I suggest that one of the most haunting spectres for small business, for farmers, fishermen and home owners are these excessively high interest rates. It is interesting to note now how spokespersons for the financial community, economists and financial advisers, are saying more and more that the government is on the wrong tack and that the way to slow inflation is not to increase interest rates. People are talking more and more about the spectre of 25 per cent interest rates. What is that doing to the imagination and the hope of Canadians and the vision of a better Canada when we have a government which is prepared to sit back and a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is prepared to stand up and essentially say to home owners that they have never had it so good?

One wonders with all seriousness to what extent members opposite get out and actually talk to people in their constituencies. To whom do these people talk? With whom do they discuss economic policies? Surely it is not the people who elected them to the House of Commons because I have yet to find an individual who would suggest that the best thing for Canada is to jack up interest rates even higher, and yet that is the policy which this government seems willing to continue.

● (1550)

We are looking at a government which, through its failure to provide leadership and a sound, long-range industrial policy for Canada, has presided over the balkanization of the Canadian economy and the systematic fragmentation of our industrial structure right across the country. As a result, our international economic performance has deteriorated dramatically over the last number of months. Last year we imported over $7 billion more than we sold to the rest of the world. This is something that I am not certain Canadians appreciate or that the government makes any effort to communicate, that the country imported over $7 billion more than it sold. Indeed there is a balance of trade, but when we consider the dividends that are flowing out of this country, we are talking about a $7 billion deficit.

Our balance on finished manufactured goods stood at a staggering deficit last year of $17 billion. As a result, the value of the Canadian dollar has only been maintained by massive interventions by the Bank of Canada in the foreign exchange market and by a crippling high interest rate policy.

There is a myth that the federal government has perpetrated across Canada that our Canadian dollar has been allowed to float on international markets. One then has to ask why these incredibly large infusions of money have been required and the answer is, obviously in an effort to prop up this dollar at an extremely artificial level.

As the demand for more efficient national industries increases in the face of more competitive international marketplace, we are sorely lacking in an all-out offensive in the area of research and development. Surely during these times when we must develop a competitive edge economically and internationally, research and development should be taking a high priority in our efforts, both privately and in our educational and government institutions.

This government not only has the worst research and development record among western industrialized nations, but has only recently announced what has to be described as a weak-kneed and inadequate policy in this extremely vital area. We are still seeing the spectre of $1.5 billion cutbacks in post-secondary funding, at a time when skilled development in the trade sectors is at an all-time low and when all sectors of the economy recognize the need for highly trained skilled workers with a very sophisticated expertise. There is a need for scientific research and technical research as never before, yet this government contemplates cutbacks of $1.5 billion in this very vital sector. Surely that is not the kind of leadership Canada requires at this point in time.

Nothing illustrates the bankruptcy of this government more than the bankruptcy of this government. The federal government's deficit this year will again be $14 billion. This government now is required to be in a position to have to borrow each year simply to pay off the interest on this deficit without paying off any of the principal at all. This is a government very familiar with the problems of bankruptcy, a government which has led the way in bankruptcy legislation, but quite the contrary of what Canadians would like to have seen.

It is an irony when you look carefully at Bill C-12. The bill protects the most those who can best withstand bankruptcy loss and protects the least those unable to withstand bankruptcy loss. It is ironic in that it places goods and services above human beings. The workers of a bankrupt firm, the real producers in our country, the working people of Canada who make the goods from our raw resources, are by and large overlooked in Bill C-12. As with so many pieces of legislation coming from this Liberal government, it favours the large and the powerful and ignores the small and the weak, a tragedy indeed.

During the next number of weeks we will look forward to working with the minister in committee, proposing a number of amendments and articulating more clearly some of the more precise criticisms that ought to be made when the bill reaches report stage.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Bill C-12 respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, I first want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) who led the debate for this party on this legislation. I am sure he will make a further excellent contribution when the bill is discussed in committee.

It is quite ironic that this legislation is to streamline all bankruptcy procedures. Instead, the government should be bringing forward legislation to streamline policies to assist small businesses to survive in this country. We would sooner be debating that type of legislation.

The bill empowers the superintendent of bankruptcy to collect data to determine the feasibility of establishing a funded plan to insure wage earners against losses of wages and other benefits caused by the bankruptcy of their employers. The Senate committee had recommended such a plan when considering the original bill in 1975.

It is unfortunate the government has to bring in legislation and recommendations like this. If we had a responsible government, it would get off the backs of the businessmen in Canada and leave them alone. Nothing like this would have to be introduced.

Let us look at the number of bankruptcies, personal and business. In 1960, there were 3,641 and in 1980, 27,620, an increase of 758 per cent. That is the dismal record of successive Liberal governments. Farm bankruptcies in 1980 represented 79.2 per cent, an absolute disgrace. These numbers do not include businesses that collapsed but did not make use of the Bankruptcy Act; those placed in receivership, liquidated by secured creditors or that simply closed the shop doors. No wonder the Liberal government is driving so many businessmen and so much investment money to the United States.

It is high time that this bill was passed. It has been presented four times previously. It is essential today that we update, consolidate and substantiate the guidelines involving the bankruptcy process because this government is going to be in power for another two or three years.

With the bankruptcy rate running rampant in Canada, the proportion of people who can be adversely affected by the dilemma is growing. In an over-all sense, the bankruptcy rate has grown by close to 15 per cent in the past year. This almost equals the 15.2 per cent increase in food costs. This insolvency rate breaks down into a number of categories. Farm bankruptcies totalled 224 in 1980 and to date in 1981 have reached 75 in number. Business bankruptcies totalled 6,595 in 1980 and to date in 1981 have reached 2,044 in number, and personal bankruptcies totalled 21,025 in 1980 and to date in 1981 have reached 6,152.

Ontario and Alberta had the highest rates in the country. Business bankruptcies in Ontario were up 17.9 per cent and consumer cases were up 24.8 per cent. Albertans saw an increase of 17.1 per cent for businesses and 26.6 per cent for consumers. It is not surprising that these two provinces are the hardest hit. In fact, I am quite surprised that, taking into account the quality of Liberal economic policies, these rates are as low as they are.

● (1600)

The people of Ontario are taking note of why this is happening. Most of it is directly caused by the national energy policy, if it can be called a policy. I have a document here prepared by the Nisku Businessmens Association in Alberta entitled "The Impact of the Federal Budget and National Energy Policy on 41 Oil Service Companies in the Nisku Business Park". They also explain how it affects the province of Ontario as a result of this ridiculous energy policy which should be withdrawn immediately. I will just quote a few of the statistics here to give an idea of how many other firms are moving toward closing and bankruptcy. It states:

> The uncertainty resulting from the federal budget and NEP has caused a sharp decrease in rig activity in Alberta. This can be seen by looking at questionnaire results from five drilling companies who informed us of their expenditures.
> From the following charts it can be seen that 1980 operations were not seriously affected by the budget and NEP. This is due in part to the fact that many contracts did not expire until the end of the year. However, expectations for 1981 are extremely poor. Proposed expenditures on drilling rigs have dropped 56 per cent and the actual number of rigs has dropped 52 per cent. This is only for drilling companies in the Nisku Industrial Park. Results would probably be similar for the industry in general, in Alberta.

This same can certainly be applied in Alberta and on into Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker.

The report also gives the effect on branch offices as follows:

> Of the responding companies in our survey, 49 per cent indicated that they had some type of branch office located in Alberta or northern British Columbia. Some of the locations included Grande Prairie, Calgary, Lloydminster, Edmonton, Brooks, Fort St. John and Fort Nelson. Most of the branch offices were involved in either sales, manufacturing, repair, storage or supply.
> Out of the existing branch offices, 40 per cent will be shut down as a result of the budget. Of those that remain, some will have cutbacks in staff or will curtail expansion.

You can see the course we are on and the government is determined to keep us on that course. Maybe some day we will get an explanation why they ever introduced this ridiculous policy in the first place. I refer to this National Energy Program. It is obvious to everyone how disastrous it has been in the country, at least to everyone but this so-called Liberal party which is determined to pursue it.

We have a further explanation of the loss of operations in Canada which reads as follows:

> One of the implications of the budget was the movement of business across the border to the United States. Prior to the budget's announcement, none of the firms responding to our survey had operations located in the U.S. As a result of the government's actions, 34 per cent of the companies indicated they would be moving a portion of their business outside of Canada. This movement will involve from 10 to 50 per cent of the firms total operations with an average of 30 per cent.

Perhaps we will not have so many bankruptcies to deal with, Mr. Speaker, because there will be fewer and fewer businesses in this country as they move to the United States where they can survive. The report goes on as follows:

> It should be noted that most of these figures result from company forecasts. This may change as the situation concerning the budget changes.

Just to read the brief summary of results of this excellent document, Mr. Speaker, they point out:

> Total sales volume in 1980 dropped from an expected $256,450,000 to $218,300,000, a drop of $38,150,000.
> Total sales volume in 1981 is expected to drop from a forecasted total of $277,710,000 to an estimated $174,850,000, a drop in sales of $102,860,000.

That is disastrous, Mr. Speaker.

It goes on to state:

> Drilling companies in the Park are forecasting a drop in the 1981 number of rigs from 42 to 20.
> Forty per cent of branch offices will be shut down.

This will mean lay-offs, Mr. Speaker, The summary continues:

> Thirty-four per cent of survey companies will be moving a portion of their operations to the United States.

This is when the Ontario people want to start listening, and some of those Ontario Liberals had better wake up. It states:

> Loss of revenue to eastern suppliers as a result of purchase cutbacks of the responding companies was $1,470,000 in 1980 and will be approximately $20,000,000 in 1981.

This just covers one area in Alberta, so the figures can be multiplied by at least 20. It goes on to state:

> Revenue loss to Alberta suppliers as a result of purchase cutbacks of the responding companies was approximately $2,500,000 in 1980 and an expected $30,000,000 in 1981.
> Loss of employment in the surveyed companies will be 255 in the Nisku Park and 173 branch and field operations throughout Alberta.

In the face of all this, the Liberals have the unmitigated gall to tell us we are on the road to self-sufficiency and this policy is going to be good for Canada.

The Liberal government has to be blamed for the increase in bankruptcies in Canada and for bankrupting the country. What more can Canadians expect? The Grits cannot even keep their own house in order. If they are not careful, they will bankrupt the government through their policy of promoting and stimulating a huge deficit of over $121 billion. It is costing Canadians almost $12.5 billion each year to service this debt. How can small, or large for that matter, businesses or individual consumers be expected to practise sound financial theories when they have no example to follow or learn from? The Grits certainly cannot provide this example, Mr. Speaker.

Another reason small business and consumers alike are suffering these difficult times is the Liberal government's stubborn approach on the constitutional issue. Month after month passed while important economic legislation waited on the sidelines. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) it seems, would rather see thousands of businessmen go down the tubes rather than have his Constitution delayed. Meanwhile Canadians are suffering and the figures blatantly uncover the government's failure.

As I explained earlier, the National Energy Program has placed unbearable pressure on the private sector. Not only has the government broken promises in respect of energy prices, which for many people demolished their budget projections, it is extending this deplorable position by its failure to come to a resolve with Alberta over energy pricing. Consumers must pay as much as 50 cents more per gallon of gasoline, as one example. I do not think we have seen the end of the increase in the cost of gasoline. A recent article in The Globe and Mail states:

> Despite the continuing impasse between the federal and Alberta governments over the appropriate price for Canadian crude oil, the price of gasoline in the Toronto area is soaring at more than double the rate of general inflation.
> A survey of more than 80 stations in and around Metro Toronto last week showed that the cost of an imperial gallon of gasoline has gone up between 50 and 60 cents a gallon in the last two years—

We were told during the last election that gasoline would not increase over 18 cents a gallon. The government placed us in this ridiculous position by not reaching an agreement with the Alberta government which wants approximately $35 a barrel. The situation is the same in respect of Saskatchewan. This government would sooner pay $45 to $50 a barrel to OPEC countries than reach an agreement with the provinces.

Imagine if we were paying that $35 to Alberta and Saskatchewan instead of sending $45 to $50 a barrel out of the country. I suggest we would have an economic boom in this country like you have never seen in your life. All these rigs and businesses would be staying in Canada; they would not be closing down.

Just to give the taxpayers a little idea of what this Liberal policy of importing oil from Mexico and the OPEC countries is costing, I would point out it is costing $500,000 an hour. We should be trying to reduce that figure. We are not going to reduce it, we are going to increase it, and I will give you the figures in that regard in a few minutes. If we were paying the $35 per barrel here in Canada, we would be using our own oil and much of that money could be used for research and development in respect of alternate sources of fuel. Many businesses, especially in the oil industry, and I am talking about Canadian firms—I do not want anybody to get the impression I am talking about multinationals—simply cannot afford to run machines, heat their warehouses or even drive to work. Alberta, for example, has suffered a 30 per cent drop in its service sector as a result of the NEP. No doubt some of this has gone to the United States where economic conditions are more favourable. I would say most of it has gone there, but much of this loss is a result of bankruptcy, as I mentioned earlier.

Now on top of all this, businesses and consumers are being forced to cope with record high interest rates which, since the Grits took power in 1980, have gone up over 6 per cent to almost 19 per cent, or over 20 per cent for normal borrowers. The home owners, small businesses and consumers must all bear the brunt of these outlandish interest rates. Many, however, have only one alternative to paying high interest rates: declaring bankruptcy. To date there is no end in sight to this trend.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, when the Conservative party was in government we were the only people that took any action to deal with the interest rate problem, and I have to listen to the hypocrites, the NDP, who have the nerve to stand up here talking about interest rates. We appointed an all-party committee as our first act of business to deal with the interest rate problem and it was making some headway, witnesses were to be called in, but the committee was not allowed to complete its work because we were defeated by a facetious motion put forward by the NDP that nothing was being done about interest rates. We have asked for this committee to be re-established so that it could come up with some answers and do something about this interest rate problem, but the government refused to reappoint that committee or even have anything to do with the excellent work it did over three or four months.

Now each and every day new obstacles get in the way of the normal activities of business and consumers. When we were in power, we introduced the small business development bond. This was finally passed on February 26, 1981 after several months of delay. This scheme was devised to help small businesses deal with higher interest rates and is, as a spokesman for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business said, a lifesaver. A Royal Bank spokesman said the delay and start-stop scenario which unfolded after the Liberals came back caused some headaches for both businesses and financial institutions.

Just let me give another example to the Canadian people about the ridiculous policies of the Liberals relying mostly on imported oil. They made a deal with the Mexican government where we pay approximately $50 a barrel for their oil. They would sooner send $50 a barrel down there than keep $35 in Canada.

Mr. Huntington: They cannot even use or sell the oil.

Mr. McKenzie: That is right. My colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) says we cannot even use the oil, and that is correct. You have to cut the oil out of the barrel with a chainsaw and then it has to be run through a Cuisinart and forced out of the barrel, and we are paying $50 for this. They have to add oil to make it oily. That is typical Liberal energy policy to get us trapped into a situation like this where they would sooner send $50 down there for blocks of tar rather than give $35 a barrel to Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I also want to point out there is oil in every province of Canada, and if these moneys were kept here, we could be doing exploration work; instead, all we are doing is closing down wells. There are about 1,400 wells that have closed down in Saskatchewan and they are actually losing about 40 cents a barrel, so pretty soon there will be no more oil produced in that province under this ridiculous National Energy Program which is supposed to make us self-sufficient. What an utter farce!

Now a spokesman for the Bank of Nova Scotia said that a colleague in Alberta commented on the usefulness of the small business development bond and said:

A lot of our customers would not be borrowing and expanding right now with interest rates as high as they are, if it were not for the bond.

In other words, the bond is helping to instil some growth in the economy, even in strong areas such as Alberta. However, it is not the total answer, and with the high interest rate policy it is becoming less and less effective. It can be imagined what the bond means to other regions such as Ontario and the maritimes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is high time this legislation was passed and it will help protect employees of those unfortunate companies which fail in their attempt to cope with the degenerating policies of the Liberal government. It will grant to wage earners priority over unsecured creditors for up to $2,000 in unpaid wages per employee, plus an additional $500 per employee in respect of amounts an employer is liable to pay as pension and other health and welfare contributions. It makes directors personally liable for unpaid wages and contributions but adds a defence of reasonable reliance on financial statements and other reports, and there is going to be a big line-up to get in on that, Mr. Speaker.

. I would just like to give you more statistics on what is happening to Canadian businesses under the so called Liberal policies. We were visited by representatives of 101 companies from Alberta and Saskatchewan two weeks ago. These are service companies supplying goods and services to the oil industry. They informed us that lay-offs in the industry in Alberta and Saskatchewan for the first quarter of 1981, since the NEP was introduced, totalled 2,040. They conducted a survey and claim that within six months, 40 per cent of these firms will be going bankrupt or just closing their doors, or moving to the United States, and they claim that 75 per cent will not be able to last one year. I cannot put the proper words to try and get the message across to the Liberals as to why on earth they are being so stubborn on this issue with this stupid, ridiculous program which is a tremendous burden on the backs of Canadian businessmen and is going to do absolutely nothing to make us self-sufficient.

These are disastrous figures. They claim that 75 per cent of these 101 firms will only be able to last another year. And there are further figures on how these policies are affecting Canadians. The Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors claim there will be a grand total of 60,000 jobs lost by mid-summer due to the increasing number of oil and gas rigs leaving Canada. Stan Jones, executive director of the association, said:

—the 50 per cent decline in the number of rigs drilling for oil and gas during the past year has surpassed their worst predictions.

Jones blamed the federal government's National Energy Program and its failure to reach an oil pricing agreement with Alberta for creating the dramatic slump in the oil industry.

So I guess it is just as well we are debating a bill to streamline bankruptcy procedures and give some aid to the 60,000 employees to be laid off.

As to self-sufficiency, I cannot find anyone who agrees with the Liberal party that we are going to be self-sufficient by 1990. The industry has provided us with figures that Canada will be only 55 per cent self-sufficient in oil by 1990 and the cost of increased oil imports will be $182 billion over the decade. That is going to the OPEC countries, to Mexico and Venezuela. Just imagine, if we were working to keep those billions here in Canada, we would not be talking about bankruptcies and lay-offs and driving businesses out of the country. That is an awful lot of money to be leaving a country the size of Canada.

I would like to say that I support passage of this bill but we all must keep in mind the fundamental reasons why such a bill has to be introduced in the first place. As I have outlined in this speech, the Liberals are the root of our problem. They have operated a blank cheque-spending policy throughout their stay in office and have failed to develop any over-all industrial economic strategy that would stimulate and maintain a healthy financial environment in Canada.

The Financial Post has done a lot of research into the Liberal national energy policy and its effects on Canadian industry. I would like to read into the record part of an article which appeared in the April 18, 1981 edition of The Financial Post. It reads:

Since a surplus of rigs in Canada is expected, demand for repairs, new rigs, equipment and supplies is far less urgent than in recent years. The oilfield manufacturing sector, which used a lull in new orders since last October to catch up on back orders, now faces an alarmingly bleak future.

Partial reprieve for some companies, mainly the bigger, better capitalized ones, is to move south with the Canadian oil explorers.

They just do not go down there for a short visit. If something happened here which would remove the National Energy Program, it does not mean that they will all come rushing back. It will not happen because it costs a lot of money to move the rigs. They will stay there as long as they want. They are made welcome down there, but they are certainly not made welcome in their own country.

The article continues:

Dreco, for instance, the Edmonton-based company that builds rig masks and substructures, last year sold 55 per cent of its output to Canadian drilling companies for use in Canada. In 1981, only 25 per cent of its rigs will go to Canadian clients and even those are for use in the U.S. Dreco was fortunate to have established U.S. plants in 1978, says Don Seto, vice-president, finance, pointing out the frenzied U.S. demand for rigs means this year's sales should climb to $170 million from $106 million in 1980.

Bill Hull, president of the Red Deer ESAA chapter and also president of Viking Oil Field Supply Ltd., is one of those looking south—his company is suffering a 40 per cent cutback in its $3 million annual sales of oilfield supplies.

"I'm heading down to Houston in June," he says. "These days you can hardly get a flight to Denver or Houston because of the people moving or taking a look. Many of them with, say, $1 million invested in a service operation have to move to survive."

More lay-offs, more businesses and regional offices are closing down; they cannot survive in Canada. I saw a recent advertisement in an economic magazine which referred to Kentucky as the eleventh province. "Come to Kentucky where you can survive, all you Canadians. Bring your money, your rigs, your businesses and your expertise". Also the advertisment indicated that "profit" was not a dirty word in Kentucky.

But I would like to indicate that the Liberals are coming up with some solutions. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated that he would give us a tax hike because the economy is strong. But he forgot to say that the economy in the United States was stronger. Thanks to him and his colleagues, the economy in Canada is not strong at all. Their solution is tax increases.

I should like to refer to what Mr. John Bulloch, the head of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, pointed out respecting the serious effects on his members owing to the stubbornness of the Liberal government in not reaching a solution with the oil producing companies, by allowing them $35 a barrel instead of the $45 and $50 out of the country. He pointed out:

The organization, representing some 57,000 small business owners and managers across the country, also says that a recent survey shows nearly 70 per cent of its membership support more rapid increases in domestic oil prices than those already set out by the government.

The members of that organization had the same feeling as many of us; Mr. Bulloch stated:

We don't believe that Alberta is as rigid as Lalonde says—

Anyone who would introduce an energy program as he has is certainly the one who is at fault; it is not anyone else. He is determined to get at Alberta one way or the other, but Canadians must realize the effects of this ridiculous policy. It affects all provinces, especially Ontario. Most of the trucks which are used out there are made in Canada. It will affect General Motors in Oshawa, Ford, International Harvester, White in Penticton and I understand the Kenworth Trucks outside of Montreal. I do not have the exact figures, but there have been some serious cutbacks in production there because of the NEP. Some of the Quebec Liberals should check the figures to find out just what this outfit is doing.

An hon. Member: Ask Bill Davis.

Mr. McKenzie: I hear a Quebec Liberal yelling out; he would not know anyway. I hope some of these facts and figures will at least get the message across to the people of Ontario and Quebec. The NEP is doing absolutely nothing for them. We hope the Liberal party will come to its senses in the very near future and remove this ridiculous National Energy Program. Then we will not be required to debate great thick bills on how to streamline bankruptcy.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in looking at Bill C-12, an act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, I immediately asked myself what were the guiding principles which the designers, framers or draftsmen of the act actually had in mind. I thought I should point out the four or five guiding principles I would use to write a bankruptcy act for Canada today.

The first point I would put down is that honesty should pay off. It is not the basis of many of our bankruptcies or receiverships. Sometimes it is trickery, sometimes it is sharky deals, sometimes it is financial manipulation by so-called clever people. In many cases the honest chap gets the dirty end of the stick. I do not think that should be the basis of our legislation. At worst, bankruptcies and receiverships are a disastrous catastrophe for those involved and for the country as a whole. The basis of this entire act should be honesty. If honesty is not the basis, many inequalities will show up.

My second point is that bankruptcies should not be profitable. Going into bankruptcy should not be the means for a person to make money. Yet how many times has it occurred? I have seen businesses go bankrupt regularly every year and pay their debts based on a percentage of the dollar.

Whether it was five cents, 25 cents, 75 cents or 99 cents, in my view it was dishonest. They are paying their debts by making money themselves; they are not paying their logical debts. The person who takes the loss is the unsecured creditor. Bankruptcies should not be profitable.

This bill should include some guidelines which ensure bankruptcies are not profitable for certain people and terrible for those who suffer the consequences. The other night the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) cited a case similar to one which is familiar to me. I do not have all the facts with regard to the case before me, but his case definitely illustrated that honesty was not the basis of the receivership on that occasion. The farmer he talked about had to pay twice simply because he was doing business with a dishonest dealer who did not give him a proper receipt. The farmer was trusting, which is a nice element in any community, and he took the dealer at his word. This is common in many parts of Canada, but in the case cited by the hon. member the farmer had to pay $60,000 instead of $30,000 for a tractor. That is not fair nor right, yet it is what we are condoning in this legislation. Bankruptcy should not be profitable for some and disastrous for others.

The third point I wish to make is that bankruptcies are beyond the control of debtors and this fact should not be permitted to ruin a family. Today, in a number of bankruptcies, the debtor has had nothing whatsoever to do with bringing about a situation in which he loses his home. If the legislation for our country permits a banker or financier to increase interest rates midstream, then who can stand up to that type of action? For example, if a man earns $10,000 a year and makes arrangements to spend a percentage of his income on a home, say at 10 per cent, if he suddenly finds that the interest rate has been increased to 15 per cent or 19 per cent, that places a burden on him which he cannot carry. Bankruptcy is beyond the control of this person and he can lose his home. His family will be ruined. This is happening to a great many people today. My heart goes out to these people because their bankruptcies are not caused by bad management; their bankruptcies have been caused by the actions of others over whom they have no control.

The fourth point I would like to mention is a basic principle. Wage earners, unsecured creditors and small businessmen should not be given the dirty end of the stick. Pardon my language, Mr. Speaker, but that is exactly what is happening today. When a bankruptcy occurs a wage earner does not receive his wages. He has no cash put by upon which he can live, so he and his family go without. The same is true for unsecured creditors. There are cases involving the assets of an estate being eaten up through the costs involved in litigation, the hiring of lawyers and chartered accountants and paying off secured creditors. When it comes right down to it, the unsecured creditors sometimes receive nothing. Sometimes they receive a percentage on the dollar, but at other times they receive no wages whatsoever. A wage earner cannot bear such a burden. I will deal with this aspect in more detail in a moment. A bill such as the one before us should ensure that wage earners, unsecured creditors, and in some cases small businessmen and farmers, should be given equality with secured creditors.

The fifth point I wish to make is that in dealing with bankruptcies you are really dealing with tragedies. They should be handled with understanding, fairness and equality to all concerned, including the debtor. I think that if the five points I have mentioned were the foundation for the bill before us, the debate today would not be very long.

I now want to deal with some aspects of the bill. What are the facts in regard to bankruptcies? At the risk of being repetitious I will quote some figures, since what I have to say is based on them. If we were having few bankruptcies in this country, then there would be nothing to worry about. Let us look at a five-year average for the last 20 years. In 1960, 1965 and 1970 the number of bankruptcies ranged from 3,500 to 5,500. The increased number of bankruptcies through those years was not dramatic. But between 1970 and 1975 there was a substantial increase of almost 6,000 bankruptcies. That is more than double the number in the previous years. That is a serious situation.

I would have thought the government of the day, in 1975, would have looked at those figures and realized that something was wrong. They should have found out what was happening and taken steps to correct it, but apparently nothing was done. Between 1975 and 1980 the situation grew dramatically worse. The figures rose from 11,293 personal and business bankruptcies in 1975 to 27,620 in 1980, an increase of 144 per cent. Surely the minister in charge should have asked why this was happening. We must ask why today. I can understand the comments of the minister, who asked us not to discuss inflation and economics, but they are factors which are interwoven with bankruptcy. Today we have inflation and high interest rates. They are part of the cause to a very large extent.

Let us take a closer look at some of the bankruptcies on the personal side. In the first quarter of 1981 there were 6,152 bankruptcies. For the first quarter of 1980 there were 5,238. This represents a 17½ per cent increase in the number of bankruptcies in a period of only one year. Why should this be? The government should be trying to find out.

On the business side the figures are not quite so bad. For 1979 to 1980 the number of bankruptcies amounted to 5,523. But in 1980-81 the rise in the incidence of bankruptcy is 18.5 per cent. That figure is more than the rate for personal bankruptcies. Small businesses are going broke.

I would now like to look at the figures for farms. Often farms in our country are called the backbone of the nation. In the first quarter of 1980 there were 44 bankruptcies, while in the first quarter of 1981 the figure almost doubles, amounting to 75. This figure does not reveal the number of farms which went into receivership, nor does it include farms which fail. If those figures were included, a terrible picture would be presented. What is happening? We are not giving our producers a reasonable deal at all. As a matter of fact, we are providing no incentive for farmers to go out and break their backs the way they have been, and the way they have to today, working 10, 12 or 15 hours a day, particulary during seeding and harvesting. There is no incentive because, at the end, if they are trying to build stakes for their families, we now say: "You are going to be stuck with capital gains. We will not even give you once in a lifetime relief. If you pass it on to your families, they will pay; or if they pass it on, they will pay". So there is no incentive to try to build a nest egg any more.

Hundreds of farmers in this country today have spent their lifetimes building up estates. Now they want to retire, but they find that by the time they pay capital gains, they have nothing to retire on, or very little. They cannot buy homes in the city, where they want to spend their last few years.

As for production, we discourage production in this country. We are trying to get farmers to produce. There is only one thing this government is doing to try to stop inflation, and that is to bring in high interest rates. It is not being successful. High interest rates keep going up further, yet we still have inflation. With high interest rates, with taxes such as the excise tax on natural gas increasing, with inflation and the extra they have to pay for natural gas, it means the farmer has to pay more for heat, more for fertilizers, more for credit, more for machinery—more for everything. He is unable to cope with these increases, so what does he do? He cannot afford to buy more fertilizer because we put an excise tax on it, so he lowers production.

This is happening all across the country. When the farmer cuts production he again aggravates inflation, and the government again raises interest rates which lowers production still again, and the vicious cycle goes on and on. How the government can ever think that by continually raising interest rates it will solve inflation is completely beyond me. I think it is also beyond them, because this policy just is not working. It has not worked in this country yet. In spite of what Governor Bouey says, it is not working. Inflation is still going up.

If I were the minister of finance I would say to Governor Bouey: "Show me that it will work; if it will not work, find some other way". Surely there are other ways and other means. A far better way, in my view, is to increase production; but we are doing the very reverse in our system today; we are decreasing production. It is only by increasing production in this country in all industries, including farming, that we will be able to raise the standard of living and raise the pensions which could be paid to those who have already passed the age of production or to those such as widows who are trying to raise children. We cannot continue forever by borrowing money and paying it out as pensions and subsidies; we must do something to try to increase production.

I suggest that the government try giving lower interest rates to producers, just to those who produce our food. There are producers all along the way, from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland. Eliminate that excise tax on agricultural production and see what will happen. I will tell hon. members what will happen. Immediately the farmers will start putting in more crops. They will increase their production. They will use more fertilizer. They will buy more machinery. There will be bigger yields through the use of fertilizer. Then, when that happens, interest rates can be lowered again and inflation will go down.

There are two ways of fighting inflation. One is by fighting it with interest rates; the other way is to raise production. However, we are raising interest rates and lowering our production. I would like to know what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and Governor Bouey have to say about that. There is surely an answer, and the people of this country are getting fed up waiting for an answer.

No wonder we have this number of farmers going bankrupt. It is a serious matter. The total number of bankruptcies increased 70 per cent during the first five months of this year over the first five months of last year. Seventy per cent! There is something wrong.

Another thing which could be done to fight inflation is to cut down expenses. We do not see very much going on in that area either. Lip service is given to cutting down deficits, but we are still borrowing money. We have already passed two bills to borrow more and more money. The government is trying to raise itself up by its bootstraps and it just cannot be done. Ultimately the country will go bankrupt. It is only because this is a vast country that we are able to withstand this type of situation. When people say the country was built on credit, they are right; but when a farmer borrowed $2,000 from the bank to enlarge his farm, he used that money to increase production so that he had something left over for himself after paying back not only the $2,000 but the interest. However, here we are borrowing money and giving it away, expecting that it will lower inflation. There is a need. There are many places where money could be saved by this government, but apparently it has never thought of saving money. It does not want to save money, and I want to deal with that aspect in a few minutes.

We have a debt of $120 billion in Canada. As the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) said a few minutes ago, we are not even touching the capital. We are barely paying the interest. Where is it going to end? Every baby born in this country is born with a tag of more than $5,000 debt around its neck. That is their birthday present when they arrive on mother earth. Perhaps some of these babies will have something to say about that in a few years, too. It is not fair, it is not right and it is unnecessary. Why, we spend money like—I was going to say like drunken sailors, but drunken sailors only spend the money they have. This government borrows money and then spends it.

The remarks I have just made relating to debt should indicate the causes. I think we should now look at some of the causes of bankruptcies. Then so far as time permits I want to deal with some of the clauses of the bill.

First of all, one cause of bankruptcy could be poor management. People get into water which is too deep for them. They do not have expertise or knowledge and so they go under. That is sad. They try, but they have gone beyond their own means. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said the other day, sometimes the manipulators are responsible. They play Russian roulette with their creditors. They go bankrupt in order to reduce a debt to pay a few cents instead of the dollar that they owe, and the unsecured creditors take a beating and perhaps even the wage earners.

● (1650)

Another thing to be considered is that credit is too easily available. People are urged to buy on credit and not wait until they have saved the money to buy an article. Those who make credit so easily available are partly to blame because they urge people to buy on credit—indeed, they almost beg them to borrow. Then when trouble comes, they are not so sweet and show their real colours.

Sometimes in the business world the banks are partly responsible for bankruptcies. They restrict credit to the point where they do not advance enough money for a particular purpose and, as a result, the business goes under.

The fifth point that I would mention is government legislation. The most conspicuous piece of legislation is the national energy policy which has driven business and capital out of the country. During the past recess I toured 67 places in my constituency and spent about half an hour or an hour on the streets of each, talking to people. The problem reaches down into the small businesses, the cafés, restaurants, hotels, grocery stores, hardware stores. All are now feeling the pinch because the oil industry is at a standstill. This could have been avoided if the government had thought ahead.

In July, 1980 Premier Lougheed offered the government a way out when he proposed an oil price 65 per cent to 75 per cent of the Chicago price after three or four years. He included a lot of other fringe benefits, such as financing the pipeline to the maritimes and providing money for transportation of grain in western Canada. If that agreement had been accepted, millions of dollars would have been saved, but much of this money will now come out of the pockets of the people in Ontario and Quebec, where the major population is, to pay for foreign oil. Now things are worse. The sooner the government accepts that agreement, the better things will be. If it does not, more and more industries in this country will be wiped out. This bankruptcy legislation will not prevent any bankruptcies.

It may have seemed clever to try to hurt Alberta because it was doing well, but this country will not be built by penalizing those who are working and making it pay. I grew up in Alberta when it was one of the have-not provinces with a huge debt. The object was to get that debt paid and get the province back on its feet. The policy that started back in 1935 was pay-as-you-go. The policy of the present government is to provide for the present and for the future but not to go into debt unnecessarily and to spend money just because it has it. Every time a program is adopted, the cost five or ten years from now must be considered. There is no backing up on those programs.

I hope the minister will delay the legislation which requires metric measurement in our food stores. Thousands of people across the country have indicated that they do not want it, yet $7 million per year is spent telling them that they must have it. Metric measurement in food stores will only create chaos and hard feelings. It will not build any more trade. As a matter of fact, the IGA organization has said that it will lose trade because people who live close to the United States border will go there to buy food in a language they can understand. Why must we suddenly have metric in our food stores? The people of this country are not illiterate. They know what they want. They understand the imperial system. If the United States was changing, there might be some logic in this country's changing as well. There is no logic whatsoever in the government spending $7 million this year. That is unnecessary. The money comes out of the pockets of the people, or it is borrowed and the people must pay interest on it as long as they live and probably as long as their children live. It is all for nothing and the people do not want it. Metric conversion will cause bankruptcies if it goes through. I attended a meeting in Ottawa where representatives of IGA said that the cost would be something like $2 million which would be passed on to consumers. So it is not only inflationary, it is adding to the cost of living.

We also passed legislation to provide for two languages on every package of corn flakes, thus increasing the cost.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: If the hon. member opposite wants to make a speech, let him go ahead and make it. I have never seen anyone so devoid of speeches. Hon. members opposite sit like lumps during the day and then when somebody else is speaking they start cha, cha, cha.

Mr. Parent: That is what you sound like, cha, cha, cha, cha.

Mr. Taylor: Where two languages are required, that is fine; but in many cases it is not required and it is not cheap at all.

Mr. Berger: It is cheaper.

Mr. Taylor: Tell me that metric is cheaper as well. What about the $7 million? The government knows better than the people. That is its philosophy, but the people of this country are getting fed up with it.

The government's legislation causes a lot of bankruptcies and the government will have to take responsibility for that. Government policies are also a major cause. High interest rates stop expansion, kill new starts and lower production. I suppose my friends opposite who have so much to say when they are in their seats will now be supporting high interest rates even though they are killing business. I should like them to put that in their pipes and smoke it. It is not fair to anyone to permit interest rates to change in mid-stream. When a contract is made for a mortgage on a house, the interest rate should not be changed. Otherwise it is unfair to the person who makes the contract.

Subsidies are provided for some people. Some of the companies that go bankrupt get a subsidy or a hand-out from the government at the expense of the rest of the people. Imperial Oil was not going bankrupt but it said it was leaving the country. The government should have entered into an agreement and thereby saved another few million dollars.

I understand we are now providing subsidies for a trucking company in the Northwest Territories. There have been trucking companies in that part of the country for many years which have built up their own business with hard work and their own capital. They have paid their way. But now competitors are coming in which are subsidized by the government. If you call that building a country, I say it is not. It is ruining a country. Subsidization like that should not be permitted. This would be a good avenue for DREE, but even DREE is doing that type of thing.

I have already written to the minister about one case where a government grant of $49,000 put one company into business but ruined another, one which had built itself up over a number of years with its own capital. The company which received the $49,000 subsidy could, of course, sell its product cheaper, and the other company which had paid its own way was ruined. That is not the purpose of government subsidies. There is a place for government grants in business but they should never put one firm in a better competitive position than another, particularly when the other one has been built through sacrifice and brawn without government assistance.

This country was built under the free enterprise system without government subsidies. If the government now start subsidizing certain businesses, it will put others into bankruptcy. That has already happened. One company has been ruined and there are others on the way out.

A few years ago we had this policy of importing beef. We increased the amount of beef we were importing from another country. As a result, scores of our young livestock producers went bankrupt. We looked after the people in another country but we did not look after our own livestock producers in Canada. That was government policy. Hon. members can talk about causes of bankruptcy. That was a cause of a tremendous number of bankruptcies among our young farmers, those who were just starting out and trying to make a go of it, but who then found out that the government had done something with which they could not cope. Government policies are one of the causes of bankruptcies.

Deficits too are a cause of bankruptcy. It is not right to operate under continual deficits. At one time the psychology of debt was abhorred by people, but the government has made it fashionable. The government has set an example to the people of this country. The government has said to the people: "Don't pay your way; borrow, borrow, borrow, and borrow to pay the interest". That is what we are doing in Canada. A business could not stand that, but that is what we are asking people to do. No wonder there is a $5,000 tag around the neck of every baby born in Canada. It is a disgraceful situation. However, we keep on doing this. We do not try to cut expenditures. We spent $7 million on a useless metric system, an unwanted system. We provide subsidies to companies to put other companies built by hard work and the capital of their owners out of business.

We wonder why inflation is rampant. We buy Petrofina at double its price, which does not bring one extra gallon of oil into this country, yet we charge the people for the acquisition. I say to hon. members, justify that policy to the people of Canada, because this contributes to inflation. To those who went about the country during the last election denouncing the 18-cent increase, I say tell the people of Canada why gas costs $1.41 a gallon today. If that is not inflation, I do not know what is. We are pouring oil on the fire of inflation. We wonder why inflation is increasing. We increase our interest rates hoping that this will put out the flame, but all the time we are just pouring more and more oil on the fire. This bill does not deal with those causes and that is my major criticism of it.

I want to deal in the time that I have left with one or two specific items. First, I want to comment on wage earners. The minister talked about a special fund being considered to which employee and employer would contribute. They would contribute ten cents or 25 cents a week or a month, whatever it was. But can anyone understand a worker being asked to contribute to a fund to save his employer from going bankrupt? I think employees in this country would laugh themselves sick if they were asked to do that. What if a person were told: "Your company might go bankrupt, so would you like to contribute 25 cents a week from your pay cheque to stop the business from going bankrupt and so you can get some wages"? That was tried a few years ago through the compensation board. It was said to those workers injured on the job while producing for their masters who made the profits that they should pay part of the compensation. For a number of years that was done, until finally—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Has my allotted 40 minutes expired?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I am informed that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry about that because you have missed the best part of my speech.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will not be too long. I rise in my place because I have a very special interest in this piece of legislation. Bill C-12 was introduced into this House of Commons for consideration and debate by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who also held that portfolio in 1975 when he introduced the bill for the first time. I had just joined the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as a public servant, where I remained for the subsequent five years. During that time, this bankruptcy bill was introduced into the House and went through the Senate committee three times. In the interim period, during 1979 when the Conservative administration was in power, this very same bill was introduced, word for word, with no changes, not one comma, not one dot over an "i", not one cross on a "t", and it is the same bill which has now been introduced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This is the honourable Senator Flynn's Conservative bill word for word. Yet for two days now the Conservative have held up approval on second reading with spurious discussion unrelated to the content of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Evans: This is a good piece of legislation. The Conservatives agreed with that because they introduced precisely the same bill as that which went through discussion in this House, discussion in the Senate, discussion since 1972, following reworking and redrafting. This bill has been under consideration in the public service and in Parliament for nine years. We have finally come to a point where both parties are totally agreed as to what the optimal content of the bankruptcy bill should be, and both parties, via different administrations, have within a year introduced precisely the same bill. However, we cannot seem to come to agreement in this House to give it second reading and send it to committee where it can be looked at in greater detail. When both ministers from two different administrations produce precisely the same bill, why can we not send it to committee? And even there, there should not be a great deal of discussion.

I know personally the people intimately involved in the development and drafting of this bill. I was involved in another part of the department in federal-provincial conferences at which the content of this bill was discussed ad infinitum and ad nauseam with the provincial governments. There is agreement at the provincial level that this is good legislation. There is agreement among the parties in this House that this is good legislation. It is about time that we got on to the business of putting this bankruptcy legislation through all stages. It is good legislation. It is well drafted legislation. It is needed. It is legislation which by any standard this House has already agreed to.

I will not take any more of the valuable time of this House. I ask hon. members to put aside the temptation to use this debate as a vehicle for throwing in other items dealing with the economy and other matters. For example, tomorrow is an opposition day when we can talk about interest rates and all kinds of things. We do not have to do that with regard to this legislation. This legislation should be passed at second reading right now.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the parliamentary secretary stay and listen. He might learn something. The parliamentary secretary said that we were engaged in spurious discussion, in unrelated discussion. I find it incomprehensible for a member, particularly a parliamentary secretary, to stand up and say with a straight face that the economy is in no way related to the Bankruptcy Act. It is very apropos that the government brought in this bankruptcy legislation at a time when there is an all-time record of bankruptcies in the farming community, in small businesses and in personal bankruptcy. As a member of this House, I will stand at every opportunity to bring to task the government members, particularly the parliamentary secretary, for the disastrous way they are treating the Canadian economy and causing hardship from coast to coast.

The parliamentary secretary said that the civil servants and others who worked on this bill, but particularly the civil servants, did so for the past nine years. I would ask the parliamentary secretary how many civil servants run a business, have to borrow money to operate on their receivables and are on the verge of going down the tube because another company has gone bankrupt? I can tell you, there are not very damn many. How many of them even run a business or even have a concept of knowing what it is like to run a business? How many feeding at the government trough, working at 35 per cent capacity, have ever felt the pangs of going into personal bankruptcy? Not very damn many.

I would now like to get to my main remarks, and they are related to this bill. When the minister introduced the bill at second reading, he asked the opposition to avoid playing politics. He said the bill is not related to the current economic problems facing Canada. He stated that a new Bankruptcy Act will not solve this country's economic problems because it is a legal question and is unrelated to inflation and interest rates. What nonsense! How can he say that bankruptcy is unrelated to interest rates and the economy? I do not know where he gets that kind of information. Maybe I will pass some of it on.

An hon. Member: Is he an economist?

Mr. Shields: He is not a very good economist, if he is. I would like to place some figures on the record. In 1980 there were 224 farm bankruptcies compared to 125 in 1979. No figures are available for 1978. We can rest assured that if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has the figure, it will not be made public in this House. In the first quarter of 1981 there were 75 farm bankruptcies. We will exceed the 1980 figure. In excess of 300 farm families will be forced into bankruptcy this year.

Let us look at the number of business bankruptcies.I am talking about small businesses and those a little larger. If they are as big as Chrysler or Massey-Ferguson they do not have to worry about going bankrupt. The government will dip into the barrel with the taxpayers' money and bail them out. I do not see the government coming to the rescue of the small farmer or small businessman. Let us see what is happening there.

In 1980 there were 6,595 business bankruptcies, 5,648 in 1979 and 5,646 in 1978, a definite trend. In the first quarter of 1981 there were 2,044 business bankruptcies. Therefore, there will be close to 10,000 business bankruptcies in 1981. That is clear to anyone who wants to dig into it a little bit.

Let us look at what is happening with personal bankruptcies. It is very easy to obtain credit. There is no onus on the individual granting the credit. We are creating a credit society. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) said earlier, we are at the point where people are starting to borrow money to pay interest on funds borrowed to pay interest on money they borrowed previously. They reach a point where they can no longer function on a daily basis because they are being hounded by the same creditors who consolidated their loans with a new loan at between 18 and 25 per cent, thereby forcing them into bankruptcy.

I ask hon. members to consider for a moment the pain, sorrow, humiliation and utter defeat an individual must go through when faced with a bankruptcy, particularly a personal bankruptcy. In 1980 there were 21,025 personal bankruptcies, 17,892 in 1979 and 15,938 in 1978. In the first quarter of 1981 there were 6,152 personal bankruptcies. We are looking at between 25,000 and 30,000 personal bankruptcies for 1981. In fact, the figure will probably exceed 30,000.

One might say in respect of personal bankruptcies that they are not so bad because they only affect one man, his wife and perhaps his children—just one family. We have counsellors for this sort of thing. We have government services which come to their aid to counsel them out of it. They work out a system of going through a bankruptcy.

However, consider for a moment what happens in a small community, or any community for that matter, when a small businessman is faced with the kind of competition which grants indiscriminate credit. He is forced to stay in business and grant credit also. An individual bankruptcy of a small businessman works in exactly the same way. Let us consider a man who is a small entrepreneur. He may have a portable welding unit. He may have been doing fairly well with good jobs and established a standard of living for himself and his family. With the economic downturn we are now experiencing in central Canada and in the west, indeed in any part of this country, this man is faced with mounting costs. He is unincorporated so a bankruptcy is classed as a personal bankruptcy.

This man may owe the supplier of welding rod and other welding materials something like $30,000 a month, particularly if he is a contract welder. A small supplier of that material cannot withstand that sort of debt. As a result we immediately set up a domino effect with one business going bankrupt and then another and then another.

The minister stood before this House with a straight face and said he does not want Her Majesty's loyal opposition to play politics with this bill because it does not relate at all to current economic problems. How ridiculous can you be!

An hon. Member: You can be a Liberal.

Mr. Shields: I guess you have to be a Liberal to be that ridiculous.

The business community is a network of interconnections. A man establishes a line of business. If he is a supplier he establishes a number of customers. He gives them the supplies on the basis of 30 days net. In some cases when a man has a good job and it looks as though he is operating well the supplier will allow him 60 days net, but generally he gives 30 days net, and that is usually printed on the bottom of the invoices. For hon. members opposite who might not understand what that means, let me point out that it means the customer is expected to pay his bills within 30 days. A man can run up quite a bill in 30 days, particularly one of the small businessmen, entrepreneurs or operators. If the customer does not pay his bill in 30 days he goes into the 60-day accounts. After 60 days the supplier starts to worry, and in 90 days he starts to panic. We must remember that a small business community operates on its receivables. This involves unsecured debt, but the debt is out in the community.

The supplier goes to the bank with his invoices and shows his bank manager his receivables. The bank manager will usually advance 75 per cent of those receivables as operating capital. This is how these small businesses establish an operating line with the bank. As a result of this situation, if one man goes under and then a second goes under, before you know it a very healthy and viable service industry also goes under. This is the domino effect I refer to. That is what is happening right now, though we will not see the entire effect of this immediately.

All this is happening because this government in its wisdom brought in a national energy policy which is absolutely destroying the service industry in Alberta and Saskatchewan. We are now talking about bankruptcies and I suggest this is very appropriate.

Last week we had a delegation from the oil service industry. Most of these delegates were from Canadian-owned small companies, and some medium-sized. They sat here with members from the opposite side and from the opposition and said generally that if the national energy policy did not change they were going to go bankrupt. The matter is that simple. Some said they would be bankrupt in three months. One fellow said he might be able to hang on for six months, but no one said he could live with the national energy policy as it now exists.

This energy policy has literally dried up exploration in the western basin, and when the big rigs are not drilling holes, the service rigs which come in after to clean the holes and prepare for production, including the mud companies, welding outfits and small pipeline contractors, start laying off employees. As a result their equipment sits idle. Yet the minister says he does not want the opposition to play politics with this bill because the Bankruptcy Act does not relate to the economic climate in Canada today. If anything relates to that economic climate it is certainly the Bankruptcy Act, because the policies of this present government are driving more and more small businesses into bankruptcy.

Let me refer for a moment to the very important riding of Athabasca. It is there that two megaprojects are being held up right now waiting for policy by this present government. These projects involve the expenditure of in excess of $20 billion. This is not government money. These companies are not in the pork barrel or at the government trough. These funds are already earmarked for the development of the heavy oil industry and the tar sands.

What happens when a company decides to expend $10 billion in a community like Fort McMurray, or perhaps $10 billion to $12 billion in a community such as Cold Lake-Grand Centre? The service industry must provide the services required by all the people who move there to work on these megaprojects. For three years, with no help from the government, no grants from DREE and without being propped up by the government trough, small entrepreneurs have invested their own money in these areas to build the necessary office space, warehouse space and other facilities. They have set up service firms and have employed a number of people. They did so with the knowledge that this country needed the development of the tar sands to survive.

What has happened? These people gambled because they are gutsy entrepreneurs. That is what free enterprise is all about. But they have overextended themselves. They are still not asking for handouts. They are not pounding on the door of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or asking DREE for money in order to survive. However, they are saying that if these projects do not go ahead they will pull up stakes and leave. If this thing does not go, they are going to go bankrupt.

All they are asking is that this government move in with a policy that is realistic. This government knows deep down in its very soul that if those plants do not start producing the necessary supply of oil required for this country, the country will indeed go further into bankruptcy because we are importing oil and taking money from the taxpayer to pay for it. Thus we are pushing further and further into debt every man, woman and child in Canada.

A small businessman, and I stress small, could not function if he borrowed the way the present government borrows, because he would go bankrupt; he would be forced into receivership. This government cannot go bankrupt because they have nowhere to go. But they are bankrupt, and that is indicated when the foreign exchange value of the Canadian dollar starts to drop. Bankruptcy occurs because the government is defaulting on its debt. So what we are doing now, Mr. Speaker, is we are borrowing money from foreign sources, the New York exchange, the European monetary fund, anywhere we can get it, to prop up the Canadian dollar so we can buy back our dollars that are floating around all over the world because nobody wants them. That is what is causing interest rates to go sky high. How ridiculous can you get?

The first thing you hear from government benches, Mr. Speaker, is that hon. members over here stand up and start talking but have no concrete suggestions for the government to follow. I would like to make a few. Nobody is going to hear but maybe one person over there might hear. Does it not seem feasible to hon. members on the government side that if we allowed the two megaprojects to go ahead with an investment of $20 billion, that will immediately take the pressure off the Canadian dollar? Does it also not seem feasible that if there is a national energy policy in place that creates an economic climate in our country that will attract investment, people will be clamouring to invest their money in Canada because we are so richly endowed with every resource imaginable from water to oil? If people are clamouring at our door to invest and we say we do not want any more money invested, it seems logical that they will say that they will not charge us 15 or 20 per cent interest but will drop it down to 12 per cent or 10 per cent—because money is just another commodity.

All we have to do is look at the economic climate in Switzerland, where a few years ago—and this is well documented; all members have to do is go to some of the departments and read the information they have—there was a negative interest flow to invest in Switzerland. In other words, you paid them to take your money because everyone was clamouring to put their money in Switzerland. And it is logical. Interest rates in Switzerland are below 5 per cent even with inflation. Yet this government tells Governor Bouey: "Go ahead, Bouey; just lace it to them. We are going to cut off that spending spree that Canadians are on." Then when you turn on the TV, the credit card companies say: "Don't leave home without it"! Who is kidding whom?

We are creating an inflation mentality across this country. People are scrambling to buy now at 20 per cent interest because next month it might be 25 per cent. And the minister says the Bankruptcy Act is really not relevant to what is happening in Canada today! Believe me, Mr. Speaker, it is.

Let us look at something else just briefly. The government's fiscal policies are obviously damaging the country. The NEP is damaging the country. And what is happening out there in the business community? I have seen healthy small businesses which were growing and prospering going into bad management practices because the inflation mentality has now hit them. They are saying: 'Buy now, stock up now, we will overstock for spring, because, by God, by the time we get stock in to sell it will have gone up 10 or 15 per cent and it is better for us to make the money". In most cases, for the past three years it has been that way, but now bankruptcies are coming in. They are overextending themselves because of poor business practice. The day of reckoning is at hand, and we have absolutely no one to blame or to look to but the present government because they have been in office for 12 years. They got us into the mess we are in.

Surveys have been done showing that the average working family are in debt to the extent of three times their annual earnings, excluding home purchases, and the figure is increasing all the time. In my riding of Athabasca, Mr. Speaker, the bankruptcy rate is starting to increase and can be related directly to the NEP brought in last October. This is a policy adopted by this government and it is hurting the gutsy little entrepreneur who will invest his money. When plants are set up you have to have services in place, because if you do not the turnover rate in those plants is so high that costs go up again. Schools have to be built, municipalities must expand, hospitals have to be built.

Not one small businessman in northeastern Alberta can plan for the future today. He cannot sit down and forecast, he cannot buy properly. He must be able to do this, because if he makes a small mistake he will go bankrupt. Why? Because of the national energy policy established in October.

I want to address the area of farm bankruptcies. I have expressed my feelings on the oil industry, but one cannot eat oil. The people in our country from coast to coast who live on the land, work the land and provide the bread and butter for Canadians who sit down to three meals a day, if they are lucky, are being shafted by the government's high interest rate policy. The farmer depends greatly on borrowing on the strength of his inventory. What is the inventory of a farmer? It is the basic stuff which goes on our tables, whether he is a hog producer, a cattle producer, a grain producer, a chicken farmer or whatever.

A grain producer cannot move grain to market because the government will not accept a plan to upgrade the transportation facilities put forward by the province of Alberta. He has it in storage and it is worth dollars. He goes to the bank to borrow money on it so that he can operate. He mortgages his soul so that he can plant this year's crop when he is not rid of last year's crop.

I do not know if there is something wrong with me at times, because I see this clearly. People seem to become involved in the incestuous relationship which we seem to have in Ottawa and absolutely ignore all these things. The minister stood in the House and said that we should not be talking politics about the Bankruptcy Act. This is not politics, it is common sense. He said that we should not be discussing anything, that we should bang this bill through the House of Commons and go on our merry way, because it has no relationship to the economic situation facing Canada today. What utter nonsense and rot!

It is correct and necessary to update the present legislation before the House. It has been long overdue. We all know of instances where a wage earner has worked loyally for a company which goes bankrupt and he loses all his wages; he might even have piled up wages. He is not able to get this wages because he is not a secured debtor. Bill C-12 goes a little way toward helping him, but would it not be more reasonable to give absolute paramountcy to the wage earner or the salesman who sells on commission for a company? Would it not be better to give him absolute paramountcy over everyone and to say, "You get paid first because you put your sweat, blood and tears into your job"? Then the secured debtors could be paid.

The government has built in a $500 to $2,000 limit for a wage earner. With inflation going the way it is, is that reasonable? I can remember taking a job, living high off the hog, thinking I was rich and doing well earning $3,000 a year. Hon. members know that one requires $12,000 to $14,000 per year now in order to live. That amount is increasing all the time with inflation and the manner in which the government is handling the situation. Why should we place a ceiling on it? If a man is owed a dollar because he put in a dollar's worth of work, he should get it. Whether it is $2,000, $5,000 or $10,000, he earned the money. The bankruptcy laws should be such that he has absolute paramountcy over any creditor.

We talk about the wage earner. We think he is the guy who punches the clock and gets his pay cheque every day, every week, every two weeks or every month. I am talking about the guy who buys his own car, gets his sample cases together, drives all over the country at his own expense and picks up orders. He is a commercial salesman. His company might give him a bit of a draw, but in essence he is not incorporated; he is still an employee of the company. He goes to the bank to borrow on his future earnings or the earnings he has. He picks up the orders, the orders come back, and he might wait four or five months before his money starts to flow to him. It is the nature of the business.

What about the guy who takes his savings and buys a gravel truck to start hauling for a construction firm? Usually he operates on a net 30-day basis, and the construction firm can hold him off for 45 days. In the meantime he has expenses. He goes to the bank and says, "This is how much money the construction firm owes me; I will get my cheque next week." The bank advances him the funds to keep operating and driving his truck. Then there is a bankruptcy and, bang, he is lost because he is an unsecured creditor. It is not right, it is not fair. If a man puts an ounce of sweat into his job, he should be paid for it. He should have paramountcy in all legislation dealing with bankruptcy. Pegging the maximum at $2,000 is artificial indeed.

If inflation keeps going the way it is, we will be back here next year, the year after and the year after that. We may take another ten years to update this legislation again. I ask the minister to consider seriously including salesmen, self-employed individuals and truck drivers. I am talking about the guy who goes out and buys a welding rig to weld on pipelines. They can be absolutely devastated by a bankruptcy and must be protected.

Who are the secured debtors? They are the Federal Industrial Development Bank—government and DREE. Let us put the priorities where they belong. The priorities must be with the individual who works day after day and depends on his cheque for his livelihood.

The government or government agencies should have the lowest priority of the secured debtors. We should think about that for a minute. If a government agency is willing to extend credit and to take the flier because the government is involved, it brings in on its coattails other people who say, "If the government is involved, that company must be pretty good or the government would not have advanced the funds." So, unsuspectingly, the small businessman comes along behind and grants credit. He says to himself, "Surely my government, which is knowledgeable about all these things, would not advance credit to this guy if he was no good." And bingo! He goes broke, Mr. Speaker. Who receives their money back first? It is the agency of the federal government. The small businessman is left out there—I have an expression to use, but I will not.

Mr. Shields: He is left sucking his thumb.

This is another concrete example I would like to give the House. The government should set up the legislation in such a way that the wage earner, the self-employed wage earner, and the others I have described, receive absolute paramountcy, before secured creditors or anyone else. The second suggestion I have is that the government, as a secured creditor, should be last in line behind all the other secured creditors. I think that is reasonable and fair.

There was a press release issued by the minister on December 29, 1980 announcing that a committee on insolvency problems would be established. We called the committee chairman's office. He is Mr. Landry of the University of Ottawa. We were not able to reach him but we did get hold of a Mr. Guam, who is on loan from the Justice Department. Mr.

Guam said that the committee had finished its research and that a report was in the drafting stage. Think about this, Mr. Speaker. The committee's mandate was to study insolvency problems; in other words, to study the problem of bankruptcy. It was aiming at a June completion date. It had six months to do its work. The committee was studying the impact of bankruptcy on the wage earner only. The initial intention was that the committee would work for six months, which is not a long time, and that the report would be ready before the legislation in the House reached second reading. The report is not here. The government established a committee and gave it six months to study the effects of bankruptcy on the wage earner. We wanted to have that report before the second reading stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that the time allocated to him has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Shields: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Where is the committee's report? Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that we in this House should have a copy of the report immediately so that we may sit down, go through it and put forward some recommendations of our own?

I suggest that the minister would probably not wish to be embarrassed by this reversal in timing. We are at second reading stage before we have the report. I do not know why. If the minister, as he has said, wants this legislation to be non-political, and if he wants it to proceed to committee, then we should be making it the best legislation possible to assist the wage earner who has been discriminated against in our bankruptcy laws up until now. When will the minister have the report published and made available to members of Parliament? It is in the minister's power to do this. Will the minister have the report published immediately and distribute it to members?

There are serious problems facing our country and I become a bit upset when a minister stands to address members in the House and says. "Let us not make politics of this bill; if you have anything to say about the economy, you are making politics out of this bankruptcy legislation". That is not true. The bankruptcy bill is the most appropriate piece of legislation which this government could present at this time. It is as ironic as blazes that the government would bring in bankruptcy legislation now. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it had better be streamlined, because if this government continues with its ill-advised National Energy Program and disastrous economic policies, with its continued overspending and with the borrowing of money to prop up the Canadian dollar, then we will be in more serious trouble in two years' time than we would ever have dreamed possible. It is urgent that this government address the problem immediately. This government must take the responsibility for waste and neglect in our country.

The very last thing I wish to comment on concerns the president of Imperial Oil, who has very clearly indicated that if there is not some degree of certainty with respect to an energy agreement at their Cold Lake plant by June 1 the whole project will be shelved. That is a $12 billion project which will be of incalculable value to the Canadian economy.

More important, there is the $40 million which was lent to Imperial Oil by the government to keep its research team in place. Have hon. members opposite forgotten this? It only happened six months ago. That $40 million is non-repayable if the plant does not go ahead. Imperial Oil is on the verge of saying, "Gentlemen, if you cannot make up your minds with regard to national energy policy and if you cannot get together and come to some agreement, we will shoot our project down the tube and shelve it".

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) is travelling around the globe on the pretext of uniting the world and feeding the hungry while, in the meantime, Canada has hundreds of girls and boys and aged hungry and ill-clad, a million unemployed, interest rates that are the highest in the history of the country, an energy policy which is driving capital and jobs out of the dominion, and farmers who have been waiting for weeks for a decision from cabinet on embargo payments, etc., etc., therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this House demands that the Prime Minister give Canada and Canadians first priority and start doing the job for which he is being paid and for which he was re-elected. "Charity begins at home".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

TERRY FOX MARATHON OF HOPE DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. The concept of having a Terry Fox Marathon of Hope Day, as announced by the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, to commemorate Terry's achievement, is an excellent one and deserving of support by all Canadians. However, in view of the fact that for more than 30 years the month of September has been known as Arthritis Month, and a month dedicated to the raising of funds for the fight against arthritic diseases which affect more than two and a half million Canadians, and in view of the need for major charitable organizations and, in this instance, the federal government, to co-operate with each other in order to maximize the raising of the needed funds to carry out their charitable works, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the minister of fitness and amateur sport give earnest consideration to designating a suitable date in April, a month traditionally known as Cancer Month, to pay tribute to Terry Fox and to include the Marathon of Hope.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RETENTION OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON ACID RAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which I feel deserves the unanimous support of the House. Whereas the special subcommittee on acid rain has successfully completed its inquiries, public hearings, and on-site inspections in Canada, the United States and Europe; whereas it is presently completing its report; and whereas it is imperative that this committee remain as a committee in order to monitor closely all preliminary discussions and deliberations leading up to the signing of the treaty between Canada and the United States on the limitation and elimination of long-range trans-boundary air pollutants, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That the special subcommittee on acid rain remain a special subcommittee until the said treaty is signed and put into effect.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

PUBLIC SERVICE

EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government has finally acknowledged the equality of women by awarding back payments to 341 women technicians in the public service who were suffering pay discrimination because they were not receiving equal pay for work of equal value, and in view of the historic fact that for the first time the government did this "without being ordered to" by the Canadian Human Rights Commission, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House welcomes this belated and long overdue recognition of women's rights by the government, but reminds the government that 341 is far short of 3,000, the number of outstanding demands for equal pay for work of equal value still lodged against the Government of Canada by women employees in the public service who are being discriminated against.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REGULATIONS IMPOSED ON WEST COAST TROLLERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the disaster hanging over the fishing industry on the west coast and the bankruptcy facing fishermen, causing them to blockade Vancouver and Victoria harbours today, to make their point with the minister, and I should add that the ferry from the state of Washington was denied entry to Victoria harbour within the last hour, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House calls on the minister to suspend the regulations imposed on trollermen and to resume negotiations with them in order to resolve the differences in a fashion which will preserve both the salmon stock and the livelihood of the fishermen.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES ON CANOLA SEED AND MEAL PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the disparity that exists between freight rates on canola seed, and oil and meal products from that seed; and in view of the fact that this disparity restrains secondary value added processing within particular regions of Canada, with the resulting loss of potential jobs and investment as well as the loss to the gross national product and Canada's foreign exchange earnings; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this House adopts the principle that freight rate parity between canola seed and products is fundamental to any resolution of the statutory freight rate issue.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

EXCLUSION OF AIR AND MARINE TRANSPORT INDUSTRY WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Workers in the air and marine transport industry are now excluded from part IV of the Canada Labour Code and therefore have no effective protection with respect to occupational health and safety. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Axworthy) was quoted as saying that he was approached by union and company officials in the shipping industry not to be included under part IV of the code which is currently undergoing revision, a statement at complete variance with information supplied by the Seamen's International Union, certainly one of the major unions in the industry concerned. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That the Minister of Labour immediately table in this House a list of those union and company officials who he alleges do not want their industries to be brought under part IV of the Canada Labour Code; and further that the minister specifically inform this House whether his parliamentary secretary, the former president and general manager of Canada Steamship Lines, is one of those officials by whom he was approached.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

REGULATIONS GOVERNING EXPENSES OF THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the callous neglect shown by the Toronto district tax appeal board toward a hard-working citizen who has had the courage and the will to forgo a wheelchair for a leg brace, and in view of the fact that the tax appeal board, in a precedent setting case last week, will only permit tax deductions for disability expenses incurred through wheelchairs, and not leg braces, and because this is the International Year of the Disabled, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the government, through the Minister of National Revenue, direct the Toronto district tax appeal board to show less revenue-hungry zeal and more compassion toward the disabled of this country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR SAFETY

INSTALLATION OF JOINT-ENROUTE TERMINAL SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my motion deals with the Joint-Enroute Terminal System. It is increasingly obvious that significant errors were made by Transport Canada in the determination of operational requirement for radar data remoting, processing and display capability at the time JETS was installed. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Transport cease installation of further JETS in Canadian airports until the deficiencies have either been corrected or a decision made to return to standard forms of equipment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

WORDS AND ACTIONS OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in responding to my charge that he has used the Student Youth Employment Program for political pork-barrelling, told the media that I was a chronic complainer, which I consider a compliment considering the source, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the minister who could be described, if one were to use alliteration in name calling, as an incessant interferer, as the Doris Dumper, as a happy hotelier or as the pork-barrel bungler, in future confine his words and actions to dealing with the unemployment problem among Canadians, especially among women, the young, and native unemployed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

STUDY OF CAPTAN FUNGICIDE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On March 31 this year, the head of the Health Protection Branch of the federal Department of Health and Welfare wrote an urgent, secret, intra-governmental memo urging that the fungicide captan be banned or at least severely restricted. It is widely suspected that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) caused that memo to be suppressed and ignored by the government for narrow economic reasons.

To protect the public against a potentially lethal substance now commonly sprayed on fruits and vegetables, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the House call upon the federal government to release immediately to the public its findings concerning the impact of captan on the environment and human health; to restrict the use of captan until it is clearly demonstrated to be safe, and to subject this potent fungicide to thorough scientific testing to determine, in fact, whether it is a hazardous product and therefore should be permanently banned.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

CAUSES OF INFLATION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I wish to address my questions to the Prime Minister. He knows that this House has examined the question of high interest rates and high inflation in the abstract for some time. Therefore, I shall deal with a concrete example, if I may.

A wage earner faced with the higher costs of food, clothing and shelter, the basics of life, is driven to asking his employer for an increase in wages. The employer, who has those same increases at home, plus the increase in the cost of business and high bank interest rates, has to come up with an answer. The only thing he can do is to raise the price of his goods and services rendered. Does the Prime Minister not feel that this fuels the inflationary spiral?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is always how the economic system works. If one is a worker, one tends to keep equal at least with the increase in the cost of living plus participate in the success of the enterprise. If one is the employer, one charges higher prices if one's costs increase. This is the way the system has always worked.

GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, if the government acknowledges that it knows how the system works, and if the government acknowledges it has high interest rates and high inflation, what is the government doing to break this cycle? When can we get Canada off this merry-go-around of higher inflation and higher bank interest rates?

Miss MacDonald: The rate is over 19 per cent.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, what tends to happen in times of increasing inflation is that people's expectations sometimes tend to anticipate even higher inflation. Rather than asking for normal and fair compensation either for their costs or for their efforts, they tend to anticipate and increase the prices of their goods more than is justified by normal profits, or they increase the price of their services by more than is justified by a normal increase. That is the explanation of the psychological drive behind inflationary expectations. But the hon. member knows, as well as I do, that is the way the system works. What we must do is to prevent the anticipation of inflationary expectations and to try to keep both prices and services at normal increase levels rather than anticipating high inflation.

EXTENSION SOUGHT OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND CONCEPT

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, it seems to me and to the House that all we are doing is fuelling the spiral and not coming up with anything to break it.

In view of the fact that the bank rate today burst through the 19 per cent ceiling, I ask the Prime Minister whether his government will consider taking the mechanism of the small business development bond one step further—which is in place and is there—to businesses which have traditionally used bank credit, and have bank loans in place but cannot do anything about it. Would he investigate extending it to all bank credit presently in existence?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is not possible for the reason indicated many times by the finance minister.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Miss MacDonald: Who is he?

Mr. Trudeau: The small bond arrangement is one for a particular sector of the community. It is an expensive one. If the hon. member wants it to be extended to all people using credit, he will be going against the guidelines proposed by his own party and by the spokesmen in his party on economic matters, that is, to keep expenditures down. I do not believe the hon. member would advocate that.

Mr. Clark: What about Petrofina?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They do it in Gabon.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE TO PEOPLE IN NEED

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity of being responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing. In the meeting earlier this week with members of Parliament from British Columbia and officials of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation the minister referred to more social housing by the government which might overcome the problems created by his government's fiscal and monetary policies, which include today's new record high Bank of Canada rate of 19.06 per cent.

Government housing, before all of the disastrous subsidies which are offered are taken into account, actually costs Canadians more than that provided by industry. The minister must realize that, and also that the real shortage is of money in the hands of those needing shelter. What will his government do or offer to those in need of housing assistance to replace the Clark government proposals, such as mortgage interest deductibility, which his government defeated in 1979, aided and abetted by the New Democratic Party?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, speaking of the Clark administration and Clark proposal during its nine-month government period, on previous occasions I have, of course, made reference to the report on privatization ordered by the previous government. The one thing that we have done, as a government, is to reject the privatization of CMHC, and reject the advice offered to the previous government which was almost a complete withdrawal and complete abdication of any role for CMHC in the area of social housing. On the contrary, what we have done is to use the programs which were in place last year, such as under Section 56(1) of the act, which is the social policy housing program. We, for example, increased the number of starts in that social area—

Miss MacDonald: Tell that to people who have lost their houses.

Mr. Cosgrove: —which provides a subsidy to housing, bringing down the interest rate from the current levels to 2 per cent, thereby aiding and assisting—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Tell that to your mortgagees.

Mr. Cosgrove: —people such as senior citizens, the handicapped, and those in the special needs area. I am happy to say that those additional 5,000 units released last year have been constructed and are now coming on the market. I submit that they are coming at a time when it is more difficult, I admit, for people in those income levels and those special categories to access housing.

An hon. Member: That's enough!

Mr. Cosgrove: I think that move of the government was well timed and is serving those people in need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

CANADIAN INVESTMENT IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, obviously the question period would not be long enough for the minister to try to explain all of the mish-mash of government's proposals which amount to intervention in housing. I want to ask the minister this supplementary question: can the minister assure Canadians that his government will stop interfering in the housing industry so that all of the Canadian expertise, which is investing billions of dollars in the United States to provide housing for Americans, can come back to Canada and start working for Canadians in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): From the question I would take it that the intervention referred to by the hon. member possibly addresses the question of supply. I talked about the question of affordability, and I have no apology whatsoever for the response of this government to people in need. If that is intervention in the economy, then I support it, and this government supports it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: Referring to the supply, of course the hon. member knows that the government responded in the budget, I suppose by intervention, and by reintroducing capital cost allowance to increase the supply side modestly. Again, I have no apology for that. I have received submissions from many people, and many of the hon. members opposite, asking for that very thing.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REDUCE RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The minister responsible for housing is taking great pride in an obviously disastrous situation for the typical Canadian. Today, even before the interest rate jumped to a record level of 19 per cent—

Mr. Nielsen: 19.06.

Mr. Broadbent: —a Canadian family would require an average income of $47,000 to buy a typical home in Canada. This means, for the first time since the great depression, that 90 per cent of Canadian families are excluded from the normal Canadian expectation of being able to buy their own homes.

My direct question to the Prime Minister is: why does the government not take direct action to bring mortgages down so that the average family could, in fact, buy a home?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has dealt with these suggestions many times. I dealt with them last week when the hon. member suggested direct action to bring mortgage rates down. He knows direct action would mean immense subsidies to everybody concerned, and that would mean increased expenditures, and increased expenditures means increased deficits, and increased deficits means fuelling inflation. Or the alternative, Madam Speaker, is to go into exchange controls, and I have not heard even the NDP in its wildest moments advocate those.

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT FORCE BANKS TO LOWER MORTGAGE RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister listed two alternatives, and I will deal with those points later in today's proceedings. But there is a third option the Prime Minister did not comment on, and I refer to the banks and bank legislation. Considering that bank profits in the first quarter of this year were up 60 per cent over the record level of last year, and considering that the banks represent one institution which is gaining like no other institution from high interest rates, why does the Prime Minister's government not take direct action to force the banks to put out mortgages at lower levels and, therefore, yes, reduce their profits somewhat to achieve a social purpose?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the New Democratic Party leader may be dealing with this matter later in the day and we will be interested in his views, but he should take into account what the Minister of Finance said in answer to that exact same question two weeks ago when he indicated that, indeed, bank profits had increased very considerably over the last two quarters, but that had not been true in the period before that, but that he was—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, the hon. member behind the Leader of the New Democratic Party is trying to get in, Madam Speaker, but I will ask him to be patient and perhaps he will have a moment to speak later in the day. I am giving the answer of the Minister of Finance. It was to that effect that the minister was monitoring these profits and, if necessary, he would consider appropriate action.

AID FOR HOME OWNERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The Prime Minister took a long time not to answer the question directly.

Mr. Trudeau: That is because of your howling benchmates.

Mr. Broadbent: We are not talking about instances of a special excess profits tax which could be considered; we are talking about forcing the banks to distinguish loans in the mortgage sector from other sectors. The government recognized that distinction and should act on it.

The Prime Minister has indicated he is not willing to help those who do not already own homes. There is another group of Canadians who are being forced to sell their homes which has now reached a monthly rate of 1,000. They have to abandon them because they cannot keep up the mortgage payments. In fact this is alluded to in the Economic Review published by the Department of Finance just yesterday. My question to the Prime Minister in this regard is, will he at least take immediate steps to provide assistance to those Canadians who already own their own homes so that the number who are forced to abandon them will not increase to 1,100 or 1,200 monthly, and in order that we can at least maintain families in homes who already have them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I realize that the Leader of the New Democratic Party is probably short of questions because he is always asking the same ones and he is getting the same answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are short on answers.

Mr. Hees: And you used to be such friends.

Mr. Trudeau: Exactly, George. I realize that the New Democratic Party does not agree with the budgetary position taken by this government. Its members said so at some great length during the budget debate.

An hon. Member: That is not the only thing they do not agree with you on.

Mr. Trudeau: They certainly did not agree with your policy either. They even pretend that they had invented Petro-Canada and the hon. member was anxious to get rid of it for that reason. I recognize the difference in economic policies put forward by our different parties, but we stand by the budgetary policies put forward by the government and we believe in gradualism in attacking these problems.

RAILWAYS

PENSIONS OF RETIRED WORKERS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Rail pensioners are amongst the lowest compensated pensioners in Canada. Some former employees are receiving such measly increases as $4 a year. Some receive pensions of only $115 a month. What is the minister going to do to correct this disgraceful condition? The Minister of Transport has made his position perfectly clear; he will do absolutely nothing to assist them in their time of need and claims it is up to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the Minister of Transport's taking any such position. I am sure he shares with me and other Canadians concern about all of those people who are living on pensions based on salaries which were at a lower level and at a time before inflation changed the value of work to the extent that it has.

The hon. member will be aware of the fact that Dr. Noël Hall carried out a very substantial investigation into the subject of railway pensions and that in the conclusion to his report he stated that pensions for railway workers are something which should be bargained between the parties.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, it was just over a year ago that the minister wrote to one of the unions. I wish the minister would pay attention, please. It was just over a year ago that the minister wrote to one of the unions saying that he would be taking some action, so I suggest he review his correspondence of last May to the unions.

REPORTED PURCHASE OF GULF OIL STOCK BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS PENSION FUND

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. There are strong rumours that the CNR will use its pension fund to purchase Gulf Oil. Gulf is one of the most active stocks on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Over 500,000 shares have been traded in the last two days, which indicates another possible Petrofina fiasco.

Will the minister confirm or deny the possible purchase, will he indicate whether rail pensioners will receive any improved benefits, such as proper indexing, as a result of the deal or will it just be the tipped off new stock purchasers who will benefit?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I find the question very strange, and the lack of background knowledge on the part of the questioner even stranger. I am sure the hon. member is fully aware that I am not the minister to whom Canadian National reports and I am in no position to know what are the plans of Canadian National. I think the hon. member is merely rumour-mongering, and he should realize that by posing a question to a minister on a matter for which that minister is not responsible, and on which the hon. member is not well informed, he is spreading the rumour further.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

INQUIRY WHETHER FIRE ENGINE CONTRACT HAS BEEN AWARDED TO WALTER TRUCK CANADA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. I believe he is fully aware of the details concerning the disgusting case of the Walter Truck Canada Company. Can the minister tell the House why he has awarded a $6 million fire trucks contract to that company, which would seem to have been reincorporated for that occasion and which is a technical branch of a bankrupt American company, strictly on the basis of plans? In addition, could he explain why, after several months of procrastination, he turned down the lowest bidder who would have guaranteed the experience, the skills and the 70 per cent plus Canadian content of the well known Thibault fire trucks?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, we did wait several months because the bids filed were very thoroughly examined. We received a request from the Department of National Defence concerning certain technical requirements. The Walter Truck Company which was chosen did best meet those technical requirements and therefore it was awarded the contract.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, that is one more example of the just society of the Liberals who, in my opinion, lead the most corrupt government in our history. How can anyone award such a big contract to a company whose headquarters and sole small shop are located in the riding of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Are contracts always awarded with consideration for the political stripe of the bidders, keeping in mind that the owners, Messrs. Marcoux and Laporte, are very well known Liberals?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, first I might point out to the hon. member that he is questioning not only the integrity of the officials of my department but also that of the officials of the Department of National Defence. If he wants to make those kinds of accusations I hope he has supporting evidence to back them up. Madam Speaker, I do not believe that the officials who discharge their duties day in and day out ought to be subjected to such meaningless charges. I can tell the hon. member that he is raising issues about which he does not know anything at all, that the contract was awarded to the Walter Truck Canada Company because it did guarantee more Canadian content than the lowest bid which was rejected. Everything was done in an orderly manner. I made sure of that. If the hon. member wants to make an accusation let him do so seriously and let him stop making unfounded charges.

TERMINATION OF SERVICES OF COMBINES DIRECTOR OF INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Prime Minister. Over the last two days there have been many statements surrounding the termination of the services of Monsieur Robert Bertrand, director of investigation and research. Because they are coming from government officials I think it is extremely important that this be clarified. Health reasons are being given, as well as the suggestion of a promotion to the Anti-dumping Tribunal. Senior officials are saying he was fired. In one case he was falsely accused of leaking information. Since it is the cabinet which is responsible for his appointment, I urge the Prime Minister to make a statement to this House to clarify the reasons why the services of Monsieur Bertrand were terminated.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would gladly say a few words about this because I believe many of the adverse rumours we have heard in the past few days have been unjustified and, in some cases, malicious.

I have known Mr. Bertrand for some 20 years. I have a very high regard for his human and professional qualities. He is the best man to state on his behalf whether he was fired or whether he is going to another job which is of his choosing. I expect him in the next day or so to make a statement to that effect. Indeed, I encourage him to do so.

REASONS FOR CHANGE IN POSITIONS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I have just a brief supplementary question. The timing of this termination could not be more unfortunate, and I ask the Prime Minister to confirm that there was a great policy difference between the incumbent director of investigation and research and the cabinet minister involved, that Mr. Bertrand's services were terminated, that the cabinet was asked to approve that, that it refused to do so and that Mr. Bertrand, rather than being terminated, was appointed to another position? Anyone here certainly knows that no one is appointed, as a promotion, to the Anti-dumping Tribunal from another position.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, from the point of view of those who want to seize on anything to imagine some evil hiding in the recesses of government, and of those who believe in the diabolical theory of politics, any timing is wrong.

Mr. Bertrand had been in his job for some seven years. It is a very trying job. A couple of years ago he underwent a very serious operation, and there was the question of his taking on a less heavy load at that point. It was agreed that because there were several very important investigations under way, notably the one on newspapers, the other one on the oil industry—

Mr. Stevens: What about the uranium cartel?

Mr. Trudeau: —and the uranium inquiry, he would stay on until these tasks were terminated. They are now terminated; a new phase is beginning.

• (1440)

The man has been there for seven years, and it is a very difficult position. He has indeed been given a promotion, one that he chose among others offered to him, and he has gone from an SX3 position to a DM1. Naturally nobody will believe this if they want to invent stories, Madam Speaker, and that is why I say to hon. members opposite, if you do not want to take our word for it, or the word of his friends, why not ask him yourself?

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE POLICY DISAGREEMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, since this involves a quasi-judicial position that Mr. Bertrand occupied and is a matter in which the House is unusually interested, I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us whether there was a significant policy disagreement between the minister and Mr. Bertrand prior to his change of position.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand the preface to the question. Mr. Bertrand is now going to a semi judicial post in which he will have much higher authority than previously where he was—

An hon. Member: Oh, get off it.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I see some guys having bellyaches over there, Madam Speaker. I cannot deal with this kind of—

An hon. Member: Honourable guys.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member from the New Democratic Party who used some very excessive words yesterday—I wish he would catch up on himself and try and be a little more rational when he debates this kind of question. I repeat: you can ask Mr. Bertrand the question yourself.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the House of Commons is the place in which members of Parliament put questions to the government about matters of government policy and conduct. I put to the Prime Minister a simple question which he did not answer as to whether or not there had been a policy difference of significance between the minister and Mr. Bertrand prior to Mr. Bertrand's change of position, and I would like an answer to that.

I would also like the Prime Minister to indicate to the House that in situations of this kind where there is a change surrounded by controversy in the position of someone carrying out a quasi-judicial function—

An hon. Member: It is not quasi-judicial.

Mr. Clark: —whether he would institute a practice whereby the minister who occasions that kind of change, in this case the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, would make a full statement to the House of Commons outlining all of the details in the case, or would be prepared to go before a constituted committee of this House to answer detailed questions from interested members about all of the circumstances leading to a change in the activities of a senior public official carrying out a highly delicate and important quasi-judicial function?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that the House of Commons is the place where members put questions to the government. We believe that, and we have been answering questions for the past several days. What we cannot answer are malicious and inventive rumours that we have been hearing from the opposite side for the last few days. They either take our word for it or they ask the man himself, and I suggest the latter.

An hon. Member: What is malicious about that question?

Mr. Trudeau: As to the question of setting up some kind of inquiry every time the government—

An hon. Member: What is the policy difference?

Mr. Trudeau: On the question about policy differences, Madam Speaker, I can say that I know of none, and I hear the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs say that he knows of none either. Therefore this is another invention of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBLE IMPACT OF AT & T STATEMENT ON SALES OF TELIDON SYSTEM IN UNITED STATES

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. Will the minister advise the House of the significance to Canada of yesterday's announcement by AT & T and its impact on jobs in Canada?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, this announcement by AT & T is indeed a major step forward for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Hon. members have undoubtedly read in the press the announcement to the effect that AT & T is adopting standards which are fully compatible with the Telidon system. This arose as a result of many hours and many days of intense consultation between Department of Communications experts and AT & T.

The second part of the announcement yesterday, which does not seem to have been noticed by the media, is that CBS—

An hon. Member: That is why you planted the question.

Mr. Fox: —and I am sure it will be of great interest to members of this House who are interested in the development of Canadian high technology and its sale to the United States—is that CBS has adopted standards for transmission which are fully compatible with the Telidon system. This means, Madam Speaker, that the American market will be open to Canadian manufacturers of high technology who, because of the development of Telidon within the Department of Communications, have a leading edge in competing with other manufacturers on the North American market.

HUMAN RIGHTS

TESTING OF CANDIDATES FOR ADMISSION TO LEGAL PROFESSION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who will be aware of the fact that 15 Canadian law schools require candidates for admission to take the American law school admission test. May I ask the minister whether he feels it is appropriate that Canada's future lawyers should have to be thumbprinted in the process of taking this test and to be asked for their social insurance numbers, their family's financial status and their racial background, and that this information should be stored along with the test results in the United States? And if the minister does not feel it is appropriate, is he prepared to take action to block this from taking place in the future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of this problem but I will certainly look into the matter and report to the House as soon as I have an answer.

Mr. Beatty: I am amazed that the minister would not be aware of these facts. May I ask him, in view of the fact that these LSAT tests are American and the questions have a distinct American cultural bias and are therefore inappropriate for Canadian students, is he prepared to contact Canada's law schools to offer his assistance in the preparation of a standardized Canadian law school admission test?

Mr. Chrétien: I have nothing else to add, Madam Speaker.

INCOME TAX

REGULATIONS GOVERNING EXPENSES OF THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue and arises from the plight of a polio victim in my riding who spent 36 sleepless hours in a sit-in to draw attention to an unfair tax law. As this is the International Year of the Disabled, and in view of recommendation 46 contained in the report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, which recommends that a disability deduction replace the current flat rate deduction to allow an individual to deduct the full cost of goods and services directly attributable to a disability, would the minister please review the decision made by the Tax Appeal Board on May 14 with respect to a recent test case in which my constituent made an unsuccessful attempt to deduct expenses for the cost of a leg brace, shoes, and other expenses related to his disability?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I have a great deal of sympathy, and indeed admiration for the gentleman in question, as I am sure we all do, and I am aware of the very excellent recommendations of that task force. This, however, is the judgment of an independent body, the Tax Review Board, and I am not at liberty to change that judgment any more than I am at liberty to change the law. The law appears to be quite specific. Even though I have sympathy for the gentleman, only Parliament can change the law in this regard.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF ACT

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, in view of that answer I will address my supplementary to the Minister of State for Finance in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

In light of the committee's recommendation, would the minister amend the Income Tax Act so that those people who are not confined to a bed or a wheelchair, but who are disabled, would be permitted to deduct expenses for those goods and services which are attributable to a prolonged disability?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the special House committee which has looked into the many problems the handicapped are facing has prepared an extremely important report which proposes certain amendments to the Income Tax Act. As the hon. member is certainly well aware, changes to the tax structure are made at the time a budget is presented. The Minister of Finance has already indicated that he would present a new budget next Fall. The hon. member can be assured that the committee's report and recommendations concerning the handicapped will be given special consideration by the Minister of Finance when the time comes for him to prepare his budget.

GRAIN

DROP IN SOYBEAN AND RAPESEED PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON COMPENSATION

Mr. Stan Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the grain embargo—just in case he thinks we have forgotten all about it. Soybean and rapeseed prices dropped considerably immediately after the embargo on shipments to Russia was put in place. The price of soybeans dropped about $25 a ton. Most of this crop is grown in the constituency from which the minister comes. I have been distressed of late to hear that these two crops are not being considered for compensation. Would the minister indicate whether or not these two crops are being considered for compensation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, these two crops are not being considered for compensation.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, that was a record answer from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hovdebo: I am sure the farmers in Essex County will be as distressed as I am to hear his answer.

Although the minister told us last November that the government was ready to pay compensation, it still has not done so. The minister has avoided tabling any kind of white paper or giving hon. members any indication of how he will calculate the compensation to be paid. Would he explain to the House, and the farmers, why there has been this long delay in making payment of compensation?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, in the first part of the hon. member's question he acknowledged that part of the delay was due to the fact that some of the requests for compensation, such as the request by the soybean growers in my area, which he mentioned, were made only a few weeks ago. That caused a delay.

At the time of the finalization of this program all the facts with respect to how it came about will be made public.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER PRICE STABILIZATION PROGRAM WILL BE ESTABLISHED FOR PORK PRODUCERS

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

For the past several months, the Canadian Federation of Hog Producers have been seeking a hog price stabilization plan from the Minister of Agriculture. Hon. members are aware that the prices on the world market had slumped so much that producers were selling their hogs below their production costs. Could the Minister of Agriculture advise us whether there will be a hog price stabilization plan, when producers will be paid, and how much the hog price stabilization plan for Canadian hog producers will amount to?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, there will be a hog stabilization plan which will amount to $8.96 per finished hog. This sum will be paid as soon as possible. As a result of the experience of last year we have all the names of producers in a computer, so it should not take very long to finalize the payment to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

FUTURE OF COLD LAKE, ALTA. PROJECT

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister is aware, the June 1 deadline for the Cold Lake project, to which the government loaned $40 million, is fast approaching. The minister is also aware that Imperial Oil has indicated that unless there are clear indications that an energy agreement is imminent it will shelve the project. Will the minister be giving a clear indication that there will be an energy agreement so that this project vital to Canada will not be shelved? If not, will the minister be preparing another loan to Imperial Oil to keep its design and engineering team together?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that the deadline is not June 1. The answer to the last part of the question is no.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, that is one of the clearest answers that the minister has given. I would much rather have a straightforward answer such as he gave this time than all the running around which he has been doing.

The minister talks about a spirit of willingness and a spirit of compromise which he is seeking from Alberta. Can the hon. gentleman indicate to the House what this spirit of willingness is, what are the areas of compromise he has indicated to Alberta that he requires in order that an energy agreement can be reached?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

REPORT ON STATE OF CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It deals with the recently released Secor report which is a fairly comprehensive report on the Canadian nuclear Candu system. Has the minister had a chance to review this report? In the report there is a comment that the Canadian nuclear industry hovers on the brink of a crisis which threatens to bring it to its knees. This is really a comment on the many years of Liberal government activity in terms of its efforts to commercialize a Canadian energy system in the international market. We know that the Liberal party has an internal mini-review of the nuclear industry. I wonder if this review had been completed and if the minister took into account the Secor Report.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker. I would like to add that the hon. member seems to have forgotten the nine months when the Conservatives held office, when the antics of their secretary of state for external affairs created very serious difficulties with regard to our sales to some other countries.

Mr. Clark: That's not true, and you know it.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, the minister knows that I think he is a nice guy, but I am sure he would not want to hide 16 years of Liberal incompetence in the areas of energy and finance behind nine months of the only freshness this country has had in the last 16 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gurbin: The Secor report suggests that we should have a 20 per cent share of the global market for Candu or any nuclear reactors. The essence of the report is that the Liberal government, along with AECL—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The answers have been remarkably short. I would urge hon. members to put equally remarkably short questions.

Mr. Gurbin: I was antagonized, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gurbin: My very short supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is for the same minister. Does the minister understand that the essence of the Secor report is that what we need is a major Canadian manufacturing vendor to make the system work? Is he prepared to act quickly to see that occurs so that we can have a Canadian system which can effectively compete on world markets, in order that our whole Canadian nuclear industry, our research and development programs, in fact our contribution to global energy needs, will not wither away while we sit idly by?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, we are reviewing this matter. I can say that steps have already been taken to integrate our efforts abroad on a better basis than ever before. In particular AECL, Ontario Hydro and the Association of Canadian Nuclear Industries are now working very closely together. They are making representations abroad on a joint basis. These efforts have been quite effective in the few seminars and events which have been organized by these groups in various countries which are interested in Candu. We are monitoring the situation very closely. We are examining the advisability of developing further structures. We are working very closely with the industry at the present time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE BY NORDAIR FLIGHT ATTENDANTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour, notice of which I gave to his office. In view of the fact that Nordair flight attendants have been without a contract for six months and have been on strike for something over a week, and in view of the fact that Nordair is owned by Air Canada and that these attendants want something equivalent to parity with Air Canada employees, can the minister tell us whether it is true that he authorized or approved Nordair clerks and ticket agents taking three-day crash courses as flight attendants in order to keep Nordair flights in operation during this labour dispute?

• (1500)

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, it is true that a work stoppage has been under way at Nordair for a period of time. The Montreal office has been in touch with the parties and they are aware that mediation—

Mr. Nielsen: You are doing very well, Gerry. You read very well.

Mr. Regan: —assistance is available, if they wish to resume negotiations. Our people are standing by to be of any assistance they can in helping to bring an end to this dispute.

However, I am not aware of the other subject that the hon. member mentions. I certainly have not given authorization for any course of action, nor would I have occasion to do so. It is not a matter which would fall under my jurisdiction in any manner, shape or form. Our job in labour, and I think a job that our people in the Department of Labour carry out very well, is to provide expert mediation services to help avoid and bring to an end disputes of this type. The question of the services which are being maintained is a matter which would fall under another department.

Mr. Nielsen: It certainly wouldn't be a crash course, anyway!

SAFETY OF OPERATIONAL PRACTICES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour, if he has not given approval to this crash course for ticket clerks and other clerks to be flight attendants, would he advise the House whether he would investigate the matter and see to it that untrained personnel are not acting as flight attendants on Nordair flights? Would the minister also see to it that this effort of blatant strike-breaking by Nordair will cease immediately?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): The hon. member will be aware, in relation to the safety of the operational practices, that that is a matter which presently falls under the responsibility of another department and another minister. The hon. member's urgings in that regard could be directed to the Minister of Transport, who says he will look into the matter for the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the government House leader the intentions of the government with respect to business next week. Perhaps while he is on his feet he might designate, as far as he could, allotted days.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, next week we will have two opposition days, Monday and Wednesday. Tuesday and Thursday we will continue consideration of Bill C-57 to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, with the report stage of the bill beginning on Tuesday.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is the government House leader now in a position to indicate what we will be doing on Friday of next week?

While I am on my feet, I might mention that last week I made an inquiry with respect to the extension of the small business development bond concept to operating capital and inventory and with respect to unincorporated small businesses, which would include farms and, perhaps, fishermen. I asked him if he would consult with the Minister of Finance because of the difficult situation in which people in those occupations find themselves. Has he made that inquiry, and if he has can he inform the House of the results of that inquiry, given the understanding that I tried to direct to him, that we would be prepared to talk about it in terms of a restricted debate?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: In answer to the hon. member's first question, I would say that next Friday we will be considering bills yet to be decided at the next meeting of House leaders, which is usually held on Wednesday or Thursday. That is why I did not announce the business of the House for next Friday, being well aware that we could be more specific next week depending upon the progress made at the report stage of Bill C-57.

As for his second question, I did discuss the matter with the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), and I am sure that after he has done the necessary checking he will only be too glad to answer himself any question from the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the government House leader with respect to House business. I wonder if he could tell me whether my practice of being persistent but polite is going to pay off in terms of getting the legislation respecting veterans, especially with respect to those who were not covered in last summer's Bill C-40, or whether I am going to have to find some other tactic. In other words, what is the reason for such a long delay, since so often I have been told that the matter is going to cabinet in a day or two?

My other question relates to another group of widows. As the minister probably knows, when the present Minister of Justice was president of the treasury board, the government came awfully close to granting legislation which would end the denial of pensions to widows of public servants, RCMP and national defence retirees where the marriage had taken place after retirement. In view of the fact that there are now so many of these later marriages which last for many years and that many widows suffer because of this unfair limitation, will the minister discuss this with the appropriate ministers to see if the proposals of a few years ago can be reactivated?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's first question, I will say that being polite always pays off, and that is the approach I would recommend he take. If he prefers to try "some other tactic", to use his expression, I must warn him that that could delay the introduction of the legislation he so desperately wants to have passed. If he wants to chance it, I strongly urge him to use manners, because sooner or later that pays off. As for his representations on behalf of the widows of public servants, I want to assure him that they are taken into consideration and that I will convey his message to the minister responsible.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NOWLAN—SECURITY MEASURES ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I have a question of privilege. Ordinarily, I would have written a letter to try to have something clarified; but in view of the totality of what happened this morning, which is the first time something like this has happened in the years that I have been in the House of Commons, I think that for the benefit of all hon. members it should be clarified post haste because the same thing almost happened again at noon.

I am very sorry that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not here, and it is unfortunate; however, I am sure he will hear about this. Quite frankly, I am not imputing this to the Prime Minister, but I am suggesting that perhaps there is an element of pomp, circumstance or presidential, or whether there is bona fide security involved—and that is what I want to know. We all know there has to be increased security in this day of the looney when unfortunate things happen.

However, very briefly, my point of privilege is that I understood that the door to the west was known as the members' door, and that members habitually, traditionally and historically have been driven up to it. Ministers who are members get out and come in, in the same manner as a member. I have noticed, in the last week or so, that at certain times there seem to be six or eight plainclothes people and uniformed commissioners and RCMP waving off cars at the members' door. Then when one looks behind in the rear view mirror, one sees the prime ministerial entourage coming. So I can understand that to a point.

This morning I drove up and, unfortunately, I was a little late; it was about five after nine, but quite often I happen to come in either just before or after the Prime Minister's entourage. I came up, saw six or eight individuals waving off the area where the bus parks. I said to my wife, "Well, I think the Prime Minister must be around." I looked in the rear view mirror and the prime ministerial cars were down by the East Block; but I did not go into the area which is restricted to buses and/or where cabinet members and others are sometimes let off. I stopped by the sidewalk and the light post where the little lady used to stand with the lonely little flag. I then got out of the car, at which time the prime ministerial entourage was approximately by the Senate door. It took about five seconds. I walked in without any problem.

Ten minutes later I received a very even-voiced call from my wife who, after she discharged me, had continued on her way. In front of the National Cenotaph, after a blinking light from an RCMP car had followed her off the grounds, she was apprehended, pulled over to stop, and was asked why she stopped in front of a restricted area. She did say that the constable who stopped her was most polite. My wife answered, "I have let my husband off to go to work." He asked: "What does he do?" She said, "He is a Member of Parliament." So the constable said, "Oh, would you please have him get off at the sidewalk when the prime ministerial entourage is arriving?"

As I say, I am not imputing this to the Prime Minister but I am very irritated. This is a members' door, not a prime ministerial door. I have made inquiries and quite frankly, Madam Speaker, I have found that there has been no new directive for security inside the House or outside the House. Perhaps your inquiries will prove me wrong but that is what I understood.

I understand the need for security, and in view of the coming summit conference perhaps there will have to be more security. If it is security, Madam Speaker, we cannot have it both ways and have the public lined up at the sidewalk, quite properly to see our Prime Minister from time to time, and not have members of Parliament drive up and be let off at the members' door. There is the back door where the Prime Minister or members may come in, or there is the side door which is now open and which is a lot more secure, perhaps, than the public door.

I should like your Honour to take this matter under advisement to find out if it was just an overzealous act of an officer or if there has been a change of direction and instruction and, if so, who has given the instruction. Then perhaps the embarrassment that took place this morning and was almost repeated this afternoon at five minutes before two o'clock will not occur again.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has raised this question and I will want to inquire into what took place. I am sorry that the hon. member's wife was embarrassed. I will want to know whether new instructions have been issued—I am not aware of any at the present time—and exactly what they are. Even if it is found necessary to increase security around the House of Commons, I would certainly not want hon. members to be impeded in their function as MPs. They should be properly delivered to any door that they choose to come in through. I will look into the matter and I thank the hon. member for raising it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, on the same point, to indicate that it is not an isolated instance—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has another point, he can give me notice.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is the same point.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the hon. member was not in the same car. If he has another incident he can give me notice of it and I will deal with it in due course.

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—REPORTED LEAKING OF REPORT TO NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is not quite as serious a matter of state as that of the hon. member who spoke previously. I should say that I would gladly lend him my bike if he would like to borrow it in order to avoid the complexities he encountered.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Keep your pomposities.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a bike.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): My question of privilege arises from certain remarks made by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) in connection with the recent termination of Mr. Bertrand, a matter which has been raised in this House. Unfortunately, certain allegations were made with respect to Mr. Bertrand having—and I quote from a report in this morning's Globe and Mail:

—leaked a report to the New Democratic Party after taking umbrage at the way former Conservative Justice Minister Jacques Flynn dealt with his recommendations on a matter.

As the hon. member well knows, Mr. Bertrand is not in a position to defend himself from this kind of accusation.

As the member who originally raised the suggestion of collusion on the part of a number of Conservative cabinet ministers, I should like to say that this is a total fabrication. In no way did Mr. Bertrand, either directly or indirectly, leak any kind of report relating to the very serious allegations of wrongdoing on the part of the government of the day.

I call upon the former minister to withdraw any suggestion of impropriety on the part of Mr. Bertrand at that particular time. As the former minister well knows, Mr. Bertrand is not in a position to answer for himself.

Madam Speaker: This is obviously not a question of privilege involving the hon. member. He wanted to make a point about what was said in the House. The point is well taken but it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Lawrence: May I speak? I shall be very brief.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, I have now ruled that it was not a question of privilege. If I had seen the hon. member rise before, I would gladly have heard him. As he knows, I am under an obligation not to hear any comments after I have ruled, and therefore I am afraid I cannot hear him.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I certainly realize and recognize that it was not a question of privilege, as you did too. Not only was it not a question of privilege but it was a frivolous waste of the time of the House. The hon. member already knows that the quotations ascribed to me were absolutely incorrect.

Madam Speaker: The point is well made.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

ACCESS TO STAIRCASE BY MEMBER

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention that yesterday I attempted to go down one of the staircases after I had escorted some people to the gallery. As I attempted to go down the stairs, it was obvious that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was entering the building because one of the plain clothes security people put his arm out in front of me to stop me from going down the stairs. I had to push his hand down. I was not stopped but the attempt was made to stop me from using the same staircase as the Prime Minister at the same time. I should like to add this incident to the question of privilege raised by my hon. friend.

Madam Speaker: The point is well taken.

TREASURY BOARD REGULATIONS—CHARITABLE CAMPAIGNS

Question No. 1,356—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does chapter 328 of the Treasury Board Regulations on charitable campaigns state in part that: "Other forms of government assistance such as use of cheque-stuffer services are hereby restricted to the United Way campaign . . . ."?

2. Were cheque-stuffers included with the June pay cheques of a large number of Public Service employees and, if so (a) what is the name and job designation of the most senior person in government authorizing such action (b) was the President of the Treasury Board aware of such action and, if so, on what date did he become aware and did he or any one acting on his behalf give permission for such action?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. Yes; however, Treasury Board can grant exemptions or extensions to the policy. Circular No. 1980-54 clarifies this flexibility by stating that additional assistance to organizations not associated with the United Way will be considered on a case-by-case basis, limited to the following alternatives:

(a) approval to distribute one campaign notice to public servants via the payroll distribution system; or

(b) similar to (a), but extended to identify public servants who are willing to work strictly as volunteers, who could answer inquiries and receive completed pledge cards or donations.

Over the past two decades, such assistance has been extended to the following institutions: University of Alberta, University of Calgary, University of Carleton, University of Guelph, University of Lethbridge, University of Ottawa, University of Windsor, the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, The Ottawa Civic Hospital, CARE of Canada, The Canadian Cancer Society, The Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

2. Yes.

(a) The President of the Treasury Board authorized the policy extension to cheque-stuffers for the University of Ottawa campaign.

Question No. 1,357—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Anne Haynes hired by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce from an Ottawa private employment agency and, if so (a) on what date did she commence work and for how long a period of time was she hired (b) was she engaged in the soliciting of funds for the University of Ottawa from members of the department and, if so, what is the name and job designation of the highest official authorizing such action?

4. Is it government policy to permit breaches of Treasury Board regulations in regard to charitable donations?

5. Was chapter 328 of the Treasury Board Regulations headed "charitable campaigns" dated December, 1979, changed and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, have they been contravened and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am informed by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources, Finance, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Treasury Board as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) June 9 to June 27, 1980.

(b) She was engaged as a clerk with legal services and approximately 2 per cent of her time was spent to solicit funds for the University of Ottawa. The director of legal services, Industry, Trade and Commerce authorized such action.

2. Dr. Pierre Bourgault, assistant deputy minister, planning and evaluation, is co-ordinating the University of Ottawa Achievement Fund campaign within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Question No. 1,358—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. D. R. D'Avignon, deputy minister of supply, circulate a letter dated May 21, 1980, to all departmental employees urging them to donate to the University of Ottawa fund raising campaign and, if so (a) was it printed on government stationery (b) did the government pay for the cost of such printing and circulation (c) what is the name of the highest authority authorizing the letter?

2. Was the Minister of Supply and Services aware of, or did he give his permission in advance to the letter and, if so, on what date was it first brought to his attention?

3. Was Mr. D'Avignon aware of the contents of chapter 328 of the Treasury Board Regulations in regard to charitable campaigns and specifically, was he aware whether or not such regulations prohibit "canvassing, solicitation or collection of funds in government offices on behalf of charitable campaigns" and, if so, what are all the reasons that the regulation was not adhered to?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as the Supply Administration is concerned: 1. Mr. G. R. D'Avignon, deputy minister of supply, issued a circular to supply administration employees within the National Capital Region informing them of the forthcoming campaign and encouraging them to support the campaign.

(a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) Mr. G. R. D'Avignon, deputy minister of supply.

2. The minister's permission was not sought for this matter, since the decision to issue a letter to the employees providing details on the campaign, does not contravene the general intent of the exception to the policy approved by the Treasury Board. However, the Minister of Supply and Services was made aware of the letter by the deputy minister of supply.

3. See reply to question No. 1,356, part 1, answered this day.

Question No. 1,359—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Were circulars sent as cheque-stuffers and/or otherwise distributed, to public servants requesting funds on behalf of the University of Ottawa and offering eligibility to participate in a draw for gifts and, if so, is it government policy to give charitable receipts for contributions under such circumstances?

2. What is the name and job designation of the highest official authorizing distribution of the pamphlets in such a manner and (a) what part did the President of the Treasury Board play (b) did the Minister of National Revenue or anyone in the Department authorize charitable receipts under such circumstances and, if so (i) on what dates (ii) what are all the details (iii) what are the names and job designations of all those involved?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am informed by the Department of National Revenue and Treasury Board as follows: 1. Yes. The cheque-stuffers distributed to public servants advising of the University of Ottawa compaign contained information of a draw, which was subsequently withdrawn. A registered charity may not issue official receipts for income tax purposes in such circumstances.

Connell and, if so (a) was it addressed to all employees (b) was the entire content devoted in both official languages to urging employees to donate funds to the University of Ottawa and, if so, does this contravene Treasury Board Regulations in regard to charitable campaigns and what is the government's intention concerning this situation (c) what is the name and job designation of the highest ranking official authorizing the newsletter?

[English]

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes; 13 calls were received from Manitoba from July 13, 1979, to November 30, 1980. Five were transport emergencies, six non-transport emergencies and the other two calls were from Manitoba agencies simulating an emergency for training purposes.

6. The Canadian Transport Commission was not asked to investigate any emergencies other than the MacGregor spill and the spill of methanol on April 6, 1980.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Evans: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I apologize to you and the House for rising again with regard to question No. 1,852 which I put on the Order Paper on December 9. As you will be aware, prior to the Easter recess, on April 23, I brought this question to the attention of the parliamentary secretary who responded as follows:

● (1520)

Madam Speaker, following my conversation with the hon. member this morning, I am checking on the matter. I fail to understand why an answer had not been transmitted through the Privy Council office to be presented in the House. I will do my best to have it as soon as we return from the recess.

That was on April 23. It is now May 21. A month has gone by and we still do not have an answer to that question.

On Thursday of last week, I again rose on a point of order bringing this matter to the attention of the government House leader, who gave this undertaking, as reported on page 9586 of Hansard:

Madam Speaker, I shall take notice of the recommendation made by the hon. member concerning his question. I shall consult the parliamentary secretary and ensure that he can provide the hon. member with an answer as soon as possible. There are undoubtedly very valid reasons to justify this delay, and we shall try to give them to him as soon as I have talked with the parliamentary secretary.

I placed this question on the Order Paper on December 9. It deals with the government's conflict of interest regulations, those requirements dealing with conflict of interest as they relate to the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation. The chairman of that corporation indicated publicly over a month ago that he transmitted the information to the government many, many weeks before that. Yet, Madam Speaker, we have still not received an answer.

Since that time one of the appointees to the Canadian Film Development Board, who was appointed earlier this year by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), has resigned because of a conflict of interest not noted at the time of his appointment. Second, the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation has himself indicated that clients of his law firm in the film business come before the CFDC to request financial assistance and he benefits financially because they are clients of his firm.

This is a question of considerable importance, particularly in view of the fact that, if the government delays any further, the chairman of the CFDC will have resigned—his term runs out at the end of this month—before I get an answer to my question.

In view of the assurances given in the House on numerous occasions that an answer would be given to my question, can the parliamentary secretary tell me what the answer to the question is?

Mr. Evans: Madam Speaker, I was not in the House when the hon. member inquired of the President of the Privy Council about this matter last week. This matter was checked. We know the answer is being prepared in the department but we have not received it yet. I expect the hon. member will receive his answer in very short order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—INTEREST RATE POLICY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa) moved:

That this House condemn the government for following a made-in-Washington interest rate policy and for breaking its promise to the Canadian people in the Speech from the Throne that "it recognizes the need to protect those Canadians most affected by unacceptably high interest rates".

He said: Madam Speaker, during the past hour two significant statements have been made. One revealed to Canadians that we now have an interest rate which has jumped beyond 19 per cent, the highest interest rate in the history of Canada. The second statement came some time earlier from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in response to my question concerning precisely the same interest rate problem. The Prime Minister said that he was finding questions on interest rates raised by the New Democratic Party to be repetitious. I want to say through you, Madam Speaker, to the Prime Minister that the questions on interest rates coming from the New Democratic Party are repetitious because the problems are still there. They are not going away. The people of Canada keep asking us questions and we intend to keep asking the Government of Canada questions about interest rates until the government changes its high interest rate policy.

The Liberals made-in-Washington high interest rate policy is a high interest policy which reveals low interest in the needs and concerns of working Canadian men and women. It is a policy of little interest indeed to the concerns of home owners and families who want to buy their first home. It is a policy showing no interest in small business, those men and women who want to expand and rely on the banking system to provide reasonable costs for such expansion. It is a policy which lacks any interest at all in the farmers of Canada. It is a policy that is indifferent to the needs of fishermen and others who rely on reasonable credit costs. In short, the high interest policy of the Liberal Party of Canada totally ignores the interests of the vast majority of Canadians.

Let's face it, the Liberals have an interest policy with only two interests behind it. The first is a policy which is determined to go on giving what can only be described as immorally high profits to the banks and the other lending institutions of Canada. Second, I would stress it is a policy that clings blindly to the misguided economic notion that our high interest rate policy must be made in Washington, not in Ottawa. I will come back to that in a moment.

Consider first the banks. The average increase in first quarter profits in 1981 of our seven chartered banks over the same period last year was 58.3 per cent. But with every new interest rate increase like the one we have experienced today, and the added hardship it provides to Canadians, shouts of joy can be heard in the banks' head offices from one end of the corridors to the other. Nonetheless, the Liberals remain with what can only be described as a doctrine attitude on monetary policy. And while they let Washington lead them around in circles, it is the working men and women of Canada who find themselves dizzy from this unstable economy the Liberals have created.

Despite overwhelming evidence, whether from the United States, the United Kingdom, or previous Conservative governments, the Liberals still retain a policy which cannot be justified by any rational consideration of the facts. Even former finance minister Walter Gordon is telling the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), a former Liberal colleague, that the MacEachen monetary madness has gone far enough. And Mr. Gordon, surely, is right.

Consider Mr. Gordon's points. He demands that the government take action "sooner rather than later so more people won't lose their home and most small businesses don't go bankrupt". He adds that the current high interest rate policy is fuelling rather than fighting inflation. He says the banks' present course is damaging to people and rather than providing a solution it is exacerbating the problem. I say, and I am sure that I speak not only for New Democrats in this House but for Canadians all across the land, that Mr. Gordon is surely right.

I say the government's failure to force the banks to reduce their interest rates is the major cause of Canada's current economic difficulty. That policy must be changed and it must be changed now.

Let us look at some aspects of ordinary existence by ordinary people in this country as they find themselves living in the midst of this monetary madness. First, let me deal with home owners. Two years ago a mortgage could be obtained in Canada for 11 per cent. The increase to the current level of 18.5 per cent—and it will go up again after today's announcement—means an increase in carrying costs in terms of monthly payments of 65 per cent. That means a mortgage of $70,000 will now cost $1,052 per month to carry compared with a former cost of $673 per month.

Home ownership is now out of reach of everyone but those earning beyond $50,000 a year. Put differently, for the first time in my life as an adult and for the first time since the great depression, 90 per cent of Canadians cannot afford to buy their own homes. That is surely the most glaring statistic of all in terms of the government's high interest rate policy. The government says it is pleased with the statistics which show that housing starts have increased recently, but what good is a housing policy that produces houses which only 10 per cent of Canadians can afford?

What about the farmers in Canada? During the past year farm bankruptcies were up 78 per cent over the year before; that is, 1980 over 1979. In the first three months of 1981, farm bankruptcies have continued to climb and this time they are up 70 per cent over the same period last year. Farm bankruptcies are only the tip of the iceberg. Not included in these figures are foreclosures and sell-outs that have been forced upon the farmers of Canada.

What about our small business people? The federal government's failure to understand the interests of small businessmen is profound in its implications, not simply for the people directly involved as owners of small businesses, but for the majority of Canadians because the majority of men and women who work in Canada work for small businesses, not large corporations. When a small businessman goes belly up, the ordinary men and women of Canada also go belly up in terms of losing their occupation. Whether we are talking about farmers, small businessmen, home owners or fishermen, the problem of inflation directly relates to the high interest rate policy and its effect on the majority of Canadians.

Having listed in a very brief way the problems faced by Canadians in these particular occupations, I want now to deal with the government's response to this profoundly serious situation. What has been the government's response when confronted with the evidence? There certainly have been pious expressions of concern. Beyond that, they have said two things. First, they said that high interest rates are needed to bring down the level of inflation. The second argument, whether in the words of the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, has been that opposition suggestions, all nicely lumped together, would exacerbate the inflation problem rather than reduce it.

Last week in a debate on a similar topic, I noted that it was once the practice of the Liberals to refer to the Conservative party when they were in government as a non-government. At that time I said that the Liberals, given their present attitude on interest rates, were providing Canadians with what could only be described as a "con" government. I want to say precisely what I mean by that in terms of the two arguments I just said they make, first that the high interest rate policy is needed to bring down the level of inflation, and second, that opposition suggestions would be counterproductive when it comes to inflation. It is exactly the reverse of the truth.

A con government, like a con artist, likes precisely to do that. He likes to take black and pretend it is white or take white and pretend it is black. The minister dismisses a good argument if it is from the opposition and maintains a bad argument simply because it has come from the government.

Let me deal with the first argument, the interest rate policy being good for inflation. The record is clear. The record of Margaret Thatcher's government in England is clear. The record of Carter's performance, followed by his successor in the White House in the United States, is also clear. The record of the Conservative party when they were in power, followed by the Liberals when they came back into office, is clear. Every time you have had an interest rate increase, rather than leading to a reduction in the rate of inflation it has led to an increase in inflation. Surely that message will get through to the Government of Canada. They should stop paying attention to an ossified, rigid theory which emanated some time ago from Milton Friedman of the University of Chicago and has been accepted holus-bolus by too many governments in the western world, start looking at the evidence, ignore abstract theory and begin paying attention to the real problems in Canada.

The second point concerns their suggestion that the NDP proposals in themselves would contribute to the problem of inflation. I want to take that on particularly this afternoon in this important debate. Our central suggestion when it comes to the interest rate policy has been to force the banks, through direct action by the Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada, to bring down interest rates in Canada step by step to the level of inflation.

It has been suggested that the results of this would be entirely negative, would inevitably lead to an outflow of capital and exacerbate the problem. I suggest that reducing the interest rate would have early tangible, positive effects. It would enable Canadians to own and maintain their home. It would enable farmers, instead of having to sell, to maintain their farms. It would enable all those I talked about earlier to cope with their economic situation and in some cases, such as small businesses, to more than cope and be able to expand. Those would be some of the positive, tangible effects on the economy and on people of a change in interest rate policy.

Let me consider the one negative possibility which the government has raised time after time on this issue, the possibility of an outflow of capital. We in this party have considered that question, just as governments in western Europe have considered it in the past and as two different governments of the United States not only considered it but dealt with it in recent history. If necessary, and I underline those words, if there is to be an outflow of capital which causes problems, we can learn for once from some of the positive actions taken in the United States.

We should look at the experience of President Kennedy in the early sixties and his successor, Richard Nixon, in the seventies. Both presidents were confronted with the problem of an outflow of capital. What did they do? Did they bring in some extreme, radical, totally unheard of idea? Not at all. In both cases the then American president put on, on a temporary basis, a negative taxation to discourage the outflow of capital from the United States. I stress that it was temporary, to deal with a particular problem. I stress that under present circumstances, given the ravages that high interest rates are having on the Canadian economy, it is time we considered such a measure in Canada in order to bring down interest rates. I hope the government will have the intellectual integrity to reply that instead of ignoring it.

I now want to go to another specific aspect of the interest rate policy that we think could be effective and which was not dealt with by the Prime Minister today in response to questions on housing. We did not raise today, although it is appropriate in a different context, the question of an excessive profits tax on banks. We did not consider a second alternative to which the Prime Minister alluded today. We did not mention, and I repeat here with emphasis, the necessity to force the banks of Canada to not simply live up to profit maximization. They are private sector institutions and, of course, they have to make profits. We in this party believe that the banking system has social obligations as well as the right to make profits, and it is up to the Bank of Canada to make sure the banks live up to those social obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Therefore, we say that when we have a situation in which Canadians are selling their homes off at the rate of 1,000 a month because they cannot renew their mortgages, and in view of the current prices of houses vis-à-vis incomes, leaving 90 per cent of Canadians—not simply the poor, though that is bad enough—for the first time in my lifetime as an adult beyond the pale when it comes to being able to purchase a house, then something ought to be done with the banking system, especially when the profits of the banks are at the kind of levels I have already indicated.

What do we say—and I want the government to reply to this? We say that, in addition to forcing through the Bank of Canada a reduction in the general level of the interest rate, categories for lending money ought to be imposed directly on the banking system, and one category should be that of home ownership. We say it may be fine for the banks to reap substantial profits on genuine luxury goods, but we also say in this party that a home is not a luxury good but a necessity, and the banks are not entitled to reap fantastic profits off the backs of home owners in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In this context we say very directly that the Bank Act should be changed. The banks should be forced to have a special lower interest rate for mortgages, because mortgages are simply a form of interest. That rate should be adjusted to enable the average family to obtain a mortgage to buy a house in Canada. Let the profits be made in other sectors, and let the banks use some of their excess profits made in 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980 and 1981 to enable more Canadians to buy their own homes.

I want to conclude by raising and then answering this question. In our judgment, something can and ought to be done about shifting the monetary policy of the government. I have indicated what that should be in terms of a general lowering of the interest rate. Something can and ought to be done about a specific act we have talked about today, and my colleagues will talk about other items.

I want to ask through you, Mr. Speaker, why the government is not doing this? I want to suggest that the reason it is not acting is that the banks are in fact the government's friends. The banks represent, as no other institution in Canadian society, the traditional Liberal view of profit maximization, and it is only with the most extreme reluctance that the government will ever move against such a powerful vested interest. It would almost take a depression before it would move.

We in the social democratic movement do not take that approach at all. We do not wait for disaster to inflict itself upon the people of Canada. We do not regard the banks or any other institution as sancrosanct. We believe the common good to be sancrosanct. Therefore, I say that the Government of Canada is not taking the action it ought to take on interest rates, because that would impinge upon the profits of the banks, and because changing the Bank Act would impinge upon the power of the banks to make their own decisions.

This really is a matter of social philosophy. We in this party believe the Government of Canada should be acting in the interests of the people of Canada, not in the interests of the banks of Canada. We in this party are going to continue day after day to pressure the Prime Minister and the government on the other side of the House finally to live up to the commitment made in the throne speech last year to act for those who are negatively affected by the high interest rate policy of the Government of Canada. We are going to continue to put pressure on the government until it finally abolishes the high interest rate policy which is doing untold damage to the people of this country, wherever they live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, we in this party certainly join with the NDP, to use the words of their motion, in condemning the government "for following a made-in-Washington interest rate policy and for breaking its promise". We join them in condemning, disparaging, deploring and criticizing, indeed, even weeping over, this Liberal government's interest rate policy, and in particular over its record of broken promises.

The motion deals just with the promise made in last year's throne speech but in fact the record of broken promises by the Liberal party extends much beyond last year's throne speech. This is the same party headed by the same Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which in virtually every throne speech and every budget speech over the last decade and longer promised to increase growth, reduce unemployment, reduce inflation and keep interest rates low.

Remember the famous commitment that the Prime Minister was going to wrestle inflation to the ground. Remember the promise not to impose wage and price controls and then the flip-flop to do exactly that. Remember the promise that after controls were phased out inflation would decline to about 3 per cent or 4 per cent by 1981. Remember the first ministers' meeting in the summer of 1978 when the Prime Minister declared confidently that, as a result of Liberal party economic policies, by 1981 inflation would be at 3.5 per cent. As we know, inflation in 1981 is at 12.7 per cent, higher than at any time since 1948 when the war-imposed wage and price controls came off. Remember the promises and commitments of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), when he was Minister of Finance, in his budget of 1978. He predicted quite confidently that that budget would reduce inflation to 6 per cent.

Let us consider what the Liberals had to say when they were in opposition and during the election campaign. Remember The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), when he was finance critic for the Liberal party, saying in the Commons finance committee on October 25:

> We of the official opposition, while recognizing concern about inflation, are also very concerned about the impact of these increases in interest rates to record levels on the economy as a whole, and particularly on small business, farmers and consumers.

I wonder what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is saying now as he sits around the cabinet table?

What did the Prime Minister have to say on February 10, 1980? He said:

> I would want to manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would in fact come down . . . because the economy would be administered in a sounder way.

It was just pointed out to me that this subject so interests the Liberal party that, while the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is in Gabon, we have two members present in the House of their caucus of 145.

An hon. Member: That's how much they care.

Mr. Andre: I wonder if the House remembers the statement reported in The Toronto Sun on February 4 by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, then the finance spokesman for the Liberal party, who said:

> It is my belief we can manage the economy in a way that would allow us to have lower interest rates than we have now and I think we can have greater independence in interest rate policy.
> I don't think that allowing the dollar to have some downward adjustment would do as much harm to our economy as our present high level of interest rates.

Then he said the same thing on "The Watson Report" on October 15, 1979; he said the same thing in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on October 30, 1979; and so forth.

Those were the promises and commitments of the Liberal party with regard to interest rates. There have been more broken promises than just those in the throne speech which were made and broken, which we condemn along with the New Democratic Party. There is a long trail of broken promises. In fact, based on what the Liberals have promised and what they have delivered, only a fool would believe anything a Liberal says, and only a party of fools would so quickly and unashamedly jump in and out of bed with them.

The reality of the Liberal government is that promises, commitments and goals are political instruments to be used to manipulate public opinion, and they have little or no relationship to performance or to the programs which are devised and implemented in virtually complete isolation.

For example, let us look at the last so-called budget, or budget-cum-energy statement. The intent of the programs and policies contained therein are very clear. The intent is to increase federal control over the oil and gas industry, to give the federal government access to more revenue, to increase state ownership and to sacrifice, if necessary, the conventional oil and gas industry in order to promote offshore and high Arctic exploration, which is under federal jurisdiction. Those are not particularly politically palatable, so while that is the reality of the program, the stated goals and promises are to attain self-sufficiency by 1990, to Canadianize the industry to 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990 and to have a fair revenue share. The goals have no relationship to the program. I concede that part of the program has been operated with some success, but the fact is that the promises, the commitments, the goals and the objectives are PR fluff. They are put out by Mr. McLaren and Dr. Goebbels' department through his advertising campaign, but they have nothing to do with the reality of the program.

At least I will say that the government has an energy program, wrong-headed, dumb, disastrous and damaging as it is. In the Department of Finance there is not even a program. There is no program at all. The subject seems to interest neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Finance. After being re-elected last February on a platform which had to do with energy, inflation and interest rates, the Prime Minister then devoted virtually the entire next year to a personal crusade to impose on this country his own version of what our Constitution should be, in spite of the damage this might do to the country. Now that he apparently has done as much damage as he can do in that regard, he is traipsing around the world trying to impress people with his knowledge of global problems and with his perception of what needs to be done to cure those world problems. Having wrecked Canada, he has now set his sights on the rest of the world.

When the Minister of Finance stops in Ottawa in between Hawaii and Gabon, where he apparently is now, he produces about as much substance as a fog machine. In spite of being in his portfolio for over a year, he has failed so far to produce anything resembling an economic policy. Even that fine Liberal institution, the Toronto Star, was forced to conclude about the Minister of Finance and the general state of the economy in its May 2 editorial that, and I quote:

> The state of our economy is, in a word, miserable.
> Our economic growth is stagnant.
> Throughout all this, the Minister of Finance—the man with fundamental responsibility for steering the nation's economy—has been acting like a passive and barely interested bystander.

Then at the end of the editorial the Toronto Star said:

> The time has come for MacEachen to either begin meeting those responsibilities much more convincingly than he has done so far, or to step aside. At this crucial and difficult point in our economic development, the finance portfolio cannot be merely a place to hide until something more interesting comes along.

With respect to that editorial, at least, I agree wholeheartedly with the Toronto Star. I wonder about a Minister of Finance who so glibly and unashamedly refuses to accept his responsibilities, and I wonder about a Prime Minister who seems to care not at all about the economic state of the nation and who occupies his mind on much loftier concerns than the mere jobs of Canadians, the mere payment of mortgages by young people trying to buy homes and mere attempts to maintain small businesses when small businessmen are looking at interest rates of 20 per cent plus. I wonder about the morality of that kind of government. The reality is that this government has no policy. The Minister of Finance really has no policy.

The motion of the New Democratic Party today accuses the government of following a made-in-Washington interest rate policy. To some extent that is true. In fact, based on the performance of the Bank of Canada in the last little while with respect to interest rates in Canada, I think we could disband the bank and replace it with a clerk. We could instruct him once every week to telephone Washington to find out what the interest rates are and then declare that those are the appropriate interest rates for Canada.

But in fact we are not following Washington strictly. We are leading Washington. According to the latest data, Canada now has the highest interest rates of any western industrialized nation. The central bank discount rate in the United States as of May 5 was 14 per cent. As of March 18 in Japan it was 6¼ per cent. As of May 2 in Germany it was 7½ per cent. The latest figure for France is 9½ per cent. That terrible pariah, Mrs. Thatcher of the United Kingdom, has managed to maintain a central bank discount rate of 12 per cent. In Italy the figure is 19 per cent. In Canada today, as we know, it is 19.06 per cent. We have the dubious distinction of not following the United States or any other country but of leading them all. We have the highest interest rates of any country in the western world.

With the exception of Canada every one of those countries pays the world price for crude oil, so the statement that the Minister of Finance continually makes in this House that we have high interest because of high inflation and high inflation because energy prices have gone up is absolute nonsense. Every one of these countries pays the world price. Japan imports 100 per cent of its oil and gas and has a 6¼ per cent interest rate. It is simply an unacceptable and intellectually dishonest argument for the government to make to say that we have to endure high interest rates because of high inflation which in turn is attributable to high energy prices. The fact of the matter is that every other country in the western world has been able to deal with world energy prices in such a way as to maintain interest rates within those countries at lower levels than in Canada. The only country which comes close to being as bad as Canada in this regard is Italy.

Mr. Evans: And the United States.

Mr. Andre: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) says the United States, yet as of May 5 the central bank discount rate in the United States was 14 per cent.

Mr. Evans: That is irrelevant and you know it. What is the prime rate?

Mr. Andre: The prime rate is 18 per cent, as opposed to 19.06 per cent in Canada. That is as of May 5. The latest figures are published in the May issue of World Financial Markets, which is a publication of Morgan Guaranty. Those are the figures I am using. I suppose the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance must be living in the same kind of airy-fairy world as his mentor, the Minister of Finance, and must not really be aware of the true situation.

It is tragic in the extreme, Mr. Speaker, that for over a year the Minister of Finance has been in his portfolio and has yet to come up with anything vaguely resembling an economic policy. In fact, the only policy he has now is to let the Bank of Canada pursue its tight money policy. The Bank of Canada has for several years been operating on the theory that if you control the money supply, keep it within certain limits, this will eventually bring down the rate of inflation to that level. Well, that policy has been in place for several years now and during that time inflation rates have in fact climbed, and we now have enough experience to make the empirical judgment that that is a bad policy.

However, Mr. Speaker, one does not need just to make that empirical observation; in fact, examining the policy for what it is raises all kinds of questions about its validity. For example, there is the mere question of the kind of money, if you will, that the Bank of Canada is controlling. Their policy is to control the so called M1, which is currency and demand deposits, within a limit of 5 to 9 per cent and they have now dropped that down to 4 to 8 per cent. In fact, Mr. Speaker, there was a raging argument several years ago, and it continues in this country, the United States and Europe, as to whether M1 represents an adequate definition of money, and many suggest that M3 should be used, which is currency and all chequable notices and term deposits plus foreign currencies. If we look at M3 over the last few years, we see it has been growing at a rate more closely analogous to the inflation rate. It has been growing at 12, 14, 16 per cent, while M1 has been growing at between 5 and 9 per cent. So perhaps those who argue that the Bank of Canada is controlling the wrong type of money have a pretty valid argument based on the performance that we have observed so far.

Moreover, M1 merely represents transactional money. The theory is that if you control and limit that, you limit the transactional ability of the economy to progress by limiting the ability of people to spend and invest, thereby taking some of the steam out of the economy and producing a lower inflation rate. Well, one of the experts in regard to interest rates, I suppose on a global basis but certainly in the United States, is Henry Kaufman, chief economist with Salomon Brothers, a very well known and highly reputed Wall Street firm. He has consistently and very accurately predicted high interest rates over the last decade and dismissed the impact of money supply on interest rates. He points out in an article in Fortune magazine of May, 1981:

"One of the great wonders of the world", he says, "is the American credit market." In his view, bankers over the last two decades have been dismayingly creative in attracting new types of deposits and finetuning "spreads" between their cost of money and their selling price, so that they can turn a profit no matter how much they pay for deposits.

The net result is that there is no discount rate that the Central Bank imposes which will affect the profits of banks. In fact, as the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) points out, profits tend to go up under those circumstances. He then goes on to say that what really matters in terms of money and inflation in the economy is the credit involved; not the currency or the transactional money, but use of credit. He gives examples of the kind of creativity shown by modern bankers and financial officers with corporations. I quote:

"The financial markets are very innovative, and we're going to find some more substitutes for money," says Kaufman. "We can drive that credit mechanism very hard." Thus he forsees an increase in the velocity of money far beyond past experience.

The net effect of that, as he says here, is that not only have high interest rates not dampened the creation of credit and therefore the flow of money, but it has merely added to the cost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I see you are trying to get to your feet, but before I step down I wish to put on the record an amendment to the motion. In view of the fact that the government has no policies, I think it behooves them to look at ways in which perhaps some of the damage can be ameliorated at no great cost to the treasury. Therefore, I move;

That the motion standing in the name of Mr. Broadbent be amended by deleting the final period and adding thereafter:

"and calls on the government to introduce measures to make property taxes and mortgage interest tax deductible and to extend the provisions of the small business development bond to cover farms and non-incorporated businesses for working capital as well as fixed capital financing."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he has exceeded his time.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has given the members of this House the opportunity to discuss an extremely important and topical subject that concerns most Canadians. However, I would like to tell him that I am disappointed that he has imputed the economic problems facing not only the Canadian society but the whole western world to one type only of financial institutions, namely the banks. He will probably accuse me in return of simplifying the tone and substance of his speech. However, that is how I perceived his comments, and I cannot believe that the leader of the New Democratic Party would allow himself to make such a simplification. I shall blame partisanship for his having ascribed the economic problems of our country to the activities or operations of only one type of financial institutions, namely the chartered banks.

I would also like to remind the leader of the New Democratic Party that when he speaks of the profitability or the profitability rate of our chartered banks, he should be aware of the data he uses for comparison purposes. For instance, he has compared the first quarter of 1981 to the first quarter of 1980. Yet, we know that, because of certain economic conditions, there was a high profitability rate during the first quarter of 1981, while because of other economic conditions, the rate for the first quarter of 1980 was lower than usual compared with the quarterly rate of previous years for the same period. I believe therefore these two figures alone do not allow us to draw firm conclusions since the economic conditions during the periods involved were exactly the opposite. Any conclusion must therefore suffer from this distortion, and a much longer period should be considered to determine real profitability rates. On the other hand, I would like to point out to him that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has undertaken that his department will look fully into this sector and monitor profitability rates, and that the minister would take appropriate action if there were excessive profits.

I also noted in the comments of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) that he was making a comparison between the bank rates from country to country. This is not in every case an indication of consumer interest rates. In certain countries, the bank rate directly reflects consumer interest rates, while there might be a significant difference in others. For instance, in the United States, the bank rate of the central bank is now at 14 per cent while the prime rate is at 20 per cent. There is therefore a difference of 6 per cent between the bank rate of the central bank and the prime rate of American banks. It is therefore an unsound argument to draw inferences from the bank rates of various countries and that consumer interest rates are related to the bank rates since the difference between the bank rates and the rate structures are not the same in every country.

Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party condemns the government and suggests that interest rates for Canada are set in Washington. It is quite obvious that Canada has important commercial and financial ties with the economy of the United States. It is also true that Canada and the United States are both facing serious inflationary problems. In view of the similarity of the economic conditions in both countries, a certain analogy in the evolution of interest rates in our two countries should not come as a surprise. Nevertheless, there are significant differences between the American policy and the Canadian policy as concerns interest rates. In the last 18 months, interest rates in Canada have been far less volatile than in the United States. While American interest rates reached record highs temporarily both in April and in December of last year, interest rates in Canada remained significantly lower.

In the United States certain short-term interest rates went up by as much as ten percentage points in as brief a period as five weeks. Although certain movements have been relatively significant in Canada they have been less noticeable than those which occurred in the United States. At the same time we went through periods during which the exchange rate was under strong downward pressure. During the spring last year, for instance, when the American interest rates were at record levels, the Canadian exchange rate dropped by more than four cents. When the American interest rates reached unprecedented heights in December of last year, the Canadian exchange rate stood at its lowest mark since the first years of the depression.

In recent days the dollar exchanged at close to $0.83, whereas interest rates in the U.S. compared favourably with those of Canada or were slightly above Canada's rates. When looking at those differences in interest rates we must recall that historically the American interest rates have usually been much lower than Canadian prevailing rates. Those changes in the interest rates and in the financial situation of the United States created a problem of a general nature for Canada's monetary policy because we had to decide either to go along with a similar volatility of our interest rates or again accept very sharp fluctuations in the value of the Canadian dollar. The policy adopted by the Bank of Canada and strongly endorsed by the Minister of Finance is to steer an intermediary course, in other words, as far as possible, to reduce to a minimum the volatility of the Canadian interest rates while at the same time resisting undue downward pressure on the exchange rate. Even though external factors did have a significant impact on Canadian interest rates, Canada's economic situation is also a major element of the pressures which are brought to bear on interest rates.

Since the budget speech of last October several developments originating abroad as well as in Canada changed the course of our economy in 1980 and the outlook for 1981. After the decline recorded in the first half of 1980, the Canadian and the American economies did not remain in a state of recession as it had been expected. In fact, the strength of the upswing was even surprising. Economic activity in Canada increased at an annual rate in excess of 8 per cent in the last quarter of 1980, which offset the drop recorded at the beginning of the year. On an annual basis the real gross national product hardly changed in 1980, but investments did increase very rapidly that same year. A real growth of 8.5 per cent was reported. On the other hand, the housing sector was very weak, particularly in the first half; our trade balance surplus reached $8 billion, more than double that of the previous year. That enabled us to cut down from $5.8 billion to $2.8 billion our current operations account deficit with foreign countries.

Let us now consider what happened in the field of employment. The number of jobs rose by 286,000, an increase of 2.8 per cent. A record level of 59.2 per cent of the Canadian population was employed. Incomplete data for the first quarter of 1981 lead us to believe that we will witness the same strong growth as the one recorded in the fourth quarter. A real growth of roughly 1 to 1.5 per cent, which means 4 to 6 per cent on an annual basis, appears likely. Employment went up by 1.3 per cent in the first quarter and that led to a slight decline in the unemployment rate to 7.3 per cent. The growth in employment continued through April and the unemployment rate dropped to 7 per cent, the lowest it has been since June 1976. In April, the cumulative increase in employment for the twelve previous months was 3.3 per cent, which means 346,000 new jobs. The economic recovery which has begun in the second half of 1980, both in Canada and in the U.S., forced us to revise upwards our forecasts for real growth in 1981. A rate of growth of between 2.5 and 3 per cent is now generally accepted, compared to the one per cent that was expected when the budget was brought down.

This improved picture for real growth is dimmed, however, by less encouraging prospects as far as inflation is concerned. The increase in expected growth for the goods, services and manpower markets combined with the downward pressure of the rate of exchange will only exert more inflationary pressure. Price increases for goods are also expected to be greater than what was forecast last fall. Provincial tax increases as well as energy price hikes will only worsen our inflation rate projections.

Furthermore, to compensate for Alberta crude oil cutbacks, the federal government has imposed a levy in order to avoid increasing subsidies for imported oil. In April, the CPI was 12.6 per cent higher than for the previous year. Price increases in the last few months are due in large part to energy costs. These increases are necessary and during the adjustment period we can expect the general rate of inflation to be relatively high. What is cause for even greater concern in the long run is the increase in non-energy and non-food components of the consumer price index. We must also be mindful of the rate of salary increases.

Recent increases, Mr. Speaker, show that inflationary expectations are entrenched in the minds of employees, workers, as well as employers. Increased housing starts in many areas of the country, for example, despite record level mortgage rates, also show that this inflationary psychology is firmly entrenched in our views and in our outlook on the economic future of our country. The vigour of our economic activities and the strength of these inflationary expectations could by themselves explain the upward pressures on interest rates. But we must also consider that for the last few weeks another factor has been influencing this trend. Indeed, the increase in interest rates in the U.S. which exerts pressure on the rate of exchange also greatly affects the interest rate situation in Canada.

High interest rates do not seem to have greatly slowed down credit buying in this country. Save for a few weeks in March, the rapid increase in bank loans, which started in the last quarter of last year, continued. According to recent data published by the Bank of Canada, general loans by chartered banks now amount to more than $100 billion, which means an increase of $14 billion over the last seven months. Alternatives to bank credit have also increased. All this points to the fact that the demand for credit in Canada is under terrific pressure.

Considering the context which I have just described, we concur in the interest rate policy advocated by the Bank of Canada to support the Canadian dollar. One can hardly argue that a depreciation of the dollar is required to maintain the competitive advantage of Canadian products on world markets as it has been suggested. On the other hand, this very same depreciation could add to the direct inflationary pressures such as those resulting from the increased price of imported products. This same depreciation could also play upon the indirect inflationary pressures which result from the increased capacity of Canadian firms to grant inflationary salary increases.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn briefly from the monetary policy aspect to the financial standing of the government. The statement of financial operations for March as published yesterday gives a first indication of the financial requirements for the fiscal year 1980-81. The initial estimate was set at $10.3 billion, that is almost $2 billion less than provided for in the budget. This figure would be moderately altered. The preliminary figures on the components of the financial standing for 1980-81 will not be available before July. However, we can now estimate that the budgetary deficit will be about $1.5 billion lower than expected in the budget.

Mr. Speaker, present monetary and fiscal policies are aimed at checking inflationary pressures. They will not cause instant changes, but they can be expected to slow down the growth of expenditures and thus create an atmosphere in which inflation can be reduced further. It is absolutely illusory to believe, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party does, that higher interest rates will have an immediate or concurrent influence on inflation rates.

The impact of a monetary policy compounded with an interest rate policy that conforms to inflationary pressures is a medium and long-term process. Any attempt at finding a wonder solution that would bring down interest rates overnight to something like 7 per cent while dispelling inflationary pressures, would be altogether illusory. On the contrary, such a policy would only add oil to the flames of inflation. By and large monetary and fiscal policies that do not contribute to inflation are recognized as absolutely necessary if sustained progress is to be made in wrestling down inflation. A marked decline in the inflation rate is known to be a prerequisite to relatively low interest rates.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is also generally agreed that the speed and ease with which those policies will reduce demand, and consequently decrease inflationary pressures, are subject to many factors which are in turn extremely variable. As a rule, if all decision-makers in the field of economics were immediately and totally convinced of the need to pursue the policies I have just described, the path to a lower inflation rate and lower interest rates would be short and relatively smooth. But actually we will probably have to take a much rougher road. The strength of the demand for expenditures and credit may initially push interest rates still higher, especially if inflationary expectations persist, and all the more so if they are compelling. It is very important to stress, Mr. Speaker, that the fight against inflation cannot be waged by the government alone; to win the fight against inflation the efforts of each and every economic agent must be co-ordinated.

The government has an important part to play in directing the fiscal and monetary policies in order to draw up a consistent strategy to fight inflation. However, economic agents from the unions to the employers, the corporations and even the individuals must also be convinced of the need to fight inflation, and also, as economic agents, to take the necessary steps to ease inflationary pressures. Yet, the co-operation of all these agents of the economy is of vital importance and should complement, as I said, the efforts made by the government to contain rising production costs and inflation.

The Conservative spokesman has moved an amendment to the motion of the leader of the New Democratic Party. The purpose of his motion is to call on the government to introduce measures designed to ease the burden of high interest rates on various sectors of our society, more specifically on farm producers, manufacturers, small businessmen and home owners, by subsidizing interest rates in some way. Mr. Speaker, I have just stated that these high interest rates were due to the over-all economic situation in Canada and in particular to the strong inflationary pressures that are presently at work. If, through government intervention we tried to cushion the negative effects of these interest rates, we would totally cancel the expected results, namely to reduce inflationary pressures and expectations. This would be tantamount to cancelling the desirable effects that are hoped for. I think, as I said earlier, that there is a price to pay and that all economic agents and all citizens must band together if we really want to improve the situation in the long run; that is, to actually reduce the inflation rate, inflationary pressures and, hence, interest rates. It is such an effort of co-ordination and commitment on the part of economic agents and all citizens that the Minister of Finance has asked us to make in his last budget when he created the conditions designed to reach this objective.

Mr. Speaker, in this difficult economic context, the government has tried, in keeping with its basic philosophy, to protect those who are hardest hit by these economic hardships and rising interest rates. It is a fact that the Progressive Conservative opposition made a big issue of the idea of retaining the indexing of exemptions in our tax structure before the October budget was brought down. It stressed the importance of going on indexing the personal income tax in the trying times we were going through. Well, the Minister of Finance acknowledged that it was appropriate to retain indexation with regard to personal income tax in order to alleviate the burden of low-income groups in a period of economic hardships, high interest rates and high inflation. The retention of income tax indexation meant that an additional $1.6 billion was left in the pockets of taxpayers. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, large families are aware, for instance, that the indexing of family allowances has enabled them to be compensated in some measure for the hardships they experience as a result of these inflationary pressures and high interest rates.

There are other groups which are also seriously affected, namely, elderly people. The basic allowances paid to elderly people are also indexed. It is also well known that the government increased the guaranteed income supplement as soon as it returned to power, precisely because the economic situation was difficult and because it knew that those people were the most affected. Those guaranteed income supplements are also indexed.

Mr. Speaker, if we want lower interest rates, we must fight inflationary pressures together and reduce our inflationary expectations. Then the population may be sure that the government is determined to carry on the fight and to protect the most sorely tried in our society.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I want to add something to this debate about the effects of high rates of interest, particularly on small businesses. I particularly choose that aspect because I have a personal connection with small business and know how it is affected.

Reviewing how the rates have jumped around in the last few months, I see a great danger that if this problem is not resolved, thousands of small businesses will not survive. When I speak of small businesses I include farmers and fishermen. We face the danger of their not surviving the high interest rates that are before us today.

A 19.06 per cent central bank rate is shocking, Mr. Speaker. It means that most small businessmen will probably be paying in the 25 per cent bracket for funds from chartered banks. In this situation most small businessmen find that they are bracketed as far as gross profit is concerned. They sell something and make a gross profit, but the price at which they sell is pretty well set by the marketplace. They are not in the position where they have an exclusive product with no competition so that they can set the price at will and make an unusual gain. That is not the situation. Their gross profit is bracketed.

In the meantime costs go up. Costs that they cannot control, such as Bell Canada, municipal taxes, provincial taxes, federal taxes, workmen's compensation, are increasing and gross profit gets slimmer and slimmer, until the profit available at the bottom line is equal to the rate of interest paid to the bank for the use of money. That is the position they are in today.

Some measures must be adopted to ease the pressure on the small business sector. A mechanism must be developed to follow venture and operating capital into small business. It should not be a single instrument such as the small business development bond, which is welcome relief but is too limited in application.

Who is the largest employer in Canada, Mr. Speaker? It is the small business sector. Who is the most stable employer in Canada? It is the small business operator. Who keeps his employees on when the market turns down? It is the small businessman. Why does he do this? Perhaps because he is a little more human and is closer to his workers. Another reason may be that he has to compete with the large employer and one of the levers he has is to keep his employees on when the market turns down. His employees know they have a steady job so that is one of his levers. He imparts a tremendous stability to the economy which is not imparted by any other entity. We must never forget those basic principles, Mr. Speaker.

The concept of the small business development bond is good, but the repayment terms should be extended to ten years. There should be a series of variations to the small business development bond to allow it to be used for refinancing small business.

Aside from that, we also require a venture capital instrument which will offer, say, a non-taxable return or an exemption from capital gains tax, or perhaps an instrument which can be completely written off against income tax by the lender when issued, with the tax payable on earnings from the repayment or when anything is received. There are a hundred variations to this; I have outlined only a few. Something like that, however, must be put in place. Regardless of the method chosen, a venture capital instrument must be found. Small business must be refinanced. Small business must be recapitalized and the problem must be attacked on an urgent basis.

The reality of running a small business is that you must deal with the frustration of research and development and the financing thereof. Good ideas are not restricted to large companies which have researchers, engineering department and R and D facilities funded by the corporate treasury and by public funds. There is a great deal of inventiveness and innovation in the small business community.

The tragedy small business faces is that when an R and D project is closed down, the guy who usually has to close it down is the comptroller. It is not for lack of ideas, lack of innovation, lack of market sense, product design or anything of that nature; it is lack of cash which causes a close down. That is a reality which must be brought home to the government opposite. I can hear these people who have the job of closing down R and D projects saying the prime rate has just gone through the 19 per cent level and the bank is now charging 25 per cent, so we cannot afford to keep the R and D venture going. I have been there and I know all about it.

R and D projects have to be closed down because there are the payrolls to meet or accounts payable have to be paid or whatever happens to take precedence over R and D. Those are the situations we face now that R and D projects will be closed down all across the country. Even in my own business these projects have been closed down. I ordered that done today as soon as I heard what the rate was. Small businessmen just cannot afford to keep projects going with rates this high. As a result, all of those good ideas are gone from the system while the situation continues the way it is.

I know that it is very easy to criticize in these debates. We are told by members opposite that all we do is criticize, that we never come up with any solutions. However, I have some solutions to suggest. I have already suggested that the small business development bond be extended, that it be allowed to be used for recapitalizing a small business, which I think is a good thing. I do not see that it will cost all that much. I have also suggested that repayment terms be extended to ten years.

However, with respect to research and development, I propose that we put in place a registered research and development fund for small business. Small business should be allowed to contribute a portion of their tax payable to this fund, somewhat similar to the way an RRSP works and so on. In other words, out of the tax payable a businessman could take a sum of money, put it on one side into a research and development fund, and when that fund was at its optimum he could begin his research and development project by having enough money to complete it.

It think that is a good idea, it is workable and it is simple. It is not something that will call for a government subsidy, such as programs worth $250 million or $300 million. It would only affect those who would want to get into this sort of venture. This is a program which would allow many small companies to get on with their research projects and so help us down the road with future employment.

By a simple amendment to the Small Business Loans Act we could allow money to be used to complete a research and development project, because none of these things is complete in itself. A business might get going on something and suddenly find that another $25,000, $30,000 or $100,000 is needed to complete it. An amendment such as that would certainly be of benefit to small business.

The same act could be amended to allow for the registering and purchasing of a patent, a trademark, a registered design or even for the purchase of existing technology. I know it is popular today in business to use the buzz words "high technology", "innovative designs", and all that sort of thing, but most people employed in Canada today and who will be employed in the foreseeable future will be using reasonably common technology. There will be things such as the Telidon deal, announced either last night or today, which by 1985 or 1986 will create 10,000 new jobs. That is fine, but I say 200,000 jobs could be created in the small business sector by allowing some mechanism to get research and development projects going. As I said, if we could amend the Small Business Loans Act to allow people to purchase a patent, register a patent, a trademark, a registered design or existing technology, tools, jigs, fixtures, methods and so on, that would be of tremendous help. I am talking about low and common technology which is used every day. This may hurt some of the upwardly mobile people who like to bounce from one high technology cloud to another, but the reality is that the jobs are in small business at the present time. Much imported machinery comes into Canada that could be made in Canada. But what it comes down to is that old devil money and the high interest rates we have to pay if we are going to get on with projects like that.

Each time we talk about something the government should do involving money, each time members talk about high inflation or high interest rates and how these things are hurting small business or the consumer, there is a cry from the government side that we are asking for subsidies that will only add to the deficit, fuel inflation further and make things worse than they are. I have put forward three valid workable solutions that will help set straight some of the problems faced by small business. I challenge the government to take up those ideas and put them in the next budget. The government should put them into operation. They could be modified. The important thing is the thought. In the long run these proposals will pay dividends for business, the labour force and finally for the government.

I shall stop here because I know there are other hon. members who want to speak. I like to be constructive in this type of debate. I know we are going through a very difficult time and that we have to find solutions. If we do not, we will have an awful mess in Canada. Our employment rate will zoom to double what it is if we do not solve these problems.

I put these ideas forward in the hope that the government will take them seriously and consider them. I will be pleased to sit down with government members to expand on these ideas and give any other help I can in this regard to assist in putting these things in place, because I know they will pay dividends down the road.

● (1650)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to commend the chief opposition whip for the very constructive ideas he put forward, especially with regard to research and development. They are ideas he and I have discussed before. I want to assure him that I am certainly looking very carefully at what he has suggested. Hopefully, something can be done to respond to the concerns he so rightfully raised, especially in the area of research and development. We are all aware of the problem. He has some very interesting proposals that deserve serious consideration.

With regard to the motion before the House dealing with the interest rate situation facing this country, in the last week we have had at least two opportunities to discuss this question and the causes of the difficulties we now face. We heard a great deal of opposition comment with regard to policies the government should adopt in trying to respond to the situation we face.

My opportunity to discuss the subject today will be used to indicate why those alternatives that have been put forward thus far in this debate and on the previous two opposition days are simply not workable and why the current government policy is the appropriate policy. It is the only policy that holds any hope of eliminating the problem we face and not exacerbating the problem. It does very little good to discuss the concept of interest rates or basic economic concepts using the tool of rhetoric as opposed to the tool of logic and understanding and the basic economic forces that face this country today, trying to respond to those basic economic forces with policies that deal with the problem and not just the symptoms.

As hon. members know, we are facing a very difficult situation. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated in his May 6 speech, if you analyse the last five to six months, inflation is running somewhere in the range to 13½ to 14 per cent. That is an unacceptably high rate of inflation. That factor alone is the prime driving force behind high interest rates.

There are two other factors that I will mention that are exacerbating the problem and creating additional upward pressures on interest rates. The main driving force behind high interest rates is the high rate of inflation and the expectation that the inflation rate will either continue at these high levels or in fact get worse. It is those expectations we have to deal with in addition to the fundamental causes that are driving up that rate of inflation.

If we look at the most recent month, as the Minister of Finance indicated the other day in the House during question period, there was a reduction in the rate of increase in inflation. In the first quarter of this year, we had monthly inflation factors of 1.3 per cent, 1 per cent and 1.3 per cent. In the month of April we saw a decline to .7 per cent which, if you annualize it, will be in the range of 8.7 per cent. That could be a temporary anomaly. We certainly hope not. We hope it is a sign that finally inflationary pressures are being brought under control. If that is the case, we will see lower inflation and lower interest rates. It is too early to say whether that is the establishment of a long-term trend. We certainly know it is a hopeful light.

In addition to the inflation factor that is so very important in establishing the level of today's interest rates, there are two other factors. The first is the fact that the federal government and Bank of Canada are into a policy that, in my opinion, is the only policy that promises any hope of success in dealing with inflation. It is the only policy that I am convinced will work, and that is to bring the growth rate in purchasing power more into line with the growth rate in real output in the economy.

The Bank of Canada recently reduced its target for the growth rate of the money supply, defined, as the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) indicated, as M1, into the 4 to 8 per cent range. In fact, the bank is holding the money supply growth in that range. In so doing, the bank is reducing the relative growth rate in money below the level of inflation. As a result, the relative effect is to create a reduction in the supply of purchasing power in the system below that which is demanded, even at the current inflation rate, and even at stable demand levels.

On the other hand, we have a fire of expectations in the system, as I indicated last week and as the minister also indicated, which has led to an increase in the demand for credit to buy now before prices go higher later, up some 20 per cent in April. Therefore, we have two forces operating here, the constraint on the supply of credit by the central bank, the government, at the same time as a major increase in the demand for credit. These two forces are going to cause an escalation in the real rate of interest above inflation. It is going to cause that gap between inflation and interest rates to widen.

The final factor we are faced with, one that is also very important, is the level of interest rates in the United States. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) stated that the federal government has, first, a high interest rate policy and, second, that it is a made-in-Washington interest rate policy. Neither statement is true. The policy of the government is not to have high interest rates. The policy is to deal with the fundamental factors that are causing inflation, to bring down the rate of inflation, and part of the transition we are going through is temporarily higher interest rates than would normally be the case.

One of the factors, not a major factor, involved in those high interest rates is the fact that interest rates are very high in the United States. All of the dynamics involved in flows between Canada and the United States, requiring that our rates be in very close relation to their rates, means that when rates go up in the United States there is additional upward pressure on our rates to stay in line. Therefore, there are three major factors or forces driving up interest rates in this country today, and I have just outlined them.

If you are going to deal with the problem of high interest rates, there is no alternative but to deal with the factors that are causing them. To say that the federal government should reduce interest rates is to say nothing. Neither the federal government nor any other government can step forward and with a wave of a magic wand say that interest rates tomorrow will be 5 percentage points lower than they are today.

Mr. Broadbent: That is precisely what the Bank of Canada does.

Mr. Evans: It cannot be done, and it is not what the Bank of Canada does or is doing. If the hon. member for Oshawa believes that, then he is more misguided than I thought.

With regard to the U.S.-Canada rate situation, the hon. member for Oshawa in his opening comments correctly noted that if we let our interest rates fall appreciably below those in the United States there will be an outflow of capital from Canada which will put downward pressure on the exchange rate. If we do not allow the exchange rate to go down it will put upward pressure on interest rates. So that flow of capital is a factor with which we have to deal.

The hon. member for Oshawa indicates what we could do, and that is put on exchange controls. There are some definite problems associated with exchange controls and I will deal with those in a minute.

Let me ask this question. If we were to have a drop in the dollar and we were to say that interest rates are not going to be related to U.S. rates, and if they go up we will allow the outflows to take place and allow the dollar to drop, what would be the effect of that? Immediately we would have a major inflationary surge caused by the drop in the value of our currency, and the effect of that drop on prices of all the goods we import, food, and at the moment energy and a number of fundamental commodities, would be that they would go up automatically.

People say yes, but that would mean foreign goods would be less competitive and as a result our manufacturers would be able to move in and produce those things. The fact is that in the short term—and by "short term" I mean five years—we are not going to be in a position to replace in any major sense imported oil, and we are not ever going to be in a position to replace fresh fruits and vegetables imported during the winter. These things cannot be replaced in the short term, and in the short term we are not going to replace the importation of machinery or equipment that we bring in which is necessary for the development of the tar sands and other natural resources in Canada. Those things cannot be replaced in the short term. Over the longer term perhaps that could be done.

My contention here is that if you are talking about a major investment expenditure the exchange rate is not going to be the determining factor that causes a businessman to decide to go into a line of business, because in a flexible exchange rate world exchange rates change. If the only reason you are investing in Canada to produce machinery and equipment is because the exchange rate in Canada happens to be 20 cents below the equivalent in the United States, then you are basing your profitability on a factor that is totally unpredictable and one which could be wiped out tomorrow. So that is not a major factor in investment decision-making; there are many other factors.

We are not going to get the kind of import replacement some members believe would occur. The question is, would you get a major stimulus in demand for domestic products and would the prices for those domestic products produced here in Canada be unaffected by the increase in the competitive position and the decrease in the value of the dollar? The answer to that is that if those products are exportable then we are going to have upward pressure on the prices of those commodities, just the same as you have upward pressure on the prices of imports. Because a manufacturer who can sell those goods outside the country at much higher prices will raise the price in Canada as well. You get upward pressure on prices of both imported products and products that are exportable but are made here in Canada. You must have some means of offsetting that effect.

