather than now. The Hon. Member is answered by his own absurdity. However, I am not interested in exchanging partisan remarks with him.

He talks about rewriting history. Unhappily, he has no history to rewrite. What we are trying to do is protect not the history of Canada but the future of Canada against a very real threat from acid rain.

A report was brought down in the U.S. which purports to have a scientific basis. We believe it is scientifically incomplete and wrong. We intend to challenge it and spend money doing so. We intend to be present in the U.S. challenging it. I invite the Hon. Member to lift himself above petty partisan politics and join us in trying to protect the future of Canada.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—BINDING DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. While we are on the topic of rewriting history, we have heard continuously from the Prime Minister and other members of the regime that the bottom line of any trade agreement with the U.S. will be a binding mechanism for settling trade disputes. This morning the Prime Minister, in one of his musing interviews, said it may not be the right interpretation that we would have a binding mechanism—that may not be the way it appears when it is put down on paper.

Is the Prime Minister shifting ground once again on what our demands are in the negotiations? Have we changed our position? Are we now saying we do not necessarily want a binding mechanism for trade disputes?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not shifted ground. The only thing that has shifted is the view of the Opposition on free trade.

Mr. Axworthy: The Minister may want to consult with her Prime Minister who seems to be shifting his ground quite substantially.

CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Ontario, after being briefed by the trade negotiators, has clearly indicated that matters of government procurement are no longer part of the negotiation package accepted by the Americans. They are not even on the table. Given that, is what the Government is negotiating now really a sectoral trade arrangement? Has it abandoned the notion of a comprehensive free trade agreement? Have we now once again shifted our ground from the expectations put forward to the Canadian people?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not shifted and we are not confused. As far as Premier Peterson is concerned, he knows very well that the bulk of the new jobs created by the free trade agreement, estimated by the Economic Council at 40 per cent, would be in Ontario. It is in Ontario's interest to have a free trade agreement.

Mr. Axworthy: But you do not have a comprehensive free trade agreement.

Miss Carney: It will be comprehensive.

Mr. Axworthy: Oh, yes!

Miss Carney: It will not be sectoral. It will meet the needs of Canadians across the country.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—POSITION OF NEWFOUNDLAND GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have before me a letter of February 12, 1987, from the Prime Minister where he promised continuous and unbroken participation by the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador in the talks between Canada and France over the fishery dispute. What is the point of continuous and unbroken participation if the Government of Canada consistently ignores the position of the Government and people of Newfoundland and Labrador?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we do not consistently ignore the advice and representations of the Government and people and industry of Newfoundland. We have made arrangements, which I think are unparalleled in Canadian history, to involve the Government of Newfoundland, the fishermen of Newfoundland, and the industry of Newfoundland in the negotiations. They have been present for the last several months. They were in Paris for the negotiations which took place last weekend. The Premier of Newfoundland decided to withdraw, I hope temporarily, from those negotiations.

The Government of Canada has an obligation to proceed to try to establish an arrangement that will serve the interests of the fishing industry and the fishermen of Newfoundland, whatever the attitude of the Premier of Newfoundland regarding participation. I invite him back. The negotiations are going on and they would be better with his presence than with his absence.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT HALT TALKS

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, how can these talks continue without the Government breaking its promise of continuous and full participation? Why does the Government not halt the talks, sit down with the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, and come up with an acceptable position before it goes back to the negotiations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the letter quoted was an undertaking by the Prime Minister of Canada to do everything we can to ensure continuous participation by the Government of Newfoundland and others concerned. We are doing everything we can. We have involved them fully in briefings prior to the negotiations. We took them with us to Paris. They are welcome to be with us at the negotiations which will continue later on in Ottawa. Our commitment to having Newfoundland involved is continuous.

I repeat: This is going to be a very important decision if we achieve a negotiated settlement. It is in the interests of the Government of Newfoundland to have its Premier there. We hope he will accept the outstanding invitation of the Government of Canada to continue to play his part. We hope he will not follow the NDP line which is always to walk away.

STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries said in this House on January 28 that:

> Our commitment to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador is that any price which is too high for Newfoundland and Labrador is too high for Canada.

By its actions the Government has now taken the position that it knows what is best for Newfoundland and not the Government and people of Newfoundland. Is that not the highest form of unbelievable arrogance by the Government of this country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, neither the description of the facts nor the characterization is correct. For the first time in history, to my knowledge, in a negotiation of this kind, which is clearly within federal jurisdiction but which has an immediate and dramatic impact upon not just the Government of Newfoundland headed by Mr. Peckford but also the fishermen with their representatives, the fishing industry with their representatives, and other interests in Atlantic Canada, we have brought them in. We want to keep them in because we want this to be a negotiation that will serve the interests of all of Atlantic Canada and all of Canada. That is why we have taken this historic action of reaching out. For the time being, the Premier of Newfoundland, in answer to our reaching out, has walked out. We hope he will come back.

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE—FRENCH NOMINEE

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of record that the Government wants the entire boundary dispute on the East Coast of Canada to go to a third party, the International Court of Justice in the Hague, as soon as possible. That is according to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Why did Canada go along, without a murmur of protest, when this week in the United Nations France nominated its own chief negotiator in the Canada-France fishing talks to sit as a judge on this very same International Court of Justice? Is that not a little like inviting the hangman to sit on the jury?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, once again the answer, known to everyone interested in facts rather than rhetoric, is no, that is not at all the situation.

I am not sure, but perhaps the Hon. Member can tell us when he rises, why the Liberal Party, with its presumed interest in this question, did not lead on the question of the fishery in Newfoundland, as the walk-away New Democratic Party led on the question—

Mr. Murphy: We just walk away in the polls.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Excuse me, the walk-away violently NDP.

The answer with respect to the court is that Mr. Guillaume, if he is chosen to the court, will be prohibited by well known practices to sit on any case in which he has been in any way involved.

POOR FISH CATCH

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, Canada's new strategy is to negotiate with the French so they can fish for codfish even outside the disputed zone on the East Coast of Canada while the entire boundary dispute is sent to the International Court where the chief French negotiator sits as a judge. Boy, do we have the French on the ropes now!

Does the Minister not realize that the fishery this year is very poor and there is not enough for our own fishermen and their families, let alone negotiating the French fleet to enter our territory? How does he rationalize doing that, when his own Government has appointed a commission of inquiry that is investigating why the cod resource is so depleted on the east coast of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a melange of accusation, as well as the assertion of a couple of rather unique Liberal Party principles. One is that any negotiation should be carried out here on the floor of the House of Commons, telegraphing everything we are doing to the people with whom we are negotiating, rather than carrying it out so that it might come to a successful conclusion within the negotiating concept.

The second idea is even more breathtaking. It is that nations should not make appointments to international judiciary bodies because some issue involving those nations might sometime arise before those bodies. The way most sensible people deal with that question is to say that a person nominated to the bench cannot judge on a question in which he was involved.

The Hon. Member is suggesting on behalf of the Liberal Party that in effect Canada should no longer make nominations to international judicial agencies because some case respecting Canada might come up. That is absurd.

INDIAN CABINET MINISTER—KNOWLEDGE OF PRESENCE IN CANADA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. The Minister has now had an opportunity to review the transcripts of wiretap conversations which demonstrate clearly that CSIS was well aware of the presence in Canada of a Punjabi cabinet Minister several days ahead of time and yet took no action whatsoever to protect that Minister from possible attack.

Will the Minister now explain clearly to the House and the people of Canada why those who are responsible for this dangerous bungling which led to serious injury continue to work within CSIS?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I advised the House yesterday, I think the actions of the Hon. Member in releasing transcripts was completely irresponsible and could very well affect the success of the ongoing investigation in this matter. I do not intend to do anything that is going to impede that investigation. I think it is important that it proceed.

We must remember that four of the nine people involved here have already been convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to 20 years. I am not going to engage in debate on anything that might in any way impede the success of that investigation.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the Minister obviously refuses to accept his responsibility and answer the question.

[Translation]

UNION INFILTRATION BY CSIS AGENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has admitted that Marc Boivin was a paid CSIS agent with the CNTU in Quebec. Given the strong criticisms expressed by CNTU, QFL and CEQ officials concerning this dangerous infiltration of labour unions in Quebec, can the Minister assure the House that there is no source or agent of CSIS in Quebec unions or elsewhere, and especially that they never did act as agents provocateurs in the Quebec labour movement?

[English]

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have already advised the House, first, CSIS does not target labour unions because they are labour unions. That is not within our mandate. Second, anyone who is a security threat to Canada has the right to be targeted. I have admitted to the House that Mr. Boivin was a source, because he admitted that in court.

Upon learning of this, I went to the Act and called upon the Inspector General, as he is available under the Act, to conduct an investigation into these activities of Boivin. In addition to that, I asked the Osbaldeston committee—you will see it quite clearly in their mandate—to look at this whole matter of targeting and the whole matter of recruiting sources, and the whole matter of defining more clearly the roles between counter-subversion and lawful dissent. I believe I am carrying out my duties as Solicitor General under the Act in a careful and prudent way.

DISARMAMENT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF U.S.-U.S.S.R. ARMS CONTROL AGREEMENT—VERIFICATION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of External Affairs. I think we all agree that the historic announcement this morning by President Reagan and Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze on behalf of Secretary General Gorbachev on arms control, arms reduction, and nuclear testing is a significant turning point for our civilization.

Considering that Canada is upgrading its seismic verification capability in Yellowknife to world-class standards, coupled with our potential satellite capabilities, does the Minister see Canada playing a verification role in this vital arms reduction progress?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might respond to that question with three very brief observations.

The first is that the announcement from Washington today is accepted and welcomed by all of us in the House of Commons as a very important step forward, and I am sure that Members of the House of Commons would want to endorse and be associated with the congratulations that the Prime Minister is conveying to both President Reagan and Secretary General Gorbachev.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Second, as the Hon. Member so astutely pointed out, one of the surprising and important developments is that there has been an agreement, after an eight-year hiatus, to resume discussions on nuclear testing. That brings directly to the fore the importance of verification in which Canada has some very real expertise. That expertise will be available fully if it can be put into service.

Finally, I know that Members of the House will want to be brought up to date as fully as possible with what in fact has been discussed and decided in Washington, and what the next steps might be. I have, consequently, spoken this morning to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade to propose that, as a first step in ensuring that Parliament is fully informed, I would be prepared to make my senior officials available for a full in camera briefing relating to all of the information we have with regard to the nature of the agreement and subsequent steps. I think that briefing will occur on Tuesday morning.

DISASTERS

AIR-INDIA CRASH—AIRLINE'S SUIT AGAINST GOVERNMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns Air-India 182. The Minister will know that various officials of the federal Government, and the federal Government, are being sued by Air-India for $120 million. Air-India alleges in its Statement of Claim that the destruction of its aircraft with the consequent loss of life was due to the negligence of the defendants some of whom were federal government officials.

In paragraph 30 of its Statement of Claim Air-India indicates: "In the months of May and June 1985, the existence of circumstances posing a threat to Air-India's operations was brought to the knowledge of all the defendants in the form of letters and verbal communications from the plaintiff". Air-India is making a very serious allegation. It is suggesting that the federal Government is somehow negligent and responsible for the destruction of Air-India 182 because it prewarned the Government of Canada, or officials of the Government of Canada, by way of letters and verbal communications.

In view of the very serious allegations made in the Statement of Claim filed in the Supreme Court of Ontario and with the Federal Court of Canada, will the Deputy Prime Minister, on behalf of the Government of Canada, now initiate a full and complete judicial enquiry into the circumstances surrounding the destruction of Air-India 182?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member has already said, this case is before the courts. There are very extensive civil litigation proceedings presently being carried on which go to the very heart of the defence of this Government. While the Hon. Member may have a different opinion from this Minister, it is our opinion, and that of the Department of Justice, that we cannot discuss the case because it is before the courts.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Mazankowski—

An Hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Kelleher: —the then Minister of Transport, on June 25, 1985, said in the House as recorded in Hansard at page 6138:

> —in this particular case Transport Canada was not apprised of any specific threat against Flight 182. Therefore, the basic normal Air-India precautions and surveillance that they conduct were conducted in their usual manner. I repeat that we did have the additional RCMP security officers deployed as requested.

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION INQUIRY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, as you know we have had a Royal Commission inquiry into the Hinton rail disaster, another into the Ocean Ranger disaster. We had a Royal Commission inquiry into the conduct of a Minister of the Crown. There were lawsuits launched in two of those situations. Those lawsuits did not preclude a Royal Commission inquiry.

I would like to put the question again to the Deputy Prime Minister, as we in the Opposition have done for a great number of months now. In view of the tragic loss of life—329 people were murdered in the Air-India tragedy—in view of the allegations that there were advance warnings to the federal Government, and in view of the allegations that the federal Government may in fact have been in some way responsible, does the Deputy Prime Minister not believe it is time now to have a Royal Commission inquiry into all the circumstances surrounding the destruction of Air-India 182, and to look also into the conduct of various federal Government officials and the conduct of various Ministers of the Crown at the time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Solicitor General, I think, has outlined the position of the Government quite clearly. I would simply like to remind the Hon. Member that the Canadian Aviation Safety Board did in fact conduct a full investigation into this very horrible accident and perhaps the Hon. Member might want to revisit that report and look at its findings. I think he will find that the conclusions and findings very fairly comprehensive. Perhaps, upon reflection, the Hon. Member may very well consider that the report of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board was in fact a very full and comprehensive review.

ACID RAIN

POSITION OF UNITED STATES PRESIDENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

What will the Government be doing, apart from buying American advertising, on the matter on acid rain? And what does the Government intend to do to convince the U.S. President of the need for a drastic reduction in acid-rain-causing emissions? What effective measures will he take to convince the President?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the subject and the tone of the question!

We have already taken a major step because we have here in this House a statement from the President of the United States on the matter of acid rain. It is the first time we get such a position and we now have an obligation and a duty to make sure that the President and not a scientific group is speaking on behalf of the United States.

Secondly, the report that has just come out in the United States purports to be based on scientific evidence. Canadian scientists are absolutely not in agreement with the conclusions, and on a scientific basis we intend to question the findings of the American panel.

Of course there will be many other measures, and hopefully we can count on the co-operation of the Hon. Member and her party as well as other parties in this House, in order to be sure that Canada is protected against the threat of acid rain.

[English]

CANADIAN MESSAGE

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, while I welcome the statement as far as it goes, I would ask the Minister if he does not admit that perhaps the Canadian Government itself has been sending out a mixed message, for example, in accepting the joint envoys' report, which was a very complacent one? Of course, it has been getting a mixed message in reply from the American President. What is the Government going to do to ensure that we have a consistent message on acid rain getting out there, and that it gets right to the top?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have brought the message right to the top on several occasions. We have done it more effectively and assiduously than it had ever been done before. We also have an undertaking, what we consider to be an undertaking, from the President of the United States himself. We believe it is the President who speaks for the United States, not some groups of scientists which might be put together as a result of an act of Congress.

That is not to say that we do not have a problem. We have a very major problem regarding the commitment of the United States to accept the scientific evidence and to get on with the fight against acid rain. We are going to continue to press them at the highest levels. I will raise it with Secretary Shultz. The Prime Minister will continue to raise it with President Reagan. The Minister of the Environment has already been in touch, after the so-called report which was issued the other day, with his counterpart in the United States. We look forward to extensive co-operation, Member of Parliament to Congressmen, Senator—if I may use that word—to Senator, to try to ensure that Canada's message is received as effectively and pervasively as possible.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—CONTINUATION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on February 10, 1987, the Prime Minister, with respect to the Canada-France negotiations, said in the House: "We hope that the ultimate negotiations will meet with the complete satisfaction of the Newfoundland fishermen whose interests we are deeply committed to protecting". The Minister of Fisheries said on January 28: "If in the process, the demands of France exceed that which Canadian fishermen and Atlantic Governments can support, there will be no agreement".

The last time I checked, Newfoundland was an Atlantic Province, her Government an Atlantic Government. It has said no to the position put forward by Canada in Paris last weekend. In light of the commitments of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries, stated fully and openly in this House, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs how the Government can continue with negotiations as scheduled in October when the Canadian negotiating team, that is, the federal Government and all of the Atlantic Provinces, have not reached a consensus on a Canadian position to be put before the French in the October negotiations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite helpful that the Hon. Member has read into the record those statements made by my Prime Minister and by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries. They do represent the position of the Government of Canada. They are the reason why we broke all precedent and went ahead and established for the first time, I believe, in history, this kind of full participation in an international negotiation that rests technically and legally within the domain of the Government of Canada.

Newfoundland has been present, up until Saturday night when, on instructions from its Premier, its representative left a portion of the discussions. We regret that decision. We hope that Newfoundland will come back.

• (1150)

Newfoundland has been kept fully advised of what the Canadian position was going to be.

Mr. Tobin: For how long?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Hon. Member asks me for how long. I would have to verify for how long, but certainly, to speak of the events that have given rise to recent developments, certainly since the counsel, Mr. Fortier, carried out his consultations preparatory to the negotiations in France.

We have been trying to bring the provinces in. We brought the industry in. We brought the fishermen in. We brought them into a matter, into a negotiation which, strictly speaking, is our business. We know it is too important to hide behind jurisdictions. We want to have the best possible solution for all Canadians. We hope that the Government of Newfoundland will want the best possible solution, too. It can guarantee that much more by being present than it can by walking away.

CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that, strictly speaking, these negotiations are the business of every Atlantic Government and the business of every fisherman who makes his living from the sea in the Atlantic and not just the business of the Government of Canada.

Mrs. Mailly: He just finished saying that.

Mr. Tobin: I remind the Secretary of State that the Government entered into a process in which it committed itself to the principle that, if a position was put and a demand was made by France that exceeded the agreement of the provinces and if any province disagreed with the demand put and the negotiating position of the federal Government, no deal would be made.

Is the Secretary of State telling us that the Government of Canada, having done a mea culpa and having given an apology in the House of Commons last January for its early behind-the-back-door agreement, has now changed its position and is prepared to make a treaty with France notwithstanding the views of Newfoundland or any other Atlantic province? Is he telling us that there has been a change on the part of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have two comments, if I might. The first is that the Hon. Member quite properly drew attention to the fact that there is a brand new process here. We are not hiding behind jurisdiction. It is a process that was not in place under Liberal Governments. When Liberal Governments negotiated they shut everybody out. We are not shutting people out because that results in bad agreements. We have plenty of proof of that. We are trying to get a good agreement that will last, which is why we have brought the Government of Newfoundland, the industry of Newfoundland, and the fishermen of Newfoundland into the process.

Mr. Tobin: Is the new process still in place, yes or no?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Hon. Member asks whether or not a position has changed. Our position has not changed. The position of the Government of Newfoundland has changed for the moment in that the Premier has decided to absent himself from these discussions. We hope he comes back.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

APPLICATION TO POSTAL WORKERS DURING STRIKE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Yesterday I asked the Minister a question in which I referred to the Canada Labour Relations Board decision against Canada Post. On Wednesday I revealed the preliminary findings of the Post Office with regard to how workers felt intimidated in the letter carriers' dispute. I indicated to the Minister earlier this morning that I had talked with female workers who felt that they were threatened with dismissal unless they carried on the work that was normally done by the letter carriers.

Prior to any future Canada Post strike will the Minister ensure that his officials issue a clear statement explaining that workers do have a right to refuse work, as is the case under the Canada Labour Code?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday and as I indicated to my colleague this morning, I am looking into the situation and will get back to him next week.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Churchill on a short supplemental.

OBSERVANCE OF CODE BY CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister assure us that he will live up to Section 184 of the Canada Labour Code and ensure that those provisions of the Code which have been reaffirmed by a Canada Labour Board decision this week that grant the individual the right to refuse to do struck work will be upheld and that he, as the Minister of Labour, will ensure that Canada Post lives up to the law?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think that everybody, all parties and every Canadian, have to live up to the law, in particular those concerned with Section 184 of the Code.

IMMIGRATION

HONDURAS AND BOLIVIA—INTRODUCTION OF VISA REQUIREMENT

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. On September 1 of this year I asked the Minister whether he would consider imposing a visa requirement on Honduras considering the increasing number of Hondurans coming to Canada, particularly to Vancouver, claiming refugee status. It has become clear over the past two weeks that some of those Hondurans have been counselled by travel agents in Honduras to use the refugee system to claim entry to Canada rather than the regular immigration system. Indeed, they have been given false expectations about what would happen when they come to Canada.

Two weeks have passed. Can the Minister advise the House if he is prepared to proceed with imposing a visa requirement on Honduras, first to protect Hondurans from being taken advantage of and, most important, to ensure that our refugee system in Canada is not compromised or unduly burdened?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago we told the Hon. Member that we will consider the case of some countries from which we face problems in terms of refugee claimants. We have considered two particular cases in this regard, Honduras and Bolivia. Over the last nine months we have received 1,000 migrants from Honduras claiming refugee status and 300 from Bolivia. Accordingly, we decided as of midnight last night that visa requirements will be imposed on Honduras and Bolivia.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

PARLIAMENTARY NEWS SERVICE—POLITICAL BROADCAST REGULATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications or to the person designated to answer in her absence. It concerns the so-called Parliamentary News Service which should be called more appropriately the "Tory News Network" or TNN for "Tainted News Network".

As the Minister knows, in a few weeks from now the CRTC will invite public comment on the development of a proposed new policy on political broadcasting in Canada. Given the emergence of this new satellite service being undertaken by the Progressive Conservative Party, will the Minister ask the CRTC to extend its review of political broadcast regulations to include periods between elections and not just political campaigns? It is quite obvious that we need new regulations because of this type of abuse.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, considering that my hon. colleague, the Minister of Communications, is away on government business today, I will take notice of the question. I am sure that she will get back to the Hon. Member as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member on a short supplemental.

HOLDING OF INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State or, in his absence, to the Deputy Prime Minister, and deals with the TNM, the Tory or Tainted News Network.

The National Trademark and True Labelling Act prohibits the use of words or symbols aimed at misleading the public into believing that a service is under the patronage or control of the Government.

Is the Minister prepared to launch an inquiry to determine whether this Tory service violates the law by calling itself a Parliamentary news service?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to figure out why the Hon. Member is so upset about a new information service. I have to tell him that we certainly appreciate and thank him for highlighting this new service. It is receiving a great deal of attention.

What we are really looking at is that individual Members of Parliament and, indeed, political Parties in Canada, as a matter of routine issue press releases literally on a daily basis. The Hon. Member talks about confusion. I have just read through a few Liberal and NDP press releases and I have not seen so much confusion in many a year. The fact of the matter is that the Hon. Member should get with it. We now live in an electronic age. This is really an electronic form of a news release. If the Hon. Member wants to sit down with members of our Party perhaps we can update his Party's communications program and advance it into the new electronic age.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DEATH OF YUGOSLAV REFUGEE IN CALGARY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and it concerns Damir Durekovic, who was originally from Yugoslavia. He was a real political refugee who came to Canada in 1984. Tragically, his body was found last week in Calgary.

I wish to quote from his refugee examination hearing held on June 28, 1984: "The basis of his application was that he feared for his life as his father, also a refugee in West Germany, was murdered in July, 1983. Mr. Durekovic claimed that the murder was politically motivated due to the fact that his father had authored five books which were critical of the Yugoslav regime". The Croation community in Canada is very upset.

I wish to ask the Solicitor General if he will order a full and complete investigation into this tragic death.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Hon. Member was good enough to bring this to my attention by way of a letter, part of which he has quoted today. I was glad to be able to assist him in some small way. I asked my officials to look into this matter immediately and see what was happening.

I have now been advised by my officials that the Calgary police force are conducting an investigation, that it is a continuing investigation, and at this time it is under the purview and jurisdiction of the Solicitor General of Alberta.

If the Hon. Member has further facts to give me which may not be known to them, I will be happy to receive those facts and pass them on to the appropriate authorities.

AGRICULTURE

ASSISTANCE FOR TOBACCO GROWERS—APPLICATION OF RULES IN ONTARIO

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. He will know that last winter Agriculture Canada allotted $30 million to aid tobacco producers in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, and Prince Edward Island, in order that they could exit the industry or switch to alternate crops.

I wish to ask the Minister why the arrangement that was negotiated with the Government of Prince Edward Island which changed its targets is more flexible than that drawn up with Ontario where the rules and bureaucracy have added to the tobacco growers' frustrations instead of helping them to address the surplus problem.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): I appreciate the question of the Hon. Member. He must realize that in the tobacco reduction program, like many other areas, the Government has had to break new ground.

We sat down with the various provinces and the producer groups within each province and signed specific agreements that were unique and peculiar to situations.

The agreement with Ontario requires revision. The take-up is not as high as I would like it to be. Last week I met with representatives of the tobacco marketing board. I have requested that my provincial counterpart meet with the tobacco board, possibly as early as next week, for the purpose of reviewing the progress to date with the thought of relaxing the requirements in order that there can be a greater take-up in the Ontario program.

REQUEST FOR THIRD PARTY INTERVENTION TO ESTABLISH FAIR COMPENSATION PROGRAM

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Since the passage of time indicates that the Minister and his Government have decided to ignore the report of the tobacco subcommittee to the Standing Committee on Agriculture filed some four months ago, is the Minister still considering the requests made by the local governments in the various tobacco counties of southern Ontario for third party intervention with power to establish a fair compensation program to resolve the dispute between producers and the various governments as to what is a fair and equitable payment program, or has the Minister also rejected that suggestion?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): The Government has not rejected any recommendations from Members of Parliament, or recommendations from producers or marketing boards, regardless of what commodity they represent. The record will show that we have been extremely responsive.

The tobacco reduction program is a very responsible program. I believe it is a responsible action on our part that, as early as next week, we plan to sit down with the provincial Governments that are partners, and, of course, the third and most important partner, the producers themselves, and the marketing board, with the thought of revising the criteria in order that the take-up will be more sufficient.

Mr. Speaker: The last question will be from the Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

INDUSTRY

FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion I wish to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Tabling of Documents

Given the fact that 1,300 jobs are at stake in the riding of Hamilton East, and the fact that it has been almost two weeks since a bona fide offer was placed on the table for the purchase of Firestone Canada Inc., I wish to ask the Deputy Prime Minister what action the Prime Minister, the Minister involved, or the Deputy Prime Minister has taken to discuss directly with the president of Firestone in the United States in Akron, Ohio, how important it is that a deal be consummated in the Firestone situation? Has he simply left the question to be dealt with by civil servants because, in Parliament, Hamilton East does not count? Perhaps the Conservatives have written it off because in the last provincial election they were barely ahead of the Communists.

Why are the Minister and his Government not doing something to save those 1,300 jobs? Has he written off the people of Hamilton?

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of State (Small businesses and Tourism) and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking what steps have been taken by the Government. She is well aware that under the direction of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, some Departmental Officials are working with the company involved to bring the whole thing to a conclusion. The Hon. Member will certainly recognize that this is a private sector transaction and that all the Government can do and does indeed is to reply to the requests of interested parties. As in the case of all private sector transactions, its particulars cannot be discussed in public.

PETITIONS

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the City of Toronto who object to Bill C-55. The petitioners feel that it will have the effect of preventing refugees from reaching our borders, or if they reach our borders, they will be turned away without their claim being properly heard.

• (1210)

They also object to the concept of a safe country which has no foundation in law. They point out that a better system was proposed nearly two years ago by the standing committee of Parliament.

Therefore, they pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that Government and Parliament will withdraw Bill C-55 and substitute the sort of legislation for which the standing committee asked two years ago, and in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

OPPOSITION TO DISCONTINUATION OF CN RAIL SERVICES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is both an honour and a privilege for me to present a petition signed by 200 residents of my Glengarry—Prescott—Russell riding who are strongly urging the Federal Government and this Parliament to make sure that the CN Rail service between Ottawa and Montreal, and also between Ottawa and Sudbury continue to operate and does not disappear as provided in an internal document of CN Rail.

Wherefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to persuade the Government to take the necessary steps.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition signed by a number of Canadian citizens from St. John's, Newfoundland and Vancouver and Surrey, British Columbia. They humbly petition the House to show that Bill C-55 will result in many, and perhaps most, refugees who reach our borders being turned away without having their claim heard on the merits of their case.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that Government and Parliament withdraw Bill C-55 and substitute legislation embodying the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of claims of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission, universal access to such hearings for every applicant in Canada, and the right to appeal on the basis of fact.

SAFETY OF REAR SEAT AUTOMOBILE PASSENGERS

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present a petition signed by residents of Brantford (Ontario), Lethbridge (Alberta), Lindsay (Ontario), Aylmer (Quebec) and Ottawa.

The petitioners are asking for changes to be made to the highway safety regulation. They believe that rear seatbelts are now inadequate and that the sufferings of highway collision victims could be greatly reduced or avoided. They believe also that the costs of medical care could be also reduced and eliminated.

For these reasons and many others, Mr. Speaker, they are asking Parliament to agree to make compulsory the installation of three-point adjustable safety belts for rear seat passengers, and also the installation of inflatable bags at the front of cars.

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL AID FOR CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING PROGRAMS

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present a second petition signed by residents of the City of Victoria, British Columbia. The petitioners believe that delay in introducing new programs for funding co-operative housing projects and the Government's half-hearted support of its programs have meant increased hardship for those Canadians who have to resort to sleeping in tents and on park benches.

For these reasons and many more, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to increase assistance immediately for emergency shelter and co-operative housing.

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of Canada from Ottawa to Vancouver. The petition asks Parliament to consider the effects of Bill C-55 and expresses concern about the refugee status determination process.

It states that while the standing committee of Parliament has proposed a new procedure for refugee determination which is quicker and fairer, the current legislation, Bill C-55, be withdrawn and new legislation be considered.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that the Government enact legislation which will embody the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of refugee claimants before a refugee board independent of the Immigration Commission.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 29

CANADA-FRANCE AGREEMENT—FISHING RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to written notice under the provisions of Standing Order 29, to move that the House do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public concern, that being the Canada-France fisheries negotiations.

Given the fact that these negotiations are now continuing and the federal Government appears to have every intention of concluding an agreement without Newfoundland's involvement, and given that such an agreement would not be placed before the House for debate, I believe that an emergency debate is required now to permit Members of Parliament an opportunity to persuade the Government to reconsider its decision to continue these talks with France.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair received notice of the application of the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. Harris) who has raised a matter which is of very great concern to him, to other Hon. Members from the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and to all Canadians.

The House will remember that some time ago there was an emergency debate on this issue. The Hon. Member of course would urge that there has been a recent event, as a consequence of which certain persons representing the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador apparently are not, at least for the moment, with the Canadian negotiating team. The Hon. Member is concerned about that, as I am sure are all Hon. Members, and has urged upon the Chair that the House be adjourned to debate this matter on an urgent basis this afternoon.

I want to assure the Hon. Member for St. John's East that the Chair has given it very careful consideration. I feel that under the circumstances perhaps it is not necessary to go ahead with an emergency debate this afternoon.

However, I want the Hon. Member to know that the entire issue is taken seriously by the Chair, as I know it is by other Hon. Members.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: It is my obligation to make a ruling in the House in respect of amendments to Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

I think I should begin by pointing out to the House and to the listening and watching public that there are 77 motions on the Notice Paper in amendment to Bill C-55. I have examined these motions and will allow debate to proceed on the motions which are acceptable at this time.

I want Hon. Members to know that the majority of these amendments were received late yesterday, and I want to congratulate the staff of the Journals and the Public Bills Offices for the long hours they put in in preparing the motions and the material to brief me this morning. I know that some of our officials were working until 5 a.m. this day in order to give me the briefing I need so that the convenience of all Hon. Members is properly met.

Motions Nos. 2 and 3 will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13, and 14 are attempts to amend Clause 14 of the Bill. They will be grouped together for debate, with a vote on Motion No. 13 first. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 13 obviates the necessity for a vote on the remainder of the group. However, a negative vote on Motion No. 13 requires separate votes on Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 14.

• (1220)

Motions Nos. 15, 25, 26, 28, 31, 32, 33, 35 and 36 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately. All of these motions deal with the concept of a credible basis for refugee claims.

Motions Nos. 18 and 21 will be debated together with an affirmative vote on Motion No. 18 obviating the question being put on Motion No. 21. A negative vote on Motion No. 18 will require the question to be put on Motion No. 21. Motions Nos. 27, 29 and 34 will be debated together but voted upon separately.

I want to advise Hon. Members that the Chair will return to the House with a more definitive ruling as soon as possible.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking to your ruling, but I just want to make a point and indicate a position in the event that I may not be in the House when it comes up.

It is my understanding that there are amendments on the Order Paper presented by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) who is unavoidably detained today. There has been a request from the Official Opposition that the amendments in his name be moved by another Member. We have considered this matter; we have considered it in the light of Standing Order 114(10) which points out that report stage is there to provide Members who are not Members of the committee with an opportunity to have the House consider specific amendments they wish to propose. It also goes on to say that it is not meant to be a reconsideration of the committee stage of the Bill.

I point out that the amendments that are on the Order Paper were tabled in committee, but only one was moved by the Hon. Member at clause by clause stage. I impute no motives in this but the Government is content to have these motions moved by the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), I believe.

I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to Standing Order 114(10) which in part reads:

> NOTE: The Speaker will not normally select for consideration by the House any motion previously ruled out of order in committee and will normally only select motions which were not or could not be presented in committee.

I make that point and indicate in the spirit of having debate on the amendments that we are naturally prepared to have any amendments which the Chair finds to be in order moved by the Hon. Member for Davenport rather than the Hon. Member for York West.

I do ask the Chair to consider the spirit of parliamentary reform, the spirit of the legislative committee, the spirit of the discussion, of the hearing of witnesses and the clause by clause consideration in committee where the whole purpose of clause by clause discussion is to have ample time to discuss it, and ease the work of this House, since we do have several committees sitting at one time, by placing amendments at committee and endeavouring to have them either talked out, passed or not. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider that in your ruling.

I indicate formally that the Government is prepared to allow those amendments that you find to be in order standing on the Order Paper in the name of the Hon. Member for York West moved by the Hon. Member for Davenport.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mr. Hawkes) on the same point of order?

Mr. Hawkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is a follow-up in the same vein. Seldom have I been on a legislative committee that spent so many hours hearing public testimony or that made so many amendments to a Bill. I think it speaks to the complexity of this Bill. We also chose in that committee to group items, I think in a way similar to the way you have grouped them for us today, but we took things out of sequence.

