of the actual killing, as murderers seldom committed the crime in such a manner as to permit of positive evidence of the killing. The prisoner, it innocent, should disprove the evidence by showing where he was at the time. This was the law of the country, and he was bound to give them that for their guidance.

The first question for them to consider was, was Charlotte Hill dead, was the body found her remains? In arriving at a conclusion on the point, they must consider the evidence brought to identify the remains. They would ask themselves, was there as the tout in the point of the testimony. They would ask themselves, was there as monton is entertained by the court.

The first—the linegality of the Jury, so bejection in the early part of the trial; second—that the prisoner had never been placed in their hands.

It seems that the law requires that at the outset of a trial of a prisoner charge of with a capital offence the indictment had never been read to the jury, and the prisoner charge of the was bound to give them that for their guidance.

the night of Charlotte Hill's disappearance, and next morning it was gone.

He would next turn their attention to the evidence of the identity of Thebalt.

Bell's crop was broken into by his cattle, and he arises at midpight to turn them out and sees the prisoner and his victim pass his house. This was the start on that journey so fatal to one of them. They had been told that the prisoner must have been mad to have gone so far away over a public road to commit the murder, instead of dropping the girl into a pool near home. It would have been absolute madness to have done this, for when the girl was missed the woods would be searched and the ponds dragged. But he chooses the land of dragged and the ponds dragged. But he chooses the loneliest place he knows off. A more loneliest place than the scene of the murder could hardly be found in the murder could hardly be found in the province. He started out so as to accomplish the greater part of his journey in the hours of darkness. When on his return it was said he came openly, and why not? There was no need to fly. If from some sudden impulse he had not made a fire to destroy the remains of the murdered woman and that smoke had not guided the Munros to the spot, the body would have been covered by the snows of this winter and perhaps till the girl had been forgotton or Thebault had passed away. No, he felt secure on his homeward journey, for as had been said, it

Dury meet and McBride, who saw the prisoner near the same place. Then, further on, Osmond Dunn meets him, then Porter and Albert Marshall. With all this evidence before them they must be satisfied that the two they saw were the two who left home together, were seen driving towards the Meadow Road, and then the prisoner is seen to return without her. In that journey to the scene of slatighter and back the prisoner is met by sixteen different persons. It is true all were not positive, but some were and had spoken to him, while all agreed in the description as our young girls think 'nae ill,' and in the description and our young girls think 'nae ill,' and in the description and our young girls think 'nae ill,' and in the description and out of the scene of slatighted decorption and so say I, to the extent that so him, while all agreed in the description are the state of the scene of slatighted the description are the scene of slatighted that the scene of slatighted the description are the scene of slatighted the description are the scene of slatighted the scene

Having now, he felt satisfied, proved the jdentity of Thebault, he called attention to several circumstances connecting the links in the chain and corroborating the evidence before referred to. The subponaing of the wife and family of the prisoner had been pathetically described by the counsel for the defence. He could say that there was no wish on behalf of the prosecution to agravate the trials the family had to endure, but where there was a possibility of justice being baffled he would not hesitate to call members of a prisoner's family, for this was an age when sentiment could not interfere with public duty. away. No, he felt secure on his home ward journey, for as had been said, it was not unusual that he should be seen driving on that road. Next, after Bell seeing them start out, Adelbert Thomas sees them pass the Mil ford House early in the morning. A mile further on the road the Dukeshears meet them. Mrs. Dukeshear, when she gives her testimony, says, that looks like the man, but he was more stern looking.' What more natural, for then the man had almost arrived at his journey's end and was steeling himself for the commission world more beautiful than the lambs world more beautiful than the lambs running races and dancing round the big stone of the field?

We have no right to keep ourselyes or others from natural pleasures; and we are all too apt to interfere with and judge harshly the pleasures of others; hence we who are stiff and given to other pleasures, and who, now suckednesses of the world, are too apt to put the vices of the jaded, empty, old heart, like a dark and ghastly tire burnt out, into the feet, and the eyes, and the heart, and the head of Mason and Hamlin, Geo. There was but one being who cared for her. For that poor wretch in life there had been no human sympathy, charity or mercy. It was for us to say now whether in death she was beyond the pale of justice, If the jury had a remonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt let him go, but he implored them to beware that they considered well, for if they believed him guilty and found a verdict to the contrary, it would give them very little satisfaction. He, on healf of the Crown, didn't ask for ven geance, but justice. The last case of murder tried here had been spoken of the believed the jury did right in finding the verdict they did, but the Crown chose to exercise mercy, as they recognized there was to be mercy exercised it was the duty of the Crown, not the jury, to exercise it.

The Pig Pasture.

The Pig Pasture.

We always have the best success with breeding sows when they are allowed to feed on grass. This is the only food they require until the young pigs are a week or two old, when milk or meal of some sort may be given to them to increase the flow of milk if they require it. Sows thus managed are never ugly and never destroy their pigs. Why? Because they are in a natural and healthy condition. The grass also increases the flow of milk and is, quite often, sufficient food for a sow while rearing her young. Young pigs soon learn to eat the grass, which is alike natural and healthy for them. We never had a case of scours or thumps among young pigs when running in pasture. The grass serves to counteract the effect of corn, and many pigs on grass can be fed heavily with this food without the injury it would do them if confined and deprived of grass. Our experience has convinced us that no farm is complete without a pig pasture. Clover is the best of all the grasses for this purpose, and next to it we prefer this purpose, and rest to it, we prefer this purpose, and next to it we prefer the promptly after being eaten off, is the this purpose, and next to it we prefer orchard grass for the season that it starts up promptly after being eaten off, is the earliest in the spring, and is relished by the pigs. It is not necessary to have a special field for the pig pasture, but they may be allowed to run in any field if promptly enclosed. There should be plenty of water in the field and plenty of grass. A patch of sweet corn sowed in drills will be found convenient to supplement a short pasture in the late summer. There should also be another patch of turnips or other roots into which the pigs may be turned for fall feeding. With the three auxilliaries of pasture, the sweet corn stalks, and a root patch, the cost of rearing and feeding pigs may be reduced to less than one half their expence when

MR. H. R. Stevens, Boston, Mass.:

Sir—I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the efficacy of your invaluable family medicine, Vegetine. For three years I was a great sufferer from Chronic Rheumatism, and Derangement of the Kidaeys, and after testing innumerable so called remedies, in the spring of last year I was recommended to give the Vegetine a trial and to persevere in using it for some time. I did so, and in the course three months found that a perfect cure had leen effected, and I am now, thank God, in the I lengoyment of the best of health. I considite the most effective remedy for the distressing complaints just mentioned, and for Indistrict, stion, Biliou mess and Liver Complaint. It is very ple want to take, vitalizing and invig-