The hon. member for Oshawa has put forward the possibility of exchange controls. It is rather interesting to note that others have suggested this. There was a commentary in a recent editorial in the Regina Leader-Post. It is not an eastern paper, not a Liberal paper. It is the Regina Leader-Post and it talks about this particular issue.

Mr. Broadbent: It is not an NDP paper.

An hon. Member: It sure isn't a Conservative paper.

Mr. Evans: In any case, it clearly indicates that the impact of this particular policy—

Mr. Broadbent: We just had a vote, John, and it is a Liberal paper.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member for Oshawa says it is a Liberal paper. If it is, thank you very much.

An hon. Member: It is the last Liberal on the prairies.

Mr. Evans: It states:

> Among the possible cures for the high interest rate dilemma is exchange controls, intended to insulate Canada's rates from those abroad.

Then it goes on to say in relation to the possibility of controlling the outflow of oil, for example, which was just recommended by Premier Blakeney who suggested you could regulate the outflows of oil:

> But controlling the flow of oil through a finite number of cross-border pipelines is surely a lot easier than stemming an almost infinite number of currency channels, whether they involve stashing money in suitcases or funnelling it via sophisticated corporate bookkeeping manoeuvres.
> In a country as large and heavily dependent upon foreign trade as Canada, it is hard to see exchange controls accomplishing much more than creating a burgeoning bureaucracy, black markets and other assorted economic distortions.

That is perhaps the best, most concise statement of the major problems this country would face with a policy of exchange controls as any statement I have heard so far to date.

We could go on with this. The policies of the government have been recently disputed by Mr. Walter Gordon, the ex-finance minister, for whom I have a great deal of personal respect but with whom I disagree rather strongly on his economic philosophy.

I think we can deal with the particular set of arguments put forward by the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy rather quickly. Its commentary starts off on the basis of a totally erroneous set of hypotheses about the Canadian economy. If you read from the institute's own document you will note it is said that we have interest rates at record high levels, which is true. It then goes on to say that we have a slow rate of growth in the economy. In the last quarter of 1980 the economy grew at an annualized rate of 8 per cent. In the first quarter of 1981 it grew at an annualized rate of 4 per cent to 6 per cent. That is not slow growth by any standards.

The institute goes on to say we are currently running at very high levels of unemployment. We now have the lowest level of unemployment since 1976, just 7 per cent. We would like to see the unemployment rate go even lower, but we are talking about the lowest level it has been at in the last five years. The Canadian Institute for Economic Policy says we have to change the policy because the government's economic policy that is in place is causing stagnation of growth, which is not true, and excessively high levels of unemployment, which is not true. Based upon false premises such as this what good can come from considering much further the analysis by the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy? It has been known to be wrong often in the past and I am afraid its trend has not changed.

We have heard much from the hon. member for Oshawa with regard to the question of bankruptcies as well. None of us in this House wants to see any firm face bankruptcy, but I think the hon. member distorted some of the figures he quoted. He said that bankruptcies were up 70 per cent in the farming community. We had a meeting the other morning with the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, and at that meeting the Ontario Federation of Agriculture gave us a series of documents. One of the documents dealt with farm bankruptcies in Ontario during the first quarter of 1981. I agree that the figure I will quote does represent an increase of 70 per cent over last year, but there are 75,000 farms in Ontario. There were 46 bankruptcies in Ontario in the first quarter of this year compared with 26 last year. That does not sound to me like rampant bankruptcies. There are 75,000 farms, as I say.

In closing, I would like to refer to bankruptcies in the business community. In April bankruptcies were 3.9 per cent higher than they were a year ago in April. That does not sound to me like rampant increases in bankruptcies.

The point is that if we are going to deal with economic issues, I think we have to deal with the fundamentals of the problems we are faced with, and we have to deal with the issues based upon facts. It does no good to distort the facts and to provide this House with rhetoric, because that does nothing to help the government find the solutions all Canadians want to see.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in the House in speaking about this very important issue today, particularly as it affects the most critical social and economic problem in Canada, the problem of Canada's housing crisis, which affects people of all income groups and in every province.

For years the Liberals have treated housing not as a basic need, which we believe it is, but as a tool to pump up or slow down the economy. We hear the minister talking constantly about market needs coming before the needs of the Canadian people. As a result, more than ever before home owners and tenants are the victims of a lack of positive housing policy. And, of course, the problems have become much greater because of the high interest rate policy of the government.

Today it is almost impossible to believe that we can still be shocked by changes in interest rates, but today interest rates are up to over 18.5 per cent, which must surely shock most Canadians very severely. As my leader said earlier, according to our calculations this means that only those earning over $47,000 a year will be able to purchase new homes. Can hon. members believe it?

Ninety per cent of Canadian families will be unable to purchase homes, if they are not the lucky ones who have homes already. Who earns over $47,000 a year? Certainly not very many members of Parliament, probably a few highly paid professionals, some corporate bosses, a few movie stars if we happen to have them in Canada, and perhaps one or two football players.

Mr. Mayer: Hockey players.

Mr. Broadbent: And the presidents of banks.

Mrs. Mitchell: And the presidents of banks. These are the only people who can afford new houses today.

Mr. Kempling: Union leaders.

Mrs. Mitchell: Not union people. I can give some facts on that.

Mr. Kempling: How much does Dennis McDermott make?

Mrs. Mitchell: The economic policy of the government is supposedly one of restraint to cool down inflation. As we know, that has resulted in a continuous spiral of interest rates, and there is no restraint at all in view. The latest mortgage interest rates mean that instead of forcing down the price of housing there will certainly be an escalation of costs for both tenants and home owners. We know that most families who have homes and have to renew their mortgages face a crisis simply because they cannot find another $400 up to $700, depending on their mortgage arrangements, per month. The cost of food is increasing every month. There are increases in the cost of fuel and transportation, not to mention increased taxes. How can people possibly find these amounts of money on family budgets? Their only choice will be to sell their homes or face foreclosure. This is exactly what has happened. As we have said before in the House, foreclosures are at an all-time high and have been for the past year. As my leader stated the other day, approximately 1,000 home owners a month are being forced to abandon their homes. This is according to the economic review of the Department of Finance to which my leader referred today. We face a very desperate situation and have for the past year.

However, if we think we have had a bad time this year, just wait until next year. Next year is the year when there will be a record number of short-term mortgages coming due. A lot of five-year mortgages were taken out five years ago in the hope that mortgage interest rates would come down. Many three-year mortgages were taken out three years ago. Very short-sighted but desperate people took out one-year mortgages last year hoping against hope that they would be able to beat the system this year. All these mortgages will be coming due next year. If ever there was a time for government planning, this is the time, but we know that the minister responsible for CMHC has said that we will stand pat, we will not do anything new and we will not do anything to protect the people of Canada who are losing their homes. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), supported by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has promised that there will be no changes in economic policy, so we can expect that mortgage interest rates will go even higher.

Whenever we speak about mortgage interest rates, we tend to focus on home owners and the effects they face whenever interest rates go up. I would like to stress, however, that tenants in most cities are in a much greater plight than most home owners. Those of us who own homes or have some equity in homes at least have some security for the future. We have something to show for the money we have to pay. Tenants in most cities spend all of their incomes on the high cost of living. They are unable to save for homes. Many of them, at least in my city of Vancouver—thousands of them, as a matter of fact—are paying over 60 per cent of their incomes on rent, yet our minister suggests removing rent control.

Young people—and I am sure we all know many of them—are simply putting off indefinitely or forever having families. How can they have families when they cannot get out of one-bedroom suites and cannot really afford the cost of those? Those who have been saving for houses will be disappointed again unless they have incomes, as I said, of well over $47,000. Who has those incomes? The only ones who have any hope at all—and these are the smart ones, in my opinion—are the people who have had the foresight to try to get their names on co-op housing waiting lists. Let us hope there will be some increases in funding for co-op housing, since that is about the only affordable housing for young people or, for that matter, for anyone today.

As a direct result of the economic policy of this government, and particularly as it affects home owners and tenants, I maintain that we have a two-class society, and the disparities are becoming greater every time interest rates go up. Those who are lucky enough to own their homes, even though they may be modest homes costing a few thousand dollars 20 years ago, are the comfortable elite compared with young people today. This critical situation has come about directly as a result of federal economic policy—and within an astonishingly short period of time, if we look back over the last five years.

High interest rates have not cooled down inflation. The price of housing has not cooled, it is at boiling point, and so are Canadians. It is certainly no wonder at all that Canadians are demanding higher wages just to keep food on the table. Excessively high interest rates have depressed housing starts across Canada as well, discouraged the construction particularly of rental housing despite that famous MURB program. In B.C. it so happens housing starts are up and we do not have unemployment in the construction field, but I can say most of our trades people are moving to Alberta because they cannot afford to own a house in Vancouver. Potentiel home buyers are being kept out of the housing market and those facing renewal are in an impossible situation.

I would mention briefly that housing starts are down in most provinces. Perhaps hon. members would be interested in a comparison of house prices across Canada. Here again we see a direct relationship to high interest rates. Vancouver is in a crisis situation and the disease is spreading to Ontario, so let us hope we are now going to get some action.

If we compare prices in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver over the last quarter we see that in Toronto house prices for an average family home have gone up from $76,000 to $79,000, an increase of 4.2 per cent. In Montreal, prices have increased from $51,000 to just over $52,000; and I am told that the fastest increases are coming in Montreal and that over the past year increases have been much greater than that. In Vancouver the average price has increased from $133,000 to $156,-521, an increase of 17.6 per cent. So we can see that the average increase in housing prices across Canada is over 12.3 per cent in the last three months, and this jump and the cutback in housing construction are directly related to these completely irrational economic policies.

I would like to mention one bright light on the horizon, and let us hope that the federal government is going to take notice and expand this program. Nova Scotia announced yesterday a long-term mortgage loan assistance program. We know that in four or five other provinces similiar programs are starting up, but this is a federal responsibility, Mr. Speaker. Provinces, particularly one of our poorer provinces such as Nova Scotia, should not have to be forced to do this on their own.

Housing starts, as I say, are down across Canada, and in Manitoba they are the lowest they have been in 14 years. There have been only 35,000 new housing starts in Quebec, down 6,000 from last year. We know that St. John's, Newfoundland is another crisis area second only to Vancouver. Vacancy rates there dropped from 20 per cent in 1970 to minus 1 per cent in 1980. And we know that with the influx of people related to the oil exploration industry there is a very serious problem coming. St. John's has experienced a 22 per cent increase in housing prices.

I want to mention the situation in British Columbia again as a warning to other provinces. This week we had a briefing from CMHC officials from that area. One third of our households are tenants and to purchase a home one must have an income well over $60,000 a year. Children have to stay with their parents and work to help pay for a house, and only those who have parents or fairy godfathers have a chance of getting a house. Tenants in new housing units are paying well over $650 a month rent. Families are doubled up and there is desperate overcrowding as far as young people and students are concerned. As I said before, over 33,000 tenants pay more than 50 per cent of their income on shelter, and these are mainly senior citizens, the single parent families and handicapped persons who are living in dumps because they cannot afford anything else even if it were available.

Part of the problem is the influx of 56,000 persons into B.C. last year, 17,000 of whom were immigrants. There is an increase in demand for an estimated 25,000 more housing units, yet the government is doing nothing to help the situation. Their high interest rate policies are creating an impasse in the rental housing field and I would think also from the point of view of social housing, although we appreciate very much the non-profit mortgage write-down policy of the federal government. This is one of the best policies going but it is not enough. The cost to the government of those high interest rates for that program is another problem we must face.

We do not want to shut the doors to beautiful B.C.; we want and have a right to expect government help to increase the stock of affordable housing, as does everyone in Canada. So what are we going to do about this, Mr. Speaker? We have mentioned repeatedly a number of very positive programs that the government, if it had the will and it cared about people rather than the market, could institute tomorrow. My leader mentioned several of them earlier today. We must have a made in Canada mortgage rate as well as a general interest rate policy, even if it means that the dollar goes down or exchange controls are needed. We must have a sensible and practical mortgage assistance program through the banks, which make several millions of dollars in profits every time the interest rate goes up one point, and also through the government, particularly for family starter homes. Nova Scotia is an example we have been advocating for some time, with low interest mortgages, preferably over a 25-year period, for families earning under $30,000. This should bring down the cost of shelter to at least 28 per cent of income. This is a federal responsibility and we have the money there to do it; we have the money that the banks have, we have the Bank Act and we should get going.

We also want, Mr. Speaker, CMHC to return to a leadership role in the field of housing. It is time they went back to direct lending for long-term mortgages.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: We want CMHC and the federal government, in co-operation with other levels of government, to get back into land banking, assist municipalities in bringing down the cost of land and protect public land for the use of ordinary people for affordable housing. This is most urgent. We want an increase in the stock of affordable housing and the only way to do that in today's circumstances is by government write down of mortgages for non-profit and co-operative housing and for sensible family-oriented, small units of public housing.

We also need to have increased government programs to rehabilitate older homes. This is the only kind of accommodation most people can afford and it improves our cities and makes use of available resources. We should certainly have more innovative housing programs.

Let us look at what the Atlantic provinces did, but which they cannot do now because of mortgage interest rates, in regard to self-help programs in building co-operatives, shell housing, putting one's own labour into one's home, building a few rooms and adding more later when the kids come along. This government is discouraging that kind of thing.

My hon. colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells me that I still have two minutes left—a most unusual situation.

I would like to elaborate and give some examples of some of the things people can do themselves if they have some sort of government assistance, particularly the non-profit sector getting into affordable housing. In my riding of Vancouver East groups in the Chinese community have been organized for over ten years which have not only rehabilitated the older homes in the community but which have used 25-foot inner city lots on which to construct two or three housing units. This is innovative and attractive housing which people can afford. In some cases the land is leased and in others it is strata title housing which people can own. There are other groups which are building co-op and other forms of rental housing. We need more housing which is accessible to the handicapped, and there is no better year in which to construct that type of housing than in the Year of the Handicapped.

I will conclude at this point, Mr. Speaker. I repeat, I support the motion which my party has put forward. We must have a made-in-Canada interest rate policy. We need it for the number one economic and social problem in Canada—housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, once again and for the second week in a row, we are having a debate in this House on the economic effects of high interest rates in North America, and I should even say the entire world. I agree with my hon. colleagues opposite that the present interest rate is far from ideal and obviously affects people throughout our country. I have to agree that, as far as economic growth and people's ability to pay are concerned, the interest rate has a negative impact on the wealth and purchasing power of individuals. However, we must recognize, Mr. Speaker, that economic conditions in the western world have changed enormously since 1973. One major reason was the increase in energy and oil prices which on two occasions caused mini economic crises in these countries and required extraordinary imagination on the part of the government to save individual consumers undue hardship because the situation or price increases were hard to justify as they were based simply on the oil supplying countries' desire to acquire more wealth.

Of course, the opposition parties now rise to blame the government for breaking its promise to protect Canadians who must bear the brunt of high interest rates. It is easy for the opposition parties to make such an accusation now, especially as they conveniently forget several things when they talk about the situation. First, they claim the government did not make good its commitment to protect those people who suffer the most from those high interest rates. This is completely false. I can very easily prove it by mentioning some policies which specifically aim at protecting those in the lower income brackets. Of course, interest rates are one of the factors which can cause poverty, but it is not the only one. Is it not a fact that Canadians who are now paying higher interest rates are also paying only $1.80 or so for a gallon of oil compared with about $5 in every other industrialized country? I heard a member of the opposition say earlier that co-operatives could no longer build in Canada. I find this extremely surprising because the Canada Housing and Mortgage Corporation now lends money to co-operatives at an interest rate of 2 per cent for housing projects. I find it extremely difficult to explain why they cannot build when the interest rate is 2 per cent; if they cannot do it now they never will.

As far as I can see, the proposal made by the opposition party is just about the same song we heard from the official opposition last week. Members opposite would rather have lower interest rates in Canada. I would too, of course. But in what context? If it is in a context where the world interest rate hovers around 10 per cent, then the Canadian interest rate should also be 10 per cent for the well-being of all of us, but if conditions are such that the U.S. prime rate nudges 20 per cent, what is the meaning of the position taken today by the opposition parties? It is very easy to define. It means that the dollar is weakening. It means that the value of our Canadian dollar is going down, so what does that imply? It implies that the price of all imported goods is going up. The price of oranges is going up, the price of coffee is going up, the price of sugar is going up, the price of energy is going up, the price of oil is going up, the price of cars is going up, the price of car parts is going up, the price of each and every consumer goods will go up tomorrow morning.

So who is undergoing the effects of all that? Mr. Speaker, I agree that it is important to stand up in this House and speak for those who can borrow because, thanks to everything that has been done in our country over the past 20 years, Canada ranks first in terms of single-family dwellings per capita. Canada is where residents own the largest number of goods, Canada is where people can borrow more than anywhere else, because no other country offers better borrowing opportunities than Canada does.

Of course, any member who rises in this House and attempts to defend those who can borrow is making friends with a great many people. But one thing that should not be forgotten is that there are people in Canada who cannot borrow even when the interest rate is 5 per cent. I am referring to Canadians who draw unemployment insurance benefits, people who depend on social welfare to survive, the elderly in many cases and widows in many others who are facing problems. There is one very simple aspect which we ought to keep in mind, namely that in any money-lending system, be it Canadian, Russian or American, no person can borrow unless he or she already has money or property. If a person does not have anything there is no way he or she can borrow even when the interest rate stands at 5 per cent.

When I hear our so-called socialist party lecture this House on the need to bring down interest rates, which would necessarily lead to a weaker dollar and force those people who have barely enough money or an income hardly decent enough to safeguard their pride, to pay more for the bare necessities of life, for sugar, salt and coffee, as we often say, then I really wonder what kind of socialism they profess. I have great difficulty in—

Mr. Nystrom: Mitterrand!

Mr. Gimaïel: —Mitterrand, indeed! That party seems to think that we would be better off with Russian style policies, even though Russia has trouble feeding its 300 million people spread out over a huge landmass. That is the kind of socialism you are advocating. No, Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party in this motion of theirs is simply asking us to help multinationals and big corporations borrow still more money.

As a government we are naturally much concerned with the fact that the medium and small businessman, the farmers, the home owners have to pay more to borrow money. But was it not a member of this government who announced today that pork producers would receive substantial amounts of money to help them meet their costs? This government has taken all sorts of measures to offset these high interest rates and thus to aid those who need help the most and not the multinationals whose case the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) is now arguing.

I remember that last year I called that party a non-development party and I still hold that to be so. I think that the reason why the leader of the New Democratic Party is paying so much attention to underdeveloped countries is that he is realizing that the policies he wants to apply here are already being applied over there. Maybe that is his basic problem. Because above all, this so-called socialist party has overlooked a very important segment of our population which belongs to the future of this country, and I am referring to our young people who do not own homes, or cars, who often do not have any money in the bank, who cannot borrow, who have to face serious difficulties. These socialists have forgotten that these young people need to have sugar, bread, milk, and butter. They need imported oranges, imported salt and many imported goods for the daily necessities of life. If the Canadian dollar loses value, who will bear the brunt? Young people, the handicapped and people on welfare. If this is what members of the New Democratic Party want, let them say so. Let them say publicly to all Canadians: "We want to help the multinationals, the borrowers, we don't want to help those people who cannot afford to borrow. We don't care if interest rates are higher, in other words, if the Canadian dollar is weaker and prices higher. Such is not our concern.

Well, I for one, say as a member of a party that for years has been defining itself as the party of economic liberalism, as the party of individual liberties and defence of the individual, I say that the individual who cannot afford to borrow deserves more help than the one that can. That is essential to the future of our country because if our young people who are now confronted with unemployment-related problems cannot afford or have to pay too high a price for essentials, we are going to experience major problems in this country such as some other countries are presently going through.

In the same line of thought, I think that those who would like to make Canadians believe this government and preceding Liberal governments have not tried to help Canadian workers improve their lot, are simply distorting the facts and misleading the Canadian people. What is the result of all the work that has been accomplished? As I was saying, in this country people own more goods than anywhere else in the world. Some Canadians now reap the benefits of our forefathers' toil. We the young people, we who are 30 years old and over, 30 to 55 or even 60 years old can enjoy many luxuries. We own houses, cars, summer cottages, TV sets. Many of us take trips, own expensive fur coats and jewelry. Not all countries in the world have been able to provide so much for their people. Granted, today we have to make sacrifices.

I heard the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) suggest a miracle solution, an amendment. I worked it out quickly, Mr. Speaker, and came to the conclusion that the amendment of the hon. member would cost $3 billion to the Canadian taxpayers who would be affected. Considering the fact that this extraordinary suggestion comes from the party that has been condemning the government for a whole year now for spending too much, for wanting to spend too much, that has been asking the government to cut down expenditures, I feel that this is asking for more inflation; this amendment would dig into everyone's pocket directly, because even the person who receives unemployment insurance benefits pays income tax. In other words, everyone is affected.

Mr. Speaker, personally, I do not believe in miracle solutions. However, there are solutions and this government applies them. Is it not in Canada that people pay less for energy? Yes, indeed, it is. Is it not in Canada that people have access to more goods? Yes, indeed. Are not Canadians the ones who travel the most around the world? Yes, again. In that context, how can anyone accuse the government of not doing its job? Is it not in Canada that the gross national product has increased by 8 per cent over the last three months, and that on a yearly basis? Yes, we are talking again of Canada. Tell me of another country which does as much, even a socialist country such as Yugoslavia, the U.S.S.R. or any other, whose broad general policies may be based on state control. There is not one. Is it not Canada with a population of 26 million which feeds hundred millions of people throughout the world? Yes, it is Canada. Is it not a fact that the wheat produced by western farmers who seem now to have difficulty borrowing money is sold five years in advance? Is it not true? Yes it is. Those are the parties, Mr. Speaker, which come up with miracle answers. Where would those miracle answers take us? Nowhere. Another $3 billion in loans or a dollar dropping to 70 or 75 cents, this is left to one's imagination. And who will foot the bill? The small wage-earner who is earning nothing or next to nothing. The government in power has assumed its responsibilities. It has reduced unemployment by 0.7 per cent and increased the gross national product from 4 to 6 per cent over last year. What more can we ask? I think that the government is doing its duty and those who are blaming it are doing so because they lack the necessary imagination to bring positive input into this debate to help Canadians.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there is one fact that I should like to emphasize: the miracle workers in this country have never built anything, contrary to the patient men who have taken advantage of economic circumstances to liberate our people and help those who needed help. In this context, the government of Canada is indeed assuming its responsibilities when it asks Canadians who can afford to borrow to pay a little more for a year or two perhaps while protecting those in our society who need protection. You must protect your children and your parents who supported you for a great many years, because they will be facing difficult times for awhile, by paying interest rates which are a little higher, but do not let our dollar deteriorate completely; do not ask us to lower the interest rates you pay because our dollar would collapse and all those essential goods we are importing would cost more.

In that context, Mr. Speaker, this is what I say to my fellow Canadians and especially to those in my riding of Lac-Saint-Jean: Make an effort for a year, maybe a little less, maybe a little more, and pay high interest rates. Make this effort because the President of the United States, who was received with very loud applause by the official opposition for over two hours when he visited us some time ago—such loud applause in fact that we, on the government side, were wondering why—has decided to raise interest rates in the United States to 20 per cent. This is a direct attack against the Canadian dollar. We are going to support the Canadian dollar and I ask my fellow Canadians to do likewise: help the young, work for the future of our country, and everything will be back to normal within the next few months, the unemployment rate will come down and inflation which is so hard on the low wage earners will not hurt quite as much. Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I hope opposition members will see the light and understand that beyond home owners, lands, houses and corporations, there are in Canada people who have just the bare essentials to live on.

[English]

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel), and I had to agree with him when he started his speech. I want to congratulate him, as well, on at least having the decency to admit that the 20 per cent interest rates in this country are causing problems and that it is not all milk and honey. However, as he progressed in his speech, I think he got lost in some of his rhetoric. At the end he said that we are going to help our young people. I do not see how we are going to help our young people by having interest rates at such prohibitive levels. First of all, it will drive them out of business. We all know that the people who are hurt the most are those who are the most vulnerable in business and, by and large, those are new and young Canadians trying to get started in business and those who have recently gone into business and borrowed money at lower rates. So when he talks about helping young people and at the same time defends 20 per cent interest rates, he is contradicting himself somewhat.

● (1750)

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) who said that we have only seen the tip of the iceberg. If these interest rates continue, a lot of people who have to renew mortgages in the coming year at prohibitively high interest rates, will lose their equity in their home and will be out on the street.

If the hon. member opposite intends to support the young people in his constituency as well as those in the rest of the country, he should prevail upon the government of which he is a member to pursue policies to bring down interest rates. The young people he is concerned about would then have the chance to participate in the development of this country which has so many opportunities to offer.

In the last month all of us had an opportunity to spend time in our constituencies. One of the reasons for having this time is to find out from our constituents what their concerns and problems are. Those of us who have been in our constituencies know that interest rates are the greatest problem facing Canadians today. They realize that there are no easy solutions to the problem. Most members on this side have presented some short-term and long-term solutions to the government and have suggested methods to alleviate the problem, but none of these have been acted upon.

Our constituents are justifiably concerned about high interest rates. While most people realize that there are no easy solutions, they do not see any benefit coming from the situation. It is one thing to go through a trying time in a business, to cut back on expectations and the standard of living and still face the possibility of going out of business if there is the prospect of better days ahead, but that is not the situation today. The government does not offer any long-range policies or solutions.

I should like to list four or five things that the government could do that would bring about lower interest rates and a more productive economy within two or three years. These have been stated many times before but I think they need to be stated again.

First of all, there should be a genuine willingness on the part of the government to negotiate with the provinces which produce oil and gas so that an agreement can be reached that will make Canada self-sufficient. This would create jobs and generate economic activity in the country. It would also stop the massive hemorrhage of Canadian money going out of the country to establish trust funds in places like Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, and Mexico. People become excited about the heritage fund in Alberta, but I would much sooner see a fund established within the borders of Canada than one outside the country. This is something that the government cannot seem to get through its thick skull, that we are much better off to keep that massive amount of money—something like $4 billion this year, which is—approximately equal to the total budget of Manitoba and Saskatchewan together—and at least have a chance to recirculate it and generate jobs and economic activity in this country. Instead, the government chooses to subsidize the price of oil and pay foreign producers more than Canadian producers.

In addition to sending the money outside the country, there is another unfortunate effect. That money has to be recirculated and it comes back in the form of foreign investment in this country. Provincial governments are engaged in the legislative process of trying to prevent foreigners from buying Canadian farmland. This seems to me to be silly considering that we are sending money out of the country because we cannot reach an agreement on oil prices in our own country. Our countrymen are not asking for world price but for a percentage of it. At the same time as this is refused we are, in effect, paying foreigners to buy our farmland with Canadian dollars used to buy foreign oil.

For a long time those of us who come from western Canada have been concerned about transportation. I would argue that it is part of our heritage and should have special attention. If there were some leadership forthcoming from the federal government, we would not face the prospect within two or three years of insufficient transportation facilities to move our raw products. If we could ensure transportation, it would help our foreign exchange problem, our balance of payments deficit, interest rates and the value of the dollar. We see no leadership in this area whatsoever.

I am puzzled why the government would give top priority at this time to buying Petrofina which will add nothing to our production capacity. It simply buys out a bunch of gas stations, a refinery, some real estate and some reserves already in the ground. The $1.5 billion will be taxed away in the form of a 3.5 cents per gallon increase in the cost of gas at the pumps and in the form of an increase in taxes on natural gas.

I have in front of me a letter from Union Gas which points out that a further $18 per year increase will come into effect on July 1, in addition to the $18 per year increase to the consumer which came into effect on May 1. That means that the average consumer of natural gas in Ontario will pay an additional $36 per year—not to make Canada more self-sufficient or to increase the supply of natural gas or tar sands oil or any kind of synthetic oil in this country, but to let the government buy Petrofina.

It seems to me that if the government were genuinely interested in making the economy more productive and thereby keeping down the rate of inflation instead of adding to it and to the burden on consumers, this money would be spent on increasing production in Canada.

My constituents do not understand why the government persists in trying to attack inflation only from the demand side. That is precisely what the government permits the Bank of Canada to do when it allows the governor and the board of directors of the bank to pursue the fight against inflation through monetarism. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) said something that I took down as best as I could, so it is close to a quote. He said: "High interest rates have not had a major impact on slowing down growth and credit". I am pleased to see the minister is in the House. He quoted statistics to back up his statement. If that is the case, can the minister not see that the monetarism which he supports adds to inflation? This is certainly a possibility. I see the minister shaking his head.

I should like to give the minister an example, Mr. Speaker, one which affects all small businessmen and farmers in this country. Many small businessmen are not in a position to carry inventory at interest rates of 25 per cent. We now have a prime rate very close to 20 per cent in this country, that is compounded monthly. On an annual basis, that approaches 22 per cent or 23 per cent. Small businessmen cannot afford to carry inventory at those rates, so when a customer comes to buy something, it has to be ordered from the factory. That accounts for two or three months of supplies that the business would normally carry and in turn, this puts people out of jobs. It does nothing to fight inflation; it hurts on the supply side. This would apply to a furniture dealer, a clothing dealer, a lumber yard or any business that has to carry much inventory. There is a limit to how much interest a businessman can pay. He has to pay interest costs out of profit, and if he does not have enough profit to carry inventory, he simply cuts back.

This is the planting season in Canada, but many farmers will not be able to obtain a line of credit, and so they will not plant or buy feeder cattle to put on pasture. They are not going to plan on planting the kinds of crops which will have to be marketed through livestock. The results will show up in the food the consumer buys next fall because there will be less food around and that hurts on the supply side. That is exactly what the government is doing deliberately by simply supporting straight monetarism and not doing anything to take account of the very serious effects which these ridiculously high interest rates have on the supply side.

I see that you are on the edge of your chair, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it is because of my speech; I suspect it is because it is getting close to six o'clock.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening, at which time the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) if he is present in the chamber.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Portage-Marquette had the floor.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, as I was attempting to point out to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe)—and I repeat we all appreciate his presence in the House—the Canadian economy is in a very serious situation. I contend, and I am sure many others do as well, that interest rates above a certain level, certainly over 20 per cent, on an annual basis add to inflation more than they help to prevent it. I was using the examples of farmers and small businessmen.

I wish to go back and relate some of the concerns I have with regard to small businessmen. Small business in this country is responsible for the creation of more permanent jobs than any other sector of the economy. It is not only small business, but farmers and new businesses who are particularly hurt by high interest rates.

Not only can small business not afford to carry the inventory which would have created jobs in order to produce it, it is also losing sales. When a potential customer is not able to make a purchase, not only is the sale lost and, therefore, revenue, but the high interest rates are draining that small business of any profit it may be making.

In the case of the farming community, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) pointed out, this is an added cost in terms of farm machinery and whatever else is required in order to be productive. When there is a breakdown of machinery, more time is required to get replacement parts and eventually the whole system is affected, and this hurts the economy.

I urge the minister to take these matters into consideration. Rather than support strictly a monetary approach, which is the demand side of our inflationary concern, he should take into consideration current interest rates as they affect production. Many small business people know that the present interest rates add to inflation rather than prevent it. In his speech this afternoon, the minister, to paraphrase him, said he did not want us to cancel out what we were doing with the right hand by doing something else to counteract it with the left hand. That is exactly what the national energy policy is doing. The figures I have in front of me indicate that by mid-1981, that would be in August, approximately 20,000 jobs will be lost to the oil industry and the service industry connected to that industry. These figures also show that about 139 oil rigs will have left the country, and this represents approximately $1 billion in capital cost. As a result of the government raising interest rates to attract capital, our dollar is helped and inflation is kept in check, particularly if we keep our dollar from falling any further. On the other hand, the National Energy Program is actually driving capital out of the country. I would argue very strongly that if the minister looked at some of the statements he made, he would see that the policies his own government is pursuing are cancelling out what the government is doing.

Again I would urge the government to proceed as quickly as possible, with as much good will as possible, and with a genuine attempt at negotiation to reach an energy agreement with the producing provinces.

When we pursue a monetary policy, as we are doing in this country, strictly by trying to slow down the rate of expansion in the money supply by simply using interest rates, we are not fully realizing what has happened to money as a commodity. Money is no longer simply a medium of exchange as it was 300 or 400 years ago. I forget my history in respect of the development of the medium of exchange, but money, it seems to me, has now become a commodity. It is needed in terms of production in the same way that farmers need fuel, seed and fertilizer, and in the same way a small businessman needs an office or a premises in which to do business. If we think of money in these kinds of terms, I think it would be easier for us to realize, when we raise the cost of that commodity dramatically, what this does to the productive process in this country.

This country was originally settled so people could come here, have some economic freedom and make the country productive. Yet, when we see interest rates at what I would call an "Al Capone" level, it is obvious that is what prevents us from being productive. I am sure if interest rates were at 20 per cent or 25 per cent as recently as three years ago, they would have been referred to as "Al Capone" interest rates. In spite of this, we see speakers from the government side standing up to defend what I would call those "Al Capone" or exorbitant interest rates.

I would like to touch upon the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) in the time left to me. It sets out that our party supports the extension of the small business development bond, and I heartily endorse that suggestion. I see the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism has joined us in the House this evening. This is something to which he should pay close attention because it is an interesting concept in the sense that the small business development bond allows the incorporated small business person in this country to borrow at half of prime plus 1 per cent or two per cent. At today's rates, that would mean the incorporated small businessman could borrow at something like 12 per cent.

The reason banks are able to make these loans is that they can treat this income as dividend interest rather than straight interest and they are taxed on it at a lower rate. On the other side of this very interesting concept is the fact that the small business which borrows this money cannot claim it as an expense.

It seems to me this is precisely the kind of program that is needed. Most small businessmen are not now really concerned about making a lot of profit. They are not concerned about deductions when they file income tax returns. They are simply concerned about staying alive from one year to the next. The people who would make the most use of this are those people who are not taxable. That is a very interesting idea and a very useful concept. I would urge both ministers whom I see in the House to consider extending the small business development bond, making it available to unincorporated businesses and for things other than straight capital items, for instance, making it available to small businesses for financing the purchase of inventory and the expansion of premises. It could also be made available to farmers for the purchase of livestock and for lines of credit during a planting and growing season. If that could be done, it would certainly go a long way toward alleviating the interest problems of small businesses. Small businesses are more responsible for the creation of jobs in this country than any other sector of the economy.

The other part of the amendment moved by my colleague has to do with the concept of mortgage interest and property tax credit. This is an interesting concept with which I would agree. It really relates to a principle which I think is valid. It simply means that once a tax is paid, it should not be paid again. If we are in fact paying a tax, that tax should be allowed as a deduction on a person's income tax return. That is something that would be very useful to people who are renewing their mortgages and will meet all kinds of problems, as pointed out by the NDP hon. member for Vancouver East.

I would urge the government to consider the suggestions made by the three speakers from my party in order that we can do something about the very serious situation of our economy as a result of extremely high interest rates. Thank you very much.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the discussion this evening of the specific question of inflation and broader economic problems. Today we have heard the government attacked because inflation has recurred as a persistent and pernicious problem. Clearly the prime cause of inflation in Canada, as in all industrialized nations, has been the two major oil price increases triggered by the OPEC petroleum cartel.

During the 1973 oil price hike, for example, the average rate of inflation in industrialized nations jumped by six percentage points. The effect of the 1979 oil price increase, the second of the major OPEC increases, was to add a further five percentage points to the average rate of inflation in industrialized countries.

Today we have been hearing from one faction of the Conservative Party which favours a lower rate of inflation. Yet there is another faction of the Conservative Party which presses for a rapid escalation of oil prices in Canada. There is obviously a contradiction in those two positions.

For example, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) somehow manages to be a member of both those factions. He advised the Alberta government not long ago to hang tough in its negotiations with the federal government and to press for higher and higher oil prices. Yet last week in this House he piously expressed concern for Canadian consumers who must cope with oil-fuelled inflation. I do not see how he can have it both ways.

If this government were to follow in Canada the Conservative policy of a "made-in-Saudi Arabia" oil price, who would win and who would lose? Where would the impact of inflation fall? The winners would obviously be the large foreign-controlled petroleum companies, petroleum companies which reported a profit of almost $30 billion in 1979. Our Conservative friends evidently think that they need more. Who loses if we permit OPEC to set oil prices in Canada, or if we tie Canadian oil prices to those set by an international cartel? Certainly rapid increases would cause yet more inflation in Canada. Rapid increases would have an especially severe effect upon those in our society who live in rural or isolated areas and those who depend upon petroleum for travelling long distances, and certainly consumers in the poorer regions of Canada would suffer more. Certainly the poor people in our country would become poorer because energy costs play such a large role in the household budgets of the poorer segments of our society. An important American study, for example, recently concluded that for families with incomes in the lowest 10 per cent bracket, energy took fully one third of their expenditures. For families, however, in the top 10 per cent bracket, energy took only one twentieth of their total expenditures. The Economic Council of Canada has estimated that for every one dollar increase in the price of a barrel of oil in Canada, the consumer price index—in other words, inflation—will jump by 0.5 per cent.

For that and for many other reasons we do not have in Canada an OPEC-made oil price policy. We have a made-in-Canada oil price policy, but that is not to say an unrealistically cheap oil price policy. Certainly prices will rise. They will rise gradually, but substantially, over this decade, and they will rise in a manner which is controlled, predictable and known to consumers and producers alike. We are actively working toward an agreement with the principal producing province on that basis.

We recognize that oil prices in Canada must increase. However, unlike the previous government, we have moved to ensure that the beneficiaries of those increases are not the "seven sisters" of the international petroleum industry but, rather, Canadians. In terms of revenues received, foreign-owned petroleum companies in Canada in 1979 still represented 72 per cent of the total industry. Moreover, the involvement of foreign corporations is greatest among the integrated companies—the large, foreign-controlled companies—and lowest amongst our junior producers which are, typically, Canadian-controlled.

In those terms it was evident to all of us on this side of the House that we had to allow Canadian oil and gas prices to rise, but we also had to continue a program of attractive incentives for exploration and development of new supplies from within our own borders. However, if we had done just that, we would inevitably have increased the revenues and the assets of largely foreign-controlled firms, thereby making it yet more expensive for Canadians to purchase a greater share of the ownership of our own petroleum industry. We would also have seen the largely foreign-controlled industry reap substantial windfall gains. In addition, higher prices would have meant either increased dividends to the foreign parents or greater foreign ownership through the reinvestment of profits in the petroleum industry and diversification into other sectors of our economy.

We have been concerned in this discussion and, indeed, earlier in this session of Parliament about capital outflows from the petroleum industry. Let me underline that since 1974, the Canadian petroleum industry has supported net capital outflows of $2.1 billion. If dividend and interest payments are added, the net outflow over the 1975-79 period was about $3.7 billion, contributing to inflation in Canada and contributing to the lack of control of this most dynamic sector of our economy.

Our preference in those circumstances has been a policy to accelerate the process of Canadianization with three specific goals. We aim to achieve a 50 per cent Canadian ownership of petroleum production within ten years. Second, we want Canadian control of a significant number of larger petroleum firms. Third, we look for an early increase in the share of the gas and oil sector owned by Canadians.

The achievement of those three goals will go a long way toward retaining the benefits of greatly increased oil and gas revenues in Canada. It will reduce our vulnerability to the fiscal and monetary policies of our powerful neighbour to the south. Greater Canadianization will stimulate more activity by Canadian-owned firms, with resultant energy and employment benefits. Greater Canadianization will also mean that more and more of the highly technical research work will be carried out here so that both the quality and the quantity of jobs for Canadians will improve.

The renewed role for Petro-Canada will mean that the benefits of Canadianization in terms of equity ownership and control will accrue not only to larger Canadian firms and wealthy individuals but also to every Canadian taxpayer.

I was pleased to note recently that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has reversed his position on the privatization of Petro-Canada, but in that policy, as in so many other cases, there seem to be several factions within the official opposition. Another part of that same party seems to be led by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), from whom we heard earlier. According to The Calgary Herald, the hon. member for Calgary Centre stated recently that "Petro-Canada is here for the moment, but we will see what the situation is if we are back in power". Despite what his leader has said, he added, "There are already more than 400 Crown corporations, and that is just far too many. Petro-Canada would be one place to start cutting that number".

If there is confusion among the factions within the official opposition, the situation does not seem to be much different in the New Democratic Party, where we see some of the same lack of consistency respecting energy policy in Canada. One of the factions in that party calls for greater federal spending to aid Canadian consumers, but another faction demands that the provinces have all resource revenues from east coast development and that we slow or cease exploration and development in northern Canada.

One faction demands greater revenues from the petroleum industry, yet another faction in the same party rejects the 8 per cent petroleum gas revenue tax. The New Democratic Party certainly seems to have a surplus of suggestions on these matters, but on oil pricing its members are strangely silent.

Interest Rate Policy

Since inflation is basically a structural phenomenon, it can best be abated by structural remedies. Much has been made during the course of the debate today and earlier about what is seen as the economic interdependence of Canada and the United States. The long-term solution of the New Democratic Party to our problems is to declare our economic independence, but what do members of the New Democratic Party advocate with such a vague phrase? Surely they favour our very successful efforts to export goods and services. The United States accounts for two thirds of our exports. In 1980, for example, our total receipts from trade with the United States alone amounted to more than $55 billion.

Now in this sense Canada cannot and will not withdraw from the international marketplace in search of some ephemeral economic independence. We are a trading nation. We are a winner in international trade. In terms of merchandise trade alone, the 1980 balance was in our favour by some $8 billion. However, in terms of our service account, Canada suffers a large and growing deficit which last year was more than $10 billion and which more than eliminated our merchandise surplus.

I believe the implication is clear, Mr. Speaker. Canada must continue its vigorous trade efforts to sell abroad while allowing our competitors fair and equal access to our domestic market. At the same time we must strive to reduce our dependence on foreign investment which contributes substantially to our current account deficit. However, if the NDP means economic independence in terms of controlling foreign investment and providing incentives for Canadians to invest in and own the dominant Canadian industries, then indeed they are supporting many recent government initiatives, of which the NEP is an outstanding example. The government, Mr. Speaker, has moved recently to patriate the Constitution. We are gradually moving to patriate significant sectors of our economy.

Let me allude for a moment to other structural causes of inflation, having touched on the major impact of world oil prices and our immensely important connection with the international trading community. In part, high inflation is a symptom of economic inefficiency which reduces Canada's competitiveness and productivity. One such inefficiency is the lack of a strong indigenous research capability and specialized technology. Canada has a secure resource base, a fairly strong secondary manufacturing sector, but we add little value to the resources nature has so generously bestowed on us. Borrowing someone else's technology or even just copying the products of other countries and producing them on a world scale was enough perhaps at one stage. However, the day that someone else's technology will give a country a major lead in international trade is fast passing. Major technological events are the reordering force behind changes in market competition.

The industrial strategy of Japan and several European countries has been forged through government leadership and co-operation with industry. Public policy has become a major factor in the traditional concept of competitive economic advantage. Public policy can serve either to support the development of a viable long-term position or, at worst, add to the costs of an industry. Although we have been slow to encourage research and development in Canada, and despite the fact that a good deal of innovation is controlled by foreign corporations, we can build on our limited domestic base. Our investment in technology must relate in large part to the specific market opportunities in the future which should be undertaken with a sense of urgency and an expectation of significant achievement. The success of Telidon is an outstanding example.

I have spoken of one or two of the factors in our economy making for inefficiency and hence, by extension, contributing to inflation. In conclusion I want for a moment to touch upon the fact that here in Canada provincial governments have erected economic barriers which frustrate the realization of the full benefits of the Canadian common market. We must be economically integrated. We must not be the victims of balkanization if we are to prosper in a highly competitive world. Most Canadians, for example, would assume they have the right to travel, live and work anywhere in our country, but because of actions that provincial governments have mistakenly taken in the past, we have had to guarantee that right in the constitutional proposals before this House.

There have been other examples of obstacles to the free flow of capital, goods and services. These obstacles to production must be reduced and eliminated if we are to compete in a difficult world and ensure that our industry is as efficient as it can be and, as a result, we shall reduce and eventually eliminate inflation.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I have touched on one or two of the longer term possibilities for combating inflation. I have alluded to some of the major components of this government's industrial strategy and touched on the benefits for all Canadians in the National Energy Program. I have also drawn attention to several significant contradictions in the opposition arguments which I believe indicate once more that they have been unable to convince the Canadian people that they have any constructive alternatives to offer.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed time that this House devoted itself to a debate on the economic affairs of this nation. Under the guidance of this government we are moving into a state of economic feudalism. It was in the middle ages that feudalism bloomed and prospered in a different way than today. It was a matter of armed force under the lords or ladies of that day that controlled society in every way. It was then that we had restricted ownership, share croppers, tenants and peasants. Over the years we grew out of that structure only to find that under the leadership of this government, in an economy which may be approaching a state of uncontrollability, a different type of feudalism is emerging.

We have small storekeepers being bought out by larger ones and the owner may be installed as manager. We have small plants being bought out by large plants and the former owner installed as manager. We have people who are going to leave their farms by virtue of bankruptcy and they may or may not be employed by the next owner as manager. The feudal system of our economy is frightening, fearful, devastating and unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: Small business cannot survive in this environment. It is our largest employer and covers a wide area of our economy, and it is the patient who suffers most in the economic malaise in which we find ourselves. Fishermen, farmers, storekeepers and home owners cannot stand the punishment government is dealing out by virtue of its fiscal and monetary policies. They do not have the power in the marketplace that big business, the feudal barons of today's economy, have. They do not have the market power, the buying power or influence with government. They do not have the power, period. They are therefore caught in the trap of the economy which has been generated by this government. They do not have the pleasure or the luxury of the protection which should be afforded them by law, and which at one time was afforded to them.

● (2040)

Today, for instance, if one has the good fortune to have $100,000 in loose change one can place it with a financial institution on a 30-day basis at 18.1 per cent. This was one quote I received. I do not have that kind of money, but I wanted to find out what an investment of that sort would be worth. On the other hand, let us take a look at what would happen to the guy who renewed his $40,000 mortgage today—and this did happen. He was advised by the man who advanced the money that his monthly payment would go up $240. Let us assume that this guy who arranged his mortgage pays 18.1 per cent interest to the mortgagor. He will pay $7,200 a year—$600 a month in interest alone, with no capital improvement in his position. What has happened to this guy is that he is now of little use to the economy of Canada, except as he serves himself to pay his interest to stay under his own roof. He has nothing left over to take to the marketplace to make a demand, which in turn creates employment. This is what is happening to the economy. What else can he buy? What contribution can he make?

What about the farmer who must borrow to put in a crop? If he is compelled, as many are, to borrow all his working capital for planting, a combination of inflationary history of the last ten years, plus the increased rate of interest he must pay, this will cause—and this is what I want to draw to the attention of the last speaker—a ten to fifteenfold increase in interest costs for an acre of crop. That is he must pay ten to 15 times more in interest in 1981 than he would have paid in 1970-1971. That is a real inflationary pressure.

Let us take a look at what it might cost a potato farmer to get into business this year. The following are a few remarks made by Joe Drozdowski of the New Brunswick Potato

Agency on farm debt problems for New Brunswick potato producers:

In 1980 total cost of production per acre amounted to $1,063, of which interest charges were $70. Higher interest rates should force that figure higher this year.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to show you the position of the seed producer who will finance and plant a crop in late April or early May and who will, in turn, put that crop on the market in March or April. His costs on the basis of cost-per-acre will be in excess of $200. This is what is happening to the price of food. To get crops in the ground, producers will have to borrow $80,000 to $100,000 for a moderate-sized potato crop. They will have to pay 20 to 22 per cent interest. If a young man wants to buy a farm of 150 acres, for example, he faces an initial capital cost of $300,000. At that price, and at this interest rate, he cannot enter the agriculture business and the potato industry of this land anywhere and hope to survive. Joe Drozdowski also says that interest rates are keeping total acreage at a low level. Farm machinery dealers and fertilizer companies will not offer credit beyond 30 days, so the farmer is forced to go to a lending institution for all his operating costs. Mr. Speaker, these are pretty dire consequences.

Recently the Canadian Federation of Agriculture put a very special plea to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The Federation sent an urgent bulletin to all members of Parliament requesting immediate emergency relief for farmers facing bankruptcy or foreclosure due to exorbitant interest rates. The CFA called for extra funds under the auspices of the Farm Credit Corporation, which has the staff and administrative capability to provide loans at deferred rates. Those most in need, said the CFA, were hog and beef producers, as well as cash crop producers, and that includes potato producers. The Federation also noted that it is high interest rates and not poor management, as had been implied by the members of cabinet to your right, Mr. Speaker, which has driven farmers into this unfortunate position.

As well, the CFA pointed out that these loans would not be a government expenditure but might well prove to be an investment in Canada's future from which the government would reap good dividends. It was also pointed out that in the first quarter of 1980, there were 44 bankruptcies and that in 1981 there were 75.

It was pointed out that in 1979 there were 125 farm bankruptcies in Ontario and in 1980 there were 224. Farm bankruptcies were up 80 per cent over the 1979 level. In the first quarter of 1981, it was pointed out that farm bankruptcies are up nearly 70 per cent from the first quarter of 1979. If present trends continue, farm bankruptcies could reach 400 by the end of this year. These are serious trends which involve small businessmen who are being brought to heel under the economic feudalism generated by inflation, extravagance and debt brought on this country by this government.

Mr. Whelan stated that it was really only beef and pork producers who were facing bankruptcy. Perhaps pointing out the plight of the potato industry is good.

Interest Rate Policy

The Minister of Agriculture also said in the House yesterday that only a small percentage of farmers faced bankruptcy—

Mr. Blais: Order!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member is quoting from a document.

Mr. Evans: What is unparliamentary is unparliamentary.

Mr. McCain: It is obviously a sore spot for hon. members opposite. Even an economist would have to realize that there is an element of logic and argument against this government. The more you wail and complain over there, the more you emphasize how short you are on tender feelings, as you sit in the city and abuse the farmer about whom you know nothing. And you still want to interject. Mr. Speaker, I might add that that demonstrates the intelligence of the government as a whole.

The minister also tried to lay blame at the foot of the provincial budgets, Ontario in particular, stating that it only spent $200 million on agriculture in Tuesday's budget. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, and those tender-nerved individuals to your right, that the federal government in a single year, in ordinary administrative and research expenditures since 1980, has not made a real increase in the moneys allocated from its treasury to agriculture for the services which this government should perform. There has been an element of change in some departments and some additional emphasis placed on research in the last year, which shows previous neglect of this government. That is not all, Mr. Speaker. The government has tried to transmit to the provinces and the provincial taxpayers historic responsibilities that the Government of Canada has carried since Confederation, since this minister was willing to accept less from the government.

I have heard members of this House complain about the cost of food without saying anything about production costs. What about the fisherman whose fishing gear has risen in price five, six and sevenfold? The cost of boats has more than tripled. The fisherman, too, is paying ten to 15 times as much in interest as he was paying over the last ten years as a result of inflation. Interest alone may have reached as much as 15 per cent of the total cost of food—that is inflationary and cannot be interpreted otherwise.

There is no relief. Even the historic crutches which have been extended to agriculture by the government of this nation have been withdrawn. They have said: "Let us get the provinces to do it." Yes, food is costing more. Farmers and fishermen have had bad years, as they live in a cyclical situation of return in price; but rather than reaping exorbitant profits, they have actually subsidized the food consumer of this nation for years. The cattle feeder, for instance, is losing $150 per head in spite of the high price of meat. Just think of the subsidy he has extended to the food consumer of this nation. The hog producer is facing bankruptcy and, in spite of the price stabilization payment being paid by this government, which comes late but nevertheless is welcomed, he still finds himself subsidizing the consumer of Canada.

What does one want from the farmers and the fishermen? They have given their blood in 400 bankruptcies; and we are going to complain about the price of food in this nation? If anyone wants to complain about it, let him examine the distribution system and examine the mark-ups, and if there are troubles there, fine. However, agriculture is far from prospering in this nation today. The government wants the provinces to look after these bankruptcies and the hon. Minister of Agriculture, to the satisfaction of hon. members over there—I cannot read it any other way—is willing to abide by all these things which have been passed out by this government. Yes, there are predictions of 400 bankruptcies in agriculture in Ontario this year.

Let us take another instance. A dairyman has advised hon. members of this House that he has an investment which has been a family heritage, and he has an estimate of its value. At no time in the last three years has he been able to realize five per cent on his investment. Why does that farmer not sell that farm and deposit it with one of the borrowing or lending institutions of this nation and get 18 per cent? He is farming for less than nothing, and we are going to complain about the price of food? Yes, it is high, I acknowledge that. However, it is no higher, relatively speaking, than are automobiles, dishwashers, clothes driers or any other requirement of a consumer.

Let us examine the situation of the fishermen in a little more detail. I think it is rather interesting to note that the United Maritime Fishermens Co-op showed a surplus in sales of over $100,000 in 1978. In 1979 they had a deficit of $500,000. In 1980, their sales deficit rose to over $3.5 million. Although sales rose quantitatively, the price per pound stayed low due to poor domestic and foreign markets. In spite of the rising costs due to interest rates and cost of equipment, fishermen could not get a better price. Prices were kept low by the fact that the consumer demand dropped off both here and abroad, as stated in The Globe and Mail of March 19.

I have to stand up for the food producer in this nation because he is having a rough time under the structure that this government has established. The government, at this time, should not be opening new offices. It should not be taxing the people of Canada to support them or to employ more people. It should, instead, be looking for ways and means to use the people which it presently has in such a way as to reduce the tax burden and deficit. This is essential. Business and labour cannot be expected to exercise savings in view of the example set by this government. They cannot improve productivity and effect savings. They cannot be penny pinchers in the face of excessive taxation, excessive borrowing, and ridiculously heavy spending. When I read that executive salaries sometimes exceed $500,000, I must say that I find that to be a little high. I must acknowledge that that salary will have to be paid by the consumer of the goods that that company produces. I would say to you that social responsibility in such an instance and in such difficult financial times as these has evidently gone out of the window.

I want to give one example of this. Let us take as an example the village of McAdam in the province of New Brunswick, in my constituency. It was established by the CPR as the railroad was built. It became a booming town in which that company employed some 500 or 600 people at its peak. Now this corporate giant has decided to remove virtually all employment from that community. If left to its own resources, it will become a ghost town. After creating it, it abandoned the village, in the certain knowledge that it will become a ghost town. By not restoring employment historically extended by this company to the residents of that village, I submit that it has not demonstrated a sense of social responsibility. It worries not about the hardship that has been imposed upon these people, nor about the social expense—and this is what concerns me—which will be foisted on the taxpayers of the province of New Brunswick and the Government of Canada as a result of the abandonment of that community.

It is difficult, indeed, to be a free enterpriser under these circumstances, and to exercise a reasonable degree of responsibility when excesses such as this exist. I have to say, though, that the free enterprise system has, in the main, served this country extremely well. There are just a few examples in this structure which, I must say, deserve severe criticism.

The fiscal and monetary problems of this country today may appear to be similar to those which we read about in history. They appear to be simple, as to make us think that there is too much money after too few goods. Even when too much money chased too few goods, policies, now practised by this government, of heavy borrowing, heavy spending and heavy taxation, were self-defeating as happened in Germany after World War I. That kind of inflation could not be controlled that way. Even worse, this is not an historic inflationary period. The shelves are burdened with goods, but people cannot buy them in quantities which will encourage production or employment because the costs are too high. Yet this government is operating at high interest rates, with exorbitant spending and massive deficits, as if these were the cure. There is no immediate panacea.

The economic world today has three virtually equal parts in strength. They are government, management and labour. Until such time as each, with all its power, is prepared to sit down with the other to discuss the problem and evolve a solution, there is no hope for this nation. This government has shown that it lacks both the courage and the leadership capability to supply leadership and face the realities. It is high time that leadership and perhaps some unpopular political moves were applied. A co-operative triumvirate could triumph, but a stubborn government will not create the triumvirate or provide the leadership which could save this country with moves which might not be politically apparent. Let us go after it!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks this evening by saying how impressed I was with the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) who, this afternoon, rose from a sea of empty Conservative seats behind him to propose that this government should ignore the needs of about 70 per cent of Canadians, those who rent and those people, chiefly the elderly, who have little or no mortgage debt. That would be the effect of the amendment proposed by the hon. member which calls for the introduction of mortgage interest and property tax deduction.

In its April 14 Speech from the Throne, this government stated that Canadians would accept economic sacrifice to meet economic challenges, provided it was done on an equitable basis. I would like to know where the equity is in the proposition which would be so targeted, as in the amendment proposed by the Conservatives. In contrast to the previous administration, which, in opposition still sticks to a program to help a minority of Canadians, this government said the following in the throne speech: "We will help first those who need help most." The speech also stated that the government "recognizes the need to protect those Canadians most affected by an acceptably high interest rate". It goes on: "The government will act to assist those ordinary Canadians unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided . . . without the government embarking upon a major subsidy program."

To this end we have taken positive action on two fronts. First, we have met with lenders to determine the methods they would use to ease the impact of mortgage renegotiation. We have seen that those discussions have been successful in facilitating renegotiation. The practical result of this approach by the lenders has been a steadily declining rate of mortgage arrears in Canada.

In January, 1980, for example, there were 0.78 per cent of accounts under administration. This spring the number has dropped to 0.6 per cent, despite the number of roll-overs which occured in that period.

Second, some Canadians previously received aid for home purchases through various subsidy programs. They face a particularly sharp difference between the old and the new mortgage rates. They were often people of modest incomes; their incomes were of modest growth. We provided particular help on an equitable basis.

Let me report to this House exactly how much aid we have had to provide under the special arrangements I have referred to. Of the Assisted Home Ownership accounts reviewed so far, only 5.9 per cent, just 52 accounts to the end of last month, required the special help offered by this government. Very few complaints have been received to date from those served under the program who received only loans as opposed to subsidy aid; in fact just 11. The government has increased social housing by 5,000 units. These are the non-profit and co-operative dwellings serving people of modest income who receive from the Government of Canada interest write-downs to 2 per cent under Section 56.1 of the National Housing Act. This is in addition to the 25,000 units committed annually by the federal government under its social programs. In British Columbia, for example, one in ten homes is assisted by the federal government. This is important assistance to many people in this country.

The Speech from the Throne states that "Canadians want more effective government, not necessarily less government." In line with this promise, I am pleased to say that cabinet approval has now been given for CMHC mortgage insurance operations to be made more streamlined, more efficient and more competitive. This entails realistic inspection fees for a look at applicants, and somewhat higher premiums. We will have an improved Crown corporation operating on a fully commercial, cost recovery basis for its mortgage insurance, but clearly committed to serving the social needs of the country. Much of this depends on legislative amendments for which I hope to receive the support of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the message I have attempted to impart with these remarks is that this government has kept its promises, it is keeping its promises, and it will keep its promises.

Switching now to other matters in the housing market today, a study has recently been completed for CMHC by Vischer Skaburskis, planners on speculative activity in the most active housing market, namely Vancouver. It reports these interesting findings: out of 17,960 residential transactions studied, it was revealed that approximately 14 per cent appeared to be purely speculative in nature—so about 86 per cent are not. That applies to residents of the province. Another study brought to my attention by the CMHC general manager for the British Columbia region, shows that only about 1.2 per cent of properties bought by individuals in British Columbia, were bought by foreign investors. I know that people have been concerned about this. We will continue to watch closely in conjunction with other concerned agencies, the various trends which have the potential to pose significant problems.

We are monitoring the situation in the housing market very closely. In contrast to the position outlined earlier by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) of large numbers of foreclosures, I have indicated that claims have been dropping steadily, Mr. Speaker. In January of 1980, 711 were received, both rental and ownership. By December of last year, despite the rise in interest rates and with the large turnover, this had dropped to 557 claims. By April, again, despite the higher interest rates, the trend continued—441 NHA claims on 808 units.

The fact is that Canadian housing production is growing. Indeed, housing starts have turned around remarkably. The rate in the first quarter of this year was the highest since the fourth quarter of 1979. The seasonably adjusted annual rate for April was 242,500 new homes to meet the needs of Canadian families, compared to 158,000 in 1980, a record rate for the last five years.

Some may ask, Mr. Speaker, why this could be the case if people cannot afford to buy, as the hon. member for Oshawa has suggested. It is simply not true as he has alleged, that 90 per cent of Canadians cannot afford to buy a house. He should consider who is buying homes at record rates.

There are undoubtedly problems for those young first-time buyers entering the market with a small down payment and trying to buy a home with no existing mortgage on it. The facts are that the majority of Canadian homebuyers in today's market are buying with substantial equity from the home they currently occupy. We know that this equity has increased remarkably in the last few months. Many purchasers of houses are able to assume existing mortgages with interest rates stuck since the time when they were lower. Many others, by shopping around, are able to secure builder "buy down" mortgages. Some, and this is not new, will need to save longer or secure equity from relatives or employers. It would be interesting to know how many members of this House were assisted in their first home purchase and were able, on their own, to manage the down payment. We know that in many cases home purchase has been a family or company affair.

If interest rates were lower than they are, there is no guarantee at all that the faith of the leader of the NDP that increased access would result, would be realized. Interest rates are one of the few factors restraining a heated market. We do not know what would happen if interest rates were lower than they are. I would agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) that the brunt of the housing situation in the critical market area is undoubtedly being borne by renters. Statistics show that 34 per cent of British Columbia tenants are spending more than 30 per cent of their income on shelter. The situation is difficult. Since the easing of rent controls, rental increases have been running at about 20 per cent, outpacing the growth in real incomes.

I am pleased to say that British Columbia is expected to have 45,000 housing starts this year, 8,000 over the previous record year. Over 2,500 private rental housing units will be of great help to the easing of the rental market situation there when they come on stream. These units are part of the government's initiative under the MURB program and part of the corporation's activities in B.C. in realigning its underwriting provision to encourage rental housing starts in that very difficult market.

We are doing a great deal to help Canada's rental households. We provided last year alone, for example, subsidies totalling $297 million for about 400,000 homes directed toward lower and modest income Canadians, natives and people living in non-profit homes and co-operatives. That is a continuing and significant contribution by this government toward the shelter needs of Canadians.

I would add that far from being inactive, I intend to meet early next month with my provincial counterparts for what I am sure will be a very productive session on the issues that we face inherent in the motion before us this evening. The first priority concern I take with me to that meeting—and I might add that I am quite surprised that I have not heard mention of it in the debate today—is to bring attention to those Canadians who are the worst housed. I am speaking about the Indian, the native and the rural population of Canada.

During the year that I have held this portfolio, the corporation, in conjunction with organized people from these groups, has reviewed the policy and presented recommendations to the ministers involved, and we in turn have presented, and are in the process of presenting, those changes to our cabinet. I hope that with the co-operation and input of provincial ministers at the conference I have mentioned we can address that concern which should be a concern, not only to people in this House, but to all Canadians who, even though they are faced with problems in their daily lives, should share the concern for the neediest in our communities.

I am sure we will have co-operation and I look forward to meeting my counterparts in the provinces and from the territories as we address, not only the needs of the worst housed people in our communities, but the short-term as well as the long-term challenges that we have in housing today. We do have to plan and address the longer term problems in order to take advantage of what we have learned over the past decade. Housing is always a challenge, not only to the federal government but also to provincial and municipal governments.

In comparison, the previous government did little in the housing field. It authorized a study under the aegis of CMHC. The recommendations of that study were in effect to cancel and to withdraw from areas under the CMHC social program. In just a year we have taken action to get the housing market moving again. We have brought back the rental stimulus under the MURB program which was left to die by the previous government. We have provided additional social housing in addition to the 25,000 annually committed by this government over the years. That is opposite to the claim that this government is doing nothing in the area of social commitment to housing—

Mr. Deans: What you are doing is harmful.

Mr. Cosgrove: —and nothing for those people who need the assistance of this government for affordable housing. We have fostered a free housing market. That market is at last beginning to see a little bit of light in contrast to the darkness that it experienced under the previous administration.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed listening to those members opposite who have spoken this afternoon and this evening. As a result, a number of things have become very clear to me. While we in the New Democratic Party were preparing for this opposition day, I am proud to say that our caucus was unanimous that the high interest rates in the seemingly mindless policy of the Liberal government needed to be criticized and brought to the attention not only of government members but to the people of Canada. We were unanimous about the seriousness of the high interest rate situation. We were serious about the devastating nature of the increasing cost of living. Yet the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us the other day that home owners have never had it so good.

I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) speak. Implicit in his comments was that everything was quite fine, that the government was handling the problems of the day very well and things were going along quite nicely. Then, somewhat appalled, I listened to the minister responsible for housing suggest again that in the housing industry across Canada accessibility to decent housing is not the serious problem Canadians think it is.

I wonder why this dichotomy of viewpoint exists. Why do people on one side of this House have a certain feeling about the state of affairs while those opposite feel something quite different.

Mr. Skelly: That is politics.

Mr. Riis: It became clear to me that while we talk of tax credits, fiscal policy, monetarism, the M1, deferred taxes, bankruptcies, 21 percentile ranges, prime rates and the Bank of Canada, we are not talking about human beings.

We have a very interesting jargon we use to attempt to understand what is happening in our economy. We do not mention people. We do not mention that people are out there struggling just to keep alive, that they are struggling to keep running shoes on their children's feet. Instead of saving for a holiday this summer, they are struggling to keep their small business going and their farm productive. Human beings are out there being severely devastated by the policies of this government.

I do not want to dwell on the human side to this question, but it does seem to me that it has been absent from our discussions today. Within the last two weeks I had the opportunity to visit a small farmer in my constituency who had gone bankrupt. Here was an individual, a young man in his early forties, married with five children. He had purchased a farm a little over five years ago and had worked literally around the clock for 12 months of the year to attempt to get that farm on track. I had to witness a family packing up all of their worldly belongings in two vehicules and having to drive away. They will likely now find themselves on government dole as they join the ranks of the more than one million unemployed in Canada. That is the story of just one small farmer in central British Columbia.

I also had the opportunity of visiting a shop where the people had just closed the door and put plywood over the windows. This was a small welding shop in central British Columbia. Here again it was a family effort to develop a small welding and manufacturing industry to service the mining sector of central British Columbia. For the last three years the husband, wife and children worked 16 to 18 hours a day. They had to walk away from that dream.

Mr. Riis: The Liberal dream resulted in an absolute nightmare for many farmers and small businessmen.

I want to talk about the home owners. I suppose there is a grain of truth in what the minister of housing suggests. I would not for a moment say that he was intending to mislead the House. In some way or another, most Canadians today are trying to make do. How are they attempting to make do and what is the human cost? I am sure all of us know of many examples of households where, in an effort to make the mortgage payments, which are getting worse every week, the spouse has to work outside the home. The mother who wants to stay home, raise a family, be with her children after school or take care of preschool children, no longer has that opportunity. That individual is now forced into the marketplace as two incomes are required to meet the mortgage payment.

How often is the other spouse in the situation where after finishing work at the end of the day, he must go out that evening and do a little moonlighting on the side in order to meet the interest payments on their exorbitant mortgage? One could go on and on and talking about the real side of high interest rates and the damage it is doing to the fabric of Canadian society.

Today one sees more and more a situation of hopelessness. If one did a survey asking parents whether they had the same optimism for their children that they had when they were that age, and will their children's lives be the same as theirs at their age, in terms of what they can hope and dream for, I suspect that 100 per cent of the parents would say no, the Canada of the future under present conditions is bound to be worse. Who do we thank for that? Our friends sitting opposite, the Liberal government of Canada which is taking us so quickly to the brink of economic and financial disaster.

The governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), whom our spokesperson called Allan in Wonderland for obvious reasons, told Canadian farmers, fishermen, home owners, business people and consumers that high interest rates, which are obviously made in the United States of America, are necessary for Canadians in order to bring inflation under control. Canadians are not dimwitted persons. They know there is more to it than that.

For the year ending November, 1980, the rate of inflation was 11.2 per cent and the prime rate fluctuated between 12.25 per cent and 13.75 per cent. Since then the rate of inflation has moved up to 12.6 per cent, but the prime rate has skyrocketed into the 20 per cent range, and indications suggest that next Thursday it will be 22 per cent, eventually moving on to 25 per cent plus.

An hon. Member: Then Herb Gray will resign.

Mr. Riis: All of us in this House recall the words of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) when he was playing a role in opposition. He promised that if he was in government and interest rates were as high as those under the Tories, he would resign. They are much higher today. We hope the minister will live up to his promise. We will have to wait and see.

The government's efforts to fight inflation with ever higher interest rates have not, to use the words of the governor of the Bank of Canada, been of limited success. It has been an utter disaster. In fact, the short-term objectives have not really centred on inflation at all but rather on supporting the value of the Canadian dollar relative to that of the United States.

This objective has more or less been achieved. The exchange rate has moved within a fairly narrow range, from 82.5 cents U.S. to 86 cents since the beginning of 1979, but the price of exchange rate stability has been very high.

No country has experienced a continuous and unstable deterioration in the value of its currency and yet has been considered to be well run or well managed. However, the true value of a nation's currency depends on the health and vitality of its economy. It depends on the productivity of its citizens and a nation's ability to develop a sound and efficient manufacturing base to enable it to pay its way in the world economy.

Countries that have strong currencies have strong economies. The national productivity and world trade performance of West Germany, Switzerland and Japan are unexcelled and certainly must be considered exemplary in today's society. The Canadian economy, on the other hand, under this government and previous Liberal and Tory governments has been mismanaged on a plane unparalleled among western industrialized nations, with the possible exception of Great Britain over the last two or three years.

No country in the world has allowed the vital sectors of its economy to become so dominated by foreign economic interests. The National Energy Program bears testimony to this in our key energy sector right from the beginning, and the trend continues today. First it was the fur trade, followed by the squared timber trade, and now in the automotive and food industries we are still hewers of wood and drawers of water. No western industrialized nation has allowed its research and development effort to fall to the level tolerated in our country.

We hold up our head with a great deal of pride and say we have the same level of research and development as Greece and Portugal. With no reflection on Greece and Portugal, they are not considered to have the potential of the dynamic country that Canada ought to be and would be if it were not for the retarded policies of this country.

No other advanced industrialized nation with any sense at all has pursued the kind of bankrupt, short-term, get-rich-quick policies that have left Canada with a fundamentally unsound structure to its balance of international payments. Contrary to what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated about Canada's trade balance being fine, we are looking at a chronic current account deficit in the amount of $5 billion. We have a chronic service account deficit of over $9 billion resulting from the outflow of profits, dividends, interest and other payments to the foreign owners of the Canadian economy. We have a staggering deficit of over $16 billion in our trade on fully manufactured goods.

These are the real underlying sources of weakness in the Canadian dollar. Under the mismanagement of the present Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance over the past 13 years, the value of the Canadian dollar has fallen by over 20 per cent with respect to the United States dollar and by more than 40 per cent in relation to the stronger currencies of western industrialized nations. If I can paraphrase a familiar quote from Pogo, indeed "we have found the problem and they is" the Liberal government.

Our dollar would be much lower if it was not for the massive interventions in the foreign exchange markets since 1977 by the Bank of Canada to support the Canadian dollar and, of course, the bank's policy of maintaining high and rising interest rates, but exchange rate stability has been achieved over the last few years at a very high price.

There is the myth that our Canadian dollar is floating. We then must ask why we have to regularly support its value artificially in the 80-cent U.S. range.

Mr. Deans: It's not floating, it's sinking.

Mr. Riis: It is not a floating dollar but a sinking dollar and going down fast. Interest rate instability resulting from the Bank of Canada's monetary policies has made our financial institutions reluctant to extend fixed rate loans. This in turn has compounded business's task of planning ahead and financing long-term investment projects. When one cannot tell what the interest rate is going to be from one week to another, one is obviously reluctant to plan for six months in the future, let alone six years or 30 years down the road. In fact, a recent survey of over 10,000 small and medium-sized businesses disclosed that high interest rates were the most important factor in the decision for them to curtail planned expansion.

• (2130)

High interest rates contribute to a decline in our national productivity by forcing planners to discount projects in which they have invested heavily and which may result in broad based economic benefits, but over a long period of time. Thus a greater part of our economic activity is focused on rearranging industrial assets rather than increasing their size; that is, investing in new productivity, new capital creating new jobs and new opportunities for our communities.

One of the best illustrations of this type of distortion created by both high inflation and high interest rates is the growing wave of corporate takeovers resulting in increased business concentration in our economy. This is surely not at all in the best interest of Canadians.

Interest paid by one corporation on funds borrowed to finance a takeover is tax-deductible in our system. This lowers dramatically the after-tax cost of a merger, and in the present environment of high interest rates and inflation many corporations are more interested in buying other businesses than they are in producing and selling products to customers. We are not seeing, then, our economy expanding, developing and growing. We are simply seeing mergers and monopolies evolving.

In fact, the value of mergers in both Canada and the United States rose from $12 billion in 1975 to $22 billion in 1977, and from $34 billion in 1978 to $40 billion in 1979. In fact, Canadian companies last year spent more on acquisitions than they did on research and development.

These are only a few of the consequences of this government's misguided monetary policy. The death knell is being sounded for Canadian business, especially small Canadian business. The death rate is certainly greater than the birth rate for Canadian small businesses, which obviously means that the end is very close.

Inventory growth has a powerful influence on how the economy performs. In 1980, cutbacks in inventories made the difference between a positive economic performance and a negative one. Our present high interest rates have dramatically increased the cost of carrying inventories for all businesses, but this burden falls especially hard on small businesses. As a result, they must cut back on their type of investment which reduces their ability to carry adequate inventories. It reduces their ability to compete effectively with larger corporations, with the national chains and with the multinationals, again causing difficulties for the small business.

Small businesses, by their very nature, must be flexible and responsive to changes in market conditions if they are to survive and prosper. Uncertainty and instability undermine the effectiveness of business, especially small business, to make sound investment decisions, create new jobs for Canadians and contribute to our future prosperity.

A prime responsibility of government, then, is the establishment of policies that contribute to a stable, well managed economic environment, and encourage confidence in the future. Unfortunately the legacy of policies adopted in the 1970s, and now in the 1980s, under this government, is a climate of uncertainty and an economy in decline.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I treasure this last ten minutes in the evening for the opportunity it gives me to outline just a few thoughts. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate that has gone on today, particularly those speeches from the government benches and from my socialist friends to the left.

We heard the socialists say they blame inflation on high interest rates, on multinationals, the money-grubbing, profit-hungry banks, big business and the greedy speculator. Then we heard from the government side that everything is going well, we are all living well in this country, and the government cannot do anything about interest rates because our economy is so closely tied to that of the United States.

Time after time we hear stories about small business firms going under. We hear about farms and others going bankrupt. We hear about people losing their homes. All this is denied, of course, by members on the government benches. The fact is that all these things are happening.

The Liberals in their speeches about high interest rates and inflation say it is a result of that little bit of greedy push by Alberta which wants oil prices and commodity values to go up to something comparable to what is being paid elsewhere in the world.

All this distresses me because it becomes very obvious that this government is not only bankrupt financially, and obviously has nowhere to file its bankruptcy, it is bankrupt of ideas and solutions. It is very clear that if a business or a wage earner goes into debt by overspending and then begins to borrow funds to pay that debt, the business or the individual will go bankrupt. This government has declared personal bankruptcy but it has no place to file. This shows up in the strength of the Canadian dollar.

To make a case to the world that we are doing all right here in Canada and that Canada is endowed from coast to coast with riches galore, while countries like Japan and Germany are doing without, we prop up the Canadian dollar which is not worth the 83 cents indicated on the foreign market. This is the direct result of the system we are operating.

There is one cause, and one cause only, for inflation, and that is government spending and waste. The more government gets involved in the day to day operations of people's lives, the more it is going to spend and the more inflation will increase. The government does not have the income, and it is is not getting it in taxes. What is the government after? It is after more money to run the system. The government does not say it has to get its spending in line. If the government would say it was going to cut back on expenditures this year and next year and balance the budget, then I would humbly submit that the investment community around the world would look at Canada and begin to see immediately that Canada is the place to invest. The Canadian dollar would then strengthen and interest rates would go down because we would have something attractive for the investor. They would have confidence in the Canadian economy.

What are they saying about us in other countries? We become very incensed when we look at things around what we call Parliament Hill. We read editorials about our own words day after day and we begin to think that maybe this is the centre of the world. What are some of the others saying about us? Let me just tell you. The California business research firm, Environmental Risk Limited, has ranked Canada 29th on a list of 45 nations as a place to invest. We are preceded by places such as Singapore, Switzerland, Taiwan and South Korea. That feeling is being expressed not only in the United States but also in other countries. Why? Look at the idiotic and absolutely asinine national energy policy introduced last October. What did it do? This government moved in on the one industry which is healthy and strong and creating jobs and activity right across Canada and, with its national energy policy, killed the goose which was laying the golden egg and keeping the economy humming. Now the government is beginning to sweat because it sees that the national energy policy will defeat everything the government wanted to do. The government wanted to bring about energy self-sufficiency by 1990. Let us be honest about it; there is no way that will happen. Hon. members opposite know as well as I do that there is no way we will have oil self-sufficiency by 1990 because of the delay caused by their national energy policy.

There is pressure at the present time in the manufacturing sectors in Quebec and Ontario. Why? Because there is a downturn. The golden goose has nearly been killed because this Liberal government took its arrow, shot it and said, "We want more; we are going to take it over". Hon. members opposite killed the golden goose, and where did it go? It took off.

Mr. Kelly: How can it take off if we killed it?

Mr. Gray: We know what you Conservatives did to the "Arrow".

Mr. Shields: Hon. members opposite know exactly what I am saying, although I may not be able to express it as well or as glibly as some others.

There are small businessmen who are prepared to invest in this Canadian community of ours. Companies are ready to invest in Canada. Literally $20 billion are waiting to be invested in two major tar sands plants, one at Fort McMurray and one in the Cold Lake area. That would create in the neighbourhood of 60,000 jobs across the country and greater activity in the manufacturing sector in central Canada, thereby creating more jobs. When there are jobs, wage earners can pay taxes. When there are no jobs, they cannot pay taxes, and federal government revenues begin to decrease substantially.

I ask members of the government to consider very carefully the bankrupt policy they are following, and have been following for the past 12 years, with the complete support, through marriage, of the New Democratic Party, whose members now have a holier-than-thou attitude. They are the ones who have kept this government in power for the past 12 years.

The first realistic budget presented to the people of Canada was defeated by members of the Liberal party through their very convenient marriage to the absolutely immoral socialist New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Parent): Is the House ready for the question?

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Added to the growing list of horror stories being compiled in this country as our economic situation worsens daily, comes news of a possible postal strike. In light of the fact the Canadian Union of Postal Workers may be in a legal position to strike in one month, and given the fact that such a strike would result in serious consequences to the general public, and the now-struggling business community in particular, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Postmaster General recognize the extreme gravity of the situation and take every immediate and possible step to ensure that such a strike is averted.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DIEFENBAKER GOVERNMENT INFLATION FIGHTING METHODS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since 1948 only four governments have had the economic policies necessary to keep the inflation rate below 2 per cent. West Germany did it in 1948; Eisenhower did it in 1953; de Gaulle did it in 1958, and the Progressive Conservative government under the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker did it between 1957 and 1963. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the present Liberal government launch an immediate investigation into the methods by which the Diefenbaker government was able to maintain a world record low inflation rate of 1.2 per cent, and then go back to the drawing board with their present inflationary budget and disastrous National Energy Program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL HYDROLOGY RESEARCH INSTITUTE

SUGGESTED REMOVAL FROM OTTAWA TO SASKATOON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to bring to the attention of the House some recent pearls of wisdom from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). According to the Canadian Press, the hon. minister told an audience of eager young Liberals in Saskatoon that the University of Saskatchewan campus there would be the most logical place for the National Hydrology Research Institute because of long-term water management problems on the prairies, to which the chief young Liberal added that money for the move could come from the Axworthy slush fund. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That this House call upon the cabinet to make good immediately on Liberal promises, dating back to 1976, to move the Hydrology Institute from Ottawa to Saskatoon, without, however, resorting to the typically "back-Axworthy" move of bribing western Canadians with their own money.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

SUPPORT FOR ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER OF FINANCE AT GABON MEETING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43, of urgent importance.

In view of the selection by members of the International Monetary Fund, which numbers some 140 countries, of the Minister of Finance of Canada (Mr. MacEachen) as chairman of the important interim committee of the IMF which advises all member countries on the management and adaptation of the international monetary system, and since the economic well-being of Canada will depend to a large extent on the solving of world economic problems through agencies like the IMF, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain):

That this House urges the hon. member for York-Simcoe to withdraw his frivolous, foolish and insulting motion questioning the attendance of the Minister of Finance at important international gatherings such as the current IMF meeting in Gabon.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF MEXICAN OIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the heavy sulphur content of Mexican oil is causing severe problems at our refineries, as well as increased sulphur emissions into the atmosphere and, in addition, this so-called oil is costing the people of Canada millions of dollars more than Alberta oil would cost even at 75 per cent of the Chicago price, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That this House deplores this waste of taxpayers' money and this shameful discrimination of this Liberal government against the province of Alberta.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

APARTMENT VACANCY RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recent CMHC figures show apartment vacancy rates down to the unacceptably low national average of 1.8 per cent, a drop of 1 per cent from one year ago. Some provincial governments, however, have moved to alleviate the problem through interest-free loans to developers. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House call upon the government to implement a program that will assist private developers to construct apartments for Canadians who are now having difficulties finding a place to live.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to introduce the following motion. Whereas both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have been extremely evasive and prevaricative on whether or not they plan to implement wage and price controls, or exchange controls, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Finance be immediately recalled to Canada and that he be obliged to make a clear statement, if that is at all possible for the hon. gentleman, as to whether or not the Liberal government again plans to impose wage and price controls on Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR INCREASE IN SURVIVOR BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House notes that under various government superannuation plans, if the wife dies first the surviving widower's pension is 100 per cent but that if the husband dies first the surviving widow's pension is only 50 per cent, and this House calls on the government to bring in the necessary legislation to correct this situation on an interim basis by raising the widow's pension in all such cases to 75 per cent, and to declare that the eventual goal is pension equality between men and women.

If we believe in equality, let us practise it.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

SUGGESTED TALK BY AUTHORS OF POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Noting that since the announcement of the so-called "National" Energy Program on October 28, 114 drilling operations and 49 servicing operations have left for the United States; regretting that for each rig that leaves Canada an estimated minimum of $1 million in wages and other economic spin-offs alone is lost to our country on a yearly basis, not to mention the lost opportunities of finding domestic oil and gas with that rig; and acknowledging that the stupidity of the program is perhaps rivalled only in recent times by that of the post war Roumanian agriculture minister, whose politics it seems unnecessary to specify, who ordered approximately two million Roumanian horses killed without bothering to note that there were no tractors available to replace them, thereby causing a severe famine, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That the authors of the national energy policy, the energy minister, the finance minister, and the Prime Minister, jointly give this House a talk entitled "the power to tax is the power to destroy".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXCHANGE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It arises from an exchange in this House yesterday between our two socialist leaders. Yesterday in replying to the hon. member for Oshawa concerning the possibility of somehow sheltering the mortgage interest rate impact on Canadians, the Prime Minister stated that:

—the alternative, Madam Speaker, is to go into exchange controls, and I have not heard even the NDP in its wildest moments advocate those.

I wish to bring to the Prime Minister's attention that there was such a wild moment on the part of the NDP. It came as a result of an answer given on May 12 by the Prime Minister to the Leader of the NDP. In an answer to a request for lower interest rates, the Prime Minister stated:

—this would mean exchange controls, and until he is prepared to advocate that I would say that we are not prepared to listen to him.

On May 14 the Leader of the NDP came back and stated:

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that if there is a run on the dollar or if there is a concern about a flow of money—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stevens:

—south of the border in the short run—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stevens:

—then certain action could be taken.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stevens:

We do not withdraw from the suggestion of a form of exchange controls.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That is the third quotation in the course of asking a question. It is a bit much. I urge the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Stevens: Now that we have the scenario properly set for the Prime Minister, will he bring us up to date on what is the attitude of the government with regard to the possible reimposition of exchange controls, something we have not had since 1950?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. member that I am not leader of a socialist party but of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: A rose by any other name—

Mr. Trudeau: We on this side are proud of our Liberal label, Madam Speaker. We do not try to hide it under the Conservative Progressive ticket that they use over there. If the hon. member wants any witnesses, I can call on the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, the questioner was so long-winded that you had to cut him off at the point where he was trying to establish what he was trying to establish. I did not hear the quotation of the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Therefore I fail to see his whole point, which was to say that the Leader of the New Democratic Party accepted exchange controls. Then you stood up, Madam Speaker, and we did not hear him any longer.

Mr. Wilson: You heard his question.

Mr. Trudeau: Look, you silly guys—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. I think we will have to start that one over again. I do not mean that the hon. member should again cite his quotations, but that he should put a simple and brief question to whomever he wishes to direct it.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister can well understand my reference to his being a socialist leader. After all, I am judging him simply by his actions. The Leader of the New Democratic Party stated:

We do not withdraw from the suggestion of a form of exchange controls.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member simply ask his question.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the statement made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party on May 14, will the Prime Minister now indicate to the House the curent attitude of the government with respect to exchange controls?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is asking me "In view of the statement made by the Leader of the NDP", you will have to let him read that statement or I cannot answer the question.

• (1120)

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, let me put the question in the simplest possible fashion.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member now has to read the statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, let me put the question in the most direct way to the Prime Minister, who is simply toying with the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Would the Prime Minister indicate whether there is any serious consideration being given to the reimposition of exchange controls in Canada by his colleagues or by the cabinet itself?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Ma'am.

GOVERNMENT POLICY WITH RESPECT TO PUBLIC'S DISCRETIONARY SPENDING

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Prime Minister, if I may.

As he knows, the average Canadian is being squeezed, and the concern in the country among average Canadians in respect of this squeeze is that it is going to get tighter, that real wages are falling behind—that is established by the statistics—and that there has been no energy tax credit and no mortgage interest deductibility to give relief. If the Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada are correct in saying that higher interest rates can control inflation, is it correct then to conclude that government policy is to squeeze the public until there is no discretionary spending left? I am wondering whether the Prime Minister, in his wisdom, would have any advice for all those people who at this moment have no discretionary spending?

GOVERNMENT FISCAL POLICIES

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, we can certainly see how serious the government is about the plight of the average person throughout this land. We are continually told that productivity is the answer to the low Canadian dollar, our high interest rates, our imbalance of trade, our continuing demand for higher wages and benefits, and that these things can only be resolved by fiscal policies which will deliver an improved Canadian productivity to our country and our economy. Both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister know this, as I have heard them state it so often. Will the Prime Minister advise us as to the fiscal policies the government might have in mind to deliver the incentives necessary to excite and deliver a highly productive, efficient and effective economy, which is ours by right and by heritage?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Those policies are contained in the budget, Madam Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TERMINATION OF SERVICES OF COMBINES DIRECTOR OF INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH—APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, yesterday I raised a question about the termination of the services of Monsieur Bertrand. I would like today to direct a question specifically to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Stories associated with the termination of the services of Monsieur Bertrand included stories that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was being reorganized in such a way that the autonomy and powers of the director of investigation and research would be curtailed. Those stories were also accompanied by statements that there would be an appointment of a new director, probably one of the individuals appointed by Michael Pitfield. Would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs give us a description of what reorganization is going on within his department at this time?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, let me first of all say that all of this is part of the very regrettable, wild speculation which took place concerning Mr. Bertrand. There is no reorganization in the department and the successor to Mr. Bertrand will be appointed soon by the cabinet, and not by Mr. Pitfield. The remark the hon. member has made about apparent linkage between reorganization of the department and the responsibility of the director of combines should not be made because the new director of combines investigation will have the same authority and power Mr. Bertrand had previously.

LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENTS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, we will wait to see the outcome with respect to this matter, but on March 5 the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs suggested that he could place before the House within five weeks the new amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. The minister received from Monsieur Bertrand in his report on the petroleum industry two specific recommendations respecting amendments which should be made to that statute.

Could the minister explain why he has changed the amendments—this was announced in his speech—and changed the procedure by which the Combines Investigation Act amendments will come before this House? Why specifically do we not have that legislation now, so that people can study and comment, and so that a broad segment of Canadian society can provide input? Why has there been a change? Why have we not seen that legislation to this point?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is very clear that if hon. members were to co-operate and adopt bills much more rapidly we would very soon be in a position to consider legislation to amend the Combines Investigation Act. I sponsored in the House a few days ago a strictly non-controversial bill, the bankruptcy legislation. The opposition wasted two days debating everything under the sun except the bankruptcy measure. Once again it proves that members opposite engage in filibustering and prevent the government from dealing quickly with the bills it wants to pass.

As to the competition bill, Madam Speaker, I think it would be useful to consult the parties concerned. I sent to all the big national associations in Canada 21 questions having to do with competition. I expect an early reply from those Canadian associations so that I will then be in a position to make specific recommendations to cabinet. Finally, when the bill comes before the House I hope the hon. member and all his other colleagues in the opposition will adopt that bill very quickly.

DEPARTMENTAL STAFFING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): From his last comments I believe the minister missed the point I was trying to make in my question, Madam Speaker.

[English]

I have one final question in this respect. Over the past few years the minister's department has been depleted in resources in terms of the person-years which have been available to that department, and in terms of adequate financing. The question of reorganization almost appears to be a question of the gutting of that department. We would have much more confidence in the minister if he introduced combines legislation so that we could see a strong determination in that department.

Would the minister confirm that he has in fact begun a process of gutting the department? The confidence of this House would be restored if the minister would submit strong combines legislation now.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, we ought to pay homage to the officials who manage that department. They worked facing restrictions in hiring staff and had to make do with a budget which was not increased other than to follow the natural upward trend in the cost of living. They continued the efficient and uninterrupted operations of the consumer department throughout the country. That is an example of sound administration which can be a source of inspiration for other departments. Too often governments are blamed for inflating budgets and hiring personnel, and we are told that we ought to clamp down a bit on government expenditures, so as an example I cite the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which has been able indeed to cut its expenses and staff procurement while continuing to offer excellent services to the people.

As regards the second part of the hon. member's question, namely, when the bill will be introduced, I can assure him that we are well into the process of drafting, studying and working on bringing amendments to the competition bill. It will certainly be one of the major pieces of legislation of the next session.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

DROP IN VALUE OF SHARES—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The annual general meeting of the Canada Development Corporation was held yesterday. At that meeting considerable concern was expressed by a number of small shareholders as to the degree of interference and intervention on the part of the government in the affairs of that company. So far the loss to the public shareholders of the company amounts to some $75 million to $100 million because of the decline in share values since the interference by the government began.

• (1130)

For many of these people, holding shares in CDC is their only investment in the future of Canada, and in order to restore the confidence of these shareholders in the future prospects of the CDC the government must make a clear and unequivocal commitment that it will not interfere in any way with the affairs of that company, specifically, that the government will confirm that CDC does not require government approval in the conduct of its affairs and that the government will not interfere with the directors in the exercise of their business judgment.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to make that specific commitment today to this House and the shareholders of the CDC?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if there was a paper loss in the value of the shares I think it could be directly ascribed to the opposition who have tried—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, hear me out. The opposition have tried to make a big fuss over the fact that the major shareholder was attempting to ensure that the chairman of the company would be a very successful businessman. Now there does not seem to be anything in that, or in Mr. Strong's career as a successful businessman, which would frighten people, so obviously if there has been a fall in the value of the shares it is because there has been the kind of agitation we have heard in the past couple of weeks from the hon. member and his party who have tried to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —scare people into believing that the company would do badly under Mr. Strong whereas they were doing marvellously under some other chairman whose name, I bet, is probably unknown to three quarters of the shareholders themselves.

I have said in this House that this government holds 49 per cent of the shares for the Canadian people, we have somewhere between 75 and 80 per cent of the equity of the company, I do not know of any shareholder in similar circumstances, in private or public, semi-private or semi-public affairs, who would not be interested in the designation of the chairman of that company of which he or she is a major equity holder. That is what the government has tried to ensure, and there is nothing for which we should apologize. The annual meeting was held yesterday. I understand that it was amicable and that the results are satisfactory to all people concerned. The hon. member seems to have a supplementary, and I will be happy to hear it.

NECESSITY FOR COMMITMENT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have to ask a supplementary because I did not get an answer to my question.

Let me make one point quite clear. The drop in the value of the shares took place before we raised the question in this House and occurred because the shareholders were aware of the interference by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government. That is why the shares went down, and for no other reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: My question to the Prime Minister is to ask why is he completely unwilling to make that specific commitment, one that was made in the offering memorandum on behalf of the government to the shareholders, which they took at face value when they made their share purchases? Why is the Prime Minister unwilling to make that commitment today because I can tell him, based on my experience in that business, if he does not make the commitment, the future expansion and financing of that company will be put into serious doubt? His alternatives are to make the commitment or buy back today the shares that were sold to the small investors of this country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not sure what future financing plans the hon. member is referring to. If he has some information on that I would be happy to have him make it public. I do not know of such future financing plans of the CDC, but I do know that during the first ten years of its existence, a company set up by this government some ten years ago, I was informed and consulted about the appointment of its chairman. The shares, according to the hon. member, continued to increase in value.

I think it was normal when we were not informed, or when the Minister of Finance did not receive the information in time, that the government should have shown some concern. We hold, on behalf of the people of Canada, more than 75 per cent of the equity of that company, and I think it would be a mere courtesy to ensure that the major shareholder and equity holder would be informed of the choice of chairman.

REVIEW OF TASCHEREAU-KELLOCK ROYAL COMMISSION PAPERS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, you will appreciate that the retired civil servant retained by the Privy Council Office to review the transcripts and documents of the Taschereau-Kellock Royal Commission on the Gouzenko revelations was to report to the Privy Council Office by May 1, when I understand his mandate expired. I ask the President of the Privy Council if that report has been made, and if the recommendation is to permit public access to all of the papers, as it should, why are inquiries from the public still being denied?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, with regard to the question of the hon. member and the report to which he referred, I shall certainly check into the matter. I should be able to give him a more detailed answer early next week.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING ESPIONAGE ACTIVITIES IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Is the President of the Privy Council indicating that he does not even know if the report has been made to him or not, or what the recommendations are, or what the situation is? In view of this almost unbelievable ignorance of something within his jurisdiction I would ask him whether he could also, while he is checking into it, check into the actual transcripts, papers and revelations of Mr. Gouzenko to ascertain whether or not it is true that a number of public civil servants were incriminated by those revelations and if, as well, there were two other spy rings indicated in this country's public service and that the government, in the intervening years, has done absolutely nothing to try to uncover those two spy rings?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, my previous answer also applies to the second question.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

IMPORTANCE OF AGREEMENT ON LAW OF THE SEA

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and relates to the upcoming Ottawa Summit in July and the Law of the Sea agreement. Assuming that he recognizes and agrees that seabed resource and revenue sharing must be the cornerstone of any redistribution of the world's economic wealth and power, and that a collapse of the Law of the Sea agreement would seriously undermine hopes for a new and more just international economic order, will he not only try to convince the United States of the very great importance of signing the Law of the Sea agreement for the future of the North-South dialogue, but will he also take the initiative at the meeting to have the delegates approve this agreement at least in principle?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, I would agree with the hon. member, Madam Speaker, that for many of the Third World countries the Law of the Sea agreement and its provisions concerning the seabed are indeed central to their preoccupations.

I cannot give any guarantee to the hon. member as to the results to be obtained, but she is aware that various countries are attempting in various ways to persuade the United States to accede to the conventions of the Law of the Sea, and that we in Canada will continue to try to persuade the United States to that effect.

Miss Jewett: I hope that the Prime Minister will take the initiative at this conference to have the delegates approve in principle the Law of the Sea agreement. Would the Prime Minister assure us that we still believe in the multilateral approach and that in fact, if the United States decided it did not want to go that way, or wanted a mini-treaty of some kind, that we would not go the route of the mini-treaty? Would he assure us that we will continue to go the multilateral route and continue to show a very intimate interrelationship between the Law of the Sea agreement and the possibility of a new international economic order?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the alternative mentioned by the hon. member of a mini-treaty, but certainly I can indicate that the Law of the Sea negotiations which have taken place thus far are the way in which we intend to see the matter continued.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSAL TO CONSTRUCT PRODUCTION CENTRE IN TORONTO

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. On last Friday, May 15, the CBC appeared before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, and I renewed my question about when the CBC plans to build a central production centre in Toronto. The president of the CBC agreed with me that the existing facilities are appalling, but said he does not plan to do anything until the government makes a definite commitment to the construction of a CBC production centre in Toronto. Would the minister tell the House what steps his department has taken, or plans to take, toward the construction of such a facility, and what kind of expenditures are involved?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, the CBC has a proposal to lease additional space in the Toronto area to consolidate some of its facilities. As to a new CBC facility in Toronto, I am informed that the cost would be somewhere between $235 million and $250 million.

The CBC receives a parliamentary appropriation every year. It is now somewhere around $649 million, which is $70 million more than last year, and $150 million in commercial revenues, which gives them a total budget of close to $790 million. The CBC has a capital component in its budget of approximately $75 million a year which it spends on capital projects. This year the management of the CBC recommended to the government that consolidation take place in a number of places in the country, including Regina where some $16 million will be spent this year on new facilities. It is up to the CBC to make recommendations to cabinet. I understand that in the Toronto area the CBC is looking at a number of other options, including the use of land which it presently owns.

FINANCE

GROWTH IN MONEY SUPPLY

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. In the mid 1970s the government informed Canadians that it would have to control the rate of growth in the money supply in order to contain inflation. The statistics of the Bank of Canada indicate that this is a complete failure. In only one year out of the last ten has inflation gone down when the money supply has gone down. Many economists in Canada are telling the government that it is impossible to contain inflation unless the government contains its own spending in addition to controlling the growth in the money supply. Is the minister prepared to admit that the control of the growth in the money supply is ineffective unless we also control government spending?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member would ask such a question. I would simply suggest to him to read once again the budget speech made last October by the Minister of Finance. He will see quite clearly that the Minister of Finance indicated not only his support for the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada, but also that, for this policy to be effective, he would undertake to reduce the deficit in an orderly manner. He gave an outline of the plan to reduce government expenditures as well as the deficit. He also indicated that the fight against inflation must involve all sectors of the economy. That is the message that the budget gave to all economic agents.

PROPOSAL TO REMOVE TAX ON EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I find the minister's answer hard to understand since government spending has risen by 16 per cent this year. A couple of weeks ago Mr. Lougheed, the Premier of Alberta, suggested that the government could have some positive effect on interest rates if it allowed more exports of natural gas, simply by taking off the 30-cent per thousand cubic feet of tax which the government imposed on natural gas going from Alberta. He suggested that if the government did this it would no longer have to track American interest rates as it is doing now. Is the minister prepared to consider such a proposal from a financial standpoint, not from the standpoint of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that the policy of this government is consistent and not compartmentalized. As a proof of this, in the last budget, in addition to the financial operation framework of the government for 1981, the Minister of Finance announced jointly with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a new national energy program. In our view, natural gas and oil are first of all resources which must serve all Canadians and every action must be taken to ensure that they continue to do so.

AIRPORTS

ROLE OF DAWSON CREEK, B.C. AIRPORT IN DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHEAST COAL PROJECT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the development of northeast coal in British Columbia. As he knows, one way to stimulate the economy in the short term would be to get some megaprojects under way. In connection with his responsibilities as minister, I would ask him to put some of the infrastructures in place in northeastern British Columbia to facilitate the shipment of this coal. Apart from his responsibilities in connection with the agreements that have been made with the province, there is a direct responsibility, namely, in connection with the upgrading airports and facilities for air transportation in the region.

I am particularly concerned about the hopelessly inadequate facilities at the Dawson Creek airport which was assigned a very important role as a staging area for coal development. Have the minister's officials as yet examined the role the Dawson Creek airport is to play and whether money has been set aside and planning is under way to upgrade the facility?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed this area will have very substantial growth in coming years. This morning I read in the paper that a CN vice-president announced that more than $500 million would be spent on the CN line in this area. He was talking, I may say to the Prime Minister, in terms of double-tracking that part of it, Prince George to Prince Rupert, by 1995.

On the situation of the airport at Dawson Creek, I must admit I cannot memorize the budget of all airports in Canada; there are close to a thousand of them. I will report to my hon. friend as soon as I can.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, the minister will discover that it was previously planned to redesignate and upgrade the airport and that with the additional load and role assigned to it by his former colleague, Mr. Basford, the situation is now extremely crucial. Could the minister report to me on whether the upgrading of the airport will be looked at as the sole responsibility of his department, or will it be tied in to the general agreement between the province and the federal government? In other words, are the province and the regional area expected to pay some of the costs of the upgrading of the airport, or will the minister assume that responsibility himself?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I cannot be very definitive on the subject. In Canada there are different classes of airports. There are airports of a more local nature where provincial governments make contributions one way or the other as well. But I will look at it with a very open mind.

FISHERIES

BLOCKADE OF VICTORIA HARBOUR BY SALMON FISHERMEN—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF RESTRICTIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Of course he will be aware that yesterday there was a blockade of the Victoria Harbour which caused certain disruptions in traffic and that the strike of the fishermen could very easily spread to other ports in the area. This demonstration of anger at the minister's restrictive practices was brought about because American fishermen, on the breakdown of the Canada-United States negotiations, are fishing in Canadian waters and taking young stock in areas where Canadian fishermen are being denied access.

Having been out there for the first—second time, really, since he reassumed office—and having seen the matter on the site, is the minister now prepared to reconsider the decision which he made about gear, about limited access and limited time? This is taking into account the preservation of the salmon stocks, which every Canadian wants to see; but still fishermen have to live. Is he prepared to reconsider the restrictions he has imposed on the fishermen in that area?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, there is a certain amount of misinformation in the hon. member's question. The fact is that we had test fishing on the Canadian part of Swiftsure Bank, and there were fewer juvenile fish than had been assumed, and we did in fact open it so the trollers could fish in that area. We tried to get agreement from the U.S. authorities to close down if there were too many immature fish. We still hope that they might do so, because we would close down if immature fish were too numerous, as any normal fish manager would do.

On the question of the demonstration, I must say that the regulations which were announced last October followed long consultation with the trollers through their representatives, three of whom sit on the ministerial advisory council set up by my predecessor. At the time it was agreed that six gurdies were a wise conservation measure. At the meeting that I had with the same advisory council last week, again the representatives of the majority of the trollers supported the conservation measures we had announced. The consultations were long and exhaustive.

I am really surprised that the hon. member is advocating a change on a measure which was taken strictly on conservation grounds and which, in fact, if we were to back down before this sort of demonstration, would make any pretence to manage the fisheries exactly that, a pretence.

FINANCIAL POSITION OF FISHERMEN

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In these consultations the minister is talking about, I wonder whether he was able to take into account the financial structure of the fishermen in the area and, particularly, the high interest rates that they are now having to pay to finance their operations. While conservation is the concern of fishermen across the country, and he should certainly not be charging fishermen with failing to take that into account in their enterprise, there is still the matter of the livelihood of fishermen.

I am wondering whether the minister really did get this information about the six gurdies as opposed to the eight. In light of the current interest rates alone, the fishermen are not able to make their payments. Is he trying to drive them out of business? Is he trying to destroy the industry of the trollermen on the west coast? I rather suspect that he is, in favour of the seiners.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): We offered the trollers what adjustments we thought were reasonable, including the one I have just mentioned, the reopening of Swiftsure as long as there are not excessive numbers of juvenile fish caught. We offered to look at the October fishery, in light of the season, in light of the condition of the stocks, when that time comes. But surely the hon. member is not advocating that we eliminate conservation measures because the interest rate has gone up.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Nor are fishermen.

Mr. LeBlanc: Frankly, if I had to manage a fishery on the basis of fluctuations in the interest rate, then I would really hand in my resignation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Let's have it today.

LABOUR RELATIONS

VOYAGEUR BUS LINE STRIKE—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I advised the Minister of Labour I would be asking this question this morning, and I notice that he has disappeared. I hope he is not too far away.

My question to the minister concerns the long and protracted strike that is developing at Voyageur Bus Lines. As the minister knows, a strike of a bus line is particularly damaging to middle and lower-income Canadians who cannot afford the luxury of air transportation. Also, a small number of communities have become isolated as a result of this strike. Will the minister appoint a mediator to look into this? I have been advised that the unions would like this type of service at this time.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for bringing to our attention the question of the Voyageur bus strike. This strike, which commenced on April 28, involves some 450 drivers and maintenance workers in the Ottawa and Toronto terminals. It also not only affects service within Ontario but also service to and from Ontario points and Montreal. The mediation branch of the department is available to provide mediation services. The parties are aware of that, but they have not indicated a desire to resume negotiations as yet. If either of the parties does so, then we are prepared to provide the mediation services immediately at this stage.

The hon. member will be aware of the fact that the parties went through extensive negotiations and conciliation services from the time of the expiration of the agreement last November until the strike began on April 28. Our department is immediately available to provide mediation services at the request of the parties.

NEED FOR PROMPT ACTION

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, the minister must be aware that this company has a monopoly on the services in the western portion of Quebec and Ontario. How long must these people wait to have some kind of gathering brought together? Will the minister immediately try to get the two sides together, to try to resolve this situation so that these people can continue to get the service they expect?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, if the information that the hon. member provides to the House is accurate, that the parties now want mediation services and are prepared to sit down again, then I will certainly respond by providing that service immediately. Of course the hon. member, who is quite knowledgeable in these matters, is aware of the fact that in all of these disputes there must be the willingness of the parties to sit down. They must come to that stage, and if they are at that stage, then we are most anxious to provide the assistance.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

FUND RAISING PROJECTS TO ASSIST IN FIGHT AGAINST ARTHRITIS AND CANCER

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. In view of the discussion which has been going on with respect to Arthritis Month in Canada, I have had letters and inquiries from the Arthritic Association of New Brunswick. I wonder if the minister could clarify this alleged misunderstanding between that organization, and the date set for the Terry Fox fund raising run.

Mr. Nielsen: Why did you say no yesterday?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the arthritic association has traditionally held its fund raising drive in this country in the month of September, whereas the cancer organization has primarily dealt with its in the month of April. For a variety of reasons, those organizations responsible for establishing the Terry Fox Day, the Cancer Society, the Canadian Track and Field Association, and the Four Seasons Hotels, in consultation with the Fox family, chose the date of September 13 for the Terry Fox Day and the Terry Fox run, in which I hope some two million Canadians will participate.

Of course in the past there have been many instances of the overlapping of various charitable fund raisings. Indeed, during Terry Fox's own run across Canada it was found that, even though it concentrated on the cancer cause, other charities received more than they traditionally did in those time periods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I am hopeful that the people who have traditionally supported the arthritic cause will do so, at least to the same degree, and perhaps to a greater degree, in the month of September. However, I can assure the hon. member that following the announcement and the choice of that date by those organizations, officials of the arthritic association and the cancer society met together in consultation and have agreed that they should proceed with the September 13 date for this year and then assess the situation after September's experience.

INSTALLATION OF JOINT ENROUTE TERMINAL SYSTEM

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On January 23 of this year I asked the minister some general questions regarding the Joint Enroute Terminal System. It is now crystal clear that JETS, as specified by the Department of Transport, and delivered, fails to comply with the air traffic control operation requirements. I want to ask the minister if he will put a halt to further installation on JETS until a study can be undertaken to determine the safety of the system.

● (1200)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is a big question. I recognize that there is a debate now on the adequacy of the JETS, the Joint Enroute Terminal System. On one side you have my hon. friend, whose opinion as a pilot I obviously treasure, and you also have CATCA, the controllers, saying that the system is inadequate; on the other side you have pretty impressive expertise also. You have CALPA, the pilots' union, who were before the committee on transportation the other day saying that Canadian safety standards at airports were far superior to anything in the world.

You also have the opinion of the experts in Transport Canada, which is not unsubstantial, both at the headquarters and the regional levels. They say that indeed there are problems but they are being resolved, that precautionary measures are being taken and remedial measures are being taken, and so on.

In the coming days we will have a report from Mr. Justice Dubin on the subject. He has looked at it extensively. He has heard extensive commentary on it so I think we should await his contribution as an important one in the debate, which is one among very respectable experts.

REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN SYSTEM

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I am very tempted to phrase my supplementary along the lines of asking when we will hear from Mr. Justice Dubin in this House. Because the other problem is so serious, I want to deal strictly with it. I was before the committee when CALPA was there and I heard their statement. I suggest to the minister that pretence that this system is adequate should be abandoned; that the system be rethought; requirements restated, and changes made at once. Does the minister accept the statement of some of his staff who suggest that they keep their heads down and hope for the best?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I agree that I am no great expert on matters of electronics. But then every author makes the case that the minister should not be, so I am par for the course. But I am told by experts that no system can ever be developed without trial and error, without the experimental aspect to it.

On the subject of the Dubin report, I am pleased to say that I will be tabling the first part of it some time next week. I swear to God that I have not seen it, but I understand that the judge will give a general view on safety matters in Canadian aviation and address them in a succession of reports on specific items, such as this one, most probably.

FISHERIES

STATUS OF EAST COAST BOUNDARIES AGREEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. There were five major elements to the Canada-United States East Coast Fisheries Agreement, namely, the management regime, the share of stocks and access for both countries, the fisheries commission, the dispute settlement procedure, and the review procedure.

I wish to ask the minister what linkage there is between the fisheries treaty and the boundary agreement. Now that the United States has unilaterally terminated the treaty, what is the status of the boundary agreement? Are we going to arbitration, or has this agreement also collapsed?

Point of Order

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I understand that this matter is under the responsibility of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The United States Senate has ratified that part of the treaty. I have been away travelling on the west coast so I have no knowledge if Canada has dealt with the Canadian response on the boundaries issue. I have been given a head signal that we have not taken a position yet as a cabinet.

COMPOSITION OF INTERNATIONAL COURT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for that response. I presumed, since he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs shared joint responsibility for this matter, that he would be knowledgeable of it.

I should like to address a brief supplementary question to the minister. Will there be a Canadian judge on the panel of judges when the Canada-United States fisheries and boundary agreements come before the International Court? If not, could he tell the House from what countries the judges will be selected, and by whom?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is fair when he equates the fact that one does not know the detail of what happened within the last week with a lack of knowledge. On the question of the selection of judges, that would be very much a part of cabinet discussion on whether we are going to approve of going this route. I know that there are views on both sides of the issue of whether there should or should not be national judges. I understand that issue has not been settled yet.

MR. COOK—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. TRUDEAU

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I am indignant and take umbrage at the remark of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In one of his long answers today, in reply to a question from the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), he stated, looking clearly at the opposition benches, "You silly guys".

Mr. Fox: Oh, you recognized yourself!

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, the word "guys" is demeaning, and I might say is out of date slang. The word "silly"—

Mr. Gray: —is relevant.

Mr. Trudeau: Don't be such a silly guy.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, that is not a point of order. The hon. member did notice that at the time these words were said no one objected to them and neither did I. They are not unparliamentary. They were not directed to one person in particular. I am afraid that point of order cannot be taken.

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, if I may refer you, the word "silly" was declared unparliamentary on January 26, 1961. If he is using it for "idiot", are you suggesting, Madam Speaker, that you cannot defame the whole opposition by an expression?

Madam Speaker: I am just checking that. One point is quite clear; that word was not addressed to one person in particular.

Mr. Trudeau: I really meant goofy.

Madam Speaker: What was declared unparliamentary was "silly reason", not "silly".

MR. JORZY MROCZKOWSKI—EDITOR OF "CZAS"

Question No. 35—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the RCMP investigate an alleged fraudulent or fake issue of the Polish ethnic newspaper known as CZAS in Winnipeg, Manitoba, issued in August, 1978, and, if so (a) what were the results of the investigation (b) were any charges laid officially or are any charges pending in regard to fraud, etc.?

2. Did the RCMP receive complaints from the editor of CZAS, Mr. Jorzy Mroczkowski and, if so, what action was taken?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

1. Yes.

(a) insufficient evidence to lay charges;

(b) see reply to 1(a).

2. Yes. Action was taken in the form of the investigation referred to in part 1 above.

MR. MICHAEL PITFIELD

Did Mr. Michael Pitfield, secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council state that he had returned $10,000 to the Public Treasury calculated on the basis of the time remaining of a 58-week period for which he was being compensated and that this represented "after tax money" and, if so, did the Prime Minister instruct him to commit himself to return the full amount due, including pre-tax money after applying and receiving from the Department of National Revenue a tax rebate in the current tax year and, if not (a) for what reason (b) will the Prime Minister do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am advised that Mr. Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet, on April 22, 1980, released the following statement to the Parliamentary Press Gallery: "Mr. Cossitt's motion in Parliament today was not based on fact. I am grateful to members of the Press Gallery who delayed filing their stories in order to give me a chance to correct these inaccuracies. As is well known it is very difficult to get the record straight after allegations of this kind have been disseminated across the country. When, after over 20 years in the public service, my employment was suddenly terminated on June 4, 1979, the previous government agreed that I should receive fifty-eight weeks' salary as damages, in addition to the usual termination payment of one week's salary for every year of service which is provided under Treasury Board regulations for any permanent employee departing the public service. The total amount was about $107,800, not $150,000, and this amount was fully taxable at the highest rate unless transferred to a fund for my retirement twenty to twenty-five years from now. When I rejoined the public service on March 11, 1980, I offered, and the Prime Minister agreed, that I would give back a part of this amount to the Receiver General on a purely voluntary basis. This is an unusual thing to do and I was not under any legal requirement to do so. The amount—approximately $10,000—was calculated on the basis of the time remaining of fifty-eight weeks for which I had been compensated, taking account of the fact that whereas what I received was pre-tax, what I was giving back was after tax. Concerning the holding company in which I have an interest only as a preferred shareholder, all details were disclosed, in accordance with the conflict of interest guidelines, when I was last employed by the government, and they will be reported again in the near future when the rearrangement of my affairs in accordance with the existing conflict of interest guidelines is completed. While one would not normally publicize one's personal affairs of this kind, I trust the foregoing will prevent the doubts that Mr. Cossitt's motion has sown from taking root."

Question No. 673—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. Michael Pitfield, secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council report under the present government disclosure guidelines, the existence of a holding company which he either controlled or in which he had an interest and, if so, on what date?

2. Is the company still in effect and, if so, what is its full name?

3. Did the company do any business with the government and, if so, what are all the details?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1, 2 and 3: See reply to question 672 answered today. In accordance with the Government of Canada's guidelines on conflict of interest, Mr. Pitfield fully declared his interests to the Assistant Deputy Registrar General from the time the guidelines came in force until he left the public service in 1979, and again in 1980 when he was reappointed as Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet. Conflict of interest statements were deposited in the Conflict of Interest Public Registry with regard to both periods of time. Details of information reported to the Assistant Deputy Registrar General by any person subject to the government's guidelines on conflict of interest are personal and confidential. No private company in which Mr. Pitfield has an interest has ever done business with the federal government while he was a member of the public service.

Did Mr. Michael Pitfield state that the payment he received after leaving his position as secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council following the May 22, 1979, general election was allegedly to cover in part damages and, if so, what are all the reasons justifying any claim that he was damaged and what damages did he suffer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See reply to question 672 answered today. The government of the day authorized payment of separation pay to Mr. Pitfield in line with standing government policy established by P.C. 1977-3325, November 24, 1977, which reads as follows: "His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, is pleased hereby to approve payment of separation pay, as follows, to —persons appointed by the Public Service Commission to the senior executive group of the executive category; and —Deputy Ministers and other persons appointed by the Governor in Council

—whose positions are slotted into the DM/SX structure and whose salaries are fixed or approved by the Governor in Council at rates within the DM/SX salary ranges on the basis of an annual performance review and following consideration by the special Cabinet Committee on the Public Service and the Cabinet; and —whose non-salary compensation, other than superannuation, is not prescribed by statute or by regulation made pursuant to the statute or by bylaw of the agency in which they are employed,

(a) with the approval of the Treasury Board, in an amount which, together with any severance pay to which he is entitled, does not exceed 104 weeks' pay, when his employment is terminated at the initiative of the Government; and

(b) notwithstanding the provisions of (a) above, and with the approval of the Treasury Board, notice of termination of employment may be given in lieu of, or in combination with, separation pay but such notice, or combination of notice and separation pay, shall not exceed 104 weeks." Mr. Pitfield received separation pay significantly below the maximum amount which would have been permissible under P.C. 1977-3325.

Question No. 675—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. Michael Pitfield pay back to the Receiver General of Canada any portion of the moneys paid to him at the time he ceased to be secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council following the general election of May 22, 1979, and, if so (a) on what date (b) what was the amount returned and how was it arrived at?

2. What were the amounts and dates of any cheques received by the Receiver General?

3. Did Mr. Pitfield return all the money he received for what he has referred to as "severance", other than the salary he would have received during the nine month period of time before he returned to the same position and, if not, for what reason?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1, 2 and 3: See answer to question 672 answered today.

Question No. 678—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to Mr. Michael Pitfield's absence of nine months from the position of secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council raised in the House of Commons on Tuesday, April 22, 1980, by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, did Mr. Pitfield state publicly in reference to the hon. member's remarks "it's goddamn unfair . . . it's just not true" and, if so (a) was he stating government policy (b) was he instructed by the government to change his remarks in a written statement made later on the same day indicating the opposite with certain clarifications?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

I am informed as follows: Yes.

(a) No.

(b) No.

Question No. 1,271—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the office of Mr. Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet, receive numerous telephone calls from Mr. Ben Tierney of Southam News, requesting to speak to Mr. Pitfield between April 28 and May 1, 1980, as well as a number of other calls and, if so (a) did Mr. Pitfield return the calls and, if not (i) for what reason (ii) is it government policy that the senior public servant does not have to return telephone calls received (b) what was the total number of telephone calls from Mr. Tierney?

2. Was the Prime Minister's press office contacted requesting assistance in making contact with Mr. Pitfield?

3. Did Mr. Pitfield receive a hand delivered letter containing a list of questions from Mr. Tierney concerning the $107,800 he received when he left his position in June, 1979?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1. Mr. Pitfield spoke to Mr. Tierney on two occasions in April, 1980, concerning Mr. Pitfield's statement to the press gallery of April 22, 1980. Mr. Tierney's questions on these occasions were of a persistently personal nature. It is not incumbent on a public servant or anyone else to answer a journalist in these circumstances, nor can the degree of a public servant's obligation, willingness and ability to assist journalists be measured by the frequency of one journalist's telephone calls.

2. Yes.

3. Yes. The questions were again characterized by their personal nature.

Order Paper Questions

Question No. 1,272—Mr. Cossitt:

Did Mr. Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet, state in April, 1980, that he received $107,800 when he left his positon following the May 22, 1979, election and, if so, to the knowledge of the government was any of this placed in a government retirement fund and, if so (a) what was the amount (b) will this be withdrawn and returned to the Receiver General to compensate the taxpayer for the fact that he was only absent from the job for eight months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See reply to question 672 answered today. The specifics requested in (a) and (b) are of a personal nature.

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY DEMONSTRATION

Question No. 1,586—Mr. Howie:

1. Was it necessary for guards to fire a shot to break up a demonstration at Dorchester Penitentiary, New Brunswick, in the month of June 1980, because the demonstration began to shape up as an escape attempt?

2. In the same month, was there a hostage taking incident at the penitentiary?

3. What was the reason for the demonstration and the hostage taking?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

1. At 20.00 hours on June 27, 1980, approximately 105 inmates were in the gymnasium at Dorchester penitentiary, and refused to return to their cells when ordered to do so. During the disturbance the inmates began destroying property and furniture, as well as throwing dangerous objects at the correctional officers. The correctional officers believed that the inmates were going to attempt to break out of the gymnasium and either smash the institution or attempt a mass escape. Subsequently, numerous warning shots were fired from shotguns to keep inmates away from the barriers through which they might escape, and to keep the inmates from throwing dangerous objects at the correctional officers. Officers were told to aim high and most of the shots struck the side of the building at about the roof-line. A few shots penetrated through the upper parts of windows and hit fluorescent fixtures which had already been smashed by the inmates. It was learned that one staff member fired three shots from a rifle through one of the windows. He was disciplined for this act. An inquiry by the Inspector General of the Correctional Service of Canada into this incident concluded that it had not been necessary to fire so many warning shots. In retrospect, it was found that the disturbance was not a planned attempt to escape.

2. Yes, on May 31, 1980, two inmates took one correctional officer hostage. This hostage incident ended June 1, 1980.

3. Disturbance June 27, 1980:

The incident was sparked when a small group of inmates under the influence of "homemade brew" made their way to the gymnasium and began to destroy property and incite other inmates to participate in the disturbance.

Hostage-taking may 31, 1980—June 1, 1980:

The hostage-taking incident was attributed to two factors: (i) the restriction of the recreational privileges at the institution, and (ii) the closure of the coffee shop in the gymnasium.

The recreational privileges had been restricted as a consequence of difficulties experienced at the institution at the time. The coffee shop could not be made available to the inmates because the gymnasium was undergoing renovations.

The demands of the hostage-takers were: (a) that the coffee shop in the gymnasium be reopened, (b) the return of full recreational privileges, (c) an institutional two-way radio.

The demands were not met as the normal policy and practice of the Correctional Service of Canada is that no agreement which represents an ultimate benefit to the hostage-taker or takers be permitted in hostage negotiations.

VISIT TO BONN—PRIME MINISTER AND MR. PITFIELD

Question No. 1,684—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Prime Minister and Mr. Michael Pitfield visit Bonn, Germany and other countries during the summer of 1978 and, if so, on what dates and for what purpose, in each case?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes. The dates and purpose of official visit were: July 14-July 21—Germany, Bonn Economic Summit and official visit to the Federal Republic of Germany.

MR. MICHAEL PITFIELD

Question No. 1,685—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet, attend the Commonwealth Conference of Cabinet Secretaries in Cyprus during 1980 and, if so, on what date was it decided that he would attend and on what date did he accept the invitation?

2. Did the Prime Minister agree to appear before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and, if so (a) on what date (b) did the Prime Minister agree after Mr. Pitfield had made arrangements to go to Cyprus and, if so, for what reason was the Prime Minister's appearance not delayed until Mr. Pitfield could join him?

3. What are all the details of all the work done by Mr. Pitfield while in Cyprus and what was the advantage of his trip to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1. Yes. Mr. Pitfield's attendance was decided when he was appointed by the governor in council on March 11, 1980, to be Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet. His attendance was confirmed in discussions with the Commonwealth Secretariat in London on June 27, 1980.

2. The clerk of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates was tentatively informed approximately two weeks before the Prime Minister's appearance on November 4, 1980, that the Prime Minister would appear. The date of his appearance could not be confirmed until October 31. The appearance could not be delayed because under House order the committee was obligated to make its report on the Main Estimates to the House of Commons by November 10, 1980, and Mr. Pitfield could not return to Ottawa before November 11 at the earliest.

3. Mr. Pitfield was head of the Canadian delegation. The Commonwealth is an important element of Canadian foreign policy and the senior officials meeting is the principal venue for discussion of management and program questions. See the minutes of the November 4, 1980, meeting of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, p. 27:18.

PRESENCE OF U.S. AND CANADIAN MILITARY PERSONNEL IN SAULT STE. MARIE DURING W.W. II

Question No. 2,248—Mr. Blackburn:

1. During World War II, were United States military personnel present in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and, if so (a) for what reasons (b) which regiments and units (c) what was the maximum strength (d) on what date did the first personnel arrive and on what date did the last personnel depart (e) how many were killed or wounded?

2. Were U.S. civilian personnel attached to this military unit and, if so, what were their names?

3. Were Canadian military personnel stationed in Sault Ste. Marie and, if so (a) how many (b) how many were wounded or killed?

4. (a) Was enemy espionage activity suspected in Sault Ste. Marie and, if so, in what form (b) were there arrests and, if so, how many (c) were charges laid and, if so, what were they?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance):

I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) U.S. authorities were concerned about disruption to the war effort which could result from damage to the canals due to sabotage and air attacks from enemy vessels which might penetrate Hudson Bay. Although the Canadian Chiefs of Staff considered the risk only a slight one, Canadian authorities acceded to the U.S. request to station U.S. troops on Canadian soil.

(b) Initially, elements of the 100th U.S. Coastal Artillery Anti-Aircraft Regiment. Subsequently, the 110th Coastal Artillery Group.

Last Departure—mid-February, 1944

(e) None.

2. There is no record of U.S. civilian personnel attached to these forces.

3. Yes.

(a) 163.

(b) None.

4. (a) The RCMP have no information concerning possible enemy espionage activity in Sault Ste. Marie during World War II.

CFB GAGETOWN PERSONNEL

Question No. 2,287—Mr. Corbett:

1. What is the number of non-service personnel employed at CFB Gagetown and how many are retired service personnel?

2. How many non-service positions were filled in the past five years and what is the breakdown between ex-service personnel and others who were hired in each year?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

1 and 2. The number of civilian permanent personnel and temporary personnel as at April 1, 1981, was:

Civilian permanent personnel	652
Civilian temporary personnel	184
Total	836

The number of civilian personnel both permanent and temporary filled in the past five years is as follows:

Order Paper Questions

1978/79	289
1979/80	346
	1,857

The above figures include some 200-300 term employees hired to cater to peak requirement during summer concentration. In regard to the questions concerning retired and ex-service personnel this information is not readily available and would entail manually checking several thousand personnel files for which the department does not have the necessary resources. Furthermore the data if found would be unreliable since only those people requiring a security clearance fill out a personal history form detailing all previous employment, whereas other personnel hired may or may not volunteer information of previous military service.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare):

In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: no.

In so far as the Medical Research Council is concerned: yes, financial support for medical research in Canadian universities during the last ten years was provided as follows:

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if question No. 1,020 could be made an order for return, such return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 1,020 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT ECONOMIC POLICIES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel) moved:

That this House condemns the government's barren economic policies, which are destroying the stability, productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy; reminds the honourable member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso that he is now Minister of Finance and not Secretary of State for External Affairs; asks the minister to see at first hand the misery caused by his abdication of economic leadership by travelling around Canada instead of around the world; and, urges him to then introduce a budget with corrective measures before July 1, 1981, or resign.

He said: Madam Speaker, in speaking on my motion I feel that perhaps it is getting more and more urgent that we in this House start accepting some of the true facts and realities that we are now living with in Canada concerning our economy. I say that because I find it almost unbelievable that we have a government, judging from its answers to questions today and earlier in the week, that is virtually indifferent to the plight of the average Canadian who has to live with an interest rate structure of over 20 per cent as far as most borrowing activities are concerned.

• (1210)

We have dwelt on this and we know that when the present members of the cabinet were in opposition they deplored the then existing interest rate structure in the country. One member in particular, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), even stated, when interviewed in his home town, that if he were a member of a government that had such a high interest rate structure, he would resign from that government.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Kempling: Why did you chicken out, Herb?

Mr. Stevens: The interest rate structure which the minister then referred to was about 14 per cent. Now it is over 19 per cent, 20 per cent as far as most borrowing activity is concerned, and we see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce not resigning from that government but somehow or other compromising his views and clinging to the office which he has apparently grown to love so much.

I mention this because I feel we are in a situation where our whole way of life, our type of society, that of the free enterprise system, is not going to survive if the present tendencies of more and more government intervention, more and more government spending resulting in deficits, is allowed to continue in this country to the detriment of all Canadians.

Not only do we have the evidence of an indifferent government, but we have a Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the person one would normally expect to be grappling with the problems that I am going to refer to, gadding about the world. He is one of the few ministers of finance from leading industrial countries to attend the meeting in Gabon. As we all know from this morning's news, we have a Minister of Finance who has been selected by certain members of the International Monetary Fund to be chairman of the main policy-making body of the IMF itself.

Mr. Nielsen: God help them!

Mr. Nickerson: God help the world!

Mr. Stevens: There was clearly, because there is nothing else to read into it, some type of a gross misrepresentation made at that conference that attending members would even think of our Minister of Finance chairing any responsible committee of the International Monetary Fund.

An hon. Member: Maybe he will stay away.

Mr. Stevens: Oddly enough, when we read the Reuters story we find that our Minister of Finance was chosen to take that office for all the wrong reasons. They chose him because he was the big spender. The Minister of Finance was, first of all, in attendance; most of the other major industrial nations ministers of finance were not there. Second, they like his spending habits, they like his big deficits and they like the fact that he has allowed his fiscal policy to rage on virtually unabated, something which is certainly aided and abetted by the socialists to our left.

Mr. Huntington: They have high interest in him.

Mr. Stevens: We have a government today that on a national accounts basis is spending in the current fiscal year, 1981 to 1982, $7.5 billion more than was anticipated under the Crosbie budget which, of course, caused the defeat of the Clark government.

Mr. Peterson: What about the $3 billion in extra expenditures that you voted for yesterday?

Mr. Kempling: Tell us about PetroCan.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Petrofina.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) has the floor.

Mr. Waddell: So Toronto has a member in the House.

Mr. Kempling: How many gas stations do you own?

Mr. Stevens: If I could relate that $7.5 billion of extra spending, which the government has put in place and presumably will see spent this year over and above what we anticipated would be spent, we are talking about $200 per average Canadian family. That is the spending level we have reached as far as this government is concerned. It is over and above what we anticipated fiscal 1982 would require had we continued in power.

I know that the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) gets exercised every so often. Already he has been speaking from his seat during my speech, but perhaps he will pay heed to his own Minister of Finance's Economic Review which spells out, I suggest, certain of the arguments that I would like to make in support of my motion today. This Economic Review, incidentally, was tabled a few days ago while the Minister of Finance is on one of his world jaunts. In it, on page 3—it is disclosed that in 1980 we tied for the worst unemployment rate among the seven major countries in the world. From page 3 of the Minister of Finance's own Economic Review we can see that our unemployment level averaged 7.5 per cent, tied with Italy, the worst unemployment record of the seven major countries in the world. Compare that to Japan's unemployment level which is shown as 2 per cent. That is the first negative which should require the government to ask the Minister of Finance, as we are suggesting, to get back into this country. If the Minister of Finance wants to travel, let him travel around Canada and see what impact his policies have on Canadians. If he does not want to bring in a budget correcting some of these problems before July 1, then he should resign.

Mr. Peterson: He also created more jobs.

Mr. Stevens: That is the thrust of our motion. Again, if the hon. member for Willowdale would stop talking but read this Economic Review—

Mr. Nielsen: He is shooting from the lip.

Mr. Stevens: —he would find on page 8 the interest rate structure is given for the large OECD countries. Large, means the seven largest countries in the OECD. On page 8 we find, not as the government has been representing, that it is simply playing catch-up as far as interest rates are concerned, but that we are at the top of the list with the highest interest rates in the world. That review indicates that in December the central bank discount rate in Canada was 17.26 per cent. The next highest was Italy's central bank discount rate at 16.5 per cent. The lowest central bank discount rate, of course, was that of Japan at 7.25 per cent.

Mr. Peterson: If you read those figures, you will also find that we were one of the countries that increased employment last year.

Mr. Stevens: When the baboons are being affected you can always tell because the clamour gets louder and louder.

Mr. Huntington: You are getting to them.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member from Willowdale asks about the amount of employment that was created last year. What he is not telling us is where that employment was created. Those jobs were created in the public service and related services.

Mr. Huntington: Not one of those jobs was productive.

Mr. Jarvis: Ask Herb Gray about Windsor. How many jobs were created in Windsor last year?

• (1220)

Mr. Stevens: Let me tell the hon. member for Willowdale that there is one job the government created for him of which he should be proud, and that is that he has a job as a member of this House. He would never get such a good job in any other place if he returned to the private sector.

Mr. Gray: Tell us about your job with the Bank of Western Canada.

Mr. Smith: Tell us about the bank rate.

Mr. Stevens: One of the backbenchers says "Tell us about the bank rate". That is what I am talking about. The fact is we were a world leader until the new socialist leader of France raised the French discount rate this morning to 22 per cent. Here we have the vice-president of "Socialist International" in this country, the leader of the New Democratic Party, egging the government on to more and more spending. Until this morning we have had the highest interest rates as a result of that spending, which creates inflation. We may well have an increasing interest rate structure in Canada that will return us to the number one or worst spot if the socialistic and spending tendencies of the present government are maintained.

Mr. Jarvis: Now they are number two they will try to go higher.

Mr. Stevens: I am not quoting our figures or figures from PC research; I am quoting the government's own statistics. That is what they find so embarrassing.

Let us turn to real growth. On page 1 of his Economic Review, the Minister of Finance reveals, stands naked if you like, for all those who wish to read it, that our real growth in 1980 was 0.1 per cent, just marginal. If you relate that to workers, you find that the average worker in this country had a decline in real growth last year, in fact for the last four years. Under this government, every worker has had steadily declining real growth in wages.

Mr. Peterson: Tell us what happened in the seven major OECD countries.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member is making it for me here. We should keep this up, Willowdale and York-Peel. He asks about the seven major OECD countries.

Mr. Peterson: Canada's decline in growth was less than any of the other OECD countries.

Mr. Stevens: If the hon. member will look at page 1, he will see that the minister has averaged it out for him. The average for the major OECD countries was 1.3 per cent real growth compared to our 0.1 per cent.

Mr. Peterson: The average over the last two years has been better than any of the other OECD countries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Willowdale will have an opportunity to speak later today. The hon. member for York-Peel has the floor.

Mr. Stevens: At the risk of having the hon. member for Willowdale completely succumb to the statistics, let met refer him to page 6 of his minister's Economic Review. This is where we find the shattering effect of our discounted dollar. There it is revealed that the real effective exchange rate in Canada is now the lowest of all the countries listed on page 6. Our real exchange rate in an effective sense is now below 90, 89.8, compared to other countries such as Norway, Denmark, Austria, Switzerland, Belgium, Sweden, Australia, The Netherlands, Spain, Italy, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Japan and the United States, which have all done better.

Mr. Jarvis: Is Gabon in there?

Mr. Stevens: If the Minister of Finance stays there too long, they will be running hard to overtake us as far as their Gabonese currency is concerned. Canada's economic decline over the past decade is reflected not only in the statistics I referred to, but in many other ways.

Over the past five years, our dollar has traded at an average price below that of any other year in our history, even going back before confederation. The 16 per cent discount to the United States dollar is again an historic first. You go back to the 1850s before you find such a period in our history where we have had consistently for such a prolonged period of time such a low dollar in relation to the American dollar.

Mr. Nielsen: We ought to make the Guinness Book of Records.

Mr. Stevens: That's right. Perhaps some government apologist, maybe the hon. member for Willowdale, will make this type of apology later and say that you have to let the system work. Yesterday the emperor, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), said he believed in gradualism. He felt that if he could somehow edge up interest rates, this would eventually reduce inflation. We in the official opposition are asking when this magic turn around will occur.

Mr. Pepin: Soon.

Mr. Stevens: The Minister of Transport says soon.

Mr. Smith: Have faith.

Mr. Stevens: Another government member says have faith. It will take a lot of faith. Since this government has taken power, interest rates have gone up roughly 4 per cent. Oddly enough, the inflation level has gone up roughly 4 per cent. It appears that rather than high interest rates stifling or dampening inflation, they are fuelling inflation.

Most economists are now coming to the realization that what this government has given to the nation is very expensive money, but not really tight money. The net result is that there is more and more money to borrow at higher and higher interest rates. This creates the scenario you need, not for lowering consumer prices but increasing them on many of our products.

Let me touch on productivity. As we know, the record in Canada with respect to productivity has been dismal. Per worker output declined about 3.5 per cent after 1980 after a 1.2 per cent drop in real terms in 1979. We had virtually no economic growth last year. That was confirmed in the Economic Review I read from earlier. The prospect for 1981 is again for virtually no growth. In terms of the average worker, real earnings have declined over the last three years by almost 5 per cent.

These statistics alone should indicate that urgent corrective measures are needed for the economy. I hope the Prime Minister will at least spend the money on a phone call to Gabon to tell the Minister of Finance that instead of being the world gadabout, he should get back here and start solving some of the problems I am referring to.

Mr. Pepin: Come on, he hardly ever travels.

Mr. Stevens: The only significant action that we have seen from this government on the economic front over the past several years has been a policy of encouraging high interest rates, ostensibly to curb inflation, yet there is no indication that they are performing that duty.

Let me touch on trade. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is in the chamber, probably knows that world trading activity grew by a record 20 per cent during the 1970s, but unfortunately Canada did not keep pace. Canada had an annual average growth rate in the 1969-79 period of 15.1 per cent, with the result that our share of world trade decreased by over 30 per cent. This has represented an opportunity loss for Canadian exports of $20 billion per year.

One of the weakest performers in terms of exports has been our secondary manufacturing sector. From 1970 to 1975 Canada's share of world trade in manufacturing goods has dropped from 5.6 per cent to 3.8 per cent, at a time when Japan's share increased from 10.4 per cent to 12.1 per cent, when France's share increased from 7.7 per cent to 9 per cent, Germany's share from 17.6 per cent to 18.1 per cent, and Sweden's share from 3 per cent to 3.1 per cent. These statistics are not ours; they come from the Science Council of Canada which has outlined a technological policy for Canada. In 1980 we experienced an amazing $17.8 billion trade deficit in end products alone, six times higher than in the early 1970s.

Notwithstanding that background, we find that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, at a time when the Americans were having active discussions with the Japanese in the hope there would be some type of restraint on the exportation of Japanese cars to the United States—and they succeeded in getting such restraint agreed to by the Japanese—said and did nothing to protect Canadians from the eventual outcome of having an export quota placed by the Japanese on exports to the United States market with no similar arrangement for the Canadian market. This may mean that 20,000, 30,000, perhaps even 35,000 extra cars will pour into the Canadian market as a result of the inactivity of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in this field alone.

Despite brave election promises to reduce inflation and unemployment and to provide Canadians with an industrial strategy, this government has continued rather in bankrupting the nation. There has been no effort to get to the root causes of economic decline. In fact, we find that rather than having an industrial strategy put before this House, some suggested way out of these dilemmas I am referring to, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has apparently been shunted aside from his own cabinet responsibilities and has had to admit to the public that any question of an industrial strategy must take second place to the constitutional debate and the energy policy program we have lived with in the House for so many months.

What I have been referring to is the Canadian scene. What a contrast we have now between Canada and the United States of America. In the United States it has been recognized that government itself represents the major problem to that nation in restoring itself to its old prosperity. The Reagan administration has a fourfold strategy for achieving economic recovery, based on the recognition that runaway government has been a major problem. That administration plans to concentrate, first of all, on spending cuts, then tax cuts, regulatory relief and monetary restraint. It is important to note that it is a fourfold thrust they are embarking upon in the United States. It is true that monetary restraint is the fourth thrust, but that administration would be the first to tell you that without proper fiscal restraint, with resulting tax savings and, above all, regulatory relief, the entire program will not achieve the success hoped for. In short, it is a co-ordinated, concentrated attack on inflation and the lack of productivity in that country, something we do not have in this country.

The administration in the United States plans to cut spending growth by two thirds. That will be a savings in the United States of $55.9 billion by 1982. Imagine the contrast. There you have a nation that intends to cut back its growth by two thirds and save something like $55 billion in spending, yet this government has in place $7.5 billion on a national accounts basis of extra spending over what we projected in the Clark budget on which we were defeated.

President Reagan wants to eliminate his government's deficit, which he forecasts next year to be 3.7 per cent of total spending. That 3.7 per cent is in contrast to the 20 per cent of total federal spending this government contends is prudent.

Can you imagine our shock this morning to learn that our Minister of Finance, if you like the mother of the deficit I have referred to, being 20 per cent of our total spending, has now been chosen to chair an important committee of the International Monetary Fund and may have some influence on the entire world's financial system, as opposed to being restricted in the harm he can do to Canada alone? The Minister of Finance is recognized around the world as being the last of the big time spenders. As I indicated, it was stated in today's story that he in fact had been acclaimed or chosen as "Mr. Big Spender" of the seven major industrialized nations. What a sad reflection on Canada itself. I can assure the House and I think most of the members of this House feel the same way, that if those who have compassion for the comparatively poor of this nation, the small businessman, the farmer, the fisherman, those who somehow believe in the free enterprise system, believe that people in those categories should be given a reasonable opportunity to improve their lot and their real wages, they have to support the thrust of our motion today and bring the strongest possible sanctions against the government, urging it to correct its ways. If the Minister of Finance is the problem and is unwilling to correct his ways through a new budget, we should ask him to resign.

Canada can be such a great nation. Rowland Frazee, the president of perhaps the fourth largest bank in the world and our largest bank, the Royal Bank of Canada, has said that if over the next few years we could capture the productivity we have lost, it would mean $4,000 in added income in real terms per worker compared to a projected $200. This is the sad aspect of this matter. Those who represent that they have the common man's interest at heart are the very people who are hurting that common man so badly in this country. They are denying him the break I would suggest the Canadian worker is entitled to and would have with proper leadership here in Ottawa.

We are talking in very, very large terms. I do not think we in Canada have to accept being number 13 as far as real incomes in the world are concerned, but that is our current position. We used to be number two, running hard at being number one. I suggest that with a properly co-ordinated fiscal, monetary and industrial approach in this country we could not only be number two again, we could be number one among the nations of the world. That is what we in the official opposition believe and that is why we want our minister, if you like our Pimpernel, to take action. They seek him here, they seek him there, they seek him everywhere, this Minister of Finance, but nowhere can they find him doing an effective job.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, before getting on with the substance of my remarks, I should like to comment very briefly on the intervention of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) who has just presented his motion. First I must tell him that I am surprised he should be making unfounded accusations against all those who selected Canada's Minister of Finance to chair the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund. In my opinion, the hon. member for York-Peel is insulting the ministers and the international finance experts who chose the Canadian Minister of Finance to preside over that important meeting.

I was also struck by the frenzied rhetoric he resorts to when he talks about budgetary deficits and government expenditures. I am astounded by the fact that in the House last night the hon. member for York-Peel supported the motion of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) who was urging the government to boost its expenditures by $3.5 billion. I fail to see where the logic is. On one hand, they say to the government: Cut down your spending; on the other, they rise to support their colleague from Calgary Centre who says to the government: No, do not cut down your spending but rather increase it to the tune of $3.5 billion. So much for the logic of the hon. member, as evidenced as well in his speech.

The hon. member quoted selected excerpts from the economic review I tabled in the House earlier this week. Common sense being the one thing in the world which everybody has, I would suggest that the great majority of people look askance at figures taken haphazardly out of a 200 or 300-page document. I do not want to comment on those figures because I know that my colleague, the hon. member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger), will set them in their proper context when he takes the floor later on this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Peel has just given us a very pessimistic outlook on the current economic situation in Canada. The hon. member has twisted reality. He has given us a distorted picture of the day to day life of Canadians, and above all a contorted representation of the strategy conceived by the Minister of Finance in his budget of October last. In that budget the Minister of Finance wanted to combine the necessary restrictions with measures which were essential to shore up the then prevailing economic situation in Canada. By making the energy self-sufficiency of Canadians the basis of that strategy, the Minister of Finance is ensuring the upswing of our economic activities, guaranteeing as well improved conditions to pave the way for increased productivity and, finally, securing our competitive position on international markets.

Yesterday, during the debate on interest rates, I had the opportunity to tell this House how surprisingly strong the upswing of the Canadian economy had been during the last quarter of 1980. In fact, the economic activity increased at an annual rate of over 8 per cent during that quarter. The first quarter of 1981 also showed an amazing vigour. Why does the hon. member for York-Peel ignore these figures? He does so because they clearly fly in the face of the allegations contained in his motion. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ignores these figures because they confirm unequivocally that the policies put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) are effective and meet the needs of the economic situation in Canada.

What about employment? In 1980, 286,000 new jobs have been created, or 2.8 per cent more than in the previous year. As a result of these hundreds of thousands of jobs being created, a record high of 59.2 per cent of the population was employed by the end of 1980. The first quarter of 1981 augurs well with regard to job creation for the present year. Indeed, in April, unemployment dropped to 7 per cent, a level that had not been reached in Canada since June 1976. The downward trend of the unemployment rate in the last few months is further evidence of an economic recovery in Canada. What is interesting, Mr. Speaker, is that the percentage of workers aged 15 or more reached a record high of 60.1 per cent in April and broke the 1980 record. Mr. Speaker, how can the hon. member for York-Peel ignore these figures? How can he deny that such buoyancy in job creation is an obvious indication that the economic policies of the Minister of Finance are adequate and that they meet the present economic conditions in Canada?

In his motion, the hon. member for York-Peel refers to economic stability. The hon. member did not make a major discovery and did not teach anyone anything new by saying that the Canadian economy was going through a difficult period. This is clearly indicated in the diagnosis made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. This instability is caused by various shocks, some of them external and others domestic. The drastic increases in oil prices decreed by OPEC countries have had obvious destabilizing effects on our economy. The impact of oil prices has been reflected by strong inflationary pressures throughout the world, and these pressures have also been at work within Canada. Such destabilizing factors required appropriate action. Our monetary policy, a gradual reduction of the deficit and the determination of the Minister of Finance and the government to control inflation are the key elements of a policy which will restore stability to the Canadian economy. However, the effects of such measures can obviously not be felt in the short term. The search for economic stability was a clearly stated objective of the budget and the Minister of Finance has taken the means necessary to achieve that objective in the longer term.

Mr. Speaker, this new decade offers Canada and Canadians fantastic economic opportunities, but we must first learn to control inflation, promote stability and attract investments. That was the challenge contained in the October budget, and the figures that I quoted yesterday and that I briefly referred to a moment ago show that Canadians have responded to the Minister of Finance's challenge and are willing to take it up.

In his motion, the hon. member for York-Peel also talks of the competitiveness of our business sector. Increases in prices and costs as well as fluctuations in the rate of exchange have played a major role since 1979 with regard to the competitiveness of Canadian corporations in the international as well as the domestic markets. The decrease in salary costs has had a significant effect on our improved competitiveness. In 1980, exports of manufactured goods helped improve our trade balance by over $8 billion. For the first quarter of 1981, the trade surplus was close to $2 billion. That, Mr. Speaker, also serves to prove the competitiveness of Canadian business and it also shows the effectiveness of the measures contained in the Minister of Finance's budget aimed at achieving economic recovery.

I believe that to ensure Canada's long-term growth in an increasingly competitive world, there must be massive corporate investments, especially in four areas. First, in the development of our huge energy and other natural resources. Second, in plants and new equipment that will be required to modernize and adapt Canadian industry. Third, in research, development and innovation so that Canada can be ensured of state-of-the-art technology and can become a leader as manufacturer of those products which will be required in the future. Fourth, we must invest in human resources to meet future technological requirements and to produce the new consumer goods that will be needed in the world of tomorrow. That is why the general objective of last October's budget was to create a favourable climate for increased medium-term investments. The figures that I referred to a moment ago show that economic recovery has already begun.

In his motion, the hon. member for York-Peel criticizes the Minister of Finance for attending this week an important international meeting.

I indicated early in my remarks that to me that was a mean comment. What kind of a meeting is the Minister of Finance attending? It is a meeting of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund. As citizens, we are entitled to ask what matters are being discussed at that meeting. I should say first the world economic situation which also is unsettled, for the Canadian economy is not the only one going through difficult times, and then the problems of inflation, the various ways and means of solving the problems of inflation, monetary theory, and interest rates. All those matters were discussed by honourable members in this House for two days last week, as well as yesterday and today. Clearly it is important that our Minister of Finance be at the heart of the discussion when people representing every country in the world are discussing how they are to straighten out these situations. In view of the interconnections between world economies, there is no doubt that Canada must attend these meetings. Canada has an open economy, a small population, and a tremendous productive capacity.

● (1250)

The impact of strategies implemented by our trading partners is therefore of primary importance to us Canadians for the well-being of our economy. By attending such meetings, our Minister of Finance will not only profit from the experience of other nations, but also learn how these nations intend to act to wrestle down economic instability and inflation. The importance for Canada's attendance at such meetings can be readily understood, for it is a matter of common sense, and I am stunned that despite his vast knowledge the hon. member for York-Peel should lack that little common sense needed to recognize the need for it.

This morning, for instance, Mr. Speaker, the press generally reported the appointment of Canada's Minister of Finance as chairman of the IMF interim committee. This appointment confirms that state representatives at the highest international level recognize the competence of Canada's Minister of Finance and have selected him to chair that important IMF committee.

I entirely reject the biased statement made by the member for York-Peel against those delegates who have expressed their high regard for the Minister of Finance of Canada. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that those hundreds of persons representing many countries in the world know as much about economic problems in the world and in their own country as the member for York-Peel knows about economic problems in Canada, and from his actions and the behaviour of the Canadian economy they were able to infer that the Minister of Finance of Canada deserves their confidence as chairman of that very important political committee. Eight hundred experts and ministers of finance of 141 states will be taking part in the Gabon meeting. Canadians should be proud of the appointment of their minister to such an important and prestigious post. With characteristic pettiness and partisanship the member for York-Peel in his motion blamed the member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso and Minister of Finance not only for bringing honour to Canada at the International Monetary Fund conference but also for looking into strategies which will be adopted in other countries in an attempt to solve the problems experienced by the main western economies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I should like to return briefly to what I was saying when the bell rang at one o'clock. The House will recall that the motion moved by the hon. member for York-Peel blames the Minister of Finance for taking part in an important international conference in Gabon, thereby demonstrating the hon. member's dishonesty or ignorance. As I was saying, the more than 800 ministers and officials from every corner of the world who are taking part in this conference have indicated that they fully recognize the competence of our Minister of Finance by appointing him Chairman of the International Monetary Fund interim committee. I suggested also that Canada being a country with an open economy and the economies of the world being so closely interconnected, it is of paramount importance to be present when the members of the international community are dealing with inflation, economic stability, and development strategy. We are present and very competently and prestigiously represented by our Minister of Finance, who has been appointed to chair the International Monetary Fund interim committee.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members urges the Minister of Finance to introduce a new budget before July 1. There seems to be a sort of pattern with Progressive Conservative Party policies: after they have made critical remarks for a number of weeks, they end up repeating endlessly "a new budget" ... "a new budget" ... "a new budget", like the needle of a record player which gets stuck in the same groove of a warped record. Then, when they realize that the scheme is not working any more, one of them, generally their leader, starts gesticulating and complaining again about housing, interest rates, and so on and so forth. And again, after a few weeks, whoops! "a new budget" ... "a new budget" ... "a new budget." Mr. Speaker, Canadians are well aware of this pattern of the Progressive Conservative Party policy, having been exposed and subjected to it for a few months.

The Minister of Finance has already announced in the House that he intends to introduce a new budget in the fall, presumably in October. I can understand the hon. member remembers that his party when they were in power, used to change its mind and policy every minute. His leader, who had made a name for himself as a man who follows the prevailing wind, was showing the way. With this government, it is a different story. This government has policies which it reviews from time to time and as the need arises. Just now, the Minister of Finance is involved in all sorts of studies and analyses, to prepare for the new budget which he should introduce around October to meet the needs of the economy.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me point out that after two days of debate on economic matters last week, after yesterday's debate on interest rates and inflation, and after the first interventions in today's debate the opposition has only managed to prove its lack of imagination and show in front of all Canadians that, in economic matters as in many other areas, its great tenors are just as boring as the bore of a gun. Canadians were not long seeing through the inanity of the Progressive Conservative government. Its members were simply thrown out. The people expressed their confidence in us, as they also did in the Minister of Finance of this country, and they will go on doing so because even now there are signs of an economic recovery and these will continue to grow in the forthcoming years.

• (1410)

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate today because it is the second anniversary of my election to the House of Commons. I am of the class of 1979. Indeed, I was elected to this House on May 22nd, like so many others such as the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans); so, this is indeed a very special day.

[English]

I am very happy to speak on the second anniversary of my election to Parliament in 1979 and that of many members of the House.

An hon. Member: It was also the defeat of a few.

Mr. Waddell: Having listened to the speech of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) who introduced—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is a question of privilege by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

PRIVILEGE

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—SECURITY MEASURES ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for interrupting his speech, but a question of privilege is normally raised at the first possible opportunity. The opportunity has just arisen.

I have just been driven over from the Confederation Building to this building, and the bus was stopped just because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was approaching the doors. If it were raining, we would presumably have had to walk from the bus to the door. The bus is put there for our convenience, and I expect that like any other member of Parliament I have the right to be driven to the door. I asked the Prime Minister if, by any chance, he had issued orders to do this; he said "No", and I suppose I have to take his word for it. It do not know where the orders came from.

I believe Madam Speaker is looking into this matter, but the interruptions and the interferences with members of Parliament are continuing. I do hope that the three instances which have now been brought to her attention will enable her to make a ruling.

When I asked the Prime Minister if he had issued orders, he said "No" I then said, "Well, then, who did?" He said, "Well, if you want to ask me whether I made orders, I will call you a liar". When I asked him if he would come inside the House and say that, he said he would do it right out there.

I therefore feel that this question of privilege is timely because it has just happened, and I wish to have that recorded firmly on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's question of privilege has been raised. I hope the hon. member carefully chose his words in describing the privilege. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT ECONOMIC POLICIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That this House condemns the government's barren economic policies, which are destroying the stability, productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy; reminds the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) that he is now Minister of Finance and not Secretary of State for External Affairs; asks the minister to see at first hand the misery caused by his abdication of economic leadership by travelling around Canada instead of around the world; and, urges him to then introduce a budget with corrective measures before July 1, 1981, or resign.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, before I go back to my speech, I would like to say, speaking for myself, that I do not personally object if there must be some special security measures around the Prime Minister of Canada at this time, and that we become inconvenienced a little bit because of our buses. This is a very dangerous day and age. This period is a very dangerous one. As there will be a major summit meeting of world leaders in Canada, if we have to suffer a little tougher security, well, that is a problem of the times. So speaking as one member, a backbencher, without the same amount of experience in the House as the hon. member, I personally do not object if it is on security reasons that we MPs have to walk a few extra feet, so long as there are legitimate reasons, and I am sure Your Honour will find that out in your investigation.

Let me go back to the subject of economics. I started to say that I was disappointed in the speech, frankly, and in the motion. I think it is a rather frivolous motion for a very serious subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: The hon. members from the Liberal party need not say "hear, hear!" I will get to them in a moment.

The reason I think it is frivolous is in the mention of the finance minister being in Gabon. Since he is in Africa, I might use the analogy of a big game hunter going to shoot an elephant and aiming for the elephant's toenail. There is so much for this government to aim at on its economic record that it seems to me to be—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I note the Liberal members are also saying, "hear, hear!" There is so much to aim at in the economic record of this government, with just about the highest interest rates there have ever been, with an inflation rate which is topping 12 per cent, with people who are unemployed, with a housing market of crisis proportions in Vancouver, where I live, with a rudderless ship and no economic policy. So why pick on the finance minister's going to Gabon? As a matter of fact, I understand there may perhaps be a split in the Consertative party. I understand that one half of the party wants the finance minister to return from Gabon and the other half would like him to stay in Gabon! We have the same problem.

An hon. Member: Same difference!

Mr. Knowles: Where is the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens)?

Mr. Waddell: I tried to listen to what the hon. member for York-Peel was saying. He said that the government was indifferent to the average Canadian, and I agree with that. I wonder, though, whether he was any more different when he was in power, or whether he would have done anything more. It seems to me that, if anything, he might have been even a little cooler in slashing social spending. That is why they call him "the slasher", I suppose; but I want to deal not with name-calling but with particular economic positions which were put forward, for a change, in this House.

It seemed to me that the position the hon. member for York-Peel put forward was that the government is a big spender and that is what causes inflation. That seemed to be what he was saying. Other than asking for a budget, that was the whole basis of his speech. It seems to me that that is too simple a position; it depends on what the government spending is for. If the government just gives away money, simply allows write-offs and tax loopholes and gives subsidies to companies which perhaps do not need them, as in northern oil and gas exploration, for example, I think that kind of giving away of money is wrong. There is perhaps too much fat and idleness in our tax system in our country in some of those giveaways.

However, when the government is spending money for investment purposes, I think that is very important. I am sure, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out in this House, if we did not have those welfare programs, those spending programs for what are generally called social welfare matters, at these difficult economic times with these high interest rates, we would have some real social problems in this country. So I do not regret that that money is being spent.

I understand other countries have big deficits, such as Japan. I do not see the hon. member for York-Peel running around saying they do not follow the proper economic policies.

Second, there is a certain myth here which the hon. member for York-Peel puts forward. It is a kind of contemporary American myth. I will send him over an article by Joseph Kraft which appeared recently in the Washington Post. He was writing about the American space success of the shuttle. He writes:

● (1420)

> Americans hunger for public achievement, but also seek to reduce the power of government.

Later in the article he writes:

> —the anti-government approach seems highly unlikely to yield the advertised results. Some of the most prized objectives simply lie beyond the reach of private effort.

He refers to space exploration. It is inconsistent in many ways for the hon. member for York-Peel to take the American position, to cut back on government, because there are certain things that even some of the American people, who want government cut back, still want to have.

Mr. Kraft, who is hardly a socialist journalist, goes on to say:

> The free enterprise system excludes other goals. Does anybody believe the mining and chemical companies are going to keep the water and air clean without a shove from government? Who can imagine that reducing funds to the cities will improve police work, or transit services, or local education?

You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker, and that is where the hon. member is inconsistent. I thought this government was cutting back federal spending. What is the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements task force doing? It is there to cut back on public spending. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) wants to cut back funds to the provinces for education and health. This government is cutting back, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, the big struggle in Canada in the next few years will be in this third theatre of war, the first theatre being the Constitution and the provinces and the second being energy and the provinces. The third one will be the government's attempt to cut back on money given to the provinces for education and health.