I would like to bring to your attention that at about five o'clock on Friday, September 11, we negatived two amendments in committee known as N-4-17 and N-4-27. I think you will find that they are identical to Motion No. 2 which is before us this afternoon. Perhaps you would like to have a little more time to examine the record and those two particular amendments, Mr. Speaker, and that it might be wiser for us to begin the debate this afternoon on Motion No. 3.

I would also suggest that throughout the course of dealing with the 77 amendments, from time to time some input from Members of the House who were actually in committee could be helpful in organizing ourselves as we proceed.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to the fact that in the same session of Parliament, Parliament should not pronounce upon the same issues. My distinct impression is that many of the issues dealt with in Bill C-84 are being dealt with in Bill C-55. Is my understanding of that situation correct? Should we be pronouncing upon a number of issues which appear to many people to have been touched upon in an earlier Bill passed in the same session of Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Two points of order have been raised in the last few minutes, one by the Minister of State (Mr. Lewis), and one by the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). As I indicated to the House, the ruling that I have made is the first ruling; I will be returning to the House as soon as possible with respect to the remainder of the matters that must be decided.

It would be possible to go ahead at this time with Motion No. 3, while perhaps I have some time to consider the matter raised with respect to Motion No. 2. That might be the easiest way to approach things. If that met with the approval of the House I would suggest that that is how we proceed for now.

The Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) has a point of order. I have not been ignoring him. I now have a chance to recognize him and give him the floor.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, my point relates to what was said by the Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis), and the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mr. Hawkes) about the work done in committee.

First, I wish very sincerely to congratulate the staff of Journals, the Clerks and the Speaker on their hard and speedy work. I wish to thank the staff of Journals and the Clerks for their assistance in recent days and weeks. Their work has been vital.

I wish to comment on the point which the Minister rightly raised, that our plan is to give people ample time, as the Minister puts it, in committee to consider all these matters. Well, Mr. Speaker, there wasn't ample time. I wish to draw the attention of the Speaker and the Members to a problem, in that cases like this may warrant some administrative action or possibly a reconsideration of some parts of our rules of order, particularly the one that provides that debate on the report shall begin within 48 hours of it being tabled. If it does not require it, it seems to provide for that. Although that measure was relaxed for a day this time, the situation this week has brought to a head rather extraordinary circumstances.

The committee's work was extraordinarily heavy. It worked for 55 hours in six days and dealt with 30 groups of witnesses, sometimes as many as four in a group, and as many as 10 witnesses in one day. Then for three days it did the clause-by-clause work on all the clauses in a Bill that is 62 pages long. The report of the committee was also fairly lengthy.

A few interim copies of the Bill as amended were available on Wednesday. The regular copies of the amended Bill were not available until after 10 a.m. Thursday. That was when debate would supposedly have begun. There were differences in line and page numbering between the interim and regular copies of the Bill which caused a good many extra hours of work in my office and I believe also in the Clerk's and Journals offices as well.

The fact is that this Bill was unusually long, unusually complex and unusually controversial. It required many carefully worked out amendments, not all of which could have been put in committee, even if there had been more time, because some amendments are consequent upon other amendments moved by other Parties in the committee. Even the Government, I believe, with all its extra staff, needed this extra day.

I am grateful for the extra day that was allowed but I would draw the attention of the House to this problem which does not occur with a Bill that has only two or three clauses or is only two or three pages long, but can occur in a case like this. I think these cases are not provided for well enough by the rules, and I would hope that it may be possible to speed up the production of the Bill as amended by committee or that the Standing Orders may give a wider discretion to allow for more time between the depositing of the report and the beginning of the debate. There has not been ample time and I regret that very much. When a very controversial, large and complex Bill is to be debated in future, I hope more time will be given both in committee and between the committee finishing and the report being debated.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) who has been ably watching this Bill go through committee, I would also like to express our appreciation for what has been done by the staff and by everyone involved. I would suggestion that Motion No. 2, which happens to have been proposed by the Chairman of the committee, is one that ought to stand on its own merits and ought to be debated at report stage. It is a complex motion and it deserves to be dealt with by way of normal proceedings, as other motions will be debated, motions which are already printed along with Motion No. 2 on the notice paper.

As far as we are concerned, we could start by debating Motion No. 3 as you have already ruled and we are prepared to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Jourdenais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I see that there is some disagreement to start the debate with Motion No. 2.

This motion stands in my name. In passing, I would like to thank the Journals Branch staff for spending last night, until five in the morning, preparing these 77 amendment motions. A lot of these motions arrived late yesterday, at five or six o'clock.

One thing that I would like to point out to my collegues in this House is that I have had no opportunity to speak on Bill C-55. I have been democratically elected to represent my constituents, and I believe that I should be allowed to explain why I have introduced certain amendments. I believe that this is my right and privilege. All of the amendments which I introduced are for the good of Bill C-55, the good of the Canadian people and the good of my constituency.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank Hon. Members for their consideration while I consider the matters raised by the various points of order including the comments about Motion No. 2. I might indicate to the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) that the Chair of course will carefully consider his intervention and his remarks. In the meantime, I take it that it is the disposition of the House to accept my suggestion that we proceed with debate on Motion No. 3.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 9

(a) by striking out lines 46 and 47 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"two weeks after the making of the order; or"

(b) by striking out line 2 at page 8 and substituting the following therefore:

"required to leave Canada, and in any case not less than two weeks after the notice is received."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion deals with one of the many little points in this Bill which make it not so much a means of admitting refugees as a means of keeping people out of Canada, some of whom may be refugees. It is a complex system that has been constructed. It reflects the work of some public servants over a period of half a dozen years and the earnest desire of some senior public servants in the Immigration Department.

Clause 9 concerns one of limitations to be placed upon a person who has arrived in Canada and is claiming refugee status. The clause provides that while a person is to have legal representation, he is limited in getting it. He can have a lawyer but only within some limitations. The preferred system is that he have a lawyer who is paid by the Minister.

I think the Supreme Court would look in a rather strange way at having a person who is in a contest with the Minister, a person who has been told that he has no right to be in Canada unless he can prove that he is a refugee, prove that he met the safe-country test, prove that he met the credibility test and go on to prove his claim, if he is lucky enough to get that far doing so with the help of a lawyer hired by the Minister in charge of putting him out of the country if he cannot prove it. That is not a very equal system. It is not a very good introduction for a person who, like many refugee claimants, might some day become a very fine citizen of Canada, as Rabbi Plaut keeps reminding us happened in his own case.

The Bill does allow that a person may get his or her own lawyer at his or her own expense, but the Bill wants to limit the time allowed for doing that. This particular provision appears at the bottom of page 7 of the Bill. It says he will have a lawyer appointed by the Minister unless he is represented by a barrister or solicitor who is available to take instructions with respect to such an application, in the case of a person against whom a removal order is made within 24 hours after making the order, or, in the case of a person to whom a departure notice is issued prior to the date on or before which the person is required to leave Canada.

In the normal experience in Canada getting a lawyer within 24 hours is often next to impossible. Getting through with a phone call to a lawyer may be next to impossible. There are competent lawyers. Most of them are not unemployed. Most of them do not regularly work, for example, on weekends, or they are not necessarily in their offices available on statutory holidays when these things may happen. If they are reachable by telephone they cannot necessarily drop whatever they are doing and that very day go out to interview a client. If they have an appearance in court scheduled for that day, it is a very grave matter not to appear. If they have an appointment with a client scheduled for that day, it may be a very grave matter to the client if it is cancelled. In fact, we have had complaints from the immigration department about lawyers who cancel their appearances for one reason or another.

What is envisaged here is that the only lawyer who might be available to this person as his lawyer of choice would have to be one who is in effect unemployed that day. It is very unreasonable. The Supreme Court has said that even a non-Canadian, someone who has come to Canada and said he is a refugee and needs the protection of Canada from the country persecuting him, is entitled to due process. That includes reasonable access to legal counsel. This is not reasonable access. It takes time to contact the lawyer. It takes time for the lawyer to act within his schedule or refer a person to another lawyer who might have time more immediately.

When the lawyer does arrive, it takes time to prepare a case on which the future of that person may depend. If the person fails at the coming inquiry for which he is to be prepared, he will not get any hearing of his refugee claim. If he is told that he came from a safe country, that is a country considered safe in terms of this law, even if he feels the decision is mistaken in his case and that it is not safe for him, he may be sent back there.

If he passes that test but does not convince two people in that preliminary screening that he has what they call a credible basis for his claim, mainly based not on his evidence but, as the Act lays it out, on evidence they have, prior to meeting with him, in other words a preconceived opinion depending on which country it is he says was persecuting him, he has to make that case. He has to instruct his lawyer and that is not necessarily quickly and easily done, particularly in the case of a genuine refugee.

If he is a phoney, perhaps he will have a case already made, a lawyer already arranged, et cetera, and things will go smoothly. If he is a genuine refugee on the run for his life, perhaps having had to run through more than one country to find safety, he will be nervous, and afraid of officialdom. He may not know the details of our law.

The details of this law extend to 62 pages. Very few Canadians have even read the Bill, let alone claim to understand it. I suspect few Members of Parliament have read it, let alone claim to understand it. Yet this person has to face all the details of this Bill and he is supposed to get his lawyer within a day. That is in the case of a person against whom a removal order has been made or in the case of a person to whom a departure notice is issued. He has to do it on or before the day on which he is required to leave Canada. It is unnecessary and unreasonable to require such haste when we recognize that we may be dealing with a person who is in genuine danger of his life or liberty and is having some difficulty in speaking out.

We heard an excellent brief from the Women and Law Group who reminded us that not all refugees are men. Women refugees are subject to rather specialized forms of trouble to which men refugees are not. Women refugees have often experienced rape and other forms of sexual harassment by the people from whom they fled, border guards through whom they passed, security guards or jail guards where they were detained in different countries, and so on. It is not, so they told us and I take their word for it, easy for a woman in such a case to blurt out those facts to the first person in Canada who says, tell me all about it. It is the experience of competent lawyers who have years of experience dealing with cases of genuine refugees and who are respected by the courts of this country, that it may take some hours or even days of careful and skilled and sympathetic interviewing to bring out the essential facts of the story.

The present chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board gave us a case in point where a person went all the way through the process and only at the last, and because of a question from the chairman, said the reason he came on the run is because his father was killed in his home country. That was verified and that made the case, but he had not said it before because it is not easy to tell those things in all cases the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, I must interrupt the Hon. Member because his time has expired.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, we encountered this amendment in committee with one different word. I think the amendment then was that the period of time be extended for seven days. It now is for 14 days.

I think it is important to understand just how great an improvement this proposed system is with respect to protecting the rights of legitimate refugees compared to what is in place today. If the House were to adopt none of the report stage amendments, we would still have a system that would be the finest in the world. With some of the report stage amendments, I think it would be better still.

Members have to realize that what is happening to the administrative side is that humanitarian and compassionate concerns which are permissible in the Immigration Act will be considered prior to the commencement of an inquiry. If they are relevant, the person will be landed, and if they want to make a claim for refugee status, they can do it in what is called "in-status", inside the country.

When we talk about a removal order or departure notice, we are dealing with a brand new system under Bill C-55 that provides a barrister or solicitor to a refugee claimant, at taxpayers' expense, from the moment they indicate to the inquiry officer that they intend to make a claim. When a claimant formally makes a claim at an inquiry, it is adjourned immediately in order to provide that claimant with counsel. The Bill requires that when the decision is made for a removal or departure notice, reasons must be given and the lawyer must be present with the claimant.

A removal or departure order means that the claim to refugee status has been rejected. This provision of the Bill does not deal with people who still have a claim to refugee status, and certainly not with people who are determined to be refugees. It deals primarily with those thousands of people who have come to this country in the last couple of years to abuse our generosity and were found to be ineligible as refugees. This Bill allows an appeal on leave to a higher court and permits the claimant to ask for a stay of execution of that removal order for a minimum of 24 hours. They are provided with a lawyer of their choice, and that 24 hours or longer can be used to instruct counsel to prepare a legal document for the higher court within 15 days.

I suggest to the Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) that there are probably 24,000 people in the backlog who, under this system, would receive removal orders or departure notices. I ask the Member why we would want people who are determined not to be refugees to stay in the country two weeks longer at taxpayers' expense.

We have a well deserved reputation for humanity and generosity toward legitimate refugee claimants. But this part of the legislation provides some of our generosity to people who we decide are not refugees. They are provided with counsel and can stay the removal order for 24 hours. There is no good legal reason why those 24,000 people should be given two weeks when most of them had no claim in the first instance. Surely we have gone the extra mile with a 24-hour stay of execution of the order and the provision of counsel at taxpayers' expense. That is going a long way for people who try to abuse our system. I believe we should use the expense that would be incurred by that two weeks for legitimate refugees rather than the abusers of the system.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, it is really difficult to deal with any particular provision of this Bill in isolation. I believe one has to view any particular section of the Bill within the context of the over-all thrust of the legislation.

It would be appropriate to comment on this motion by referring to some testimony that was given before the legislative committee. I have the testimony of Professor Angus from Osgoode Hall, who I understand is an expert in administrative law and procedure. He concluded his comments about the Bill by saying:

> I think it is fatally flawed in a number of respects. It reflects a bill drafted by an administration task force which has taken an extreme position on one side: it has been opposed with extreme positions on the other side, and we have failed to define the middle ground. That troubles me very much, and I think it should trouble your committee.

He went on to say:

> Reasonable compromise has worked well in the past in this nation of ours so that we do not reach the extremes. I think the consequences may be very substantial.

He also said:

> There are individuals who feel genuinely betrayed by these provisions in terms of their participation leading up to Bill C-55.
> A number of individuals most surely will, as a matter of conscience, pursue civil disobedience against the provisions of these two statutes. We are going to see an elevation of conflict in society as a result of these two Bills. There will be Charter challenges.
> I think there is a very substantial prospect that many of these Charter challenges will proceed. It grieves me deeply that we are at this point of Bill C-55. It is a one-sided view of a very serious matter of international and national concern.

Again, an expert in the area of administrative law predicts that there will be Charter challenges to a Bill which he views as very extreme. He states that we must really study this provision.

I suggest that it is a travesty of justice when one requires a person who is subject to a removal order or departure notice to come up with a lawyer within 24 hours, when it may be a matter of life and death. It is a travesty of the fundamental principles that all Canadians believe in.

As well, the statement by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) about dealing with humanitarian considerations prior to the process defies logic. One knows that humanitarian considerations are those things that are raised in the last resort. They are matters that are brought up on an appeal to a Minister, on an appeal to the kind of group that has been charged with that responsibility, the special review committee. It involves people who go beyond the strict limits of the law and the strict procedures that are set down in our law to determine whether there may be any extenuating circumstances which justify giving a person an extra opportunity to be heard, or giving a person the benefit of the doubt.

Again, this question was dealt with in the hearings before the committee. The very distinguished lawyer, with many years of experience in immigration law and refugee law, Miss Barbara Jackman, appeared on behalf of the Canadian Bar Association and pointed out that senior immigration officers are enforcement officials. They are enforcement minded and their concern is removing people from Canada, not facilitating entry.

• (1300)

I support this amendment. I think it is an entirely reasonable amendment. This particular section of the Bill, the way it is currently drafted, will be subject to challenge. I really, quite frankly, cannot understand why the Government is proceeding with many of the provisions of this Bill. I do not understand why it is not willing to entertain amendments. As was mentioned by Professor Angus, if we have a Bill which is a response to an extreme position and which will be subject to Charter challenges from day one, we will not be getting the kind of process wanted by the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner), all Members of this House and all Canadians. We will end up with a system that will become bogged down from day one. This is the overwhelming consensus expressed by many of the witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee.

I do support the amendment and I would hope the Minister of State for Immigration and his colleagues in this House would support this amendment as well, if they are indeed interested in arriving at a Bill which will improve the situation and give us a process that will work, not one which will not work.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I too would like ask the House to support this amendment for the simple reason that I think it is really crucial as we look at what this Bill does. There has been a good intent on all sides of the House to try to resolve a very serious problem. However, I do think this Bill is too reactionary and too rigid. This particular amendment to the Bill will add a little fairness to the whole system.

What we are looking for is something that can expedite the whole process from a humane as well as from an efficient point of view. I think it is really important to recognize something the Hon. Member from Calgary was discussing, that is, the fact that these people had already been designated as not being credible refugees. I do not think that is right. This whole process is in place so that it is part of the refugee designation process. It seems to me that because of the state of anxiety these people are in when entering a country under the conditions in which many refugees enter the country, it is really important that they be given the amount of time necessary for them to seek a solicitor. It seems to me that two weeks is not an over-extended amount of time when we know how slow the process has been in the past and when we know how difficult it has been, and that there are probably going to be challenges with respect to the Charter which will certainly cause all kinds of bottle-necks.

In the first instance, we recognize the fact that these people have not been designated as non-refugees or refugees at this point. That is why that process is in place. Surely we must give them full and adequate hearing. That cannot happen if they have to get a lawyer within 24 hours. Just imagine how we would feel, Madam Speaker, if we were in that state of anxiety, entering into a strange country, probably fleeing for our life and the lives of our family, and being told at that point that within 24 hours we must have a lawyer or face deportation. That is not fair or just and it is totally unreasonable.

If the amendment could be accepted, it would give a little more fairness to the Bill than what is there at the moment. I think it is a very unpalatable Bill because it certainly, as the previous speaker has said, puts the most extreme position forward. Certainly, the legislation is trying to kill a mosquito with a sledge-hammer.

Over and above that, I think we must always recognize the fact that we are in the process of refugee designation and at the first hearing the decision on refugee designation is not made. To be able to have a full and complete hearing with the solicitor is very important as one goes through that process. Expecting a potential refugee to be able to get a lawyer within 24 hours is very unreasonable.

I would urge Members on both sides of the House to support this amendment. It is a very small amendment but it certainly does add to the Bill a touch of humaneness and fairness. I think that is the kind of thing we are looking for. If we get the challenges with respect to the Charter as has been predicted, we know that huge bottle-necks will form in the system. If we can help the system to work expeditiously and be able to move people through whose lives are really threatened we should do so. In fact, I would suggest that the people who are under the deepest pressure, who probably are the real refugees, are the ones who are going to suffer the most without this amendment because they are the ones who will be incapable of finding a lawyer within 24 hours.

I think it is really important that we give these people a fair hearing, but we are not going to be able to do that if we expect them to appear themselves without counsel, or with counsel who is designated by the Government of Canada, within 24 hours, and that is about the only way they can proceed. I think it is really important that this type of amendment be supported. I would urge Members on both sides of the House to do so. We will certainly be supporting it.

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I will begin my remarks by doing something that is not done very often in this Chamber, that is, to compliment a member of the Opposition, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), who, during the committee process, of which I was part, showed day by day, hour by hour, during all 55 hours, his diligence, sincerity and, indeed, his good humour as we muddled through a very complicated and lengthy process.

The Member from the Liberal Party who spoke earlier, the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger), had he been there, or had the Liberal critic been there on a regular basis, he would have been aware that during that process we moved the humanitarian aspects from the end of the process up towards the beginning. Therefore, it is indeed a much more humanitarian Bill. Counsel is, in most cases, already there, so the provision for the 24 hours very often is not required. The person can just turn to the counsel already provided.

We heard during the committee hearings from witness after witness that choice of counsel is very often used as a delaying tactic, mostly by those who have no respect for the system as it now stands. Indeed, those who may be considered most fraudulent or bogus among the refugee class are the ones who played with the system the most and who are still playing with the present system. Switching lawyers was often the way they did it. They would select a very prominent immigration lawyer who may or may not be available at the time of the hearing, and then when he was not available, there would be another delay. This would go on for months, if not years.

I also think there is a very important distinction to be made between counsel being paid by the Minister and being responsible to the Minister. Counsel is, indeed, paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. If I may be so bold, let me say that counsel is responsible to the taxpayers of Canada to ensure that justice is done under the laws of the land.

For these reasons, and the reasons brought forward by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), I would urge that Motion No. 3 be defeated.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Madam Speaker, I, too, would like to take a moment in commending and thanking those members of the committee who worked so diligently through those 55 hours. We deeply appreciate, as do all Canadians, their efforts and, indeed, the quality of their work.

In response to the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) I would say that the committee represents a compromise between the views of many interveners at the committee and the concerns of the Government which gave rise to the Bill.

• (1310)

Professor Angus viewed a Bill that did not ensure that duty counsel would be a lawyer, and that did not provide the right, at inquiry, to represent himself or herself. The committee has responded to those areas of weakness in the Bill and the compromise would, in my view, satisfy Professor Angus, if not a number of other interveners.

The concerns of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr.Heap), and others, that many competent lawyers are not readily available is the reason that the Bill provides for duty counsel. The Government undertakes to ensure a maximum availability of competent lawyers, and the cost of those counsel will be borne by the Government.

The Government and the Minister have no interest in finding that a given claimant is not a refugee. If an error has been made, the Government has a public interest in correcting that error. When the error is not to the benefit of the claimant, the Minister would not want that error overlooked. Duty counsel, competent members of the bar, readily available at the expense of the Government, will ensure that the claimants can have the opportunity to correct that error.

This motion extends the period that a person ordered removed after inquiry has to instruct counsel from 24 hours to two weeks. There is a technical problem with the amendment because it does not provide an equivalent stay of the removal order beyond 24 hours. In any event, two weeks is unreasonably and unrealistically long. All the person concerned needs to do in 24 hours is to decide whether he wishes to seek judicial review or not and sign an affidavit authorizing counsel to act on behalf of the person concerned.

Therefore we oppose the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is on Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 114 the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

We will now proceed to Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13 and 14.

Motion No. 4 stands in the name of the Hon. Member for Laprairie (Mr. Jourdenais)—

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it was the Speaker's intention in his ruling earlier that we begin this group with Motion No. 13 which amounts to a deletion of several clauses. If that motion is passed we do not need to debate Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 14.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In his ruling the Speaker said that these motions would be grouped together for debate but with a vote on Motion No. 13 first. All the motions must be debated together. Therefore, I need to put all the motions to the House.

In the absence of the Hon. Member for Laprairie we will not proceed with Motion No. 4.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 30 to 34 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"inquiry shall be continued."

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Motion No. 6 is in the name of the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi). There was an understanding that the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) would move the motion. He is not in the House at the moment. Is there unanimous consent to have the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier) (for Mr. Marchi) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 39 to 45 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion refugee, the person shall, as soon as is practicable, have the claim referred to the Board for a determination."

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 39 to 45 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion refugee, the inquiry shall be concluded and the adjudicator shall take the appropriate action pursuant to Sections 32 and 32.1."

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 1 to 9 at page 12.

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out line 29 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"claim by notifying an immigration officer who shall refer the claim to the Refugee Division."

[Translation]

Mr. Heap moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 30 to 45 at page 12.

Motion No. 13

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by deleting proposed Sections 48, 48.01, 48.02, 48.03, 48.04, 48.05, 48.06 and 48.07 at page 13 to 23 inclusive.

• (1320)

[English]

Do I have unanimous consent for the the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) to move Motion No. 14?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Laurier) (for Mr. Marchi) moved:

Motion No. 14

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14

(b) by striking out lines 21 to 23 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"shall determine whether the claimant should be permitted to come into Canada or to remain therein and whether the claimant is eligible to have the claim determined by the Refugee Division; and"

Mr. Jourdenais: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Laprairie (Mr. Jourdenais) on a point of order.

Mr. Jourdenais: Madam Speaker, when the Chair gave its ruling earlier, it was my understanding that, for the Motions which have been grouped, that is Nos. 4 to 13, the debate would be on Motion No. 13, and that if the vote were in the affirmative, there would be no debate on Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6 and so on, and if it were in the negative, there would be a debate. I was not here earlier when you called for the Hon. Member for Laprairie.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): With leave of the House, I shall now repeat in French my answer to the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), who asked me exactly the same question a few moments ago. The interpretation given by the Chair was that Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13 and 14 would be debated together, but that there would first be a vote on Motion No. 13, as an affirmative vote on this motion would cancel the need for the other votes. That was the question and the answer is still the same.

Mr. Jourdenais: Madam Speaker, may I have the consent of the House to debate my motion?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Motion No. 4 was in the name of the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais). As the Hon. Member was not present, it was set aside without proceeding.

Is there unanimous consent that we return and include Motion No. 4 in this grouping?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 20 to 37 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"45.(1) Subject to subsection (5), where a person who is sub—"

He said: Madam Speaker, I want to thank Hon. Members for this opportunity to take part in the debate on my amendment No. 4.

Madam Speaker, I am in duty bound and even compelled by my conscience to rise in debates concerning certain amendments.

First, having been elected in 1984 and being a Member of the Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, since the beginning, I have attended many meetings, where a number of persons have appeared, stating that what we need in Canada is a system with a refugee status that is more precise, more clear cut, easier, more understandable than the one we now have, that is before Bill C-55 was put forward.

Many people are wondering and asking me: How is it that Fernand Jourdenais, Chairman of the Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, is the only one in his group willing to defend Bill C-55? The reason why I insist indeed on introducing certain amendments is that when the Bill was introduced in May, Members of the Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration had very strong reactions, and some even said: We worked for two and a half years and nothing, almost nothing of what we decided in report No. 5 is written down in the Bill.

There is something in the Bill, there is certainly the basic principle of having a clearer, more open and speedier system. But out of 62 pages of proposals, we have quite a problem understanding actually, when one is outside the law profession, is not a lawyer or a judge, and you know as well as I do, Madam Speaker, that one must be cautious with the so-called "small print"!

If we look at page 11 of the Bill, Clause 45, we find something which is contrary to the principle and the aim of Bill C-55.

We are saying it will be fair, but we can already see from this clause that it will not be fair. It will not be fair because when we have refugees entering Canada, when they first meet an immigration official or somebody who represents the law these people get nervous, they are tired, they are afraid precisely because they have just fled a country where they had problems, where authority was represented by an individual who would not think twice before throwing them behind bars and torturing them if they dared utter a single word in his presence.

According to this clause, if during the interview the adjudicator asks the refugee or the person applying for refugee status: "are you applying for refugee status?", and if that person happens to be nervous or fails to understand because there is an interpreter, and for all sorts of reasons, because he feels cornered by the authorities and because in his country he has experienced difficulties with officials and was scared, if he does not answer right away even before they begin to question him, the kind of questions which, according to the legislation, are very important, like whether or not he should be transferred to the next stage so his case can be reviewed, if he does not ask for it he will not have the right during the interview to say: I want refugee status.

This is a lengthy clause, and any ordinary man who takes a close look at it will find it hard to understand that if he fails to ask for refugee status right from the start he will be turned down later on. A man can indeed be a genuine refugee, and those who will have applied will be genuine refugees, but they will be afraid to say they want refugee status because in their country anyone making such a request is likely to be mistreated.

Witnesses gave evidence before the legislative committee; unfortunately I was not qualified to sit on that committee, but some people said, and I quote:

• (1330)

[English]

"The principle of immediate claim may not be compatible with the claimant's emotional state upon arrival."

[Translation]

Others said:

[English]

"Newly arrived refugees may be afraid to make a claim".

[Translation]

This is exactly what I said earlier. Those people are so nervous—I could tell you how we had a witness one evening in committee, someone who came from Guyana; it took an hour and a half before he could speak by himself and give us answers, although ours was not the type of questioning that could have sent him to prison. All we wanted to know was what had happened when he landed in Canada, in Toronto. Finally, after an hour and a half, at 11 p.m., he started telling us what had happened during the first interview he had when he came to Canada, with the first person he met. And he was not a fellow from the woods back in his country, he was the principal of two CEGEPS, a well-educated man, well-mannered, very knowledgeable; but he was nervous indeed because he had a wife and a four-year-old child and he was afraid he would be sent to prison, as had been done in his own country.

And if Bill C-55 was written in such a way as to be fair, the Government should accept the fact that the majority of Canadians want a refugee determination formula that will allow indentification of genuine refugees as against the others, in order to offer them long-lasting protection in Canada. The Government should recognize that the refugee determination process should both protect genuine refugees and deter those who abuse it. Those two goals should not be considered as necessarily opposite, and the implementation of the four following criteria, which I hope I have time to indicate, will help us reach that goal.

First, the formula must guarantee as much as possible that legitimate refugees can be identified and protected, which Section 45 does not do. Second, the formula must be effective, which means that it must be accompanied by a fast determination process which is both economical and practical, as this is the very basis of the Bill. Third, the formula must comply with the constitutional guarantees for equity and meet the basic requirements of legal administrative tribunals. Fourth, the formula must be in tune with the international legal commitments of Canada as signatory to the United Nations Convention on Refugees, and by not allowing the claimant from saying at any time during the hearing that he claims refugee status, we are going against this Convention.

Naturally, there will be a lot of debate on this point. There has already been a lot of discussion and there will be more. However, I believe that the Government should amend Section 45 along the lines that I mention in Motion No. 4:

[English]

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 20 to 37 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

[Translation]

Here it is:

"45.(1) Subject to subsection (5), where a person who is the sub-".

Therefore, Madam Speaker, when you realize all the good these people do in Canada after they settle down, I think it is necessary that this Section 45 be amended using the words I have just mentioned.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to support the amendment of the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais).

[Translation]

I commend him for the courage and generosity he has shown while defending the cause of refugees during the couple of years he was in our Committee.

[English]

I want to emphasize a point which has been made, that it is not reasonable to expect that a genuine refugee will always make his claim at the first moment. We have plenty of experience of bogus refugees making their claims at the first moment. That is the point; they have been coached.

I am told that there were 3,600 people who came from one country in Europe saying, "I am a Jehovah's Witness; if I go back there, I will be persecuted by the Roman Catholic Church". They would have no trouble with this clause. They would shoot right ahead and make their claim at the right time, because they paid somebody several thousands of dollars to coach them on how to do it.

Those are not the people I am concerned for. Those are not the people who will be caught by this clause if we do not amend it. They will not be caught by the clause if we amend it, but there will be people who will be unfairly caught by this clause if we do not amend it. Those will be the people, as the Hon. Member for La Prairie said, who come here nervous because of what they have gone through. In all or most cases they are in fact refugees, and what they have gone through to make them refugees in many cases also makes them nervous.

To tell them in effect, to borrow the words from another context, "speak now or forever hold your peace" is unreasonable. To marry people in our church, banns are called. We are notified that so and so will be married on such a day. When the day comes, everybody in the community has had that notice. When the officiant at the marriage is about to proceed with the act of making two people husband and wife, he says: "This is the end of the time for any objection or intervention. If anybody knows why they should not be husband and wife, speak now or forever hold your peace; don't interfere later if you don't interfere now".

Somehow or other that notion, which is quite reasonable in our marriage service, has been brought in here and turned upside down. This is not the end of a long inquiry and study. This is only the beginning of it, and it is the beginning of it only if the person knows what to say at that time. For some people there may even be a language problem. Not many refugee claimants come here speaking English as their first language. Of those few who do, many of them we suspect of not being genuine refugees.

These are the people who may have a language difficulty. These are the people who may have what we could call, in a very mild sense with great understatement, a culture gap.

Recently I met a group of refugees from a Latin American district. They were refugees from a country in which, in very recent months, the military has shot people demonstrating in the streets. Unarmed people, labour groups, or other groups demonstrating in the streets for what we would consider to be normal human rights have been shot, very often beaten, and often arrested, for doing what we take for granted as normal action by citizens who wish to get together to make their point publicly.

They sought the help of my friend who made some of the arrangements which in our culture are the appropriate things to do, and who spoke their language—Spanish. When these people, newly in the country, refugees, for the purpose of this demonstration, asked my friend, "Will the police shoot at us?", she was more than a little startled by the question. When she assured them that they would not, they said: "Well, will they beat us or will they arrest us?" My friend assured them that they would not, and they asked: "How do you know they won't?" My friend brought out the police permit.

They had asked for help from people who know the ways in our country. One way is that if you are going to use the public streets for demonstration, you talk it over with the police to make sure that it will not cause undue disruption of traffic or perhaps a collision with another demonstration. That sometimes happens in Toronto streets. My friend had a police permit and showed it to these people. They were satisfied, and they came out for the demonstration.

I think those people at that point learned something about Canada, but I am glad they learned, and I believe every Member of this House is glad they learned, that in Canada demonstrators are not normally shot at, beaten or arrested by police. There may be incidents involving such things, especially arrest from time to time, but it is not the normal way that demonstrators, the police and the public conduct affairs in Canada. That illustrates the baggage that a refugee may carry with him when he comes to Canada. If I stick my neck out against authority, if I question or challenge authority, can I be shot, beaten or jailed?

I grew up in Canada. The only year I was out of town was when I was in Chicago. Sometimes Chicago has a reputation for violence, but I did not notice it because I was at the university. I have been fortunate to live in a very peaceful country. I was shocked, as my young friend was, to hear stories like that of the expectations or fears of people when they come here.

We are told by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) that a humanitarian element is in the Bill through a recent amendment, which was proposed in the last few hours of the committee hearings, that is supposed to help the process. I am sure the Hon. Member thinks that that will be understood in the way he intends it by all concerned. What it amounts to is another prescreening. It seems that the Government, as far as possible, is adamantly opposed to letting people state their refugee claims. The Government has now introduced prescreening. It is on page 16—at least that is what I assume the Hon. Member for Calgary West refers to. Subclause (7) on page 16 reads:

> If the Minister is of the opinion that the claimant has a credible basis for the claim and informs the adjudicator and the Member of the Refugee Division of that opinion, the adjudicator and the member shall determine that the claimant has a credible basis for the claim.

This is another prescreening. We will have an occasion to speak about that later, Madam Speaker, but I want to point out now that the Government is protecting itself massively against a person who may be a genuine refugee who wants to state his case in the place where the decision will be made. He has to pass through a series of areas. The inquiry is the main barrier, but now we are told there will be another screening before the inquiry. The Government has all these chances to stop a refugee, but it gives him only one chance to say the word that could be a matter of life and death, freedom or imprisonment if he is a genuine refugee.

We have heard a lot of nonsense about how many people are not genuine refugees. I call it nonsense because the figures have been inflated and distorted, sometimes by those who know better. Our committee found two years ago that a majority of the people who had been examined turned out to be either bona fide refugees or worthy of having the humanitarian programs of our Government and country applied on their behalf. That was a system unfair to the refugee claimant, according to the decision of our Supreme Court, because most of the claimants had not had an oral hearing before those who would make the decision about them. Even by an unfair test, over half of the claimants had been found to be either bona fide refugees or to be worthy of humanitarian protection even though they were not exactly refugees. We should not be so hasty to cut them off. We should not be so hasty to cut them off at the very first chance they have to make their case.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, it is quite a trick to deal with nine amendments in 10 minutes, which is the consequence of the grouping. I would like to commend the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) for his diligence on the committee over many months. I think the committee report was presented in November, 1985. Perhaps it is time that he reread it. I think some of the things he said earlier this day about that report are not accurate. Bill C-55 is absolutely remarkable in the degree to which it is a faithful reproduction of committee recommendations.

Regarding the whole issue of review, the committee recommended a two-person oral hearing with the benefit of the claim going to the claimant with leave to appeal to the Federal Court of Canada. That is exactly what Bill C-55 does. The basic principle of benefit to the claimant runs throughout the Bill. Provision of counsel which the committee recommended runs throughout the Bill. The presence of a refugee board member at every stage of the proceedings, not just the refugee claim, but the issue of removal and departure, is guaranteed by the Bill. The notion of a safe Third Country was deliberately included, not with that language, in our committee report and approved by all three Parties.

It is a little disturbing to listen to statements in this House and statements made in the press about how discrepant this Bill is from what the committee recommended. It is not, and the Bill goes beyond what the committee recommended in its fairness to legitimate refugees. It goes beyond any sense of speed for removal of abusers. There is absolutely no disagreement in Canada that maximum speed for the removal of abusers is not only justified but desirable. I commend the drafters for finding something faster, a series of ways dealing with the situation, than committee members could find. The Bill is very faithful to the principles of the committee report.

I have tried to look at these nine amendments and ask myself, how do we deal with them in what probably now is seven minutes instead of 10? There are absurdities. The motion from the Hon. Member for La Prairie and the motion from the Liberal Party of Canada create the following absurdities which exist in the current law. There is no end for the abuser. There has to be a point at which a claim is made and when that point is passed the person has the opportunity to claim to be a refugee so one can get on to other things. When opposition Members ask us to accept an amendment in this Chamber that provides no such point, an absurdity is created. It becomes impossible to remove someone from this country.

There are about 1,000 people a month who are discovered by immigration enforcement officers to have broken the Immigration Act, to be living and working here illegally, or whatever. The current system has no such point. Three-quarters of these people, 750 a month, are already inside this country legally or illegally, and the minute they face the inquiry for removal they claim to be refugees and five years later maybe we can kick them out. That has to stop, Madam Speaker. When an inquiry for removal begins, every single human being appearing before that inquiry has the right to a taxpayer-paid barrister and solicitor. They have counsel. The question is very simple. Are you a refugee? Yes or no. Counsel can act for the claimant and say yes. That is how simple it is.

We hear of all sorts of examples of frightened human beings. That becomes apparent during an inquiry. The inquiries are not simply an hour and a half long. Seldom will an inquiry on the issue of a removal be anything short of three days. Very commonly they will last at least a week and in some cases three or four weeks.

Bill C-84 allows for detention for 28 days without review by adjudicators for undocumented arrivals. Some 10,000 of them had to be referred to the RCMP for help this year. After all, an inquiry cannot be started until the identity of the person involved is known.

These fears are false. It is true that frightened people arrive in Canada. It is true that frightened people may arrive in Canada from Guyana. This law requires the past history of nationals of a particular country and its refugee claimants to be taken into consideration by the adjudicator and the refugee board member. Guyana is a country that produces refugees. That is an evidentiary fact which must be entered on the record and must be taken into account by the adjudicator and the refugee board member. When it is evident that people are coming from a refugee-producing country, their cases must go before the board. That is what the Bill provides.

It is time we stopped dealing with the mythology surrounding this Bill and started dealing with its reality. As a group, these amendments eliminate the possibility for fast determination of bogus claimants. There is not a church group, human rights activist or any Canadian with any credibility who appeared before the committee who did not urge fast removal of bogus claimants. We will eat up all of our resources and all of the good will that exists in Canada toward bogus claimants if we cannot remove them quickly. Removing them quickly is the only way to stop others from arriving.

Some of these amendments try to get rid of the notion of eligibility. Eligibility is determined by an adjudicator and a refugee board member. What are the criteria of eligibility?

First is the question of whether or not the refugee needs the protection of Canada. Those who are already Convention refugees or who have come from a safe third country are not eligible. No one can guarantee absolute safety for every individual in every country we will put on that list, but there will not be many countries that will be unsafe. I suggest that most of the countries on the list will be European, and I suggest that people are as safe there as they would be here.

We do not want to see the constant movement of claimants from country to country. Some claimants have claims existing in three or four western countries all at the same time. The resources of three or four countries are going to a single individual. Are these people, the ones who are already in western European countries like Sweden, Denmark, Holland, France and Britain the most likely to be in need of Canada's protection? No, they are a low priority. The person from Guyana, from El Salvador, from the Middle East or from Asia is the person who needs our help. Therefore, the first eligibility criterion is whether or not the claimants need our help. If they are from a country on the list or if their cases have been determined, they do not need our help.

The next criterion relates to repeat claims or to going past the time when a claim ought to be made. That is a Canadian determination. Those who have already been found not to be refugees or chose not to claim are not eligible. Can we have an endless chain as proposed by these amendments? Should we let a claimant make another claim every time we try to remove him? There would be 10 hearings, 20 hearings, 40 hearings, an infinite number of hearings. That is absolutely absurd and is unfair to legitimate claimants. There must be a moment when the claim is made, the determination is made and removal follows. Failure to remove would be an absolute catastrophe for the system.

What is the third criterion? The Standing Committee report of a year ago June said that it had grave doubts about the protection offered to Canada by the Immigration Act and its processes. Therefore, the third eligibility criterion is security. In a case where there are security questions, instead of going to the board, it would go directly to a federal court judge who would determine whether or not the person is a danger to Canada.

We cannot be the patsies of the world. It is time we toughened the immigration laws and took away the loophole that creates a wide-open door to potential terrorism in Canada. I commend the Government for moving on this matter.

There is not one amendment in this grouping of nine that does not do serious damage to our ability to remove abusers. There is nothing in these provisions that does serious damage in any way, shape or form to legitimate refugee claimants. I believe that the parts of the Bill covered by these amendments should stay as they are.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, it is very difficult to maintain one's composure when one hears the kind of comments made by the Hon. Member. Either he does not understand what has been said by all of the groups representing refugees and by all of the distinguished lawyers who appeared before the committee or he is purposely twisting the views of those groups.

He said that all of these groups are in favour of fast removal of abusers. Sure, they are in favour of that, but they are not in favour of a prescreening process which will not allow claimants full hearings on the merits, and he knows that. He knows about the flaws of this Bill. Nonetheless, he is trying to wrap himself in the flag.

Earlier today, the Hon. Member said that this is the most humanitarian and the best kind of refugee determination process in the world and that it will tell us who all the refugees are. I would like to refer the Hon. Member to the comments of Mr. Arthur Helton of the Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights. Mr. Helton is no slouch. He is an adjunct professor teaching immigration and asylum law at New York University School of Law, the North American co-ordinator of an exchange of legal practitioners under the auspices of the European Consultation on Refugees and Exiles, a practitioner in the United States and a student of other systems. He said that in other countries in Europe where the concept of a safe Third Country has been introduced, the determination is made on an individual basis. It is part and parcel of the process of determining whether a person is in need of protection. It is not an arbitrary decision made on the basis of whether or not a person comes from a country which is on a list prepared by Cabinet, a list subject to all the political considerations about which the standing committee has been warned.

Mr. Helton, when appearing before the committee, said the following:

> Virtually all the countries that utilize the first asylum principle regard it on an individual basis, and in making a determination decide whether or not to assess the intent or wishes of the individual. I would particularly cite Austria, France, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.

The Hon. Member has said that this law is equivalent to practice which is acceptable in other countries. He has said that it will provide safeguards and that individual refugees will always be given the benefit of the doubt, the favourite expression of the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner). What he has said is totally at variance with the facts and totally at variance with everything that was said before the legislative committee which studied this Bill. It is totally at variance with all knowledgeable opinions expressed by editorial and opinion comments in the newspapers over the course of the past several months.

• (1400)

There are many more things I could say about the extraordinary contentions being made by members of the Government, but I see it is past two o'clock and we will get another crack at this next week.

Mr. Lewis: The clock has saved you from yourself.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair noticed the Hon. Member's comment about the time, both before he was given the floor and as he was completing his remarks. I would like him to know that, yes, there is a big clock in the House, but there are some other clocks on the Table and in front of the Chair, and these are the ones we work on. The Hon. Member did not go over his time and we did not go past two o'clock.

It now being 2 p.m, the House will proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties with respect to Private Members' Business on Monday. I understand the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) is unable to be in attendance, and it is my further understanding that if you sought unanimous consent for her item to be dropped to the bottom of the list, the House would consent to that motion.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, we concur with what the Hon. Minister has said and agree with his suggestion.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, we agree to this perfectly sensible suggestion from the future leadership candidate of the Ontario Conservative Party.

Mr. Lewis: I don't agree with that. I already have a bank loan.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. It would help the Chair if the Hon. Minister could also provide us with a decision as to which of the motions will be heard on Monday. Do we go now to Motion No. 31, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor)?

Mr. Lewis: No, it is my understanding that we would continue with government business that day, and the Hon. Member for Bow River's motion would come up on Tuesday and be dealt with in the normal course of events during Private Members' Hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair thanks the Hon. Member for his clarification.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS--PRIVATE BILLS

YELLOWKNIFE ELECTRIC LTD.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South) moved that Bill S-10, an Act to revive Yellowknife Electric Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am happy to speak to this particular Bill which, in summary, is the situation of a corporation in all innocence ceasing to exist under the laws of Canada and seeking to have new life breathed into it so it can effectively wind down its affairs and continue on. The Bill was sponsored in the other place by the Hon. Senator Nathan Nurgitz. It is an Act to revive Yellowknife Electric Ltd. and provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act. The Bill was passed by the Senate on June 16th of this year, by unanimous consent, and I hope we might have unanimous consent to pass it through all stages today, depending upon the disposition of other Parties.

Yellowknife Electric Ltd. was incorporated on March 21, 1955, by letters patent issued under the Companies Act. The company's principal place of business is in the City of Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories. Subsection 125(1) of the Companies Act requires that the company file with the Department of the Secretary of State an annual summary. Yellowknife Electric Ltd. failed to file those summaries for three consecutive years. As is required under the law, notice of the company's failure to file the prescribed annual summary was published in The Canada Gazette on June 11 and June 20, 1966, stating that Yellowknife Electric Ltd. would be dissolved unless within one year of the publication the company filed the summaries for the three years in respect of which it was in default. Those prescribed summaries were not filed. As a consequence, Yellowknife Electric Ltd. was dissolved pursuant to Subsection 125(12) of the Canada Corporations Act.

When we examine the facts of the case, the directors of the company did not see, nor did they have any knowledge of, the default in filing annual summaries. It may be the duty of all of us to read prodigiously and religiously all the contents of The Canada Gazette, but some of us are remiss in that regard. Apparently the notices to file were sent to the registered office of the company, a lawyer's office, and the solicitors for the company omitted to file same. The directors of the company simply did not know why the annual summaries were not filed. The solicitors for the company did not have any record of the notices, nor do they recollect the circumstances of the default in filing the summaries.

I and my staff have gone to some pains to determine these facts are accurate because even though this may seem like a small matter, we are proposing to occupy some time of Hon. Members and of this House in making a determination of this particular Bill. So I can speak with some conviction when I say that these facts are accurate as stated.

The company, unaware of the order published in The Canada Gazette on June 24, 1967, dissolving Yellowknife Electric Ltd., continued to carry on business as if it had not been dissolved. It will not be possible for the company to continue to carry on business unless it is revived. Assets are trapped inside the company and cannot be dealt with by the company as Yellowknife Electric Ltd. is technically not a legal entity. For example, the directors have no capacity to transfer land owned by the company, nor would the Land Titles Office register a transfer without a certificate of good standing of the corporation. The certificate is of course impossible to obtain because without revival there is no company. The company has complied with required publication requirements. The company has no liabilities whatsoever.

To address the question of why the Bill is in the House today, the Companies Act as amended, Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, Chapter 53, had no revival provisions for a company dissolved in circumstances such as applied in the case of Yellowknife Electric Ltd. This, with respect, could be described as a legislative oversight. Rare as those may be, this appears to be one. However, today's legislation allows revival of the dissolved corporation as an administrative matter. One simply files articles of revival with the director of corporations and the director shall issue a certificate of revival. That appears under the terms of the Canada Business Corporations Act, Statutes of Canada, 1984, 1985, 1986, Chapter 33.

Since the company was a corporation to which Part I of the Canada Corporations Act applied, and since there is no provision in this Act for revival of a company that has been dissolved, the company cannot be revived except by a special Act of the Parliament of Canada.

With respect to the matter of continuance, if the company had not been dissolved it would have been required to apply on or before December 15, 1980, for a certificate of continuance pursuant to the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Let me give some background on the company. The company has its objects set out in the letters patent. They provide that the Yellowknife Electric Ltd. is in the business of electrical and plumbing contracting. At this moment, it is winding down its affairs in Yellowknife. I am informed that it is the intention of the company to relocate and carry on business in Vancouver, British Columbia. It owns substantial assets, including a block of realty in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories.

The company has no liabilities. It made an attempt to sell the realty and, in fact, accepted an interim agreement for sale and purchase, when they were made aware that the company had been struck in 1967.

The registrar of land titles in the Northwest Territories would not accept the transfer without a certificate of good standing of the corporation and this was, of course, impossible to provide as the company was dissolved.

I believe it was at this stage that it was discovered that this Bill would be necessary and that it would be necessary for the Parliament of Canada to become active in the case.

As I said at the outset, I hope the House might be disposed to deal with this matter today. I hoped that would be the case, but I am given to understand that it may not be.

In any event, I hope the facts as I have been able to outline them will be of some benefit to Hon. Members in determining the fate of this company. There was innocence, perhaps some neglect, if not negligence on the part of certain individuals in positions of trust. I am given to understand that at least one of them may have been rather elderly at the time that the responsibility was on his shoulders. I hope Members might consider the circumstances and give some consideration to the affairs of the company so that it could be restored to personhood, one might say, and continue the objects of the directors of the company.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, on behalf of our Party I want to indicate to the Hon. Member that we would be happy to deal with this Bill immediately. In saying so, I find it remarkable that no summaries or annual returns were filed from the year 1963 to the present. It is quite astonishing that that period of time could go by without anyone being aware that no returns were filed, including 20 years elapsed from the time the company was dissolved pursuant to a notice that appeared in The Canada Gazette on June 14, 1967.

I understand that the company paid property tax and income tax throughout that period and that no person or corporation would be adversely affected by the passage of this Bill. I see the Hon. Member nodding in the affirmative.

I also note that this Bill has been passed in the Senate, but was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the other place. The solicitor on behalf of the company appeared before the Senate, as well as an official of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who assured members of the other place that indeed this is a pro forma matter and that no person will be affected adversely by the passage of this Bill. Therefore, on that basis, we would be pleased to proceed with the passage of this Bill.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my Party, we support the motion to refer this Bill to committee. I certainly appreciate the Hon. Member's point about it being largely an administrative matter, and we do not intend to be obstructionist, but there are several points that I believe are worthy of committee consideration, both for the protection of the petitioner as well as to give credibility to the decisions that this House makes.

It has already been stated that this involves a duly registered company which failed to file the required summaries and was dissolved. That dissolution is listed in The Canada Gazette.

I recognize that many small companies perhaps do not even have the resources to be monitoring such things, but when such a company comes before the House of Commons for discussion I think it is a more serious matter. Given that the company did not recognize that it was dissolved and continued to operate for close to another 20 years, one assumes that it did not submit the required summaries during that time, as it had not done before dissolution. Therefore, while not suggesting that there was a deliberate intent to mislead, certainly the company displayed poor management practices. Furthermore, while we are not discussing the assets which the company wishes to recover, we are not aware of their dollar value.

Given that there have been some rather unorthodox practices by this company which continued to operate for 20 years in which it presumably did not even submit the required summaries, we are supporting the motion that the Bill go to committee.

However, being from the north myself, I realize that these companies often work with very small resources and may overlook such things. Therefore, I hope the committee could expedite this as quickly as possible so that the matter can be redressed in the best manner possible.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I can assure you that I will be brief. The reason I am speaking is that the company is located in the area that I represent.

Today we are dealing with a very simple administrative, pro forma type of matter. It is almost unbelievable that the NDP would be so obstructionist as not to allow all three stages of the Bill to be dealt with this afternoon. There is absolutely no reason why we should debate it, at considerable expense to the taxpayers of Canada and to the company officials involved. However, if that is the way they like to operate, I guess we must live with them.

• (1420)

What I do want to do, Madam Speaker, is to pay tribute to the Yellowknife Electric Company, which has not operated now for several years but at one time was a force to be reckoned with in the electrical contracting field, and to pay tribute to the principles of that company, in particular Mr. Al Marceau, who has done much for the City of Yellowknife over many years. I promised to be brief, Madam Speaker, and I was brief.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I think you would find a disposition in the House to call it three o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent to call it three o'clock on this beautiful Friday afternoon?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being three o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 2.21 p.m.

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour this morning of laying upon the Table the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons, reporting on the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

I want to make two brief comments with respect to the report. Our report concludes that the Accord is an historic act of national reconciliation between French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians. It is supported by 11 First Ministers representing all major political Parties in the country.

It had its origins in promises made to Quebecers during and after the Quebec referendum of 1980. We believe that its detailed terms have to be looked at in light of this great purpose and objective but we have also reached a conclusion, after reviewing 301 written briefs and hearing 131 witnesses over five weeks of testimony, that these detailed terms are in fact good, and good for all of Canada.

I would also like to point out the tremendous debt that we owe to the committees' directorate at the House of Commons, Mr. Eugene Morawski, Miss Elizabeth Kingston and Andrew Johnson, for the prodigious effort they extended on behalf of all the committee in allowing us to have this report ready for today. I do not want to neglect the many people who helped them, such as typists, translators and others. We owe a great debt to the Committees Branch.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETITION

UNIVERSAL ACCESS TO FAIR ORAL HEARINGS BEFORE REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition from a number of residents of the City of Toronto who object to Bill C-55 on the ground that it will have the likely effect of excluding from Canada many people who have arrived asking to make refugee claims who are in fact real refugees according to the standards of law.

It points out that there was a better system proposed by the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, which has widespread support from religious, legal and other public groups in Canada. Therefore, they request the Government and Parliament to withdraw Bill C-55 and substitute for it legislation embodying the principles of fair and quick oral hearings of claims of refugee claimants before a refugee board that is independent of the Immigration Commission and universal access to such hearings for every applicant in Canada, and the right to appeal on the basis of fact. In duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered Orally are indicated by an Asterisk.)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 169 will be answered today.

[Text]

RCMP—COST OF SERVICES TO NEW BRUNSWICK AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 169—Mr. Howie:

During 1986, in (a) New Brunswick (b) Newfoundland (i) did the number of RCMP persons deployed decline and, if so, for what reason (ii) how many persons were deployed and what amount was paid to the Government for their services (iii) what rate per person was charged for police services?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): (a) & (b) (ii) During fiscal years 1985-86 and 1986-87 the number of RCMP regular members in provincial policing duties in New Brunswick and Newfoundland declined by 14 in each province. The reasons for decline are the Royal Newfoundland Constabulary and the New Brunswick Highway Patrol assuming responsiblity for duties which had previously been performed by the RCMP.

(ii) For the fiscal years 1985-86 and 1986-87, the numbers in New Brunswick declined for 296 to 282 and from 448 to 434 in Newfoundland. The Province of New Brunswick reimbursed the Government of Canada $13,372,120 and $14,522,551 respectively. The Province of Newfoundland reimbursed Canada $22,503,206 and $23,641,324 respectively for the same periods.

(iii) A rate per person is not struck, in relation to total police services in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) has been answered.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the other questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, September 18, consideration of Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee, and Motion No. 4 (Mr. Jourdenais, p. 9105), Motion No. 6 (Mr. Marchi, p. 9104), Motion No. 7 (Mr. Heap, p. 9104), and Motion No. 9 (Mr. Heap, p. 9104).

Mr. Speaker: I have a brief further preliminary ruling to present to the House.

On Friday, September 18, 1987, the Chair made a preliminary ruling in respect of the motions on the Notice Paper in amendment to Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof. Following consultations with the Hon. Member for Spadina, (Mr. Heap) the Chair will now make a definitive ruling on the grouping presently before the House.

Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 9 will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately. Motions Nos. 5, 8, and 10 will be dropped, as it is not the Hon. Member's intention to proceed with them.

Motions Nos. 11, 13 and 14 will be debated together. There will be a separate vote on Motion No. 11. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 13 obviates the necessity for a vote on Motion No. 14, however, a negative vote on Motion No. 13 requires a separate vote on Motion No. 14. Motion No. 12 will not be selected as it is similar in substance to Motion No. 11.

Should debate be completed on Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 9, the House will then proceed with Motions Nos. 11, 13, 14. The next grouping to be put to the House will be Motions Nos. 27, 29 and 34 which will be debated together but voted on separately.

I should advise Hon. Members that consultations are continuing on the remaining motions in amendment and the Chair intends to give a final ruling at three o'clock this afternoon. Thus, the House will now resume debate on Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7, and 9 which were proposed to the House last Friday.

I want to express the appreciation of the Chair to the Hon. Member for Spadina for his co-operation in the consultations since Friday, and to some other Hon. Members who have made representations. As I say, there will be further consultations taking place between now and a little later in order to be sure that we are making rulings which are fully understood by all Hon. Members.

[Translation]

Mr. Jourdenais: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) on a point of order.

Mr. Jourdenais: Mr. Speaker, I am simply seeking clarification. I did not hear Motion No. 15 being called. You called Motions Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 27, 29 and 34, but I did not hear you call Motion No. 15 which was supposed to come up for debate after Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8—motions debated last Friday—and I should like to know what happened to Motion No. 15.

Mr. Speaker: As I said earlier, I expect to make a ruling on the other amendments this afternoon, including Motion No. 15.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot remember from Friday's debate, which was somewhat hurried in several ways, what action we took on Friday on Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 9, specifically whether I spoke to any one of them. I think I probably did. However, because of the uncertainty about the ruling, I am not quite sure how it is ruled.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can assist the Hon. Member for Spadina. We are resuming on Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 9, and I think the record will show that on those motions grouped for debate the Hon. Member has in fact spoken.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, with respect to Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 9, are you saying we are addressing them collectively or are we going individually? I would like to speak to Motion No. 6, particularly, but I am not sure whether we are on Motion No. 4 or are taking all four motions as one cluster.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for his question. Perhaps I can reread the preliminary ruling. Motions Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 9 will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address Motion No. 6 which was presented as an amendment under my name on behalf of my Party.

Essentially the intention of Motion No. 6 is to remove the prescreening process and allow the refugee claimant to go directly before the refugee board. This was one of the key amendments we put forward for discussion at report stage. There are essentially three overriding principles, three overriding amendments that every witness wanted this Parliament and this Government to make, namely, amendments to prescreening, to the safe country concept and to the appeal mechanism.

Our prescreening amendment is our first amendment, that is, if we are going to establish a refugee board and put in place a refugee board that is distinct from the immigration program and immigration flow, in order to deal specifically and with a great deal of expertise on refugee claims, it would be our contention, and the contention of every single witness who came before us and who wrote to us, that we should provide accessibility to that refugee board.

Anyone who comes to this country and claims to have a reason to fear going back to one's country, should have legitimate grounds to be assessed by the refugee board. Therefore, many groups and many witnesses have found it very dangerous to place around that refugee board a barrier, a wall. That wall is defined by having a prescreening.

On the one hand, the Government is saying it is putting in a refugee board which is a new and improved processing, with which I would agree, but at the same time it is saying it is going to have a prescreening which is going to determine who will be able to access the refugee board. We believe very strongly that this is the wrong procedure.

If we are going to provide for a refugee board, we should allow the refugee board to make the determination on who is properly a refugee or non bona fide refugee. Regardless of the answer of the refugee board, this House and this Parliament would at least be assured, and have some satisfaction and comfort in knowing that the refugee board, which is mandated to deal with refugee matters, has given a ruling rather than two officers at the border crossing. The two officers at the border crossing will say, "Let us hear part of your story, but do not give us all your story because that will be part of a complicated hearing before the refugee board". If you, Madam Speaker, were a refugee claimant and were coming to this country—God forbid, because no one would want to be a refugee—you would not want to give only part of your story in order for one of the two officers to get a taste of whether you merit or do not merit a further hearing. A real claimant fleeing persecution would want to put all the facts and all the circumstances on the table in order to convince those two officers clearly and profoundly that, indeed, the protection of this country was required.

What groups have argued quite legitimately and logically is that we would be adding another burden of bureaucracy at the front end of the system. Rather than having each claimant appear at one hearing of the refugee board we would be asking refugees to do it twice. We would be asking them to do it once at a prescreening and then, if the person is approved, they will have to do the same in front of the refugee board.

From the point of view of accessibility and of ensuring that the two officers in the predetermination process do not rule against a legitimate refugee who will be sent packing back to his or her country in the face of danger, and also from the view of expediency and time, it makes more sense to have one hearing. It makes more sense to have a hearing done quickly and fairly. That is why we moved Motion No. 6. We did so in order to remove the prescreening process and to allow claimants to go directly to the refugee board.

We believe that that is the proper, just and most effective manner of trying to deal with claimants who arrive on our doorstep. We cannot allow a newly created refugee board to be diluted by two officers at some border-crossing where in fact they will make the most important determination. What is the use of having a refugee board if two officers at the border are going to refuse access to the board to a refugee claimant?

If we really want to deter abuse and discourage people from making frivolous claims, then I suggest that a one-hearing process directly to the refugee board, which would take less time, is the best disincentive to people making fraudulent applications. If they know that they can make it once at the prescreening process and drag that on and then perhaps go into another hearing before the refugee board, then that will not deter people as much as saying, "You have one hearing and one hearing only. It is before the refugee board. If you are turned down you have an appeal, yes, but the refugee board hearing is what really counts".

We have submitted this amendment in the hope that the Government will remove the prescreening process, reduce the time for hearings and allow maximum security for the safety of individuals without having to undermine the integrity and the effectiveness of the refugee board through a prescreening process.

This is one of the three very fundamental changes that have been advocated by organizations which were basically split into two camps. Members of one camp said that there are so many fatal flaws that the Bill is unamendable. They suggested that the Government withdraw the Bill and go back to the drawing board. The other camp advocated the following. Members of that camp said, "If you are going to allow Bill C-55 to stand on the books, then we urge you to change three essential items, namely, the prescreening process, the safe country concept and the appeal process". They said that the appeal had to be beefed up, the safe country concept eliminated, as well as the prescreening process. They said, "If you make changes in those three areas, then the Bill will be acceptable and we can move on with the reform that has been waiting for three years. However, if you do not change these three areas in a substantive and meaningful way, any other changes become almost academic." They said that if we did not offer protection for refugees at a prescreening and if we wish to orbit them by safe country and if we do not want to offer them a proper appeal, then what is the use of crossing the t's and dotting the i's on page 41 of the Bill?

Those are the three basic tenets of the Bill. If those are not changed the spirit of the Bill will not be changed and the other amendments that we can dither over and spend lots of time on will become meaningless in comparison to the other three areas. We therefore strongly advocate that the Government show some movement in these three areas.

Motion No. 6 addresses itself to one of those three areas, namely, the elimination of the prescreening to allow for maximum safety of the individual and to allow the individual to take part in one hearing which would reduce the time that we have to have refugees in the system. Reducing the time will give more fairness, clarity and add a disincentive to those who wish to make frivolous claims.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of Motions Nos. 7 and 9 as presented by my colleague. I understand that he has spoken in detail to these motions.

We have a great concern that the Bill will not give a fair hearing to individuals. It provides for a hasty process with only an adjudicator and a member of the refugee board to talk quickly to people at the port of entry. We feel it is important that there not be this hasty method of excluding people from a fair hearing with proper legal counsel and the opportunity for appeal. Therefore, we are asking that the recommendation in the Bill for an inquiry at the port of entry be changed and that this matter should go directly to the refugee board for processing.

As I have said several times in speaking to the two immigration Bills, I fail to see why the Government has not paid heed to the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, the all-Party committee of the House which recommended an efficient, effective and more streamlined method of processing refugee applications. In essence, as I understand it, that is what we are suggesting here. We want people to have the chance of a full hearing. We do not want it to be delayed unnecessarily. We want maximum administrative efficiency, something which we do not have now in government procedures. We do not want people to be turned back at the port of entry.

I am particularly concerned about the port of entry in my province where many Latin American people arrive, coming from the United States. We know that if they are left in the third country, in this case the United States, they may very well be deported since there is certainly not as much acceptance and sympathy there for people coming from countries where there is considerable upheaval.

In speaking in particular to Motions Nos. 7 and 9 moved by the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) we ask that they be accepted.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of Motion No. 6 put forward by my colleague. The purpose of this amendment is to eliminate the prescreening that is provided for in the Bill. We want to eliminate it because it denies to refugee applicants universal access to the refugee determination process.

Under the prescreening provision in the Bill those who will sit on that hearing will decide whether or not the applicant comes from a safe country, and I say "safe country" parenthetically. If they decide that an individual or individuals come from a safe country then they are denied a full hearing on their claim for refugee status and sent back to that safe country.

• (1130)

Prescreening is wrong because it is almost impossible to provide a universal definition of what is a safe country. A Salvadoran coming from the United States to Canada and claiming refugee status, who was sent back to the United States because the United States was considered a safe country, could very well be returned to El Salvador where his life would be in danger. Therefore, the United States is not a safe country for the Salvadoran.

On the other hand, for a refugee coming to the United States from Poland or Czechoslovakia, the United States may very well be a safe country for that Polish or Czechoslovakian person, and they would not be sent back to Poland or Czechoslovakia.

The problem with the safe country concept is that conditions change in the refugee world instantaneously from day to day. What is a safe country today may change overnight due to some revolution or some massive movement of people, and that country would not be a safe country tomorrow. As I previously stated, a country may be safe for refugees from some countries but not from other countries.

Consequently, through this amendment we are moving that the prescreening be eliminated, and that the person be sent to a fast, efficient hearing on his full claim as a refugee as quickly as possible. In general terms that was proposed by the report of Rabbi Plaut, who considered this matter for more than a year. He was appointed by the previous Liberal Government, and he reported to this Government. He strongly recommended that there be universal access to the refugee determination process, and that there be no prescreening where a certain group is eliminated before they have an opportunity to prove their full case.

Having received the report of Rabbi Plaut, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration re-examined this whole matter and heard witnesses. I was a member of the committee. The members of that committee, Liberals, NDPers, and Conservatives unanimously recommended that there should be universal access to a refugee determination process that would be fast, fair, and efficient.

That provision in the Bill flies in the face of what was recommended by the Plaut Commission, and by the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. This amendment should be supported. We should follow the recommendations of Rabbi Plaut and the standing committee, and almost every refugee support group in the country, the churches, and so on, who are universally opposed to this provision of prescreening. That provision should be eliminated, and we should provide for a fair, fast, and efficient refugee determination process that would be open to all applicants. That is what is proposed by this amendment, and I would ask the House to support it.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak briefly in support of this series of amendments, particularly Motion No. 9, which would eliminate the prescreening process and allow refugees to appear directly before a refugee board. The prescreening process at the border is specifically designed to eliminate a large number of claimants. That type of fine mesh being applied before claimants have the opportunity to appear before a refugee board will eliminate legitimate refugees.

The purpose of this motion is to open up the system to ensure that people who are legitimate refugees have the opportunity to appear before a refugee board, and that they are not summarily dismissed by some kangaroo type court that takes place before they have a chance to get into the country, and before they have a chance to appear before a refugee board and receive some semblance of due process.

The prescreening process is particularly directed at people from Central America, from countries like El Salvador and Guatemala. At the present time in the United States these people are targeted for removal. A small percentage of people have attempted to claim refugee status in the United States from countries like El Salvador, where everybody knows there has been widespread oppression and violations of human rights. A miniscule number of refugees have applied to get into the United States and be accepted as landed immigrants or as refugees. The American Government is planning to return these people to what is almost certain death or torture. By having this prescreening process in place, the Canadian Government is playing right into the hands of the Americans.

I urge Members on the opposite side to look at this situation, take account of what is happening to Central American refugees in the United States, people who have a genuine and legitimate claim to refugee status, and not allow this type of prescreening process to be placed in Canadian law which will deny refugees a decent hearing with some semblance of due process. I urge Members opposite to give this some consideration and not just follow blindly in how they are told to vote, to think of the implications for Canada's refugee policy. If they do, I am sure that they will support this motion.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I wish to say that I certainly respect that members of the Opposition have the right to oppose both the Bill and its concept. In doing so, I wish to say that it is not very good for them to use language like "kangaroo type court" when referring to provisions in the Bill. That does not serve the purposes of good debate. It is designed to inflame and caricature an honest process. I hope that when Members disagree, which they are entitled to do, they do so on a solid, cogent, argumentative basis and not use this type of language.

When my friend, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) spoke of the safe country concept, I wonder if he has paid any attention to the amendments that we have brought forward in the Bill. He stated that there is no possibility of universal application of the safe third country concept. He has completely ignored what the original Bill stated, and the amendments that we have brought forward.

If the Hon. Member checked with the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), he would find that, although the Hon. Member for Spadina may not accept the amendments we brought forward, we have certainly gone a long way in redefining the safe third country concept in order to ensure the security particularly of Latin Americans in the United States. I hope the Hon. Member will be careful that when he speaks to a measure he speaks to it from an informed position, and not in the manner he has at present.

It is true the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) would eliminate prescreening. This Member has always spoken about dealing with those people who would defraud the system, who are bogus claimants. If this Member has talked about anything, it is that. At the same time he talked about genuine refugees. I ask Members opposite how we know that they are genuine refugees until they have gone through the system? It seems to me that Members opposite are asking for us to give legitimacy to prejudging on the part of the claimant, or the people who are sponsoring the claimant. We do not know if they are genuine claimants until they have gone through the system.

The Member brings forward a motion that would eliminate prescreening. I wish to read to Members a list of the people that he wishes to have direct access to the refugee system and would not be prescreened, as he calls it.

• (1140)

The following people would have direct access to the refugee system: war criminals; terrorists; persons convicted in Canada of serious criminal offences; persons guilty of espionage; people who are already recognized and protected as refugees in another country; a person who has already claimed refugee status in Canada before—once, 10 times, 100 times, or 1,000 times—and has been denied; people coming from safe third countries; and people who have no credible basis for claiming refugee status.

These are the people that those who sponsor and support this motion want to have direct access to the refugee process. That is unacceptable; we cannot do that.