Since I am from the west and therefore a reasonable guy, Mr. Speaker, I did agree with the hon. member for York-Peel when he said that the wealth of the average worker in Canada is steadily declining. That is true. For the past few years the average worker has been falling behind the rate of inflation. I can tell that from speaking with my constituents who are ordinary working people. They are starting to suffer, Mr. Speaker.

What does the Minister of Finance do about this? Recently he said that the problem is with the ordinary worker demanding higher wages. Last week the Financial Post published the salaries of the top 30 executives in this country. This information is not available in Canada so they got it from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. It showed the following: Mr. Gallagher of Dome Petroleum Ltd., $682,800; Mr. Bronfman of Seagram Co., $659,149; Mr. MacNaughton, vice-chairman of Genstar Ltd., $611,517; Mr. Richards of Dome Petroleum Ltd., $602,000; Mr. Sinclair of Canadian Pacific Ltd. only made $568,701; Mr. Knudsen, who is from my neck of the woods and is chairman of MacMillan Bloedel, only makes $419,000. And so it goes down the list. These are exorbitant salaries with exorbitant increases. Yet who does the Minister of Finance blame? He does not quote these salaries but says that it is the average worker in Canada who is seeking additional wages.

The hon. member for York-Peel may have mentioned housing in passing but the minister, who spoke next, did not mention it. Last week we were told by the minister and officials of CMHC at a special meeting that the average price of a house in Vancouver is $160,000 and that it takes a family income of $70,000 to qualify for a mortgage. How many people have an average income of $70,000? They told us that only 2 per cent or 3 per cent of the population have. That means that 97 per cent of the people in the lower mainland of Vancouver cannot afford to buy a house if those figures are used. This seems to me to be an example of a system that is not working.

As was demonstrated last week, there are a number of rip-offs about which the government does nothing but which are affecting inflation. I wish the hon. member for York-Peel and the minister had talked about that. I tried to raise in the House the question of the continuing oil rip-off and the recent six cents per gallon increase in the price of gasoline that has not been explained. The minister will not do anything about it. I suggested that he did not have enough backbone to do anything, but he could show that he has by standing up in this House instead of shifting laterally.

In British Columbia we called the promotion of Mr. Bertrand a lateral arabesque. He was moved to the Anti-dumping Tribunal, at a better salary and with deputy minister status, from the highly visible, effective job he was doing on competition policy. The only man who was prepared to tackle oil price rip-offs, which are causing inflation, was moved.

I have already said that the Conservative motion offered today is rather silly—if that is not unparliamentary language. It is a motion which lacks depth. I should like to compare it with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) yesterday. His motion read as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for following a made-in-Washington interest rate policy and for breaking its promise to the Canadian people in the Speech from the Throne that "it recognizes the need to protect those Canadians most affected by unacceptably high interest rates".

There is the key, Mr. Speaker. I wish the hon. member for York-Peel had said that. He referred to Washington as doing the right thing with its monetarist economic policy which Margaret Thatcher and the British government have shown does not work. We seem to be following it, however. It seems to me to have been discredited, yet Washington still wants to follow it.

When the hon. member for York-Peel dealt with Washington, why did he not refer to the real nub of the problem, which is that we have a "made-in-Washington" finance policy? One of the frustrating things about being a member of this House is that the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada do not appear to have any room to manœuvre, if one accepts what the Liberal party puts forward.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada says that we have to accept American interest rates and American policies. If we are an independent country, what is the point of accepting that? We might as well pack up and run for Congress. Indeed, about 10 per cent of the people in my part of the country want us to do that.

There is an alternative, however, Mr. Speaker, and that is to simply run a different policy. I did not hear the hon. member for York-Peel say what the Conservatives would do about the situation. We all know what the Liberals are doing—basically nothing but following a made-in-Washington policy.

The policy of the New Democratic Party is simply to follow a different Canadian interest rate policy. That means that we have to start setting our own interest rates and focus on certain things. We must give lower interest rates to the family that is going to start a home so that the situation that exists now in Vancouver will not be continued. We have to give a lower interest rate to small businessmen who need capital and who are suffering all over the country. We have to give better interest rates to farmers and fishermen who need reasonable credit. We have to stop these usurious interest rates and get back to real interest rates.

Mr. Waddell: The people who are left are those the Liberal government is helping, namely, the chartered banks, the speculators and those people who are generally well off.

I am not unmindful of the fact that there would be a certain fallout as the result of my suggestion. I expect hon. members will heckle me on this point, asking what will happen to the dollar and what will happen to capital; will it all run out of Canada? The answer to that is to do what President Kennedy and what President Nixon did when faced with that problem in the United States. They applied special taxes to stop capital leaving the country. We would have to do that.

What we are saying from this side of the House is that we could have an independent Canadian policy. It has nothing to do with government spending. It has to do with following American high interest rates and encouraging high interest rates, as this government is doing. High interest rates there lead to high interest rates here and to inflation. Can the government not see that? It seems obvious to us. I think we have to do something else.

I see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is in the House. I would encourage him to follow an industrial strategy which would give Canadians more control of the country through a mixture of tax changes, planning agreements with major companies, selective state intervention—and that is what I meant by proper government spending—and an enlarged role for Petro-Canada in oil development. That is the next step after constitutional reform. Constitutional reform is the first step in bringing the Constitution home. We will patriate our Constitution to Canada. Then we have to patriate our economy. That is the challenge of the 1980s. I think the minister of trade understands that. I would encourage him to push the cabinet into following that kind of policy.

I want to comment briefly on some of the more complex things which I think are wrong with our system. In my view, the hon. member for York-Peel barely touched on some of the fundamental questions that are facing us in economics. It seems to me evident that we have a system which no longer obeys the laws which were supposed to govern it. The open market has disappeared. Trusts, cartels and price-fixing agreements reduce the area of free competition to a minimum. I think the flexibility of earlier capitalism has given way to increased rigidity and the public is no longer protected. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for York-Peel and his colleagues are in the nineteenth century. Capitalism, as we knew it in the nineteenth century, has gone.

It is evident that planning of some sort is coming anyway. The state has already exercised considerable control over our economy. The capitalists themselves, as fast as they divide up their markets and build their monopolies, are becoming planners. Every giant corporation has a planning commission.

I see that my time is almost up. Before concluding, however, let us deal with the here and now. We no longer have that old system which the hon. member for York-Peel would like to have. We have a different system now and we have to protect the people in that system. We have to protect the little guy in that system. That is what this government has failed to do, that is what the vote of non-confidence in this government should have said and that is what the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) was trying to get at yesterday when he talked about these discredited, made-in-Washington usurious interest rate policies.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. It enables me to describe to this House some of the efforts of the government to deal with the economic and industrial challenges that have emerged in this country, as they have in national economies the world over.

Mr. Stevens: How long do you need? Five minutes?

Mr. Gray: I want to describe the efforts of this government and how they involve creating a solid framework for present and future economic stability.

The hon. member from York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), in presenting his motion, as usual showed rather severe ignorance of the vast array of positive policies and programs which the government has implemented. We are right now addressing precisely those issues about which the hon. member for York-Peel claims to be concerned and mentioned in his motion, namely the stability, productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy. The hon. member may be a slow learner, and the Canadian people have confirmed this, but I am glad to have another opportunity to tell him something about our economic policies and how they are working toward an economic future in which all Canadians can benefit, one that is vital and growing.

Before doing that, I want to make another observation about the motion before the House. Whether my hon. friend likes it or not, Canada and Canada's economy do not exist in isolation from the rest of the world. On the contrary, Canada is one of the most internationally oriented of nations, and its trade with other countries makes up 25 per cent of our gross national product. The economic events that have confronted Canada with its most serious challenges in recent years, starting with unprecedented increases in the price of energy and running the gamut to the emerging competitiveness of newly developed countries, are international in origin.

Far from condemning the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) for participating in a meeting of the International Monetary Fund, or for that matter criticizing any other minister of the Crown for pursuing Canada's economic interests in international meetings and international markets, the hon. member for York-Peel and the official opposition, if they knew what they were talking about, should be expressing confidence and satisfaction that this government's views of its responsibilities in regard to having the right economic policy for Canada are not so narrow, limited or empty as those of the official opposition.

The hon. member for York-Peel made reference to the election of the Minister of Finance as chairman of the main committee of the International Monetary Fund. According to press reports, the Minister of Finance was elected because a large number of member countries of the fund did not want the British finance minister, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, a leading figure in the Conservative government of Britain, to be elected to that post. I suspect that is because they saw what Conservative policies were doing in Britain when it came to matters like employment. They undoubtedly knew what damage Conservative policies have done to Canada during the fortunately brief period when the member for York-Peel and his colleagues were in office. Obviously they knew what would happen if that group had continued in power—

Mr. Benjamin: You are doing the same thing.

Mr. Gray: —and had not been removed by the Canadian people.

I think that the member nations of the International Monetary Fund must have decided that, in electing the Minister of Finance to his position as chairman of their key committee, the balanced approach represented by the Minister of Finance was more in the best interests, not only of the Canadian economy but of the world economy, and they expressed that judgment when they elected him chairman of that key committee.

I have already said that the hon. member for York-Peel is slow to learn but he is also quick to forget, quick to forget that growth in the last six months in Canada has been running at an annual rate of 6 per cent to 7 per cent; that the unemployment rate has fallen to the lowest level in almost four years; that the current account of the balance of payments in the fourth quarter of 1980 moved into surplus for the first time in six years; and that we are creating jobs in the Canadian economy faster than any other industrialized country in the world. In the wording of his motion, he has obviously forgotten what the budget of this government presented last October was all about.

Contrary to the allegations of the hon. member for York-Peel, the budget did create an environment in which sustained economic growth and development can and will occur. Let me briefly remind the member opposite of some of the elements of the economic strategy of the government set out by the Minister of Finance in his budget of October 28, 1980.

In his motion, the hon. member inaccurately claims the government's policies are destroying stability. That budget is aimed at reinforcing stability. The official opposition in its motion ignores, as this government does not, the destabilizing and destructive effects of inflation. Unlike the hon. member and unlike the official opposition, this government's policies are very much concerned with maintaining the stability so necessary to the health of our economy.

Central to the budget was a fiscal plan calling for steady and gradual deficit reduction and expenditure restraint. The purpose of this budget and this plan was to provide a basis for sustained private sector expansion as well as its financing over the medium term. It is through helping improve the productivity and the competitiveness of our private sector that the government is in fact working to strengthen the productivity and competitiveness of the entire economy. This is where improved productivity and sustained competitiveness in the private sector will originate, not from the empty rhetoric and confused ideas of the member from York-Peel and of the official opposition.

The hon. member and his colleagues have demanded that the government spend more. Today, however, the hon. member is complaining about government spending. Yesterday he apparently voted for increased expenditures by the federal government of more than $3 billion. I think that throughout this debate this type of conduct has shown the confusion that exists when it comes to the Conservatives deciding what their priorities really are. For them, at one and the same time less spending is the number one priority and more spending is the number one priority. This is typical of the irresponsible and in fact hypocritical approach on the part of the official opposition to the necessity of having the right kind of priorities in place for this country at this time.

In the budget, this government set out firmly what Canadian priorities must be at this time in energy, economic development, industrial development and adjustment and manpower retraining. Our commitment to these areas has been demonstrated through increased funding; for example, the 22 per cent increase in the economic envelope for this year and through definite actions.

At this point I want to describe some of these actions and to talk about some of the things we have done and are doing to carry out the promise of the October 28 budget to enhance the stability, productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy. Surely it cannot have escaped even the sluggish perceptions of the occupants of the official opposition benches that in the variety and the creativity of the particular economic development measures which we have taken over the past 15 months and are continuing to take, these are the real and important measures of the government's effectiveness in building on Canada's impressive economic strengths, in improving the competitiveness of our industries and in increasing the capacity of our economy to generate wealth and income for the benefit of all Canadians.

I want to mention the new industry and labour adjustment program, the funding for which, $350 million, was announced in the recent budget. Already four communities undergoing severe adjustment pressures have been designated for assistance under this program, which in a unique way brings together measures to support both industries and workers in the designated communities. I expect more designations of communities will be made during the course of the program. This program flows from the government's recognition that adjustment and restructuring are a necessary part of increasing competitiveness. At the same time the burden, the costs of industrial adjustment and restructuring, should not be permitted to fall solely on particular individuals, communities and industries, since the results sought are for the benefit of the entire economy.

I think it is wrong that for some the notion of adjustment seems to convey a negative connotation, but in reality continual adjustment is a necessary precondition for maintaining a dynamic and vibrant economy. The positive side to adjustment is innovation and seizing and exploiting market opportunities as they emerge. The government fully recognizes this and has taken some very significant steps to ensure that these kinds of adjustments are a reality of the Canadian economy and the activity within it.

Take support for industrial innovation, for example. Recently, we announced a $27 million increase in the federal government's funding of the joint industry-government Telidon program. This very substantial increase in federal funds for a program which is jointly managed by the Department of Communications and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was added to the more than $12 million already committed. It is a major contribution toward making this new industry self-sustaining, nationally and internationally, and in demonstrating the commercial competitiveness of Telidon in world markets.

That this approach is working was stunningly evident in the announcement this week by the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, the world's largest communications corporation, of its acceptance of a Telidon-plus system as the standard in this new communications technology. This AT & T decision should give Canadian manufacturers first crack at the crucial United States market. Industry representatives say they could easily accommodate the existing Telidon system to the announced standard, and what is more, they are now predicting a market worth $4 billion and the creation of 12,000 jobs between now and 1985. Of course, this would not be happening were it not for the vigorous support of this government of this Telidon technology.

On April 13 of this year I announced substantial increases in federal government funding for the highly successful defence industry productivity program. This program is essentially one aimed at encouraging the development of the Canadian aerospace, telecommunications, electronics and related industries. I announced an increase in the base funding for normal projects of over 50 per cent from the previous fiscal year. I also announced an additional $100 million in funding over the next four years to help clear up the deluge of applications received, and an adjustment formula to take account of expected cost escalations.

Adding to these amounts is funding for particular major projects, such as the PT7 engine and the components for the Cruise missile, bringing total DIPP spending over the next two years to $272.9 million, a good investment in the growth of key industries, important for Canada's present and future.

I want to point out that a rigorous evaluation of the program has shown, among other things, that every government dollar invested in these industries through this program results in $15 of high technology sales, 90 per cent of which are for the export market. Equally if not more important to Canada's industrial development as our support for the introduction of new products like Telidon, the Dash-8 plane, the PT7 engine, is our effort to encourage another type of innovation throughout the Canadian industrial sector. I am talking about encouraging and helping all Canadian industries to adapt to the most modern and innovative production processes, like computer aided manufacturing and designs. The extent that this happens on a scale sufficient for our industries to remain competitive with respect to cost of production and quality of product will very much depend on the extent of co-operative efforts between government and the private sector.

The government has begun extending just such support through such means as the special microelectronics fund under the enterprise development program and the planned microelectronics awareness program aimed at making Canadian industry generally more aware of the necessity of adapting to and using these kinds of new production technology.

In this decade the opportunities for industrial development will be so widespread that the biggest challenge will be to ensure that we are continually identifying and capturing them and not permitting them to slip through our hands. Three of the most promising areas of opportunity where we as a government are already very actively involved in working with the private sector are to maximize the benefits to Canadian industries and workers of the industrial benefits from resource and energy development, Canadian sourcing and export market development.

With respect to the first of these areas, there is general agreement that one of the strongest sources of market stimulus in Canada in the coming decade will be major resource and energy projects. The demand for goods and services spun off by these projects will give Canadian firms in all regions opportunities to provide technology-intensive goods and services in domestic and foreign markets, leading to sustained and broadly based economic growth across our country.

Seeing to it that these benefits accrue in fact in and for Canada is a very important goal for this government. In fact, there are provisions in the oil and gas legislation now before this House to respond to the concern that Canadian firms have every full and fair opportunity to supply these major resource projects. These provisions would govern only those projects undertaken on Canada lands and reflect the authority of the federal government with respect to these areas of our country. I believe the policy priority for this government must be and in fact is in addition to administering these provisions for the Canada lands, to ensure full benefit to Canada from major resource and other projects undertaken everywhere in this country. Obviously something should be done on a co-operative basis with the provincial governments.

Added to the spinoff benefits of major energy and resource projects are important domestic marketing opportunities in a number of other industrial sectors, provided we are in a position to capitalize on domestic, on Canadian opportunities as they arise. One very significant example of the government's commitment to achieve this kind of objective was the recent and very successful Opportunities in Mining Conference just held in Vancouver. Jointly sponsored by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the government of B.C. and the mining associations of British Columbia and Canada.

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of good order I simply want to ask the minister whether he will be dealing with the question of interest rates, and in particular why he feels that their 19 per cent level is okay when our 14 per cent level would have justified his resignation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that is a matter of argument rather than a point of order. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has the floor.

Mr. Gray: Unlike the hon. member, who in my view is abusing the rules of the House with spurious points of order, Mr. Speaker, I am responding to the only real point I can find in his motion where he talks about policies requiring efforts to improve the stability, competitiveness and productivity of the Canadian economy. I think I am responding to whatever merit there is in his motion, even more so that the hon. member did in presenting it.

An hon. Member: Tell us about interest rates.

Mr. Gray: This Opportunities in Mining Conference was a unique and very successful form of government and private sector, federal and provincial government co-operation. Its purpose was to bring together the Canadian mining industry and Canadian manufacturers to enable much more of that industry's more than $1 billion in annual sourcing of products, services and equipment to be purchased right here in Canada.

The hon. member in his speech spoke critically of the federal government's efforts in the area of trade. Last year we had a record merchandise trade surplus of some $8 billion, more than double the previous record. This government is making significant efforts to build on this success, responding to requests from the private sector for increased support for export promotion.

We realize that expanding and diversifying our exports is a key element in bringing long-term stability, productivity and competitiveness to our economy. But as I said earlier, the opposition finds it very hard to learn, and what little its members do learn they very soon forget. So it bears repeating to them that the Government of Canada is now providing funds to our Export Development Corporation to enable Canadian companies to match concessional terms being offered to foreign companies by their governments, and thereby enable our Canadian companies to meet more effectively international competition in export markets. We have also greatly increased the budget of the program for export market development and the trade fairs and missions program of our department, providing substantial additional funding to assist Canadian companies directly in their export efforts.

To conclude, I want to say that this government's policies certainly are not destroying the stability, productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy as alleged in the opposition's spurious motion. The statistics, not only in Canada but those developed by international agencies like the OECD, show that when looking at growth in employment, including manufacturing employment and the over-all growth of our economy and the balance of trade, the government's policies are in fact strengthening the stability, productivity and competitiveness of our economy.

As I said at the outset of my remarks—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, we have now had a dialogue on the lame-duck Liberal industrial stategy. It would have been more appropriate had the minister in this debate used some of his words I can quote from the past. He said, for example:

—because of the harmful effects of high interest rates on consumers, businessmen, especially small businessmen, and the entire economy, there should be an urgent study by the Finance Committee, where the Governor of the Bank would come, and the Minister of Finance—

That is from "The Watson Report". The minister made that statement on October 15, 1979. That is what he should be addressing today rather than the lame-duck industrial strategy that has not worked for 12 years. His industrial strategy has brought us the worst record in our history.

Then we hear our friends to the left in the frivolous rump attacking us. Why do they not attack the government? They have all these marvellous industrial strategies; why do they not tell the government what to do? I doubt if the minister would listen anyway.

It is interesting to note that this debate was commenced because of the economy and high interest rates. In 1968 when this government came to power the average interest rate was 6⅝ per cent. This year it will average 17⅞ per cent. That is almost a 200 per cent increase. The debt in 1968 was $20 billion. It has now gone up sixfold plus, from $20 billion to $120 billion-odd. I do not know how far it has gone. It is going up so quickly you cannot keep up with it. Inflation has gone from 3 per cent to 12 per cent. It is interesting that all these statistics are in relation to each other, and this tells me that the government has been on a bad track, that it should get off it and start running this country.

We know and it has been proven, and I believe it will be proven even more strongly south of the border, that these interest rates have been brought about because of wasteful government spending over the past number of years. It is tragic what this is doing to the country, it is tragic what it is doing to our citizens, and it is tragic what it is doing to Canadian business. Every time the government has to borrow more money it sets up a chain reaction. The people who lose are those in Canadian business, Canadian citizens as a whole and the entire country. Canadian business is all small. Only the multinationals from other countries are really big business in this day and age. We are not helping small business by providing them with relief from the interest rates they have to pay during these dire times.

Last weekend I was talking to one of my constituents who had bought a business when interest rates were 9 per cent. His money was on a demand loan and he does not qualify for the special bond. He said that now that rates are 20 per cent his business is no longer economically viable. This is what this government is doing to this country.

All the government has done so far during this session is hammer at one segment of our economy. If any corporation, organization or government agency would just cut one part of the economy off at the knees without any plan to look after the employment of all the people thrown out of work, it would be thrown out of business.

The energy program has brought us all to our knees. We are all waiting and praying that something will happen to save us. I know this will not come from internal forces but rather from external forces. Why does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) not stand up and level with the public, setting forth a five-year program? Obviously the government is into five-year programs, so the minister should tell us how the government is going to nationalize all industry within the next five years. The government has just started and what we see is only the little tip of the iceberg it has grabbed onto; the easy part, the rich part, the big bucks. The government will just keep going until it brings us right down.

Mr. Gray: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) wishes to ask a question. Will the hon. member accept?

Mr. Fennell: When I finish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At the end of the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Fennell: This government does not want to help small business. It is easier to nationalize six large giants than to nationalize 60,000 small Canadian businesses. The government's plan is to protect and look after the big guy, because there would be too much of a hassle in the press, in the country and within the constituency if the government tried to nationalize 60,000. I maintain, and we have brought this forward before, that it is time for this government to bring down a new budget, before July 1, bringing out new incentives to Canadians to invest in this country. The people are tired of the government and then taking the money out of their pockets.

• (1500)

All the government will do with any proceeds is to spend them on another new program. That does not produce any oil or anything positive. These people should be permitted to buy into competing industries under the free enterprise system. We should not be creating a giant bureaucratic monster in Ottawa. The forefathers of the people of this country had pride. They settled this country through many hardships. These people should be given pride of ownership beyond the pride of ownership of their own homes or the pride of ownership of the businesses or industries in which they work. The people in this country have no pride in this government.

I received on my desk this week the financial statement for Petro-Canada. All I can say is that it must be government-financed because I do not know of another oil company with the same debt to equity ratio. Petro-Canada could not even pay for its recent acquisition. It had to go back to the public to drain some more bucks from the middle-income group, the biggest pot it could find.

Mr. Pepin: You wanted to sell it to ordinary people. Make up your mind.

Mr. Fennell: Petro-Canada did not borrow the money at the current rates at which its competition has to borrow money. Petro-Canada does not have to go out and pay the big bills small Canadian producers have to pay. Small Canadian producers pay 20 per cent; Petro-Canada gets away with half rates. If this were a privately owned company, the directors and the management would be thrown out by the shareholders, but in this country we do not have that opportunity.

The "Economic Review" is meant to explain to Canadian citizens why we are going bankrupt. Table 1.4 at page 5 shows that we stand right at the bottom of the list respecting the current account positions of the non-socialist economies. We are the worst. Perhaps that is because we are no longer a non-socialist economy. Perhaps we should not even appear on this page. Real effective exchange rates are dealt with at page 6. We are at the bottom of that list too. I think we should be classified as a socialist country. We belong on a list of socialist countries. I do not think we belong in the same league as some of our friends, as we did in the past. Some of the OECD countries which are below the seven largest on the list are pushing us. They are going to replace us. We are going to drop to the bottom of the list and eventually right off it, and Luxembourg could probably take our place. People say we should compare the seven OECD countries to ours. One thing that none of those other countries has but that we have—and we are not using—is natural resources. We were blessed with much more than any of those other countries. We have the greatest agricultural potential in the world. We have the greatest oil potential in the world. We have the greatest mineral potential in the world. We also have the greatest potential in the people of this country to build industry. We have the potential to convert those raw materials into finished products rather than depending on the export of raw materials. When we compare our record with those of the other countries on that page, we should hang our heads in shame. We have not done a good job, we have not taken care of this country, and we in Ottawa have not been responsible.

We keep hearing about high interest rates. I could give dozens of quotations from statements by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). He may say today that he is in favour of high interest rates, but I do not believe it. I believe he is violently opposed to high interest rates. We have tried high interest rates. They are not working. They are driving us to our knees.

Hon. members to my left say our high interest rates are made in Washington. Perhaps we should let our dollar float partially, look for some import replacement and address ourselves to building an industry for import replacement. We should take hardship away from home owners. We should reduce imports into this country. If the value of our dollar dropped to half of what it is now, people would not be buying big cars. That might compel us to force the large companies to produce small cars here in Canada. I am not talking about bringing Japanese cars over. I am saying we should get them here in pieces, that we should contribute some of the pieces and build the cars here. If we reduced imports and increased exports, we would benefit.

I think this government is very frightened of its tenuous political power, so it has gone far beyond the wildest dreams of the New Democratic Party. A certain speech made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) back in 1978, when compared with some of the programs being implemented by the Liberal government, can now be seen to have been very conservative, and that is quite a compliment I pay. I am sorry members of the New Democratic Party are not here to hear it.

The New Democratic Party is open. Its members believe in socialism through evolution. I think the Liberal goal is socialism, but that party would rather do it through revolution. They are in a hurry. They want to get it done right away. They cannot wait ten years. They will bring in socialism in any way they can. They will pass any legislation necessary. They will do anything in their power to change this country from a non-socialist nation to a socialist nation. We are getting down to the bottom of the list of non-socialist countries, but the question now is who is going to slip off the list first? France may slip to the position of the country with the worst economy and replace Canada. That would be something, but the trouble is that France might slip right off the list too. We may go off together three points apart, 22 per cent to 19 per cent. In light of the new situation in France there might be tremendous competition to see who can nationalize the most the fastest. Will we win or will France? We will see who gets the real lead. Any entrepreneur in this country should beware. Entrepreneurs should watch out. Small businessmen should watch out. This group opposite may come and take them over too. This government may do that under the guise of Crown corporations, but eventually they will take businesses right in and work them over so that there will not be so many people to cut through.

With this government we are not getting any further ahead. We are getting further behind all the time. It is interesting that south of the border government spending increases will be cut by two thirds, but each year in this country our expenditures keep going up. The Americans are going to cut their taxes, and still, in spite of our indexation, they will have a better tax situation than we have here in Canada. The U.S. administration will encourage entrepreneurs. Unlike our government or the French government, the U.S. government will encourage entrepreneurs to get going and to make the country work. That has brought a spirit of encouragement back to the United States. There is a spirit of "Let's go, guys, we have a great country and we can do it". That is what this government should be doing here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fennell: The American administration will increase industrial tax incentives. That will make that country work.

Let us compare the U.S. energy program with ours. It is like day and night, or capitalism and socialism. There are no similarities at all.

We have heard much talk about the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) being chosen chairman of an IMF committee. My colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), mentioned that the minister probably got the job because he is the biggest spender. Last fall I had the opportunity to go to the United Nations. I was not there very long. I was there only a week, but I learned how appointments are made in international circles. The test is, "Who can do the most for me," and "That is the person who will get the vote". Obviously, those who voted are expecting a giveaway from Canada or some feathering of their nests. I can tell hon. members one thing, and that is that they can bet their bottom dollar that they can talk about the minister from Britain, but there is no way that bunch who voted in the Minister of Finance of Canada would have voted for Donald Regan.

I made a statement in January of this year that we hit the peak, or I hoped we had hit the peak but I do not know if we will ever come to that point. It is interesting that as our interest rates go up, so do our taxes. They compensate for indexation, they keep on grabbing more money somewhere else. They may as well never have indexed the income tax because they are going to get it somewhere else, they are going to skin the Canadian public one way or another.

There was a 4 per cent increase in income taxes in Ontario, but that has pushed up the average person's income tax by only 1.72 per cent. Then the Government of Canada comes along and puts 4 per cent on top, that makes an increase of 5.88 per cent and that hurts. That increase in tax of almost 6 per cent is on top of an inflation rate of 12 per cent. I do not know how the poor guys working nine to five in General Motors, where I have many constituents, are going to manage. I do not knock those guys because they may be making a big buck in 1970 dollars, but they are not making very much in today's dollars. It has been a sort of set-up by this government to grab all the money they can, grab every little piece of the pie. The other governments in this country have used this as an example and have said: "Hey, guys, there is where our bucks are so let's go." The municipalities keep jumping in for more money, as do the provinces and the regions. The province of Ontario could not get its hand out of our pockets; they had to get some of those petro-bucks.

They are all grabbing for more, so the people of this country are looking to this government to set a standard, which it is not doing. It is the biggest tax grab I have ever seen and probably the biggest ever witnessed in this country. It is an interesting thing that large corporations do their borrowing on a fiscal basis so that when interest rates go up, they just delay their borrowing, they get a little bit more bank financing. Governments do the same thing. High interest rates do not really hurt the governments and large corporations and, strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, they do not hurt the Canadian development companies which are now the major holders of real estate in New York, Houston, Dallas, San Francisco, all around the United States. It does not hurt them at all because they borrow the money in Canada from Canadian banks, Canadian savers, then turn around and deduct that interest from their parent company here and then get a second deduction in the United States. So it does not cost them one red cent. It does not matter if you have a 40 per cent interest rate, they can still pay the bill. It is the government which is going to fork it over. That is the problem in that one instance, and that is why those large development companies are building housing, offices and everything else in the United States instead of in Canada.

The government says there is nothing they can do about the high interest rates. I say they could do something about them. They are hurting the home owners much more than if our dollar dropped in value. They are hurting the small businessman, and I am talking about everything other than multinationals. They are hurting the independent oil companies, as is the National Energy Program. And the other people who are really hurting are those who have deposit receipts. They may be getting 18 per cent, but they are paying tax on that, which leaves them with 9 per cent, but with an effective inflation rate of 12 per cent they are still three points in the hole. I ask this government, I plead with it the best way I can, please do something to help Canadians survive. You may think they are making a lot of money, but they are not. The dollar they are making today by many comparisons is only worth about 10 cents compared to the dollar of 1961.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, it is always an honour and a pleasure to take part in a debate in the House of Commons, especially on such a topical subject as the economy. Last week, I had the opportunity and the honour to speak to the House and to those who listen to us about an important subject, namely the economy and the harmful effects of inflation on small wage earners who bear the brunt of inflation. However, today, I must say that I am greatly disappointed by the lack of seriousness of the motion introduced by the opposition.

I sit on the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). I have not been in the House for long, but I have often had the impression that I was learning a lot during the debates of this committee from the contributions of the hon. member for York-Peel, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the other financial critics of the opposition. I was grateful for the quality of the questions that they asked and the wisdom that they often showed in their interventions.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that on reading the motion introduced by the opposition, I was greatly disappointed. I respect the former President of the Treasury Board even though I do not necessarily share his political and economic views, but I still respect him because he has always been consistent. We know what to expect from him. We know his economic philosophy and where it leads. We may disagree with it, but we can still respect it. This is why I have always appreciated the interventions of the hon. member for York-Peel. I must admit I do not think much of his motion. He went so far as to object to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) attending a meeting of the International Monetary Fund! He has effectively condemned our whole policy even though he had the same goals when he was himself President of the Treasury Board! Obviously, Mr. Speaker, we must face our current problems, namely the inflation rate and the impact of high interest rates and inflation on small wage earners.

I do not believe that such a silly motion can solve anything. It is so ridiculously phrased that few opposition members were here today because the majority were ashamed of it. I think that no one wants to be associated with those unconvincing comments. Since we are facing such a prevailing and basic situation which concerns so many people and causes hardship to the underprivileged and small wage earners, all members of the House should co-operate to find the required solution. Unfortunately, such is not the case.

The solutions suggested may often be very attractive politically. Perhaps on the very short term, the solutions promoted by the hon. members opposite can attract certain pressure groups and a few additional votes. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that these political ad hoc measures have a very doubtful economic value. I have listened to a whole series of them, enumerated by the member who spoke before me. In my opinion, we cannot live in a closed society. We all depend on our neighbours and on our actions. There is no magic solution to inflation. I think that members of the opposition would have had every reason to denounce our Minister of Finance if he had ignored this international conference.

I think that it is not so much his attending an international conference that is being criticized but the fact that the conference is being held in Gabon. Fancy that! Gabon! I am sure that several members of this house cannot imagine that an international conference of value could be held in Gabon—but I remind members opposite who have criticized the minister for attending and participating in this conference that there were over 800 experts and ministers of finance from 141 countries, members of the International Monetary Fund. I, for one, am proud to see that the delegates attending this monetary conference considered it appropriate to appoint our Minister of Finance their chairman. I think that is an honour they bestowed on me and on all Canadians. I think the previous speaker insulted officials of the United Nations or other international agencies by the way he described the appointment process. Can you imagine! He spent one week at the United Nations and that automatically makes him an expert on the way all appointments to major positions are made.

Now that is incredible, Mr. Speaker. I have never heard such nonsense, and that is what I was referring to when speaking of the hon. member for York-Peel, because he is not generally inclined to make those kinds of statements. I wonder whether four days of debate have not exhausted the members opposite, whether they have not said all they had to say about the economy, and whether they are now going to try, through devious means, sheer stupidity, or politicking to impose their economic policies on this country. That is what I find deplorable and that is certainly not the philosophy I adhere to as a member of Parliament and certainly not the approach I took when I was in opposition. Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to quote from a wire from France Presse, which has a reporter on the spot. This is what he said, as reported in today's La Presse and I quote:

> The 24 member group from other Third World countries feel that the monetary policies followed by industrialized nations in their fight against inflation have increased interest rates and exerted more pressure on the deficit ridden balance of payments of poorer nations.

That pretty well sums up, Mr. Speaker, the debate that has been going on in this House for the last two weeks, for I do not know how many years. That is precisely what we are discussing: the effects of the monetary and fiscal policies of our government. There were 800 international experts in attendance. There were also ministers of finance. And our Minister of Finance was criticized for being there and not here. But if the opposition took a positive approach, if it made constructive recommendations instead of politicking, maybe the problem could be solved. In my opinion, the Minister of Finance was wise to go to this international conference where there were 800 experts because there is no such expertise in this House, certainly not on the opposition benches anyway, and I much regret that fact. I would certainly be very pleased if we could all together face this situation which certainly causes much hardship for low-income Canadians.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a question?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) will understand that is the choice of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger).

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: I have a lot of respect for the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, not only because he speaks French but also because oftentimes his contributions are positive. If time permits I would be more than grateful to have an opportunity to exchange ideas with him. I would even be interested to know what his question is, Mr. Speaker, if unfortunately I should run out of time. I am glad indeed that he is listening to my speech. Perhaps we might get together after my intervention? I think that Canada is a closed country. If Canada were the only country in the world I think it would be obvious that the current monetary policy would not have the consequences we are experiencing daily. I think we would be able to administer—and very well at that—strictly with a fiscal policy. But such is not the case, Mr. Speaker. We are not living in a vacuum.

We are definitely influenced by the economic policies of all countries in the world. To my mind that is interesting because it so happens that in his motion the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) refers to the international character of the travels of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and he mentions other countries in the world, the economic aftermath of the new American policy on all countries, not only Canada but also the Federal Republic of Germany, Belgium, Japan and so many other. We all know that the Americans have decided to implement a policy designed to fight against the inflationary pressures in their country. The result of that of course is a stronger American currency, but another side effect is that interest rates are soaring. But since no one lives in a vacuum and since the United States is a country whose importance is not diminishing but growing indeed, it is a fact that it has an influence not only on Canada but on all countries as well. If I may I should like to give a few examples. In the Federal Republic of Germany the deutschmark has considerably depreciated and we already know that the Bundesbank had to raise interest rates in recent months. Belgium lived through the very same phenomenon. Although the Japanese have huge investments in the automobile industry, and that is indeed a major factor in their balance of payments, we know that they had to push their rates up sharply these past few weeks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are to compare the cost of living index in Canada I will quote not just any figures but those which even the hon. member for York-Peel quoted from the Economic Review for April 1981. He selected the figures which seemed to strengthen his case, and that is politically understandable, but he referred for instance to the 7.5 per cent unemployment rate level. And then he said: Look at the chart on page 3, that unemployment rate is frightening, we are in worse shape than the Democratic Republic of Germany, France and even Great Britain. What he is not saying, among other things, is that the rates of unemployment have come down substantially. What he is not saying is that the level of unemployment now is lower than at any other time since 1976. What he is not saying is that 337,000 jobs were created over a one-year period. What he is not saying is that we are striving increasingly toward full employment, an aim which both he and I certainly share. I suggest, therefore, that the figures he has quoted were poorly chosen for if I wanted to quote figures to demonstrate that our economy is having a hard time, I would not quote figures connected either with unemployment or consumer prices.

As far as the rate of inflation in 1980 is concerned, in Canada it was 10.1 per cent, compared with 13.5 per cent in the United States, 18 per cent in Great Britain, 13.6 per cent in France, 5.5 per cent—I agree—in the German Democratic Republic, and 21.2 per cent in Italy. It seems to me that these figures speak for themselves Mr. Speaker. I suggest that in this international context, our level of inflation is high. We are suffering as a result of high interest rates, but we are not the only ones.

We cannot cure all ills in this House. Even the economy of the German Democratic Republic is no longer as sound as it was when these figures were first published. This is significant of course but what I feel matters even more is what was reported in the April 1981 issue of the Economic Review about the money supply and what the hon. member for York-Peel failed to mention. That is of paramount importance. In short, we know that inflation is due to a mass printing of dollars which exceeds our level of production, and that the best way to wrestle unemployment to the ground is to reduce considerably, if not entirely, our dollar printing activity. There are various ways to achieve that. We could do as Great Britain has done and wait until the interest rates reach 18 or 20 per cent, and then stun the whole country with a major reduction of the money supply. When we look at the figures, we realize that Great Britain went from 20.3 to 4.2 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I have been to Great Britain and I have seen with my own eyes the impact of such a policy. There is no doubt in my mind that this is the policy we ought to follow, because when such high rates are reached, there is no choice. They had to take stringent steps, but the situation was different in Canada. And that is why the money supply must be gradually reduced. And when it is reduced, Mr. Speaker, it is like a drug addict who keeps increasing his daily fix. When he is weaned off drugs, he finds it painful, but he is told: In the end, you will be free, you will be healthy. Then I think he is willing to be treated. This is precisely what is happening in Canada. A gradual reduction of the money supply has, of course, an impact on the inflation rate, because the value of the dollar and the inflation rate cannot both increase at the same time Mr. Speaker. If interest rates are allowed to drop, the dollar will depreciate and then the inflation rate will increase. So we have to make a choice. I approve that choice, Mr. Speaker, because it is a necessary choice, which is to reduce the money supply. Where we may disagree, it is on how far that reduction should go.

As far as I am concerned, I am one of the haves, I am not a businessman, I am here in this House without the advantage of having been in private business as the former minister of state for small businesses. He stressed I was not a businessman. This is true, I was a lawyer in private industry, I have been for a while with Power Corporation, so I have just the same some idea of business. He reminded me I had never had to meet a payroll, to feel the pressures exerted on a businessman. He is right, of course, but I say to him that, to my knowledge, the effect of inflation on my constituents is precisely the effect it has on have-nots. And I think we have no choice. We must act, and act now.

If there is one thing I can blame the opposition for, it is their criticism that we have nothing constructive, nothing positive, and I hope the hon. member who will speak after me—I understand it is the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—will give us specific suggestions. Because, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the victims of inflation are the have-nots, and on the very short term I do not know what we can do to ease their burden, to improve their standard of living. But if I were to make recommendations to the Minister of Finance, as I did last week, simple and practical ones that in my view would improve the lot of have-nots, I would tell him first and foremost that people should forget once and for all about granting wage increases on a percentage basis. It is my view that we should arrive at an index of essential goods. We should establish a minimum amount equivalent to the cost of essential items. We know that food is essential, that housing is essential, that transportation costs must be met. We know that current expenses add up. Therefore, it is the total, the cost of all those essential items that should determine our salaries. A low-income person should never get a raise short of that amount because it is obvious that the person who earns $40,000 a year can more easily bear the brunt of inflation than the one who earns $10,000 and that at 10 per cent raise for the person earning $40,000 does not have the same impact as a 10 per cent raise for the one earning $10,000.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to this house as I suggested to the minister who is surely going to give it some thought, that we should consider the possibility, a minimum not in terms of percentage but in terms of dollars and that instead of granting raises on a percentage basis which do not compensate for the ravages of inflation, we should set a minimum set first on the cost of the basic necessities of life and going upwards. This means that those people with higher incomes, the well-to-do, the high-rollers, and there are still many of them in our society, in my own district in Brossard, I can assure you that houses sell well and at high prices, just as in Vancouver they sell well and at high prices. This means that people do not necessarily mind inflation rate or interest rates; they simply look at the monthly payment to be made. If they can afford to pay such an amount at the end of the month they will buy. It is bad policy but that is the way they act. So I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we must change our way of thinking. People must be made to understand where they are going, and if we manage to get that, if we can understand what is the actual consumer price index, if we can manage to set new wage bases we will then be able to achieve a new economic policy in this country.

Today, I do not intend to dwell on fiscal policy because my time is running short. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, economic policy in a country has as its components fiscal policy and monetary policy. Naturally, our fiscal policy will be contained in the forthcoming budget. A budget, in short, is a statement of the fiscal policy of a country.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Peel is asking us to bring down another budget now. We have yet to reach an agreement with Alberta on energy matters. We have already had one budget without any such agreement. The Progressive Conservatives also brought down a budget without an agreement having been reached. Surely they will admit, as I do, that it is hard to know what our sources of revenue will be without such an agreement. As far as I am concerned, I am of those who hope and believe that we should try to come to an agreement with Alberta before having a new budget, in order to know exactly what our revenue base will be. Once we know that, it will be much easier to develop a fiscal policy that will stand on its own. In addition, Mr. Speaker, and I am quite willing to admit that government expenditures must be cut back—I am the first to admit it—but not at any cost, however, nor at the cost of selling off, just like that, all Crown corporations; on the contrary. The state still has a role to play; it remains a driving force; however, Mr. speaker, I do not feel that it should be involved in every sphere of the economy. So, I say a fiscal policy after an agreement with Alberta, because then we shall, in fact, know what our sources of revenue will be; a formal commitment, on the part of the government that takes into account the human element, a formal commitment to always be present while, on the other hand, giving free enterprise a certain leeway to operate, because that is very important.

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is almost up and to sum up, let me say that I know or at least I hope that all hon. members in this House realize the significance of inflation rates and the consequences of interest rates. We may disagree on the steps to be taken. I have suggested one or two and would like to hear something constructive, something positive from the opposition. I for one can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that these people are Progressive Conservatives is no reason why I should not listen to them: on the contrary, I always listen to them; but I would like to hear something meaningful; in fact I wish we could find together a solution to all those problems, for the sake of all Canadians.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

• (1530)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), but I should indicate to him that if he is rising on a point of order to question the hon. member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger), that is not possible without the unanimous consent of the House. The hon. member is entitled to seek the unanimous consent if he wishes.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: Very well, Mr. Speaker: let us drop the matter.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Well, then, the hon. member has resolved his own question.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The issue that we are debating here behind all the talk is one thing, that is, interest rates. One can call it barren economic policies. This motion does. Basically, the sin that we are discussing is the fact that the government has been following a practice, which the previous government and the government before that followed, of accepting advice on economic, monetary and fiscal policy based on a type of approach that has been proven quantitatively wrong over the last 20 or 30 years.

In their last major national conference in Montreal, economists admitted they did not know and could not explain where they had been. They admitted they did not know where they were or where they were going. If economists could have admitted their complete failure to understand the system on which the world is working, I would think it behooves us in Parliament to be a little humble and accept the fact that neither do our advisers in Ottawa, our capital, know where they are. I use that as a starting point.

We have had a good demonstration today of the words "barren economic policies". I am sorry that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) left because I was going to make a comment or two. I sat with the minister when he was in the opposition. In that short period of government, I was happy to be on the government side in a committee where most of us in all parties agreed, that the ordinary members of Parliament had to take over from the cabinet and the ministers on the grounds that they had accepted this fallacious economic theory of the bank governor and the Department of Finance. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was loud and outspoken in his acceptance of the fact that the advice we were getting from the bank was wrong. He was outspoken in his acceptance of the fact that the advice we were getting from the government was wrong because it came from the same source. The hon. member now sits as a minister. He said it is all right to pay 20 per cent interest because the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) had said that the people of Canada are so wealthy that they can afford it. Last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House that the ordinary people of Canada are 50 per cent better off than they were ten years ago. Everyone thought that must mean that the government is doing a wonderful job.

I will not go over that barren ground of statistical statement which reached the point a number of years ago that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board—who is no longer in this House—wrote a report to prove, on the basis of figures supplied by the then Bureau of Statistics, that the farmer was never wealthier than he was five or six years ago. I do not have to say what has happened to him; brilliant as he was, he was wiped out in a western riding because of such stupidity.

We have seen the same stupidity in this House in the last week when not only the Minister of Finance mouthed this type of empty rhetoric, but the statement was repeated again today over and over again—that if we do not keep interest rates high, our dollar value will decline. There is no evidence that such a thing will happen.

In late 1979, when the governor of the Bank of Canada was asked for evidence that since he applied this monetary policy in 1975 it had kept the dollar value up, he said that he did not have any evidence. That made headlines in the newspapers. You would think reasonably literate people would not repeat that simple statement again, yet it happens half a dozen times a day in this House. People claim that if we do not keep interest rates high, our dollar will drop. The governor of the Bank of Canada or anyone else who looks at the evidence knows that there is no evidence of that; in fact, the evidence is to the contrary.

It is the same with the other great truth that they enunciate—that when you save a lot of money, interest rates are supposed to go down. Ten years ago Canada not only led the world in per capita savings, but between 1975 and 1979 the rate of savings increased from 5 per cent to 11 per cent; last year it dropped to 10 per cent. No other nation in the world saves more than Canada but the book on economics says that if savings are accumulated, interest rates are supposed to go down. I will not get into the semantics of that today, Mr. Speaker.

I hope that the government recognizes that in 1979 people sense that it was tired and bankrupt of ideas. That is why it was turfed out exactly two years ago today. Through an accident of political demagoguery and trickery it was returned and it thought that God had spoken—that it is now right in everything. We now see this tame, tired, dispirited group without ideas. It knows full well that the civil service cannot help it any more. The men at the top of the civil service have made up their minds about what is right, based on theories learned 30 or 40 years ago. In spite of all the quantitative evidence to show that they are wrong, they cannot bring themselves to make changes. For ministers of the Crown to defend that nonsense brings us all into disrepute.

A few years ago, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was so much against high interest rates that he said if the government did not bring them down, he would resign. He has destroyed his credibility because he did not resign. Now he comes into this House and reads off a list of things which is barren of ideas for helping out with the interest rate problem.

What we have to do today, Mr. Speaker, is to recognize that politics has fallen to the level of the scam or, to use an old fashioned word, fraud. The whole constitutional debate has been fraudulent. We have not even begun to discuss the Constitution. What we have seen is great posturing on the part of politicians as if they were examining something. The government must know that it has failed in that undertaking. It is just a matter of letting it die a natural death. Then there is the great cry over energy prices. The government must accept the fact that it has failed and that it must make an agreement. But today, when the government is in trouble, the only solution known to civil servants is reorganization.

The Minister of Finance has become head of the policy group of the International Monetary Fund. That has happened to Canadians before and I am not opposed to it. Personally, I am glad he is out of the country so that he does not make us all look so foolish by making statements in the House. He has been zigging when he should have been zagging so often in the last eight or nine months, that it is a good thing he is out of the country! Let these newly evolving nations have him. If they think they will get anything out of him, they are mistaken.

I should like to put forward a few ideas that could have some possible positive effects, and I shall list them. There is no doubt in my mind that in the next two or three months, since we are not doing well in economics and since the constitutional scam has collapsed, as has the scam over energy prices—even Ontario betrayed it the other day—there will have to be a new scam. It will be Canada taking a position among these newly developing nations as the great white father who is on their side.

Let us be honest, Mr. Speaker. We want to help the developing nations in the world. Let us not try to hide what is actually happening, however. We know that they will not be helped by a continuation of the present type of handout. These handouts have done more to make enemies for the United States, Canada, Great Britain, France, Germany, and the other nations that gave them handouts. These newly developing nations know that a handout is given primarily for the purpose of lining the pockets of the local politicians of the governing party.

Mr. Blais: Nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Those countries know that the pockets of Canadians are also being lined because not a single handout is given unless the nations buy something in Canada.

As many hon. members may know, I have felt a load on my conscience over the last 20-odd years about doing something about this. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and others well know, I have been trying to organize international trading companies which would help these underdeveloped countries trade with others. They would make money in the process and so could afford to buy what they want, where they want. It would be a three-way trade, not this bilateral economic imperialism that we have practised under the present handout policy.

I know what ministers and what ordinary businessmen in these countries say. They say, "Your country comes to us with all these offers and a list of things that we are expected to buy from Canada." They know that it is economic blackmail. They may smile at you so as to get some more handouts but in their hearts they hate your guts. That is the frank truth of the handout route.

I have never met a more dedicated group of civil servants then those in CIDA. Yet I know what they must endure to go through all these monkeyshines. When one country gives to another country, you cannot really enforce the carrying out of that program in the other country.

What is a better way of doing it? I have mentioned the International Trading Congress. I think I have said enough about it. Their programs are working at no cost to government. Both sides benefit and world trade has improved.

I think hon. members probably know that in 1961 the People's Republic of China had only $400 million a year in trade, $200 million going to Russia and $200 million coming back to China. What is it today? They have $30 billion a year in trade. That has been done by free trading institutions moving in and out, sometimes to government, but more often just private businessmen going back and forth and dealing with corporations. Handouts are just a new form of imperialism. These people out there know it, and so do we. They are ashamed. I am not going into the question of the competence of handling these programs. We should not be giving them handouts. We should give them lower interest rates, if they take aid in the form of loans. They have no more chance of paying back a loan at low interest rates than they have with a high interest rate loan if the loan is not properly utilized to produce more wealth with which to pay it back. I do not want to spend too much time on that aspect either.

The last type of rap we have had over the last ten years started with Malta. Someone came along with this great Christian concept that we should turn the wealth of the oceans over to the newly developing nations. My God, wouldn't our fellow men think we are wonderful people? The ocean wealth is the heritage of mankind. Every nitwit in every political party in Canada is in fraud and scam from the word go right up to their necks. The wealth at the bottom of the sea under international law belongs to the coastal states, as far as they can develop it. With present technology, that means everywhere. Six sevenths of the world is ocean today under sovereign control by international law of the coastal states. Canada owns the resources halfway across the Atlantic, the Arctic and the Pacific. That is the international law. Yet civil servants who come into our political parties never even mention that the international law still applies.

Mr. Blais: How much of the high seas?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain): The high seas have nothing to do with the bottom of the sea convention, if the hon. member knows anything about it.

I want to make it very clear that Canada put forward that proposal in 1958. It was unanimously approved in committee at the Law of the Sea Convention, unanimously approved at the United Nations in 1962, and enough nations ratified the proposal to make it international law, and there it remains.

Why should nitwits in our political parties here in Canada play a part in this scam of pretending that we are going to give something from the bottom of the sea to these new nations? At present we can do it very easily by simply granting them a certain royalty, 5 per cent, 7 per cent, 8 per cent, or whatever we agree upon. If we want to give them a handout, 7 per cent of the gross might be acceptable. There is no way to ever get these nations to agree on the split. We would have to turn it over to a United Nations body, such as the International Monetary Fund or the World Bank. With their programs, it would probably be more rationally assigned.

I have mentioned three or four different types of scams: the handouts, the low interest rate scam and the scam of pretending that we are helping people when we are really trying to delude them. The newest one I have mentioned is the one where Canada will take the lead with the wealthy nations of the world toward a better North-South relationship.

We all know what that is. The Prime Minister has made up his mind what he is going to do. He wants to go out with something good. He has failed with every other thing. He has failed on his constitutional gambits. He has failed on his energy gambits. He is not able to do anything on the economic side, so he has to pretend that he is leading the world to higher and better things. Whenever you try to persuade nations such as Britain, France, Germany, Japan and the United States to join together in a helpful procedure for the newly developing nations, boy, that is real pretence. There is only one way you get things through these countries sensibly and that is to help them make more money first so they can do without the handouts.

The proposals I want to put forward all have precedents. When Malayasia wanted a handout to fight communism in 1958, what we did was to clear the land in ten acre jungle lots, plant red rubber trees and pay the people directly wages of $70 a month. When the rubber trees came into production and they were able to pay for running their operations and looking after their families, we asked, as Canadians, for a 15 per cent return. We were paid back in three years.

If we can do this type of thing for Malayasia without getting rid of interest rates, and stop communist insurgency by letting people own their land, they will never become communist. Why can we not use the same rules for Canadians?

Canada took the lead in 1959 and then in 1961 on another project. Instead of handouts, we set up an international program through the United Nations called the world food program, under which were not authorized handouts except in cases of famine or emergency. Today we are beginning the twentieth year of that program. There is no program in the whole of the United Nations working more successfully and achieving more good than this one. Ninety per cent of the billions of dollars we have raised and given to this program has been spent in constructive enterprises, and only 10 per cent has gone to handouts for emergencies. There are precedents to do things in a constructive way so that everyone benefits.

Because my time has just about run out, I want to plead with this Parliament to start putting proposals forward in the hope that in its desperation the government will accept a few of these precedents and begin to apply this type of constructiveness, aimed not only at our own economic problems but to realize that we will help ourselves if we help the other fellow first.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, Canada today is in a crisis of confusion. We are squandering our government resources, our people resources, our natural resources and our intellectual resources. We are even in the process of squandering a heritage of freedom by destroying a process of common law and a parliamentary form of government that has at least protected our liberty and freedom down through the ages when other forms have failed.

In the past, all emerging and growing societies have given priority to their economies, for it is only with a disciplined, well-managed economic base that the material needs and social wants of man can be provided. Surely the lessons of the Soviet bloc countries, with their state-owned and controlled economies, massive police forces and armies, are there as warnings to us. Surely the economic crises of the welfare states that the NDP have been giving to us as examples of what they would like to see in Canada are a warning that we should not ignore.

Today in Canada we have a gang of socialists marauding under the cloak of the Liberal Party of Canada, repeating the mistakes of the past and of contemporary history. One can only conclude that the screwed up priorities, the mismanagement of this country's economy, the squandering of our resources is deliberate, with the intent of removing any sense of freedom and incentive from our economy, all in the name of an egalitarian welfare state where men will live under a totally structured economy.

Man was not born equal, and in egalitarian societies where men are forced to live as equals, they are not free. When we lose the essential elements of a free economy, as we are doing in Canada today, we lose the basic foundation of our freedom. With the continual emphasis on structure rather than behaviour in the legislation that is being tabled in this House by this government, we are chopping down the tree that feeds the roots of our freedom and of a free economy.

I do not believe that this drift to economic and social oblivion has to be inevitable. We should turn our considerable talents and energies to the many alternatives that are available to us. First, we should take advantage of the lessons of history that are in the Laffer curve and we should deliver fiscal politics that will once again spark the energy, ingenuity and talent that is now lying dormant within our Canadian people. It is the collective attitude of the nation's people which is the ingredient that builds or destroys a nation. We should manage our future, which means forward planning. Herein I agree with the NDP. It means forward planning and budgeting of our people and our resources. However, what do we have today?

Today the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) stood up here and gave to us his industrial strategy which was just a tangled web of microprograms and activities within one department. In no way can we deliver ourselves today from our microproblems. What this country needs is sound, fundamental fiscal policies. History tells us what we must do. History is pleading with us not to repeat the mistakes of the past. What is our Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) doing in Gabon when the great national crisis of today could be solved with a sound fundamental fiscal policy? He should be here preparing his budget for October.

Today we have deliberately delayed the many megaprojects that could deliver this country to energy self-sufficiency by the year 1990. What are we going to do with this delay? If we could reach energy self-sufficiency by 1990, that would be the greatest gift we could give to the Third World, removing our international demands for energy from the rest of the world. If we could look after our own needs at home, that energy would be available for others. Here we have tied up all of these megaprojects and are backing them up behind a dam. It is my guess that this government is going to let them all go at once, creating the most massive shortage of trades people, the most massive shortage of labour, shortage of steel, shortage of transportation, and I do not see one shred of planning in the delivery of the great opportunities that are ahead of us in this country. Not one shred of planning did I hear about today from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

We in this country are critically short of tradespeople and people with trade skills. This country historically has been drawing them from the countries and schools of Europe. Whenever we needed them, we brought them over on immigration programs. Today those countries need those skilled tradespeople themselves so they are not available to us. We have known this crisis has been coming for the last decade, but where have we put in place educational programs to deliver the trade and skill needs that this country requires in time for the demand that is shortly ahead of us if we ever are going to get these megaprojects under way? Can you imagine what $1.2 billion spent in trade education would do for this country and the Third World instead of a string of broken down gas stations across this country?

My colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) pointed out that a co-ordinated approach was in place in the United States to deal with the inflationary pressures within that country. It is important, in addition to recognizing the co-ordinated approach in the United States, to recognize that we need something more for our basic economic structure which, although once similar to the United States, is no longer so.

We have an additional challenge over and above the co-ordinated approach of the United States. For instance, in Canada we borrow on a short-term basis with floating interest rates that are at a crisis level, and I guess will keep going up until we have strangled all the discretionary spending there is out of our economy.

Homes that should be financed on a 20-year basis are now on a one-year and five-year term, with interest incentives that have kept people rolling them over on a year to year basis, thinking, hoping and praying that interest rates will drop. Only short term and demand money is available to the small and medium-size enterprise sector of Canada, with terrible pressure being exerted on any attempt to improve productivity in those sectors.

In the United States, on the other hand, long-term money at lower interest rates is available for long-term purposes, such as new and more productive plants and new productive capacity. We do not have that edge available to us in Canada, particularly for the small and medium-enterprise sector. In this area, our financial structure is different and it should not, in my opinion, be blindly following the interest rate monetarist lead of the United States. We have a different need entirely.

For over three years there has been an initiative for long, low, long-term interest rates on the bureaucratic merry-go-round between the Department of Finance, and the Department of Insurance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Powerful establishment interests have all but smothered this private sector initiative that would loosen up all the savings my colleague from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) was talking about that are now dammed up in the pension funds, RRSPs and tax shelters of Canada. All those funds need is a covenant of guarantee in order to be released on a 20 and even 30-year-term basis at 0.3 and 0.4 points under prime.

In July 1980 I asked the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce what he was doing to get this initiative out of the tangled web of bureaucracy of the federal government. I remind you it has been there for some three years. That initiative has been denied to the private sector of Canada. This is something that members on both sides of the House should be concerned about and should address.

We have examples of banks lending long-term money in Canada to specified projects at rates well below prime and on a long-term basis. If banks have surplus funds to lend on a preferred long-term basis to some projects, why do we not examine why that is and why it is not available to other good, solid, secure activities in the Canadian market? Why are we so selective? That is the question I ask. The interest rate problem in Canada has and is aggravating our productivity factor. Both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance know that the only way we can climb out of this national, even world, dilemma is by improving our productivity. Yet the interest rate policies of this government are deliberately working against that important need.

Our productivity in the last year has dropped 1.4 per cent. Some of us in this House do not even understand what productivity is, for I heard the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) needling my colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel, regarding the pride shown in having created 300,000 new jobs in Canada. Not one of those jobs is in an area which creates wealth. It is only jobs which are in the process of adding to the value of goods that can carry the payrolls of those not involved in that economic process. In other words, 300,000 jobs are not productive jobs; the same work and goods could be produced in Canada with 300,000 fewer people. That is the burden that government policy is putting on those who do true-value work in this country.

There are games being played that I do not understand. For instance, the federal government is a dominant factor in issuing extendable bonds. They talk about their bonds bearing 16 per cent interest for three years. Those bonds now have an extension for a further ten years at a higher rate of interest. The budget will show the lower rate of interest as the cost of financing, but nowhere in the projections is it reflected what the higher cost down the road will be. These are half-truths and games which we do not need any more in this country if we are going to address the serious problems that should be dealt with on a truthful, factual and thinking basis.

The Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada are correct in saying that higher interest rates can control inflation. As I said during question period today, it is correct to conclude that government policy is to squeeze the public until there is no discretionary spending left. We heard the Prime Minister's answer to my question today. He does not have the slightest bit of consideration for those people in this country who have put in their work, done their jobs, are in retirement but have absolutely no discretionary spending.

Today all Canadian business in the general stream of commerce is hooked on the short-term changing interest rates which create havoc with our productive capacity and costs, and benefit only the paper pushers and the banks. There is little if any reward left in Canada for those who create jobs and maintain payrolls. All the rewards go to the developers, the industrial landlords, the banks, the chartered accountants, the lawyers—the paper pushers. The guy who has to manage, has to balance things, has his guarantee on the line, risks his home and his lifetime of work, is almost at the point, if not at the point, of no return. There are very serious complications and a lack of incentive today for those capable of managing and creating productive units. In fact, in my opinion, this is rapidly becoming a national crisis.

Labour laws today allow secondary picketing.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Huntington: You bet they do, and there is an inability to adjust to production costs and to market realities with our swinging interest rates. All of these things are creating an impossible situation, even to the point where a non-productive and unsuitable person can hardly be removed from a payroll today.

This government refuses to give the job-creating sector tax points for research and development incentives. Their servants continue to insist that innovators come cap in hand to the bureaucrats who say yea or nay to these projects. Some of them have just too much pride, and most risk takers in the small and medium enterprise sector are just too busy to find the time for this cap-in-hand process. The rules of the game in business are being constantly changed and this damages any chance of improving productivity levels. Intervention in structure is the order of the day of this government. Only the oligopolies, the large multinational corporations and the large corporate entities, have the time, the resources and the payroll ability to play the game the government asks of the economic community. The SME sector is really out to lunch.

I would like for a moment to turn to the NDP rump of the Liberal socialist party of Canada with its phony, negative whining that is motivated, in my opinion, by envy and bitterness, for its members have attacked every significant initiative in this country that is there and waiting to resolve our unemployment and energy problems.

They demand more and more of the system at large, but hinder the very process of providing the wealth needed to improve the social benefits of this welfare society. They mouth shallow platitudes to the small business sector when their masters are the big union bosses who are interested only in the maximum grab from the economy for a minority of the work force. They call for wealth distribution while living off the avails of big Liberal monopolies. In my opinion, members of the NDP speak with a political forked tongue.

Earlier I touched on the fact that our structure is different from that of the U.S., and I discussed the energy factor there. I have discussed the fact that the government is involved in extendable bonds which place an unfair burden and an advantage in the marketplace, and disturb and distort our interest rate structure. The government does not show the cost of the future rate and it takes an advantage away from other forces in the market which might want to attract that capital. In my opinion, these tricky games make it most difficult for the rest of the business community to have a fair share and a place.

This policy is leading to a reduction in wealth and a destruction of the Canadian dream. It can only lead to state control of our economy. When that happens, when that day comes, I suggest that anybody hearing this plea in this chasm should understand that their very basic freedoms are threatened. There is no answer to be found in a welfare state and Sweden is an example of it. We are falling into the same economic trap and dilemma they have already developed for themselves. Please, can we not learn from this?

One thing we might do which would resolve our interest rate problem, our low Canadian dollar problem and our productivity problem would be to seriously study putting between $50 billion and $70 billion into our international monetary fund as a reserve. In that way our interest rates would come down, our dollar value would go up and our cost of living would come down.

One might say that is a lot of money. I tell you it is a pittance compared to what the present policy has robbed from the pension funds, the savings plans and the savings of individuals throughout Canada. I would urge the government to perhaps seek co-operation from this side in taking a very serious look at the delivery of a good, sizeable and usable reserve which would give stability to our interest rates and our international exchange rates.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking in favour of this motion today. The last sentence asks the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to introduce a budget with corrective measures before July 1 or resign. I fully support that.

Our present Minister of Finance has been in Liberal cabinets longer than any of his colleagues, so he is actually more responsible than they for blank-cheque government. He was there, right at the start, for the introduction of blank-cheque government, uncontrolled spending and changing the rules so that there is no longer parliamentary control over expenditures. After listening to some of the Liberals speak today, I suggest they spend a little more time reading the report of the Auditor General and the report of the Lambert commission on how this Liberal government has been running the country and controlling expenditures. Perhaps the term "cutback" is not correct. It really should be eliminating waste and mismanagement within government, and there has been no attempt by this government to get together with the provinces to eliminate duplication and to try to find ways and means to improve control over our expenditures.

There are many examples around us. For example, on the Campeau project over in Hull there was an over-expenditure of $300 million. That is just one little example. Another one comes to mind; the UIC fraud squad was disbanded a number of years ago because the things that squad was coming up with were embarrassing to the Liberal government. That squad was disbanded. It would have exposed fraud costing about $100 million a year. Hon. members opposite did not impress me at all with any of the speeches they made this afternoon.

I am going to speak about some of the untruths of hon. members opposite and point out once again that their word means absolutely nothing. That is old hat, but I will refer to just a couple of points. The Liberals were going to hold increases in government spending under the growth of the gross national product. They have absolutely no intention of doing any such thing. There was to be an industrial strategy, job creation and increased Canadian ownership. Canadian ownership has just been increased through the purchase of Petrofina and by sending $1 billion to Belgium and $1 million to a Swiss bank to pay for the transaction.

My friend, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), spoke about establishing a fund to help small businesses facing high interest rates. Just imagine if that $1 billion had been put to that use instead of being sent into the Belgian economy!

Prior to the last election, the Liberals stated that they would achieve energy security at a fair price. I will go into some detail on that in a moment. That statement is absolute nonsense. There was the promise that gas increases would be kept below 18 cents a gallon, and we now find that the price is increasing as much as 60 cents a gallon. That is another broken promise. The Liberals promised to ensure prosperity through economic growth in every region. Then they introduced the NEP, which is killing economic growth in Canada.

The Liberals promised to help first those who need assistance. I am our spokesman on veterans' pensions, and I know the problems of veterans respecting the length of time it takes to process applications and the problems the widows of veterans are having. I know the serious problems rail pensioners are having. This government is doing absolutely nothing about those problems.

These problems have been with us for years, and this government refuses to deal with them. Some rail pensioners receive increases of $4 a year. We get the runaround from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who say they will help those who need assistance.

This is not the only government in the world which has not controlled expenditures or seen that money is spent properly. Almost every government in the world is the same in this respect. There have been only four since 1948 which have operated in a responsible manner. The government with the best record of all was the Diefenbaker government between 1957 and 1963. That government was not a blank-cheque government. It was composed of a group of responsible men who saw that we received proper value for our tax dollars, and the inflation rate was held to 1.2 per cent. When the Liberals came into power in 1963, they took the lid off. Mr. Pearson was going to be a big, tough prime minister with respect to a dock workers strike. He was going to show them. He gave the dock workers a huge increase instead of giving them a guarantee of job security which they wanted. Anyone can look at a graph and see that that is when spending took off, and it has never stopped.

This afternoon I picked up an article in The Toronto Sun.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: Our country is in a disgraceful situation. This article quotes statistics. The Liberals are laughing. They do not like any newspaper which continually exposes this fraudulent government and its mismanagement. The article reads in part as follows:

> Metro's eviction rate is soaring and sheriff's offices face hotted-up hostility in their struggle to keep abreast of the growing workload.
> Evictions to April 30 are up 10 per cent over last year, when the rate jumped 28.5 per cent from 1979.

I say to the two laughing frontbenchers opposite that that means that thousands of Canadians are being evicted from their homes. When we were in government, we introduced a mortgage credit plan for home owners which would have assisted them greatly, and we would not have had as many evictions today. However, the New Democratic Party and the Liberals were violently opposed to any assistance for home owners. The article goes on to say the following:

> Over all, evictions of residential and commercial tenants and evictions resulting from foreclosed mortgages have risen an awesome 23 per cent from the 971 recorded in 1976, the year after Ontario's rent controls were introduced.
> Boris Kashuba, deputy sheriff in charge of evictions for York district, yesterday said his eight men are encountering "a more hostile, militant mood" from the public.

I guess they are, with these disgraceful interest rates this government is supposed to be reducing. I remember the slick Liberal television commercials during the last election campaign. They were going to reduce high interest rates. Of course, they had absolutely no intention of doing any such thing. This article goes on to say the following:

> There were 3,279 evictions last year in Metro compared to 2,550 in 1979.

The sheriff's people are going into suburban areas because of foreclosures on homes whose owners have given up the battle to meet mortgage payments. The article goes on:

> Tenants faced with rental arrears are borrowing the money to keep their landlords satisfied because they fear they won't be able to find alternative accommodation.

That is a national disgrace in a country like Canada. It is a national disgrace that people are being booted out of their homes right and left. The Liberal party lied in the last election campaign on television about its intention to lower interest rates. Now that they are in power, they do not do anything about this at all, and they have no intention of ever doing anything about it.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) made a ridiculous speech in Winnipeg a week or so ago. He pointed out that the National Energy Program is not primarily an employment program but that it will stimulate employment. What a ridiculous and untrue statement!

We have figures from the oil industry showing that the NEP will cost 60,000 jobs. More than 60,000 jobs may be lost by mid-summer due to the increasing number of oil and gas rigs leaving Canada, the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors has stated. Stan Jones, the executive director of the association, has said that the 50 per cent decline in the number of rigs drilling for oil and gas during the past year has surpassed the worst predictions of that association. Jones blamed the federal government's National Energy Program and its failure to reach an oil pricing agreement with Alberta for creating the dramatic slump in the oil industry.

I do not know why they have not been able to reach an agreement. If I were involved in those negotiations, I would have no hesitation in paying Saskatchewan and Alberta $35 a barrel. I would rather pay them $35 a barrel than pay $50 a barrel to Mexico. Mexican oil is of poor quality. We have to add Canadian oil to bring it up to a proper standard. I would rather pay Alberta and Saskatchewan $35 a barrel than send $45 to the rich OPEC countries to make them richer. The ridiculous NEP does not make any sense at all.

Mr. Jones went on to say that the slowdown threatens to eliminate more than 60,000 jobs on the oil fields and across Canada by midsummer. "In little less than six months the National Energy Program has effectively dismantled more than half of the most dynamic industry in Canada," Jones said.

And that is what the Liberals call progress and creating jobs and self-sufficiency. We are not going to become self-sufficient at all. By 1990, under the government's program, we are going to be sending $182 billion more out of the country to buy imported oil. We are only to be 55 per cent self-sufficient. Mr. Jones went on to say that there were 370 drilling rigs working in Canada last May compared with 177 this year, and that most of the rigs have been moved or auctioned off in the U.S.

I do not think the Liberals really understand whose economy they are trying to help. They have certainly been of welcome assistance to the United States.

Here is a great article out of Denver, Colorado. It reads:

Many Canadian based oil companies are setting up operations in the United States because of higher profits.

Profit is not a dirty word in the United States but this government, under its policy of cutting down the cash flow of these small Canadian firms, is making it impossible for them to exist, and that is why they are getting out of this country. The article goes on:

Oil industry sources say that in the last year, more than 100 Canadian companies, mostly from Calgary and Edmonton with a few from Vancouver and Toronto, have established or are planning to establish U.S. offices.

For many of these Canadian companies, the Rocky Mountain states are their first choice.

About 80 of the 100 companies represented at a recent energy conference in Denver were based in Canada, says Dave Lytle, a Canadian oilman recently transferred from Edmonton.

Canadian oil company executives here say they can make up to 10 times more profit from a U.S. oil well.

And when they are making lots of profits they are spending more, paying the shareholders more, and Liberals from Ontario and Quebec had better do a little close checking too of how it is affecting them because from 42 cents to 47 cents of every dollar spent in the oil industry is spent in Ontario, so they are really going to get walloped very sharply, probably in the Sarnia area. The article goes on:

By contrast, they say U.S. oilmen are praising president Reagan. U.S. drilling and new petroleum discovery rates are at a record high and U.S. oil imports have dropped to their lowest level since 1975.

And what are we doing? We are importing more oil under this ridiculous National Energy Program. There is $500,000 an hour leaving this country for Mexico, Venezuela and the OPEC countries to import oil, but the government will not sit down and make a sensible agreement with Alberta and Saskatchewan. Reading further, it is stated that:

U.S. oilmen welcome the arrival of the Canadians although some of them are unhappy with Ottawa's Canadianization policies.

"We need the drilling rigs, the exploration capital and Canadian expertise," says one U.S. oilman.

Well, they can thank the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Labour, the cabinet and all the rest of them for assisting the United States economy and helping the United States to achieve self-sufficiency.

I mentioned earlier the Liberal promises to look after the underprivileged and all the rest. I am glad that the Minister of Labour is here today because we have had one exchange on what is going to happen to the rail pensioners in Canada. There seems to be considerable confusion between the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour as to who is responsible for showing some leadership in assisting these people who have really been getting the runaround. A lot of people get the runaround from government. In many cases it is not intentional, but in this case it has gone beyond any reasonable explanation and somebody is going to have to take the initiative. I hope the Minister of Labour will do so. I would just quote to him what some of these pensioners are receiving. Some receive $115 a month, others receive $178, $212, or $224 a month, and they have been trying for years to get a few dollars more and some kind of indexing system.

The Minister of Labour has written letters to different unions to say that he has the matter under study, that he recognizes there is a problem and he is going to be doing something about it. That is what it sounds like in his letters, but when I asked him yesterday in the House about this, he started talking about the Hall report. Well, that report is about five or six years old, and the first of these letters that he wrote to the unions was in May of 1980 and nothing has been done since. They are supposed to be able to have the unions bargain for them, but they cannot because management will not recognize the unions as bargaining agents for the pensioners and we are just going around and around in a big circle. So I hope the minister is present at this committee on Tuesday morning so that we can discuss this in a little more detail, and I hope he will give me some kind of assurance that he will take a close look at this particular problem because it is a real problem. Those who have retired from about 1977 onwards are really not too badly off but prior to that the pensions they receive are absolutely ridiculous.

I just want to comment further on statements on interest rates by the Liberals when they were in opposition. These statements are just unbelievable, especially from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) who said he was going to do something about interest rates and that he would resign if they did not come down. In fact, they have gone up about eight points since he made that statement. And he pointed out:

—because of the harmful effects of high interest rates on consumers, businessmen, especially small businessmen, and the entire economy, there should be an urgent study by the finance committee, where the governor of the bank would come, and the minister of finance—

Well, when we were in government, we established such a committee and they were only half way through their work when we were defeated in the House of Commons by a motion presented by the NDP saying nothing was being done about interest rates. And at that time the Governor of the Bank of Canada was one of the next witnesses to appear.

This is the sort of thing you get from the NDP. One of their spokesmen today was criticising our motion. They have a lot of nerve criticizing our motion or anything we do considering the devious manner in which they operate in and out of the House of Commons. We could very well have found a number of solutions to this problem had that committee been allowed to carry on, and we have asked repeatedly that it be established once again, but the Liberals refused to do anything about it. They have made their point perfectly clear: we are going to have to live with this interest rate problem because they have no intention of doing anything about it. They will tell you they are going to do something about it during an election but once they get in, that is the finish.

Then this great Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce went on to say to the Minister of Finance:

> Mr. Minister, I want to point out to you that your high interest rate policy would slow down the economy: it will mean the loss of thousands of jobs; it will mean increases in the cost of living. It will probably bring the housing and construction industry to a halt, with thousands of jobs being lost in those sectors.

Well, what is he doing about it? He is not doing anything at all.

I see I have one minute left, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure this debate will be brought to a dramatic conclusion by one of the better debaters in the House of Commons, namely, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether we had found a new speaker on the floor who was announcing the next speaker in this debate. However, this is a very serious motion we have before us today and I would just like to remind everyone of the following words in the motion:

> That this House condemns the government's barren economic policies, which are destroying the stability, productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy;

That is the first element, and it is a threefold element. The motion terminates by urging the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to introduce a budget with corrective measures before July 1, 1981, or resign.

● (1640)

I suspect the Minister of Finance would be unable to devise the required corrective measures, unless he examined more closely the National Energy Program announced with his previous budget. It was really the pith and substance of the budget, since the budget itself contained very little of a budgetary nature.

What distresses me most in the present circumstances is the unthinking manner in which the government makes use of our national resources, on the grounds that it knows better how to dispose of the national wealth than those who earn it. The wages of wanton extravagance designed to buy voter support are the economic dilemma in which we find ourselves today. Rather than designing an intelligent program to make the country a worthy legacy for generations to come, the government embarked upon a short-term desire to maintain itself in power. It uses the hard-earned wealth of taxpayers to buy their support. I consider it tragic, pitiful, distressing, shameful and verging on treasonous and treacherous for a government to abuse the mandate granted to it in January, 1980.

Our resource base is almost limitless. What policies do we see the government creating to develop the resource base so that we could hand over a flourishing economy to those generations to follow? I could think of two or three examples, but one of the most fabulous—and I use that word in its real meaning—is the coal resources of the Rocky Mountains. Of course, the tar sands and heavy oils are other examples. The government is doing everything to destroy initiative and to prevent the accumulation of individual initiative to bring those resources on stream.

The government believes it can do it better. How does it go about it? It charges Canadians who drive automobiles an extra .8 of a cent per litre or 3.5 cents per gallon in order to buy an enterprise and send $1.5 billion of motorists' funds out of the country. Those who heat by oil, find their heating costs have risen by the same amount. This is being done to acquire an enterprise based offshore, not to produce more energy. It is only to obtain ownership of a resource which has already been found by somebody else. Why is that $1.5 billion not being used to take us closer to energy self-sufficiency?

The government refuses or is possibly incapable of devising a program which meets the legitimate needs of the provinces with resources and at the same time the legitimate need of the central authority for funds for other purposes. It is really the destruction of individual initiative which I deplore so much. No one in the world, certainly no upstanding Canadian, would regret the effort the government has taken to look after the needy, but why must the government look after those who are not in need? There is no need to destroy initiative by robbing Canadians to meet needs which do not exist. We are all prepared to share what we have in order to help those who are unfortunate, but I see no point in contributing a cent to a pension for an E. P. Taylor or even a pension for myself. I am prepared to stand on my own feet. I have had good fortune. I have experienced good health throughout my life and hopefully have done an honourable day's work every day I worked, for which I was compensated. I have been able to look after myself and my future. Why should they rob from me to pay me after I can no longer work? This is stupid nonsense. We can help those people who were mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), those railroad pensioners who are in need. We are prepared to do that, but the government has overspent to the point of profligacy. I cannot think of a stronger word than that.

If time permits, I would like to cite a few figures and to offer a few ideas because the government has shown in its performance that it has none of its own except to tax and to invent nonsensical projects which do nothing for productivity. Every day the government boasts about the number of jobs it has created. It has not created jobs except those in the public service, and those it has created in plenty. I wonder what is the productivity of the public service at the present time. It used to be good. I say that with pride. I do not think it is as great as it was.

There has been no attempt to curb credit. The whole design of the government is to destroy the initiative of the individual to work and to invest.

If it is true, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been saying for these last two or three days when he has been attacked about the high interest rates, that there is more spending now than there ever was before, there is spending now because of the uncertainties of the future. That is why. The uncertainty is causing this spending. There are surplus funds in people's pockets. There is no question about that. However, they are spending it wantonly. They are not saving or investing. They are not prepared to stand on their own feet because this government has destroyed that incentive which had inspired my father and mother.

Mr. Blais: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was wondering if the hon. gentleman who has just made a statement relating to the inability of Canadians to save would address the phenomenon of Canadians saving at a rate which is twice that of the United States.

Mr. Taylor: That is not a point of order.

An hon. Member: Good fact, though; interesting, isn't it?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): During the last three or four days we have been talking about inflation and interest rates. Bankruptcies are a tragedy. It is a family tragedy and an individual tragedy when a man who has put his heart and soul, his energy, and all his capital into a project finds that with the requirement to borrow further funds he is faced with insuperable charges and that therefore either his house has to go, his farm has to go, or his equipment has to go. Sometimes his wife even deserts him. That is also sad.

An hon. Member: Save a lot of money that way!

An hon. Member: Don't believe it!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The breakup of the family unit as a result of these stressful situations brought about by inflation which this government has done nothing to control, and excessive rates, makes me wonder why we should be so ready, under an enterprise known as the Export Development Corporation, the EDC, to provide favourable, advantageous rates of borrowing to foreign governments or companies provided that they spend those funds in this country. I think particularly of shipbuilding.

In a speech about two or three years ago, I mentioned the number of ships built for other countries. I think the figure was something like 30 in five years. They had been built for such countries as Poland, Argentina and France. I understand that a French ship was built not very long ago. Why are we lending these funds to foreign countries when we might just as easily lend them to our own citizens to build our own merchant marine? I just do not understand this. Notwithstanding its name, why should the EDC not provide these credits to Canadian citizens so that we might further their purposes within Canada?

Two days ago, on May 19, I was impressed when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) offered two or three suggestions as to what this government might do—

An hon. Member: We want Jarvis!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —in a global manner to assist those who are in trouble because of the inflation or high interest rates. When the Conservative government was in power, we, of course, did introduce those features in the mortgage interest deductibility plan and also on the energy side. For example, it put a stop to the requirement to pay the added tax which was to be imposed on heating oil. This government has done nothing like that. It seems as though suggestions which come from this side of the House are, ipso facto, untouchable. They should not even be examined.

One of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was to make governmental provision for loans at a reasonable rate on condition. For example, if the purpose of the loan were to buy a house, if that house were sold at a vast profit within two or three years, then the capital gain on the investment would be shared 50-50 with the government. I think that makes a good deal of sense.

I have one further suggestion to make, and it is not new. It was put in practice at a time which only a few people in this House can remember. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would certainly remember it. I remember those days, too, as a teenager, when farms were being closed down and farmers were having to leave their land and go somewhere to find relief, the dough. It was a shameful time. I think there is still a lesson to be learned from that period which we might consider. In its briefest terms, it would consist of this: there would be a moratorium on the repayment of capital borrowing. The interest would be repayable. However, there would be a moratorium on capital borrowing. To my way of thinking, this would have two very important effects. It would mean that the money that was out would be earning its keep. The rent on it, even at 20 per cent, could be faced. On the other hand, the repayment of capital would be deferred and the life of the loan would be correspondingly extended at the far end until the interest rates had come down and a refinancing could be arranged.

Besides the advantage to the borrower, the other advantage is that it would take a great deal of capital out of circulation because as capital is returned to the lender, it would be loaned out again. However, if some of that capital could be withdrawn from circulation, then I think the effect on inflation would be catastrophic. The inflation rate would drop because the extent of capital available for borrowing would be reduced by an immeasurable amount. I cannot even conceive the amount.

The one thing which would have to be examined very carefully in putting forward this notion would be the bureaucracy required to examine cases of requests for the moratorium. As I say, it would have to be reviewed, for instance, every six months or every year so that advantage would not be taken of borrowers. The dual advantage of having the borrower able to pay something, to stand on his own feet, pay the interest, and at the same time withdraw capital from circulation would have a very important and depressive effect on the inflation rate. That is one suggestion I put out to the government for its consideration.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock!

An hon. Member: We want Jarvis!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired, and accordingly the House stands adjourned to Monday at two o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE LATE DAVID LEWIS

TRIBUTES TO FORMER LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is the sad task of Parliament today to pay tribute to the memory of one of its most distinguished former members. The passing of David Lewis has deprived Canada of a man of passionate commitment, a man of ideas and conscience, a brilliant and eloquent person, a man who devoted the whole of his adult life to the service of others.

Canada's loss is felt nowhere more keenly than here in Parliament, a place he loved and honoured. It was here, as Leader of the New Democratic Party, that he found the fullest scope for the expression of his ideals and idealism. It was here that he was able to speak to Canadians, day in and day out, about social and economic justice, about the gap between what Canada was and could become, about the primary duty of Parliament to help and protect those who could not protect themselves.

By giving expression to his own profound belief that political action is the noblest and most effective means of achieving social change, he also lent added dignity and respect to the profession of politics, and to the Canadian political process.

Because he became best known to Canadians during his tenure as Leader of the New Democratic Party, it is sometimes forgotten that he was a political activist in the cause of social democracy for some forty-four years of his life.

His was a life-long commitment, played out principally away from the limelight of the national leadership, in the hard-slogging and frugal years organizing, travelling, and speaking in every part of Canada.

It was that commitment which gave power and forcefulness to his public performance. He was not one to play at politics for a time while waiting for more lucrative doors to open. He gave his life to politics, as his chosen way of giving his life to his country and its people.

David Lewis was a man in whom social idealism was combined with the most practical of political skills. He excelled as a strategist and orator, as a campaigner and organizer.

He knew every detail of the cost of every victory he won, because he had paid that cost in his own hard work.

He was a proud Canadian, imbued with the sense of wonder of one who was not born in this country. He both shamed and inspired many native-born Canadians by learning not just one of our official languages, but both of them, and he spoke them fluently. That was also a sign of his commitment to Canada and to all its people.

As we mourn the passing of this dedicated human being, our sympathy goes out to his beloved wife, Sophie, and to his family. May the knowledge of the great respect he earned throughout a life of service to Canada comfort them in this time of bereavement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to associate my leader and my party with the tributes being paid to David Lewis today.

David Lewis was a person who cared. It was evident in everything he did throughout his life. He cared about people and wanted to see their hopes and aspirations met. He cared about principles and strove to uphold them in his personal and public life. He cared about Canada and returned, in full measure, the opportunities and advantages this country afforded him.

David Lewis was an ardent socialist, and this led him to a life-long association with the working people of Canada. In union halls, in mining communities, in fishing hamlets and, finally, in Parliament, he argued their cause, passionately and persuasively. He could do it because he knew them so well. He met them in their homes and wherever working people gather in this country.

David Lewis was guided by his principles. He rejected inequality and injustice wherever they occurred, and strove to banish them. In his own words, he saw democracy as a dynamic weapon in the war against poverty, prejudice, and ignorance. He had a deep and abiding belief in civil liberties, and was willing to stand up and be counted no matter what the personal and political cost.

David Lewis saw in Canada a country where the principles he espoused so strongly and the convictions he held so firmly would be embodied in the law and life of the land. He never doubted that that would come to pass in Canada.

As with many new members who entered the House in which he was already a veteran, I was deeply impressed by the power of his oratory, his skill in debate, and the force and conviction with which he participated in the work of this chamber. It was indeed an inspiration to a new member to listen to both our official languages being used in a manner both persuasive and effective, and indeed it was a challenge to all of us to try to improve our performance.

David Lewis was a great parliamentarian and a great Canadian. His work in this House and elsewhere is his lasting legacy to Canada. We join with all members in expressing our sorrow at his passing, and our sympathy to his family.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, we are most grateful to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). Indeed, we are most grateful to the House for taking these few moments to remember the life and work of our friend whom we have lost, David Lewis.

I express that gratitude on behalf of our leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), who will be interrupting his mission in Central America to be here tomorrow for the funeral service. I express it on behalf of all the members of our caucus and all our members and supporters across the country. In particular, however, I want to express appreciation on behalf of the members of David Lewis's family. I am grateful to both of those who preceded me for mentioning them.

We are all aware of David Lewis's public life. We are particularly aware of the crowning achievement of that life in the years that he spent as a leader in this House. What is perhaps not so generally known is that he was a warm and devoted family man. He was extremely happy to be with his wife Sophie, his four children, Stephen, Michael, Janet and Nina, with their spouses, with his six grandchildren, his sister Doris and her two children. I am sure it will mean much to all of them that the sympathy of this House has been expressed today by the Deputy Prime Minister and by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who indeed were speaking on behalf of all of us.

We welcome the tributes that have been paid to the way in which David Lewis lived his life. We all know what a brilliant person he was, that he could have been a success in anything to which he turned his hand, but he believed so deeply in the right of common people to have a better life that he literally gave his life in their service in the political movement which he thought was best fitted to do just that.

As a party, we owe a debt to him for the organizational skills that he used to make our movement an effective force in the country. I believe the country is better off for there being the kind of democracy we have today, much of which is due to the impression made by our former leader. It is particularly fitting that this man who, as the Deputy Prime Minister said, spent many decades behind the scenes, was here as our party's leader during a couple of years when much of what he believed in was accomplished.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, we think today of the loss the family has sustained, we think of the loss that our movement and our country have sustained, but we are also conscious of the fact that David Lewis was one who lived life in the very best way. Indeed, we are happy today, though we mourn his passing, to celebrate a life well lived.

HOUSING

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF MORTGAGE TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Housing is a basic necessity, and home ownership is fundamental to the economic and social stability of our Canadian society. Whereas in one Canadian city alone evictions have risen by an amazing 237 per cent since 1976, and whereas 3,279 families in Toronto have been literally booted out of their homes as a direct result of the Liberal government's disgraceful high interest rate policies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House instruct the government to implement immediately the Conservative party's home mortgage interest deductibility program, and also have the Finance Committee resume its hearings aimed at solving and eliminating the Liberals' high interest rate policy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

TAX ON GAS EXPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43.

Whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), in a speech in Vancouver on May 22, 1981, indicated that the National Energy Program is "for all Canadians", and "the energy problems . . . are a burden we must all bear"; and whereas the excise tax on gas is aimed directly at Alberta and B.C. where it will take thousands of dollars out of the pockets of the rank and file westerner where it will have its greatest impact, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House demand that the said minister make good his words by immediately withdrawing the excise tax on gas, otherwise his speech will be just another example of "don't believe a word I say".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HALIFAX AIRPORT—INSTALLATION OF SERVICE EQUIPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, in view of the great public and governmental concern over safety in air travel, and in view of the fact there has been in storage since June, 1980, at the Halifax international airport, automatic terminal information service equipment, and that the immediate installation of such flight safety equipment should receive top priority but has not, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Transport take immediate steps to inquire why this equipment has not been installed, and to direct departmental officials to remedy this situation immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION TO SETTLE DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent matter.

Considering that Quebecers have been deprived of information for eight months, just as English Canadians are every now and then, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Communications intervene forthwith so that the labour disputes affecting the CBC French network will be settled as soon as possible and in all fairness to its journalists and its technicians.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

IMPROVEMENT OF SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise, as is my privilege, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the redress of a grievance which has befallen thousands of Canadians through no fault of their own.

Postal service is a right and not a privilege. Postal service across Canada ought to be uniform and consistent, but it is not. Thousands of Canadians are reduced to second-class status when it comes to postal service. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That Parliament request Mr. Michael Warren to ensure, as his most urgent priority as president of the newly created Post Office Crown corporation as soon as he assumes office, that all Canadians are elevated to first-class status in receiving mail.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

DISPOSAL OF RADIOACTIVE SOIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada has indicated that radioactive soil discovered last year in a Scarborough subdivision will be moved to Faraday township in Hastings county, against the wishes of the township of Faraday, the county of Hastings, the residents, the provincial MLA, and myself as the federal member of Parliament, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House request the Government of Canada to direct the AECB to dispose of this material at existing dump sites at Chalk River or Elliot Lake.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURED SCALES AND MEASURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek unanimous approval on a very important matter. The metrication program of the government requires thousands of retail outlets in Canada to convert to metric over the next number of months. This will require hundreds of millions of dollars worth of scales and other measuring devices to be purchased by these retailers. Since these purchases must be made over the next number of months, this will prohibit the sourcing of these from Canadian manufacturers and suppliers. Therefore, due to the government's metric policy we are creating jobs in foreign countries and manufacturing opportunities for foreign companies. Last week in committee the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) indicated that this is the price we have to pay for metrication.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House unanimously support the nomination of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the 1981 sell-out Canada award.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORT ON TASCHEREAU-KELLOCK COMMISSION PAPERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, the special report on the Taschereau papers will be in the hands of the government within the next few days. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges), I move:

That this House require the government to table this report within a week of its receipt by the government in its unexpurgated form as it is received from the officials to whom the task was entrusted.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON MONETARY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas in a speech in Halifax over the weekend the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) stated that there is a consensus in cabinet for regionally tailored monetary policies, whatever that might happen to mean, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the Minister of Finance be required to make a statement on motions to say whether or not this is government policy and, if so, since when has the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who is even more clueless than himself, been given the responsibility for making announcements of major changes in government monetary policy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FORESTRY

EXPORT OF UNPROCESSED LOGS FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, as a result of overcutting and poor management, the timber reserves of British Columbia are a dwindling resource. In view of the fact that some sawmills in British Columbia face serious log shortages, which will force widespread layoffs, and in view of the fact that unprocessed or semi-processed logs are still being exported from British Columbia to foreign countries, which means that jobs are being exported, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That the government tighten up regulations regarding the export of unprocessed or semi-processed logs and ensure that Canadians get the maximum number of jobs from every tree cut in our forests.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRADE

PACIFIC RIM POTENTIAL—ORGANIZATION OF TRADE FAIRS IN VANCOUVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the future of Canada lies in the west and in the Pacific Rim, in view of the fact that the recently released report of the Pacific Rim Opportunities Conference held last November in Vancouver recorded a number of important steps Canada might take in order for this country to take advantage of the tremendous potential of the Pacific Rim, and considering that some of the steps would involve the sponsoring of regular trade fairs in Vancouver, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

● (1425)

That the government accept the suggestions of the Pacific Rim Opportunities Conference and immediately take steps to organize a series of trade fairs to be held in Vancouver every two years.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, and may I welcome him back to Canada from the International Monetary Fund meetings in Gabon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: He will know that while he was away interest rates in Canada reached an historic new high and are now the highest, or next to highest, amongst the 14 largest OECD nations. Can the minister inform this House whether he was able to determine, during the IMF meetings with his fellow finance ministers, why these other countries are able to maintain lower interest rates than those in Canada, and can he tell the House whether he now has plans to implement these or any other ideas to bring down the atrociously high interest rates in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for his welcome. I assure him that I would have much preferred to have been in the House last week listening to the debate and to the comments being made about me in my absence than to be attending the meeting of the International Monetary Fund, but that was essential as part of my responsibility as Minister of Finance.

The question which the hon. member asks, Madam Speaker, is an important and very complicated one, but it is clear that interest rates in various countries vary, partly because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —of the differences in the rates of inflation, but it certainly was a common belief expressed by ministers from the OECD countries that the chief problem facing these countries in the forthcoming year is still the very deep inflationary momentum that had gained great force in every economy in that group, and one of the conclusions shared by all the countries was that we ought to maintain a non-accommodating monetary policy in the face of this still strong inflationary pressure.

PERFORMANCE OF OECD COUNTRIES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): It is too bad the minister did not find out how these other countries were able to do that with lesser interest rates. A week ago Friday the Prime Minister, while lamenting high prices announced in this House with some pride that between 1970 and 1980 Canadians were some 50 per cent better off on average. What he failed to mention was that in 1970 Canadians had the third highest living standard among the 24 OECD nations; by 1980, according to the latest OECD figures, we dropped to twelfth place and are soon going to be passed by Austria and Japan.

Can the minister explain, perhaps with the benefit of information he may have obtained from other OECD ministers in Gabon, why these ten countries have performed so much better than Canada given that all of them charge their citizens world prices for oil and, with the exception of Norway, all of them import virtually 100 per cent of their crude oil? Why is it that with Canada's tremendous advantages in terms of resources, especially oil, at least ten and perhaps a dozen countries have performed so much better than Canada over the last 12 years while we have had this same Liberal government in office?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I do not accept for a moment the statement made by the hon. member that all these other countries have performed better than Canada. In the past year Canada has created more jobs than any other industrialized country.

● (1430)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: No industrialized country, including Japan and West Germany which are often held up as examples of good economic management, achieved the same rate of growth in employment which prevailed in Canada during the past year.

REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC PLAN

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, it seems the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance cannot get their bases together. A week ago the Prime Minister said that we were so much better off. When I point out that the rest of the world has done better without our resources, the minister changes his bases again and talks about the last few months. I ask him to check the OECD figures if he disputes that.

Recognizing the minister has taken on new onerous responsibilities as chairman of the interim committee of the IMF—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The whole world is going down the tube.

Mr. Andre: —I hope he still recognizes his first responsibility is to Canada. Given record high inflation rates, record high interest rates, and that there is a way to do it better, as proven by at least 12 nations with no way near the advantages we have, will the Minister of Finance address himself to an economic policy and/or to a budget for Canada? Will he commit himself now to introducing a budget or an economic plan for Canada prior to his obligations taking him off on another global trip?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would hardly describe a journey to West Africa to attend one meeting as a global trip. It was mainly to attend that meeting; it did not involve any other visits elsewhere.

Also I remind the hon. member that I believe I am discharging my responsibilities to Canada in assuming responsibilities on behalf of Canada as part of the international community. I believe we have a very important stake in the successful operation of an international system of trade and payments.

We have a very important stake in the over-all efforts to reduce inflation. I believe the hon. member would share that view. He asked me if I intended to bring in a new economic plan or a new economic budget before I take on another global trip. The answer is no, I have no global trip in mind, but I want to forewarn members that I will have to be away in the month of June for a few days to attend a meeting of the OECD in Paris. That is not a global trip either.

IMPACT OF HIGH INTEREST RATE POLICIES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. I noticed his reference to his new international responsibilities, but one would be tempted to ask what the poor struggling Third World countries have done to deserve this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: The minister has been away for a week and the situation in Canada has become much worse during that week; 250 more home owners have lost their homes because of mortgage rates; 170 more small businessmen have gone bankrupt; 500 more personal bankruptcies have occurred. In light of these figures, and now that the minister has assumed straightening out the world's economic woes, could he tell us what he will do at home to take care of the burden of his high interest rate policies on Canadians who are losing their homes, their farms, and their businesses?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the first thing I would like to do is to be able to correct, if I had the time, all the inaccuracies the hon. member can put together in a single question, for example, the references to bankruptcies. The hon. member really knows, if she checked the facts, that the relationship between the number of business incorporations and the number of bankruptcies has not appreciably changed this year in Canada. To draw the conclusion that there has been an escalation in bankruptcies—

Mr. Andre: You stayed too long in the sun in Gabon.

Mr. MacEachen: —in the last few months really is a mistake. She talked about bankruptcies among the farming population. If she had listened to or read the speech given by my parliamentary secretary the other evening, she would recall the number of bankruptcies in the farming community. Any bankruptcy is serious, but it must be related to many other factors. If she had read the speech, she would have realized that the increase in the number of bankruptcies compared to the very large number of Ontario farmers is not very great. Any one is serious, but the increase is not in the terms the hon. member mentioned.

If we are to have a debate, as we ought to have every day about the economy, there is no point in trying to exaggerate the difficulties as the hon. member is doing. She asked me what I would like to do. I would like to have the time to correct all the inaccuracies she put before the House.

INCREASE IN MORTGAGE COSTS FOR HOME OWNERS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I know the minister would like us to believe that there are no bankruptcies in Canada, but if he would get out across Canada and talk to people, as I advised him more than a week ago, he would really find out what is happening. In the meantime, I refer him to a statement of one of his aides which came out of his office while he was away, about what would be done for home owners in the face of staggering mortgage rates. It was said:

> It may be uncomfortable for them, but it is not the end of the world. People faced with higher monthly mortgage payments will simply have to put money earmarked for a new car or a vacation into housing.

This is what the minister's aide said. What about the thousands of Canadians who have not put money aside for a new car or a vacation? What about Canadians who have no extra money at all? What about Canadians for whom higher mortgages rates are not only uncomfortable but are downright impossible?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member has taken a more responsible line in this particular question, as she attempted to relate the additional burdens of higher interest payments to those who would have great difficulty in meeting those burdens. Although there has been a very substantial increase in interest rates, and individuals will have to renegotiate their mortgages at higher rates, in the interim there has been a very considerable increase in personal incomes.

An hon. Member: For some.

Mr. MacEachen: I am concerned to monitor very carefully the number of persons who will be faced with very deep or real difficulties in meeting these higher interest burdens. I remember the situation in the House of Commons about a year ago when we were faced with very high interest rates. I was pressured on all sides to bring in new and expensive programs to protect particular groups in the community. I was obligated to consider the burden on the treasury, but also to watch trends in interest rates. The fact of the matter is that rates came down very quickly and most individuals—almost all, in fact—were able to renegotiate their mortgages without any deep difficulty at that particular time.

Miss MacDonald: Live in the present.

Mr. MacEachen: In the present circumstances, I hope that will also be the case. As I stated last year, and with the same attitude, we will be following the situation very carefully.

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the words of the Minister of Finance today are indeed saddening. Although we have statistics which at least indicate to him that there is not a problem, in the last two weeks I have witnessed personal friends who have had to walk away from their homes because of high interest rates; I have visited small farmers who have walked away from their farms because of high interest rates; I have seen countless small businessmen closing their doors and walking away from their dreams because of high interest rates.

Last Friday the banks in the United States raised their prime lending rates in excess of 20 per cent. If the government continues to pursue its made-in-Washington interest rate policy, it will inevitably follow suit in the next number of days.

In light of the mounting criticism of spokespersons in the finance community across Canada that our slavish adherence to the United States monetary policy is having disastrous effects for both the short run and the long term, will the minister forget about the expensive small programs to assist various segments, and commit himself today to lowering Canadian interest rates—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member put his question now? The microphones were turned off. The preamble to the hon. member's question was quite long. If the minister has not understood the question, perhaps the hon. member could formulate his last sentence.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, my last sentence is: will the minister commit himself to establishing a made-in-Canada interest rate policy, drop interest rates for Canadians, and forget his expensive programs about which he has been warning us?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I propose to reduce interest rates, and the only way they can be reduced is through a gradual reduction in inflation. If the hon. member thinks that important progress can be made in reducing interest rates without reducing over-all inflation, then he is making a very big mistake.

I wish to draw to the attention of the hon. member that within the past week, I believe, interest rates under the new French government, the election of which was applauded by his leader, saw an increase from 14 per cent to 22 per cent. The new socialist minister of finance said that he wanted to tell the French people that France is being buffeted on the troubled seas at the present time like every other country in the world. He told them, too, of the impact on France of the high interest rate policy followed in the United States. Why does the hon. member not learn what is happening in the world?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNITED STATES POLICY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I hope the minister is not suggesting we should now be following a made-in-France interest rate policy, since for every country he points out with high interest rates we can point out countries which are following their own national interest rate policies.

Mr. MacEachen: Name them.

Mr. Riis: Of course we can name them.

On November 6, 1979, the Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, stated:

> On interest rates, it says we will let the United States decide and we will follow their policy, no matter how high it goes.

The Prime Minister was criticizing the Tory government for following American interest rate decisions.

Would the Minister of Finance please explain to the members of this House and to the Canadian people why, in the last 18 months, the Prime Minister and the minister have reversed themselves on interest rate questions and are now committed to following the policy set by the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question. If the hon. member would look at the trends of interest rates between Canada and the United States in the past year he would notice—it could not escape him—that there were considerable differences and divergencies between various rates in Canada and the United States. Sometimes our rates were considerably lower, sometimes they were equal, and sometimes they were higher. There have been divergencies.

What the hon. member fails to understand is that, because of the importance to Canada of our trade and capital relationship with the United States, what happens in that economy is bound to influence Canada. That is why the minister of finance in France made a similar comment. That is why last week in Washington Mr. Helmut Schmidt complained vigorously about the impact of high American interest rates on the German economy, where rates are being pressed up and pressure is being put on the Deutschmark. That is a fact of life.

Even the socialist leader in France, whom the hon. member's leader extolled just last week, finds the facts the same as I find them, namely, that you cannot walk off the globe and find a world which does not exist without relationships with other countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATEMENT MADE BY DEPUTY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, it would appear that rates will continue to increase. John Crow, the newly-appointed deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, is quoted in The Vancouver Sun of Saturday—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has taken a great deal of latitude in asking his questions. This time I must ask him to go directly to his question.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, the deputy governor says that interest rates are not high enough. Does this mean that the government will be pursuing even higher rates, as is suggested by the newly appointed deputy governor of the bank?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker.

DISPOSAL OF RADIOACTIVE SOIL

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Public Works. In light of recent reports that radioactive soil from a subdivision in Scarborough is to be moved to a uranium tailings site in Faraday township, west of Bancroft, following a decision by the Federal-Provincial Task Force on Radioactivity, I would like to ask the minister if he concurs with the choice of this location.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, it is true that the radioactive material was to be moved from the riding which I represent as a federal member. However, I think that this matter should more properly be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am sure he has the response.

REASON FOR LOCATING DUMP SITE NEAR BANCROFT, ONT.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I understand that contaminated soil from the Port Hope area was disposed of at a Chalk River dump site. In light of the existence of this site, and a site at Elliot Lake, could the minister please advise this House why the Madawaska mines site near Bancroft has been chosen in which to locate the soil from Scarborough? Would the government consider relocating such contaminated soil to Chalk River or Elliot Lake, in view of the local protests from governments and residents?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the decision in this regard has been taken in full consultation and co-operation with the government of Ontario. It was a joint decision. The site which has been chosen is a site where, in effect, the fill which will be moved from the Scarborough site to the chosen site will cover tailings from the existing mine which are more radioactive than the new fill which will be brought in from Scarborough. This will improve the situation which exists at the present time at the site which has been chosen.

I am also advised that the material which is being moved to that mine is material which is quite safe at a distance of about 20 feet. It is being moved because it is located very close to residences. I understand there are consultations taking place with regional people. I hope the matter will be resolved to the satisfaction of everyone involved.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

FUNGICIDE CAPTAN—RELEASE OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for social policy. It concerns the matter of the government's refusal to give information with respect to the fungicide Captan. The minister will recall that there was a letter from the health protection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare recommending that Captan be banned or seriously restricted. He will also recall that last week the Minister of Agriculture appointed a 17-person committee to investigate the matter, particularly on the economic side. He will also know that last week the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is absent from the House today on other business, indicated that she is concerned about the household use of Captan. Finally, I am sure the minister will know that health protection branch officials are now concerned with respect to Captan residue on apples, grapes, and strawberries. Clearly, the government now regards the use of Captan an extremely serious health matter. When will the government release the report from the health protection branch?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not have the answer for the hon. member. This file comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister is absent today. I will transmit the hon. member's question to her and I am sure she will want to give the information to her colleague as soon as possible.

INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO CITIZENS OF UNITED STATES

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): In order to put this in perspective, Madam Speaker, and because the minister is senior in matters of social policy to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will put my supplementary question to him. The Environmental Law Association of Canada, which is a member of the Minister of Agriculture's committee, when looking for information with respect to the IBT Canadian tests on Captan, could not get it from Ottawa but had to go to Washington to get information which was obtained from Canada. Why does this government think that Americans should have the information, but not Canadians?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I gave the answer that this is a problem in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I will talk to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but I do not have an answer for the hon. member now.

DISASTERS

EXPLOSION AT THUNDER BAY ELEVATOR

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I will put it to his parliamentary secretary, if I can get his attention. It relates to the explosion early this morning in a grain elevator in Thunder Bay. This party's committee on occupational health and safety visited the grain elevators in January and recommended at that time that better conditions be established in case of an explosion. Examples of two explosions in the United States were cited. The committee found that there was no fire escape, very poor ventilation, and that there was imminent danger of an explosion.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary what measures Labour Canada has taken to rectify this problem. I am directing this question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, who does not seem to be aware of it at this time.

Miss MacDonald: He does not have one.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in the absence of my colleague and the parliamentary secretary, I will take the hon. member's question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister at the first opportunity.

AMENDMENT OF CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. As he knows, amendments to the Canada Labour Code are being drafted by Labour Canada at the present time. Would he assure the House that the three basic principles, that is, the right to participate, the right to know, and the right of workers to refuse work, will be written into the revisions of part IV of the code so that workers under federal jurisdiction will at least be brought up to the minimum standards now offered by most of the provinces of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the considerations mentioned by the hon. member will be dealt with by the Minister of Labour and considered before the bill is brought to the House. I cannot give him any assurance of what the result of that consideration will be, but I am sure his interest will be taken into account.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER INFORMATION HAS BEEN OBTAINED ON ALTERNATIVE ENERGY

Mr. André Bachand (Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister announced today the general outline of Canada's petroleum substitution program. Since that program aroused a lot of interest among the people when it was announced last October, could the minister tell the House where the interested parties should apply for complete information so as to draw maximum benefits from the program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had the pleasure of announcing today that the program involved is now operational and that as of today people may apply for the grants provided under this program. With regard to the conversion of oil heating systems to electricity or natural gas, Canadians are urged to apply to the public utilities companies which offer natural gas and electricity services, namely, hydro companies or natural gas corporations. As to other conversions to propane or other renewable energy sources, information is available from the regional offices of my department or from the EnerSave office. In any event, announcements will be published in newspapers in the next few days. Specific and detailed information will be given to Canadians so they will know exactly where to apply.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RECRUITMENT OF SECRETARIES BY DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I almost sat down after 28 days of trying to be recognized.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Are you never satisfied?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What is the matter with the truth?

Mr. Hawkes: My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. On March 24 at question period I received a communication from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I rose in my place on that occasion because in that letter the minister indicated that in late summer or early fall he would correct the situation whereby secretaries in ten provinces, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, were not eligible to work for External Affairs. Late fall or early summer is unacceptable. I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister, on behalf of the Prime Minister, would give this House an undertaking that any minister of the Crown who discriminates against Canadians and their employment opportunities on the basis of province of residence, will be asked to resign.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot give any assurance to the hon. member along the lines of changes in the government but I can assure him that I will draw his renewed interest in the subject to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who will likely communicate with him further.

THE CONSTITUTION

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED TO CANADIAN EMBASSIES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I will put the following question to the Deputy Prime Minister. On April 28 a communication was received by all our embassies around the world which indicated that, subsequent to April 23 and the votes in this House, two western premiers would have a veto relative to protecting themselves in the Constitution. That information is incorrect. Prior to April 23 each western premier had a one half veto but since April 23, because of the Liberal party and New Democratic Party, each western premier has a one third veto.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister undertake to send a corrected communique to all our foreign embassies so that our staff around the world will have the correct information on what the government intends to do about the Canadian Constitution and the vetoes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I shall draw this question to the attention of the minister.

INTRODUCTION OF NEW ECONOMIC ORDER

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Not long ago the Prime Minister indicated very clearly that in terms of government policy there was to be no government assistance for consumers in Canada. Immediately after making that statement the Prime Minister departed for North Africa, where he pursued his long-time goal for establishing a new international economic order which has as its chief purpose the redistribution of the wealth of the western world, including Canada, among countries of the Third World.

In view of the fact that the program of redistribution will involve either the imposition of taxes on Canadians, the creation of a greater deficit by the Canadian government, or the artificial fixing of high prices for foreign-made products imported to Canada and paid for by Canadian consumers, how does the Deputy Prime Minister equate these moves by the Prime Minister with reducing inflationary pressures in Canada which would have the effect, at the same time, of reducing the cost of interest to Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has put forward a number of views which he apparently holds as to what constitutes a new international economic order. Those are his views and not the views of the Government of Canada.

OPPOSITION TO CANADIAN PROGRAMS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I take it that the Deputy Prime Minister does not agree that the purpose of the new international economic order, as part of the North-South dialogue, is the redistribution of the wealth of the world by what is alleged to be more fair sharing among Third World nations.

In any event, with respect to his intention the Prime Minister has been quoted as having found that the President of the United States will be a stumbling block to these intended processes. Is it not true that the Prime Minister has also found that the governments of England and Germany are opposed to the programs he has advocated in this regard?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has certain views on what the views of the Prime Minister are on this subject. I do not think there is any compatibility between his perception and what the facts actually are. The question of improving the situation of the developing countries is a very complex one. It includes a large number of programs, including the ability of developing countries to improve their own production and create more wealth.

It seems to me that is the most important and long-term step that can be taken, namely, that of helping the developing countries to produce more food and to reduce their dependence on food importation. Second, it will permit them to discover greater amounts of indigenous energy supplies so as to reduce their dependence on imported energy. That is one important aspect which casts, I think, the over-all situation in a much different light.

FINANCE

RATE OF RETURN ON GOVERNMENT OF CANADA ANNUITIES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of 115,000 Canadians who are retired and living on Government of Canada annuities, namely, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister will know that in 1976 his predecessor promised to annuitants that the rate of return on annuities would be changed, subject and depending on future fluctuations in interest rates. Now that we are prepared to pay the banks 18.81 per cent interest, Canada Savings Bonds holders 13.75 per cent, and 16 per cent to market bond holders, does the minister not feel, bearing in mind the promise made in 1976, that it is time he gave those people, who lent Canada money back when the dollar was worth a dollar, a fair return in other words, better than 7 per cent on their money?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The annuity program is a long-term fiscal instrument and it should not be adjusted according to fluctuations in the marketplace on a yearly basis. We are examining the situation as it affects annuities but I will have to discuss the matter further with the Minister of Finance to determine whether there should be any changes. At the present time we do not have any plans to change interest rates on annuities.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN RATE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is then, of course, for the Minister of Finance, who knows that he has been a little fairer with Canada Savings Bond holders by increasing the rate of interest paid to 13.75 per cent. Bearing in mind that we are supposed to be doing something for people who are retired, that we are supposed to encourage saving, and that we are supposed to encourage people to trust their government's fairness in this country, will the Minister of Finance now increase the rate on Government of Canada annuities to a fair rate of return for these retired savers?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will take into account the hon. member's views on this subject. If there is to be a change in policy, I will announce it in the House.

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. As the minister knows, last week a 16-year-old Ontario high school student with no previous criminal records was sentenced to seven days in jail for possession of a very small quantity of marijuana. The sentencing judge indicated that he intends to impose similar Draconian sentences in the future.

How many more young Canadians must be expensively processed through our criminal justice system, thrown into jail and given criminal records, before the government will live up to its promises in the Speech from the Throne, and elsewhere, and finally bring in legislation putting the offence of possession of marijuana under the auspices of the Food and Drug Act, where it belongs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we are in the process of discussing this matter with the attorneys general for the provinces, and we hope to be able to be in a position to present legislation in this House soon.

CONTINUATION OF PRESENT POLICY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General, who told the justice committee last week that these consultations had already been concluded. How can the Solicitor General, who is supposedly committed to alternatives to imprisonment, defend the failure of his government to act on promises to decriminalize marijuana while discouraging its use by scientific education on the effects of marijuana on health? Now that the provinces have completed these consultations, which the Minister of Justice referred to, how much longer must this futile, archaic policy be continued before the government finally lives up to its responsibilities and changes the law?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the consultations to which the hon. member referred have just been concluded in the last few days. For consultations to be meaningful, I think the government should take into account what we learned in the process, and that is what is being done now.

THE ADMINISTRATION

APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, this is a supplementary question to an earlier one put by a member of the New Democratic Party to the Deputy Prime Minister. The hon. member asked some questions about labour only to discover that there is no parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour because he has resigned from his job as parliamentary secretary. This means that we cannot get answers to labour questions on Mondays or Fridays when the minister is not here because he prefers to be in Vancouver telling Liberals in the west that they have a problem.

Could we therefore have an undertaking that a parliamentary secretary will be appointed as quickly as possible so that we can begin again to have questions on labour answered in this House, particularly since the acting ministers have no idea of what is going on concerning revisions to the labour code?

Hon Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will take note of the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The Minister of Labour is in the House regularly and has given ample opportunity to hon. members to ask some questions. The fact is that the Minister of Labour sits in his seat day after day and no one on the other side seems to have very much to ask about labour matters.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

THREATS ON LIFE OF ROBERT McGARRY

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the Solicitor General with respect to a situation on which he and I have exchanged views for some time. It has to do with the policy of the RCMP in treating informants.

One Robert McGarry, a former Sureté de Québec informant, an RCMP informer, has had his life threatened as a result of criminal proceedings involving one Serge Coallier, a former QPF member. His counsel has found it necessary to write to Assistant Commissioner Venner, requesting that the RCMP honour its commitments to give Mr. McGarry protection. Will the Solicitor General look into this matter and find out why the RCMP appears to be so lax and so reluctant to fulfil its obligations to Mr. McGarry?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, without agreeing with the hon. member's conclusions, I will undertake to look into the matter.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, will the Solicitor General also pursue further the inquries made by Deputy Inspector Rankin into this matter involving McGarry as it involves "A" Division, and ascertain the names of the members of the RCMP who are so unhappy about the situation that they are prepared to testify at a parliamentary committee or elsewhere, given the proper protection to do so?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, before doing that, I would be glad to meet with the hon. member behind the curtains after question period to get details of the information from him to which he has just referred.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, on April 8 I asked about the possibility of raising questions having to do with certain votes in the Main Estimates which I feel are out of order. At that time, Madam Speaker, you indicated that you would be prepared to hear the point of order but at a time closer to the day on which the estimates would be reported back to the House, to paraphrase what you said.

I just rise now to indicate that since the estimates are reported at the end of this week, perhaps some time this week might be the appropriate time. I have spoken to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) concerning tomorrow but that may be inconvenient to him because of a commitment to appear before the miscellaneous estimates committee. Unfortunately, Wednesday is inconvenient for me. Perhaps we might set Thursday as the appropriate day for the point of order, if that is agreeable to the President of the Treasury Board.

Madam Speaker: If that suits both hon. members, I will be prepared to listen to the point of order at that time.

MR. MacEACHEN—ENERGY TAX INCREASES—CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Briefly, I wish to clarify an answer I gave to the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) on the last day I was in the House, which was May 15.

• (1510)

I believe that my answer with respect to no new energy taxes should be interpreted to mean that no new types of taxes are contemplated at the present time. I believe my answer is ambiguous as it is given. I do not want to mislead the House or the hon. member so I am taking the first available opportunity to say that no new types of taxes are contemplated at the present time, but obviously the petroleum compensation charge might be increased or indeed decreased, depending upon developments with Alberta, exchange rate developments or international petroleum prices. I wanted that to be made clear so there would be no misunderstanding on that point.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, we are holding up the answers so we can give a larger number tomorrow. In the meantime, therefore, I would ask that the questions stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF FAILURE TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington) moved:

That this House condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of its high interest rate policy and for its failure to assist the small business sector in Canada

(1) by increasing and extending the small business development bond program;

(2) by encouraging venture capital investment by means of appropriate tax adjustments;

(3) by relieving the small business sector from the massive weight of government regulation; and

(4) by fostering the research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian businesses of all sizes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, our motion sets forth the four main requirements if the small business sector is to survive and play its traditional role in our economy. That role is reflected by the fact that the small business sector is the largest employer in Canada, that it contributes a large percentage of the GNP to the national economy and the small business sector gives stability to the labour market because it traditionally retains its labour force when the market turns down.

The motion bears reading again:

That this House condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of its high interest policy and for its failure to assist the small business sector in Canada

(1) by increasing and extending the small business development bond program;

(2) by encouraging venture capital investment by means of appropriate tax adjustments;

(3) by relieving the small business sector from the massive weight of government regulation; and

(4) by fostering the research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian business of all sizes.

The small business development bond is a good program but it must be extended. It should include unincorporated small businesses, farmers and fishermen. Where does the small businessman initially get his capital to start his business? He borrows it, or at least borrows to supplement his savings, or he cashes his life insurance, bonds or other assets, or he mortgages his house; and in many cases he does all of those things to accumulate enough capital to get going. He does this because he believes he has an idea that will be profitable or a service to render from which he feels he can make a reasonable fee.

If he is successful, how does he expand? In most cases an expansion of the small business is paid for out of retained earnings that are poured back into the business. Unless the small businessman becomes large enough to go public, he must find the capital for expansion from profits earned by the business or by borrowing from the bank.

The banks have not been all that helpful, particularly since capital gains have been imposed. Why do hon. members think the government introduced the Small Businesses Loans Act in 1960? It did so because the chartered banks were reluctant to make loans to small businesses. Even after the government guaranteed the loans, you could hardly find a bank that would admit such an act was in place. I could not begin to count the number of times small businessmen came to me complaining that their bank manager had never heard of the Small Businesses Loans Act or said he would have to check with his head office. However, once the rate for the loan moved to the current bank rate, the managers suddenly found the Small Businesses Loans Act in their files. While the rate was fixed lower by the government the banks were not interested; once it moved up to the current rate they became very interested.

The small businessman cannot survive the 19.6 per cent prime rate. The supply side of our economy is good, competition is strong, but inflation and increases in the rate of interest small businessmen must pay for the use of bank money is draining away these profits. What will happen is that inventories will drop and that drop will be rolled back onto the manufacturing side of our economy where the slowdown will be felt at a later time. The small business development bond must be extended to encompass the unincorporated businesses of farmers and fishermen and the term for repayment should be extended to ten years to allow for the regeneration of the small business sector.

If some relief, as suggested in my remarks, is not put in place and quickly, there will be a dramatic increase in bankruptcies. A bankruptcy is an economic tragedy. It is the cessation of the economic activity of an enterprise that means loss of employment, the loss of a contribution to the GNP, the loss of profits and, consequently, a loss to the tax base for three levels of government. If you are startled by the latest bankruptcy figures, Mr. Speaker, you will be really upset at the bankruptcies to come if some relief is not felt in the weeks ahead.

We have more than one million unemployed. The government talks about the work it has done in job creation. The reality is that many of those jobs are temporary. They are meant to get people into the labour force in the hope that they will stick. Most stick long enough to qualify for unemployment insurance, so they become a traveller between the employed and the unemployed.

One of the realities of the labour market is that the direction is the reverse to what most people believe. Many people are worried by automation in assembly operations. They fear automation and believe they may be replaced by a robot or some automatic assembly operation. The reality is that the fully employed worker of the future will be multitalented. He or she will be required to do several jobs and could move to a variety of employment. Some work will be performed in the home on computer terminals. That is almost a fact today.

If I had my way I would search out the most talented craftsmen in the world and bring them to Canada to teach their crafts to Canadians. The demand for the multitalented employee is growing. They are the core of the labour force in the small business sector. That is where the real strength is. They remain employed because they can turn their hands and head to a variety of jobs. They become indispensable to the small businessman. There is great vigour in the small business sector. That vigour and initiative must be matched with venture capital if it is to contribute to the economy in the very positive way it can.

Venture capital will only be made available with tax adjustments. The prospect of an unusual gain is the main reason people are willing to put venture capital on the line. The gain should be in the form of a non-taxable profit. There are as many ideas for venture capital formation as there are needs for it. Appropriate tax adjustments must be made to increase the flow of venture capital to the small business sector.

The plan I prefer is one developed by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. That plan, in short, allows the person lending the money to write off the loan from his tax payable and would cause him to pay income tax on the return when it is repaid. There are a number of variations of that idea, but it is one simple way of channelling venture capital funds to the small business sector. If you want a future for small business, Mr. Speaker, you have to buy it today. We can develop from the tinkerer-inventor-scientist dream if we are prepared to put venture capital on the line.

Let me say a few words about profit, because if anything has been maligned in the business world today it is profit. It should be looked upon as a tool with which to create the future. One of the great hang-ups of the socialists is that they love money but they hate profit. They would have you believe that profits are stored in the corporate vaults and the boards of directors are groups of robbers who divvy up the profit at the expense of the worker. Anyone with an ounce of insight knows that profit is what is left over after all costs, including labour and taxes, are paid.

You have to look at profit in a different dimension. If you look at profit in the form of time, brain power and money you will see it is a tool to create the future. If we want social programs to continue to look after the unemployable and the elderly, they can only be sustained if we have profits. If we want to continue to improve our way of life and our standards of employment and living in the future, then we must do it by rethinking attitudes toward profits. As I said, most socialists love money but they hate profit. I make reference to socialists because the general public today believes the Liberal party is a socialist party. In fact, someone said to me the other day they are like the NDP in a hurry. That is a twist I am sure the House will recognize, and I knew that would get Stanley!

I wonder how many people really understand the effect of the massive weight of government regulation. I wonder how many realize the massive power in those regulations. If hon. members analyse the preamble to the average statute they debate in this House, they will find these words: "The governor in council shall attach regulations thereto upon proclamation". Further, they will see these words: "The governor in council may change regulations from time to time as required". From those two sentences the authority for regulations springs. You never see them until they are proclaimed in The Canada Gazette. They are not exposed to anyone but the persons within the bureaucracy who use them.

Regulations have a life and power of their own. They are administered by faceless, nameless people who, for the most part, are removed from the mainstream of the realities of the businesses they would regulate. Let me give a few examples. The Metric Commission, in its haste to turn Canada into a metric nation, decided all gasoline service station air pumps should be converted to record air pressure in kilopascals rather than in pounds per square inch. A conversion program followed. I suppose in their fiddleheaded way they thought everyone was going to jump up and down with joy because they had made this great decision.

Let us look at the reality. A sign is placed on the air pump which tells you that the pump has been converted. The sign is in both official languages so you can have bilingual frustration. But no conversion chart tells you what 28 pounds per square inch converts to in kilopascals. I asked the service station operator when I happened to go in one day wanting to put some air in tires: "What do I put on the pump"? He was busy serving a customer and he said: "I don't know and I don't care. It's free air—why should I bother".

I called the Metric Commission and told them my dilemma. I said: "I am at a service station, the air pump is in kilopascals, my tires take 28 pounds per square inch; what does that convert to?" That created quite a problem. I waited on the phone for 45 minutes and finally a voice said to me: "If you multiply 28 psi by 6.805 you will get the kilopascal setting to put on the pump". I told him where to stuff the air pump, hose and all, it was such a frustrating experience.

A few years ago we had a bill before the House which dealt with tire standards. It had been drafted with the assistance of the rubber industry association and its member companies. Most people were satisfied with the safety standards set forth in the bill. In fact, the government was satisfied. Then the bureaucracy got hold of it and wanted to create a whole new layer of regulations. They were going to have every retail outlet in Canada and every gasoline station keep records of the serial numbers and the name and address of every person who purchased a tire. The retail store would then have to initiate a recall should one be required. In spite of the fact that the tire manufacturers said they would take over the responsibility, the bureaucracy pressed on.

In addition, they would have had a series of inspectors, they said, who would regularly check the retail tire sales outlets to see that the records were being properly kept. Can you imagine the bureaucracy you would have had in a city like Ottawa; probably half a dozen retail tire records inspectors who would probably have to report to a district inspector, who would report to an area inspector, who would report to a provincial inspector, who would report to an eastern-western inspector! It just goes on and on and on, and all to be paid for, of course, by the taxpayers. This would have laid upon the small retailers an unbelievable responsibility and, of course, additional overhead. We fought hard and we won that one. We had the provision withdrawn from the bill and left it with the industry to advise purchasers of recalls through their computer control system.

That measure came into the House of Commons by reason of the bureaucracy copying almost verbatim a statute that was in place in the United States. We had the same thing happen with some provisions under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

I recall when I first came to Ottawa in 1972 meeting with a trade association and Dr. Campbell who was head of the motor vehicle safety division in the Department of Transport. Dr. Campbell wanted to have some control over motor vehicles. In fact, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act used by the Government of Canada is word for word, page for page, clause for clause, item for item identical to the one used in the United States. All one has to do is take out the word "state" and insert the word "province" or "territory" and the acts are identical. In fact, one can work from the American legislation in Canada quite easily.

What we found happening was that Dr. Campbell wanted to make the last person who worked on a motor truck responsible for that total motor vehicle, regardless if he only hung a mud flap back of the tires, if he moved the turn signal back on the frame, or if he put anything on the vehicle, such as a reflector or another mirror. If he was the last person who worked on that $60,000 or $75,000 Mack truck, he was going to be responsible for the total recall of that vehicle if in fact a recall was required. In other words, Mack truck would advise a wee little operator that a certain vehicle was believed to have a defect. The small operator would have to go to the expense, time and trouble of notifying the purchaser of the vehicle that he must return it for a warranty repair.

It was a silly situation. We argued all day, and we finally convinced Dr. Campbell to back off; but his inspectors still go to little businesses around the country which do installation work on motor trucks. Those businesses are quite prepared to be responsible for what they instal, but they think it is ludicrous that they should be responsible for the total vehicle which was designed by General Motors, Ford, Mack truck or whoever it might be. That is the type of bureaucracy which drives people right up the wall.

The bureaucracy of government depends upon a passive Parliament to allow it full rein. If there is one non-partisan theme we all could look at, it is the effect of regulations on the public. This whole Parliament should be together on that. There should be no political partisanship whatever involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: We should be totally together. A rein should be put on this. Every country in the western world is faced with the same problem. We can see what is happening in the United States, which is attempting to deregulate. We have heard about regulation in Germany and in Japan. The bureaucracy gradually grows and grows until it swallows everyone. This Parliament would work better if we could spend a certain number of hours a week looking at regulations which are being introduced, even before they are put into The Canada Gazette. There should be references to an all-party committee. Such a committee could look at the regulations, rule on them or give its views on them before they are passed. There should be some type of review.

To go back to my story about tire inspectors, can hon. members imagine how many tire inspectors we would have in Canada if we had not stopped that measure? How many tires are damaged because of those idiots in the Metric Commission who decided that we should use kilopascals instead of pounds per square inch? Any safety expert or any tire shop operator can tell us that one of the greatest problems with tires is underinflation. Service station operators can tell us that the greatest trouble with bicycle tires is overinflation. If we go into any gasoline station, the operator can show us a line-up of blown bicycle tires.

The fact is that little, if anything, has been done to reduce regulations and paper loads respecting small businesses. I believe one of the previous ministers of state for small businesses set up a committee to look into the abuse of the small business community by means of paper work. I have not seen any results from that, but if the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) got together with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), an income tax form could be devised on which all the information required by the government from the small business community could be gathered at the time income tax returns are filed. I am sure that could be done. It could be a once-a-year task. It could be kept simple and the amount of paper work kept to a minimum. That would stop Statistics Canada from calling and threatening small businessmen with fines if they do not send in certain returns by certain dates.

Let me turn to the fourth point in our motion respecting the fostering of research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian businesses of all sizes. Our contribution to research and development is one of the lowest of all OECD countries. It is far out of proportion to our labour force and the size of our primary and secondary industries. When we invest in research and development, we invest in the future. It seems to me that there is a mindset in the bureaucracy which firmly believes that the only new ideas we should use should come from outside Canada.

A former minister of state for science and technology—I believe he was also president of the treasury board at the same time—believed we could purchase our technology cheaper than we could develop it ourselves. I believe there are some in the Treasury Board and in the Department of Finance who still influence any move toward an expanded research and development program for industry. That kind of thinking will doom us forever to being a second or third-rate industrial nation. Some industries are large enough to have ongoing research and development programs of their own, but many undertake research and development only when their backs are to the wall.

I believe in the tinkerer-inventor-scientist theory that we have to begin somewhere. I have thought long and hard about the practical side of research and development funding. As I have stated many times in this House, the reality is that for all but a handful of industries which are large enough to sponsor full research and development programs the real problem is the availability of cash. The demands on profits and cash flow are so severe that research and development programs are shut down or never leave the ground in the first place.

I have suggested before in this House that we should put into place a registered research and development program. Under such a program a business could accumulate money for a period of time to ensure that funds are in place to undertake and complete a research and development program. The funds could be accumulated from a percentage of the tax payable and be drawn down once a project was decided upon by a business. We would find that an enormous amount of activity would ensue as a result of a program such as this. The government would not have to lay out $400 million or $500 million. The money would be drawn from the profits generated by a business, the government would hold the funds in a registered research and development trust fund and they could be drawn back by the business. That would allow businesses to complete projects which they want to get going.

There should be an emphasis on the training of technicians at community colleges. There should be more integrated programs with industry and, through a double write-off provision, businesses should be encouraged, wherever possible, to establish technical libraries. In the final analysis, we would be investing in the future. We should do this with the sure knowledge that dividends would be returned many times over.

The motion before us is well thought out. I have attempted to give the House my thoughts in a positive, non-partisan manner. I believe the situation in the country today is very serious. This is a very serious motion, and it should be acted upon by the government with all possible speed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise to speak in this Conservative opposition debate. This motion is indeed a thoughtful statement. It provides an opportunity for us to discuss some of the problems and challenges being faced by small businesses across Canada. Unfortunately, we seldom have an opportunity to discuss small business, and I am pleased to see the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) here today to listen to what opposition members have to say regarding that area of his portfolio. We look forward to hearing some new initiatives announced by the minister later this afternoon. We are anxious to hear what he has to say about the future of the small business community in Canada.

During these times there is no question that those who have been hardest hit by excessively high interest rates—the highest interest rates in Canadian history—have been people in the small business sector of our economy. For the more than 320,000 unincorporated small businesses and the more than 330,000 small and medium business corporations, interest rates of 19 and 20 per cent, now 21, 22 and 23 per cent, mean higher production costs and cutbacks in orders and inventory, which in turn mean lay-offs and production cuts for manufacturers and suppliers. Entrepreneurs and individuals interested in expansion and in seeing their businesses grow simply find that impossible with interest rates in the 20 plus percentile range. At a time when investment is crucial to improving Canada's productivity, they certainly mean delay, and in some cases permanent delay, in that investment.

As high interest rates wreak havoc throughout the economy, one of the biggest casualties is new job creation. This means higher unemployment at a time when unofficially well in excess of one million Canadians are unemployed. If one is to include in that figure those Canadians identified as being disabled, we are talking about a figure probably touching close to two million unemployed.

It is important to recognize that small business creates two out of every three new jobs in Canada and represents 42 per cent of the employment base, and that by pursuing this policy the government is doing so on the backs of secondary workers in Canada. By secondary workers I mean those workers that are young, old, women, native Canadians, disabled Canadians. These are the people that are first to be laid off, the first to go during an economic crunch. I noted with interest that the president of manpower temporary services, Mr. William Coke, said over the weekend that he would not be surprised to see unemployment easily reach 9 per cent, and I suspect that to be a very conservative estimate.

Also, Mr. Speaker, high interest rates mean sharp increases in small business bankruptcies and the number of firms placed in receivership. Mr. Claude Leduc, the chief statistician for the Canadian Insolvency Association, said the number of business bankruptcies in the first four months of 1981 increased by 17 per cent, with total liabilities up 35 per cent over the same period last year. This indicates very clearly that not only small businesses are being hammered by these high interest rates, but medium and large businesses also are feeling the pinch.

Of course, the official figures on bankruptcy, as bad as they are, cover up the seriousness of the situation. They cover up the impact these high interest rates are having on our economy because for every thousand firms that go through formal bankruptcy, no less than 5,000 firms will finally give up and quietly go out of business or be placed in receivership.

The picture is indeed very bleak but the worst is not over yet, Mr. Speaker. Farmers must be included in our comments on small business. There are over 250,000 farmers operating across Canada, and whether they own a family farm or a corporate farm, it is fair to say that 99 per cent are indeed small businesses. High interest rates in the farm sector raise the cost of just maintaining herds, let alone expanding a cattle or hog operation. High interest rates raise the cost of financing new machinery and equipment as well. This, of course, hurts the thousands of small businesses across the country in our farm communities who sell and service farm machinery.

And what of the bigger businesses that manufacture farm machinery? What of the hundreds of smaller manufacturers that supply this industry with parts and components? Indeed, when one considers the cash flow problems that small farmers are facing and the fact they are unable to expand during this time, it is a sad day for the agriculture sector and for the small farmers in Canada that this government continues with its high interest rate policy, a policy made in the United States and which the government seems to be quite prepared to continue and increase.

Of course, as mortgage rates also climb above the 18 per cent range the housing market is shaken at its very foundations. Young Canadians who have saved and worked hoping one day to purchase their home watch their dreams crumble with each successive increase in mortgage rates. The great majority of construction firms are small businesses again, Mr. Speaker, and there are 88,000 of them across Canada. These are not the Cadillac Fairviews, NuWest or the Bramaleas; they are local firms employing local citizens in our communities and purchasing building materials and supplies from other small businesses.

High interest rates also take their pound of flesh out of the consumer. With finance charges at an all-time record level, consumers are reluctant to purchase new automobiles or new appliances such as refrigerators and ranges. This understandably is having a devastating effect on these industries as well. The Canadian Appliance Manufacturers Association now estimates that 4,000 fewer major appliances will be sold in Canada this year than were sold in 1980. But that is just sales, which includes imports. For the domestic industry the outlook is even worse. Major appliance imports as a percentage of the domestic market have risen to nearly 30 per cent from 24 per cent during the period 1975 to 1979. This government's high interest rate policy is guaranteed to accelerate further the decline of our manufacturing industry and slowly strangle thousands of small parts manufacturers dependent upon this industry, not to mention the small retail appliance stores in communities across Canada.

Of course, members of this House are well aware of the plight of Canada's auto industry and auto parts industry and one need not go into detail on this particular major sector of our economy.

An hon. Member: Maybe the Liberals should hear it.

Mr. Riis: Maybe the Liberals should hear it one more time.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but the point I want to make is that this government's high interest rate policy is doing serious damage, both short and long term, to the entire economic fabric of Canada, not only to certain restricted sectors. The small business sector, the automobile industry, the construction industry, the farm sector, appliance manufacturers, first time home buyers, families renewing mortgages, even municipalities that need to borrow in order to make long-term public investments in sewage treatment plants, water systems and recreational facilities which are so important to their communities—nothing is left untouched by this government's high interest rate policy.

And what have we gained? Inflation has gone up since Mr. Bouey started tightening what he calls the money supply. That has obviously been a failure, but the Canadian dollar has more or less stabilized between 83 and 86 cents. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will probably go down in Canada's history books as not being the one million dollar man but the 30 cent man for Canada.

We have heard today, Mr. Speaker, that the government's response to these devastatingly high interest rates is the consideration of introducing a number of schemes, gimmicks, concessions or special deals. This is, of course, in response to the various lobby groups, pressure groups and special interest groups that are attempting to make their point with the Liberal cabinet. In other words, we have high interest rates but not for everyone. With these special arrangements we bring in further inequalities in the Canadian economic system and further disparities in the treatment of various groups.

The best example of this is the small business development bond. This was an idea first introduced by the Tories and brought into being by the Liberal government, which we, of course, supported because we believed the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I am not certain why at this point, when he said it was the government's intention to assist and support small businesses in Canada. We took him at his word, much to our chagrin today.

As the small business development bond began to take shape, we found that it would not provide much help to the 940,000 small businesses in Canada. There were a number of exclusions built into it. Right off the top, it excluded the 350,000 unincorporated businesses and the hundreds of thousands of small businesses requiring financial assistance in order to provide them with working capital. Other exclusions were the fact that the small business development bond could not be used to recycle equipment; it could not be used to purchase used material, equipment or machinery. The small business development bond does a great deal to create more inequalities in the Canadian economic system. In spite of its good intentions, many inequalities and exclusions are built into it. We really have a small business development bond which assists probably fewer than 5 per cent of the small business community.

Unfortunately this program also provides tax shelter relief to those who need it least. It provides tax shelter relief to the corporate lenders of Canada—they are the main beneficiaries—at a time when their profits are at all-time record levels.

The government should direct the Governor of the Bank of Canada to lower interest rates, in which case we will not need the small business development bond or the number of other schemes to assist small farmers and fishermen. They simply want reduced interest rates so that home owners, for example, can requalify for their mortgages and first time home owners can qualify for mortgages. Therefore, I hope the minister will have something for us, when he stands in the House shortly, which will indicate to the small business community that he is prepared to open up the SBDB to provide an opportunity to unincorporated businesses, farmers and fishermen and which will ensure, perhaps most importantly, that the benefits go to the borrowers, not the lenders.

For a country with the potential of Canada to be a dynamic and innovative leader in the world economy as well as its own, venture capital is much needed. In this respect, the Federal Business Development Bank has failed to provide risk capital or venture capital. It has failed to be a lender of last resort. It has turned out to be one of the most conservative lending institutions in Canada.

The high rate of staff turnovers often results in inadequately experienced loans officers. One could go on and on about the problems associated with the Federal Business Development Bank; they are well known. In many parts of Canada it is looked upon as nothing short of a financial disaster. Rather than encouraging Canadians to dream of a better future, it drags Canadian entrepreneurship down and essentially eliminates the possibility for many Canadians to build a better future for themselves and for Canada.

The FBDB must be totally re-evaluated in terms of its mandate, organization and policies. It should be a model or a leading light for venture capital opportunities for Canadian entrepreneurs. It should be used as a clearing house of information for all federal government programs to assist small businessmen. But it sits and essentially retards the development of Canada. This must be changed and the sooner the better.

The previous speaker mentioned the need for research and development. One cringes when one sees that the government's aim is to obtain 1.5 per cent of the GNP by 1985. The government itself admits that this is possibly a hopeless target. It should be recognized by us all as totally inadequate, because 1.5 per cent of the GNP for research and development will not provide the technological leadership the country drastically needs at this time.

More money and efforts should be expended on federal research institutes and educational institutions. More emphasis should be placed on industry and business to develop a more aggressive policy when it comes to research and development, through to the production stage. Research and development per se is inadequate. The government must set the guidelines or the parameters. It must provide initiative for the private sector to move in the direction the government seeks to develop. I am not certain we need another 50 kinds of underarm deodorant. We need research and development which is guided and makes sense in terms of industrial advantages in Canada and research and development through to the production end. It will create more jobs for Canada. It will provide expertise for Canadians and from Canadians. It will develop a technological leadership for Canadian industry and for the world.

At this point in time we mainly require an active commitment by the government to the small business sector. Earlier today we recognized that the government decided to introduce metrication in the retail sector which will require the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars on measuring devices and scales in order for retailers to comply with the initiative taken by the government. While we support the principle of metrication, we abhor that because of the timing hundreds of millions of dollars of equipment and machinery will have to be sourced from beyond Canada's borders; they will have to be sourced from the United States and abroad. If the government is committed to a buy-Canada policy, if the government is committed to the small business sector, this is where it can provide sound leadership and a strong model to business across the country.

Also the previous speaker mentioned the paperwork burden facing small businessmen. There is no question that this is the case. We must take seriously the matter of the paperwork burden of small businessmen. I spent the last number of days speaking with small businessmen from Kamloops who are good businessmen. They depend upon the state of the economy to develop their sector adequately. They are committed Canadians who want to do a good job. They want to co-operate with government authorities, but now they have reached the stage where they are prepared to say, "We cannot take it any longer".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) on the motion which he introduced in the House today and which gives us the opportunity to discuss an important sector of our economy, namely Canadian small businesses. I would also like to congratulate him on the contents and the tone of his speech since, as he said in his introductory remarks, we have to rise above partisanship if we really want to serve well the interests of this community which concerns every one of us.

I appreciated particularly his comments concerning regulations and the horror stories which he told us because I also know a few of them. The hon. member can be assured that my colleague from the Treasury Board, who is responsible for the general deregulation on behalf of the Government of Canada and myself, as I am more specifically responsible for reducing paper work for small businesses in Canada, will be very happy, not only to follow his advice, but also to ask him for advice to bring about a situation where regulations will no longer be a constant barrier to entrepreneurship in Canada.

I am also happy to note that he speaks in his motion of the increased need for risk capital to provide additional stimulus and strength to the small business sector. It is obvious that at the present time in spite of the relatively important operations of the Federal Business Development Bank with regard to loans or the placing of risk capital on the market, in fact, no financial institution in Canada entirely meets this need.

However, I would like to mention to the hon. member simply for his information that there are agencies in certain provinces, such as the Small Business Development Corporation in Ontario, SODEC in Quebec and the Venture Capital Corporation in Nova Scotia. My colleague from Alberta also mentioned that he was establishing some type of agency to promote activities or loans for risk capital. There is only one question I would like to ask at this time: I wonder whether or not we need another federal agency in addition to those which now exist in the provinces in this field. I believe that it would be more appropriate to increase co-ordination with provincial agencies to be able to set up one system throughout the country which would make available more risk capital to men and women in business. I must say that I was very pleased with the comments of the hon. member concerning the profits of the business sector, and I agree completely that if we want to continue as a country and as a nation to have some of the most generous social, medical, old-age assistance and unemployment assistance programs to meet the needs of our community, it is essential quite obviously for small businesses in Canada to have the best possible margins of profit.

Like the hon. member for Burlington, I am not afraid of the word profit and I hope that an increasing number of our small businesses will be able to make these profits which they have a right to expect. I am also glad that his motion mentioned the issue of research and development. It is true that our country may not have a sufficient percentage of its revenue invested in research and development compared to other member countries of the OECD, but the government has undertaken to increase this percentage to 1.5 per cent of the gross national product. I hope that, as the years go by and as the financial situation of the government improves, we will be in a position to implement even more generous programs to promote research and development, either through tax measures or other means, to help the promoters establish these research and development programs, and we could perhaps even, as suggested by the hon. member, give a tax credit for the purchases made to set up scientific libraries in business companies, for instance.

I was therefore very pleased with the comments made by the hon. member for Burlington, but unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the same cannot be said about my reaction to the whinings of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), who recited all he has learned by rote, which he has been repeating these last few months and which is full of untruths and half-truths. He indicated at the very beginning of his intervention that the present policies of the government delay the development plans of small businesses and prevent Canadian small businessmen from purchasing the new equipment they need and from expanding their business to create more jobs.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell him that that was precisely why the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) promoted the small business development bond program in his budget. Under that program, as the hon. member knows, businessmen can borrow at roughly half the current or commercial rate. It is used specifically for business expansion purposes, either for the purchase of real assets, land, buildings or new equipment. So that answers the first objection raised by the hon. member. Then the hon. member said that the policies of this government are leading to higher unemployment rates. Mr. Speaker, he seems to forget, or he is probably not aware of this, that in April we reported the lowest unemployment rate since 1976. Instead of looking at the figures as they are he would rather throw a scare into everybody by saying that the unemployment rate will soar to 9 per cent, 10 per cent and 11 per cent. He wants to scare Canadians.

Then the hon. member went on to a topic so dear to his heart, bankruptcies, saying that they had gone up by 17 per cent in 1980 and during the first quarter of 1981. Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance stated during today's question period, of course the economy suffers from any bankruptcy, but no useful purpose is served in stressing only one figure as did the hon. member who he failed to mention in the same breath that, although bankruptcies may have risen by 17 per cent in 1980 and in the first quarter of 1981, there were 20 per cent more new businesses in 1980 and that same percentage holds true for the first quarter of 1981. He also failed to point out that the total number of bankruptcies in the sector of small businesses still represents less than 1 per cent of all small businesses in Canada. And as a universal remedy, of course—this he suggested during the question period, as if he were living on a remote island in mid-Pacific or mid-Atlantic, I could not say—the universal panacea for all such woes he described to us, when he stated that the government only has to lower interest rates. I suggest that it is a rather simplistic view of the components of the Canadian economy, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the hon. member does not give a hoot either for the considerable damage done by inflation to the future of small businesses in Canada.

A little further on in his speech the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap again repeated his favourite statement, namely that the Federal Business Development Bank is Canada's most conservative financial institution, that it strangles small businesses, shies away from risks and no longer serves the purposes for which it was created. I should like to tell him very simply that the bank made a study of its lending characteristics, which study reveals that, in 1975, 52 per cent of FBDB loans were fully guaranteed as compared with only 31 per cent in 1980.

Since there were more loans that were not guaranteed, there were naturally more loan calls. In 1976, the reserve for losses included in operating costs was equal to .9 per cent of the total loans outstanding at the FBDB, in 1980, it was equal to 2.4 per cent. I wonder whether the hon. member could name me one commercial bank or "caisse populaire" or credit union which incurs losses of 2.4 per cent on loans to small business. If so, Mr. Speaker, I will agree with him that the Federal Development Bank is too conservative an institution for small business.

The bank's figures and an analysis of its loans show that the hon. member's assertion is unfounded. The hon. member did however make one good suggestion, that is that the Federal Development Bank with its network of 102 offices throughout the country should serve as a distribution center for federal programs. I certainly agree with that, and so do the bank's officials. During the training course that they must take, the bank's credit officers are made aware of all the existing programs that can aid the small business sector, and we try to use this network of 102 offices across the country to distribute information regarding federal programs.

The hon. member went onto talk about his latest pet peeve, metric scales. He thinks, Mr. Speaker, that it will cost hundreds of millions of dollars to replace existing scales by metric scales in grocery stores. That is another red herring, because according to the information I have, replacement costs in food chains and retail grocery stores will amount to between $45 and $58 million. That is a far cry from the hundreds of millions of dollars the hon. member speaks of.

He is shocked, perhaps not without just cause, that we do not at this time have the capability to manufacture such scales in Canada. Since 1976, all Canadians have known that metric scales would be introduced in retail food stores in 1979 and, for various reasons, this was delayed until January, 1982, that is three years later. And yet since 1976, despite all our efforts to encourage investors to go into the manufacture of metric scales, only one Canadian manufacturer, located in Ontario, decided to take up the challenge. We certainly hope that when conversion is implemented in 1982, he will do a booming business. Why did not other Canadian manufacturers go into that venture? Probably, Mr. Speaker, because they considered that the volume of sales, which is some $50 million, was not worth the investment required to go into this new line of production. We are not of the opinion, like members of the NDP, that we should take investors by the hand and tell them: Sir, Madam, would you please manufacture scales. Our programs are well known and so are our policies, and it is not by behaving in the paternalistic fashion suggested by the hon. member that we will develop in Canada a healthier, more aggressive and more dynamic business sector.

We do not deny, Mr. Speaker, that high interest rates affect small business in Canada and that the cost of borrowing money is getting ever higher for small businessmen. However, before considering new programs and setting up new stuctures, let us look at the programs already in place. The hon. member who moved the motion pointed out that the Small Businesses Loans Act has been in force since 1961, and in 1980 alone, it is interesting to note that Canadian small businessmen have borrowed over $400 million, Mr. Speaker, under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

You will remember that less than a year ago, last June, I introduced some amendments to that legislation in order to make more people eligible and to raise the maximum amount of loans through a more flexible rate scale providing for larger and easier loans. Loans granted under the Small Businesses Loans Act are 90 per cent state-guaranteed and may be granted to manufacturing concerns, to wholesale and retail firms, to service industries, to building, transportation, communication, real estate businesses as well as to insurance agents and brokers. We are then trying to cover the greatest possible number of small businesses so that they may enjoy state-guaranteed financing.

Secondly, I dealt briefly with the Federal Business Development Bank which, in spite of all its deficiencies and the present difficult economic conditions, plays an essential role in the country in that it is the only institution at present that provides a cheap management consultant service for small businesses. It also provides throughout the country, in our remotest cities, a series of management seminars so that businessmen and businesswomen may acquire new administrative techniques, learn how to improve their bookkeeping and to run their business most efficiently. In addition to the financial role played by the Federal Business Development Bank—someone just said that such a bank has no place in the market—Mr. Speaker, I hasten to point out that the average loan granted by the Federal Business Development Bank is about $49,000. Let us look at the average loan granted by chartered banks. You will see that it is around $500,000 or more. It means that the small business community in Canada is not served by the Federal Business Development Bank. I think it is a gross distortion of the truth. The management consultant services such as the management seminars of the Federal Business Development Bank are a most valuable tool, particularly in remote communities, because up to 1980, the bank held more than 7,000 seminars throughout the country, not in cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver or Calgary but in more remote communities where customers do not have access to all the government services provided in large cities. In addition to the FBDB and the program under the Small Businesses Loans Act, there is another program, the business development program, which meets partly the needs of small businesses to finance their activities in the area of research and development.

Mr. Speaker, just to give you an idea, I have here an April press release that says that under the industrial development program, during January and February, $42 million were allocated to industrial development projects in Canada as innovation grants for new products, for design, for increased productivity, for the identification of new products and for proposed projects. This program also provides for adjustment assistance in the form of loan guarantees for the reorganization, development and upgrading of equipment, as working capital or contribution to hire consultants to prepare restructurating proposals.

Mr. Speaker, that was the business expansion program for February and January. The amount was $42 million. And another news release issued on May 12 showed that for March, an amount of $14,230,215 had been granted to support industrial expansion in Canada. This means, therefore, that there are at this moment programs which provide for and facilitate research and development, help our men and women in business develop new products and find their way, after months and years of effort, into the export markets. And this is exactly how all Canadian corporations, whether small, medium or large, will get a chance to survive. That is the reason why the government has decided to significantly increase both the credits allocated to the export promotion program, and the financial resources of the Export Development Corporation. If 1980 has been a record year as far as exports are concerned, this is due to all the mechanisms we have set up to help businessmen forge ahead in their quest for new markets outside Canada.

Moreover, the National Research Council has its own industrial research assistance program. Under this program, the council contributes approximately 40 per cent of the total costs of research and development carried out by Canadian corporations. The industrial research and development mini-program implemented in 1979 was aimed at providing additional assistance to small businesses. We seek to encourage small businesses in Canada to participate more resolvedly in research and development activities, to develop new products, since we are all too aware that creativity is found mostly in small businesses. It is a fact that in 1980, small businesses were responsible for 62 per cent of the new jobs created in Canada. As a matter of fact, this sector is responsible for 42 per cent of all the jobs in Canada. It is clear that this government, like the other governments before it, is extremely concerned with the welfare of small businesses, just like all provincial governments for that matter. As I was saying earlier, an additional co-ordinating effort must be made in conjunction with all parties concerned, because as a result of the current fiscal situation, there is no longer any room for competition between the provincial and federal governments to set up programs, because we are all using taxpayers' money.

I suggest that the time has come to accept that when a province decides to support research activities in a particular area, the federal government should avoid getting involved in the same area. I think that we must co-ordinate all federal and provincial policies to help small businesses.

I have referred to the small business development bond program; this assistance, however, is not to be considered as a source of working capital. But I feel that the purpose was to have a special mechanism to favour the growth and development of dynamic small businesses and make it possible for them to purchase any new equipment they need to increase their production. Under item 4 of the small business development bond program, banking and lending institutions may consider using this program to refinance corporations which are facing serious financial difficulties. I think, therefore, that the necessary mechanisms exist to provide assistance in that area.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will remember that some time during the summer, my colleague, the Minister of Supplies and Services (Mr. Blais) and I having told ourselves that the state should serve the small business sector, introduced the subcontracting program. As we know, the federal government is the largest in the country; it spends for goods and services about $4 billion a year. We therefore decided to recommend a subcontracting program providing that for all contracts entered into between the Department of Supply and Services and a supplier, and amounting to $2 million or more, the contractor be required to tender a plan of his subcontracts with small Canadian businesses. Even though at this time about 38 per cent of government purchases in supplies and services, and representing about $1 billion, go to small business, we hope, thanks to this subcontracting program, to reach a target of 45 per cent of all central purchasing, precisely to help small and medium-sized businesses.

In addition to all those programs, as you know Mr. Speaker, there are special tax incentives for small businesses. The main one provides for a lower tax rate on their income. As you are aware, the rate on the first $150,000 earned by a private company under Canadian control is 21 per cent lower than that applying to big business. I know that in all my contacts with the small business community throughout Canada I am often reminded that the amount of $150,000 to which the preferential rate applies has not been changed in four years. I agree that at some time or other that ceiling will have to be raised, when the financial situation of the government allows. Moreover, again in the field of tax measures, let us keep in mind that the carry-over of as much as $200,000 in capital gains in the transfer of small businesses between generations has been proposed. There is also the tax credit on research and development spending by small businesses. Small private Canadian-owned companies that are entitled to the lower tax rate that I mentioned in the first tax measure can also benefit from an investment tax credit of 25 per cent on all their investments in research and development.

There is also the sales tax exemption on manufactured goods of up to $50,000, the tax-free allowance on provincial aid to risk investments such as, for instance, the investments made by the Small Business Ontario Development Corporation, or SODEC, or the Venture Capital Corporation of Nova Scotia. The assistance given by those corporations is tax exempt. The last budget also provides for deduction of the spouse's salary for non-incorporated businesses in Canada, and contains another program I have spoken of at length, the small business development bond.

I now come to the paperwork burden reduction, Mr. Speaker, since I am in charge of that program in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I know that this is one of the most constant and justified concerns of the Canadian small business community. It is figured that the paperwork required by the federal government from the business community, from both large and small businesses in Canada, would each year fill a train stretching from Montreal to Toronto. So this is to say to what extent we are flooded with paperwork, with a multiplicity of forms.

I was a little sorry to hear that the hon. member from the Progressive Conservative party was not aware of what had been achieved by the Paperwork Reduction Bureau, probably because he did not attend my press conferences. I would like to point out to him, for example, that in August of last year I announced a series of 50 measures precisely with a view to reducing the paperwork burden for small businesses in Canada. One of the most important will save about $100 million for the business community because we have limited to six years the retention of business records. Previously, as the hon. member knows, there was no limit, and some businesses kept papers for 50 years —

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You still have to fill out forms!

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): I will come back to that if the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) will allow me to continue. Until last August, the burden of proof lay with businesses. They had to write Department "X", "Y" or "Z" to ask when they would be allowed to destroy those—I was going to say darned papers encumbering their basement, attic and warehouses. The onus is now reversed: We say: "The six-year period is up, you can discard all the old papers". If some departments want businesses to keep records for more than six years, they now have to ask for it and specify why they have to be kept.

So, after six years, businesses no longer need ask permission to destroy their files or records, and the onus is on the department to justify any request for keeping papers going back more than six years. Here is a more practical example: customs and excise regulations were amended and now allow importers to list all their shipments on a single form instead of having to fill out a separate form each time. They remit taxes and charges once a month instead of doing so for every shipment.

Statistics Canada was requested to change a number of inquiries, particularly the monthly inquiry on employment, payrolls and individual hours; it is hoped this will reduce the burden imposed on small businesses, saving them some $35 million. Also, the Department of Labour was requested to review the famous question of the time logbook that every trucker in the country must fill each night.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order! I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time is expired.