On the one hand they say that we must clean up the system so that it will work. On the other hand they bring in a motion which will clog up the system and make sure that it will not work.

If there is one thing we must protect in Canada, it is a system in which people can have confidence. We must make sure that bogus claimants are eliminated quickly and that the refugees which the system determines are real refugees will find protection in Canada and the security they deserve. This motion would destroy that, and we cannot allow it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The first question is on Motion No. 4. Mr. Jourdenais moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 20 to 37 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"45.(1) Subject to subsection (5), where a person who is the sub-".

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 6. Mr. Marchi moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 39 to 45 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion refugee, the person shall, as soon as is practicable, have the claim referred to the Board for a determination."

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 7. Mr. Heap moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 39 to 45 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion refugee, the inquiry shall be concluded and the adjudicator shall take the appropriate action pursuant to Sections 32 and 32.1."

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West)): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that a number of motions are before us. It is the wish of the Official Opposition that if its amendments cannot be carried by voice vote, there be recorded votes on them.

Rather than have us go through this interesting and somewhat archaic procedure of shouting out the yeas and nays and then rising for each of the remaining motions, I wonder whether it would be the disposition of the House to agree to have the same results in respect of the three motions Your Honour has put to us so far apply to the others.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I thank the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) for his suggestion. There is one motion remaining in this grouping, Motion No. 9, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). Mr. Heap moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out line 29 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"claim by notifying an immigration officer who shall refer the claim to the Refugee Division."

Do I have unanimous consent of the House to defer the division on this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Therefore, the recorded division on Motion No. 9 stands deferred.

I should like to refer to the next group of motions to be debated. Motions Nos. 11, 13, and 14 will be debated together. There will be a separate vote on Motion No. 11. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 13 obviates the necessity for a vote on Motion No. 14. However, a negative vote on Motion No. 13 requires a separate vote on Motion No. 14.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 46 to 49 at page 12 and lines 1 to 11 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"47. Every person who claims to be a Convention refugee shall be referred to the Board for a hearing on the claim.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Dealing with Motions Nos. 13 and 14, they were before the House on Friday, but I will reread them for the benefit of Hon. Members. Mr. Heap moved:

Motion No. 13

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by deleting proposed Sections 48, 48.01, 48.02, 48.03, 48.04, 48.05, 48.06 and 48.07 at page 13 to 23 inclusive.

Mr. Marchi moved:

Motion No. 14

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14

(b) by striking out lines 21 to 23 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"shall determine whether the claimant should be permitted to come into Canada or to remain therein and whether the claimant is eligible to have the claim determined by the Refugee Division; and".

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, as I understood you, the only motion before us for debate at this time is Motion No. 11.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Motions Nos. 11, 13, and 14 will be debated together.

Mr. Marchi: I thought Your Honour said that Motions Nos. 13 and 14 were debated on Friday.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): They were introduced, but they are now part of a different grouping following the new ruling made by Mr. Speaker earlier this day.

We are now debating Motions Nos. 11, 13, and 14, and there will be a separate vote on Motion No. 11. The Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) has the floor.

• (1150)

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I will begin with the words of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Friesen) who said a few moments ago that he was highly offended by the use of some words by some Hon. Members and he threw out the words "kangaroo court". He said we should not be using terms such as "kangaroo court". Then he proceeded very quickly to suggest that because we were moving Motion No. 6 in order to delete the prescreening clause, that somehow myself and other members of my Party and those who support Motion No. 6 were, in his words, in favour of criminals, terrorists, killers and other individuals. That is a highly irresponsible statement and it puts the debate into the gutter. His stand is very hypocritical to say the least. He suggested that the words "kangaroo court" were the wrong words but suggested that somehow he has a monopoly on virtue and that other Members of Parliament are in support of those various classes of individuals. Not only is that irresponsible, it is highly inaccurate. There is not one Member of Parliament, not one Canadian in this country, who is in favour of the number of different types of individuals which the Parliamentary Secretary had the temerity to suggest.

Motion No. 11 is similar to Motion No. 6 which was rejected by the Government. Motion No. 11 reads:

—by striking out lines 46 to 49 at page 12 and lines 1 to 11 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"47. Every person who claims to be a Convention refugee shall be referred to the Board for a hearing on the claim."

That is our amendment, Madam Speaker. It does not say that we are in favour of possible criminals or terrorists. It does not say, as the Parliamentary Secretary advocated, that we would be judging the person to be a legitimate refugee. How do we know a person is a genuine refugee if we do not have a prescreening, he asked. The Parliamentary Secretary is trying to imply that because we do not want a prescreening we are suggesting that the person is a bona fide claimant.

Once again, this reflects a misunderstanding on that side of the House. It is even more worrisome when we hear that from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Immigration, because by deleting the prescreening we would not be passing judgment on the individual claimant. We would be changing the process by which a judgment on the individual is rendered.

If we allow the prescreening to stand, we are giving the authority and power to the prescreening officers to keep a person out of the country for whatever reason. Perhaps the officers had a rough morning and perhaps they misjudged and misread the individual. The new refugee board will not have a chance to render a decision on a person who is turned away.

Couple that with Bill C-84. The person coming in on a boat will not even touch shore, but that is another argument. The Member is trying to suggest that we allow the prescreening to prejudge. We say that is wrong. We have a court and a system of justice which says to the Supreme Court judges, the various other justices in the different courts, "You be the arbitrators. We will create the laws but you adjudicate any rights or wrongs." We are not telling someone to go to the Supreme Court but that we might prejudge him or her first and send in a written analysis. That is a different system, of course, but it is the same principle.

What we will have is a refugee board and a prescreening process that will or will not allow that person to go to the board. This is a prejudging. If the person is allowed to go to the refugee board, the two officers and the evidence they collected at the beginning of the process can be used against the claimant at the board. So much for the Government saying that it is a non-adversarial role, because that is not true. The Government has to decide whether it is adversarial, like in a court of law, or it is non-adversarial. It should be non-adversarial and refugee board members should be allowed to make the determination.

If I were a claimant, those two officers and the information they collected at the border could be used against me at the board by a government official or government lawyer. If the Government wants to have a refugee board make the determination and the Minister has said that the board has the integrity, the knowledge, the expertise and the structure to make a fair, effective decision—with which I and my Party agrees—why is it necessary to build a Berlin Wall, as Rabbi Plaut suggested, around the refugee board by designing a prescreening process? Those forces are not pulling in harmony but in opposite directions. Motion No. 11 suggests that the prescreening be deleted to allow a claimant to go to the refugee board.

Let us have the assurance that whatever decision is rendered by the refugee board we can be satisfied that the decision was properly made. We do not want to question ourselves. We do not want nightmares and we do not want to think about whether we should have left the decision to the refugee board of the lady from El Salvador. We do not want to wonder whether she had a little more to say which the prescreening would not allow her to say, or whether we made a mistake. If we have, and if we do make a mistake, that mistake can be fatal. Why should we have that on our conscience as a Parliament and as a country?

Would it not be better as a progressive country, as a privileged country, to afford protection for an individual and allow his or her story to be heard at the refugee board hearing? Why at the border crossings must we say to the claimant, "Look, don't give us all your story, just a bit, so we can get a taste of what you are fleeing. We will know whether you are right or wrong and we will either send you to the refugee board or send you packing".

If you were a claimant, Madam Speaker, would you want to give a little bit of your story or would you want to give all the facts and circumstances? Obviously you would want the latter. I would. If you go to a court and the judge says "I have only an hour. I know you have been fighting this prison term for 20 years of your life, but just give me enough facts and I will make a decision on that". That is not the way it works.

The refugee claimant will want to tell his or her story. We ask nothing more. The claimant asks nothing more. Why have an individual give just a little bit of the story at the prescreening stage? This process will take more time and it will create another bureaucratic level. We will have two hearings instead of one and that will encourage more frivolous claims. Logic dictates that you have one good hearing before one competent body, namely, the refugee board. What is so wrong with allowing claimants to go through the system and to be judged by those who should judge them and not by an immigration adjudicator who has enforcement on his or her mind because of the duty of those officers?

• (1200)

We do not want to pass judgment on who is genuine or not. We are not in favour of the drug traffickers and terrorists the Parliamentary Secretary mentioned a few moments ago coming into the country. We are in favour of a legitimate process to render a legitimate decision. With the prescreening the Government is making a predetermination and prejudgment. Therefore, it is wrong and we hope that the House realizes that and will vote in favour of Motion No. 11.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of Motion No. 11 and, since they are grouped together, in support of Motions Nos. 13 and 14.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If I may have the attention of the House for a moment, I think an explanation should be given at this time.

Motions Nos. 13 and 14 were introduced on Friday and the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) as well as the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) and the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) spoke on those motions. However, they did not have the opportunity to speak on Motion No. 11 as it had not been introduced at the time. Hence, the Chair will consider this to be a new debate and Hon. Members who would like to participate in debate on Motions Nos. 11, 13 and 14 may do so. The Hon. Member has the floor.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, as it happens, I will use my 10 minutes to concentrate on Motion No. 11, but my remarks will cover the others as well.

Motion No. 11 is the attempt to correct the error the Government made in establishing this unfortunate system of screening and particularly the notorious concept of a safe third country. Apparently this is a concept invented by the Canadian Government. It has no standing in law outside Canada. There are no agreements in force between Canada and any other country in this respect. There may be some bilateral agreements between France and Germany or countries like that, but there is no standard concept of a safe third country.

More than 40 witnesses spoke to the committee during the 44 and a half hours of hearings. The Government waited until those witnesses had finished speaking before it introduced, during the clause by clause hearings in the committee, an amendment to the safe third country clause.

That clause had indicated that a person is not eligible if the claimant came to Canada from a country other than the country of the claimant's nationality or where the claimant has no country of nationality, the country of the claimant's habitual residence that has been prescribed as a country that complies with the United Nations Convention on the Status of Refugees either universally or with respect to the persons of a specified class of persons of which the claimant is a member. In other words, we would comply with the Convention for all people or only for people from country x if a certain claimant happens to come from country x.

That was the way the clause read in the morning. Then the Government changed its mind and brought in a different clause in the afternoon. Now the Government only wants to comply with Article 33 of the Convention rather than the entire Convention.

This is typical of the way the Government conducted the hearings on this long, complicated and highly controversial Bill. We went through the Bill in about seven days. Over 40 witnesses appeared before the committee and the committee had about two days to handle all the amendments that could be put in that time. Some of the amendments were changed more than once by the Government itself, a Government which has all the resources the public and Opposition would like to have to study this kind of Bill.

There are two major faults with the Government's amendment. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary tried to suggest that I was favourable to it. He did not actually say that I supported it, but he certainly gave the impression to some that I was favourable to it and I wish to correct that impression.

Even though witnesses and the Opposition asked that the Convention be respected, this amendment does not respect the Convention. First, it leaves out such limited tests as the Government had included in its original draft. One such test is whether or not a person can make a refugee claim in the country to which we send him back. That test is not included in the Bill any longer. The Government can send a claimant back even if it does not think that the person can make a refugee claim there.

Article 33 of the Convention is the article dealing with non-refoulement or not returning a refugee to the country from which he is fleeing. However, there is nothing in this clause to say that we must pick a country which complies with the right of a refugee claimant to make a claim. If we ship him back to country x, country x might say that it does not like the colour of his eyes and it will send him back to his home country without finding out whether or not he is a refugee. Country x may feel that if Canada did not want to put the claimant through the refugee claim system, why should it. Canada so far has been a leader; not the Government but the people of Canada got the Nansen Medal last year for good treatment of refugees. If Canada does not want to give this guy a chance to make a claim, why should country x? It might ship him back to the country from which he is running without even learning that he is a refugee. It will try to cover its own guilt and our guilt in that way.

The second thing wrong with this amendment is that Canada did not sign just Article 33 of the Convention, it signed the whole Convention and there are a lot of obligations under the Convention. If we send a person to a country that does not honour those other obligations we are abandoning those parts of the Convention.

Article 16, for instance, provides that a refugee shall have free access to the courts of law when in the territory of contracting states. Article 17 provides that a refugee be able to earn wages or be gainfully employed. There are so-called refugees in Germany who are not allowed to earn a living. Germany does not comply with that article of the Convention.

Another article of the Convention indicates that all contracting states shall accord to refugees lawfully staying in their country the same treatment with respect to public relief and assistance as is accorded to their nationals. Many countries who have signed the Convention do not comply with that article. There is a similar article dealing with labour legislation and social security. Canada signed all those articles of the Convention, not just Article 33.

We must ask how a person will be treated in the country to which we send him back, even if we think that that country complies with the non-refoulement article only, the only one for which the Government has shown respect. It has shown contempt for the other 40-odd articles of the Convention which we signed 20 years ago.

On the surface, the Government's amended version appears to be better. The Government has persuaded Canada's Ambassador to the United Nations to say on the radio this morning that since the Government has fixed the Bill up, the UN might like it better. I do not think that Canada's Ambassador to the United Nations knows any more than he did the last time he opened his mouth and was properly criticized for not knowing what he was talking about on this point.

In administration, this clause may actually turn out to be worse than the one it replaces because there is no guarantee that when a person is shipped back to country x he will have a chance to make his refugee claim there and no guarantee that he will have the rights of refugees, other than non-refoulement, which the convention requires and which Canada should require.

We heard warmhearted statements from the Minister last spring that we would only send refugees back to countries that would give them the same treatment that Canada gives them. That is a lot of malarkey. The Government abandoned that along with many other of its promises. We will send them back without knowing how the country will treat them. The Government is pulling a shameful dodge with Clause 14, Section 48.01(1)(a). I hope that Members will instead support Motions 11, 13 and 14.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, it was a bit of a surprise to hear the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) supporting Motion No. 11 because he was in attendance during all 55 hours of hearings, the clause by clause study, and certainly most, if not all, of the hearings which took place in the fall of 1985, and a lot of the hearings and visits in between. I think the Hon. Member does understand this very complex Bill and how particular amendments might affect it.

I have read Motion No. 11 more than once. I am not surprised that the motion was moved by the Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) because he did not attend all the hearings. In fact, he was at about 10 per cent of them and missed the entire clause-by-clause study. The moving of this amendment is not a discrepancy from past behaviour. This particular amendment puts us in the exact situation in which we are today. It creates an impossibility to remove; it effectively wipes out the removal decision. It provides the opportunity to re-enter the system again and again.

This motion would do another very important thing. Because the Government has a concern for legitimate refugees and an understanding of the fear and trepidation with which many true refugees arrive at our border points, through this Bill they will be provided with a barrister and solicitor. Right from the moment that they face any significant decision, such as a denial of entry to this country, and through all of the eligibility and credibility stages to learn whether they are legitimate refugees, they will have counsel. This amendment would take that counsel away. It would eliminate the protection which is provided to claimants by the decision of the state to provide a barrister and solicitor. I am not sure that that is what the mover of the motion intended, but that would be the impact.

We heard a lot from the Member for York West about the need for a single hearing. That is consistent with the advice which we received from many groups, to decide as many issues as possible in a single hearing. It is possible to decide in a single hearing whether a person is a refugee deserving of the protection of Canada. However, there is another decision which must be made in every case, that is, whether the person is entitled to enter Canada or should be removed from Canada. The advice of the committee was that the two issues should not be mixed.

Motions Nos. 11 and 14 in combination indicate the emergence from the Liberal Party of Canada of a new thought which no one has recommended. These two motions together clearly say that refugee board members should be making immigration decisions about who is eligible to come into this country and who is not, who should be removed from this country and who should not. They are saying that the people appointed to the refugee board, because of their sensitivity to countries with specific conditions around the world and to the true plight of refugees, to hold a non-adversarial hearing and encourage people to tell their story about persecution and torture, should suddenly be made enforcement officers making expulsion decisions.

That is the consequence of Motion No. 14 and it is consistent with Motion No. 11. The Liberal Party of Canada wants refugee board members to become policemen on immigration matters. I hope that that is unacceptable to all Members of this Chamber. It is inappropriate.

Through this Bill we are proposing that we decide, at a single two-person oral hearing, whether a person is admissible to Canada, should be removed from Canada, and has any basis of a claim to the protection of Canada. If there is any possibility that the person might need the protection of Canada, the Government says that they should go forward to the refugee board, made up of compassionate and knowledgeable Canadians, where they should have a non-adversarial hearing to determine whether or not they need the protection of this country.

However, all cases where there is no evidence of the need for the protection of Canada will be dealt with in a single hearing. Under the scheme of the Bill the adjudicator alone, in the presence of the refugee board member, will make the removal and admission decision, which is an immigration decision. The refugee board member or the adjudicator will send that person forward for a full refugee board hearing. We will not be asking the refugee board member to become an expert in Canadian immigration law. We will not ask the refugee board member to become a policeman of inquiry. That is totally inappropriate and totally inconsistent with the role that we will ask them to play in Canadian society.

By voting down these amendments we retain the right of all claimants to have a barrister and solicitor represent them at the inquiry, to meet with them subsequent to inquiry if there is a removal order issued, to prepare the legal documentation, and to apply for leave to the Federal Court of Canada. Surely that is an important principle. Surely we support the provision of counsel in order to protect the rights of the claimant under the Canadian Constitution and Canadian law.

• (1220)

It should be crystal clear to all Members of the House that these amendments were not well thought out and their implications were not well understood. The consequences of the adoption of these would indeed be a tragedy for the legitimate refugees who come to our shores.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to speak briefly in support of Motion No. 13 which would delete Sections 48, 48.01, 48.02, 48.03, 48.04, 48.05, 48.06, and 48.07 from the Bill.

I want to speak particularly about the concept of a so-called safe third country because there is no safe third country that will be safe for all people. People who apply for refugee determination status require that they be heard on the merits of their individual case rather than being lumped together to be shipped back to some country with which we happen to have good diplomatic relations.

I want to draw the attention of Members opposite to the very serious difficulty of declaring that some country is not a safe country for individual refugee claimants. For example, how will we indicate that the United States is not a safe third country for refugee claimants from El Salvador or Guatemala? It is not a safe country for them, but how will we be able to indicate that without getting ourselves into some diplomatic brouhaha with the United States? We are treading very dangerously in respect of our relationship with the United States today and will presumably always need to have some account of our diplomatic relationships with the United States. The Government is building itself a diplomatic time bomb with this concept of a safe third country. It will either face diplomatic embarrassment at some point or there will be a less than fair process for refugee claimants.

Perhaps I can make this more clear by referring to the Government's response to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. Last spring the standing committee made its report on official development assistance and said that the Government should establish a grid regarding human relations, and that development assistance should be tied to human relations. In its response, the Government indicated that this was a very dicey step to take because it did not want to become too public in stating the human rights situations in other countries.

If that is true with regard to Third World countries to whom we might be thinking of giving development assistance, it would be even more true in terms of dealing with powerful nations like the United States, with whom we are less than equal.

According to previous regulations, there are some 18 or 19 countries to which we would not return any refugee claimants. With this concept of a safe third country, we do not know that those safe countries will not return refugees to these countries to which we previously said people should not be returned.

I want to quote an E-mail correspondence we received from the General Secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches concerning Bill C-55. Mr. Donald Anderson states:

> We appreciate government work to try to improve Bill C-55. Unfortunately our deep concerns remain. How can we know if a person claiming to be a refugee needs our help if we do not hear their problems? Each person claiming to be a refugee should have a right to have their individual circumstances assessed and their case decided on its merits before competent independent decision-makers. To us, this is the intent of the Convention and Protocol.
> Immigration programs may legitimately choose who comes on humanitarian grounds and may set priorities on countries they may come from. We understand the attractiveness of this approach.
> Bill C-55 provides for exclusion of people not on the basis of their individual circumstances, but by a political Cabinet decision that the country they transited before arriving in Canada is deemed to adhere to Clause 33 of the Convention, that is, it is deemed the transit country will not return the person in any manner whatsoever to a country where he or she may face persecution. This is a far shot from our obligation to give an individual who arrives in Canada a fair hearing of his or her claim to need our protection.
> Also, there is no meaningful appeal to any of the critical decisions made which can remove claimants from Canada in proposed inquiries or hearings.
> We cannot accept legislation which sets aside a claimant's right to just procedures in the name of administrative convenience.
> We urge you to reconsider, to abandon this Bill C-55 and to speedily replace it with one conforming with the principles of allowing every claimant a hearing on the merits and a meaningful appeal. There are alternative processes we can surely all support.

I urge Members opposite to think very carefully about this entire concept of a safe third country which, in fact, has absolutely no validity whatsoever in the facts of the situation.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Madam Speaker, during the entire process of this legislation, second reading, committee stage and now, I never quite understood how the Government deals with the fact that this law we are considering contravenes Canada's signature to the UN Convention dealing with refugee matters. That Convention requires that Canada provide the opportunity for a claimant to be given the chance to present his or her case in front of an independent tribunal to determine its merits. Yet this Bill clearly precludes certain classes of people from making that claim. That is a clear contradiction of an international obligation, to say nothing of the intrinsic transgression of the rights of the individuals involved.

It is a very serious undertaking for a government to knowingly and clearly contravene that kind of international obligation. It must be for reasons of great emergency of state that we would so clearly go back on our word and commit this kind of incredible retraction from an undertaking to an international statement made by the Government of Canada on behalf of Canadians.

The Government has never been prepared to say why it is doing so. We know that much media attention has been given to the fact that certain Sikhs arrived on our shore and the House was recalled because of a crisis. However, that still does not explain Bill C-55. It does not explain that there is a clear alternative to the methods being chosen.

The motion points out that it did not have to be done this way. It did not have to automatically preclude large numbers of people from being given the opportunity to present their case. We have pointed out in this House many times that if they happen to come from a so-called safe country, that is an automatic exclusion regardless of the merits of the case. Yet we know there is no such thing as an absolutely guaranteed safe third country. Look at the statistics.

The previous speaker to me talked about the United States. I think we all admire it as a democratic country with an open political system based upon a constitution and bill of rights, yet we know that at the present moment, if one is a refugee claimant from Central America, one's chances of being accepted into the United States refugee determination system is about 3 per cent or 4 per cent as compared to being a claimant from eastern Europe where one's chances of acceptance are around 50 per cent or 60 per cent. The conclusion one must draw from that simple statistical analysis, therefore, is that there is a high degree of political judgment being applied in the refugee system of the United States. For Central Americans it is not a safe third country.

I can speak from personal experience with respect to many of those who are involved in the sanctuary movement, the very movement about which the Pope spoke in San Antonio last week in an appeal to the United States Government to legitimize the sanctuary movement. We in Canada were, up until now, accepting refugees in that sanctuary movement because those people knew their chances of an opportunity to be heard in the United States were virtually nil. We are now excluding that class of people. By the way, when that class of people made claims under the sanctuary movement and appeared before the refugee advisory committee, a large proportion of them were accepted as bona fide refugees.

We have had historical experience since 1982 of Central Americans in the sanctuaries of the United States being given access to our refugee claim system and being accepted as bona fide refugees. We now have a Bill in the House which will exclude that class of people from even making a claim and having it heard. Clearly that is a contradiction of our obligations under the Act. The case evidence is before us.

It is very hard to have any justification for this, and we have heard none from the Government. It has evaded any commentary on that central point. It is no wonder that every single organization in this country, every single reputable group working in the field of refugee matters, such as the Canadian Bar Association, church groups and aid organizations, and every single international organization, including the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and Amnesty International, every group which has knowledge, and respect and credits in this area, has condemned this part of the Bill. Yet the Government stands in the face of that kind of evidence and refuses to acknowledge that it has made a mistake in this particular area and refuses to find any way of trying to make a correction.

The amendments before us are simply to respond to the historical evidence, the treaty evidence and the testimony of all those who have come before the committee to say the Government has made a mistake. It is a grievous and terrible mistake. Do something to correct it.

It is hard to fathom when there has been such a weight of argument why there is such obduracy and insensitivity to this matter. It is really hard to fathom, unless what the Government is really saying is that it now believes we should no longer accept the UN covenant on refugee matters in terms of universal right of access to determination. I say that because during the debate on this Bill earlier the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) rose to say that he does not believe in it. He is not the Minister of Immigration but he is a member of Cabinet and, therefore, provides us with some suspicion that perhaps what he was saying reflects a much broader point of view.

If that is the case, the Government should say so. It should clearly say it is abandoning its international commitment and tell it to the United Nations Commission for Refugees. The Government should at least have the honesty to admit that it no longer will adhere to that basic fundamental principle which we have adhered to as a country for 20 or 30 years. At least we would then have it out in the open. At least we would know what we are dealing with, rather than trying to slip it in by the back door. That is why these amendments are very crucial. If it is simply a matter that the Government has made a mistake, then it still has an opportunity to correct that mistake. However, if the fact is that it is fundamentally changing its commitments, and this country's commitments on refugee matters, at least it should have the guts to say so.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, there is a tendency around here to believe that interventions made in this House are of a partisan nature. That is quite understandable. After all, this is a partisan place. We therefore tend to look at interventions by government Members as being pro-Government and the Opposition as being in opposition for the sake of opposing. That is why I would like to put on record instead the opinions, not of the Opposition, but of groups which appeared as witnesses before the committee when the Bill was studied. I would like particularly to put on record the statements and comments which were made on the particular question of prescreening by groups that felt the clause before us ought to be amended.

No one could accuse the Canadian Bar Association of being a body of wild-eyed radicals whose intent it is to disturb the system or to create dangerous situations. That is why it is important to know what it said in committee when it appeared on August 31.

The Canadian Bar Association said that the screening process and the lack of discretion for the immigration adjudicator and member of the refugee division concerning access criteria prevent a complete evaluation of claims and do not comply with the Convention in allowing refoulement without inquiry on the merits? In other words, the Canadian Bar Association came down with the suggestion that the review be carried out by two members of the refugee division and in favour of what is commonly described as full universal access. It was suggested that, it be done through at least two members of the refugee division, people who are knowledgeable on matters relating to refugees.

On August 28 the Immigration Appeal Board, another institution that you know, Madam Speaker, is well established across the country because it consists of Government-appointed Canadian citizens, also expressed its disagreement with the way the Bill is written. It said that the immigration process should not interfere with the refugee determination process because particular situations, as the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) so well articulated in his speech, might be penalized.

Let me put on record what the Refugee Status Advisory Committee said on the same date. It said there is danger in not evaluating all the proof during the screening process and that there is danger in denying access to the genuine refugees.

On September 2, the Coalition for a Just Immigration and Refugee Policy said we should not limit access to the determination system. All these organizations came down in favour of full universal access by way of an alternative process.

What did the Mennonite Central Committee have to say on September 2? It said that the screening process, the one being proposed by the Government and which we are attempting to amend today, will not permit an individual evaluation. This is a group of people which, as everyone knows, has had considerable experience in the field of refugees. It is a group which consists of thoughtful Canadians who have taken to heart the whole matter of refugees over many years. They have a considerable record of performance and experience in this regard. They also said that the short timeframe and the burden of proof on the claimants make access to the determination system very difficult. At that time they assumed that that timeframe would be 72 hours. Granted, things may not have been expressed at that time very clearly for them to make that point. However, they went on to ask this. Why not give a universal hearing on the merits before members of the refugee division? Here again we see the emphasis being placed on the refugee division.

On September 3 Rabbi Plaut appeared before the committee. He was in favour of full universal access. He said that the screening process consists of a hearing but with the disadvantage of not hearing all the evidence, as the Hon. Member for York West put it a short while ago. Rabbi Plaut went on to say that, nevertheless, it will take almost as long as a real hearing. This is why we are baffled by the apparent insensitivity on the part of the Government to accept an approach by all those who have appeared before the Committee with credentials and with the intention of improving the quality of the legislation to make it work better.

Pierre Duquette appeared before the committee on September 3. He said that screening will be as long as a full hearing but will not have the advantages of a full hearing.

The witnesses to whom I have referred were not put up by the Liberal Party of Canada. They are individuals or members of organizations who came forward on their own.

The Hispanic Congress on September 3 made the comment that the period of 72 hours is too short.

On September 4 an interesting observation was put on the record by Professor Angus who said with respect to the timeframe that if it were as short as 48 hours or 72 hours then that would clearly be open to a challenge under Section 7 of the Charter. I am sure that the Government does not want this Bill to be brought before the Supreme Court on a Charter challenge. This is another reason we have difficulty in understanding why these amendments are not meeting the favour and support of the Government.

On September 8 the Canadian Council for Refugees made the comment that it is not fair to preclude people from making claims. That is the Council's interpretation of how the Bill as proposed by the Government would work.

The non-governmental groups stated on September 8 that immigration officials should not be involved in any refugee matters. That is the same point being made by the Immigration Appeal Board and the Canadian Bar Association.

Again on September 8 we find that the National Association of Women and the Law stated that, in essence, screening should be eliminated.

The Canadian Jewish Congress on the same day said that screening is done partly by an immigration official as proposed in the Bill. The Congress stated that this confusion of immigration and refugee issues is unfortunate, which is what the Hon. Member for York West and others have been saying for many, many weeks. The Congress went on to indicate that it would be preferable to have refugee division members handle this particular phase of the process.

On September 8 John Frecker of the Law Reform Commission of Canada said that where there is as much concern expressed about procedures as there has been about the access tests, we would do well to take a second look because legal challenges might well tie the system in knots. Why do members of the Government, in particular the Parliamentary Secretary, not address this particular comment? It would be interesting to have on record their assessment as to whether the Bill would not be eventually tied up in knots in terms of legal challenges.

John Frecker went on to say that there is an alternative. It is that it is possible to have a hearing by one refugee division member only.

Before concluding may I draw to your attention, Madam Speaker, what the Canadian Employment and Immigration Union said on the same day as Mr. Frecker. Representatives of the union said that adjudicators have had no involvement before this time in refugee issues, which is one of the reasons this amendment is now before the House, and therefore they would have to be carefully trained. This is why if we run through the testimony given we will see that the evidence is strongly in favour of refugee division members handling this particular process, this particular link in the totality of the chain of the process.

You can see what is motivating us, Madam Speaker. It is not just a partisan opinion. It is the process itself that has generated this amendment. There was a consultation with interested parties in committee. Nevertheless, that consultation did not seem to produce any result from what are credible sources of competent groups in the country.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to say something in support of Motion No. 13 which would amend Clause 14 of Bill C-55 by deleting a series of proposed sections, all of which are designed to create barriers to access for persons who may have more than valid refugee claims but who will, if the Government has its way, be prevented from having any access to Canada's refugee determination process.

I want to join with others in the opposition Parties, and in particular with my good friend, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), in opposing the Government's intention. It is of course the Hon. Member for Spadina who has put forward Motion No. 13.

We have before us a fundamental question of humanity as it will operate in Canada's refugee determination system. We have here a fundamental proposal by the Government to deny Canadian humanity in the application of the law. In considering that possibility, while I see government Members sitting silent while we in the Opposition speak to the importance of Canadian humanity, I want to consider what is involved with this particular proposal.

Its essence is a proposal to allow a couple of persons, one of them an immigration officer, to ask very limited questions. They will ask not whether someone is actually a refugee or has a valid refugee claim to put forward, but whether the person has come from a country which is not itself the country from which he or she has escaped, whether this is a safe third country, as the jargon goes, to which such a person might be returned. They will ask if there is any credibility to the claim that the person is making in terms of the country involved, not the person himself or herself.

Then two possibilities will be considered. Did the person come from a country with which we have good relations and to which that person may be sent back because he or she will not suffer in that country; or is the person conceivably making a claim to being a refugee in a country with which we again may well have good relations and which we do not wish to regard as productive of refugees?

The last years have given us good reason to recognize that the individual experience of persons in various countries including, tragically, sister nations of the Commonwealth can be such that they have every reason to put forward a claim to being refugees. In fact, they are in danger of their lives; they may have suffered severely in their bodies; they may have experienced torture or psychological terror of a most serious type.

Immigration officers who are quite unsympathetic to the claim of persons from that country generally, may deny them the opportunity to put their claim forward. That is the chief concern with the motion put forward to delete all those provisions and raise a barrier to a person who wishes to put a refugee claim forward to the Canadian authorities and the established refugee determination process. This is an attempt to raise a barrier against refugees and against the whole spirit of Canadian humanity which has opened our door to refugees in the past, and which did so quite triumphantly in the summer of 1986. Suddenly this past summer it was slammed shut as the Conservative Government saw an opportunity to turn its back on Canadian humanity and come up with extreme legislation which could only pander to some of the worst tendencies that exist in Canadian minds and hearts, and begin playing to Canadian prejudice.

The consequence of the proposal in Bill C-55 is a rejection of our commitments to the United Nations, to the community of nations to which we have been joined since the end of the Second World War. It is a rejection of our commitments under the Convention, and under the UN Charter of Rights. This charter states that every person who, in his or her experience has been forced out of their society or country for fear of life and safety, has a right to have their claim to refugee status considered. Under the UN Convention which we joined with other nations to ensure safety for refugees, those particular commitments are being denied in this Bill.

It seems a light matter to Conservatives across the country, and to those whose prejudices are pandered to by this legislation, to deny our international commitments. What can we say of a government which is committed to observing the law and upholding it, when it sets out to deny the statement of the Supreme Court of Canada, and to flout the decisions of the Supreme Court of this country which has declared that anyone who is within our borders has the right to have a claim to refugee status considered? What can one say of a government that will do that? What right does it have to make law when it does not know how to observe the law, and when it finds new devices to raise barriers, play to prejudice, and create the worst tendencies in this country?

If there is any question of that being rather strong language, surely those who scanned the half page of an advertisement in The Globe and Mail last week know that it is true. The questions asked and the argumentation put around those questions by this so-called Immigration Association of Canada were attempts to incite the prejudices that exist, and those feelings that immigrants who are coming to this country, particularly refugees from the southern hemisphere, are changing the nature of our society and we should do something to end that.

It is often forgotten that this country is, in a particular sense, a country resulting from the arrival of refugees. Canada is bilingual because after French-speaking settlers and immigrants from France had settled for more than a century and a half in the St. Lawrence Valley, the colony of Upper Canada was created in response to the arrival of refugees who had lost the war for the British Empire in North America, and those who had been defeated by the American colonies assertion of their own independence. The arrival of refugees in what became Upper Canada, later Ontario, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, was the first of many experiences of the arrival of refugees.

In fact, in a sense I am here because in 1926 my father and his family came to Canada as refugees from Soviet Russia. They were fleeing a system of government which had threatened the lives of members of the family, and others of the community. In Canada they found a safety for which they were devoutly grateful, and for which I am devoutly grateful.

With those Canadian traditions, I find it profoundly offensive that the Government should raise barriers and pander to prejudices which exist in some Canadian minds. In the era of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms we have been doing our best to remove them from Canadian public life and lessen, if not end entirely, their impact on employment, services to individuals, and so on. The Government which did all too little in the way of achieving progress in employment equity is here in the immigration area explicitly playing to those prejudices.

On the one hand we may say that this is something that bureaucrats in Immigration have been seeking, because they have been talking to their opposite numbers in other countries of the European community, and countries where similarly grim attitudes have come into play. Those countries have often experienced far more in the way of population movement, and the appearance of refugees than Canada. At this point Canada may be the last country that still wishes to maintain principles of humanity. At least, many of us in this country do, whatever the Government thinks. Surely, it is not fair to blame those in the Immigration Service who have been listening to others and thinking about ways in which the Canadian system could be tightened up. In our system of parliamentary government, it is never fair to blame the officials or the bureaucracy for what is happening. The buck stops on desks on the other side of the House.

Quite explicitly, I wish to say that last January when the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) made comments about his home district of the Lac-Saint-Jean area and spoke of it as untouched by immigration and other realities, the controversy aroused a good deal of noise in the House and little attention in the country, because there were people who did not believe that the Minister of Employment and Immigration actually meant that. Since I made the charge at the time and asked him to withdraw those comments, I have long since been convinced that he did mean what he said.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration is quite happy with what is happening these days, and he is encouraging this Immigration Association of Canada, led by someone who had a leading role in the immigration service in years past and who is now out of the Public Service. The Minister is quite happy to encourage attitudes opposed to immigration, opposed to the appearance in Canada of refugees—having some type of a lily-white Canada in which people from the southern hemisphere are not wanted, particularly those from Central and South America where too many countries still have repressive regimes threatening people with danger and forcing them out of their borders. The Canadian Government does not wish to respond to that situation, and it is giving us this type of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the Hon. Member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, it is quite inappropriate in the Chamber, and one of our long-standing traditions, that Members do not deal with the issue of motivation. I feel that the Hon. Member is being particularly sleazy in dealing with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard), and ascribing motivation to that Minister. It is totally inappropriate behaviour in the Chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—BAN LIFTED ON PUBLICATION OF LA PRENSA NEWSPAPER

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the Central American peace process the Government of Nicaragua has shown further evidence of good faith by lifting its ban on the publication of La Prensa.

Nations find it very difficult to maintain full freedom of the press when, like Nicaragua, their independence is threatened by war from outside.

Prior to its closure in June, 1986, La Prensa had been giving its support to the American-financed Contras who were waging war on their own people. Even as she announced the reopening of her paper, Violeta Chamorro said that she would print information even if it endangered the security of the Sandinista Army.

If Canada were at war, we would neither expect nor want to see freedom of the press carried to such an extent that newspapers would print information which could endanger the Canadian Armed Forces. By reopening La Prensa, therefore, Nicaragua is taking a great leap of faith in the peace process.

The Reagan administration in the United States now has an obligation to show similar evidence of good faith by stating clearly that it will not provide any Contra funding while the peace process is on track.

AIR CANADA

CALL FOR PRIVATIZATION

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I met a large group of Air Canada pilots at the Rotary Lobsterfest in Guelph. We ate lots of lobster, but we also spent considerable time talking about Air Canada.

It is becoming increasingly clear that members of the staff of Air Canada want the company privatized. They do not want 10 per cent turned over to the private sector, or even 50 per cent; they want 100 per cent turned over to the private sector. They want new aircraft, new spirit, and new opportunities.

Let us agree to let them have those opportunities. Let them lead the way in turning this Crown corporation into a private enterprise. They deserve the chance.

THE HOMELESS

URGENT NEED TO REMEDY SITUATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in addition to drawing public attention to the deplorable living conditions of more than 40,000 Canadian men and women, the Canadian Conference on the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, which took place in Ottawa last week, will have made us fully aware that the situation is critical and that concerted efforts must be made to try to remedy it.

Unfortunately the Conservative Government did not get the message. Once again it has been unable to show the leadership required to implement concrete measures designed to solve the problems of these thousands of men, women and children who live under difficult and even miserable conditions.

Over the past year more than 1,000 persons have slept on streets and sidewalks in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier, while 11,000 youths aged 15 to 24 have been without work. A great many people were on social welfare rolls, including most of the 19 per cent of single-parent families that, as we know, are among the most destitute in our society. By contrast, during the last three years of the federal Liberal Government, 765 subsidized housing units were built in Ottawa—Vanier alone, but in the past three years since this Government took office only 270 such units have been built.

By refusing to offer a helping hand to the needy, the Conservative Government shows its inability to live up to the mandate given to it by Canadians, men and women alike, both rich and poor.

VIA RAIL

TREATMENT OF PASSENGERS WAITING TO BOARD TRAINS

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, VIA Rail is suffering intense competition from airlines, bus lines, and auto transportation, yet it insists upon putting the convenience of its policies ahead of the comfort of its passengers.

Hundreds of people regularly line up in stations at Toronto, Ottawa, and other cities, often for an hour, before being allowed to board trains that are standing empty in the stations.

In contrast, passengers may comfortably wait seated in trains long before they leave stations at London, Paris, Rome, and New York.

If VIA wants business, it will find success from a tried and true formula—put the customers first.

HEALTH

INTRODUCTION OF ANTI-SMOKING LEGISLATION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it was only a few short weeks ago that we heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) wax eloquent about what he called the toughest anti-smoking legislation in the western world. He was going to introduce a clean air environment for federal employees. He was going to introduce restrictions and a ban on advertising.

However, what do we now hear through the grapevine? Unfortunately the Minister felt the heat, and he is apparently considering getting out of the kitchen. The Minister says that he does not know whether he will proceed with the legislation because he is getting too much heat from the back-benches of the Conservative Party.

I want to tell him that we on this side of the House feel that anti-smoking legislation has been a long time coming and that he should continue with the legislation.

[Translation]

I should like to tell him that if he is not prepared to stand the heat generated by the political issue which non-smokers' rights have become, we are prepared to do just that and we ask that he table forthwith the anti-smoking legislation instead of heeding the advice of his Party's back-benchers who are dead set against such a measure.

HISTORIC EVENTS

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST ITALIAN CHURCH IN HAMILTON

Mrs. Shirley Martin (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, last night I had the pleasure of joining with 1,100 Canadians of Italian heritage in celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of St. Anthony of Padua Church, the first Italian church in Hamilton, Ontario. It was established to serve the spiritual needs of immigrants from Italy working in the steel mills of Hamilton. Those steel mills are still contributing to the growth of our area as are the descendants of those first immigrants.

• (1405)

The Italian community brings a rich, cultural heritage to Canada of which it can be justly proud. But first and foremost, Mr. Speaker, these people are Canadians and this was amply demonstrated last evening. Yesterday's tribute was not only to St. Anthony's Parish but to the great contribution that Canadians of Italian heritage have made and continue to make, not only to the growth of the Hamilton area but, indeed, to all of Canada. I am pleased to join in this tribute.

PUBLIC SERVICE

THE LATE AILEEN MANION

Mrs. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canada grieved at the tragic loss of an extraordinary woman, a woman who worked steadfastly for the rights and dignity of Canadian working men and women. Aileen Manion, who was the first woman elected to the Executive Committee of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, died yesterday at her home here in Ottawa.

[English]

In her role as vice-president of the Public Service Alliance, Aileen was personally involved in the struggle for equal pay for work of equal value, presenting her union's first equal pay case to the Human Rights Commission. Ms. Manion devoted long hours to issues faced by her union members and was instrumental in establishing educational programs for union representatives.

Her loss will be deeply felt by all of us in public service and by the working people whose causes she championed.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Members of this House, I would like to extend our deepest sympathy to the family and friends of Ms. Manion's family and friends.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—CONDEMNATION OF UNITED STATES REPORT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the wake of the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program report issued in the United States last week, I call upon all Canadians to demonstrate outrage and disappointment with its content. To echo our own Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), the report is incomplete and unacceptable to a fault. Fortunately, there are many U.S. politicians with vision and verve who continue to strive toward acid rain abatement.

In a letter addressed to me on September 9, Congressman Robert C. Smith of New Hampshire said that over 140 members of the U.S. House of Representatives are calling for a reauthorization of the Clean Air Act of 1987. In addition, the Chairman of the U.S. House Science, Space and Technology Subcommittee on Natural Resources is enthusiastic to have our own Special Committee on Acid Rain appear to present Canada's case.

It seems the life-threatening depletion of the earth's ozone layer could be the best friend acid rain abatement ever had.

We now have proof that international transboundary agreements to preserve the environment are attainable. A similar agreement for acid rain must be forthcoming in North America before we drown in our own industrial excrement.

HOUSING

HOUSING NEEDS OF URBAN NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the International Conference on Shelter for the Homeless has come and gone without any action being announced by the Government. We would have expected a whole plethora of announcements to deal with multi-problems that were dealt with at the conference. Maybe the Government just lacked ideas and did not know what to do. I would like to give the Government suggestions for at least one area.

Let us take the area of housing for urban native people, an area crying out for action. Is the Government not aware that the infrastructure is in place to deliver housing? We have some 80 urban native housing corporations across the country which are presently delivering 1,000 units. Why does the Government not double that number, add another 1,000 new units, in order to deal with this crisis in housing? This would show that the Government is putting a priority on the needs of people and that it is ready to act and not just talk.

It is time for action, Mr. Speaker. I wish the Government would put a priority on the question of the homeless in Canada and recognize that it can do something concrete and immediate for urban native people.

PETITE-NATION REGION—GOVERNMENT'S PERFORMANCE

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Minister of Employment and Immigration travelled to Papineauville, in my beautiful constituency, to announce the participation of 19 municipalities to the Community Development Program.

Thanks to that program, a business assistance centre will be set up as early as November 1, 1987, with $1.5 million funding to help provide businesses with local technical and advisory services, and also with financial assistance in the form of loans of up to $75,000. Moreover, a community development assistance committee made up of 12 Members will receive a $200,000 subsidy to realistically appraise the opportunities for development and diversification of our rural economy.

Mr. Speaker, this is another example of this Government's success in fighting unemployment, especially among the young, and a further example of this Government's commitment to private entreprise.

Thanks to that program, the Petite-Nation area can take up the challenge of full employment and ensure its economic and social development. This is one of the best news the Papineauville area has received over the last decade, and this was made possible by a Conservative Government!

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, last week a poll was made public which indicated that 33 per cent of grain farmers and cash-crop farmers are expecting to have to leave their land within two years. This is a devastating poll which was carried out across the country. It comes at a time when the Government has not taken any action to replace the financial security and position of the Farm Credit Corporation.

The Farm Credit Corporation went into a negative equity position of $124 million last April and the Government has failed to act for six months. How can the Farm Credit Corporation, which is designed to help Canadian farmers who are in financial difficulty, help them when in fact it has been allowed to go broke and no action has been taken by the Government for six months?

GROWTH IN 1984-1987 PERIOD

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, since September, 1984, the Government has followed an economic renewal program that has shown great results across the country. The litany of successes includes the creation of 907,000 jobs with over 88 per cent of these full-time, an unemployment rate down from 11.7 per cent to 8.8 per cent, interest rates at their lowest in years, housing starts at their highest level in eight years, consumer spending and confidence up, and investors enjoying a return to a stable economic environment.

With our responsible policy of deficit reduction, Canadians have seen the deficit fall from a record $38.3 billion in the last year of the Liberal administration to $29.3 billion this fiscal year. This will be the first consecutive three-year decline in the deficit in three decades.

Most important, our responsible fiscal policies have allowed the Government to protect better our existing levels of social programs and promote the Canadian standard of living for future generations. In short, the Government's actions have restored the confidence of Canadians and of the world in our economy.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

WORKFORCE REDUCTION IN TORONTO REGION

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, The Ottawa Citizen has reported today that whereas the Government acknowledges that, of 24 enforcement officers in the Toronto region, 10 have been removed over the past year or so, cutting the force to 14, the President of the Canada Employment and Immigration Union local estimates that there are hundreds of criminal immigrants who are going uninvestigated simply for lack of person-hours to do so.

The Government, the Minister or the administration have ordered another internal inquiry into the allegations that were made about mail openings and other problems raised with the post office, but this series of internal inquiries which the union calls witch-hunts will not solve the problem. It will not solve the problem because it allows senior management and regional management to cover up their mismanagement at the expense of any whistle-blowing employee, of whom two have already been fired in the Toronto region. They were fired because they asked to have clear instructions about their work and could not get clear instructions, or could not get instructions that complied with the laws they were supposed to carry out.

• (1415)

I call upon the Government to admit that it cannot solve this by cover-ups through internal departmental inquiries, and to appoint an independent inquiry into the allegations being made of mismanagement in the Toronto and Ontario region in the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, particularly with respect to immigration.

USE OF SEAL OIL AS FURNACE FUEL

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago the Canadian sealing industry was all but ruined by the activity of Greenpeace and similar organizations. Now, with the assistance of government, the northern sealers are striking back.

The National Research Council of Canada has helped to fund the Koomiut Co-op of Pelly Bay to study the use of seal oil as a furnace fuel. The test project would use 1,000 seals. Blubber will be rendered into fuel oil, skins will be used for leather, some meat will be used for human consumption, and all the waste products will be ground up for dog food. Take that, Greenpeace!

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

PAPAL VISIT—SELF-GOVERNMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL DISCUSSIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday John Paul II fulfilled his own promise to our native peoples by visiting Fort Simpson. While he was there he urged upon all of us aboriginal self-government. I think parliamentarians ought to ask ourselves whether we will fulfil our own promise to our native peoples.

Will the Prime Minister agree to place self-government at the top of the agenda for future constitutional discussions as recommended by Liberal Members in our minority report? Will he agree to pursue the issue of self-government until it is achieved?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the most recent First Ministers' Conference I proposed an amendment which would have recognized the right of the aboriginal peoples of Canada to self-government. Not only did I propose it, I fought for it very actively at the First Ministers' Conference on aboriginal rights. I fought for it very actively, and it was almost achieved, in 1985 at the First Ministers' Conference.

It is very much a priority of the Government of the people of Canada. We will keep trying until such time as we have achieved this fundamental objective.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD—REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to understand why the issue of aboriginal self-government would have in any way impeded a constitutional accord.

Will the Prime Minister agree to ask his provincial counterparts to review and amend the Accord to reinstate, at the top of the agenda, the issue of aboriginal rights and self-government at all future constitutional conferences until the issue is disposed of, recognizing the inherent constitutional rights of our native people?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be evident to anyone concerned about the well-being of the aboriginal peoples that one of the principal reasons for Canada's failure in this regard at federal-provincial conferences was the fact that Quebec was not part of that process. It is my judgment that had Quebec been there the results in 1985 and 1987 would have been clearly different.

One of the great benefits of the Meech Lake Accord, once it is completed and with Quebec at the table, will be to put the partners of Canada in a much better position to ensure that the aboriginal peoples finally secure that degree of justice to which they are entitled. That is another very important reason why I hope all Members will support the Meech Lake Accord.

[Translation]

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES—PROMOTION OF GOVERNMENT AND POLITICAL AUTONOMY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to understand how recognizing and putting back on the agenda the rights of our native people can threaten the Constitutional Accord. The native people cannot wait indefinitely.

Since the Prime Minister will be meeting the premiers in the coming weeks, could he not ask them to take this opportunity to promote native self-government and to provide our native people with the territory and the resources required to give real meaning to this initiative?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for my part, the rights of the native people are still on the agenda. They have never been excluded from this agenda, despite the fact that we did not succeed at the last federal-provincial conference in meeting the basic requirements of the native people. One of the major reasons for this was the exclusion of Quebec in 1981. Quebec had a very impressive record as far as protecting the rights of the native people, but it was excluded from the constitutional process. One of the major components of the Meech Lake Accord would be to have Quebec rejoin the constitutional family, and its presence at the constitutional table would have a very positive impact on the future of the Canadian native people and their basic rights.

I therefore believe that even though I have stated publicly that, for my part and for the Government, the issue of our native people remains on the agenda, we have a better chance of succeeding in meeting our fundamental objective if Quebec sits at the constitutional table.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM—SCHEDULING AND MECHANISM

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, the aboriginal leaders of Canada have called for a renewed constitutional process. That process is to deal with treaty and aboriginal rights. The Pope, when he was in Fort Simpson, was very supportive of this demand. I want to add my gratitude to His Holiness for keeping his promise to return to Fort Simpson and for calling for dignity and equity for Canada's aboriginal peoples.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: Is the Prime Minister prepared now to take steps immediately to develop, along with the aboriginal leaders, a schedule and a mechanism for completing the unfinished business of aboriginal constitutional reform? I am not asking for vague generalizations from the Prime Minister, but am asking for something very specific, that a schedule and mechanism be put in place immediately.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my intention to complete the unfinished business in regard to native peoples, who were left in a situation of neglect for more years than this country should even bear to mention, begins today with the tabling of the Meech Lake report. Its conclusion will provide for Quebec's return to the Constitution and that will have a very important beneficial effect on the capacity of Canada to deal fairly with the native peoples, as it ought to have dealt with them. I have made it very clear that my objective and the objective of my Government is that degree of justice for native peoples.

It happens that we inherited a situation which almost precluded that objective. Parliament is now in the process of redressing this injustice. I am satisfied that given Quebec's quite impressive record over many decades in dealing with its own native peoples, its presence at the constitutional table as a full partner will have a most beneficial effect in favour of justice on behalf of the native people.

FUNDING OF ABORIGINAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, let me try another specific question. The Prime Minister knows that funding to enable aboriginal organizations to pursue constitutional reform has been cut. Aboriginal leaders have called for a restoration of those moneys. Today the Constitutional Committee, which tabled its report, supports that request. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to restore this funding so that preparatory work for successful constitutional negotiations for aboriginal people may continue? Is he prepared to make the announcement this week that the funding has been restored so that what he says he wants to accomplish can have a possibility of succeeding?

• (1425)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the commitment of this Government and that of the Prime Minister to making Canada whole again under the Constitution of Canada will always and continually reflect the needs of the aboriginal people of Canada.

I draw to the Hon. Member's attention that on August 6 the Prime Minister wrote the four aboriginal leaders in Canada. In his letter he said:

> —once it is clear to me that conditions are conducive to a successful aboriginal constitutional conference, I will not hesitate to convene First Ministers for discussions around this issue.

We have had artificially imposed deadlines in the past which, unfortunately, did not lead to success. To impose another artificial deadline on something as important as aboriginal self-government in Canada at this time I think would be counter-productive.

PRINCIPLE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT FOR NATIVE PEOPLE—HOLDING OF CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He stated he agrees with the principle of self-government for native people. All Parties here in the House endorse this concept. In this context the Prime Minister made a positive reference to Mr. Bourassa of the Quebec Government.

My question is quite simple. The Government of the Province of Quebec is very sympathetic concerning the needs of native people. All Parties here are in agreement. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to get in touch with Mr. Bourassa and the other premiers and convince them that a conference on this objective should be included in the Accord?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the idea of a conference on such an objective is quite acceptable. I said so publicly. I even predicted after the failure of the last federal-provincial conference on native rights that, despite that failure, we would ultimately be successful in securing a degree of justice in favour of native people. That has already been done.

What is missing is an important player around the table, keeping in mind the political realities which prevailed. As a result of the intervention of First Ministers in Edmonton, we deemed appropriate to conclude the Meech Lake Accord which, I should think, will have a very beneficial impact on the lives of native peoples within a foreseeable future in Canada. I know I can count on the support of my hon. friend in this respect.

[English]

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I totally agree with the Prime Minister's desire to have Quebec there. We all welcome that distinct possibility right now with the adoption of this Accord. I want to address my question to the Prime Minister in the context of assuming Quebec is going to be there. It is the one province that has already accepted the Accord.

Does the Prime Minister not think it is desirable to improve the Accord by adding a limited number of amendments that are consistent with it, particularly in this instance on the important question of the principle of self-government, including the idea of a commitment to a particular conference? Why can the Premier of Quebec and the other Premiers not be asked to initial and support this kind of limited amendment that is totally consistent with what they have already agreed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is required. I have already stated on behalf of, I think, all parliamentarians, that there is going to be a conference. We are going to deal again with the absence of justice for our native peoples. I have made that very clear.

Mr. Tobin: Justice delayed is justice denied.

An Hon. Member: Where were you for the last 20 years?

Mr. Mulroney: I indicated, Mr. Speaker, that clearly we would want to try to create conditions as propitious as possible for success, to lend themselves to success on behalf of the native peoples. They have been let down too often in the past for us to try again without a reasonable assurance of success.

• (1430)

It is my judgment, and I may be wrong, that the native peoples of Canada stand an infinitely greater chance of success with the Confederation having been completed by Quebec being present at the constitutional table in their behalf. With Quebec there I think we can state with a good measure of conviction that at that point in time we can deal, probably successfully, with this historic and legitimate grievance on behalf of the native peoples of Canada. That would be my undertaking to the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

CONSTITUTION

MEECH LAKE ACCORD—EQUALITY OF WOMEN

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with another area of concern I want to ask the Prime Minister the following question. Although it is certainly not my view that the distinct society clause in the Accord threatens sexual equality rights, or any other rights provided in the Charter, as the Prime Minister knows there have been expressed concerns to the contrary. Since out of an abundance of caution in other areas amendments were accepted, if I can put it this way, between Part A and Part B in the development of the Accord, will the Government consider appropriate wording for the same reason to help obliterate those concerns about the equality impact on women, in particular, that have been expressed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, people will have to vote up or down on this, yea or nay, in favour of the Meech Lake Accord. It is our judgment, and it appears to be the judgment of the parliamentary committee, that the overwhelming weight of the evidence sustains the view that individual rights of this kind are not negatively impacted by the inclusion of the reference to distinct society. That is my view. That is the view of the Government.

I know that there are views at variance with this, and they have been respectfully considered by the parliamentary committee. As I understand it, it is the judgment of the parliamentary committee that in the national interest we ought to proceed and that fundamental assurances can be given as to the protection of those rights without any changes being made in the wording of the distinct society clause. We believe that one cannot have it both ways. One has to be for or one has to be against. But one cannot be on both sides of a fundamental issue.

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—REPORTED MEETING BETWEEN CANADIAN NEGOTIATOR AND FRENCH PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This morning the Premier of Newfoundland telexed the Prime Minister asking him to confirm an allegation that Canada's chief negotiator in the Canada-France fish talks, Yves Fortier, held a secret meeting with French Prime Minister Jacques Chirac last week during the two days of negotiation in Paris. The Premier says that the Canadian negotiating team, including Newfoundland, was unaware of the secret meeting and unaware of the matters discussed during that meeting.

In light of last January's agreement between Canada and France signed behind Newfoundland's back, an agreement for which the Prime Minister's Government apologized, can the Prime Minister today absolutely assure the House that no secret meeting took place in Paris and that no secret deal has been made once again behind Newfoundland's back?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that no such secret meeting, as he characterizes it, took place in Paris. There was a courtesy call, for lunch, I believe.

I might say that had members of the delegation from his province hung around they would have been told that such a meeting was occurring, as the other delegations were.

REQUEST THAT TALKS BE SUSPENDED

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Is the Minister telling the House of Commons that the only meeting that took place was a lunch meeting with all the Canadian delegation present? Or is he denying that a private meeting occurred between Canada's negotiator and the Prime Minister of France? He knows that in light of the history of this Government's bungling of these talks, and in light of the history of its apology for one secret deal, no private meeting is acceptable to all members of the Canadian team. I ask him to confirm or deny that a private meeting took place.

If such a meeting took place I ask him to suspend Canada's chief negotiator and to suspend these talks until common ground can be found between the Government of Canada and all of the partners in ensuring a fair and equitable fish treaty between Canada and France.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, this line of reasoning is ludicrous coming from a member of the Party that created this problem in the first place, and who sat for years, along with his colleagues, and did nothing about it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Answer the question!

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, we sincerely regret the fact that the Premier of the Hon. Member's province has chosen to withdraw from this process.

Mr. Tobin: Was there a meeting, yes or no?

Mr. Siddon: We are trying to rectify a problem that results from 20 years of neglect and indecision on the part of the Government of which the Hon. Member was a part.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

MEECH LAKE ACCORD—CREATION OF NEW PROVINCES

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. The Accord suggests, for the first time, that unanimity will be required for the establishment of new provinces, particularly in relation to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Given the obvious injustice of this and the comments found in the report of the committee, will the Prime Minister undertake to contact Premiers to work toward redressing this injustice?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to contact the Premiers. I think that they are acquainted with my strong views and the views of my colleagues in regard to moving along, as quickly as is possible, the right to provincehood of the people of the territories. This is very much a front and centre issue with us. We want to work very carefully and closely with all the people involved in this regard.

FEDERAL, PROVINCIAL, AND TERRITORIAL CONSULTATION

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, given that the report of the Constitution Committee states that there will be considerable discussion with the provincial Legislatures and provincial Attorneys General, will the Prime Minister undertake to assure residents of the territories that equal consultation will take place with the Ministers of Justice and the territorial Legislatures to continue the constitutional review?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position of this Party and of this Government in regard to provincehood and legitimate rights for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories is well known. We believe that the Meech Lake Accord is another step along the road of nation-building which will ultimately and happily, we think, conclude with all Canadians being represented in this process, along with rights for native peoples. Only then will the Government be pleased with the process.

In regard to consultation, I would be delighted to give my hon. friend the assurance that the historic degree of consultation that I have undertaken as Prime Minister, and which my colleagues have undertaken, which has changed the atmosphere of federal-provincial relations from one of confrontation to one of genuine co-operation, shall be actively pursued and maintained with the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REFUGEES

COST OF WELFARE FOR REFUGEE CLAIMANTS IN TORONTO

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister is aware that Metropolitan Toronto has asked the Government to pay at least a portion of the $1.5 million a year which it costs it to process welfare payments for refugee claimants. Bearing in mind the fact that refugees are a matter of federal rather than local jurisdiction, will the Minister assure the House that the Government will grant that request? Surely the Minister does not expect Canadians to foot these bills out of their property taxes.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asks a good question. It seems to outline some of the confusion that exists in Ontario with respect to what the Government of Canada has to support in terms of the cost for social welfare recipients, especially those who claim welfare. Some 50 per cent of the cost is paid by the federal Government, while the other 50 per cent is paid by the province. Any agreement between the provincial level and the municipal level has to be decided between both parties.

The federal Government does not have the right to interfere in a decision concerning the share of costs between municipalities and a provincial Government. Any complaint at that level has to be dealt with at the provincial level. The Canadian Government respects this commitment and pays 50 per cent of the cost.

LIAISON WITH ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

We all know that the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service have deliberately been given overlapping mandates. It is the responsibility of the Minister to see that jurisdictional issues that arise between them are settled.

The other day the Minister told us that he had set up a liaison committee between the two services to end what he called "the state of confrontation" that existed during the time of his predecessor, the present Minister of National Defence.

Will the Minister tell the House if that committee has done any effective work? Have any issues been resolved between the two services? If so, what issues have been resolved? It is obvious that national security is threatened by the confrontation that continues to exist between the agencies.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that never at any time did I accuse my predecessor, nor would I, of not having carried out his duties in a proper and efficient manner. Indeed, he did discharge his duties properly and efficiently.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): That's because he is not a lawyer.

Mr. Kelleher: Shortly after assuming office in July, 1986, I immediately had meetings with the then head of the RCMP and CSIS. I sat down and discussed liaison problems with them and the exchange of information.

An Hon. Member: They weren't listening, Jim.

Mr. Kelleher: On August 14, by written direction, I set up liaison committees and liaison officers, which has gone a great length to eliminate and minimize problems between the two services.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): How does the Minister then explain the problems in the service which continue to result from a lack of clarity on the part of the Government about what product it expects the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to deliver, and what assistance is it to receive from the RCMP in doing its job?

Mr. Beatty: I guess it must be a problem left to us by you.

Mr. Kaplan: You left it to us.

Mr. Rossi: You stand up and answer. You know all about it.

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat that in my opinion both services are carrying out their duties properly, efficiently, and are working together.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Efficiently! Wait a minute.

Mr. Kelleher: If the Hon. Member has specific instances of non co-operation and non-liaison, then I would appreciate receiving them. I will attend to solving them immediately.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—NORTHERN COD STOCK

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Good luck!

Mr. Rodriguez: I am fishing.

I wish to quote some comments which were made in an emergency debate in this House on January 28 by the Minister responsible for Newfoundland in this Government's Cabinet:

> It is our fishing industry, it is our life in Newfoundland the same as the wheat fields are the life of Saskatchewan, or oil and gas might be the life of Alberta. That is why the Government of Newfoundland and the industry and union representatives should never have been left out of this last week.

Mr. Hees: Louder, John, louder.

An Hon. Member: Can't hear you, John.

Mr. Rodriguez: Now, Mr. Speaker, I have their attention. Now they agree, and the Minister was right. The northern cod stock is vital to the life of the people of Newfoundland. It is an extension of the people of Newfoundland.

Therefore, my question to the Minister is this. How does he reconcile what government representatives have said in the House, and what the Prime Minister put out in the statement issued by the Minister of Transport with respect to the importance of northern cod stocks—how does he reconcile those statements with the give-away of the northern cod stocks to France to the detriment of the best interests of the people of Newfoundland?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): I regret the fact that the Hon. Member did not quote a particular statement in order that I might focus on the essence of his allegation.

Mr. Broadbent: He did.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Are you deaf?

Mr. Siddon: I can assure the Hon. Member that the Government, unlike either of the two Parties opposite, believes in sincerely seeking solutions to difficult problems, solutions which often require difficult and protracted discussions.

I can assure the Hon. Member that I am absolutely confident that when a package is arrived at, under the capable leadership of Yves Fortier, the result of that solution will be good for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, the fishermen, and all whose interests are affected.

RESULT OF TALKS—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT REQUESTED

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): In light of the fact that we have experienced Liberal Governments which negotiated away the natural resources of the provinces behind the backs of the Premiers of the provinces, this Government is doing it right in front of the eyes of the Government of Newfoundland.

My supplementary question to the Minister is this. In light of what the Minister has said, is he prepared to give an assurance to the House, and to the people of Newfoundland, that no agreement will be entered into between France and Canada with respect to fisheries off the East Coast of Canada until the Government, the fishermen, and the industry in Newfoundland have given their agreement to it?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I think that I hear the Hon. Member suggesting that one province should have a veto over a matter which is of such national importance as this.

Mr. Rodriguez: You are giving it to them in the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. Siddon: I can assure the Hon. Member that in the spirit in which we have entered into continuing consultation with all affected parties, including my colleagues, the Atlantic Council of Fisheries Ministers, we are confident that the approach being taken here will prove to be acceptable to the fishermen—

Mr. Rodriguez: You are washed up.

Mr. Siddon: —and the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. It will end for all time an unhappy boundary dispute which must be resolved in this way, and in this way alone.

LITERACY

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH NATIONAL PROGRAM TO REDUCE ILLITERACY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment. During the past two weeks we have had several reports indicating the critical state of illiteracy in Canada. There are over four million adults who are functionally illiterate. This represents 24 per cent of the Canadian population. Few of those people will continue to find work, or even qualify for training programs.

In these circumstances how can the Government be satisfied with a $1 million secretariat and a symposium as a solution to this serious problem? Is it not time, for the good of the country and these individuals, that we have a five-year national literacy program with set goals and adequate funding to reduce these shocking figures substantially?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Last week, Mr. Speaker, within the context of the Unemployment Insurance Act, I replied to my colleague the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt. Let us say first of all that the Secretary of State currently carries out a number of studies, but intends, together with the provinces, to develop a number of mechanisms in connection with this issue. Essentially, the people who are collecting unemployment insurance benefit overpayments are entitled, especially under Section 39, when the costs of these courses are paid—

[Editor's note: A child is crying in the Galleries]

An Hon. Member: As they say, the truth comes out of the mouths of babes.

Mr. Broadbent: Even the child does not agree.

Mr. Nystrom: There goes another disenchanted voter, Brian.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has no intention of fixing responsibility for that outcry.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, this is almost the same tune as I am used to hear from the other side.

But here is what I mean to say to my colleague. Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, there are mechanisms available to people taking training courses supervised by employment centres which entitle them to collect benefit payments, I think that my honourable friend will understand that, within the limits of the current legislation and funding, we are unable—we do wish we could, but we are prevented from doing so not because of a lack of will but because of the lack of available financial resources—to assume the overall financial responsability for people already collecting unemployment insurance. The door would then be wide open to abuse, something, I am sure, my honourable friend would not want to happen.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Considering the gravity and size of this problem, the measures announced by the Minister and the Secretary of State are not adequate. There is no sense of urgency.

On behalf of these over four million Canadians, I plead with the Minister to reconsider his answer and to think about a national literacy program to reduce this awful situation in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that is what I have just said in my answer. Before putting together programs... You did it yourself for years but you failed, because of a total lack of consultation. My colleague, the Secretary of State, is in consultation with the provinces, and will set up mechanisms, but as for the employment's strategy, it will work, because we will take into account the provinces' opinions.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister or his deputy. A recent poll of farmers confirmed that many farmers lacked confidence in their future, with 59 per cent seeing no improvement in their condition in the foreseeable future.

Since the poll confirms the prediction of FCC that between one-quarter and one-third of farmers will be squeezed out in the next few years, will the Government now acknowledge that it is contributing to this low confidence level by its continued refusal to make a solid and detailed commitment to deficiency payments in the coming year?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Government and every Member in this House are aware that agriculture is going through a bad period internationally, and not only here in Canada. That recent poll has merely brought to light the importance, as it has indeed been done by the Prime Minister for over a year now, of impressing upon world powers the urgency of putting an end to the price war that seriously affects wheat producers not just here in Canada but elsewhere in the world. To that end, Mr. Speaker, I think the Canadian Government did everything it could do last year when it injected $1 billion, something absolutely unheard of, that is almost four times more in deficiency payments as had been done in the past. The Minister of Agriculture has been meeting with farm leaders during the last few weeks, and in this recent poll, as the Hon. Member has failed to mention it, the Minister of Agriculture is shown as being approved by 60 per cent of Canadians who wholeheartedly support the Minister of Agriculture's commitment to the interests of farmers.

[English]

SUBSIDIES ISSUE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, do the Minister and the Government not recognize that part of the very lack of confidence in the future of farmers was due to the Government's call, through the Prime Minister at the Venice Summit, for a subsidy-free world, at the very time when this generation of farmers is depending upon subsidies to get them through?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): I think, Mr. Speaker, that since the Prime Minister's meetings with foreign leaders at the various summits, including the Tokyo and the Venice Summits, we have put agriculture on the agenda of the major powers. We are all conscious that this war must be scaled down. We are doing every possible effort, including in our negotiations with GATT. I think the interests of Canadian farmers—farmers know that this Government is always there when farmers need it.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

LACK OF FINANCIAL RESOURCES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and concerns the serious situation in agriculture. We are seeing the greatest exodus of farmers from the land since the 1930s. A full 33 per cent of grain farmers and cash crop farmers expect to be off the land in two years.