[English]

Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): I am thankful to hon. members for allowing me to conclude my remarks. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am very grateful to the hon. member for introducing this motion. I would like to indicate to him that I share his concerns in respect of risk capital, the financing of working capital, the red tape and the matter of research and development, and I accept wholeheartedly his offer to co-operate. To sum up, I would like to submit to the hon. member that at this point in time, if we look at the whole range of loans guaranteed under the Small Businesses Loans Act, all the loans from the Federal Business Development Bank, loans guaranteed under the business development program, the Canadian government currently has upwards of $3 billion in guaranteed loans to small businesses as of May, 1981. And if we add to that business development program grants, grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, grants from the National Research Council of Canada and other departments, we see that some $100 million in grants are extended to small businesses every year. And finally, as far as fiscal measures are concerned, if all revenues lost in the form of either tax deductions, preferred rates or business expansion bonds were added up, they would amount to $2 billion a year of extra help to small businesses. These in my view are huge investments, but admittedly we still have a long way to go, and I count on my colleagues from all sides of the House to help me bring back to a more acceptable level the red tape and regulation burden and create an over-all economic climate that will be more favourable to small business expansion.

[English]

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the minister of state is sincere in his concern for the small business sector. I appreciate his sincerity, but I feel sorry for him. It is obvious that his hands are tied by the more senior cabinet ministers of this administration. They do not share his enthusiasm for small business. If one follows the record of the Trudeau administration, small business has been virtually ignored.

Just over one year ago the Liberal party platform during the election campaign was based on lower inflation, gasoline prices and interest rates. After the Liberals received their mandate presumably to pursue those policies, they instead subjected Canadians to over one year of debate on the Constitution. They virtually ignored the blatant signals of real economic difficulties.

When the constitutional debate left this House a few weeks ago to await the Supreme Court ruling, the first piece of legislation brought forward by the Liberal administration was the youth offenders legislation, followed by the elections act to shorten the period of elections. There has not been anything to deal with economic matters, especially those related to small businessmen. It has only been at the urging of the opposition parties that we have had an opportunity to debate any matters relating to the economy.

During this one-year period of inaction on the economy, gasoline prices increased by 49 cents per gallon and inflation climbed from around 10 per cent to nearly 13 per cent. The biggest culprit damaging the small business sector in Canada has been interest rates, which have now skyrocketed to nearly 20 per cent prime rate. That means small business pays well over that. At the same time, people are losing their homes, business bankruptcies are on the increase and farmers are being forced from the land.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have the gall to maintain that Canadians are much better off than they were a decade ago. I would like to quote from a letter to the editor in today's "Trudeau Star"—I mean the Toronto Star. I believe it expresses the feelings of the majority of Canadians. I quote:

> Regarding the article "No more aid to consumers, Trudeau says," Prime Minister Trudeau's statement to the House of Commons that Canadians' after tax income has risen 50 per cent over the last decade and, therefore, "Canadians are 50 per cent better off, on average, in 1980 than they were in 1970" is asinine.
> In 1970 we bought our home with a 10 per cent mortgage. My husband was and still is a municipal worker and I did not work. Our gas cost $10 a week to go to work and I could feed our family for $35 a week. Our property taxes were $250 a year. We managed on one salary.
> Ten years later, my husband's salary has increased—averaged over 10 years—approximately 60 per cent. This does sound fantastic!
> But it now costs us $30 per week for gas to go back and forth to work—an increase of 200 per cent. The mortgage rate is now 18 per cent, if you're lucky—an 80 per cent increase. It costs us $85 per week for food—another increase of almost 150 per cent and our taxes have more than doubled.
> I could go on and on with percentages of price increases, but I think every working Canadian family knows this.
> I now have a full time job myself, out of sheer necessity, and then I pick up the paper and read we are 50 per cent better off now than we were 10 years ago.
> Garbage!
> Trudeau's statement is an insult to my intelligence and the sooner he and Finance Minister Allan MacEachen get down off their high horses and start doing something to get Canada out of this economic mess it's in, the better off all Canadians will be.

I read that into the record because, from talking to my constituents and people across the country, I feel it exemplifies the feelings of Canadians today regarding the inaction of this government. The Minister of Finance says that high interest rates will reduce inflation. That is hogwash. The higher the interest rates, the more a businessman has to spend to finance his company. He will pass along the cost of that increase in his product to the consumer, the consumer will have to pay that much more and that feeds inflation. Economists do not often agree on anything, but they do agree that high interest rates feed inflation.

Government spending continues to rise. Government spending is the main reason for domestically caused inflation. There is no question about that. Last year this government spent an estimated $67.6 billion. Projected costs of services to government increased again this year by $4.7 billion. The Liberal government is spending at the rate of $129,000 per minute, 24 hours a day. It is the inability, ineffectiveness and obvious non-urgency of the Liberal administration which are causing the problems in our economy.

When they were in opposition, the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance condemned the PC government for trying to reduce government spending in the civil service in order to reduce inflation and, therefore, interest rates. During the election campaign, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) promised to resign if interest rates did not go down if and when the Liberals again formed the government. The Liberals again form the government, interest rates have skyrocketed and the minister is still here, he is not resigning. On October 30, 1979, while a member of the loyal opposition, the same minister said:

> Because of the harmful effects of high interest rates on consumers, businessmen, especially small businessmen, and the entire economy, there should be an urgent study by the finance committee, where the Governor of the Bank of Canada would come, and the Minister of Finance.

He went on to say to the then finance minister, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

I want to point out to you that your high interest rate policy would slow down the economy, it will mean the loss of thousands of jobs; it will mean increases in the cost of living. It will probably bring the housing and construction industry to a halt, with thousands of jobs being lost in these sectors.

How right he was, Mr. Speaker. Even so, the Progressive Conservative Party went on to meet his challenge by introducing a budget that would have returned purchasing power to the lower and middle-income earners. We were prepared to implement a small business policy that would meet the real needs of the vital sector of our economy. We reduced government spending and provided incentive to business and individuals. We proposed energy tax rebates to lower and middle-income families, an employment tax credit, and a mortgage and property tax reduction for middle and low-income families. We proposed all of these things, yet the government had the gall to tell us that interest was too high when it was below 14 per cent at the time and to defeat a budget which would have reduced interest rates and inflation even more.

What has this government done? It has initiated a debate on the Constitution for a year and has brought forward the young offenders legislation and things of that nature without having the least bit of compassion for the small businessman in this country or, indeed, for the individual across the land. Naturally every Canadian and every sector of the Canadian economy is adversely affected by this lack of action on the part of this insensitive and arrogant Liberal administration.

The one sector that is affected most by this lack of action is the small business community. We have said over and over again that the small business sector of this country is the backbone of our economy. It is the largest potential employing sector in Canada. In fact, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) just stated it employed over 60 per cent of the labour force in Canada last year. This is why the Progressive Conservative Party has moved this motion today, and I should like to take the time to read it into the record once more:

That this House condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of its high interest policy and for its failure to assist the small business sector in Canada

(1) by increasing and extending the small business development bond program;

(2) by encouraging venture capital investment by means of appropriate tax adjustments;

(3) by relieving the small business sector from the massive weight of government regulation; and

(4) by fostering the research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian businesses of all sizes.

I very seldom get angry, but I am getting fed up and very angry about this inaction. I have talked to small businessmen in my constituency and across the country, and they are angry about the inability and the inaction of this government to take the necessary steps to reduce inflation by reducing government spending and bringing down interest rates. It is a cop-out to tie interest rates to the weekly bond issue, as the Prime Minister has done, and therefore absolve himself from the responsibility for high interest rates. It is a cop-out even to tie them to United States rates. They should not be tied to United States rates. We must accept temporarily lower exchange rates for the Canadian dollar if we untie interest rates from U.S. rates, I agree, but I believe, as does the majority of businessmen, that we will temporarily have to suffer a tougher exchange on the dollar if we are to bring interest rates down. The government must act on this question.

I feel sorry for the Minister of State for Small Businesses because he is not allowed to act on his own. It is obvious that in dealing with interest rates his hands are tied. He just had an opportunity to take some specific action in reducing interest rates but he could not do so.

The small business development program should be extended beyond 1981. The government did not want to extend it even to the end of this year. It was as a result of urging by my colleagues, myself and others in opposition and across the country that finally the government reluctantly moved to extend the program. It should be extended for another one, two or three years so that businessmen can make long-range plans instead of depending on the ad hoc, band-aid approaches and temporary programs this government has set up.

Perhaps the small business development bond program should be expanded to include venture working capital, because businesses cannot continue to carry inventory, payrolls and day after day production paying over 20 per cent in interest. Small business development bonds do not cover working or venture capital.

Perhaps loans under the small business development bond program should be tax deductible in order to benefit small businesses with profits as well as those which are not in the black. Profit should not be considered a dirty word—something which has resulted from this Liberal administration's policy. Businesses with profits today cannot deduct the interest paid on borrowings made under the small business development bond provisions. Therefore, profits from that bond program are minimal. The rates are nearly parallel to conventional loans.

The Minister of Finance has said from time to time that the government cannot afford to do this. Let me refer very quickly to a study made by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business on the economic impact of the small business development bond. It concluded that there was no net cost to the federal treasury for small business development bonds, but an actual gain of $77 million in the first year of the program. Surely that reduces the validity of the argument of the Minister of Finance that it is too costly a program. He just does not care about small businessmen and the interest rates they are paying today.

Since my time is running out perhaps I could make one final recommendation. I have nothing against profits. As I just said, profit has become a dirty word around this place in recent years, but I think profits tend to create productivity and expansion of businesses. However, during these present circumstances the high bank profits of today should be channelled into loans at preferential rates for small businesses guaranteed by the government. This could be done through the existing Small Loans Act under which the government is already guaranteeing chartered bank loans at prime plus one, I believe it is. The minister of state boasts about the number of loans the government is guaranteeing under this act, but does the guaranteeing of loans at 21 per cent or perhaps 22 per cent help small business? I do not think it does and nor do small businessmen. This preferential rate should be tied to the cost of living or the inflation rate. These are some of the things that should be considered.

Unless immediate action is taken to bring down interest rates in this country, particularly in the small business sector, we will lose this sector as we now know it. It will no longer exist. This country was built through incentives, initiatives and the well-being of small businessmen. This is what we can grow from and build in the future, but what is this government doing? It is reducing small business to a small portion of our economic productivity, because small businesses are now dependent on the government's actions which cause them to suffer 20 per cent interest rates and more on their borrowings.

I do not care if we have to sit here for months on end, but if this Parliament does nothing else it should lower interest rates. The only way to do so is to start by providing preferential interest rates to the small business sector.

In closing, let me say that my colleagues have talked about regulations, directives and controls. These things still exist and they must be replaced by incentives. We must give tax rebates and other incentives to those small businesses which invest in research and development. We should provide an incentive tax credit to any Canadian citizen who makes a direct investment in the equity of a Canadian-owned business. Incentives must replace the many stringent regulations and controls that have been established during the Liberal reign in the last ten years. It is time the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister put small business where it belongs, and that is at the top of their list of priorities.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF FAILURE TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kempling:

That this House condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of its high interest policy and for its failure to assist the small business sector in Canada

(1) by increasing and extending the small business development bond program;

(2) by encouraging venture capital investment by means of appropriate tax adjustments;

(3) by relieving the small business sector from the massive weight of government regulation; and

(4) by fostering the research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian businesses of all sizes.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, this is the third almost consecutive day that the business of the House has given us the opportunity to discuss the issue of high interest rates, and it is unfortunate that some forget to look at the problem in its general context. The opposition condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of high interest rates, as though short-term high interest rates did not result in the long run into a decrease in inflation and consequently in interest rates.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, we were able to explain last week in what context the current high interest rates in Canada had to be considered during the debate on the motion introduced by the New Democratic Party which suggested that interest rates in Canada were being set outside the country. We saw how economic conditions caused inflationary pressures and expectations, how these pressures resulted in certain monetary and fiscal policies which brought about higher interest rates, and how, if we wanted to have an effective policy against inflation, we had to suffer in the short term the unfortunate effects of certain measures so as to meet this medium and long-term objective of fighting against inflation.

What I find surprising is that after the motion of the New Democratic Party, a motion for the Progressive Conservative party was introduced by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). He blamed, of course, the government for its high interest rates, and singled out as one of the causes the very large government deficit and the unlimited expenditures of the central government.

Mr. Speaker, the members opposite, especially on the side of the Progressive Conservatives, should make up their mind and decide whether we should reduce the deficit as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has undertaken to do and is now doing, or else they should say unequivocally that they do not believe in reducing the deficit, and do what the hon. member has done today and ask the government to increase its expenditures and extend the program of small business development bonds. The hon. member who has just spoken told us, on the basis of solid Social Crediter arithmetic, that this measure would cost the government nothing. He said that it would cost nothing and would even bring revenue to the government. He would have to prove it, and he has not done so yet. However, it is a well-known fact that a tax credit allows a business to deduct from its payable tax part of the interest due on its loan and also allows a lending institution to deduct from its revenue that part of the interest it will not collect. One has to calculate like a Social Crediter to suggest that it does not cost the government a thing because revenues not collected by the government are losses, and a tax expenditure, whether it is a taxation or a budgetary item, is an expenditure all the same.

I want to believe in authoritative arguments, but in arithmetic as in taxation, such arguments are inconclusive. Even if Mr. Y said that a tax expenditure does not cost anything, we can very well believe him, but let us ask him to explain how a tax expenditure does not cost anything to the government.

When amendments to the Income Tax Act were considered—if I am not mistaken, it was in early February—several members in all corners of the House, especially the Minister of State for Small Businesses, urged the government to extend the small business development loan. We remember that the Minister of Finance had rightly and reluctantly agreed to extend for another year the small business development loan. He did it for two reasons: first, because of the economic circumstances, high interest rates being prejudicial to the development of small business, and second—keep in mind that we were then still in a recession—in order to promote economic development. Small and medium-sized highly job-oriented businesses would be in a position to make further investments in order to give a new economic impetus.

The minister responsible told us a while ago how the government, with that small business development bond, with others institutions under his jurisdiction and with other government programs especially under the aegis of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, promotes the development of small business and enables it not only to get through the difficult times we are now experiencing but to develop further in spite of those difficult times.

There was also some reference to tax measures designed to encourage small business risk capital. As for that particular aspect of risk capital, I should like to point out that the government has taken several steps to ensure the development of small businesses in a sound and favourable climate. Obviously, the measure I have just spoken of is of great importance to the development of small businesses, but we also have tax measures that are of great benefit to them. All privately-owned Canadian businesses enjoy a major income tax concession. The federal income tax rate that applies to them is 15.75 per cent as compared with the normal 37.8 per cent applied to big companies, or compared with the income tax rate that applies to foreign-controlled companies. In other words, the tax rate applied to small Canadian-owned companies, that is, 15.75 per cent, is roughly about half that applied to foreign-owned companies. So, when I am asked to provide special tax measures for risk capital, I say that having an income tax rate of barely half that normally applied to companies is clearly an advantageous tax measure, and it already exists, Mr. Speaker.

In the case of the profits of Canadian manufacturing and processing firms, the rate applied to small businesses is even lower than the privileged rate of 15.75 per cent I have been discussing; it stands at 10.5 per cent compared to the current rate of 31.5 per cent applied to unincorporated businesses. That substantially lower rate is clearly of special advantage to small Canadian business; it also represents an important federal government tax measure aimed at encouraging risk capital investment in small and medium-sized businesses. That type of tax expenditure in terms of lower tax rates amounts to about $1 billion in revenue losses for the Canadian treasury for the year 1979.

Research and development has also been mentioned, Mr. Speaker. In the field of taxation we also have an extremely important measure concerning research and development: a 25 per cent tax credit for investment in research and development in the case of expenses incurred by Canadian small businesses. A 25 per cent tax credit has to be a rather generous measure. Other tax measures are aimed at supporting provincial programs covering venture capital investment. There is also a refundable 25 per cent tax exemption on investment dividends when the investor company is eligible as a venture capital company under certain provincial programs.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, we are being urged to come up with special tax measures designed to promote research and development as well as venture capital investment, and it has been shown that our tax system already features measures applicable to any of the measures which the opposition is calling for.

Above all I would like to insist on the fact that three of the four suggestions made in the motion openly call for government expenditures. And yet, last week, the same Progressive Conservative party asked the government to reduce its deficit and its expenditures. Cut down your spending! Cut down the public deficit! But at the same time, hardly one day later, they forget everything they asked for and say: boost expenditures by extending the small business development bond program and by encouraging venture capital investment through tax measures. Where is the logic in that? It is the logic of the illogical Conservative policies. Now either you believe in the cutback approach or you do not. But if you do not, then you have to be consistent and stop behaving like a weathercock changing your views from day to day in an effort to gain some of the popularity that has been escaping you for some years now, and I am talking about the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) dealt eloquently with the third item, since he is responsible for lessening the burden of regulation and red tape which weighs down Canadian business. It is his responsibility and he is supported in his efforts by the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), and I certainly hope that with their combined efforts they will be able to lighten the burden of regulation and red tape which small business must now contend with.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to recall that the aim of this government is to fight against inflation so that in the short and mid-term, with a more balanced economy and improved economic health, Canadians will be better off. By trying to relieve some sectors, either temporarily by subsidies, or directly, or by tax deductions, we would only be destroying with the left hand what the right hand is trying to do as a matter of policy, that is to lessen inflationary pressures so as to have lower interest rates resulting from a more stable economy.

That was the basis and the outline of the budget the Minister of Finance introduced last October. I for one am convinced that if we pursue with determination this policy of reducing the federal deficit, of controlling expenditures, and of implementing a gradualist monetary policy, we will in the mid-term achieve a more stable economy, lower interest rates and a lower inflation rate.

[English]

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today on a matter which I am sure is of extreme importance to all Canadians. In following the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) I think there are several comments that are appropriate, particularly to the references he has made both to the small business development bond and in terms of the government's monetary policy.

Perhaps one of the handicaps he has in looking at this is the advice of the same people who have been guiding the economic policy of the government for some years now, but I would like to refer him to a comment made May 20 in The Globe and Mail which was attributed to Walter Gordon, a previous minister of finance. Mr. Gordon, who was chairman of the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy, said at a press conference that the current high interest rate policy is fuelling, not fighting, inflation. The bank's present course has itself been a part of the problem rather than part of the solution.

The minister has just said that you get four different economists and four different policies. I suppose that is true. Perhaps it makes the objective assessment of what should really be done difficult, but at the very least it should bring into question the type of policy the government is following at the present time. Some of the other comments that have been made—and there have been many things written about this lately—would suggest indeed that the options of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) are limited to the point where he is waiting to see what will happen with inactivity on his part. Indeed, as we recess for the summer the government will have an opportunity to remove itself from some of the pressure coming from a number of areas and different interest groups in the country that are feeling specific pressure for specific reasons, most of which are not of their own making.

As an example—and this stems from one of the comments of the minister in the House today—it is very difficult to believe he is not aware of what is going on in the country. He seemed to suggest that he did not believe that farmers were in more difficulty, that people were actually having to walk away from homes, that small businesses were experiencing increased bankruptcies.

I think the first thing that has to happen if there is to be any movement in this whole area is that the government must recognize the problem, but in light of the kind of comments that the Minister of Finance has been making it appears that he does not recognize the problem. I would extend to him an invitation, as I am sure most members on both sides of the House would, to go out into the country and talk to people; not just those who have experienced bankruptcies, but people who are forced to leave their businesses or who decide they can no longer hang in there.

I can tell the minister that in one area alone where I made an effort to draw up some statistics we are facing a situation where on a year over year basis we will have nearly five times the number of people who may not face the spectre of bankruptcy but who will be forced, because of a change in their equity position in terms of their debt load, to get out of the business they are in, whether it be agriculture or otherwise. The number of farms for sale, particularly in my area, is expected to be 300 per cent higher this year than last year simply because of the economic climate the government is fostering now.

Also in his comments, the minister suggested that the reduction of the federal deficit was one of the prime efforts of the government. If we look at the deficit position of the government in the last year, it seems to me we are actually looking at an increase of $4 billion over what was projected in the Crosbie budget. I do not want to compare two different budgets, but in terms of looking at this as a mechanism for lowering inflation, I do not know from where the minister gets his figures. I have heard this several times in the House, but every time I look at the figures I realize they do not agree with his comments. Perhaps he would at some time try to bring me up to date on what kind of figures he is drawing from.

In this year alone government expenditures have risen to approximately $62 billion and the deficit is up to $14 billion. They are clearly giant increases in each area. It portends even worse for the future. In 1983, 1984 and 1985 we will be looking at yearly government expenditures somewhere near $90 billion. This is not in agreement with the kinds of things the minister has said.

I should like to comment briefly on what he said concerning the small business development bond. A previous speaker on this side of the House suggested that if the small business development bond were expanded, it would allow business to take advantage of lower interest rates. This would help them increase their activities and avoid bankruptcy. The minister suggested that it was costing the government a lot of money and that the presentation which has been made was not accurate.

Because there are a number of different economic theories from different economists, I think it is reasonable to quote one economist who suggested very strongly that we would benefit from this type of move because of the activity it would generate in the economy and, in the long run, tax dollars would be generated; this would return funds to the government. I think this is the idea of the hon. member. Certainly it suggests that the minister should rethink his position and perhaps take a look at a fresh viewpoint, rather that sticking with the same kind of attitude that has been adopted hitherto.

In a recent book entitled "How Ottawa Spends Your Tax Dollars", Bruce Doern noted that the Liberals have abandoned social priorities of the Pearson era and that a prime example is its failure to cushion lower-income groups from the effects of higher oil and gas prices as in the 1979 Crosbie tax credit.

In the perspective of economic distress under which we are now, I suggest very strongly that we are not dealing with the social aspects of what we are supposed to be doing or what I suggest we should try to do. The difference between lower and upper-income people and the number of people below the poverty line is increasing, not decreasing. We are not accomplishing the transfer of benefits to lower income groups, although it is suggested that we are doing all these things economically on behalf of the nation at large.

Much has been said about the government's interest rate policy, its impact on small business, and the way in which it is addressed. The Canadian Institute for Economic Policy indicated that small and medium-sized business, most of which are Canadian-owned, are borrowing heavily from the banks for their capital requirements. Many of these businesses have been driven into bankruptcy; they are in situations where they have no recourse but to go into bankruptcy.

Perhaps it is a sad commentary that one of the major bills before the House of Commons now is the bankruptcy bill. A bill addressing economic issues rather than bankruptcies would give a more favourable light to what are the activities and priorities of government. The number of bankruptcies in March, 1981 was 29 per cent higher than a year ago according to the figures of the institute. We heard a number of figures today, including 17 per cent and 18 per cent. Whatever it is, it is a significant amount. As was mentioned, even that amount does not address the entire problem because it does not indicate the number of people who are voluntarily withdrawing from business rather than face full bankruptcy.

There has been mention of the automobile industry. One of the more interesting and important viewpoints on this subject came recently from the United States and was published in the Atlantic Monthly. It drew a comparison between the automobile industry in North America and the automobile industry in Japan. Although we are addressing small business, I mention this becaause of the differentiation between small business and large business. Whether it is a large energy project or whatever the megaprojects will be, whether in fact it is agriculture versus small business, most come down to some common denominators. Certainly one major common denominator is the cost of borrowing money in order to do business.

The automobile industry in North America is experiencing severe distress. In the last year alone, Ford experienced a massive deficit of approximately $1.5 billion and Chrysler had losses of $1.7 billion. The market share of the North American industry has decreased significantly as Japanese models have come on stream.

There are many factors in this area. Many Canadians who have bought foreign cars tell us about their quality and the terrific relationship between Japanese workers and their parent organizations, as well as a number of other things.

The research and development aspect is perhaps one of the most important, but we should consider the amount of capital reinvested in research and development, the manner in which products are brought on stream and organized, as well as the entire series of marketing and other manoeuvres. The research and development aspect is one in which Canada in particular is vulnerable, as many people know, in a number of ways. It is vulnerable in the immediate sense in that we have not been able to maintain the competitive aspects either at the research and development level or at the fully developed and commercialization phase. This speaks to the co-ordinating activity of the government as a prime mover in research and development. Regardless of its dedication to providing a certain percentage of the gross national product, allowing certain programs, a tax credit system or whatever mechanism it chooses, something has been lacking.

There are specific examples in a number of areas. However, the government has been lacking in the management aspect of the whole scene. This management aspect must be improved in terms of providing a relationship and a linkage between universities, government and business itself, particularly small business. Small business does not really have the facilities or the resources to develop products or do basic research on things which would be in their best interest, such as their product lines or things they would like to be innovative in. This was the consistent finding across Canada at all provincial government levels with which I had the opportunity to have discussions. It is something which has not been addressed meaningfully in the activities I have seen occurring or in government programming.

As the government looks at a five-year program in research and development, it is still treading lightly and very hesitantly in terms of adopting a full program. This is precisely the point. The management aspect of it requires a long-range view. It requires a consistency in funding and in programming. Indeed, it requires an understanding of the required management capabilities in order to be effective.

In a broader sense, I think the Canadian nuclear industry has been faced with the same thing. I mention that as an example since there is a recent reference to it which I think should be read by many people who are interested in this area. I am speaking about the Secor report which addresses Canada's situation in terms of the development of its research and the international aspect of what is quickly becoming a high cost and high technology area. The Candu reactor is a prime example of this.

There are many other areas which we will be developing, but the Secor report breaks down these so-called high cost and high technology areas into three or four major points. The report suggests that these areas have common factors in the global market and that the systems must really be sold across international boundaries in order to maintain a viable industry. The report states that these systems should be competitive in an international sense, that is, competing with other people in other countries at all times and continuing to do so. The competition must be won if these industries are to survive.

Finally, it is mentioned that there should be a technology push, that it is necessary and important to maintain technology investment and to keep up with changes in a technological way in terms of refinements which will allow industry to maintain whatever market share they have. These are matters which have never before been addressed in Canada. It does not appear as though they will be addressed in Canada.

I think the whole system suffers simply because we do not have the management or involvement that we will need if we are to keep up with international competition and if we want this high technology to survive. One of the major points which I think must be made is that if we do not choose to do this, or if we are unable to achieve it, whilst remaining competitive—unless we go the route of continual subsidies—then we will put ourselves back into a state where we are only able to provide raw resources. It is as simple as that. We do not have a great number of options from which to choose. We must face the international marketplace and its requirements. This issue must be faced in a meaningful way, not just in terms of one big industry but in terms of the peripheral activities which take place and which cause our economy to function.

I draw attention to the tar sands projects. The Financial Post has suggested that one of the few short-term hopes we have is in the area of tar sands development and heavy oil projects, that if we do not get them off the ground with the investment they require and do not realize the economic activity they will generate for small industries across the country, we will be out of luck in three or four years.

I think it was interesting to hear the minister of state suggest that with the programs the government has in place now we will not be out of trouble any sooner than three or four years. That is a comment made by another economist, not by myself. He says it will take that long to achieve the effect we want—at least three or four years before we will achieve the desired result. I do not think we can wait that long. I know that a great many small businesses and industries involved in agriculture simply will not survive unless there is some short-term redress to the problem which they are facing today.

One other point I would like to mention with regard to research and development which the government has missed to date is with regard to equipment. We could take a great deal of time to talk about what kind of training we must have. However, the limited time allotted to me at this juncture does not allow for that. There has been an additional assessment of the kinds of equipment our universities have and what is happening to our basic research and development programs at that level.

A task force which reported during the last few months has found that we are about ten years behind—most of our equipment is at about the ten-year vintage. While that speaks well for the maintainers of our technological equipment, it has put us out of the race in a great many high technology areas. We have been left behind because of the rapid change in equipment and the ability to maintain a competitive position is just not there. We have old equipment which will require a massive amount of investment in order to upgrade it. This task force report is available through the National Science and Engineering Research Council of Canada and I think would be worth while for many people to look at.

The Science Council report states in part:

> Complex scientific, technological and economic problems of the future cannot be met by using second rate institutions to generate new concepts and to train the manpower required.

Several times the priorities of the government have been mentioned and what has been done in the last year or so. I have a list before me of the government's priorities. At the top of the list, as we all know, is the Constitution, which has really taken a great deal of our energy. It is still very much unresolved and is a matter which still has to be addressed.

Returning to the list, the budget follows the Constitution in terms of priority. The number of budgetary measures which actually address the short-term economic problems which we face have been very few indeed. Next on the list come the National Energy Program, the western Canada strategy and a review of major social policy arrangements.

What has really been lacking is a sense of urgency with regard to making the economy the first priority. Until the government admits that the country is having difficulties we will not attain the appropriate priority this situation demands. We will continue to meet the foil of matters like the Constitution, matters of social policy and the like, which are not really addressing the real short-term needs of Canadians.

There are many things which can be said, but I feel that the major emphasis as far as research and development is concerned is that we must have a government which is sensitive, not just to simple funding, but to the entire concept of managing these programs. Co-operation among our universities, small businessmen and governments must be encouraged if we are to facilitate the basis for economic recovery in our country.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege this afternoon to assess for the edification of members of this House the relationships that this administration has established and can be expected to promote between the federal government, research and development and the business community.

I would like to open my remarks by insisting that, the criticisms of the opposition notwithstanding, this government places a high priority on fostering research and development in industry, assisting companies of all sizes to increase their growth and profitability through the performance of R and D and by applying new technologies to their operations.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) announced the federal government's intention to foster an increase in national R and D expenditures to 1.5 per cent of GNP by 1985. Within this over-all target, it is proposed that the federal government's expenditures should rise from .4 per cent of GNP to .5 per cent, that industry shares should rise from .4 per cent to .75 per cent and that the balance of .25 per cent should be financed by the provinces, the universities and others.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the largest increases in research and development will be required in the industrial sector, and the federal government intends to continue to place a high priority on assisting Canadian companies to undertake profitable research and development activities. It is equally clear, as most hon. members already know, that the major role will have to be played by the industrial companies themselves, but I hasten to add they will be greatly assisted by a business environment in which innovative activities are strongly encouraged.

The federal government has long recognized the importance of supporting research and development activities, and has therefore introduced a range of incentive programs and taxation incentives which, I believe it is fair to say, are among the most generous in the world. For example, very substantial financial assistance has been given to companies such as Pratt & Whitney, de Havilland, Canadair, and Bombardier, as well as many others in the high technology sectors of Canadian industry.

To focus on an area of particular importance, I would direct the attention of the House to the federal government's announcement of April, 1979, which initiated a special electronics program to introduce the secondary industry in Canada to the benefits of using microelectronics in their manufacturing processes and product design. The first part of this program consists of grants for major projects in all sectors of the manufacturing industry. Two very substantial grants have already been made under this section of the program, one to Mitel, and the other to Sentrol. However, it would be wrong to give the impression that only large companies in the electronics area can gain from this program. A number of smaller companies have applied—in the food, textiles, metals processing, and other industrial sectors—and grants have been approved for monitoring of diesel engines for small fishing vessels, pantyhose manufacturing, and control systems for bakery operations, while others are expected to be approved in the near future.

A second part of this program will promote the awareness of Canadian companies of the importance of applying microelectronics technology to their operations. In considering the role of technology, we must recognize the importance of the application of technology to industrial processes, in order to make the processes more productive and competitive. It is not only the supply of high technology products to world markets which is important—it is absolutely vital that we increase the productivity of all our manufacturing and processing operations if we are to prosper, or, perhaps, even to survive, in the future. So, I can assure the House that the federal government intends to play its role in order to ensure that Canadian companies are aware of the importance of the application of technology.

A large proportion of financial assistance in support of R and D has gone to the larger companies, for the simple reason that their research and development operations are much larger than those of smaller companies. Nevertheless, a substantial amount of assistance has been provided to smaller companies. Departments of the federal government, including the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, have regional offices in all parts of the country for the purpose of ensuring that assistance from the federal government is as effective as possible.

A large number of smaller companies have also been assisted through a variety of institutions which have been established under programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am pleased to say that over $23 million have been invested in the establishment of 27 of these institutions, which provide research and development, testing and technical training services to industry in a variety of industrial sectors and in all regions of Canada.

It is well known that small companies have a difficult time in commercializing technology and starting up new companies, especially those which involve inventions and technical ideas. To provide such assistance to small companies, and even private individuals, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has financed the start-up of two industrial innovation centres, one located at the University of Waterloo and the other at École Polytechnique in Montreal.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a number of other programs to support industrial R and D. First, there is the Enterprise Development Program which will normally support 75 per cent of the direct costs of product and process development projects and market and productivity improvement studies. This program is administered, in the main, by the regional offices of DITC in the ten provinces in order that its application and use will be closely based on the needs of the various regions of Canada. Because of the criteria used in project selection, this program has been of particular assistance to small and medium-sized business.

Total spending under the program in 1980-81 was about $38 million, and it is estimated that approximately $2.0 billion of product sales will result over a period of five years.

The equivalent of the EDP program for those industries—primarily electronics and aerospace that are in the business of providing high technology military equipment for export market requirements—is the Defence Industry Productivity, DIP, Program. Under this program the federal government shares the cost of product developments related to export military markets as well as the costs of acquisition of modern production equipment. DIPP spending for the 1980-81 fiscal year is about $120 million and is expected to rise to over $150 million in 1981-82.

The National Research Council's Industrial Research Assistance Program, IRAP, and the Program Industry Laboratory Project, PILP, are other government vehicles for promoting and supporting industrial research and development in industry. Under these programs, financial support is provided for selected industrial research projects of good potential. During the period from April, 1962, to March 31, 1981, IRAP supported 1,313 projects from 655 companies for a total contribution of $183 million. It is estimated that each dollar of funding produced $20 of sales on average. IRAP's budget for 1981-82 will be about $29.4 million of which some $2 million will be directed towards companies with less that 100 employees. Approximately 400 projects from industry have been supported under the PILP program since its inception in 1975 for a total contribution of about $40 million. Is is expected some $12 million will be spent in the 1981-82 fiscal year.

In addition to these specific programs, the federal government has adopted a contracting-out policy for its own R and D requirements. The objective is to increase Canadian industry's R and D and innovative capability. Under this policy, federal government departments must contract out their R and D requirements to the private sector, except in those instances where there are compelling reasons for the work to be done in government laboratories themselves. In 1980-81 approximately $139 million was spent under 2,500 individual contracts.

In the important field of energy, the federal government is currently contributing some $15 million to the private sector for R and D work in renewable forms of energy—such as solar and biomass—and in energy conservation in industrial processes. In addition, $3 million is being provided for research on improved methods of extracting crude oil from tar sands and heavy oil deposits and in coal gasification and liquefaction.

In total, the federal government contributed some $264 million in grants and contracts to industry in 1980-81 for industrially initiated R and D. That figure is expected to increase to well over $300 million in 1981-82.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I have provided this House with convincing evidence of the federal government's resolve to assist companies of all sizes to develop a technological capability, to perform R and D which will assist them to meet the challenges which Canada must face in domestic and international markets, and to apply new technology to their processes so that they can remain competitive and productive in the face of international competition. I realize, of course, that government programs are not the whole story, by a long shot. Canadian industry must share its burden of the responsibility to remain innovative and competitive as I am sure it will, and thus ensure a sustained economic growth in Canada.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak on this motion introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling).

Each morning as I walk to my office I find myself pausing frequently to enjoy the beauty of the Parliament Buildings and surrounding grounds. Inevitably my eyes are drawn to the top of the Peace Tower. There, night and day in all seasons, is the flag of this great nation at once both a symbol and a commitment, a symbol of a land of freedom and opportunity; a commitment that the people of this land will keep it ever so.

But today as I looked at that flag, I was struck with the contrast evident between potential and reality. It came to mind that, given the record of this government, the flag should have been flying upside down. It should be flying upside down, not as a gesture of disrespect but in compliance with the international code of distress. This country is not only in distress, it is in severe distress. This country is in serious condition, and a great many of us are well aware of it. And because of the calculated indifference of this government, things seem to be getting worse. There is no doubt that everything else is upside down, so why not the flag? Is the government waiting perhaps until the economic chaos it has created gets so bad that it will simply then hoist the white flag of surrender? A good many of us feel the government should do that already.

The government is forcing thousands of Canadians to surrender. Every day that passes, more and more Canadians have to surrender their homes, their farms, their businesses and their jobs. Pretty soon we will all be waving white flags because there will be nothing more to surrender. There are others on this side of the House who have repeatedly and urgently tried to get the government to take responsible action to eliminate the mess we are now in. They have spoken of the plight of thousands of Canadians. They have dealt with the general situation and with particular segments. I join in condemning this government and wish to draw attention to a particular community in this country which is among those most hard hit by this government's economic mismanagement. I am speaking of the thousands and thousands of small businessmen in all provinces and in every sector of this country.

This government has subjected the small business community to a number of financially punishing burdens. The relentless push to metric conversion is a perfect example of this. Converting to the metric system has been a monetary nightmare for the business community and consequently the consumer.

Conversion in the retail food sector, forcing grocers to switch meat and produce scales from ounces and pounds to grams and kilograms, could cost us as much as $200 million. I noted the comments of the New Democratic critic, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis). I also noted the comments of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) who seemed to raise his eyebrows at that amount, implying he thought it was a ridiculous figure. I believe he quoted conversion costs as amounting to between $45,000 and $48,000. I presume he meant that $45,000 to $48,000 would apply to certain individual stores. He is shaking his head. But I am quite sure that for Eaton's, Simpsons, and the Bay the cost of conversion will be a lot higher than $50,000. It was mentioned earlier by other speakers that the majority of the metric scales will have to be purchased abroad which, in turn, will provide jobs outside of the country instead of here in Canada. This relentless target date of January 1, 1982, is certainly unpopular.

One grocer in a metric conversion test area said that he had to pay $900 to convert his scale, and the test cost him $100,000 in lost sales when customers went elsewhere.

An overwhelming majority of businessmen and consumers are opposed to metric conversion. But this government has never shown the slightest inclination or willingness to respond to public opinion, and there is no indication that it ever will. The devastating impact of the fiscal ineptitude of this government is quickly and painfully destroying hundreds of small businesses in this country every day. Because the small businessman and businesswoman live in the shadow of the giant corporations, the impact is harder for many to recognize.

There are over one million small businesses in Canada and they create two thirds of the jobs. Small businesses in this country generate at least 20 per cent of the value of all goods and services produced. The small business community is obviously a vital segment in our economy, a very important constituency that cannot and should not be treated in an offhand manner.

I am sure that the minister for small businesses understands this. I would suggest to him though that he ensure that his own aides realize it as well. It was disturbing to learn that a call to his office last week to obtain figures on the small businesses which I have just cited resulted in a reply that the office kept no such figures, and the suggestion was made that the caller try elsewhere. Surely the credibility of a minister is in question when people in the minister's own office plead ignorance when asked the most basic of questions. I heard the minister today give some indication as to the importance of small business. If people in his own office do not seem to have this information, I would suggest that he have his aides read his speech carefully so they will have it. If small businesses were to operate in the same manner as some of the people in the minister's office, they would soon be out of business. One would think, given the reams and reams of paperwork forced on small businesses by the government, that statistics would be crowding the minister right out of his office.

For years the small business community has been inundated with mandatory government forms. Some businessmen and women spend about as much time on government paper work as they do in operating their own businesses. This pile of paper, completed under duress, is both annoying and costly. It is frequently unnecessary. The small businessman and woman, not having the resources to hire high-priced lawyers or accountants like their multinational counterparts, must shoulder the paper work burden alone. A good many of them burn the midnight oil in order to complete these many forms. Some of the paper work these days involves government bankruptcy forms.

There are more bankruptcies in small businesses than in any other segment of the economy. We heard statistics and figures given showing just how many bankruptcies there are at the present time. Thanks to the government's acceptance of the policy of higher and higher interest rates, many small businesses have gone under, and there are reportedly hundreds more which are on the verge of bankruptcy.

Just this past weekend I spoke to two or three of the businessmen in my community. One in particular, a hardware merchant, mentioned the high interest rate he was paying on loans, I believe it was 21 per cent. This is a staggering amount. It is also a reason why so many small businesses are in such serious condition.

People all across the country, who have worked hard enough to save money to start their own businesses and who have put in long hours to make sure their business remains viable, are now losing everything. Many of them mortgaged their own homes as collateral to help their businesses get started or to expand and are, therefore, in a position now where they may even be losing their own homes.

When small businesses fail, the owners of those businesses are not the only ones affected. Their businesses, collectively, employ millions of people. In fact, the majority of working men and women in this country work for small firms, not for large corporations and not for government. Therefore, when a business goes bankrupt, the unemployment level rises. When hundreds of businesses go under, thousands of people lose their jobs. This tragic situation did not occur overnight. On the contrary, things have been getting progressively worse for months. When members on this side of the House were requesting urgent and immediate action on economic issues, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had more important matters. The Prime Minister had his Constitution and his charter of rights and, to him, these were of prime importance. We are well aware they took up the time of the House of Commons for months. They were concluded only recently, having been sent to the Supreme Court.

A place in the history of the nation will be valueless if the nation itself is destroyed. With the constitutional issue now before the Supreme Court, the Prime Minister wants to reassure the nation that the economy is headed in the right direction. To demonstrate that he is taking things seriously, he has spoken of holding a federal-provincial meeting on economic issues. If such a meeting is held, the climate of consensus would hardly be achieved.

How could the provincial premiers be expected to consult, exchange views and attempt to resolve problems with the very man who, during the constitutional debate, treated them with ridicule and contempt; much the same sort of contempt he and his government obviously have for the small business community. This government neither understands nor has compassion for the problems facing the owners of small businesses. The Prime Minister and members of his government have demonstrated they are oblivious to the problem. The only problem they seem to acknowledge is that people are angry and complaining.

The government does not know why people are upset. We are told time and time again that all is well, that the universe is unfolding as it should. Well, I have news for this government. The universe, for thousands of Canadians is coming apart at the seams. The threads of the economy of this nation are unravelling at an alarming rate.

The growing number of bankruptcies should indicate to this government that something is seriously wrong, wrong with its policies and wrong with its attitude. That hundreds of small businesses have gone bankrupt, and hundreds of others are on the verge of bankruptcy should be a source of alarm for this government.

Let me illustrate for members of this House the reason why even a single bankruptcy can result in a potentially horrendous domino effect. Let us take a small tourist operation, of which there are many in my constituency. The resort, faced with exorbitant interest rates, cannot afford to seek financial assistance for its summer operation. Without sufficient funds to cover the purchase of supplies and salaries for the initial start-up, the tourist resort has to close. Cooks, waitresses, the cleaning staff, office staff and handymen are suddenly unemployed. The owner and employees now have no extra money with which to purchase goods and services in the community.

Other small businesses in the community immediately begin to feel the pinch. With fewer people to supply, the owners of these other firms soon have to lay off staff, and the list of the unemployed grows. The tourists who have in the past stayed at the resort now look for other facilities, and again business in the community suffers. Again other people are out of work. Some of those out of work will move to other centres in the hope of securing employment, but others, for a variety of circumstances, will be forced to apply for unemployment insurance or accept welfare. Then, because of one business closing, the community and the country is faced with the prospect of higher taxes to support those whose only resort is the social benefit programs. Everyone's disposable income takes a slight plunge, and the vicious cycle is about to be repeated on other levels.

What I have described is only a small part of the sad circumstances of a single bankruptcy. When you have several small firms going under, the effects on the community and the country are calamitous. How then in heaven's name can this government sit back and do nothing, tell us all is well, when what is happening now is affecting us all?

We cannot afford to lose one of our small businesses, but there are some whose loss to the nation will create more hardship than others. I am thinking now in particular of the small farmer. In these days of automation and plastic wrapped meat and produce, there are those who speak fondly of the farming of yesterday. Like sideshow attractions, historic villages offer glimpses of the disappearing communities of yore and display what are now considered quaint methods of production and commerce. Today's farm is indeed often automated, but today's farmer, trying to run his business, cannot cope with the rising interest rates and an absence of economic planning, and he too is going under.

When thousands of small farmers go bankrupt, or lose their farms through bank foreclosure, who will feed this nation? The farmer can be classified as a small businessman. When the price reaches even higher levels than those we have today, who will be able to afford to buy what is available? With so many businesses closing down, will there be anything left to buy?

Mention was made of the small business development bond which was introduced by the Clark government and adopted by the present government, for which they are to be commended. However, it is restrictive in the sense that it is only available to incorporated companies. I hope that because of pressure from all parties, including government backbenchers, the government will consider making it available to individuals and partnerships and continue it beyond the present deadline of December 31 next. It should be a law on the books, and it should continue.

Rather than being restrictive, the government would do well to enlarge the bond so that it provides working capital. Also, it should be available for used machinery and equipment. This would provide much needed assistance to the small businessman. As well, the farmers could take advantage of it.

The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) took exception with one statement coming from this side. It was said that this would not cost anything. The minister said it was costing X number of dollars. However, if the small business development bond helps businesses to stay in operation, pay salaries, make purchases and sell their goods, as the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) stated, then in the long run the government will end up making money. It cannot be classed as an excessive cost when everything is weighed in the balance.

This government knows all about bankruptcy. In fact this government would have been bankrupt long ago had it not been for its taxing power which enables it to spend into eternity. It cannot go bankrupt. It just prints more money. The government has been bankrupt in thought and deed for some time. It has been said that misery loves company. Therefore, the government seems determined it will not be alone in its mess. The problem is that it is not. It is astonishing to hear the government say that high interest rates are not causing the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary of President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was absent briefly following the question period and unable to give the answers to the order paper questions. I understand there will be consent to my giving these answers now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): This can be done with unanimous consent. We will interrupt the debate and go back to questions on the order paper. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is so ordered.

Mr. Collenette: I thank hon. members for their consideration.

MR. MICHAEL PITFIELD

Question No. 1,217—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Michael Pitfield, secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council, absent from his job at any time since he reassumed his position and, if so (a) for how many days and on what dates (b) for what purpose and where (c) was he paid his usual government salary during the days absent and (i) if so, under what authority (ii) if not, what amount was deducted for each day absent or part thereof and what was the total amount deducted to the date this question is answered?

2. Did his absences include first class transportation to Boston and, if so, was such travel made at public expense?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1 and 2. Since his reappointment as Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet on March 11, 1980, Mr. Pitfield has not been absent from his job save for normal holiday leave. During the period immediately following his reappointment, and in accordance with arrangements made at that time, Mr. Pitfield's family continued to reside in Boston, Massachusetts, until the end of the 1980-81 academic year. He made regular visits there to visit his family and to complete his teaching obligations to Harvard University. Mr. Pitfield was authorized to use first class transportation where circumstances required. See also reply to question 2,386 answered today.

MR. G. R. D'AVIGNON—ADDITIONAL POSITION

Question No. 1,314—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. G. R. D'Avignon, deputy minister of Supply, appointed to the additional position of chairman of the board of directors of the Royal Canadian Mint and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what are his qualifications for the job?

2. Is the Minister of Supply and Services presently making an investigation of any kind concerning Mr. Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint and does the appointment of Mr. D'Avignon have significance of any kind in this connection?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. Yes.

(a) It has been an established practice for the deputy minister of supply to hold that position.

(b) Mr. D'Avignon's knowledge and experience makes him a highly suitable candidate for the job.

2. (a) No; (b) No.

CNR NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

Question No. 2,156—Mr. Turner:

1. Did CNR purchase newspaper advertising in 24 Canadian newspapers congratulating CP of Montreal on its Centennial and, if so (a) at what cost (b) what was the cost in each case?

2. (a) Which cities were chosen and for what reason (b) who made the decision to choose each of the 24 newspapers?

3. What was the criterion for the selection of each newspaper and who made the final decision?

4. Did Mr. Lorne Perry, manager of advertising and graphics, make any decisions and, if so, what were they?

5. Was the decision made by an advertising board and, if so, what was the name of each representative?

6. For what reason was the advertising money not utilized by some other method so CNR equipment and road beds could be brought up to the high safety standards of the 1940s and 1950s?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Canadian National purchased advertising space in 23 Canadian newspapers.

(a) $64,244.

(b) Through advertising agencies, CN purchased the space from the newspapers at their normal published space rates.

2. (a) Moncton, Halifax, Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Ottawa, Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Vancouver, St. Boniface. These cities are major Canadian centres where Canadian Pacific does a considerable volume of business, and wherein reside significant numbers of its employees and officers.

(b) Mr. D. E. Todd, general manager, public affairs and advertisement.

3. The criteria used for selection of the newspapers was circulation, the appropriateness of the medium to the message, and recognition of the need to be represented in both English and French newspapers in cities where both exist. The final selection was made by Mr. D. E. Todd.

4. Once the decision to go ahead had been made, Mr. Perry, manager, advertising and graphics fulfilled liaison duties with the various advertising agencies involved in the program.

5. No, the decision was made by Mr. Robert A. Bandeen, president and chief executive officer.

6. It is perceived by management and the board of directors that such a large and diverse enterprise as Canadian National should be involved in many activities unrelated to the maintenance of equipment and roadbeds, and that advertising is a proper and normal activity of the railway as it provides communications support for CN by enhancing the business climate in which it operates.

Since 1974 (when CN Rail computerized its accident reporting system), concerted efforts by both management and labour to improve safety performance have resulted in an annual decrease in practically all categories of accident and casualty statistics. These efforts include an ongoing track rehabilitation program, better equipment, more employee training, and the application of research to improve rail safety. In 1980, CN Rail was among the four safest railways in North America.

Order Paper Questions

FARM OWNERSHIP

Question No. 2,201—Mr. Herbert:

1. What percentage of farms is owned by (a) incorporated companies (b) non-incorporated individuals or groups?

2. What is the percentage of farm land owned by incorporated companies?

3. What percentage of the incorporated companies is more than fifty per cent foreign owned and what percentage of farm land do they control?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: according to the 1976 Census of Agriculture,

1. Percentage of farms owned by

(a) Incorporated companies (incorporated business with shares owned by operator and his family)	3.78 per cent or
Incorporated businesses (with shares owned by other than operator and family)	.62 per cent
	4.40 per cent
(b) Non-incorporated individuals or groups
Individual or family (owned or not)	91.46 per cent
Partnership (only operations having a formalized partnership agreement)	3.77 per cent
Institution or community pasture (land owned by municipality, province or federal government)	.26 per cent
	95.49 per cent
Other (lands operated privately for estate, trust company, Hutterite colonies, co-operative farms	.11 per cent
Canada	100 per cent

2. The Census of Agriculture asks farm operators to report information about the land they are operating. If an operator rents or leases all or a portion of the land area he operates, the area of rented land is known, but information is not given about the ownership of that land. The table below outlines the information available on areas of land operated and owned. The difference between the two totals (which represents roughly one third of all farm area operated) is acreage leased or rented by an operator for which no ownership information is available.

Type of Operator	Number of Farms	Total Farm Area
		Operated	Owned
		(acres)
Individual	274,490	134,983,151	98,390,624
Partnership	11,313	7,979,595	4,892,755
Institution	771	6,436,841	1,914,210
Company—family	11,348	12,505,476	7,780,330
Company—other	1,864	2,389,154	1,194,852
Estate, Trust Co., etc.	332	1,682,043	1,375,105
Total	300,118	165,976,260	115,547,876

From these data, the proportion of farm area owned by an incorporated company (family and other) is 7.77 per cent.

3. Foreign ownership information is collected under the Corporation and Labour Union Returns Act, and only corporations with $250,000 or more in assets are covered. In 1978, Statistics Canada estimates that 59 corporations in this class operating farms were foreign owned out of a population of farm corporations of 4,328. Thus 1.36 per cent of these farm corporations were foreign owned. No information is available on the area of farm land controlled by these corporations.

SALE OF CMHC ACQUISITIONED UNITS

Question No. 2,222—Mr. Herbert:

In 1980, what percentage of the houses sold by CMHC after acquisition were sold for more than (a) 10 (b) 20 (c) 30 per cent less than the (i) original mortgage total (ii) cost of acquisition?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

	Original Mortgage Total	Acquisition Cost
The percentage of sales over 100 per cent of	48.5 per cent	18.6 per cent
The percentage of sales at 90—99 per cent of	21.4	17.5
The percentage of sales at 80—89 per cent of	12.7	25.4
The percentage of sales at 70—79 per cent of	7.3	19.0
The percentage of sales at less than 70 per cent of	10.1	19.5
	100 per cent	100 per cent

COTEAU-DU-LAC, QUE.—MUNICIPAL GRANTS

Question No. 2,314—Mr. Herbert:

What amount (a) was paid in 1980 (b) will be paid in 1981 to the municipality of Coteau-Du-Lac, Quebec for the historical site under the municipal grants program?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works):

(a) Appraisal cards requested from the municipality of Coteau-du-Lac, Québec, have not yet been received, therefore no 1980 grant on this property has been paid.

(b) The 1981 grant amount cannot be estimated until the values and tax rates are forwarded by the municipality.

MR. WILLIAM ELLIS (L. 12973)

Question No. 2,351—Mr. McKenzie:

Was Mr. William Ellis (L. 12973) a member of the South Saskatchewan Regiment during World War II and, if so (a) did he take part in the 1942 Dieppe Raid with the regiment (b) is he also a veteran of World War I (c) is he the last living Dieppe Raid survivor of the regiment who had also served in World War I (d) does he receive a veterans pension or allowance from the government and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): This question requests information of a personal nature concerning Mr. William Ellis, the disclosure of which is governed by the Canadian Human Rights Act, Part IV.

SPEECH WRITTEN BY MR. PAUL DOUCET

Question No. 2,378—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. John de Bondt, acting director, public affairs division, Canadian International Development Agency, write a letter dated February 24, 1981 to Mr. Frank Hawes, 5-56 Rideau Terrace, Ottawa and, if so, was the letter to act as a contract when signed by both parties for a speech to be written for the director general, communications, CIDA, Mr. Paul Doucet?

2. Was the speech to be delivered during the "round table on the North/South Dialogue of Sietar's Conference"?

3. (a) Was Mr. Hawes offered $1,600 to prepare the speech and, if not, what was the amount (b) was Mr. Hawes asked to send an invoice in triplicate and was the invoice paid and, if so, in what amount?

4. Did the letter further instruct Mr. Hawes as to what source material to utilize?

5. For what reason could Mr. Doucet not prepare his own speech or use persons within CIDA to assist him?

6. How many speeches has Mr. Doucet delivered since he was first employed by CIDA and, in each case (a) what was the cost to the taxpayer (b) where was it delivered (c) what was the subject-matter?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes, $1,600.

4. Yes.

5. A round table on the North-South Dialogue was one of the activities at the Sietar Conference. Mr. Louis Sabourin, president of the Development Centre of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development was to have participated in a round table which included a representative from Africa, a representative from Latin America, and the assistant secretary for administration of the Organization of American States. Mr. Sabourin, who would be the only Canadian present at this round table, had to cancel ten days before the opening of the conference.

In order to ensure a Canadian presence for this session, Mr. Paul Doucet agreed to be one of the panel participants. The subject was "The intercultural variable as a condition for the effectiveness of interventions by experts in developing countries".

Precise data on this aspect of international development exist in two studies. One was published by the Canadian government and entitled "Canadians in Development"; the other, by the University of Saarbrucken for the Federal Republic of Germany. Frank Hawes who had co-authored the Canadian study knew not only the results of the German study but the non-published data of the two studies. That is why he was selected to prepare notes for Mr. Doucet's presentation.

It should be noted that at this conference and at the preceding working session, Mr. Doucet was co-host with Pierre Casse of the World Bank. Besides his role as host, Mr. Doucet had already agreed to make two presentations; one tracing the history of the project "Agenda for a Small Planet" and the other to deliver the final address.

6. In his five years as director general of communications at CIDA, Mr. Paul Doucet gave at least 50 speeches and numerous interviews on radio, television and in the press on the subject of international development. He never had recourse to outside specialists for these activities.

Question No. 2,386—Mr. Friesen:

1. Is Mr. Michael Pitfield presently the William Lyon Mackenzie King Visiting Professor of Canadian Studies at Harvard University?

2. Is he employed by the university in another capacity and (a) if so, what is his title (b) if not, on what date did he terminate his employment with the university?

3. Is Mr. Pitfield on temporary leave from the university and, if so (a) from which position (b) what are the terms of the leave?

4. Does Mr. Pitfield receive a salary, honorarium, stipend or other type of remuneration from the university and, if so, what are the terms?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. Mr. Pitfield is on leave from the William Lyon Mackenzie King Visiting Professorship in Canadian Studies.

4. Mr. Pitfield receives no remuneration from Harvard University. Nevertheless in recognition of Harvard University's generosity in releasing Mr. Pitfield to serve the Government of Canada at the Prime Minister's express request, the government asked Mr. Pitfield to ensure that any obligations remaining from the time when he was actively serving as the Mackenzie King Visiting Professor be fulfilled as part of Mr. Pitfield's responsibilities.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 2,308?

[Text]

*MR. JAMES FAY, EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT TO THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 2,308—Mr. Bosley:

Did Mr. James Fay, Executive Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, take plane trips at government expense between Ottawa and Prince Edward Island in the fiscal year 1980-81 and, if so (a) how many at what cost (b) for each trip, what was the purpose?

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley), the answer is yes, eight trips at a cost of $1,523 excluding the return travel trips nos. 2 and 7 listed in part (b) of this answer, which were trips with the minister on a government aircraft.

The purpose of the trips were as follows: 1, to attend potato hearings and meet with producers on the minister's behalf; 2, to discuss a potato agency with members of the P.E.I. Potato Producers Association; 3, to meet with the Maritime Agency Potato Producers on the minister's behalf; 4, to meet individuals from the agricultural industry on the minister's behalf; 5, to meet with P.E.I. potato producers on the minister's behalf; 6, to meet with officials of the potato industry on the minister's behalf; 7, to attend meetings accompanying the minister; and 8, to meet agricultural groups on the minister's behalf. This answer was supplied on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair to return at eight o'clock p.m.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF FAILURE TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kempling:

That this House condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of its high interest policy and for its failure to assist the small business sector in Canada

(1) by increasing and extending the small business development bond program;

(2) by encouraging venture capital investment by means of appropriate tax adjustments;

(3) by relieving the small business sector from the massive weight of government regulation; and

(4) by fostering the research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian business of all sizes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at six o'clock, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) had about one minute remaining.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, not much can be said in one minute, so I will defer to the next speaker.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that was an admirably brief statement from the hon. member opposite. However, we have heard some rather longer statements today, which to my mind indicates how little some hon. members opposite appreciate what has been happening in the area of government support for the small business sector. The opposition motion might have been relevant 30 years ago, 20 years ago or perhaps even ten years ago, but today the motion seems to reflect the curiously anachronistic character of the party which sponsored it.

In any event, let us start at the beginning, because evidently hon. members opposite need information about what the national government is doing in terms of support and incentive for the growth of small business in Canada.

Back in 1976, some five years ago, this government appointed Canada's first minister of state for small business. Since then our efforts to assist small business have proliferated to the point where one of the outstanding, and occasionally justified, complaints of small businessmen was that they have been unable to find their way through the various programs offered by both the federal and provincial governments.

Accordingly, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, through its regional offices located in every province and territory, and its unique small business secretariat, has maintained continuous contact with the small business community. Instant telephone service is available at all times to provide small businessmen with the information they require about the variety of services available. Of course, I want to emphasize that in addition to those services provided by the public service, members of Parliament, at least from this side of the House, have their doors open on all occasions to small businessmen seeking assistance.

It is obviously impossible in the short time allocated this evening to review all the efforts made by the national government to assist the growth of that essential sector of our economy, the small business sector; efforts which, I might note, have won the praise of chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and indeed of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. However, since there seems to be some confusion in the minds of the members opposite about those programs, I wish to note a few highlights.

Some members may recall, for example, that we have introduced income tax measures which benefit small businesses by about $2 billion annually. Secondly, we have responded to the requests of individual entrepreneurs and business associations by reducing the amount of the paper burden that has proven increasingly bothersome to business over the past decades. Resultant savings amount now to something over $300 million annually. I only wish that some provincial governments had been equally imaginative and also had reduced that time-consuming demand facing the small businessman. We have greatly increased the opportunities for Canadian suppliers, especially small businesses, to obtain government contracts, often working nationally with provincial governments to achieve maximum benefit. Incidentally, for small businessmen with complaints about paperwork, red tape, excessive government regulation, or indeed any other problem, we have created a small business advocacy office within the small business secretariat.

Government help first becomes available, Mr. Speaker, when an entrepreneur is starting or contemplates expanding his existing operation. In such circumstances, his main concern is to obtain sound financing. Although the commercial banks necessarily remain the principal source of capital, some firms have continued to encounter difficulty in obtaining funds from them. However, these firms have access to the Federal Business Development Bank, an expanding corporation owned by the people of Canada which now has more than 100 branches across the country. Although the bank assists businesses of every size and variety, emphasis is placed on helping small business. In fact, of the 165,000 loans granted by the bank in 1979, over 90 per cent were for $100,000 or less, with the average loan being only about $50,000, obviously in response to the particular needs of small business. Customers of the FBDB may borrow in order to acquire land or to improve their buildings or equipment, to strengthen their working capital, or indeed to establish a new business. The point I wish to make in referring to the activities of the FBDB is simply that venture capital is available and indeed has been available in increasing amounts for some time. Not including the much larger level of direct loans now amounting to some $840 million to over 40,000 customers across Canada, the bank has recently embarked upon direct equity investment. This now amounts to some $25 million, which is in effect invested in the dreams and aspirations of Canadian entrepreneurs.

I should also briefly mention that the bank extends other services to businessmen, for example, the important services of counselling which are often provided by retired experts from the business community, and management training and investment services are available from the bank. Opposition members will, I hope, join with government members in referring their constituents interested in small business assistance to the local branch of the bank.

Another instance, Mr. Speaker, where government has encouraged venture capital development is through the Canada Development Corporation. The CDC has an important subsidiary which unfortunately is not generally recognized, called Canada Ventures. It in turn has significant holdings in several of Canada's major venture capital companies. Yet another source of financial assistance is provided by the Small Businesses Loans Act under which the government guarantees loans mades by commercial banks and other private sector financial institutions to assist small business to start up and to expand. I would note that last year this government raised the ceiling on such loans to $100,000. With the guarantee provided by this act, commercial banks, for example, are encouraged to make loans to small businesses which they might otherwise consider too risky. I might also note that last year the bank expanded its capacity by increasing the total amount that may be advanced from some $200 million to $475 million.

I have only sketched in outline, Mr. Speaker, the degree and variety of federal small business assistance. Once a small business has been established, however, there are a number of federal tax measures geared to promote and foster its growth. Let me mention one or two of the more important. Small business tax deductions substantially reduce the impact of federal taxes. What is the effect? Obviously the cash flow of the business improves substantially; there can be no question that the small business thereby gains in terms of its ability to reinvest, to expand and indeed to have a diminished need for financing from outside sources. Our government also extends assistance to small business for capital losses, which differs substantially from that afforded larger corporations. Small business investors are permitted unlimited deduction of their eligible capital losses from their income, a great advantage not available to larger enterprises.

Federal money, Mr. Speaker, is available to help small businesses improve their energy technology, a subject very much in the minds of Canadians today. We are working through the small business secretariat and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to improve the efficiency of energy use in small businesses. We have recently announced our intention to widen the extent of that commitment. Financial support is, for example, offered for research and demonstration projects to ensure that there is greater energy conservation in industrial processes. I might mention that only a fortnight or so ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) opened in Winnipeg the new headquarters of Canartech, the Crown corporation created to promote renewable energy technology. That technology is to be developed, through the use of small businesses in particular to promote small businesses engaged in the provision of renewable energy. I do not doubt that we shall see that Crown corporation grow into one of the most imaginative and effective catalysts for small business development.

Another source of federal assistance upon which I would like to touch for a moment with regard to energy management and conservation is a program that, when applied by industry, has substantially reduced energy consumption in the industrial processes, bringing spectacular savings for small businessmen as well as larger corporations that can reduce their expenditures for fuel and electricity.

The fourth part of the opposition motion before us touches on the question of federal government support for research and development. The first three parts of the opposition motion pertain particularly to small business. The fourth part alleges that the federal government has been laggard in providing support for all types of business in the area of research and development. However, I would ask the mover of the motion and other hon. members opposite to note that only recently the business community widely welcomed the announcement that our government intends to raise the national research and development expenditure to 1.5 per cent of Canada's gross national product four years from now, in 1985.

The government itself will contribute about one third of this targeted figure, but in total it represents a co-operative effort with the private sector. Small businesses which have a particularly important part to play in entrepreneurship and in innovative technology, offer some of the best prospects for growth in research and development.

To that end, the federal government will spend about $200 million more this year than last year on research and development so as to move us toward the attainment of our national target of 1.5 per cent of the gross national product. Obviously a part of those funds will be channelled toward university research and development, some will go to government programs themselves, but a substantial proportion will go to co-operative programs with industry. We have already seen emerging in the private sector a concentration of R and D resources on space, communications and energy technology. But I have no doubt that in those areas the support of the federal government has been warmly welcomed and that the support will continue and expand in the future.

Also there are tax incentives available to companies engaged in research and development. Only 100 companies took advantage of those tax incentives as recently as 1977. But the following year the number ballooned to almost 500. That growth has continued, giving substance to the claim that the program is obviously taking effect.

I could continue about the work of the federal government in the area of research and development which the hon. member opposite seems to ignore or of which he is unaware. I want to note that fiscal incentives in the form of tax credits and accelerated write-offs have already had a substantial impact. The second area of concern is the general support programs of the federal government. Further recent initiatives indicate that funds are generally available for financing any sound project, irrespective of the industry sector in which it happens to fall. In that connection, small business support is particularly in the minds of those administering the program.

Also I want to draw attention to the government's policy of contracting out research and development which can have a major benefit on the growth and diversification of activities on the part of companies engaged in high technology areas.

I want to draw attention also to the industrial R and D available through a growing number of programs announced in recent months, programs which were virtually unknown only a few years ago. For example, the enterprise development program has a special fund for microelectronics. In the area of energy, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Ministry of State for Small Businesses have a co-operative program in research. The Department of Communications recently had a major program which led to the development of Telidon, one of the more promising successes of Canadian technology in recent years.

I draw the attention of hon. members to the programs in aerospace which not only involve a significant number of major corporations, but also contribute substantially to the growing competence of a number of small enterprises. All these programs, of which the hon. member opposite seems either to be unaware or whose real importance he does not evaluate, require funds, of course. It seems to me idle for some members opposite to call for substantial reductions in government spending and at the same time to advocate expanded activities on the part of government to finance research and development and incentives for the growth of small business in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in the debate this evening on the motion before us, and particularly to deal with the importance of research and development. It must play an important part in the development of a viable and strong small business sector in Canada today.

There is no doubt that various reports, very often commissioned by the government opposite, and various commissions, have shown the importance research and development can play in terms of creating jobs, increased productivity and increased exports, and helping with our balance of payments.

For example, Mr. Pocock, a researcher for the Lamontagne Commission on Research and Development stated:

> —if Canada had had a GERD of 1.5 per cent in 1978 and assuming 85 per cent of the increase would have been an increase in R&D by industry, there would have been an extra 10,600 jobs for scientists and engineers, which would have also resulted in a total of 1.52 million extra jobs created in new industrial activity and an extra $15.54 billion in exports.

It is amazing when government planners opposite look at ways and means to reduce unemployment and our adverse balance of payments that they do not listen and do not remember the recommendations and words of their own thinkers, their own commissions or their own inquiries. We know that sometimes the Liberals enjoy appointing royal commissions. They enjoy receiving reports and commissioning studies; but not very often do we see the government acting on its own recommendations and findings. Do I need to say that the benefits of increasing research and development would result in increased employment, greater output, greater productivity, improved competitiveness by Canadian industry and businessmen and, indeed, lower prices?

Since I am the critic for science and technology of the New Democratic Party and since I faithfully attend all of the committee meetings, I have learned a great deal. For example, I learned of the Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council. The NRC conducted an analysis of its program for the years 1973 to 1977. It took the 400 industrial projects represented by 250 companies and the IRAP invested some $93 million of public money which was matched dollar for dollar by private industry. These were the results of the analysis. The investment of some $93 million of private money resulted in a $1.8 billion return to the industries. In other words, it was a return of one dollar for every dollar. The government coffers were increased by some $350 million in taxes which were collected as a result of this investment.

The previous speaker from the government side indicated that the opposition was crying for fewer government expenditures. In some ways we are. I agree in some ways with the Conservative members to my right who say that there can be some trimming in the government's activities. Expenditures in the research and development field are not expenditures, they are an investment. It is an investment which will yield a return of greater tax dollars, of greater economic activity and employment. It is an investment in the country and in its human resources. The IRAP program is but one example of the success which direct investment in research and development can give to the country as a whole. There are several modifications to the IRAP program. For example, there is the mini-IRAP program which is especially geared to smaller industries. What this particular type of program does is to give access to the business community to the biggest resource and the greatest scientific knowledge in this country, that is, public knowledge and public research in the field of science and technology.

The goal of increasing our research and development to 1.5 per cent of our gross national product is certainly not a new goal. I believe it was in 1968 that we heard the government opposite suggesting this goal. It was repeated in 1972 by the Lamontagne commission. In fact, that commission suggested, I understand, that up to 2 per cent of our gross national product should go to research and development. So, the government must understand that when it trots out with a new goal of 1.5 per cent for 1985, the Canadian public and the opposition remain a little sceptical. Our position is to wait and see.

Finally, I hope that the government is serious about increasing research and development in this country and that we will see some action. In some ways the jury is still out. Definitely, some of the five year plans proposed by such funding agencies as the Natural Science and Engineering Research Council have not been met. For example, the NSERC funding has not reached the level which the five-year plan projected for the second year—it is still below. The government has still not given it's commitment to these research organizations.

We are finding that the universities, which are essential if we are to have the trained personnel to fulfil our objectives, are afraid. They are afraid that they will see a continuing decline in funding. Young university students are not completing their doctorate programs; they are not even commencing their master's programs because there is no assurance that there will be jobs for them. There is a general feeling of insecurity in the scientific community as to what the commitment of this government is and what the future will be. This will affect the business community as well.

One of the major reasons why we have very low expenditures in research and development in Canada compared to other developed countries is to be found in our economic and business structure. Our expenditure is roughly on par with what Portugal and Ireland spend on research and development. Why is this? The major reason is that private industry has not contributed to research and development activities as it has in other countries.

I would like to read into the record the OECD international comparisons for R and D funding shares as a percentile for 1977 in various countries. For example, in Denmark industry contributed 51.3 per cent, in Finland it was 55.3 per cent, in France 41.1 per cent, in Germany 55.6 per cent, in Japan 65.8 per cent, in Norway 40.8 per cent, in Sweden 59.3 per cent and in the U.S.A. 43.9 per cent. In Canada the percentage is 35.8 per cent—dismally low. It is not small Canadian industry that is to blame. Canadian industry invests in research and development roughly on par with other countries. The fault is that much of the Canadian economy is controlled by multinational firms; and these firms, for a variety of reasons, prefer to do their research outside Canada. One of the two main reasons is that multinational firms have access to high technology from the parent company. Since we are a branch plant economy, there is no reason for them to do their research in the branch plant. This flow of technology across the border has hindered the development of a viable research and development community in Canada. This is the central problem which the government must tackle if we are to achieve our goal of 1.5 per cent. There is no indication that the government is willing or capable of tackling this essential problem. It is not that it does not know about it. The Science Council of Canada have pointed out in various reports the basic structural problem which exists in Canada and which prevents us from achieving our stated goal.

There are no solutions coming from this government. In fact, the slide continues, the slide that we saw during the 1970s when there was a decrease in the expenditures on research and development. We in the New Democratic Party believe that science and the development which flows from it, for example new technology, can and should be used as an important instrument by which Canadians can achieve a great measure of control over their destiny. We believe that R and D should rate a higher priority. It should have an essential priority in the development of any industrial, economic and social strategy for Canada.

We do not believe that throwing money into research and development is a solution. In the past, this government has spent huge sums of money on R and D from which multinational oil companies have benefited greatly. Technologies have been developed to which the Canadian public has no access but for which it has paid. This is not an appropriate type of research and development that we would talk about. We suggest that in Canada we agree with what the National Research Council of Canada presented in its five-year plan entitled "The Urgent Investment". I would like to quote three sentences from that report:

> Because of Canada's comparatively low population and its unique geographical distribution, a large portion of Canada's manufactured goods is produced in relatively low volume. The technology introduced here must have the flexibility to reduce the inefficiencies found in traditional low volume production techniques.

The National Research Council in its five-year plan refers briefly to the appropriate technologies which we should develop in Canada because they are appropriate to us as a country. I mentioned before that we in this party believe that research and development must play an important part if we are to gain a measure of control over our destinies. It is not enough for us as a country to react to technological innovations all over the globe. It is not enough for us as a society to continually react. Surely we must begin to be in control of events. That is why we feel that the public has an important part to play in developing proper research strategies.

It is also important for us to develop the appropriate technologies. Very often these are not heavily capital intensive but are those that allow local self-sufficiency to develop and a move away from the large, capital intensive, centrally and globally controlled production toward greater decentralization and self-sufficiency.

I feel that this direction is very appropriate for our country, Mr. Speaker. It is an opportunity for Canada to make a significant contribution to the development of Third World countries in particular. It is also an area very appropriate for small Canadian businesses. It would strengthen small Canadian businesses immeasurably. Instead of technologies that require heavy capital funding that depend on the international capital markets, that depend on technologies whose patents are controlled and owned outside our borders, we would, should, and could, develop technologies appropriate to the small-scale production which is suited to our population and which would allow greater participation by small businesses. It would also be more labour intensive.

In the last few decades, small businesses have been wiped out all over the world and markets are controlled by larger and larger firms. High interest rates are but a continuation of this. The economic policies of this government and, in fact, the former Conservative government, and the attitude toward research and development, have all helped to engender a greater concentration on and control over the productive forces.

We suggest that there is a way out, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, research into the appropriate technologies for energy, food production and all the other basic human needs, would make this country into a new, more contemporary country—a country which has a great deal of control over its destiny. It would allow this country to have the self-sufficiency and freedom that it does not have at present.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that much of what my colleagues in the Conservative party suggested today makes sense, particularly when they spoke of the neglect of research and development in this country. I hope the government is taking note of the presentations made in the various committees about the need to develop some clear plans for the future that would allow a strong and viable research community to grow in this country, that would benefit small business, the workers and the farmers, and that would make Canada a stronger country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to discuss various important and pressing issues facing Canadians and small business today as a result of the government's economic mismanagement and high interest rate policies.

We have a federal government that has done so little for so many for so long, at the same time as it has done so much to so many for so long. The government has become insensitive and uncaring about the plight of the average and low-income Canadian.

The farm and small business sector along with the consumer and home owner are suffering from the record interest rates that are in place today. To say that the interest rate is high is an understatement; soaring in the clouds is more like it. The government has been soaring high in the clouds for some time without sufficient oxygen to induce clear thinking. Interest rates have taken off like the space shuttle, but with one big difference—the space shuttle came back to earth. The government is taking us on a one-way trip—straight up. I suppose it could use the slogan, "Lost in Space" for its next campaign instead of some of its past logos, such as "The Land is Strong".

The land was strong and it can be strong again, but not under the spell and the rule of the federal government. Inflation, unemployment, interest rates and an energy policy are all important issues, and they need to be solved with leadership and initiative coming from the federal government. Industry needs long-term planning to be effective and competitive in a competitive world. We see countries with few resources become successful world trading nations. The reasons are government support, long-range planning and faith and belief in the country and in the people and, most important, pride in the future.

In Canada we have an abundance of raw materials, know-how and human resources. Many other countries that have done so much with so little must wonder what on earth Canadians need in order to develop their potential. The government should come out of orbit and down to earth and provide some ground control and ground rules for our future.

I have spoken in the House about the need for a comprehensive industrial strategy for Canada, and made specific reference to the textile and clothing industry in particular and the need to ensure that this industry survives and grows. I have stressed the need for the government to ensure that Canadian industry grows for the future so that we do not become dangerously dependent on a wide range of imports.

In its latest report, the textile and clothing board recommended that bilateral agreements and quotas should be extended to cover the period ending December 31, 1990. I supported the industry's position in asking the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and the government to announce the decision on the board's report no later than March 31, 1981, so that business could look with more certainty and support to the future and get on with needed investment and growth.

The industry is still waiting for the government's decision, Mr. Speaker. It is not asking for handouts, but rather for guidance and direction so that it can effectively plan for the future.

The government should realize how important effective planning can be. It lets industry as well as the consumer feel confident about tomorrow and the day after. Planning offers incentives for advancement and the confidence to pursue this. It gets people stirred up in a constructive way. Idleness becomes eagerness, as Canadians are restored to working hard for that great concept of Canada.

Investors need confidence to make the large-scale commitments necessary today. Farming is very big business, even though it could be classified as small business. Start-up costs are extremely high, taking into account necessary machinery and land purchases. The textile and clothing industry requires large capital outlays as well. Such long-range expenditures require future security, and this in turn requires government support through an effective industrial strategy.

The government must combine this with effective emphasis on fostering research and development. This is the key to the future. We cannot sit around on our hands or our laurels and expect to compete or prosper. We can see examples of this in such cases as the British and Japanese automobile industries.

For years Britain had a thriving automobile industry. Then we saw the results of the Japanese introduction of intensive research and development. The British automobile industry was hard hit. We must ensure that our industries do not suffer the same fate.

Research and development and adequate technical training should be high on the government's list of priorities. The success of small and large business in the future requires a co-ordinated effort combined with a comprehensive industrial strategy. This is a big job but it is not insurmountable. Other countries have done it and so can we.

The government must realize the serious state of our economy and must direct its energies to priority issues. Let us tackle the bread and butter issues of inflation, unemployment and high interest rates, and then many of the other concerns will be mitigated. If theories are not working, then the government must take some initiative and act, not sit back and watch the country slide down the rungs of the economic ladder.

● (2050)

Gross economic mismanagement and throwaway overspending have left Canada with a huge deficit and unhealthy interest payments. The government needs a plan to reduce the deficit in the hope of trying to get Canada back on its feet. While in opposition, the Liberals condemned the government of the day for high bank interest rates of some 14 per cent. On January 12, 1980, in Toronto the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the following:

We have an economic program for the 1980s which will enhance dignity, create opportunity, and provide security.

Since the Liberals took office, the bank rate has risen from 14 per cent to a record 19.06 per cent, as recently announced. The government says it can do nothing about this sorry trend. The truth is that the government cannot be bothered to do anything for the people of Canada who are being so burdened by present economic developments. For many Canadians their universe, instead of unfolding as it should, is closing around them.

The present economic policy of the federal government is a nightmare for small business, for home owners renewing mortgages and for farmers. High interest rates are said to slow down borrowing and spending in an effort to curb inflation. This might have some validity for needless expenditures or certain luxuries, but it is not fair for the Canadian home owner who has to renew his mortgage. This is not a frivolous expenditure, although in light of present government policy it certainly looks more like a luxury when it should, in effect, be a right.

The home owner has already borrowed this money to buy his house and is striving to pay off such a loan. This is not a deliberate new expenditure with new borrowed money to fuel inflation. Yet the home owner is forced to renew this existing debt at greatly increased interest costs in order to maintain the home in which he and his family live.

The government should realize the seriousness and unfairness of this situation and bring in some positive measure to aid home owners facing such high interest increases. We need action now.

Canada is its people and Canada's health and welfare depends on that of its people. How can a country be strong when its economic backbone, comprising small business and the farming industry, are scrambling to make ends meet instead of planning with certainty for the future? The answer is that it cannot. Government cannot sit back and wait for the bubble to burst. The nation, its industry, business and people, need action now. Confidence in the marketplace is essential for planning and future growth.

The present government promised to hold the line on government spending growth to under the rate of the Gross National Product and yet we see spending growth in fiscal year 1980-1981 at 15.2 per cent, compared to the nominal GNP growth of 10.7 per cent.

The annual federal deficit is at a high $14 billion, and we pay over $11 billion a year on interest payments alone. These factors, along with borrowing on the foreign markets, are fuelling inflation. The federal government wants Canadians to show restraint and help combat inflation. Canadians would like the federal government to set an example and show some restraint and responsibility to commence and maintain the fight against inflation.

The average Canadian citizen is reeling from the current economic situation before us today. Their standard of living appears to be decreasing despite their efforts to get ahead. And yet, at the same time there is a $51 million increase in expenditures on the correctional service of Canada. This must seem hard to understand for the average law-abiding citizen who works to better himself in society. Perhaps such an amount of money would have been better spent if directed toward some mortgage assistance fund for home owners or to fund a program to aid small business and farmers in difficulty during these difficult times.

We have seen how the uncertainties of the National Energy Program have caused havoc in the oil and gas industry in Canada. This affects businesses both large and small. The government's Canadianization of the industry is at huge cost to the taxpayer while not ensuring one new drop of oil. Drilling exploration and capital expenditures are down substantially because of this program, along with a significant decrease in jobs in the industry. This slowdown is felt across Canada in the operations that supply the industry.

Energy supplies and costs are a significant aspect of the cost of doing business to both small business and large-scale business. Again, it is hard for business to plan and to budget when there exists so much uncertainty in the market today. We have been faced with a multitude of energy increases since the last federal election. Relations with the producing provinces have suffered because of the National Energy Program and the Constitution, both imposed on Canadians by the present government. All this leads to uncertainty in the marketplace.

The government is not setting the proper framework to produce the confidence and enthusiasm for investors and business to expand. This framework is needed now so that we can rebuild our economy, fight inflation and unemployment and return to the lifestyle Canadians used to enjoy. We have the potential, and what we need now is leadership and confidence which all together can snowball into a dynamic future for Canada. Concrete measures need to be taken.

While in power, the Progressive Conservative government introduced the small business development bond when interest rates started to climb. This was done in an effort to bring relief to incorporated small businesses. The measure was adopted by the present government and passed by the House in February of this year. After pressure from the Progressive Conservative party along with the business community, the small business development bond was extended to the end of 1981 for qualified borrowers.

This measure has been of great help to small businesses, especially in light of the escalating interest rates. The bond is helping to instil some growth in the economy by providing the vehicle to provide the capital needed to carry out plans for the expansion and renovation of businesses.

The government should look at the possibility of extending this measure to unincorporated businesses so that more farmers and small businesses could benefit.

Small business in general needs some relief from the crippling interest rates at which many of them are forced to borrow money. Programs, such as the small business development bond, are useful as positive government measures designed to support Canadian business.

Let us build up Canadian business with pride and give it the support it deserves. These small businesses and farm operations are run by our friends, neighbours and constituents, all fellow Canadians. They contribute to our lifestyle and our economic cycle. When their businesses are strong and growing we all benefit.

We must keep Canadian money in Canada to help Canadians. It does not make much sense to me to pay foreign countries, such as Mexico, millions and millions of dollars for oil when at the same time we pay fellow Canadians much less for a superior product produced at home. That money leaves Canada, much of it forever. Our borrowing on the foreign market has run up an unhealthy deficit which the government seems unable to control. Money that should be used for a variety of constructive measures goes just to try to pay the interest charges on the government's deficit. This adds to the inflation cycle. It is not a good way to run a business, let alone a country.

Canada has the potential to be great, and I think the people realize this. Government can co-exist with business in a free enterprise system without the aspect of socializing everything. There are many options open to a conscientious and responsible government willing to implement realistic long-term solutions for the good of the country. This can be done without stifling business with regulation upon regulation. A prime example of this is the metric madness before us today.

Therefore, I ask the government to come down to earth because that is where the people of Canada are living and trying to cope. A far-reaching and comprehensive industrial policy to allow business to plan for the future is needed to provide a stimulus for growth. Interest rates must be brought under control so that businesses can move ahead, not go under. Programs, such as the small business development bond, should be explored and made available to those businesses who need assistance before it is too late. Canadians want to be able to pay their mortgages while, at the same time, enjoying life, not mortgaging it away.

The government has much work ahead of it. It must build a strong foundation and attack the roots of our economic problems. Inflation must be brought under control and steadily reduced. The present administration has spent years getting Canada into its present condition with irresponsible spending and short-term inconsistencies. I would not be surprised if the government tried to reintroduce wage and price controls after they had taken us even further down the road. The government cannot patch up its past mistakes with cosmetic measures. They put us into this economic mess and their meddling will only make things worse.

The people of Canada deserve better treatment and realistic long-term solutions, such as those proposed by the Clark Conservative government and the new U.S. administration.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate this evening. While listening to the speakers this afternoon and this evening, I could not help thinking that perhaps they have overlooked a great deal that has been brought in by this government.

This afternoon we heard mention of the introduction of wages paid to spouses as a business expense. The rate of taxation on small businesses is lower as compared to larger corporations; it is 15.75 per cent. This lower rate is a clear advantage for small Canadian-owned businesses.

Some members feel we are not doing enough research and development. We have a 25 per cent tax credit for research and development. This measure is designed to encourage venture capital and more Canadian research and development here in this country.

The small business development bond issue was spoken about this afternoon, as well as the Small Businesses Loans Act and amendments to the Federal Business Development Bank. The Federal Business Development Bank is one of the few lending institutions in this period of time in Canada which lends at a fixed interest rate that is renewable or renegotiable after three years.

We heard about the retail scale conversion program to metric which is estimated to cost between $45 million and $50 million. The government provides assistance with regard to retail scales of less than 100 kilograms. Remission of duty is available on imported conversion parts. Such parts are exempt from federal sales tax and are written off as an expense for business. A few days ago we heard indications that none of these are manufactured in Canada. They are manufactured in Canada, one of the plants being in Toronto.

I welcome this opportunity given me today to speak, for example, about the reduction of the paper burden that cuts the paper work required. This government initiative provides for the retention of records for only six years and allows for the submitting of customs and excise documents on a monthly basis. This is a very important move on behalf of the government to assist the small business person.

I would like to elaborate briefly on four major initiatives taken by four different groups pursuing a common goal, namely the alleviation of the paper burden and regulation on the small business community.

In February, 1978, the then minister of state for small business was charged with the responsibility of creating a small business focal point in government, of finding solutions to specific paper burden problems, as well as of identifying long-term methods to alleviate this problem.

After listening to the small business community's complaints, suggestions and requests, after consulting and negotiating with the various departments, the present Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) was in a position to put forward to cabinet a series of recommendations to reduce the paper burden stemming from government forms, reports and surveys, record-keeping requirements and unnecessarily complex regulations and procedures; the two major irritants to small businesses.

These specific measures, developed in co-operation with most government departments, resulted in annual savings to business of at least $300 million per year. These results would not have been achieved without everyone's co-operation in the public and private sectors.

The effort to reduce the paper burden in Canada is a very good example of the kind of action that can be undertaken successfully. Through this activity, however, it was confirmed that the paper burden was only a symptom of, and a direct result from, unnecessarily complex regulations and procedures.

Simultaneously, the federal government, in conjunction with the provincial governments, decided to attack the whole matter of economic regulations. At the meetings of first ministers on February 13-15, 1978, the following was agreed:

> That the whole matter of economic regulations at all levels of government should be referred to the Economic Council of Canada for recommendations for action, in consultation with the provinces and the private sector.

The interim report of the council was produced in November, 1979. It contained procedural recommendations t increase the accountability of government agencies. The report stressed the need for better consultation procedures with affected groups prior to the introduction of new regulatory initiatives through assessments of the costs and benefits of new regulations. This final report, which will be presented to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government on June 11, 1981, will propose a system for better management of government decisions about economic regulations. It will feature three major components: first, advance notice and consultation; second, prior assessment; and third, periodic evaluation of existing regulatory programs. The efforts of the Economic Council will certainly serve as a catalyst for assessing the existing myriad of regulations and regulatory agencies.

This House also played a very active role in minimizing the regulatory burden on the private sector. A special House committee was formed to make recommendations on regulatory reform. Individuals, groups, provincial governments as well as officials from a variety of federal departments and agencies contributed to the effort of this committee.

The report released on December 19, 1980, contained 29 recommendations aimed at reaching three primary objectives: first, to improve the process whereby new regulations are drafted; second, to re-evaluate the effectiveness of existing regulations on a regular basis; third, to enhance the accountability of regulation-making bodies to cabinet and to Parliament.

This special committee, among many excellent recommendations, stressed the early consultation aspect with the private sector, including the small business community in the following terms:

> The key to more effective regulation involving the least possible burden on the private sector is the participation of a wide variety of interests in the process of regulation from the earliest possible stage.

While this committee found widespread support for regulatory reform from the public and private sectors, it did not obtain the same total support for "deregulation". However, we are positive that, in some instances, deregulation will result from the implementation of some of the committee's recommendations. This initiative will create major benefits for the small business sector.

Another example that proves the government's commitment to regulatory reform and, by the way, to help the small business sector, is the fact that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has been assigned by the Prime Minister the responsibility to oversee and co-ordinate the government's regulatory reform efforts. I understand that good progress is being made in the elimination of unused, ineffective and undesirable laws and that a bill to this effect will be introduced very shortly.

Another activity that retains the attention of the small business sector is the one related to the guidelines for standardizing and, in some cases, reducing the periods of time for which the federal records must be retained by the business community. An interdepartmental committee, under the chairmanship of the co-ordinator, regulatory reform, is actively involved in the work, with the participation of all departments which administer statutes requiring the private sector to keep records. Ten other major projects now fall under the responsibility of that committee, projects which should have a greater impact on the small business community.

In my remarks today, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to show factually the serious commitment of the government toward reducing the paper burden and the regulations required of the small business community. These different approaches reflect the wisdom of the government in recognizing the fact that any effort to reduce the paper burden and the regulations must not compromise the needed flow of information. We all want regulatory reform. Great care and thought is needed to design the changes required. I believe the government is on the right track in this area of great importance to the private sector. The small business community is looking to this House for leadership and guidance in the matter of regulations and paper burden. Certainly we cannot and will not disappoint this important group. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss this most important motion presented by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling). I should like to read it into the record once again because of its importance. It states:

> That this House condemns the government for ignoring the consequences of its high interest policy and for its failure to assist the small business sector in Canada
> (1) by increasing and extending the small business development bond program;
> (2) by encouraging venture capital investment by means of appropriate tax adjustments;
> (3) by relieving the small business sector from the massive weight of government regulation; and
> (4) by fostering the research and development necessary to preserve the vitality of Canadian businesses of all sizes.

I should like to discuss just a couple of things relating to this motion. My colleagues have addressed most of the matters, but let me deal first with the high interest rate policy of this government. I do not think there is anyone here who would deny that the high interest rate policy is ruining many individuals, many business people and many farmers in Canada. It is particularly hard on senior citizens and people on fixed incomes.

We have a prime rate in Canada of 19.5 per cent, but most people cannot borrow at that rate. That rate is only for the most credit-worthy customers of the chartered banks. Most people who borrow must borrow at commercial rates of around 20 per cent, 21 per cent or 22 per cent. Those who owe money through credit card use, pay anywhere from 24 per cent to 30 per cent, and those who borrow from finance companies, are paying 26 per cent, 27 per cent or 28 per cent. Those who are forced to borrow through second mortgages, are in some cases paying up to 35 per cent.

It is an atrocious situation when we have to put up with a government with another three years to go which is dedicated to high interest rates and more deficits. This government has no fiscal policy to speak of and it cannot defend this policy.

If we consider some of the rates in other countries and make a comparison of the inflation rates, we can see some of the areas in which we have gone wrong. In Canada we have a prime rate of 19.5 per cent with an inflation rate of 13.9 per cent, and rising. That is the bad feature. Our interest rates are going up while the interest rates in other countries are going down.

The United States at present has a prime interest rate of 20.5 per cent with an inflation rate of 10.2 per cent, and many economists suggest it is going down. If it does, it will pull ours along with it, as is usually the case when that economy recovers.

Germany has a prime interest rate of 12 per cent—and many businesses there are unhappy about that rate—with an inflation rate of only 5.6 per cent. That is a country which 35 years ago was ravished, with nothing left of its business community.

Japan has a prime interest rate of around 7 per cent with an inflation rate of 6.2 per cent. That country was also ravished, perhaps even worse than Germany in some respects.

I find it very strange that about one year ago the governor of the Bank of Canada stood before the committee on finance and said, "I will not allow the inflation rate to go to 15 per cent; under no conditions will I allow it". The rate is now almost at 14 per cent and is going up. What has happened to the governor of the Bank of Canada? I suggest he is simply following the instructions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The Minister of Finance has no alternative, because of the deficits of this government but to keep interest rates high in order to encourage investors to buy Government of Canada bonds.

Government borrowings now account for over 50 per cent of all borrowing in Canada compared to 25 per cent 15 years ago. In the last seven years we have had over $20 billion in deficits. In this current year we have a $14 billion deficit, but the government is telling us it is going down. I do not believe that. Government spending is going up by 16 per cent this year. We know the estimates the government provides are not true estimates. If you or I as an individual were to show an expense of $7,000 on our income tax return, the Department of Revenue would assume that was a true expense. If we had $3,000 in revenue which we applied against those expenses, they would not be true expenses. Our expenses then should be $10,000. That is what the government is doing with its estimates. It uses the netting effect. What we see as government expenditures of approximately $61 billion is not a true figure; it is false. Of the $3.8 billion we are paying out for imported oil, the government is showing approximately $500 million. It is not showing the true figures, and this sort of thing goes on and on in the estimates. This is the netting effect. This is not a $61 billion or $64 billion expenditure, it is something more like $80 billion or $90 billion.

Once again the government does not want the people of Canada to know this and it says it will look after it. The government is spending approximately 25 per cent more than it is taking in. This is unbelievable, but it has been doing it for years. About 20 cents of every dollar the government takes in is used just to service debt. The government has no intention of ever paying off its debts. How could a small business or an individual operate like that? The government would never allow them to do that.

Just last week I did an analysis of the money supply in Canada and its relationship to inflation. In the mid-1970s the government told us it would have to control the rate of growth of the money supply—which is credit—so that it could control inflation. But when we control the money supply, there is a tendency for interest rates to go up. The government kept telling us that this would benefit us because inflation would be controlled. I have figures here for the last ten years. In only one year, 1977, when the money supply decreased did inflation go down. In four years the money supply increased and inflation decreased. In three years the money supply decreased and inflation increased. In two years the money supply increased and inflation also increased. We cannot control inflation by controlling the money supply unless we can control government spending. That is why this monetary policy of the government does not work, and that is why small businesses have problems. They do not have access to many lenders. There is only one lender to which they go.

I hate to think of the legacy this Prime Minister is leaving behind. I am afraid the Liberal party will never recover. When this Prime Minister leaves this chamber, members of the Liberal party will be telling us they have new policies and new leaders. It will be the same old story. There will be large deficits, high interest rates and many bankruptices. The small business community is being ignored. Its profits are decreasing. It is not able to finance properly. Seven times in the last five elections this Prime Minister has stood before the people of Canada and said "I will control government spending". Government spending has increased from $500 million in deficits in 1968 to $14 billion annually in 1981. I do not know anyone in Canada who should believe the Prime Minister and the Liberal party, least of all the small business community.

There have been 11 increases in the price of gasoline and heating oil over the past year. Those prices have increased over 50 per cent. Those increases have been presided over by a government which said it would keep gasoline prices down. This government bought heavy oil, unseen, from Mexico. It cannot be refined at Canadian refineries. This government does not know what it is doing.

There are 1.1 million small businesses in Canada. They account for over 66 per cent of the employment and job creation in Canada. The small business community provides more opportunities for both skilled and unskilled labour than any other industry.

In 1979 the Canadian Federation of Independent Business surveyed 9,000 small businesses. Five of the most serious problems cited were, first, finance; second, inflation; third, shortage of skilled help; fourth, government regulation and paper work; and fifth, taxation. I would like to review a couple of these.

The small business development bond was introduced by the Conservative government. Fortunately the Liberal government decided to continue that program. It is a very favourable type of borrowing for small businesses. The terms are good, up to five years. The rate is approximately one half of prime, and small businesses can borrow amounts ranging from $10,000 to $0.5 million. However, small businesses were asked recently why they do not borrow from the small business development bond, and they replied that small businesses have considered, but rejected, government-backed loans because of the danger of becoming entangled in bureaucratic red tape. That red tape keeps getting worse and worse.

Small businesses are particularly hard hit by inflation. There is no question that large businesses can cut back on their inventories in certain areas, but small businesses cannot. There is no question that one of the major problems small businesses are having right now is the high cost of financing their inventories. In few areas other than the area of small business can one say that high financing costs will defeat a business so easily. Small businesses must finance to carry inventories.

Another concern of small business people is government regulation and paper work. Businessmen have told me that 20 per cent of their time is taken up by government regulation and paper work. Even the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) admits that there is too much paper work. I was astounded to hear him say this afternoon that there is a six-year limit on the retention of documents. That will not help relieve the paper burden. Having been involved in storing documents in a business for many years, I can tell the House that once documents are put away, they are put away. The biggest problem is the amount of paper which must be gathered each year and put away. The documents which are put aside do not take up anything but space. That is a cost to a business, but it is a minor cost compared with the cost of the time spent doing paper work. This minister tells us he is helping small business, but he really has not solved the problem. He had a lot of gall to say what he said this afternoon.

I am going to present three recommendations to the government tonight. The Minister of Finance is always saying in this House that the opposition never makes any suggestions. The problem is that he is not listening. If I had my way, I would cancel the national energy policy completely. There is no question that that damned policy is ruining Canadians. It accounts for the high interest rates we have right now. Let me explain briefly why. Approximately two billion exploration dollars are leaving the country, and money will continue to leave the country over the next five years. It is not hard to find many businesses in Canada which do nothing else but raise money for Canadian drilling companies drilling in the United States. They are still doing it. It is estimated that the figure is up to $2 billion. I have spoken with representatives of firms which do this, and they have told me that they will raise $2 billion in total each year for the next five years. Fifty per cent of all the drilling rigs which operated in Canada last year are now in the United States, and they are being supported by funds from Canada. That is one of the reasons we have high interest rates.

With respect to the export of natural gas, natural gas firms in western Canada have stated on more than one occasion—and have proved it—that they can export up to 50 per cent more natural gas than they are exporting right now, but the price of natural gas is tied to the price of imported oil. Every time the price of imported oil increases, so does the price of natural gas. Those prices should not be tied. Natural gas has nothing to do with imported oil. It is not an import. We are exporting natural gas. We have to get away from the formula which ties the price of natural gas to the price of imported crude oil. In 1980 we exported $4 billion worth of natural gas. And that, these firms are telling us, is 50 per cent of what they could do. This is a very serious problem because we are not talking about multinationals but about small Canadian firms which have locked themselves in gas wells for a minimum of five years and they do not know what they are going to do. I can tell you what they are going to do: they are going to persist until they can no longer finance the wells and then they will be taken over by the governments. That is what this government wants to do. It will buy up these shut-in gas wells for 25 per cent of their real value, which is the value put on them right now by the banks. They are prepared to give credit for 25 per cent of the real value because they will be shut in for up to five years.

My last suggestion to the Liberals is that the government bring in a program related to mortgage interest and property tax credits. I was not here when the Conservative government brought in this policy, but of all the things I have seen this seemed to make the most sense because it has the immediate effect of reducing the financing costs of the average home owner by at least 3 to 4 per cent. My calculations suggest at least that, but it could perhaps be higher depending on the tax bracket. However, surely this government can bend a little on policy and recognize a few of the excellent programs the Conservative government brought in. There are 500,000 home owners renewing their mortgages this year. They just cannot go on with this.

The Minister of Finance was, for lack of a better term, sucked in by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) on a program to nationalize the oil industry. There is no other word for it. You can talk to the staff in his department and they will tell you that they have a policy to nationalize the oil industry. If you want to read some of the books of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), it says right there that the way to socialize or nationalize this country is to make sure that private industry does not work.

Some hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. Wright: It says that in those words. You have to make sure private enterprise in this country does not work. And who operates 66 per cent of the business in Canada but small businessmen?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my voice to this debate. My constituency has a large number of small businesses, and we value them very highly. I am sure that everyone realizes the answers to our economic problems are not simple ones. They are complex problems and we do not want to be like that great knight Sir Ronald, the hero in Stephen Leacock's novel, who jumped upon his horse and rode off in all directions.

The question of who invented the small business development bond reminds me of the story about who invented the telephone. They finally came to the conclusion that the answer to this problem had to be that it was conceived in Brantford, Ontario and born in Boston. So I suppose that the small business development bond, we have to agree, was conceived by the opposition when they were in power and was delivered by the Liberal government.

Now, I am somewhat disturbed when our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is criticized for his leadership in the North-South dialogue, and recently the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was criticized for his activities in the World Bank, and I would just like to draw to your attention the fact there is a very close relationship and dependency between the economy of the rich and poor countries of the world.

I would just like to read to you for the record from a supplement to the report of the Parliamentary Task Force on North-South Relations. North-South, what is it? Why should Canadians care? Here are some examples of the consequences which might befall us if the governments of north and south do not curtail and reverse the growth of world poverty. If there is a loan default by only one or two of the ten countries which account for 70 per cent of the $300 billion debt owed mainly to northern banks, the industrialized countries face the possibility of a full-fledged depression. Political instability, fed by massive poverty increases the likelihood one of those isolated skirmishes in the Third World will escalate into super power confrontation, causing us to spend more and more tax dollars fortifying our security systems. Let there be no doubt that there is a relationship.

I would now like to talk for a moment about the small business development bond. The opposition contends that this government has been insensitive to the plight of the small businessman who today faces a record high interest burden. However, these critics choose to belittle an extremely significant interest subsidy that was implemented by this government for small businesses. I am speaking of the small business development bond.

The measure was designed primarily to assist small businesses to expand their operations by enabling them to obtain loans at reduced interest rates to carry out such expansions. However, its scope is much broader than that. It is also designed to assist small businesses that are unable to meet their financial commitments by enabling them to reduce their interest burden.

This latter aspect of the program is often overlooked but can be an extremely important one. For example, let us assume that a small incorporated hardware store owes $100,000 to a bank in respect of the mortgage on the property in which the store carries on its business. The mortgage has come up for renewal and the applicable rate has increased from 10 per cent to 18 per cent. Unfortunately, the actual and expected profits of the business are inadequate to cover this increased expense. The result would be a mortgage foreclosure.

The hardware store in this instance can likely reduce its interest costs to the 10 per cent level on the old mortgage by using the SBDB measure. The paperwork involved is minimal. The store and its bank need only complete a single page election form in respect of the new mortgage and mail it to the Revenue Canada district taxation office to which the store normally mails its annual tax return.

As a result of making such an election, the bank will not be taxed on any interest it earns on the new mortgage. Thus it will earn after tax the same amount on the new mortgage by charging 9 per cent interest as it did on the old mortgage by charging 18 per cent. The administration costs associated with the procedure will probably result in the bank requesting a 10 or 11 per cent rate of return. This rate is not fixed by the government and is completely subject to negotiation by the borrower and the lender.

The bank in the above example does not lose anything by accepting the reduced interest rate since it is not taxed on it. On the contrary, it benefits by the fact the hardware store will be more likely to repay its loan. There is no government department or agency from which the bank or hardware store is required to obtain approval before such a loan is made. However, in practice, cautious lenders often take steps to obtain an assurance from Revenue Canada officials that the prerequisites for making a small business development bond loan are satisfied.

This device can be used by incorporated farmers whose carrying costs have reached unmanageable levels. Although care should be taken to consult the actual small business development bond rules in specific cases, one can say in general that any small incorporated Canadian active business with retained earnings which do not surpass $750,000 which is unable to repay a loan can utilize the small business development bond vehicle to slash its interest costs by almost 50 per cent on up to $500,000 of qualifying debt.

Undoubtedly the opposition will point out that the measure is not available for healthy corporations which, though hard hit by high interest rates, are able to handle their debt load. We acknowledge this fact, but we do not feel the need to apologize for it. The government's interest rate policy would be severely undermined if all small businesses were insulated from its effects. The assistance provided was reserved for those who needed it most.

However, in order to help our economy to recover its former strength and vigour, provision was made in the small business development bond program to assist all small businesses to expand their operations. Thus, even healthy businesses can benefit from the interest rate relief afforded by the program if they use the funds obtained to build new structures, to purchase new equipment, or to carry out scientific research and development. In this manner we hope to foster growth in our economy and to lower levels of unemployment. The measure was restricted to new capital asset purchases in an effort to stimulate simultaneously the manufacturing sector.

The opposition suggested that the measure be made available to unincorporated businesses. The nature of unincorporated businesses is such that it would be very difficult to ensure that borrowed funds were used for permitted purposes, since even the separation of business and personal assets is often unclear in the case of unincorporated businesses.

Further, complex rules would be required to assess the smallness of an unincorporated business, whereas well-known rules already exist to accomplish this objective in respect of incorporated businesses.

I must also point out that the incorporation of the business is now a simple and relatively inexpensive operation. In addition, rules were provided in the small business development bond legislation to permit qualifying assets acquired by unincorporated businesses to qualify when transferred to a newly incorporated company. Further, the existing tax law permits assets to be transferred without tax costs into a new company. In the case of unincorporated farmers and small family businesses, it provides parallel treatment for the intergenerational transfer of shares of a family farm or small business corporation. Thus, there appears to be no valid reason to introduce further complexity into the small business development bond legislation by creating rules for unincorporated businesses.

The suggestion has also been made that the measure be expanded to cover working capital loans. The revenue costs associated with an unlimited expansion to working capital loans are very significant. Our estimates indicate that such costs could attain several million dollars. As indicated, the measure was not intended to be a general interest rate subsidy. Such a subsidy would conflict with the government's over-all policy to reduce inflation. It was designed solely to provide relief in those cases where it was most needed, that is where there was genuine financial difficulty, and most desirable, that is where capital expansion and scientific research were to be done. The preceding considerations are equally applicable to all businesses. There is no justification for an extension of the measure to cover the inventory carrying costs of one particular business group.

Although we are unable to provide actual figures, all our sources in the financial community indicate that the small business development bond program has been very widely used by small businesses in all regions of the country and that it can only, at this point in time, be categorized as an unqualified success.

To summarize, it is erroneous to say that the government has failed to assist the small business sector in Canada. It is true that no general interest rate subsidy was made available to the small business sector. However, as indicated previously, relief was provided in those cases where it was most needed and most desirable. A general interest rate subsidy for the small business sector was not provided for two very important reasons. First, such a move would largely undermine the very purpose which present interest rates are intended to serve. Second, such a program would likely cost the government and taxpayers several hundred million dollars. We are not prepared to adopt such a course of action at this time.

In so far as the possible extension of the program is concerned, such a decision requires that we carefully assess whether there is a continued need for the program and whether it is cost effective. It is much too early to attempt to predict whether there will be a need for the program next year. Further, the data required to assess the cost effectiveness of the measure is not yet available. These matters will likely be dealt with in the course of our upcoming budget in October.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in the eulogy given by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder). He read the departmental letter most beautifully. He did not give credit where credit is due.

When the small business development bond program was introduced in the House, the government wanted the bond issue ended on last March 31. It was only as a result of one week of tough debate by this side that the government finally relented and made the bond run until the end of December for new investment.

The hon. member for Guelph read a departmental memo. There are rules in the House about reading things. One usually quotes the author. I hope he tells Hansard who the author was so that they can put quotation marks around it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has delivered his speech and it is not in order to reflect in that sense on it. I invite the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) to keep his remarks in the conventional parliamentary context.

Mr. Blenkarn: Certainly I want to keep my remarks in proper parliamentary context, Mr. Speaker. When I came back from my recent trip with the House committee on fiscal arrangements, I received a wonderful booklet; Mr. Speaker probably received it too. It is entitled: "The Government of Canada and the small business". I whipped over to the section entitled: "getting started". It is a fine publication. It is in both languages, of course. It is pocket size. It reads:

> Although the FBDB assists businesses of almost every type and size, special emphasis is put on helping smaller enterprises. In fact, 90 per cent of the 16,500 loans it authorized in 1979 were for $100,000 or less—

The last time I talked to the FDBD, it indicated that it made loans to businessmen at four points over prime. Their prime rate is four points over prime. Its prime rate is 23½ per cent. Its rate for loans which are a bit risky is six points over prime—only 25½ per cent! That is the kind of help this government advertises as giving to small business. Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of help that Household Finance used to offer. Superior Discount used to offer the same kind of help. Those are the kinds of rates that you would go to jail for if you were part of the mafia. This is the brochure the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) hands out in all seriousness. It is fancy, and well-printed. There are coloured pictures in it of young people who are getting along. Household Finance ads used to look like this. It looks like great stuff. This is the kind of help we receive from the Government of Canada for small business.

● (2150)

In order to borrow $60 million of fresh money on Thursday last, the Government of Canada renewed about $1 billion worth of treasury bills. To borrow $60 million worth of fresh money the government had to bid the rate up to 18.1 per cent. Why did it do that? It wanted to preserve the validity of the Canadian dollar. It wanted to ensure that we did not have a devaluation of our dollar so that the Canadian dollar would remain at about 83.5 cents. So the Government of Canada went out into the marketplace and paid 3 per cent more than the government of the United States had to pay on equal security. Of course we could say that the credit of the Government of Canada is that much worse than the credit of the government of the United States. With our natural resources maybe our credit is worse than the United States.

Mr. Nickerson: Of course it is worse. Look at the kind of government we have.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says of course it is worse than the United States. The truth of the matter is that we paid 3 per cent more than the government of the United States paid for money because we do not manage our affairs in Canada properly and because people need that kind of return in order to invest in Canada. This is because we do not have an energy policy which means anything to anybody, because we have a government which drives investors away from the private market. This is what our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did when he tried to drive investors away from the Canada Development Corporation. Of course we have to pay more—because we have to bribe people to bring their money to Canada.

An hon. Member: They retire here.

Mr. Blenkarn: The hon. member opposite says they retire here. They don't retire here, they retire in a great many other places, but not necessarily here. The hon. member opposite will have to retire soon, when his constituents begin to realize what kind of government he is sponsoring.

Sir, what happens with the prime rate? The Government of Canada creates an interest rate and the banks immediately follow. So, we have a 19.5 per cent prime rate. Let us look at how that works with respect to small business. A small businessman goes to his banker and says, "I need a line of credit for 1981." Let us say that he receives approval for a line of credit of $300,000, which is not that much today. The banker says, "The rate of interest you will have to pay is 1½ over prime." When the small businessman made that arrangement in September of last year, he could have had his interest factor somewhere around 13.5 per cent. Today he is paying 21 per cent. How can he make a profit at 21 per cent? There is no way he can.

The other day I was examining a balance sheet and a proposal for some clients who were organizing the purchase of a business through my law firm. I was giving them advice on the proposal. The business was earning 16.5 per cent. Not very long ago that would have been a pretty good business. But today anyone who bought that kind of business would have to have scrambled eggs for brains. It would be more sensible to go out and buy treasury bills at 18.81 per cent rather than to invest in Canada. That is certainly what is being done. Why is that the case? It need not be the case, but it is. This is so because of the totally inept financial leadership that we have seen in this country.

When we get into this kind of situation, we are asked by the Minister of Finance to supply some alternative. In the motion before us we have suggested to the minister that here is a tax expenditure method like the small business development bond. We have suggested that he expand the purpose of that bond to allow small businessmen the use of it for inventory, for accounts receivable or for working capital. The Minister of Finance says, "My goodness, my treasury will be raided." But does he talk that way when he allows foreign investors to buy Government of Canada securities, foreign investors who pay no withholding tax and no income tax to Canada when those securities are bought and when interest is received from Canada on them? Not in the least. He said that is quite all right. In fact, foreign investors can come into this country, buy bonds, even corporate ones, and pay no income tax on the interest received from Canada. But when a small businessman wants to borrow from his bank the minister says, "My goodness, you will tear my budget apart. You will rip me asunder." Mr. Speaker, the minister says that the small businessman is not entitled to the same advantages that the big boys are entitled to because this government wants to tax, tax and tax small business since it is not prepared to be imaginative in financing the small businesses of this country. That is why interest rates are between 23 and 25 per cent at the Federal Business Development Bank. That is why we have two situations occurring throughout the country. We have big business able to swallow up the little guys because it has the credit to go to the banks and borrow the money for takeovers, while small business can either try to pass the cost of credit on to consumers or go bust. And the very nature of small business is that there are a number of little fellows in the game competing with one another. The result of this high interest rate policy is that only the very strong will survive—the weak will perish and prices will rise.

When the government says that this interest rate policy is an anti-inflation policy, it is really saying that it is a big business policy, a high price policy—a policy in favour of inflation. There is only one way that business can survive with this kind of policy, and that is to raise prices. If it does not raise prices, it will go bust. That is the result of the high interest policy with which we are faced today.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL SECURITY—MISSING TASCHEREAU COMMISSION PAPERS AND MACKENZIE KING DIARY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question I put to him on April 13 about missing documents in the Taschereau-Mackenzie King papers, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) indicated to me, as reported at page 9197 of Hansard, without so much as batting an eyelid, that his interest in the question was more historical than political because, he said, the loss of one of Mackenzie King's diaries was recorded years ago.

Has it occurred to him to be a little curious about why the diary should have disappeared in 1947? Is he so sure that the Taschereau documentation is complete? If that documentation reveals gaps, what does he propose to do?

Is the man naive? Has he learned nothing from interwar history, or more particularly, from post-war history? Does he give no credence to what those outstanding Russian dissidents, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn and Andrei Sakharov have been saying about Soviet threats to the west for the past decade or so—not the nuclear threat, but the threat to our social fabric and to our economic organization that the Soviet Union and its workers are set on destroying one way or another? Does he discount such pleas, such urgings, such warnings as mere rhetoric spawned in the minds of overwrought neurotics? Has he written Solzhenitsyn and Sakharov off as kooks? He is ready enough to charge the Soviet Union with bad faith when it comes to mistreating their citizens and denying exit permits to the Shumok's and the Shcharansky's of this world. Why does he refuse to believe the Soviet Union when it says to the West, "We'll bury you"? Why should he berate them in one instance and be ready to exonerate them in the other?

Has he read Sakharov's "Letter from Exile" written in exile in Gorky in May, 1980, and smuggled out of the Soviet Union to appear in print in the New York Times Magazine Supplement on June 8, 1980? Does he consider that Sakharov is a raving lunatic when he lists the four groups of citizens in the west who, by reason of their positions in government, in the industrial sector and in the media, are able to promote Soviet influence and expansionist goals? Or does he hold that the Sakharov letter is a forgery? He may have forgotten that Gouzenko said as much in a letter published on October 12, 1968, in the Congressional Record, 20 years after giving evidence in Ottawa.

Why should he think Canada is immune from subversion? Does the loss of documents relating to subversion not make him feel just a little, tiny bit uncomfortable? Is he really concerned with history and with personal privacy, as he says in answer to my supplementary question? Has he not thought of the implications of the losses for the nation's security? How has he come to convince himself, given the loss of strategic documentation, and for other reasons, that there are no moles at work at various levels in Canada's government service? Strategically important documents do not disappear on their own. They need a helping hand. Whose hand was at work and is it still at work? Is he not concerned about the apparent indifference of the government in determining whether those moles are not still burrowing away? Where are they located or is he so blind because he has been hoodwinked into believing there are no such moles? How naive can the Solicitor General be? Has it not struck him and the Canadian people that, since 1945, Canada is the only major western country which has not had a first-rate spy scandal? To what do we owe this special immunity? I lay this at the door of the government's indifference. It is purblindness or even perversity, whichever is the worst. There may even be a more sinister explanation. Are those moles in Canada being protected by persons in positions of influence?

● (2205)

Britain has had its Philbys, its Burgesses and its MacLeans. More recently it has had its Blunts, and now a shadow is cast over another prominent British secret agent. The Germans have had their problems too, as have the U.S.A. and Australia. Are Canadians such dedicated patriots that we have prevented infiltration entirely? That is difficult to credit. Given our strategic position geographically and politically in the western world, Canada cannot be anything else but a prime target for infiltration and subversion unless, of course, suspicion about our moles had made our friends unwilling to show us any vital secrets. I fear for the future of this country when I am obliged to note the attitude of this government to the live threat confronting us. I am at a loss to know how to shake it up. I am the more fearful when I recall that 35 years ago, the Taschereau report of the Gouzenko investigation mentioned the presence of several spy rings in Canada and referred to the difficulty in identifying the members of more than one of them, namely the Zabotin Ring—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Where are the other rings and why have they not been discovered?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we could be here all night if we all attempted to address the broad issues raised by the hon. gentleman opposite. Therefore, I shall restrict my remarks specifically to one portion of his address, namely the Taschereau commission papers.

I am pleased to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). In his question of April 13, 1981, the hon. member asked several questions relating to the so-called missing Taschereau commission papers and the so-called missing MacKenzie King diaries. Specifically, the hon. member asked why the minister and his colleagues were "so indifferent to the disappearance of these documents." He also asked for an assurance that an inquiry was taking place within the department and in the department of the Secretary of State, "to make sure every possible clue is being followed up to find out where these documents might be." The minister has asked officials in his department and in other departments of the Government of Canada to attempt to determine the exact composition and present disposition of the documentation relating to the Taschereau commission and the papers of the late prime minister.

It has been determined that there are four known copies of the transcripts of the Taschereau-Kellock royal commission. One copy is divided into ten volumes with two indices and comprises the testimony of 110 witnesses recorded in 6,042 pages. This copy was retained by the Privy Council office until 1963, and then transferred to the Public Archives. It was retrieved by the Privy Council office in 1976 for examination, and returned again in 1978 to the Public Archives. It was withdrawn once again by the Privy Council office in March, 1981, and is the document currently under review for the purposes of eventual publication. This document is complete, and there are no missing sections.

Copies two and three are divided into 49 volumes and both are located at the RCMP archives. These documents are complete. I wish to notify hon. members that the exhibits and miscellaneous papers of the Taschereau-Kellock commission, involving some 601 original statements, personal notebooks of persons interviewed by the commission, etc., are also stored in RCMP archives.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Give him another minute.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—INQUIRY WHETHER FIRE ENGINE CONTRACT HAS BEEN AWARDED TO WALTER TRUCK CANADA

● (2210)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, I asked a question of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) about the award of a fire engine contract in connection with the Walter Truck affair. The contract has been awarded to the Walter Truck Canada Company, and I thought that I had found certain facts which deserved the attention of the House. The Department of National Defence needed these special crash trucks and the order amounted to $6 million for 32 trucks. The lowest bidder was the firm les Camions Pierre Thibault Inc., of Pierreville, in Quebec, which has a well-established reputation, good Canadian content and the required expertise.

The second lowest bidder was the Walter Truck Canada Company, from Ville D'Ajou, in Quebec. This company was purchased at the time when the bids were submitted, it had never built fire engines such as those requested and it had neither the staff nor the expertise required when the bid was made. The only thing they had in hand were the plans for a fire truck almost identical to that requested, and indeed the plans were bought from a bankrupt American company. If I may be allowed a comparison, let us say that the Walter Truck Company, at the time of tendering, was as well equipped as any private individual in Canada having in hand the plans for a warship which would meet the requirements of a Supply and Services order. That individual could be awarded the contract without any previous experience in shipbuilding. The least we could say is that such tendering practices are unbelievable. To my supplementary question in this House, the minister answered as follows, and I quote:

—the contract was awarded to the Walter Truck Canada Company because it did guarantee more Canadian content than the lowest bid which was rejected.

In a press interview, the president of the Walter Truck Company, Mr. Georges Laporte, stated on November 11, 1980, he had the plans from an American company and the Canadian content was only 62 per cent, while the Thibault trucks had a 70 per cent content.

As the saying goes in trade talk, it is the pump that makes the fire truck. The Walter pump is made in the U.S.A., while the Thibault pump is manufactured here in Canada. The Pierre Thibault company have been manufacturing all kinds of fire trucks for more than 72 years. The Walter Truck Canada Company is a recently established firm which as of the time tenders were called had never built anything else but snow-plows.

The thought of questioning the integrity of our officials never occurred to me. I was myself a civil servant for ten years and I am sure that they correctly performed the work that they were asked to do. However, one may wonder whether at the time tenders were called there was not a lack of information or at least of flexibility which did not allow for a more serious perusal of that tender nor a greater stress on the benefit of experience, technique and the more competitive prices of Pierre Thibault Inc.

Last Thursday, in reply to a question I asked him, the Minister of Supply and Services said that Walter Truck Canada had a greater Canadian content than Pierre Thibault Inc., that being one of the reasons why it was chosen.

Now, I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have left, that that argument simply does not hold water. This company's Canadian content is only 62 per cent. Thibault, on the other hand, states that the Canadian content of its trucks is 70 per cent. Is it the kind of Canadian content that is considered?

This is the answer the minister gave to my first question, and I quote:

—the bids filed were very thoroughly examined.

I wonder, in closing, Mr. Speaker, whether the minister would consider asking for a review by an independent engineering firm to ascertain the quality of the trucks submitted and to determine which is the better one.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to preface my remarks by saying I am pleased the hon. member has desisted from implying that there has been any wrongdoing by officials of the Department of Supply and Services. That certainly was his original intent and I am delighted now that he has publicly recanted.

Mr. Kilgour: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) on a point of order. At this stage of the proceedings points of order are rarely entertained, but in these circumstances I will recognize the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: My opinion concerning the Canadian content is still the same. Mr. Speaker, I have never suggested that the officials were guilty of anything—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Kelly).

Mr. Kelly: By way of elaboration, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I think I stated very clearly that the hon. member implied that very strongly in his statement in the House earlier, and he certainly implied it during his appearance at the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee this evening.

Everyone in this House should know that no government at any level of major jurisdiction accepts the lowest bid automatically. The bid that is considered acceptable is the bid that is the lowest and that is compatible with the specifications of the contract. In this particular instance, the Walter Truck company submitted the lowest bid which met the specifications. The specification was that the bidder present to the government evidence of a foam system that was tried and true. The company did that, whereas the other bidder did not. There was absolutely nothing untoward about this particular bid. Different contracts at times carry different specifications. In this instance the specifications were met and the contract was offered to the lowest bidder. Everything was above board and according to the practices of this government and every other government which is involved in the bidding or tendering process in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND INDIAN AFFAIRS—1. INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO END DISCRIMINATION AGAINST INDIAN WOMEN. 2. REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BAND RESOURCES

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on April 6 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) about Canada's commitment to the United Nation's Human Rights Committee. Last November Canada indicated to the committee that it would introduce legislation by mid-1981 to end the discrimination against Indian women which now exists under the Indian Act.

In response to my question, the minister referred once again to his "powers under the Indian Act to set aside those provisions which discriminate against status women who marry white men and lose their status" whenever a band chief and council passed resolutions asking him to do so. The minister said:

> We have received some of these resolutions now, and I am acting on them.

That same day, April 6, 1981, in response to a question asked in the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development on April 2, 1981, a departmental official wrote:

> Unfortunately we have not been able to act on any of these requests. Simply removing application of Section 12(1)(b) will not achieve the minister's objective of placing Indian women who marry non-Indians on equal footing with Indian men who marry non-Indians. The Department of Justice has not as yet been able to determine which sections can be removed to achieve this goal.

Obviously when the minister promised to use Section 4 of the Indian Act to get around the ugly fact of discrimination, he was either perpetrating a fraud or he did not know what he was talking about.

● (2220)

In the same way, the Department of External Affairs deceived the United Nations Human Rights Committee when it suggested mid-1981 as the time when legislation would be introduced to eliminate this discrimination. On May 12 when the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development appeared before the committee, he finally admitted that there would be no such legislation by mid-1981. Rather, he talked about a three-year period while we are waiting for the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to come into effect.

I would be interested in knowing if Canada is going to revise the answer it gave to the United Nations Human Rights Committee. In November the government said to that committee that the legislation would be tabled by mid-1981. Last summer the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that Indian women would have to wait one or two years more for justice. Now the minister tells us not to worry and that we have a period of three years to find a solution to this problem. Is Canada going to go to the United Nations and inform it about this change in its intentions? I agree with the minister that the problem is complex and that in our desire to do justice to Indian women we do not want to ride roughshod over the rights of the Indian people as a whole. But the Canadian government's failure to act will not make the problem go away. Instead, it will continue to fester until it erupts in a manner which will hurt all Indian people.

We in our party do not want to see a solution imposed. We hope that by a process of negotiation, this discrimination can be eliminated quickly without doing violence to the Indian people. More and more of the Indian people themselves, both men and women, are speaking up on this matter and urging that the government take action.

My question is: when will the government show some leadership and some initiative to end this discrimination? Or is it going to continue a policy of drift and indecision and of promising one thing to the United Nations, something else to the House of Commons and something else again to the Indian people? I fear that unless the government does show leadership, it will end up with a crisis on its hands and it will act in a stupid, unthinking manner which will only make matters worse.

When will the government show some leadership and sit down with Indian organizations, including Indian women's organizations, to erase this black mark against human rights in Canada?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Canada's response to the questions from the United Nations Human Rights Committee arising from the submission of Sandra Lovelace and her loss of Indian status as a result of her marriage to a non-Indian under section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act was forwarded by the Government of Canada in November, 1980. In the course of that response, the federal government outlined the nature of the situation facing Indian women marrying non-Indian men and, in particular, referred to statements made by Ms Lovelace herself concerning her relationships with the Tobique Indian Band Council, particularly in respect of housing on the reserve.

In addition, the question of what steps the Government of Canada was contemplating in respect of section 12(1)(b) was asked. The government's reply indicated that there was a commitment to end discrimination based upon sex against Indian women, and further outlined that any future revisions to the Indian Act would address this question in such a way that provisions in the act would apply equally to both Indian men and Indian women.

Some of the proposed items under consideration were referred to as well as the fact that additional revision concerning local Indian band government was also being considered at this time. The nature of this legislation which my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), has referred to on a number of occasions in this chamber would be enabling legislation under which individual Indian bands could choose to operate under a newly legislated form of Indian government giving them responsibility and authority for their own social, economic and cultural development at the local band level.

The response to the United Nations Human Rights Committee specifically stated that one of the items being considered under that enabling legislation referred to band control over membership. It is anticipated that any such band control would also be exercised on the basis of the application of uniform, non-discriminatory bylaws concerning membership.

• (2225)

The government's reply indicated that it hoped to present legislation containing non-discriminatory membership provisions to the House during 1981. As the members are aware, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has also referred to the fact that it is this government's intention to seek general Indian agreement on revisions to these sections of the Indian Act, and he hoped that such an agreement could be obtained within the next year or so. If it continues to be difficult to achieve such a consensus, then the Prime Minister also indicated that the government would be prepared to move on its own accord in introducing such revisions to the Indian Act.

CALL FOR MORTGAGE INTEREST DEDUCTIBILITY PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that 500,000 Canadian home owners who secured their mortgages initially at 12 per cent in 1976 will have to renegotiate them at the staggering rate of at least 18.5 per cent, and perhaps as high as 20 per cent, forcing many people to sell their homes, and since HUDAC officials are expressing the view that this situation is far more serious than the government will admit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to implement immediately a mortgage interest deductibility program to protect the average home owner in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FIGURES GIVEN IN NATIONAL ACCOUNTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, in a release dated May 13, 1981, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated that in the month of March, 1981, he had a surplus of $836 million. The fact of the matter is that this surplus was there because the minister revalued certain government assets to the tune of $1.268 billion. Actually in March the minister lost $432 million. Last year in the month of March the government spent $4.9 billion and received in taxes $4.862 billion for a loss of only $47 million. Canada was nine times worse off in March this year than last. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the Minister of Finance today on motions explain to the House why he reclassified assets and liabilities during the month of March so as to pretend to show a surplus in national accounts and explain to the House why he issued what can only be described as a misleading release to the public dated May 13, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since waste disposal negotiations between the United States federal government, the state of New York, and Hooker Chemicals and Plastics Corporation, will form the basis for agreements with several hundred other waste disposal companies in the New York state area, since Canadian interests are not represented at these negotiations, and since the Canadian public do not want their environmental concerns represented by the company responsible for the Love Canal waste disposal site, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House instruct the Minister of the Environment to advise the U.S. government immediately of Canada's concerns in this matter and insist that we have representations at these discussions to protect Canada's interests and protect our lakes and waterways from becoming a sewage system for U.S. industrial wastes.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has repeatedly refused to extend the provisions of the small business development bond program, citing the government's inability to absorb additional costs, and because a new study by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business recently concluded that the SBDB program will, in fact, produce a net gain in government revenue of $77 million in the first year alone, I move particularly since the government refuses to take any action in order to reduce the damaging interest rates in this country, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

S.O. 43

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to amend immediately the provisions of the small business development bond program to include venture or working capital and to render unincorporated businesses, farmers and fishermen eligible to receive such benefits, and further that the program itself be extended beyond the December 31, 1981, deadline.

METRIC CONVERSION

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter that becomes more urgent and pressing every day, especially in view of the six-month lead time foreign scale manufacturers will require in order to supply the Canadian grocery store guinea pigs on January 1, 1982. In the last month the Retail Council of Canada stated "it would be desirable to defer initiation of the scale conversion process until it is clear that the U.S. is close to catching up with Canada". The Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers stated the same thing, that Canada should not convert until the Americans, our neighbours to the south, do. Loblaw companies, on behalf of the corporate chains, stated "We would recommend that the timing of retail scale conversion in Canada be set to coincide with the conversion of the industry in the U.S." I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the government respond to the clearly expressed wishes of those most affected by metric scale conversion and immediately take steps to halt the scheduled conversion program in the retail food stores and follow the most sensible course of a co-ordinated conversion with our major trading partner and tourist source, the United States of America.

HEALTH CARE

PROVISION OF SERVICES TO JAMES BAY CREE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas this morning at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs the members, by unanimous vote, directed the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), to provide primary health services to the James Bay Cree until such time as the terms of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement are fulfilled, and given the fact that all doctors serving the Cree will have left the area by June 19 and no replacements will arrive until September, and that there are serious and urgent health problems facing the James Bay Cree, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately ensure that adequate and comprehensive health care services are provided to the Cree of northern Quebec on a temporary, humanitarian basis, to alleviate their very serious health problems.

NEGOTIATION OF SALE TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the announcement today that Canada has negotiated a huge grain sale to the Soviet Union, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael):

That this House convey its support for the work being done by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in expanding Canadian grain sales abroad.

SHIPMENTS THROUGH PORT OF CHURCHILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 is on the same topic.

In light of the long-term grain agreement with the U.S.S.R., which is a strange way to conduct an embargo, and in view of the neglect of the Port of Churchill by the federal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That the government now commit itself to ship 4 per cent of grain shipments through this port and further commit itself to building a merchant marine so that we can ship our grain on Canadian ships.

FUNGICIDE CAPTAN—NEED FOR PUBLIC INFORMATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I too rise to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the American government has asked the Captan manufacturers to show cause why Captan should not be banned, and whereas the health protection branch in Canada has urged that a ban, or severe restriction, be placed on Captan, and whereas the Canadian government has refused to make any information public while the Americans published last August their information on potential health hazards, and further, any information Canadians have so far obtained they have obtained from the United States, where it has been public for over nine months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Health and Welfare be directed to make public immediately all information concerning Captan.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PENSIONS PAID TO RETIRED EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Canadian National Railway pensioners were notified last week that they would be getting a cost of living increase in their pension cheques for the year 1981 only. This increase varied from a high of $25 per month to a minimum of $8.18 per month for a widow whose husband retired in 1971. While this increase could not be considered satisfactory under any circumstances, the fact that it is for the current year only adds insult to injury.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Minister of Transport instruct CNR to make this paltry increase a part of the basic pension rate ensuring thereby that these underpaid pensioners will continue to get this money beyond December 31, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Now that the government has acknowledged the error of its ways, accepted good advice and agreed to amend Bill C-48 to modify the clause dealing with appropriation without compensation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House reaffirm and uphold the principle that no private property, ownership rights, or proprietary interests will be expropriated by government or any Crown corporation of government without due compensation and/or access to due process of law.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS TO MEET INCREASED MORTGAGE PAYMENTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the high cost of housing and interest rates. I put it to the Minister of Finance that he is prepared to have his government pay $1.5 billion for an oil company but is not prepared to come to the aid of Canadians who are facing high interest rate charges and who are faced with the prospect of not being able to renew their mortgages.

The minister will recall that in the throne speech the government promised, and I quote:

—to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided.

That was a firm commitment made in the throne speech opening this Parliament, before $1.5 billion was spent on Petrofina. Does the Minister of Finance intend to honour that commitment, or will that commitment to Canadians be abandoned, and will Canadians who are facing renewal of their mortgages now in many cases be forced simply to let their houses go?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I mentioned yesterday in reply to a question from a member of the opposition, there was indeed a similar situation existing in the country respecting interest rates at the time the Speech from the Throne was made public and announced. We were all very deeply concerned about the very sharp increase in interest rates not only in Canada but also in the United States. It was in that context that that was commitment made.

Subsequently, however, as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition recalls, interest rates in Canada dropped sharply, and the fact of the matter was that after very careful monitoring by the government, and after co-operation arranged with financial institutions by the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, most home owners—indeed all—were able to renegotiate without any difficulty in that situation.

Since that time I have given the assurance to the House that I am monitoring the current interest rate situation and the impact it may have on the ability of those who are currently renegotiating their mortgages, and that is the commitment I restate now.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, for those Canadians who might have missed that, the clear message of the minister is that he intends to abandon absolutely the promise he gave to Canadians. His word is worth nothing. That is what he is saying.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF MORTGAGE TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance talks about the easy situation Canadians are facing. Perhaps he would like know, as the House should know, that a typical Canadian home owner trying to renew this year a $30,000 mortgage will be paying $90 a month more in interest alone than he or she would have had to pay if that renewal had occurred when this government came to office. Ninety dollars a month is the high cost of Allan MacEachen.

In light of this burden which is being placed upon Canadians, many of whom are faced with the prospect of losing their homes, will the Government of Canada not honour its obligation and honour its word, recognizing that $90 a month more now than would have been paid when this government was elected is indeed a heavy burden for most Canadians? Will the Government of Canada not do what it should do and bring in the kind of measure my government proposed, a mortgage tax credit, which would have met all that extra cost, or will the government take some other action? Will the minister help those Canadians who are now paying $90 a month more for the "privilege" of having a do-nothing Minister of Finance?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the only suggestion the Leader of the Opposition is ever able to make when he asks questions on the orders of the day in so far as the economy is concerned, is that we should spend more money. Every day he gets up and says, "Let's have a new program. Let's add to the deficit. Let's increase expenditures"—

Mr. Nielsen: What about Petrofina?

Mr. MacEachen: —while his former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, looks away in embarrassment at the naivete of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

Mr. Clark: The difference, Madam Speaker, is the direction of the spending. This government is prepared to spend $500 million to aid the OPEC countries because it cannot sign an energy agreement. This government is prepared to pay $1,500 million for an oil company that the country does not need, but it ignores the needs of ordinary Canadians who are being driven into bankruptcy or driven out of their homes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister, who is interested in spending, might know that while he was out of the country, running away from his responsibilities last week, the Minister of Labour indicated that he intended to bring in expensive new programs. He said, and I quote, "I don't give a hoot how much it costs." That is the spending of the Liberal party.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare in the Minister of Finance's absence last week indicated that she proposes higher child tax credits—Allan gets out of town and the government starts to spend everything it can. That is the position of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, when is this government going to recognize that the Conference Board of Canada, Wood Gundy, Data Resources, that everyone knowledgeable about the housing industry is indicating there is going to be an increase of at least 15 per cent per year in the price of houses in Canada unless there is some change in the government's policy? I ask the Minister of Finance will he not accept his responsibility to help those Canadians who are already paying too much for housing and who are going to be facing further increases? Will he come home to his responsibilities, and will he help those Canadians in need?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition has included a lot of political polemic in his so-called question, and he alluded to the Canadianization program which is part of the NEP and which is widely accepted by the Canadian people. He ought to remember the stand he took on Petro-Canada and which sent him down the chute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I am telling you that if he takes the same attitude on the Canadianization program, he will have the same retreat into political oblivion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EFFECT OF MONETARY POLICY ON HOUSING COSTS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Executives of HUDAC are presently meeting in Ottawa on what has been described as the worst housing crisis in Canadian history. The Conference Board of Canada estimates the cost of financing a single detached home will be 81 per cent higher this year than in 1979. That is a direct result of the government's monetary policy and high interest rates. People are being forced to sell their homes, with nowhere else to go because housing starts are going down and the vacancy rate in major cities is practically non-existent.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, that is a crisis, and it is clearly the responsibility of the government to face up to that critical situation. I ask the Minister of Finance, who is a compassionate man, what does he propose to do about it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has denounced the monetary policy being followed by the Government of Canada. What we are doing is supporting the monetary policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I would remind the hon. member that his colleague from St. John's West, in a speech not very long ago in this House, gave his support to Governor Bouey in the current circumstances, and that is the monetary policy we are supporting.

However, I would also remind the hon. member, before he gets carried away by a lot of intemperate inaccuracies, that housing starts, for example, were higher in April, 1981, than at any time since November, 1978. And the hon. member is totally wrong when he talks about the housing industry being in a state of crisis, because there has been considerable acceleration in the rate of housing starts in Canada at the present time.

SITUATION IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. It is true that the Governor of the Bank of Canada may be responsible for monetary policy, but the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are responsible for the welfare of Canadians, and the minister has failed to live up to that responsibility. Because of the critical situation we face today, people are being forced to sell their homes, and housing starts are beginning to decline at a rapid rate.

Mr. MacEachen: No. They are going up.

Mr. McGrath: We have been told that today. I want to put a position to the minister regarding our own region, the Atlantic provinces. The average industrial wage in Atlantic Canada this year will be just under $16,500. The family income required to purchase a new home has increased from $17,500 in 1979 to $31,800 in 1981. Given these startling statistics, and given the fact that the people of the Atlantic provinces, more so than people in any other part of the country, want to own their own homes, what is the minister prepared to do to help the young people of his own region to satisfy their dreams and aspirations? Under him, the dream of home ownership is becoming a dream which will be unfulfilled.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, I do not agree at all with the very pessimistic approach taken by the hon. member with respect to the possibility of home ownership in the country. Recently the statistics indicated a very sharp increase in the number of housing starts in Canada. I do not believe it is to anybody's benefit to create a false picture of what is the situation.

Miss MacDonald: Take off your rose-coloured glasses.

Mr. MacEachen: But I want to remind the hon. member of this point: no Canadian will ever have his dreams or aspirations fulfilled in the next five or ten years—

Mr. Crosbie: Under this government.

Mr. MacEachen: —unless the government, at the present time, takes the very difficult decision of doing the things that are required to arrest inflation in Canada.

Mr. Clark: Unless he is Maurice Strong.

Mr. MacEachen: If hon. members opposite want to ensure—

Mr. Clark: Pay for the pork-barrelling and ignore the home owner.

Mr. MacEachen: —lower interest rates in the future, and that young people will be able to—

Mr. Clark: Let them give one million bucks to Maurice Strong.

Mr. MacEachen: —to provide for home ownership, then they ought to get behind the battle I am fighting against inflation in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

FUNGICIDE CAPTAN—RECOMMENDATIONS OF DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Department of National Health and Welfare made certain recommendations to the Department of Agriculture concerning the use of the fungicide Captan, which is apparently strongly linked to cancer, birth deformities, and miscarriages. Will the minister make public the recommendations of her department to the Department of Agriculture? Will she also state what her own department will do to control the use of Captan in such non-agricultural uses as wallpaper, cosmetics, and pharmaceuticals?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in making public the letter and the recommendations which I sent to my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, and also, if required—and if the Minister of Agriculture feels this appropriate since he is in a client relationship with my department—in making public also the basic study which gives an update of scientific literature about the dangers of the fungicide Captan which are known at the present time, and in this regard, I do not agree with the preamble of the hon. member. However, if we are to follow the rules of the game, this question would be better addressed to the Minister of Agriculture himself since he has the legal responsibility to publish these documents. I would certainly not object to it.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, in fact the Minister of Agriculture was asked and, as usual, he gave an answer which nobody quite understands yet.

ROLE PLAYED BY DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. On May 22 the Minister of Agriculture established a 17-member committee to review the Captan issue and other issues relating to fungicides, herbicides, etc. Does this new committee replace the role the Department of National Health and Welfare has played in terms of its recommendations for the registration of these chemicals? If so, what new technology and what new capacity would this committee bring to the job that the Department of National Health and Welfare does not have?

● (1430)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Madam Speaker. The role of Health and Welfare is quite clear. I am looking into the eventual need of making the procedure for giving health advice more stringent and formal. Our role is not replaced by that committee. If the hon. member had read the press release it would be absolutely obvious to him that my advice to the agriculture department concerns the exact state of knowledge we have with regard to Captan, and any recommendations. The basic recommendation is to ban Captan from domestic household use—and there was a wide misinterpretation of what I had recommended—because of small open spaces in city gardens where children and, perhaps, pregnant mothers may be exposed to it. So we want to ban the household use of Captan and not its use by farmers in wide open spaces, and according to more strict control and eventual limitation of its use. It is not a ban which we are recommending for farmers. Rather, the committee will study other recommendations which will change the use of a great many of these products.

THE ADMINISTRATION

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CHEMICALS AND TOXIC SUBSTANCES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. What we have here is a special committee established by the Department of Agriculture which seems to all of us to begin to replace what the Department of Health should be doing, despite what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has just said. As well, the Minister of the Environment, in a news release of March 31, 1981, stated that his department will become thoroughly involved with toxic materials and that it would become a major priority of his department—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. de Jong: The Minister of the Environment states that he is concerned about toxic materials which are not even included for discussion by the committee established by the Minister of Agriculture. The Department of Health is really being ignored. Who is in charge of the question of chemicals and toxic substances in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, since this particular chemical substance is used in relation to agriculture it was deemed that the Minister of Agriculture should be put in charge of this particular aspect of environmental and health concerns.

It frequently occurs that a particular subject matter falls within the purview of several departments. We attempt to put the minister who is more directly concerned in charge.

The Minister of Agriculture is presently attending the World Food Conference. He is frequently available in the House, and he will be happy to deal with hon. members' questions as soon as he returns.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In a speech which I gave a week or so ago I advised the public not to blame Governor Bouey but to blame the government which got us into this mess, and which will do nothing to get us out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: On October 29, 1979, the present Minister of Employment and Immigration was the housing critic for the party in opposition at a time when mortgage rates were 11½ per cent—8 per cent lower than they are now. At that time he said this:

> If there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases.

That was the policy of the Liberal party on October 29, 1979. Interest rates have risen 7 per cent to 8 per cent since then, and mortgage interest rates are hurting hundreds of thousands across the country. When will the minister observe the requirement to help those people who are hurt by these interest rate increases and who did not cause them?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I answered that question in reply to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition.

Miss MacDonald: When did you answer a question.

ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the minister is giving us more gibberish from Gabon. The minister's policy is the Gabon policy—return to the jungle. Is that his advice to Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: All we need are tree houses and we can swing from tree to tree!

My question to the minister is this: on March 11, 1980, the minister said that the federal government will consider special assistance to home owners if interest rates soar under the new floating rate approach. Interest rates have now gone up 5 per cent more than they were in March of 1980.

I have in my hand a letter from a man whose mortgage is at 11.25 per cent now and will be raised to 19 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: —he has already stopped buying groceries, clothing—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: My question to the minister is: here is one of thousands of Canadians, who has cut down spending on groceries, clothing, maintenance—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: What action will the minister now take to carry out his commitment?

Madam Speaker: I am sure the hon. member heard me call Order. I must remind him that when I do call for order he must resume his seat and find out why—

Mr. Crosbie: We cannot hear you because of the din by members opposite.

Madam Speaker: —I am calling him back to order. I think the hon. member knows his question has been a bit lengthy.

Mr. Crosbie: When will the minister take action to carry out that commitment made on March 11, particularly in view of the fact that housing starts in Newfoundland, for example, will be down 25 per cent this year from the housing starts forecast?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, once again I want to remind the hon. member, as I reminded the hon. member for St. John's East, that there has been a very sharp increase in housing starts, both in urban and rural centres in all parts of Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: That is the past.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member says that that is the past. I am talking about the month of April, 1981, which showed an increase of 50 per cent, which showed a very substantial increase in housing starts over April of 1980.

The hon. member has quoted statements which were made more than a year ago about the interest rate situation which existed at that time. The hon. member knows that at that particular time we monitored the situation very carefully. We entered into discussions with financial institutions, and arrangements were made by the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to assist where required. The fact of the matter was that because of the very rapid increase in incomes which took place between the original negotiation for the mortgage and its renewal, the problem was handled and managed. I have said in the House of Commons, Madam Speaker, that I am taking the same attitude at the present time.

I want to tell the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that she will never have to worry that the hon. member for St. John's West will qualify as secretary of state for external affairs after his views about Gabon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY INTO MARKETING OF URANIUM

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the inquiry into the marketing of uranium in Canada has been going on for 44 months, and since we can only presume that Mr. Bertrand would not have been dumped into the Anti-dumping Tribunal without that inquiry being completed, would the Prime Minister confirm that the inquiry has been completed, that a report is in position, and would he indicate when it will be made public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that the report has been completed and that it was Mr. Bertrand's intention to hand it over to the relevant people had he not been involved in a premature leakage of his change of functions. I understand that the report has been completed and that Mr. Bertrand has transmitted it.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my recollection is that Mr. Bertrand's shift was announced by the government and not leaked.

REQUEST THAT REPORT BE MADE PUBLIC

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): I would like to follow up my line of questioning. If the report is complete, and since it may touch on certain former ministers and senior public servants, as well as various mining and other companies in Canada, would the Prime Minister or perhaps the Attorney General of Canada, since I see he is preparing himself to answer my question, indicate what is intended with respect to the report? Will it all be made public? Can we be assured that none of the report will be changed; and, above all, will prosecutions or other action be taken?

• (1440)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the director has sent his report to the Attorney General of Canada. We received it last week and we have begun to examine it. We shall have to make the decisions concerning the recommendations it contains in the weeks to come, and we are not in a position to make any other comment before the review by the Department of Justice is completed.

HEALTH CARE

CONTINUATION OF SERVICES TO JAMES BAY CREE

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health and Welfare. The minister knows that the Health, Welfare and Social Affairs Committee this morning requested her to convene a meeting involving herself, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Quebec authorities, and the James Bay Cree. The meetings were to resolve questions of jurisdiction and funding regarding the health care of the James Bay Cree. Pending the outcome of such meetings, the committee moved that the Departments of National Health and Welfare and of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should continue to meet their responsibilities for the health care of the James Bay Cree. Will the minister now permit her department to meet its responsibility for the health care of the Cree and to prevent another outbreak of gastroenteritis like the one which last year took the lives of several infant children?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not know if it is customary to repeat the discussions held in a committee. The situation is this: this morning, an amendment to the main motion, which I welcome since finally all the interested parties will be able to have a round-table discussion on the health of Indians and health infrastructures, was passed. I objected to the amendment for the simple reason that—and I can repeat it to the House—since the transfer of powers and responsibilities several months ago, the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare cannot get into the health stations, such as the hospitals, and so on, unless it is at the request of the Cree Indians and the province of Quebec. I suggested to the hon. members that they amend their resolution for that very reason, but they refused to do so. Therefore, I am unfortunately unable to act on the basis of the amendment.

[English]

PROVISION OF SERVICES FOLLOWING DEPARTURE OF DOCTORS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, the committee requested that the departments continue their historic obligations in this way. There is nothing in the James Bay agreement that absolves these departments from that responsibility. Summer is the time when sewage and water problems become most acute, and the problem of gastroenteritis is going to come to the fore again. I ask the minister what steps is she going to take to ensure that there will be adequate medical attention for the people of that area when the doctors finally leave in another two or three weeks from the hospital at Chisasibi?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam speaker, I thought that I had made myself clearly understood. We have given an answer to this same question I do not know how many times. The immediate responsibility for the health of the James Bay Indians is no longer mine. I am not even authorized to go into health stations, for instance. It seems to me that I am explaining my position very clearly. I have spoken with the Quebec authorities about this matter. After the meeting this morning, I spoke once again with my officials, and they assured me that they have very recent information to the effect that health workers of Quebec, those who were hired under contract, as well as the board of directors for health of the Cree Indians, are working very well at this moment and that all health workers are in place. I cannot give the hon. member any other assurance. The following step will be to see to it that the health infrastructures, including sewers and drinking water, are in place, at least in a basic but sufficient form, and I shall see to it as requested by the committee.

MARKETING OF URANIUM—REQUEST FOR RESCINDING ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister will know that ten years have elapsed since the formation of the uranium cartel, and that in 1976 the government invoked an order in council which has really effectively prevented the people of Canada from understanding the facts and details with respect to that cartel and government participation in the cartel.

In light of the answer by the Prime Minister that the report is now completed, and in light of the fact that 12 major firms have settled their anti-trust lawsuits in the United States, will the minister immediately rescind the order in council so that freedom of speech and freedom of disclosure can again see the light of day in this area?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not have the authority to repeal orders in council.

[English]

REPETITION OF REQUEST

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I pose exactly the same question to the Prime Minister, who does have the power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may not have noticed, but I was talking to the Minister of National Health and Welfare when the question was being asked. Will the hon. member please repeat it?

Mr. Speyer: It has been ten years since the formation of the uranium cartel. We know that there has been a restrictive series of orders in council; one in September of 1976 and one in April of 1977. One of them is still in place, and that limits freedom of speech and limits freedom of disclosure.

In light of the Prime Minister's answer to the effect that the inquiry is now ready to be published, and in light of the fact that the major uranium firms have settled their anti-trust lawsuits in the United States, will the Prime Minister take immediate action to ensure that this order in council, which is odious to all of us who believe in free speech, is immediately rescinded?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member declares that the order in council is odious to everyone who believes in free speech. I would like to remind the hon. member and the House that these orders in council were adopted in defence of Canadian interests against the extraterritorial application of American law.

If the hon. member remembers the circumstance, it was the American uranium industry and government which took restrictive measures preventing the entry into the United States of competitive Canadian producers, and that is why many countries joined with Canada in an international understanding in order to make sure that the Canadian industry would not be destroyed by the American industry. When the case was taken to the American courts, the Canadian government took action to make sure that American law would not be binding and compelling on Canadian citizens and corporations. That is the circumstance with respect to what the hon. member described as odious legislation.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks if I will consider rescinding these orders in council. I will certainly take that under advisement. If there is no longer any danger of damage or of prosecution to Canadian nationals, then I see no reason why we should not make it public.

Oral Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE

THREATS TO CUSTOMS OFFICIALS—MANNING OF ISOLATED POSTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday the Public Service Alliance of Canada released an extensive report on the health and safety hazards of customs inspectors. This document gives information on case after case where officials have been threatened or beaten up at isolated posts at Canada's borders. These locations are well known to criminal elements, escaped convicts and smugglers. Will the minister authorize funding which will allow two persons to be at these posts for every shift of the day?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I was somewhat surprised to read of the report, not having received a prior copy or having had discussions with the Public Service Alliance with respect thereto. Obviously the report will be studied, and if it is decided that there are safety issues involved of the magnitude that have been discussed at the press conference and in today's press, then clearly some action may be required.

RIGHT TO REFUSE DANGEROUS WORK

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the minister admits that there have been extensive discussions over the years, but what we need is action because the beatings and the threats are still taking place. This report also lists work place hazards which the customs officials face, especially exhaust fumes, carbon monoxide and nitrogen dioxide and other fumes which are hurting the health of these workers. Since the minister has shown little sympathy for allowing federal government employees the protection of part IV of the Canada Labour Code, will the minister guarantee the right to refuse work which is dangerous, to all customs officials?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am somewhat astonished by the allegation that I have shown little concern about the health and safety of public service employees. In fact, I have pointed out to the hon. member for Churchill on a number of occasions that the standards established by the Treasury Board with respect to employees of the public service have, in nearly every instance, exceeded those provided for under part IV of the Canada Labour Code. The hon. member is aware of that. Therefore the allegation is completely and totally without foundation.

Our safety record and our concern for the health of employees are well known. As I pointed out a moment ago, if we determine that there is validity to these allegations, and the facts justify action, then appropriate action will be taken.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PORNOGRAPHY—BANNING OF YOUTH PARTICIPATION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

A Quebec newspaper reports today that over 325,000 people have signed a petition asking all levels of government to ban the sale of pornographic material to minors.

Would the minister tell us whether he intends to change Bill C-53 so as to include a ban on pornographic publications involving minors, children? Would the minister also inform us whether he intends to amend the Criminal Code or the Excise Tax Act in order to prohibit more adequately the import of pornographic material using minors into Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-53 which is now before the House is to amend the Criminal Code in order to put teeth into the provisions regarding pornography with minors. When the bill is sent to committee, the hon. member can put his suggestions, if he has any, to members of that committee. We are ready to proceed with consideration of this bill. However if we can come to an agreement with opposition parties for quick passage so that the bill can be sent to committee, we shall of course give due consideration to any suggestions hon. members may wish to make.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER INTENDS TO TAX PORNOGRAPHIC PRODUCTS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, the bill the minister refers to does not deal, to my mind, with the import of pornographic material involving minors.

I should also like to put a supplementary to the Minister of National Revenue. According to Mrs. Sheila Finestone, retiring president of the Fédération des Femmes du Québec, present laws dealing with the sale, display and publicity of pornographic material are not being enforced.

Does the Minister of National Revenue intend to levy new taxes or increase present ones on that kind of material? In addition, does the minister intend to amend the Excise Tax Act or departmental regulations in order to slow down or put a stop to the import into Canada of pornographic material involving children?

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the levying of taxes and amendments to the act in question are not under my purview, but under that of the Minister of Finance. We implement the act as the law exists, and my officials screen pornographic material and prohibit its import into Canada. We intend to enforce the law as it presently exists. With regard to the future law, I will, of course, be consulting with my colleagues, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF PROGRAM AS APPLIED TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. It stems from two notices which arrived in my office this morning. One is a transcript of one sentence from the executive director of the Metric Commission in which he says the members in the sector dealing with scales in the retail food industry at a scheduled meeting for conversion of scales had, and I quote:

—agreed that the conversion to metric in Canada in 1982 should be more closely tied to our trading partner to the south, the United States—

For that reason the executive director was recommending a delay in the implementation of metric at this time.

In light of the minister's answer in the House a week ago that he would take into consideration the submissions of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers and the major corporate chains, and now that he has the Metric Commission opposed to the implementation of metric at this time, will the minister finally represent the small business sector in Canada and go before cabinet to delay forcing metric conversion, making Canadian measurement illegal in January, 1982?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should have read the second paragraph of the notice that was sent to me by the task force on metric scale conversion in the retail food sector; he would then have indicated that in fact the task force recommends to defer initiation of the scale conversion process, however in the second paragraph it is mentioned that should the government decide to go ahead, it will be willing to co-operate fully with the government.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERCEDE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I would like to read what the executive director said in his second paragraph:

However, if the federal government proceeds against the wishes of this sector to publish that part of the Gazette making Canadian measurement illegal, the working group on scales in the retail food industry will continue to meet to minimize the costs and the confusion.

The third paragraph reads:

The committee members called upon the government—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question, or does he just want to read a communique to the minister?

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I have a question, but we continue to get bad answers from the other side.

However, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. Will he intercede and remove the order in council causing fines, imprisonment and lockups if people continue using imperial measurement in 1982 and 1983? Will the minister represent the small business sector, or will he go the route of the last two cabinet ministers on the government side who failed to listen to the small business sector?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Do we not receive an answer?

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE OF ALBERTA ON PRICING AGREEMENT

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Because of the impasse as far as reaching an energy agreement with the producing provinces is concerned, will the Prime Minister give consideration to instructing his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to send the Petro-Canada negotiating team responsible for negotiating the Petrofina agreement to Alberta to negotiate a pricing agreement?

An hon. Member: What about Maurice Strong?

Mr. Andre: He is too busy on his ranch in Colorado.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the hon. member has the answers, Madam Speaker.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT ON ACID RAIN WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of the Environment. As the minister has had several meetings with officials of the United States government since President Reagan's visit to Canada when he assured Canadians that the American government would work with the Canadian government to greatly decrease acid rain, would the minister advise the House what movement there has been so far on the part of the American government to work in this direction? If there has been none so far, what action is planned immediately by that government?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member may know, I have, on several occasions, visited Washington to discuss with officials of the American administration our common problem which is caused by the acid rain generated in our two countries. So far, the response that we have received from the administration is encouraging. I can tell the hon. member that we expect to begin the formal process of negotiation of the international accord governing air quality standards probably in the third week in June.

PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON MARKETING OF URANIUM

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It seeks some clarification of earlier answers with respect to the report of the uranium inquiry. As I understand it, the report is completed and has been referred to the Attorney General. Pursuant to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, undertaking in the House on March 4 when he indicated that, when completed, the findings would be made public, is the Prime Minister in a position to tell the House when he expects that report to be made public?

ASSURANCE SOUGHT RESPECTING UNEXPURGATED REPORT

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, second and more important, the Prime Minister will be aware that from time to time reports received by government, usually those dealing with security and intelligence, have had certain sections expurgated before they are made public. Is the Prime Minister prepared to undertake to the House that the report resulting from the uranium inquiry is not of that character and that the report, once made public, will be a complete report with no expurgated sections?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the report myself. I do not know its contents and, therefore, I cannot answer a hypothetical question.

I would point out to the hon. member that when reports are expurgated the reason is indicated, and generally it is done in agreement with the authors of the report or, at least, with their approval, because they recognize, too, that they may have some matters in a report which could be confidential or desirable to keep in camera. I cannot answer in this particular case because I do not know.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about the accused?

FINANCE

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. During the minister's absence last week questions were directed to the government House leader with regard to the possibility, and the government's intention, of extending the small business development bond to cover unincorporated businesses for working capital inventory, and an extension beyond the year which would benefit many people, including farmers and fishermen, those who are unincorporated. There was an undertaking that there would be discussions upon the minister's return. Have those discussions been held and, if so, what is the position of the government with regard to that extension?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am currently having discussions with the minister of state on that matter.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is the minister aware of the petitioning and the urgings that have been made to him by the Federation of Independent Business, agricultural interests, and others with regard to this matter? Will he give an undertaking to the House that he will expedite his consideration with the minister of state so that a statement or announcement can be made by the government with respect to this most important matter?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I obviously will expedite consideration of the matter. If there is any new announcement to be made, I will advise the House immediately.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NOWLAN—SECURITY MEASURES ON PARLIAMENT HILL—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: The other day the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) raised a question of privilege concerning a matter involving access by members to this building. In raising the question of privilege, he did not allege that he had personally been impeded or obstructed when entering the building. Therefore, on those grounds I do not find a prima facie case of privilege.

The hon. member did raise an important point as a result of which I have asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to hold discussions with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who have jurisdiction outside the building, in order to find out why the incident he raised in the House had taken place. Discussions were also held with the office of the Solicitor General.

I was given an assurance by these two sources that in future any security measures taken will cause a minimum of inconvenience to members. I might add that these discussions will be ongoing because I understand there are a number of new officers on the Hill who have only recently received their training. Perhaps they are not aware of the identity of members of Parliament. I think they need to be better apprised of who is who in this House and not raise suspicions where obviously there should not be any.

I must tell hon. members that some changes have occurred in the procedures in the interests of both safety and security. Some members will have noticed that the buses no longer park illegally on the wrong side of the street. That important aspect of safety had been overlooked. In an effort to accommodate the members, the bus drivers were dropping them off on whatever side of the street was more convenient. I understand the importance of that when it is raining or snowing, but in the interests of safety I ask hon. members to accept that minor inconvenience.

Standard procedures regarding security have recently been revised. There have been some slight changes. These matters are under constant consideration and periodically new procedures are adopted which the security office feel may be better.

The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) is not in the House. He reported an incident which occurred inside the building, which is clearly within my jurisdiction. I would simply say that corrective measures will be taken in that case. It was an unfortunate incident and I am sure it will not occur again.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CROSBIE—REFERENCE TO GABON

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order just to make sure there is no misunderstanding about my reference to that wonderful country of Gabon, which is a progressive and developing nation and an oil producer. My reference to swinging from a tree and going back to living in tree houses applied to Canada, not to Gabon where housing conditions and interest rates are likely better than in Canada. My point was that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sure that if that is what the hon. member said, it will be obvious to anyone who reads Hansard that his reference was not to Gabon but to Canada. Unless the hon. member wants to correct something he said, members usually do not correct after question period what they said during question period.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I gave you notice today of a question of privilege regarding the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who is not here. I would like to adjourn that matter because of his absence.

Madam Speaker: Order. There are other hon. members who are ahead of the hon. member for St. John's West. It is just a matter of one notice arriving at one hour and another arriving at another hour. I take questions of privilege in the order in which they arrive. The one I received first was from the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson).

PRIVILEGE

MR. NICKERSON—ALLEGED PARTISAN BEHAVIOUR OF MR. MUNRO (HAMILTON EAST)

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, this is the first time I have ever pre-empted the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Unlike the hon. member for St. John's West, it is a very unusual occurrence when I rise on such a matter. In fact, this is the first time I have raised a question of privilege since becoming a member of this House. It is not something I do lightly.

My concern deals with what I consider to be rather improper partisan behaviour on the part of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). I gave Your Honour notice of this a week ago. I would have preferred to raise the matter when the minister was in the House, but he has not been here for seven days, I have no idea when he will return and under our rules questions of privilege should be raised at the earliest opportunity. Therefore, with no disrespect to the minister, whose presence I would have preferred, I will with your permission proceed today.

It seems that the minister in question finds it difficult to draw a distinction between what might be described as party affairs and public affairs. The House already has the benefit of your ruling, Madam Speaker, with respect to the opening of constituency offices throughout the north. I believe it was handed down on March 26.

My question of privilege today goes back to April 23 when, in reply to a question from myself, the minister said with regard to recent NEB decisions on the pipeline and other matters that "consultations will be held with all those people who feel seriously affected by this decision". He was referring to the people of the north.

I submit that that undertaking to consult with the people is good. However, it is the manner in which the consultations have taken place which cause me concern. Public meetings were held in Yellowknife on May 15 and 16. The meetings were organized, executed and put into effect not by the government, not by the minister's office but by the Liberal party. I wish to read two brief quotations from the literature circulated in connection with these meetings. The first is:

—the Liberal Party of the Northwest Territories has invited the Minister to attend a "Public Meeting" in Yellowknife on May 15th and 16th.

Referring to the topics to be discussed, the material reads:

These three topics for discussion were chosen by the Liberal Party of the N.W.T.—

I might point out that the meeting was chaired by the local Liberal president. That evening there was a $40 a plate dinner held for party fund raising purposes, attended by the minister. You paid $40 if you wanted to see the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

● (1510)

I submit, Madam Speaker, that there are three areas of privilege involved here. First of all, there is the question of misleading the House in the minister's reply. He said that all people would be consulted, whereas in fact it turns out that only those people who were willing to attend a Liberal party gathering were the people who were consulted. I submit the minister is using his ministerial authority for partisan purposes. I know this is always a matter of degree, but I submit that in this case he has overstepped the line.

He has in a way insulted the public service, particularly those members employed within the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He has in fact shown that he has little or no confidence in the people who work for that department. He does not trust them to be part of the consultative processes, but would prefer to leave that to the party organization. Can you imagine, Madam Speaker, the chagrin of departmental officials who are pressured into paying $40 to the Liberal coffers in order to hear what their minister has to say to them?

I submit that in doing these things the minister in a way has impaired my ability to do my job as a member of Parliament representing my particular constituency of Western Arctic.

I submit that I was to a certain extent misled in the House, and that neither I nor my constituents could take part in these consultations unless we were prepared to attend a Liberal party function. To many people in the west and north that is something, of course, which they would avoid at any cost.

I submit the possibility exists that public servants, those people employed within the department, were under some undue pressure to attend these partisan functions, and it is difficult for me to get independent advice from members of the public service.

That is really what I wanted to say, Madam Speaker. May I conclude by saying I do not want to see Hamilton-style politics pollute the north. I think they have enough of that in Hamilton. So far the political process in northern Canada has been rather unsullied and we do not want the extension of Hamilton-style politics into the north. We do not want to have to belong to a certain party before getting a job in the public service or being awarded a contract. We in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon do not want association with the alleged, rather unsavoury elements of society that I am led to believe is the case in Hamilton.

Madam Speaker: In spite of the fact that the hon. minister is not present in the House, I think I can rule on this particular question of privilege. I may remind hon. members that it is not necessary that ministers be in the House in this regard. I would have agreed to defer this question but the hon. member chose to raise it anyway, and I commend him for that because, indeed, questions of privilege cannot be delayed indefinitely, and if privilege exists it may be so important that the House cannot function before it is settled. However, I feel I can make a ruling at this time, and I am glad the hon. member chose to raise the matter today.

I must inform the hon. member that the minister in question may choose to consult whomever he wishes in the process of carrying out his departmental responsibilities. If he did tell the hon. member he would consult, I do not think he gave details as to whom he would consult, and the hon. member did not elaborate on that. At any rate, the minister is free to consult in the manner in which he himself sees fit. I certainly have no jurisdiction in respect of how a minister of the Crown discharges his departmental responsibilities in that regard, or as to whether he pleases his officials by consulting or bypassing them. That depends entirely on the style of the minister, who is free to adopt his own working methods. Of course, the Chair cannot intervene in this particular case.

The hon. member was not very explicit about the alleged impairment of his ability to discharge his duties as a member of Parliament in this House, and I think that is a very important aspect. I gather he did not feel his ability was considerably impaired or, for that matter, impaired at all. Therefore, it is difficult for me to determine that he might have a case of privilege.

The hon. member complains that he cannot obtain impartial information from officials. I think the hon. member could get the information he requires, if he persisted, from officials or from the minister. It is up to him to find ways of extracting that information from the government, its ministers or its services. I cannot help him in this particular regard through the process of a question of privilege. Therefore, I have to say that I do not find there is a prima facie case of privilege in the hon. member's question.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. WADDELL—ALLOCATION OF TIME DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I meant to raise this question before you got to the stage of questions of privilege. My point of order arises in relation to the question period.

It is my understanding that members in this part of the House would normally be allowed to ask four questions during the question period, but it seems that this principle has been steadily eroded during the last month or two. May I respectfully suggest that, if the first round of questions and answers were shorter, more members, especially those in the back benches, could ask questions. Perhaps hon. members should lose the right to ask supplementary questions if they cannot make their original questions shorter. I noticed that being the case with previous Speakers in this House. I say this respectfully, but I wonder what has happened to our right to ask four questions.

Madam Speaker: First of all, I am not sure how many precedents there are of Speakers determining that a second supplementary question cannot be asked when the first question is rather long, but I find that an interesting suggestion.

Having regard to the second point raised by the hon. member that members of the NDP have a right to ask four questions, I think the hon. member's mathematics are not very accurate. I suggest that members of the NDP are entitled to ask about one third of the questions asked by members of the Conservative party. That does not work out to four questions on most days. There are days when I allow members of the NDP to ask four questions because they are entitled to a little more than one third. As a result, I do allow four questions once or twice a week, but usually three. That practice has been consistent since the beginning of the time I have been in this chair. I think if the hon. member looks at the statistics he will find that proportion is just about right.

If the hon. member looks back in Hansard, I think he will find that on many occasions when questions by members of the Conservative party have been unduly long and have taken up quite a lot of the time of the House during the question period I have allowed members of the NDP to ask about one third of the questions, in spite of the fact that on those days the proportion allowed members of the NDP did not work out to one third. On some days I have to work on the basis of time rather than on numbers.

I take note of the hon. member's suggestion about the length of questions. I myself find that questions tend to be very long, and I try to discipline hon. members.

An hon. Member: And the answers too.

Madam Speaker: The answers tend to be equally long and I do discipline members on the government side when answers are lengthy. Hon. members must realize that when the questions are long it is very difficult to cut off the answer, or to allow less time for the answer than for the question. However, I have heard hon. members complain when the answer on the other side was simply "No". They do not seem to appreciate that kind of short answer, so it is very hard for the Speaker to please everyone. I know that, and I just try to be as fair as possible.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I gave Your Honour notice this morning of an important question of privilege which involves the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and a letter from him which is misleading and in which false information is obviously deliberately contained.

The minister is not here today. I do not think he will be here until Thursday, according to his office. I will not be here Thursday and Friday because of other public business. I am prepared to go ahead and argue this either tomorrow—there is ample precedent for it—or I can wait until next Monday when presumably the minister will be here. I am quite willing to wait until next Monday, which appears to be the first day, unless Your Honour wants to direct otherwise.

Madam Speaker: There is no reason for the minister to be present in the House. If I need to hear the minister once the hon. member has raised his question of privilege, I can defer my ruling on that question of privilege and wait until the minister is heard. However, I can hear the question of privilege, and I urge the hon. member to raise his question of privilege today. If I need further clarification from the minister, I can hear that later; but if the hon. member wishes, I can hear his question today. In fact, I prefer that the matter not be deferred.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, because I checked with the minister's office and was told he was not here, I did not bring the documents and the things I need to make the point now. I can go upstairs and get them and bring them down in a few minutes' time, or else I can go ahead tomorrow.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, may I speak very briefly on this point? While it is true that there is nothing in the Standing Orders or in our rules which prevents questions of privilege from being raised in the absence of a minister or a member who it is anticipated will be involved in the question of privilege, nevertheless it has been a long-standing practice traditionally in this House that courtesy is extended to the minister or member involved in a question of privilege and that the question not be raised until he is here. That is particularly true with respect to questions of privilege which involve allegations of untruthfulness, allegations of misconduct or allegations which affect ministers or members personally.

I have some knowledge of the nature of the subject matter of the question of privilege which the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) intends to raise, and it does involve allegations of such a nature. In this particular circumstance I urge the Chair that it might be far more appropriate to await the return of the minister before the question is raised.

Madam Speaker: I am not saying that I rule out that the hon. member should defer his question of privilege to another day, especially owing to the fact that, thinking that the hon. minister would not be here, the hon. member does not have the documents he needs with him and therefore cannot raise the question.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) points out that there is nothing in the Standing Orders which says a question of privilege has to be heard by the other party who is affected by the question of privilege. There is indeed absolutely nothing. Those are the Standing Orders, and it is in my discretion to hear the question of privilege even if the minister whose conduct is questioned in the question of privilege is not present in the House.

There has to be a balance in relation to a question of privilege. If an hon. member has a question of privilege, then it has to be dealt with very rapidly. If we defer questions of privilege for several days and they are serious, then I wonder what the meaning of the Standing Order is and what the meaning of a question of privilege is. If it is urgent, it is urgent and therefore has to be heard immediately. So it is a balance between these two things which I am trying to reach.

I do not like deferring questions of privilege. Thanks to some hon. members, I have gained a lot of experience respecting questions of privilege. An hon. member's insistence on raising a question of privilege in the presence of a particular minister calls for a debate rather than simply exposing a question of privilege. It might be in the interest of the House that questions of privilege be raised independently of whether a minister is present or not present.

I will accept the hon. member's suggestion that he raise his question of privilege tomorrow because he does not have the documents, but I urge hon. members to raise questions of privilege at the earliest opportunity. If hon. members are not here to defend themselves, sometimes I can rule independently of hearing them, and if I need to hear them I can ask them to rise in the House on another day.

MR. McKINNON—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I am rising to serve notice that I intend to raise a question of privilege tomorrow. I would be pleased to tell Your Honour why I am waiting until tomorrow. The chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence wishes to conduct his own investigation into this matter. I think it will take one or two days. A piece of documentary evidence which would be extremely useful to me is in French only, and I have not been able to have it translated as yet. I am not confident that I understand its full meaning.

The question of privilege concerns an attempt to falsify the minutes of a meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and I will give Your Honour notice tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: I have said repeatedly that I need not have oral notice in the House of a question of privilege. The hon. member can walk out of the House now and give me a written notice of his question of privilege, and that will suffice. Questions of privilege are subject to notice to the Chair in writing, in which notice the member should give an indication of what the question of privilege is all about. I do not need oral notice in the House.

DOC EARTH RECEIVING STATION LICENCES

Question No. 137—Mr. Greenaway:

1. For each year 1975 to date, by province, how many earth receiving stations for the reception of satellite broadcast signals were licenced by (a) CRTC (b) the Department of Transport and, in each case, what were the reasons for approval?

2. For the same years, by province, how many earth receiving stations for the reception of satellite broadcast signals have been established without licences?

3. Have any such cases been prosecuted and (a) if so (i) how many (ii) where were they located (iii) what was the outcome of the prosecutions (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Communications and Transport as follows:

1. (a) Television receive earth stations are licensed by the Department of Communications under the Radio Act.

   (b) Not applicable. This function was assumed by the Department of Communications approximately 12 years ago.

Department of Communications television receive earth station licences issued, by provinces, for the year 1975 to 1980:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980
B.C.			1	1	6	7
Alta.					1	3
Sask.			1	1	1	8
Man.					2	3
Ont.				1	12	21
Que.	3	3	12	14	21	63
N.B.						3
N.S.					1	2
P.E.I.						2
Nfld.	1	1	1	1	2	2
Yukon		3	6	6	6	6
N.W.T.	1	2	4	4	4	4

In each case, television receive earth station licences were approved when the applicant satisfied the licensing requirements of the Department of Communications.

2. No statistics are available on the number of unlicensed earth stations for the years 1975 to 1979. The following figures are estimates only for the current year:

Alta.	13
Sask.	6
Man.	12
Ont.	16
Que.	7
N.B.	1
P.E.I.	0
Nfld.	4
N.W.T.	17

3. It appears that most of the unlicensed earth stations are being used to receive signals from U.S. satellites that carry television programs. In view of the fact that this matter is closely linked to the recent CRTC report on the extension of television services to remote areas, which is currently under review by the Minister of Communications and the CRTC, no enforcement action has been initiated. However, the over-all situation is being monitored and some investigations are being made. Enforcement action could be taken in specific situations prior to a resolution of the broadcasting policy and regulatory issues.

ILLEGAL DISH ANTENNAS

Question No. 1,026—Mr. Cook:

1. How many illegal dish antennas are operating in (a) British Columbia (b) Alberta (c) Saskatchewan (d) Manitoba (e) the Yukon (f) the Northwest Territories (g) Ontario (h) Quebec (i) New Brunswick (j) Nova Scotia (k) Prince Edward Island (l) Newfoundland?

2. Of the illegal dish antennas in British Columbia and the Yukon, how many are operating in areas where there is poor reception or no reception of the CBC signal?

3. Has the government ever forced the closing down of an illegal dish antenna in British Columbia or in the Yukon and, if so, near which communities were they situated?

4. Does the government intend to close down any of the illegal dish antennas it is presently aware of and, if so, near which communities are they situated?

5. Did the government receive complaints from the American government regarding illegal dish antennas in Canada pirating TV signals from the U.S. Satcom 1 satellite and, if so, what was the government's response?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

1. (a) British Columbia	60	(g) Ontario	16
(b) Alberta	13	(h) Quebec	7
(c) Saskatchewan	6	(i) New Brunswick	1
(d) Manitoba	12	(j) Nova Scotia	2
(e) Yukon	9	(k) Prince Edward Island	0
(f) N.W.T.	17	(l) Newfoundland	4

2. It is estimated that there are five unlicensed earth stations in British Columbia and two in the Yukon operating in areas where there is poor or no reception of CBC signals from standard television transmitters.

3. Both the CRTC and the Department of Communications have communicated with many persons owning or operating such facilities to advise them of the illegalities involved. To our knowledge, such notification resulted in the closing down of an unlicensed installation in Whitehorse.

4. It appears that most of the unlicensed earth stations are being used to receive signals from U.S. satellites that carry television programs. In view of the fact that this matter is closely linked to the recent CRTC report on the extension of television services to remote areas, which is currently under review by the Minister of Communications and the CRTC, no enforcement action has been initiated. However, the over-all situation is being monitored and some investigations are being made. Enforcement action could be taken in specific situations prior to a resolution of the broadcasting policy and regulatory issues.

5. No complaints have been received from the American government regarding unlicensed earth stations in Canada pirating TV signals from U.S. satellites. The unauthorized reception of satellite television program signals, including those from Canadian satellites, is also a problem in the United States. It is understood that the government of the United States does not consider the direct reception of U.S. satellite signals in Canada to be permissible under existing international agreements.

A. V. ENGUIBAROV'S TRIP TO BROCKVILLE

Question No. 1,559—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 31 which states in part, that A. V. Enguibarov, commercial counsellor at the U.S.S.R. Embassy made a visit to Brockville, Ontario (a) what was the date of this visit (b) was any reason given to the Department of External Affairs for the visit (c) does the government have any knowledge from any source whatsoever as to what he did while in Brockville, Ontario?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): (a) Mr. A. V. Enguibarov visited Brockville on April 14, 1979.

(b) and (c) In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, Mr. Enguibarov was not required to state, and did not volunteer, the reasons for his visit to Brockville.

LETTERS SUPPORTING CONSTITUTIONAL ADS

Question No. 1,600—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Minister of State for Multiculturalism receive letters in support of the constitutional ads and, if so (a) how many (b) from whom including any members of Parliament in the opposition?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): The Minister of State for Multiculturalism has received favourable responses. However, records are not maintained in such a way as to provide an accurate answer to this question.

U.S.S.R. EMBASSY VEHICLES REGISTERED IN NAME OF A. V. ENGUIBAROV

Question No. 1,608—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) How many vehicles at the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. in Ottawa are registered in the name of Mr. A. V. Enguibarov (b) was the total five in 1978 (c) what are all the reasons given that he requires so many vehicles?

2. Did he use one of the vehicles on his trip to Brockville, Ontario as referred to in the answer to question No. 31 and, if so, what was the licence number, make, model and colour?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. (a) In 1981, no vehicles at the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. in Ottawa are registered in the name of Mr. Enguibarov.

(b) In 1978, six vehicles were registered in the name of Mr. Enguibarov.

(c) From 1978 to 1980, all vehicles used by the personnel of the Soviet trade mission were registered in the name of Mr. Enguibarov. The number of vehicles registered to, and used by, Mr. Enguibarov and other members of the Soviet trade mission is commensurate with the size of the personnel of the trade mission and is not considered disproportionate or excessive.

2. For the trip in question (to Brockville, Ontario), Mr. Enguibarov used a red 1978 Buick Electra, licence No. CDA 248.

CBC DOCUMENTARIES

Question No. 1,908—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is CBC planning to show the documentary "Ten Years After" in the near future and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reasons?

2. What role does CBC Toronto have to play in the decisions to distribute CBC documentaries?

3. Will CBC distribute the program to independents who would like to borrow it?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. No.

(a) Not applicable.

(b) The program does not meet a basic criterion for a CBC documentary on a controversial issue, namely that it make a serious attempt to include all points of view. In the corporation's judgment, the research for the program was not complete, which left the final production badly out of balance.

2. The senior officers at the CBC's English network headquarters in Toronto have the operational responsibility for deciding which programs will be carried on the national network.

3. No.

UNUSED PERSON-YEARS IN LAST FIVE YEARS

Question No. 2,195—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, how many authorized person-years in the Public Service have not been used and what is the estimate for the current year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board):

The unused authorized person-years in the last five years were as follows:

1975-76	11,952
1976-77	8,972
1977-78	5,298
1978-79	8,367
1979-80	5,788

Although the data for 1980-81 are incomplete, the unused person-years should be in the order of 6,000. Unlike financial planning, the person-year authorities are not discounted for expected lapses. Therefore these data reflect unused authority after the facts.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES FILES

Question No. 2,204—Mr. Cossitt:

Are there any other files, in addition to the Taschereau Papers, that have been retained in the Public Archives and not made public after the 30-year statutory limit and, if so, what is the name of each file?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

I am informed by the Public Archives as follows: there are approximately 6,000 files of public records in the Public Archives of Canada that have not been made public after the 30-year statutory limit. These files are in the exempted category as defined by cabinet directive June 23, 1977.

As well, approximately 1 per cent of collections of private papers of individuals and organizations in the Public Archives have some access control for a specified time period. This access control is usually a condition of their acquisition and is implemented to protect personal privacy.

A list of each file in the exempted category is not readily available and would require an inordinate amount of work, time and cost. However, these files are readily identifiable in the existing lists and indexes that serve as finding aids to the public records under the custody of the Public Archives.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON PUBLIC RECORDS

Question No. 2,234—Mr. Cossitt:

Did order in council number 1966-1749 dated September 9, 1966, provide for the setting up of an Advisory Council on Public Records and, if so (a) on what date was it set up (b) what are the names and qualifications of the (i) present members (ii) previous members of the council?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Archives as follows: the Public Records order (P.C. 1966-1749, dated 9 September, 1966) provided for the establishment of the Advisory Council on Public Records (ACPR). The order in council specified that the council was to be under the chairmanship of the Dominion Archivist who would nominate 12 members and present the nominations to the Treasury Board for approval.

(a) The members were appointed on February 8, 1967, under the authority of Treasury Board minute T.B. 664903. The first meeting was held on July 17, 1967.

(b) The Public Records order states that nine members are to be appointed from government departments and agencies, including the Treasury Board at all times. Traditionally, these people have been records managers of major government departments with a great deal of experience in the field of records management. Three members from outside the public service are appointed as representatives of the Canadian Historical Association (CHA), The Canadian Political Science Association (CPSA) and the Records Management Institute (RMI).

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

[English]

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since January 21 my question No. 2,003 has been on the Order Paper. I believe I have asked about this before. It is of particular importance today now that an announcement respecting a large wheat sale to the Soviet Union has been made. The question has to do with how much credit has been extended to the Soviet Union and to the other eastern bloc countries. I understand that the western hemisphere countries have extended credit to the eastern bloc countries to the tune of $65 billion, which puts us in a very vulnerable position. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could see to it that this question is answered as quickly as possible because I think it is germane to the headlines in the newspapers today.

Mr. Collenette: Yes, Madam Speaker, I shall follow this matter up.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Madam Speaker: As hon. members know, there are 135 motions standing on the Order Paper at the report stage of Bill C-57. I have not had an opportunity to examine all the motions to determine their procedural acceptability or, in any case, to group them for debate. However, for the moment, I suggest the following: Motions Nos. 1 and 3 could be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

● (1530)

Motion No. 2 is acceptable for debate and, if required, will be voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 4 and 5 will be debated together and a vote on motion No. 4 disposes of motion No. 5.

Motions Nos. 6 and 7 could be debated together with an affirmative vote on motion No. 6 disposing of motion No. 7. However, a negative vote on motion No. 6 will necessitate the question being put on motion No. 7.

Motions Nos. 8, 13 and 58, standing in the name of the minister, are similar in nature and could be debated together, with a vote on motion No. 8 disposing of motions Nos. 13 and 58.

Motions Nos. 9 and 34 are similar and could be grouped for debate. However, as one motion refers to aircraft gasoline and the other to aircraft parts, separate votes will be required on these motions.

Motion No. 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), seeks to import a new proposition and offends the royal recommendation attached to the bill. I might quote for the benefit of hon. members Citation 437(1) of Beauchesne's fifth edition as follows:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

Also Citation 773(7) reads in part:

> An amendment is out of order . . . if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications as expressed in the royal recommendation.

I might also add a reference to Citation 516(2) of Beauchesne's fifth edition which reads in part:

> —No motion can therefor be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the Crown, . . . nor any alternative made in the area of imposition.

The hon. member may wish to offer argument on the procedural acceptability of his motion, and if so he can do that the next time the bill is before the House for consideration.

Motions Nos. 11 and 12 will be debated together and a vote on motion No. 11 will dispose of motion No. 12.

Motions Nos. 14 to 26 could be grouped for debate and, if required, will be voted on as follows: Question to be put on motion No. 14 by itself. Question to be put on motion No. 15 and, if in the affirmative, this will obviate the question having to be put on motion No. 16. If in the negative, then the question will be put on No. 16.

Likewise for motions Nos. 17 and 18. An affirmative vote on motion No. 17 will negate the question being put on motion No. 18. A negative vote on motion No. 17 will necessitate the question being put on motion No. 18.

Question will be put on motion No. 19 by itself. Question will be put on motion No. 20 and, if in the affirmative, the question will not have to be put on motion No. 22. If in the negative, the question will be put on motion No. 22.

Question will be put on motions Nos. 21 and 23 separately. Question will be put on motion No. 24 and, if in the affirmative, this will negate the question having to be put on motions Nos. 25 and 26. However, in the case of a negative vote, the question will have to be put on motions Nos. 25 and 26 separately.

Motions Nos. 27 and 28 could be grouped for debate and a vote on motion No. 27 will dispose of motion No. 28.

Motions Nos. 29, 30, 31, 32, 33 and 35 will be debated separately and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42 and 43 could be grouped for debate, with the question being put on motion No. 36. An affirmative vote on this motion would dispose of motions Nos. 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42 and 43. Motions Nos. 40, 41, 42 and 43 seem to be consequential and hinge on the fact that motion No. 36 will carry in the affirmative.

However, in the Chair's opinion, should motion No. 36 be negated, then the question on motions Nos. 40, 41, 42 and 43 is not necessary, including the putting of the question on motion No. 37 which is identical to motion No. 36. This leaves the putting of the question on motions Nos. 38 and 39 separately.

Motion No. 44 will be debated separately and voted on separately.

This is the suggestion that the Chair would like to make at this point. This being a complex bill, as indicated by the number of motions proposed by hon. members, the Chair would welcome any suggestions hon. members may have in order to facilitate further consideration of the bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you will recall, motions Nos. 8, 13 and 58 deal with a particular provision of this very complex bill, namely the quarterly indexation of taxes on spirits and tobacco. There is on the Order Paper an amendment to have this quarterly indexation become semi-annual. The committee has received representations from the industry and the provincial boards to have annual indexation. To introduce an amendment providing for annual indexation, I would need the authorization and the agreement of the House to table two ways and means motions, one concerning the Excise Act and the other concerning the Excise Tax Act, and I would also need the leave of the House to table the amendments related to these two notices of a ways and means motion to adjust the indexation from quarterly to annual. If I had the unanimous consent, I would proceed in this way, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I have had consultations with members on this side, and while we are not at all happy with indexing, we are quite prepared to have the minister do what he can to improve what we say is a bad bill. This might be some improvement. It certainly is not the kind of thing that we would like to see happen, but we would certainly give unanimous consent to allow the minister to file what may be an improvement over what is already there.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, with the greatest respect, may I say that I fail to see the necessity of the move, using ordinary common sense. Unless there is a difference in the incidence of tax, which the minister has not indicated in his remarks this afternoon is the case, how can he possibly justify this request? What the bill calls for is quarterly indexing, which is in effect quarterly compounding. The minister proposes to move to a yearly basis. My fundamental mathematics tells me that quarterly compounding yields a greater result than annual compounding. Therefore, since it is not an increase in the incidence of tax in the sense that the minister wishes to present, and it is open to any hon. member including a government minister to move for a reduction in tax without notice, I fail to see why it is necessary to obtain the consent of the House, first, to the tabling of a ways and means motion, and second, why there need be consent of the House. As a matter of fact, I think at the time the minister is discussing his subamendment, his amendment of six months which is already on the Order Paper, he could move to change it to one year by way of an amendment to an amendment. I fail to see how this is necessary procedurally.

Now, it may be alleged that annual compounding or indexing annually will yield a greater result. I still have not been able to resolve that and there is no proof of that, merely the fact that it has been said. I want to make sure that that is so. I am not objecting to the proposed change, but, as I say, I do not think it is necessary procedurally.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the experts of the taxation division of the department inform me that a change from a quarterly indexation to an annual indexation exceeds the scope of the original ways and means notice of motion, so that we would need to have a second ways and means notice of motion for the amendments to be consistent with the ways and means motion, which would not be the case since the extension, if I may call it that, of the original ways and means motion, would not allow us to move an amendment to have annual indexation, but only semi-annual indexation.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

• (1540)

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if it would be appropriate to defer for a moment discussion as to the consent. I would like to take a look at the actual text of the amendment. If I may have a copy of it, it would be helpful. We could return to it a little later in order to see the matter dealt with. If that is agreeable to the Chair, I think it would expedite the business.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: As I understand it, the hon. members of the opposition are not clear as to whether the motion that the hon. minister wants to move is made necessary by the fact that it exceeds the one that we already have before us. Consequently, would the hon. minister accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton to the effect that he could perhaps give him an idea of what his new text contains so that he can ascertain whether it is really necessary to have unanimous consent to table new amendments?

[English]

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker, I am not suggesting—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but I think we have found a solution to the problem. The minister will give hon. members some idea of the wording, and then they can determine among themselves whether the proposal should be accepted.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, am I to understand that, if I have unanimous consent after the documents are examined, I could proceed as I have requested, at any time later today?

Madam Speaker: It is my understanding that as soon as hon. members have read the text, the hon. minister can ask for unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 9 to 13 at page 2.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since Your Honour indicated that we will be grouping motions Nos. 1 and 3 for debate, should not motion No. 3 also be put now?

Madam Speaker: Yes, the hon. member is correct.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 26 to 34 at page 2 and lines 1 to 6 at page 3.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I hope we can carry on today following discussions with the hon. minister and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. There was a half day of debate at second reading, a large number of days were spent hearing witnesses from the public at large, and there was discussion in committee. Now that we have reached this particular stage on the first set of motions, perhaps we might allow a rather wide-ranging debate on all aspects of the bill. This would certainly help clean up the passage of the bill. I think the minister should recognize that particular fact. Otherwise there will be a long, long hot summer with this particular bill, because every aspect of it will be repeated at each stage of debate.

The minister will remember that the House leader of the opposition, the minister, myself and our colleagues in the New Democratic Party agreed that there should be a short one-day debate in order to expedite the passage of the bill to committee to hear witnesses. Now, it is only fair that the minister agree at this point to let other hon. members make what, in effect, will be second reading debate speeches at this stage when we are considering motions Nos. 1 and 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

If the hon. minister wants another reason why that should happen, it is that we are dealing with clause 1 of the bill. When we are dealing with amendments at report stage, particularly to clause 1 which incidentally is a definition clause, surely to goodness we can expect a wide-ranging debate. This is the practice of the House. To simply say that we will be limited to the terms of these amendments would be a denial of the practices of the House. I think it would not do anything constructive in terms of the continuity and effectiveness of this particular debate. Therefore, I propose to review what has happened leading up to this particular point.

I should like to refer to the number of witnesses in committee. It was interesting to see the wide spectrum of the source of these witnesses. There were representatives from the city of Medicine Hat, the Hobbema Four Band Council—

[Translation]

—regional and metropolitan weeklies, select newspapers from Quebec, the Québécor Inc. group, the South Shore weeklies and Michael Publishing Inc—

[English]

—and suburban newspapers. Then there was the Canadian Association of Provincial Liquor Commissioners, the Association of Canadian Distillers, the Canadian Construction Association, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, the Retail Council of Canada, the Canadian Petroleum Association, the Canadian Organization of Small Business, the Federation of Alberta Gas Co-Ops Ltd., the Canadian Wine Institute, Dome Petroleum Limited, and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. If my memory serves me correctly, there may have been some others, but I do not have the exact textual indication of who they were.

This bill is an omnibus bill. Although it deals with the excise tax, it ranges far and wide on the commodities it touches. Not only does it do that but, even more so, I suggest it creates wide departures from the normal course of the calculation of the excise tax and, shall I say, its impact.

• (1550)

In the past the excise tax has always been known as the "manufacturers' sales tax". It was imposed upon the price at which a manufacturer was selling his commodity. But the legislation before us does not do that. We will now be recognizing a switch which had been hinted at and advocated by the Porter commission report to shift the incidence of the excise tax away from the manufacturer to the wholesaler, bringing it closer to the ultimate consumer and, of course, yielding that much more money to the Crown since there has been no change in the rate of tax. There is no doubt in my mind that in its amendments to this particular bill the government is seeking to maximize revenues to the Crown in any way it can.

There was no indication by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) at the time of the budget that it was his intention to shift the incidence of the excise tax away from the manufacturers' level to the wholesalers' level, but we see exactly that in the item we are discussing at the present time dealing with cosmetics. A distributor of cosmetics who does not manufacture those cosmetics and who does not sell them to retailers but to beauty parlours and other establishments which actually use them as materials in their business are to charge excise tax on such articles which they import. This is clearly a wholesale distributors' tax.

Why was it imposed? It may be that having heard the representations from the organizations most seriously affected the government may change its mind. I do not know since I have not looked at all of the government's amendments. It is remarkable that if there are to be changes here it must be that beauty was able to get to the beast. This is a rather strange circumstance and since there is not a great deal of tax involved it is a particular point on which the government can yield at no great cost to itself to give the appearance of being reasonable.

Mr. Fox: Not only appearance.

Mr. Lambert: As the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) has said, it is all a question of appearance.

Mr. Fox: No, not only appearance but a reality of reasonableness.

Mr. Lambert: Certainly being cosmetic it is a matter of appearance.

In any event, I gather from the chairman of the committee, who was nodding his head sagely when I was referring to the change, that there has not been an elimination but a modifying change. However, there is an area called "marginal manufacturing", which is an area about which I expect to hear a great many remarks from members in this House because, frankly, it is a value added tax when it is imposed at the level of the marginal manufacturer. Goods are imported and packaged, and whatever the added value of the packaged goods may be, then it is taxed. It is clearly a value added tax, something which was referred to in the Porter commission report. There have been indications by the government that it was studying the question of the federal excise tax internally as it applied to goods manufactured or imported into Canada. There have been odd references to it, but there has been nothing concrete and no firm study or green paper that I can recall which was ever examined by a committee of this House.

The third point I wish to raise is the indexation of taxation on a quarterly basis. The government made an amendment to put it on a six-months basis and this afternoon the minister indicated that the government is considering a yearly indexation of the excise tax on alcohol and tobacco, alcohol being distilled spirits, beer and domestic wines. It will be based on the increase in the CPI in that subgroup.

If ever there was a devastating critique of precisely what this was imposing from the distributors' point of view, then the brief of the provincial liquor commissioners would be a complete answer to the nonsense proposed by the government. Any little thing which contributed to the increase, for example, in the price of wine, whether it be a fall in the value of the Canadian dollar resulting in imported wines costing a little more, or whether it is a strike by liquor commission employees who receive a wage settlement causing prices at the liquor commission to rise, if there are increased costs for heating buildings, if distillers in Scotland increase the price of their product or if there is just general inflation, it is all considered under the CPI of the particular subgroup and there is a quarterly—let us change it now to periodic—stop in the calculation of new tax, which is then added on. It is, in effect, compounding on an annual basis, according to the amendment proposed by the minister this afternoon. This is so, not only because of influences on the price within the subgroup, but influences from extraneous sources and the minister receives additional revenues without having to come back to the House. He gets an increase in taxes, not just like the ad valorem tax. Already the sales tax is on an ad valorem basis because it is 9 per cent of the manufacturers' cost. Now we are going to get an additional factor, compounded once a year, without the minister coming back to the House.

I think that this is a most pernicious proposal and one which this House should reject out of hand. It just means that Parliament is being asked again to yield its control over taxation. It is as if we had asked to let the Minister of Finance increase income tax, with the rate changed on an annual basis, with reference to the CPI. That would be outrageous; Parliament would be absolutely impotent to control taxation. Of course, there is this built-in interest on the part of the government to see inflation go up. All it is is a snowball in the spring rapidly rolling downhill, getting bigger and bigger. However, that is the principle involved in the indexation of excise tax on the alcohol subgroup.

I see the Ontario government has fallen for this, too. It is a bureaucratic move. It is beautiful. However, I cannot congratulate the provincial treasurer of Ontario for doing it, and I would oppose him to the end. I will not only suggest but I recommend to this House that we never accept that principle. It is far too easy. Ministers of finance and their bureaucrats think that this is apple pie because they do not have to face up to their legislatures for tax increases. That is the net result of the proposal put forward by the minister in his budget and which is included in Bill C-57. Whether it happens quarterly, half yearly or yearly, there is that compounding feature which creates a snowball and, of course, much more revenue for the Crown, benefiting entirely from inflation.

The government does not know how to cope with inflation, so it is saying that it will index taxes based upon inflation. If this House and this Parliament dares accept that principle in this particular case, in the subgroup of alcohol—oh, and do not the purists clasp that to their bosoms—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but according to my understanding of the rules, he is allowed 20 minutes.

Mr. Lambert: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member actually moving on behalf of the official opposition?

Mr. Lambert: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Lambert: This subgroup of alcohol and tobacco are considered to be social sins, the devil's goods, in the minds of some people. Therefore, I suppose it is that much easier to make this House swallow this first bitter pill. However, that is not the way it will work. This House has to reject the principle out of hand, because the next step will be for manufactured goods generally, and all other goods and services which are subject to the federal excise tax, to be made subject to indexation. The special sales tax on airline tickets is a classic example. That is a sales tax. It comes under the excise tax and it will be subject to indexation under the CPI. Everything is going to be gathered up together in one big, fat snowball to go rolling down the hill, picking up everything in its way and finishing up at the bottom with everyone in a great smash. The thing is pernicious.

When I think that the government of Ontario, in its recent budget, has adopted that principle in certain of its statutes, all I can say is shame. It is a bad principle and should be repudiated in the same way I am asking this House to repudiate the attempt of the government on this occasion to bring that principle in.

It is not brought in by the back door. It is being done openly. The Minister of Finance said that he wishes to benefit from additional revenue. He needs the additional revenue. However, he does not have the gumption to come before us with his budget and face up to Parliament. It is Parliament that decides whether the government shall get the money. We allow indexation and then the government does not have to meet. It goes on generally. Soon the government—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would like to call the hon. member's attention to a Standing Order which is quite clear. Section 75, subsection 9 states:

> —no member shall speak more than once or longer than twenty minutes during proceedings on any amendment at that stage, except that the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, a Minister of the Crown or other member sponsoring a bill and the member proposing an amendment, may speak for not more than forty minutes.

An hon. Member: That is what this is, an amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my understanding that the amendment stands in the name of hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). The hon. member is not proposing the amendment at this stage, and the 20-minute rule would apply to him.

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest of respect, I moved the amendment on behalf of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), and there are many other amendments in his name. He is precluded from speaking by his absence on a task force. I am taking all of these amendments and I am proposing all the amendments. I submit that the Speaker has to recognize it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In the rules of the House there is a procedure by which hon. members lay down amendments at the report stage. The procedure has been observed up to this point. My understanding is that the rule would allow the hon. member 20 minutes at this stage. If this is going to be a 40-minute procedure for every one of the amendments in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South, I would respectfully wish to defer my decision on the matter for the moment and I will confer with the Table and Madam Speaker. But certainly my first presumption, on the reading of the rule, is that it is abundantly clear. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Lambert: I will not argue with the Chair but I will simply say that it has been my experience and that of other senior members of this House, when dealing with this particular feature, that it has always been indicated that it would apply whether it was the hon. member proposing or he who was proposing in lieu. In other words, since, in effect, I am proposing the amendment, I have the 40 minutes, and I will continue on that basis.

Mr. Collenette: A point of order. Mr. Speaker, you have correctly pointed out the rule of the House to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I was in the House a little while ago when Madam Speaker was in the chair, and quite distinctly the motion was moved in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). I do not think we are going to put up any great fuss, but we would certainly support the Chair and the Chair's interpretation of the rules.

● (1610)

I must set the record straight. Motion No. 1 was read. Motion No. 3 was then read after it was drawn to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that they were being grouped together. In both cases the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) moved the motion. He was in the House and in both cases the motions were seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Lambert: Again, it was our argument that the motion would not have to be seconded. The motion was moved by me on behalf of the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will check Hansard later. Meanwhile the hon. member will be allowed to proceed. The Chair has, however, indicated the interpretation is subject to a review of Hansard.

Mr. Lambert: And also authorities.

We have, as I indicated, three departures from the usual consideration of excise tax. I intend to talk about indexation. My colleagues will take on the petroleum and natural gas tax section, that portion marked part IV of the bill, since it will be part IV of the Excise Tax Act. Others will deal with a variety of subjects, for instance, marginal manufacturing. Included also will be the manufacture of alcohol by individuals in limited quantities and oddly for limited periods, but I will let those hon. members speak for themselves. There will be others who will speak about a change in newspapers.

Representations made with regard to the incidence of the excise tax have now resulted in an increase, according to a government amendment, of 75 per cent to 80 per cent of advertising matter before a publication will attract excise tax. We will see what reaction there is to that. I found as a result of the representations, certainly from the small weeklies and the small city dailies, that this is an absolute killer. It did not affect the large newspapers as much. Certainly over the period of time during which calculations could be made, percentages could be worked out so that the independent inserts could be calculated. Large papers, precisely because of their volume, could escape tax. An eight or 12-page paper coming out on a weekly or bi-weekly basis and carrying inserts with it because that was deemed to be the best distribution in the district of such advertising inserts, would attract sales tax or federal excise tax. I am not talking about the distribution of full catalogues within the folds of newspapers. That is not the purpose, and that in itself can be dealt with. I am sure that no new newspaper would insist that it has the right to distribute, say, a Sears catalogue within the confines of a 16-page newspaper.

Mr. Cullen: Except O'Callaghan.

Mr. Lambert: I heard the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen). I can always stand up to the representations of the gentleman to whom he referred, even though I find that Ontario Liberals have a great deal more difficulty digesting his other views. They are so "right" in so far as a Canadian's concept of Canada is concerned, the right to resources and so forth, that I commend his particular articles as mandatory reading for all Ontario Liberals.

Mr. Cullen: He might be "right" but not correct.

Mr. Lambert: In any event, when I consider his original political views and where they are now, certainly he has my sympathy. In so far as the newspaper machine for which he works, that is quite a colossus.

I think that we, as Canadians, have to pay some attention to the size of some of the newspapers in the big chains. I am not one who gets worried about bigness by itself, but there comes a point when we have to look at the absence of healthy competition and alternatives, something which is happening here in Canada at the present time, unfortunately.

One area about which I must say something, and on which my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) will have a great deal more to say, is the petroleum and natural gas tax of 8 per cent. It is a revenue tax of 8 per cent which, in itself, is a punitive tax to which the government has no right. As a matter of fact, the Alberta appeal court, in so far as revenues for natural gas owned by the provinces are concerned, has declared them beyond the powers of the Government of Canada. I agree with that decision. This is just another public raid by a treasury which has absolutely no business mounting a campaign to spoliate provincial natural resources owned either by the governments of those provinces or by the people of those provinces. The Government of Canada does not have any jurisdiction in that respect. It has never exercised its jurisdiction with respect to the gold, nickel, copper and other products of Ontario. It has never touched the gold of Quebec. It would not dare. What about electricity? Is the federal government going to make a descent upon the electricity coming from James Bay? What about that which is produced at Manic or will the federal government go after the electricity generated from Churchill Falls which is taken by the Quebec government from the Newfoundland government? It would not dare.

This is another attempt to try to get at people, many of them, like the Indian bands of Alberta perhaps some in Saskatchewan, who have oil and gas wells from which they derive revenue and on which they are building economies for themselves.

The first trust company established by Indian councils is in Alberta. They depend upon the revenues of the natural gas and oil produced in the Hobbema area. What does the Minister of Finance say? He says "I want 8 per cent of that". He wants 8 per cent of revenue to which he has no right. He has no right to levy income tax on income treaty Indians have earned on reserves. Provincial governments have no right to levy taxes of any kind in those reserves. No municipal government or any other government can levy a tax with regard to Indian lands. However, because there are revenues from oil and gas coming from under Indian lands belonging to those treaty Indians, the Minister of Finance through Bill C-57 says he wants his share, his pound of flesh.

I am not going to place myself in the role of the courts of Canada with regard to the legality of the imposition of that tax, but I will say this. There is no more right in the Government of Canada under the Constitution, the British North America Act, to levy such a tax on revenues from oil and gas produced on Indian lands than on oil and gas produced and owned by a provincial government, as declared by the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Alberta.

What this has done to Canadian interests in the oil industry is astronomical. It is worse than a pirate's raid. They are federal buccaneers. They are out to raid provincial funds, whether in Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia. It provides a beautiful precedent for a raid on the forest industries of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia or for a share of revenues emanating from the production of pulp products or lumber. What about a share in gold, silver and all our other metals? It makes a nonsense of what is clearly written in the Constitution, that the natural resources shall belong to a province. I find their conception of the Constitution absolutely indecent, and that is a very mild term.

Under Bill C-48, the Government of Canada has established what it calls Canada lands, including the lands in the Northwest Territories and Yukon. What will those who have aspirations to provincial status get? A sucked out lemon! In fact the federal government will not be able, nor would it want, to grant to the peoples of the territories and the Yukon their natural resources.

The Inuit, the Dene Nation and other native peoples in those territories should almost be up in arms at the Government of Canada proceeding with Bill C-48. It is a raid on lands that the Government of Canada is merely holding in trust for the people of Canada under our federal system. They are ultimately to be delivered to the peoples inhabiting those territories when they become provinces. If in the past the government had behaved towards the lands of Alberta and Saskatchewan as it is today trying to behave with regard to the lands in the territories, there would not be any resources left for the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had 43 minutes which I think is ample time.

Mr. Lambert: I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Edmonton West wants to complete his remarks, I am sure there will be unanimous consent to allow him to continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse the generosity of my colleagues this afternoon. There will be plenty of opportunity on the particular subject. As for my general remarks, I think I have made my point: there is not much in this bill that I like.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to hear again the speech the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has promised. The main concern I want to express this afternoon is that we had an agreement from the minister that after a very brief second reading we would have an intensive review of this legislation in committee where we might cross-examine a group of witnesses and make a greater attempt to find a consensus as to what modifications could be made.

What is really disturbing about the government's response to the criticisms that have been made on a number of measures contained in the bill is that the government was really only prepared to move in one area and one area alone. There was a general consensus on the part of the committee that the cosmetics industry was being treated in a way that was discriminatory. There was a tax on a group of people we did not think should be taxed, those who own and operate beauty parlours. Apart from that change—

Mr. Waddell: A cosmetic change.

Mr. Rae: I suppose one could describe it as a cosmetic change. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has obviously been reading my notes. Apart from that change, there has really been no progress. It is the absence of any progress or response from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) with respect to a number of amendments which have been put forward that I want to deal with this afternoon.

There are 135 motions dealing with this measure. I see the minister nodding in the affirmative, obviously with somewhat of a heavy heart. There will obviously be a difficult and I dare say boring and protracted debate on a number of matters which are of importance to particular groups of Canadians, indeed to all Canadians. I think this debate could be shortened if we could have some indication from the government that they are prepared to move on a number of measures which have been put forward in a constructive spirit.

Speaking on behalf of our caucus, and in particular the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and our energy critic, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, particular proposals have been made which have really met with a simple brick wall response. I could give the minister an indication of what this looks like to us.

We see a brick wall when we are faced with the matter of indexation of taxation on alcohol. The government has moved from indexation every three months to indexation every year. Nevertheless, the principle involved, that the government should not be seen to be or, indeed, not be a beneficiary of inflation has been rejected by the government. The government has now given itself a stake in inflation whereas we regard the imposition of this kind of a tax and any adjustments thereto as something that should be done every year at the time the budget is introduced.

Once the government has accepted the principle that this is going to be an annual change, why should it tie its hands when it could introduce this at the time of the budget and it can be debated, when the real effect of that legislation on the three major industries can be seen? I find that the notion of increasing tax automatically by virtue of indexation is something that in other instances the government has rejected, and it is something which should not be accepted in this particular instance.

We have proposed other amendments that have been treated with equal disdain by the government. The simple proposition that those people who collect taxes on behalf of the government, many small businesses, should receive some form of compensation from the government has been rejected out of hand. Indeed, we may even have difficulty moving it because of the ruling of Madam Speaker in respect to its being in order in that it obviously provides for some expenditure by the government. The government should be moving that kind of a motion.

This is the government that talks about its willingness and eagerness to assist small business, when in fact its interest rate policies are, as we all know, having the harshest possible effect on that community, driving many into bankruptcy. Those that are not driven into bankruptcy are facing tremendous problems. Many of them are being forced into receivership and many are forced simply to walk away from or sell their businesses because of the problems high interest rates are causing them. Yet when we propose a concrete measure which would give the government a means to compensate these industries and small proprietors for a service they are providing the government, the government says no.

I find that astonishing when we know—and the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap will be pointing this out in some greater detail—that there are instances in each and every province of compensation being paid. I should say there are two exceptions. In Newfoundland, for reasons which perhaps the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) can explain to us, compensation has been limited for the collection of sales tax. Of course, there is no compensation in Alberta because in the land of milk and honey there is no sales tax, so obviously there can be no necessity for providing compensation. The province of Saskatchewan provides 5 per cent on the first $300 of sales tax and 1 per cent on the balance. The provinces of Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario provide, in some instances, a maximum of $1,000. Some have no maximum, but the principle has been adopted that those people who collect the sales tax for a province should not be punished by the provincial government but should in fact be compensated for providing that provincial government with a service. When we suggest that the government do something specific for smaller businesses then, of course, members of the government simply hold up their hands and say: "No way, this is something we do not want to get into; this is something these people should be providing the federal government with gratis, and we will have nothing to do with it".

Again we received a series of briefs ranging from wholesale rejection of the tax, in some instances, to very specific and concerned suggestions, for example, from a group of newspaper publishers in Quebec and in English-speaking Canada, having regard to the impact the government's measures on taxation of advertisements and advertising supplements in those newspapers will have on their business. I can assure the House that this is a subject of concern to a great many communities across our country.

It is the proposal of the government to tax these supplements and to introduce an arbitrary definition of what is a newspaper. This is something which affects the life of literally hundreds of communities across Canada, yet the government's consistent response has been: "No, we do not see that we can change it". The government and bureaucracy has made a fundamental decision with regard to these distinctions and they are not going to be tampered with.

Before the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) leaves, there is one amendment we put forward in respect of which I want him to take a particular interest, and it has to do with the government's philistine decision that it intends now to tax all original prints and will not make any distinction between reproductions that are simply manufactured and original prints which are, by their very definition, of a limited nature.

Let me say that we have had intensive discussions with people in the department who are concerned with this matter, and I think I can honestly say that this department simply does not understand what every artist and every art dealer has indicated to the government, at great effort, is a well-known distinction. There is a distinction between an original print and a reproduction which is simply reproduced photomechanically and distributed across the country. There is a difference between an Elvis Presley poster and an Alex Colville lithograph. For the government not to appreciate that there has been a fundamental decision taken by the federal government, which we support and have supported, namely, that works of original art are to be exempt from the sales tax, and for the government to say, once that decision has been taken, that there is no such thing as an original print, is simply to show that the Department of Finance has been philistine in its understanding of what is going on in the artistic community today.

The fact of the matter is that most or a great percentage of contemporary artists in Canada today are working in a variety of fields and mediums which cannot be described as works of art in the sense they have been defined by the Department of Finance; they are working in the area of prints and the manufacture thereof for limited sale and distribution. There is a distinction. In fact, there is a conceptual distinction, an artistic distinction, between them and, as I say, the photomechanical reproduction of a poster or a painting.

Many of us have in our offices or homes reproductions of well-known works of art. They are not original prints and there is no reason they should not be regarded as manufactured and taxed; but there is a distinction between those and an original print produced by the artist himself and distributed on a limited basis throughout the country. As the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap says, it is a slap in the face for the artistic community and simply indicates that the ministers involved have not taken the time to become sufficiently interested in the sort of problems which have been raised in the committee and in correspondence by a whole range of people.

The government must give every citizen who has to deal with it a tremendous sense of frustration, because no matter how reasonable a proposition that is put forward, the government rejects it. It does not matter how much the person putting forward the proposition shows that he is not simply trying to evade taxes but is simply showing that the imposition of the tax will create a hardship or an anomaly. In this case the tax will split the artistic community in two, and it will mean that if an artist wants his work to be regarded as tax exempt by the government he will have to work in oils or water colours, because those are the only products that are going to be exempt. When there are people working in a whole range of artistic media, it is absurd simply to say that these are the people we are going to single out.

My colleagues will be discussing as well a fundamental question which was touched on by the hon. member for Edmonton West and which, of course, is a preoccupation of all Canadians. That question is the problem of the system of taxation of petroleum and gas which has been imposed on the country, on the industry and on the provinces.

The other day in the House the Minister of Finance said, when he was criticizing us for one thing or another, that the government has imposed taxes on oil companies but that the government does not seem to have received very much help from the New Democratic Party. I want to say to the minister that there is a very simple reason for that. If he had listened to the representations we made at second reading, he would understand from whence flows our opposition to the notion of the excise taxes that have been imposed. Those taxes impose a tremendous hardship on the ordinary Canadian when they are not accompanied by any form of a tax credit, for which we have consistently argued for at least three years in this House and outside this House. We have argued that the government has to distribute some of the surplus it is collecting to ordinary Canadians in the form of progressive tax credits.

There is another reason as well. From one point of view I suppose the imposition of this tax could be seen simply as a tool being used in the bargaining or in the preamble to bargaining in the banana steps the government is taking as it tip-toes its way up to the clear need for an energy agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government. However, simply taken on its own, it clearly is a tax which is a complete infringement of provincial jurisdiction. It hits the little guy. It has consistently been shown, by a series of representations which we have received from a number of producers and a number of workers in the industry, to be a tax which is having a very serious effect on employment, on the level of production and on the livelihood of people in western Canada. As a representative from eastern Canada and, indeed from the city of Toronto, which is frequently regarded by many people in the west as the heart of the problem, let me say that I think there has been a caricature in eastern Canada and in the press of eastern Canada of what the oil industry is all about.

In imposing this kind of blanket tax the government has hurt worst not the large oil companies, from which we heard very few representations on the government's energy policy other than of a very general kind, but those people who provide all the service and all the contracting and other work which needs to be done in the production of oil and natural gas. As the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap says, these are small business people. These are people who are not millionaires. These are not people who are simply burning $100 bills in order to have a good time. These are people who have been put out of work by the imposition of a tax which has had the effect of hitting smaller businesses much harder than larger businesses. This tax affects the cash flows of smaller businesses more than it affects the cash flows of larger industries, and coming from a government which says that its goal is to Canadianize the industry, it is a joke because its effect will be to decrease the power of Canadian small businesses in the oil and gas field and to force them to sell to multinationals. I think the evidence shows that the government has been quite prepared to subsidize multinational companies, but has not been prepared to do anything to stimulate growth in a real way in the Canadian small business sector.

In closing, I will take just a couple of minutes to indicate one other basic fact of life with which we have to deal at the present time, and that is that there is an extraordinary sense of uncertainty and unease about developments in the modern economy. I am referring specifically to the problems of inflation and interest rates. These are problems which eat at the heart of any stable and healthy economic system. These are phenomena which hit the ordinary Canadian very hard indeed, and these are problems which I think provide the basic background to our discussions today.

If I may say so to the minister, any proposals which have the effect of increasing the cost for small business at a time when it is hit by the extraordinary effect of high interest rates are misdirected and are of no help to the economy at the present time. Any proposals which have the effect of making it more difficult to achieve the kind of energy agreement which would be livable for all Canadians, producers and consumers—and we simply have to find a way of living together and providing for the just claims of both producers and consumers—are simply regressive and are an exercise in useless and fundamentally destructive rhetoric which is of no help in finding a solution to this problem.

Very fundamental challenges are facing the country in finding a solution to the problem that we do not have an energy agreement and to the problems of inflation and high interest rates. As I have said on many occasions, it concerns me deeply that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) cannot find it in himself to become concerned about issues which really affect the cost of living, the cost of working and the cost of providing for the basics of the Canadian family. I regret that that is the case, but I look forward to hearing some productive indications from the minister that the government is prepared to accept some of the proposals we have put forward which, in our view, would provide for a more progressive and fairer excise tax system in this year accepting, as we all do, that the government is going to be producing some major changes in the excise tax system and that this is something which we will be debating next year.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate this afternoon. This is a very important piece of legislation we are considering, particularly as it relates to the oil and gas industry and the future energy supplies in this country.

Bill C-57 contains two taxes which have proved to be the most damaging elements of the National Energy Program the government announced last October. These are punitive taxes and they have had an extremely damaging impact on the oil and gas industry.

Over the period of time between the announcement of this program and the end of last year, we on this side of the House drew attention to the many concerns people observing the scene have had regarding the impact of the energy program, but at that time we could not point to specific results. As Your Honour may recall, last week in the House I drew attention to some of these results. Drilling activity this year compared with last year at this time is down over 50 per cent. Sales of potential petroleum properties are down by 70 per cent this year compared with last year. The number of drilling rigs which already have left the country is 139.

Those are the specific facts which have proved to us very clearly the impact of this energy program. These are short-term problems. These are problems which are with us today in Alberta, but they also have an impact on the rest of Canada, and we will be discussing this tomorrow in debate.

However, there are some very serious long-term problems that I wish to discuss because they must be faced today. The minister, whether it be the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), must show that he is sensitive to these concerns, that he is listening to what is going on around him, what I am sure he is hearing day in and day out from the people affected by these taxes.

My party and I have proposed amendments to Bill C-57 on oil and gas taxes, the effect of which is to totally remove the production tax and the excise tax on natural gas, thereby requesting the government to seek other forms of revenue. We have no quarrel with the government's seeking more revenue through oil and gas revenues. My colleague the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) made some specific proposals in his budget which raised the federal take to 24 per cent. So in principle we have no concern over this.

I should say that we feel very strongly that the government must respect provincial jurisdiction and not fight the energy battle on the backs of consumers, which is what is happening today with the endless price increases we have had since the end of 1979, many of which have only resulted in putting the tax revenues in the pockets of the federal government. The amount that has gone to the industry and producing provinces is a small part of that which has been collected over the past year and a half. We also believe that the government must take care that the burden placed on the industry, the source of production, must be fair and that the price and tax regime in Canada must be competitive with other countries in the world. Because people and equipment, as we have seen with the 139 drilling rigs, can move to more favourable jurisdictions.

Now, in all these areas this government has failed miserably, as we see from the statistics I referred to earlier. For that reason we propose to amend this bill by deleting the production tax and the excise tax on natural gas. There are many options available to the government to raise the funds it feels are necessary. The self-sufficiency tax in our 1979 budget clearly demonstrated that there are ways to seek agreement with the provinces. We had agreement in principle on that tax, as evidenced by an exchange of letters between the province of Alberta and our government. We could have, as they do in the United States, such things as a windfall profits tax or an excise tax on the end product, again as we proposed.

In previous debates we have drawn attention to the impact of production and excise taxes and have warned of the possible results. Now we have the clear evidence of these results, not just in the deadlock with Alberta but in the operating decisions taken by individual companies to cut back severely the amount of money they propose to spend. For Canada to have any chance at all of meeting the objectives of the National Energy Program, self-sufficiency in particular, these two taxes must be withdrawn. We will be pressing very hard, Mr. Speaker, to bring some sense into the mind of the minister to withdraw these taxes, go back to the drawing board and come back here with something that makes more sense in terms of the government achieving its objectives.

Last fall the National Energy Board commenced hearings on the supply and demand situation in Canada, during the middle of which the National Energy Program was announced and the board asked the companies to come back with revised predictions as to the impact of this program. They have not at this stage released their report but I would like to summarize for the House some of the key elements set out in the evidence.

The first topic is the impact of the National Energy Program on cash flow. Company after company indicated that there is a very serious immediate impact on their cash flow. The reduction ranged from 20 per cent, 25 per cent to a third, and in some cases as high as 40 per cent. The conclusion reached was that the decrease in the producer cash flow will have an adverse impact on the economics of existing conventional oil and gas production and will affect the exploration budgets and the ability of the companies to keep production up over the immediate period ahead. PetroCan itself reported that the NEP would result in considerably lower netbacks to producers this year and for the next two years. In the longer term, although price increases would tend to offset the initial decreases, all companies' cash flow would be hurt over the short term. It is that immediate impact that is so evident in the statistics I referred to earlier.

As a result of this reduction in cash flow there is also an expected reduction in the ability of independent, Canadian-owned companies, the ones that are intended to be helped by this program, to seek financing from the banking community as well as the private sector. As I said, this will impact directly on their exploration and development budgets, and its impact on the smaller companies will be quite severe.

The direct cash flow to these smaller Canadian companies will lead to increased investment in exploration because of the grants; that is an expected result of the program. But the over-all cash flow impact related to their production activities will be lowered, according to the presentations made to the NEB. Nova, a very strong Canadian company, indicated that the National Energy Program assists Canadian companies in exploration programs, but they say there are few Canadian-owned companies large enough to make the investment required in frontier exploration, oil sands and heavy oil development. These are large projects requiring significant financial strength and which are certainly not helped by the NEP and these taxes under consideration today. So again, it is expected that the exploration and development budgets in Canada will decline to somewhere between 25 and 50 per cent below the projections in place prior to the announcement of the National Energy Program.

What this means to the future oil supply in Canada must also be projected. Company after company stated that our goal of self-sufficiency is pushed much further into the future directly as a result of this program. In addition, reserves that were economic prior to October 28 suddenly became uneconomic, and the principal culprit is the 8 per cent production tax which is part of Bill C-57.

I think we are all aware that the proposed pricing schedule does not provide sufficient incentive, which is another factor, but the combination of the 8 per cent tax and the insufficient pricing schedule has set back the timing for the achievement of self-sufficiency in this country severely; in the view of some observers, well into the next century. So the NEP, and in particular this tax on production, has had a direct impact on one of the key goals that we have set out, that of self-sufficiency.

One can draw the conclusion that the National Energy Program is totally counterproductive to the objective of self-sufficiency. We should consider the precarious nature of the world today, particularly the Middle East. Day in and day out we are reminded of the very precarious nature of the polictical situation there, whether it is the conflict between Iraq and Iran, the arms build-up in the Middle East, the current conflict between Syria and Israel, or the concerns of observers as to the over-all intentions of the Russians in that part of the world. There is no sense whatsoever in the government setting self-sufficiency as an objective and then taking a route to self-sufficiency which totally undermines the objective, particularly when we face these risks in other countries.

Another element of this is in the area of marginal production. This particularly affects southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta. There are many wells which were economic prior to October 28; right now they are not productive or economic. There is no indication in any of the amendments of the government that it recognizes this problem and is proposing any difference in the impact of the production tax, which is a very blunt instrument indeed. I believe this is a major shortcoming in the bill.

We have all heard of the deadlock currently in place between the federal government and the government of Alberta. One result of this deadlock is the fact that the megaprojects, the heavy oil project at Cold Lake and the Alsands synthetic crude Project, are on hold. They may well never go ahead if there is not a decision soon on the future of energy development in the country. These projects are one of the key elements in achieving self-sufficiency in Canada. In 1990, according to the National Energy Program, 50 per cent of production will be from non-conventional sources of oil.

The problem is not only the deadlock between the province and the federal government. There is still the problem, as set out by a number of observers at the NEB hearings, that the pricing proposals, combined with the production tax, make these projects uneconomic under current circumstances. These major projects are not likely to proceed under the National Energy Program, without some agreement between Alberta and Ottawa.

This also affects heavy oil and heavy oil upgrading. The production tax is right at the heart of the problems which the industry is facing in maintaining production on an economic basis. The production tax, combined with the insufficient pricing schedule, will not result in these projects going ahead.

My colleague mentioned that the excise tax on natural gas has been declared unconstitutional by the Alberta Court of Appeal. Apart from the direct impact on the production and exploration activities of the industry, it is another reason we believe the government should withdraw these two key elements of the National Energy Program and rethink the ways in which revenue can be raised.

In passing, I should like to note that the production tax affects frontier production. Today I released the amendments we are proposing to Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act. One concern of the various witnesses who appeared before the committee was that the production tax comes up time and again as being a key element in making production in that part of the country less economic and, therefore, less likely to proceed. There is such a layering of taxes, starting with the production tax on frontier development, that while there could be some surge in exploration activity because of the generous grants which have been provided, the next step toward bringing the fields into production could well be held back by the size of the production tax, together with the other elements of Bill C-48 which our amendments propose to remedy.

A final point on the impact of the National Energy Program on our economy concerns the balance of payments. This year we will be paying somewhere around $5.5 billion to $6 billion for oil imports. It will be a very, very heavy drain on our economy. The production tax will perpetuate that drain and might well see it increased because of the significant increases we are likely to see in oil prices over the next ten to 15 years.

It is one of the causes of the very high interest rate policy the government has been following. Since we have this drain on our balance of payments, we are forced to keep interest rates up to support the level of the Canadian dollar. If that oil was produced in this country, the pressure would be off and it would provide Mr. Bouey with a great deal more flexibility in the monetary policy he has been following. So it is essential that the production tax and the excise tax be deleted. We are proposing that in our amendments to the legislation.

I repeat that we will be opposing the taxes in the strongest possible way because of their very serious impact on this industry, on our energy future and on our economy in general.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, just before dealing with several other points we wish to bring forward in discussing the excise tax amendments, I want to mention first how obvious it is that the provisions of this legislation are part of the scheme of hypocrisy which the government is now advancing in Canada. The taxes to which my hon. friend just referred—the tax on natural gas and gas liquids and the 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues—are part of the new, so-called energy policy which has done tremendous economic damage to the country.

I just want to refer to an address which the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) made on May 6 to the Conference Board of Canada in Toronto to show how hypocritical either this legislation is or his address was. On page 2 of his address he said:

> Of the three percentage point rise in inflation that we have witnessed in the last five months, two percentage points are the direct result of the recent increases in energy prices that were set out in the National Energy Program. Put another way, energy accounted for almost 25 per cent of the over-all increase in the consumer price index in the last five months.

Then on the same page he said that the annual rate of increase in the consumer price index has now gone up to 13.9 per cent in those same five months. He said that 25 per cent of the over-all increase was due to the National Energy Progam. What is the National Energy Program? It is a whole series of taxes imposed by the government. In other words, the Minister of Finance indicts his government. He should have said, to put it another way, that this government has accounted for almost 25 per cent of the over-all increase in the consumer price index in the last five months.

These taxes, and others imposed by the government, for example the petroleum compensation charge and the Canadian ownership charge, have resulted in energy price increases in the last five months. They are the cause of the 11 increases in the price of oil and oil products since February, 1980. Of the 11 increases, eight have been increases in federal taxes alone—taxation increases going to the federal government alone. Not one cent of those eight increases will go to the gas or oil producers. Not one cent of those eight increases will go to the provincial governments. They are federal tax increases—eight of the last 11 increases in the price of gasoline at the pump. Eight of the last 11 increases in heating oil, and every one of those increases, apply to all of the products which come from a barrel of oil in addition to gasoline. So it is the government of the Minister of Finance which says that it is battling inflation by putting on these inflationary tax increases. It is their own National Energy Program which they should change.

In the same speech the minister says that he has identified energy as a source of two thirds of the rise in consumer inflation which we have experienced in the last five months. Two pages on in the speech he has it up from 25 per cent to two thirds. He goes on to say:

> I have argued that higher energy prices cannot be avoided.

That is nonsense, Mr. Speaker. Higher energy prices could have been avoided if the Government of Canada had chosen not to have eight tax increases in the price of oil products in the last year. We did not have to have the Canadian ownership charge. We did not have to have Petro-Canada buy Petrofina, which resulted in a Canadian ownership charge, putting the price of gasoline up 3.5 cents a gallon just a month ago. We did not have to have the petroleum compensation charge which has put the price up $3.30 a barrel, I think it is, this year, and I have forgotten the total altogether.

The Minister's speech is rife with hypocrisy. He tries to put the blame on energy cost increases when it is the government's increases that are responsible. The increases have not gone to Alberta or the companies, they have gone to this government.

Further on in his speech, the minister says that interest rates will continue to rise until demand weakens to the point at which a resistance to further price and cost increases begins to take hold. What kind of nonsense is that? The minister is in this House day after day boasting about how demand has increased in Canada over the last few months. He boasts about how in the first quarter of this year and the last quarter of last year we had an 8 per cent growth rate. This is how he answers questions when anyone questions him about the present state of the economy; he boasts about how demand has increased and how the economy has grown. Then in his speech he says that interest rates will rise until demand weakens. This is the "man" in the government who boasts about this growth in the last quarter of 1980 and the first quarter of 1981, and who is determined to keep on with higher interest rates until they stop that growth. He cannot have it both ways. He must stop talking nonsense and start telling the truth.

The minister went on in his speech to say that he will strongly resist demands for blanket protection which he continues to hear from the consumers. So be it, Mr. Speaker. We will see how long he keeps on that course. He looks to me now like a man who is weakening. He looks to me now like a man who is under very heavy pressure from the Liberal caucus because they can see their seats vanishing. They will not be back in this chamber in three or four years' time if they do not change the minister's talk about there being no blanket protection for Canadians who are suffering from these fantastic interest rates.

I want to pass on to another point which is in this bill, one which is not widely known, and that is the effect of this legislation on the fishermen of Newfoundland, Labrador and the Atlantic provinces. There is a clause in this bill which changes a whole pattern of conduct for the sale of fishing gear in the Atlantic provinces, in British Columbia and wherever there are commercial fishermen. I have a letter before me from the Bay Bulls Trading Company in St. John's West. It is dated February 17, 1981 and reads:

> Dear Sir:
> We have just been advised of the imposition of a 9 per cent federal sales tax on all fishing equipment.
> Although gear supplied to fishermen by wholesalers or fish plants holding FST exemption licences is exempt—about 70 per cent of all inshore fishing gear in Newfoundland and Labrador is distributed through general retail stores without licences.

In other words, in Newfoundland in particular but also in Nova Scotia and other areas there are small stores scattered about the many small fishing communities which have for years sold fishing equipment to the commercial fishermen federal sales tax exempt. There is no federal sales tax charged to them on the equipment. They did not have to collect it from the fishermen and then try to obtain an exemption from the department. That involves immense paperwork. The author of the letter, Mr. Earle, who is an experienced man in Newfoundland, says in his letter:

> Consequently, because Newfoundland inshore fishing equipment sales amount to approximately $10 million per annum, one could expect $7 million to be sold through these smaller outlets.
> Because small stores have neither the staff nor the time to make rebate claims to the federal sales tax department on a continuous basis, they will mark up the gross cost, (cost plus FST) and fishermen inthe future will pay not 9 per cent, but rather 11 per cent extra on 70 per cent of the fishing equipment purchased.

Mr. Earle concludes that Newfoundland fishermen will pay approximately $770,000 additional in hidden taxes to the federal government through the change in this legislation every year.

What is the purpose of this, Mr. Speaker? We are told that the whole purpose of this provision is to stop some sports fishermen, or some people who are buying fishing equipment and who are not commercial fishermen, from receiving this exemption. Surely the amount of equipment which could be sold to people who are not commercial fishermen and not entitled to the exemption is minuscule. Perhaps it would amount to a few hundred thousand dollars, compared with the millions of dollars worth of equipment sold to commercial fishermen who will now be taxed because the people they deal with have not the facilities to obtain a federal sales tax licence exemption and have no facilities to handle the hundreds of requests they will have to make for exemptions when they sell equipment to Fisherman Brown, Fisherman Smith, Fisherman McGrath and fishermen of the various towns and communities of the Atlantic provinces and the west coast.

I brought this problem up with the minister. I have written to him about it and I have brought it up in committee. The only reason it has been suggested there should be this change is the reason I have given you, Mr. Speaker, which was the reason given by the minister in the committee. That is to say, to make sure that the exemption from federal sales tax for fishing gear is confined to genuine commercial fishermen. If the equipment is used for recreational fishing, most of that equipment should be taxable because no exemption is available for that type of equipment. So, Mr. Speaker, to try to close this little gap through which there is a small amount of tax exemption being claimed by people who should not have it, the government will make thousands upon thousands of commercial fishermen in Canada suffer, since they will be paying this 9 per cent federal sales tax even though they could claim an exemption were there provision for them to obtain such an exemption, and if the little stores they dealt with could hire the extra staff to master all the complexities of applying for hundreds of claims every year to obtain these exemptions.

The minister must have been anticipating my comments today since I received a letter from him today replying to my correspondence. The letter is dated May 19. I hope what he says in the letter will work out. He says that this is a complex problem. I agree. He says there is no easy solution. I agree. Then he says:

> Nevertheless, I am informed that my colleague, the Hon. William Rompkey, Minister of Revenue, has developed new administrative procedures to resolve most of the difficulties described in your letter. First, goods which, by their design, are restricted to use solely in commercial fishing activities, for example, large nets, sinkers, floats, and metal panel opening devices, may be sold to dealers exempt of tax. Secondly, dealers will be allowed to purchase certain of the goods which are normally used only in commercial fishing, such as fishing twine, hooks, lures and jiggers, exempt of tax, provided that they agree to collect tax on sales to persons other than commercial fishermen.

These are the arrangements which the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) is putting into effect to try to get around this problem. I hope these measures are successful in getting around the problem. The Minister of National Revenue is from a fishing constituency. He is now applying the iron heel of the tax collector to thousands of fishermen; he is collecting income tax from them with unparalleled ferocity. I am told that there is a little irritation in his district at the savage way in which fishermen are being treated by the national tax collector, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. But if the Minister of National Revenue can do something to assist the fishermen with these administrative arrangements, I am sure that will help him in his extremity; and he is going to be an extremist before he ever passes through that district and gets re-elected to this House again.

There should not be any need for these cumbersome administrative arrangements. I do not know how in the name of heaven these new administrative procedures are going to work. I can only hope they do work because the minister would not change this legislation and go back to the old system despite my reasoning with him, the letters and correspondence we have had with him, and the correspondence also sent to him by the minister of fisheries of Newfoundland, who has once again been showing his concern for the problems of the ordinary fishermen of Newfoundland. Well, so much for that problem.

We have before us today, Mr. Speaker, a terrible piece of legislation. I am a lawyer. I have not practised since 1972; I have been too busy involving myself in public affairs, God help me! However, Bill C-57 is an illustration. How can the people of Canada possibly deal with the laws we are passing and the tax arrangements that we are making? It is a job for me to try to figure out what section is where in this piece of legislation before us. One would have to be a lawyer and a chartered accountant. One must be able to deal with Chinese inscrutability to try to understand the provisions of this legislation.

Where are we headed? How can we expect the ordinary person in Canada to understand what is happening and going on when even in this chamber with our expertise we cannot understand it? We had a committee, and perhaps it is still functioning, on subordinate legislation or on regulations. I think the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) was the chairman. I do not know if the committee has reported, but if it has, it does not seem to be getting us anywhere. One just has a feeling of complete and utter despair when one deals with amendments like this and the other financial amendments that we have in this House. When I was a minister, I could not bear to look at the bills I was trying to get through the House, they were so bad. It is even worse when one is in the opposition and must look at them and try to understand them. The ministers do not have to look at them or understand them. They have civil servants to tell them what is in them, how to understand them and what to say.

Another item that we are worried or concerned about on this side is the effect on universities of the provisions relating to their purchases of equipment which, up to date, have been exempt from federal sales tax if the equipment was used in their activities. There is a section in this legislation which puts the universities completely at the mercy of the tax gatherer and the people of national revenue when they import equipment. I do not have time in this speech to go into it in detail, but I have a letter dated May 21, 1981, addressed to the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) who is sitting opposite now.

An hon. Member: Smiling!

Mr. Crosbie: Did I pronounce his name correctly? Anyway, he is my good friend, mon bon ami. This letter was trying to reason with the Minister of State for Finance in connection with the purchase of equipment. I am sure the minister has received this letter. It will be brought up when we get into this particular subject, because we are going to move an amendment that the word "design" be removed from the relevant section of the legislation.

Just to give one example, though, because time runs on quickly, this university gentleman from the Association of University Teachers gives the example of a Croft grinder purchased recently by the University of Manitoba is deemed by customs not to be designed for use in classroom instruction and is therefore subject to federal sales tax. It is pointed out in the letter what a ridiculous conclusion that is. He says the new regulations are being interpreted by customs to mean equipment which is specifically and only used for university research, and that if it is used by anyone else, it is not designed for universities and they have to pay federal sales tax upon it.

Then he gives the example of computers, which I do not have time to go into today; the different treatment of computers at the University of Calgary compared to York University. He goes on to show how the government claims it wants the universities to do more and to spend more in research and development but, on the other hand, the government is taking further moneys away from the universities through amendments to this Excise Tax Act which are going to cost the universities millions of dollars when they buy equipment during succeeding years once this legislation is passed.

I only have time to refer to that problem today. However, I ask the minister, what is the point of our having a House of Commons finance committee conduct hearings and take evidence relating to the problems if there are going to be no changes? Surely that is one change that the government can still adopt. If it is equipment to be used by a university for teaching, research, or whatever, never mind whether it is designed so it can be used by other people in addition to universities. Allow them to have a federal sales tax exemption, as was the case in the past.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), a very knowledgeable veteran in this House, has already mentioned the automatic indexing of the excise taxes on liquor, beer, wine and tobacco. This is just a terrible precedent which has now been picked up by two provinces already, and I can understand why. The minister of finance for Newfoundland badly needs money, every cent he can get. The minister of finance for Ontario badly needs money. They are both going to sqeeze us until our pips squeak. That is the nature of finance ministers: they have to raise money.

The minister here is in the same box, but he creates a precedent for the provinces to index their taxation on liquor, beer, wine and tobacco. He wants to increase the tax as the cost of living increases every three months. I think there is going to be a change to make it every six months or every year. The government will not have to come back to this House any longer to ask for increases in the taxes on alcohol, beer, wine or tobacco. The people of Canada will just automatically have the cost of those products increased every three months, six months or every year as the cost of living goes up.

Surely, a government which is devoted, as it says it is, to fighting inflation should not include that kind of a provision in the legislation and ask the members of this House to pass it, so that automatically, if the cost of living goes up—I have forgotten which index we are using, and it does not much matter what index we are using—the taxes on those products increase. Very shortly we will have this as a feature of every one of our consumer taxes. It will not stop with just alcohol, wine, beer and cigarettes; that is only the start. Members of this House have little power anyway. We are in a presidential system. Once the government has a majority we might just as well all stay at home for the effect we can have on affairs, because the government demonstrates, with this bill that it refuses to listen to us or to the people who come before committees.

The government argues that indexing the excise tax is something similar to indexing exemptions under the personal income tax. There is not a word of truth in that.

I have to conclude now because my time is up. However, just let me say that indexing income tax does not protect government from inflation. It imposes greater burdens on the taxpayer. It exposes the taxpayer to the greater burdens of inflation. It does nothing to restrain the government in its operations. It does nothing to restrain government in its expenditures. It has the exact opposite effect of indexing personal income tax. It is completely inconsistent.

We hope the government will reconsider this provision and join with us in eliminating it from this bill before debate is finished in this chamber.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to indicate a number of concerns that we have regarding Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as well as to introduce some levies, which I suspect most members of the House realize are inappropriate, relating to the oil and gas industry and the provincial ownership of those resources.

I speak as a relatively new member of the House. I have really appreciated the opportunity of participating in the discussions via the finance committee and listening to the various witnesses that came before us, such as the city of Medicine Hat, the Hobbema Four Band Council from Alberta, the Canadian Community Newspapers Association, the Canadian Construction Association, Canadian Federation of Small Business, Federation of Alberta Gas Co-ops, the Canadian wine industry, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, and a whole number of excellent witnesses who came before the committee because they were given an opportunity to react to Bill C-57.

These people were not trying to avoid paying taxes. They were not attempting to dodge around the legislation. They came before the committee because they had serious concerns about it. There were obvious weaknesses attached to the legislation. There were areas that had been almost obviously overlooked and perhaps provisions which had been assembled in haste. They wanted to draw our attention to those problems in the proposals in Bill C-57, based on years of expertise in the field of newspapers, distilling liquors and oil and gas development. We owe them something. I am sure the minister recognizes that we cannot ask witnesses upon witnesses to appear before the committee, listen intently to their concerns, become involved in elaborate discussions with them, read their intensive and extensive briefs, and then ignore them. What is that going to say to the people of Canada in terms of our Parliament and the committees of Parliament if we invite witnesses and then simply ignore what they say? The word would go out quickly, the word would spread as quickly as a grass fire on the prairies, that there is no point in raising issues with the subcommittee of the House because the government will simply ignore them.

We on this side are optimistic that the government will not ignore these witnesses and that it will come forward recognizing that there are some real weaknesses in Bill C-57 as it is presently drafted. In an effort to gain revenues perhaps the government moved too hastily in some areas. We hope now that it has the courage, in the interests of the country, to say that it is prepared to accept and make changes in certain areas.

What are some of these areas? I shall try not to mention points that we will be discussing in detail but will simply highlight half a dozen areas in the legislation about which I suspect every member in the House would agree that yes, concern is legitimate and changes are necessary.

This is the International Year of the Disabled. There is a clause in Bill C-57 saying that if you have a problem with your foot or ankle and a brace or a device is necessary to correct the problem, it is tax exempt. But if you have a problem with your back, your shoulder, your thigh, or any other part of your body, a brace is not tax exempt. Furthermore, if you are suffering from multiple sclerosis and need an entire body brace, you have to pay for it, yet if you have a problem with your foot or your ankle, consideration will be given to covering the cost of any such device. Surely anyone will agree that that simply must be a bureaucratic oversight. The plight of people who suffer from serious physical problems must be recognized. Here is an opportunity to do that, particularly as this is the International Year of the Disabled.

Then there is the matter of newspapers. The present legislation will have a significantly detrimental effect on our small weekly community newspapers across Canada and on the small metropolitan dailies. It will remove some of their much needed advertising revenues. Surely in a country such as Canada, where information to the consuming public is so important that if a firm is to have a particular special or give the consumer a particular break we would agree that it should be widely known, that sort of information should be put in people's hands. The present legislation in attempting to get around the problem of certain firms slipping catalogues into our newspapers seems to have gone overboard, and by taxing one, two and three-page supplements in a newspaper is overreacting to the problem. We have proposed a number of amendments which hopefully will get around this problem without any serious difficulty at all.

I listened with interest at the beginning of today's proceedings when Madam Speaker indicated that motion No. 10 was really inappropriate in that it was asking the government to expend some funds to recognize the tax collecting role of the small business sector. I will argue that. But it seems that if the government were to introduce something of that nature, it would be quite appropriate.

It seems to me that earlier today we heard the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) stand up and say that the government is committed to the small business sector of Canada. We on this side certainly support that. If the small business sector is doing a real service for the federal government by collecting federal sales tax voluntarily, although they do not have a choice—nevertheless small businesses are prepared to co-operate, go through all the paper work and red tape necessary—the federal government should recognize that assistance by allowing small business to retain a small portion of the federal sales tax collected, up to a maximum of, say $1,000. This would not make any difference to the medium and large firms across Canada, but to small family operations it would make quite a difference. Most important, it would be an indicator by the government, a gesture, which says to the small business community yes, we recognize the role you are playing and the assistance you are giving us and this is our way of showing that appreciation.

It is interesting to note that every provincial government does allow a certain retention of sales tax collected, with the exception of Alberta. Alberta does not collect any sales tax so there is no need. Perhaps every other province recognizes the small business sector, assists it and has a number of programs in place which allows small business to retain a certain amount of the provincial sales tax they collect.

Again, we have put up a recommendation and a solution to this problem as we might call it. It is certainly within the government's ability to recognize the value of small business and to do something along the lines I have suggested as a demonstration of its concern and interest in the small business sector.

My colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) mentioned the art community. Again, surely to say that art is exempt from federal sales tax, but not original prints must be a bureaucratic oversight. Anyone who has paid any kind of attention to what is going on today in the art world in Canada would recognize the real place original prints take. We see them in art dealers' shops and in displays across the nation. These are quite different from the photo mechanical reproductions, posters and so on, which so many of us are able to acquire so easily. I say it is necessary, particularly during this time of repatriating the Constitution, of trying to build a support for Canada, of trying to instil in Canadian people a pride in our country, to recognize the role played by the artistic community. Original prints as an art form should be recognized and encouraged. I am sure all of us can recall a number of struggling artist friends or acquaintances. Here is one small way to say that we recognize their role in the development of Canadian society. I am sure that the provision imposing a tax on art is a bureaucratic oversight.

Then there is the matter of assisting learning institutions across Canada by providing tax exemption for materials used in classrooms, various utensils, instruments and other apparatus. These items should be recognized as being tax exempt, so this provision must be an oversight by the government.

One area particularly close to me is the construction equipment amendment that we have proposed, recognizing that construction equipment is exempt from federal tax but that dynamite is not. This is not a major provision because I am sure the amount of revenue the government can accrue by this clause is minimal. We are saying that in many parts of Canada where blasting is a very important function of the construction industry, the cost of dynamite is included in the construction cost. If we are to exempt construction materials, we should certainly exempt dynamite.

I do not need to say much about tax indexation this afternoon. A number of previous speakers have elaborated on that in some detail. It is so important, though, that I want to spend a moment or two on it. It is certainly a dreadful and horrendous foot in the door. This particular move will give the government a vested interest in inflation. It will be hoped that inflation continues because then revenues will continue. It is a way for the government to raise taxes without ever having to mention it in the House of Commons. It will be taxation by the back door. The government will look good. As far as the people of Canada will be concerned, the government will not be raising taxes again on tobacco, beer, domestic wines or distilled spirits. However, it will be taking place through indexation.

We would have a difficult time trying to find a tax expert or financial adviser who says that indexation of taxation is a good idea. I have had the opportunity of speaking to a number of people in the financial field. I asked how they felt about this. I raised this with chambers of commerce in my constituency, asking what they thought about this proposal. I have yet to find an individual who says that indexation of taxation is a fine idea, particularly for a government that almost on a daily basis reminds those in the opposition it wants to wrestle inflation to the ground. This seems to be a peculiar route to follow.

My colleague from Vancouver will have a great deal to say, along with other members of the opposition, about the tax on natural resources in the west, mainly natural gas and petroleum. This is very clearly an inappropriate tax.

I was very impressed when the mayor and a number of representatives from the municipality of Medicine Hat appeared before our committee. They went on at some length. Years back the city fathers of Medicine Hat felt it would be appropriate to take advantage of the natural gas deposits in their area. They developed those deposits in the interests of the citizens and the entrepreneurs of Medicine Hat. Inexpensive energy was an attraction for companies and firms wishing to move to Medicine Hat.

The representatives of Medicine Hat asked the committee to please give them some recognition. They pointed out that they are not a private company or firm, but a level of government. Recent court decisions have made it clear that governments are not to tax other governments. The city of Medicine Hat ought to be given recognition of their foresight and for the fact that they are a level of government taking advantage of a natural resource beneath them.

As one of many in the House concerned with the small business sector, and as our party critic or spokesman, I was impressed by the tales and stories brought to the committee regarding the impact of this tax on the small business sector in provinces like Alberta in particular. The large oil companies will not feel this or be bothered by it. Those who will really be hurt will be the thousands of small firms which service the oil industry.

I grew up in southern Alberta in the oil fields of Turner Valley. I know the kind of people who provide for the infrastructure of our oil and gas industry. They are not rich people. They are not, as is sometimes conjured, individuals with oil wells pumping in their back yards. These are small firms struggling to provide a service to the Canadian economy and, essentially, do a first class job.

These people tell us that levying this tax will reduce business and possibly drive them out of business. It will certainly have that result. In fact, we have already seen the beginning of it. Very impressive witnesses made presentations before the committee showing the linkage between the service firms which serve the petroleum industry and the effect this legislation will have on those small entrepreneurs. Again, this is from a government that, almost on a weekly basis if not a daily basis, reminds us of its concern for small business.

What do they mean by that? Do they mean small business in certain parts of Canada? I do not want to be cynical or negative, but one gets the impression they are particularly interested in going out on a limb to service small business in certain parts of Canada. Let us ask for a demonstration from the government that it is in fact interested in encouraging, nurturing and recognizing the role of small business in all parts of Canada.

We will have many more comments to make as we go through the 135 amendments—my gosh—to this particular bill. I ask the minister this afternoon to remember those witnesses who came some distance and went to a great deal of effort to indicate to us some of the problems associated with Bill C-57. I ask the minister to recognize that their request is not to avoid paying taxes or avoid being responsible individuals or firms, but to stop what appear to be bureaucratic oversights. I ask him to consider that and show us in good faith that the government is prepared to listen to the witnesses and to our voices in the opposition and come forward with some recommendations very quickly.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) in his sane, reasoned, dispassionate and very sensible appeal to the minister.

I was told by one of the groups lobbying the minister at the time the measure was before the committee that the minister at that time promised that if serious representations were made to him at report stage about what are apparent deficiencies in the legislation, he would give serious attention to representations in order to improve this legislation. If that message got back to the witnesses who appeared before the committee, I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap, they will be watching these proceedings to see whether the government is taking seriously the commitment made by the minister that he will give attention to representations made by witnesses, members of the government's back benches and opposition members regarding serious shortcomings in this provision.

While watching the news on television at home this past week, I saw a news report on the meeting of the consumer affairs minister for the province of British Columbia with a number of citizens, citizen's groups, representatives of the Vancouver city council and people in the downtown Vancouver area around Carroll Street who were very concerned about the liquor outlet store in that area. It served largely what are called the winos, or alcoholics. These people were concerned that the government store in that area was perpetuating the problem of alcoholism in that community. The B.C. minister of consumer affairs was taking notes, meeting with the people of that area, wanting to hear what they had to say in order to see whether the government store should be closed down in an attempt to provide some relief to the community on a very serious social problem there. The lesson to be learned is that when the government acts, it inevitably affects social needs and social reactions in that part of the community.

I would like to draw the minister's attention to some of the social effects of this particular bill on the people in the community. Members of the House know me well enough to appreciate that the tax relating to liquor and alcoholic beverages will not affect me much. I think probably the whole alcoholic industry could be diverted to the production of gasohol and in this way would probably serve us a lot better. In any event, the change will not really affect me, and I have no axe to grind in this regard. However, I am concerned about the social effects of this particular piece of legislation.

I have before me statistics, which have been given, I am sure, to every hon. member, regarding the apparent effect of tax legislation on wine, beer and distilled spirits, and the change in consumption patterns resulting from taxes levied on those products.

It is my understanding that prior to April, 1980, and the imposition of these tax changes, for the period 1974 to 1980, the average annual percentage change in respect of beer was 1.7 per cent, in respect of wine 8.3 per cent, and in respect of distilled spirits 3.3 per cent. However, between April, 1980, and January, 1981, the percentages of sales compared to the previous period were as follows: a decrease of 3.6 per cent for beer, a decrease of 1.8 per cent for wine, but an increase of 4.6 per cent in respect of distilled spirits. If we accept these statistics, we see that there has been a radical change in the consumption of what we call hard liquor.

My question to the minister and those on the treasury benches generally is whether it is in the interest of the government to bring about tax changes which encourage an increase in the consumption of hard liquor. Given the fact that the public is going to continue drinking beer, wine and hard liquor, is it in the interest of the government to encourage the public to increase consumption of hard liquor by changes in the tax structure?

The government has an obligation to look at the social effects of the tax measures it brings forward. In the measure the government now wants to validate through Bill C-57 it is implicitly saying it wants people to be deterred from drinking those beverages with less alcoholic content, and wants them instead to drink beverages with greater alcoholic content.

I keep wondering in the back of my mind what percentage of the revenue the government collects through these taxes is being spent on programs to alleviate problems it creates through the encouragement of the consumption of alcoholic beverages? The government collects "X" millions of dollars per year in taxes on alcoholic beverages. What percentage of that revenue is it spending on health measures, rehabilitation, and so forth? It seems to me the government is making money on something that is a potential health hazard to Canadians.

Secondly, I am concerned, as are other members, about the indexation provisions of this measure, what can become a hidden tax, and I am concerned for two reasons. This measure perpetuates increases in the future. An automatic continuation of these increases is wrong. The government is already making money on inflation in the way it is indexing taxes and in the way taxes are increased by percentages. In this way it is creating a situation in which it makes more money on inflation. I think the minister has to agree with that. The government increases its revenues every year because of the percentage basis on which it operates. If it does that in this area, it seems to me it is perpetuating something without examination, and that is wrong. One of the fundamental functions of Parliament is to examine and re-examine. Through indexing this increase, the government is taking that function away from Parliament, making it an automatic process.

The third subject matter I wish to speak to relates to clause 12 and really has to do with social policy as it is affected by taxation. Clause 12 deals with the tax to be imposed on the sales of metric scales. The clause reads:

(2) The tax imposed by section 27 shall be imposed only on fifty per cent of the sale price if manufactured in Canada or fifty per cent of the duty paid value if imported, of metric retail scales having a maximum weighing capacity of one hundred kilograms and specifically designed for the weighing of goods in retail operations, when sold or imported before January 1, 1984.

If there is one policy other than the government's policies on energy and the Constitution which creates alienation, particularly in western Canada, it is its policy on metric conversion. In this bill the government indicates it is going ahead with its metric policy by which all retailers will have to buy scales in metric—they are being forced to buy new equipment—but the government is going to be very nice and will impose the federal tax on only 50 per cent of the value of those scales. "Aren't we great guys? What a wonderful lot we are", they say. Let me say to the minister that if he wants to increase the feeling of hostility out there in the small business community, he simply has to continue the imposition of metric by compulsion and then punish that community through taxation for obeying government orders. That is wrong. Then it compounds that sense of hostility by making it look as though the government is doing the small businessman a favour by taxing only 50 per cent of the value of the scales.

I am concerned about the social effects this kind of legislation will have on the business community and the consumer, because the small businessman has to pass this tax on to the consumer. If witnesses are correct, the change to metric will cost us at least $500 million and the consumer will have to pay that. Mr. Speaker, I see that it is six o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) had the floor.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker—

M. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am told by the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) that he has had consultations with his colleagues on the other side and that they have come to an agreement. So before my hon. colleague goes on with his speech, perhaps we could settle that matter by reverting to motions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to reverting to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICES OF MOTIONS

Hon. Pierres Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as I explained briefly this afternoon, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to table two notices of ways and means motions, one concerning the Excise Tax Act and the other Excise Act. I have already indicated that this is necessary because we want to amend the provision concerning the quarterly indexation for tobacco and alcoholic beverages to provide for a yearly indexation. My explanations failed to convince the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and he was quite right since the tabling of a ways and means motion is justified if the period over which the indexation will apply is being changed, thus bringing about a change in revenue. As I said, I failed to convince the hon. member this afternoon, but following our discussions and after examining this provision concerning the new period, the hon. member for Edmonton West informed me that a ways and means motion was required to make such a change.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House, I shall now table the two ways and means motions and ask the House to approve them. I shall also ask the unanimous consent of the House to table the amendments related to these ways and means motions, namely three amendments which will provide for a yearly indexation instead of a quarterly indexation. I wish to thank the hon. members for their excellent co-operation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister asks the unanimous consent of the House to table two ways and means motions. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE EXCISE ACT (2)

Hon. Pierre Bussiéres (Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That a Ways and Means Motion to amend the Excise Act, notice of which was tabled in the House on Tuesday, May 26, 1981, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

THE EXCISE ACT (3)

Hon. Pierre Bussiéres (Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That a Ways and Means Motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, notice of which was tabled in the House on Tuesday, May 26, 1981, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, of course, the three amendments Nos. 8, 13 and 58 already tabled are automatically withdrawn and replaced by the three amendments I have just tabled.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As something which follows from what the minister has just done, the minister is seeking agreement to withdraw two amendments from the Order Paper.

Mr. Knowles: Three.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that perhaps the substituted amendments could occupy the same numerical positions as the original amendments because they fall into sequence as to, shall we say, the "logicality" of the debate. We are quite in agreement with that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In order to have it clear, there is, first, unanimous consent respecting the two ways and means motions of the minister, and then two amendments will be withdrawn, but the same numerical sequence will be followed.

Mr. Knowles: Three others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Three others will be withdrawn, but there will be the same numerical sequence for the new material. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

• (2010)

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): I do not know what right the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has to talk about the "logicality" of the debate here. I have been here seven years and I do not know if the debates have always followed the route of logic.

At the dinner hour break I had been trying to make the point that Bill C-57 shifts the tax on alcoholic beverages in such a way that it changes the lifestyle of people. Figures indicate that the consumption of beer has decreased whereas the consumption of hard liquor has increased, and I am not so sure that is good for the country. My colleague, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) reminded me today that another factor enters into it, and that is that beer is really the working man's beverage, and he is right. A man does not come from the docks or the saw mill or the logging camp, and the fisherman and construction worker do not come off the job and go to the liquor store, and buy a $12 or $14 bottle of whiskey; they buy a six pack. So what we have here is another tax on the working man. If the government can find a way to tax the working man, they will find it, and this is a very important factor in this tax legislation before us.

Finally, the provisions on page 2, subparagraph 3 regarding the definition of a manufacturer or producer have some implications that seem at first to be innocuous but are actually fairly far-reaching. When one shifts the tax from the manufacturer and puts it on the wholesaler or distributor on products like cosmetics and so forth, I think two things can happen. I may have misunderstood the legislation and I would gladly hear an explanation from the minister on this, but it seems to me that we are changing the base of taxation because there is a manufacturer's price and a wholesale price. If you have a 9 per cent federal tax on the manufacturer's price of, say, a $10 item, you have a 90 cent tax. The wholesaler is going to add his 40 or 50 per cent, which now makes it a $14 or $15 item, and the tax will now be $1.40. I say there is a subtle shift here which provides more revenue for the government. Simply by changing the definition of a manufacturer, the government increases its income.

Second, it would appear to me that the cost of collection is going to be much higher. It is one thing to go to half a dozen manufacturers and have them collect the federal sales tax; it is another thing to go to all of the wholesalers and distributors and collect it from them. It seems to me that you increase the tax but you also increase the expense, and I am not too sure that the economics justifies the shift, but it appears that the consumer is going to be the loser because the bottom line is that the government will make that much more, which means inevitably that the consumer will pay that much more.

I really end with what I started with, that when the government brings forward a piece of legislation which is supposed to be a routine tax measure, in this case the excise tax, it behooves the government to look at all the shifts that take place.

I want to emphasize the cost that these provisions represent to the country in terms of human relations. There is no way in which the government can pretend to be Canadianizing the country with a national energy policy when the policy implications themselves tear the country apart. You can talk about Canadianization by buying out oil companies such as Petrofina—and to me one of the most odious things about the policy is that the government now requires other companies to collect the tax to help support a competitor, which does not seem exactly right to me—but in buying out the other companies the government is going south of the border to use American funds to buy out existing companies in Canada and calls it Canadianization. There is no way the government can genuinely talk about Canadianizing an industry when in the process of doing so it brings about tensions in the country which have the potential of tearing it apart. I think, Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the debate we indicated there are possible serious repercussions from this legislation, and as the debate goes on I believe you will find there are many other issues that are going to impinge on the government. We will wait to see whether the minister was serious when he said before the committee that he will listen intently and be willing to introduce amendments that will prove to those witnesses who came before the committee that the government indeed is listening.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my comments will be very precise on one section of these motions. Starting with No. 46 and going on to No. 51, my comments have to do with a subject known as gasohol which you have heard discussed before.

As this House probably knows, gasohol is now legal and encouraged in over 30 nations in the world. One nation, namely Brazil, requires it for all motor vehicles. Canada, however, has been lagging behind, and I am very pleased to support clauses of the bill dealing with gasohol, although of course they put it in words that are a little bit difficult for the layman to grasp. When you have a legal still on your farm or in your home you no longer call the product alcohol, you call it denatured spirits. Now if we get that point clear in our mind, then we see that the various clauses of this bill lay down the terms for having a legal still if you are producing denatured spirits. In plain English this means alcohol that you cannot drink.

These proposed amendments dealing with gasohol try to make the terms of this excise tax act workable. In dealing with the question of a licence, the bill says that a special temporary licence to encourage or engage in the manufacture of denatured spirits may be granted by the minister to any person. It must be obvious to any thinking person, Mr. Speaker, that if you are granted a temporary licence and later on you find its duration is for one year, you will not want to build a still. For all practical purposes, the still that we are talking about costs anywhere from $4,000 to $25,000. Now I have seen pictures of these stills. Because they are illegal in Canada, all it is legal for me to do is to look at them.

I think the type of still which will serve the purposes we are trying to achieve in this innovation will suit the average home or farm. If we look at the figures of the Department of Agriculture, we find that they calculate, for example, that on the average grain farm in western Canada there are approximately 1,000 bushels of grain which are usually classified as waste. At one time this grain was used to feed chickens and pigs. Now they do not have chickens and pigs on farms because they cannot afford them, so they must get rid of the waste in another way. By putting it through an alcohol still, they can get rid of this waste in a very useful fashion, as long as it is called spirit. When a farmer makes alcohol, he has relatively no fuel costs because there is another waste product on his farm called straw. It is a difficult chore to get rid of straw. By bailing this straw and placing it into a furnace, he can apply a steady heat to the still which keeps it from getting too hot and exploding. Therefore, he does not look upon it as a cost; he is just getting rid of a waste product. However, it is a cost to the commercial manufacturers. After the farmer has used the straw to distil the alcohol, he passes on the heat to his barn or his home to heat them. This is a second use of the waste product for heating. He takes off the alcohol which is worth $4 for every bushel of waste grain he puts through. In addition, he gets 42 pounds of mash with a very high protein rating and tremendous digestibility. Having gone through the distillation process, it is much easier for animals to digest. Therefore, more meat is put on the animal or more milk is produced, whatever the case may be.

If the farmer puts in a still to meet all these conditions and to give him some form of relative or comparative advantage over the commercial manufacturer of alcohol, he will require a still which costs from $4,000 to $8,000 depending upon his plans. He will not spend that amount of money if he has a licence for only one year because he will never get his money out of the still.

The first motion simply deals with this matter. If we take out the first two or three lines and include a clause which takes away all ambiguity, then a person, a group of persons or even a group of people connected with a corporation, because 15 per cent of our farms are now incorporated, can take advantage of it.

I do not think I am asking too much when I ask all hon. members in the House to support this series of motions. I have described in some detail the common-sense approach of not limiting licences to one year and of not limiting them to one person. Farm activity is organized either by a single farmer, a farmer and his son, a farmer and two or three of his neighbours or, in some cases, farmers' co-operatives, who use the same still. Therefore, this legislation must be workable and economic for farmers, and it must satisfy the types of organizations used by farmers when dealing with these problems.

The advantages of a legal still are obvious. It will only provide enough alcohol to meet 2 per cent to 5 per cent of our total energy needs. The Americans are going at it much harder. They are planning to satisfy 8 per cent or 10 per cent of their total energy needs from alcohol. By giving large subsidies to big companies, small companies and individuals, they will reach in the fall of this year, the target they set some years ago of producing around two billion gallons per year.

This takes up a very big proportion of energy, but it worries many thinking people in the United States because farmers and some of the companies that are heavily subsidized by the program are taking advantage of the subsidies to reduce their costs. They are producing more and more alcohol but are using good farm land to produce waste in order to make alcohol. Good farm land is needed much more desperately in the world to feed people.

The concept in these motions is to give enough economic leeway to the project so that farmers, either an individual or a group of individuals in any structure they like, can pick up the waste on their various farms and make good use of it; it must be a viable operation. We do not want them to use good grain or vegetable land, which should be used for the production of human food or cattle feed, to produce alcohol for the automotive industry.

Let me make one point clear. This legislation is modest in U.S. terms. The variation in each of the United States which have legalized the still is great. Limits should be imposed in one of these motions in such a way that no one will be going into production of alcohol as a big business. It will be simply for the purpose of getting rid of waste and allowing the person to make money. The country will benefit in that farmers will produce alcohol that cannot be drunk for use in the gasoline tanks of tractors, trucks or automative machinery which takes that type of fuel. It does not give any more miles per gallon, but it keeps the motor clean and the motor lasts two or three times as long. This is important in this day and age when car motors, particularly small ones, only last 100,000 miles. By keeping the motor clean with the addition of alcohol to the gasoline at a one to nine ratio, or 10 per cent alcohol, it will last two of three times longer; in other words 200,000 or 300,000 miles. The same ratio is maintained for tractors and trucks.

Those are the main points I wanted to mention. Of course the motions do not make sense unless one has the act in front of one, and if one is really astute, one would have the old act as well. If one reads these acts, one finds that these motions are carefully drawn. Unless there is some legal opposition to them, I think every member in the House could support them.

Turning now to the duration of the permit, it must be at least five years to warrant building the stills, and the five-year term should be renewable. It will be the responsibility of the minister and his staff, which really means the excise people and the Mounted Police, to decide if there is any abuse of the act. Therefore, cause must be shown before it can be taken away.

The quantity a farmer can produce should be extended to cover the majority of farmers, and the period of time should be set for a minimum of five years for any person legally operating a still with no interference at all. The state will have the power, through the permit and through the bonding procedure, to make sure the law is not abused.

I do not think I am speaking out of line when I say that representatives of the RCMP have seen the plans for the stills which will be offered under the regulations, as have the excise people. Both are satisfied that no one will fool the government and that it will not create a hardship. If we put the bill through today as it is, it will not work because no one will build a still with a temporary permit of one year and no one will build a still if it does not satisfy one's particular needs. In other words, perhaps it will take the waste of two or three farms to keep the still operating efficiently.

There may be other matters which can be covered when we come to a detailed discussion of the motions which are before us. I think the four or five motions which deal with stills can be grouped together and voted on. They are simply designed to help in every way an individual, or a group of individuals, who wish to have a still. There is nothing in these regulations to stop a city person from having a still. Plants can be grown in a city garden, or waste can be picked up around a city, which can be used in making alcohol. Artichokes are better than grain, and sugar beets are also very good for making alcohol—any number of substances can be used for this purpose.

So long as we make it legal for those who wish to make alcohol within reasonable economic limits, I think this legislation is a big step forward. It puts us in tune with the progressive nations of the world. Above all, it allows us to move forward into the area of renewable energy resources, while at the same time it allows us to get rid of our waste. I would ask, therefore, that members of all parties give serious consideration to voting for the five motions which are before us. I think one of the motions should be dropped, but that can be decided upon later on.

Most members of Parliament do not talk about alcohol, but we have lived with this religious phobia in Canada too long. Now that there is a perfectly legitimate use for this type of alcohol, I think we should let this legislation go through.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to join in this debate tonight, and to be called upon to follow the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). Much of the emphasis of my remarks will be in tune with the comments made by my hon. friend.

I would first like to discuss the bill from the aspect of the confusion caused to people who are trying to understand what it is we are debating. This is an omnibus bill which covers a number of areas. It has really been an effort to put into one measure matters which do not necessarily fit together. While we talk about fuel alcohol in one instance, we also talk about the excise tax on natural gas, which includes the area of small business. I think the way in which this legislation has come forward is not the most appropriate, and it is therefore confusing. On a broad scale, what this legislation indicates is the approach and philosophy which this government has toward the raising of revenues. Unfortunately, many of the measures in the bill before us look for ways to close what could be considered loopholes in many small business areas. In many instances it seems as though it will take as much money to collect these revenues as it would cost the government in lost revenues were they not collected. In this way it is really not a very productive effort.

Excise Tax

One matter which I wish to deal with very briefly is the fact that small business will feel the brunt of this legislation in many ways. First, it will be imposed upon to do more paperwork. The small businessman will have to comply with government regulations in a number of ways. Apart from placing a double layer of revenue on the final cost of a product, this legislation will impose a burden on that very sector of the economy which we hope would help to revitalize the whole Canadian economy. In this way it is a measure which is difficult to support.

One of the other major issues I wish to deal with is the petroleum and natural gas revenue tax. This is a tax which has an unfortunate consequence, particularly at a time when we are trying to achieve self-sufficiency, and trying to move toward alternative sources of energy, away from oil and into the use of natural gas. The net effect of this tax has been to create a large number of what can be called "marginal wells", areas of marginal production which are very questionable economically. We have ended up in a position where we find our natural gas exports to the United States markedly decreased. The market for natural gas is not there because of this increased tax.

Before I deal with the question of fuel alcohols I would like to deal with the 8 per cent petroleum and natural gas revenue tax. The point should be made that this tax is applied right at the wellhead, with a couple of major consequences. One of them is the effect this tax has on producers, particularly those in marginal areas. The tax does nothing to help in terms of improving exploration and development, nor does it assist in making the necessary steps needed to improve our net production of energy in this country. Thus at the producer level, this tax is having a detrimental effect.

In addition, this taxation places another layer on the taxation which already exists on the oil industry, with the cumulative effect of a 50 per cent decrease in exploration which has been seen in the last year or so. There has also been a 70 per cent decrease in the amount of land coming under exploration. In total, we are looking at about 20,000 workers in the oil industry who will be out of jobs this summer. This, in turn, will have a tremendous economic impact on the whole country. Finally, by placing this tax at the wellhead, the federal government puts itself in direct confrontation with the oil-producing provinces.

The fact is, Bill C-57 includes an aspect which is now before the Supreme Court, that is, the natural gas and gas liquids tax. It is a very serious constitutional debate in terms of the relationships between the federal government and the provinces.

I would now like to discuss the section of the bill which was dealt with by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. The situation we have in Canada at the present time is that anyone who wishes to produce spirits or alcohol, whatever you wish to call it, is required to post a $200,000 bond. This does not mean that one must pay $200,000 but there is a significant economic factor involved for small producers. Also, there is a $7.50 per gallon excise tax on the alcohol which is produced. That is the way the law stands now.

More important than these two aspects is that one must pay a $250 annual licence fee, and it is necessary to have inspections performed involving other additional costs. These regulatory measures are clearly not conducive to the production of fuel alcohol. Perhaps the most obvious symbol of all these difficulties can be found in Gentle Ben and Mr. Thomas. Through Mr. Thomas's considerable ability in media relations, he has reached the point where he has been called into court. This was the first instance in which Canada recognized the fact that alcohol could be used as a fuel. It was a milestone in the evolution of fuel alcohol. There is another gentleman who I think is also worthy of mention. He is Dr. Les Emery, who has done a considerable amount of work in this field. He is looking at the use of units smaller than the individual farm, but ones which would have an economic viability, to spur on the development of all fuel alcohols.

I think the particular problems of the bill have been well identified by the previous speaker. If one is really serious about trying to replace some of one's own requirements with alcohol, one has an immediate difficulty because of the longevity of the terms of reference of the bill now. A temporary permit which would last for one year would clearly give no incentive and, in fact, would take away the desire of anyone to make any sizeable investment. At the end of the year, as it now stands, it could result in people having to actually physically dismantle their apparatuses and cease operations. That is clearly something which must be changed and must be expanded. Five years is a good idea, and should also be renewable on a five-year term unless there are clear problems. So that is one major point in that whole issue.

The second matter is whether or not it should be confined to personal use. The idea of a co-operative development also has a particular appeal in some ways. If a person or a farmer is producing fuel alcohol, even in small quantities, he will probably be producing more than he can actually use in his vehicles on the farm. He should be able to sell his overproduction on the commercial market in some way, whether to other farmers, local people or to a company of some sort. There have been indications that companies will be glad to accept this overproduction. If he does not have that access, then there is another major block in the economics of the evolution of the whole process. So the provision must be expanded to cover more than personal use.

Another point I would like to make is that under section 76 of the bill, there is an inclusion that those who apply for these licences should provide a specific diagram to the minister or his representatives who would decide whether these licences would be approved. It is very important that this measure be revised so that it would not be necessary for anyone, particularly farmers, to present technical drawings which we would normally expect from engineers. That is a weakness in the legislation which could cause real difficulty for many people. The measure should be revised or at least clarified so there would be an understanding that sophisticated, engineering-type descriptions would not be required. Indeed, many people would not really know the complete network of materials required when they first started, and that could solve another problem.

The five amendments which the Conservative party has presented address these difficulties in many ways, and we would like to support them. It is important, when we are looking at this whole issue, to establish some of its bases. We must clearly understand that we are dealing only with the specific area of the regulatory aspect of allowing the production of fuel alcohols, and it must be put in a broader framework which must include the production and end use aspects. It must be considered in the context of helping to achieve self-sufficiency of the whole country by whatever mode of fuel is used.

One question becomes very important. How much of our total transportation requirements will be met through the use of fuel alcohol? Another question is, on which fuel alcohol would we like to put major emphasis? We can look at the United States as an example to see what it has been doing. Last year, in 1980, it produced approximately 100 million gallons of ethyl alcohol, ethynol, to provide an adjunct to its normal transportation fuel requirements. To put that in context, in one year the United States uses approximately 50 billion gallons of gas and diesel fuel. Even with the dedications shown so far, with the hopes for the future, and with the feedstock being used, although it may be of economic importance what we have is a fairly limited added source of transportation fuels required all across North America. By 1985, the United States hopes to produce about 10 per cent of its requirements. That would be about 500 million gallons. What has been achieved this year, or what is likely to be achieved because of a number of things which are happening in the United States right now, is approximately 110 million gallons of fuel.

We must be careful to keep the perspective in mind that what we can do with the fuel alcohols is to stretch some of our normal requirements. If large amounts of grains and other agricultural products were dedicated, and I am not referring to waste products here, we would end up with some degree of competition on the feedstock market. The price of grains would increase or we would face a shortage in one area or another. Then the controversy of food versus fuel would indeed be very well fuelled. There is a very important sector, particularly in the farming area, which can be well served by the development of these facilities. I would encourage that development, but I think the total picture must be kept in perspective.

I might mention that the difficulties will be in the actual technical aspects. Although the process of distillation and fermentation is 6,000 years old, when we get into some of the newer techniques which will optimize the economics, more and more sophisticated apparatus is required which will need more careful attention and management during the ongoing production. The buildings are more sophisticated. These developments are difficult for a private or individual person to keep up with and, as time goes on, it may either improve or get worse. This is one of the reasons, why, in my own personal view, I think that a small number of farmers working together in a co-operative type of group makes more sense because then they would be able to keep up and would have access to the newest techniques. The other aspect, of course, is that efforts are being made for the future in genetic engineering to optimize the processes required to break down the starch or cellulose from which we would be working.

The end uses are another important point for individual users to remember. One hundred per cent alcohol or a typical gasohol, which is anywhere from 10 to 20 per cent alcohol, can be used without any difficulty in most current engines. However, there may be difficulties because too much of our feedstock resources would be dedicated to that area and also because of the mechanics of the end uses, and so on. So although engines may seem to be working well now, other problems may be created.

I tried to convey to hon. members that we are dealing only with one aspect of this bill right now. Agriculture Canada has been doing a fair amount of work in trying to explain the processes and concepts of the whole issue, and should be commended for it. What I fear we have right now is one sector of government operating almost in oblivion of another. This is not unusual. It is a difficulty which needs to be watched and addressed. But we now have before us ways to open up opportunities. Yet I think individuals are in grave danger of being taken in by those who would capitalize on this opportunity with equipment which does not comply with a certain standard or that will not produce as expected. I think there is a danger for the individual who is trying to produce something. People need to have access to up-to-date important mechanical, technical and biological information that will make it possible for them to be efficient and effective.

We need co-operation and understanding. We probably need a drive by Agriculture Canada to make information of this sort available to people. I hope we are successful in passing this bill.

We have attempted, while addressing this bill, to free ourselves of our dependence on imported oil so as to become self-sufficient in energy in the future. This is a move which needs support. It is an important move and is something which should have been done several years ago. We seem to be two years behind in terms of what we are proposing right now in comparison to the American experience, and that is too bad. As an example, the American small producer, by making a telephone call, has access to a licence which allows him to produce.

This bill needs to be supported. Until now we have been discriminating against renewables. I think it is time that we got this measure and many more like this one passed through Parliament.

Excise Tax

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-57 is designed to provide money for the federal treasury. We all realize that money is necessary for the federal treasury. However, an excise tax or a tax that goes through the back door or one that is questionable in that it does not have the support of the people of the country, may well backfire and be counterproductive in the long run.

I shall try tonight to show why the excise tax on natural gas and the production tax are ill advised. Both of these taxes are hurting the country. Both are preventing development. Both are driving capital and jobs out of the country. I find it difficult to understand why the government insists on proceeding with this type of taxation in spite of all the evidence now available showing the terrible effect it is having on our country. I shall try tonight to show how some of these things are actually working out.

For instance, the excise tax on natural gas is a tax which does not hit the large oil companies. It is not a tax on those with plenty of money. It has no bearing on ability to pay. It is actually taxing the people who can least afford to pay. In addition, it is hurting Canadian food production.

The increase in natural gas immediately affects the chemical industry. Consequently fertilizer prices have to rise. The use of the gas itself in industries such as the Alberta provincial gas co-operatives also has a detrimental effect on production. The biggest effect it has and the greatest damage that is being done is that of cutting down production. It takes money from the farmers' pockets. As a result, the farmer cannot buy as much fertilizer so he resorts to summerfallow. In turn, less extensive use of the land is made which means less production and less dollar return for the farmer. Consequently, with fewer dollars, the farmer is unable to buy the machinery or the clothes he wants. Fewer manufactured goods are purchased. In a nutshell, almost every segment of industry in the country is affected.

A few weeks ago representatives of the Alberta gas co-ops were here to make representations to the finance committee. I was very disappointed indeed that the finance committee did not pay attention to the strong arguments presented. These men were all producers themselves. They tried to show what effects there are when the production of food is cut down.

Any tax that will cut down on food production in Canada is dangerous. Our farmers have to make a living if they are to stay on the land. Already, with high interest rates and the cost-price squeeze, many farmers are not able to keep their heads above water. Some have gone into bankruptcy, as I mentioned the other day when discussing the bankruptcy bill. Some are on the verge of bankruptcy, not knowing which way to turn at the present time. Some are going into receivership. Possibly the majority are those who are simply saying "what is the use" and are giving up and not producing anywhere near what they can. All of these consequences will be very detrimental to the country.

I urge government members to pay attention to what this excise tax will do to agriculture in Canada. They are not hurting the multinationals; they are hurting ordinary everyday industry in Canada. They are hurting the farmers, the shops and all the stores. Workers are being laid off. Every segment of industry in Canada is being affected. I do not know why the government persists in keeping this tax or why it is doing other things which hurt our farmers. Even without the extra tax now being levied at the gas pumps it is most difficult for farmers to continue on the land.

I want to read into the record a letter which was published in a number of papers throughout Canada. It was written by a farmer from Three Hills, Alberta, by the name of J. T. Bishop. He wrote:

> I must protest the totally unfair tax on petroleum products to pay for the Petrofina takeover. This tax is as unjust as the English Tea Tax that precipitated the Boston Tea Party and the American War of Independence.
> Hard pressed western farmers, because of their high energy use, are forced to pay 10 to 20 times as much as the average Canadian to buy service stations for eastern Canadians we will never use. In addition, because of the wide use of natural gas in Alberta, Albertans must pay more tax on natural gas than all the rest of Canada combined and have nothing to show for it. In my case, with several large broiler barns in operation demanding high consumption of natural gas to maintain the necessary heat for chicks, I will pay probably 10 times as much in this sector as the average farmer who heats only a home and possibly a shop.
> I am fully in agreement with the principle of Canadian ownership, but totally opposed to the principle of government ownership with all the inefficiency and feather bedding invariably involved that fattens the bloated federal bureaucracy and Liberal political hacks.
> If I must pay into buying Petrofina for PetroCan, I should be issued shares in it according to how much I pay and be able to collect dividends as an investment to offset the hardship created by these forced payments. This would be fair to everyone. I would be contributing to the Canadianization of the industry and as a part owner of the company I could be proud of PetroCan and support it.
> As a state-owned company I pledge that I will never buy a gallon of gas from PetroCan as long as I can get it anywhere else. In addition, such a completely unfair tax raises the importance of the objectives of West-Fed as the only way we can get fair treatment for the west.

That was signed by a farmer, not a red neck revolutionist but an ordinary farmer who worked his way up to where he is today. Now he sees his investment disappearing because of unfair taxation. This excise tax on natural gas is completely discriminatory. It hurts British Columbia and hurts Alberta even more because we have made use of natural gas. This discriminatory tax should be wiped out. Rather than unite this country, it will turn those who are supporters of the present government against them. They can see how unfair this tax is.

I support the plea made today by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). He asked the government to consider totally removing the excise tax and the production tax as well. This tax will only add fuel to the fires of separation in western Canada. It will build up disunity in eastern Canada as well. It is finding its way into almost every industry in eastern Canada. Not only does this tax not do anybody any good, but it is wrong. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that this tax defies all conventions. One government does not tax another. The Queen in right of the federal government should not tax the Queen in right of the provincial government. A provincial government should not tax another provincial government. This is a long-established principle.

This government pays no attention to conventions. They have a majority, so they do what they want, regardless of whether the people want it or not. I do not know how long the people of Canada will put up with that kind of attitude. This government will not listen to reason. Even though the Supreme Court of Alberta declared this illegal, it makes no difference to this government. They continue to collect the tax in spite of that court order. We wonder why our boys and girls are going wrong and are defying the law. This government sets the example of defying the law. I repeat, they are collecting a tax ruled illegal by the Supreme Court of Alberta.

Under our conventions, no government of any political stripe has ever taxed another government in order to fill its treasury. That is not right. It is wrong and this government will not listen. I do not know how long the people of Canada will put up with this government's attitude. I certainly do not think those in the west will tolerate it. It is getting worse every day.

This government is pouring oil on the fire. It is similar to the story of the Pilgrim's Progress where one fellow was trying to put out a fire by pouring water on it while someone on the other side of the fire was pouring on gasoline to keep it going. That is what this government appears to be doing.

For years our Indian people have been on the verge of starvation. Ask any member who has visited a home on an Indian reserve whether he felt proud to be a Canadian. In the last few years, the Indians have been trying to get on their feet by developing their natural resources. In spite of the fact the law states that Indian reserves should not be taxed, the federal government is levying a tax on natural gas on Indian reserves. This government is denying our native people the opportunity of becoming self-sufficient and being in a position of making a contribution to this country. Our native people want to live a life they can be proud of and give their children the education they deserve instead of living in poverty and facing near starvation.

We hear a lot of talk about the poor and the hungry of other countries. Visit some of those in Canada who are hungry. Indian people are being forced to go back to where they were 20 years ago. After having got to where they are today through hard work, the government insists on its pound of flesh, regardless of what it does to our native people. Shakespeare wrote about taking your pound of flesh, but said you must not drop one ounce of blood. This Minister of Finance and this government insist on taking their pound of flesh, even from those on the reserves. I do not know how long the Indian people will put up with that.

The government will not listen to the people. I cannot remember when any government was so indifferent to what is going on in the country. It just does not care. We ask question after question and all we get are frivolous answers, even from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). When we talk about hunger and starvation in this country, he grins and laughs. Before he begins to feed those in the rest of the world, he should start at home and look after our people. We have many who are hungry.

Western Indians are endeavouring to raise their standard of living through development of their natural resources. Rather than make it harder for them, we should be helping them. An export tax on a non-renewable resource will severely cripple a number of reserves. It should be withdrawn, and withdrawn rapidly.

If following this debate the government totally removes the excise and production taxes, it will be showing that it is listening to the people and trying to do something for this country. They are trying to fill their coffers in this way. If this goes too far, it will be like the French revolution. When the people were hungry and had no bread, it was said, "Let them eat cake". The Canadian people would not accept such talk. The people of Canada should be respected. Their thinking should be reflected, not defied by the government, as is happening today.

There is another angle we could talk about all evening. There will be another opportunity for that. This tax is not only unfair, but illegal. It defies all conventions. It is destroying the growth of our agricultural industry. If that is not reason to withdraw the tax, I do not know what is.

In addition, there is a new 9 per cent tax applicable to advertising inserts, catalogues and newspaper inserts. Who is this going to hit. Is it going to hit the big chains? I suggest that is not the case at all, but rather that it is going to hit the small weekly newspaper people who provide a service to the people of these areas. As the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) said this afternoon, these inserts advertise the bargains. This is the only way the people have of knowing what the bargains are so that they can make their dollar go a little further, and they have to do that because they have so few of them and because they buy so little.

Now the government is saying not even the newspapers can carry these inserts. This will mean a loss of several millions of dollars to our newspaper industry. Can our weeklies stand this type of taxation, and what will it do? I suggest this is a measure against the freedom of the press. The press should be able to provide news to the people and carry these inserts to cover that cost. If the government simply wants to say to the newspapers they cannot carry Simpsons or Eaton's advertisements, it should say that. Do not hit every newspaper in this country with some form of blanket taxation, saying they cannot carry inserts of any kind because it is going to tax every cent it can, making it completely uneconomical for them to exist.

This is the first time a tax of this kind has ever been devised in North America. Who dreams up these tax measures for the Liberal party? Does the government have a special corps of some type of animal that dreams up tax measures which have never been levied before? This is the first time this kind of tax has ever been levied, and it is detrimental and discriminatory to our smaller newspapers. Not only that, it is an inflation-fuelling tax on the consumers and it threatens the existence of our local newspapers. It is a counterproductive tax. I would ask again why this government wants to get money through this kind of a tax measure. This is really beyond me.

Then we come to another clause of this bill which contains an aspect regarding health care of the people. Some excise taxes are now being eliminated in respect of hospitals to keep the cost of medicare down. Our hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin)—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry because I just barely started.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, as the federal member representing the riding of St. Catharines I am naturally interested in any kind of legislation that affects the wine industry in the Niagara region. I have had the opportunity of reading the submission by the Brewers Association to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Both the wine and the beer industries stand to suffer from the introduction of indexation, a new means of cost taxing related to the consumer price index.

I spent the past weekend in the city of St. Catharines attending the Folk Arts Festival and I took the opportunity, as I very often do, of showing guests around the community, pointing out the natural beauty of the area. I was far too often faced with the question, why are there so many acres of abandoned vineyards, non-productive acres lying in waste? I admit that some of this production has been lost as a result of the expansion of urban centres, including that of St. Catharines, but many acres have been lost to productivity because of this government's lack of concern for agriculture in the Niagara peninsula. Many of these vineyards have been abandoned because of the shortsighted economic policies of this government, of which the excise tax was an example in the first place. The indexing of that excise tax simply represents a further aggravation of a glaring and blatant lack of concern on the part of this government for the grape growers and the wine industry in our community. On the one hand the government claims it is concerned about the Canadianization of agricultural products and industry, but this is Canadianization that has taken the form of lip service only. The government discriminates against the wine industry by indexing its costs to the consumer price index.

For those of you who say this is not a precedent, let me expand on that further. Not only is it a precedent, it is discriminatory. The Finance Department claims this is based on the formula that applies to indexation of personal income taxes and is, therefore, presumably not discriminatory. In response I say to you, Mr. Speaker, what utter rubbish and nonsense. The Canadian people can thank a great Canadian and former leader of this party, the Hon. Robert Stanfield, for having instigated the indexation of personal income taxes. That particular indexing is based on real wage gains, not on cost of living increases given to help track inflation. Had it been based on cost of living increases, most Canadians would now be employees of the Liberal government.

The indexation proposed by Bill C-57 is not based on that formula. The tax on beer, wines and spirits, if indexed to the consumer price index, and as it applies to the alcoholic beverage subgroup, is a good example of this fact. Let me illustrate this point.

As the price of beer rises, whether by reason of increases in the cost of production, the cost of ingredients or the cost of packaging, this government automatically takes an additional share. This government takes its share of the inflationary expectations of the industry. This government has inflationary expectations and by this indexing lends a hand to that inflation. This government is feeding on inflation.

It has been stated that the basic reason for this indexing is to protect government revenues from erosion which has come about as a result of inflation. It has already been shown, only too often, that this government does not have the strength to fight inflation. Worse than that, this indexing form of taxation erodes the will and the desire of the government to even attempt to fight against this higher cost of living facing all of us. As I demonstrated a moment ago, the indexation of the tax on alcoholic beverages is not comparable to indexation of personal income taxes. That being the case, it is discriminatory.

We have something that is far worse. What we are really talking about is the establishment, as we have suggested often here today, of a precedent in the form of taxation. This is a precedent which can be used by the present or any future government to index any tax in relation to the consumer price index. The government will and has said that this is not something that will or can be called a precedent. Any intelligent, thinking person knows better than that. How can a precedent not be a precedent when it is a precedent? If that is a tongue twister, I would like you to try to untangle some of the circumlocutions in the answers and responses of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) when he tries to explain that this is not a precedent.

I cannot expect some people to follow that form of argument, nor can I object too strongly to this proposed new form of taxation. Canadians expect their government to be responsible, to manage the nation's business effectively and to be fiscally circumspect. Canadians do not expect their government to lie back and say, as it does in this instance with this indexation, that inflation is running out of control, that the government has no policies to combat inflation and that as a result it is taking an attitude of "I'm all right, Jack". That kind of approach looks after the government first and the Canadian consumer last.

Further, in recognizing the importance of fiscal responsibility, the Fathers of Confederation left with this House of Commons responsibility for fiscal matters. In Bill C-57 this government is saying that the Minister of Finance does not need to consult the House on future increases in taxation of alcoholic beverages because taxation will automatically increase. As long as the present government is in power, we do not have to concern ourselves with the possibility of a decrease because the consumer price index will continue to rise to record heights. What we have is underhanded taxation without representation. I am sure all members of this House will agree that automation in industry is one thing, but automation in the field of taxation is quite another.

We have been awaiting a new budget since the Minister of Finance introduced his ill-fated budget of October, 1980. As we all know, the measures introduced at that time have failed to have an impact on ever-rising interest rates and our out-of-hand inflation. As we know, the minister is reluctant to present a new budget because that would be a public admission that the government has been inept at dealing with the economic situation which exists in this country today.

If Bill C-57 passes with Ways and Means motion No. 22 included in it, that will be a further indication of two major points. The first is that the government truly has been bankrupt and is bankrupt in its economic policy. The second is that the government will continue to shift the burden of fiscal mismanagement on to those who can least afford to pay. I shudder when I see so much hardship being inflicted on those who can least afford to pay. The hardship is inflicted on hard-working, honest people.

I would like to return to an earlier comment about the growing number of vineyards in the Niagara region which are now going out of production. The people of St. Catharines take pride in the wines of that area. We were delighted to see so many Canadians not only trying Ontario wines but also preferring them and representing them as having an improved taste culture which competes with that of imported wines. As indicated in the brewers' submission, according to surveys there has been a 1.8 per cent decline in wine sales in the period between April, 1980, and January, 1981, compared with the same period just one year ago, and beer sales dropped 3.6 per cent in the same period compared with the previous year. This decline is related directly to the excise tax this government imposed on those two beverage sale markets. If that decline in beer and wine sales continues, then both those industries will have to face up to far more serious problems than they had a year ago.

Let us carry this one step further by projecting beer and wine prices if Bill C-57 is approved. According to the Brewers' Association, in ten years' time beer will cost $23.64 for 24 bottles, almost one dollar per bottle, an increase of 157 per cent. In the first instance, wines generally were subject to a percentage increase of 155 per cent. Now wines generally will be subject to a further increase of 125 per cent over the next ten years. This surely is not acceptable to this House. I ask the government, and particularly the Minister of Finance or his assistant, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières). Is it this government's intention to put brewers and wine makers out of business? Is it their intention to kill that goose which lays the golden eggs and which produces so much revenue dollars to the government today? If it is, I would appreciate knowing sooner rather than later because we could then inform local manpower offices to be prepared for such an event.

Does the Minister of State for Finance know that in Ontario alone the wineries and the grape growers employ over 18,000 persons? Is that not a segment of the community worth considering? In its brief to the standing committee, the Canadian Wine Institute hit the nail on the head when it stated that neither winemaking nor grape growing is a profitable business. For the information of members of this House let me say that in so far as wine production is concerned, the net return is less than 5 per cent of the capital cost investment. That is not a great venture from a profit-making point of view. There are already declining sales and, thanks to that earlier 155 per cent increase in the excise tax announced last April, this cannot fail to continue as the government loads quarterly increases onto the retail cost of wine. With this decline will come the collapse of the smaller wine industries—the cottage wine industries—which have improved the taste and quality of domestic wines. It will also lead to lay-offs in the larger wine industries.

I spoke earlier of the fuel which indexation will add to the inflationary situation. We are not speaking just of increased retail costs for agricultural or alcohol products. We shall have a larger administrative cost and an administrative burden which will add enormously to the cost of operations of, for example, the various provincial liquor control boards and, I might add, to the expansion of paper work which most of us see as an ever-increasing problem. Every three months, new price lists will have to be prepared, circulated, distributed and posted. As is the case with respect to weekly interest rate announcements, consumers will be able to bank on increases in the cost of their alcoholic beverages. This will come to be an accepted thing. We are building yet another bureaucratic nightmare.

I would like to conclude by reinterating the points I have attempted to make in this House this evening. First, the indexing of the tax on the alcoholic beverage subgroup of the consumer price index is a recognition on the part of this government that it has failed in its economic policies and that it has given up trying to fight inflation. That is a defeatist approach in every sense of the word.

Second, that indexation is in itself inflationary and will simply add to the inflationary spiral and the inflationary expectations of Canadians. Their own government expects increases in the consumer price index, and it intends to profit by them.

Third, the indexing sets a dangerous precedent which will, just as surely as I stand here this evening, be adopted by other governments, and it will be adopted by this government in relation to other products.

• (2130)

Fourth, the indexation is discriminatory as it presently stands, and damaging to the wine and beer industry in particular. I repeat my earlier question: if the government is trying to put those industries out of business, then let it be honest and say so rather than going through the long drawn out and painful process of eliminating them.

Finally, I want to say that it is most distressing to me to answer questions in my home town community of St. Catharines when asked about those abandoned vineyards. The proposed indexing formed part of my response, and I hope that this House will have the wisdom to reject the government's irresponsibility in this respect so that I will not be faced at some future date with the question: did they not once grow grapes here? That is the future if this government continues in its approach to the agricultural industry in the Niagara peninsula.

The government has shown little interest in the Niagara fruitlands. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) may be an embarrassment to the minister but he is a millstone around the necks of the grape growers of Niagara. Let us eliminate now this built-in conflict of interest and get rid of the consumer price indexing of government revenue.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): During my years as a member of an elected body I have never had occasion to almost look at the government of my land or of my province with shame. I have had, Mr. Speaker, sharp differences of opinion and philosophy which cause me no shame, but I have to say to you that the two-party government we have today makes me wonder if I should not in fact be ashamed. I sat in this House this afternoon and watched people plead for the consumers, the farmers and the fishermen of this land while the second part of the government sits on its fanny without a word to say as we heap punishment upon punishment in the form of taxes on everyone who spends money in this country. For those who are ready to proclaim that they are going to arrive on white horses and look after the downtrodden of this land, there is a thunderous silence in the minority portion of this government, those who sit on my extreme left.

Mr. Rae: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether the hon. member was here earlier this afternoon, in fact I do not think he attended a single meeting of the finance committee which discussed this bill at great length. I was at every single one of those meetings, I gave a speech at some length today, I did not have the opportunity to speak at as great a length as the hon. member for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) was expressing his opinion and I am sure the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) wanted to express his point of view, but that, in my view, is debate and each member will have that opportunity.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, it is useless to say that I have said anything that is untrue. There has been a thunderous silence.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. McCain: And it was coupled with a vote last week against the home owners and the farmers in a motion of confidence in this House. So not only is there thunderous silence there, it is accompanied by a vote of heresy by that party.

In this country, Mr. Speaker, only the strong are going to survive. That is an old saying. The Spartans had a way of testing their boy babies by exposing them to the elements for a period of time and if they survived, they brought them back, suckled them and made them soldiers. I want to say here that it is not enough to be strong to survive; they have to be strong and rich to survive. They have to be part of the elite of the economic feudalism which this government is creating because the small guy cannot survive. I commented last week in this House that a friend of mine is paying $7,200 on his mortgage and he will buy nothing else except food, clothing and fuel, and when he buys that fuel, he is going to pay the full scope of taxes and when he buys that clothing, if it happens to be a polyester fibre or a derivative of the hydrocarbon industry, he is going to pay the tax. If he ever has money enough to put a rug in that house, he is going to pay two taxes, the wellhead tax on the gas from which the material is derived and then, after the rug is made, he will have to pay tax on the tax on the cost of production of the rug, thereby paying twice.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the most iniquitous tax structure that I have ever seen imposed in this land, and at the same time these taxes are coming in to fatten the revenues of this government which it will spend at will to open new offices in Moncton, Fredericton and Saint John, to hire more and more people to manage more and more regulations and to bring in more and more new programs at a time when they claim they are going to save money.

This is a government of which Canadians certainly cannot be proud and which they must look at with regret. This is the first time that any government, except in wartime, has passed on the full burden of taxation to production. They have passed it on to the farmers, fishermen and lumbermen. At a time when you cannot afford to build a home and perhaps not even buy one already built, these taxes are coming in as an inflationary factor in the ever growing cost of that home. With regard to the farmer, I have heard the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) make excuses for the price of food. Well, I make no excuses for the price of food except that there is a Liberal government in this land. Oh, I forgot, it is a two-party government so I had better remain consistent through the evening.

An hon. Member: Nobody is paying any attention to what you say—

Mr. McCain: Well, in that case how do you have knowledge of what I have said and any cause for reply? If no one is paying attention, Mr. Speaker, you would not expect an interjection, would you? Well, every now and then you sit on a porcupine quill and you have to respond.

An hon. Member: Where is your amendment?

Mr. McCain: I thought they were not paying any attention. They do not pay any attention but something is bothering them. It must be their own negligence getting to their conscience, their abandonment of their principles, of responsibility for farmers, fishermen and consumers, all of whom are hurt, every last one of them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have reached the point in the trucking industry where you cannot make a long-term contract for trucking, but you can get a contract if you are prepared to accept the increment in rate which the industry may deem to be required as a result of additional taxation. And of course fuel is a part of it. That is a rather unstable situation for a producer of goods to have to live with. Having taxed the raw material to make the fibre for the rug and then the rug itself, you tax the transportation fuel which takes the rug to its destination. When this is coupled with the taxes imposed at the provincial level, I wonder what the first tax now amounts to. It probably approaches 20 per cent instead of the percentage you thought it was going to be when you read the bill and said "here is a tax on an article used for production". It is a pyramid of taxation and it is feeding inflation. It is feeding an inflation which is not entirely the same as historic periods of inflation have been. One thing which is lacking in this inflationary period is a lack of goods. There are goods all over the place; every shelf is full. Merchants are trying to reduce their inventories at a very serious sacrifice of profits because they cannot afford to pay the interest rates on them. As we tax here, we are ensuring that there will not be money to buy these goods. We are enhancing the demands of the people of the country who feed on inflation and require more to survive, as we tax and tax more. There are other ways to combat this.

The provinces set an example in earlier crises in home construction by removing the tax on building materials. It happened, for example in the province of New Brunswick. It began to appear that the province was losing revenue which it could ill afford to lose and that it was not necessarily accomplishing the purpose it hoped to accomplish because of the contradictory measures of the federal government. So, here we go again; we are again discouraging purchasing at a time when our shelves are full.

We require a full and complete fiscal monetary policy. There is only one portion of the objective a government must reach for which is being satisfied by this bill and this instrument of taxation across the board. If the government constrains itself to its present expenditure guidelines, I suppose it will reduce the deficit. This of course will reduce the demand on the money market, this of course will in fact have a favourable impact upon inflation, but this is the only aspect of it which can in any way slow down or tone down the inflationary expectations of this land.

It does not make much difference what we look at. When we start taxing hydrocarbons at the wellhead, we are raising the cost of virtually everything in the country. We are raising the cost of transportation, agriculture, fishing, forestry and highway construction, because we are raising the cost of asphalt. We are raising the cost of everything virtually because of our maximum dependence upon the imported or local hydrocarbons as resources.

I would like to ask a question because I do not know the full answer. Perhaps the member of the government who is responsible for the bill will be able to give me the answer in due time. I would like to make a fairyland assumption, for the moment. Let me assume that there were absolutely no taxes on gas or oil as it arrives at our shores. I ask the minister what would be the cost of gasoline at the pump if we bought $32 per barrel oil from Saudi Arabia and the federal government did not tax a whit. What would be the price of gasoline in that event? It would be a little higher than it is today, unless there is a very serious error in my calculations.

We have brought on a lot of these taxes on the assumption that the equalization of the cost of petroleum products in this land can be accomplished by federal taxation on petroleum. If the federal government abandoned taxation on petroleum products and allowed Saudi Arabian oil to come into the eastern refineries of Canada which serve that part of Canada east of the Ottawa valley, as they have traditionally, how much additional oil would be necessary? If there were no federal tax of any kind, I think it would be rather interesting to see how little more would be necessary.

We are now paying for the cheapest barrel of oil we can get, approximately $1.55 to $1.56 per gallon. When we relate that to a 35-gallon barrel of oil, how much more would we actually need without a federal tax? I think it would be revealing. I think the people of this nation, the farmers in particular, would find that the tax on the fuel they use in their fields is really not so much for equalization as it is to feed the hunger of the spending machine of the Liberal government.

We have heard the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicate many times that they would try to serve the people of the country. I plead with them to get down to fiscal monetary responsibility which is such that we do not have to tax the living daylights out of the people of this land.

On the one hand we say to the provinces, as one example, that we will charge them more for RCMP services. Then the minister responsible for that service is quoted in The Globe and Mail last week as saying that the provincial ministers will not negotiate. As soon as I read that article, I telephoned the minister in New Brunswick responsible for that, and he said, "That is outrageous nonsense. Certainly we have tried to negotiate. We have tried to obtain a gradual change in the charges of the federal government for the RCMP". Also he said that he had asked as well the preceding minister, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) to respond.

In the negotiations in 1975 or 1976, it was agreed that the cost would go up by one percentage point per year. It went from 44 per cent to 45 per cent of the cost to 50 per cent to 51 per cent of the cost from that period until now. Now in one fell swoop the federal government, in its urge to save money, will charge the provinces another $100 million.

Not only does this bill impose additional taxes on the consumers of Canada, it imposes them at a time when the government is imposing upon the provinces further reason for them to tax by withdrawing its support from the programs to which they have been accustomed ever since the RCMP has rendered municipal and provincial services in co-operation with the federal government. The only portion which is negotiable is: "We will provide the service if you will pay us what we want". This is what the federal minister said to the provincial ministers responsible for police services. Those ministers are prepared to negotiate and to escalate into a fair position of cost-sharing for the RCMP.

We should look at the contradiction. We tax more here and we pay less to the provinces. So the taxpayer will be hooked twice; once here and once when the bigger bill is issued to the provinces.

Let us look at the extremes and the desperation. This is where shame must enter into the hearts of some supporters of the government. We will tax hospitals, hospital equipment, research equipment and health centre equipment at a time when the provinces are pleading with the federal government not to cut those block grants which are going to them. The provinces, out of their money, will be required to equip the hospitals, the universities or the research centres with the help of taxpayer dollars. Again the health units, which are the responsibility of the provincial governments, will be paying more money. We are taxing more, spending more, opening offices, reducing our cost-sharing payments to the provinces and hitting the taxpayer coming and going, as we escalate taxes and increase prices and charges to the provincial governments. Why is this necessary?

• (2150)

Today the fishermen of this land are buying virtually all of their nets from Japan. With just a little care and caution in its price system, Mr. Speaker, do you realize that Japan can make those fishing nets cheaper than our fibre manufacturers can make them with the wellhead tax and the other taxes which have been applied to the hydrocarbons which are necessary to make those fibres? Japan imports all of its oil and gas. On top of that, we will be taxing these nets. By refusing to pass this tax on to the producers of goods and services in this country, we are denying them our own Canadian markets and leaving them vulnerable to countries which, with just a little price manipulation, can produce those fibres from hydrocarbons and their derivatives cheaper than we can produce them, though they import every single barrel of petroleum they need and every bubble of gas. This is what we are doing to our land. We are not only taxing the consumer, we are taxing the producer. We are taxing the producer of goods in this country to the point where he may well be deprived of his own country's market. That is carrying it too far, Mr. Speaker. Yes, there is no question or doubt, only the strong can survive, if they are rich.

Before this bill goes further, and before some of those who are listening tonight give consideration to a favourable vote in support of this bill, I wish to remind this House once more that a combination of the inflationary structures in the agricultural community in which I live, plus the increments in interest which are being paid bankers, means that the cost of interest on the cost of processing potatoes has gone up tenfold, and it has risen fifteenfold on seed potatoes in a ten-year period. I am not one who gives a lot of statistics, but I promise members of this House that I can put those figures down in black and white for any individual who wishes to question my contention. There is not much difference between the costs incurred by the potato industry and those incurred by the fishermen. When will this government turn around and recognize that there are little guys buying homes and tractors, producing food, fishing for food, and that by helping them it can also help the consumer? The government might also make a contribution to reducing inflation if it would open fewer offices and allow more people to be employed in the private sector.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join in the debate this evening to side with my colleagues who have expressed concern about the provisions of Bill C-57. Some of our concerns have been expressed by and large in the amendments which have been placed on the Order Paper and which we are now debating. We hope that the government will give recognition to some of the arguments made by members on this side of the House. We feel that the amendments put forward are important and would serve the legislation and the country well.

Several of my colleagues have talked about the indexing provisions which have been introduced for the first time in regard to excise taxes at the federal level, the indexing of taxes on alcohol and tobacco. It is passing strange, if not alarming, to listen day after day to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) when he is questioned about interest rates and their high level. He is asked to take action to reduce these interest rates, and his answer to recommendations of members on this side is usually along the line, "Well, in an era of high inflation we have no choice. We have high inflation because of people's expectations. Because prices are going up, people expect high inflation, therefore they are borrowing money and, therefore, in order to limit the money supply, we must keep our interest rates high."

It is no wonder that people who have high expectations in terms of inflation expect it to continue when they see this government bringing in legislation which it says it must have in order to protect its revenues. In fact, that is inflationary. One day the Minister of Finance will criticize workers and unions who look for cost-of-living clauses in their contracts. He indicates that these kinds of provisions are inflationary, this sort of indexing of salaries is inflationary. Yet, the next day he introduces legislation to index his own revenue sources. It is no wonder that any rational observer looking at the performance of this minister will conclude that there is no way the minister and the government will attack inflation. What they are attempting to do is to protect their revenues upon which the government operates, basically the same way as an individual or business operates to protect himself. This government is not acting on behalf of the nation as a trustee. It is operating as a corporate entity on its own in competition with the private sector. Just as the private sector moves to protect its welfare from inflation by raising prices, so does the government move to protect itself from inflation. The same is true for an individual who seeks to protect his salary from inflation.

The government is supposed to adopt the role of a trustee in terms of the rest of the population. It is not supposed to be competing with the private sector. It is not supposed to be designing systems to ensure that it can continue to extract funds from the private sector. It is supposed to be concerned about the whole country. But that is not the way this government behaves. Instead of acting responsibly by coming forward annually with a budget to raise or lower taxes according to need in an open and forthright manner, the government resorts to ploys such as the ones before us to index its revenue sources so that it will be protected. It does this to avoid the embarrassment and political cost of having to be open and honest about its revenue sources.

I would ask the government to re-examine its intent. I know that it has looked at the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario and others. The government says, "if the provinces are doing this, then why shouldn't we?" One good reason why the government should not is that it is supposed to be the national government, it is supposed to provide leadership. It cannot, on the one hand, demand more power from the provinces and on the other follow the bad examples set by those provinces which have resorted to indexation to protect their revenues.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

(A) EXPORT OF PARTS TO EUROPEAN AND JAPANESE CAR MANUFACTURERS

(B) DISCUSSIONS WITH EUROPEAN AND JAPANESE MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, on April 13, in Hansard, at page 9191, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) questions regarding the auto parts manufacturers in Canada and the discussions the minister had with the U.S. government authorities when he visited Washington to pursue amendments to the auto pact. I asked as well if the minister had discussions with Japanese and European government trade officials regarding their automobile exports to Canada. We all realize the automobile industry and its component parts is having a difficult time. We all know as well that the solution is not an easy one.

All North American manufacturers of automobiles are coming out of a year of massive losses, coupled with the very high cost of tooling required to produce smaller fuel efficient cars. So one can see quite readily that a fast solution will not be found. Only time and a change in buyer preference will turn around this industry. Most manufacturers are producing their version of the world car. Industry spokesmen tell us that by the end of this decade there will be only five major automobile manufacturers left in the world. There may be a few smaller manufacturers producing for a local market; but the industry experts say there will be only five major manufacturers in 1990. I believe that is a valid analysis.

We hear every month about joint projects such as Volkswagen and Renault co-operating to design an automatic transmission that will be used by both manufacturers. We have also heard of Volvo and Renault developing a fuel efficient gasoline engine that will be used by both manufacturers. We see as well that Honda and British Leyland have an agreement to use Honda components with British Leyland sheet metal work and body, and so on.

We see these agreements and arrangements being made by various manufacturers because the cost for one of them to do it is tremendous, but two of them can share the cost and benefit from it. This is driving the industry together. The point of my question is, what is Canada doing to get some of the world car component parts business because the world car will be the volume car of the future? Can we get some of the component parts business? What can we get? In Burlington at the Oakville plant there is a very aggressive company called Tridon Limited. Tridon, after many years of research and development, is in the production of two very saleable items. One is a windshield wiper and the other is a flasher. It is selling that windshield wiper in 43 different countries in the world to original equipment manufacturers and to users as well.

The point is, what are the prospects for Canadian businessmen developing other products that could be used in world car production? This is the way we have to look. If we do not look at the world car market and try to get a piece of it, by the end of the decade our auto parts business will be simply non-existent.

A look at the auto parts industry in Canada will show that 70 per cent of the production facilities are subsidiaries of U.S. companies. Many of them have no sales force, and are really a manufacturing facility which builds on demand for the U.S. parent. I make no comment as to whether this is good or bad, only that it is hardly an atmosphere in which one could likely get component parts business for the world car market. We have had ample evidence from past history where development funds have been given to a company who has used those funds to develop a product, only to have the venture close down and production transferred to the foreign parent. I know we can all catalogue such cases.

I believe there is a place for Canadian components on the world car market. We have leverage because we have a good sized market of our own here. I believe we are the fifth or sixth largest user of Japanese automobiles. That is a sizeable market. We must not abandon this market or allow it to slip from our hands and go across the border in the reconstitution of the North American automobile industry.

We have heard very little, if anything, from the minister. He roars and he issues press releases which get headlines, but that is about all we see. All we have heard from the Washington talks is that the Americans feel it is not an opportune time to renegotiate the auto pact agreement. I believe that secretly industry, trade and commerce officials agree with that assessment. Fresh on the heels of press releases and headlines about a reduction in quotas of Japanese cars is a story that the Japanese will ask for a 5 to 8 per cent increase over last year. While the minister flops from one disaster to another, the opportunities of the world car slip from our hands forever. There is a market there. Tridon and others have proved it can be done.

● (2205)

I feel that this whole matter is lost in the depths of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and that we are only reacting to crises as they surface. The automobile industry contributes substantially to the economy of Canada.

I urge the minister to recognize the potential of the world car component parts business and to encourage and assist the automotive parts manufacturers to get a sizeable share for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the question of the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) who seldom has the opportunity of putting questions in his capacity as whip of the official opposition; we know his questions and interventions are always positive and serious.

[English]

In trying to reply to this question, I want to give the hon. member a little bit of history, about which he probably knows, but I want to put it on the record.

One major effect of the auto pact has been the rationalization of the industry resulting in its transformation from a basic domestic supplier to a North American one for both original equipment and replacement markets. That was to the benefit of Canadian industry.

In relation to manufacturing, the automotive parts industry consists of four types of companies: divisions of U.S. auto manufacturers; foreign-owned multinational divisions; Canadian-owned multinational companies; and wholly-owned Canadian companies.

In the first two groups, the disposition of funds rests largely in the U.S. to the extent that financial resources generated by U.S. branch plants cannot be regarded as always being available for use in Canada and in such activities as developing new markets, research and development, purchases of advanced equipment, or generally accommodating the Canadian operation to changing market conditions.

As the world car concept advances, rationalization on a world scale will affect various divisions of U.S. vehicle manufacturers. As an example, suspension components for the General Motors J-Car will be produced in only two GM plants in the world, one of which is located in Canada.

We recognize that a problem does exist with some U.S. auto parts manufacturers in Canada who have no Canadian domestic or export sales force and who carry out export functions through their U.S. head office. Indeed, there are successful Canadian-owned companies in the automotive sector which do not participate in the lucrative offshore markets.

Recently, a greater emphasis has been placed on investment in Canada by the department. A mission of Canadian automotive parts manufacturers visited Japan in March of this year to meet with Japanese companies interested in joint ventures or licensing agreements leading to production in Canada of automotive parts for Japanese vehicles. Comprising the mission were a number of Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. parents.

The mission was extremely useful from the point of view of interest generated and contact established, and negotiations are continuing.

I want to bring to the attention of the hon. member that in reply to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) about the increased importation of Japanese cars into Canada and the possible request for an increase in quota was that better and more participation of Canadian industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member's allotted time has expired.

EMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY RESPECTING INCREASE IN FUNDING OF COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on November 17, I asked a question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) concerning the community development program and whether additional funding could be provided to this program. Indeed, some time early in the new year, additional funding was provided to this program, at least in my constituency.

● (2210)

The arguments I want to put before the minister tonight relate to how the program will be carried out this coming fall because there has been a wide variation in the amount of funding over the past three or four years. In the year 1980-81, under this program $376,373 was provided to the constituency of Algoma. When the Conservatives were in power in 1980, no funding was provided under the Canada Works program. In the year 1978-79, my constituency received $1.5 million and in 1977-78, $1.8 million.

This program of employment during the winter months when there are high seasonal lay-offs is very important. It does not so much affect the communities in my constituency with a large industry such as a steel mill, a pulp and paper mill or a uranium mine, but it does affect the dozens of smaller villages, hamlets and rural townships throughout the vast area, some 400 miles in the Algoma-Manitoulin area.

Many of these communities have high seasonal lay-offs and the people are unable to find other work. Some must apply for unemployment insurance benefits or welfare. This is certainly true in the 12 Indian bands in the constituency.

My request to the minister tonight is that adequate funding be provided in the upcoming year for the community development program. Indeed, I hope there will be increased funding and that it will be targeted to the high unemployment areas of the country. Last year funding was provided right across the country, $100,000 to every constitutency whether it was needed or not. I feel that the program operated in 1978-79 which was targeted to the high unemployment areas was much more useful and beneficial.

It is important to note that over the past four or five years of this program the department has developed an excellent staff of young people who are dedicated, helpful and imaginative. They have developed a lot of expertise at operating direct employment programs. These people are available. There is a certain amount of additional overhead by having capable, competent staff like that, but it really pays off in value for the dollar spent. Often we are just displacing dollars that would be spent on welfare or unemployment insurance. People want to see value for the money spent for the work that is carried out.

I hope the minister will be successful when he puts this program before cabinet and that cabinet will hear these representations and will provide adequate funding for the community development program in the coming winter months. I hope the application forms will soon be made available in order that they can be processed over the summer months so that the projects can be approved, started on time and carried out during the winter months, providing much-needed employment in many of the slow growth areas of our country, at the same time carrying out very worth-while community projects, such as community halls, fire halls, and any number of other worth-while community projects carried out under this program over the last several years.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member in his question has acknowledged the extent of the response across the country to the Canada community development projects.

• (2215)

As the hon. member is aware, the government decided, immediately upon taking office, to initiate this direct job-creation program as a replacement for the Canada Works program which had been terminated by the previous government.

Through this program, $105.5 million was originally made available for the creation of jobs with a particular impact on the winter months of 1980-81. Early in this calendar year, an additional $4.5 million was made available to the program for the creation of additional employment opportunities. While these jobs were created across the country, they were concentrated in those areas and groups beset by high unemployment. As a result of this government's initiative, almost 20,000 people worked over the winter months who would otherwise have been unemployed. Some 60 per cent, or almost 12,000, of these persons are still working today.