The Government has allowed the Farm Credit Corporation, which is there to help farmers, to go into debt to the tune of $124 million for the last six months. How does the Prime Minister expect the Farm Credit Corporation to help farmers stay on the land when the Government itself has allowed the FCC to go broke?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is still somewhat amazing to hear such words coming from a Member of the previous Government under which interest rates hovered between 14 per cent, 15 per cent and 18 per cent, and which we have brought down to 10 per cent and 11 per cent. Those were very positive aspects for farmers. We also applied a program based on the costs of commodities, something which had never been done by the previous Government, and about which we consulted the Canadian people that helped thousands of Canadian farmers. We will continue monitoring that sector very closely with respect to interest rates. You may be assured of that!

[English]

FARM FORECLOSURES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I would point out to the Minister that the Government has raised the FCC rate of interest twice this summer, at a time when farmers are in the worst financial crisis in years.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Foster: I would also point out that, according to the FCC's own report, the Government expects to seize the farms of 6,000 farmers, involving 2.2 million acres, over the next two years.

Why do the Minister and the Government not bring in programs to keep these farmers on the land rather than seize 2.2 million acres of land and thousands of farms over the next two years?

Why do they not take some action by bringing in some reforms and assistance to keep farmers on the land?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member would look at what we have been doing since we came to Government; he would see that we have set up a Farm Debt Review Committee, that we have kept interest rates under constant review and that they have been brought down significantly over the last three years—and you should be able to recognize that they were reduced to a significant point—this is a whole lot more than what you did when you were here, when interest rates were much higher.

We have no lessons to receive in that area, far from that. Concrete steps were taken.

AIR CANADA

PRIVATIZATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Privatization and relates to my comments earlier in the day about Air Canada.

I should like to ask the Minister whether it is still her intention to privatize Air Canada. If the answer to that question is yes, as I hope it is, I should like to know if it is also her intention to ensure that the employees of Air Canada are given an opportunity to purchase a significant percentage of the shares?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, let me say that what I have said about Air Canada to date is that it is under serious review. I have not said that it is my intention to privatize it. I have said that it is under review. That review is continuing.

I might point out that it took Britain five years to get to a big privatization. We are moving much more quickly on ours. We have done 11.

However, in answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question, let me say that the employees of Teleglobe and of FBI in Newfoundland, who are very happy shareholding employees, are a good example of the kind of thing we would want to do in the future.

HIRING OF STRIKE-BREAKERS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Post Office.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canada Post has already started advertising for strike-breakers. In view of what happened during the last postal strike, has the Minister not learned that the hiring of strike-breakers probably will create violence on the picket lines? Has the time not come to act in a more civilized way and abandon this policy of hiring strike breakers?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my position on that is very similar to the position expressed by the Hon. Member's colleague, the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville, who said on June 18 of this year, when discussing whether to allow the Post Office to continue operating during a strike: "it is a very tough issue because you have two conflicting realities. The postal workers must be treated fairly and justly but other Canadians must continue to receive their mail".

That is a pretty good description of the situation. The position of the Government is very clear. The social responsibility of the Post Office is something we ask of management. We expect both sides to obey the law, and it is illegal, contrary perhaps to the position of the New Democratic Party, to use violence in pursuit of objectives in Canada.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I resent the implication that the NDP is advocating anything that is illegal.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will put his question, keeping in mind the time.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, what I would like to know from the Minister is whether he and his Government are capable of learning from experience. Does he not think that a Government has more responsibility, a responsibility beyond condemning violence and, in fact, a responsibility to put in place policies that will avoid violence, that will ensure we can have negotiated settlements which people can understand? Does he not think that Canadian society has a measure of civilization and that we do not stoop to the level of—

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Somewhere in that tirade, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member did say that we should seek a negotiated solution. On that point I am in absolute agreement. I can hear the Hon. Member. Will the Hon. Member be reasonable for a moment?

I would hope that both Parties will have an opportunity, based on the conciliation commissioner's report which we expect in the not too distant future, to find a negotiated settlement. In the meantime it does no good whatsoever and no good purpose is being served, either for the union or for the public, for the New Democratic Party to suggest that under the threat of violence one must capitulate and say that there is no alternative. That is wrong, bad policy, and the New Democratic Party knows it.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—NEGOTIATOR'S MEETING WITH FRENCH PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries following up on a question posed by a colleague from Newfoundland. Was there or was there not a private meeting between Maître Yves Fortier, our chief negotiator in the fisheries dispute, with the Prime Minister of France, Jacques Chirac?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I thought I answered that question when I responded to the Hon. Member's colleague.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Siddon: It is my understanding that Monsieur Fortier paid a courtesy call on the Prime Minister of France. It was an opportunity for lunch, as I understand it, and I don't know whatever general discussions but there was no element of those discussions which could be characterized as being secret. In fact, members of the delegation of all participating provinces and the industry who were present in Paris on Monday were fully advised as to the nature of that meeting.

NATURE OF DISCUSSION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister be good enough to tell us what was discussed at that meeting if it was not the fishery? Why wasn't the rest of the delegation informed or invited? Why particularly was the delegation from Newfoundland not informed that there would be a private tête-à-tête between our chief negotiator and the Prime Minister of France?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition why he and his Party and colleagues to his left are constantly looking for some negative sinister motive in everything that is done.

I would tell you, Mr. Speaker, and assure this House that anything discussed among the negotiators and with the benefit of the provincial and industrial representatives was discussed for the benefit of the fishermen and the people of Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the following will be the last question. The Hon. Member for Scarborough West.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

ARMS GAP BETWEEN NATO AND WARSAW PACT NATIONS

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Among the good news in recent days has been the possibility of an agreement to remove short and medium-range missiles from Europe, but the flipside of that welcome announcement is the effect on NATO's capability to deter Warsaw Pact aggression.

Will the Minister advise the House what consideration NATO members are giving to closing the conventional arms gap between the Warsaw Pact and NATO?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member points out, a very significant agreement was reached, one that was welcomed by all of those with interests in Europe and who want to see a long-term agreement to promote peace.

However, left untouched were a number of important areas, such as conventional imbalances between East and West where the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact maintain an advantage of two or three to one at the present time in chemical weapons and a range of other areas. We are hopeful that progress can be made in these areas, in addition to being able to reach deep cuts in terms of strategic weapons, which will leave the world a safer place.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee, and Motion No. 11 (Mr. Marchi, p. 9119), Motion No. 13 (Mr. Heap, p. 9105), and Motion No. 14 (Mr. Marchi, p. 9105).

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the co-operation of the House because it is my duty and obligation to make a final ruling on the groupings and admissibility of the various motions or, in common parlance, on the amendments that have been brought before the House at report stage of Bill C-55.

I regret to advise that the ruling is fairly lengthy because of the great number of motions. Hon. Members have been extremely co-operative with the Table in assisting to bring about a ruling which not only upholds the procedural niceties but tries as much as possible to give to Hon. Members who are moving motions the maximum of free speech on these important matters.

I am now ready to make a final ruling on the motions on the Order Paper put forward in amendment to Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

To recapitulate the debate so far, a division has been deferred on Motions Nos. 3, 4, 6, 7 and 9. Motions Nos. 5, 8 and 10 have been dropped by the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap).

Motions Nos. 11, 13 and 14 are now before the House. That grouping will be followed by debate on Motions Nos. 27, 29 and 34 which will be debated together but voted on separately.

Motion No. 12 was not selected as it is similar in substance to Motion No. 11. That was the situation at one o'clock today. Now to continue.

Motion No. 1 is similar to a motion moved in committee and ruled out of order in that it attempted to define the rule of the adjudicator by way of amending the interpretation clause which, of course, is contrary to our procedural practice. I concur in the decision of the committee chairman and must similarly rule this motion out of order. The Hon. Member is referred to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 773(10). In addition, this motion is attempting to amend the parent Act, the present Immigration Act of 1976, by introducing definitions which are not in that original Act. As Speaker Lamoureux said on June 11, 1970, it appears that the amendment seeks to go beyond this Bill to amend the Act itself. In other words, it has sought to make a change which would not only affect the Bill before us but as well the Act which the Bill itself seeks to amend. I regret to say that in most circumstances this motion and amendment cannot be accepted.

Motion No. 2 will not be selected as a similar motion was debated and negatived in committee. In this regard, I thank the committee member, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), for bringing this point to the attention of the Chair on Friday.

Motions Nos. 15, 16, 28 and 46 were debated and decided in committee. Consequently it is my view that they ought not under the circumstances to be selected or proposed to the House.

Motion No. 17 will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 18 and 21 will be debated together, with an affirmative vote on Motion No. 18 obviating the question being put on Motion No. 21. A negative vote on Motion No. 18 will require the question to be put on Motion No. 21.

Motions Nos. 19 and 20 will not be selected for debate. A motion substantially the same as Motion No. 19 was disposed of in the legislative committee. Motion No. 20 is similar, and neither motion will be selected for debate.

Motions Nos. 22, 23, 24 and 30 deal with the concept of a safe third country and will be debated together but voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 25, 31, 32 and 33 will be grouped for debate but will be voted on separately. All of these motions deal with the concept of a credible basis for a refugee claim. After consultation, the Hon. Member for Spadina has agreed to drop Motions Nos. 26 and 36.

There will be a separate debate and vote on Motion No. 35.

Motion No. 37 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina and Motions Nos. 53, 57 and 70 standing in the name of the Minister sponsoring the Bill will be grouped for debate but voted on separately. Motion No. 69 will not be selected as its content is covered in Motion No. 70.

Motion No. 41 will not be selected as its content is covered in Motion No. 40 which will be debated and voted separately. Motions Nos. 43 and 44 will be grouped for debate but voted separately.

Motions Nos. 45, 47, 48 and 49 all deal with Clause 14 and will be grouped for debate but will be voted on separately.

• (1510)

Motion No. 50 will not be selected as it was debated and negatived in the legislative committee.

Motion No. 54 is similar to Motions Nos. 55 and 56. Thus Motion No. 54 will not be selected as it is the same as Motions Nos. 55 and 56 and was placed on the Notice Paper later. They will be debated together and a vote on Motion No. 55 will be applied to Motion No. 56.

Motion No. 58 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) is the first in a series of amendments which attempt to introduce a new concept into the Bill, a concept which was not contemplated in the Bill as read in this House a second time. When the Bill was last before the House, it provided for limits on the number of steps in the process of refugee determination. Here, however, the Hon. Member is attempting, through a series of amendments, to prolong this clearly limited process.

As all Hon. Members are aware, the consideration of a Bill at the report stage is now a more formal repetition of the committee stage with the rules of debate which are proper when the Speaker is in the chair being applied. According to Erskine May, Twentieth Edition, at page 549, the proceedings at report stage should not therefore amend the Bill in a manner destructive of the principle of the Bill.

The proposals calling for a definitive role for the Deputy Chairman of the Convention refugee determination division in the refugee determination process appears to the Chair to go beyond the principle of the Bill. It is clear from all of the authorities, Beauchesne, May and Bourinot, that amendments which attempt to go beyond the scope or principle of a Bill are out of order. I regret to have to inform the House that I cannot put Motion No. 58 to the House. I must add that there are 10 other motions attempting to reach the same or a similar object. Therefore, Motions Nos. 38, 39, 42, 51, 52, 62, 63, 64, 66, 71 and 72 are out of order and will not be put to the House for debate.

It might be helpful to Hon. Members and also to the public if the Chair made an observation here. The Chair is bound by procedural laws. It may very well be that Hon. Members or members of the public may think that certain amendments that have been put forward at report stage are of such substantive importance that they ought to be debated and put to the House. The position the Chair is in, of course, is that it is not for the Chair to rule on whether the purport of the amendment or its substance is worthy of debate. It is for the Chair to decide whether, within the procedural rules set for the admission of amendments at report stage, the amendment is procedurally acceptable.

The second thing I would like Hon. Members to consider, and I also say this for the benefit of the public, is that while the admission or otherwise of an amendment or a motion is bound by the procedural law and that is what the Chair must decide, the Chair also has a discretion in grouping the amendments for debate. That is a less exact science.

In this case, given the number of amendments and especially given the concerns of the spokespersons for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and the New Democratic Party, the Chair has tried to extend some particular latitude in trying to have a grouping which will enable Hon. Members to give as much time for debate, explanation and persuasion of those amendments as is appropriate. I think I must say that the Hon. Member for York West and the Hon. Member for Spadina have given exceptional courtesy and co-operation to the Chair in this regard.

Motions Nos. 59, 60 and 61 are dependent on or consequential to Motion No. 58 and therefore will not be put to the House.

Motions Nos. 65 and 67 will be debated together but voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 68, 73, 74, 75 and 77 will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 76 causes the Chair some procedural difficulty. The motion attempts in part to amend another Bill that is still susceptible to amendment in the legislative process. Bill C-58 was just last week referred to a legislative committee for review. It appears to the Chair that Part (c) of this motion goes too far in the way of amending Bills by amending a parent Act, the Act which is already on the statute books, and a Bill which has not yet been adopted by the House. Therefore, the Chair will only propose to the House parts (a) and (b) of Motion No. 76. The revised Motion No. 76 will be debated and voted on separately.

I hope the Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) will understand the difficulty the Chair has been in on this particular ruling. That motion is a motion that was brought in by the Government. On Friday last the Hon. Minister of State raised a point of order concerning the moving of amendments in committee. The thrust of his comments was that motions or amendments ought to be put while the committee is still sitting and if the opportunity to do so there is not taken, then the question of whether or not they should be accepted at report stage is one the Chair should consider.

I can say that the Standing Orders do not empower the Speaker to force Members to move amendments in committee. Nevertheless, the Minister is correct in that the Standing Orders do state in part:

> The Speaker—will normally only select motions which were not or could not be presented in committee.

I would hope Hon. Members would take note of that. As I say, there is nothing in the rules which absolutely forbids the moving of motions or amendments at report stage just because they were not necessarily moved at committee stage. The rules indicate that the practice of moving amendments or motions earlier in committee is preferable, but it is not an absolute rule. I thank the Hon. Minister of State for drawing this point to the attention of all Hon. Members.

On Friday last the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) raised the issue of Parliament pronouncing twice upon the same issue in the same Session. I have given careful consideration to the Hon. Member's comments. The Hon. Member was referring to Bills C-55 and C-84. Just to clarify for the benefit of all Hon. Members, let me quote Beauchesne's Citation 701(1):

> There is nothing in the rules and no precedent to prevent the setting down of more than one bill or motion dealing with the same subject.

While it is true that the House should not be called upon to decide the same question twice in the same Session, nothing prevents the House from dealing with the same Act more than once. It is a distinction which is perhaps a fine one but I hope that the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona will accept that the Chair has given the matter careful consideration. I thank the Hon. Member for raising the issue and for allowing the Chair the opportunity to clarify the matter.

I want to thank all Hon. Members who made themselves available for consultations. The House will now resume debate on Motion Nos. 11, 13 and 14.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank you for the thoroughness and completeness of your ruling. It will, I think, be very helpful to us.

Re-reading the motions, I find that in Motion No. 57 there is a Clause (b) which is substantially the same as the motion I moved, Motion No. 65. I would be quite happy to stand my proposed motion down in favour of Motion No. 57. It covers more topics but the wording is identical except for one word. It is not a substantive change and it might make things go a little bit quicker if that were to happen.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). I will consider, shortly, what the Hon. Member has proposed and perhaps come back to the House in a few minutes. I want to look carefully at the motions referred to. I think Hon. Members will understand that the Chair, perhaps not the Table officers, and perhaps not even all Members, cannot remember the details of 77 motions off the top of the head. Considering the complexity, I know the Hon. Member would give the Chair several minutes at least to reflect on the suggestion.

The House will now resume debate on Motions Nos. 11, 13 and 14.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment presented by the Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) which I think is a fair and sensible recommendation. It considers the barriers to refugees being granted true access to a fair system of hearing in this country.

The danger we are facing, through a tightening of the screws, is that we will not permit legitimate refugees, who are coming here to seek a safe haven access to the system. Under this proposed streamlining we will require applicants to deal first with two people, an immigrant adjudicator and a member of the refugee board.

I think we are asking the member of the refugee board to take on a burden which is unfair to put on any human being, that is, to say yea or nay in a potentially life-threatening situation. The Government cites the independence of these gatekeepers. I think the refugee board should determine what kind of safeguards should be put in place for Canada. How much responsibility should rest on the shoulders of one person?

Canada has enjoyed growth and development, economically, socially, politically and culturally, because we were open and hospitable and accepted refugees who came to our shores and were able to grow and develop away from the lifestyle of terror which they fled. No one flees without good reason.

Canada has had a very proud record. We have shown compassion toward the plight of refugees seeking haven in Canada. Canada accepted 37,149 Hungarians in 1956-57, 11,943 Czechoslovakians in 1968-69, 7,069 Ugandans in 1972-73, 700 Cypriots in 1975, 9,000 Vietnamese in 1975-78, 9,000 Poles in 1982, and thousands of others from Iran, El Salvador, Lebanon, Sri Lanka and Guatemala since then.

Canada has taken in over 360,000 refugees since the 1950s with yearly quotas of about 12,000. In 1986 we admitted 12,146 government-sponsored refugees and 5,067 privately sponsored. In August, 1984, the refugee backlog was 11,538 cases. It grew to over 20,000 in May, 1986, and stands currently at approximately 23,000 cases. I recognize that that is why we are studying this situation.

We were awarded the prestigious Nansen medal as a people who were open and receptive. We are now faced with a very difficult situation. I think it is a good idea to make changes, however, we must look intelligently at the amendments which are being moved.

When a refugee states that he desires to claim refugee status, who does the initial interview and says yea or nay to him? There are two people standing at the gatepost, acting independently of any refugee panel, saying that they can or cannot come in.

What are the restrictions? If there is any question, that is the end of the story. If he says that he has come from the United States he is immediately judged as having come from a safe third country. Are these safe third countries truly safe in all instances? Should we be demanding that another country take up our own responsibilities to these people? Are we responsible for the administration or a change of heart of a safe third country? I think that would be interfering with their right to manage. Who will determine whether a safe third country is still safe at the last moment?

I think the Cabinet has taken unto itself a very dangerous responsibility. It will make a list of countries to which claimants may be returned. It will seek the advice of the U.N. High Commission in drawing up that list. What will happen to these people whose lives are put in jeopardy if that list becomes outdated? I do not think this is what Canadian people want. It is not what refugees should expect and it is not what immigrants who came to this country and helped to build it think is right or fair.

I hope that we will give very serious consideration to a proper refugee system. There should be a first appeal to the refugee board on points of fact. The Federal Court should hear the appeals, not only on points of law but on points of fact. We will then have a truly fair and open hearing of the concerns of refugees who come to our shores. We must not only choose from the refugee camps those people whom we wish to integrate into our society. We must also be open to those who arrive on our shores and those who arrive on planes, trains and buses at our frontiers across the land. I urge the support of this amendment.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to a number of the representations which have been made. The Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) said that one of the things he has not been able to understand is that the Government would bring in a measure which contravenes—and I emphasize the word "contravenes"—the Convention. I listened carefully to that because the representative of the United Nations Human Rights Commission was before the Committee.

Knowing that that charge had been levelled at the Government a number of times I asked Mr. Van der Veen the following question: "Do you contend that Bill C-55 contravenes the convention?" Mr. Van der Veen answered: "No, we do not". That is on page 4:70 of the committee proceedings held only two weeks ago. Yet the Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry persists in circulating the notion that the Bill contravenes the Convention. I underscore the fact that the UNHRC has said that it does not. It is pernicious for Members to keep circulating something which has been denied.

I will respond briefly to the quotations which the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) read from the proceedings. They are accurate quotations and I have no objection to them except that they were all made before the amendments were introduced, and many passed, in committee. Therefore, while the quotations may have represented legitimate concerns of those organizations at the time—and I suspect some of them have a mind set such that they are still their concerns—I think the Member for Davenport would concede that the Government introduced substantial amendments in committee to deal with the kinds of concerns that some of those people raised at the time.

I recall the words of my friend, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), who I agree worked very hard in committee. One of his principal concerns was the safe third country concept. That is another issue we addressed in committee. The Member for Spadina now says that the amendment is not adequate because we did not take a universal approach to the Convention. We introduced the concept of Article 33 of the Convention. That is the basic concern of people. It deals with the whole notion of refoulement or the danger that refugees might face if they were returned to another country which could then, in turn, bring them back to the country where their lives might be in danger. That is the notion with which Article 33 deals.

The Member for Spadina then asked about the whole universal application of the Convention because refugees who go back to Germany are not allowed to work, may not be allowed full access to the court system and do not have access to the social security system.

The principle in Section 48 concerns refoulement or the notion that one could be in danger of being sent back to the country where one fears persecution. It has nothing to do with these other concepts.

Last year, the Federal Republic of Germany had a budget allocation of $1.3 billion to take care of refugees in Germany. One hundred thousand refugees came to Germany last year. One witness came before the committee and complained because those refugees whom Germany was clothing, housing and feeding were not given the food from their own culture. I do not know if we are supposed to supply a menu, but that was the nature of the types of complaints. The fact that they were safe in Germany was not enough. They also wanted their own local menu from the country from which they came. That would be nice if it were possible, but try that with several hundred thousand people.

I suggest to the Hon. Member for Spadina that the question is one of refoulement. Canada honours the entire Convention. Refugees in Canada are given opportunities to work. Refugees in Canada are given protection by the courts, and refugees in Canada are protected from refoulement. If they are not permitted to remain in Canada, when they are sent back to the country from which they came immediately prior to their entry to Canada they will be protected from being sent back to the country where they face persecution.

I say categorically that those Central Americans who live in the U.S. are protected under this Bill from being sent back to El Salvador or Guatemala. This Bill protects their security.

I hope Members opposite will accept the fact that while the Bill was in committee it was amended to make sure that the drafting itself would be so precise as to protect those who fear persecution.

Let me make one final point. I refer to the fifth report tabled by the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. It is Issue No. 46, page 46:7 where it states:

> It should be noted that it is the policy of the UNHCR that the practice whereby refugees leave their country of protection and enter other countries irregularly to seek asylum should be deterred. The UNHCR has stated that refugees may be returned to a country which has previously protected them against refoulement and will allow them to remain under minimum recognized standards until a durable solution is found. Provided these conditions are met and due consideration has been given to Canada's policy of family reunification, the Committee believes that Canada should be allowed to return Convention refugees to countries which have previously protected them.

That statement was endorsed by the committee. The Member for Spadina and the Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) were on that committee. Having dealt with that issue, I hope they will now accept the thrust of the Bill and recognize that the amendment they have put forward under this motion contradicts the Bill and we cannot accept it.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Madam Speaker, while we in the Liberal Party support this amendment and oppose this Bill, I want to make it clear again that we support action to weed out phoney refugees. That is why we have generally supported from the beginning the recommendations of the Plaut report and the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. Both those reports made recommendations to correct the abuses which now exist, but they also recommended strongly that we have a system that is fair, efficient and provides universal access to the refugee determination process.

Those recommendations that are contained in the Plaut report and in the Standing Committee report are not in this Bill. That is why we oppose the Bill, while supporting reasonable measures to weed out phoney refugees.

We do not support this Bill because it goes too far in many areas. In its attempt to set up a system to weed out phoney refugees it has put forward a preliminary hearing process. This morning, I used the old term "safe country". It is no longer called a safe country, but amounts to the same thing. It is a slight improvement, as the Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) pointed out, but it is still part of a preliminary process of selecting refugees before they get a full hearing on their application for refugee status.

The Bill as reported from the committee now states in Section 48.01(1):

> A person who claims to be a Convention refugee is not eligible to have the claim determined by the Refugee Division if
> (b) the claimant came to Canada from a country—that has been prescribed as a country that complies with Article 33 of the Convention—

Several Members have pointed out that this wording is still vague. The Parliamentary Secretary seems to believe that it is satisfactory and will ensure that all legitimate applicants for refugee status will get through and have a full hearing. However, some people have suggested that such countries as Chile may be considered to be a country complying with Article 33 of the Convention. There could be others. There is no absolute process for ensuring the safety of people who would be returned to these countries.

The Liberal Party stands for universal access to a fair, efficient, effective method for determining refugee status, that is open to all those who feel they are refugees. Send them back if they are found to be phoney refugees after they go through that process, but it is unacceptable to have a preliminary process to weed out people before they have a full and fair hearing. That is why we have made this amendment. That is why we will persist in opposing this Bill as long as those provisions are in it.

The Plaut Commission was before the Government, I believe in late 1984 or early 1985. It goes back at least two years. Yet it took the Government until May 5 of this year to table this Bill. Even then, although the Government controls the business of the House, it did not put it forward for debate until a few days before the summer adjournment. Then it recalled us in the middle of summer to deal with the Bill because there was a so-called crisis on our shores. The Government has been derelict all along. Several Members on this side of the House—and I recall rising several times myself—asked the Government to proceed with the recommendations of the standing committee or with the Plaut report, but no action was taken month after month. Finally the Government produced the Bill and it did not even bother calling the Bill for debate.

On the basis of the landing of, I believe, 157 people on the shores of this country, the Government declared it a critical emergency and rush us all back to deal with this Bill and with Bill C-84, which we dealt with last week, because the matter had to be dealt with in an urgent way. But the Government had ignored the recommendations of the committee and the Plaut Commission over several years.

The Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) referred to some of the statistics. However, the numbers of refugees and immigrants coming to our shores in recent years are not large compared to those who came in past years. During the Hungarian revolution we had over 50,000 refugees, who have all now settled in this country and are making a grand contribution to it. Because of the situation in Czechoslovakia, in Uganda, and because of the Vietnam situation when the boat people arrived, a great many more people have come to this country, and those people have settled in and integrated into our society and, on the whole, are contributing very well. Of course, in all groups of people there are some who will perhaps break the law. However, they are a very small percentage of those who have come. These people who are the target of this Bill are no different from those who came in the past and were accepted by this country.

The subject was brought home to me this summer when I travelled to Israel and visited the Holocaust memorial. During my visit I learned again with great emphasis how several countries in the 1930s turned back boats of immigrants fleeing from Nazi Germany. These people were seeking refugee status to come to safe countries, but they were turned back. Of course, we learned after the war that many of those people were sent to the ovens and were annihilated.

Let us not put in place measures which could lead to the same situation. Let us make sure that this country, which won awards for its humanitarian refugee policies, allows those who apply for refugee status because they are fleeing from countries where there is political, religious and racial persecution at least to have a chance to demonstrate their case fully. If they cannot demonstrate their case, we can send them back, but at least we should give them a chance for a full and fair hearing.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is on Motion No. 11 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to the suggestion made by the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) this morning, shall the Chair conclude that the recorded division shall be deferred?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The next question is on Motion No. 13 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the recorded division be deferred?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): As the Chair cannot presume the outcome of the deferred division on Motion No. 13, the question, of course, cannot be put at this time on Motion No. 14.

The Chair has examined a suggestion made earlier by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) with regard to Motion No. 65 standing in his name on the Notice Paper. Since the Hon. Member wishes not to proceed any further with Motion No. 65, it will, therefore, be dropped. Therefore, Motion No. 67 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) will be debated and voted on separately.

The next grouping of motions for debate will be Motions Nos. 27, 29 and 34.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 66, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway)—Employment—Job creation in Toronto area; the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Canadian Security Intelligence Service—Indian Cabinet Minister—Knowledge of presence in Canada. Request for parliamentary inquiry; the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier)—Official languages—Right to use official language of one's choice. Right to use official language everywhere in Canada—Opportunity to put pressure on Albertans.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): We will now proceed with the next grouping.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved:

Motion No. 27

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 12 to 17 at page 15.

Motion No. 29

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 36 to 50 at page 15.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie) moved:

Motion No. 34

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 15 to 19 at page 16.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, we have three motions here, Motions Nos. 27, 29 and 34, which have been grouped by the Speaker for debate. I wish to mention briefly what they are and then comment. In Motion No. 27 we call for deleting paragraphs on page 15 which were introduced by the Government during the last couple of days of the committee meeting. The first paragraph is actually a little ambiguous. It is the second two paragraphs I am moving to delete.

The first paragraph says that a claimant who is in the country solely for the purpose of joining a connecting flight to Canada shall not be considered as coming to Canada from that country. There is no logical objection to that clause but there is a hook in it, as I found after having more time to consider it. However, I shall not be opposing that clause because, taken in isolation, it seems useful and fair. The trouble is that we will not be able to take it in isolation, not with what is going on at Pearson Airport and the immigration proceedings there. It is subparagraph (b) that I propose to delete. It states:

> (b) a claimant who comes to Canada from a country shall be considered as coming to Canada from that country whether or not the person was lawfully in that country.

• (1550)

Paragraph (4) states:

> (4) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(b), where a person who has come to Canada in a vehicle seeks to come into Canada without a valid and subsisting passport or travel document issued to that person and claims to be a Convention refugee, the burden of proving that the person has not come to Canada from the country in which the vehicle last embarked passengers rests on that person.

What I am concerned about in the paragraphs that I have read is a person who has escaped from El Salvador from the death squads and the bombing of civilian villages by the air force that the American Government supplies, pays, arms and directs, and that person has escaped into the United States where it is possible, of course, sometimes to hide among the lower-paid and usually not quite white-skinned population. However, the American Government has tightened up its laws and is chasing those people out. It has deported many thousands of them back to El Salvador where some have already been killed. Thus some of them try to come to Canada.

The Minister is busy trying to prevent them from coming to Canada. He does that in this way. First, he does so with the regulations which were brought in in February and, second, with this legislation. So when the Minister states, "a claimant who comes to Canada—shall be considered as coming to Canada from that country whether or not the person was lawfully in that country", he means that if the person was hiding in the United States he will be considered as coming from the United States. This is so regardless of the fact that the United States was not willing to give him any protection, did not know he was there and most likely would not have given him protection if it did know. That country now deports 98 per cent of the Salvadorans who claim refugee status. However, we will treat him as though he had been coming to Canada from the United States for the purpose of sending him back to the United States. That is the meaning of that clause.

The next clause in the Bill is similar. If he comes on a bus from the United States but says that he came across the United States as fast as he could from Mexico or Central America, then we will say, "Prove that you did not come to Canada from the United States". Of course, he will not be able to do that. In other words, he will be treated as if he came to Canada from the United States. We have never had a straight answer from the Government as to whether it will return Salvadorans to the United States under its present practices. The Government hints that it might not do that, but there has been no firm assurance that it will not do it. Those two paragraphs are judiciously worded so as not to make very plain what it is the Government is doing. But that will be the effect of them.

The first paragraph turns out to be not as good as appeared at first. Part of my reason for saying that is simply that it means that anyone who stayed in the country any longer than just to join a connecting flight to Canada by implication may be considered to have been living there in the sense that that is a safe country and he has protection. We would have a right to send him back there because we do not want to be bothered with him here. That is a fully valid possible interpretation of subparagraph (a).

It is reinforced by the information and the instructions that are being given to the immigration staff at Pearson Airport, and perhaps at other points in Canada. They are required to fill out a form with information from each refugee claimant arriving. They are asked what countries they have been to, and so on and so forth. The sixth question asks this question. "Did the claimant seek or receive the protection of any of the above countries?" At this point he will have already mentioned that he has been in this country and that country. He is then asked, "Okay, did you receive protection there?" The responses are yes, no, or unknown. There are four classes of answer as to what kind of protection they received. The first is refugee claim pending, which means that he made a claim and has not had an answer. The second is refugee claim rejected, which simply means that he made a claim but was turned down. The third is refugee claim accepted, which is obvious. He was accepted there but is leaving. The fourth is de facto protection. Therein lies the trap. It is a trap, and a very well planned one at that, by the same people who planned this legislation. They have issued instructions to staff in this regard. One of the instructions is printed on a mimeographed sheet distributed to the staff. It pertains to a section called "Third Countries—Protection", and refers to the question numbered 6 to which I referred. The document states:

> 6. Protection is defined as either the granting of de facto asylum or formal refugee status, whereby the claimant is not in danger of involuntary return to a country in which he or she has a well-founded fear of persecution.

If in effect he can be considered to have been allowed to be there, even though he was not officially and formally granted protection, then we will say that he has de facto protection. This is the Government's plan.

The final stage of it is contained in a copy that was made of a handwritten instruction in the immigration office at Pearson Airport. It is a handwritten instruction added to the mimeographed instructions. The handwritten instruction states, "deemed de facto protection if person admitted as visitor legally transiting en route even without visa through any country en route". So if he is legally transiting en route, he can be classified as having de facto protection. If he is classified as having de facto protection, then it is clear that the intent of the administration under this Government is to send him back there.

All we get a chance to debate in Parliament is the legislation. We do not get a chance to debate the regulations.

Mr. Friesen: Yes, you do.

Mr. Heap: We do not get a chance to debate the instructions that are written with respect to interpreting regulations.

The Parliamentary Secretary says that we do get a chance to debate the regulations. He may be referring to the fact that if the committee is willing to meet to look at the regulations within the 30 days while they are Gazetted, then we get a chance to debate them in committee. That is not in Parliament. The fact is that these instructions to interpret the regulations are normally not even available to our eyes. But when somebody fortunately makes them available, we understand the weasely way that this law is intended to be used by those who framed it, that is to say, the task force on refugee determination that drafted the law steered it through Parliament and through committee with very selectively incomplete information to the opposition Parties.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, fair, fast and efficient are three words which scare me when I look at Bill C-55. Fair, I doubt; fast, yes, everybody will be turned back at our borders; efficient, a moot point about which I still entertain some doubts. I have been asking myself this question for three months: Do we accept, do we want to accept refugees, yes or no? Do we still want to be party to the Geneva convention, yes or no? If so let us change the system, let us switch to a faster, more effective and better system, but definitely not Bill C-55.

Of course, when I rise in the House to debate Bill C-55 I feel vibrations in the House, and I would hope no one is trying to influence me with these vibrations to make me change what I intend to say. I introduced amendments to this Bill. Had the decision been left to me alone, I would have scrapped Bill C-55. Had I been selected to sit on the legislative committee I would have worked very hard to change it, set it aside, have it reconsidered by the committee of the House. But we do have this Bill before us and we simply must amend it to make it fair, fast and efficient. I said last week, last Friday, that Bill C-55 now under study does not reflect the ideas expressed in the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. Above all I did not say it did not faithfully reflect the report, but that roughly 80 per cent of the ideas or suggestions expressed in the fifth report are not included in the Bill. For openers, the fifth report of the committee of the House does not say anything about a pre-screening test. In addition, Section 45 prohibits the claimant from requesting refugee status at any time during his hearing before the adjudicator.