EXCISE TAX—APPLICATION TO LIQUOR SALES—PURPOSE OF INDEXATION

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): I rise in respect of a question I addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on May 15, and I submit the answer given was not only unsatisfactory but, perhaps, by a sin of omission was misleading to the House. I am in the hands of the Chair in that regard, but I suggest the minister misled the House in saying that the excise tax on alcoholic beverages to the alcoholic beverages subgroup, having regard to the consumer price index sale, was not discriminatory. Specifically the minister stated that a different tax system, an ad valorem tax system, applied to other commodities. This suggests that although we are talking about two different and separate tax systems, the end result is the same. That suggestion is unmitigated nonsense and I am surprised it should come from the Minister of Finance.

Perhaps it is best that I begin by trying to distinguish between these two systems and establish what we are talking about when we refer to an ad valorem tax and indexation. An ad valorem tax simply establishes the tax percentage rate applicable to a particular commodity. It is voted on in Parliament and the taxation rate does not change unless Parliament changes it, either by way of increasing or decreasing it. As the value of that particular commodity changes, the amount of tax may change but the applicable percentage rate does not.

Indexation on the other hand, as it applies in this case to the consumer price index, represents an entirely new trend in taxation policy. It sets a precedent which I find reprehensible. The percentage rate of taxation is pegged to the consumer price index, meaning that the government's percentage of taxation increases at a rate equal to the change or the increase in the consumer price index. What makes this so disturbing is that the change in percentage, unlike an ad valorem tax, is accomplished without parliamentary approval.

With the definition of these terms somewhat clarified, I should like to again refer to my question to the minister, pointing out that it was based on fact. The indexation of the excise tax on alcoholic beverages is discriminatory. No other tax is based on the consumer price index, and if the minister honestly believes that the effect of this taxation will be the same as an ad valorem tax, I invite him to make it an ad valorem tax so that the taxes all fall within the same system.

Of course the reason this was not made an ad valorem tax is that these are different tax systems, and the net return from indexation of the tax to the consumer price index will be far greater with the increase in consumer price index than it would have been on an ad valorem basis. It is the government's greed which has singled out these industries for this kind of tax. It is an established fact that beer and wine sales are down. My expectation in this regard is that this decline in sales will continue as long as this government continues to burden industries with higher retail costs as a result of a higher form of taxation.

The consumer, already in a financial squeeze, will simply cut back his or her purchases of alcoholic beverages. To an already closely run industry, a further drop in sales could only have a disastrous effect. If the government does not care about the wine or beer industries in particular, then let me add that the government is actively promoting inflation and inflationary expectations by the application of this indexing method.

Canadians expect interest rates to go up every week. This proposed indexation will give them a second expectation, and that is that every three months the cost of alcoholic beverages as a result of the indexed tax will increase as well.

I ask the parliamentary secretary, or whoever is speaking tonight on behalf of the Minister of Finance: does the minister propose to extend this precedent to other commodities, just as I indicated he might be able to do—and he can do—as he has in connection with the beverages we are talking about this evening? If he does not propose to add a form of indexing to other commodities, then how can he justify this continued discrimination against the wine, beer and spirit industries, particularly in view of the fact that they are now facing undue hardships?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) sought an explanation of the taxes on alcoholic beverages in his questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on May 15, 1981.

The Excise Act and the Excise Tax Act impose commodity taxes on most goods imported into or manufactured in Canada. The great majority of these taxes are ad valorem levies; that is to say, they are expressed as a percentage on the sale price. The federal sales tax which is the main levy, is imposed at the rate of 9 per cent on most goods, except building materials, which are subject to a 5 per cent rate.

Since the federal sales tax is a percentage of the price, it automatically increases as prices increase. No special mechanism is required to achieve that relationship. Indeed, the system has functioned in that manner for more than 75 years.

However, in the case of alcoholic beverages and tobacco products the commodity tax levies are structured somewhat differently. The bulk of the taxes on these goods are not expressed as a percentage of the price. Rather, they are expressed as an amount per unit of product. To illustrate, the levy on spirits was $16.25 per proof gallon of alcohol, and the levy on beer was 42 cents per gallon. These specific levies were increased in April, 1980 to $17.15 per gallon for spirits and to 54 cents per gallon for beer.

In the absence of discreet changes in such specific levies on alcoholic beverages, their real value falls as prices rise. Even with the increase in April, 1980, the real value of taxes on these goods is less than it was in the late 1960s.

Federal revenues should keep up with the growth in prices of products, as do those provincial mark-ups which are expressed in percentage terms, and as does the general sales tax which is imposed on most goods as a percentage of value.

For these reasons, the government introduced a measure to adjust automatically the levies on alcoholic beverages in line with changes in prices. While this change does increase federal taxes on these products, it does not discriminate against beer, wines and spirits. Rather, it places the commodity tax levies on those goods on approximately the same basis as the commodity tax levies on all other goods.

SOCIAL SECURITY

NEEDS OF SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of there being 600,000 women in Canada who are over the age of 65 and who are single, widowed or divorced, and in view of the fact that 60 per cent of them are living in poverty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche):

That the government be condemned for its inability in dealing with the needs of Canada's senior citizens and that the government take positive steps in resolving this grave situation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE BY RAILWAY WORKERS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, a work stoppage by 200 rail workers in British Columbia is causing havoc with shipments of western grain. In Alberta there are 1,500 fully loaded railway cars sitting on sidings, some trains being a mile long, which cannot proceed to their destinations because of the tie-up. Canada's reputation as a reliable supplier of quality grain is being jeopardized.

I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the minister responsible for transport and the Wheat Board intervene personally to get this dispute settled and get western grain moving again to the markets of the world.

Madam Speaker: Is there unamimous consent for this motion?

ENERGY

NECESSITY FOR PRICING AGREEMENT WITH WESTERN PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, Madam Speaker. Given the fact that oil production cutbacks in western Canada, and more particularly in the Weyburn area by PanCanadian, an operator of the units of 65 companies, last week resulted in the cutback of 75 per cent of their production from some 480 producing wells for which they receive $17.75 a barrel at the wellhead while the government continues to pay $40 a barrel for offshore oil, and given the fact that the gasoline price at the gasoline pumps has increased in the last year by 50 cents a gallon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the Minister of Energy bring an end to the cold war between the east and the west which he has created and address the very serious situation, which is his responsibility, of a pricing agreement with the provinces of western Canada, which will allow western Canada to make its contribution to the energy of this great nation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ECONOMY

CONSEQUENCE TO CANADA OF UNITED STATES POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I stand under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recognizing that the prime rate last week in West Germany was 13.8 per cent, in the United Kingdom 13 per cent, in The Netherlands 12 per cent, and in Switzerland and Japan was 6.5 per cent, and recognizing that there is not a mass flow of capital out of these countries into the United States with its prime rate of 20.5 per cent, and recognizing that the government says Canada must tie its rate to that of the United States of America I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House request the Minister of Finance to admit to the Canadian people that the policies of this and former federal governments have relegated our country to the status of a 51st state.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

TOURISM

NEED FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of some urgency. Statistics Canada has reported that the tourist deficit in this country for the first three months of this year was almost $1 billion, which was almost the same figure as for the same quarter of last year. In light of the potential of the tourist industry to assist in generating extra income for all sectors of the economy, and because in addition to ignoring this potential the government has placed the entire industry in jeopardy as a result of high interest rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the government cease its imitation of the Peace Tower clock and start working again to get the mechanism of the economy moving forward.

This government should stop talking and start ticking.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

WILLIAM HAMILTON MERRITT

SUGGESTED TRIBUTE TO BUILDER OF WELLAND CANAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a motion which I am sure will receive the unanimous consent of the House. Last century there was a man who had a dream and who had the courage and determination to bring that dream to life. The man was William Hamilton Merritt, and his dream was the Welland ship canal, which is now an integral part of the St. Lawrence Seaway. In order to honour the memory of the man who brought the Welland Canal into being, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House agree that consideration should be given by the Canadian Coast Guard to naming a vessel The William Hamilton Merritt.

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS RENEGOTIATING MORTGAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Some years ago the government encouraged home ownership through the AHOP program. Today, because of its calamitous interest rate policy, the same government is threatening to deprive hundreds of their homes due to the necessity of remortgaging at 18 per cent, 19 per cent and more. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That the government institute a six-month freeze on remortgaging in cases where the new interest rates will consume in excess of 30 per cent of the family income for house payments and, failing that, the government extend the subsidy, without ceiling, to the same hardship group.

SMALL BUSINESS

SUGGESTED RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Despite the fact that our small business community makes a tremendous contribution to the economic well-being of the country, is our number one creator of new and productive jobs, and is innovative and counterinflationary, the Liberal government has refused to recognize the devastating effects its misguided budgetary policies and high interests are having on this vital sector and, in turn, on the country as a whole. Because of the fact that our party can be singularly credited for forcing into effect those assistance programs which do exist, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, who obviously does not have the attention of his senior colleagues in the cabinet, cross the floor of this House and join the ranks of the Progressive Conservative party where he will be able more effectively to exercise his responsibilities.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas pensioners are among those who suffer most from the impact of high inflation which, under this government's management, has reached the ridiculous rate of 13 per cent, and whereas the government's policy of indexing the Canada Pension Plan on a yearly basis causes a loss to pensioners, due to inflation, of over 6 per cent of their yearly pensions, or about one month's rent every year—a loss they can ill afford—I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government immediately institute a policy of indexing the CPP on a quarterly basis to ensure that Canadian pensioners do not suffer needlessly because of the government's mismanagement of the economy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

PUBLICATION OF URANIUM MARKETING INQUIRY FINDINGS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): In the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I would like to put my question to the Prime Minister who confirmed yesterday that the inquiry into the uranium cartel is now complete.

As the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs stated on March 4 in this House that when the inquiry was completed the director's findings would be made public, and as in 1977, when the inquiry was commissioned, the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs also said that the findings of the inquiry would be made public, would the Prime Minister now inform us when he intends to make these findings public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, it would not be for me to set the date, Madam Speaker. If the minister gave that undertaking I will consult with him and see what his intentions are. The competition bureau, as I said yesterday, has referred the matter to the attorney general, and of course if he decides to lay charges the whole matter will become public in court.

POSITION OF FORMER MINISTERS—APPOINTMENT OF LEGAL COUNSEL

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, again in the absence this time of the Minister of Justice perhaps I could put my follow-up question to the Prime Minister. Is the government presently retaining independent counsel for certain former ministers, deputy ministers and other civil servants who had some involvement with respect to the uranium cartel? Namely, are you presently retaining counsel for certain former ministers such as Mr. Macdonald or Mr. Gillespie?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Madam Speaker, if he is referring to the matter of the report of the competition bureau. If, however, the hon. member is referring to actions taken in the United States courts which attempted to summon Canadian ministers before those courts, I do recollect some years ago that the Department of Justice was authorized to provide advice to a former minister which, as of course the hon. member would recognize, is very proper.

IMPACT OF CARTEL ON CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I would suggest that the Prime Minister might check his records and perhaps report later in the day to the House concerning whether such independent counsel have in fact been appointed and are still being retained by the government on behalf of certain ministers and civil servants in connection with the uranium cartel combines investigation in Canada.

As my final question, would the Prime Minister indicate, since he sanctioned the various orders in council and regulations, and took other steps with respect to the activities of the uranium producers, including Crown corporations, during the period 1972 through 1978, whether he was ever aware of the implications such a cartel had for Canadian consumers, in short, that the price rigging, quota setting and other activities of this cartel were having an impact on Canadian consumers, and not only at present but in the future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday in an answer to the House, the intent of these regulations was quite clear. It was to protect Canadian citizens and corporations from the extraterritorial effect of U.S. law. That was the intent of the regulations. If the competition bureau has uncovered anything which is otherwise illegal, then I imagine they will be reporting it and it will be in the hands of the attorney general. This I do not know.

Mr. Stevens: Let us see the report.

Mr. Trudeau: However, I made it quite clear that the intent of the regulations was to protect the Canadian uranium industry, and not in any sense to put pressure on the Canadian consumer. On the contrary, it was to keep alive a Canadian industry which was being very severely discriminated against by United States regulations respecting the free entry of Canadian products into their market.

JUSTIFICATION OF MARKETING PRACTICES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. It is clear that the methods of marketing utilized by the uranium cartel involved a scheme of bid rigging, and what happened is that there would be a true bidder designated by a secretariat in Paris, and a secondary sham bid. Senior Canadian officials participated in establishing the rules of the cartel, and the cabinet over which the Prime Minister presided implemented the regulations which gave effect to these artificially high prices. In light of this fact, how does the Prime Minister justify the marketing? Is it not just plain cheating and fraud on the purchasers of uranium?

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, this matter came before the House in great detail during past years. The situation is still exactly the same. I do not know why the opposition chooses to deny the fact that the American industry used American law in order to protect that American industry from international competition, against the rules of GATT and of free trade.

Canada, along with several other countries producing uranium, took protective measures. We found it was our duty; we still believe it was our duty. I am surprised we do not have the support of the opposition to protect Canadian producers and workers against discriminatory measures taken in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has just said that any means justifies the end.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

QUERY RESPECTING LEGAL OPINIONS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Does any letter of opinion or any indication exist within the Department of Justice which would immunize against prosecution any firms that were members of the cartel? Does the Minister of Justice have an independent legal opinion, in light of the potential conflict of interest his department might be in, in circumstances which might prove that there will be a prosecution in the offing?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I just received a report from the investigation and research branch. We are studying the report at this time. When we are ready to decide whether or not we have to prosecute, we will decide it. I will try to act as quickly as possible. If I feel there is some difficulty for me in making up my mind about this problem, of course I will be happy to seek some outside opinion. But in the last analysis the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada will have to make the decision.

THE ECONOMY

VIEW OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA ON FULL EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It concerns the evidence given yesterday to the Senate Committee on National Finance by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Gerald Bouey. Governor Bouey indicated to the committee that he felt the Canadian economy was working at virtually full capacity, and that unemployment was still too low. He described the labour markets as being very tight in Canada.

Does the Prime Minister regard an economy which is working at around 80 per cent capacity as being full capacity? Does he share the view of the Governor of the Bank of Canada that unemployment right now is too low in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I read hastily the statement prepared by Governor Bouey. I saw nowhere in it that he indicated unemployment was too low. If the hon. member has a quote, I would stand corrected, but I have not seen any such words from the mouth of the governor. Perhaps the hon. member read them in the press, but I do not believe he heard them from the governor.

As to operating near capacity, the hon. member knows the figures. In the last quarter of last year the economy was operating at a real growth rate of 8 per cent on a real basis. In this first quarter it is 6 per cent on a yearly basis. We do not know if these trends will continue. We do know they are very high growth rates, indeed very much higher than the growth rates in other industrialized countries. These growth rates have caused a fall in unemployment rates, not a rise.

GOVERNMENT'S VIEW ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, when the transcript of the evidence of Governor Bouey is available, I think it will indicate that the governor said the labour markets were tight and that the economy needed to produce more slack before he felt the war on inflation would be won. In that light I would like to ask the Prime Minister, since we now have over 900,000 unemployed soldiers in the trench war on inflation and like some First World War general, Governor Bouey is saying, "Let us send another half million into the trenches in order to fight inflation", if it is his view, and the view of his government, that unemployment should increase. If that is the view, how high should unemployment go? Is the Prime Minister prepared to accept the policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in this regard, and will he come clean with the Canadian people and say just how much unemployment he thinks is necessary in order to fight this useless trench war against inflation?

● (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks if it is the view of the government or of the Governor of the Bank of Canada that unemployment should be higher. It is certainly not the view of the government, and I just challenged the hon. member to indicate where the governor had ever used such words. The hon. member tells me that when the transcript is available we will see. I suggest that the hon. member should come clean and tell us now that he is only fantasizing from headlines and not from words which were actually spoken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is an expert on fantasizing. I simply indicate to him that when the Governor of the Bank of Canada states that in his view labour markets are very tight and the economy is working at capacity, that means he thinks we have to reduce capacity in order to fight inflation, which means he thinks a higher rate of unemployment is acceptable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: Among other things Governor Bouey also said he thought that the government had made a mistake and that he had made a mistake in reducing interest rates in the period between April and July of last year. Since the government took great credit for the fact that interest rates went down during that period, and since it was regarded as an act of deliberate policy—in fact part of the genius of the Minister of Finance—I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees with Governor Bouey that the government made a mistake in reducing interest rates at that time. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether it is his intention to reduce interest rates over time, or whether it is the intention of the government to maintain interest rates at the level which Governor Bouey again indicated yesterday he regarded as entirely acceptable and ones which were, in his view, necessary to carry out the policies of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would suggest that the genius of the Minister of Finance speaks for itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: As to carrying the responsibility for interest rates, every member of this House knows the rules. When interest rates go up, the government blames the opposition, and when they go down they just say it is chance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: That is the rule the hon. member follows, the rule every member follows.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: You have it topsy-turvy.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTORS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to praise the government, but in all justice I cannot do it.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Last Thursday the shareholders of the CDC met at Winnipeg to re-elect a board of directors and to have their annual meeting. The government nominated four directors to the board, led by Maurice Strong, the Prime Minister's pet fixer, and three other Liberals. Is it correct that the deputy minister of finance, Mr. Ian Stewart, met with the board of directors of CDC previous to the shareholders' meeting, and advised them that the government wanted two other directors appointed, Mr. Joel Bell, the vice-president of Petro-Canada, and Mr. David Beatty, a former partner of Mr. Jim Coutts in the firm of Canada Consulting, that these two gentlemen also had to be appointed or the government would vote its shares to dismiss all of the directors of CDC if they did not carry out the government's wishes? Is that correct?

It is obviously correct that the board refused, of course, this extraordinary and astounding threat, and that the government withdrew it just before the meeting. Can the Prime Minister confirm whether that in fact happened, and whether Mr. Stewart was authorized by the government to do those things?

Would the Prime Minister also explain the reasons for that kind of action, and would he agree to a public inquiry into the whole situation surrounding the Canada Development Corporation over the last month or so, its future direction, what will happen to the board of directors, or a reference to the House of Commons finance committee?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the little story of what happened in Winnipeg, I will inquire and will perhaps be able to inform the member of the opposition. As to the direction of the CDC, it is contained in the law which set it up. The CDC has certain goals and objectives which are set out in the law.

Mr. Andre: Does the law say all must be Liberal hacks?

Mr. Trudeau: The Minister of Finance made it quite clear that he had no intention of introducing any changes in that law. The whole action of the government, and I wish the hon. member would realize it, was intended to ensure that the major shareholder, the shareholder owning 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the equity, being the people of Canada, represented under the law by the Minister of Finance, had some say in the choosing of the chairman of that corporation. Once again I will challenge the hon. member, who seems to know a lot—

An hon. Member: What about the other two?

Mr. Trudeau: —about money-making, does the hon. member know of any corporation the major shareholder of which is not ever even consulted or informed on the naming of the chairman of the board? If he does, then I wonder how he made his money?

REPORTED THREAT TO DIRECTORS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): The Prime Minister fails to understand the seriousness of this situation, and he did not answer my question. Does the Prime Minister remember that in 1971 he gave a letter to Mr. Hampson, the president, and to the directors, as did his Minister of Finance in 1972, containing written assurances that the board of directors would be free of political intervention and would be permitted to exercise their business judgment as directors of the Canada Development Corporation, as was said in the debate when the bill went through this House? Does the Prime Minister remember that and, if he does, will he so state to this House? I happen to know this is correct, as I have checked it myself.

Did the government instruct the deputy minister of finance to go to Winnipeg and make a threat to fire the whole board of directors of Canada Development Corporation if they did not elect Joel Bell and David Beatty to the board of that company, together with the other four Liberals who had been proposed in accordance with section 40 earlier? Did that happen and, if so, why did it happen, and will he permit a public investigation of the whole situation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. Indeed the directors are expected to exercise their business judgment in matters of business. The law states as much. The undertaking we gave to the first directors named was to that effect, and nothing in the recent actions of the government indicates any intention to change that direction.

Mr. Crosbie: What about the threats that you made?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Madam Speaker, that the major shareholder considers that it is entitled to be informed about the choice of a director. I told about the choice of a chairman. I informed this House that the earlier chairman had been chosen with my knowledge and with information given to me. None of the directors found this scandalous, nor saw any reason to resign, nor indeed did the then opposition find any reason to complain. That is because in those days members sitting opposite knew something about how corporations operate and how shareholders' interests should be respected.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INDEPENDENCE OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is a supplementary to the preceding question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance. The government, by its hanky-panky in connection with putting its own appointees, Liberal supporters, on the board of directors, has put in jeopardy the investment of many pensioners and of other small investors and widows who invested in this corporation. The value of the shares has gone down. There has been interference by the government by virtue of its actions.

At the time this legislation was introduced, Mr. Benson, the then minister of finance and spokesman on behalf of the government, indicated that the Canada Development Corporation was "placed in the hands of a very independent board of directors because when social or political objectives intervene in business decisions, business judgment suffers". I ask the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that during the last election he stated that he wanted to convert the CDC into a PetroCan mould as a tool of government policy, whether he now renounces that position and will allow the board of directors to operate independently and choose their own directors as an independent corporation?

Mr. Andre: Come on, be honest. Admit you have changed.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think that is a preposterous suggestion that we put in jeopardy the investment of people because as major shareholders we want to have a say in the choice of the directors of a corporation and the choice of a chairman of a corporation. I repeat the challenge to the opposition. If they know of any shareholders in the private sector who, owning a majority of the shares of a company, are not interested or do not have a word to say in the choice of a chairman, I would like them to give some names today, tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. Andre: Are you going to interfere, or are you not going to interfere?

SUPPORT URGED FOR CORPORATION'S POLICIES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): The fact of the matter, and the Prime Minister knows it, is that his action and the action of his government in attempting to interfere with the operation of this business are in fact, a political ploy and have seriously impeded the corporation.

An hon. Member: Sell CDC. Sell your shares.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He has caused a substantial loss. It is contrary to the principles involved, and the fact is that it is a reflection on the way in which the corporation has operated in the past.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he will give a commitment, on behalf of those representatives of himself and the government, that they will give a full vote of confidence and will continue to support the successful policies which Mr. Hampson and the board of directors have demonstrated, up to this point.

Mr. Lalonde: We have appointed a board.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Quite honestly, Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is qualified to say how a Crown corporation should be run, let alone the CDC.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is not a Crown corporation.

Mr. Trudeau: We know from the hon. member that he tried to destroy Petro-Canada, so he obviously cannot have any understanding of the CDC.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

BANKS AND BANKING

PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would have addressed my questions to the Prime Minister, but his grasp of economics and his answers have deteriorated since the people dealt with him previously in May of 1979. I direct my question to the Minister of State for Finance. There was notice today that bank profits for the second quarter of this year are holding a very strong and, I would suggest, outrageous position. The president of the Bank of Nova Scotia has indicated that the reason for this very strong earning position is basically the high interest rate policy of the government and the high spreads of interest rates. Given that the Minister of Finance has said that he would keep a close eye on this trend and could not operate on a single quarter, and that these profits are maintaining a high role, would the government be prepared to put a special tax on bank windfall profits?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The question of bank profits has been raised a few times in the House and it has been linked as well to certain economic events. I would be tempted to give an example which I borrow from Plato. When Socrates would dip a stick into water and ask, "Is the stick straight?" people would answer, "No, it is bent since the water bends the stick." He would draw it out and say: "You were mistaken because you were looking at reality from too close a vantage point, the stick is really straight." I suggest the hon. member is making the same mistake. He is looking at reality from too close a vantage point, he lacks perspective to be able to judge the true profitability of banks. However, the Minister of Finance did indicate that he had asked his department to take a close look at the situation and that if abuses are uncovered he would take the necessary corrective measures.

[English]

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, if the point of the short story was that the Liberals then took the stick from Plato and jammed it up our nose, I think he is correct. The question would go a little further. Since it has been acknowledged by the banks that their strong earning position is coming from a very large spread in interest rates and the high interest rate policy of the government, since there has been a substantial and continuing profit, and since they put out a document of half truths and distortions, like Plato's stick, would the minister be prepared to recommend to the government that it refer the question of bank profits and this document to the committee on finance to examine the problem, if the government is unwilling to do anything about it?

● (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, a few days ago the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs had the opportunity of examining the estimates of the office of the Inspector General of Banks. The issue of bank profits was raised and I can only repeat to the hon. member that the close examination undertaken by the Minister of Finance will lead to certain measures if they are justified by the facts brought to his attention.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

THE DANGERS OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the minister is aware, there is an increasing amount of carefully researched medical evidence that marijuana, with its 60 psychoactive and biologically active chemical ingredients, is both physically and psychologically harmful. In particular, there is positive evidence that use of marijuana can and does produce brain dysfunction, significantly increases the risks of emphysema, chronic bronchitis, and lung cancer, and has a detrimental effect on hormone production. It is clear that these effects make the user dangerous, not only to himself or herself but to the community at large.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Madam Speaker: We are just about ready for the question.

Mr. Hudecki: In light of the above health considerations, and in light of the mounting advocacy by some members in this House and the press at large—

THE CONSTITUTION

GOVERNMENT'S POSITION ON SHARED COST PROGRAMS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Twice this past week the minister stated that if the Supreme Court declares that the federal government's constitutional package is illegal, the government will retaliate by applying the Constitution, in the minister's words, "to the letter", and will refuse to renegotiate federal-provincial agreements. Could the minister explain whether the government is threatening to withdraw its support from programs such as medical services and post-secondary education in Canada if the Supreme Court does not rule in its favour? Why does the minister make these idle threats—if they are idle—and why does he insist on attacking Canadians—old people, those who need medical help, and students who want to go to university?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the answer is very simple. I just said that there are two options. One is to start again after 54 years of negotiations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: —to go back and renegotiate, or to do what the hon. member from Halifax was asking the Prime Minister to do last week on the offshore, when he asked why we do not refer the case to the Supreme Court and let the Supreme Court decide. This is a very valid option because we have a Constitution and it is the prime law of the land. To say, as Minister of Justice, that this act can be respected and judged by the Supreme Court of Canada, makes no threat. It is a correct interpretation of the legal situation.

GOVERNMENT'S ROLE IN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement that he made on May 1 namely, "—some gestures toward conciliation certainly would be welcome on everybody's part", can he tell the House whether this is the government's new form of conciliation? Was the Minister of Justice speaking on behalf of the government when he said that if the government did not have its way with the Constitution it would use threats on programs that have been established for a long period of time? Is this the new method that the Prime Minister is going to use in federal-provincial negotiations should he not get his way?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is just showing that he did not listen to the answer given by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is very simple. We have been trying to change the Constitution by discussion over the past many years. We have always tried to seek agreement on modifications which were needed in the Constitution. We have tried to seek agreement on who would regulate and manage the offshore. This has been the procedure of this government. What the minister is saying is exactly what the hon. member's colleague from St. John's said a week ago—

Mr. Crosbie: Not from St. John's.

Mr. Trudeau: —I am sorry, from Halifax—

Mr. Crosbie: Right.

Mr. Trudeau: —said a week ago, "Why don't you refer the matter to the Supreme Court?" The Minister of Justice is saying that—if we cannot reach agreement with the provinces, it will be the Supreme Court which will have to decide where the law lies.

Miss MacDonald: That is not what he said.

AIR SAFETY

REFERENCE OF REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In about 15 minutes the minister will table the report of the commission of inquiry into air safety. Would he give the House a commitment now that when he tables that report he will, at the same time, refer it to the Standing Committee on Transport for deliberation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have not tabled it yet so it is a bit difficult to anticipate. My answer at the moment would be simply to say that the report I am going to table is Volume I of what will be a three-volume report. I would not know exactly what to refer. My hon. friend would probably like me to refer the whole subject. That would not be possible because I have only received the first of three reports. Be that as it may, I would think that some legislative action will follow the first of the reports, and consequently I would hope that there would be some interesting material for the permanent committee on transport to work on in the fall.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, if I may answer the minister's question, he can refer the first volume and the subject matter to the committee. Frankly, I think it is not good enough to wait until the fall. I ask the minister again if he will not refer the subject matter and Volume I to the Standing Committee on Transport, on which the government has a majority of members, so that it can deal with it in the next six or seven weeks before the recess and perhaps also through the summer. The subject matter is extremely important.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, everyone recognizes the importance of the subject, indeed. As I said, the first volume will most probably lead to legislative action. I would think this would be quite sufficient for the committee. If, as I expect—Mr. Justice Dubin is in the gallery and we salute him en passant—the other two volumes are in by the fall, then reference to the committee of legislative action on part of it, with the totality of the information in front of us, would be a very constructive way to proceed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POLICY OF CONTRACTING OUT PRODUCTION OF PROGRAMS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Communications concerns the CBC strike. NABET members are being told by their superiors that the federal government supports and endorses the CBC's determination to extend the practice of contracting out. Since the government is forever telling us, when questions are posed to it, that the CBC makes its own administrative decisions, may I ask if it is true that the government endorses contracting out at CBC?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, whenever there is a strike in the public service, as in the CBC, this is of course something that we deplore. We would like to see that strike settled as soon as possible. As far as the government is concerned, we would like to see the CBC produce a lot more Canadian programming. One of the ways suggested by CBC management is to have greater recourse to production through the private sector. In that sense, the government would like to see the CBC use its funds as effectively as possible to stimulate the development of a good Canadian program production industry.

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS TO END LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, it appears to me that the minister's answer is yes. This party also supports more Canadian programming, but we do not support union busting. It looks to me as if that is exactly what has happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: NABET people are also being told by their superiors that the CBC can manage without their services until the end of the summer and that the corporation is not interested in a settlement until September. May I ask the minister if that is true and if the government agrees with it?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is obviously raising a most interesting question. I am somewhat surprised to see members of the Conservative party applauding, since the member for Vancouver Centre not too long ago criticized the CBC for not devoting enough of its budget to the independent program production centre. Be that as it may, the hon. member does not seem to be aware of the fact that the CBC in its negotiations with the union has undertaken to guarantee that there will be no loss of jobs, and that the number of programs presently produced in-house by the CBC will not be diminished.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON ACTION TO COMBAT ACID RAIN

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. A front-page article in the Washington Post yesterday revealed the contents of a secret internal report of the U.S. environmental protection agency, which concluded that the United States government should take little action against acid rain until further research is done. How does the minister reconcile such a position, taken by the major agency in the U.S. government responsible for the environment, with what the minister has been telling Parliament, namely, that the United States government is eager to work closely with Canada to combat acid rain in both countries?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am always a bit skeptical as to the accuracy of the contents of leaked material. As the hon. member knows, I have had meetings with the Secretary of the Interior of the United States who has spoken to us very strongly of his desire to move. The administration has indicated it intends to begin formal negotiations on the treaty in the third week of June. The environmental protection agency administrator was confirmed in office just a few days ago, so I have not yet had a chance to meet her, but I expect to do that very shortly.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGAL ACTION AGAINST UNITED STATES INDUSTRIES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): The Minister of the Environment is practically the only person in all of North America who does not believe that Canada's negotiations with the Americans on acid rain are, in fact, in very deep trouble.

If the Canada-U.S. negotiations toward an accord on acid rain do not materialize, which seems to be the case, does the Canadian government have a contingency plan to deal with the problem? If so, what is that contingency plan? Does it include the possibility of the Canadian government actually taking legal steps against industries in the United States which pollute the Canadian environment?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): As I indicated, Madam Speaker, the administration is committed to beginning formal negotiations with us next month.

Miss MacDonald: When?

Mr. Roberts: In the third week of June. If the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands had listened to me yesterday and earlier today, she would have known that in the third week of June those negotiations are going to begin. I would hardly think it useful to assume immediately that these negotiations are going to fail and then describe what possible alternatives we might have in that situation. We have a commitment from the U.S. administration, we intend to pursue it, and I am confident we will make progress next month.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REPORTED THREAT OF DISMISSAL OF MEMBERS OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have some questions for the Prime Minister relating to the propriety of activities by governments under his leadership. The first relates to the Canada Development Corporation. The Prime Minister did not reply to the question put by my colleague from St. John's West. We would like a reply. First, we would like to know whether it is a fact that the deputy minister of finance went to Winnipeg and threatened the dismissal of members of the board of the Canada Development Corporation if they did not name the two Liberal nominees, Joel Bell and David Beatty. Second, we would like an undertaking from the Prime Minister that the whole question as to the future of the CDC and its treatment by this government will be referred to a committee of this House of Commons.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I answered the first question by saying that I did not know the answer but that I would inquire. I doubt very much if that is the case, but I will inquire.

Mr. Crosbie: It is the case.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member knows the answer, why does he ask?

Mr. Crosbie: We want you to find out and confirm it. You are the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, he can state his case, he has the floor every day in this House. He can make his case if he wants. I would say, so what?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: There was a second question, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister would probably say "so what" to the right of Parliament to inquire into the abuse of the Canada Development Corporation, just as he said "so what" to the idea of a deputy minister threatening members of the board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let this "so what" Prime Minister consult his memory, consult the record, and come back and answer the questions as to whether or not that threat was issued and whether or not there will be a willingness to refer the matter to a committee of this House.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

MARKETING OF URANIUM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I would now like to turn the Prime Minister's attention back some years, again on the question of the propriety of actions of his government, to the question and the time of the formation of the uranium cartel. The Prime Minister knows full well that there were diverse instruments available to the Government of Canada to protect the interests of Canadians at the time the cartel was formed. There was an instrument that was within the law, the establishment of a marketing board, and an instrument which was outside the law, the establishment of a cartel. Will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons why a government he led chose an instrument outside the law, the formation of a cartel, rather than choosing an instrument inside the law, the establishment of a marketing board?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the right hon. member is begging the question. He states that the forming of an international agreement is outside the law. I would challenge him on that, and I would say that it is not.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister is consistent in his refusal to respond today. We look forward to receiving the Bertrand report as to whether the matter is within the law.

QUERY RESPECTING EXISTENCE OF LEGAL OPINIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Let me go to another question that the Prime Minister did not answer when it was posed by my colleague from Cambridge, that is, whether there has been any commitment, opinion or undertaking by the Department of Justice or any other department or agency of the Government of Canada which would protect or shelter any Canadian company or any Canadian individual against prosecution for violation of the law of Canada in relation to matters covered by the uranium cartel.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I can only say I know of none, but I indicated that the whole purpose of the legislation was to protect Canadians from the application of the law of the United States. Returning to the earlier question, I ask the hon. member does he know what law would prevent Canada from entering into an international agreement on trade? There is obviously no such law. He knows that. He is just trying to mount a case against the government, spuriously, as he always does.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INSPECTION OF RETAIL SCALES—LACK OF DEPARTMENTAL MANPOWER

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister, whomever he or she is. The government will know that a senior official in the weights and measures branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has publicly stated that federal inspection of retail scales has been carried out on only half of the 600,000 measuring devices in the country in the past year because of the tremendous workload and understaffing. Will the consumer and corporate affairs ministry consider reallocating its existing resources to enable the weights and measures branch to increase the number of inspectors so that retail scales may be more efficiently regulated, and so that consumers will run the least possible risk of rip-offs?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and his concern. I want to assure him that the government is always reviewing the nature and adequacy of its weights and measures program in terms of problems in the marketplace, as the hon. member indicated. Of late, as he can well imagine, technological change has been presenting additional challenges. Solutions being employed at the present time include changes in inspection techniques and strategies, and also include assessment of resource needs. He can be assured that the government will continue to take appropriate action to ensure that Canadian buyers and sellers benefit from accurate measurements.

ACCURACY OF SCALES CONVERTED TO METRIC MEASUREMENT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I can imagine that the words technological change largely mean conversion of scales to metric. That will mean that the weights and measures branch will have a very real and even more desperate need for manpower. What assurances can the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs give this House and the consumers of Canada that these scales that are being converted to metric will indeed be checked for their accuracy, as Canadians may run the very real risk of some businesses accidentally or deliberately cheating people as we are being forced to understand metric measurement?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): In reply to the hon. member, Madam Speaker, I would tell him categorically that we will take every precaution to see that the consumers of Canada are given a fair shake when this change takes place.

Oral Questions

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

PUBLICATION OF BERTRAND REPORT

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is supplementary to questions asked earlier with respect to the cartel. The Prime Minister has given an opinion to the House of Commons that a cartel is not illegal. That is his opinion. If he is not giving that opinion, there remains a question outstanding in the Prime Minister's mind in respect of the legality of a cartel. The Bertrand report obviously deals with a cartel and the question of illegality. In view of what has occurred today, and in view of the position in which the House now finds itself, will the Prime Minister undertake immediately the release of the Bertrand report, because it obviously has some effect upon the combines law of Canada, one way or another, and I think it is time the House had that matter before it as quickly as possible.

● (1500)

Mr. Nielsen: You promised to do it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must clear up the confusion in the hon. member's mind. I did not say a cartel was not illegal.

An hon. Member: It is not illegal?

Mr. Trudeau: I said that an international agreement entered into by Canada and other countries relative to trade, is not illegal. That is what I said and it is as simple as that. I do not see why the hon. member is attempting to distort my words.

An hon. Member: With a domestic implication?

Mr. Trudeau: He asks about the report. I would point out to him that under the law, as voted by this Parliament, these inquiries must be conducted in secret, and Section 27 makes it quite clear that it is then, after being conducted in secret, handed to the Attorney General of Canada for a judgment by the Attorney General as to whether there are any illegalities in the report. If there are, the matter ends up in front of the courts, and then the matter becomes public. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think the Prime Minister and the government have suddenly changed their position. On March 4, 1981, the minister said in answer to a question in the House of Commons, as reported at page 7878 of Hansard:

> In relation to the second question of the hon. member regarding the uranium inquiry, this inquiry by the director is not completed. Obviously, when it has been completed, his findings will be made public.

It would be made available by the government, of course, which follows from that implication, and not as a result of court action. Will the Prime Minister live up to that undertaking by his minister, and will he tell us, however this is described, as an international agreement, a cartel or however, how such an agreement which has domestic implications, which has to be so in order to contravene the combines act, could possibly be legal, and given the questions that arise therefrom will the Prime Minister reconsider this change in the position on the part of his government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, again I will attempt to clarify the situation. An international agreement made between various countries on restraining trade is not illegal in Canada. Once again I challenge any lawyer to tell me the contrary. After that agreement is set up it is possible that the people who operate under that agreement—

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, blame them now.

Mr. Trudeau: Blame them? Will the member suggest who we are going to blame, the government of France or the government of South Africa?

Mr. Crosbie: The Government of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know what he is driving at.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I cannot answer all the questions at the same time. If I have one at a time I will answer them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—LETTER WRITTEN BY MR. AXWORTHY RESPECTING CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, this question of privilege has to do with a letter that was sent by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to the member of Parliament for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), which letter subsequently came into my possession and the possession of other members of this House. It involves a written misleading and false reply contained in that letter. I have to give Your Honour some background first.

Last summer of 1980 the government announced the Canada community development projects program for 1980-81. The total funding for that program for all of Canada was $105.5 million. The amount of the funding for the province of Newfoundland was $17.376 million and the funding was supposed to be spent in accordance with the level of unemployment in various areas of Canada.

Under that program the deadline for projects to be submitted if they were to receive approval for funding was September 29, 1980. If you put in an application from any district of the country after that date, under the guidelines sent out by the minister and his department it could not be considered for funding after that date. I will come back to the importance of that date in a few moments. As a matter of fact, I know of projects that were submitted two days after September 29, 1980 which the minister's office rejected and said could not be processed because they were late and outside the guidelines.

It was also part of the guidelines for the program that projects had to start by February 2, 1981. The guidelines were sent to every member of Parliament and widely publicized across the whole country.

During October, 1980, in Newfoundland the provincial boy scouts' council requested the seven members of Parliament for Newfoundland to allocate some of the funds for their districts to a project for the boy scouts that was going to be constructed in the district of Gander-Twillingate. The basis of their appeal was that this facility would benefit boy scouts all over Newfoundland and they needed the help of the MPs from all over Newfoundland to fund that project.

As a result I, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Rooney), the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) and the minister for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) agreed to allocate $25,000 each from funds allocated to their districts to build this project in the district of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. The project was a project of the provincial boy scouts council.

On October 23, for example, I received a letter from the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate thanking me for that co-operation. One Newfoundland member did not contribute, the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin).

In the fall or early winter of 1981 $2 million in additional funds were made available to the minister to spend on this program in whatever way he liked, in whatever political way he wished. A few weeks later, in February 1981, a further $4.9 million was made available secretly by the government to the minister to spend across Canada on these projects.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I want to ask the hon. member to please come very soon to the matter which is the basis of his question of privilege. He is giving me a lot of information about what those guidelines were. I do not know for what reason he is referring to them. I do not know yet why the guidelines are important or why it is important to read them out to the House. I would ask him to come very soon to the matter of the question of privilege, otherwise I will interrupt him.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the relevance of all this will very soon become apparent.

There was $4.9 million made available, unknown to ordinary Canadians and members, in additional funding for this program for the minister to spend at his discretion. The minister decided to allocate $275,000 of that funding for the province of Newfoundland. Now I am coming to the relevancy and you will see that all this is relevant, Madam Speaker.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate apparently did not hear of any money being made available for his district, so he wrote the Minister of Employment and Immigration on February 26 asking whether additional funds were to be allocated to Gander-Twillingate under this program. The minister answered him in a letter dated April 14, 1981. In the meantime, of the $275,000 allocated for Newfoundland the minister made $150,000 available to the district of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador for a 1982 Winter Games Association, Incorprated project 2855 MA9 submitted by the people of Labrador City-Wabush and signed by one Gordon Manstan. The application from that group was dated February 5, 1981. It was received by the department February 23, 1981, five months late—five months after the deadline for that project. Despite violating all these guidelines the Minister of Employment and Immigration allocated $150,000 to his colleague the Minister of National Revenue, for a project that did not meet the guidelines of the program at all. It may be a good project, but it should be funded from sports and recreation, or wherever, not in violation of the employment program.

• (1510)

In this letter, and I have a copy in my hand now, from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to his Liberal colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), he is responding to a letter of February 26. He tells him that his constituency received an allocation of $3 million originally, and then he goes on to say this in the third paragraph:

> Federal constituencies in Newfoundland received $275,000 of the incremental funds which were distributed amongst the five constituencies which had transferred a portion of their initial allocations to your constituency.

There is not a word of truth in that paragraph because in the district of St. John's West not one cent was received of the $275,000 incremental funds to repay St. John's West for the contribution of $25,000 to the member of Parliament for Gander-Twillingate's boy scouts project. Not a cent of those funds went to the district represented in this House by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). Whether any of the other three districts got anything, I do not know, and no funding went to Gander-Twillingate. So, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Can the hon. member confirm something for me? I suspect he is now telling me that the basis of his question of privilege is that some members did not receive funds to which they felt they would be entitled or that funds were allocated while not following the guidelines which had been set forward by the minister. Is that what the hon. member's question of privilege is all about?

Mr. Crosbie: No, Madam Speaker, it is not about that at all. My question of privilege has to do with a letter sent by a minister to a member of Parliament which contains false and misleading information and which, therefore, interfered with and breached his privileges as a member of this House, breached the privileges of this House generally and that of every other member who was sent a copy of the letter. It has no connection with the violating of the guidelines of the program.

I am giving the background so that this letter can be understood, and this is based on a precedent of this House to which I will come in a few minutes and in which a prima facie case of privilege was found by Mr. Speaker Jerome in 1978.

Just to finish this background, how did the hon. member for St. John's West get a copy of this letter containing false and misleading information from the Minister of Employment and Immigration? A copy was sent to me by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate with a note dated April 16 which reads as follows:

John,

As you can see by the attached letter your constituency received an additional amount of money to compensate for your constituency contribution to the boy scout camp.

Congratulations!

The hon. member was congratulating me for receiving this additional funding. He was pleased to see that I got this additional funding for making $25,000 available to the district of Gander-Twillingate during the fall.

What is the nature of the complaint? The outline of the facts here shows, of course, that the program was violated. The guidelines were ignored by one cabinet minister listening to a supplication from another cabinet minister. Dozens of projects were turned down as being late. Five months later one was allowed, and $150,000 went to it, although it did not meet the guidelines of the program at all. That was to the detriment of many dozens of other projects submitted in Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and all over Newfoundland, but that is not the complaint. The complaint is that the minister, having done that, wrote a letter to a member of Parliament, a colleague of his in his own party, and deliberately gave him wrong information.

An hon. Member: False information.

Mr. Crosbie: False information. In other words, he was saying to the member of Parliament for Gander-Twillingate, "You didn't get any of this $275,000 because I took that $275,000 for Newfoundland and repaid the five districts that helped you out in your boy scouts project." That is what the program means. We have two members in this House who can testify to the falseness of that information, and the minister had to know it was false.

What about the precedents? I have a motion here that I am ready to move. I am fully aware that the function of the Speaker is to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege or not, and if she finds that, the matter then has to be debated and voted on by the House.

I want to refer Your Honour to a recent precedent. If you look at Hansard for November 3, 1978 at page 777, you will see a similar kind of complaint made by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). There was a letter from a minister of the Crown which misled the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland several years earlier. It was not even in the same year; it was in a different Parliament. The minister of the Crown had sent him a letter with misleading and false information and, in turn, the hon. member for that district had misled his constituent. There was a written misleading and false reply sent to that member which directly affected his capabilities and attitudes in the House with respect to his duties as a member of Parliament.

This program is one of the more important programs, I can assure you, in Atlantic Canada where employment is very, very badly needed and where there are thousands and thousands of projects put forward by communities and groups. Nothing could be more important in creating employment in our rural areas. Yet we were given misleading and false replies by the minister as to how the funds were being spent.

As it was said then, and I repeat now, I should be able as a member of Parliament, as should the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, both in and out of this House, to trust the word of a minister of the Crown. Surely if a minister writes us a letter stating that certain things have happened and that certain funds have been distributed in a certain way, we are expected to trust his word as a member of Parliament and minister of the Crown. If we cannot trust his word, the whole system collapses. That is what affects the privileges of this House and members of Parliament. We should be able to trust the word of such members.

I will not read long citations from May. I presume Your Honour will be looking them up because this is a very serious question of privilege. The nineteenth edition of May at page 67 deals with what constitutes privilege:

The distinctive mark of a privilege is its ancillary character. The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its members; and by each House for the protection of its members and the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

We as members need to be protected from any suggestion or any possibility that other members of this House or ministers of the Crown will deliberately mislead us. If we do not have that kind of assurance and if we cannot be absolutely sure of that, then this whole system of Parliament founders.

I want to refer Your Honour to page 141, which deals with acts or conduct constituting a contempt of Parliament and an abuse of our rights:

It is a breach of privilege to present or cause to be presented to either House or to committees of either House forged, falsified or fabricated documents with intent to deceive such House or committees or to subscribe the names of other persons or fictitious names to documents—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe those quotations are not very relevant. I ask the hon. member to concentrate his argument on something else. When he quotes May, he is speaking of conduct of ministers or statements of ministers which would impede members in the House. Up until now the hon. member has spoken of nothing that happened in the House, but of a letter which was written to another member of Parliament in which some information, the hon. member alleges, was false. Up until now the hon. member has not indicated to me how his function in the House has been impeded by the fact that a particular letter was written.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, if I might just make one further point, how have my actions in the House been impeded as a result of receiving this false information? Every member of this House is involved in carrying out, supervision of and checking upon public programs. This is a public program that took place in Newfoundland. I have the right to come here to this House and criticize how the program is administered. I have the right to go to committees on the estimates and to ask questions on how it is being administered and whether it meets the guidelines.

Madam Speaker: Yes, the hon. member has that right, and that is what he should do, but he should not raise a question of privilege about it. Of course the hon. member has the right to criticize actions of ministers or the government and to ask questions about what a particular minister has done, about which the hon. member might have a grievance. I have heard the hon. member for more than 15 minutes and I must interrupt him now, because if he has not proved to me in the course of 15 minutes that he has a question of privilege, I do not think he will be able to do so in the next five minutes.

The letter and the precedent to which he alludes are quite different. That precedent has to do with a letter which had been improperly drafted by the RCMP and which they admitted had been improperly drafted, and which probably allegedly impeded the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) in performing his duties in the House. So that precedent does not apply; it is a completely different type of letter.

● (1520)

The hon. member probably has a grievance, he wants to levy some kind of criticism of the minister in question and he is quite entitled to do that, but not under the guise of a question of privilege. I must therefore rule that he does not have a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Crosbie: There is a precedent of your predecessor but I am not even allowed to quote the precedent?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: A minister can lie to a member of Parliament and it is not a question of privilege?

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: Order yourself.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has quoted a precedent, the contents of which have been communicated to me by the Table. I said the precedent was not applicable and I do not think the hon. member can contest that. In any event, in the course of his more than 15-minute intervention he has not indicated to me that he had a prima facie case. I have now ruled on that and I am afraid that I will not be able to hear the hon. member further.

Mr. Crosbie: I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: On a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Just before I hear the hon. member's point of order. I just want to warn him that he cannot now transform his question of privilege into a point of order, because I will not hear him. If he has another point of order and it does not refer to my ruling, I will hear him.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my point of order refers to the fact that when a similar question of privilege was raised in 1978 the member was given a good 30 to 40 minutes to explain and cite the precedents.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: That was a question of privilege on exactly the same point.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That might be true, and in some cases I have allowed longer interventions on questions of privilege feeling that I needed further information; but in the course of the hon. member's 15 minutes, and after my repeated requests to the hon. member to be more precise on what exactly was the basis of his question of privilege, he did not come up with anything that convinced me there was a question of privilege. Therefore, I must tell him that I can hear him no further on that particular question of privilege.

Mr. Crosbie: The judgments of your predecessor do not matter to you.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps you could assist me because I am involved in the same question of privilege and I had hoped to be able to make an intervention, to be able to give arguments in support of the arguments put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I think it is an important matter, but obviously I am not permitted to present that argument now because Your Honour has in fact ruled. How can I then raise it? Do I raise it as a grievance or as a—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have ruled on it. I have ruled that there is not—

Mr. Crosbie: The minister is a liar, a damned liar.

Madam Speaker: —a prima facie case of privilege. The hon. member did say that he wanted to speak on the same question of privilege. I have ruled that there is no question of privilege. If the hon. member had another question of privilege not related to that one, I can hear him at another time but not today. I have ruled on it and I cannot hear the hon. member.

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, is this a point of order?

Mr. Rompkey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My question is really the same as that of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I had also hoped to make an intervention on the same question of privilege—

Madam Speaker: Yes, but the hon. minister, I am afraid, is out of order as well.

MR. McKINNON—ALLEGED ATTEMPT TO ALTER RECORD OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege, I am thankful to say, is not on the same point although the similarity of what I am complaining about will be clear.

I delivered this morning to your office, Madam Speaker, a statement of my question of privilege and I intend now to speak to you and the House on it in order to enlarge somewhat on my question of privilege. It involves an attempt to change the wording in the minutes that reflect what happened in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

At a meeting of that committee on May 14, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) gave an opening statement of which he appeared to be reading part and ad libbing part. He did not circulate a copy of the text from which he was reading although he did at a later meeting circulate a copy of a NATO press release.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am very sorry but the hon. member's question of privilege relates to deliberations which took place in a standing committee. The hon. member knows that deliberations taking place there cannot be dealt with in the House until such time as the committee reports back to the House. Therefore, I am afraid I have to advise him that the place to deal with his particular question of privilege would be in the standing committee and not in the House.

Mr. McKinnon: There are two points I would like to make on that, Madam Speaker. First, I know of no method whereby the chairman of the standing committee could refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Second, part of the offence did take place in this House on May 20 when the minister misled the House during part of the same nefarious conduct that I am complaining about. I was hindered in my duties as a member of Parliament by a misleading and untrue statement that he made in the first part of his answer to my first question that day.

Now, if I may proceed, Madam Speaker? When speaking of possible NATO commitments outside of the recognized NATO boundaries, the minister said:

> Canada has made a new commitment to deploy its NATO forces outside the normal NATO treaty area.

I was rather surprised and said that I hoped the minutes of the committee would reflect his ad libs as well as his written statement. On May 15 the unedited transcript of the minutes were sent to my office and it confirmed the remarks that I heard, which were:

> Canada has made a new commitment to deploy its NATO forces outside the normal NATO treaty area.

In the second meeting of the same committee the minister, in reply to questions from two Liberal MPs, said there was no new commitment. I assume that he was contradicting himself as he sometimes does. He made no comment that his remarks of May 14 were in error.

Madam Speaker: I must warn the hon. member that I can only listen to what happened in the House. It is quite clear to me that the hon. member is referring to an incident in the standing committee. It is true that the matter came back in the House on May 20, and I now have in front of me the answer given by the minister in the House. Therefore, the hon. member is discussing that aspect of the question he is raising now; but if he has a question of privilege arising from the deliberations of that day, that is to say May 20, that was the time to raise it. Furthermore, if he is not satisfied with an answer that a minister has given in the House, no matter in what way he is not satisfied, it does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I thank you for your advice, which I will try to follow and restrict myself to what happened on May 20. I will ignore from now on my allegation and contention that he has tampered with the record of the proceedings in a committee, which he certainly has done. As he said at that time—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member alleges that some minister has tampered with the proceedings of a committee, as he is now doing, that he must do in the committee. Now, the hon. member asks how that can be dealt with because that committee does not have the authority to refer the matter to another standing committee.

● (1530)

The procedure would be that if the standing committee found the minister had tampered—allegedly tampered—or had done whatever the hon. member says he has done, the committee would report such action to the House. Then the House would be able to deal with it by referring it to another committee in order for the committee to pronounce on that particular action. This would be the procedure, and this is the way to deal with that kind of matter.

If the hon. member can state his case without arguing that he is not satisfied with the answer given the House, I can hear him.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, thank you for your guidance. Fortunately, that committee will meet one more time before it finishes the estimates. I will certainly attend it to lodge my complaint and see how it goes.

However, the second part of my complaint is that in the House on May 20 the Minister of National Defence said in part:

> At the time I read the statement at the SCEAND on May 14, I said that Canada had made no new commitment to deploy its NATO force outside the normal NATO Treaty area.

This is misleading and untrue. I understand that anybody who makes misleading and untrue statements in the House is interfering with the privileges of members. Certainly it interfered with my privileges. I spent hours on this during the rest of the week. I was hindered in that question period by following up with the question I had intended to raise, and I was impeded in my duties as a member of Parliament for several days afterward trying to track down actually what the minister had said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: In view of that and the curtailment Your Honour put on the rest of my point, which I will defer, as you suggested, to the committee, I would like to move, subject to Your Honour finding there has been a prima facie case in this instance of the minister's misleading myself and the House, that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for an investigation and a recommendation.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member would like me to be the judge—

Mr. Nielsen: A member wants to be heard.

Mr. Chas L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I would like to intervene along the lines you have suggested on this question of privilege to submit that there is no question of privilege as far as the House of Commons is concerned. As far as the committee is concerned, we debated this matter yesterday and we will do it again.

In the House of Commons, as the hon. member quite correctly quoted, the minister said that he had made no new commitment. This is consistent with the quotation he read and with what the minister said in the House. Therefore, I submit that there is no question of privilege; there is no contradiction. The minister said in the House what the member just repeated by reading from the transcript. Therefore, there is no discrepancy in the statement made by the minister in the House.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I happen to know that you have in front of you a very complete treatment of this matter by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). It amounts to a three-page letter of notice which alleges a number of things. Among them is what the hon. member has attempted to allege about something which occurred in the committee that Your Honour has said strictly and narrowly cannot be dealt with in the House. Also there is an allegation of something that occurred in the House of Commons to which he has been able to speak. This indicates clearly, whether or not he knew it or for whatever reason, that the House and the hon. member was misled by the answer of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne). Those are the two things Your Honour has.

The third thing you have in that letter is a sense of concern that ought to be in the minds of every hon. member and ought to carry beyond the mere technicalities of narrow questions of privilege. One privilege we are supposed to enjoy in the House is some assurance that there will never be an attempt to tamper with the records of the House of Commons, which includes the records of the committees of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I have read the letter submitted by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) who, by the way, has listened to the tape. It is a matter of some concern to me as a member of the House of Commons that this should be confined merely to the narrow question of privilege as to whether it occurred in the committee or in the House of Commons. We are talking about the integrity of the record-keeping of the House of Commons, which I think ought to involve the concerns of everyone. It is the integrity of that, not with respect to those who operate the system, but with respect to what is contained in there about attempts to change the minds or the view respecting the operation of the system.

That is why I think, in this case particularly, that when the hon. member for Victoria has submitted such a very elaborate submission to Your Honour, it goes far beyond that mere point and involves the privileges of all hon. members of the House of Commons. I say with respect that elaborate submission ought not to stand in the way of the oral argument which may be necessary to encompass and develop the case.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria had a chance to discuss that aspect of what he felt was a question of privilege which took place in the House. I reiterate that the other aspect of it has to be dealt with in committee. I urge the hon. member to clarify this matter in the committee.

What I want to say about what happened in the House is that the hon. member is asking me to be the judge of the veracity of any statement made by the minister, its veracity or compatibility with whatever he said in another place. Obviously that is not the role of the Chair and the Chair cannot determine on such a basis that there is a question of privilege.

The hon. member has a place where he can seek redress for his complaint, and that is in the standing committee. As for what happened in the House, I cannot determine whether an hon. member has made a statement which was true or untrue. The only thing upon which I could rule is if the hon. member stated that the minister had deliberately misled the House by saying one thing or the other, and that he has not mentioned. On that basis I am afraid I must rule that the question must be dealt with somewhere else.

As to what happened in the House on May 20, that ought to have been raised immediately at the time it happened. I find that there is no question of privilege on this particular statement of the minister.

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) put certain allegations on the record with regard to my riding. It is the duty of a member of the House to promote his riding, to defend and to speak for his riding. It seems to me he has the privilege of straightening the record as to certain facts. If not, I would ask Your Honour how I could correct the record within the confines of the House. Also I would ask for time to straighten the record with regard to the comments of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister will find many occasions to straighten the record. I try to keep questions of privilege fairly short; I do not want to allow too many interventions. I ruled on that question of privilege. I know the hon. minister wanted to speak on it, but I did not allow it. Therefore, I ask him to seek other occasions—and I know he can find them—to straighten the record.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order in the hope that by doing so we can avoid a hassle tomorrow about any changes in the record. As Your Honour will recall, during the question period all of us heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say quite clearly that when interest rates go up the government blames the opposition.

Mr. Epp: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: It may have been a "tingue-twuster". Perhaps care should be taken, since if that sentence in Hansard is changed we will spend another half hour on questions of privilege tomorrow. I do not think it will hurt the Prime Minister for the record to be printed in the way he actually said it.

• (1540)

Madam Speaker: We will have to see about that tomorrow.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—SECURITY MEASURES ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises from an incident which occurred at approximately 6.35 p.m. last evening when my wife and I were leaving the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings to proceed along our direct and usual way in exiting from Parliament Hill. My wife was driving our vehicle, which clearly bore House of Commons special licence plates as issued by the province of Ontario with the customary prefix MHC. I was sitting in the front of the car on the passenger side.

Before proceeding further, I would like emphatically to state that nothing I intend to say, or will say, is meant to detract from what I am sure we all agree are the very necessary stringent security regulations protecting the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), particularly in light of the recent incidents involving President Reagan in the United States and His Holiness Pope Jean Paul II in Rome. Also, before proceeding further may I say to you, Madam Speaker, that I realize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) raised a question of privilege a few days ago on which you gave a ruling yesterday. I hope I will have the opportunity to illustrate that my question of privilege is sufficiently different from the one raised by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants and that it cannot be said that I am speaking on something about which you have already ruled.

I would now like to return to the incident in question. As we were signalling a left turn to proceed toward the members' entrance of the Centre Block, with the intention of proceeding down the hill to Wellington Street, an RCMP constable somewhat frantically rushed out from our left and ordered my wife to come to a full stop and then to turn around and proceed in the opposite direction at once. I got out of the car and asked the officer what this was all about. He replied, "I cannot tell you, just move at once; I have my orders". I then identified myself as a member of Parliament travelling with my wife—

An hon. Member: You are a Canadian like anyone else.

Mr. Cossitt: I am a Canadian like what, did you say? If hon. members opposite will stop their silly shenanigans, I might be able to proceed.

Mr. Cousineau: Stop yours and we will stop ours.

Mr. Cossitt: I am telling you, Madam Speaker, they started them when they started as a party and they will continue them until they cease to exist as a party, which may be sooner than they like to think.

To get on with my question of privilege, Madam Speaker, having identified myself as a member of Parliament travelling with my wife I offered identification and again demanded to know why my exit was being impeded from the Hill. Again I drew attention to my MHC licence plate as identification and offered to produce my House of Commons identification. The RCMP constable replied, "I am not permitted to answer your questions. How do I know you are really an MP? Move out."

Some hon. Members: Shame!

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: And thus the hon. member was prevented from carrying out his duties.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: I told him I had a right to an explanation and that I had absolutely no intention of moving until I was given one. I asked him—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does have the right to an explanation in this particular case. He must tell the Chair how he was impeded in the performance of his duties as a member of this House because of this incident. I understand he was leaving the House, but there might be some catch to that—

An hon. Member: You have jurisdiction over them.

Madam Speaker: The Speaker has no jurisdiction over the grounds, the RCMP has. However, I want the hon. member to concentrate on telling me how this particular action impeded him in the performance of his duties as a member of Parliament in this House since he did raise another question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, when I finish outlining the incident, I believe that will become apparent. I am approaching the crucial point of the incident.

I asked the RCMP constable if there was something wrong here. I asked, "Has there been an accident? Is someone coming out of the members' door?" I asked him if no member was allowed to go in that door. He replied, "I have orders. I am not allowed to say whether anyone is coming or going at that door. Hurry up and move."

It was at this point that I noticed that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) was standing on the sidewalk adjacent to the members' entrance along with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). I observed that everything on the Hill had been brought to a complete standstill by the police, including the stoppage of the House of Commons buses which were proceeding to the Hill. I cannot prove this, but I would presume that the buses carried members of Parliament who were proceeding to the Hill to perform their duties as members of Parliament. Of course, the public were stopped as well.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice were obviously not engaged in a serious conversation but in a conversation which could have waited until later. By his actions the Prime Minister was holding up the entrance to—and I emphasize that point—and exit from the building. He was guffawing and giggling and the Minister of Justice was also doing a good job of guffawing and giggling. I feel that if the Prime Minister requires security, and I agree that he does, he should not take advantage of that security by tying up all of Parliament Hill for the purpose of giggling and guffawing and holding up everyone else who has plans, as members, to come into the building to carry out their functions in the House or to attend committee meetings, etc., or even to leave the buildings to speak at a function, as we are obligated to do as part of our duty as members of Parliament.

I contend that the Prime Minister, not the RCMP—I do not fault the RCMP for this at all since I feel they were carrying out their orders—was misusing his office and the security which has been and should be afforded to him in a way which was actually impeding the work of any number of members of Parliament. While I saw some members in the area, I am not sure how many there were at that particular time. I did not actually go around to the buses to see how many members of Parliament were on them.

This was a disgusting and disgraceful display. If it is still going on, and I have no reason to believe that it is not, I believe it should be fully investigated and that it should stop. If the Prime Minister wants to leave the Hill with protection, why does he not simply go to his car and leave instead of standing around and impeding the duties of members of Parliament? That is what he was doing and there is no question about it.

Mr. Lalonde: Use another door.

Mr. Cossitt: You over there are impossible.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I feel that the Prime Minister of Canada was, in effect, impeding the ability of members of this House to perform their duties as members. I would not criticize the right hon. gentleman if it was something crucial which required him to be where he was. The silly part of it is that he was simply giggling and guffawing and making jokes on the sidewalk. He caused everything to come to a standstill. I think it is a disgrace.

If you do find that I have a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I would like to reserve my right to move the appropriate motion.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF RCMP DEPUTY COMMISSIONER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I do have one other point. It may be that you would prefer me to raise this point subsequently, since it is not absolutely connected with my previous point. My point concerns a very important question of security in this building. I will raise the matter now if you wish. It will take approximately 60 seconds or so.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member promises to make his point in 60 seconds I will hear him now.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise to ask if the Chair would clarify for the benefit of all members of this House that the deputy commissioner of criminal operations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, J. R. R. Quintal, has been, in effect, appointed—I have not heard it announced so I presume he was secretly appointed—director of security for Parliament Hill.

The reason I ask for clarification on this point is that we now have two good men, Mr. Sandy Cunningham, who runs the protective staff, and Mr. Gene Grace, who runs the plain clothes security staff; and there is now being brought in someone to be put between these two gentlemen, if this report is true, and the Sergeant-at-Arms. In other words, an expensive messenger boy to rush back and forth. That hardly seems necessary. I would just like to ask, has Mr. Quintal been appointed, or is he about to be appointed, and is he presently a deputy commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

• (1550)

Madam Speaker: I would like to remind the hon. member that while he is arguing that he has been impeded in some of his duties as a member of Parliament by the actions of an officer of the Mounted Police outside the building, he did not tell me which ones.

Mr. Cossitt: By the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: It has not been made very clear what kind of impediment he has suffered because of that particular incident. However, I do want to remind the hon. member that there is a distinction to be made between the different duties of a member of Parliament which are considered essential to his function, and he did not consider that; nor did he tell me which of these duties he was not able to perform because he was accosted by one of the officers of the Mounted Police.

I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House, but he did refer to my ruling on the matter raised by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan). I did tell the House that, for reasons of both security and safety, procedures for directing traffic on the Hill, and particularly the buses, have been revised periodically. Yes, some new procedures have been adopted as a consequence of that revision.

Because some hon. members have complained about the way in which the Mounted Police are carrying out these new procedures, I have asked the Sergeant-at-Arms to discuss these matters with the Mounted Police. What I do want to assure hon. members is that, whatever changes are made in those procedures, I will try to ensure that they are made with the minimum interference with members of Parliament.

As for the nominated or about to be nominated new director of security, I can tell the hon. member that nominations of House of Commons staff are made in the usual way and not in the House.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I was simply asking, not how the appointments were made, but for clarification as to whether the deputy commissioner, J. R. R. Quintal, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has, in effect, been appointed and it is an accomplished fact.

Madam Speaker: If and when any nominations of this type are made, they will be made in the usual manner and the hon. member will be informed.

Mr. Cossitt: It has been done, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member knows that if he wants any information on this kind of matter he can either come to my office or write a letter and he will get it.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, might I ask, when the RCMP stops a person and that person asks a reasonable question, why should the constable not answer in a civil way? We are surely entitled to an answer.

An hon. Member: You are never reasonable.

Madam Speaker: Whatever happens outside the House, of course, is not under my jurisdiction, but I can ask—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Well, that is absolutely correct. I have no jurisdiction outside the House. Security and safety on the Hill is the responsibility of the Mounted Police. However, what I can do to accommodate hon. members is to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to inquire about this kind of conduct on the part of officers on the Hill. I will do just that in the name of the hon. member.

Mr. Taylor: I have had no experience on the Hill—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: —but whenever I have had an experience with the RCMP and they have stopped me, I ask why and I have always had a civil answer. I cannot see why that should not be so on the Hill as well.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the director of operations on the Hill will want that to be so, too. As I said, the Sergeant-at-Arms will have a consultation with the director.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HUDECKI—QUESTION ASKED DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): I rise on a point of order emanating from the question period. At Your Honour's indication, I went directly to my question and proceeded with it when I was really closed off and told that the question had not been put forward. I think that the error occurred in that there was a delay with the sound equipment. I did present the question. The sound equipment was not in operation. I have evidence from witnesses both on this side of the House and from the hon. members opposite that the question was put forward.

In view of the importance of that question, I wonder what mechanism I have of putting that question forward before the House again.

Mr. Knowles: Tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: I did call the hon. member to order at least two times and perhaps a third time. I cannot remember that, but I do remember at least two times. His question was very long. I do not know whether it had been put right at the beginning, but his question was too long and on two occasions I got up and asked the hon. member to put an end to the question. He continued to ask his question.

Perhaps I have been a bit hard on the hon. member. He is new in the House. However, whenever the Speaker gets up, the hon. member has to resume his seat. If the Speaker indicates that the question, in her view, is too long, usually hon. members co-operate and go to the question immediately. If I did not hear that the question had been posed in the very first sentence, I do apologize and I will try to recognize the hon. member another day on the same question providing, of course, it is short.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBY—OWNERSHIP OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES—REPLY OF MR. CHRÉTIEN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question of privilege which I can state very briefly, but it is nonetheless one of great importance to me and to the people of Nova Scotia. It arises from remarks made during the question period by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and repeated indirectly by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The remarks were to the effect that I asked the government and the Prime Minister to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of the ownership of offshore resources; that is to say, the ownership of the minerals, hydrocarbons and the submarine lands off the coasts of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. The remarks of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice relate to a debate which took place in the House on May 20, 1981, in which this matter was raised. I said then what I say now.

The Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister misinterpreted the nature of that exchange in that I had said that this question ought to be referred to the Supreme Court only if the Prime Minister and his government were unwilling to continue the political action of negotiating with the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland over the settlement of the ownership of those resources. I want to say to Your Honour, to all hon. members of this House and to the people of Canada that this question of ownership of offshore resources is just as important to the people of Nova Scotia as it is to the other provinces.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will find other occasions to say just that, if he wishes. He is entering into a debate. This is obviously not a question of privilege. He feels the Right Hon. Prime Minister has misinterpreted the situation and he wants to put the facts right. That is obviously debate, not a question of privilege.

Mr. Crosby: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. Your Honour cut me off before I even got to the mention of privilege. It is a matter of privilege of the hon. members of this House when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice indicate that they have taken a legal position which they have not, in fact, taken. Is that not a misrepresentation of what was said? The record will speak for itself.

Madam Speaker: It will indeed. The hon. member should know that hon. members constantly question the interpretation put on hon. members' words. This is the whole purpose of debate in the House of Commons. That is exactly what debate is. I cannot allow it as a question of privilege. It is obviously a difference of opinion between the two hon. members. That is quite legitimate and can be debated in the House; but it is certainly not a question of privilege.

● (1600)

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, today is a Conservative opposition day and we have just heard an hour of questions of privilege from the Conservative party. I wonder if they have any more questions of privilege. If we knew, we could either go back to our offices and get on with other work or go into the Conservative debate.

Mr. Lalonde: The great Tory filibuster.

MR. MICHAEL PITFIELD

Question No. 1,217 (Revised)—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Michael Pitfield, secretary to the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council, absent from his job at any time since he re-assumed his position and, if so (a) for how many days and on what dates (b) for what purpose and where (c) was he paid his usual government salary during the days absent and (i) if so, under what authority (ii) if not, what amount was deducted for each day absent or part thereof and what was the total amount deducted to the date this question is answered?

2. Did his absences include first class transportation to Boston and, if so, was such travel made at public expense?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister):

1 and 2. Since his reappointment as Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet on March 11, 1980, Mr. Pitfield has not been absent from his job save for normal holiday leave. During the period immediately following his reappointment, and in accordance with arrangements made at that time, Mr. Pitfield's family continued to reside in Boston, Massachusetts, until the end of the 1979-80 academic year. He made regular visits there to visit his family and to complete his teaching obligations to Harvard University. Mr. Pitfield was authorized to use first-class transportation where circumstances required. See also reply to question 2,386 answered May 25, 1981.

Question No. 2,135—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Canadian National Railway recently place advertisements congratulating the Canadian Pacific Railway on its anniversary and, if so (a) at what cost (b) for what purpose (c) what are the names of all the newspapers in which the advertisement was placed (d) what is the name and job designation of the highest ranking person authorizing the advertisements?

2. Is it government policy to scrutinize the spending by a Crown corporation on such advertisements and, if so, in this case did the government scrutinize such spending so that there would be no waste of taxpayer's money?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) $ 64,244.

(b) The purpose was to congratulate Canadian Pacific on its one hundredth birthday and to recognize the great contribution that company has made to Canada.

Together CN and CP form an industry that forged the links of nationhood and the ad was meant to draw attention to this fact as well as underline the important role this industry will have in the future development of Canada.

NATIONAL REVENUE BUILDINGS, RIGAUD, QUE.—USE OF FACILITIES

Question No. 2,144—Mr. Herbert:

1. What amount was charged, if any, for the use of the facilities, on the weekend of February 14, 1981, at the National Revenue Buildings, Rigaud, Quebec, by the city of Ottawa for city council budgetary studies?

2. Are other municipal councils offered similar use of the facilities?

3. What is the policy of the government concerning the use of the Rigaud facilities by other public or private bodies?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue):

1. $1,437.35.

2. Yes.

3. Consistent with the government's program of decentralization, the facilities at Rigaud can be made available to other private or public bodies, but only under strict conditions, and only when not otherwise occupied to meet operational requirements.

CN EXPRESS SERVICE—BROCKVILLE, ONT.

Question No. 2,208—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the CN Express giving consideration or has it decided to shut down its express service in and out of Brockville, Ontario and, if so, for what reasons?

2. Will the government give a positive guarantee that the express service at Brockville will not be closed down?

3. What are all the reasons justifying the consideration of any shut down in view of the large revenue obtained by CN Express at Brockville as revealed in the answer to question No. 4?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

1. Brockville has been identified as one of some 30 express terminals CN intends to retain as part of their network of core terminals for express operations.

2. It is not felt necessary for the government to give such a guarantee. CN is committed to maintaining express service across the country, sometimes by interlining to serve the smaller, light density market areas.

3. At the present time, closure of the Brockville express terminal is not being considered.

CMHC ACQUISITIONED HOUSES—MORTGAGE INSURANCE

Question No. 2,223—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation refuse to insure mortgages for houses sold by the corporation after acquisition and, if so, for what reason?

2. Are the purchasers of the houses able to obtain insurance in the private sector and, if so, is the total interest for both the insurance and the mortgage different from the total for a mortgage insured by CMHC?

3. Was a study undertaken to determine whether or not an increase in the cost of insurance and interest rates for a mortgage affected the selling price of a house and, if so, what were the results?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

1. In general, houses acquired by CMHC qualify for NHA insured mortgages when they are sold. However, in isolated cases mortgage insurance has been refused because of the poor physical state of the unit. In such cases the sale is on an "as is" basis at an appropriate price, and insurance is refused because it is not known whether the unit will be repaired to acceptable standards.

2. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not compile data regarding this subject and is therefore unable to provide relevant information.

3. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not undertaken any such study.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

National Energy Program

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) moved:

That this House condemns the government's National Energy Program because of the substantial adverse impact it has had on energy development in Canada, and on those parts of the economy which supply goods and services to the oil and gas industry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members opposite for their patience in waiting for my speech. I want to assure them that, like a good wine, my speech has improved with age!

Yesterday we debated Bill C-57. During the opening speeches on that bill we discussed amendments to delete the production tax and the excise tax on natural gas, principally because of the damage it is doing in the area of supply, the area of energy development and the deadlock that has caused the megaprojects to be put on hold, as well as the consequent very dangerous exposure which this country faces in view of the increasing reliance on the Middle East.

As I said yesterday, these taxes are at the heart of the problems that we will encounter in the years ahead. But there is another side to this issue, and that is the immediate impact of the government's energy program on the economy today. It is a very visible side of this issue. As I have said in the past in this House, 139 rigs have left the country since October 28; drilling activity is down in excess of 50 per cent this year compared to the same period last year, and in addition land sales on petroleum properties have declined about 70 per cent. All this is having a ripple effect throughout the entire economy. It is that aspect of the energy program that I wish to debate today.

We on this side have discussed the effects of this energy program on individuals, businesses, different sectors of the economy, not just in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, but also in parts of eastern Canada which are important suppliers to the oil and gas industry. Many of us in this House met with representatives of the oil service industry. They told us about small companies of five, ten, 15, 30 and 40 people and stated categorically that if no changes are made in the situation as it is today, about half of them will be out of business within six months and about 70 per cent will be out of business within one year.

A very urgent problem faces us, Mr. Speaker, and that is the reason for the motion we are debating today. The motion stands in my name but I am proud to make it on behalf of the many people in my party who have felt directly the concerns of the people so severely affected by the program brought forward by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), on October 28—the energy program.

Let me just read the motion quickly:

That this House condemns the government's National Energy Program because of the substantial adverse impact it has had on energy development in Canada, and on those parts of the economy which supply goods and services to the oil and gas industry.

As I mentioned earlier, some of the service companies have been to Ottawa to discuss the very real problems that affect them, the people who work for them and the people in their communities. I should like to refer briefly to some of these. One individual had seven leases of rental equipment cancelled outright with the resultant loss of $500,000 to him and to his small company when the equipment had to be returned to the bank. Another person, also in the equipment rental business, who one year ago employed 26 people, now employs 11 people. There is a contractor who, in 1980, employed 50 people but this year employs only 20. Another construction company had 137 people in 1980 and now has only 27.

We would not ordinarily think of hotel owners being in the oil and gas business, but they accommodate the people who work on the rigs. A particular hotel owner had 68 employees in 1980; now he has 38, the loss of business being directly attributed to the National Energy Program.

I should like to refer to a survey conducted by my colleague the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) on companies in his constituency. He asked: "Has your firm experienced an actual reduction in financial activity in the last six months?" Mr. Speaker, 82 per cent replied that they had. The average amount of the decrease was 41 per cent, so it is a substantial decrease and it is much greater than in other parts of the economy.

The next question was: "Has the change in financial activity been a direct result of the National Energy Program?" About 50 per cent of the companies canvassed responded to the questionnaire—and that is a high number, Mr. Speaker—and 88 per cent replied that the change had been a direct result of the NEP.

About 55 per cent of the respondents are involved directly in the oil and gas industry. I should point out that 81 per cent of the companies are 100 per cent Canadian owned. This is the result of the Canadianization program that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has introduced.

Unemployment has increased in the riding of Peace River. Last year employment was about 4,000 people—3,964. This year it is down to 3,065, a decrease of about 22 per cent.

Finally, "Could you indicate the amount of capital you spent and what you plan to spend within the Peace River constituency in the following years?". In 1979-80, it was around $35 million or $37 million. In 1981-82, these companies are projecting about $18.5 million, a decline of about 50 per cent. There are very real indications of the disastrous effect this policy has had on individual business, small business, Canadian-owned business, businesses that are the heart of the economy of this country.

Let me also refer to the effects of this on companies in eastern Canada. There is a very direct impact. The Alberta government, in conjunction with companies in the industry, did a survey on the economic impact of the Alsands and Cold Lake projects. The purpose of this was to show that the economic activity generated by these projects in Alberta was about 42 per cent, and in Ontario and Quebec the total amount was 35 per cent; a little over 25 per cent in Ontario and a little over 9 per cent in Quebec. Therefore, these projects have a very direct impact in eastern Canada.

The megaprojects have been put on the back burner for some considerable length of time as a result of the discussions and disagreements that have taken place between the Alberta government and the federal government. We are at a very serious point in time where these projects just may not go ahead, in particular because of the deadlock between these two levels of government and because of the effect of the taxes, specifically the production tax, on these projects. In addition, the pricing schedule of the energy program has been stated quite categorically to be insufficient to bring forward the investment necessary.

Foster Associates did another broader impact study on conventional and megaproject investment as it relates to the rest of Canada. Of every dollar that is spent on both sides of the business, the megaprojects and conventional projects, 42 cents is spent in Ontario, 13 cents in Quebec, 16 cents in other provinces and 29 cents in Alberta. Therefore, this is not just an Alberta problem, or a British Columbia problem, but a Canadian problem. That is the point we want to make in the debate today.

The Foster Associates study went on to say that for every job created in Alberta by these projects, two additional jobs are created in the rest of Canada. The impact on the rest of Canada is not as massive as it is in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Other of my colleagues will be discussing those specifically today. I would like to talk about some of the broader elements of the slowdown in the industry so that we can have a better understanding in this House of the impact of the policies the government is following.

Ralph Hedlin Associates completed a very intensive report entitled "Some Implications of the National Energy Program on Ontario and Quebec manufacturers". Let me just refer to the broad range of industries that are affected by the National Energy Program: the rubber industry, steel industry, wire rope, structural steel, fabricated pipe, boilers and pressure vessels, valves, turbines, pumps, controls, electrical equipment, transportation, measurement and control equipment. I would imagine that covers well over 75 per cent of the total manufacturing range of industries in this country. It is a very broad problem that we face.

Let us look at the compressor industry, one of the industries that is hardest hit. One firm in this industry estimates that losses of $40 million are due to cancelled, reduced or delayed orders. Another firm reports a fall-off from $17 million in sales about a year ago to $1.7 million, a 90 per cent drop in sales in the two-month period of January and February. One company reports that under normal business conditions they would bid on 30 to 40 projects per month. Now they are bidding on three to four in the oil and gas industry. This is a serious situation that is growing worse daily.

Let us look at the rubber industry. They had anticipated orders of about $22 million for the Alsands project. These are delayed, I guess you could say indefinitely because the minister has been unable to make any progress as a result of the decisions he has taken in the negotiations with the Alberta government. They attribute these delays directly to the National Energy Program.

One structural steel company predicted about $100 million in potential business for western Canada. This is now on hold as a result of the program. One fabricated pipe manufacturer, who unfortunately had expanded production facilities prior to the National Energy Program, is now operating far below capacity with very substantial interest rates to maintain, as a result not just of the slowdown in the energy industry but the very high interest rate policy of this government.

Finally, in the electrical industry one company had planned to establish a research and development capability but it has now put that on hold pending resolution of the energy deadlock in this country. With the uncertainty and the direct impact of this energy policy, there is substantial loss of economic activity and loss of potential to the economy of this country that must be addressed very quickly or we will face very serious consequences throughout this country.

Let me draw some conclusions from the Hedlin study which I believe it important for members of this House to consider. The first is obviously the very broad relationship of the oil and gas industry to the total manufacturing economy of this country, not just in western Canada but all of Canada. This is a very important relationship that we must learn to better understand in this House.

Second, the immediate impact that the Hedlin study has observed is not nearly as much as the medium or longer-term impact, as the over-all result of this loss of business starts to affect orders that will be lost, sales that will be lost, lost employment opportunities as well as investment opportunities or the creation of new plant and equipment which generates economic activity in this country.

The key is that the next 12 months is a critical period for all of these industries. That is the period during which the direct impact will be felt by the country. If the megaprojects, the Alsands and Cold Lake projects, are delayed, the impact on this country will be disastrous, not just in lost supply so important to us in 1990, but in the economic activity that we need so desperately in this country today.

The intransigencies of the minister and the provocative approach that he and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took to these oil negotiations last year at this time have resulted in the most serious government-induced slowdown in our economy that I think anybody in this House can remember, and perhaps I could say it is the most serious government-induced slowdown of our economy in history.

The Alberta reaction which resulted in cutbacks and putting these megaprojects on hold was a predictable reaction. In face of the way the minister and the Prime Minister conducted the negotiations last summer, it is clear there were few options the government of Alberta had when the energy program finally came out and showed, if you can believe it, a less satisfactory offer to the provinces than had been offered to them back in July. It was no surprise. I think anybody could have predicted it and we were predicting it in this House prior to the energy program, if there was not a more realistic approach when the energy program was finally brought down.

Today the outlook for the Canadian economy is not good. We had unexpected strength in the fourth quarter of last year and the first quarter this year, but with the high interest rate policy that this government has maintained throughout this whole period and with increasing interest rates, it is clear to me that the economy cannot stand that sort of stress and still maintain any degree of economic growth. The future is very cloudy indeed, and we need desperately this energy development to be brought forward to take up the slack in this economy.

I am not the only person saying that. If you read economic reports, including the one of the Economic Council of Canada, you will see stated very clearly in the last report that the key hope for this economy is energy development in this country.

Let me refer briefly to a statement made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada yesterday when he was before the committee in the other place. He said:

> —a settlement of energy disputes probably ought to be given the highest priority in economic policy these days . . . I think the settlement might very well help us on the exchange rate and might improve the investment climate.

I believe you know, Mr. Speaker, that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is a very subdued and soft-spoken individual, but I think that is a very powerful message he has given us to date. What he is saying to us is that because there is uncertainty about future energy development in this country in face of the real energy problems the world faces, there has been downward pressure on the Canadian dollar—the exchange rate, to use his words.

He also indicated previously in his testimony that if there was not that pressure on the exchange rate he would have an opportunity to reduce the level of interest rates in this country. Quite clearly, the direction the Governor of the Bank of Canada has followed is in maintaining an interest rate policy which clearly has an eye to the level of the Canadian dollar, because if the dollar falls further than it has to date it will generate further inflationary pressures in this country.

Let us be quite clear. When you cut through it all what we are referring to is jobs—jobs of individual Canadians in small businesses, medium-sized businesses and very large businesses. This is most visible in the province of Alberta but we are starting to see it more and more from statements being made in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Let us not forget that last November and December we on this side of the House, as well as many other observers in the country, warned the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that the policy, if followed through, would result in the disasters that are starting to fall around us right now. We did predict oil drilling activities and we did predict the drop in land sales. Now this is a fact.

How long is the minister going to sit there nodding his head saying yes, yes, yes, when we talk about the broader economic effects of this policy and do nothing about it? The statistics we see today clearly demonstrate that we knew what we were talking about in November and December, and the statistics of later on this year will prove that we know what we are talking about today. Very few people in this country disagree with us.

Let me refer to another element which I think involves an important message which I am receiving from people in my constituency and others who are directly affected, and that is the oil brain drain. This is quietly happening today, Mr. Speaker. Canada is not an island unto itself in energy development. We have to be conscious of what is happening in the rest of the world. We are part of a broad, worldwide oil and gas industry. I do not think there is another country in the world which has taken the approach that Canada has to oil development. Other countries are aggressively pursuing exploration and production of oil and gas. They are valuable commodities to these countries, so we have a competitive situation here. Our young men and women are being drawn away from Canada because of uncertainty and the lack of jobs in this country, jobs which are available for them in spades in many other countries of the world, most particularly in the United States because it is right at our doorstep.

Mr. Gerry Maier, chairman and chief executive officer of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Co., recently made a speech on this subject. He said:

> As long as Canadian energy policy results in cash flow cutbacks and reduced profits for the industry, the temptation to move to greener pastures will remain strong.

He goes on to say:

> In the U.S.A. reducing dependence on foreign petroleum has become a virtual crusade, and Canadian recruits are being welcomed with open arms.

The prospects clearly are better in other parts of the world. The uncertainty which has been created by this energy program in Canada is pushing our technologists, our highly technical experts, out of the country to other parts of the world. The industry and the governments in these other countries have accepted as a common goal the need for greater production. We must accept that today or we will lose more of our highly technical people.

The result of this will be that when these projects are to be developed the people we need to bring them on stream will not be available. What that means is that we will get the second best talent, which will result in longer times to bring the project on and it will result in mistakes. The net result of that is that the consumer in this country will pay more for energy developments that could be under way today if this government had any sense.

In face of these clear signs of deterioration, whether it is from conventional drilling, delay in the megaprojects or from the oil brain drain, it is hard to understand the complacency of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He is saying they have a majority in the House of Commons and they are going to ram this program through. They do not have to listen to anybody. They can build the monument to Marc Lalonde.

Another statement he has made which disturbs me tremendously is that if they are going to get beaten in the next election they should get beaten by something they really believe in; not what the people want but what they, Marc Lalonde and other members of the government, feel is important to their small little world.

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Hon. members should be referred to by the names of their constituencies, or by their departmental titles if they are ministers, but not by their names.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for drawing that to my attention. I will try to do better next time.

What we are forgetting here is that people are losing jobs. We are creating tremendous oil supply insecurity in this country, and we are losing the technological brains which would be tremendously important to this country in the years ahead. The minister must not sit and build his own oil and gas Utopia in which things are done just according to what he says. He must learn, he must pay attention and he must be sensitive to what is happening in the rest of the world. He must pay attention to the decisions which are being made by people in the industry and by individuals who are going to those green pastures to which Mr. Maier referred. If the minister does not do these things, his Utopia will force Canadians to accept lower living standards, less economic security and a much more uncertain and cloudy future than we see even today.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that we finally got around to debating this motion which the Progressive Conservative members of the opposition surely deemed very important and very urgent, but which they even came close to stranding completely because of the altogether unfounded questions of privilege raised during a full hour by various members opposite.

[English]

For an hour we listened to a number of frivolous Conservative questions of privilege and points of order. The hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) tried to back away from a position he impressed upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a week or two ago. Having reflected upon his attitude at first, the hon. member tried to back away from the position he took in this House. As the hon. member himself said, the record will speak for itself. It is there for everyone to see.

[Translation]

The motion before the House today reads very simply as follows, and I quote:

That this House condemns the government's National Energy Program because of the substantial adverse impact it has had on energy development in Canada, and on those parts of the economy which supply goods and services to the oil and gas industry.

If the Progressive Conservative members of the opposition had the courage of their convictions, they would have drafted a much clearer and much simpler motion. They would have said quite simply that the Progressive Conservative Party urges the government to raise consumer prices so as to give more money to the oil industry and to the producing provinces. Basically that is what the Conservative members have been advocating here and there and everywhere in the country, and we had the best example of that earlier from the hon. member who spoke on behalf of the Progressive Conservative opposition. In fact, what the Progressive Conservative Party is doing, and I quote, it "condemns the National Energy Program" as a whole. I see Conservative members opposite, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) who nods his head in agreement. It is important that Canadians know what the Progressive Conservative members object to when they say: We reject the National Energy Program. What they reject, Mr. Speaker, is a whole series of measures whose aim is Canada's self-sufficiency by 1990; what they reject is a whole series of measures to ensure that that industry will be controlled and owned by Canadians by 1990; what they reject is a price system which will be fair to consumers and to the various regions of the country as well as to the Canadian government and the government of the producing provinces. That is what the Progressive Conservative members reject. They should have the courage of their convictions. The National Energy Program provides for billions of dollars in grants to help Canadian consumers improve energy conservation through the Canadian Home Insulation Program, for instance, in which we pay half the cost of insulation up to $500 for each home. That is what the Progressive Conservative members reject. Similarly they reject measures to promote the replacement of petroleum by other forms of energy, something which must be done as quickly as possible because that is what will make Canadians self-sufficient in the short term. Thanks to the measures I announced on Monday, Mr. Speaker, we will be able to reduce oil consumption in Canada by 300,000 barrels a day. Canadian consumers will be eligible for up to $800 for each home to convert their oil heating system to a heating system operating on gas, electricity, wood, propane gas, solar energy or other forms of energy. That is what the Conservatives are condemning and rejecting. Let them have the courage of their opinions, let them stand up and be counted! The Canadian consumers will know how to judge their position on this subject.

What else are they rejecting? They are rejecting the extension of the gas pipeline for the citizens of Quebec and the maritime provinces, which is an integral part of the National Energy Program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. minister's speech, but he is attributing a large number of statements to this side of the House, which is a total distortion. If the minister is going to make those statements, I ask him to substantiate them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member had 30 minutes. He had a chance to make his point of view known, whether he was accusing the government of mismanagement or of having a bad energy program. Now the government is defending itself. I think the Chair is here to listen to both sides, and that is what we will do.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives wasted an hour of the time of the House this afternoon with flimsy questions of privilege and points of order. I hope the time taken by the hon. member in raising this latest flimsy point will not be considered part of my time.

I am not attributing any intentions to the Conservatives. I am reading their own motion, which says:

That this House condemns the Government's National Energy Program—

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Lalonde: An hon. member says that that is true. I will tell hon. members opposite what they are condemning. They should stand up and be counted. They are condemning conservation measures. They are condemning measures which will encourage consumers to use substitutes for oil. They are condemning the Canadianization program of this government which will ensure that before the end of this decade Canadians will control the petroleum industry, which at the present time is over 70 per cent controlled by foreigners. That is what the Conservatives are rejecting.

Mr. Taylor: We won't even have a country if you are there for long.

Mr. Lalonde: With the support of the people of this country, before the end of this decade this government will see that the people of Canada own over 50 per cent of this industry.

Mr. Taylor: If there still is a Canada.

Mr. Lalonde: They will control the major companies in this industry. Through their government the people of Canada will have a larger ownership than they had before, and this will benefit Canadians.

Mr. Taylor: If there still is a Canada.

Mr. Lalonde: We hear them now. We know what they are condemning. We can hear hon. members opposite talk and shout. What they are condemning are measures in the energy program which provide that Canadians will pay a predictable price for their oil. They will pay a price which will increase, but it will increase on a gradual basis. The price of oil will not be subject to the rapidly escalating and unpredictable prices determined by OPEC. That is what the Tories are fighting. With respect to distribution between the regions of this country, the Tories are against the proposition that the national government should get a larger share for the benefit of all Canadians. This is what they are fighting, Mr. Speaker. This is what the Tories cannot see.

• (1640)

Mr. Taylor: Fifty dollars to Mexico.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I thought the House had recognized the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and it is very difficult for the Chair to hear the discussion when there is shouting. I think courtesy was extended to the previous speaker and I would invite the hon. members to be as courteous to the present speaker.

An hon. Member: Ask him to leave the House if he does not want to listen.

Mr. Lalonde: I think we have clear evidence that the truth hurts and it seems to hurt very badly over there.

Mr. Wilson: It is not true, though.

Mr. Lalonde: In effect what we are proposing is that the people of Canada, through the energy program, should be entitled to 23 cents out of every $1 that comes out of that industry while the industry will still get 33 cents and producing provinces will get 43 cents. That is what the Conservatives are fighting. They think the people of Canada, who have been paying through their taxes the overwhelming part of the industry incentives, are not entitled to more than 9 cents. Well, we think 23 cents is a very fair and very low payment to the people of Canada for everything they have put into that industry over the years, and that is for all the people of Canada.

Mr. Wilson: That is a distorted figure.

Mr. Lalonde: So when the Conservative party puts a motion condemning the National Energy Program globally as they are doing in this debate, let us remember what they are condemning.

Mr. Taylor: Fifty dollars to Mexico, $15 to Alberta, that is what we are condemning.

Mr. Lalonde: What I would like to cover more specifically is some points raised by the hon. member.

[Translation]

I believe that it is important, Mr. Speaker, to recall once again what it is that the Conservatives are opposing. What they oppose is the National Energy Program as a whole, that is a good program for the Canadian consumers, a good program for Canadian ownership and Canadian control of this industry, and a program which will ensure energy self-sufficiency by 1990, which means that we shall no longer have to import foreign oil.

The Conservatives' answer would be to increase consumer prices and give more money to the corporations and the producing provinces even though in no other federal system in the world producing provinces receive as much as they do in Canada, and this under the National Energy Program.

[English]

Now, the spokesman for the official opposition has depicted a very gloomy picture of the situation and I would like to draw to his attention a few facts. I will begin with what is happening in the Canada lands, Mr. Speaker. These lands are the exclusive responsibility of the Government of Canada, and if any blame is to be attributed, you cannot parcel it out. If something goes wrong in the Canada lands, the responsibility is that of the Government of Canada. However, if something good happens there, then the Government of Canada should get the credit. And what have we seen? The hon. member talks about the oil and gas industry. I would urge the official opposition to look at the oil industry in global terms, not just to look at Alberta and say that that is the end of it. Look at the situation in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and the Canada lands.

What is the situation in the Canada lands, Mr. Speaker? Well, I have no doubt that the Conservatives do not know what was spent there last year. Total expenditures by the oil and gas industry in the Canada lands last year was $345 million. And after the National Energy Program was announced in 1981, Mr. Speaker, how much is the industry going to spend there? It is going to spend $630 million, almost double what it spent last year. Then we go to next year and the year after. The forecast for 1982 is $880 million, and for 1983 it is $1.035 billion. That is the kind of action taking place in the Canada lands with the oil and gas industry. The Tories will not talk about that, they do not know any better. They like to believe the stories they are being told by some spokesmen for the industry and they do not want to look at the whole forest; they look at a few trees and knock their heads against them and refuse to see what is happening in the industry.

What is happening in the provincial lands? Well, I will not quote internal statistics because they will be challenged as being inaccurate; I will quote the opposition's preferred source, namely the industry magazines, such as Oilweek, for one, which I am sure is known if not read by some members on the other side, and what do we see there? They talk about wells disappearing or a small number of wells being drilled. Well, let us face it, we have a situation in this country where we have had a surplus of natural gas, and that has been going on for quite a while. People recognized this well before the National Energy Program was brought in, Mr. Speaker. That program had nothing to do with capped wells in Alberta or in other provinces. They were there well before the NEP was announced, so much so that a spokesman for the gas industry said, well before the program was announced, that there would be a very substantial decline in drilling activity in western Canada in 1981. This is what the oil and gas journal said in quoting the executive director of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors before the NEP came into being. He said that no more than 5,000 wells would be drilled in Canada in 1981 compared with 8,300 wells in 1980, a drop of 40 per cent. That is not the government's policy, not the government's decision and not the National Energy Program.

Mr. Wilson: Read the rest of the quote.

Mr. Lalonde: It is a fact that the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors stated, before the National Energy Program was announced, that because of a surplus of natural gas they would have a very drastic reduction in the number of wells drilled in this country in 1981 and, significantly, that is what has happened.

What do we see in Oilweek? Comparing the first quarter of 1981 with the first quarter of 1980 we see that the number of wells in development for natural gas has gone down. There is no surprise there. That was foreseen by the industry at least a year ago. Development wells are down from 641 to 457. And we see, in spite of the gloomy stories we hear from the opposition, that the number of exploration and development wells for oil has not gone down, Mr. Speaker, but has increased. Oil exploration wells went up in the first quarter from 162 to 253, according to Oilweek. Oil development wells have gone up from 284 to 400 and therefore, the total for oil has gone up from 446 to 653, over 200 more in the first quarter of 1981 compared to the first quarter of 1980. If you add all the wells together, including the gas wells, you end up with a larger number of wells in the first quarter of 1981 than in the first quarter of 1980. It went up from 2,004 to 2,235. These are the statistics, the facts, the reality of what is happening.

The situation for natural gas is indeed serious and one we have had to live with, as I said, well before the National Energy Program.

• (1650)

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Does the minister not realize that the figures he is quoting are the result of budgets established well before the National Energy Program, and that we are now just coming to the time when there will be a downturn? Surely he has the intelligence to understand that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I hope the time taken up for this point of order will be deducted from my time. There are so many inaccuracies and wrong statements made by the opposition that I will need all my time to answer them. We are not talking about previous budgets; we are talking about the first quarter of 1981—

Mr. Towers: But it is a result of previous budgets.

Mr. Lalonde: —which is several months after the October 28 budget came into effect. These are the facts as put out by Oilweek.

Obviously there are some problems. I indicated that as far as the Canada lands are concerned, we are seeing more activity under the National Energy Program than we have ever seen before. This is taking place, thanks to the National Energy Program. It benefits oil and gas companies, mainly Canadian gas companies. For the first time in the history of that industry, junior Canadian companies are involved in exploration.

Mr. Wilson: In the United States.

Mr. Lalonde: They are involved in exploration on the east coast and in the Arctic, which did not happen before. Also this is thanks to the National Energy Program. Most of those companies are from Calgary and Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Like Mobil!

Mr. Lalonde: There are problems in some areas. After having indicated the areas where the federal government alone is responsible, I would like to indicate that there are problems in some provinces.

I would like to say a word about those provinces because while we are exclusively responsible for the Canada lands, everyone recognizes the provincial governments are getting the largest share of the benefits. They have responsibility as well as the national government when it comes to provincial lands. As a matter of fact, they like to claim that it is all theirs, but when it comes to paying their contribution or their share of the costs, they are not so eager.

Let me look at the situation in some provinces. If we look at the situation in Saskatchewan, for instance, we see royalties in the province which are higher than in any other province in Canada. We have a situation where some of those wells are being closed at the present time. I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) will want to talk about this. Some of those wells are being closed, but why? It is because of the excessively high royalties in the province of Saskatchewan. The royalties are higher than in any other province, royalties which the industry itself is blaming for the current closing down of a large number of wells in that province.

I hope the government of Saskatchewan will reflect upon this and realize that it must do something about this. What is the situation in Saskatchewan? Saskatchewan royalties are twice as high as Alberta's on the production of an average well; they are twice as high as those of its neighbouring province.

Mr. Taylor: So what?

Mr. Gustafson: But our production is three times as low.

Mr. Lalonde: For an average well in Saskatchewan producing about 30 barrels per day, the royalty on old oil is 51 per cent in Saskatchewan and 24 per cent in Alberta. Lower rate producers are hit even harder. A ten-barrel per day well pays 37 per cent royalty on old oil in Saskatchewan and only 8 per cent in Alberta.

The hon. member for Assiniboia can complain as much as he wants but those figures indicate clearly that if those wells were in Alberta, they would be still producing. They are being closed down at the present time because of the excessive royalties the government of Saskatchewan has imposed.

Mr. McKinnon: Speak louder.

Mr. Lalonde: Now I would like to turn to British Columbia. We have heard a lot of noise from the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) earlier. What is the situation in British Columbia? Gas pricing in British Columbia is lower for the producer than it is in Alberta. The producer in British Columbia receives about $1.45 per thousand cubic feet for old gas after export adjustments. In Alberta the same producer receives $2.62. This is under the same National Energy Program. The situation in British Columbia has nothing to do with the National Energy Program. It has to do with the Socred government there and the type of decisions that government has taken. It is not the National Energy Program that is the cause of the difficulties in the industry in British Columbia at the present time. This has been repeated over and over again by the industry when representatives appeared before the British Columbia Utilities Commission.

I left Alberta to the last. Certainly Alberta has some problems. We have met with the service industries; many of them came from Alberta. Certainly these people attract our sympathy. It is sad to see many of those little Canadian companies suffer.

Mr. Towers: What will you do about it?

Mr. Lalonde: I have had several meetings and discussions with these people. Their attitude is more responsible and rational than that of the Conservatives on the other side of the House. In all the meetings these people said that both orders of government must settle this, that both orders of government must move, and that there must be some compromise. They recognize that since the National Energy Program was announced, we have made some moves, some adjustments, and have shown some compromise.

Mr. Gustafson: To take over the industry.

Mr. Lalonde: To the contrary, and I will quote the hon. member for Assiniboia. In the parliamentary committee last night he said that the producing provinces have not budged an inch. We can check the blues; he had better not change them.

Mr. Gustafson: They should not budge an inch.

Mr. Lalonde: This is what the hon. member for Assiniboia said.

Mr. Gustasfson: Why should they?

Mr. Lalonde: I presume he was speaking for the Tory Opposition when he spoke like this last night.

Mr. Taylor: Why should they?

Mr. Lalonde: Now we hear from another member from Alberta, the respectable hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). He is asking "why should they?" That is the attitude of the Conservatives: sock it to the consumers, give more money to the industry, give the producing provinces whatever they want; they should not compromise.

Mr. Taylor: You give Mexico $50 and us $15.

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad the ministers of energy for the producing provinces and the premiers, particularly the Premier of Alberta, have more judgment and are more reasonable than the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Taylor: That is why you have not reached an agreement.

Mr. Lalonde: They are ready and willing to make some concessions. I will meet with the minister of energy for Alberta on June 10; I am looking forward to that meeting. At our last meeting, we indicated that we were willing to be flexible and to compromise. There was such a recognition of this fact by the spokesmen for Alberta that they agreed to have another meeting to look at whatever flexibility they could introduce in their position. In that sense, they have shown a lot more judgment than the Conservative members from Alberta who are sitting in the House, particularly the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Taylor: Try telling them why you pay Mexico $50 and us only $15.

Mr. Lalonde: Indeed we have indicated that there must be a settlement.

Mr. Taylor: You will not answer that, will you?

Mr. Lalonde: It is a matter of high priority. The Governor of the Bank of Canada said yesterday that it was a matter of the highest priority. We agree with that. On November 2, the Prime Minister stood in the House and said that Alberta does not like the program and that we were ready to sit down and talk about improvements and adjustments to it.

Mr. Taylor: It took you about eight months to decide that.

Mr. Lalonde: What happened between November 2 and early April? We have not been able to obtain a meeting with the government of Alberta. That is the situation; that has been the situation.

Mr. Taylor: Now you blame Alberta.

Mr. Lalonde: There was a cutback of 60,000 barrels by the government of Alberta.

Mr. Taylor: And it could be even more.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member for Bow River is shouting that there will be another one on June 1. How will that help the negotiations? How will that help the average Canadian?

• (1700)

Mr. Taylor: Buy it from Mexico at $50 a barrel.

Mr. Lalonde: We know that it will not help the average Canadian, it will hurt him, because he will have to pay even more.

Mr. Taylor: Buy it from Mexico at $50.

Mr. Lalonde: We hear that the industry hurts. In its last report, the Alberta Energy Conservation Board said that at worst the National Energy Program in Alberta, perceived in its worst possible context, might reduce production by 50,000 to 60,000 barrels in Alberta by 1990. But that board, which is a board of the Alberta government, said that what was most damaging to the industry in Alberta at the present time was the cutbacks imposed by that government, and that those cutbacks this year would cut production by 180,000 barrels and would have an impact on the industry of over $200 million in Alberta. This is what is happening with the decisions of the government of Alberta, not the Government of Canada.

Mr. Taylor: Pay us a proper price then.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member for Bow River says, "Pay us what you want."

Mr. Taylor: No, pay us a proper price.

Mr. Lalonde: That is the position of the Tories in this House.

Mr. Taylor: Fifty dollars for Mexico, $15 for Alberta.

Mr. Lalonde: The Tories say that any provincial government may dictate to the national government what should be the national policy. We do not believe in that.

Mr. Taylor: Fifty dollars for Mexico, $15 for Alberta.

Mr. Lalonde: We believe in compromise and good sense. We believe in national responsibility for all the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: We will fulfil our national responsibility.

Mr. Taylor: Fifty dollars for Mexico, $15 for Alberta.

Mr. Lalonde: We will negotiate and arrive at a deal which will be fair to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister must leave, but I hope that he will stay and hear me for a short while. When I listened to his speech he reminded me of a man whom Oscar Wilde described as someone who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Waddell: It seems to me that once again the minister has thumped, pumped and spoken. It was not a speech he gave, it was more of a tirade, which indicates to me that the minister must be in trouble with his National Energy Program.

The message we received on this side of the House was the same old message: Ottawa knows best what is good for the west. Before the minister leaves I wish to quote—

Mr. Evans: When will you say something of substance?

Mr. Waddell: If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) would listen for a moment he will see that I will deal positively with how I think we can solve this problem with western Canada.

Mr. Evans: Proceed.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the minister of a speech given in this House by the Right Hon. Lester Pearson on April 14, 1964, as reported in Hansard at page 2145. I see the minister is leaving, but he can read my remarks in Hansard tomorrow. At page 2145 of Hansard for April 14, 1964 Mr. Pearson was dealing with co-operative federalism. He said:

> It is the task of Parliament, without regard to party; it is the challenge of statesmanship rising above faction, to find the solutions to our problems which are now more serious and more difficult than any we have faced in peacetime since 1867.

Mr. Pearson was dealing with the problems of Quebec in the 1960s. He was dealing with a quiet revolution in Quebec, which in a strange way has certain similarities to the kind of economic revolution which is happening in western Canada at the moment. As I understand it, that was the reason why members such as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) were elected to Parliament. Maybe the minister has forgotten some of the words of his mentor, the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson. The speech goes on:

> We must find these solutions by agreement, not force them by compulsion. We cannot hope to find such agreement in our country if we cannot find a basis for it in our Parliament.

And what did we receive in this House today? A tirade mainly against the Conservative opposition, and secondly, against the provinces with regard to the whole energy problem.

The minister has left the chamber, but I offer three quite obvious points to him to which I hope his parliamentary secretary will reply. One, we do not have a pricing agreement with Alberta, and on June 1 Alberta will turn down the tap further and Canadian consumers will have to pay more for gasoline. It will be another "Lalonde levy", as we call it here. The Liberals call it a "Lougheed levy". The Albertans call it a "Lalonde" levy and I call it a "Lougheed-Lalonde levy". In any case, it will be an additional tax to pay for imported oil.

That is a ridiculous situation, Mr. Speaker. The minister cannot just get up in the House and blame it on hon. members to my right, or on the provinces, although in a great many ways it is a shared blame. The minister is part of those negotiations. He must be flexible in the agreement. Is the minister or the parliamentary secretary prepared to stand up in this House and say, "Mr. Speaker, all right, we will withdraw the 8 per cent wellhead tax. We will withdraw it, change it, and we will be flexible"? Saying that would go a long way toward reaching an agreement. But you can bet your bottom dollar and your bottom barrel of oil that neither one of them will stand up in the House and say that. The minister is one of the inflexible parties.

The second point I offer to the government speakers to reply to is simply this. We heard from the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) of a downturn in the west, in Alberta, in oil exploration. I have the same figures and I could quote them. All the figures are before us and they will appear in Hansard as cited by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. The minister stood up and quoted figures from Oilweek, which I personally think are old figures. They are really last year's projections before the National Energy Program came into effect. Those figures will not be borne out. There will be a downturn in the Alberta oil and gas economy, also in the economies of Saskatchewan and British Columbia. I do not believe any of those figures. I do believe the guys who came into my office. They are working men, and they also went to the minister's office. I see a member to my right nodding, they also went to his office. I looked at them, and as a lawyer the minister knows that the best evidence is live evidence, what we lawyers call viva voce evidence. I could judge their credibility. It seemed to me they were credible. They were small time industry workers and they told me they were suffering. I believed them. They are suffering from the National Energy Program. For the minister to stand up and say that they are not suffering is simply hogwash. It goes against the best evidence there is—they were there and they were suffering.

The third point I offer to the government arising out of the minister's speech is the fact that the minister says we are developing Canada lands. He is asking us to look at all the exploration which is taking place, for example Dome Petroleum and others who, with all that public money, are exploring and developing Canada lands. "Canada lands" means the north and the offshore, it does not mean Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, where the minister cannot be the dictator. I ask this question of the government for reply in this debate: why develop Canada lands when you have Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia to develop? That does not make any sense to me. Why go to the high costs in the Arctic and offshore when you have Alberta with conventional gas? This does not make any sense to me. I submit that it does not make any sense to the average Canadian either. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) was saying, and I do not agree with his philosophy, why buy imported offshore oil when we have Alberta oil? It does not make sense for the minister to say, "Let us develop Canada lands", except if we accepted a rather Machiavellian interpretation of what the minister is doing. Is he saying that he will go around Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia rather than deal with them? That is exactly the opposite of what Mr. Pearson said in the House in terms of co-operative federalism.

The minister said in the House, as well, that well before the end of the decade, by 1990, the people of Canada will own over 50 per cent of the industry. We support that. Who doesn't? Maybe a few hon. members to my right who have an ideological hang-up on public ownership do not agree, thereby going against the entire Canadian social history and the history of their own party. But other than those few members, we on this side of the House support that effort. In Sault Ste. Marie in 1974 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that we would own 50 per cent of the industry by 1980. Mr. Speaker, there is just no credibility there.

I would like to deal, in the time I have left, with what I consider are now the positions of the three political parties in Canada on energy. I hope that when I am outlining our position I can suggest some principles upon which we can settle by negotiation the dispute with Alberta. I agree with all speakers that this is the number one problem. It is one of the big problems in the Canadian economy today.

I should say right away that both the Conservative spokesman and myself do not think that the National Energy Program is working. It was supposed to help Canadian companies; but these little guys, these Canadian companies, are telling us they are going out of business. Something is wrong there; and I will tell you what is wrong. What is wrong is that the major foreign-owned companies are making their profits downstream. By that I mean in marketing, in pipelining and in selling gasoline at the pumps. The little Canadian companies make their money and do their work in exploration and development. So what does the government do? It puts an 8 per cent wellhead tax at the exploration and development stage. Whom does this hurt? The little guys? One does not hear the big companies squealing. One hears the little guys squealing. So what kind of a Canadianization policy is that? To me it does not make sense, and that is one of the reasons we are opposing the National Energy Program. They are scared. My colleague said they are scared of the big companies. I will come back to that in a moment.

With respect to the Conservative policies outlined by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, it seems to me it is simply that the industry should be given a free hand. He said, and I quote, "The pricing schedule is not sufficient to bring about new investment". That is the industry line: "Give us more and more and more." That is the line my friends to the right are taking. They believe it. They are advancing it. However, it seems to me it will result in high profits to the industry. There have been record profits over the past few years. It will result in continued foreign ownership. We must tackle that problem. There is no way of getting around it. Either we tackle it or we do not tackle it, and that kind of "let the industry have a free hand" will mean continued foreign ownership. Finally, with continued foreign ownership, it will always mean pressure for high prices.

What is the Liberal policy? We have had a lot of fancy talk. In 1973 we had a national energy program. The Prime Minister said:

> Its prime objective, to be reached before the end of the decade is self-sufficiency in oil and oil products.

In 1973, the big target was 1980. Now, in 1980, the target is 1990. The fact is that the government has not done anything very much in the past to really tackle the oil industry. What is it doing now? The minister says it plans to support renewables and conservation, but it gives $20 million to Canartech and $40 million to Imperial Oil to continue on with its development in the tar sands. Mr. Bertrand came out with a report in which he said the oil companies made excessive profits over the time the government was in office, and the time that the Conservatives were in office as well, and that these excessive profits and rip-offs were continuing. What did the government do? Well, Mr. Bertrand was moved; he went to the Anti-dumping Tribunal. He was dumped on the Anti-dumping Tribunal, and that is what happened.

The minister also talks about opening up the north. As we found out, the National Energy Program, in the opening up of the Canada lands in Bill C-48, has, in fact, brought problems to the north. The northern governments are upset and the native people are losing their rights. Because it cannot solve its dispute with Alberta, this government is prepared to bring in a national energy policy which will destroy the lands, in my submission, destroy the environment of Canada's north and destroy the native people in Canada. That is the bottom line.

An hon. Member: Come on!

Mr. Waddell: The hon. member does not believe that. He should read the submissions which were made to the committee. There are all kinds of government reports to say that if the north is opened up too quickly, that is what will happen.

I wanted to say something about the position of our party. I can see an hon. member saying, "It is about time." He should talk about his own party and stop criticizing. What I would basically like to set out today is the position of our party. It is very simple. We believe in Canadianization; but to us Canadianization does not mean to take over Petrofina, number eighteen from the list of companies. We would make Petro-Canada number one in the oil industry by taking over Imperial Oil. Second, we believe in conservation and renewables. We will put a massive effort into conservation and into renewables, not this picky little effort of the government, and we would follow some of the recommendations of the recent report of the task force of the House of Commons.

Third, we believe in provincial ownership. This is essential. I heard the hon. members applaud when the minister gave his last statement. I asked the hon. members on the opposite side, on the Liberal benches, to think about what the minister said. The fact is that the resources belong to the provinces, and that is in the Constitution. It is in the British North America Act. It is in the new Constitution, and that is generally accepted.

The provinces have been painted as the bad guys here. They have said that in spite of the fact that the resources belong to them, they are prepared to share. They are prepared not to ask for world price, but only for 75 per cent of the world price. They are even prepared to share the revenue they then get, recognizing that oil prices are extraordinary. We in the New Democratic Party reject world price. We do not believe in the world price; but we are prepared to listen to the provinces when they request their share and the prices they want.

For the federal government's share, if the federal government wants to subsidize oil prices in this company, then the federal government must take less of the amount. In a way, that respects the principle of provincial ownership, and it respects the problem we have in this country of not rushing the high oil prices right away. So in this country we can, in fact, have lower oil prices, but we can meet the requirements of the provincial governments. We can take off the 8 per cent wellhead tax and we can take off the 30-cent per thousand cubic feet gas tax because they are discriminatory taxes. They fall against the west.

I just returned from Alberta and from Saskatchewan. The producing provinces in the west are incensed with that tax. It is all very well for the majority in eastern Canada. I say this as a member of Parliament from British Columbia, which is both a consuming and producing province, and as one who might stand in the middle, as a member of the party which represents producing and consuming provinces, not like the hon. members opposite who only represent consuming provinces. If they continue to treat the west the way they are, they will have a separated west, or they will have—

An hon. Member: Come on!

Mr. Waddell: Do not say, "Come on", to me.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Waddell: There is deep discontent in the west, and it is about time this government realized that.

[Translation]

Mr. Tousignant: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Témiscamingue on a point of order.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be suggesting that the provinces should receive more royalties. Can he tell us what the Americans and the American states—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If the hon. member wants to ask a question, he must have unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: I asked the hon. member to listen to what I am saying. I am saying that we must try to meet the legitimate requests. The hon. member is a Quebecer, and I suspect that he understands the legitimate request of the province to control its own resources, to get a fair price for them, and to not be pressed or told what to do by the federal government and to not be discriminated against, but to work with the federal government. The government does not go around putting a tax on electricity going to the United States. That is what I am trying to say. Outside the House, or maybe later if I have time, I will talk to the hon. member about that.

I want to conclude by saying that it is no good to have a national energy policy without having an increased public sector role. That is really the kind of modern world we are talking about. If we are going to have Canadianization, we must talk about that. We must also talk a little bit about not giving away all this kind of money which we propose to give away in the north as direct grants without getting some equity for the Canadian people and without getting some control.

Finally, we must tie into a national industrial strategy. The people are groping with that in this House. The Conservatives have suggested that there will be an impact in Ontario if we slow down oil production. We must flush that out and bring in shipbuilding in British Columbia where I come from. We are interested in that development as well. So we must tie into an industrial strategy.

Let me just conclude by saying we do not think the National Energy Program is working. We applaud all these great statements of Canadianization, conservation, substitution and so on. We want to see it work in practice. Too many Liberal statements in the past have turned out to be just pious hopes. I have suggested today, in I hope, a very positive, Pearsonian spirit, that we can reach an agreement with the provinces based on the principles I have set out. I hope to speak further on these principles in the House at another time. I think we can get this agreement very soon. The world will pass us by if we do not get together to solve the energy problem in this country. We will all suffer as a result.

● (1720)

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak in this House on this very important subject. I am sorry that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is not present because I should like to bring a very positive direction to the energy question, particularly from those in the field and the people in the service and supply industry in my area who are suffering as a result of the energy dispute.

The minister referred to the import compensation program which he defended vigorously in the House just a few minutes ago. I should like to deal with the facts as they are in the field, with the international situation and also with the deficit that this country faces because of the import policies and compensation program of this government.

We import 150,000 barrels of oil per day from Mexico and Saudi Arabia which costs taxpayers $8.8 million per day. This is the equivalent of $1 million per hour for an eight-hour working day, to say nothing of the spin-off benefits that would accrue to the economy of the country if the minister would address the National Energy Program in a positive manner.

The National Energy Program should be the number one plank for solving the economic problems facing us today. Instead, it has become the number one business mistake made by any government in this century, particularly the government of which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is a member.

I want to deal with the local conditions in the province of Saskatchewan which the minister addressed, Mr. Speaker. He said that royalties in Saskatchewan are high. They are. The minister did not explain to the people of Canada, and particularly the people of eastern Canada who are not aware of the situation, that Saskatchewan wells have low production. The average production of a Saskatchewan oil well is 19 barrels; the average production in Alberta is 60 barrels. The minister is unfair to the people of Canada when he neglects to clarify that point.

I want to bring to the attention of the members of the House and all those who are interested in the national energy policy a situation which arose this past week in my riding of Assiniboia. There are 480 wells of which PanCanadian is the unit operator, covering 65 other oil companies. Production at those 480 wells has been cut by 75 per cent because in the production of 14,000 barrels per day throughout the last year, the companies lost $564,000. The energy picture in western Canada has been clouded since October 28, at a time when it should be having the biggest boom in its history. If this is not a serious situation, then I do not know what is.

In the Williston Basin, which is 100 miles south, in the area of Estevan, Weyburn, Radville and Midale, and the oil field of southern Saskatchewan which is a part of the Williston Basin, production has decreased by 75 per cent but the production in Williston-North Dakota has increased by 75 per cent. Mr. Speaker, 139 oil rigs have left. I recall that I was one of the first members to rise in this House and ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he did not fear that the oil rigs would be driven out of the country. He would not even admit to the possibility. That went on until last July and then began again last fall. We on this side of the House kept asking the minister whether he did not fear that his energy policy would drive the rigs out and he continued to defend his position, claiming that his policies would not have this effect. But, Mr. Speaker, we have lost 139 rigs.

As a result of Bill C-42, in 1972 we lost 65 oil rigs, not one of which has returned. Canada has one of the finest oil drilling fleets in the world, and it is being driven into the arms of Americans for their benefit instead of being used for the benefit of the Canadian people. All that drilling technology and so on is lost as well.

I should like now to turn to the service and supply industry. My colleague in the NDP mentioned that these people are suffering very badly, and that is true. The industry is suffering as never before. There is about a 40 per cent reduction in employment, and small Canadian companies are being hurt.

The national energy policy pretends to address the Canadian situation and Canadianization of the industry, but in fact it is North Dakota, Montana and Texas which are being Canadianized. The rigs, the expertise and the investment capital are being driven out. All this will have far-reaching effects on our economy which will not soon be forgotten.

I should now like to turn to the matter of capital. For the past year I have been a member of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works which deals with energy. One member of the committee invariably asks how much capital is being spent in Canada. In most cases, whether the company concerned was Canadian or foreign, it was a fortunate thing for the Canadian people if they responded that as much as 25 per cent or 30 per cent of their total capital investment is spent in Canada.

The outflow of capital due to the government's energy policy and the minister's direction, is a frightening thing at this time, not only on the provincial scene but in the Canada lands as well. The Canadian people should not forget about this question because it is a very serious one in terms of the outflow of capital. There was mention of $1.5 billion to be spent by 1983 in the Canada lands. In testimony at the committee, the Norwegians made it abundantly clear that it is important to have the participation of all the majors in a project as large as Hibernia and the North Sea development.

It is most important that our energy policy address itself to that. I would like to get back to the local scene in Saskatchewan and elsewhere in western Canada and to what is happening there. There is a job loss of about 40 per cent. Many small operators possibly will not be able to hang on beyond another month or two as a result of this energy policy.

About 120 service and supply people from Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia appeared in Ottawa and painted a very serious and sad picture of the energy policy in Canada at this time. One hundred and thirty-nine rigs have left, as well as a great number of service rigs. There is 40 per cent unemployment and a 50 per cent cutback in exploration. The minister just said in this House that exploration would be up. It was intended that some 1,500 new wells would be drilled for exploration this year. It is now predicted that less than 700 new wells will be drilled. That is what is happening to our industry.

What about pricing? We now pay Mexico $42.50 a barrel for their oil. In Weyburn, Saskatchewan and in Alberta they pay $15.75 a barrel for heavier crude and $17.75 for lighter crude. This means a loss of jobs and a loss of opportunity for the people of this country. The minister of energy would prefer to buy oil from Mexico and Saudi Arabia at more than twice the price than give Canadians an opportunity to have jobs in their own country.

What about the spin-off benefits for the people in Ontario, Quebec, those in the rubber industry and in manufacturing industries? I do not think there is one industry in Canada that would not be affected by the spin-off benefits from the production of oil in western Canada.

We have to be realistic. We in western Canada are good Canadians. We want to be a part of building this country. However, we want to be treated fairly. For 100 years the industrial sector of the world dominated the economic scene, not only in Toronto, Montreal, North America but across the world. Suddenly under OPEC, energy has become number one. Somehow western Canada is supposed to be second place to all of this activity and accept $15 a barrel while everyone else receives $40 a barrel. We are reasonable people. If the price of oil were increased by $4 a barrel, we would be receiving half the world price, which might be reasonable.

The members of this House and the people of Canada should start to think very seriously about what the minister of energy is doing to our country. As I said before, the people of western Canada are good Canadians. It just happens that we produce energy and food. I repeat, for 100 years the industrial sector of the world dominated the economic scene. Suddenly that sector is in trouble. The government which represents the golden horseshoe is saying to western Canadians that it will take with its big powerful hand of government what is necessary to keep this country going in the direction it has been. There is nothing wrong with that. We in western Canada think the federal government should have a fair share, but let us be reasonable. The future potential of Canada is great in manufacturing, energy and food, but we must work together as a country and a people.

When my colleague spoke previously, he warned about the dividing factor this energy policy has become under the direction of the minister of energy. It is very serious, and the frustration in western Canada is great. The minister must address the cold war between east and west as it relates to the energy policy.

I want to address another area of the energy policy. There is a very definite parallel in the direction in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to lead this country with the Constitution and the energy policy. Make no mistake about it. I want to read a paragraph from the book "Reaction: The National Energy Program" put out by the Fraser Institute in Vancouver, British Columbia. I quote:

> It is ironic that a program of government, designed to "secure the nation's energy future" should have such a damaging effect on the industrial sectors and the provinces uniquely capable of achieving it. Perhaps it is this inconsistency that has led some observers to claim that the new energy program is, in fact, a political document more concerned about short-run political objectives than energy security.

The direction of this government's energy policy is to nationalize the oil industry. Through Bill C-48, the move in the Canada lands and the 200-mile offshore in Canada lands, the federal government gives to the Crown corporation Petro-Can 25 per cent. There is a move to nationalize the oil industry. Through Bill C-48, it gives extraordinary powers and privileges to the minister of energy to take up as much as 50 per cent in some cases.

Because of my statement about the energy policy and the Constitution running parallel, I want to read something written by the Prime Minister on an earlier day when he wrote about the practice and theory of federalism dealing with constitutional reform and what he thought should happen to Canada in 1960, some 20 years ago. He wrote:

If the whole of the Canadian electorate could miraculously be converted to socialist ideals at one fell swoop, there would be no reason to discuss strategy in the present context. Socialism would be achieved with or without federalism, and socialist administrations would be installed at every level of governmental affairs, no matter the form of the Constitution.

I want to suggest to you that it is not by chance that running parallel with the nationalization direction and the Constitution of Canada is the energy policy. We are faced with a new direction that will lay an industry in western Canada flat on its back, if needs be, to achieve this end. That is exactly what is happening. The Canadianization program and the energy program of Canada at this time are taking that kind of direction.

What is the cost of the energy program to the people of Canada at this time? Some experts have projected that the cost of the energy program, including the cost of the spin-off effects amount to $1 million an hour, not taking into account the $8 million it is costing us to pay for the 150,000 barrels of oil we are bringing into Canada daily. I refer to the spin-off effects, the loss of jobs to Canadians, the loss to the car industry of Ontario and the loss to the manufacturing sector of Ontario.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I find in listening to the debate this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, that there seems to be some confusion on the part of the hon. member opposite who moved the motion. His motion reads:

That this House condemns the government's National Energy Program—

Yet the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) the same member who moved the motion condemning the National Energy Program, stated on January 22:

—I am in agreement with the broad objectives of the program. Who in this country would not be in favour of self-sufficiency, an increase in Canadian ownership, and fairness in pricing and revenue sharing?

On the one hand the hon. member opposite condemns the program, and on the other hand he says he is in agreement with it.

I suppose one should not be too surprised by that contradiction because one has aften heard of similar instances during the course of our energy debates in this House. We have, for example, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) going to Alberta, urging the Alberta government to "hang tough" as I believe he put it, in discussions with the national government, in demanding higher and higher oil prices. Yet that same member when he returns to his native province of Newfoundland, or indeed here in the House of Commons, deplores the impact of higher oil prices on our economy and particularly on inflation. I do not know how the hon. member is able to reconcile those two obviously contradictory points of view.

Of course, we know of the confused Conservative Party attitude toward Petro-Canada. We have seen a series of positions taken, starting with outright condemnation, to gradual acceptance, and then to full acceptance. The other day the Leader of the Conservative Party (Mr. Clark) said, yes, after all, let us have Petro-Canada. That did not deter the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) who within a few days said, as reported in The Calgary Herald, that there are too many Crown corporations in Canada, let us get rid of some. Obviously, he added, Petro-Canada would be a good place to start. I do not think we need to feel any real surprise about the contradictions that are before us in this motion when we have, as I pointed out, the same hon. member supporting the National Energy Program and then turning around and condemning it.

In supporting the program, he specified three principal objectives: self-sufficiency in oil, added to the self-sufficiency in all other forms of energy which Canadians already enjoy; an increase in Canadian ownership; and fairness in pricing and revenue sharing. Let me deal with one or two of those points which, indeed, are principal objectives of the National Energy Program.

The petroleum industry is and will, of course, continue to be one of the largest and most prosperous sectors of our economy. The industry will benefit immensely from the effects of increased prices foreseen in the energy program, and particularly from the incentive grants to help ensure that Canadians achieve oil self-sufficiency, as well as benefiting from a greater degree of conservation and oil substitution.

We do not, however, accept that fundamental decisions affecting Canada's petroleum industry, that most dynamic sector of our economy, should be made primarily in the boardrooms of multinational companies outside Canada.

Since 1974, for example, the petroleum industry has been a major exporter of capital from Canada. Such capital exports would grow if we had not introduced the National Energy Program, and grow so substantially that our balance of payments situation would deteriorate causing yet further strain on the Canadian dollar and, indeed, fuelling inflation.

By ignoring the problem of foreign ownership and domination of the industry in the past, Canadians in fact forfeited a significant share of the benefits from the strong resource sector we fortunately have in this country. We have many sources of energy in rich supply, and we intend to ensure that our energy resources benefit all Canadians.

A recent report by the Royal Bank of Canada, noting the strong base for growth that we enjoy in this country, offered the following appraisal of the Canadian economy. It predicted that over this decade employment opportunities will increase faster than the growth of the labour force. The Royal Bank estimated that the unemployment rate will fall to 6 per cent by 1985 and about 4 per cent by 1990, which is in fact, in the statistician's terms, almost no unemployment at all. The bank went on to suggest that Canada's potential growth rate will remain above that of the United States and rank second only to Japan among the seven major industrialized countries. I note these forecasts, Mr. Speaker, because that is the context in which the energy developments of the months and years ahead will bring benefit to all Canadians.

In the Atlantic provinces energy resources are behind much of the Atlantic renaissance, and that certainly will continue. Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Alberta will, of course, be the major beneficiaries of future energy developments in the area of conventional oil and in oil sands. It is against that background that we are working toward an agreement with the government of Alberta. I am sure that all members of the House look toward that agreement emerging in the time ahead.

● (1750)

Throughout the industrialized world, oil-fuelled inflation remains a persistent problem. We have noted how the two major OPEC-imposed price increases of 1973 and 1979 led to a rapid growth in inflation throughout the industrialized world. Yet we here in Canada have the opportunity to reduce that impact and to cushion the blow on our economy by developing our own resources.

Unlike hon. members opposite, we on this side of the House favour a made-in-Canada oil policy, not one that is made by OPEC, so as to benefit all Canadian consumers. Apart from sheltering consumers from the severe impact of unpredictable oil price hikes imposed from outside our country, we shall encourage all Canadian explorers and producers of oil and gas in Canada to participate to a yet greater degree in the industry. We shall do that through Canadianization and, through the activities of Petro-Canada.

I want to cite a few examples of the growing success of our Canadianization program. Obviously Canadian companies see the petroleum incentives program announced in the National Energy Program as a catalyst for putting together deals with largely foreign companies which control so much of the land both in the frontier areas and in the provinces. There is growing evidence too—we have seen articles and news announcements in profusion recently—about the reaction to the incentives which are being offered. There are high expectations for the east coast. Not only will the major Hibernia and Sable Island deposits bring great benefit, but other opportunities are also being identified, partly in response to the initiatives taken under the National Energy Program.

In the Arctic the recent discovery of oil by the Panarctic consortium is encouraging. In the Beaufort Sea, Dome's activities are clearly accelerating, and development will reach record levels. Other Canadian companies such as Norcen are joining with foreign-controlled corporations in the search in the Arctic areas as well.

Therefore, there is certainly no need to be sombre. Indeed, there is every reason to be expectant and optimistic about the opportunities on Canada lands, the frontier areas of Canada. As the minister noted, oil exploration activity on Canada lands this year is at record levels. It shows every prospect of continuing and reaching much higher levels in the years ahead. That is an ample refutation of claims by hon. members opposite who continue to argue against the thrust of the National Energy Program.

I have cited several major activities on Canada lands, but I would not want to pass over the fact that other corporations have recently announced new initiatives. Husky Oil has indicated an intention to play a new role in offshores exploration. Real-West Energy Corporation has acquired potentially the largest single shareholdings in Asamera Inc. and United Canso, a step in the direction of Canadianization and further development. There is growing evidence that many foreign-owned companies are adjusting their ownership structures to take advantage of the incentives offered under the National Energy Program. The government's agreement with Dome Petroleum regarding the creation of Dome Canada is only the first example of many which I am sure will emerge in the time ahead.

I could cite, for example, the case of PanCanadian Petroleum which has formed a new east coast exploration group with Norcen and Roxy Petroleum. Another Calgary company, Ranchmen's Resources, has restructured its shares using the Dome Canada arrangement as a model.

I cite these examples to indicate to hon. members opposite that the National Energy Program constitutes a new and innovative approach to energy policy in Canada. For aggressive and forward-looking companies the program obviously offers immense benefits. Contrary to what the previous speaker said about his fears of some obscure move toward nationalization, we see in fact ample evidence of private entrepreneurs in Canada taking the initiative to ensure that the Canadianization goals set by the government will be achieved.

Of course, not all Canadians can hope to participate in the Canadianization of the industry through the acquisition of shares. For those who cannot take or do not take that route, participation is achieved through Petro-Canada. Canadians can all benefit through their own Crown corporation in major oil and gas activities. I find it ironic that we still hear from hon. members opposite attacks on Petro-Canada. Any brief review of the past years will indicate a remarkable confusion on the part of hon. members opposite about where they stand on the question of a national petroleum corporation.

I remind hon. members that in 1974 when we created Petro-Canada it was to provide a window on the industry. It was to provide a toe-hold, so to speak, at the exploration and research end of the petroleum industry, with an initial capital investment of some $500 million. I remind hon. members that at that time the Leader of the Opposition said that Petro-Canada would become a $500 million white elephant.

Through the 1979 election campaign confusion and contradiction in the Conservative ranks increased even further. The free enterprise hawks were whetting their appetites at the thought of the carrion which was about to be created from the national oil company. Yet that was the same year, 1979, in which the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce said of Petro-Canada said: "It is serving a purpose, and my own feeling is that it should be left alone". Indeed, in a very short time we noted the chairman of Imperial Oil and other leaders in the petroleum industry recognizing that there was an important role for Petro-Canada to play. Perhaps as a result of those or other factors, the Conservative party then changed course from its days in opposition, and when it came to power it passed through a remarkable series of acrobatics about who should own Petro-Canada, what its share structure should be, whether it should be a Crown corporation or not, whether it should be partly owned by the public or through direct share ownership, whether it should be entirely in private hands, and so forth.

Finally, during the 1980 campaign the Leader of the Opposition asserted that Petro-Canada's mandate should be broadened—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) proceedings on the motion have expired.

This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AGRICULTURE

HOG STABILIZATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The urgency of this matter is in connection with the May 21, 1981 announcement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) regarding the 1980-81 hog stabilization payment.

Since this measure violates the minister's discretionary powers under the 30-year-old Agricultural Stabilization Act, thus making his action illegal and, in addition, causes inequities to producers not only between but also within provinces, I move, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this Minister of Agriculture immediately revise the application of this much needed program in such a manner as to avoid the penalization of producers who, because of the lack of adequate leadership and financial commitment on the part of the federal government, have purchased additional coverage and protection from their own provincial governments.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

VIA RAIL

RECOMMENDATION THAT OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY BE IMPLEMENTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an urgent matter.

Referring to VIA Rail Canada Inc., the Commissioner of Official Languages stated in his report that the quality of services in French on the trains remains quite inadequate throughout the country, even on lines crossing Quebec, because VIA Rail Canada continues to give priority to the principle of seniority in the choice of routes by its staff, with the inevitable result that too frequently the trains are manned by unilingual crews. Such a situation, which is ridiculous besides being frustrating and which might be hazardous, goes against the intent of the Official Languages Act, and particularly falls short of the promise concerning French services made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and others during the referendum campaign. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the House condemn VIA Rail Canada for the shortcomings of its official languages policy, and urge the Minister of Transport to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that this policy will be carried out by the Crown corporation, and that in the meantime the minister recommend that VIA Rail Canada act immediately with a view to eliminating this hazardous situation.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED ISSUANCE OF COMMEMORATIVE STAMP TO HONOUR ST. ALBERT, ALTA.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. One hundred and twenty years ago one of the very first western missionaries, Father Lacombe, established the mission of St. Albert in Alberta which, down through the years, has contributed much to the opening and development of the west. This year St. Albert, a city on the outskirts of Edmonton, will be celebrating its birthday in grand fashion. In the interest of preserving some of the national and historical nature of St. Albert, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the government issue a commemorative stamp honouring St. Albert and its founder, Father Lacombe, on this its 120th birthday, and that the site of the original mission be declared a national monument.

THE LATE CARDINAL WYSZYNSKI OF POLAND

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise to seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Kushner):

That this House express profound sadness and sympathy to the Polish people and the Roman Catholic church on the death of Cardinal Wyszynski, Primate of the Roman Catholic Church of Poland.

Cardinal Wyszynski was a very distinguished representative of the church and a dignified son of Poland. He was a great proponent of respect for human dignity, and his absence will be felt by all.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House will want to express its sentiments by its applause.

FORESTRY

FUNDING FOR FREDERICTON, N.B., COMPLEX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the declared commitment of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), who is responsible for forestry, made last December 1, almost six months ago in Fredericton, to the Maritime Forestry Complex in that city, and in view of the fact that the land sale exchange for the complex is now near completion and that officials have yet to hear from the federal government as to when the funds will be available, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Minister of the Environment now live up to his commitment of December 1, 1980, and immediately inform this House when the government will put its money where his mouth is, commit these funds publicly, and begin to clear up the huge research and development and forestry education backlog, which all agree is stopping the forest industry in Canada from meeting its potential for huge growth.

AIRPORTS

FUTURE OF PICKERING, ONT., PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My constituents have been disturbed, disgusted, and divided for almost a decade by the Pickering airport issue. Last month the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) indicated that the Pickering lands confiscated from farmers in my riding will remain "in the refrigerator" until the 1990s. This means 20 years with the government acting as a slum landlord to an 18,000 acre wasteland.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to stop sitting on the fence and tell us once and for all if plans to build the airport are being finalized, or if the bureaucrats will return the Pickering lands to the people.

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS AND SMALL BUSINESSMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity. Every person in this House surely understands the importance in this country of agricultural small business, yet the government insists on sitting quietly by and watching thousands of hard-working Canadians in both farming and small businesses go bankrupt—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Shame!

Mr. Bradley: —the same government that unhesitatingly aided Chrysler, that spent billions of dollars in setting up a government oil company, and set up a cartel to help uranium producers get a good price. Is it not time, Madam Speaker, that they did something for our farmers and small businessmen in order to halt this unacceptable situation of interest rates and overhead? I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the government immediately take steps to offset the effects of high interest rates and overhead on the farmers and small businessmen of Canada.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY WILDCAT STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas the Canadian Labour Board upheld the dismissal of two CPR employees at Revelstoke; and whereas pressing for their reinstatement, other employees at Revelstoke, led by a handful of militants, are on a wildcat strike has virtually stopped the movement of grain between Calgary and the west coast, and whereas it is absolutely ridiculous when a handful of persons can inconvenience and jeopardize the livelihood of thousands of farmers, to say nothing about the possible loss of markets, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House urges the federal government to take immediately any and all steps necessary to stop this costly nonsense and to get the grain moving again.

AIR TRANSPORT

SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND NEW YORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given that the Canadian Transport Commission has not yet made a decision on an Ottawa-New York City air link, even though a three-month search has failed to turn up any willing American carriers, and given the fact that two Canadian carriers have expressed serious interest in providing this service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House urge the Minister of Transport to get off his duff, that is if doing so does not conflict with any CTC guidelines, and make an early decision to award the direct air service to one or the other of the interested Canadian carriers.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CURTAILMENT OF INVESTIGATION IN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, whereas it has now been established that both the provincial Crown attorney and the responsible RCMP officer originally assigned to the investigation of transactions between Mr. Roland Thornhill and a number of chartered banks were pulled off the case before their investigation was completed, and whereas it is clear that the so-called investigation by the inspector general of banks simply consisted of telephone calls to the banks themselves, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House calls on the government to launch a judicial inquiry into three particular questions involving Mr. Roland Thornhill; first, the agreements entered into between Mr. Roland Thornhill and a number of chartered banks for the forgiveness of certain loans; second, the reasons for the curtailment of local investigations by the head office of the RCMP and the attorney general of Nova Scotia; and third, the nature of the so called "investigation" carried out by the inspector general of banks.

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. During the February, 1978, first ministers' conference on the economy, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated, and I quote:

Premier Davis, your government in Ontario has introduced a refundable tax credit system to provide relief from property and sales tax for low and middle income taxpayers. Perhaps this is a model that should be pursued on a broader scale.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the national government introduce a new budget at the earliest possibility and include in it home owner property tax deductibility up to a reasonable maximum, for income tax calculations, to provide some relief for home owners and at the same time reduce the injustice of people paying taxes on taxes.

TAX-BASED INCOMES POLICY—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance who will know that yesterday his deputy minister testified that the Department of Finance is taking a very hard look at a new tax on Canadian workers, called generally a tax-based incomes policy. The minister will recall that in one of his own rare pronouncements recently on economic policy on May 6, he said:

> A tax-based incomes policy has not yet been devised that is both administratively feasible and fair. In particular, I have yet to see a TIP design that ultimately controls anything more than wage demands—

That was the position of the minister on May 6. First, is the government in fact looking at this new tax on Canadian workers? Second, have the minister's objections to the designs then before him been overcome, and is there a new design? Third, does the new tax his department is studying control anything more than wage demands?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is true that I mentioned a number of alternatives in that speech, I believe, before the Conference Board, including a TIP as it is called. I said that I had not seen a program which would recommend itself to me, but that the search was still going on. That is the situation as it is today; there has not been any new insight conveyed to me as to a workable and fair program.

As the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition may recall, I talked about the design of such a program and that a search for a suitable design would be continuing. That is the situation as it is now.

DESIGN OF SYSTEM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, perhaps the minister can give us a statement on the government's policy as to the kind of tax system which would be acceptable to it. If he does not find a design which does not have any effect other than controlling wage demands, if that is the only kind of design before him, will he reject this TIP approach?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the question is hypothetical, because I cannot foresee what further study or research migh reveal. But I believe the situation is clear, it is a proposal which one ought to look at in the light of inflationary pressure. One has to be sure that it is fair and administratively feasible and has a design which would bring that about. We have not found one yet; we are still looking. I believe that is what my deputy minister conveyed yesterday before the Senate committee.

DECLINE IN REAL WAGES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me pursue for a moment this question of fairness. The minister knows that, given the rate of inflation, the real income of Canadian workers has fallen. He knows that the average Canadian worker is now earning, in real terms, more than $500 a year less than he or she was earning in 1977. These people are the principal victims of inflation in Canada. Will the minister indicate how he could justify making these people, who are now the chief victims of inflation, also the chief targets of a new tax? Particularly when the government is prepared to be as helpful as it is to companies like Petro-Canada and to individuals like Maurice Strong, how can the minister justify dumping this special tax upon people?

Mr. Rae: And to companies like Imperial.

Mr. Clark: To companies like Imperial Oil, indeed. How can he justify helping out multinationals when he proposes to add to the cost burden of the average Canadian worker?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if the day ever comes when I will recommend such a program to the House of Commons, I assure my right hon. friend that I will be in a position to justify it to most sensible people.

DEINDEXING OF TAXATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday when the deputy minister of finance was before the Senate Committee on National Finance he described the effects of high interest rates as a holocaust. I would go further and suggest that it is a holocaust in which wage earners and home owners have been the real victims. He also indicated that they would continue.

In June the minister gave an assurance in the House that the government "would not attempt to solve the economic problems of the country or the fiscal requirements of the government on the backs of the low income people of this country."

• (1420)

In view of the fact the minister's deputy indicated yesterday that deindexing was a real consideration at the present time and, as the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, real incomes in this country are declining, and given the fact that deindexing will tax the average wage earner and let the high income earners of the country go free, is the minister prepared to give an assurance now, in light of the uncertainties which have been created, that there will be no deindexing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we went around this track last year. If the hon. member wants to play that game again he can go ahead, but I am telling him exactly the same thing I told him a year ago—when it comes to preparing for the budget all matters are up for consideration. He ought not to draw any particular conclusions from that with respect to indexation.

I should remind the hon. member and the Leader of the Opposition that when they talk about declines in real incomes in Canada, there has been a decline in productivity in Canada. It is about time hon. members opposite focus on the fact that you cannot have more by producing less. That is precisely what is happening in the country.

CHILD TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would say to the minister that it is the government and himself who are playing games with the Canadian people, since yesterday his deputy minister raised the spectre of credit controls in this country, amongst other things, which could set off a wave of inflationary buying in anticipation of credit controls.

Given the fact that we are told that high interest rates will continue and that the government has no response to the impact of interest rates on the average wage earners of the country, and in light of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare gave a kind of undertaking in this House the other day that there would be changes in the child tax credit program, I want to ask the minister if the government at this point in time is anticipating changes in the child tax credit program and/or the elimination of the child tax deduction.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is a bit out of date. He says that high interest rates will continue; obviously he has failed to notice that today at the treasury bill auction the bank rate declined by 38 basis points—a very significant drop. He ought to put that in his head.

Mr. Nielsen: Eighteen point six eight per cent.

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members never mention a drop in the bank rate, they are interested only in increases.

With respect to the child tax credit, when a policy is decided upon it will be announced in the House in the regular way.

AIR SAFETY

DUBIN ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—APPOINTMENT OF TASK FORCE MEMBERS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, which I find strange on the day following the publication of the Dubin Royal Commission Report on Aviation Safety, considering it is the first opportunity which members of this House have to ask questions, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

I appreciate the position of the Prime Minister in that he does not interfere with the responsibilities of each minister unless he asks them for a resignation, but can the Prime Minister tell the House that he will point out to the Minister of Transport that the appointment of the air administrator to the task force to implement the Dubin commission report is a direct conflict of interest and flies in the face of the report, in view of the fact that Mr. Justice Dubin has specifically mentioned that gentleman four times as one who created situations which interfered with aviation safety?

● (1425)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the important objective for the minister when he has an advisory council is to get a balanced view from experts in the aviation field.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: The advisory committee is composed of two people attached to the ministry, but there are also four competent outsiders who will give him an unbiased report. The final decisions will be the minister's to take. If public servants are not satisfied with the decision taken by the minister after the advice is given by that committee, a good civil servant knows what he has to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS FROM TASK FORCE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, we have a case here where the Prime Minister is letting the department run a minister instead of a minister run a department. Of the six names, two are presently in the ministry, one was a past deputy minister of Transport Canada, one previously served as legal council for the MOT; plus the air administrator, plus the assistant deputy minister. A majority are from the ministry of transport on this task force.

Since the government report named four senior Transport Canada officials who deliberately interfered with accident reports and enforcement of safety and rules in order to avoid, to quote Mr. Justice Dubin, "political embarrassment to the department and to the minister"—

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: —would the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Transport to remove the officials of the Ministry of Transport from the task force so as to implement this report?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Presence in Gallery

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I will reiterate my previous answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bockstael: The four outsiders are regarded as having wide qualifications for this job. As a result of the Dubin report there is a recommendation for an independent tribunal for Canadian aviation safety. The minister is in agreement with this kind of a commission or safety board, and it will be dealt with in due course.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

CONDUCT OF OFFICIALS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): I have a final supplementary question for the Prime Minister. The Dubin commission clearly raises serious questions about the performance of their duties by the senior officials in the air transport administration, and by the administrator specifically, interference in an air crash investigation in Vancouver Harbour in September of 1978. In September of 1979 at Sechelt an air crash in my own riding followed, and was almost caused by a failure to produce certain items out of that previous crash. In the interests of fairness, fair play, and an unbiased evaluation of these incidents, and the implementation of the recommendations from an excellent report, would the Prime Minister consider relieving the administrator and those named officials until such time as an investigation can be conducted into the propriety of their actions in those investigations? Possibly another anti-dumping tribunal?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport is satisfied with the committee he has established. He will consider the first recommendation of the Dubin report to establish a Canadian aviation safety tribunal, and this will meet the recommendations of that report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF HON. D. T. MATENJE, MINISTER OF EDUCATION, AND HON. L. C. CHAZIYA, MINISTER OF FINANCE, OF MALAWI

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of two representatives from the Government of Malawi, the Honourable D. T. Matenje, Minister of Education, and the Honourable L. C. Chaziya, Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

FUTURE OF PROGRAM

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding the disappearing $4 billion Western Development Fund. Last fall the minister promised that he would consult with the provinces and bring out a spending blueprint by January, 1981. In March the minister said that, instead of a blueprint, propositions would be made public, to be used for discussions in western Canada. Has the minister given up on a blueprint and, if so, when will the spending propositions be made public, or has the minister lost control of this program completely?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the blueprint and the strategy by which the federal government can provide major support for economic development in the west, are already in place. We signed a major grain agreement with the Soviet Union—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: We have given major assistance to the very important development of the LRT system in the hon. member's home city of Vancouver, which will enable major development of new technology in western Canada so that we can aid in the expansion and diversification of industry in that area. There has been major assistance in a number of economic development initiatives in the city of Winnipeg in the development of the Canertech Corporation. There is already a very clear and very relevant blueprint in place and working for the benefit of people in western Canada.

CONSULTATION WITH WESTERN CANADIAN INTERESTS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the same minister. I would ask him whether the blueprint that is already in place is the blueprint which he said would be in place in January, 1981. In view of the fact that the Right Hon. Prime Minister said a few weeks ago that no formal discussion had taken place with the western provinces, and in view of the fact that he is trying to spend $350 million in this fiscal year and $2 billion in the next three years, and that as yet there is no proposition, no blueprint, and no formal discussions have taken place, I should like to ask when formal discussions will take place. When will the propositions be made available? When can we count on the disappearing $4 billion fund being resurrected and presented to us so that we can see what it is?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in the budget the Minister of Finance very clearly indicated that there would be a commitment to put into place additional programs and projects to aid industrial development, and to look at areas of transportation and native development in western Canada. Those propositions are being worked on and are the subject of a wide variety of discussions between members of government and all kinds of interest groups in western Canada. They are ongoing discussions. When the propositions are prepared and ready, I can assure the hon. member that they will be available for his response as well as the response of the provincial governments.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

TABLING OF REPORT ON MARKETING OF URANIUM

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister undertake this afternoon to table in this House the report of the uranium inquiry prior to the House recessing for the summer, so that it might be the subject matter of discussion in this House prior to the summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice has informed the House that the report has been referred to him as provided for by the law and that his officials were looking into the question of whether charges should be laid. If they are, the matter will become public; if not, I believe that there are—

Mr. Nielsen: That is not what Ouellet said. Ouellet said it would be tabled.

Mr. Trudeau: Now we have an opinion from the Yukon, Madam Speaker. Maybe you could recognize him on a supplementary.

METHODS OF SUBMITTING BIDS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the Prime Minister. During the currency of the cartel, did the Prime Minister ever have any information or belief, direct or indirect, as to the sham bid-rigging methods employed by the cartel members in raising the price of uranium?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the question contains an allegation of something being done with sham. I know nothing of that, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: That's good; we have got him on that.

Mr. Trudeau: Joe says they have got us.

Oral Questions

EMPLOYMENT

TASK FORCE REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. According to a confidential report of the minister's task force on labour market policies in the 80s, it is recommending to the cabinet that the goal of full employment be re-examined and that as many as 500,000 people from Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces will be forced to move to the west over the next five years in order to make a living. May I ask the minister why this report recommends a retreat from the full-employment goal and why further financial incentives should be given for people to move from where they now live to new areas, rather than providing the money to make job opportunities available for people in the areas in which they live?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that whatever report he may have, there is not yet a final report; it is still being worked on. It would be remiss of me to try to respond to random or ad hoc comments drawn from a report which has not yet been tabled in the House.

SHARED-COST EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the report also recommends that the federal government reduce its expenditures on post-secondary education. That recommendation is in line with the proposals of the Minister of Finance in his budget. The report recommends that the current federal contributions of $2 to $3 out of every $4 for post-secondary education be reduced to $1 out of $4, and that student fees be increased. Can the minister explain how, according to this report, "such a scheme would have the advantage of encouraging provincial governments to spend in federally desired areas" and that "students would be given more clout by having their fees raised"? How can that be done when the government wants to reduce its costs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Once again, I should like to point out to the hon. member that it is somewhat irresponsible to take isolated items from a report which is not yet published or final and has not been tabled, and try to make a case. I am sure the hon. member can wait, as other members will, for the completion of those reports and get the full and comprehensive picture. He will see that we are developing major strategies to aid and develop employment programs for this country and to ensure that we can meet the skills shortage which we all know is very critical to our economic health.

Oral Questions

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION INTO ABDUCTION OF 15-YEAR-OLD ALBERTA GIRL

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. On April 22 of this year in the village of Standard, about 60 miles east of Calgary, a lovely 15-year-old girl, named Kelly Cook, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. Cook, was kidnapped by a stranger. Kelly thought she was going to babysit for a neighbour. She has not been heard of since. The RCMP and hundreds of friends and neighbours have carried out an extensive ground search for clues, but without any success.

Will the Solicitor General bend every effort to alert the people and the police across Canada to be on the lookout for Kelly, culminating, we pray, in the safe return of Kelly to her home?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am glad to inform the House that I have already done so. When I was in Alberta last week I took the opportunity to discuss this case with the commanding officer. Although the investigation is being conducted under the provincial police program, I did express a considerable concern about it.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the work and the attitude of the Solicitor General, and also the work that the RCMP is doing.

BORDER POST RECORDS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): My supplementary question is intended for the Minister of National Revenue, Madam Speaker, but I wonder if his parliamentary secretary could answer in his absence. There is a possibility that Kelly has been taken to the U.S.A. or Mexico. Will the minister alert his personnel at the ports of entry to check their records and be on the look out, with any clues to be sent immediately to the RCMP at Strathmore?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker I will pass that along to my colleague, and if that has not already been done, it will be done.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INCREASED CANADIANIZATION OF SERVICE

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Communications. Yesterday the minister was kind enough to remind the House that in the past I have criticized the CBC for not spending more money on original production. He failed to add that the CRTC agreed with me in rejecting the application for CBC-2 for reasons which were outlined by three of my Conservative colleagues and myself when we appeared before the CRTC last January.

Since the minister was apparently prepared to find the $30 million for CBC-2, what steps is he taking to ensure that there are additional funds available for the increased Canadianization of the basic CBC-1 service?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, as I indicated a number of times before, the whole question of the CRTC licence is one which was quite properly dealt with by the CRTC itself. On the question of the level of funding for the CBC, this matter received the attention of cabinet during the course of the preparation of estimates. Cabinet decided to give the CBC approximately a 12 per cent increase this year. That is now up. Because of the normal arm's length relationship between the government and the CBC, it is now the job of the board of directors of the CBC to determine how best and most efficiently these funds can be spent.

● (1440)

GOVERNMENT PRIORITIES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Communications. As he knows, the CRTC has indicated that it is willing to consider an application for an interim service on CBC-2, consisting mainly of repeats. What are the minister's priorities? Are they for an interim CBC-2 service or to upgrade the basic CBC-1 service by providing more original programming?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the position of the government is quite clear. We feel that the main objective, the main challenge which faces all people interested in the broadcasting industry in Canada is the development of a good Canadian program production industry, which will produce quality programs that Canadians will want to watch. That is the challenge. We hope to develop policy to help the private sector and, of course, the public sector to continue along these lines.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—UNITED STATES NAVY REPORT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Southam News in Washington reports that two months ago the U.S. navy's aircraft and evaluation division prepared a secret report on the F-18A. The U.S. Navy's report stated, quite frankly, the following:

> It is difficult to make a case on cost or effectiveness grounds for continuance of the F-18 program. To date, none of the expectations that were the basis for initiation and continuance of the program have been achieved.

Did the U.S. Secretary of Defence discuss this report with the Minister of National Defence during his visit to Ottawa in April?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I should reassure the hon. member for Victoria that in my discussions with Mr. Weinberger, the Secretary of State for Defence, we talked about practically all matters and documents relating to the F-18. Again reassurance was given to me that there was no problem with this program.

I was in Norfolk the day before yesterday with the navy and Admiral Train, who is in charge of the North Atlantic operations for the United States navy. He expects the F-18 to be the best plane the navy will ever have when it takes delivery of it, which will be as soon as possible.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I am pleased that Admiral Train did not refer to it as the best lemon they ever had, as the minister did.

The U.S. navy report suggested alternatives to the F-18A aircraft which are cheaper and more certain of military success. Also, the U.S. navy has asked "at least two manufacturers" for cost proposals on attack plane options. Has the Department of National Defence looked into the options available to Canada if the F-18A program is discontinued?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, we have not looked to any alternatives nor have any alternatives been given to the defence department. We do not see a need because the F-18 program is going on schedule, very successfully, and delivery in October, 1982, of the first F-18 to Canada has been guaranteed by the U.S. navy, by McDonnell Douglas, and by Mr. Weinberger on behalf of the U.S. government.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF URANIUM REFINERY AT BLIND RIVER, ONT.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister knows that Eldorado Nuclear Limited proposes to construct a uranium refinery at Blind River, Ontario. A growing number of local people oppose this refinery because of the negative implications on human health, genetics, the environment, and the economy.

For the past three months organizations representing 9,000 Indian people have been asking the minister to help them in their opposition to this destructive project. Why has the minister done nothing more than acknowledge receipt of their letters? Why has he not helped these people make their case to the Atomic Energy Control Board?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am aware of the concern of some of the Indian people in that particular area. It is largely a question of available resources which will enable them to present their case better. However, they are still able to present it.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, I am surprised at the complete inadequacy of that answer.

Mr. Nielsen: Why?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): In February the minister promised that there would be a minimum amount, beginning with $1 million, to help Indian people across Canada make their case in terms of the environmental impact major resource projects have on them. So far none of that money has been made available to the people who will be affected by this project.

Will the minister provide funding for these people so they can have effective opposition to this project? Will the minister intervene with the Atomic Energy Control Board to prevent permission being given for this project?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member who serves on the standing committee is well aware of the increase in resources that we have been able to find to fund native organizations to help them present their cases, but there is a limit to the available money. We cannot satisfy the tremendous demand we have at the present time.

Mr. Manly: Why don't you answer their letters?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The hon. member should be well aware of that. The hon. member's first question acknowledged that I had been answering their letters. Nevertheless I will review the situation.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

WESTERN CANADA GAMES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of fitness and amateur sport, or the Minister of Labour. I do not know what his title is now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Would the minister advise this House why he has cut off a continuous contribution to the Western Canada Games? This is an ongoing contribution to help develop Olympic athletes.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the department responsible for fitness and amateur sport on two previous occasions, in 1975 and 1979, gave some funding to the Western Canada Games even though they are not national but regional in scope. This was done to help them get started and make them successful. Probably the hon. member opposite may well have been minister at the time of the second contribution. I am not sure.

Mr. Paproski: Yes, I was.

Mr. Regan: I am glad to hear that.

In any event, it is felt that the money which is available for fitness and amateur sport should be used on national programs, as is agreed between the provinces and the national government and for purposes that are traditionally followed, rather than for regional games. Mind you, if the hon. member opposite had not given away the lotteries to the provinces—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: —I think we would have been able to do a great deal more if he had not done that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Madam Speaker, that is worth a question of privilege, but I will not raise it this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

DISTRIBUTION OF FEDERAL FUNDS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Why does the minister not say that the government has never had as much money as it has now? Why does he not say the government is discriminating against western Canada because there are only two members of the Liberal party representing western Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member making any such suggestions at all. I think the hon. member has to agree that these games are regional in scope.

Mr. Clark: It is the wrong region.

Mr. Regan: In relation to the question of discrimination, I am spending more of my time and effort on trying to help other people to bring the winter Olympics to Calgary than I am on anything else. That, I think, is a very important undertaking, and a national one in scope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That may be the problem.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

PROMOTION OF OFFICERS SERVING AT AIRPORTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Recently the minister promoted, almost arbitrarily, the PM 1 immigration officers to the PM 2 level at four of our international airports. Is the minister aware of the whole range of new discrimination that he has brought into play by promoting people from the PM 1 level to the PM 2 level while overlooking the immigration officers at all the other ports of entry in Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member recalls, we had an exchange on this particular topic in a discussion before Christmas when we looked at my estimates. I indicated to him at that time that we would be discussing these matters with the public service unions involved. Therefore the decisions taken concerning the elevation of certain officers at the busiest airports and reception centres across Canada was based upon that assessment of the actual volume with which they had to cope. Those were the discussions we had with the unions, and they are in agreement with the basic redrafting of the categories we now have implemented in the department. I think we have made sure that the criteria by which the innovation of the additional category was made were achieved in very close co-operation with the workers themselves.

DIFFERENCE IN TREATMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): The minister ought to be aware that at the Port of Douglas, for example, another land-based port of entry which is a lot busier than Mirabel, the immigration officers have been excluded from any kind of promotion, even though they are senior officers. Meanwhile newcomers to the civil service are promoted immediately to PM 2. I wonder what the minister's defence is going to be if he has to appear before the Human Rights Commission or the Labour Relations Board?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I pointed out in my previous answer, this is a matter that is primarily of administrative discussion between unions representing the categories of the workers involved and the department itself. It is not a matter of human rights discrimination, but merely a matter of working out the relative sort of workloads dealing with different immigration and refugee categories that come into each of the points of reception. That was the judgment that was made based upon the objective criteria that were established.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISIONS COVERING MARIJUANA

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I am glad to see the Minister of Justice back in the House as I should like to ask him a question. It is my understanding that there is to be legislation brought forward soon covering the matter of marijuana. I would ask the minister if he can tell us whether that legislation will distinguish in a statutory form between possession, importation, and trafficking, rather than leaving these matters to regulation, and will he also tell us when he plans to bring this matter before the House? Will it be before the summer?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I replied to the committee yesterday that we are in the process of completing consultation with the attorneys general in Canada. When that process is completed we hope to introduce this legislation. I do not know whether we will have time to introduce it before the summer because, if the consultation is to be meaningful, we must try to include in the legislation the views of provincial attorneys general, but we want to introduce it as quickly as possible in order to clarify some of the matters that preoccupy the public.

MEDICAL REPORTS ON DANGERS OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): If it is planned in the legislation to legalize marijuana—

An hon. Member: No way.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —I am wondering whether the minister and members behind him realize that this would be tantamount to changing the maple leaf in their emblem to a marijuana leaf.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My question to the minister is whether—

An hon. Member: Go and have a smoke.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Are you stoned?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In developing the criteria for possession, importation and trafficking, and even the use of marijuana, will the recent medical reports which are now available and being distributed widely, be taken into account? They show that the use of marijuana is producing very serious effects on the children of those who are taking it, including hydrocephalus, damage to the bone marrow, and also very serious effects in the reproductive organs of males?

An hon. Member: And you lose your hair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we have no intention of making the importation or utilization of marijuana legal. We want to change the form of the penalty and to modernize it. I do not think the hon. member is helping the situation at all by pretending that we will legalize marijuana. We have said so many times in this House, that this is not what we are about to do. We do think that once in a while we have to modernize laws which have been on the books for so long and do not cope with realities as they exist.

BANK ACT

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REVISIONS TO CONTROL INTEREST RATES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Agriculture has been making important finance policy statements around the country regarding interest rates. Will the Minister of Finance please tell this House when we can expect revisions to the Bank Act which are designed to control interest rates, as promised by the Minister of Agriculture in a recent news report from Humboldt, Saskatchewan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe that matter was clarified last week in the House when the Minister of Agriculture acknowledged that he did not have in mind a revision to the Bank Act; nor do I.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I should also like to ask the Minister of Finance when he will be announcing the extension of the small business development bond past the termination date of December 31, and how soon can we expect the inclusion of unincorporated farms and small businesses in that program, again as promised by the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, no decisions have been reached on either of those points.

THE JUDICIARY

VACANCIES IN SUPREME COURT OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Will he please advise the House whether a decision has yet been taken on filling the vacancies in the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and if a decision has not been taken will he give very serious consideration to appointing a woman?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we have not yet taken a final decision concerning the appointment of judges to the New Brunswick Court of Appeal and Superior Court, but I will keep in mind the suggestion of the hon. member. Of course, we would be very happy if we could find a woman to fill one of those vacancies.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REVIEW OF TASCHEREAU-KELLOCK COMMISSION PAPERS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, when the Solicitor General announced in this House that a review of the Taschereau papers by a retired civil servant was taking place, he indicated that he expected an answer and a report by May 1. He later said the government had received an interim report, but just yesterday the President of the Privy Council informed me that the government had received no report whatsoever. I wonder if the Solicitor General can clear up this contradiction?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have the interim report in my hand, so it certainly has come to us.

Mr. Lawrence: Will you tell the President of the Privy Council?

Mr. Kaplan: As I indicated publicly, the interim report suggests that the retired public servant doing the studies intends to get legal advice from law officers of the Crown on privacy questions and part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act. When I mentioned the date of May 1 in the past it was to indicate that the initial term terminating May 1 had been given to the retired public servant because we were not certain how long the job would take. I did not indicate the job would actually be finished by that date. I can tell the House that it will be finished soon, and that the government will take a position on it soon.

SCOPE OF INQUIRY AND LOCATION OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Further to this 35-year-old delayed problem as far as access by the public is concerned, will the Solicitor General tell us if the review by Mr. Branscombe is also covering the personal notebooks of Mr. Gouzenko, the documents removed from the Russian Embassy, and also the details of the interdepartmental committee which reviewed the whole matter about 15 years ago as well, and also why are those documents being kept in the archives of the RCMP rather than in the National Archives?

An hon. Member: What did you do about it?

Mr. Lawrence: Tried to get them released.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, Mr. Branscombe is initially looking at, and his terms of reference are limited to, the transcripts of the hearings. The hon. member is referring to some 601 exhibits that were also produced to the Kellock-Taschereau inquiry. It would certainly be a good idea to look at those documents as well, but it is a huge job. We are proceeding to do one thing at a time, first to review these transcripts in which members of the House have expressed the most interest. When that is completed and the government's decision is taken, it would be appropriate to consider looking at the files which are with the security service and in the custody of the RCMP, to review those, because they have not been reviewed in a systematic way, in order to determine what portions of those should be released and which should be retained.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF REPORT RESPECTING BILINGUALISM POLICY

Madam Speaker: I have the honour of tabling my report on the implementation of the special report of the Commissioner of Official Languages on the House of Commons, along with a document on the bilingualism policy which I have adopted for the House of Commons. One of those reports will be published in both languages, but the English translation of the special report of the Commissioner of Official Languages will be tabled later on this afternoon after the translation has been completed.

I should like to point out that if the House wants to refer it to one or other committee of the House of Commons, and perhaps to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services where I am authorized to appear, I will make it my duty and it will be a pleasure for me to appear, should that wish be expressed by the committee to which the report might eventually be referred.

Two reasons prevent me at this time from complying with the request of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages if I want to respect the traditions of the House and follow them faithfully. First, only the annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages have been referred to a committee of the House. The special report which was commissioned by my predecessor has never been referred nor was it ever the subject of a full chapter in the annual reports, as was the case for the report of the Comptroller General on the administration of the House of Commons. Therefore, the difference there is absolutely essential. Second, it was easier for me to appear before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts on which only members of this House sit. The presence of senators prevented me from appearing before the committee.

Therefore, should a reference to that effect be made to a committee of the House, I will be able, as it is my wish, to keep hon. members posted on the progress of bilingualism in the House of Commons and respect the principle of the transparency of administrations, which I consider very important.

SPORTS

WESTERN CANADA GAMES—STATEMENT BY MR. REGAN ON FUNDING

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which has to do with the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) on the funding of the Western Canada Games. He misled the House when he said that $85 million could have been accumulated from Loto Canada. I would like to say that $30 million in the hand is better than a ghost in a bush.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member knows that that is not a point of order; that is entering into debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, could I ask the government House leader about his intentions with respect to government business for the balance of this week and into next week?

Perhaps while he is on his feet he might do what he could to designate as many allotted days as possible.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as usual, we will be very generous with allotted days, to the tune of two days a week. For next week I will designate Monday and Wednesday as the two allotted days.

[Translation]

Tomorrow, we shall try to complete second reading of Bill C-61 on young offenders, or rather to vote on the amendment. We have agreed that if we reached that stage, the vote will be deferred until Tuesday. Afterwards, tomorrow, we shall try also to complete second reading of Bill C-58 to amend the Canada Elections Act.

As for next week, I have already indicated that Monday and Wednesday would be opposition days, and as for Tuesday and Thursday, we shall continue the report stage of Bill C-57 to amend the Excise Act, and I hope that we can also dispose of the third reading of that bill.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to bring a matter which is of concern to the House to the attention of the government. It has to do with the position in which we find ourselves under the Representation Act. When I was president of the privy council, I placed the appropriate reference on the order paper dealing with the representation in the House and, indeed, the question of the number of members of Parliament there ought to be in this House.

This arises because of an estimate given by the Chief Electoral Officer that, if nothing is done by Parliament and the matter is just allowed to lie, this House will expand in membership from 282 members now to a new high of 312 members after the next census. That would have an impact on cost. As the government House leader must know, the raw cost is about $170,000 per extra member, not counting support staff, buildings, housing, furniture and a host of other things. I wonder what the intention of the government is with respect to this.

If the government does nothing, then as my hon. friend knows the natural course of events will take place. The membership in the House will grow and grow, and the problem of the 1974 Parliament, which was denied then, will be passed on to a further Parliament. I want to ask my hon. friend whether it is his intention to present a discussion paper to the cabinet dealing with the size of the House of Commons. This is a matter of House business because it affects all of us. Could the government House leader answer that question?

Second, is the government House leader prepared, following that, to make the appropriate references of this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that the House of Commons itself can get into this matter, which is important with respect both to the work of members and, indeed, to the way in which this place operates? I think it would be wrong—indeed morally wrong—if this matter were allowed to lie fallow, if nothing were done and if the normal events took their course.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the issue raised by my learned colleague is very important, and it is a fact that according to available statistics, if the new electoral boundaries were applied under the present legislation at the next federal election, there could be up to thirty additional members in this House. However, it is far from sure that these new boundaries will be in effect at the next general election because, as my colleague is aware, under the present mechanisms, which are based on Section 51 of the Canadian Constitution and the various provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Act, we could wait for as long as over three years before these final boundaries are in effect.

Let me simply remind him that the June 3 census will have to be completed within a year and that following the report of the Chief Statistician of Canada, it could take more than a year and a half before the various commissions set up for each province submit their report. In addition, they are entitled to a six-month extension. Ultimately, after the reports of the various commissions have been received my learned colleague is well aware that the new boundaries can be implemented only if Parliament is dissolved more than a year later.

All of this means that, for all practical purposes, we may have to wait between two and a half and three and a half years as of today before facing the possibility of 30 additional members or implementing the new boundaries. As for the next election, nothing is certain. No one cay say definitely that, under the present provisions of the Constitution, there will surely be 30 additional members after the next election. This remains uncertain. However, I am not suggesting that we refuse to deal with this matter. It concerns electoral reform in general. The Speech from the Throne mentioned that a parliamentary committee will have to be set up to consider electoral reform in general. This includes proportional representation, but the general theme will be electoral reform. I feel that since this would lead ultimately to an amendment to Section 51 of the Constitution, it would be sensible and wise to wait for a few weeks before making any change that might involve amendments to the Constitution.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the government House leader has lumped this in with electoral reform as he has seen fit. Unfortunately, he has not answered my question. The problem is upon us now and can be dealt with by the government House leader or neglected, whichever the government chooses. Is the government House leader preparing a discussion paper on the question of the size of the House of Commons? I am not talking about electoral reform or proportional representation but the size of the House of Commons. That matter is now upon us because of the peculiarity of events following the fall of my government and the beginning of the government which he leads in this House.

● (1510)

That is the question and I hope the answer is in the affirmative so that Parliament can deal with it. If he is not contemplating it now, would he undertake to the House to do so and advise immediately or within the next day, perhaps next week, as to his intentions? This question affects every one of us. The size of the House of Commons is important to all Canadians and how this institution works and ought not to be decided by neglect.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I thought I had established a very clear link between the size of this House and electoral reform and amendments to the Constitution. However, if my hon. colleague wants an answer now, it is not my intention now to prepare that discussion paper.

I will give him an answer to the second question he asked in his intervention, which was: Will I agree to make a reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections? The answer at this time is no, but I am not saying that in a few weeks the answer will be the same. All I am telling him is that we had better wait and see what happens with the Constitution. When we deal with electoral reform and changes affecting the size of this House, and that is linked to changes in the Constitution, then we will be in a better position to talk about any discussion paper and reference to committee.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has raised an important issue to which we shall have to address ourselves in the not too distant future, but I think perhaps at the moment the best thing for us to do is to continue the discussions we have been having about this matter at House leaders' meetings. I am hopeful we can have discussions in addition to those we have already had and come to some understanding as to what might be done.

I join with the government House leader in suggesting that since this does involve an amendment to the Constitution it might make sense to wait a while to see whether it is to be done under section 91(1) of the British North America Act, as we did last time, or whether we do it some other way.

This being the time when we ask about future House business, Madam Speaker, may I remind the government House leader that his colleague, the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, just left his place in the House to go over to the West Block where we will be having a meeting this afternoon of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I may say to the government House leader that the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs would have a much easier afternoon if we could be told now that within in a week or so a bill would be introduced amending last summer's Bill C-40, particularly with respect to widows who were left out of that legislation by virtue of an unfair phasing-in provision. I wonder if he can give us an answer to that question.

While I am on my feet, may I make a suggestion, not a world-shaking one but one which would save the printing of two pages every day in the House of Commons Order Paper. When you multiply that by the number of copies issued and the number of days we might yet sit, we might save a fair number of dollars. I refer to the fact that government order No. 41 is still on the Order Paper. It has no value because its provisions have been superseded by the House order passed unanimously on April 8 having to do with the debate on the Constitution. I realize that because this order was put under the provisions of Standing Order 21(2), it cannot be withdrawn by the Chair or the Table but only by unanimous consent of the House. We could in that way have that two page order withdrawn from the Order Paper and I suggest that the government House leader ask for consent that it be done.

Mr. Pinard: On the first question, Madam Speaker, I do not know what kind of afternoon the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs will have but I am certain that he is not in a position today to confirm that the bill referred to by the hon. member will be introduced within the week. All I can say to the hon. member is that there is good reason to be optimistic, but I cannot say that this bill will be introduced within a week or two.

Mr. Knowles: Some time in June?

Mr. Pinard: Let us hope so. In so far as the second question is concerned, he suggests to me that I ask for unanimous consent to withdraw motion 41 from the Order Paper. I am very willing to do that at this time if such consent exists. I thought we had settled that matter in a House leaders' meeting at the time we made our agreement and it was by inadvertence that it was left on the Order Paper. We on this side have no objection to motion 41 being withdrawn from the Order Paper.

Mr. Knowles: Since there does seem to be agreement among the House leaders that order No. 41 be withdrawn from the Order Paper, can we not have the question as to whether there is such consent?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, that is the famous Pinard motion. I would be delighted to consent and I hope we never see its like again.

Mr. Pinard: Well, in view of the remark made by my hon. colleague, I think I said very clearly that we agreed at the time to withdraw it because it led to a very famous settlement. So taking that into consideration we certainly agree.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed to withdraw motion No. 41?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HUDECKI—REMARKS OF MR. NICKERSON RESPECTING HAMILTON CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, on May 26 in this House the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) made some remarks concerning alleged partisan behaviour on the part of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). In making these remarks the hon. member made a number of alarming statements to which I find it necessary to refer at this time. He said:

> I do not want to see Hamilton-style politics pollute the north.

Then he went on to say:

> We do not want the extension of Hamilton-style politics in the north.

And then he said:

> We in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon do not want association with the alleged, rather unsavoury elements of society that I am led to believe is the case in Hamilton.

I submit there are a number of areas of privilege involved here. The hon. member, in making these unwarranted remarks, has impaired my ability and that of Hamilton area MPs to do their job as members of Parliament. Due to his uncalled for and irresponsible statements, members representing the various Hamilton constituencies must now answer to their electorate to set the record straight and—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to find other opportunities to set the record straight. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) will remember that I disallowed the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), and therefore that means that the hon. member cannot comment on that question. It has been disallowed as a question of privilege and therefore any divergence of views as to what was said in the course of that question of privilege cannot be discussed further on a question of privilege. So I have to tell him that he does not have a question of privilege.

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS—FISCAL YEAR 1979-80

Question No. 158—Mr. Cossitt:

What is a list of all Canada Council grants awarded during the fiscal year 1979-80 and, in each case, what (a) is the name and address of the (i) applicant (ii) recipient (b) was the amount of the grant (c) is the exact purpose in which the moneys will be used including any specific names or description given to each project?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: "On the date this question was asked, a complete list of all Canada Council grants awarded during the fiscal year 1979-80 had not been compiled, printed, or laid before Parliament. This information has now been printed, however, in the 85-page Supplement to the Council's 23rd Annual Report, 1979-80, tabled in the House of Commons on February 5, 1981".

CMHC—ADDITIONAL SUBSIDIZED HOUSING, B.C.

Question No. 1,710—Mr. Wenman:

1. Did the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation announce on June 17, 1980, that 5,000 additional units would be made available to the non-profit and co-operative housing sector and, if so (a) how many will be allocated to British Columbia and where will they be located (b) what percentage of the total cost will be spent in British Columbia?

2. What are the government's plans for future increases in housing made available to the non-profit and co-operative housing sector?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

1. On June 17, 1980, federal housing Minister Paul Cosgrove announced that he had authorized CMHC to commit an additional 5,000 dwelling units under the National Housing Act social housing programs. All of the units were to be made available under the non-profit and co-operative housing programs for new construction in areas where the vacancy rates were very low.

(a) 1,569 additional units were allocated to British Columbia as follows:

Vancouver	892
Victoria	57
Cranbrook	102
Kamloops	20
Kelowna	101
Prince George	152
Other tight markets	245
	1,569

(b) This represents approximately 31 per cent of the additional allocation of units available across Canada.

It should be noted that in December, 1980, the Vancouver area received an additional 800 social housing units. These units were shifted from other areas not requiring their entire allocation.

2. CMHC's forecast for the social housing programs, which include public housing, rent supplement, co-operative and non-profit housing, and housing aimed specifically at rural and native people, calls for the subsidization of 25,000 units per year. The approval of 5,000 additional units in 1980 was a special action taken in recognition of particularly tight market conditions in certain areas.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA—GYMNASTIC EQUIPMENT

Question No. 1,938—Mr. Lewis:

1. Is there a Correctional Services Canada program in which inmates produce gymnastic equipment and, if so, what types of equipment are produced?

2. What organizations and groups have purchased such equipment in (a) 1976 (b) 1977 (c) 1978 (d) 1979 (e) 1980?

3. What was the dollar value of such equipment sold to (a) departments and agencies (b) public organizations and groups in (i) 1976 (ii) 1977 (iii) 1978 (iv) 1979 (v) 1980?

4. What was the dollar value of gymnastic equipment purchased by Correctional Services Canada in (a) 1976 (b) 1977 (c) 1978 (d) 1979 (e) 1980?

5. What is the policy of Correctional Services Canada in establishing prices for the gym equipment produced by the inmates?

6. Are there current plans to further expand the program in any way?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

1. Yes, the Correctional Service of Canada's CORCAN Industries trains federal inmates in job skills comparable in nature and pace to those found in industry, thus increasing inmates' changes of successfully relocating themselves when they are released. The types of gymnastic equipment produced are balance beams, seating and balancing benches, agility boxes, vaulting boxes, Canadian foldaway climbers and agility stands.

2. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) School boards and universities.

3. (a), (b), (i), (ii), (iii), (iv) and (v) Figures on gymnastic equipment sales alone are not available as they are recorded under recreational equipment.

4. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) This information is not available as it is recorded under recreational supplies which includes: gymnastic equipment, playground equipment and miscellaneous equipment such as ping pong and baseball.

5. CORCAN prices are set in order to be equivalent to the private sector market prices for similar products sold at similar volumes.

PUBLIC SERVICE—PARTICIPATION OF INDIGENOUS PEOPLE

Question No. 2,020—Mr. Manly:

1. Did representatives of the indigenous people participate in all phases of the staffing process in 1979 and in 1980, as outlined in memo number 79—7, from the Public Service Commission, dated June 21, 1979, stating the goal of the Commission was to increase participation of Indian, Métis, non-status Indian, and Inuit people in the Public Service of Canada, on the national level and in each of the different regions and, if so, on how many occasions?

2. How many indigenous people applied, were interviewed, and were hired by the Public Service as a result of the policy announced on June 21, 1979, on the national level and in the different regions?

3. What was the number of indigenous people employed in the Public Service in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 (d) 1978 (e) 1979 (f) 1980, on the national level and in the different regions?

4. What is the total number of positions in the Public Service that qualify for the staffing procedures outlined in the June 21, 1979, memo, on the national level and in the different regions?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows:

1. Staffing bulletin 79-7, which outlines the Public Service Commission policy on the representation of indigenous associations in selection processes, states that representatives of indigenous people shall be invited to participate in staffing processes to fill vacancies, where the jobs to be filled possess "native content". The intent of this policy is considered to have been respected if the invitation to participate is extended, whether accepted or declined. Departments which have established client/department relationships invite representatives directly, without consulting the Public Service Commission and the Public Service Commission does not maintain specific data on the application of the policy. However, as with all direction by bulletin, the Public Service Commission monitors the policy's application, through the audit of staffing action samples, on a regular basis.

Some difficulty has been encountered in relations to departmental identification of native impact or content positions, required under Public Service Commission bulletin 79-7 and Treasury Board Secretariat Personnel Management Manual Chapter 115-21 (Personnel Management Policy Process). While some progress has been made implementation has not proceeded as quickly as the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board Secretariat would have anticipated, resulting in difficulties in assessing the effectiveness of the policy.

2. There exists no reliable data base to determine accurately the number of native people who have applied for jobs during the period in question. As recorded in the 1979 Public Service Commission Annual Report, 262 native people were appointed from Public Service Commission inventories. Public Service Commission regional offices are presently in the process of reporting statistics on personal data gathered on a voluntary basis for the period ending December 31, 1980, which will result in more accurate data being available in the future.

3. For the years 1975 to 1978, there is no statistically valid record of figures on indigenous people employed in the Public Service. The records indicate that 2,674 indigenous people were employed in 1979; 1980 figures are not, as yet available. A regional breakdown is not available.

4. The total number of positions in the Public Service that qualify for the staffing procedures outlined in the June 21, 1979, bulletin is not available as the task of identifying these positions is still in progress.

2. For the same years, what was the estimated amount of (a) federal tax expenditures (b) provincial tax expenditures that occurred because of the tax laws which exempt contributions to employer pension plans and Registered Retirement Savings Plans and the earnings of the plans from personal and corporation income taxes?

GAME "EXPLORATIONS"

Question No. 2,531—Mr. McKinnon:

Does the office of the Commissioner of Official Languages distribute the kit and game "Explorations" and, if so, what is the (a) cost of mailing from the point of origin to Victoria, British Columbia (b) unit cost of production (c) purpose of the distribution to some Canadians?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to Parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be put directly to him.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 26, consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Madam Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), I would like to read a suggestion from the Chair about the grouping of certain amendments to Bill C-57.

I indicated to hon. members last Tuesday the groupings to be followed in relation to the first 44 motions standing on the notice paper to be proposed at the report stage of Bill C-57. I have since had an opportunity to study the remaining motions, including the three new motions standing in the name of the ministers and I find that the motions affect certain of the previous groupings. For these reasons, and for the benefit of hon. members, I would like to indicate to the House which motions are affected. These motions are numbered 6, 7, 8, 13, 58, 11 and 12 as previously grouped.

The new grouping for these motions is as follows. Motions Nos. 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 56, 57, 58 and 59, all of which are in relation to the indexing provisions of the bill, could be grouped for debate and, if necessary, voted on in the following manner:

(a) Question will be put on motion No. 6 and, if in the affirmative, this will dispose of motions Nos. 7 and 8. If in the negative, the question will be put on motion No. 7. An affirmative vote on motion No. 7 disposes of motion No. 8 and, a negative vote on the motion, that is No. 7, requires the question to be put on motion No. 8.

(b) Question will be put on motion No. 11 and, an affirmative vote on this motion disposes of motions Nos. 12 and 13. A negative vote on motion No. 11 disposes of motion No. 12, with the question having to be put on motion No. 13.

(c) Question will be put on motion No. 56 and, if in the affirmative, this will dispose of motions Nos. 57, 58 and 59. A negative vote on motion No. 56 disposes of motions Nos. 57 and 59, with the question having to be put on motion No. 58.

It is at this point I would like to bring to the attention of hon. members that my statement of last Tuesday is valid in relation to motions Nos. 1 and 3 now before the House, motion No. 2, motions Nos. 4 and 5, motions Nos. 9 and 34, motion No. 10, motions Nos. 14 to 26, motions Nos. 27 and 28, motions Nos. 29, 30, 31, 32, 33 and 35, motions Nos. 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 43 and motion No. 44.

The grouping of the motions not yet dealt with by the Chair is as follows: Motions Nos. 45 to 54 could be grouped for debate and voted on as follows:

(a) Question will be put on motions Nos. 45, 46, 48, 49 and 54 separately.

(b) Question will be put on motion No. 47 and, if in the affirmative, will necessitate the question being put on motion No. 53. However, a negative vote on the motion obviates the question having to be put on motion No. 53.

(c) Question will be put on motion No. 50 and, if in the affirmative, disposes of motions Nos. 51 and 52. If in the negative, it obviates question having to be put on motion No. 51 but the question will have to be put on motion No. 52.

Motion No. 55 will be debated separately and voted on separately. Motions No. 60 to 135 inclusive have the same effect, that is, to strike part IV from the bill. It is my intention to group all of these motions for debate, with one vote disposing of the motions. Possibly, when these motions are reached, the Chair could propose for consideration by the House one question in the name of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), that part IV of the bill, being clauses 78 to 117 inclusive, be deleted. I make this suggestion in order that hon. members may consider it during the interval between now and the time when we reach for consideration motions Nos. 60 to 135.

Hon. members, I am sure, are aware that this is a rather complex bill, that the Chair has spent a considerable amount of time considering the record 135 report stage motions, and I can only hope that I have been fair in my analyses and grouping of such motions. I would like to reiterate what I stated to the House last Tuesday, that the Chair would welcome any suggestions hon. members may have in order to facilitate consideration of the bill. In the meantime, I have placed with the officers at the table a concise outline of the groupings and the voting procedures, should hon. members wish to avail themselves of these papers.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, in dealing with Bill C-57, the tax legislation presently before us, we find that the bill has in excess of 100 pages. As well, we notice in looking at the Order Paper that there are approximately 135 amendments proposed to the actual legislation. It is an extremely complicated piece of legislation.

Last Tuesday we heard from our chief spokesman on this legislation, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). In reality, there is really nothing more to be said because he did an excellent job in covering all the issues which pertain to the legislation itself. I pay tribute to the hon. member for Edmonton West. I have had the privilege of serving with him in the House for some seven years. In fact, he has served in the chamber for close to 25 years. When I first came to the chamber, I used to go to this hon. member for counselling when I had questions concerning parliamentary procedure. In addition, the contribution of this man in his almost 25 years of service is outstanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: It is excelled only by his dedication to his constituents. We deeply appreciate his expertise in matters pertaining to the bill presently before us. I would like publicly to extend my thanks to this fine gentleman for the association which we have.

• (1530)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: In dealing with Bill C-57, which is a result of the finance minister's budget, we find that a number of energy matters pertain directly to the National Energy Program and a number of tax items which are included in this legislation. The tax items in the legislation affect the farming population with respect to the sales tax exemption for equipment. Included in the legislation is a tax exemption for equipment used by school boards and universities. There are restrictions on sales tax exemptions on equipment used by fishermen. There are also tax measures pertaining to advertising flyers, a subject about which I wish to speak.

As I am sure a good many hon. members are aware, the publisher of the Edmonton Journal appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs when this bill was before it to express his reservations on matters pertaining to this issue. There will be a number of newspapers adversely affected by this measure. I am sure the negative impact will be much greater on small weekly papers than it will be on large dailies. Mr. O'Callaghan, the publisher of the Edmonton Journal, expressed his views and concerns with respect to this issue when he appeared before the committee. I am hopeful that the ministers who are responsible for this legislation, and hon. members opposite, will pay heed to Mr. O'Callaghan's contribution. In my opinion he is one of Canada's finest publishers. He has spoken loudly and fought for justice and liberty for a free press and for equality for all. Regrettably, members opposite have far too often attempted to muzzle our free and democratic press.

I would like briefly to touch upon some of the energy issues which are in this legislation. Our party's critic, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), touched upon some of the issues when he spoke on Tuesday. I would like to reiterate some of the concerns expressed by him at that time since there are measures in this legislation which have proved to be the most damaging elements of the National Energy Program. The tax measures contained in this legislation will have an extremely detrimental effect on the oil and gas industry, one of the few growth industries in Canada at the present time.

I would like to cite some figures to you, Mr. Speaker. Drilling activity in Canada this year as compared with last is down by over 50 per cent. The sales potential of petroleum properties is down 70 per cent this year as compared with last. The number of drilling rigs which have left our country number some 139. These figures prove with great clarity that the National Energy Program is having a detrimental effect on self-sufficiency as far as oil is concerned. We have a number of proposed amendments on the Order Paper which would effectively eliminate this unfair taxation.

It is interesting to note, too, what Alberta Gas Co-ops Ltd. had to say when representatives of their organization appeared before the committee. I would like to quote a portion of their presentation since it illustrates not only the detrimental effect this legislation will have on our national resource sector but the detrimental effect it will have on our entire economy. The brief states in part:

> On behalf of our members, and for the benefit of all Canadians who are, or will, use natural gas or natural gas byproducts as a source of energy, we protest the imposition of the recently announced natural gas excise tax.
> This excise tax will have particularly harsh effects on those with low or fixed incomes, unskilled wage earners, elderly pensioners, and farmers who have only limited opportunity to recover this additional cost.

So, as illustrated by Alberta Gas Co-ops Ltd., we see that these measures will have a detrimental effect on low wage earners, yet we find the government imposing greater taxation in this area while not offering any kind of assistance to those individuals in lower income brackets. In our budget we offered the energy tax credit to those individuals earning under $22,000. This tax is a punitive tax in regard to the natural resources of our country. As a matter of fact, in so far as the Alberta Court of Appeal is concerned, with respect to revenues on natural gas it has ruled that this tax contravenes the British North America Act. I do not wish to usurp the role of the courts but I do concur in its view and indicate my agreement with the position it has taken.

With the imposition of taxation measures such as the ones I am dealing with, I am surprised that the government has not seen fit to implement taxation measures on other resources, such as gold, uranium or hydro power which are found in the other provinces of Canada.

Just as Alberta Gas Co-ops Ltd. indicated the detrimental effects of the excise tax on natural gas, the Alberta chamber of commerce also illustrated the loss of jobs which will occur all across Canada because of the National Energy Program.

Yesterday in the debate on the National Energy Program the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) did an excellent job in describing the loss of jobs which is presently taking place in Canada because of the slowdown and stagnation of the development of our resources resulting from the National Energy Program. On many occasions we have received presentations from house builders associations and from individuals indirectly associated with the development of our resources which have illustrated how jobs are being lost in their small companies. I find that rather ironic when one looks at the record. During the last election campaign members opposite criticized us for advocating an 18-cent excise tax. They indicated gasoline prices would not reach those levels.

Let us take a look at the record, as illustrated in an editorial printed in the Edmonton Journal on March 5, 1981. The article outlines the series of price increases on a gallon of gasoline which total some 41.5 cents as compared to our 18 cents.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Elzinga: Members opposite indicated that their gasoline prices would be lower than ours. I would like to show you, Mr. Speaker, where these price increases actually took place. On November 1, 1980 there was a refinery tax imposed of some 2.5 cents. On January 1, 1981 there was another refinery tax imposed of some 8 cents. On March 1, 1981 the first wellhead price increase added some 3 cents to the price of a gallon of gasoline. On March 3, because of the extra cost of imports, 2 cents was added on to the price. And thanks to Ottawa's National Energy Program an additional 18 cents was added to the price, which was equal to the 18-cent excise tax we advocated. There is more. The Canadian ownership levy added another 8 cents to the cost of gasoline. These figures are only up to March 5, 1981. Since then the price has risen in excess of the 41.5 cents per gallon increase.

When you look at the over-all record of this government as it pertains to taxation, you find that it is very discouraging to private individuals in Canada especially when you take account specifically of the indexation proposals with respect to alcohol and tobacco.

The reason Mr. Stanfield, as the leader of our party, advocated the indexation of personal income tax was so we could help the taxpayer and alleviate the enormous increases in his own taxation rates as a result of inflation. This government is reversing that role. It is making inflation work to the benefit of itself now, because every time the price of alcohol and liquor goes up, increased revenues are going to go to the Department of National Revenue. I find that very disturbing because what it does is effectively remove parliamentary control over taxation policy.

If we view the shifts as far as they pertain to alcoholic beverages, we find that the government's taxation policies have encouraged more consumption of hard alcoholic beverages or hard liquor as compared to beer and wine. The taxation level is heavier on our beer. As my colleagues the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) have indicated, beer is the working man's drink. This, effectively, is another taxation policy, and it is being perpetrated upon the working-class Canadian by our friends opposite.

An hon. Member: No friends of ours!

An hon. Member: The Tories are out for beer.

Mr. Elzinga: It does not affect me any more because I am an abstainer. I feel the working-class individual in Canada deserves a break because he contributes so much to the welfare of our country.

When dealing with a measure which affects taxation, I think it is appropriate for one to examine the results of the policies of the Liberal party opposite. Let us look at the government's record for a moment and examine spending. We are all aware in this chamber that government spending has reached astronomical levels. There is no control whatsoever on government spending.

If we look at the budgetary deficits which have been brought forward by hon. members opposite, they have increased on a yearly basis enormously. We have record-high unemployment levels in this nation. We have record-high taxation. We have record-high inflation. We have record-high interest rates, and our dollar is again at one of the lowest levels we have experienced in Canadian history.

This is surely not a record to be proud of, and I hope that hon. members opposite truly attempt to do something. On a daily basis in the House, they indicate to us that inflation is their number one priority. Well, the Canadian people do not take them seriously. President Reagan has indicated the same thing in the United States; but the United States' population realizes that he is serious in his intention to bring down the inflation rate. However, the Canadian population knows that the inflation policies of our friends opposite are a farce. The sad part of the inflationary trend is that it hurts and destroys those on fixed incomes.

I am hopeful that this government will take some measures to alleviate some of the difficulties that our pensioners, our single families, our small business sector and our farming population face. That is why we have made a number of specific proposals to the minister, such as the extension of the small business development bond to the small farming operation which conducts an unincorporated business. One would think they would be ready to act, because if we look at the record we find that there is scarcely a political problem which we are facing as a nation, which does not have the fingerprints of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) all over it. I hope they see the folly of their ways as far as government spending, taxation and high interest rates are concerned, and take measures and implement programs to alleviate some of the difficulties which the Canadian population is facing.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in the debate on this very important bill, especially the provisions relating to petroleum. I call them the petroleum elements of the bill, and I would like to say a few words about them.

There are two petroleum elements. The first one is the 8 per cent PGRT, which is the petroleum and gas revenue tax, and it is a very important and controversial provision of this bill. It is so important that to a limited extent the negotiations with Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia on the new oil pricing agreement, which this country badly needs, are being held up just because of this particular tax. Canadians are probably a bit mystified why that would happen and what is involved. I hope to say a little bit about that in my speech.

Just to set the matter in some sort of context, we are talking about a pile of money which is being sliced up between the federal government and the provinces. We are talking about $100 billion. That is what is involved, not only the 8 per cent wellhead tax but the whole split in revenue between the provinces and the federal government. That is why there is such a crucial dispute in this country. That is the first element I want to speak to on the bill, the 8 per cent wellhead tax. We call it the wellhead tax, the tax at the wellhead. The federal government hopes to raise some revenue by this provision in the bill. The provinces are up in arms about this and I will tell the House why in a moment.

The second petroleum element of this bill is the excise tax on natural gas, and I want to say something about that. It is very important that I do so because very little has been said in the House about that particular tax. It is very important that a member of Parliament from British Columbia, as I am, say something about that tax because it has a tremendous effect on the people of the province of British Columbia. We British Columbians know that if it has an effect on us, then it has an effect on Canadians generally. I want to come back and speak about that tax, to tell Your Honour how it has an effect and what should happen to these taxes.

Let me start with the 8 per cent wellhead tax. As I have said, it is simply a means for the federal government to get more revenue and more dollars. I do not think that we on this side of the House in the New Democratic Party dispute the fact that the Government of Canada needs money to carry on. It does not spend it very well. It throws it away by spending $2 billion a year for jet planes that do not work and money for ships that do not go, and so on; but by and large, it does need money for social and economic programs and for all sorts of things which affect the average Canadian and indeed all of us.

It is typical, however, that instead of looking to the Income Tax Act, which is the normal method that the federal government uses in raising money—and I mean the main method of raising money—the federal government introduces a wellhead tax. Everyone knows we all pay income taxes, except maybe Shell or similar companies. However, most of the ordinary people in this country have to pay income taxes every year. Most of the companies in this country pay income taxes. Instead of looking to the Income Tax Act, where there is a present effective rate of 11 per cent for the oil companies, for getting more revenue by taxing these companies, the federal government has introduced a new tax, the 8 per cent wellhead tax. In my view, it is designed to hurt the very people that the federal government said it intended to help.

Let me explain why I say that. If the government had tightened up the Income Tax Act, it could have taxed the profits of the companies. The profits of oil companies and banks have been incredible in the last few years, especially those of oil companies. We have pointed that out time and time again in the House of Commons. We have pointed out that some companies have not been paying tax. In 1979 Shell paid no tax. So what has the federal government done? Instead of taking broad tax measures under the Income Tax Act, it brings in this 8 per cent tax which taxes the upstream profits of the companies.

Now, I must explain the difference between upstream and downstream. I know all fishermen would understand that, but I will try to explain it in the context of oil. "Upstream" means the place where the oil and the gas is found. I have had to learn this, Mr. Speaker. Having been a criminal lawyer and then coming into the oil and gas field, I have had to learn these concepts. They are not difficult and I shall try to explain them simply. The upstream is where the oil and gas is found, where the drilling is done and the gas is brought out of the ground. As I understand it, and I may be corrected, a lot of small Canadian companies are involved in drilling, exploration, servicing rigs, bringing in the water and bringing in the gas—doing all sorts of things. Profits are made in those areas when oil and gas is sold downstream.

● (1550)

"Downstream" is the pipelining, the refining and the marketing. The downstream is controlled by the large multinational oil companies—Imperial, Shell, Gulf and Texaco.

This particular tax, however, really hits the people upstream and not the people downstream. The government produced a petroleum monitoring report which showed that small Canadian companies reinvested the money they made when they found oil and gas and sold it. Some of the multinational oil companies like to take a profit and send it to their American shareholders or put it into solar energy or coal or some other investments.

Because of the tax on the upstream operation, small business people from Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia come to see us and say: "We are losing our business. Why are you taxing us? It is really hurting". Imperial Oil or any of the large companies have not come to us to say that they are hurting. As a matter of fact, their shares went up in value after some recent announcements by the government. The government has put the tax on in the wrong place, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday the minister said: "There is more and more exploration; look at the figures". Then he gave out-of-date figures from last year. Mr. Speaker, we saw people in the flesh—live witnesses who visited us—complain that the tax is hurting them and that they may go bankrupt. These are the little guys, not the big guys, and we on this side of the House are prepared to listen to them, even if the government is not. We are prepared to ask the government to get rid of the 8 per cent wellhead tax and change the corporate income tax to get money that way.

There is another problem, Mr. Speaker. The west is alienated. The government has a lot of difficulty dealing with the west because its power base is in the east. I was struck by the tirade delivered by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in the House yesterday when he said that the west is not suffering. The party across the way puts itself forward as the party of national unity; but it cannot be a party of national unity if it does not listen to the west. It is easy to win elections—just take Quebec and Ontario, with low-priced oil in Ontario, and pretend that its interests are being looked after—although in the long run they are not—keep the solid base because of the many members from Quebec, and the result is permanent government in Canada.

There is a real problem in western Canada, Mr. Speaker. In its own way, it is having the same kind of revolution as that which happened in Quebec in the sixties. I suspect many members opposite, including the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, came to this House as the result of Pearsonian Liberalism or as a result of feeling that there was a role for the federal government to play in co-operative federalism with the provinces.

This tax hurts co-operative federalism, Mr. Speaker, and I urge the government to consider it again. I do not make the argument that the provinces cannot afford it; I make the argument for the little guy. I am in favour of provincial revenues, but I believe there should be a better way of dealing with the provinces in respect of this 8 per cent tax.

It does not make sense to hurt the little guy upstream and forget about the big guys downstream, Mr. Speaker. That is where the tax should be applied. The same amount of money could be raised, the western provinces would be satisfied and the small businessmen in Alberta, B.C. and Saskatchewan would be satisfied, as would the principles of co-operative federalism.

I now want to deal with the subject of gas, Mr. Speaker. There is a problem with federalism when it comes to gas. This party is not opposed to the principle of a tax on gas but this is not a good time for it. My constituents want to know why there is a tax on natural gas which is produced by the western provinces—mainly British Columbia—when there is no tax on Quebec electricity or on Ontario gold and nickel or hydro. I find it difficult to answer them. I could say it is a source of revenue, but, Mr. Speaker, this is a bad time to levy that tax. At the time the Petroleum Administration Act was imposed unilaterally by the federal government, we as a party urged the minister to consider that tax again.

There is another reason why the tax should not be imposed, Mr. Speaker. There is a glut of gas in the United States at the moment. In 1979, the Clark government raised the gas export price and, as a result, the United States has not been buying British Columbia gas. Now, at the same time as the price of gas increases as a result of this tax, exports are decreasing.

The government has not allowed any change in the price of export gas. The result, as the economists would say, is that they have "used up the space". A tax has been imposed but we cannot get any more money for our exports, so who is to pay the tax? It is the people of British Columbia who will bear the burden.

It comes at an awkward time for British Columbia because the provincial government has been subsidizing the price of natural gas to the tune of $100 million per year. As a result, last year 40 per cent less gas was sold than the year before. Instead of the subsidy coming out of the sale of gas exports, it really comes out of British Columbia's general revenue. I am just trying to put the facts before the government because it does not have any members from British Columbia in its ranks and may not know this!

British Columbia had planned to raise the price of gas to consumers this year. At the moment, 1,000 cubic feet of gas costs $1.20. As a result of this bill we are debating today, a 41-cent tax will be imposed by July 1 and the province will likely impose another tax of about 60 cents. The price of gas for British Columbia consumers will be doubled.

It does not make much sense, Mr. Speaker, for the government to have a policy of switching off expensive imported oil for cheap Canadian natural gas, when the price of the Canadian natural gas is doubled. The actual impact in British Columbia will not be for people to switch from oil to gas, as the National Energy Program proposes; in fact, it will scare British Columbia away from switching to gas. They see a discriminatory tax. They see the price doubling. British Columbians will not convert to gas.

● (1600)

I am informed that this morning the Saskatchewan government filed a suit in its court of appeal against the federal government, challenging the federal government's ability to tax provincial Crown corporations. This lawsuit is of particular interest to the people of British Columbia. We market our gas through a Crown corporation called the BCPC, which is the British Columbia Petroleum Corporation. We used to have a socialist government in British Columbia, so we do not let the downstreamers take all the profit. We take the profit and distribute it among the people. BCPC buys gas from the producers and either sells it to the people or it is exported. BC Hydro is involved.

This lawsuit filed this morning by the Saskatchewan government will be watched very carefully by British Columbians. It will deal with the principle of whether a provincial Crown corporation can be taxed. It is not the lawsuit that I am pointing out but the fact that the government could have avoided the danger of lawsuits and disputes between itself and the provinces. We do not need that. These things should be settled in a different way, not through the courts. They should be settled through negotiation. That is what co-operative federalism is all about.

This tax is a divisive tax. By devious methods, the minister of energy is trying to raise money to deal with a particular problem. What he should do is negotiate up front with the provinces instead of levying these new taxes.

In summary, the taxes are against the principles of co-operative federalism. They are discriminatory against one region of the country. They hurt the little guy. They do very little to take additional revenues from the big companies. Instead, Canadians will end up with higher prices and higher costs at times when we really cannot afford to pay them. These costs will fall on the consumer, not on the big producers and markets.

While we on this side of the House are in favour of the principle of taxation and while we are in favour of the federal government being active and having a major role to play in this country, we must tell our friends across the way on the government side that this is not the way to do it and to delete these clauses from the bill.

Excise Tax

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-57 now before the House. I want to associate myself with many of the concerns that have been raised by members on this side and I want to express my views on certain aspects of the bill.

I, too, take extreme exception to this government's attempt to establish annual indexing based on consumer price index increases. I am well aware that the government has to raise money by taxes, but through many of the things the government is doing it gouges the wrong people.

I share the suspicion raised by many of my colleagues that this proposed move based on consumer price index increases is simply an effort by this government to circumvent Parliament. In other words, the higher the cost of a product or a service, the more the government makes out of it. In turn, the more the consumer pays, the more the consumer goes in the hole.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. MacEachen doesn't care.

Mr. Darling: The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) does not seem to worry, as the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) points out.

Such a method of indexing would perpetuate future increases, and members of this House would have no say in the matter. Parliament would not even have an opportunity to debate future increases because they would be already built in.

The indexing of taxes on such consumer goods as tobacco and alcohol, to mention only two, would surely anger and frustrate Canadians to a point where some might resort to alternate and illegal supply and purchase methods. I might say that they do not get too much money out of me through taxes on either of those products. I suppose if I were to be very mercenary, I would say tax both tobacco and liquor as much as possible because I do not happen to use them. In all fairness, however, I presume I have a great many friends and relatives who do use tobacco and alcohol, so I may pay in a roundabout way.

Mr. Elzinga: These taxation policies are driving people to drink.

Mr. Darling: The hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) says that the government's policies are driving people to drink. I guess they want to try to forget their troubles. I have not had to resort to that yet.

I have no doubt that if this objectionable method of taxing is allowed to pass, wholesale smuggling might result. It has happened in the past and there is no reason to assume that it might not happen again. We might have the reverse of the infamous prohibition period in the United States when Americans in droves came into Canada for their liquor. This government will make the prices of these items so high that Canadians will be prohibited from purchasing them in Canada and would have to go elsewhere for them.

My own province of Ontario made a mistake when it recently introduced its budget by indexing taxes on consumer goods. I certainly do not agree with that. The provincial treasurer, who is a personal friend of mine and a representative of part of my federal riding, brought in an indexed tax on gasoline. At the present time I believe this tax is about 4 cents a gallon. Of course, when the price of gasoline increases, as it most certainly will, that tax will go up automatically.

Members on this side of the House remember back in December, 1979, when that same distinguished provincial treasurer was crying blue murder to the Conservative party because of the prohibitive proposed increase of 18 cents a gallon in the price of gasoline. Now we can see what we are paying with this great federal government in power which promised on a stack of Bibles that the increase would be limited to 14 cents a gallon. On Sunday on my trip back here I filled up my gas tank. I paid $1.67 a gallon for unleaded gas. I can assure hon. members that is about 60 cents or more per gallon than I paid when the Clark government was defeated.

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you Liberals.

Mr. Darling: Again, a slap on the wrist should be given to the provincial treasurer of Ontario. I guess he learned the dirty trick from the Minister of Finance.

I find it difficult to accept that, because this government is not able to control inflation, it will use inflation to index taxes. In other words, the higher inflation goes, the more money that will roll into the government's coffers. I do not think anyone would disagree with me about that. Even members on the government side of the House should be shaking their heads and agreeing with me.

This measure will allow the government to benefit from the inflation it has created. I hear the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) interjecting. The government is benefiting because of inflation, yet we hear the government telling us that it will do its very best to control inflation. To do that very thing, the government is keeping interest rates high. But at the same time this government is driving a good many businessmen to the brink of bankruptcy. Some will declare bankruptcy. I know a great many small businesses in my riding that are feeling the pinch. I am quite sure the Minister of State for Finance knows that as well. Possibly there are some small businesses going bankrupt in his own area because of high interest rates. This is an absolute disgrace. Reasonably successful businessmen who have been established for a long while are going to the bank to borrow money to meet operating costs or to purchase inventory during their busy seasons and are having to pay 21 per cent interest.

I also wish to express my concern and the concern of many others at what appears to be evident departures from the normal calculation of excise taxes. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out, excise tax has been commonly known as the manufacturers' sales tax. This tax was imposed upon the price at which a manufacturer would sell his or her products. The bill before this House seems to be shifting the excise tax away from the manufacturer to the wholesaler and distributor. This will ultimately lead to a greater financial burden on the consumer and will generate extra funds for the government.

I am quite sure that many other members of Parliament as well as I have received letters criticizing the government for this change in policy. I certainly hope the government will rethink this. This government does not need to print extra money; it simply digs a little deeper into the pockets of tax-paying Canadians. By this bill it looks as though the government wants to dig a little deeper into the pockets of certain segments of the nation which can ill afford to support this government greed.

I want to discuss the impact of the clause of this bill dealing with excise taxes on advertising and advertising supplements in small community newspapers. There are many small weekly papers in my riding, as in many ridings across the country, which offer the community a valuable service by providing news, information and entertainment. These newspapers, which do not have the financial resources of large corporations or the revenue resources of those in larger centres, are very dependent upon the advertising they obtain. The imposition of the excise tax as outlined in this bill would place the operations of these important papers in jeopardy. I hope the government will reconsider this matter, recognize the value and contribution of community newspapers and exempt those serving certain sized populations from this change in the taxing method.

I want also to express my opposition to that part of the bill which deals with the production of gasohol. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) mentioned when speaking on this issue, gasohol is legal and its use encouraged in over 30 of the world's nations. Why Canada, or at least the present Canadian government, should take a different stand is certainly beyond me.

Other governments have realized the potential of gasohol in certain circumstances and have supported its use. This government, however, seems to be determined to ignore it or, at the very least, will penalize Canadians who want to use gasohol as a fuel alternative. The bill before us reflects the government's attitude. It does not use the word "gasohol"; it refers to the product as "denatured spirits." This just means alcohol that is rendered unfit to drink.

The government seems less worried about the advantages of Canadians using gasohol for fuel as it is about the possibility that some Canadians will erect stills to produce alcohol for human consumption. Under this bill the government will grant a special temporary licence for the manufacture of denatured spirits which are to be used solely in experimentation and development of a fuel. Surely the government realizes that such experimentation and development has been going on for centuries now, probably for a few thousand years, and the process is fairly straightforward. There are experimental processes taking place in respect of alternative approaches to manufacture, both in the conversion and separation stages, but the simple distillation process is relatively unchanged.

Why in the world would the government want to limit licences for experimentation only when many Canadians have gone beyond that stage and are into production, illegally now, I must point out? In my own riding we had an individual who had gone beyond the experimental stage and was in fact using gasohol to power his own vehicle. He was not only successful in producing the product, he was producing it cheaply. By making alcohol from crops grown on submarginal land on his farm, he was able to produce fuel for his vehicle which he stated cost him about 30 cents a gallon. I might question the 30-cent a gallon figure because I doubt if he charged for his own time, or perhaps put a charge on the land, and so on, for this, but nevertheless he did this and certainly created quite a furore and got a lot of publicity for himself across the country which certainly did him no harm.

Did the government applaud his ingenuity? It certainly did not. It sent the RCMP in there to lay charges against him. After all, it could be very embarrassing for the government to have an individual showing it that a final product works when the government is insisting experimentation is still required.

What must be equally embarrassing to the government is the fact that this man is a Liberal party member and in fact carried the standard of the Liberal party in the recent provincial election in the district of Parry Sound. He lives about 15 miles from my home town of Burks Falls. This same distinguished gentleman, Richard Thomas, is well known from appearing on television commercials for Canada Packers as "Ben", selling their bacon, so that is a plug for them. That did not hurt him during the election either. When I pointed out to Richard that he was a great Liberal expounding Liberal theories, yet they formed the government which was persecuting him, and also asked him to admit that the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) would have protected him, he admitted it himself. Do not shake your head now, Mr. Minister of State for Finance. The Crosbie budget allowed the production of 2,500 gallons of alcohol, or whatever you want to call it; it most certainly did.

Mr. Paproski: That's right and I'll vouch for that.

Mr. Darling: I see the minister of state making a note of that. If he checks that he will find it to be correct.

This man Richard Thomas showed equal determination when he was faced with the charges laid against him. He hoped, he said, to argue in court that, although he had broken the letter of the law, he had not violated the intent of the law, which was to prohibit privately distilled alcohol for internal consumption. Incidentally, the charges against Mr. Thomas were eventually withdrawn, presumably because new legislation under this bill was pending.

Will this present bill help Mr. Thomas and others across this land like him who wish to manufacture gasohol for cheap transportation? I suggest it will not, because firstly there is a requirement that anyone applying for a licence must post a surety bond of between $4,000 and $10,000. I understand that amendments to reduce this amount are before the House. As an insurance agent for a great number of years, I should say that there will probably be additional business for general insurance agents across the country. The government is going to force people to buy, even when it is for their own use. The premiums on surety bonds and fidelity bonds are quite high now. In many cases it is quite difficult to have insurance placed. Granted, there is the possibility, if an experimenter does not know what he is doing, that he will blow himself or his neighbour up. This is why there will be a hesitancy with respect to issuing these bonds. Or the government could say: "If you are doing it for your own use, God bless you, go to it; but just do not get into the business in a big way".

The reason for the bond, Mr. Thomas was told by an official in the Department of Finance, was to guarantee the respectability of the applicant. The Department of Finance has devised the ultimate measure of respectability. If a Canadian has between $4,000 and $10,000 for bonding purposes, then that Canadian is "respectable". I suppose there will be a sign on the door of the licensing office stating "Only respectable Canadians need apply". I suggest to the government that if respectability is the sole criterion for the requirement of the bond, the provision should be dropped immediately. Why not have just a simple licensing fee to cover the cost of the licence and the office paperwork involved?

Then there is the fact that the licence is valid for only a year or less, and when the licence expires there is no renewal clause. How utterly stupid! Ingenious Canadians will buy equipment and so forth, and then they will know that once they get their projects operating successfully, the government will tell them they have to discontinue them after the end of the year. That is ridiculous. Why any Canadian in his right mind would go to all the trouble and effort—not to mention the cost—to build something when it is to be destroyed a year later, I do not understand. Equipment and accessories are not put together for a few dollars; it takes a few hundred dollars and in some cases thousands. Canadians are willing to invest that kind of money only on ongoing processes and only when they know their yields will be financially beneficial. I suggest that the government make the licence renewable or extend the time involved to a more practical term.

There is also a requirement for a complete description of the distilling process, including diagrams, at the time of licence application. The government is contradicting itself. If the licence is issued only for experimentation, how can the experimenter be expected to know in what final form his equipment and process will be? No one asked Alexander Graham Bell to provide a description of a conference call when he invented the telephone. This entire section of the bill needs to be reviewed and altered to reflect reality and common sense.

In its report the special committee of this House on alternative energy and oil substitution stated that it welcomed government actions to amend the excise tax to make it easier for interested people to begin distilling alcohol, but the government is not making it easier. This bill will have just the opposite effect. I agree with other members of this House that the production of gasohol should not be allowed to lay waste good farmland, but that is not the intent of those Canadians who are looking for cheap fuel alternatives.

I am hoping the government will amend its thinking on this and allow ingenious Canadians—mostly farmers and rural people—to take advantage of this new idea of gasohol, to produce it for their own use and perhaps to sell a bit extra.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, normally when I rise to speak in this House I do so with considerable pleasure and enthusiasm. However, with respect to Bill C-57 I must confess it is extremely difficult to be very enthusiastic. This is a tax bill, and no one likes a bill which purports to take money from Canadian businessmen or from individual Canadian taxpayers, even though I think we all realize that from time to time such bills are necessary.

However, this bill is particularly distasteful. As tax bills go—and they go a long way—I might say that this bill is an absolute horror. More than that, it is a disgrace because it does nothing more than reflect this governement's complete mismanagement of the economy, and it underlines this government's desperation for money.

I intend to speak generally about this bill in the short time I have available to me. However, in my remarks I will highlight two areas of the bill which I believe are particularly wrong and ill-advised at this time.

The first area to which I will refer is the government's attempt to index taxation to inflation, as it purports to do with its treatment of the tax on alcoholic beverages. The second area of my concern is the 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas products. Ever since about 1973 when this government started deficit financing, it has continually spent more than it has received. Since 1973 deficit financing has become a way of life, as the Liberals have acted out their basic philosophy of government, which is that any problem in this country can be solved if they, the Liberals, can only throw enough money and enough bureaucrats at it. My oh my, the Liberals have certainly thrown enough money and hired enough bureaucrats over the past number of years, and they have done so to the point that today we have a yearly deficit of some $14 billion and a total deficit of $107 billion. I do not understand the magnitude of those figures. I cannot even imagine it.

With respect to the civil service, we must certainly be the overgoverned country of the western world. It is not surprising that, as a result of all this activity by the Liberal party, the country is bankrupt. The government is short of money and desperate for cash. There is a dire necessity for government restraint, but herein lies the difficulty. This government, and its bureaucrats who created the mess, are simply not capable of solving the problem. They simply cannot find the strength of will or the determination to cut back on government expenditures or to show any kind of restraint. It is like asking a firebug to put out the fire: he is emotionally incapable of doing so. When we ask this government to cut funding, it cannot do so.

What is the Liberal solution to this problem? The Liberal solution is to beg, borrow, wring, squeeze and, yes, even steal money from the Canadian public. This government and its bureaucrats have discovered three ways to get money. I think the scheme is mostly that of the bureaucrats because I do not believe the occupants of the Liberal front bench are bright enough to conceive of the Machiavellian measures which are now being set in place. The occupants of the Liberal front bench are tired. They are the ones who started the mess. This is the worst front bench any Canadian government has displayed or Canadians have had to contend with as an excuse for government in a long time.

The only claim to fame of the occupants of the back bench is their knee-jerk response and their haste to say "Yes, Sir" to each and every crazy scheme proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). One must wonder what they do in caucus other than discuss the length of the forthcoming recess, the terms of their pensions or even the size of their salaries. So the measures before us must come from the bureaucrats. In order to save their jobs and keep their ridiculously high salaries, it is they who come up with the grand design, and the Liberal government is carrying out the plan to squeeze more cash out of the Canadian public.

The grand design is threefold. The first method is inflation. This is an old standby used by many governments in many countries. There is always eventually the same result of runaway inflation and eventual collapse. It is a fairly useful gimmick. It fools the public for a short time and allows the government to finance its huge deficits. If you have an annual deficit of $14 billion and a total deficit of $107 billion, how do you pay this money back? The answer, of course, is to devalue the currency and soon we find it is easier to pay back good dollars with a cheap 75-cent dollar, a cheap 50-cent dollar, or an even cheaper 25-cent dollar, wherever and how far the public will let it go. This is the Liberal plan.

What are the mechanics of this plan? There are several. First of all, print money. The Liberal government over the years has constantly increased the money supply. Secondly, the government must make certain that money policy includes high interest rates, and they have done this. Who can deny that high interest rates are inflationary, particularly when they are not accompanied by fiscal policies and government restraint? It takes no genius to see, and only a Liberal would fail to see, that an increase in the bank rate increases the cost of production of all goods and services. The small and indeed even the large businessman paying 20 per cent to finance his inventory has to charge a good deal more than if he is only financing at 10 per cent.

If this government is serious about controlling inflation, where is the tight money policy that should be established? We do not have one; you can borrow all the money you want at high interest rates. If you are prepared to pay the 20 to 21 per cent mentioned by previous speakers, the money supply and the debt continues to grow.

Now, how else does this government encourage inflation? One method it is using is to cause the Canadian dollar to drop in value vis-à-vis other currencies, particularly the U.S. dollar. Consequently all the things we buy from outside Canada—fresh fruit, vegetables, capital goods, vacations—indeed everything, costs more and thus further fuels inflation. I suggest that the Liberal government achieved this fall in value of the dollar by keeping Canadian productivity at an unreasonable and uncompetitive level, by allowing investment in research and development to fall to disgraceful levels, and by failing to provide an industrial strategy for Canada in the 1970s and the 1980s, particularly for Ontario and Quebec. It is just another part of the horror story of the Liberal regime and it is extremely difficult to believe it was all accidental or the result of stupidity.

How else does the government cause inflation? Well, this government has some new and different kicks. Firstly, it spent over $1.3 billion to purchase a non-productive retail oil company which will not result in one extra barrel of oil in Canada or one extra job for Canadians. It then proceeds to charge this huge expense directly to the poor auto driver by gouging him at the gas pumps. And that, I suggest, is deliberately inflationary.

What else does this Liberal government do? It pays to foreign countries over $3.2 billion annually to buy high-priced oil because of a stupid political position, and that money is taken directly out of the pockets of Canadians to enhance the wealth of other countries. And that, Mr. Speaker, I suggest is inflationary.

Finally, as proof positive that this government wants to encourage inflation and that it is part of its package of fiscal tools to pay for the huge deficit, we have this bill before us which proposes to index tax increases to inflation. By this act, the government proposes to introduce automatic tax increases on alcoholic beverages so that in the future taxes are increased automatically whether or not the government needs the money. By this insidious device taxes will increase without reference to Parliament, without discussion or explanation whatsoever to the Canadian public as to the need for the increase.

In the peculiar way this government has imposed this tax on the industry, the result has been to discourage the consumption of beverages of low alcoholic content, beer and wine, and encourage the consumption of hard liquor. Surely a strange thing for a government to do and reason enough to change this legislation.

The terrible aspect of this tax is the fact that it is tied to inflation and that the government automatically receives more taxes without reference to Parliament. It will be taxing people on inflation; thus it has a vested interest in seeing that inflation continues. By indexing this tax, the government is formally giving notice that it endorses and encourages inflation as a part of its fiscal policy. No wonder Canadians across this country have lost confidence; no wonder that, in spite of the higher interest rates, Canadians are going on a buying binge and consequently rendering ineffective the high interest rate policy.

What is step number two in the grand design to obtain cash to pay its debts? Well, we all know by now it is the huge power and money grab on provincial resources. Not all provinces, however. The Liberals may be stupid economically but they are politically rather wise and identify their power with a majority in Quebec and strong support in Ontario, so these provinces generally will escape the resource grab. However, God or the Supreme Court will have to intervene to stop the resource grab in the rest of the country. The Liberals are taking the offshore resources of the Atlantic provinces. They are stealing the aboriginal rights of the Indian, Inuit and Metis and the lands of other people of northern Canada. Finally, and most aggressively of all, they are determined to rob the resource wealth of western Canada. The resource wealth of the west is the key to the Liberal program to obtain more cash and feed the insatiable bureaucrats' appetite for more and more spending.

A keystone in the government program to achieve this is the introduction in this bill of a petroleum and gas revenue tax. The act proposes to tax these products at the rate of 8 per cent of all revenues from production of oil and gas. It is not surprising that this tax has met strong opposition from the provinces since they charge, and rightfully so, that it makes nonsense of their constitutional right to own and exploit their natural resources.

In its method of application the tax is more in the nature of a royalty and in fact has been held as unconstitutional by the Alberta appeal court. Aside from that, the practical effect on the economy and well-being of the petroleum industry has been and is disastrous. Other speakers have described the results: 139 rigs have left the country; drilling activity has been reduced; sales of petroleum properties have declined.

The slowdown in the oil industry affects everyone. Out of every dollar the oil industry spends, 42 cents is spent in Ontario, 13 cents in Quebec, 29 cents in Alberta and 16 cents in other provinces. For every job created in Alberta in the oil industry, two are created in the rest of Canada. The loss of jobs and economic activity in Canada is almost beyond calculation.

And so goes the horror story. One can only stand back in amazement at a government which in a grand manner proclaims a national energy policy, one calling for oil self-sufficiency by 1990, and then proceeds to impose punitive taxation and ridiculous regulation sufficient to wreck the industry and ruin the economy in less than a year.

What are we told now? We are now told that the advisers of the Prime Minister are telling cabinet that the big shock in the eighties will be that there will be no jobs in central Canada for young people; there will be no jobs in Quebec or in Ontario. In fact, there will be no jobs for any of these people in the early eighties. What will they do? The advisers of the Prime Minister are telling us that some 500,000 young people—perhaps even a million—from Quebec and Ontario will have to move west to find jobs, work, security and employment.

The Trudeau government has failed these young people by failing to provide an industrial strategy or design for the industrial provinces of central Canada. The Trudeau government has failed to maintain an adequate or competitive industrial climate by not providing or encouraging sufficient research and development. The young people of Quebec and Ontario are now reaping the rewards of this Liberal government's stupid and ineffective economic policies. But the wonder of wonders is: Do these young people know that when they head west to the promised land, Trudeau and Lalonde will have been there before them?

Mr. Collenette: Order. You should refer to the Right Hon. Prime Minister and Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Dantzer: Are they aware that the jobs and security they expect to find do not exist because the Liberal government and its national energy policy has effectively ruined the industry and the economy in western Canada? These young people will find, if the government pursues its policies as exemplified in this bill, that there will be no jobs or security whatsoever in western Canada.

When I started this speech, I mentioned that the government, in order to meet its desperate requirements for cash, devised a three-pronged attack on the pocketbooks of Canadians. I have mentioned two of them: first, the resort to inflation and, second, the attack on provincial resources. The third arrow in the government's quiver has not yet been revealed, but it is in the making. Of course, that will be the attack on the pension funds collected from each working Canadian and each employer. At the moment only the provinces have attacked these funds and used them to meet provincial deficits and other requirements. In doing so, they are paying considerably less than the going rates of interest. I suggest we will shortly hear of the government's plan to increase greatly the Canada Pension Plan contribution; perhaps it will be doubled from 3.6 per cent to 7.8 per cent. Of course, this will have the effect of greatly increasing available cash. I suggest the federal government will ensure that it obtains at least 50 per cent of these available funds; but I believe that is a story for another time in the near future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As tempted as I am to do it, I will not. But I put the hon. minister on notice that, in the event we do not have a quorum in the House shortly, I shall call for a quorum vote, if he wishes consideration of this legislation to proceed.

Some hon. Members: Where are the Tories?

Mr. Elzinga: There were only four Liberals present when I rose on my point of order.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) for getting me an audience. I want to make a few comments in this debate this afternoon. I will not speak long, but I want to sound a warning to my colleagues from other parts of Canada about the effects the National Energy Program is having in western Canada and about the perceptions of western Canadians of our country, perceptions of deep concern to me.

Specifically I want to speak about the 8 per cent tax on gas and oil production in the bill before us today. This tax points out the policy of the government across the way. It is a policy more of confrontive federalism than co-operative federalism. It is a policy which is arousing the ire and concern of more and more reasonable people in the west. In fact, this morning the government of Saskatchewan took a challenge to the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan on the 8 per cent tax on the production of gas and oil. I predict this challenge will end up in the Supreme Court of Canada, either appealed by the Saskatchewan government or by the federal government, depending upon whether or not Saskatchewan wins its case in its own court. The main reason they are challenging the legislation is that, for the first time in our history, the federal government is taxing provincial Crown corporations. I suggest that move is wrong.

In fact, I believe the entire 8 per cent tax is wrong. It is wrong for the following six reasons. It is wrong because it is a regressive tax. The 8 per cent tax hits the large companies like Imperial Oil as hard as it hits the small companies in Saskatchewan and Alberta. It does not differentiate between the rich and the poor oil companies in the country. For those reasons I believe it is wrong.

Also it is wrong because, as I said, it taxes Crown corporations. Who would have dreamt a few years ago that the Government of Canada would impose in a budget a tax on provincial Crown corporations? What kind of dangerous precedent or what kind of constitutional war could the country become involved in if the Government of Canada gets its way in imposing unilaterally, without notice or negotiation, a tax on the Crown corporations of the country which are owned by the people through their provincial governments? There is a danger that the provincial governments will retaliate and impose a tax on federal Crown corporations such as Petro-Canada, Air Canada and CNR. What kind of a war will there be between the federal government and the provinces if this type of nonsense goes on?

Third, it has been previously documented in the House by my party that a number of people are losing their jobs because of the national energy policy and the 8 per cent tax. I am thinking of southern Saskatchewan, western Saskatchewan and the area of my colleague, the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish), where people are losing their jobs because of the fact that the national energy policy is imposing a tax which is driving rigs out of the country.

Fourth, I believe that when the government imposes the 8 per cent tax, not only the companies pay. Eventually it will pass the tax on to the consumer, and the consumer will be paying at least 8 per cent more for petroleum products, for gas to heat their homes, for gasoline to drive their cars, for farm fuel and the like.

Fifth, it is also wrong because it represents what I believe is an illegitimate revenue grab by the federal government in a field of provincial concern. This aggravates or increases some of the grievances of the provinces about confederation.

Finally, I believe the 8 per cent tax is wrong because it discriminates against western provinces. It is a tax on gas and oil. Therefore, it is a tax on Alberta and Saskatchewan primarily, but also, to a lesser degree, on the province of British Columbia. If we are to have a special tax on the production of gas and oil in those two provinces, what about a special tax on the production of mineral resources such as nickel, copper, lead and zinc which come from other parts of Canada? What about some equity in the federal system?

I make an appeal today especially to Liberal party members sitting across from me to try to make them understand that the feeling of grievance and discontent in western Canada is strong and growing.

I do not stand here today to try to sound an alarm, but I do want to try to warn hon. members across the way that there are problems in the west and that policies such as these are responsible for making more and more western Canadians alienated from the very country in which they live. It is not just this confrontive federalism, this federalism of confrontation, this fight between governments—between Alberta and Ottawa, Saskatchewan and Ottawa or British Columbia and Ottawa; it is now a fight between the people of the country.

The ordinary people in my part of Canada are becoming more and more concerned about the role they are playing in confederation. I refer to The Globe and Mail of a week ago today, May 21. On the front page there is an article which I think all members should study. The headline reads "Alienation in West on rise, poll shows." It is an article concerning a public opinion poll commissioned by the Canada West Foundation, a very well known and highly respected group in western Canada which is partially funded by the four provincial governments. A poll was taken by this organization to find out how western Canadians felt about our country and to determine what kind of perceptions we have about Canada and its future. It followed a poll which was taken by this same group last October, right after the announcement of the constitutional resolution and the National Energy Program. The poll showed in almost all instances that alienation in the west is increasing.

● (1650)

The following statement was put to western Canadians:

Western Canadians get so few benefits from being part of Canada that they might as well go it on their own.

Some 36 per cent of westerners agreed with that statement; 36 per cent of our people said: "We get so few benefits we might as well consider going it on our own." Last October, 28 per cent agreed with that statement and now 36 per cent do so.

That kind of statistic terrifies me. I think it should also terrify the government and should motivate it in the name of Canada and in the name of unity to have all of us stick together in one state, to find out why western Canadians feel that they are discriminated against. I think the government knows we want to stay in Canada; that is what the west wants. All over the west there are many people who are loyal to our country, who fought in two great wars under the flag of this country and who want to have this country stay together.

In the same poll people were asked bluntly whether or not they wanted to separate. Some 88 per cent of those polled said: "No, we want to stay in Canada." Last October 90 per cent of those polled replied in that way. On the other hand, there is a small minority of people who want to set up a separate state. Some 7 per cent of those polled said: "Let us have a separate country". Some 3 per cent said; "Let us join the United States." And 53 per cent of the people polled said that they have more in common in their hearts with the United States than they have with the people of central and eastern Canada.

So it is my purpose today to sound a warning to this House that, if we do not start to take some of the grievances in the west seriously, there may be a movement in western Canada which will be very hard to stop, which may start to snowball.

In many ways the atmosphere found in the west today is similar to that found in Quebec 20 years ago when we saw the increasing alienation of the Québécois to the rest of the country. Some people pooh-poohed this and said: "They are just a bunch of fanatics; they will never succeed. If we do not take them seriously and if we continue on with the status quo, or perhaps tinker here and there and make just a few reforms, then separatism in Quebec will be absolutely dead."

In the province of Quebec last year there was a referendum in which 40 per cent of the people voted yes to a question which, in essence, would have constituted a signal leading Quebecers toward an independent state. There is a great difference between the motivation for independence in Quebec and the motivation in Quebec for a different arrangement in this country than there is in western Canada. But there are also many similarities. There are similarities in the way that people feel about the country, both in the west and in Quebec. People feel that we are not equal partners or equal participants with the other parts of the country. If we do not address these problems and if impositions are made on western Canada without consultation or representation from the west, then there might be an independence movement which, once it got going, would be like a snowball or a prairie fire—very difficult to stop.

Members opposite should take my plea seriously and eliminate the 8 per cent tax, or at least change it so that it is not a discriminatory tax against the people of western Canada. I feel that very strongly, Mr. Speaker. I feel very strongly that this 8 per cent tax is not something in isolation but is part of an over-all plan by the federal government to reduce its deficit by reorganizing many of the institutions and programs which we have in our country today. It is a move away from co-operative federalism. In that kind of federalism you sit down and come up with a compromise and consensus between the provinces and the centre. What we see is a move toward confrontative federalism where impositions are placed on the regions.

We have seen that the constitutional resolution takes powers away from the provinces and gives them to the courts. This was done against the wishes of the four provinces in the west and against eight provinces in Canada. We saw the National Energy Program being opposed not only by the political right in western Canada but also by the political left, the alliance of Premier Blakeney in Saskatchewan, the leader of a socialist government and the leader—

Mr. Smith: He is phony.

Mr. Collenette: He is a closet Tory.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member may call Mr. Blakeney phony. I think part of the problem in western Canada is caused by calling western premiers phony. In every survey and in every conversation in the west you find people like Mr. Blakeney, Mr. Lougheed or Gordon Gibson, a member of the hon. member's own party in British Columbia, are united in their stand. They say a number of things must change, such as the National Energy Program and the way this government handles federal-provincial relations. If the government does not make these changes there will be a growth of the alienation in the west. I am very unhappy when I receive responses such as we have just heard from members opposite. I am very disappointed. If you look at the statistics reported in the polls which are taken in the west, you find 36 per cent of the people saying that if things do not change then perhaps they should consider independence.

Some hon Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anguish: They sit back and laugh.

Mr. Nystrom: As my hon. friend says, the Liberals sit back and laugh. It is no damned wonder that they have only two members from western Canada; it is because of this kind of know-it-all arrogance which is being displayed today toward the west. It is a patronizing mentality. I say to members opposite that if they come out to our ridings and talk to people, they will understand what we are talking about when we say that westerners are very concerned.

An hon. Member: Where were you in the referendum?

Mr. Nystrom: The member from Quebec across the way is interjecting. A few months ago he said Liberalism was so popular in Quebec that Claude Ryan would sweep the province. As a result of the election in Quebec the only sweeping Mr. Ryan will be doing is the sweeping of his own office as he leaves the party leadership in the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Where were you in the referendum?

Mr. Nystrom: It seems to me that I have touched some very sensitive nerves over there. They do not give a damn about what is happening in western Canada. They have established a western Canada development fund of some $4 billion, but there is no consultation with western Canada, with the four governments or the municipalities in the west. No committee of this House has been established to obtain some input as to how that money should be spent. There is no committee travelling across the country to find out what westerners want to do with those funds. Again, it is a fund which will be administered here, from the centre, imposed on the west, regardless of what western Canadians feel. It is attitudes like that which inflame division in our country.

The former prime minister, Lester Pearson, stood for co-operative federalism. He stood for people working together, for people sharing ideas and planning together. I ask members opposite, what has happened to the Canadian tradition of consensus and compromise? What has happened to the tradition of listening to people? Surely to God that is democracy. Democracy is not a few bureaucrats who have no understanding of what happens in the west devising policies for our part of the country.

I see that you are signalling to me that my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. I would like to hear some of the members from central Canada stand and put on the record those words they are heckling me with. Then perhaps the people of western Canada would have a better understanding of what the Liberal party really stands for. The two members there now from western Canada will not be there in 1983 or 1984.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro)—National Security—Investigation of further spy rings identified by Taschereau royal commission; the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble)—The Constitution—Procedure for convening federal-provincial conferences; the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle)—North-South Relations—(a) Preparations and recommendations for summit meeting; (b) Implementation of parliamentary committee recommendations; (c) Query respecting Canadian support for United States policies.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Items Nos. 22, 5 and 4 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

BRITISH COLUMBIA HYDRO—JOINT FUNDING AND PROPOSED DAMS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House before January 31, 1981, copies of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and British Columbia Hydro relating to joint funding and proposed dams in British Columbia including the names of the 20 salmon streams slated for damming.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on my motion for the production of papers. Hon. members of the House will recall that on November 20, 1980 I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) a question related to a document I had received from his department. That document was entitled the "Western Vision Blueprint", and talked about the possibility of the federal government and B.C. Hydro damming a number of rivers in British Columbia. Members will remember the indignant response the minister made, when trying to answer the question. The minister said that his officials had briefed me on the document when, in fact, they had called to plead with me not to release it.

The minister then went on to say that the issue would panic people in British Columbia. He said that outside the House, of course, because he was not able to respond adequately to me during the House of Commons question period.

I asked the minister questions about this so-called "blueprint" because of the concern I have over the possibility of this minister allowing rivers in British Columbia to be dammed without due concern for the fisheries resource. Despite the fact that the report says, and I quote:

That B.C. Hydro is looking for ways in which to meet peak power demands—many of these projects could have very attractive benefit cost ratios—there is an opportunity through joint development for both parties to meet their goals. We know B.C. Hydro is interested; we also know there are perhaps 20 or more salmon streams that would lend themselves to this approach.

That is taken from the document I received. It was prepared by Department of Fisheries and Oceans personnel, and I think it is important for hon. members of this House to have the names of those rivers and to know just exactly what this joint approach to hydro development in British Columbia involves.

The minister has refused to say which 20 rivers are going to be dammed and also by his silence has indicated he is not willing to tell the House what discussions have gone on between his department and B.C. Hydro.

It is therefore clear to me that when the government issues a report that says there are 20 rivers to be dammed, that identifies a five-year funding program and a financial flow, and all of this is set out in a very clear, technical way in the report, someone in the department of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has been looking at this very seriously. How does the government know that B.C. Hydro is interested? What kinds of correspondence and discussions have been held between the two? Or are we to assume that the minister and Bob Bonner have been quietly communicating telepathically?

In light of the minister's refusal to provide the House with any additional information whatsoever, I placed my motion on the Order Paper to have copies of correspondence, telegrams, or other documents tabled in the House by January 31, 1981. On December 17, 1980, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) asked me to withdraw the motion. I asked to have the motion transferred for debate. We are going to have the debate today and at a future date.

After some research, I am glad to be able to speak in a more technical manner on this issue today. Perhaps I should not say "glad" because some of the information I have come across leads me to seriously question the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council's statement that no documents exist regarding the issue. Even more importantly is the information that indicates that this government is willing to sell out the fisheries resource in British Columbia, just as they have done on the Kemano issue, Amax, the Fraser River and others.

I am sure Your Honour will recall that on several dozen occasions I raised the question of Amax, a mining company which is being allowed to dump 12,000 tons of toxic effluent a day into Alice Arm. The statements I made in this House were refuted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), and need I go on? My statements have now been proven to be correct. Amax was, in fact, closed this morning because the tailings were resurfacing.

It comes right down to the crunch. If a document is prepared by fisheries and oceans, has a flow chart, gives a specific number of rivers, and names the actual figures which are under discussion for these joint developments, I think that when an hon. member gives notice of motion for the production of papers that he knows exist, or at least has some reason to suppose they exist, there is a responsibility on the government side to provide them as sheer information. We do not have a freedom of information act. It is important to hon. members, particularly those from British Columbia, regarding this issue that we at least be provided with background information, so that we can provide our communities and, in fact, our own members of the legislative assembly in British Columbia with that information and know what is going on and have some sort of a rational planning of hydroelectric development in a province which has had a tragic history of inappropriate dam development.

The truth of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that at least one document does exist about this government's plan to dam rivers in British Columbia. In July, 1978 Crippen Consultants of Vancouver, B.C., submitted an unsolicited proposal to the Department of Supply and Services to do a study of possible hydro projects in B.C. In February, 1979, the Department of Supply and Services issued a contract to the same company. The project was to "estimate the potential for micro hydro development in remote communities in British Columbia". After much work I have been able to obtain only volume one of the two-volume report.

Let me make it clear at this point that micro hydro technology and small hydroelectric technology I am certainly very much in support of. Various European countries have come up with very innovative ways of producing hydroelectricity by small, torpedo-shaped hydraulic generation where they anchor it in the bottom of the river. The river continues to flow. The fish can go up and down and canoeists can use the river. Aesthetically it is not unpleasing. The natural flow of that fresh water into the marine environment allows the biological environment in the estuary to continue unimpeded and to maintain natural fish populations.

The report by Crippen Consultants identifies, in what they call the north coast region, 24 possible locations for micro hydro potential. In the other regions mentioned there are some 80 possible sites. A little bit of a quick calculation allows us to realize that not all streams and rivers in British Columbia have salmon. However, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, in his own document, has identified possible dams on 20 salmon rivers in British Columbia which, I think, is the real key and requirement for the production of these documents.

A quick review of the report does not indicate any concerns whatsoever over the fisheries resource. It does not discuss public hearings before any of these projects would get under way. In fact, the report has a nine-page section that lists "undeveloped hydroelectric sites" in British Columbia. This section of the report talks about creeks, and even mentions such rivers in my riding as the Nass and Skeena Rivers which have been unimpeded since time immemorial.

Is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans aware of this study, I wonder? Is the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council aware of it? Are they aware of their responsibilities in relation to the production of these documents?

In their desire to put their blinders on when looking at my motion for the production of papers, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans closed their collective eyes to some of what the other government departments were doing. The members of this House know that I am interested in developing energy resources in this country. I am also completely aware of the possibilities of developing what are referred to in the Crippen report as low head power dams, something that I think many rural areas will look into in the near future. However, I and other members of this House, including, I hope, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, know how vitally important it is to protect the fisheries habitat. The report I have uncovered and the lack of concern the minister demonstrates tell me that we have to explain this issue to him time and time again.

There is more about reports, Mr. Speaker. The Stikine River in northern British Columbia is a beautiful river that flows from the northern reaches of my riding through some of the most incredible scenery in the province of British Columbia. The Grand Canyon of the Stikine is a sight to behold. As a matter of fact, I was up there last year with the previous Premier of British Columbia, Dave Barrett. We flew through to look not only at the fisheries in and below the canyon but at one of the last large goat populations in northern British Columbia.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans chairs an interdepartmental task force that is studying the effects a proposed dam on the Stikine might have. In a letter dated November 18, 1980 to the Sierra Club in Vancouver, the Minister of the Environment wrote that the task force "has been established to provide advice to B.C. Hydro and Power Authority on study requirements and to review study progress and completed impact assessment reports".

I am aware that correspondence has been communicated from Fisheries and Oceans personnel in relation to the Stikine dam. It is an issue of international significance. I had the opportunity a few days ago to discuss the matter with Senator Ted Stevens from Alaska, who also has expressed alarm at the lack of public and international participation in relation to the fisheries resource on this particular hydroelectric proposal. The studies are being done under the auspices of British Columbia Hydro. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is involved. It is a salmon river and in my view it is one of the 20 dams referred to in the Western Visions Blueprint as one of the rivers considered for joint development by B.C. Hydro and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

It is crucially important in a riding such as mine, in communities like Telegraph Creek where the Talt and native people make their home, that a member of Parliament be able to provide information on proposals for the damming of a river that has enormous and important salmon runs which provide the ongoing and traditional diet of the people and is part of their culture. For the Department of Fisheries and Oceans not to provide the documents relating to the Stikine requested through a notice of motion for the tabling of documents is, in my view, a very rash act that hits at the core of democracy.

Is the Stikine one of the proposed 20 rivers that the Western Vision Blueprint talks about? Why was some of that advice that the Minister of the Environment talks about not tabled in response to my motion? On April 9, 1981 in response to a letter I wrote to the minister about British Columbia Hydro plans for damming rivers in B.C., the minister replied:

> I am not prepared to provide you with correspondence between Environment Canada and other federal departments regarding British Columbia Hydro plans for river developments in British Columbia—

The minister has told me in a letter which is just more than a month old, that correspondence does exist between his department and other departments but that he is not prepared to release it. In this House we have notices of motion and there are procedures fundamental to the parliamentary system, but because we do not have a freedom of information act, members of the opposition are not privy to a great deal of ministerial documents prepared by civil servants. In my view, if those studies are to have an impact in some area of the country, they should be provided to the opposition. If they are particularly sensitive or refer to national security, members of the opposition could be told that such is the case, but at least they could become informed about what is going on between various levels of government and various departments.

What is so secret about these plans that the minister will not release them? Perhaps the Minister of the Environment should tell the House if any of his officials had anything to do with writing the Western Visions Blueprint.

In a letter written to me by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on February 3, 1981, he says:

> Any proposals by B.C. Hydro have always been and will continue to be presented to my department for technical review in accordance with the habitat protection provisions of the Fisheries Act.

This is precisely my point, Mr. Speaker. The minister of fisheries is speaking about precisely the documents I was attempting to obtain which were referred to in a document prepared by his department. He wrote to me after the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council asked me to withdraw my motion, saying that there were no documents. We now have confirmation from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and from correspondence with the Minister of the Environment that the documents do exist, but apparently the government does not intend to comply with an order of this House. This method has traditionally provided not only members of the opposition but in some cases members of the government with valuable and vital information which enables them to represent their constituents effectively.

I should like to refer again to the Western Visions Blueprint document. In the second part, on page 2 under the heading "Department of Fisheries and Oceans—Western Visions Blueprint—Financial Flow", item 4, "Hydro planning and pilot projects", shows $1 million for year one; $3.5 million for year two; $10.5 million for year three; $11 million for year four and $11 million for year five. In the remarks column there appears, "Assumes joint funding with B.C. Hydro . . .". This chart shows the expenditure of tens of millions of dollars jointly between the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and B.C. Hydro. There are dams in my riding as I think there are in the ridings of many members from British Columbia, and I think we should have access to the information referred to in the document.

Item 7 of the document shows "Reservoir planning and pilot projects". In the first year it shows $1 million; in the second year $3 million; third year $3 million; fourth year $4 million and fifth year $4 million. The remark is, "Joint ventures with other agencies."

As if that were not enough, Mr. Speaker, under the heading "The Road to 1995" there appears the following in the text:

> —the federal government could, by 1995, transform the B.C. coast, for example, or recast the script for the as yet unwritten history of those people dependent of fresh water fisheries.

The people of British Columbia are not interested in the federal government alone transforming the B.C. coast, the lifestyles and traditional industries of the people who are dependent upon the fresh water fishery, without having direct involvement in and access to the information being developed. The text of the document goes on as follows:

> The federal government frequently gets a negative image because . . . it so frequently comes into conflict with agriculture, forestry, mining, hydro . . . Fisheries, and by extension the federal government, is too often seen by provincial administrations as a negative influence on other economic development. It is time for new approaches. Multiple resource management with a twist.

I am not sure who wrote the script for "The Road to 1995" but it may encourage members in their collective desire to get access to these documents.

It is interesting to note that the minister is not in the House today. I recognize that he has duties in other areas of Canada, but surely British Columbians have a right to access to planning documents that affect the rivers there.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say how important this debate is. Early next month there will be a meeting in Juneau, Alaska, where officials of the federal government, the provincial government, B.C. Hydro and Alaska state officials will meet to discuss the implications of the proposed damming of the Stikine River. I might point out that other rivers are also under consideration. Perhaps the documents that the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans have referred to in writing to me after the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council said there were none will now be released.

I believe the intent of my motion is abundantly clear: the government was to turn over documents related to the so-called Western Visions Blueprint. They say they do not exist. I believe the information I have provided to the House today shows that there are related documents, and that by its secrecy the government has shown that there probably are others.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully urge the minister and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council to go back to their offices today and ask the officials who were preparing the blueprint for their documents and to table the information in the House. To do so will respect the rules of this Parliament and will give the people of British Columbia the truth about what the government is planning to do about dams in British Columbia which may well impact on the salmon resource and other resources.

● (1720)

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it seems obvious that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has some kind of a bee in his bonnet over hydro dams in British Columbia and that his fertile imagination has dreamed up all kinds of sinister and clandestine deals between the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and B.C. Hydro.

The hon. member has received written and verbal replies to his questions on this subject, but apparently he still needs to be convinced that the federal government is not selling out B.C.'s salmon resources to B.C. Hydro.

Let us look at the facts without all the wild speculation and allegations. The first point to be made is that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans adheres to a long-standing policy to work positively at the watershed level with other water users when it can be demonstrated that fisheries goals can be accommodated. The department's main responsibility is, of course, to protect and, wherever possible, enhance the fish stocks. Where this can be achieved in concert with some industrial development, whether a hydro dam or whatever, then departmental officials will work toward this end.

Some time ago departmental officials put forward an idea, and I stress an idea, in a discussion paper in which they visualized the possibility in certain circumstances of fish enhancement facilities amalgamated with low-head hydro dams, with the suggestion that such developments might be financed on a shared-cost basis. It was an idea put forward purely for discussion purposes so that the practicalities and the pros and cons could be considered in the broader context of salmon enhancement. There is nothing sinister about that. This kind of procedure happens all the time in government.

However, I should make it quite clear, particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Skeena, that at this time potential projects combining fish enhancement and power generation have not been identified anywhere in B.C. I cannot say that the concept is dead. It remains in the development stage within the department and might well receive further consideration at some future date.

I believe that, in situations where there is no harm to salmon enhancement and where the benefits of salmon enhancement can be increased by the installation of a low-head dam, a serious look should be taken at that possibility by everyone, including all department officials.

Let me also remind hon. members that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has itself entered into the dam building business in areas where river or stream flow control is known to be a critical factor for fish. Such dams have proven highly successful in regulating water discharge for optimum fish production. To cite an example, this technique has been used in the Fulton River—maybe it was named after the hon. member—where a dam built by the department permits regulated water supplies to salmon spawning channels, and also in the Big Qualicum area to supply a spawning channel and hatchery complex.

These projects are both very successful fish producers which could not have been accomplished without dams providing controlled flow in the system. The point to be made here is that dams per se are not necessarily bad medicine as far as fish production is concerned. They can, and have been, used positively as a fish enhancement tool with good results.

At the same time I must also make it clear that the department remains committed to the natural production of fish, whenever and wherever possible, and to proper habitat protection measures.

High-head hydro dams can destroy salmon runs, in that they may present an impassable barrier to fish migrating upstream or downstream, as well as creating unnatural flow conditions which fundamentally change the aquatic environment in the area of the dam. It is the considered opinion of departmental experts that the various methods that have been tried to transport fish around such dams are not sufficiently successful to compensate for the numbers of fish that are frustrated in their migration patterns by the barrier. For this reason the department recognizes that fish, and large high-head hydro projects are essentially incompatible.

If I might enlarge a little on this subject, the Iskut-Stikine power project is a case in which B.C. Hydro is proposing a number of high dams capable of generating 2,765 megawatts of electricity, which could make it one of the largest power generators in the province. Considering that the Iskut-Stikine River system produces tens of thousands of salmon, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is naturally concerned about the environmental impact of such a project. Although the dams could be constructed above what is thought to be the natural upstream limit of migrating salmon, B.C. Hydro, with departmental input, has spent in the order of $1.25 million to $1.5 million over the past few years in biological studies alone to determine the downstream impact of the construction of the dams. Here again let me make the point very clear and unequivocal that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has no intention of approving a project which is likely to result in an unacceptable loss to the fisheries resource.

Turning to the wider question of the federal government's action and initiatives with regard to the west coast fisheries, I can confidently claim that the government's record is not one that we need be ashamed of. Rather, quite the contrary. I can point to a number of examples in support of this claim. The most obvious, perhaps, is the salmonid enhancement program, a federal-provincial project under which the federal government has undertaken to invest some $150 million over seven years with the objective of doubling the production of salmon and sea-run trout in British Columbia by the end of the next decade.

Back in 1975 when the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans first announced the salmonid enhancement program, he described it as "a bold and imaginative approach to the long-cherished dream of expanding our salmon resources". That was a very apt description because it has taken a considerable amount of boldness and more than a little imagination to plan and implement this major program, which involves the use of various enhancement techniques, including artificial spawning channels, hatcheries, fishways, lake fertilization and so forth.

It is now in its fifth year. The salmonid enhancement program is showing increasingly positive results in the number of salmon being produced through its various facilities throughout British Columbia. Last fall some 563 million eggs were obtained from the five species of salmon at SEP facilities.

Of this total, 69 million were incubated in artificial containers while the remainder, all of which are chum or sockeye, were developed in regulated stream or spawning environments. The projected production of salmon and steelhead trout to the fisheries, plus escapement, from the 1980 brood is in excess of 3,200,000 pieces. In a year when winter floods may have devasted large areas of natural spawn, it is reassuring that such large quantities of stocks are protected in hatcheries and other facilities. Looking ahead to 1984, the concluding year of phase one of the salmonid enhancement program, it is predicted that department-staffed facilities will have the capacity to provide additional adult returns of about 383,000 chum, 307,000 chinook, 243,000 coho, 1,010,000 pink, 4,000 sockeye, 5,000 cutthroat trout and 7,000 steelhead trout, or 1,959,000 pieces in all.

One of the very satisfying aspects of the program operation is the amount of solid support it has been given by the public at large in British Columbia. The federal and provincial governments' rallying cry to protect and enhance the salmon stocks has been taken up with great enthusiasm by young and old throughout the province, and at the present time there is a force of more than 6,000 volunteers working on various salmonid enhancement projects.

An economic analysis has predicted a cost-benefit ratio of about 1.3/1.0 for phase 1 of the salmonid enhancement program, with net national income benefits of around $120 million, in terms of 1980 dollars. In addition to these monetary advantages, one must also include other benefits in terms of employment, particularly benefiting native people, regional development and resource and environmental preservation, for which it is almost impossible to assess a value in dollar terms.

Some people may ask: why are you expending so much money and effort on salmon enhancement projects in B.C. when industrial concerns continue to pollute salmon rivers, such as the Fraser, or in one way or another destroy the habitat on which fish depend to breed and grow? That is a good question, and I hope people will not stop asking it.

The answer, however, is not a simple one. It involves complex and sensitive issues concerning levels of jurisdiction and the priorities one should accord to competing users of the water resource. As far as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) is concerned, his mandate is quite clear: his responsibility, which, I might add, was decided by the Fathers of Confederation when Canada's statutes were first put together more than a century ago, is to protect and manage the fishery resource. And to further explain how he and his department views these obligations, I feel I could do no better than quote from a speech which the minister presented at the official opening a week or so ago of a $3.6 million hatchery at Puntledge on Vancouver Island, one of the salmonid enhancement program facilities to which I was referring a little earlier.

The minister made these remarks:

> What we are discussing here is a renewable resource—one might say an eternal resource—belonging to the people of B.C. and Canada, and I feel it is a time to get tough. There must be a tougher approach on the part of the federal government to protect fish habitat and restore the salmon stocks to their previous levels of abundance. How tough should we get? My answer is tough enough to ensure proper planning to avoid disaster, to repair damaged areas, and the acceptance by all concerned of the real cost of development—to mitigate negative impact and restore to the fish and other wildlife a decent environment.

The Minister went on to say:

> I am aware that in some quarters the department's resolve to fulfil its habitat protection obligations is viewed with some skepticism. Certainly we have not done all that we could or perhaps should have done, but for the record I should point out that over the past three years the department has laid some 74 charges in B.C. under the habitat sections of the Fisheries Act. These charges covered such abuses as the deposit of toxic contaminants, sedimentation, landfilling, gravel removal, oil spills and destructive logging practices.
> Apart from instituting legal action, we have also taken firm positions on various environmental issues where fish are involved. One is the Quinsam coal development proposal. My officials are advising the company of our concerns regarding the possible impact of the mining operation on the Quinsam River and will identify three serious potential problem areas. Unless I can be fully assured that the fishery resources of the Quinsam will be adequately protected, I am not prepared to grant approval under the Fisheries Act for this development.
> Another controversial issue on Vancouver Island concerns the discharge of toxic mine effluent into Buttle Lake, headwaters of the Campbell River. In this instance we have laid three charges against Western Mines and are insisting that the company clean up its mine disposal methods to safeguard the salmon resources of the Campbell River.

At this point it might be useful if I reiterated the department's objectives on fish habitat matters. They can be stated quite simply. First, there must be no net loss of productive fish habitat in locations where the federal government manages the fisheries. Second, where feasible, we will restore and develop areas to provide a net gain in the total amount of fish habitat. Third, we intend to be firm in the use of the federal statutory powers to protect fish habitat when and where necessary, temperd by co-operative, fair and reasonable dealings with those who seek to use the water resources for other purposes.

Certainly the department prefers to use the consultative, co-operation route to achieve results rather than wielding the big stick with the inevitable confrontations and court proceedings. However this is not an area where we can afford to procrastinate. Once a fish habitat is destroyed or a salmon stock wiped out, they cannot be magically replaced overnight just because we have been successful in a court prosecution, however heavy the fine. Even with everything working in our favour, it could take years to offset the damage caused by a careless river diversion, the building of a dam, the thoughtless dumping of fill in a marsh or spawning bed or the discharge of pollutants into fish-bearing waters. Often the damage is irreversible and valuable spawning or breeding areas may be lost forever.

It is ironic that it is in the mighty Fraser River, which has the greatest potential as a salmon producer of any river system in British Columbia and possibly in the world, that we are experiencing the most serious fish habitat losses. I suppose it is easy to say that those agencies which should have been looking out for the fish, whether they fall in the federal or provincial domain, have been lax in not living up to their responsibilities. Be that as it may, fish habitat continues to be lost and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is determined, one way or the other to reverse that trend. We cannot afford to wait.

It is not difficult to predict where the pressures on the fisheries resource will originate in British Columbia in the near future. As readily available B.C. timber resources dwindle and harvesting moves to difficult terrain farther up river valleys, land slides or erosion problems are likely to occur to the detriment of entire streams.

On another front, with a projected hydro power deficit predicted in B.C. as early as 1985, one can anticipate renewed overtures seeking shared or primary use of major rivers to generate power. With current economic conditions encouraging an expansion of B.C. agricultural production, irrigation needs for new farm lands will become an even greater competitor with fish in the use of water. The mining industry—hardrock, placer and, most recently, coal—is also expanding dramatically and making its own unique demands on water resources. Finally, the prospect of greatly increased shipment of oil by tankers and the spectre of possible major oil spills poses another damage threat.

I know that departmental officials are working on these and other initiatives to improve and strengthen the department's management role on the west coast and elsewhere and, granted a reasonable degree of co-operation, I am sure their efforts will meet with success.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, given the optimistic outlook presented by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson) as to the commitment of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) to husbanding the environment of British Columbia, at least in so far as our salmon resource is concerned, one would have to wonder why the minister is hesitant about disclosing the documents which have been called for by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) in motion No. 28, which is a call for the production of correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and British Columbia Hydro, because if all the things the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has outlined are true, there ought to be nothing to hide.

I want to start by complimenting the hon. member for Skeena for bringing this very important matter before the House. It is in this type of forum that we can prevent in the future the kinds of disasters which have occurred far too often in British Columbia and in other parts of Canada in the past. However, in the comments of the hon. member for Skeena I found a hint that he feels there is something sinister in the fact that officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans would be meeting and corresponding with officials of British Columbia Hydro about the possibility of developing additional hydroelectric power on the streams of British Columbia.

I think the hon. member for Skeena typifies that overreaction to any environmental problem, which acts as a valuable conscience for our society but which sometimes makes it difficult for people to extract the facts and the truth from a lot of rhetoric and exaggeration. I am saying that this is an effective role for the hon. member for Skeena to play in serving as an environmental conscience, but as a former professional person; a mechanical engineer, I believe man and nature can live in harmony. In fact, evidence shows that man can improve upon nature, and has in many ways, which makes our modern twentieth century civilization as comfortable as it is. Granted, there are problems and some disasters about which I want to say something, but I certainly agree with the hon. member for Skeena when he says that these documents should be available for public perusal. There ought to be nothing to hide, as I said a few moments ago.

I am glad the hon. member for Skeena said he was not opposed to the rational development of power on the waterways of British Columbia and in other parts of Canada because if we are to provide comfortable housing and meaningful employment for our young people who are to follow and if we are to feed the Third World nations and help them to develop their economies, we will have to develop our national resources in some manner in harmony with nature. However, we cannot avoid developing those resources and producing power as an important adjunct of that process.

The hon. member for Skeena seems to have constructed a very good case that there are certain documents in existence and that for some reason they are not being made available. When I was an alderman in a community in British Columbia, I had to deal with a very difficult problem. There was always a hue and cry as to whether documents should be made available or kept secret, and whether we should discuss things in camera or whether everything should be discussed before the public. I suggest that when planners are trying to lay out a framework for some concept of development, they ought to be free to do that, just as Members of Parliament sometimes, within the confines of caucus, like to talk and think out loud about concepts without having the pressure of public opinion on their backs. However, I submit that once documents relating to major developments of the scale we are talking about here are completed, printed, signed and exchanged between governments or departments, those documents should be made freely available. I do not know the reason for which the department and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans could argue to the contrary.

I recall in municipal politics that if one disclosed what he was thinking about too early, then outspoken and sometimes reactionary environmental groups would ascribe all kinds of motives and exaggerate excessively, to the point that a very good project might be stopped in its tracks even before the studies had been done to the extent rquired to make the case and to make it on sound technical and quantitative bases. On the other hand, if documents are withheld, then there is always the suspicion that somebody has something to hide or that there is a great conspiracy. There is always the danger, as we have seen in the Amax case in particular, that when the facts are known, it will be too late to reverse initiatives which have been taken because of the implications for employment or in the case of the Amax project at Alice Arm because of the implications for investment. There is always the danger that perhaps we will not find out until after our light bulbs are lit by a new hydroelectric dam, and then we will be so comfortable and dependent upon that new form energy that it will be absolutely impossible to reverse that situation.

I think the secret is to allow officials to carry out these interdepartmental or intergovernmental discussions, but at the point when documents are available, printed and signed, they must then be made available for debate in a parliamentary or democratic forum. Decisions on these proposals should never be made within the confines of the cabinet room or enacted by order in council. In cases of major studies which have an impact on the environment, the environmental assessment and review process should be mandatory in all cases. There should be a full process of public debate and discussion where the technical experts and environmentalists come together and the relative merits or lack of merits in these projects are debated.

In British Columbia there are some examples of environmental disaster. Many years ago British Columbia Hydro began to dam many of the valleys up above Vancouver without cutting down the trees. One notable example is the Stave Lake area where we constructed a reservoir, but it was just dotted with dead timber. That timber had a recoverable value, but at that time no one could be bothered to clear-cut the land first. The Bennett Dam in the Mackenzie area of northeastern British Columbia came about in the same way only about 12 years ago.

Vast areas of northeastern British Columbia were flooded without the trees being cut down first. There is a continuing debate about the elevation of the High Ross Dam in Washington State, which would flood a valley in southwestern British Columbia, the Skagit Valley, and there is great danger of eliminating a very valuable recreational area there. Everyone is very suspicious of the arrangements and the deals which were made with Seattle City Light and Power many years ago, which again was not done in the context of a parliamentary forum where everyone could witness the debate and hear all the pros and cons of the proposals.

Of course, the most remarkable example of lack of care about a major and important salmon spawning resource is the deterioration of the Fraser River system itself. In the lower reaches of the Fraser where I live in the Richmond-Delta area the coliform counts are so high that our children cannot swim there any longer. The good people of Vancouver who do not want to see any more development in our area, want to continue to expand their discharge of sewage into the Strait of Georgia and Fraser River. At some point it may well be too late to regenerate the Fraser River for the purpose of maintaining the salmon runs which are so essential to our economy and the way of life of the people of British Columbia.

However, I would like for a moment or two to speak on the positive side because, as the parliamentary secretary has pointed out, the benefits of the salmon enhancement program have been clearly demonstrated and, assuming the government maintains its commitment, we will see before five years have passed over $150 million invested directly in salmon enhancement projects. The Capilano hatchery, for anyone who has visited Vancouver, is a remarkable example of what man can do to improve upon nature and produce hundreds of thousands of salmon each year of the coho, chum and chinook varieties which will then return in two or four years. Almost without fishing boats those salmon can be trapped back at the hatchery as they return to spawn and produce another cycle. That is essentially a man-made contrivance which has improved on nature many, many times over to our advantage.

The spawning channels at the hatcheries at Qualicum and Little Qualicum, have proven to be a tremendous improvement on nature where eggs laid by female salmon are nurtured and regenerate many, many times more efficiently than in the natural environment. The Puntledge River hatchery on Vancouver Island is an example of a hatchery being built immediately below a hydroelectric dam. In fact, it is an attempt to co-ordinate hydroelectric development with salmon enhancement in a positive way. It has its shortcomings, but many of the improvements technology is providing, such as vertical slot fishways and the ability to fertilize the lakes and reservoirs upstream of the dam as is done at Great Central lake on Vancouver Island, and the fish ladder and hatchery operations at Hell's Gate in the Fraser Canyon, provide the opportunity for salmon to multiply and coexist with man so that we might enjoy an increasing benefit in terms of the food resource that that represents to us all.

So I am saying that these sorts of projects should not be ruled out without detailed study which has to start somewhere, and I would be astounded if the hon. member for Skeena wanted B.C. Hydro to do such studies in isolation. I would suggest it is probably a tremendous advantage that they are meeting with DFO and provincial government officials, and consulting section 33 of the Fisheries Act. Without this kind of consultation, Mr. Speaker, the kind of disasters that have occurred in the past might well reoccur in the future. So although the hon. member for Skeena is serving as a valuable whistle blower, and I agree with him wholeheartedly that these documents should be released at this point, there is also, I think, a responsible position for the minister to take, provided, of course, the government will comply with this motion and release these documents because I do not see that it has anything to hide.

The Amax controversy and the cessation of the discharge from that mine site today should probably teach us all some lessons. It will teach the investors, the entrepreneurs and the industrialists something about the increased public consciousness and concern for environmental questions. But again, to add some balance I would suggest that the mere existence of a plume, which was discovered yesterday in Alice Arm, does not prove that there is a hazard to fish life or man. I do not know whether the hon. member for Skeena drags on those plumes with which we have to contend in committee rooms but many people do and plumes, whether they be from cigarettes or tall smoke stacks at places like Sudbury, are a fact of life. Man will continue to produce effluents and discharges so long as the natural biological processes continue. The mere existence of a plume should not be cause in itself for people to go parading around with placards and overreacting. The question is: does the plume in Alice Arm really carry on outside Alice Arm, which would be contrary to the special permit that was issued, and are the concentrations of particulates in excess of the limits set out under the legislation? In that case there is definitely a hazard, and I think the fact that Amax has agreed to cease the discharge means they are now concerned that there may indeed be a problem, that their hydraulic studies were not done thoroughly enough and their modelling of the situation did not simulate the real circumstances in Alice Arm.

So I believe that development is essential, and I think the hon. member for Skeena agrees with that. Much as people in his riding may not enjoy all the amenities those in Vancouver, Toronto or Ottawa enjoy, I would not want him to suggest that the people in the Skeena area, Prince Rupert, Terrace and elsewhere should not be able to aspire to the same types of comforts that our modern industrial society is providing. Perhaps in the long run, if we in this party agree to the favourite notion of the NDP, that we should have an industrial development strategy for Canada in order to have more finished product from our resources, we will have to contend with some of the large-scale projects such as the one at Hat Creek and chemical plants and factories, steel mills, and who knows what else. All I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that I believe, and history will show, that if the engineering is done properly, if foresight is applied and there is an open process of studying these concepts and proposals, we can improve upon the natural circumstances. So let us keep a sense of balance on these questions.

I am not convinced that the hon. member for Skeena's notion of lowhead type turbines will sove the problem because there are economies of scale associated with transmission systems and networks that may mitigate against these lowhead type turbines unless they are going to serve merely a small neighbourhood area. In fact, I think we can build large scale projects in harmony with nature and in the process improve on the environment as far as our biological resources are concerned. I realize that other hon. members would like to have a chance to speak. I understand this debate will go on for another 20 or 30 minutes, so I will resume my seat at present and conclude by saying that I hope the government will accede to the request of the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before I come to the substance of my remarks I want to congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Henderson), who, I believe, in his exposé of the facts of this issue, has set out very logically that the issue is one which is being given serious consideration by the department as it has been in the past and will continue.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has raised a number of issues in his remarks. He says, and I do not believe he intends to say it in a disputatious way, that the minister, as I understood him, is not very concerned about this issue. The hon. member also made reference to the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) are not here today, and somehow that adds up to their not being concerned with the issue. Well, if that is the implication he tried to leave in this House, I totally disagree; I think the opposite is the case.

I would also like to indicate to the hon. member for Skeena that I hope to have the opportunity in the foreseeable future—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the hour for private members' business has now expired and accordingly I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as always I feel privileged to speak in this assembly; this evening particularly so because we are debating a most important bill, Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas.

This bill is intended to increase substantively the revenues of the federal government by new taxation of those sectors of the Canadian economy which are growing, primarily the publishing, cosmetics, tobacco, alcohol and energy industries. This is being done at a time when the economy should receive a boost through tax reduction and decreased government spending policies such as those being followed in the United States, rather than tax increases.

Before speaking more specifically on various aspects of the bill, and in particular on part IV cited as the petroleum and gas revenue tax act, I want to address myself more generally to the present nature of the Canadian economy and the government's response to it.

• (2010)

Recently, the government has stated repeatedly that it is following a policy of economic gradualism. I ask: gradualism in what? Gradualism in the rate of rise in inflation which has reached 12.6 per cent? Gradualism in the rate of rise of bankruptcies in the Canadian economy? In the first quarter of this year business bankruptcies are already up by 30 per cent over the comparable quarter last year. Is it gradualism in the rate of rise of government spending over the last few years which has now reached astronomical annual deficits of some $14 billion or $15 billion? Gradualism in the rate of change of the money supply? Gradualism in the rate of rise in interest rates? The wild gyrations in interest rates both up and down in the last year are hardly extremes of economic gradualism. Is it gradualism in taxation of selected growth industries such as are implicit in Bill C-57? The federal government is now seeking revenues from areas which have traditionally belonged to the provinces—taxation of resources at the source, a form of royalty. Mr. Speaker, I ask you, gradualism in what? Just what economic levers available to it has the government shifted gradually? Indeed, just what economic levers does the national government control today?

The government can increase the levels of taxation, as it is doing with this bill, Bill C-57. We have today in the Canadian economy the gradualism of confusion and economic acquiescence to forces beyond the control or fiscal management of this government brought about by a decade of economic neglect and misdirection. This national government has lost the ability to manage the national economy, lost it partially to the provinces. By de facto royalty taxation of resources, it is trying to regain some of that lost control. The government has lost it to the dictates of international economic forces beyond its control. It has lost it to the built up inertia and momentum of its own spending habits and policies during the last decade, policies directed toward wealth, redistribution with little or no attention to wealth formation and the competitive productivity of Canada's work force. In productivity we have dropped from second place to twelfth place in the last decade among the nations of the world. This bill, more than any other government measure, highlights the mess in which the Canadian economy finds itself today.

Canadian interest rates are totally at the mercy of the levels established in the United States of America. Why have the U.S. rates reached such levels and are apparently being maintained there, rates which have caused alarm to world leaders such as Helmut Schmidt? Why are U.S. rates so high, in excess of 20 per cent, when, indeed, the most recent monthly inflation rates were of the order of 5 per cent? There is a 15 per cent spread, Mr. Speaker. Has Canada made representations or asked to be apprised of the need for such high U.S. rates? Is the United States following economic gradualism? The U.S. dollar is fundamentally the basis or standard of all other free-world currencies. Why then are U.S. rates so high when its inflationary rate is reasonable? The United States is pursuing a course of reasserting its leadership role in the world. What better way to proceed than to strengthen its currency, promote an influx of investment capital, permit capital accumulation such that it can be directed for hard commercial and needed industrial reinvestment rather than frivolous consumer indulgence? This is not a policy of gradualism in the United States, it is economic shock treatment. In all its ferocity it is being imposed on Canada and Canadians; and this government recognizes, literally admits, that the economic mess it has created over a decade is so severe that about all it can do is pray that the U.S. will relent and reduce the severity of the shock treatment and lower interest rates. The government must have prayed pretty hard because today there came some small relief and interest rates dropped slightly.

Our very own spending habits; causing us to live well beyond our means—and effectively off the backs of future generations, have rendered us impotent. So we bring forth Bill C-57 and set back a vibrant oil and gas industry for at least a decade so that the government can generate a little more revenue to keep the deficit from rising a little higher. What can we do? We can face up squarely and realistically to the mess we are in and begin to plan, seriously plan, for the mid-term and the longer term while holding the economy together as best we can in the short term.

This nation needs an energy agreement, not only with one province but with all it needs it now. This nation needs an industrial strategy, and it needs one soon. Not an industrial strategy based on a dollar which must be constantly propped up by frantic fiscal transactions by the national government and the Bank of Canada, but a strategy based upon a dollar which has been allowed to assume its true international value. This nation needs a new rationale, a new direction, difficult as it may be, toward government spending and regulation at all levels of government. Government must manage the national economy more and be involved in it less.

In 1978, after a series of federal-provincial sectoral meetings, followed by a first ministers' conference on the Canadian economy, major decisions on the economy were agreed upon. What were those decisions and how do they differ from the government's fiscal and economic measures of today, which are more taxation and more spending, as is evident by the bill before us?

I want to refer to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau), analysis of the economy in 1978, just three years ago. This is what he told the first ministers:

> Allow me to set out for a few moments what I believe are necessary conditions in this new partnership. Amongst many, I believe four are of primary importance:
>
> First, it is governments' task (in consultation with Canadians) to establish the economic goals the country can achieve—

What are these goals today? More taxation? To continue:

> Second, we must understand that private citizens and private markets have the major task in ensuring economic performance in Canada.

Not the government, the private sector. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Our job in government is to provide an economic framework—we cannot and should not manage all the details of economic activity.

What is this economic framework today? He said:

> Third, we must recognize the country is diverse in its regions and that the economies of each region are continuously changing. It is because Canada is diverse and dynamic, that the relations between governments at all levels must be flexible and adaptable. That we must also demonstrate.

● (2020)

Demonstrate how? By punishing the west through damaging resource taxation.

The fourth point the Prime Minister made at that first ministers' conference was:

—good economic performance is not an end in itself. But without it, the kind of country we all want, humane, tolerant and compassionate, is not possible. Therefore, we must provide the effective leadership which good economic performance demands. At the same time, as political leaders, we must aim to serve Canadians in a variety of ways, not just to help manage the balance sheet.

Where is that leadership today, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister went on to say:

From 1965 to 1975, government expenditures, at all levels, grew from 26 per cent to 36 per cent of our gross national product.

There are many who argue that our governments have grown too fast and too large. They say that in our attempts to provide government services for people, we sacrificed economic efficiency and competitiveness. I have some sympathy with this point of view.

That was his view in 1968. He said:

I recognize, as we all must, that if we are not efficient and competitive, if we do not create wealth in the country, we cannot sustain our efforts to help those who need it and build a more humane and equitable society.

But what have we done and what are we now doing?

The Prime Minister also said:

Our aim must be to constrain the growth of our governments. We must reduce our share of gross national product. But, even more important, we must reduce the intrusion of bureaucracy in the daily lives of Canadians.

That is what the Prime Minister said in 1978 at a first ministers' conference. What does this bill do? Is is an imposition, an intrusion in the taxation areas of other levels of government, particularly in the resource areas. The discussion culminated at that conference, and it is time we had another economic ministers' conference. There is need today for a first ministers' conference on the economy, and it should have been held several months ago. That conference concluded along these notes:

The first ministers of Canada's eleven governments have arrived at far-reaching agreement in a large number of economic matters.

Following three days of intensive meetings in Ottawa and two months of preparatory sectoral talks, they announced steps today that will:

—facilitate the setting of economic objectives—

What are those today?

—improve demand management policies,—

I will want to refer to these in a minute.

—foster responsible price and incomes behaviour,

—strengthen the business investment climate,—

This should be achieved not through more taxation, but through less taxation.

—and further shape trade, industry, energy, manpower and regional development initiatives.

First ministers see an expanding private sector as the major impetus for growth in the Canadian economy.

My, how this differs from the massive throttling of the Canadian economy through the National Energy Program and its fall-out legislation such as Bill C-57 and Bill C-48! What were those demand management policies? There are three of them:

(i) The general instruments of monetary and fiscal policy should be used to encourage the growth of demand which would bring the desired growth of output and employment at declining rates of inflation.

(ii) The monetary policy being pursued by the Bank of Canada is consistent with this objective.

It was consistent at that time.

Is it consistent today?

First ministers agreed that the Governor of the Bank of Canada should review the objectives of monetary policy with the conference of finance ministers on an annual basis.

When was the last time the Governor of the Bank of Canada met with the finance ministers of the various governments in this country? Third:

(iii) The trend of government expenditure growth should be held, on average, to less than the trend growth in the value of the GNP or provincial gross product.

Is that what we have done in the last year?

In this context, however, it was agreed that capital expenditures of a revenue producing nature were important to economic growth and development.

My, how these policies differ and how they are at variance with the policies of the government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada just three years later! What has happened during this period? I will tell Your Honour what has happened. We have not contained our spending as governments in this land. In particular, the federal government has continued to spend, and spend some more, and increase the national debt until we now know that that debt is over $14 billion per year and that much of it must be refinanced at much higher interest rates. So, we bring in a bill, Bill C-57, to tax primarily the growing industries in this land, particularly energy.

I find the 8 per cent tax, which is called the resource royalty tax, to be particularly interesting because, to my mind, that tax has several objectives; not only to raise revenue for a faltering government which is broke, and is in debt up to its ears, but to take revenue from the energy companies in western Canada and lower their cash flow to such a level of insignificance that they will start to put terrific pressure on the provincial governments to lower their royalties. That tax of 8 per cent is the federal government's way of imposing resource control, even though it does not have constitutional power to do so, or imposing a resource royalty on the provincial resource when there is no room for that taxation. So, the federal government simply said: "We will take from the companies their cash flow and tell them to go to the provinces and have them lower their royalties so the companies' cash flow can be increased".

That was essentially the reply of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to an hon. member on this side of the House who asked about the solution to the problem of wells which were being shut down in Saskatchewan. The minister said to go and ask the province to lower their royalties. So this is doing something indirectly through the Constitution which cannot be done directly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, I feel a sense of déja vu, in rising to speak on this bill today. Over 200 years ago the Americans staged a tea party in Boston to protest against representation without taxation. That is precisely what we are again now talking about right here.

Mr. Knowles: It was the other way around!

Mr. Stewart: The government is asking Parliament to give carte blanche approval to a bill which would automatically increase excise taxes indexed to the consumer price index. How convenient it would be for the government not to have to face Parliament when future taxes are increased! How convenient it would be for the government not to have to deal again with unpopular measures in the future! But that is not the Canadian way because it was not the American way. It is the Liberal way. I have been present religiously in this House since Parliament was convened over a year ago and I have not seen one positive measure put forward by this government—not one piece of legislation which adds to the productivity of this country. That is what the free enterprise system is all about.

● (2030)

This bill is oppressive, regressive, rotten, and imposes risk-stifling taxation. It is putting an 8 per cent tax on our gas industry. Hon. members opposite stand up so proudly and say this is Canadianization. They call it a national oil policy, but I call it a disgrace and a nationalization oil policy. Not one piece of progressive legislation which deals with building Canada or measures to get this moribund economy moving again and put Canadians back to work, not out of work, has been offered.

This legislation is regressive, oppressive, unfair, discriminatory and will only add to the cost of living and inflationary woes of one of the greatest nations in the world. It is crippling the citizens of Canada.

We do not need negative legislation. We need positive measures which will provide social justice and groceries at a reasonable cost. We need jobs. That is what my constituents are interested in. We need less unemployment, not more. We need lower interest rates, and it can be done, so that more Canadians can carry on their small businesses and afford mortgages so they can own their own homes. It is the Canadian dream, if you will.

We need positive action and some sign from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who smirks and smiles and shrugs, that he is aware that inflation is enemy number one in this country. We need positive measures to encourage the manufacturing sector and to stimulate R and D.

Most of all we need an awareness on the part of the government that the economy is sluggish and that its policies are mainly to blame and should be changed. They can be changed.

I am fortunate to have a wonderful corporate citizen in my constituency in Molson's Brewery, one of the largest breweries in the world. The new rate of excise tax on beer goes far beyond the Crosbie budget in terms of the application of the levy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Deputy Prime Minister—the alleged—and I say alleged—Minister of Finance, have launched a new beer on the market. I wonder how many members opposite have heard about it. It is called "Overdraft". It is not a popular seller. It does not go down well with the average Canadian, like Molson's. Like the government, Overdraft is full of froth and suds and foam. I resent the government's end run in indexing this beer excise tax to the alcoholic beverages subgroup of the consumer price index.

I resent periodic increases in this tax without reference to this Parliament. We have not had the Boston tea party yet. Like some of my colleagues who spoke earlier, I am saying we have not had it—yet.

I resent the ham-handed efforts of the government to avoid facing Parliament on this issue in the future. I resent its arrogance—read any newspaper and you will see it—in attempting for all time to stave off the politically risky business of dealing with increases in the price of beer in future budgets.

The opposition was told that this tax is being imposed to protect government revenues derived from this tax from erosion and that it was based on the same formula which applied to the indexation of personal income tax. What a joke. Indexation of personal income tax is designed to protect the taxpayer from inflation and to discipline government to better manage our fiscal affairs. It was not intended that the government should ever profit from inflation by automatically receiving higher revenues from people because they obtained cost of living increases to ward off the ravages of the record high inflation which has been brought on by this government. That evidence is based on statistics, it is not just my opinion.

By indexing taxes on beer the government is doing or attempting to do exactly and precisely the opposite of what indexation of personal income tax, as originally suggested by the Hon. Robert Stanfield, is doing—it is taking advantage of a formula which is meant to buffer the consumer against inflation and fiscal management.

If we allow this measure to pass, the government will be allowed to tax people on inflation and to do it without ever again referring the matter to Parliament. Shades of the Constitution—shades of metric!

I am sure all hon. members are familiar with the brief which was sent to all Members of Parliament by the Brewers Association of Canada.

I would like to quote from a letter I received from a driver-supervisor for Brewer's Retail in my home city of Barrie. This is a concerned Canadian, not some executive officer. He points out that with this insidious and ad valorem tax on beer, by 1991 a case of 24 beer will cost $23.64 and a bottle of gin will cost $16.64. He writes:

> I find this hard to understand since the alcohol content of distilled spirits is higher by volume by 35 per cent than it is in beer, I am also concerned that the proposal of automatic increases on alcoholic beverages would not require the approval of Parliament.

Mr. Rae: What does he think of Frank Miller's budget?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. member is known to suffer from constipation of thought and diarrhea of the mouth. The letter continues:

> Bill C-57 seems to me to be a contradiction of this age old belief, by encouraging people to drink more distilled spirits, while discouraging the consumption of beer, which has traditionally been known as the beverage of moderation.

Perhaps the Finance Minister is discriminating in favour of his own personal like for single malt scotch imported from the Isle of Skye or the Hebrides of his ancestral acres in Scotland.

My correspondent from Barrie continues.

Mr. Evans: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think you would have to agree that the last remark of the hon. member was derogatory and uncalled for. I would ask that you ask him to recall the statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry, I think the reference to the place of ancestory of the Minister of Finance is geographically inaccurate but I cannot hold that the comments made are unparliamentary.

Mr. Evans: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The reference was to the alleged drinking habits of the minister and that is derogatory. I would ask that the hon. member be asked to withdraw that comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think I explained that it is not unparliamentary.

Mr. Stewart: I am glad I got through to the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) because every time I rise to speak he seems to bring up points of order. I think he must be paying a little bit of attention.

Mr. Smith: As little as possible.

Mr. Stewart: My constituent writes:

> My chief concern is that this discrimination will result in a loss of revenue for the brewing industry, which will result in the curtailment of future expansion and, therefore, the loss of many jobs, not only for employees of the brewing industry but also the suppliers of numerous products to the brewing industry.

Much the same as the oil industry, Mr. Speaker. The letter goes on:

> As a concerned citizen, I would also like to know: Is the Liberal government prepared to lay an even heavier burden on the taxpayers of Canada in unemployment benefits, welfare benefits, etc. Would it not be better for the government to realize this revenue through income tax from people already in the work force. A great deal of the taxpayers' money has already been spent to create jobs. Bill C-57 would seem to me to defeat this purpose.

Amen. He concludes:

> Thank you for taking the time to read my letter. I would like you to know that this is the first time I have felt sufficiently concerned to write my MP. I would appreciate a reply to my letter.

He got one, of course. I would like to don my other hat now, which is one of a wholesale tobacco distributor. Although not active for the past two years, I still maintain my firm which is under a management team. I speak today as a past president of the National Association of Tobacco and Confectionery Distributors of Canada. I note that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister received and acknowledged a letter from John L. Cunningham, executive manager of NATCD. I have read the reply signed by the Minister of Finance—I will not talk about Scotch now—and I can only assume he is completely ignorant of the complexities of wholesaling and distributing, among other things. My own wholesale tobacco and confectionery sales are very small—only $15 million annually. The minister says he does not perceive an ad valorem tax to be an administrative burden. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker? Has he ever had an inspector walk into his warehouse, as I did last Tuesday when the Ontario tobacco tax went ad valorem, and demand a cheque for $33,000 in excise taxes for a product that had not yet been sold?

• (2040)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where did they get that from?

Mr. Stewart: They borrowed it from this government. The minister has never held a job in the cruel world of business. It is a jungle out there.

Mr. Rae: Blame it on Bill Davis.

Mr. Stewart: That product stacked in my warehouse represents risk on my part. The whole tax is an insidious vehicle which discriminates against the wholesaler, the small businessman and the oil producer. One hundred and twenty-five of them made representations here in Ottawa last week.

Only recently one of my chief competitors, a firm which grossed $25 million a year and which had been in operation since shortly after confederation, went into receivership, and with it 75 to 80 jobs went down the drain. These things are not being acknowledged on the other side of the House, but mention was made by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) just a few moments ago. The government does not want to talk about those 30 per cent extra bankruptcies. They are real to me because they happen next door.

The minister talks about the number of jobs being created. What a joke that is. How many jobs were created because they were needed as a result of the small rate of growth in the economy and normal attrition? Jobs were created all right, but how many less than were really needed? That is the point, what about the number of bankruptcies we have, and our high interest rates? Does the minister know how many jobs have been lost in Canada because of his government's economic and energy policies in the field of taxation? No way. Does the minister know how many small firms he is forcing into bankruptcy and receivership? He does not care. As I said, one of my chief competitors, who was recently forced into receivership, operated six branches in Ontario, two cash and carry outfits and one vending machine company. They were wiped out. That is the legacy of the MacEachen school of economics.

An hon. Member: What about competition?

Mr. Stewart: I am not afraid of competition but I do not need the government for my competition.

Ad valorem taxes on tobacco, cosmetics and beer are essentially indexed tax increases. They are essentially taxes without representation, and hon. members over there know it.

Not only are tobacco taxes already a burden on some seven million Canadians who enjoy cigarettes, cigars or pipes, but the finance minister's new approach will encourage further inflation and lead to an economic burden on Canadian smokers, especially those in the lower income groups or those on fixed incomes who comprise the majority of Canadian smokers. Whether hon. members over there like it or not, there are seven million smokers out there.

When provincial and federal budgets are brought down, it is always "a penny on the pint" or a nickel on a package of cigarettes. It is nickel and diming the poor guy who wants to have a little fun out of life. Too bad that our finance minister would not be indiscreet enough to tell a reporter "a penny on the pint" on his way into the chamber on budget night, and then we would be rid of him.

Mr. Taylor: They are learning fast from Moscow.

Mr. Stewart: I ask hon. members, how far can this government go?

Mr. Rae: All the way to Queen's Park.

Mr. Stewart: How much more can the tobacco industry and the average Canadian bear? I wonder if the hon. member opposite, who is flashing his cigarette package, realizes that a carton of 200 cigarettes costs me as a distributor $8.82.

Mr. Rae: Shame on Frank Miller.

Mr. Stewart: That is including a 2.5 per cent nine-day discount. That is the bare-faced invoice cost. Do hon. members know that is taxed $6.54?

An hon. Member: How much is federal tax?

Mr. Stewart: I will tell you how much it is. The $2.92 tax goes to the Ontario government and $3.62 goes in tax to the blue-suited feds over there.

The tobacco industry is an important industry in Canada, and hon. members should not forget that. Last year the total retail sales value, including taxes of all tobacco products, was $3.135 billion. Nine hundred and thirty four million dollars was paid in federal excise duty and sales taxes. That is almost the entire budget for our foreign aid program, which you people over there want to inflate to .75 per cent of the GNP. Then that program will be up in the billions again. Can we afford it?

Where else could this spendthrift, greedy guts government get that kind of money to do the things it is doing by waste? Provincial jurisdiction realized $765 million from the tobacco industry. Corporation income taxes in the manufacturing sector were $56 million. Tobacco creates jobs in the fields and in the plants. In 1980, wages in the industry totalled $166 million, and another $23.7 million was spent by the industry in transportation costs. But go ahead, tax it, tax it out of existence, just like you are doing with everything else. You have not had a fresh idea in 13 years.

The tobacco industry believes that the federal and provincial governments, which never miss an opportunity to identify inflation as one of Canada's major problems, should set an example of restraint instead of adopting new inflationary fiscal methods. This industry is being taxed out of existence. There were some 66 independent distributors in Toronto a few years ago. There are now approximately 12.

Getting off the tobacco subject and into another area, I would now like to read a telex that I received from Bruce Roland, publisher of the Barrie Examiner which is the daily newspaper in my city. The telex reads:

> Re proposed legislation altering newspaper taxation. Extremely concerned this ill-advised legislation if passed will cripple entire Canadian newspaper industry. Legislation would be tax upon newspaper's raw materials as well as revenue and profit. Proposal shows almost total lack of understanding about newspapers and their operating methods.

That is to be understood. The telex concludes:

> Strongly suggest taxation proposal using equitable and urge maintenance of past practice. Yours truly, Bruce Roland.

I wrote to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) upon receipt of Mr. Roland's telex. I received a three-page reply which left me neither any wiser nor better informed than when he stands up in this House. I concluded that the minister has no intention of changing this part of his legislation or anything else because he feels that the taxing on all advertising inserts will place all producers of these products on an equal basis. Equalization and linguistic equality, that is all we care about. No doubt we will soon see a new echelon of bureaucracy in the public service armed with rulers measuring the inches or centimetres of lineage devoted to advertising. Big brother will watch over everything, including the ads we will read in our daily and weekly newspapers. We will call it Pravda the third.

There is another little sleeper, that is the packaging tax. The sleeper tax has aroused the ire of Canada's marginal manufacturers who say that a Department of Finance decision requiring them to pay federal sales tax on repackaged goods will mean higher prices to the consumer and a loss of jobs.

A fellow friend of mine who is in the paper business in Barrie, Mr. Ron Lynch, mentions potato bags. If you are a grower and pack in bags, you pay no tax. But if you pack goods as a manufacturer, you do pay tax. A marginal manufacturer assembles, cuts to size, bottles, packages, repackages or otherwise prepares goods for sale. Some Canadian manufacturers are considering manufacturing outside Canada to minimize the lousy tax. This will mean a loss of Canadian jobs.

I would like to talk about furniture but I realize my time is quite short, but I could go on and on about many things. In a letter dated March 13, signed by John Cunningham of the NATCD, he listed all these unfair, undemocratic taxations. I could talk about Ron Findlay, Vice-President of Rothmans, who told me today that there are 600 products in every warehouse and most retail stores that will require paper changes. We have created a paper monster, and a bureaucratic nightmare which is fuelling the fires of inflation.

Walter Hitch, President of Kolmar in my town, states that the cosmetic industry will not be taxed in the same manner as other manufacturers of consumer goods. I have heard also from John Rogers, President of Molson's Brewery. My list goes on and on.

Mr. Lumsden, head of the independent wholesalers wrote about the 600 retailers he serves and what it will mean to them. He says he is a fairly organized businessman and he finds it incomprehensible. Next we come to the pharmaceutical industry. I can go through the whole gamut of what this measure will do to the independent businessman of Canada. This is on top of the imposition of the nightmare of metric and the taxation on oil.

Taxation indexing is not what is required, but, as Reuben C. Bellan stated in the Trudeau star "but increased productivity is what we need." May I repeat to the hon. minister of Finance what Cromwell once said to the British autocrat: "If you cannot handle the finance portfolio, in the name of God, go!"

• (2050)

Mr. Taylor: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because during the first half of the address by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) the hon. parliamentary secretary, the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), stood outside the curtains holding his drink, I guess of coffee, and did his interrupting. If he is going to interrupt, the least he could do is follow the rules and be present in the chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I regret to inform the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) that it is not necessarily part of the tradition of heckling that hon. members be inside the curtains.

Mr. Taylor: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member get up in the gallery and heckle? If he cannot do so, why can he do so from behind the curtains? Come out in the open, don't be afraid.

Mr. Evans: I am not afraid of you, Gordon, not at all.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate on Bill C-57 it is significant to note that from the earliest of times, in terms of the parliamentary system, the public, represented by their elected representatives, has been very jealous of the control by government of the taxation of the citizen. It is accordingly with some regret that we note that the system implanted permanently within the tax framework, as established by Bill C-57, has the effect of removing that direct participation by members of Parliament in determining what the tax laws of the day shall be.

Before my colleagues to the left scream that this is the very thing that has happened recently in the province of Ontario in the recent provincial budget, let me say I agree, and the comments I have in respect of this government will apply equally to any government which endeavours to impose tax without presenting to the elected representatives of the Parliament or legislature to which they belong an opportunity to discuss and vote for or against a particular piece of legislation. I do not think it matters whether the government is provincial, federal, Conservative or Liberal, or in an unusual circumstance, NDP, and I say "unusual circumstance" because fortunately the country has had so few of them.

An hon. Member: Go west.

Mr. Gamble: The hon. member suggests I go west. I have been west. The great people of western Canada had an opportunity to get rid of a canker that had infested them in British Columbia, and hopefully that kind of circumstance will not recur.

In any event I think it is appropriate that members of this House have regard for the change that is occurring. That change is not one we should accept without very substantial and recognized complaint. We have seen changes in this place in respect of our ability to stand and speak for or against a particular issue; changes in such innocuous pieces of legislation as the Canada-Germany Tax Convention which contains a provision by which there is no legislative enactment, in respect of changes, without the imposition of closure, which is built into the very piece of legislation presented to the House and subsequently passed. This is the same kind of creeping undemocratic authoritarianism about which all members should be concerned.

The provisions of Bill C-57 go far beyond that and that alone. They permit the growth of an element in our economy, sought allegedly to be retarded by the government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) just the other day, in a very learned dissertation on what the psychology of inflation entailed, indicated that some people believe that because prices are going to increase, it is appropriate that those people increase the price of their product or their services. In the process, they increase those prices in excess of what is really required. Of course, those people of whom he spoke include the members of his own cabinet who have brought before the House this piece of legislation.

It is the personification of the inflation psychology which drives prices up, and this is allegedly opposed by the government. Yet, because of the way in which it fixed its ever-increasing tax bite in respect of excise taxes, it is clear that by fixing them, in relation to certain products covered by the Act, to an element of the consumer price index, the government has given a clear signal to the entire population of Canada that it expects the consumer price index, as it relates to those elements, to increase. The government has made an announcement to Canadians generally that tomorrow the prices of those goods will be higher than today. How has the government made that announcement? It did so by suggesting that its revenues be tied to the prices as they increase.

An ad valorem tax would similarly go down in the event that the price of the commodity, as an element of the consumer price index, was reduced. Of course, the government knows that the price is not coming down because the government is the greatest cause of inflation in the nation. What it has done now, having caused inflation, is to tie its tax grab to the inflationary spiral it has created. Beyond that, it has then gone to the public and announced that prices tomorrow will be higher than prices today.

We know the effect of that kind of inflation psychology. It drives the prices of products out of the reach of the ordinary Canadian. It has the effect, naturally, of influencing the ultimate cost of money. Interest rates have skyrocketed. Despite the fact that today they may have taken a brief dip—and I hope it is not the kind of dip that occurred last year which was followed by insurmountable increases, and presumably we will not be bereaved of those high rates for some time—the fact of the matter is that as a result of increasing inflationary pressure, interest rates will and must rise. It is illogical to ever assume that the investor, whoever that investor may be, the bank or the individual, is prepared to lend his or her money, in the case of the bank its money, at a rate of return which is less than the rate at which the money is being eroded by inflation. With an inflation rate of 13 per cent, it is unrealistic to expect interest rates at 10 per cent.

As a matter of fact, if you really analyse what is occurring, in the event that a lender is in the 50 per cent bracket, a rate of interest at 18 per cent will result in a net return of 9 per cent, and inflation is eating away at the equity of a loan at the rate of 13 per cent, so the loan in fact will result in an annual loss of 4 per cent in terms of the real value of the capital amount of the loan.

Interest rates have to be tied to something more basic than what the government has suggested, that is a direct connection with the U.S. rates, having regard to the fact that every Thursday we have been artificially manipulating interest rates in Canada through the purchase of treasury bills.

Those prices have, in large measure, been influenced by a determination not to permit the Canadian dollar to decline at a rate which would startle the public into realizing what a horrendous mess the government has made of the economy of our country. The real value of the dollar should not be sustained as a consequence of interest rates but, rather, through the value of the product itself and, like any other commodity, if it is in demand, as it should be, instead of being something which is sold off to acquire another product in a foreign currency which may produce a higher interest rate—if it is, accordingly, in demand for some other purpose than for the generation of interest alone—then that commodity, that dollar, will be sought after and have an intrinsic value. How can that intrinsic value be established in the massive amounts which are required for the purposes of today's economy? It is very clear that the most effective and direct way by which this can be done is through the development in western Canada of our gigantic resources which will contribute to our energy requirements.

Why am I dealing with that issue now? Very clearly, because this delightful piece of legislation has the very opposite effect. It has a provision with respect to a special royalty imposed against the generation of energy revenues, a special tax not based upon profit but, rather, upon recovery of an amount. It is a gross tax, a royalty tax, new and special and designed, I say, to retard development which is essential not just for that part of the country but for the whole nation.

Accordingly, I submit that the only way we can avoid the economic calamities which are caused in our country as a direct result of high interest rates is to attract Canadian investment into an area which is absolutely vital. Those dollars, once tied up in plant and machinery, not only in that part of the country which will ultimately use it but also in that part of the country expanding its economy in order to produce the goods which are needed, will not be available to flee the country in search of a higher interest rate in the United States or elsewhere but will be used for the purpose of generating, as genuine equity, the kind of energy production that is required and vital to Canadian needs.

I was interested in the fact that this ad valorem concept which is built into Bill C-57 has not gone unnoticed among the general public. I had occasion to meet with a constituent who is astounded and offended by the fact that this government would introduce a piece of legislation designed to preclude Parliament from examining on a regular basis the tax structure of the country. I had thought that that kind of consideration was one which might arouse the ire of people in this House and might generally concern some theoretician who likes to examine parliamentary history, but it appears that that is not the case. People are genuinely concerned about the protection of their rights, and they look to this House to protect those rights. They look to the members of this House to undertake that task and lead the way so that other governments, be they provincial or otherwise, come to recognize that the public is not asleep. The public is not prepared to have its rights trampled upon. I refer to those rights which historically have been the foundation of our very being here and the very foundation of the system which we currently enjoy. Accordingly, it is appropriate that we direct as much attention to this issue as we can, hoping—and I am concerned having regard to the way in which the government has responded in the past—to make them realize that something fundamental and wrong is being perpetrated upon not only the system but also the people who live by it and suffer from it.

If I may just return for a moment to the issue of the detrimental effect of the resource royalty tax of 8 per cent upon the general economy of the nation, I might add that I find it extremely strange to learn that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is about to prepare the public for another increase in the price of petroleum products at the pump. He is telling us now that we shall shortly be paying an additional two and a quarter cents a gallon to be added to the two and a quarter cents a gallon we have already paid for a total of four and a half cents a gallon. The reason is that Alberta is reducing its oil production by another 60,000 barrels a day and by September, presumably, will reduce it by another 60,000 barrels a day, with the result that at that time, if the federal government follows the policy it has already announced and implemented, a total of 6.75 cents a gallon will be imposed by way of special taxes for the purpose of paying for imported foreign oil to make up for the deficit in production capacity which Canada, chiefly through Alberta, has been able to make available to the general public.

It is curious that this government can extract potentially 6.75 cents a gallon from the public by way of a special tax and pay that money directly to foreign producers of petroleum products, but it could not take that same 6.75 cents and pay it to another Canadian. There has never been a suggestion by the government that the method it has adopted for the purpose of paying for this increased price of petroleum should not be applied in settling its disputes with the government of Alberta. Yet the mechanism is there, and I am convinced, as surely as I stand here, that when that dispute is resolved, the government will have fixed permanently as a tax, never to be removed, the 4.5 cents or the 6.75 cents, whatever it may be, because once imposed, tax is used for whatever purpose the government may set about to use it.

I attended a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee this morning. We had before us the deputy minister of national revenue, and we were discussing those Canadian taxpayers who have never filed tax returns. It was suggested that some of them might well have been in the over-65 age group. I explained at the time that the reason for that particular group's declining to pay tax is probably that they remember that in 1918 when the act was introduced, the government of the day promised that it was simply going to be temporary in nature and, accordingly, they are holding the government to its word.

It is absolutely vital that we come to recognize that this piece of legislation is damaging in its present form, and it is damaging for the reasons I have discussed with respect to the effect it has upon the democratic system, our right to be consulted and our right to speak on and vote for or against a tax increase. It is inappropriate that this House should be asked to grant permanently to the government the right to extract taxes on an ever-escalating basis.

It is wrong because it has no regard to the fact that the greatest way to build the country is by removing, not imposing, additional taxes on the great energy resources available which, if developed, will remedy the economic ills with which we are concerned.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-57 and Bill C-48 are the main component parts of the October 28, 1980 budget or, as the government now prefers to call it, their National Energy Program. Provisions of both bills and their implications that are now so apparent are a major irritant and a source of extreme frustration leading to serious alienation throughout all of western Canada but especially in Alberta. This extremely serious situation must surely have been obvious to every member of Parliament about two weeks ago when the 126 oil and gas well servicing industry representatives spent two days in Ottawa. Their very effective lobby cannot be dismissed if only because they were all Canadian managers and owner-operators of the entire petroleum service industry in Alberta. They were effective because they were all speaking from personal experience about severe cutbacks, lay-offs, current massive budget reductions, idle drilling rigs and supporting services. They were all having to face the reality of a vastly reduced level of operation or perhaps complete shutdown which would lead to selling out or moving to the United States. Those were the grim realities that faced a good many of them, and surely the grim message they brought cannot be ignored, especially by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

Of the two energy bills this one, Bill C-57, is the more important for the oil and gas well servicing sector, and for me personally because of my special interest and concerns in natural gas in southern Alberta. The discovery and use of natural gas took place about 100 years ago near my home city of Medicine Hat. As a natural resource, natural gas has made a major contribution to that city, and the industrial development of gas-related industries contributed significantly to our painfully slow recovery from the lost generation of the drought and depression wracked 1930s. That was followed by another ten years of recovery and readjustment. Natural gas has rightfully been part of our heritage for almost 100 years. Both of these taxes, the production tax, also known as the natural gas and gas liquids tax, and the 8 per cent wellhead tax known as the PGRT, are viewed with extreme shock and bitter disappointment by all of us in southern Alberta. All Albertans are completely convinced that they are a deliberate and massive federal revenue grab directed right at Alberta.

It was my privilege to participate as a member of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs whenever discussions and witnesses relating to natural gas issues were before that committee. I wish to express my thanks and appreciation to the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) for their analysis of the separate representations of the various witnesses before the committee and those received by letter. The first submission to the committee was from my home city of Medicine Hat which was presented by mayor Ted Grimm and alderman Dr. Ken Sauer, who stressed their quite unique situation wherein the city has developed and owned its own natural gas and electric utilities for almost 100 years during which time these utilities have been exempt from corporate, income, production and sales taxes.

The application of these taxes has been described in their brief quite aptly as confiscatory, abnormal and constitutionally without precedent. They pointed out:

—we do not export the resource—

That is, natural gas:

—nor the profits from its exploitation. We upgrade the resource in Canada, thereby creating jobs for Canadians.

Later on in this logical and common sense comment they had this to say:

A court of law may interpret the legal technicalities and find that the tax is unconstitutional, but only Parliament can interpret the fairness or equity of taxation.

The new taxes will boost Medicine Hat's residential gas rates by 197.6 per cent, surely an increase much higher than at any other point in Canada. The minister's appraisal was that:

The gas tax is a uniform absolute amount for all gas users and thus customers in all parts of Canada will face the same increases in absolute costs.

I must say that comment is small comfort indeed to retired people in Medicine Hat when they pay next winter's gas heating bills.

Now another witness before that committee was the Federation of Alberta Gas Co-ops Ltd., and they made two visits to Ottawa to tell their story of the impact of this tax on rural Alberta. They ably represent 85 user member-owned rural utilities who supply 40,000 natural gas services for 140,000 people in rural Alberta. They operate a 40,000 mile distribution system which supplies about 80 per cent of Alberta's rural areas. They made the statement that:

Time will show that it was, and continues to be, sound planning to convert to the more plentiful natural gas, from the depleting and more costly portable fuels such as oil and propane.

And the gas co-op has extended a very generous offer to other provinces in Canada to share their experiences and expertise in rural gasification developments. They also make two telling points respecting the impact of these two taxes. The first is that substantially higher gas costs due to the taxes will be a severe deterrent to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources natural gas conversion program now under way. That program is logical and sound. However, this tax approach is surely not the way to go about it.

The second impact is the immediate and enormous cost increases of commercial fertilizers, most of which use natural gas feedstocks in addition to those other farm fuel costs. In total, it must be obvious that our basic food production costs will increase significantly.

Another witness, the Bow River Gas Co-op, a federation member with headquarters at Vauxhall, Alberta, has illustrated these cost increases with recent figures in a report dated January 7, 1981. On 136,000 mechanically irrigated acres, the cost increases due to the new taxes are as follows: For natural gas used as a fuel in irrigation pumping, a total of $174,000; for two varieties of fertilizers, 11-5-5 and 34-0-0, a total of $659,000, for a total cost increase of $835,000, all due to the natural gas taxes alone. And that figure prompted this appropriate comment from that co-op.

This is one big sum of tax money to take out of one small farming community.

The Bow River Gas Co-op concluded its cost statement by indicating:

If we farmers are not given any protection against this special tax on all fuels, I know there will be a drastic drop in production on irrigated farms.

That statement was made by one of its executives, a man by the name of Henry J. Dick.

● (2120)

The Federation of Alberta Gas Co-ops Ltd. made a very reasonable suggestion that an extension of time be allowed for the tax payment from the current 30 days, after the end of the month of sale, to 90 days. This was a very reasonable suggestion; I think it was widely supported in committee. However, the minister in his appraisal suggested that other taxpayers could also make similar claims and that to extend the time of payment of the tax to all taxpayers would be costly in terms of lost revenue. Surely the minister has missed their point completely. It is a very valid point and should be reconsidered.

Another witness was the Alberta Energy Services Association. This is the energetic group to which I referred in my opening comments who were here about two weeks ago. That 126-member lobby represented the oil and gas well servicing industry from such widely separated places as: Red Deer, Drayton Valley, Whitecourt, Lloydminster, Calgary, Brooks, Medicine Hat, Weyburn, Estevan and Swift Current.

As Canadian citizens and as responsible electors—and this is their phrasing—they questioned the government energy policy which results in thousands of lost jobs, increasing reliance on very costly foreign oil and financial instability in numerous small communities such as the ones I have just indicated. They also pointed out that hundreds of wells producing less than 12 barrels per day have been made uneconomical by the National Energy Program. Such wells are particularly service-intensive and contribute to energy self-sufficiency throughout Canada, no matter where they are.

The Canadian Petroleum Association in its committee presentation confirmed that Alberta indeed has surplus and proven natural gas supplies of between 16 and 20 trillion cubic feet in capped gas wells. But they are concerned with the continued and increasing slowdown in both drilling and exploration as a result of the National Energy Program, while at the same time the government is pushing its gas conversion program to utilize those capped gas well supplies. I think they have reason to be concerned. They reminded us all that five to ten years' lead time is necessary for adequate exploration and development planning.

The companion association, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, was critical of the National Energy Program grant system which heavily favours investment on federal lands, whereas their members are largely confined to the western Canadian sedimentary basin in the provinces. They said bluntly that both taxes should be withdrawn.

The Alberta Chamber of Commerce reaffirmed its belief that Canada can achieve energy self-sufficiency through prompt development of Canada's domestic energy resources, particularly oil. The chamber of commerce bluntly said that the production and wellhead taxes constitute a major infringement by the federal government on the rights of the provinces to own and control their natural resources. They concluded by saying:

A preferable course would be for the federal government to proceed under the Income Tax Act, and if justifiable, consider establishing a surtax on income deemed to be windfall profit.

In concluding my remarks pertaining to the submissions before the standing committee, I must say that I very much appreciated the somewhat more favourable appraisal of the Minister of Finance respecting two odd groups. One was the Motorcycle and Moped Industry Council and the other was the Canadian Water Well Association. Needless to say, the comments were a nice change of pace from most of his other discouraging words on just about all other submissions.

In conclusion, I say very seriously that throughout these remarks I have only repeated several references by others concerning the propriety and legality of the production tax and the PGRT, but surely this is the bottom line of the entire National Energy Program, at least as perceived by the west, especially by Alberta. Let there be no misunderstanding. I am referring to that threat to Alberta's natural resources by the federal Liberal government in these two particular taxes, as well as in Bill C-48. There is a valid reason for what is happening in the west right now. It makes little difference whether we call it alienation, frustration, anger or even separation. These emotions are very real and exist in Alberta, essentially because of the perceived threat to our natural resources which we have only owned and controlled since 1930—that is only 51 years ago!

At this moment the unanimous decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal is still the law of the land, at least until it is overturned by a higher level, the Supreme Court of Canada. Until that happens, surely the Alberta position applies, at least in so far as that decision is defined.

Finally, I am sure the Minister of Finance, his parliamentary secretary and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are aware of this feeling in the west and its relationship to this particular bill. I say to them that the 135 amendments now before us in report stage are an indication of that feeling. It is not too late to do something about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak this evening in support of my party's position on Bill C-57 and to highlight some of my own personal concerns and some of the concerns of my constituents regarding this bill.

We all recognize that governments need to raise revenue. We know there is no such thing as a free lunch. Ideally, the money we pay as taxes should not be counted as lost but, rather, as a contribution to the common good. But sometimes when we look at government spending habits and its concern with outdated fighter planes and some of its other extravagances, we wonder whether or not this is true. We recognize the importance of our taxes, but we also say that a tax policy should consider many questions in addition to asking how much money can be raised for the government in a specific situation. For example, a tax policy should ask questions concerning the effect of a tax upon the economy in general and upon individual sectors of the economy. It should ask questions about the effect of a given tax upon individuals. Apart from its direct effect upon the economy, it should ask about the effect of a tax upon the environment, upon the social and cultural fabric of the community and of the nation.

This might be a good place to begin. For example, the act exempts from tax paintings, drawings and pastels, which is good as far as it goes, but it says nothing about original prints. In our society artists do not have a very easy time of it. All but a very few stars have difficulty making a living. However, one area of art which has been growing and provides an important part of many artists' incomes is the sale of limited editions of original prints. Not only does this sale help the artist, but it also helps to democratize art. Art should not be the preserve of a wealthy elite—the Medicis, the Rockefellers and the Thompsons of our world. By exempting paintings and drawings but not original prints, we are discriminating against our ordinary people in favour of the wealthy.

I am particularly concerned about the effect of this discrimination upon many Indian artists. All Canadians can take pride in the recent upsurge of Indian art. I think particularly of Indian artists who use motifs from the west coast of British Columbia and of artists who are painting from their woodland Cree and Ojibway traditions. This art, and the new understanding and respect which it has brought to Indian people, has been largely dependent upon print-making techniques. It is because prints have been available, that artists such as Daphne Odjig, Jackson Beardy, Norville Moriseau and Robert Davidson have become household names in many parts of Canada. Our tax policy should encourage this art and not discourage it. Therefore, I urge the government to accept the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and include "original prints" in the list of exemptions.

The government is equally shortsighted in its proposals to tax newspapers which have advertising content beyond a certain percentage. This proposal hits especially hard at small community weeklies. Over the past years, and especially the past year, we have seen the spectacle of large chains taking an ever-greater share of the daily newspaper market in Canada. Corporate takeovers, mergers and shutdown all point to a situation which is very rightly under combines investigation at the present time. As the large dailies move further and further away from local concerns and have less and less contact with local communities, and as they move toward a prepackaged product, the role of community newspapers in our country continues to grow.

For example, in my constituency there is no single daily which serves the entire area, but we are well served by seven community newspapers. These papers are very concerned about the proposed new regulations and the effect that they will have upon their ability to continue publishing. They recognize the government's valid concerns to tax catalogues and sales sheets which have no editorial content at all, but they object to the way in which this concern is being implemented in this bill. For one thing, they point to the manner in which advertising content is defined in the regulations. Instead of counting the amount of paid advertising and then subtracting that from the total space in the newspaper, the regulations begin by narrowly defining editorial content. This way of defining the situation provides a disincentive for charity advertising. It means that little logo fillers for such things as the Participaction program would be counted as advertising. It raises questions about the possibility of newspapers refusing to carry advertisements for certain organizations and using the excuse that carrying the advertisement would bring the newspaper over a certain percentage of advertising content. It raises very serious questions about the whole freedom of the press, which is fundamental to our society. I again urge the government to seriously consider and accept the amendments proposed by my colleague, which would limit the tax to catalogues.

We can look at small businesses and the way in which they are affected by some of the proposals before us, for example, beauty parlours and the tax on cosmetic supplies. Beauty parlours and their operators are truly small businesses and often family enterprises, which have difficulties making ends meet what with maintaining an inventory and adequate equipment. By placing this tax upon supplies which are used in business, it is making it more difficult for these small businesses to continue.