As I recall, it had also been suggested that a new division to be called the Refugee Division be created. Bill C-55 does this, but we have still kept a representative of the immigration services, an adjudicator who would have to rule before the claimant can present his arguments and explain why he claims refugee status. This claimant, who will probably be very nervous and afraid of being deported quickly or imprisoned, could forget to mention that he is claiming refugee status. If he does, after the investigation, he will no longer have the right to come back and say: Yes, I wish to claim refugee status, but for whatever reason, be it nervousness, fear or apprehension, I did not do so at the time of the hearing.

As I recall, the Fifth Report of the Committee suggested that there be two levels of selection. Last Friday, the former Chairman of the Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), who, I am sure, knows this report by heart, accused me of making erroneous statements. As he is very familiar with this report, I am certain, or at least I hope so, that when the Hon. Member said that the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) had made erroneous statements, he probably meant that I had simply omitted to say that Bill C-55 included at least 20 per cent to 25 per cent of the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Committee. The report also recommended universal access, which is not included in Bill C-55. Any claimant can present his case individually in person and will not be judged by an adjudicator, as I said earlier, but by a member of the new Refugee Division.

• (1600)

[English]

Bill C-55 was intended to be fair, fast, just, and efficient.

[Translation]

"Efficient" is a very big word. Those who believe that this is possible are not living in the real world. This is indicated by the fact that there are 77 amendments at the third reading stage.

I am sorry, but I do not recall the term for the stage before third reading. There are 77 amendment motions, and over 300 non-profit organizations dealing directly or indirectly with refugees have indicated that they disagree completely with this Bill. Could they all be incompetents, Madam Speaker?

Many say that it is unconstitutional and I cannot help wondering and thinking especially when I know that the Canadian Bar Association says the same thing. And in spite of that, we continue to want to enact this Bill.

[English]

As you know, Madam Speaker, in my riding of La Prairie I was democratically elected. As a matter of fact, I was elected twice during the same election. It is a long story, and I do not wish to take the time that I have on debate to explain that to Members. Any time after the debate anyone may come and ask. I wish to tell my colleagues that I was elected to represent the people of Canada, of Quebec, and of my riding, and to take different positions following my conscience. That is the reason I am presently speaking.

In my riding there are more than 40 different nationalities. One-third of the population is non-French or English speaking. There are Greeks, Italians, Poles, Indian, Chinese, Egyptian, Vietnamese, and many more.

In my riding, I have never heard anyone who is Canadian-born say that those refugees in my riding are terrorists or not good for Canadian society.

I really enjoy people from the different cultures. Two weeks ago, without flying anywhere, I attended two different weddings. One was Indian and one was Chinese. How great it is to live in a riding where there are so many different cultures and heritages! It is good to learn from them and to speak to them, except when they talk about Bill C-55. Many of those people are refugees themselves, and they are afraid that some members of their family will not be able to join them, that because they ran away from their countries they will not be accepted here because there is no longer universal access.

Madam Speaker, has my time expired? I see that you are impatient.

Motion No. 34 is very simple. We must delete the text because it states that whoever will judge the refugee present before him should take an example of people who were previously refused. I think you call it—

[Translation]

In legal parlance, this means that the ruling would have to be based on the precedents.

I believe that Section 34 should be completely eliminated.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before recognizing someone else, I simply want to say to the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) that I was not showing any impatience, but that I simply wanted to indicate to him that he had only 30 seconds left and that his allotted time was nearly expired.

[English]

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak briefly on Motion No. 29 which would delete the last few lines on page 15.

It is very important that we understand the process that is taking place here. We are attempting to take a bad Bill and perhaps make it less bad. It is a slow and painful process because Members on the government side are refusing to accept any positive change suggested at this report stage.

I was impressed when I heard the speech of the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais). In the last two years the Hon. Member has spent a great deal of time looking at this subject. As a result of having spent that time, he has reached certain convictions and ideas that he feels are absolutely essential to the process. Yet the Government absolutely refuses to pay attention to the types of things recommended by the Hon. Member and the committee which he chaired.

• (1610)

I know that the Hon. Member is not alone in the Conservative caucus and that there are other people who think as he does. I just wish that there were other Members who had the gumption to get up and speak as he does; then perhaps we would see some real change and movement on this particular Bill.

We are concerned with the fact that this clause allows the Government to say that a claimant who comes to Canada from another country shall be considered as coming to Canada from that country, whether or not the person was lawfully in that country.

This means that the Government can return somebody to a third country as being a safe third country, even if the person has no right to stay in that country. What a travesty that is for a refugee policy!

A few weeks ago I spoke with an American worker who works with refugees in that country. She said that in the area where she worked a great many families were involved in giving some refuge or some sanctuary to people from Central America who did not have legal standing in the United States. The United States is very restrictive in terms of the kinds of people to whom it will give refugee status. If one comes from El Salvador, for example, one can forget it. She is working with a number of American families who are involved in providing sanctuary, yet changes in American law introduced in the last few months impose very severe penalties upon anybody who has someone living in his home or who gives work to someone who does not have legal status in the United States.

These people had a natural desire to come to Canada, and this refugee worker was helping some of them do so. Canada's refugee policy should be open to them, at least to give them a hearing. Many of them, not all of them, were genuine refugees. As all Hon. Members acknowledge, we need to eliminate the abuses and to speed up the process. We agree with that, but we must have an open system so that genuine refugees can come here and get a hearing.

With the law as we see it today, we are saying that we will return such people to countries like the United States even if they have absolutely no standing in the United States, even if they are not legally allowed to remain in the United States. However, we claim that by doing that we are complying with international covenants. That is a sham.

Canadians who are genuinely concerned about the refugee policy can only be ashamed that the Government is taking such action. On that basis, I simply appeal again to government Members to consider the example of the Hon. Member for La Prairie, to consider the rather silent voices of other Conservative Members who have very serious reservations about this legislation, and to support this amendment. At least let us try to make a bad Bill a little less bad.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I should like to deal with two or three issues raised in the debate and then with the motions.

The Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) read from a handwritten note—I think that was the characterization of it—from the Department. Maybe it is time in this country that the attempt, for example, to take handwritten notes from one union member to another union member and characterize them as government policy was exposed by members of the Press Gallery. Surely, with 27,000 employees in a Department, the Minister cannot be held accountable for a handwritten note which goes from one employee to another. To bring it up in this Chamber in that fashion is a bit of sophistry, and I think it should be laid bare for what it is. It simply cannot go on.

When unions choose to join a particular Party and, internal to their functioning on the job, to write each other notes, the Government cannot and should not be held accountable by this Chamber or by the press of the country.

I come to the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais). In my intervention last week I indicated that I thought upon further examination that he might not want to continue to reinforce some of the statements he made during his intervention on Friday. I see that I was mistaken. He brought to our attention today his deeply held conviction that the fifth report of the standing committee is not incorporated in Bill C-55.

I went over it again on the weekend and find in it time after time after time recommendations of the committee, or in some cases Rabbi Plaut's recommendations, over those of the committee. Bill C-55 is built upon the Plaut report and the committee's report.

For people to stand up in this House and say that anybody in need of protection will not have access to this system, is either to try to deceive Canadian people or to demonstrate that they have not read the Bill. It is either a deliberate attempt to deceive or to show that they have not read the Bill.

An inquiry starts with the need to determine whether or not persons are admissible to Canada. If their desire to be admitted to this country is on the basis that they are Convention refugees, they say it; that is the reason; they have counsel; and the hearing must be adjourned until the refugee board is brought into the hearing. That is universal access. Anybody who claims to be a Convention refugee has his or her case dealt with by a refugee board member.

There are conditions of eligibility. If the Hon. Member from the New Democratic Party who just spoke had been in committee and had heard the witnesses whom the committee brought from New York to tell us about world-wide conditions and American conditions, he would have seen the piece of paper, which is an exhibit before the committee, that laid out the legal situation for anybody in the United States of America whom the Government of that country was trying to send back to his or her country of origin.

Those of us on the committee who are familiar with the current Canadian condition reached the conclusion that the American condition might even be more complex, longer lasting, with more loopholes for a clever lawyer to exploit. It is not an easy thing to remove somebody from the United States of America.

They have had a Charter of Rights for a lot longer than this country has had, embedded in their Constitution. They have legal processes. They are at least of the kind of quality which exists in our mosaic. Their Charter requires it, their system of government requires it, and people have it.

To stand in this Chamber time after time and say that the only country in the world which gives these rights, these protections, these legal safeguards, to refugee claimants is Canada is nonsense. People should spend a little more time at organizations like the United Nations to see what other countries do—to see what Scandinavian countries do and to see what France does.

France is viewed world-wide as a country with, in many ways, the best protection for refugees. It takes people whom I am sure this Parliament and this country would not want. They took Duvalier from Haiti. I am sure there would have been quite an outcry in this Chamber and this country if we had tried to bring Duvalier here.

The Hon. Member for La Prairie seemed to be bothered by my remarks the other day. He and I were in discord in the month of May. I was in discord with members of the committee about some things on which I felt I was right and on which committee members were wrong. Committee members voted to uphold the point of view expressed by the Hon. Member for La Prairie, and I resigned the chairmanship of the committee so that I could speak in this Chamber as an individual on things that I believe in.

I believe the Member from La Prairie inside and outside of the Chamber comes dangerously close to expressing his personal opinions as if they were the opinions of the committee. I think a careful examination of the opinions of committee members would reveal that they are not, that, in the majority, members on the standing committee are clearly supportive of Bill C-55 because it is designed to get the job done.

We are dealing with Motions No. 27, 29 and 34. Motion No. 27 suggested by the Hon. Member for Spadina would create the following situation if Members were to approve it. No departure notice or removal order can be issued in this country without a refugee board member and an adjudicator. The removal of that clause would encourage everybody who had been given a deportation order to disappear for a few hours, days or weeks. In other words, do not obey the removal order. All of a sudden a person would have the right of re-entry into the refugee system. Is that what we want? These people would have been through an inquiry and an actual determination hearing if there was credibility to their claims. Simply by disappearing upon the issuance of a removal order a person would have the right of re-entry. That is what Motion No. 27 is all about. I suggest that we should defeat it and defeat it resoundingly.

Let us go now to Motion No. 29. There is a slight practical problem with the suggestion that we eliminate the words which the Member requests. Actually quite a few lines are involved. Thirty-seven million visitors come into this country annually. In the absence of these words we would be saying to our civil servants, when people destroy all their documentation, papers, airline tickets and everything else, that they, the civil servants, will have an obligation to prove where the people came from. The situation is absurd. People do not come without tickets, and to prove where they came from they simply have to submit their ticket. If people choose to destroy their tickets, are these the refugees about whom we are concerned or are they bogus claimants, people who are trying to abuse our generosity? The words must stay as they are. We cannot transfer the obligation to trace the history of 37 million visitors a year to a few civil servants at border points.

Now we come to Motion No. 34 suggested by the Hon. Member for La Prairie. That motion lays an obligation on the Crown, the adjudicator and a refugee board member to make sure that entered into the record before making a decision on credibility are the facts of the refugee board's hearings. If we find that 10 per cent of the people who make a claim from a certain country are refugees or 80 per cent, 2 per cent or 90 per cent, that percentage must be entered on the record before a decision is made, and one must conclude that the requirement to put that on the record is in the interest of the true refugees. We have had close to 8,000 claimants from three countries which do not produce refugees, 3,500 from Portugal. That fact should be on the record to deter abuse. We do have refugees from Guatemala, El Salvador and Afghanistan. That factor should be on the record to protect the legitimate refugees and to make sure that their claims go forward to a full oral hearing.

The presentation of that evidence lies at the heart of the ability of the adjudicator and the refugee board member to discriminate between those who might be refugees and those who clearly abuse the system. The thrust of the amendments with which we have dealt up to this point are to provide bonuses to abusers. Nothing that has been suggested has very much to do with the protection of legitimate refugees. It enables people to abuse the system better over a long period of time. I recommend that the House vote against all three amendments.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I had the pleasure of listening to the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) which provoked me not only to speak at this point but also to research just what the Member had contributed in the past toward committee reports and other such reports on issues involving refugees. I came across Issue No. 46 of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, minutes and proceedings of evidence before the standing committee, and I have here the fifth report which is included in that document in which there are four recommendations.

It is my duty to bring to your attention, Madam Speaker, that the Hon. Member for Calgary West just happened to be the Chairman of the committee at that time. Today we hear the harsh criticism by that member on the beliefs of the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais), who just happened to take away the job of chairman of the committee from the Member for Calgary West. I am sure though that that has nothing to do with the criticism we are hearing today. Having said that it has nothing to do with it—and you would not want me to suspect otherwise, I never would in any case being the non-partisan individual that I am—I want to put on the record some of the recommendations from the fifth report of the standing committee. First:

> 1. It is the Committee's strongly-held conviction that Canadians do not want people sent back to countries where they may be persecuted.

Remember who was chairing that committee, Madam Speaker. It was the Member for Calgary West. As far as I can see, that was a unanimous report. The Member for Calgary West certainly did not vote against that recommendation. Let me come to recommendation No. 2 which reads:

> 2. Every person in Canada who wishes to claim that he or she is a Convention refugee should have an unqualified—

Note the word "unqualified".

> —right of access to a formal process that will adjudicate the claim.

It goes on:

> 3. All Convention refugee claimants should have their case decided at a non-adversarial oral hearing.
> 4. The decision-maker in the formal process shall have the power, in addition to declaring an individual to be a Convention refugee, to recommend to the Minister that specific individuals who are not within the strict definition of Convention refugee, nevertheless should be considered for landing on compassionate and humanitarian grounds.

Obviously the Member for La Prairie was inspired by the excellent chairmanship provided at the time the fifth report was tabled in this House. As a matter of fact, I would say the Member for Calgary West was the mentor of the Member for La Prairie, who brought these excellent recommendations to us today by way of his amendment.

But what has happened to change the heart and mind of the Member for Calgary West, who himself had such excellent views in the past as we see reflected today in the motion of the junior Member of the House, the new Member for La Prairie, who listened attentively to his former Chairman and learned all those things so well, so well that he brought them to the attention of this House by way of a recommendation? I wonder about that. However, I believe that it has nothing to do with the fact that the Hon. Member for La Prairie took away the job of the Hon. Member for Calgary West when he took over as Chairman. I would never suspect that. Far be it from me to even suggest something like that. I know that the Hon. Member for La Prairie's name was taken in vain today on several occasions by the Hon. Member for Calgary West, obviously for reasons other than the unlikely one I have suggested.

I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Calgary West for the views he held when this report was tabled in the House some time ago. I cannot help but wonder what caused him to change his mind and his convictions.

I am glad that someone still believes those strongly held views formerly held by the Hon. Member for Calgary West. That person is the Hon. Member for La Prairie who was inspired by the positive views the Hon. Member for Calgary West held in the past. I hope that some day, the Hon. Member for Calgary West, under the excellent chairmanship of the Hon. Member for La Prairie, can once again relearn what he knew so well from the person to whom he taught it in the first place.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, it is always difficult to follow a speaker of such eloquence as is the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria), but I will try nonetheless.

I would like to direct my attention to two motions, Motion No. 29 presented by the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) and Motion No. 34 presented by the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais), who is the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. Both motions are very important. They deal with the very concern we all have about Bill C-55.

Motion No. 29 proposes to delete a paragraph that would suggest that a claimant who comes to Canada from a country shall be considered as coming to Canada from that country whether or not the person was lawfully in that country. That paragraph is used to define who cannot be considered for a claim under the refugee board and to define what a safe country means.

It is a very crucial paragraph because, essentially, it says that if a person comes from a country that supports and respects Article 33 of the Convention, the non-refoulement article, then for the purposes of this Bill, even though that person may not have enjoyed any kind of status while coming through that safe country, he will nonetheless be deemed to have resided in that country. That will formulate the basis for calling that country a safe country.

Unless we delete that paragraph, Canada and Parliament will be condoning the sending of individuals into orbit. We would not be taking our responsibilities seriously. Rather than ensuring that an individual would not go to a country where he could face persecution, we would be sending him to such a country if that person did not enjoy status in the country to which we returned him. That country will obviously not respect any claims made by an individual who does not have status and could as well send that person into orbit.

That paragraph undermines one of the two commitments we made under the Geneva Convention. First we are committed to seeking individuals from refugee camps in order to allow them to resettle. The second commitment is not to send back to a country a person who may eventually face persecution in that country.

Either the Government supports its commitments under the Geneva Convention or it does not. If it does not support them, let the Government say so loudly and clearly. Let it use the front door rather than some clauses hidden in the bosom of Bill C-55 to undermine the very Convention we signed in the 1950s.

A country does not show leadership when it tolerates and promotes the sending of individuals into orbit and the passing of the buck to another country. An officer at the border may ask a person from which country he came last, and if the person says he came from the United States, without batting an eyelash, the officer will send him back to the United States. This will occur without even determining whether or not it is safe for an El Salvadoran to go back to the United States, given the number of refugee claimants who get deported from the United States back to that Central American country.

If the Government wishes to implement a safe country concept, then let it determine what "safe country" means. Let us have guarantees with those countries, as the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner) mentioned repeatedly in the House during Question Period. If we are not prepared to determine what "safe" means, then I do not think we should legislate a safe country concept.

Motion No. 34 presented by the Hon. Member for La Prairie is also significant. The motion proposes to delete the paragraph which reads as follows:

> (b) the disposition under this Act or the regulations of claims to be Convention refugees made by other persons who alleged fear of persecution in that country,

That paragraph will allow officers to make a determination based on the experiences of other individuals from the same country. Again, that is a complete shift from looking at individual circumstances in favour of looking at generalities. I do not know what other piece of legislation operates in that way.

Disability claims and workers' compensation claims do not generalize based upon the class of worker or the community from which an individual comes. There is no suggestion that if a person is of Italian background and lives West of Yonge Street, we can generalize about what kind of claim he will present. There is no suggestion that if an individual comes from a certain cultural background, he will have a certain bias toward one thing or another because seven out of 10 previous cases told us that. We do not judge an individual's claim, whether it be for workers' compensation or disability benefits, on the collective claims from particular communities, so why should we do it in this legislation?

No one is suggesting that we are in favour of illegitimate claims. We are all in favour of deterring those who want to run around our regulations, but it would be highly discriminatory to give authority and powers to two officers to make a judgment on an individual claim based on someone else's story. If an individual from Uganda once made a frivolous claim and then another Ugandan came to make a refugee claim, why should his claim be marred by the previous one simply because both claimants came from the same country? I think it is very dangerous to have in the heart of our legislation a paragraph providing that previous claims can somehow affect the outcome of an individual's claim. That is not the basis of the Geneva Convention. The Geneva Convention is clearly founded on the merits of individual circumstances. That is why we will have a refugee board. If we planned to allow collective accounts to determine individual claims, we would have no need for a refugee board.

I suggest it would be very prudent for us to pay close attention to these three amendments, particularly Motions Nos. 29 and 34 which speak to the commitment which we have as a nation to the Geneva Convention. I do not think we would be very well advised to move away from those commitments and support the orbiting of individuals as though they were pinballs in a pinball machine. No one wants to go through life that way. No one appreciates being bandied about, unable to find a home.

As a privileged society we have a responsibility to ensure that these people do not become the pinballs of the international community. If we play pinball with refugees, the problem will not go away. We will not make life easier in our country for coming generations. The problem is an international one and the solution, therefore, is also an international one. If we play pinball with refugees, in the year 2000 the Member of Parliament for York West will still be dealing with this unsolved problem.

Let us take this opportunity, keep in mind the international commitment under the Geneva Convention, and do what ought to be done. Let us give leadership to other countries. Let us not send the message to other countries that Canada has enacted Bill C-55, thereby giving them cause to say that if Canada did it they can do it. If they do it as well, we will have an international corridor of locked doors, all sending refugees to the next door down the hall where they will receive the very same response. At the end of the corridor will be one hell of a frustrated and desperate human being who will resort to anything to save his or her life and who will give more business to the immoral immigration consultants who wish to reap immoral profits from human desperation.

Let us hold our heads up high. If the Government wants to break the Geneva Convention, let it do so in a courageous way rather than through the back door.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, it has been a long time since I have had a sense of uncertainty and unhappiness in speaking in the House of Commons. I still cannot believe that the Government is going to do what it intends to do. Over the past three years I have come to know that the members of the Government are, for the most part, honourable Members of this House committed to thinking issues through and considering them with rationality.

I cannot believe that those same Members are pushing through the House of Commons a major and fundamental change in the way in which our country will treat some of the poorest and most unfortunate people in the world. They are pushing it through with no deference to the many people who would have liked to have made contributions to the committee discussions but were told that these measures had to be rushed through because we were dealing with a national emergency brought upon us by 174 Sikhs.

There will be a reckoning in the country for what the Government is doing. That can be foreseen in the words of the woman from Nova Scotia quoted in the Globe and Mail this morning who said that they decided that they would make peanut butter sandwiches and try to act like human beings. That is what the House of Commons, in one of the most fortunate, richest, and largest country in the world, should be doing. We should be looking at the desperate plight of people throughout the world. Instead of trying to create a very difficult system for refugees to penetrate, we should be looking at the circumstances which face people throughout this world and exercising charity, humanity and openness.

I can tell Members of this House about things I have seen in this world. I have seen refugee camps in Somalia where people are forced to eke out a bare subsistence for families far larger than the average family in this country on an acre and a half of land. I could talk about the plains of Nepal where people have been forced onto the most difficult agricultural lands imaginable to try to provide for themselves the barest necessities. I could talk of people throughout the countries of western Africa who live in a claustrophobic closeness which makes it almost impossible for them to get the barest of necessities. I could talk about people in the Kisumu area of Kenya where the average land holding of a family of 20 is two to three hectares. It is no wonder that throughout the world people are trying to better their lives, just as my ancestors tried to find a part of the world for themselves where they could see a future rather than nothing but desperation.

• (1650)

One could talk about Ethiopia and Namibia and what has been created there by government oppression. One could talk about the devastation created by South Africans in southern Angola.

The point is that ours is a country of tremendous opportunity and potential. We should be welcoming many of the people in the world who are facing the kind of desperation which we can barely imagine. It is the kind of desperation which we saw in Ethiopia and which made my constituents weep and help to send boatloads of grain to those refugees. The spirit of this country is not reflected by the miserly, Scrooge-like attitude brought to the House by the Government.

Rather, one sees in this country a tremendous generosity of spirit in the ordinary person. It is a generosity of spirit which leads us to give great contributions to development, to missionary efforts and to provision of food whenever there is disaster in any part of the world. That is the real Canada. That is the Canada which the Government has forgotten to the point where it is lost in a fog that leads to this kind of legislation, which proposes tricky, sneaky and nasty ways of keeping people out of this country.

At the very least, these people should have a chance to apply to a refugee determination board. At the very least, those who have made their way to this country should have a chance for a fair hearing which this country has traditionally offered refugees. Yet the clauses which my colleagues seek to amend do not provide that fairness. I urge the House, at least in these small areas, to show some of that generosity of spirit and sense of fairness which exists among the real people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is on Motion No. 27 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is on Motion No. 29 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the record division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The question is on Motion No. 34 in the name of the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the recorded division be deferred?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Agreed.

[English]

The next motion is Motion No. 17.

Hon. Frank Oberle (for Mr. Weiner) moved:

Motion No. 17:

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14

(a) by striking out line 19 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) in the case of a claimant who is the subject of an inquiry caused pursuant to paragraph 23(3)(c), the claimant came to Canada from"

(b) by striking out lines 19 to 24 at page 17 and substituting the following therefor:

"48.03(1) Where a removal order is made against a claimant who has been determined not to be eligible to have a claim determined by the Refugee Division on the basis that the claimant is a person described in paragraph 48.01(b), but"

(c) by striking out lines 19 and 20 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"but for the removal order, eligible to be granted landing."

(d) by striking out line 24 at page 20 in the English version and substituting the following therefor:

"for the removal order,"

(e) by striking out lines 11 to 15 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"reason other than the removal order; or

(e) the person was determined to be, but for the removal order, eligible to be granted landing."

(f) by striking out line 27 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"order, the person is"

(g) by striking out lines 40 to 42 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"adjudicator shall

(a) confirm the order made against that person; or

(b) quash the order made against that person and take the appropriate action under section 32 with respect to that person."

(h) by striking out lines 11 to 17 at page 22 and substituting the following therefor:

"previously made."

Mr. Benno Friesen Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, this motion brings forward several government amendments which are designed to update a number of clauses as a result of the work done in the committee. Some of these amendments are consequential.

In Clause 14(1), this amendment will clarify that the safe third country limitation on eligibility to make a refugee claim is only applicable at the port of entry where, in the original Bill, the adjudicator and refugee board member dealt with the issue of "returnability", they could have quickly concluded that a person already admitted to Canada would not, in all likelihood, be able to return to a country where the person had no ongoing ties of citizenship, nationality, or permanent residence.

Now that the issue is dealt with after the inquiry, we need to avoid the anomaly that those claimants subject to an "inland" inquiry would be ordered removed from Canada, and then would be readmitted into the refugee determination system, because they had originally come to Canada from a country that complies with Article 33 of the Convention, but where that country has no continuing obligation to take them back.

The amendment confirms in law what we all recognize in fact that to return to a "safe" third country is only relevant at the port of entry. The amendment puts the subsection 48.03(1) into a syntax that corresponds to similar provisions elsewhere in the Bill. The amendment also drops a reference to departure notices because the concept of "safe third country" has been limited in law to the port of entry.

Further references to departure notices in Section 48.05 are deleted in amendments to paragraphs (c) and (f). Because the concept of "safe third country" had not been limited in law to the port of entry, it had been necessary to include in Section 48.05 reference to the possible existence of a departure notice. Departure notices can only be issued at "inland" inquiries, and therefore all references to departure notices are being deleted as a consequence of the amendment to paragraph 48.01(1)(b).

Paragraph (g) is a technical amendment that clarifies the role of the adjudicator who determines, at an inquiry reopened for the purposes of Section 48.05, that the Convention refugee cannot be landed and does not have a right, pursuant to Subsection 4(2.1) to remain in Canada.

The adjudicator may confirm the earlier order, or where more serious allegations are raised at the inquiry, the adjudicator may replace an exclusion order with a deportation order. This is likely to be a relatively rare occurrence since only those who pose serious security or criminality risks, who are unwilling to support themselves and their families, or who have medical conditions which pose a danger to Canadians or which impose an excessive demand on Canadian medical and social support facilities, will not be landed. Even those Convention refugees who are ordered removed under this provision are protected against refoulement by subsection 55(1) of the Act.

Since we have clarified that the safe third country concept is only applicable at the port of entry inquiry, there is no longer a need to distinguish between the processes for adding new allegations against the person at the port of entry or inland.

Since the Act requires, at the port of entry, that the adjudicator canvass all potential reasons for inadmissibility, there is no requirement for a direction from the Deputy Minister.

The requirements to inform the person of the new allegation and to provide the person with an opportunity to explain or respond are contained within the principles of natural justice which are always applicable to immigration inquiries.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, when I saw this motion on Friday, I read it over several times, looked up the references contained in it as far as I could find them, and tried to understand it. We did hear on Friday about the undesirability of motions being moved at report stage which might have been moved in committee. Presumably this is one to which that might have applied. Fortunately, not only for the Opposition but for the Government, the Speaker did not apply that rule as vigorously as the Minister of State seemed to feel should be done. Therefore this comes in not only after the committee but in report stage.

I studied the amendment to understand what would be the impact and on whom. A few minutes ago, the previous speaker and his colleague, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), were kind enough to give me some comments as to what the section means, even to show me some of the notes. I decided that I would probably not understand the notes and, having heard the Parliamentary Secretary read them, my opinion is confirmed. I assume the Hon. Member understands what he read, although by the way he read it, I was not convinced. However, I will make the assumption. I think the Hon. Member has confidence in whoever wrote the notes.

Fortunately, I am in a comparable position. I was able to consult last night with a representative of the Canadian Bar Association on this subject. He is recognized as very competent even by persons who disagree. That representative of the Canadian Bar Association said this one is fine, whatever it is doing. He seemed to understand it probably as well as the person who wrote it.

Mr. Friesen: Or read it.

Mr. Heap: If not as well as the person who read it or the person who heard it read.

I will be supporting the motion and recommending that we all support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Redway): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Redway): The question is on Motion No. 17 standing in the name of the Minister of State (Immigration) Mr. Weiner. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The next grouping for debate are Motions Nos. 18 and 21.

The first question is on Motion No. 18.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

Motion No. 18

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 19 to 29 at page 14.

Motion No. 21

That Bill C-55, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 20 to 29 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"a country that the Refugee Division considers to be a safe third country for the claimant and would be admitted to that country, if removed from Canada, or has a right to have the claim determined therein;".

He said: Madam speaker, Motions Nos. 18 and 21 represent an attempt on behalf of our Party to address the second major concern of three. First, we moved amendments unsuccessfully on prescreening. Motion No. 18 would have the effect of deleting "safe country" as a concept and as a fundamental piece of Bill C-55, and it really infringes upon the latitude that the two officers can have at the border crossings.

Motion No. 18 would suggest that the safe country concept be deleted. Motion No. 21 assumes the Government will stick hard and fast to the safe country concept, and, therefore, Motion No. 21 suggests that if the safe third country concept is going to be advocated by the Government, the Refugee Division should be given the responsibility of drafting such a safe country list to ensure that individuals will in fact be guaranteed their safety rather than have the Cabinet charged with the responsibility of drafting such a list.

Of the two motions our Party would obviously support Motion No. 18 which, if accepted, would make Motion No. 21 redundant.

Why is it that the Government wants to implement a safe country concept? Why is it that it wishes to have most of those individual claimants deported or orbited back to what it calls a safe country? Why is it that the Government has not provided a definition of "safe"? Why is it that the Government refuses to answer this question with respect to a Salvadoran who comes from the United States to Canada and is sent back to the United States? Would the United States be a safe country for that Salvadoran given the reality that most of those individuals are deported from the United States because of its foreign policy vis-à-vis Central America? Why is it that the Government refuses to answer this question with respect to a Tamil who passes through Great Britain and is returned to Great Britain? Would that Tamil be in danger of his life or would he not? Would Great Britain be deemed to be a safe country?

Why is it that the Government refuses to answer questions with respect to what will happen given internal strife in some countries which are perhaps on our safe country list today and which tomorrow may have a revolution? The next day we may get individuals coming to us from that country. What will happen with those people given the fact that the list will have become out-dated because of the new internal pressures in that so-called safe country?

Those questions were not answered at second reading. Nor were they answered in committee. We are now looking for some of the answers here on the floor of the House of Commons. It seems to me and to a great number of people in the country that the imposition of a safe third country concept is really a nice way of saying that we wish to send our responsibilities off to someone else. It is synonymous with saying, "Let someone else deal with that person. Let some other country try to come to grips with that problem. We do not have the fortitude to do so".

Such a move will have serious repercussions throughout the world. It will have very serious repercussions in terms of our commitment to the Geneva Convention. If we cannot satisfy ourselves in returning a person to another country that we call safe that indeed his physical safety will be protected, then are we not guilty of contravening the Geneva Convention? Are we not guilty of contravening a responsibility we have as a country to try to spend our energy and time to ensure that that person will enjoy either safety or entry into another country's refugee determination system? Instead we have the safe country concept as the centre-piece of Bill C-55.

Every witness who came before the committee on Bill C-55 advocated the removal of the safe country concept. They suggested that we have a responsibility to allow the claimant to make his or her story before a refugee board, that we are not talking about months and years for the claim to be heard and decided upon but rather that the refugee board be the ultimate arbiter of the case. If the refugee board rules against the refugee, then so be it. At least we will have been assured that the process offered the refugee the ultimate opportunity to present his or her case.

But through the safe country concept we would be prejudging. We would be predetermining. We would be sending forth a judgment without having taken the time or the energy to listen to the circumstances of an individual. At the very heart of the refugee determination system are the merits of the individual's circumstances. We cannot base those judgments on the collective circumstances of someone else who came before that person. Nor can we make a predetermination based on the country that that person may have stopped in for a number of hours or a period of days or weeks.

Motion No. 18 is an attempt to do away with sending off the problem to someone else. It is saying, "Let us allow that human being who has a story to be told to appear before the refugee board and allow the board to make its determination rather than hide behind this safe country concept saying that some other countries of the world have already done it, why should we not do it?"

It was Canada which won the Nansen Medal, not other countries. It was Canada that was awarded the Nansen Medal for the first time in the history of the award. It was awarded to a country and to a people rather than to an individual. That says something about Canada. It says that we have been offering leadership to the world until today. If that is the case, then why should we take second-best? Why should we follow the worst instincts or the mediocre instincts of societies rather than improving on our record by offering leadership and inspiration to other countries? If the safe country concept were adopted by other countries which subscribe to the Geneva Convention then we would render that Convention null and void. In the end it is the actions and not the rhetoric that will speak to whether we support as a community the Geneva Convention.

I tell you, Madam Speaker, in all seriousness, that if countries such as Canada, Great Britain and the United States of America were to legislate safe third country concepts, then the Geneva Convention on Refugees will not be worth the paper on which it is printed. It will be but an agreement on paper written in the fifties with no relevance, strength or morality for the eighties. That is the reality.

Let the members of the Government come out from behind the curtains of the safe third country concept and tell us what they are really doing. It is synonymous to making the system more efficient by limiting the number of people within it. It is analogous to a hospital saying that it will become more efficient by limiting the number of patients that it treats. Of course that can be done. If there are fewer patients then there are more beds. If there are fewer patients then they will receive more attention from individual doctors. But in the case of a hospital, if a patient is sick and requires attention there is no way that efficiency can be maximized by excluding the sick from the hospital. Either a bigger hospital is needed or more hospitals are needed. That is how we make the sick healthy. In this system if a person is a legitimate refugee or wishes to make a legitimate case, then let us take our responsibility seriously rather than putting the problem off on someone else.

Motion No. 21 states that if the Government is to have a safe country list then let us have the refugee division formulate that list based on its knowledge and credibility. Let us depoliticize the drafting of such a list. Cabinet will be receiving international and diplomatic pressures from a host of allies and friends to be put on the list regardless of whether or not their human rights record merits such a place on the list.

• (1720)

Therefore, we are saying that if there is to be a safe country list, let the refugee division suggest that list. Let them live according to the standards of those lists. Let them change the list accordingly, rather than having Cabinet in some room on the third floor decide among our friends and allies who should and should not be on that list.

I venture to place a bet with the Speaker of this Chamber that the United States, Great Britain, and many other countries that do not deserve to be on the list for a number of classes of individuals will be on the list if this legislation becomes law.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I wish to respond to the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi). I think it is a bit presumptuous to say that all of the witnesses were against the safe third country concept. It is especially presumtuous when the Hon. Member attended 10 per cent of the hearings, given the hours we spent in committee, and there was no substitute replacement. It is a lot of reading, and I doubt very much if the Hon. Member has had the time to read the 55 hours' worth of testimony.

Mr. Marchi: That is pretty presumptuous of you.

Mr. Hawkes: It is simply not true that all the witnesses rejected the concept. Certainly, the standing committee's report in November, 1985 went out of its way—

Mr. Marchi: Name names.

Mr. Hawkes: The record has been read in earlier today. The UNHCR is very concerned about the orbiting phenomenon of refugee claimants. There is a certain absurdity to people having claims in two, three, or four countries at the same time. There is a certain absurdity in a person being rejected by a country with high standards, whether or not that person is a refugee, and that person keeping going in a series across approximately 100 countries that are signatories to the Convention.

I hear hollers across the Chamber to name names. The Chairman of RSAC and a professor from York University, were not happy with the drafting. The Mennonite International Committee, Amnesty International, the UNHCR were before the committee. None of them were happy with the original drafting of the concept. The committee listened and probed and brought forward substantial amendments which were adopted in committee. In looking through the motions that we are in the process of debating one will find more. The House just approved Motion No. 17, which further modifies the original drafting of the concept. Intuitively and in a common-sense manner, it is a very important concept which lies at the heart of the Bill.

There are some 12 million plus refugees, and some estimates suggest there are as many as 80 million economic migrants in the world today. The generosity of Canadians has been recognized by the Nansen Medal. Our spirit of generosity is recognized the world over as being of a very high order.

Who should that generosity go to? I suggest that we owe that spirit of generosity to those who do not have protection. None of us like the concept that someone who is in a camp in West Germany is a refugee claimant. Is a person better off in a West German camp than he or she would be on the Cambodian border, or than they would be in a camp in other countries of the world, or than the three million Afghans in Pakistan? Do Members wish to stand in the House and say that the people with no resources who are in refugee camps in Pakistan are less deserving than people who make their way to West Germany and are in that situation?

It is an inescapable fact that the people who need our protection most are to be found in those border situations and not in West Germany, Denmark, Sweden, or Great Britain. Surely we are part of an international community where we have some faith and some trust in other countries.

There has been no suggestion, except for some amendments proposed by some witnesses, that would have determined a safe third country simply to be a signatory to the Convention. That would include over 100 nations. I would quarrel with that type of amendment. We are talking about a determination by Cabinet that a country that goes on the list will, in practice, fulfil its obligation to non-refoulement of refugees in either a direct or an indirect manner, in other words, that it will provide the type of protection that we in Canada provide.

We are attempting to say to people around the world that, if you are in one of those countries and you fit the classification, you should not waste your money on bogus consultants, or board a leaky boat with people who may not have the proper credentials to captain those boats. Do not risk the North Atlantic in winter. There will be no advantage for you in arriving on Canadian shores. Presently you are in a protected situation, see it through.

This nation goes one step further. It says to all of those people in all of those countries that they have a right to approach a Canadian embassy and ask for resettlement in Canada. They will be given special consideration. If their economic needs are such that they have to learn the language and get settled, we do have a sponsorship program. We have an unlimited capacity in this country; the limitation is only put on by the generosity of Canadians. Sponsorships can come from social organizations to bring refugees to Canada from the refugee camps in Europe and in other places. But we tell them to take their place in line, argue their case in that situation that their needs are greater than someone else's.

By putting this provision in our law, essentially we are saying that we will protect the domestic resources to enable them to be used to deal with legitimate people in need of protection. This clause deals with the reality that indeed they have achieved prior protection. They are outside their country of origin and they are in a country whose system we value.

When this concept was originally introduced in the House, I wondered about the wisdom of Cabinet being the final arbitrator of the list. During the 55 hours of testimony I listened to many people, and I came to the conclusion that that was probably the only way it could be done.

We are part of an international community. It is our Government, Cabinet, and Ministers who speak for our nation as they talk to other nations. Members will see in the motions before us that at the heart of the redrafting of the safe third country concept is the stipulation that a person can only be returned to a country they came from that is on the list. If they came from France, they can return to France. If France does not wish to admit them, they can go forward in our system. Where is the tragedy in someone who was safe in France being returned to France? Surely the resources we save with speedy removal back to safe situations for a limited number of people are resources which we can take, use, and redirect to people who need our help. Why should we allow people who do not need our help to get it?

• (1730)

It is a bit like a situation where, because of a crisis, a community is cut off from food supplies and we have extras. If our next door neighbours have more than we have, should they get a share, or should that share go to those who need it, those who do not have it? That is all we are talking about in terms of the safe third country concept. If one already has protection in a very safe situation, I say: "Please stay there and do not come to Canada; we will give our resources to people who need our help".

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say something in support of Motion No. 18 that would strike out the section in Bill C-55 dealing with the safe third country concept, to which the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi), as proposer of the motion, and the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) have spoken, of course on opposite sides of the question.

The Hon. Member for Calgary West has been endeavouring to make a reasonable argument for this as an acceptable measure and a humane measure. Of course he ignored the fact that this is only one provision of a Bill, which has been recognized by the vast majority of organizations concerned about refugees, designed to exclude from Canada, to keep from our shores—and that of course is in the literal sense—to keep out of our airports, and to keep from our ports of entry persons who could conceivably be kept from coming to Canada.

The concept of a safe third country is one of trying to force on other countries what the Canadian Government is not prepared to have Canada do. It is a matter of trying to force other countries to accept a burden, while at the same time, by its very actions, indicating an unwillingness in the case of the Canadian Government and suggesting an unwillingness on the part of the Canadian people to bear that same burden. We have here a potential for quite a shuffling of people or a business in human freight, sending people back and forth. Humane persons—and Canadians have demonstrated their humanity over the years and had that recognized in the awarding of the Nansen Medal for our dealings with refugees—would not want to see that happen.

Unfortunately, the reality of our time is that in the prosperous countries of the industrialized world—or at least we saw it that way not very long ago—there is this same kind of reluctance to allow refugees to arrive or to stay. Tamils came to Canada from Europe more than a year ago because they were afraid of losing their refuge in Europe. One does not have to read very much of the news out of Asia in the last while to know that they might have very real reason to fear for their lives in Sri Lanka. To cite only the incident of a year ago, the present Government handled it in a proper and humane way, as Canadian people wanted it handled.

Some northern European Governments, just like the American Government, are not Governments which have been very friendly to those who have been forced into fleeing their countries because of the actions of repressive regimes. When we have right wing Governments that are unhappy about the appearance of these particular refugees, we begin to see a situation, very clear in the United States, in which persons from Central American countries, particularly from El Salvador, are no longer necessarily safe in the United States. If the Canadian Cabinet is allowed to make this decision, surely it will be subject to all diplomatic pressures that operate on the Canadian Government. In the case of the United States, that is quite obvious as far as the pressure on the Canadian Government is concerned. We have a Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) whose heart seems half American and who is very, very interested in the warmest possible relations with the United States.

If in the defence of lives it becomes necessary to make a hard judgment which says that our nearest neighbour, this great power to the south of us, is not interested in protecting the lives and safety of people who have fled from Central or South America, what will the Canadian Cabinet do in making its assessment? Will it in fact make the tough assessment that the United States of America is not a safe third country? Similarly, with European countries, does one really want to come to those brutal assessments?

Economically, 1987 is far from the misfortunes we knew as Canadians half a dozen years ago with the interest rate depression of the early 1980s. As economic activity picks up thanks to stable interest rates, as economic activity particularly in some parts of Ontario brings us close to fears of demand pressures and the inflationary potential developing again, government private Members are ready to boast about the fact that Canada anticipates a higher growth rate than is true for other OECD countries. That is more a commentary on the misfortunes in which they live than an expression of how really well we are doing. These are differences of a few tenths of a percentage point which have us ahead of the others. We know that Canadian prosperity in the past has often been based upon immigration, on large movements into Canada, on settlement developments, and so on.

To be bringing forward a Bill in which the safe third country proposal is part of trying to fend people off, to push them back to Europe, to the United States, or to wherever it may happen to be, just to keep them out of Canada at a time of such prosperity, such a response to the refugee situation is quite untrue to the best impulses in Canada and to the actions of past decades, initially with European refugees and then with other refugees which justified Canada receiving the Nansen Medal.

I speak in support of Motion No. 18 in particular, with perhaps less support in my own mind for Motion No. 21, assuming that earlier motions, particularly Motion No. 13 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), would take care of all this.

Speaking strongly in support of this motion is speaking for all the best impulses in Canadian life; is recognizing Canadian traditions, Canadian history, and Canadian potential; is wanting to take advantage of our economic strength; and is recognizing that refugees who drew themselves to the attention of repressive regimes in many cases are people with the fine sense of integrity, principle, and political freedom which would make them the very best kinds of Canadians if they were able to come here.

I speak very strongly in support of Motion No. 18 in particular. I call upon government Members, if they have any sense of these principles at all and want to build a stronger and better Canada rather than play to the worst tendencies which exist in some Canadian hearts, to support this particular motion.

• (1740)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, it is important in debating the motion that has been so eloquently explained to you and to the House a few minutes ago by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) to put on the record some views, not of Members of this House, but of individuals and organizations who appeared before the committee. I am doing so because it is important for the House to hear and to have on record non-partisan views by individuals who take the question of refugees very seriously. The subject is approached in an objective manner by people who have been in the field of refugee resettlement for years if not decades and who have come forward because of a deeply-felt and genuine concern for the manner in which the Government is approaching Bill C-55.

I will start with the Refugee Status Advisory Committee which appeared before the standing committee on August 28.

Mr. Friesen: Was this before or after the amendment?

Mr. Caccia: The Parliamentary Secretary is so ignorant of the matter before us that he is asking whether a statement was made before or after the amendment. Evidently there is an amendment before us because it was not accepted in committee. What kind of wool is the Member trying to pull over the eyes of Members of this House by these silly interventions? Is the Parliamentary Secretary so ignorant of the matter before us that he has to wonder whether something is before or after the amendment?

There is an amendment before us. It is the one we are debating and it was made necessary by the insensitivity of the Government and the Minister whom he represents. The Minister is not here to defend the Bill. He is again hiding behind the skirts of the Parliamentary Secretary because he does not have the guts to fight for this Bill or Bill C-84. Is that enough of an answer?

Mr. Gauthier: Yes.

Mr. Caccia: Let us deal with the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, which stated on August 28, 1987:

> Nothing guarantees protection to the claimant in these countries.

The advisory committee was commenting on the notion of safe third country, a notion which we reject. The advisory committee said that nothing guarantees protection, and went on to say that there could be risk of diplomatic embarrassment in making reference to some incident in 1983.

Let us move for a moment to the Canadian Bar Association, certainly not an organization devoted to radical changes in Canada or to the promotion of extremist views. On August 31 it stated:

> The safe third country list system is not a workable concept because it denies—

An important observation is that it denies:

> —evaluation on a personal basis.

The association also commented on the safe third country notion by saying:

> Nothing guarantees protections to the claimant in these countries.

Let us turn now to the Inter-Church Committee which appeared before the committee on September 1. It insisted:

> All applicants should receive a hearing on the merits.

Applicants should not be judged on the matter of whether or not they had a safe third country to go to. The Inter-Church Committee also commented that:

> Readmission to the safe country is problematical.
> It is assumed that safe countries will readmit but there is no evidence that this is the case.

That is an important consideration, Madam Speaker. Let us look at what the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said. He insisted that the exception of the particular clause which we adopted earlier:

> —should apply to all who claim that the safe country is not safe, whether they have been recognized as Convention refugees or not.

This would provide a safety net for some exceptional cases. It is nevertheless an important consideration. The United Nations Commissioner for Refugees went on to say:

> —there should be an exception when people fear for their safety in that country.
> A person not permitted to return to the safe country should be allowed to enter Canada's refugee system.

We had the Halifax Refugee Assistance Group which appeared before the committee on September 2. This group made the point:

> It is objectionable not to examine the claimant's case on its individual merits.

That is something which the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) ought to remember. It is objectionable what he is proposing in the Bill. Individual merits are important. Our immigration and refugee systems have been based on that main pillar of considering individual merits, which is something that the Government is now forgetting.

On September 2, the Mennonite Central Committee said:

> The safe country is arbitrary and subject to political influences.
> No notice can be taken of individual considerations; it is dangerous to generalize situations.

That is why we are putting forward this amendment, because without putting it forward we would allow a generalization, a blanket application, of a safe third country without looking at the history of the individual, the merits of the case and the options which the individual may or may not have available.

Rabbi Plaut on September 3 noted:

> Diplomatic imperatives will be present when the list is being compiled.

He said that the list would be politicized:

> This list won't be subject to any evaluation.

How do you like that, Madam Speaker?

Pierre Duquette on September 3 made some interesting remarks. He said:

> Almost all accepted refugees in Canada wouldn't have passed this test.

It might well be that a study of this nature, if carried out, would reveal that those who have been admitted so far would not have passed the test.

The Hispanic Congress on September 3 said:

> That criterion is dangerous because it doesn't guarantee real protection to refugees.
> Danger of political criteria influencing the list.
> This criterion doesn't allow any evaluation of individual cases—

The congress was speaking of the safe third country. A number of organizations came forward more or less saying the same thing. The Montreal Refugee Coalition said:

> Danger of political factors relating to list-making.

—the lack of discretion—

Then we have the Nanaimo Immigrant Settlement Society which raised a very strong signal of the violation of the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees. There are scores and scores of individuals who took the trouble either to appear or to write in opposition to this safe third country notion. Perhaps I might be allowed to quote the Canadian Jewish Congress, which stated that there are no guarantees against subsequent rejections. It said:

If we are to return people, they should have some status in that country.

The Government has decided through a subterfuge to remain distant from its commitments to the United Nations Convention on Refugees. That is what the Government is doing without admitting it, without coming clean with Canadians and with the United Nations as to its intentions. In other words, the Government is doing something through the back door, by way of an amendment to one piece of legislation, hoping that somehow what it is doing will go by unnoticed, that it will get away with it, or that possibly it will not be challenged in the higher courts. That practice is an objectionable one, and must be put on the record. It has to be said that if the Government has the intention of reneging on Canada's commitments to the United Nations, particularly in regard to refugees, then it had better come out in the clear and say it openly to everyone so it can be judged for its actions.

• (1750)

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in support of Motions Nos. 18 and 21. I support Motion No. 21, particularly because it includes a test which, while it would not be enough to make the original safe-country clause satisfactory, does make it better than the clause that has replaced it in one vital respect.

Motion No. 21 provides that if a person is to be returned, he would be returned to a country that the refugee division considers to be a safe third country for the claimant. The people who are experts in refugee matters, not the people who are experts in external affairs, would be making that decision. Furthermore, it provides that the refugee would be admitted to that country.

The clause the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) likes so well does not assure us that a person will be admitted to a country. Later on, there is a clause which deals with what to do if a person is not admitted to a country. That is very nice if the person who is not admitted to a country is sent back to Canada. We have no assurance that that will happen.

There is nothing in the Bill about an agreement, an arrangement or a guarantee, all of which words the Minister has used since May to sell this Bill to the public, to deal with people who are chucked back to a certain country. There is only the requirement that the country be in compliance with Article 33 of the Convention, an article which provides that the country will not send the refugee back but does not provide that it will give a person a chance to claim refugee status. It does not provide a refugee the right to be returned to Canada or the right to claim refugee status in the country to which we have sent him.

In that respect, the clause moved by the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi) is better than the Government's clause. We could have moved an amendment that would have referred both to the Convention and to the right to return or to make a claim, but the Government did not want it that way.

We heard a very moving speech made by the Hon. Member for Calgary West. Oh, yes, he got to me, he really moved me. He said that people in Afghan or Pakistani refugee camps or people in refugee camps in Cambodia or Thailand are more needy than people in refugee camps in western Europe. He is right. They are more needy, from everything I have heard. I have not visited those camps, but some Hon. Members have and they probably know that. I believe that those people are more needy, but then the Hon. Member for Calgary West went on to make a little skip in logic and say that if we shut out the people from western Europe, of course we will take the people from refugee camps in Southeast Asia or Pakistan. That is a lot of pure boloney from Calgary West.

The fact is that Canada has taken in very few Afghanis. All kinds of crocodile tears are shed over the Afghan people who were invaded by the Soviet Union. I opposed the invasion of Afghanistan when I was on city council before I was a Member of Parliament, and I do now oppose the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. We hear all about the poor Afghan people, but at least until very recently, less than 100 Afghan refugees were accepted into Canada.

Mr. Friesen: Say why, Dan.

Mr. Heap: The Hon. Member wants to know why. The reason must lie with this Government's overseas selection policy. It is not because people came from western Europe, it is because, for example, of medical criteria.

There was a complaint from the Mennonite Central Committee this spring about a family of Kampucheans who were in Thailand and had waited there for years. This family was finally selected to be relocated to Canada. A couple of days before they were to board the airplane, a young son of the family was found after an X-ray to have a spot on his lung. There was a possibility that he had TB, and of course the whole family was not allowed to come to Canada. Of course, they would have had a chance to do so later on.

What happened not much later was that the young man hanged himself because he was an impediment to his family's chances of getting to Canada. In this case, the policy of the United States would have been much more generous. The family would have got to the United States if they had been scheduled to go there and the young man would either have been X-rayed again to find out if he really had TB or he would have been treated for TB. In our countries, TB can normally be cured in half a year.

Canada is not selecting the neediest refugees overseas, contrary to what the Hon. Member for Calgary West has suggested. The Hon. Member for Calgary West took part in the discussion in committee, not only with the Mennonites but also with the B'nai B'rith. At that time, the Hon. Member made this same moving plea about helping the neediest, but the witnesses present who had been working with refugees contradicted him. He forgot to tell us that when he made his speech. The witnesses said that our policy as now applied is not helping the neediest.

The policy for selecting refugees overseas that is being used at the present time is not to help the neediest. If we were helping the neediest, we would not have turned down the Chileans who were in Buenos Aires last February. These Chileans were found by reputable witnesses to have been the subjects of persecution, imprisonment and torture by the police in Chile for union acitvities. I do not refer to the entire planeload of Chileans, but some of those people who were turned down could show strong evidence of a strong need for refugee protection.

Argentina is not a completely safe country for Chileans for two reasons. First, we have to read the papers every day to see if the Argentine Government still exists or if the generals have taken it over again. Second, the Chilean secret police operate in Argentina and not for the health of Chilean refugees.

When I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) in the House if he would look at the evidence provided by a reputable Canadian lawyer from Montreal in that matter or if he would meet with him, he said to have him send the evidence down to Buenos Aires. He knew that those in Buenos Aires would continue to turn those people down because need on the part of a refugee is not the chief criterion at which Canada looks. In choosing refugees through our overseas offices, Canada now looks at economic benefits or maybe political benefits for Canada.

While I agree with the Hon. Member that we should help the neediest, I do not agree with him that the Bill does that. The Bill leaves us with a great uncertainty about what will happen when we send a person to a certain country because the Government has taken away even the slim guarantees that existed in the original Bill about the right to return and the right to have a claim determined. The policy of the Government is not to shut out western Europeans in order to help the Asians, but to shut them both out.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

EMPLOYMENT—JOB CREATION IN TORONTO AREA

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Madam Speaker, like many of us who were elected for the first time to the House of Commons in 1984, I ran for Parliament as a result of the great recession of the early 1980s. You will recall those times very well, Madam Speaker. Those were the times of 20 per cent interest rates, record inflation, record bankruptcies, and national unemployment rates of an average of 12 per cent. Of course, there were pockets of higher rates of unemployment in various regions of the country, but the national average was a horrendous 12 per cent.

I believed at that time that there was no reason a country like Canada should have such unemployment levels. I believed that I had to try to do whatever I personally may be able to do. It was for that reason that I decided to stand for Parliament, to put aside the position I then held and try my best to do something about the horrendous levels of unemployment with which we were faced at that time.

You will remember, Madam Speaker, that other Canadians felt the same way as I did. The issue in the election campaign was the economy and jobs. That issue has not really disappeared. It has been with us ever since the early 1980s. It has been a constant theme. Public opinion polls indicate that unemployment continues to be one of the major issues in the country.

What has happened to the unemployment situation since September 4, 1984, when the Government was elected? As you know, there has been a dramatic increase in the number of Canadians employed and in the number of jobs in the country in the past three years. We have had an increase of almost one million new jobs, 907,000 to be exact. National unemployment levels have fallen from near 12 per cent to 8.8 per cent in August. In the Province of Ontario, where I am from, unemployment is now down to 5.8 per cent, which is very encouraging to say the least.

I am sure that when you ran for office you were concerned, as was I, about the national picture, but were even more concerned about your own local community, as was I. I am pleased that the unemployment situation in Metropolitan Toronto has improved dramatically. The unemployment rate has fallen to below the 4 per cent mark which would traditionally be considered full employment in any economy. Fortunately, at the moment we actually have jobs going looking for people even though everyone cannot find the exact job they would like to have.

It is because of this improving job situation that I was most disturbed when I heard the Leader of the NDP indicate that 95 per cent of all jobs created in Canada since September, 1984, had been created within a radius of 160 kilometres of Metropolitan Toronto. I ran for office because I was concerned about unemployment in my own community. However, I was certainly concerned about unemployment across the country and wanted to see full employment throughout the country.

It seems to me that in the last three years there has not just been a growth of employment in Metropolitan Toronto and within 160 kilometres of Metropolitan Toronto, and in Ontario, there has been growth of employment across the country. It is my impression that 46 per cent of the new jobs have been created in Ontario, but after all, Ontario has approximately 40 per cent of the total labour force.

It is my impression as well that about 54 per cent of all the jobs have been created elsewhere across the country. In the last three years, for instance, it is my impression that more jobs have been created in Atlantic Canada than had been created in the previous six years. It is my impression that in the last year alone, three times as many jobs were created in your Province of Quebec, Madam Speaker, as was created in the past five years in Quebec. It is my impression as well that right now the unemployment rate across this country is lower in all provinces than it was at the time the Government took office some three years ago.

I am interested in the fact that in August, the Statistics Canada "help wanted" index reached its highest level ever. I understand that "help wanted" advertising in Atlantic Canada is up some 72 per cent, to its highest level in 20 years. In Quebec it is up some 85 per cent, and in Ontario it is up 154 per cent. In the prairie region, it is up 51 per cent and it is up 83 per cent in British Columbia.

I believe those figures reflect the fact that employment has not just been created within an area around Metropolitan Toronto, but right across this country.

That impression has been reinforced by a recent article in The Globe and Mail. I want to quote briefly from it:

> In June, 1984, opposition leader, Brian Mulroney said that "tens of thousands" of jobs would be created soon after the election of a Conservative government. He was roundly criticized in the media for this extravagant prediction and told to be more realistic. The media were wrong.

In fact, we have seen that they were wrong because almost one million jobs have been created in those three years. The Globe and Mail went on to say:

> The Conservatives would get all the blame if the economy were lagging, but are reaping little of the credit as Canada leads the industrialized world in economic growth. This is unfair, because federal policies on deregulation, deficit control, privatization, foreign investment, tax reform and free trade are very much part of the environment in which jobs are appearing and incomes are rising.

My impression has been reinforced by this article in The Globe and Mail. My impression is that job creation in Canada has not only been in Metropolitan Toronto and nearby, and in Ontario, but right across the country. If I am wrong—and I do not believe I am—I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will tell me so tonight.

Mr. Benno Friesen Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, first, I am happy to know that the Hon. Member has raised that question on behalf of his constituents. I can understand why his constituents would be confused by the statistics given by the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Leader of the New Democratic Party, when he said that 95 per cent of the jobs that were created were within a 160 kilometre radius of Toronto.

I recall very vividly, just after the last Budget, the same Member for Oshawa being interviewed on television. He said that he had just received information regarding companies that had paid income tax and found out just before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) had tabled his Budget that last year 60,000 companies had not paid tax.

• (1810)

Naturally, the first impression would be that that is shocking. What he did not say was that most of those companies had not made money last year. In fact, probably a lot of them had lost money last year, and obviously, if one does not make money or one loses money, one does not pay tax. The Hon. Member for Oshawa overlooked that piece of information when he gave us those statistics.

The same holds true in the statistics he gave with respect to the improved employment picture in Canada. It is just totally wrong to say that 95 per cent of the jobs were created in and around Oshawa.

The Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), who just asked the question, was absolutely right in the perspective he gave. There have been, since this Government was elected, 907,000 jobs created in Canada. It would be ludicrous to say that 95 per cent of those 900,000 jobs would be in and around Oshawa. That just makes no sense at all. It is true that many of those jobs were created in Ontario. We are happy for the Ontarians who have got those jobs and we want to make sure the rest of Canada benefits in the same way. However, Ontario also has 38 per cent of the labour force as of September 1984. Therefore, just to see a larger number of workers employed does not mean there has been a statistical growth in the way the Hon. Member for Oshawa indicated.

Metropolitan Toronto has accounted for 15 per cent of all the jobs created in the last three years, from August 1984 to 1987. When this Government was elected, the gainsayers all said that was not going to happen. Actually, we can be very proud of what has happened. I spoke to a Member from Calgary the other day. That Member said that all the drilling rigs will probably be employed this winter because the Government has removed the PGRT and has provided incentive in the oil industry.

There have been 35,000 jobs created in Atlantic Canada, 123,000 jobs in Quebec, 162,000 jobs in Ontario, 15,000 jobs in the Prairies and 22,000 jobs in British Columbia. I think that while we want to see more jobs created in the regions, we can be very proud of what has already been done.

With the continued impetus to the economy given by the incentives programs, both in western Canada and in the Maritimes, we will see more jobs created. The federal Government is discussing with the provincial Governments and the private sector ways to promote the Western Economic Diversification.

I commend the Hon. Member for raising this point in the House so that we can correct the record. The distortions given in the statistics left with us by the Leader of the New Democratic Party really do no service to the country at all.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—RIGHT TO USE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF ONE'S CHOICE. RIGHT TO USE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE EVERYWHERE IN CANADA—OPPORTUNITY TO PUT PRESSURE ON ALBERTANS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I hope I will have as much time as the previous speaker!

Mr. Prud'homme: He hopes to have as much time as the previous speaker!

Mr. Gauthier: Last June 30 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) a question concerning the right to use the official language of one's choice everywhere in Canada, and especially before the provincial legislatures and before the courts. I will recall the facts for those who might have forgotten them.

On April 7, 1987, Alberta Member of the Legislative Assembly Léo Piquette was denied the right to speak or the right to express himself in French before the Legislative Assembly. Some time later, on June 26, the Committee on Privileges of the Alberta Assembly made a decision and requested Mr. Piquette to apologize for having questioned the authority of the Speaker of the House and spoken French before the Alberta Legislature. In addition the committee recommended that any Member wishing to address the House in a language other than English first obtain the agreement of the Speaker of the House.

Madam Speaker, I raised objections at the time and I am still raising objections because I sincerely believe that any Canadian, whoever he may be, with a Charter of Rights, with an official declaration stating that French and English are the official languages of the country . . . Madam Speaker, I believe that this constitutional right enables us to use French or English, to express ourselves freely and without restraints before the courts and before a provincial legislature.

I realize that this right is not recognized in practice everywhere, that there are restrictions, but we all work toward eliminating this resistance, and this is why, as everyone knows, Madam Speaker, I often refer in this House to basic inalienable rights which should be guaranteed to all Canadians by our Constitution, because we of the minority, who must work hard to survive in this country, whether in this province or elsewhere, need to have our rights protected and promoted. I know that the Parliamentary Secretary will tell me that, under the constitutional amendments proposed to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Meech Lake Accord, the provinces would have to protect the official language minorities, that is the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec and the English-speaking minority in Quebec. However, I believe that it is still more important to realize that it is essential for the survival of this country to promote French-speaking minorities because we are submerged in an English-speaking sea in North America and we are being conditioned every day by American television, books, films, music, and so on. I am not the only one to say so. During the weekend, I read a newspaper article in which certain English-speaking groups were saying that it was time for the Canadian anglophones to become aware of this Americanization and that they had to be able to assert and defend their Canadian identity.

This phenomenon has also been noticed elsewhere, Madam Speaker. European countries are complaining about it. Countries such as France, Britain, Germany and Japan are facing a major cultural upheaval. As we know, China has also opened its doors to the United States and it will now be subject to American influences too. If these countries are influenced by the English-speaking North American culture when they are so geographically distant from the United States, how much more so are we influenced by it, we French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec, in Ontario or elsewhere? We need the political will to guarantee our survival, but first of all, we need constitutional guarantees to ensure that the survival of the minorities and their rights will not depend only on this political will.

Indeed, the Prime Minister recognized this fact in his answer to my question on June 30, and I quote:

> We are going to work together with the Fédération des francophones hors Québec and the provincial Governments, and with language minorities wherever they happen to be, to promote——and I emphasize this word—

> —to promote their rights at all times.

That, Madam Speaker, is a political will and indeed this commitment by the Government is incorporated in Section 40 of the Official Languages Act and I quote:

> Commmitment to enhancing the vitality of the English and French linguistic minority communities in Canada.

Madam Speaker, that is a legal obligation that is set out in the Official Languages Act. It is not a constitutional obligation. It is not the same thing because an Act can always be amended while a Constitution is more difficult to amend, it is a much more reliable safeguard and that is what we are aiming at, we of the French-Canadian diaspora. Francophones would like to see their rights spelled out in the Constitution just as Anglophones from Quebec are entitled to expect that their rights be also guaranteed by the Constitution.

Madam Speaker, I am happy that the Federal level has given a commitment to promote the vitality of linguistic minority communities in the Official Languages Act that was introduced, as we will recall, on June 25, 1987. However, I must stress once again that I deplore that the Prime Minister did not have the courage to enshrine in the Constitutional Act, 1987, the obligation for the federal Government to promote linguistic duality. That is why we in the Liberal Party have suggested an amendment to the Meech Lake Accord which would bind the federal Government to promote linguistic duality for minorities while allowing provinces to make that obligation binding upon them by passing a resolution in the provincial legislature if they wish to do so.

We do not want to impose this on anyone, but we are simply saying that, first of all, the federal Government should not only preserve, but also promote this duality, and that, when they deem it appropriate to do so, the provinces should have the right to follow suit simply by passing a constitutional resolution.

I can see some problems, Madam Speaker, because people are always telling me that we are moving toward this objective gradually and that we shall reach it eventually. However, as you will recall, Madam Speaker, we recently had a provincial election in Ontario during which we went through some difficult times. Certain groups attacked bilingualism in Ontario and the Leader of the Conservative Party, Mr. Grossman, stated firmly and as regressively as possible that Ontario would never be bilingual under a Conservative Government.

What can I say, Madam Speaker? The democratic process, and I am happy about this, rejected Mr. Grossman and he had to admit defeat. I am not saying that he lost everything on the language issue, but he certainly did not show an open mind about it.

In the case of Alberta, I asked the Prime Minister what he did to try to convince our friends in Alberta that a Member of the provincial Legislature had the right to speak in his own language, which is one of the official languages of this country. I do not know what the Parliamentary Secretary will reply. I do not know whether he did something, whether he wrote or whether he took any other action. But I should like to think that in this country of ours, in any legislature in Canada—provincial and here of course where it is spoken, as it is in Quebec and in New Brunswick—I should like to think that in Ontario, in Manitoba and in all western provinces where there are francophones who wish to express themselves, they would have the right to speak in French or in English if they wish, whenever they feel like it and without wondering whether they will be allowed to do so. And if they do, for Heaven's sake do not ask them to apologize for that, as Mr. Piquette was asked to do!

Madam Speaker, I want to conclude my brief remarks by saying to the Parliamentary Secretary: Well, I should imagine we will be talking about the official languages in the near future. We have had in this country experiences which resulted in progress in this field. Let us hope that in Alberta, let us hope that elsewhere in Canada—recently in New Brunswick we heard about Lynn Lévesque who had a deplorable experience with bilingualism when she applied for a job in a post office. We have had examples such as APEC, the Association for the Protection of English Canada, which has been acting up and would have us believe that everything is in danger, that the French power is taking over.

Madam Speaker, I think we are making some progress, and the case of Mr. Piquette is another example which can be a lesson to us. We must take measures, we must take action, we must tell the legislatures: Be generous, be patient, do not worry, we are not threatening you when we speak French in Canada.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, on June 30 during Question Period, the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). It concerned what is now commonly called "The Piquette Affair", which pertained to the use of the French language by a Member of the Legislature in the Province of Alberta.

The Hon. Member asked the Prime Minister if he was prepared to take action, and "call the Premier of the province to put pressure on his Alberta cousins and friends, so they will finally understand, once and for all, that French and English are the official languages of this country . . . and that it is unthinkable that a Francophone should suffer any restrictions in Alberta, any more than an Anglophone would in Quebec?"

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has requested that I elaborate on the questions raised by the Hon. Member, in light of the new legislation on official languages contained in Bill C-72, and tabled on June 25 of this year.

Neither Bill C-72, nor the Meech Lake Accord contemplate any measure that could deprive a provincial legislature of any degree of its sovereignty. The tools that the federal Government has at its disposal in matters that fall within the jurisdiction of a provincial legislation are reason, suasion, and good example.

What the historic achievement of Meech Lake and the important measures contained in Bill C-72, an Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada, demonstrate, is the will of the Government to advance the equality of status and use of French and English throughout the country, to promote the linguistic rights of all Canadians in a spirit and a framework of co-operation with the provinces.

• (1825)

For example, according to Subparagraph (d) of Subsection 42(1) of Bill C-72, the Secretary of State can take measures to "encourage and assist provincial Governments to support the development of English and French linguistic minority communities generally and, in particular, to offer provincial and municipal services in both English and French and to provide opportunities for members of English or French linguistic minority communities to be educated in thier own language".

I can assure the Hon. Member that the Minister of Justice, like the Prime Minister, is deeply committed to this renewed spirit of federal-provincial co-operation, and that he will be urging all Parties to support and swiftly pass this important piece of legislation.