Like other members of my party, I object to the principle of indexed taxation which is being introduced in this bill through the indexation of taxes on alcohol and tobacco. The government already has too much of a stake in inflation. By placing indexation on these taxes we are setting a precedent whereby the government would not have to show any concern at all about bringing in a budget and facing the music in the House of Commons over its taxing policies. Instead, there would simply be automatic tax increases as the cost of living went up, and we have seen no indication from the present government that the cost of living will be going down.

As has been pointed out before, in this bill we have seen the ridiculous bureaucratic definition which exempts some equipment for the handicapped. It exempts braces which are used on the feet and ankles. Surely in this Year of the Disabled the government could recognize that any appliances which are meant to assist disabled people to function better in society should be given tax exempt status. We should not leave these people at the mercy of a stupid bureaucratic decision.

Dynamite is a substance which has been traditionally exempt from taxation. For the first time in our history it is now being taxed. This hits at the construction industry, especially in western Canada. I point out that here we see the government concerned with short-term financial gain—a very small one—but one which has an impact on the environment. For example, we are concerned that industry and buildings should not be built on valuable agricultural land and estuaries, but these are the easiest places to build. In British Columbia, if we are to build away from these areas, blasting is involved and dynamite is required. We are placing a disincentive upon moving away from building on environmentally sensitive areas.

The New Democratic Party has been urging the government to recognize that small businesses which are involved in collecting sales taxes are subject to a great deal of additional red tape as a result. We urge the government to recognize the contribution these small businesses are making and that it should make provision in this tax bill so that these businesses could withhold 3 per cent of the taxes which they collect, up to a maximum of $1,000. This will not affect large companies such as Eatons and The Bay. However, it will help small businesses. These are the people in our society right now who very desperately need to have some help. At a time when other government policies are discriminating against these people in terms of high interest rates, we should not be passing by an opportunity to make it slightly easier for them to do a job on our behalf which we require them to do.

Again, we can look at the provisions of the bill which exempts equipment specifically designed for use in classrooms. At a time when education is under pressure, another sector of our society which is under considerable pressure today, we should be extending this exemption to include all materials which are used in the classroon, whether or not they had been specifically designed for this.

I would like to draw my remarks to a conclusion by simply pointing out that in its over-all tax policy the government, in the past few years, has been focusing entirely too much upon individuals, small businesses and this sector of society, for tax revenue. It has been ignoring vital areas where profits have been increasing, and taxes have not recognized this. We have heard the news about bank profits being up 58 per cent in the first quarter of this year. We are not doing anything about tapping that source of revenue. Instead, we are continuing to load more and more tax burdens upon individuals and small businesses.

So I urge the government to consider the amendments that the New Democratic Party is putting forward. I urge the government to consider the needs of small businesses, and to consider the social and environmental impacts of some of these taxes, as well as the short-term economic gain which it might make by imposing them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is actually unfortunate that we in the House of Commons at the present time must deal with this government in a situation now facing Canadians. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who is supposedly responsible—he is often referred to as "Marc the Knife"—has succeeded in causing an oil rush to the United States. This is unfortunate because all of us are going to suffer. We in the west are suffering now; but let me impress upon the backbenchers on the other side that perhaps they can get through to the minister and to the cabinet what is actually happening here in Canada today before it is too late.

Time is running out on us, and every week and every month the disastrous situation which is befalling Canadians increases. On May 7 of this year, not too many days ago, the latest figures which came out showed that 139 drilling rigs had left Canada, 72 service rigs had left, 63 more drilling rigs are committed to go, and 42 service rigs are going. Every time we lose a rig, we lose 60 people and 60 jobs. This reflects right through to eastern Canada. I will deal with that later. However, this is why we in the west are hurting at the present time, because we see this happening to people around us. We see it happening to those people who depend upon the oil industry. It is a new industry. Perhaps our eastern colleagues do not understand that. It has not always been with us. It is a new industry. There are a great many companies, and there are hundreds of them, which do not have the financial backing to withstand an extended period of drought. When I use the word "drought", I use it to literally imply that there are no jobs and the industry is going down the tube because of the policies of this government. Bill C-57 is the best example that I can give anyone as to what the government is doing to us.

There were 49 wells drilled in my area in Red Deer in April, 1980. There were 27 wells drilled in April of this year. The number of licences granted from April of last year to April of this year are down. Fifty-nine licenses were granted last year, and this year they are down to 30. There has been a 50 per cent drop. This spells doom for the industry out there. There is absolutely no way that we in Canada are ever going to be self-sufficient if we are going to continue in the direction we are going.

I do not really know what we must do to make the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources realize what he is doing to our country and to us as Canadians. Surely the backbenchers on that side can see through it if he cannot. Yesterday he spoke in the House of Commons on our opposition motion which condemned the government and the minister for what they were doing. Honestly, I have never heard such a conglomeration of unadulterated garbage delivered in this House of Commons as I did from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday. It would imply that he does not know what he is doing. He does not know what he is talking about. We are all going to suffer the consequences if something is not done very shortly.

Evidently, the members of the cabinet are not listening; but I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) sitting in the House tonight. I would hope that he would use his good influence to get through to the cabinet and to try to explain to it exactly what is happening. Yesterday the minister tried to imply that had our 18 cents a gallon gone through, Canadians today would be paying more for gas than they are paying under the present administration. I would like to tell those who are present in the House tonight that as of May 6 of this year, in the 13-month period, gas prices at the pump have gone up 52 cents. Our policy of 18 cents a gallon tax plus the increases in price, would probably have netted about 37 cents. So Canadians are now paying more because of the policies of this government and its national energy program. It is disastrous.

I understand that one of the areas which has not been discussed up to the present time is the tax which has been put on Canadians because of the purchase of Petrofina. The purchase of Petrofina does not mean that one more oil well is drilled. There might even be fewer drilled because of the resulting bureaucratic administration.

However, I will tell Your Honour what is happening. Every Canadian in Canada is paying three and one-half cents a gallon for every gallon of oil he buys because the government saw fit to buy Petrofina. This creates a problem for those people who are in private industry. There are agents in my area who are furious with the government. They might have voted Liberal sometime if the government had administered sanely; but there is absolutely no way those people will ever vote Liberal again because they have to collect that three and one-half cents a gallon tax, they have to keep it on their books, they have to pay it into the federal treasury, and then it is turned over and used to compete against them by their competitor in Petrofina through PetroCan.

Does this makes sense to you, Mr. Speaker? It certainly does not to me. I would like to see someone in this House of Commons stand up and try to protect that kind of a policy. Actually, what will happen is that it will undermine the whole industry. How can the government keep on doing that?

It is my understanding that at the present time the federal government has contributed about $1 billion, in one way or another, to Petro-Canada. What return are we as Canadians getting? Are we getting dividends? Are we getting debentures? Are we getting interest? No, we are not getting any of that. It works out to almost $3 billion by the time the whole program is through, if it is not carried on any further. If any industry is given a break of $3 billion, even at 15 per cent interest, which is now low because of this government's policy, at 15 per cent interest it will work out to approximately $450 million to $500 million a year.

• (2150)

If that is given to any company or individual, what will it do to competition? The only way that people in the industry will be able to stay in business will be if the corporation is so incompetent that it will erase the benefits that should be accruing. We have seen this happen before. The government cannot even run the Post Office, so how is it going to run the oil industry, especially with the leadership we have in the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Mr. Smith: What about PWA?

Mr. Towers: I can tell the hon. member about that. He does not know what it is like to be land-locked as we are in the province of Alberta. When the premier of British Columbia, a socialist, tries to purchase PWA in order to keep the head offices and industry in his province, it is no wonder that the province of Alberta wants to get it, in order to establish a line of communication between Alberta and the north. I realize that some people in Ontario would like to cut us off from that but through the wisdom of our government, that did not happen. Otherwise, we would be land-locked completely as we do not have access to a port. Surely the hon. member would not deny us the right to the air.

Mr. Smith: I thought you were against government enterprise.

Mr. Evans: Only against federal government enterprise.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, if there had been a chance of PWA being purchased by private industry, we would have been happy to see it. There is no room for two PWAs in western Canada, only one, so we had to get it and we are proud that we did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member I must call to his attention that a tax measure is before the House. He seems to have strayed just a little bit from the subject of the bill. I invite him to return to it.

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Knowing your generosity, I know you would never deny me the opportunity or right to counter some of the erroneous statements made across the floor. That is really all I was doing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his point. I think I have made mine.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to impress on the backbenchers that drilling rigs are leaving Canada in unprecedented numbers. Jobs, equipment and technology are going to the United States because of the repressive energy policies of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It is not only the workers on the oil rigs who are the losers. It is also hundreds of others in support industries. My colleague, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), today mentioned the people who came here to try to influence the government to change its policy. There is one thing that I should like to impress upon you at this point, Mr. Speaker, and that is that our whole democratic system will break down if governments do not listen to witnesses who, in their own time and at their own expense, come to the capital of the country to plead their case and nothing is done.

They come here and get their concerns off their chests and are sent home like good little people but no attention is paid to them. If the government will not pay attention to the pleadings of these people who come to present their case before the standing committees, what is the use of the charade? It would be better to tell them that nothing will change anyway. I would hope the government would listen to those people.

Not long ago a Senator from the other place said to me, "You don't change much around here." I do not know about that, Mr. Speaker. I would like to think that we can change things. But the only way that will happen will be if the majority on the other side of the House begins to listen and to act on what is being said.

As I said earlier, the west is hurting now, but it will only be a short time until the residents of Ontario will begin to hurt as well.

In the last month, two delegations of oil company and oil service company executives have come to Ottawa at their own expense to attempt to explain to eastern Canadians the devastating and punishing impact that federal oil-pricing policies are having on the west. We may be losing people and technology, and what we have lost we will never regain. The people and machines that have crossed over to the United States where the economic climate is more receptive, may never come back to this country. Why should they when we have had two problems in the last eight years?

It all started in 1973 and you would remember that, Mr. Speaker, as you were in the House at that time. The then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Hon. Donald Macdonald, saw the light, got busy and corrected the problem. It did not last nearly as long as the present problem. Now we have a minister who will not listen. So we cannot blame people for getting out. They have to look after themselves. They have to buy their own groceries and provide a roof for their families.

Until the time of the Trudeau-Lalonde axis, we experienced a happy economic climate in the oil field. Everything was going well. Everyone was busy, there was a lot of activity and orders were placed in eastern Canada. Everything was going smoothly until the present administration decided it would nationalize the industry under the guise of Canadianizing it.

The risk takers—the oil companies—initiated activity in the patches. In spite of what some may think, that technology and understanding is not gained overnight. It takes a while to accumulate it.

The drilling and exploration provided jobs on and off site. The activity provided jobs in the mills and fabricating plants in eastern Canada, in the valve industry, in the pipeline fabrication industry, in the steel plants, and so on.

Economic activity in western Canada in the oil fields enabled western Canadians to purchase the products manufactured in the appliance and automotive plants all over eastern Canada. The multiplier effect of economic activity in oil in western Canada is staggering.

To drill a well and maintain it involves 31 companies—31 small businesses which benefit and pump earnings and payrolls into western communities and eastern businesses. The Department of National Revenue will also suffer because the same amount of income tax will not be collected as in previous years.

As I stated, it takes 31 separate companies to bring in and service one rig. These 31 companies have, combined, an investment of $12 million in equipment. They will employ about 100 employees who will work 536 man days from spud to completion. They will purchase and use goods and manufactured products made in Canada from Vancouver to St. John's, at rates of up to 70 per cent of total expenditures. Already I have heard of production cutbacks in some central Canadian factories as a result of reduced oil field purchases. The consequences, the ultimate punishment, the end product of the federal government's oil policies is that some Ontario and Quebec workers have been paid off and told to go home because there is not a job for them in the oil industry. There is nothing for them. It is cutting back right across the board. Those people who think it is just the west that is suffering had better begin looking in their own backyard.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL SECURITY—INVESTIGATION OF FURTHER SPY RINGS IDENTIFIED BY TASCHEREAU ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On April 3 of this year, as reported at page 8946 of Hansard, I obtained from the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) an undertaking to report to me on whether any orders had been issued at any time to bring to a halt inquiries being made into some of the spy rings whose existence was brought to light back in 1945 and 1946 by Igor Gouzenko and made public through the publication of the Taschereau-Kellock report. I am still waiting for that report.

It was not given to me on May 25 when the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Kelly) replied to my intervention that evening, as reported at page 9904 of Hansard. Perhaps I will be given the long awaited report in the course of the reply that will be made to my intervention this evening. I hope so, because I raised a cognate question even earlier, on March 30 to be exact, as reported at page 8733 of Hansard.

The Gouzenko report, as the Taschereau-Kellock report is often called, is perhaps not well known by many of the young people today. I would earnestly recommend that it be made compulsory reading for anyone entering university or the public service. It would also be helpful reading for the executives of our large private enterprises and for those who become our trade union leaders. The message it conveys is chilling, but it must not be forgotten. We have allowed ourselves to be lulled to sleep or into a state of complacency on a matter of infiltration and subversion.

There are those, I suspect, in high places today who would prefer that the Gouzenko report be covered with the dust of oblivion. So pertinent is it to today's frightening circumstances that I intend to drag it out, dust if off a bit and place on the record in 1981 some of the findings recorded in 1946, some 35 years ago. Let me quote verbatim from page 685 of the report. The first finding reads as follows:

> There exists in Canada a fifth column organized and directed by Russian agents in Canada and in Russia.

The second finding reads:

> With the fifth column there are several spy rings.

The third finding reads:

> We have been able to identify many of the members of one of these rings, namely, that of which Colonel Zabotin was the head in Canada.

These findings lead me directly to the questions to which the Canadian people and I deserve a straightforward answer. First, were any efforts made at the time or later to run down the rings, other than the Zabotin ring, the investigation of which was pursued and people were brought to trial as a result? Second, if such efforts were made, what were the results?

Third, what credence can be placed in reports in the press and elsewhere that those efforts of the RCMP security services to run those other rings to earth were called off by someone in a position of influence. Those rumours persist and it is time they were either put to rest or the truth of them revealed.

In his comments as reported in Hansard on May 25, at page 9904, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Service spoke of four sets of the Taschereau-Kellock documents. He mentioned the location of only three. Therefore, and here is another question I am bound to ask, what of the fourth copy of the transcripts of the Taschereau-Kellock report? Is it complete? How do we know that it is complete? Although the parliamentary secretary was quite categorical in assuring me in that same reply as follows:

> —that the exhibits and miscellaneous papers of the Taschereau-Kellock commission involving some 601 original statements, personal notebooks of persons interviewed by the commission, etc., are also stored in the RCMP archives.

Why, I am now bound to ask, are these exhibits and miscellaneous papers not also available to the public under the 30-year rule? Is someone being protected? Is there some reason why they are being maintained beyond the reach of public scholarship or the press, whichever might be the more interesting?

● (2205)

There are more questions here than can be asked in the seven minutes allowed me this evening, and many more than can be answered in the three allowed for the reply. I therefore hope that when the results of the current inquiry into the release of the Gouzenko papers or the Taschereau-Kellock papers are made available to the House, hopefully this month, the minister will make a statement on motions so that some of these questions can be put to him and answers obtained. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer, on behalf of the Solicitor General of Canada, the question put by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) who, really, according to what he says, is feeding the rumour mill. I feel he is doing his best to keep those rumours alive. In recent months, they have certainly been a popular topic in the newspapers.

[English]

The hon. member rightly points out that Mr. Gouzenko did in fact state that there were several other spy rings operating in Canada in addition to the one of which he was directly aware. It will be recalled that Mr. Gouzenko disclosed the existence of a spy ring operating on behalf of Soviet military intelligence, the GRU. Mr. Gouzenko claimed that there were other spy rings operating in Canada, some perhaps also under GRU direction, and still others which were under the control of the Soviet state security intelligence organization, the KGB.

This information was also disclosed in the 1946 report of the Taschereau-Kellock commission of inquiry. I might say to the hon. member that an exhibit in any report is part of the report and should be disclosed at the same time. I am just wondering why the hon. member is asking why the exhibits have not been disclosed when the report has not been.

This is not a new question, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, on May 31, 1978, as recorded in Hansard at pages 5920 and 5921, the Solicitor General of the day, the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), gave a full and complete answer. I reply to a written question by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), the minister acknowledged Mr. Gouzenko's claim that there were several espionage rings operating in Canada at the time in question and that it was not true that the RCMP only pursued the investigation of one network. In reply to a request for further details, the solicitor general at the time noted that it was not the policy of the government to comment publicly on individual police and security investigations. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich knows that, and for obvious reasons government policy is not changing.

In the second part of his question the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich makes the allegation that the RCMP investigation into these additional Soviet espionage networks was interrupted or stopped by other members of the public service. This allegation again is almost identical to the assertion referred to in the earlier question by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville. In his question that hon. member supposed that the government had failed to act in relation to the investigation of these other groups. In fact, the solicitor general at the time advised the House that the government was satisfied that all leads flowing from Mr. Gouzenko's information had been exhaustively pursued and that no further action was required.

I wish to assure my hon. friend that all the information was given at the time and it has not changed since then.

THE CONSTITUTION—PROCEDURE FOR CONVENING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1981, I posed two questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The first one related to the application of clause 35(1) of the constitutional resolution which will return to this House, and it involved the requirement under that clause for the Prime Minister to call a constitutional conference consisting, in terms of those in attendance, of himself and the provincial premiers. I asked a question as to the usefulness of that particular clause, having regard to the indication of the Prime Minister that day or the day before that he did not intend to attend a meeting called by eight of the ten provincial premiers.

My concern at the time was that it is futile, very clearly, to insert a provision of this nature in the principal and fundamental law of Canada which requires for its application the good will not only of the Prime Minister of the country, but also the good will of ten provincial premiers and, presumably, in the event that the Yukon and Northwest Territories become provinces, ultimately the good will of the premiers of those areas as well. I did not believe it was appropriate that the Prime Minister attend to the request for a meeting, in the fashion he did, without recognizing the harm that he would do to the natural good will which was necessary in order that, first, the provincial premiers attend these intended conferences and, second, something indeed be accomplished thereat.

Fortunately, subsequent to April 6 the Prime Minister did indicate that he would attend such a meeting, and he went on at some length at a later date as well to point out that he hoped the good will that needed to be fostered in Canada would continue after the Supreme Court had ruled. Presumably he meant the Supreme Court would rule in his favour because it was not long after his comments that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), as recently as the latter part of last week, indicated that in the event that the Supreme Court should determine that the autocratic position taken by the federal government is ultra vires, he will see to it that the Supreme Court is used as an instrument to extract from the provinces some of the authorities they are currently exercising.

These matters are significant, and they go to the very roots of the need in our country for government leaders in the provinces and at the federal level to deal with each other on a basis of, if not friendship, at least some form of open congeniality which will produce the well-being desired by the people of Canada. From all indications, what has transpired so far is a clear demonstration for all who have witnessed the proceedings, that this government is hardly the government to be involved in the process of establishing such a fundamental change in the nature of our country.

My supplementary question dealt with the acknowledged legal concept that in the event the charter of rights is established as contemplated by this resolution, the Supreme Court of Canada will in fact, as is the case in other jurisdictions, legislate through its interpretive judgments dealing with what the words in this charter mean. That is a simple principle of law and one which surely must be recognized by the Prime Minister who, I understand, was called to the bar, although I doubt he has ever practised. At least I do not think he has ever practised.

Instead of dealing with the issue which was raised in the question, the Prime Minister dealt with the myth that for 54 years we have been trying to obtain a consensus. Nothing is further from the truth. The alleged charter of rights and freedoms with which we are presently concerned and which gives rise to most of the dispute throughout our nation was first presented to the people of Canada, to this Parliament and to the provincial premiers in October of 1980. October of 1980 is the fall of last year, and 54 years never enters into a determination of the time within which we have been concerned about this issue.

Then the Prime Minister went on in answer to my substantive question to say the following:

> As to the question itself regarding the role of the courts and Parliament, it seems to me that the hon. member is under a misapprehension. What I have said is that both branches of government should be autonomous and should operate autonomously. It is our job to legislate. It is the court's job to judge whether the legislation is intra vires or ultra vires.

That is not the question I was asking, Mr. Speaker. I know it is the court's job to determine whether legislation is intra vires or ultra vires, but that was not the question. The question was very simple: does the court not in fact legislate, having determined that it is intra vires, and thereby preclude this Parliament and all subsequent parliaments from ever determining whether they may change the words in the charter. That was the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a prime minister who responds in the fashion this one has does no service to the public or this House. Very clearly this Parliament is the supreme parliament of all parliaments because it has fixed the basic law of the country, if this package goes through, and no subsequent parliament under any circumstances will be able to change the law as this Parliament has enacted it. Now that is the death blow to the democratic process, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I have three comments in relation to what the hon. member has said. First, we have not been discussing a charter of rights just since 1980. A charter of rights has been discussed for at least the last 12 years. There have been three distinct studies, and I advise my learned friend to read them. The first was the Canadian Bar Association, the second was the Pepin-Robarts report and the third was the parliamentary committee, all dealing with the charter of rights.

We have been talking about this for 54 years, Mr. Speaker, and once again at the tail end of this debate we are going back to process and procedure and I say that at some point my good friend, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Gamble) will have to say yes or no, I stand for a charter; yes or no, I stand for aboriginal rights; yes or no, I stand for mobility rights; yes or no, I stand for rights for the handicapped; yes or no, I stand for non-discrimination of women and the aged. I think the time has come when the people of this country are saying to the opposition that you can no longer hide behind the premiers, you have to come out and say whether a law in Newfoundland that disallows unions is to be tolerated any longer; whether a law in Quebec which discriminates, prejudices and padlocks Jehovah witnesses is to be tolerated any longer.

Now either you stand for these things or you do not. We all represent the people; the premiers, the members of this honourable assembly, members of councils of municipalities. And at some point you have to make the decision on what is right and wrong and what is hiding behind procedure.

What did the premiers come up with? The Hon. Sterling Lyon is still against the charter. I heard nothing about minority language rights coming from the Hon. René Lévesque. I heard nothing from the Hon. Brian Peckford. I heard nothing except another checkerboard suggestion, the fifth one that has come from either the premiers or the opposition, that would allow the right to a jury in one province and not in another, rights of the aboriginals in one province and none in the other provinces because, and you know I am telling the truth, the checkerboard formula provides that if it affects the provinces, as these things do, they can opt out. There can only be one right of mobility, that is the right of a Canadian to move across this country and work where he wishes. I say that to meet with the premiers at this late date to discuss what they are proposing would be a disservice to this country and the people we represent.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS
(A) PREPARATIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS FOR SUMMIT MEETING
(B) IMPLEMENTATION OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS
(C) QUERY RESPECTING CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR UNITED STATES POLICIES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, my question is in relation to a question I asked the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on May 20 in regard to the policy recommendations Canada will put to the summit meeting this summer. I asked very specifically if Canada was going to have a policy uniquely different from that of the United States, a made-in-Canada policy as it relates to the entire question of North-South. At that time the Right Hon. Prime Minister replied to me:

> We know from the statements made by the U.S. administration that they are more keen on bilateral aid and perhaps aid from the private sector than on multilateral and public aid. This is not the point of view of Canada or of other summit countries.

To my mind what the Prime Minister has told me is that Canada is not going to follow the policy of the United States which at this time is going to be linked more closely to bilateral aid. This basically means that the United States will give aid to another country but will be very much directing it.

● (2220)

The reason I asked to have my question reviewed tonight was that prior to it, at a meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on April 21, 1981, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) said exactly the opposite. The Prime Minister seemed to say that Canada would move away from bilateral aid to multilateral aid, meaning that Canada will join with other countries and have an aid program with a much broader spectrum than this direct deal. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the following:

—so we are certainly moving, at the present time, more in the direction of expanding bilateral aid than of expanding multilateral aid.

There seems to be no clear policy about how Canada's program of aid will function. I appreciate very much the difficulty of truly aiding somebody else. Perhaps one of the most difficult verbs in the English language is the verb to aid. How do we help someone else? How do we help someone else so that the other person is helped and does not become, in a sense, subservient?

Last summer we in the North-South committee visited the United Nations during its special session. At that time we had an opportunity to speak with Donald McHenry, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. In his discussions with us, he summarized, perhaps, better than anyone else I have ever heard, the notion of aid. He simply said that aid is for aid. Aid is not to fight communism. Aid is not to build up the industrial sector. Aid is not to buy off somebody. Aid is to aid.

We will be hosting the summit meeting in Ottawa and later we will be one of the two nations taking part in the other summit meetings in Mexico and Australia. England and Canada will be the only two countries sharing the entire summit meetings. At this time in Canadian history, I think it is extremely important for the House of Commons and the people of Canada to know exactly what the policy of this government is in relation to the question of what is aid and why we are aiding.

I have heard the recent reports of the business group which deals with Latin America. This group is very happy with Canada's aid program because it means more business for them; it is a kind of subsidized business grant. As I question what is our policy on aid, I would like to read into the record what Mr. Massé, the president of CIDA, who is responsible for the Canadian aid program, said in an interview which appeared in The Financial Post on May 16. He said:

Investment in big projects is all very well, but it's not really efficient unless you also change the way people use capital . . . So now we intend to invest more in people, particularly in the areas of occupational training, management skills, health and education. It's a way of increasing the productivity of people themselves.

I gather what Mr. Masse says now is that he is looking upon aid as something which is being sent and that he is trusting other people at a very low level, not big projects which will benefit Canadian industry, but people there who need the aid. They will make the decision as to how it will be used. I would like to ask the government what Canada's basic principles and philosophies about aid are and who is making the policy.

● (2225)

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) that his concerns are being considered by the Government of Canada.

Preparations for the July summit are progressing well. The personal representatives of the heads of state and government will be meeting shortly in Vancouver. It is still difficult to say with certainty what topics will be given priority at the summit. Some heads of state have been elected only recently, among them Mr. Mitterrand, and they will have to have the opportunity to express their opinions as partners about the various themes to be considered at the summit. For the moment, we presume that the summit will deal with the five traditional economic subjects: macroeconomics, monetary and financial matters, trade, energy and, naturally, North-South relations.

On the last subject, the report on "Aid Policies and Procedures and Other Contributions to Developing Countries", requested by the heads of state in Venice, will no doubt give rise to in-depth discussion.

The government has been very pleased with the contributions which the parliamentary task force has made to North-South issues both in terms of its recommendations about appropriate Canadian policies and of the all-party stimulus it has provided for public discussion of these important issues within Canada. The government's initial attitude to the basic thrust of the task force report is very positive. Its individual recommendations have been the subject of close study over recent months and are currently under consideration by ministers, and detailed responses are expected shortly.

Obviously, Canada's North-South policy does not parallel that of the United States which may choose to give priority to bilateral assistance and to the private sector in order to meet the needs of the developing world. We do trust however that they will not neglect the multilateral dimension of aid and we hope that the summit will examine certain key areas of relations with developing countries where concrete progress would be possible. We are thinking particularly of the needs of the Third World with respect to energy and the development of agricultural production and food. There is substantial agreement among the summit countries on the objectives to be promoted, but there are differences of opinion on the means of achieving those objectives. It is our hope that the summit discussions will help to reconcile the different points of view, and it is from this standpoint that we will approach the North-South issues with the United States and other summit countries at the Ottawa Summit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

AIR SAFETY

APPOINTMENT OF REVIEW COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, Mr. Justice Dubin has recommended the establishment of an independent aviation safety board reporting to Parliament through other than the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). A review Committee is to consider this recommendation. Virtually every member of the aviation community welcomes and endorses the Dubin recommendation with the singular exception, I suppose, of the air administrators. The evidence presented to the commission virtually commands such independence. With such widespread support the naming of the air administrator to the implementation team can only undermine the trust and confidence that can, if properly handled, result in the new safety board. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House indicates its serious doubts about the conflict of interest which the appointment of the air administrator brings to the deliberations of the committee, and calls on the Minister of Transport to review his decision and replace this nominee with an acceptable representative of the operational level categories in the industry; and further calls on the minister to make a statement on motions setting forth those parts of the report with which he disagrees and has decided require further and delaying study.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

RECOMMENDATION THAT STANDING COMMITTEE TRAVEL TO WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion which I believe will receive consent as the official spokesmen of all parties have been made aware of this motion and appear to agree with it.

In view of the fact that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry must report today on the main estimates, thereby ending its reference from this House, and whereas many serious problems pertaining to the west coast fishery necessitate further intensive consideration by the committee before this House rises, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr):

That the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be granted a special reference by this House to meet and to travel to the west coast during the month of June so that committee members may be able to meet with the minister's advisory board and fishermen's groups, to observe hearings of the Pearse Commission of Inquiry, to visit a number of salmonid enhancement projects and environmentally sensitive areas, and generally to become more acquainted with the operations of the Pacific coast fishery, all of which will help the committee to appreciate better the serious problems being experienced by west coast fishermen.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POLITICAL COMMENTARY PROGRAMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that the CBC English language network is unable to provide its usual political commentary because of its current labour dispute and that the labour grievances are in real danger of being eventually resolved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House direct the CBC to continue its new improved political commentary indefinitely, even after its labour problems have been resolved.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am sure the urgency of my motion will be recognized by the majority of hon. members in the House. Our society is undergoing rapid change, influenced and led by scientific and technological innovation. We must harness this potential. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), and "thirded", I am sure, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen):

That this House unanimously request the government to establish a standing committee on science and technology.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

MEASURES TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada indicated yesterday that hundreds of builders are being forced into bankruptcy by a serious slump in the construction industry, arising from record high mortgage rates. Many builders have gone out of business in the past two years and, lately, hundreds have just disappeared.

In light of the fact that HUDAC has forecast that by the end of this year housing starts in Canada will be 8 per cent below their January forecast of 179,500 units to 165,000 units, and that it estimates 220,000 housing starts per year are needed to satisfy demand, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation recognize the rapidly growing disaster in the housing industry and place strong pressure on his government colleagues either to lower interest rates immediately or to establish mortgage interest as a deductible expense for income tax purposes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

PROGRAMS TO OFFSET IMPACT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the deliberate high interest rate policy of the Liberal government and its drastic effects upon Canadians in all walks of life, and in view of the government's failure to honour its responsibility to the agriculture sector, the small business sector, and home owners, during the present economic crisis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to introduce immediately special programs to cushion the impact of high interest rates, and specifically to extend the small business development bond to December 31, 1982, to include also unincorporated farmers and businessmen, and immediately to implement a mortgage interest and property tax deductibility program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HOG STABILIZATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the announced hog stabilization payment program has not been made available to producers who have established stabilization programs in collaboration with their provincial governments; whereas no meaningful discussion took place between the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and his provincial counterparts; whereas no notice of intent was given to many of the affected provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That this House reprimand the Minister of Agriculture for his lack of effective communicative skills, and instruct him to reopen meaningful negotiations with his provincial counterparts to provide an equitable and meaningful stabilization program.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Et cetera.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

FUNDS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On last February 3 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), for political reasons, turned down Bill C-245 which would have set up a trust fund for research and development into cereal grain and oilseeds suitable for cultivation in western Canada, utilizing some $9 million of producers' money held by the government in a non-interest bearing account known as the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund. The reason given by the minister was that he planned on tabling a similar bill himself, but there has been no sign of that bill.

• (1115)

In view of the fact that since February 3, at present interest rates, over one quarter million dollars in interest has been lost to research and development in western Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That cabinet make a decision to pay interest on the said fund retroactive to February 3 until such time as the trust has been set up.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

PUBLICATION OF REPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can he explain to the House why his government appears to be using a double standard with respect to combines investigation reports, in that with respect to the report touching on the oil industry his government seemed to welcome making the report public, even a press conference was held and much coverage was given to the matter, whereas with respect to the report touching on the uranium cartel which, as we know, involved the government itself, the government has chosen to keep the matter secret?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my recollection of the matter is that it was the investigator himself who made the report on the petroleum industry public. In this case the same man decided to refer the matter to the Department of Justice. Perhaps there is an explanation for his change of conduct, but I am afraid I do not know about it. The responsible minister will be here on Tuesday of next week.

PROHIBITION ON REMOVING REGULATIONS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister who seems carefully to avoid committing himself to the Canadian public about what they had been told in 1977, and only two months ago were told by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that the report of the director of combines and investigation with respect to the uranium industry would be made available to them. I hope the Prime Minister will not try to dodge my question. Will he indicate why he persists in maintaining the uranium cartel gag regulations, why he feels it is right to curtail the rights of Canadians in that way? Is it, in fact, that he hesitates to lift the gag regulation because he is nervous that certain of his Liberal friends might be embarrassed by the information which would come out, or is it the iron lady of Westminster, Mrs. Thatcher, who has so frightened the Prime Minister that he is nervous about lifting the gag regulations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows why the regulations were adopted, that is, to prevent American law from compelling Canadian companies or individuals to do certain things. We on this side of the House believe that we are not subject to American law. That might be the view of the hon. member but—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It obviously is the view of some members opposite, otherwise they would not object to this regulation which tells Canadian citizens and Canadian companies that they do not have to answer subpoenas, they do not have to answer the injunction of American law. It is as simple as that.

The hon. member asks if we will repeal these regulations. I indicated in the House the other day that they would not be repealed as long as they were needed to protect Canadians from the application of American law. There are still some cases before the courts now, some Canadian citizens and some Canadian corporations are still sought after by American law. We will protect them as long as is necessary. I could—

Mr. Wilson: Come on, that is a joke.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member opposite does not think this is serious business. I would ask him to talk to some of his numerous friends in the uranium industry, for instance Mr. Steve Roman, and ask him if he thinks these laws were necessary to protect Canadians or not.

Oral Questions

● (1120)

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I can assure the Prime Minister that I, for one, and the official opposition in general, feel that this is a serious matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Prime Minister, would you indicate if—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Stevens: —if a state document brought out on March 21, 1978, by the justice department in the United States is correct in stating that the Canadian government had interceded and asked that certain felony charges not be laid against Gulf Oil Corporation, an American company, and eight other companies with respect to the uranium cartel, many of which are already included in the report which is now in the hands of the Attorney General of Canada? If, in fact, you did intercede, how come you interceded—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

An hon. Member: Address the Chair!

Mr. Stevens: —in American affairs when it then suited your purpose? In turn, how can we, Madam Speaker, have any assurance that if you sought to intercede in the American—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stevens: —position, that we will have an independent adjudication with respect to the laying of possible charges in Canada—

Madam Speaker: Order!

Mr. Stevens: —against the self-same corporations?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I was just calling the hon. member to order. I think he is an old enough member in this House to know that he must address the Chair. I am a bit lenient with younger members, new members, rather, when they say "you", rather than "the hon. member". That is why I was calling the hon. member back to order.

Mr. Stevens: Well, Madam Speaker—

An hon. Member: Order. You've got to be recognized.

Mr. Stevens: I believe the Prime Minister heard the thrust of my question. Perhaps he can answer why his government did, in fact, intercede in the American proceedings to stop felony charges being laid at that time against the very companies which may be included in the report that Mr. Bertrand has submitted to the Attorney General of Canada for possible charges to be laid in Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot comment on that particular fact. I have no recollection of it. But I do recall that our government did intervene in the United States. We talked, and in particular I believe it was then the minister of justice of Canada who appealed to the Attorney General of the United States—I believe it was Mr. Clark at the time—suggesting that these matters should be dealt with by international comity rather than by taking Canadians to the courts under American laws in the United States.

If there is an American company involved in the question of the hon. member, I do not know the facts about that. I would imagine that it had to do with a subsidiary of Gulf operating in Canada under Canadian law. Certainly it was not our intention to protect Americans from the laws of their own government. However, the hon. member knows that there are some subsidiaries of American companies operating in Canada. We intend that they operate under Canadian law, not under American law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUERY RESPECTING COMPENSATION FOR URANIUM FIRMS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he or any other cabinet minister or member of the government has received any demand, or any request, from any of the uranium firms which have settled their anti-trust suits in the United States, for compensation, on the basis that they were coerced into joining the cartel, and suffered extensive millions of dollars in damages by way of settlement.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know of no such demand. I repeat that the—

Mr. Stevens: Better check your file.

Mr. Trudeau: —international trading agreement was set up by agreement between Canada and half a dozen other countries of Europe and other parts of the world. It was done in order to protect the Canadian companies, Canadian producers and Canadian workers, against restrictive actions taken by the United States government to protect its own markets. It was a defensive action. It is perfectly justifiable, and we will hold that to the very end.

I do not believe the hon. members opposite have actually gone on the record as saying that at that time we should have let the Canadian companies go under because the Americans were protecting their markets contrary to the rules of GATT and of many other rules. I wish they would make their position quite clear on that. Do they think we were unjustified in protecting the Canadian uranium producers, as France, Britain, South Africa and half a dozen other countries were protecting their producers, against United States action? Is the hon. member suggesting that Canada alone should not have protected its producers?

• (1125)

Mr. Speyer: I say to the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker, through you, that he is defending the indefensible and justifying the unjustifiable.

RETENTION OF LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister confirm that the Deputy Attorney General wrote to the Clerk of the Privy Council and the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources advising them to retain separate counsel for potential prosecution as a result of the uranium inquiry?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I believe that the international aspects of the uranium problem differ from what may have happened on the domestic market. I cannot give a specific answer to the hon. member for the moment. I shall inquire and give him the information requested when I have it.

THE ECONOMY

IMPACT OF REDUCTION IN BANK RATE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Before the minister breaks his arm patting himself on the back for yesterday's announcement that the Bank of Canada rate is going down .38 percentage points, could he tell us what he is doing to ensure that reductions will also be afforded to consumers, to home owners who are facing mortgages of 18 per cent and 19 per cent, and that farmers, small businessmen and fishermen will also be the beneficiaries of this reduction in the Bank of Canada rate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member obviously knows that these rates are established in accordance with the law which was recently revised, namely, they are not established by the government or the Bank of Canada; they respond to market forces. In the normal course there are usually—not always, but often—readjustments following changes in the bank rates. The hon. member will have noticed that yesterday the prime rate dropped in the United States. It is quite possible that similar action will be taken here, but that remains to be seen.

PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the minister's commitment to laissez-faire is unbelievable in the circumstances. The fact is that the banks are prepared to use the Bank of Canada rate to justify their increases, but when it comes to decreasing their rates and passing that on to consumers, they do not do it. Now that we have had the announcement of several six-month figures which show the same trends as were available in the first quarter for our chartered banks, when is the minister going to act to prevent the kind of profiteering that we have seen and the kind of windfall benefit that simply goes to the largest financial institutions that have played on the backs of consumers when the rates have gone up, but have done nothing for consumers when the rates have gone down?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has referred to data that is becoming available with respect to the earnings of banks for the second quarter. I have not completed my analysis of all this data, but I would suggest to him that his conclusion that the trends are precisely the same as the first quarter is not accurate. There are a number of ways in which the trend that is observable in the second quarter is quite different from the first quarter. Nevertheless, the hon. member has raised a very important point. It is my intention, as I have stated to him on previous occasions, to take this matter very seriously and, based upon some further experience, to determine whether any action is necessary. I think it would be premature at the moment to indicate action on this matter.

INCREASE IN ASSETS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, if the minister wants to have a longer time-frame, I will give him a longer time-frame. Between 1970 and 1980 the assets of the five largest chartered banks went up six times, their profits went up three times to $1.2 billion, and their taxes stayed exactly the same at $200 million. The minister has these figures, he has the facts, and he has the time-frame that he needs. What we need now is action to provide some fairness for Canadian consumers.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member puts a lot of alleged facts before the House. I want to draw to his attention that current profit rates in the banks, based upon the return of assets, are in line with those of the last five years. One has to keep all of the facts in mind before reaching a conclusion and that is what I propose to do. But I want to reiterate again my concern that the banks will not be, or be perceived to be, making an undue gain as a result of this present difficult matter.

AIR SAFETY

DUBIN INQUIRY REPORT—REASONS FOR APPOINTMENT OF REVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. When Mr. Justice Dubin was appointed to conduct an inquiry into air safety by the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville, it was seen by all as the most forward step in aviation history since the Aeronautics Act was written. Now that the report has been tabled and the weight of public opinion, both in the industry and the general public, has given it unanimous support, what is there about the report that makes the Minister of Transport want to hide behind a committee which is to review the report, especially a committee with a majority of obviously biased members, instead of accepting the report and its recommendations?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not agree at all with the hon. member's commentary. The general reaction has been very favourable to the members whom I have appointed to the advisory committee. Mr. Baldwin has tremendous experience as a transportation administrator. Mr. Deschênes is a top-notch lawyer with expertise both in marine and air matters. Mr. Reid is a former pilot who is also very knowledgeable. Mr. Michaud has much experience in running an airline and Mr. Wilkins is generally accepted as the chairman of that group. The only unfavourable reaction I have had from the press is with regard to the appointment of Mr. McLeish, the air administrator.

In this regard, I appeal to my hon. friend's sense of balance and wisdom. The effect of not having the air administrator represented on that committee would have resulted in receiving advice from two sides, namely, from the department and the advisory committee. As I wanted to act quickly in this matter, presumably I would have had to look for a third source of advice or make decisions on my own knowledge, and I am sure the hon. member would not agree with me doing that. I will, however, make those decisions but I want to have reconciled and knowledgeable advice from all sides, not from one single entity and that is why Mr. McLeish is on the advisory committee.

COMPOSITION OF COMMITTEE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport really did not answer my question. I asked him why he does not accept the report and its recommendations right now.

I think the report of Mr. Justice Dubin was one of the best reports we have seen. Certainly there is a tremendous amount of public objection to Mr. McLeish being on the committee, but if the minister is not going to accept the report as it is written right now, why does he insist on having Mr. McLeish on the committee instead of naming someone to this committee from such air organizations as CALPA, COPA, ATAC and all of the rest?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I tried to avoid appointing representatives of different agencies, unions or companies to that committee, and that is why I chose people who were retired or had severed their relationships with the entities with which they had been associated.

On the hon. member's main question as to why I do not accept the whole of that report and call it quits, I do not think that makes sense. That would be giving to a report—however good it is, and everyone agrees that it makes a major contribution—a sort of biblical value. I do not think Mr. Justice Dubin would agree with that. As a matter of fact I suspect that today he would like to rewrite some of the pages.

It is normal and standard practice, when a government calls for a report of this kind, to analyse it, to get the best expertise and to be discriminate in the way it treats the report. I am aware of some reports treated that way. What we are doing now is getting the best advice possible.

Previous bills on the same subject, in particular Bill C-40, were introduced. We will now compare previous bills with the recommendations made by Mr. Justice Dubin and try to select the best.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—TELEPHONE SURVEY OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has to do with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. Will the minister confirm that the government is conducting a survey of 800 homes chosen from 75,000 to 100,000 buildings which have had UFFI installed? Will he confirm that no testing equipment is being used, that it is just a telephone questionnaire? It is a "phone foam in your home" kind of a survey. Who determined the privileged 800, and is the minister himself included in the 800 since he has UFFI in his home? Will there be compensation for any of those 800 home owners should a problem be found?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct the hon. member. I do not own a house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: You have never had a mortgage.

An hon. Member: If you can't afford a home, how can other people afford one?

Mr. Lalonde: There is a survey being carried out by my department. It is a random survey composed of homes insulated with UFFI and homes not insulated with UFFI. These homes will be compared one against the other as to the effects UFFI has. This is only part of a broader program being examined by the government at the present time under the leadership of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and his department. There are various steps being examined at the present time. These will be announced in due course. This particular one is only a preliminary step that has been taken on an urgent basis.

COMPENSATION FOR HOME OWNERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The minister will know that meetings have been held across this country and that groups have been formed in Vancouver, Scarborough, Thorold, Ontario, Toronto, Montreal and St. John's, Newfoundland, among others. These groups are urging the government to compensate home owners for testing and, if necessary, removal of urea formaldehyde insulation. Even the testing procedure, and I am not talking about a telephone survey, is expensive. If the department's telephone survey turns up clear cases of danger to the health of the occupants, will the Government of Canada compensate them? I repeat, who is going to look after the other Canadians who want to and may need to get this stuff out of their homes?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government is looking at the various alternatives which I have just outlined in my previous answer, under the leadership of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Whatever steps are appropriate will be announced in due course.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR AID FOR MAPLE SYRUP PRODUCERS

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but since he is not in the House, I shall ask it of his parliamentary secretary. It is a question for people with a sweet tooth. Maple syrup producers in Quebec, and particularly in the Beauce area, have a considerable surplus of this high quality product. Is the minister considering some kind of assistance to finance or develop new marketing opportunities, both domestically and internationally?

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the production system using tubing developed by Quebec and Canadian maple syrup producers has increased both the production and the quality of this wonderful product, and maybe even more so in the beautiful region of the Beauce. Under the Advanced Payments Act, the producers can of course obtain advanced payments, which last year amounted to $8 million. This year, the International Maple Syrup Institute received $5,000 for promotion purposes, and the deputy minister for marketing of the Department of Agriculture has met with the Federation of Maple Syrup Producers and the Coopérative du sirop d'érable de la Beauce to find means to promote sales or find new markets abroad.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS—RETENTION OF STAFF IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. On February 24 the minister assured Parliament that the CN Express office in Prince Edward Island would be kept open and that the employment level would be maintained at 19. On February 24 he said these jobs "represent full-time jobs, and I will see that it is honoured". Does the minister know that three of those 19 employees have now been told that their jobs are guaranteed for only another 90 days, four have effectively been laid off, and the number is now about 11 or 12 rather than 19 as he promised? Does the minister consider this dire situation a breach of the commitment he gave to Parliament and to the employees on February 24?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I did make that promise. Had the hon. member given me notice of the question he was going to raise, I would have looked into it. I will now do so on the facts, so-called, that he has brought to my attention.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, I agree with the minister, but I did write him a full week ago, and had the letter hand delivered, outlining the situation I described a moment ago. Will the minister assure the House that, with the investigation he has promised to launch, the protection of the jobs of the employees in the CN Express office in Prince Edward Island will not be at the expense of other jobs within the CN System in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do not know what extension the hon. member has given to the promise I made. I again promise that I will stick to the promise I made previously.

THE CENSUS

PRIVACY OF MARRIED WOMEN

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. It relates to the census that is to be held June 3. I draw the minister's attention to question 37 which, in the view of many Canadians, is discriminatory, highly insensitive, and infringes on the privacy of Canadians, women in particular. Question 37 requires women who have ever been married to state, under the threat of three months' imprisonment or a $500 fine, the number of children born to them. It contradicts the confidentiality given to Canadian women when they give children up for adoption. In light of this contradiction and violation, will the minister immediately announce that question 37 need not be answered on June 3?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to offer that direction. I will review the question very thoroughly, as has been done in the past. That question was arrived at after very thorough and complete consultation between all interested parties. It is an essential question which will provide us with information relating to our population make-up and the rate of births within the country, which it is essential for us to ascertain with regard to the nature of our society at this time.

CONSULTATIONS WITH MINISTRY RESPONSIBLE FOR STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the minister responsible for the status of women. In light of the answer given by the Minister of Supply and Services, that his departmental officials had been consulted before the questions were approved, will the minister tell the House if the consultations with himself and his departmental officials responsible for the status of women led to concurrence on this question which violates the rights of women?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I will talk to my officials to see what kind of discussions did take place.

LAW OF THE SEA

CANADIAN POSITION ON INTERNATIONAL TREATY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure the minister appreciates that Canada has been a world leader in the negotiations on the Law of the Sea for the past 13 years. This common multilateral approach of some 160 nations is in the interests not only of world peace and security but in a meaningful way is a move toward a new global economic order. Is it the position of the minister and the government that Canada will be a signatory this year to the multilateral treaty on the Law of the Sea?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the fundamental point inherent in the hon. member's question is whether there will be a treaty this year to which we could affix our signature. I have been holding extensive consultations on this subject with other countries, most recently with the foreign minister of Norway, a very like-minded country in this respect. We have all been doing our best to urge upon the United States the advisability of proceeding in the normal manner with the completion of the treaty and the signatures. I certainly am not in a position to tell the hon. member, unfortunately, that there will be a treaty at this point to which we could be a signatory.

COMPOSITION OF INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I certainly hope, and I am sure all members of this House hope, that if a multilateral treaty is proceeded with this year, Canada will be a signatory. My supplementary is with regard to the April 29 resolution which came from the United States Senate for binding arbitration on Canada's Georges Bank, or Gulf of Maine boundary, to the International Court of Justice. I am sure the minister appreciates, certainly the maritime members appreciate, that we are talking about billions of dollars worth of resources, in scallops alone $85 million a year. In light of the announcement to be made shortly by the Government of Canada regarding the reference to the ICJ and on the make-up of the tribunal to review the Georges Bank treaty, will the minister see to it, in the interests not only of the resources but of all Canadians, that a Canadian judge will be considered, and all appropriate resources will be made available to see that Canada's position, should we go to the ICJ, is upheld?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the appropriate government action with respect to that treaty is now under consideration. The hon. member has also raised the issue of national judges under the arbitral tribunal which might be set up under that treaty. That is one possibility, that both sides would have national judges as members of the deciding tribunal. However, it would perhaps be more in accord with international precedent and would have many reasons to commend it if there were no national judges on the tribunal and decisions were made by a panel of judges, all fully independent.

THE CENSUS

MANDATORY ANSWERING OF QUESTIONS

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. It is with regard to the census forms mailed out last week to my constituents, which will probably arrive sometime in the next month or two. When they arrive there will be considerable concern about the compulsory aspects of the census. Last year in the House of Commons a direction was intended, and Bill C-56, passed January 22, provided for the minister to be able to authorize the obtaining of statistical information on a voluntary basis. Will the minister consider having the long form, which calls for less significant information, answered on a voluntary basis, thereby covering the concerns of the earlier question?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that the forms are not mailed to his constituents. They have been delivered to each household in his constituency since Monday. With regard to the other question, the long form is not of lighter import or less importance than the short form. In fact the long form and every question within it are of essential importance for us to obtain the sort of information that is required for the census to be what it is, namely, the cornerstone of our statistical system. For that information to be complete and accurate, it has to be compulsory. I am sure that upon reflection the hon. member will recognize that, if a census is to be accurate, every individual must fill out the form. It must relate to every individual within the country. Therefore there has to be an obligation to complete it.

QUERY RESPECTING PENALTIES FOR REFUSAL TO ANSWER

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): The minister indicated it must be compulsory because of its extreme importance. On the one hand the government talks about removing penalties, or decriminalization, respecting marijuana, because a jail sentence is too strict, yet jail, or fines for law-abiding citizens who refuse to answer questions in this way are considered to be legal.

● (1150)

Would the minister agree that answering questions which are repetitive, questions which relate to information already gathered by income tax authorities, questions which relate to the number of bathrooms in homes and those types of personal questions, should not be compulsory and that there should not be a jail sentence? Does the minister agree that there should not be a jail sentence for refusing to say how many bathrooms there are in your house?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman should recognize that the provision we introduced in the general amending bill to render certain surveys non-compulsory, applies only to surveys involving very small samplings. When we are dealing with a survey such as a census which applies to every individual, and when the census forms will be delivered to 8,200,000 homes, we must obtain a return from every one of those homes if that census is to be complete and accurate.

The hon. gentleman should be made aware that in terms of compulsion the number of cases in which there were prosecutions as a result of the 1971 census was something in the order of 20. There were even fewer fines imposed, so it is not a major operation in terms of enforcing the compulsory nature of the legislation. However, we must invite every individual within the country to make sure he is counted.

I am very pleased these questions were asked today because this provides us with an opportunity to make the Canadian public aware of the fact that the census is on June 3 and that it is indeed an essential exercise which is conducted not just by Canada but by every modern country.

Another point—

Some hon. Members: Order.

AIR SAFETY

DC-9 AIRCRAFT MANUFACTURED PRIOR TO 1981

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It is supplementary to the questions posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. I must say that I find the minister's actions to be inexcusable and certainly indefensible. For a minister to set up a six-man committee to question the validity of a comprehensive, reasonable, timely and independent air safety inquiry which has been supported by all segments of the aviation industry, to me is a dereliction and a clear evasion of ministerial responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I would like to ask a related question respecting air safety. The question is very important and urgent at this time. It has been reported by the United States Federal Aviation Administration that certain major defects have been found in the fuel system and in the wing assembly of all DC-9 aircraft which were produced prior to 1981. This may in fact necessitate the grounding of all DC-9 aircraft manufactured prior to 1981.

Could the minister advise the House whether his air worthiness officials are monitoring the situation, whether he has discussed this matter with Air Canada, and what action is being taken to ensure that we are not flying in Canada with unsafe DC-9s?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, on the second point, I will consult with my department, assess the situation with respect to failures in DC-9s, and report to my hon. friend as rapidly as I can.

On the first subject of how one should react to the Dubin report, I am flabbergasted and stunned by the reaction of my hon. friend. Does he mean to say that each time the department asks for a report from a justice, regardless of how creditable, good or hard-working he is, the government has to accept everything in the report? That theory does not make any sense at all. It surely has never been practised in the country.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON DUBIN REPORT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, the minister is simply trying to slough off a very, very important and credible report. He asks for examples. I remind him that when the report on bilingual air traffic control was submitted to the Conservative government, that government took a decision, accepted the recommendations, and worked toward the implementation of that report in consultation with the aviation industry. Surely the minister cannot hide behind that. Is he suggesting for one minute that it is the practice of his government to establish another inquiry to study the recommendations of a public inquiry which has conducted countless hours of study and examination, with the support of all segments of the aviation industry? The minister has not even included the aviation industry in the implementation of that report.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can only repeat what I have said. Indeed, the government of the time accepted the Chouinard report. The subject matter had been extensively discussed. The previous government had done much of the preliminary work. I can understand that there will be reports on occasions which will come to conclusions which everyone will accept at one particular time, but that is certainly not the standard practice.

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East has for nine sessions, I understand, had a bill on the Order Paper on the same subject as the Dubin report respecting investigation of accidents. The least we can do is compare the hon. member's bill with the Dubin report to see if there are not features which could be borrowed one from the other.

This indiscriminate approach to a report, regardless of how good it is—and I have said how good it is—surprises me very much. I do not think the hon. member will find many precedents in the past for such a slavish attitude with respect to a report, however good it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NUCLEAR ENERGY

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF REPORT

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it relates to a rather furtive in-house study of atomic energy initiated by the government which, of course, was paid for, as usual, by the public. I understand it is now complete. When will it be made public?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, there are all kinds of studies and papers being worked on in my department on many subjects. I indicated a long while ago that we were reviewing the nuclear question. This review is still in progress. If and when a statement is required, a statement will be made, together with the publication of whatever papers are appropriate. Indeed, I intend to release a number of papers, but they are not ready for release or publication as yet. Many are still being reviewed internally. Once that internal review is completed and the papers are ready for publication, I will be very happy to make them available.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, the minister well knows that this report, which is the result of what was proposed by the official opposition to be a public study—it was called for and supported by my party as a public study—is of consuming interest to the general public, and this business of partially completing it and sending it directly to Atomic Energy of Canada is not acceptable. Will the minister assure the House that this report will be public and that it will not be hidden like a great number of other documents have been hidden by this government, especially those relating to the uranium industry?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, this subject is of consuming interest to me too, and I am very interested in making as much information public as possible. As I said, once the studies are ready for publication, I will be very happy to make them available.

REFERENCE TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I have a very serious supplementary question respecting this inquiry which has been going on for many, many months. In fact it has gone on for over a year. When I questioned the minister earlier, he indicated that the studies and the subject matter would be referred to a parliamentary committee or a task force, for consideration of the total question of nuclear policy in Canada and externally, or some segments of it. Is the minister still of the opinion that that matter should be referred to a special parliamentary committee so that parliamentarians may have some input?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I must refer my colleague to the previous answer I gave on that subject. I told him that it seemed to be an issue of great interest to the general public and to parliamentarians as well, and that the use of a specific parliamentary mechanism, either the formula of a task force or a parliamentary committee did indeed deserve very serious consideration. Once again, I refer him to my previous statement.

Therefore, when the documents are made public the government will announce the formula it deems most advantageous to launch that study. What will be the exact formula? The cabinet has not yet reached a decision on that question.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Since weeks and months go by without anything being done by the government to change in any way, shape or form, the Crowsnest Pass freight rates with respect to grain, and since by far the majority of farm organizations in western Canada have now agreed that a change is necessary to facilitate grain transportation in the next few years, I would ask the minister why the government at the present time is almost totally inactive in this area when there is now about as much agreement in western Canada as I think the government is ever going to have on the need for change in these rates?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the events are well known. I almost crusaded for a number of months for acceptance of the concept of modernization of the Crow. The different grain organizations came to see us in Ottawa, met with the Prime Minister, and his judgment, which I share, was that the degree of commitment in western Canada to this change was not yet sufficient. The Prime Minister turned to the grain organizations and others and told them, "Develop the consensus, strengthen it and make it more definitive." This is what he called for, and again I think it was a very justified position. A number of groups have taken the invitation very seriously and have been at work trying to maximize the consensus which, in my view also, exists in western Canada on this subject, and they are now coming back with a more developed position on the subject.

With respect to the government, a number of things are being done. The branch line rehabilitation system is being improved, and we have a five-year plan being developed now. So improvements are being made but the main subject is still open for discussion.

POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT STUDY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I take the minister's answer as an excuse in terms of sloughing off the problem on the farming community, and I would remind him that with regard to the important piece of legislation that was debated in this House not too long ago, namely, the Constitution, all groups, all the people in western Canada, were not unanimous on that, but the government still went ahead.

I ask the minister does the government have a timetable for introducing legislation or setting up a commission to study once and for all this matter of great importance to western Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have my own view on how development should take place, but I am not in a position to say what the government's timetable is on this matter. Again, however, I am glad to see my hon. friend stating his position and presumably that of his party in terms of wanting to see a modernization of the Crowsnest Pass rates. I think he has made an interesting contribution this morning to the development of ideas in Canada.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKINNON—ALLEGED ATTEMPT TO ALTER RECORD OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, just a short point of order. You may recall that on Wednesday when I raised a question of privilege, you suggested I should take it up with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. That committee met yesterday afternoon and I took it up, but due to lack of a quorum I was unable to have a motion voted on. The attendance at that meeting did not leave any indication there would be a quorum today. There were five Conservatives, three Liberals and one NDP present.

Now, as that committee will finish its reference, the estimates, at the end of May, the next meeting that I can foresee with any degree of certainty will probably be next fall. I wonder whether there is any other way you may suggest in which I can have this matter settled.

Madam Speaker: Well, it seems to me the only place where it can be settled is in the committee. I would hope that whatever is necessary to have a quorum in that committee will be done by those responsible. I suggest that he broach the question with the chairman of that committee.

MEMBERS OF RCMP IN MEXICO

Question No. 1,566—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was any member of the RCMP in Mexico, particularly Acapulco, at any time between January 1 and March 5, 1979, and, if so (a) what was his/her name and rank (b) what was the purpose of his/her visit?

2. Did any member of the RCMP stay at Villa Los Arcos in Acapulco at any time between the dates mentioned in part 1 and, if so, for what reason and who accompanied him/her?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

1 and 2. Three members of the force were officially in Mexico during the period referred to. Cpl. Richard Beaudoin, "C" division, Montreal, was in Mexico in relation to a drug investigation but official duties did not take him to Acapulco. Inspector Gerhardt, then of Toronto commercial crime section, was in Mexico in relation to an investigation and was accompanied on a trip to Vera Cruz by the RCMP liaison officer in Mexico City, S/Sgt. A. Gillies, returning to Mexico City the same day.

FISCAL TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Question No. 2,179—Mr. Herbert:

Are there any fiscal transfer payments other than the established programs financing formula and the fiscal equalization programs and, if so, what are they and what is the per capita amount by province?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

In addition to established programs financing and fiscal equalization, fiscal transfer payments to provincial governments in 1981-82 include statutory subsidies, the public utilities income tax transfer, reciprocal taxation payments, transfers under the 1971 undistributed income on hand program, and the Youth Allowance recovery.

Statutory subsidies are the oldest fiscal transfers and are paid as part of the terms of Confederation. They take several forms, including a grant in support of provincial legislatures, a per capita grant, a debt allowance and certain special grants.

Under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act (PUITTA) the federal government pays to provinces 95 per cent of the tax collected from corporations involved in the distribution or generation for distribution of electrical energy, gas and steam to the public.

Through the reciprocal taxation agreements provinces which have agreed to do so pay federal consumption taxes on their purchases of goods and services, and the federal government makes payments in lieu of provincial consumption taxes and fees on its purchases of goods and services in these provinces. Six provinces—Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario—are currently participating in these arrangements.

Under the Income Tax Act corporations could distribute, tax free, to shareholders profits accumulated prior to 1972, once the special federal tax was paid. This payment represents the provincial share of the tax collected, and the 1981-82 transfer effectively winds up the program.

The Youth Allowances program has expired; however, the federal government continues to transfer three personal income tax points to Quebec and their value is recovered by means of a reduction in amounts otherwise payable to the province.

The per capita value of these transfers, by province, is given in the list below.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES UNDER ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS

Question No. 2,181—Mr. Herbert:

1. What amount was transferred to the provinces under the established programs financing formula payments program, by year, for total payment and by province on a per capita basis?

2. What is the estimated per capita contribution for the year 1981-82?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

1. The federal contribution to the provinces for hospital insurance, medicare, post-secondary education and extended health care is partly in the form of a cash transfer and partly in the form of a tax transfer. The value of the EPF transfer since 1977 is shown below.

Under the shared-cost agreements in place before EPF came into effect in 1977, the federal contribution to these programs varied widely on a per capita basis among provinces depending upon how much provincial governments themselves spent in these program areas. After an interim period during which provincial entitlements were levelled up or down to the national average, the EPF arrangements now essentially constitute an equal per capita transfer to all provinces.

The core of the cash transfer is "basic cash", which is equal to half the federal contribution under the three "established" programs in 1975-76, escalated by the trend rate of growth of GNP. To the extent their equalized tax transfer is less than "basic cash", provinces receive transitional cash payments. Because of the strength of their respective tax bases, however, the tax transfer to Yukon and Alberta for 1980-81 is sufficiently large to eliminate their need for these transitional cash payments. In fact the tax transfer in Yukon and in Alberta exceeds the value of basic cash, but this excess is not recovered. As a result the value of the EPF transfer to those governments in 1980-81 slightly exceeds the national average.

1. What percentage is returned to the provinces from the collection of income tax from corporations involved in the distribution or generation for distribution of electrical energy, gas and steam to the public?

Order Paper Questions

2. How does the government dispose of moneys, from prior years' adjustments, that are not distributable by province?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

1. The Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act authorizes the payment to provinces of 95 per cent of the federal income tax paid by investor-owned utilities on income attributable to the sale and distribution of electrical energy, gas and steam.

2. All entitlements arising out of adjustments in respect of prior years' federal income taxes are distributed to provinces once final data are received from the Department of National Revenue.

Question No. 2,189—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what amount was carried in the estimates for prior year adjustments under the equalization program and what amount is included to date in the current year's estimates?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

The amounts which have been carried in the Main Estimates for prior year adjustments to the fiscal equalization program in the past five years are as follows: 1976-77: $50,000,000; 1977-78: $50,000,000; 1978-79: $80,000,000; 1979-80: $50,000,000 and 1980-81: $150,000,000. YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Friday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Deliquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lawrence (p. 9497).

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am grateful for two reasons to be able to address myself to this legislation. Although it has been a subject of bills before in the House, one might say that I have been waiting around for over 23 years to speak on legislation that has not been much altered since 1908 when it was first passed. The second reason is that it gives me one of those typical opportunities to address myself to a measure in a totally non-partisan way.

● (1210)

The government introduced this legislation last February. It repeals the Juvenile Delinquents Act which is some 73 years old. There has been very little change since it was first passed in 1908.

I want to do three things with the time available to me. I want to compare the legislation before us with the archaic and outmoded Juvenile Delinquents Act. Also I want to compare the legislation before us with that which was introduced during the short time the Progressive Conservative Party held office; that is, the legislation introduced by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), the then solicitor general, in October 1979.

Generally the legislation is not only welcomed by our party, but we support it very strongly in principle. There are some areas in the legislation now before us which require somewhat closer scrutiny than they have had. Perhaps the most obvious deficiency of the bill is its very title. A shortcoming of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is the existing legislation governing the manner in which we deal with young people in the judicial process, is that it stigmatized young people at the outset. The new legislation does not meet this hurdle. Its short title, the Young Offenders Act, does not help us. It merely perpetuates a problem which could quite easily be overcome. This was pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax West

(Mr. Crosby) when he spoke during second reading stage in April of this year.

One of the purposes of this bill is to give a fresh start to or to take a fresh direction in the manner in which we deal with young people in conflict with the law. For instance, in connection with my remarks as to the title, we have no adult offenders act. There is no implication that an adult charged under the provisions of the Criminal Code is predestined to be found guilty. It is called the Criminal Code; under the fundamental principles of our system of justice, everyone is deemed to be innocent until proven guilty. This disappears by implication in the title of this bill. I do not think we should have a bill which prestigmatizes young people by implication in the title of the legislation itself. Perhaps a better title for the legislation, which might be considered in committee, is the "youth justice act" or some similar title which contains no implication or stigmatization of young people.

One of the major criticisms of the bill concerns the age limitation. The minimum age of criminal responsibility under the Criminal Code is seven years. Under clause 2(1) of the bill, the minimum age is raised to 12 years. In the 1975 report which was entitled "Young Persons in Conflict with the Law", the minimum age suggested was 14, but subsequently it was lowered to 12 by the proposals of the solicitor general in 1977. The age of 12 was also favoured by our government during its short term in office.

Although there are unavoidable difficulties in establishing a minimum age, a higher minimum age could well be argued so as to emphasize the contribution which welfare and educational techniques could make in dealing with children, as well as the importance of avoiding the stigma attached to a judicial hearing. The effect of raising the minimum age is that young people between the ages of seven and 12 will now be subject to provincial and territorial laws. This raises the question of provincial and territorial responsibilities to these young people.

Thus far the government has not said whether there will be any increased funding for the expansion of child welfare services which will inevitably occur. It is not clear how the provinces and the territories will respond to the jurisdictional void which will occur, but it is relatively certain that there will be a wide variation in approaches, which according to my prediction will also lead to inequities in the dispensation of the effects of this legislation.

Hopefully, when the minister closes the debate he will address the subject of the financial aspect of implementing the proposed new minimum age limit. Consideration must also be given to the manner in which provincial and territorial offenders will be processed. The bill before us is absolutely silent as to this aspect of the matter.

A serious inequity arises in relation to the maximum age set; or perhaps it is more appropriate to say "not set" by Bill C-61. The provision is for a maximum age of 18 years. However, this may be lowered by the provinces and the territories to 16 or 17. This could lead to something which the government, in other pieces of legislation, has been attempting to avoid like the plague—a checkerboard effect throughout the country which does nothing for the uniform dispensation of law in the country, particularly criminal law.

Section 15 of the proposed charter of rights protects against discrimination on the basis of age. The legislation should be attempting to bring uniformity to this area of law. Young people throughout Canada, no matter where they reside, should have available to them the provisions of this bill, although the age of majority varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. The possibility of discrimination in relation to the application of the law raises the issue with which the charter of rights is supposed to deal. It does not appear that the government, which is presumably committed to its new constitutional proposal, has clearly thought out the effect of these provisions; in my submission they are in direct conflict.

The government appears to have failed to relate its constitutional proposal, particularly the inclusion of a charter of rights, to the business which it is now presenting to the House for approval. Under the present proposal, a 17-year-old youth in one province or territory could fall within the sphere or the ambit of the provisions of this legislation, whereas in another province or territory the same youth may fall within the provisions of the Criminal Code and be treated as an adult with all the possible harsh consequences which could ensue from that circumstance.

Surely this is not acceptable; surely it should be remedied before the bill becomes law. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs should very closely and carefully examine this inconsistency. It is not simply an apparent inconsistency; it is one in fact.

Also the bill before us provides for alternate measures to the court process laid out in clause 4. It is a welcome provision, as not all youths who break federal laws will have to appear in youth courts. It has long been recognized that the courts are often full of youths, young people who should not be there, just as our penitentiary system is full of young people, many of whom should not be there.

• (1220)

These provisions give formal recognition to the voluntary—and I emphasize that word—performance of community service or restitution to the victim in lieu of a court appearance. Nothing in the provisions of the bill preclude or bar proceedings against the youth in a court where innocence or guilt may be established. The main criticism which I have of this section is that there is no formal process established in the administration of these diversion techniques, even though I recognize that diversion throughout the country, and particularly more so in some parts of the country than others, is in the experimental process.

Surely in this legislation the techniques, the process itself, should be spelled out. Although safeguards exist to ensure that the youth is dealt with equitably, if diversion is used the process by which this occurs is not governed by even the vaguest of guidelines. It falls totally within the powers of the provinces and territories. Perhaps that is the intention. But, once again, we could find ourselves faced with inequities between provinces and territories in different methods applied to bring about the process with young people being treated differently, depending upon where they reside or, perhaps, where the offence is committed.

Although the diversion provisions are worthy of general support, the process by which diversion is achieved is definitely in need of further examination by the committee. How will the changes be paid for? Who will be responsible for funding? Again, the absence of a commitment to provide financial support for the costly screening process is of great concern. The effect of section 4 can only be as good as its implementation and, to be sure, the provinces and territories will, I expect, be resisting picking up the tab, as it were. As the Canadian Corrections Association has already pointed out, merely changing the legislation without improving the range and quality of resources is an exercise in futility. But that is what is being attempted here, and I would hope that the standing committee, when seized of the legislation, will clean up what appears to be a very serious omission.

The next area of the legislation which I would like to touch briefly upon is that which concerns itself with detention and bail. The legislation would require youths to be detained separately from adults. If no place for detention for young people exists in the area, however, the youth could be placed in a building housing adult offenders. In my opinion this is simply not acceptable. Young people dealt with under this legislation should be assiduously kept apart from adult offenders. Once again the government has failed to offer funds for the additional youth detention buildings which ought to be provided for and which ought to be a requirement under the legislation.

The bill provides that a youth can avoid incarceration or detention in an institution if he or she is placed in the care of a responsible person who is "willing and able to take care of and exercise control over a young person who has been arrested". This may be found in subsection (4) of clause 7 of the bill before us. The young person must also be willing to go with the person in whose care he or she is discharged. This is a proposal which was supported by our government and which is worthy of continued support. It provided, as it does now, a positive alternative to incarceration where parents or a responsible adult may step in and assume responsibility for the young person.

One important change in the new, as opposed to the old, legislation is the new requirement that notice to the parents of the accused must be given if a young person is arrested and detained. Under the old legislation the state acquired the position of parens patriae and parents or guardians were often uninformed as to their child's circumstances. In the new legislation there is provision for direct participation of the parents in all aspects of the process under this bill.

The requirement of notice applies not only to an occasion where a child has been detained, but also to cases where an appearance notice or summons has been issued, as well as when a youth is released giving his promise to appear, or is released on a recognizance. Such notice requirements are welcome in the face of total absence of such protections in the existing legislation. It ensures that the rights and responsibilities of parents are maintained up to the maximum age of jurisdiction. Entitlement for bail will also change to the same as for adult offenders and will be governed by the provisions of the Criminal Code.

The next aspect of the bill with which I would like to deal is the right of the young person to assistance and representation. The Juvenile Delinquents Act is silent on the matter of a young person's right to counsel. The bill before us states expressly in clause 11 that a young person is entitled to be assisted by a lawyer during all proceedings. In the notice sent to a parent immediately upon arrest or issuance of an appearance notice, summons or recognizance, a statement of the right to retain counsel must be included. The judge is required to inform the youth of his or her right to be represented by counsel when the accused appears before a court. If counsel has not already been retained, an opportunity will be given to retain one.

In my submission the new legislation does not go far enough. Although the right to counsel is expressly given in the bill—and I would draw this point to the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), if he would follow me for a moment or two—in my view there is a very serious omission. It allows for an adult to assist a young person but it does not guarantee the young person the right to counsel. The role of a lawyer is vital in judicial proceedings. He or she must ensure that the youth receives a full and fair hearing in the matter of adjudicating the facts upon which the charge is based, and that the disposition of the case is, in fact, in the best interests of the child.

As a counsellor to the youth, the lawyer can discover the limitations and services offered by the court and should check and challenge the modes of disposition presented to the court. In short, the lawyer's function is to act as a check on the authorities, to question and challenge disposition proposals and therapy, even to the extent of determining the validity of the very base on which proposals are made. The fears of those who believe the lawyer's presence will lead to a formal, legal loophole-ridden and technical atmosphere are groundless, in my submission. With trained lawyers on both sides the operation of the entire procedure would run more smoothly. Formalism could help to rid the system of possible abuses. A youth is entitled to protection from well-intended but misguided coercion.

An interesting provision in this bill, and one which is worthy of support, relates to the issue which I have just been discussing. Although the role of a parent is very important, it is recognized that the parental influence is not always in the best interests of a young person. Many parents cannot afford a lawyer, nor can they take the time off to appear at the court hearing. Time and time again I have seen it happen in juvenile court, where the youth is there without parent and without representation. If the parent does not appear on the youth's behalf, he is often overwhelmed and overawed by the courtroom atmosphere. The easiest course of action for the parent is quiet acquiescence in the advice of police officers, well-intentioned advice I am sure, or probation officers. In my observation, the best interests of the child have not always been served.

● (1230)

Clause 11, subclause (7), states that where the interests of the youth and parent are in conflict, or where the best interests of the youth are not being served, the court:

—shall ensure that the young person is represented by counsel independent of his parents.

That provision is there but it does not plug the loophole that I brought to the minister's attention a moment ago. A case should not have to be made for legal representation of children charged with offences. Provision for legal aid would help to alleviate the inequities in the present system which tends to discriminate unfairly against native children and against the poor.

The next issue in this bill deals with transfer to the adult court. The bill allows for a transfer only if the youth committed the offence when he was 14 years of age or older. There are explicit criteria provided to guide a judge's decision which is lacking in the old legislation. For instance, the judge must consider a number of factors, such as the predisposition report, which is mandatory, the age and the background of the offender, and the seriousness of the alleged offence. The judge must also consider the parents' representations before making a transfer order. The transfer order itself is subject to appeal. This is another area which requires much closer scrutiny at the committee stage; in particular, the criteria that judges must consider in making a transfer order. The rights and interests of the young offender as well as the rights of society must be properly protected. The committee will have to tackle this problem, I suppose, by calling appropriate witnesses and re-examining this whole area of the bill far more carefully.

Now I would like to refer to the matter of disposition, and that is, sentencing powers. There is a much wider variety of options available to the courts as compared with the old act. The provisions are identical to the 1979 proposals which our government brought in. There is one exception to that, and that is that a combination of the options can now be used so long as they do not exceed two years in total. Options available include an absolute discharge, a fine of up to $1,000, a restitution or compensation order, a community service order, compensation by personal service, probation of up to two years, custody of up to two years, or any other reasonable and ancillary condition that the court deems advisable and in the best interests of the young person and society. These changes are consistent with the philosophy underlying the bill before us as stated by the Solicitor General and I will not repeat those statements. They are to be found in his remarks on the proposed legislation in this place on April 15 last.

This philosophy is reflected throughout the legislation. For example, an important feature of the bill is the abolition of what the old legislation describes as a delinquency. Under the new legislation, a young person would only be held responsible for offences under the Criminal Code and other federal statutes and regulations. The so-called status offences will be no more. This reflects the constitutional division of responsibility between the federal and the provincial and territorial levels, as well as approving the practice in many jurisdictions of decriminalizing behaviour which is no longer seen as serious enough to rationalize its inclusion under criminal law.

The provisions for disposition also reflect this basic philosophy. They recognize the rights of the young person to be equal to those of an adult. Maximum sentences, for the first time, are established. In making the disposition, the judge must consider the type of offence committed, the predisposition report, and any other relevant information. In the Juvenile Delinquents Act, reference to "the child's own good and the best interest of the community", is absent, which allows the court to move away from its parens patriae role and focus its intention on its role as a court. Although the parental role still exists, its importance is diminished and it cannot be used for excessive intervention. Another protection against abuse is the requirement in clause 20, subclause (5), that the judge provide written reasons for the disposition.

The two-year maximum of disposition orders is a change from the 1975 report, as well as the 1977 proposals of the Solicitor General which recommended a maximum of three years. This is a very positive change and reflects, in my view, the past experience of those involved in this area, that two years is sufficient to meet the needs of young people.

A criticism of the disposition order deals with the concept of community service and restitution as being preferable to orders based on punishment. Although it is a step in the right direction and certainly worthy of support, there should be some provision to ensure compliance. For example, the rules governing custody are quite explicit. The same thought and foresight ought to be applied to restitution orders. The legislation is breaking into virgin territory with these new concepts. Though it is recognized that, as such, not all difficulties are foreseeable, it does not take a great amount of foresight, for instance, to realize that there will be occasions, when a young person will not comply with his or her restitution order, or when a diversion program will not work. So, what happens then? Bill C-61 appears to be silent on this most important point, in my submission, and this aspect of the bill will certainly require discussion at the committee stage.

In my submission, as a finality to this point, the existing provisions in the bill are vague and the checks and balances so necessary are simply not present. The bill provides for mandatory disposition orders. Under the old act there was no mandatory review process, and power was given to the judge, in any case, to have a youth brought back to court before he reached the age of 21 without any specific reason. The judge had the power, which was virtually unchecked, to impose any disposition in substitution for the original one.

The important new provision for mandatory review will ensure, in my view, that the welfare and progress of a youth will be subject to continuing review from the beginning to the end of the disposition. Where custody is ordered, there is a yearly mandatory review which can occur more frequently on application of the young person, the provincial or territorial director, the parents or the Crown. The review can be conducted by the court or a provincially or territorially appointed review board. But if the review relates to the basic nature of a custodial sentence, then only the youth court would have jurisdiction. Upon completion of a review, a judge may reduce the disposition to any lesser one provided for under the act, including discharge. If it is found that a youth deliberately failed to comply with the original disposition, then the court itself can raise the disposition.

The important changes to note here are, first, the availability of review and the youth's knowledge and presence at that review; and second, that open-ended dispositions are no longer permitted.

● (1240)

Criticisms of these sections of the bill relate primarily not to the way the review boards will be functioning so much as to their composition. The boards will fall under the jurisdiction of the provinces and territories and there are no guidelines set out for the provinces and territories to follow in making appointments to them. This gives me grave cause for concern, as it should every member. As there are no requirements for qualifications for membership of the review board it is conceivable, indeed, it is quite to be expected, that it would be comprised of political appointees or persons unqualified for the sensitive job that is required, especially a board that is dealing exclusively with young people. In my submission the board must be competent and without bias in order to function properly and effectively. The board's composition should consist of individuals who have some sympathy with the problems of young people and some degree of expertise in their approach to how the problems will be dealt with and solved. This is usually the last criteria found in political appointments.

It is all very well in a body such as the National Parole Board to let political persuasion be a criteria in the selection process, but it is totally out of place in the appointment of individuals who comprise a review board dealing with young people. It would be my strong submission, therefore, that when the matter is considered by committee, some guidelines as to the qualifications of those who will be sitting on these review boards should be considered and, it is hoped, will be spelled out by amendments in the bill.

Another aspect of the bill deals with the appeal process. This is one of the most welcome changes to be found in the new bill. Under the existing legislation, clause 37 provides for an appeal which is allowed "from any decision" but only with "special leave from a Supreme Court judge". Before leave can be granted, the judge must consider that to do so is "essential to the public interest or for the due administration of justice."

Because of the wording of the statute, appeals have been kept to a minimum, which was the apparent intention of the language then used. The present procedure does not provide additional protection for young offenders, but rather it restricts the right of appeal.

This bill gives youths the same right of appeal as adults under the Criminal Code. The ambiguities and balancing problems inherent in the wording of the Juvenile Delinquents Act are dispensed with. The appeal procedure in the Code is clear and well established so it is with a great deal of approval that we greet this provision in the legislation. It will certainly alleviate the potential abuses of and infringements upon the basic rights of young people that have in the past consistently occurred.

Other aspects of this bill which are dealt with are fingerprinting and photographing of young persons. The bill permits fingerprinting and photographing, but if the young person is acquitted or proceedings are discontinued, the prints and photographs must be destroyed. The practice to be followed is that set out in the Identification of Criminals Act. There are also special provisions in respect of storage of these kinds of records. Generally speaking, the new provisions will be helpful in clarifying a situation which is unclear at present.

With regard to court records under this bill, once a sentence is completed and a qualifying period without crime is completed then the records are destroyed. The qualifying period is two years for a summary offence, five years for an indictable offence.

Under the existing Juvenile Delinquents Act there are no provisions regarding the destruction of records, nor are there controls for the creation and maintenance of confidentiality and accessibility of juvenile court records. The new provisions, in my submission, are to be supported because they allow a young person to enter adulthood with a clean slate. Under the present legislation a youth would be labelled a delinquent for the rest of his life.

Having addressed the matter point by point, I want to say, in terminating these remarks, that the provisions of the bill with respect to trial proceedings being held in camera are a welcome change. Under the present act, the trial proceedings were held in camera. The philosophy underlying this was that trials involving children should be without publicity and should be held apart from trials of adults. We can certainly agree with the latter point. In camera hearings are and should be viewed with suspicion always, as they are always subject to potential abuse. The press cannot act, for example, as a check on arbitrary court action.

The new bill allows hearings to be open to the public but restrictions will remain. The judge may exclude people in the interest of public morals, administration of justice or where the information being presented to the court would be seriously prejudicial or injurious to any youth present—either the accused, the victim, or a witness. The provisions with respect to the publication of information are also to be welcomed.

Having gone through the measure seriatim, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the record of today's proceedings would commend itself to those members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and that they will study the suggestions I have made with great interest and attention. I hope all the points that I have covered will come back to the House in the form of an improved piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have some advantages speaking on this bill and I have some disadvantages. My advantage is that I am not a lawyer but I am a parent. I have raised five children through this difficult period. My disadvantage in the House, as I speak on the Young Offenders Act, is also that I am not a lawyer.

This is an important and complex piece of legislation. It is, as my hon. colleague and neighbour from Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) pointed out earlier this month, the first major social justice bill to come before this House in over three decades. I think it is a sad thing to have waited so long for the reforms necessary in dealing with young offenders in this country. It is sad that the government has waited so long before giving this major issue the priority it deserves. Swept to power 13 years ago by promising Canadians a "just society", it is only now that the government takes serious steps.

What are the reforms that the government is proposing? I am pleased to see—except for one or two points which I will deal with later—that the government is stealing the proposals put forward by the solicitor general of the 1979 Progressive Conservative government. It is pleasing to see the Liberal government recognizing that good ideas on social justice come from the Conservative party. Perhaps it could also accept some of our good ideas on economics.

What has taken place in Canada with respect to juvenile delinquency under our Liberal administration? From 1974 to 1978 violent juvenile delinquency increased by 60 per cent. I am not going to blame this on any particular government. We have seen in the last decade increased violent crime in all age groups in North America. But I would like to make the point to hon. members that problems of this nature are problems for society as a whole and, to a great extent, reflect the problems of our society.

The tragedy of violent juvenile crime is not going to be stopped simply by passing an updated piece of legislation which should have been passed ten years ago. Our problems are much more fundamental than the important, but nevertheless, non-crucial, issues of administration and mechanisms of our young justice system.

What governments must begin to address is the increasing casualness and decreasing morality of our society. I know that it is not fashionable to speak of morality, but morality is necessary. If the word "morality" is too offensive for some of my colleague in the left-wing of this House, or too religious for others, I shall not apologize but instead substitute the word "ethics".

The concept of responsibility must be reintroduced into our society, not just with respect to the actions of young offenders but with respect to all Canadians. We must climb out of the ethical cesspool that we have been in and have built for ourselves which permits the individual all too frequently to blame the consequences of his actions and circumstances on other people, particularly on government, which they expect will do all for everyone.

Accountability must be introduced to our society. We must stamp out the fraudulent notion that someone or something, whether it be big government or big brother, is always going to solve our problems for us. Mistakes are always going to be made by individuals in our society, and mistakes should be judged with compassion. But there is a turning point, a point where too much compassion becomes cruelty. It is an unintended cruelty to be sure, but it is no less harsh. There is a point where too much sympathy, when handing out consequences for an individual's actions, can begin to encourage the individual to continue making mistakes, a point where the individual is not appropriately aware of the seriousness of his mistakes, a point where the individual begins to expect, and begins to take for granted that someone else, not him, is responsible.

This point, I feel, is passed in the Young Offenders Act before us. I would urge members, especially members of my own party, should the government force this bill to committee, to review carefully the provision in the bill which would remove the concept of the liability of parents for criminal acts committed by their young people. This concept, present in Section 22 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, has been removed and replaced with the view that only the young people themselves are financially responsible for their acts.

On this point, having raised five children above this age myself, I feel there must be consequences for their actions which must be dealt with in the home. The matter cannot be dealt with only in the courts. I plead with members of my own party to put this provision, presently in Section 22, into this bill.

The phrase "young people" is sometimes misleading. Let me emphasize that we are talking about children, those who have just left babyhood. The point I am making, is that we are talking about children who have not received the proper discipline. We are talking about children who have not received proper upbringing or who have not had the moral values instilled into them, as I mentioned earlier. I believe it is the moral fibre of this country which is at fault and causing these children to do these things. Parents or guardians must have the incentive to stop their children from doing wrong. Parents or guardians must have the incentive to develop some responsibility in their children. I am speaking of "their" children; they are not our children but the children of the parents. The failure to include an equivalent of Section 22 in this bill may well add to the decay of the morality of our society.

I believe it is insulting for this House to presume to speak of giving parents incentives, but let's face it, there are some bad parents in this country. At times I could include myself in that group. The courts should set an example of morality but the courts should not be the only ones to do this. Parents must also set such standards. I firmly believe that possible parental liability for the criminal actions of children will help to encourage the setting of these standards.

I mentioned that I am at a disadvantage because I am not a lawyer. Other than my philosophical worry, there are two technical aspects of this bill about which I am worried. The first was well presented on May 12 by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, who is a lawyer and someone I trust in these matters. I know that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) was not in the House at that time nor is he in the House now, which is a shame, because the hon. member made some good points on this matter. One in particular has to do with the lack of uniformity across Canada of a maximum age defining a young person. For that reason, I trust that this amendment will be adopted.

I think it very important that the administration of justice for young people not be tackled in a piecemeal approach, varying from one province to another. A 16-year-old in one province is the same as a 16-year-old in another province and should not be treated as more mature, more responsible, than an 18-year-old whether in the same province or in another province.

Mr. Evans: Does that line of reasoning not apply to the charter of rights?

Mr. Fennell: Contrary to the Liberal position.

My other technical concern is with clause 11, subclause (1), on the right to "retain and instruct" counsel, and with subclause (4) of the same clause respecting legal aid. I would ask other members in this House, those more familiar with the law, to look at these provisions closely should the government force the bill to committee. I am worried that the act does not take sufficient precautions in making certain that another huge and costly extension is not added to our present legal aid bureaucracy.

I would like to reiterate my point that I am worried for the young people of this country because in some cases both parents have had to go to work, partly as a result of inflation. I am concerned they are not getting direction. I am concerned, too, that there is no morality in their society. When I was a young person I was taken to church on Sunday. I was brought up with some morality and when I committed an offence, no matter how minor it was, my father dealt with me in the way he thought appropriate. It hurt. I did not like it but I respected it. I do not necessarily follow that philosophy today because our own morality has fallen apart.

I plead with this House and with the members serving on this committee to look at this bill very carefully to make certain that they deal with all factors, not just the legal factors. Because our young people are the citizens of this country who will eventually be governing Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: One o'clock.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, it is close enough to one o'clock that, if you wish to see it that way, I would appreciate coming back at two o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I regret to make this intervention at this time, but I wonder if we could get the unanimous consent of the House to revert briefly to tabling of committee reports, since the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) was specifically instructed by the committee on northern pipelines to table their report. Unfortunately, due to clerical problems he was unable to do so earlier.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, it sounds like an eminently sensible suggestion, although belated. We concur.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the agreement of the House to permit me to make this presentation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Deliquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lawrence (p. 9497).

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, this is a bit of an historic moment for me. Although I have had many occasions to speak in this House, this is the first time I have done so without there being one cabinet minister present—not that it will make any great difference.

Mr. Cullen: There are a lot of former ones though.

Mr. Malone: It will be a rather interesting Friday afternoon with no minister of the Crown in the House.

Mr. Knowles: There are a few hopefuls.

Mr. Malone: This young offenders legislation needs to be updated as there has been very little change made to it since it was introduced in 1908. It is important that we look at our young people and reflect upon the way we impose the law on that sector of society and make the necessary changes to both the writing and administration of it.

Although this legislation is basically good, there are some inequities which, with the agreement of the various parties in committee, could be done away with to make it a better piece of legislation. I want to reflect on the subject of young people and why it is timely that we bring about some changes to this legislation.

Those who watch the charts and graphs on the rate of crime in Canada in particular and in North America in general have noted a continual increase. An hon. member opposite shakes his head, indicating that this is not the case. I do not know what data he has looked at which indicate there is less crime today per capita than in former years. There are very few people who would believe that crime has decreased in North America.

I believe the legislation is important because I think the tendency toward crime will increase. That tendency will increase because of the advent of the silicon chip in this electronic age. The use of technology will take meaningful employment away from larger percentages of our society. That will cause frustration among our population and the crime rate will increase. Thirty, forty or fifty years ago and beyond there was meaningful employment for people who had low skill levels or intelligence levels. Such people would have difficulty finding employment today. One or two generations ago a person with an IQ of 80 or 90 could always clean out livery stables. Snow had to be shovelled. Such work is now done by machinery. Mechanization, electroncis and superelectronics will, in the not too distant future, make it very difficult for a large part of our population to find employment. That phenomenon raises an interesting question respecting law and order and how to handle young people.

If I might digress from that point, I want to address myself for a few minutes to the North American phenomenon of adolescence. I believe adolescence has been created largely in Canada, the United States and the industrial nations of northern Europe and that in most countries of the world there is no adolescence. Psychologists have delved into the matter of the stress brought about by the change from childhood to adulthood. They have studied the stress among young people undergoing what is called adolescent change. They travelled to some of the lesser developed nations to find out why the change from childhood to adulthood causes stress, but in those lesser developed countries that change takes place almost overnight. In some of those countries two weeks after pubic rites people are no longer children. They go on hunting trips with their fathers, live under the rules and assume the responsibilities of adulthood. The interesting thing this team of psychologists found is that in lesser developed countries there is virtually no stress involved. Adolescents in North America are in limbo. They are not given appropriate responsibilities.

In our recent debates on the Constitution and when people appeared before the committee studying the Constitution the words often used in the committee and in this House were "my rights". We discussed the rights of women, the rights of children, the rights of Indians or native peoples and the rights of the handicapped. The legislation before us deals with the rights of youth, but I submit that this legislation is void of an adequate discussion of responsibility.

In dealing with the phenomenon of adolescence in industrial nations I remind hon. members that this country was settled by people who involved themselves in some phenomenal activities. The achievements of those people would hardly be believable today. Before he was 21 Lord Strathcona was making moves to set himself up in some very significant business enterprises. Ezra Eddy set up the E. B. Eddy Company. At the age of 15 he was very much an independent businessman. Sir John A. Macdonald articled in law at the age of 16.

Part of the reason for our youth crime rate is that we have talked much about rights, but we have not created a climate which would allow adolescents to pattern their behaviour in such a way as to excercise their full responsibilities. If we look around the world and also consider our own earlier history, we can demonstrate that the assuming of adult responsibility is something which the majority of our so-called adolescents can do. If they were rewarded appropriately for responsible behaviour, we could have a much more mature society.

On a congratulatory note, the first comment I want to make about this bill is that it is appropriate that it should encourage adolescents to assume more of the responsibilities of adulthood. My criticism is that I do not believe the bill goes far enough. For example, I believe that the concept of retribution might well be followed with respect to youth. A youth involved in a misdemeanour or a crime should repay the debt he owes to society and to the person or persons against whom he has committed his crime.

Too often today we let youths and adults get off with mere fines or prison terms. In many respects that is an easy way of removing the sense of obligation which should follow a criminal act. I see no reason why offenders, both youth and adult, should not repay their debt and perhaps repay more than the dollar value of that debt. Offenders could do such things as cleaning up a mile of highway or several miles of highway. There should be some public service performed in order to demonstrate the need to accept responsibility beyond just the paying of a fine, which at present can be paid by a parent or even by a child, if he happens to have money. Offenders should not be required simply to pay money and then be excused. People should be required to behave in a certain manner. They should be required to pay for their misbehaviour.

There should be some differentiation between crimes committed by adolescents as a result of an association with other adolescents and crimes committed as a result of the influence of adults. There should be a differentiation when an adult uses a child to commit crime, for pornography, for prostitution or for any other crime, whether it be organized or otherwise. In such cases there should be much harsher penalties for the adults involved. It may be presumed that the youth involved is of an immature mental age and that, while the youth will have to bear his responsibility, the full wrath of the law of the land should fall upon the adult.

There are areas of this bill in which I think some improvement can be made. First of all, it is my opinion that the title, the Young Offenders Act, is better than referring to juvenile delinquents because I think there is a negative connotation to those words. And with respect to the option many of these youths will have for an in camera hearing, it is my position that, while it will in some cases save the individuals some embarrassment, I do not believe that the due process of law is necessarily protected in that situation in a country that believes in freedom of the press and information. To allow a segment of our society called "youth" to have the protection of in camera proceedings has as much, if not more, opportunity for abuse as it does for service. I am nervous and concerned about this clause because, while it might be more acceptable for certain testimony, to have an entire case heard in camera is, I believe, a dangerous precedent in Canada where we simply do not believe in closed courts. The courts should be open, and if we are to expect a higher degree of responsibility from young people and we are going to treat them in a more responsible adult way, then I think an in camera proceeding is not the appropriate way to achieve that.

Another aspect on which I would like to comment is that of the juvenile review board. Here we have a proposal to establish a review board across Canada but with no guidelines as to who should sit on that board. That opens the floodgates for political appointments, appointments of people who may or may not be in a position to serve with the kind of expertise that we need on a board of that kind.

In addition to that, I believe it would be appropriate and beneficial to the young people concerned if we had assurances that a number of young people sat on that board along with the appropriate proportion of adults. This has been tried in other countries, including the United States, and been found to have some considerable effect on their peers. In many cases a youth appearing before his peers has more respect for the law thereafter than he would if direction were coming from an authoritarian adult figure.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, it would be my view that we ought not to let this legislation pass without specifically stipulating what the guidelines should be for the review board, and that at least some members of that board should be senior youth carefully selected for their ability to consider the crime involved and whether or not parole should be granted.

Another aspect of this bill which ought to be improved at the committee stage is with respect to the definition by age of a young person. The age of majority in many provinces of Canada is 18, but it is not universal. In some provinces it can be as low as 16, and in others 17 or 19.

This is a good piece of legislation, timely and probably long overdue, but I think it would be of considerable benefit to Canada if the age limit were universal across the country. Whether you live in British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Ontario or Quebec, or one of the territories, is irrelevant. It is my view that the Young Offenders Act, so far as age is concerned, should be standardized across Canada, even if it means further negotiations with the provinces between now and the final reading to reach an agreement on that.

Another aspect I should like to speak to is that the Young Offenders Act provides that young offenders would serve their sentences in the same institutions as presently house adult offenders. While this may seem contradictory to my earlier comments concerning young people accepting the full responsibilities of adulthood, I am not of the opinion that you can put a young person in an institution which houses adults whose behaviour has been judged by society as negative.

I think it important that the federal government provide the financing for the setting up, where necessary, of institutions for youthful offenders, thereby keeping them away from the hardened criminals who occupy these adult institutions. I cannot think of a better way to teach young people about crime than to lock them away with hardened adult criminals. If this legislation is not changed in this respect, then I think it is certainly a retrograde step in our treatment of the young offender.

Another aspect of this bill is the wording which indicates that the younger person may have counsel, a right which is different from an adult's right to counsel. If we are to treat young people in a more responsible manner, which is the objective of this bill, I believe they should have the guarantee of counsel in the same way as any adult who allegedly committed a crime would be guaranteed that right. The simple provision that he may have counsel is unsatisfactory and is not strong enough in its wording. In its review, the committee should take a look at that matter to ensure that youths are guaranteed the full right to counsel in the same manner as adults, although they are younger than 18 years of age.

Historically our approach to law and order has been a punitive one, followed more recently by the protection of society and, even more recently, the talk of rehabilitation. In terms of the old law and order system, the punitive approach was to draw and quarter. Punishing people for the sole purpose of punishment should have no place in any system of law and order.

With respect to the protection of society and rehabilitation, I believe when a criminal has affronted society that the first objective ought to be the protection of society. But I would change my belief in that regard and say that the first objective with young offenders ought to be rehabilitation. Also I believe rehabilitation ought to be a part of adult programs, but in that case the protection of society ought to be the dominant objective. Rehabilitation ought to be the dominant objective when dealing with young people. We must be able to get them started, reward them for their capabilities and recognize that people, whether they be young or old, male or female, or however they are classified or stratified by society, can end up in criminal situations for reasons which do not necessarily demonstrate a calculated mental process in terms of their decision to commit a crime.

If that sounds like a lot of mush, let me repeat it by indicating that there are associated factors in our daily living patterns which have been linked to criminal activities. For example, the diets and eating patterns of North Americans is one of them. I know my following comments will not be part of the bill or an amendment to the legislation, but I encourage members of Parliament to use their influence in an attempt to rid school cafeterias of junk foods. I know we will not legislate it, but at the present time there is an overwhelming amount of information in that regard.

I hear some chuckles from the other side. Perhaps they have not read this well-researched information. Some examples are the overuse of sugar, pop and junk foods, the tensions and stresses inherent in people, the lack of appropriate vitamins and minerals in diets. I know it is difficult to excuse people's behaviour because they did not eat correctly, but it is our obligation in our role of giving leadership to talk whenever possible about the importance of these factors and their effect upon the behaviour of individuals, be they youths or adults.

As I indicated earlier, another factor is the area of jobs. With the advance of electronics, silicon chips and expensive computerization, it is incumbent upon us to remember that it is not good enough for people to be provided with goods, services and an adequate standard of living in terms of food, clothing and housing. Every human being thirsts to become a meaningful participant in society. He wants to "feel like a somebody", that he can do something; he wants a feeling of some personal worth and that he matters or counts. The removal of jobs from large sectors of society will increase the crime rate. If one does not feel meaningful and have some sense of self-respect, one will seek attention by practising disrespect. People by their nature must be noticed. If vast numbers of jobs are to be removed by electronics, they must be replaced with opportunities for people to feel that they are achievers in some other dimension.

I think I have covered all my points. I am sure further discussions will take place at committee stage. We require a tightening up of the language and words in the bill before us. There must be a reflection of the philosophy we want with respect to law and order. I do not believe there is a great disagreement among party members as to the principal objectives of this bill. Hopefully some minor alterations can be made in committee, so that in 1981 we will have a piece of legislation which is more contemporary than that with which we are living at present. Essentially it is the original 1908 legislation. Very few amendments have taken place in the interim, but obviously there has been an enormous change in our social behaviour in that same interim. I hope this legislation will receive the benefit of some good amendments before it comes before the House for third reading.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by sharing with the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) what a delight it is to follow him in the House. Many times I have had the occasion to hear him speak in the chamber. He has not only made good sense, but his speeches make good reading.

During the course of my remarks dealing with the proposed Young Offenders Act, I plan to refer to a number of letters I have received from students throughout my constituency. Most of us on occasion have opportunities to speak with school groups and the students of our constituencies. Prior to this legislation being introduced, I had an opportunity to speak to a number of classes. I asked them for the benefit of their input. I have approximately a dozen letters. I will not read them all, but I would like to point out some of their highlights.

It is important to instil, in not only our students but in the entire population, the fact that views and concerns of individuals who are not members of Parliament are brought forward in the chamber. It is important to practise participatory democracy.

• (1440)

This bill is very similar to the one which we introduced in the short period of time when our party formed the government. Our party supports the legislation which is before us. We have moved an amendment to it which, if passed, would provide some consistency to the maximum age, which is something I will deal with later. I find it most appropriate that I am able to refer to specific correspondence I have received, since far too often as far as our student population is concerned, our young adult population, the publicity they receive is negative. Most of our young people are individuals of whom we can be truly proud.

I am able to illustrate this by reading into the record a number of letters I have received. I would like to do this so that the individuals who have sent me these letters will be aware that their thoughts are being considered in this chamber. The first letter I wish to refer to is from Jeff Plantje. He indicates his concern and support for the legislation, which will upgrade the young offenders legislation which has been 70 years in the process.

Another letter I received was from Susan Berzins, who indicates her feeling that this legislation will be of benefit to young offenders since they will be entitled to more rights, such as the right to legal representation and the right to appeal.

Another letter I wish to refer to is from Leah Brunelle, who says in her letter:

> As for the maximum age, I tend to disagree with the act strongly. If an individual can receive their operator's licence, have a job, or live on their own, they then can therefore accept the responsibilities of an adult.

In other words, Miss Brunelle supports the recommendation of the maximum age being 16 years. This is a matter which we advocated in our legislation and it is something about which we would like to see some consistency across Canada. It is now flexible and the provinces indicate whether the maximum age should be 16, 17 or 18. In the event that the provinces cannot reach a consensus, we would have set the age at 16 if we had formed the government.

Another letter I received was from Fiona Gunn-Graham. She illustrates the good and bad points as far the legislation is concerned. I would like to share with the House a number of the points she considered good. She endorses the objective which ensures that young offenders benefit from all the rights and protections enjoyed by adults. She endorses the principle that society must be protected from illegal behaviour. She says that it must be recognized that young persons, because of their lack of maturity, require guidance and assistance. she also recognizes that young persons have rights and freedoms equal to adults and that they have the right to be heard in the courts and the right to participate in the process which leads to decisions affecting them.

I would now like to turn to a letter from Herman Andrés. He says that this act will be a welcome replacement for the inadequate Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Another letter I received was from Wes Marko who supports, in general, the legislation before us.

Karen Kartz wrote to me to point out that it would be beneficial to have juveniles detained in separate quarters from adults. She disagrees with youths being photographed and fingerprinted. Under the legislation before us, in the event that an individual is acquitted, the photographs and fingerprints will be immediately destroyed. After a period of two years for summary conviction offences, if the offender commits no further crime, and after a period of five years in the case of indictable offences, the records will be destroyed.

Another letter I would mention is from Colleen Ropser, who indicates her feelings that members of Parliament and of the legislatures should be aware that young people do require a certain amount of discipline. But, more than discipline, she feels they require guidance.

I have two more letters to which I wish to refer. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House with these letters, but I think it important that these individuals feel that they have a meaningful role to play in our democratic process.

The next letter is from Lyn Wolgien. She says that she thinks the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908 should be revised in order to meet the requirements of today's changing world. It is gratifying to know that we have a piece of legislation before us which more or less receives the unanimous support of this House. We hope that some corrections will be made to it when we come to the clause by clause study of it.

The final letter I have here is from Andrew Singh. I will not refer to any of the specifics contained in it, but I would like to underscore the contribution he made in the discussions we had at the Salisbury Composite High School. I must say that I was encouraged to see young people such as those who wrote to me interested in our legislative process. I was pleased to see they took time out of their busy schedules to correspond with me and express their concerns with respect to this legislation.

As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, this legislation was not before the House at the time I spoke with these students. I forwarded to them copies of the bill. All of us in this chamber can applaud the young people of our society throughout Canada for the responsible manner in which they approach many of the frustrating decisions which they must make in this day and age.

As a father or three sons aged 14, 12 and eight, I realize some of the difficulties which our young people face. While this piece of legislation seems to deal with a narrow subject, in reality it deals with a much broader topic. Young people of today must deal with values, family life and the moral fibre of society.

As my colleague the hon. member for Crowfoot stated earlier, some of the statistics which are before us are very worrisome. When we look at the figures we find that there has been an increase of some 60 per cent in violent juvenile delinquency from 1974 to 1978. Most shocking of all is the increase in violence by young people against themselves. In the past decade the suicide rate for young people aged 15 to 19 years of age has increased some 59 per cent. These are just a few of the reasons for the need to take a good, hard look at the best way for society to respond to young people and their needs.

If we are to be serious about the problems faced by young people who come into conflict with the law, we must collectively look at such issues as child abuse, our divorce rate, the reasons for teenage suicide, the relationship between crime and the criminal in the early years of development and the over-all mental health picture of our young people. This will enable all of society to grow in the knowledge of the character and personality development in a child's early years.

In my closing remarks I would like to speak to the amendment which is before us. I support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) and seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). They suggest that the maximum age in the Young Offenders Act should be consistent throughout all of Canada. As I shared with hon. members earlier, we had this consistency in the legislation we introduced in the short period of time we were in government.

• (1450)

We hope the government opposite will see fit to accept our recommendations so that that consistency will be in place throughout all of Canada. I understand that some of the reasons were that they could not reach agreement among the provinces on what that maximum age should be. However, that did not seem to deter hon. members opposite at all when we discussed the constitutional issue. There was no agreement amongst the provinces at that time, yet they more or less just bulldozed their way through with the constitutional proposal to their own liking. I hope they will use our thoughts on the issue and approach the provinces once again on the condition that, in the event they can reach a consensus among themselves, they are willing to set the age at 16, 17 or 18, but in the event that cannot be done, it would be set at age 16.

It might be worth while, too, to compare this legislation which is before us with what is presently on the books, and with what we had advocated in our 1979 proposals. As far as the philosophy of this bill is concerned, both pieces of legislation are very similar. Youths are going to be held more accountable for their actions, which I support. We have discussed the changes in the minimum age, which is going to be increased to 12 years from seven years; and, as I shared with hon. members earlier, we feel that the maximum age should be 16 and consistent throughout all of Canada.

This legislation also grants young adults the right to counsel, which we support, and provides that counsel be present at all stages of the proceedings. The Juvenile Delinquents Act is silent in this area and really states nothing specifically as to the right to counsel for our juvenile population.

As far as detention and bail are concerned, there is a provision in this legislation that the parents of youths who are charged must be notified. As I shared with hon. members earlier, there is no provision under the present Juvenile Delinquents Act to notify a youth's parents in the event that he is charged.

The privacy of the proceedings will not be as strict as previously. There will not be media coverage, but the hearings will be open to the public, and the judge will have the prerogative to determine what is in the interests of public morals. However, no information will be revealed to the public concerning the identification of the youth.

I support, too, the aspect of fingerprinting and photographing. I responded to an earlier inquiry by letter from a young constituent from the Salisbury Composite High School. This legislation provides that the fingerprint records and photographs would be destroyed in the event that the youth is acquitted. At the end of a two-year period, if the conviction is a summary offence the records would be destroyed. Five years following an indictable offence, the records would also be destroyed in the event that no further criminal activity has taken place.

There are many other aspects with which one can deal in this legislation. I have pretty well shared my thoughts on this area, but let me just stress what I feel to be the key aspect of all our dealings with any type of criminal activity. The hon. member for Crowfoot underscored this by indicating that he felt we have to take a more rehabilitative approach. I support and endorse any action that we can take in dealing with any segments of our criminal society and in encouraging whatever rehabilitative measures we can.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, three of our members have already spoken in this debate, so that it is hardly necessary for a fourth member to participate. However, anyone who might read only today's Hansard with respect to this debate could imagine that it was only the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative Party who were interested. So let me take a few moments to put on the record once again our position, as it has already been stated by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell).

An hon. Member: All Conservatives!

Mr. Knowles: Oh no! Our basic position is that it is time that the Juvenile Delinquents Act be revised and, for the most part, we welcome the improvements which are contained in the bill which is before us. However, there are a few deficiencies. One of them, of course, is the provision in the bill for the age of juveniles to be different in the different provinces. To us, it is really incredible that in this day and age that idea should be continued and, in particular, that it should be continued by a government which has had so much to say against checkerboarding Canada in any way. Therefore, when the vote is called on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), we shall support that amendment in the hope that it will be a signal to the government that the whole question of the age set out in this bill should be reviewed.

We also feel that the provisions of the new legislation do not really measure up to the high-sounding words which are in the first part of the bill. The bill presents itself as one that comes to grips with modern ideas about how to deal with young people, how to deal with criminal offences and so on; and yet, when we get into the details of the bill, it is not that far ahead of 1908.

I was also interested in the comments made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) this morning when he suggested that a different title might be considered. This is not a world-shaking matter, but I believe he has a point that calling it the "Young Offenders Act" would stigmatize any person dealt with under the legislation as an offender. As a matter of fact, it is almost a stronger word than the word "delinquent", and I would think that consideration might be given to some other name. I believe the hon. member for Yukon suggested that "Youth Justice Act", maybe a phrase like "Youth Code" to correspond to the Criminal Code, or maybe "Youth Courts Act" might be a possible title for the bill since the bill does refer to young people being dealt with in youth courts.

As I say, these are points which can be considered by the committee which will be dealing with this bill. Whatever our stand may be, as will be expressed when we vote on the amendment, I can say that in our view, after what will now be four days of debating second reading, really, the bill could well go to committee. I have already said that we shall vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland because we think that the issue of checkerboarding this country is a very important one, and that it should be corrected. In fact, if there is no indication from the government side that it is prepared to correct that fault, we will find it difficult to support the second reading of the bill.

One of the reasons I thought I might get to my feet for a few minutes on this Friday afternoon is, I admit, a personal one. Quite a few hon. members have referred to this act as having been passed in 1908. Of course, to most hon. members, that is a year which is a long time ago.

An hon. Member: Stanley remembers it!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You were here!

Mr. Malone: Was it long in committee?

Mr. Knowles: I was not here. At least, I was not present in this chamber. Of course, this chamber was not here; it was another building in those days. However, this did prompt me to go into the library and look up the Hansard of 1908, and I found one or two things which, to me, were quite interesting.

• (1500)

I have known for a number of years and I have recounted several times, that on the day I was born, June 18, 1908, this House debated and passed the first piece of legislation providing anything in the way of pensions for the general public. It was the Government Annuities Act, so I suppose there is some connection between the fact that on the day I was born that bill was passed.

What did this House do the next day, June 19, Mr. Speaker when, no doubt, this House had learned that I had arrived in this world? It gave first reading to the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I am sure I must have complained and howled about it but I suppose if I see some meaning in the Government Annuities Act being passed on the day I was born, I have to admit that there could be some meaning in the Juvenile Delinquents Act being given first reading the very next day!

Then my interest led me to turn to the pages of Hansard and consult the index to see what I could learn about the debate on the bill. It took place on July 8, 1908. That was the entire debate as far as this House was concerned. There was no debate on second reading, and no debate on third reading. All of the debate took place in committee of the whole. Of course, members complained then, as they do now, about its being rushed through. But even those who complained about its being rushed through did not try to stop it.

The entire debate on the Juvenile Delinquents Act in 1908 covers four or five pages of Hansard. The printing in 1908 was a little smaller than it is now, but at best that is less than an hour's time given to this Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908. Mind you, it had been debated in the Senate first and came to this House as a Senate bill. One or two kindred souls of mine were on the floor that day and complained about its being dealt with in the Senate first and asked why this House should be expected to pass the bill in a hurry just because the Senate had sent it to this House saying that this is the important House. That was a good thing to be said back in 1908, as it still is.

The debate was also interesting in that some of the things being said today were said then. The defence of the bill on the government side, which was Liberal, as it has been for most of this century—it is time for a change—was to the effect that it was time to remove our little "boys and girls", as one member referred to them, from legislation such as the Criminal Code. It was an attempt to find a way to provide for more rehabilitation and to give our little boys and girls, or young children, a chance.

The Tories from the other side did not like its being rushed through. It certainly was rushed through because it was done in an hour. We have spent four days on second reading! Things change but they do not change that much, do they?

The argument of the opponents on the Tory side of the House, was that it was unfair to boys and girls to make them the subject of special legislation; after all, if they were old enough to commit crime, they should be covered the same as ordinary criminals but that for the most part, children were the responsibility of their parents.

I am not quoting from the debate of the last three of four days, Mr. Speaker. I am referring to things that were said in this House 73 years ago this July 8. I throw that in for a bit of Friday afternoon interest.

I certainly express the view that I am sure all of us agree with, that regardless of what happens to human beings who are around for 73 years, certainly a piece of legislation that has been around that long needs to be reviewed and recast. I hope that as a result of this debate on second reading and the detailed consideration that will take place in committee, we will come up with a piece of legislation in 1981 that will be an advance on what was passed the summer I was born.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When I knew I was going to have to say a few words on the Young Offenders Act, I, too, checked with the Library of Parliament on the evolution of the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

My hon. friend spoke about 1908. I noticed that the first legislation adopted in relation to young offenders in Canada was the Act for More Speedy Trial and Punishment of Juvenile Offenders, enacted in 1867. I thought our hon. friend might have been there around that time.

Mr. Knowles: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Paproski: I am sorry; I forget it was in 1908 that the hon. member was born.

This enactment as well as legislation adopted in 1869 and 1886, was incorporated into the first Criminal Code passed by Parliament in 1892. These provisions ensured that the trial of young person under the age of 16 years took place apart from that of adults charged with criminal offences. Once convicted, a young person was to be detained in prison separate from adult criminals.

A comprehensive statute dealing with young offenders was not enacted until 1908 when the Juvenile Delinquents Act was adopted by Parliament. It was passed as the result of a concerted campaign by several child care workers and magistrates who were inspired by the youth court movement in the United States and the social reform ideas which were in vogue at that time. The act was adopted at the end of a parliamentary session after a relatively short debate.

In 1929—the year after I was born—Parliament consolidated the act by re-enacting the 1908 version with the amendments effected to it in 1912, 1914, 1921 and 1924. This consolidation occurred as the result of a federal-provincial conference on the revision of the juvenile delinquents act, held in 1928 in Ottawa under the sponsorship of the then minister of justice, Ernest Lapointe, the Canadian Council on Child Welfare and the Canadian Conference of Child Protection Officers.

Despite minor technical amendments to the Juvenile Delinquents Act by Parliament in 1932, 1935, 1936, 1947, 1949, 1951, 1972, and 1979, it is for all intents and purposes the same statute as that adopted in 1929.

That is a little bit of history. I think my constituents would like to know exactly what has been happening and why we are debating this Young Offenders Act today.

Over the past several years a number of publications and reports have been issued by the federal government addressing the problem of juvenile delinquency in Canada, particularly the inadequacy of the present law for dealing with this problem.

Despite the proliferation of documents citing both the desirability and need to update current juvenile law and recommending various proposals to bring about this long called for reform, such a goal has yet to be achieved.

The Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan) considers the revision of Canadian juvenile law as a matter deserving urgent consideration. It is therefore his intention to introduce new legislation during the current session of Parliament to modernize federal juvenile law, to remedy existing deficiencies, and to reflect prevailing attitudes and practices.

The new legislation, to be known as the Young Offenders Act, is the result of extensive study and consultation by the federal government. I must say it includes many provisions drafted by the previous administration under the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). We, too, had a lot of input. The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), who was then solicitor general, put this package together. Major associations and groups, private agencies and the general public were also consulted. This consultation process has had a major impact in formulating the underlying principles and the over-all substance of the proposed legislation. It is probably realistic to conclude that this consultation process has now yielded its maximum benefits. While it has become abundantly clear that unanimity on all aspects of the new legislation was not realized, consensus has been achieved on the need for legislative reform and on the major thrust and provisions of the proposed new legislation. Furthermore, the reforms in the proposed new legislation are long overdue and necessary for Canadian society as a whole and for our young people in particular. It is neither desirable nor justifiable to continue to administer juvenile justice in Canada under the outdated legislative prescriptions of the current Juvenile Delinquents Act, a statute enacted in 1908. Delays which continue to deprive our youth and the public of law in keeping with the times and incorporating those universally accepted elements of reform must cease.

• (1510)

I forgot to mention that I am delighted today to follow such eloquent speakers as the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) and the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), both of whom I admire very much. Their eloquent speeches today have added much to the input of this particular bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: Are you running for leader?

Mr. Paproski: No, I have a very good leader. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just said, I am just running in my own little riding and I am happy to look after my constituents, who are not juvenile offenders. They are very youthful, but they are not juvenile offenders.

Mr. Malone: And none of them are Liberals.

Mr. Paproski: I speak on this bill as a parent. I have five wonderful children, two boys and three girls—

Mr. Malone: And they are all Conservative.

Mr. Paproski: —all of whom are Conservative, that is right. I know they will be watching me on television, so I want to say good afternoon to them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope the hon. member realizes that he should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I knew I was addressing the Chair and I would now like to address all the constituents in Ottawa West on your behalf.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: What about Ottawa-Carleton?

Mr. Paproski: In affording society protection from illegal behaviour, it is to be recognized that young persons require supervision, discipline and control, but also because of their state of dependence and level of development and maturity, young persons have special needs and require guidance and assistance. Where it is not inconsistent with the protection of society, consideration should be given to using alternative social and legal measures for dealing with young persons who have committed offences which come within the jurisdiction of this act.

In determining the responsibility of young persons under this act, it should be recognized that young persons have rights and freedoms, including those stated in the Canadian Bill of Rights; particularly the right to be heard and to participate in the processes that lead to decisions which affect them, as well as special guarantees of these rights.

In the application of this act, the rights and freedoms of young persons include the right to the least interference with freedom, having regard to the protection of society, the needs of young persons, and the interests of their families. Young persons have the right, in every instance where their rights or freedoms may be affected by this act, to be informed of what those rights and freedoms are.

It is recognized that parents have responsibility for the care and supervision of their children. Therefore, young persons should be removed from parental supervision, either partly or entirely, only when all other measures that provide for continuing parental supervision are inappropriate.

Let us look at some of the major substantive provisions of the proposed legislation. I am not a lawyer, but those of my colleagues who are in the legal profession who have assessed this bill very carefully, have told me what has happened. I am told that the provision dealing with offences is in keeping with the recommendation of the Law Reform Commission of Canada to exclude less serious conduct from the application of the criminal law, conduct that could better be dealt with through our social or legal means. Thus it would remain for the provinces to amend existing child welfare and youth protection legislation if necessary to deal with less serious status behaviour and to establish the process by which provincial and municipal offences would be dealt with in the future.

In addition, it would remove one of the more discriminatory and highly criticized features of the Juvenile Delinquents Act whereby certain types of behaviour by young persons are criminalized, although the same behaviour for an adult would not constitute an offence.

I shall now deal with the provision on the age of applicability, in other words the minimum age. Under the proposed new legislation, the age of criminal responsibility would be raised from 7 to 12 years. It was universally agreed that under the current Juvenile Delinquents Act the age of 7 was too young for criminal proceedings. Fourteen years of age was suggested by two provinces; the remaining provinces and the majority of other persons consulted favoured 12 years. Furthermore, statistics indicate that a significant number of youths aged 12 and 13 are in conflict with the law.

Let us look at the maximum age. While the federal government recognizes the desirability of standardizing a maximum age across the country, the consultations, while also favouring a uniform age, have failed to achieve agreement as to what that age should be. The Solicitor General recommends that the new legislation provide for a uniform maximum age under 16 years. This would appear to be in accord with the preferred view of the majority of provinces as well as that of most groups and persons consulted. Nevertheless, this should be left to the jurisdiction of the provinces.

The Solicitor General is prepared to consider the establishment of a uniform maximum age at a level under either 17 or 18 years in the event that agreement among the provinces can be achieved. It should be noted that under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the maximum age is set at under 16 years with provision for the establishment of a level of 17 or 18 years in any given province. Currently the age level in the various provinces and territories is as follows: Under 18 years in Quebec and Manitoba; under 17 years in British Columbia and under 16 years in all remaining provinces and territories. In Newfoundland, where the Juvenile Delinquents Act does not apply, the age under provincial legislation is 17 years.

I consider the involvement of parents to be very important. The new act will recognize the primary responsibility of parents for the care and supervision of their children and the necessity for their involvement in the judicial process. Parents would be notified of proceedings, encouraged and, when necessary, ordered to attend. As well, parents would be allowed to make representations regarding the disposition and application for a transfer to adult court or a review of any disposition.

I now come to legal representation. In contrast to the Juvenile Delinquents Act which is silent on the rights of young persons, the new legislation would expressly articulate the rights afforded them. The right to retain and instruct counsel at any stage of proceedings, including instances when diversion measures are considered, would be recognized and protected by special provisions. For example, parents would be notified of any arrest or detention proceedings against the young person; all summons or warrants directed to a young person would contain a notification of a right to cancel, and youth court judges would be required to advise a young person appearing before the youth court of his rights.

Of course, in cases of conflict of interest, the young person would have counsel independent of his parents.

I wish to thank the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) for his legal consultation. We had some close collaboration so that I could put forward these remarks in the debate this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Did he write your speech?

Mr. Paproski: He did not write my speech but, with his great legal mind, he did permit me some consultation without charging me a fee.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The advice was worth what he paid for it.

Mr. Paproski: That is what some of the lawyers in this House should do. Instead of charging fees, they should give their services free. After all, they are members of Parliament.

The provision on predisposition reports and assessments is only a paragraph or so long. The legislation will permit greater use of assessments and predisposition reports. In appropriate cases where one or more of the following conditions are present, namely physical or mental illness or disorder, learning disability or mental retardation, medical examinations and psychological or psychiatric assessments will be undertaken when ordered by the youth court.

Predisposition reports will be mandatory when an application for transfer to adult court is being considered and prior to the imposition of any custodial sentence.

With regard to screening and diversion, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) gave a dissertation on that subject this afternoon. I will not go into that part of the bill in the short time available to me. Maybe my learned colleague will speak on that.

I would now like to deal with detention of young persons prior to a court disposition. The young offenders act would set out a precise procedure to be applied when detention of a young person is being considered. In this regard, it proposes that the rules and criteria regarding bail as set out in the Criminal Code should apply, with some modifications to meet the special circumstances of young persons. Legislation would also require that parents be notified, and it would provide that, as a general rule, young persons who are held in detention be kept separate and apart from adult offenders. The youth court would have jurisdiction to hear all bail applications concerning any offence involving a young person and would have the power to release the young person in the care of a responsible adult in lieu of detaining him in custody, where it appears that adequate control can be exercised and the attendance of the young person can be guaranteed. With regard to this phase of the legislation, I had close consultation with my colleague, the House leader from this side, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I wish to thank him for that part of my dissertation this afternoon.

Let us next consider the transfer to adult courts. There will be exceptional cases where the proposed legislation for dealing with young persons must be overridden because the gravity of the case demands an exception to the philosophy and practices of the youth court. In such cases, new legislation would provide explicit guidelines and procedures for the transfer of cases to adult court. As such, the proposed transfer provisions would apply only to young persons age 14 and above, as is the case under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and in addition, would set out detailed factors for consideration by the youth court judge in arriving at a decision whether or not to transfer the case to the adult court. Consideration of a predisposition report would be mandatory prior to making a transfer order.

Let us look at dispositions. The proposed legislation would make available to the youth court a wide and flexible range of sentencing dispositions geared to meet the needs of young persons, to protect society and to take into consideration in appropriate cases the rights of the victims of crime. The dispositions available are an absolute discharge, a fine to a maximum of $1,000, a restitution or compensation order for actual loss or damage to property, loss of income or special damages arising as a result of personal injury; order for compensation in kind or by way of personal service, community service order, probation to a maximum of two years, committal to intermittent or continuous custody not to exceed two years, provision for ancillary conditions, that is an order of forfeiture of illegally possessed goods, prohibition of firearms, etc.

It is worthy of special note that all dispositions would be of a determinate nature and that the youth court would retain exclusive jurisdiction over the case of a young person. It would not be possible to transfer jurisdiction of the case to provincial law and authorities, as is now the practice in some cases under section 21 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. In such cases, a young person does not remain subject to the jurisdiction of the juvenile court but is further dealt with solely pursuant to provincial law. As criminal legislation, the proposed act acknowledges that this practice should be discontinued, as the judiciary is seen as that body which should decide the extent to which custodial and other measures depriving a young person of his liberty and freedom should be utilized to ensure the safety of communities and its citizens. Once a judicial sentence is pronounced, it is inconsistent that such decisions be unilaterally altered by provincial social service or correctional authorities. Furthermore, a young person should have ongoing access to the court for purposes of review.

On the other hand, in order to afford provinces sufficient flexibility to plan and implement effective programming for young persons serving custodial sentences, the provincial director would, following committal to custody by the court, have the authority to determine the level and place of custody in which the young person should be held. Custody would be broadly defined to mean containment or restraint in a variety of places or facilities ranging from group homes, community training residences, wilderness camps and child care or correctional institutions. The meaning of custody is intended to be flexible so as to allow movement within programs and facilities, as well as temporary releases to the community, without judicial approval. In addition, the new legislation would provide a procedure for the release of a young person from custody on supervised probation in the community for the balance of his sentence.

Here is a perfect opportunity to provide recreational assistance to some of these juvenile offenders. The government now receives $30 million annually in lottery funds, and probably with the connection with the CPI they will have $35 million next year. Half of that is to go into recreational athletic endeavours and the other half to the arts. All of this was part and parcel of the Conservative government under the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. These moneys were to fund young amateur athletes, and were not destined solely for the Western Canada Games. It was proposed to serve all of Canada. The moneys are there. I do not know whether they are going into general revenues or whether something is being done with them. The athletes are now saying to me there is no problem, they have all the money they want, but the minister gives no direction. He does not know where to put the funds. It would be a shame if in Ottawa West, Mr. Speaker, they could not build a little covered community centre.

• (1530)

As hon. members probably know, during the winter facilities for recreational skating are not available. These covered community centres could be constructed as permanent structures so that parents would not have to take their children skating at five o'clock in the morning or at eleven o'clock at night, as they do when there are only two or three little skating rinks. In Nepean-Carleton and I am sure in London East—

Mr. Turner: Keep them skating.

Mr. Paproski: I intend to stay on the subject, but this has to do with keeping children off the streets. The minister keeps saying that if we had kept Loto Canada, we would have had $85 million. No one, not even the Privy Council office, the Prime Minister's office or the Department of Justice, all of which are familiar with lotteries, can say to me that $85 million could be made. We are receiving $30 million annually from the provinces, whether it be from bingos, lotteries, tic-tac-toe, 6-36 or whatever. It really does not matter what they have.

We do not have to put out a penny. It is the only really good revenue we get. It is $30 million net. Half of it is supposed to go into arts and half to sport, and athletes are not seeing this money. We in western Canada now have $160,000 cut off annually. That amount was to be put into the fund for the Western Canada Games. It was budgeted until 1995 for that small little item. I just cannot believe it. We do the same thing for eastern Canada. We do the same thing for Quebec and Ontario. Why should we cut off one part of Canada at this time when we should be living as one great big family?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Somebody speaks for young people in this country, Steve Paproski.

Mr. Knowles: Now to get back to the bill.

Mr. Paproski: Now to get back to the bill—

Mr. Blais: Give us a song and dance.

Mr. Paproski: I can give you a song and dance. It is Friday afternoon, and I am glad Your Honour gave me leeway, but I get tired of hearing that if Loto Canada remained, we would have received $85 million. That is a bunch of—

Mr. Knowles: Careful.

Mr. Paproski: —balderdash. No one in the Privy Council Office knows what it is even to buy a Wintario ticket or a Super Loto ticket. Hon. members should remember that May 31 is coming. They should buy one of those tickets. They might become millionaires. It hurts me when I know that we made a good deal for the government, but this government is putting the money into general revenues and not supporting the youth of this country. That is what really hurts. The hon. member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) is a former policeman. He knows it is a good deal.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Does the hon. member want to say a few words? Let him go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I know the hon. member is discussing the Young Offenders Act, and I look forward to his contribution.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

There is provision in this bill for appeals, the privacy of youth court proceedings, fingerprinting and photographing. I think my colleagues might want to deal with those matters, but one thing which is of real importance to me, to many parents and many social workers, is the appointment of judges. It has been suggested that Canada adopt the European system of appointing juvenile court judges. In Europe judges are trained as career judges. They are not appointed from the bar, as is the case in Canada. Previous practice of law, is, of course, an indispensable asset to a juvenile court judge. However, in addition to this experience, all juvenile court judges should have an extensive knowledge of social sciences. Not only should they have extensive knowledge of social sciences but they should also be former parents. They should have had children. They should know what the responsibilities are.

Special training programs should be developed. In addition, periodic consultation sessions involving judges, provincial authorities, lawyers, police and behavioural scientists would allow for valuable information flow and provide access to new trends and developments in law and social sciences.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is a very learned man and a director of one of the fine universities here. He should pass this suggestion on to some of his colleagues. People other than just people in law should become judges. Particularly for juvenile court judges there has to be a human dimension.

Not everything is just found in the book. Not everything is writs and torts. Something has to come from the heart. One has to see and assess. Members of Parliament live with their constituents. They listen to confessions weekend upon weekend. They know what all the problems are about. Perhaps former members of Parliament should have first right of refusal. Members of Parliament see these cases. Perhaps the Minister of Transport will want to make that pronouncement in the next cabinet meeting, and perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will take note.

It seems strange that the report of the Solicitor General's committee on proposals for new legislation is silent in this regard. Surely the duties and responsibilities of the youth court are as vital and as far-reaching as those of any court in Canada.

In conclusion—and in retrospect—the Juvenile Delinquents Act in action has established a reasonable track record, as its length of tenure will testify. Most of the potential abuses and incursions upon the basic rights of young people when they have occurred—and when they have been appealed—have been quickly corrected in the higher courts.

The bulk of the recommendations which are going to the committee are addressed to technical and procedural matters, and I hope when this bill goes to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, a close look will be given to the bill and many of the new recommendations will be included.

Even if limitless resources were available, perhaps the present system would remain inadequate because it is unable to treat the whole problem. The whole problem concerns problems of education, recreation, religion, health and parental supervision. These problems cannot be solved by due process. We need fully organized community resources which can view and understand the needs of a child as part of a larger whole, the family and its community. The family situation of the juvenile alone is worthy of another half hour. If the family does not stay together, all these problems are bound to occur, but I do not think I will go into that this afternoon.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Third reading.

Mr. Paproski: Perhaps at third reading I will be able to say a few more words about that.

At the present time we have dozens of different governments involved as well as countless numbers of private individuals and agencies. There is a lack of communication and, in many instances, fragmentation and mistrust.

It is obvious that in order to implement the proposed legislation there will have to be a reorganization of existing programs and services and the development of a variety of new services. In this day and age that situation changes from month to month. There is a new morality, and we must look at the matter in that light.

I will conclude by saying that I appreciate this opportunity to speak on this matter. I hope to speak a little more about the family unit perhaps at third reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1540)

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) several times during his speech looked over to indicate he would be more than prepared to make room for more time for me to speak. I would like to say to the House and to him, that, as a relatively new member, I enjoy listening to him more than I enjoy listening to myself. His wisdom and sense of these things is of great counsel to those of us who are relatively new.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am a little worried about the precedent which you allowed him to set, because I am forced to follow the hon. member by simply looking at the camera and saying: "Hi, mom". If we are going to start this precedent of members speaking directly to their families through the cameras, we may have some difficulties in future. I would have to follow that by saying: "Yes, I am going to be home on Sunday for dinner."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, the Chair did attempt to correct the situation, as the Chair must do again now.

Mr. Bosley: Well, Mr. Speaker, you have to know my mother. I am hoping you end it there forever. I think that would be the simplest way to put it.

I should also say, through you, Mr. Speaker, in response to a phone call I received today from a couple of constituents who said they would be watching and who said they are opposed to this bill, that I and my party are not opposed to this legislation because, notwithstanding its title, their suspicion that the title of the bill suggests a raise in pensions for Liberal backbenchers, is unfounded. It is in fact a bill dealing with an entirely different matter, and I think that should be made clear to the audience, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Collenette: Is this an audition, John?

Mr. Bosley: It is certainly a bill of some importance to all members in the House, and perhaps most specifically, as the parliamentary secretary opposite would know, to those of us who represent urban ridings because there is, for anyone who follows what is happening in a centre such as metropolitan Toronto, a serious concern about the rise of crime among adolescents and particularly the rise in violent crime among young people. One of my colleagues earlier in the debate made an intervention at some length on this question, and there are a number of quite scary statistics which the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona's (Mr. Kilgour) listed in his remarks which are well worth reading and actually were drawn from one of the speeches made in the Senate. It is therefore extremely timely that a bill that originated in 1908 should now be before the House for review.

I would like to say just a few words about the amendment before the House, but before I do so perhaps I could indicate my strong view that the need for this bill is overdue. Many of its provisions, which finally recognize children and young adults as persons, are extremely welcome in this day and age. I speak specifically of the provisions with regard to bail and the right to counsel, most specifically those that would formalize and regularize to some degree the ability of a court to apply the tactics that lawyers—not being one I use the phrase advisedly—describe as diversions. Frankly, we have had some experience in our juvenile courts in this country, some in Toronto specifically, with attempts to show young people that the right response to a wrongful act—and it is at least to some degree their responsibility to understand that they have committed a wrongful act—is to avoid as far as possible putting those people in official institutions. The reason is that there is very clear evidence that if we can avoid putting people in institutions, we have a much greater chance of avoiding a long-term problem. I am thinking specifically of some remarks made earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) when he referred to some very important evidence in an essay entitled "Middle Class Delinquency" by a Mr. Leblanc and also evidence from a Mr. Letkemen laying out very clearly the effect of a policy that leads to a substantial number of young people finding their way into reformatories as a method of trying to solve the problem. The evidence is clear that if we continue this policy we will create in the future an ever larger group of criminals.

It is for that reason specifically that I welcome the formalization of the provisions of diversion that would allow the courts to find alternative methods of giving young people an understanding that they have done something wrong and must pay for it, without having to put them into jails or reformatories. I think that is vital.

I should, however, like to put one other matter on the record which was referred to earlier. It is with regard to a provision in the act concerning bail and evidence rights, a provision about which I am somewhat worried and which I hope will be raised in committee. It is referred to elsewhere in Hansard but I want to make sure it is known that I feel this way about clause 56(3) which states:

> The requirements set out in paragraphs (2)(b), (c) and (d) do not apply in respect of oral statements where they are volunteered by the young people to a peace officer or other persons in authority before that person has had a reasonable opportunity to comply with those requirements.

I have a feeling, Mr. Speaker, that this provision leads potentially to some very difficult circumstances, and I hope it is checked thoroughly in committee because I find it hard to believe that we would expect somebody who is 12, 13 or 14 to have any sense of his rights under the law prior to speaking to his lawyer. I hope that that clause will be either removed or modified in such a way that that potential loophole for the misuse of evidence is closed.

Perhaps the most important matter before us today, as I indicated when I started my remarks, is the amendment put by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) dealing with what he described, and we as a party believe to be, as the major problem in the bill. We have stressed this over and over again, and I know other hon. members are aware of how we feel about this, but I think it is absolutely vital that it be made clear that it is very difficult for us to accept the idea that the age at which one is no longer a young person before the law shall be different from province to province.

There is no great magic as to why we are opposed ot it. The reason is very simple and it was stated most clearly by members in this House who described the different circumstances of someone who stood on one side of the bridge from Ottawa to Hull and committed an offence, and someone of the same age on the other side who committed an offence. One might be an offender under the law while the other might not be if the provinces adopted different laws or had opted out differently. Clearly that is wrong. Surprisingly it is not wrong in the eyes of a government which has maintained throughout the constitutional debate that it is precisely those opting out provisions on rights that are, at least in their view, the reason for moving so quickly and unilaterally on a charter of rights.

If you believed, Mr. Speaker, that the need to enshrine rights across this country is so important that we should adopt the unilateral process which this government has adopted, a process which is divisive in a country used to operating as a partnership, you would think the government should take the position that it wants to bring in this bill with provincial consent provisions relating to a fixed common age. My personal view, for the reasons I expressed earlier, about keeping people out of the formal institutions, is that the age should be 18 not 16. I am cognizant of the fact that the problem has been to get provincial consent and it may be that, for other reasons, there will be consent to the age of 16. I only wish that the government had obtained that consent before drafting the bill because what we will be forced to deal with, if this bill is not changed, is a different application of the law with respect to the same crime, if that is not too harsh a word for what we are talking about, and that seems to me to be a shame.

Let me therefore conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to speak very long today and will not do so because there are others who wish to speak as well, but certainly in a centre like metropolitan Toronto this change in our legislation will be extremely welcome. I will support anything that makes our young people bear the responsibility for their actions and at the same time keeps them out of the formal institutions which produce more criminal behaviour, because it can only be in our long-term interest to try to make our young people understand they must not break the law, but at the same time to make sure we do not turn them into criminals.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we have heard some presentations from the outstanding contingent in my party from Alberta. This should be a matter of some interest to hon. members on the government side who think that western Canada is a place where they would like to make gains, but unfortunately their policies in many respects do not help them in that regard.

I was the lead-off speaker for my party on this particular legislation, but in conclusion I want to speak on the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). It is important to consider what has transpired during the course of this debate. I want to register my dismay and dissatisfaction with the manner in which the government has handled this piece of legislation.

As I pointed out when I led off the debate for my party, the basis of this legislation has been before the government for a considerable number of months. In fact the predecessor to the present Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) tabled before the House of Commons a paper in which, in essence, he set forth the principle upon which the legislation is based. The entire matter languished on the desk of the Solicitor General for some 18 months before he brought forward the legislation for debate. The fact of the matter is that he chose a time when the critic for the Solicitor General in our party was not in the House. At that time he made a great issue about the responsibility of the hon. member to attend in the House of Commons to deal with the legislation.

This irritated me greatly at the time because there had been preliminary discussions in which I told the Solicitor General about the absence of my colleague. He proceeded, notwithstanding my discussion with him. I have followed what has taken place since that time. The Solicitor General has been here for only a fraction of the time that this matter has been discussed on the floor of the House.

We had an awful time getting a response from the government side to the amendment. After much pressure from our side, his parliamentary secretary was moved to make a short address in which she stated the position of the government with respect to the amendment. Since that time there has been no participation on the government side.

This is an important piece of legislation. I am anxious to get it into committee as quickly as possible so that we can conduct a detailed investigation. But what does Parliament mean? Parliament provides an opportunity for discussion on both sides of the issue. The government should be prepared from time to time to answer questions raised with respect to legislation and to give its views on the floor of the House of Commons. But hon. members opposite sat quiet, silent, unresponsive and insensitive to the issues relating to young people in the country.

My objection is to the way in which the bill has been carried. There was an attempt to rush it through when the critic of the official opposition was not here. With due credit to hon. members of the New Democratic Party, they made very articulate and thoughtful speeches with respect to the implications in this legislation and the kinds of improvements they would like to see. Government members sat mute and silent when members on this side dealt with an issue which affects such a great segment of our population.

I wanted to put that on record because important issues are raised by the amendment. I am disappointed with the position taken by the government. It is not prepared to look at the merits of the amendment of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. The hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley) pointed out in a very short period of time that this government should give priority at least to bringing some consistency across the country, as opposed to the bulldozer approach it has taken on the basic constitutional issue.

I am glad to see the government House leader in the House this afternoon. The government would be well advised to make inroads with respect to consistency rather than using its bulldozer approach to every issue of federal-provincial concern in the country by saying, "Henceforth we will have uniformity across the country. Regardless of whether you are from Gaspé or Saskatoon West, you will march to the same drummer. There will be no concern with respect to regional differences and aspirations." That is the attitude of the government. It is a blockbuster, blockhead approach to politics in Canada.

My colleagues have said that we think the federal government should assert itself on this issue. There is an important distinction in the attitude of the two parties. In fact, a significant minority in the NDP has taken the same position with respect to the whole constitutional issue.

I want to ensure that this bill goes to committee. We now know what are the circumstances. The committee is occupied with the freedom of information legislation about the improvement of which hon. members of my party, under the leadership of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), are making constructive suggestions. The committee will be concerned with that piece of legislation for a week or two. I want to put the government on notice that it is our considered opinion that immediately after this stage of our deliberations we should have an opportunity to hear representations in committee from people affected by this legislation. We cannot summon the representatives of the provinces before the committee; it would be improper to do so. We should give notice—and perhaps by this speech I will be giving notice—to provincial authorities that we welcome their input with respect to the improvement of the operation of the bill. We should listen to these people, if they are prepared to come and give evidence before the committee. We should take an intensive look at the bill. We in this party are very anxious to make progress. The matter has languished on the desks of Liberal solicitors general for over ten years.

For the short time we were in government, at least we took the initiative. The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland took legislative action and put the proposal before Parliament at the earliest possible date.

With those very few words, I remind the House about our dissatisfaction with the manner in which the government handled this particular piece of legislation—its silence, indifference and insensitivity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that an earlier agreement was made in the House that the vote will be deferred until Tuesday, at a time to be determined by House leaders.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 4 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

HEALTH

PROPOSAL FOR A NATIONAL NUTRITION PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of supporting in principle the implementation of a national nutrition program to be funded jointly by the federal and provincial governments, which program would

1. improve the health of young Canadians;

2. help educate children and parents as to the value of proper nutrition; and

3. help eliminate any surplus of nutritive foods produced by Canadian farmers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion which I have proposed today is one which I can take no personal pride in conceiving. It is an idea which has been proposed by some of the most knowledgeable and responsible people in this country. In March of 1973 the National Council of Welfare published a document entitled "one child, one chance". In their report they proposed the following:

That a nation-wide system of school meals be established for all our children, as a preventive health service, on a federal-provincial cost-sharing basis. Where funds do not permit the establishment of universal programs from the outset, first priority within such a system should be given to the initiation of school breakfast programs in disadvantaged areas and in areas where children must travel long distances to reach school. Where such programs can be initiated only in stages, we wish to see nutritious meals provided first to the youngest children.

The report by the National Council of Welfare was followed up by a report prepared by the federal-provincial nutrition committee of the Department of National Health and Welfare entitled "Guidelines for School Food Programs in Canada". This report was published in June of 1976. In outlining the rationale for improved school programs they said in part:

The need for school food programs has always been of concern to parents, educators and health workers and has recently become an important issue in all parts of the country. This has been pinpointed in the recommended priorities of the Nutrition Canada reports—

The report went on to say:

The consequences of poor nutrition have a significant effect on the ability of students to benefit from their school education.

School nutrition programs are not unheard of in Canada. In the city of Winnipeg there have been such programs since 1975. The program began in Winnipeg after a good deal of controversy with a $290,000 budget. Some 650 school children were provided with lunches at school. At that time the program was attacked, but today, because of demonstrated need, the program has a budget of $407,000, 50 per cent of which is provided by the provincial government. About 1,700 children are receiving breakfast in 25 schools at a cost of $127,000, while 6,000 receive nutrition education. Despite this, it has become common knowledge, as reported in the daily Winnipeg newspapers, that so great are the needs that many children are appearing at agencies such as the Salvation Army, and other core area institutions, to obtain food on weekends and holidays. The city and the province are so concerned about what will happen this summer when the schools are not functioning that they have established a special committee to look into the problem.

The schools of Montreal have had a nutrition program for a number of years. I have in my hand a document dated "Spring, 1976" entitled "Nutrition/Education". The first paragraph of the document reads:

The School Council of the Island of Montreal has officially adopted a subsidized food policy: its aim is to make students familiar with the basic principles of good nutrition.

The document goes on:

Why a food policy?

It is a well known fact that a person's state of health influences his behaviour and energy, and that good eating habits can promote better health.

In outlining what they do, the Council said:

—school cafeteria menus must conform to the document . . . Nutrition in Schools, published by the Quebec Department of Social Affairs;

I find the following remark very interesting:

—school cafeteria menus will no longer include:

—deep-fried foods such as french fries, do-nuts . . . , sugary foods that cause tooth decay such as candy, soft drinks, chewing gum, potato chips—

Not only is the Council providing feeding programs but it is trying to educate the students as to what kinds of foods they should eat. They encourage the students to stay away from junk foods which are so often eaten in today's hurried society.

Since 1976 in the city of Toronto, the Toronto Board of Education has had policies assisting school and community organizations in the implementation of lunch and school-aged day care, which are referred to in their policy as "comprehensive care programs". Currently, 59 schools offer lunch programs and 22 schools offer school-aged day care. In a survey of 106 elementary schools conducted on December 1, 1975, by the curriculum program division of the Toronto Board of Education it was reported that 76 elementary schools were taking advantage of lunchroom supervision assistance. The board, in its report, outlined the kind of nutrition programs they have. They have a variety of programs, Type A to Type E, as follows: type A provides a bag lunch; type B consists of soup, milk, apple, plus a bag lunch; type C consists of soup, milk, apple, plus a bag lunch; type D consists of a hot meal catered or cooked at the school; and, type E is also a hot meal either catered or cooked at the school.

The reason that the cities of Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal have such programs, and I am sure I could add a number of other cities to the list, is that they know how much these kinds of programs are required. I have already indicated that in my own city of Winnipeg, despite the fact that we have had school nutrition programs in 20 or more of the core area schools, it is now becoming apparent that there are still elementary school children who are not receiving the kind of nutrition they need. Indeed, in a full-page article which appeared just a couple of weeks ago in the Winnipeg Free Press, the principal of one school reported:

George Heshka, chairman of the Winnipeg school board's nutrition extension committee, took an inner-city student to lunch one Monday many months ago and still recalls what he learned.

He saw the hamburger fast disappearing and asked the youngster what he had eaten the day before.

"Mr. Heshka, I didn't eat anything," came the reply.

"Why not?" Heshka asked.

"Because yesterday was a holiday and you don't eat on holidays."

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but the facts are clear that in my city—and I am sure the facts are not different in many other cities—agencies such as the Salvation Army and the Rossbrook centre, and many others, are finding youngsters who are simply not receiving at home the kind of food they need, which is affecting their attendance at school.

• (1610)

It is affecting the kind of attention they can give to their classes. It is having a disastrous effect on their physical and mental health and on their ability to absorb the kind of education which they ought to be able to receive.

There is one other reason as to why I believe such a program would be useful, not only to the children who attend our schools from one end of Canada to the other, but also to Canadian farmers, and would improve their lot in a substantial way. We have or have had substantial surpluses of most of the major food products produced on Canadian farms. Let me just list some of the food items which, in recent years, have been in surplus amounts. There have been surpluses of butter and skim milk powder. I am told that last year 130 million pounds of skim milk powder were sold to countries outside of Canada at a substantial loss in order to remove the surplus. We had substantial surpluses of evaporated milk which we again sold to foreign countries at a loss. We are now running a surplus of 750 million dozen eggs a week. We are losing about 40 cents a dozen when we sell them on the world market. We have or have had surpluses of apples, potatoes, onions, carrots, pears and peaches. I am sure that the list which I just read is not a complete list of the surpluses we have or have had of farm products in recent years. Many of these products have been purchased, processed and stored by the Agricultural Products Board, which is a division of Agriculture Canada, and have been sold at a loss.

So, what I am suggesting is that if this kind of program were funded jointly by the federal-provincial governments, not only would it help to improve the nutritional standards and the health of our young people in this country who are attending our schools, but it would also help, in a marked, substantial way, to stabilize the purchase and the use of the surplus food products which are being produced in this country by Canadian farmers. I could compare this in a small way with the success which the United States has had in disposing of a substantial part of its surplus agricultural products through its food stamp plan. Through this program, millions of American citizens in the lower income groups have been able to supplement and improve their diet through the purchase of surplus food produced in the United States at special reduced prices.

So without any further words on my part, I want to urge hon. members of the House to support this resolution which I think would benefit, as I have said, the young people in this country. At the same time, in a very practical way, it would benefit the farmers in this country who have been able to produce food in such substantial quantities that we have surpluses of many of our food products.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to discuss with my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) the subject of his motion, which, in my opinion, is essential to the future of Canadians, namely improving the health of young Canadians. I believe that no government member could object to such a motion. I would like to tell my colleagues about my experience within various organizations concerned with nutrition.

First, Mr. Speaker, as legislative secretary to the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs, I worked in close co-operation with departmental officials to develop a provincial nutrition program, and I should mention that I believe provincial authorities are primarily responsible for implementing a program in this area. At the time, we had identified target populations, because, when we deal with matters such as preventive programs or health improvement, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with major issues and programs which aim at changing the mentality of people, and they require a lot of time and money.

One of the target groups, Mr. Speaker, were future mothers. Under a prenatal program, these women received specific instruction concerning their own nutrition and that of their baby. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is in specific situations that a government can implement special programs designed to improve the health of Canadians. In that case, future generations of Canadians will benefit along with their mothers. I believe that at the time we were teaching the basic principles of good nutrition, which were certainly beneficial since statistics show a decrease in the number of infant deaths due to increasingly well-balanced diet. I shall not go into the details of these policies, Mr. Speaker, I believe that they are well administered provincially, but I think the Canadian government has urged the provinces to take specific action, by developing a comprehensive preventive policy.

I would like to refer to the policy statement made by the Hon. Marc Lalonde when he was minister of National Health and Welfare since, after all, he developed the elements of a policy which are still applied today throughout Canada, and I am proud to say, Mr. Speaker, even throughout the world. Indeed, the former Minister of National Health and Welfare also acted as consultant for the World Health Organization and described on the international level the Canadian experience and made statements of policy on behalf of Canada in this regard. We can therefore be proud not only that we have a policy in this field, but also that we have helped to improve health standards throughout the world.

Another group, Mr. Speaker, which benefits from a preventive or special education program is that of schoolchildren throughout Canada. This group is more easily reached. It benefits from special programs, and it is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that an examination will show that each province has acted in the best interest of schoolchildren with regard to nutrition. I would like to refer in this regard to our experience in Quebec, since I can say that we have made significant progress in that area. And such progress is effectively related not only to the first object of the motion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) but also to the third point of his motion which is: "To help to eliminate any surplus of nutritive foods produced by Canadian farmers." Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at last to note that after a few years, the Quebec government, in co-operation with school boards, has made it possible for young children in primary grades to get free milk at school.

We know that Quebec is an important dairy producer and I think that such policy is liable not only to promote agriculture and be an incentive to dairy producers but will obviously be used to teach basic nutrition to our schoolchildren. In that respect, as a former president of a regional school board, the regional school board of Le Gardeur, I can say that the implementation of that policy has worked smoothly for the benefit of every segment of our community. The youngsters who had not been informed by their parents about the importance of milk as a nutrient, were told about it at school and they will probably never forget those facts.

Of course, the addition of milk at school in the child's diet is but one thing. Each year, most Quebec school boards have a nutrition week during which all the basic teaching aids and all the tools of the school board are made available to the public in order to help young students become aware of the value of good nutrition. As far as we are concerned, one of the most successful experiments was a fruit and vegetable tasting at school, prepared in co-operation with the parents, the school committees and even the school cafeteria, which agreed to forgo the profits from one meal to give the students the opportunity to taste a variety of mostly Canadian vegetables and fruits which, for many students, often was a new taste experience.

We must not delude ourselves, Mr. Speaker, it is first and foremost in the home that the principles of good nutrition are learned, and in that respect I think we are fortunate in Canada to have such quality products available. We do not have to go that far back to realize how much the quality, the quantity and the variety of foodstuff have improved. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I can recall my experience at Steinberg, where I was in charge of consumer relations. I can certainly say that the consumption of fruit and vegetables has increased markedly whereas there has been a decrease in the purchase of less nutritional foods. There has indeed been a per capita decrease in the quantity of meat consumed which has been compensated by an increase in the consumption of fruit and vegetables.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is the result of well integrated policies designed to educate the public and our young people in particular. These policies have indeed led to a change in eating habits. And I am certainly happy to see that the action of the federal government, supported by the provinces, has produced such positive results. In that regard, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted at this stage that the department of National Health and Welfare has made available to Canadian families a guide entitled The Canadian Food Guide or the Nutrition Guide, which is available from the members' offices in their ridings or through the department's information offices.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a good idea to urge all our fellow Canadians who have not yet obtained this food guide to get one. It is simple and easy to read. It provides a complete list of nutritive foods. Because I have a family, I intend, among other things, to find a place for this guide somewhere in the kitchen or stick it on the refrigerator door, so that everybody in the home may be reminded of the basic nutrients necessary for a good and healthy nutrition, and help those who might be tempted to indulge or, even worse, to overindulge, and also to make them understand that a healthy and well-balanced diet includes various types of foods which are equally good, but which should complement one another. I do not want to go over each and every one of these nutrients, but simply urge all Canadian consumers to get this guide which, everything considered, shows the way to wholesome and well-balanced nutrition.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is important to show that when work in that field was carried out within the Department of National Health and Welfare there was consultation indeed. Of course, however significant the role of the Canadian government in that sector, it must be admitted that the means to reach the people are in provincial rather than federal hands. That is why I think the initiatives are excellent, but in the end they cannot be anything more than initiatives which may be encouraging and I do not believe that a massive campaign would totally change eating habits. People will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that a simple reduction in the consumption of fat or sugar is not an easy goal to reach, nor something which can be accomplished overnight. It is always easier to make young children develop such habits than to try to change them in adulthood.

On the other hand, I think that most documents published by the federal department reveal that in this field there has to be adaptation. Sedentary working habits call for an eating pattern which differs from that of a worker in the field, in northern regions, in huge petroleum projects or again in construction. Those people who work 12 hours a day cannot follow the same standards and their eating requirements are different. Therefore certain basic principles have to be respected and I think that each person must still adapt the fundamental rules of nutrition to his activities and his age.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that whatever initiative we may take in future it would be contrary to a liberal philosophy to resort to coercion in that field. Just as all people who are concerned by this question, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I think that the new trend toward eating frozen foods or fried foods—fast foods, as they are called—is indeed the latest fashion. Such foods are in great demand nowadays; perhaps they do require a little less preparation time, but still it is appropriate to sound a warning against an abusive consumption of those meals. I do not intend to belittle that type of food, but instead I would urge Canadians to show moderation in their intake of those foods because they do have a rather high fat content and such a steady diet might eventually lead to health problems.

So, Mr. Speaker, I agree that a nutrition policy is needed and must be implemented. Such a policy has already been enunciated by the Canadian government and various ways of carrying it out are being considered. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is important to take note of what is already being done and that is really what the pragmatic observations I have just made were intended to underline.

[English]

Today there is a set of nutrition recommendations which has been accepted as a base for programs by federal and provincial authorities. I should like to state these in point form, if you will permit me, Mr. Speaker.

The first recommendation would be the consumption of a nutritionally adequate diet as outlined in the Canada food guide. This is the first recommendation that we are following. The second is a reduction in calories of fat to 35 per cent of total calories. This includes a source of polyunsaturated fatty acid in the diet. The third recommendation is the consumption of a diet which emphasizes whole grain products, fruits and vegetables, and minimizes alcohol, salt and refined sugars. The fourth recommendation is the prevention and control of obesity through reducing excess consumption of calories and increasing physical activity. Precautions should be taken so that no deficiency of vitamins and minerals occur when total calories are reduced.

● (1630)

These recommendations as stated were accepted in a 1978 cabinet discussion paper called "Integration of Nutrition into Food Strategy". They are being implemented across Canada as a result of a series of consultations. A major consultation was with the provincial departments of health through the work of the federal-provincial subcommittee on nutrition. Once this consultation was completed over 50 national associations were asked to discuss, endorse and support the implementation of the recommendations. These include health groups such as the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Nursing Association, as well as the food industry, retailers and processors, and groups such as the Agricultural Institute of Canada.

The nutrition recommendations are becoming an integral part of nutrition programs across Canada. Implementing them into programs has highlighted the need to improve existing education programs. There has been confusion between the recommendations which represent our position and other goals, guidelines, and those from other organizations and countries. Many articles were prepared for journals in this country and others for Britain and the U.S.A.

In order to improve nutritional health, we have to learn more about Canadians' knowledge and understanding of nutrition. In this regard we are collecting information about what Canadians think and know about nutrition. For example, in 1979, the Department of National Health and Welfare undertook a study on nutrition. Over 1,600 Canadians across the country were interviewed. Most of them felt that a sensible diet was important to them. They defined a sensible diet as eating a variety of foods, eating at regular times and not eating foods that are too sweet or greasy. A sensible diet was important to them because they said it meant fewer health problems and generally better health. However, the people surveyed did not believe that all Canadians generally followed a sensible diet.

It has been said many times that it is difficult for people to change eating habits. Yet in this study, four out of ten people had made a major change in their eating habits over the past year. The change was positive. They cut back on certain foods and increased their intake of other more nutritious foods.

From these recommendations, it is apparent that federal and provincial authorities are working together for a better program and for the implementation of guidelines which will result in better health for Canadians.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) who indicated that the federal and provincial governments are now working together with respect to nutrition. I recall her words at the beginning of her statement when she said that no member of the government would oppose such an idea, that is the idea in the motion.

The motion is very clear. It states:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of supporting in principle the implementation of a national nutrition program to be funded jointly by the federal and provincial governments, which program would

1. improve the health of young Canadians;

2. help educate children and parents as to the value of proper nutrition; and

3. help eliminate any surplus of nutritive foods produced by Canadian farmers.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). It appears from what the hon. member from Montreal-Mercier has said, we will experience one of those rare moments in the House when the government permits a motion to pass, because she stated that no member of the government would oppose such an idea, meaning the government will not use the usual method of talking out a motion. Therefore, I do not expect to hear a speech from any member in the House today that will carry this matter beyond five o'clock.

I suspect the compassionate member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder) would not make a speech to impede the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield), if he intends to say a few words; I trust that the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson) or even the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), will not make speeches today carrying this matter beyond five o'clock because members on the government side who have spoken thus far have said they are not opposed to the motion.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I will talk for only two more minutes because I want to see the motion go through.

There is a second thing which should be encouraging for the hon. member for Winnipeg North. A few days ago in question period, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) accused my party of adopting a position similar to that of the President of the United States, namely that we would want to see the elimination of food programs. That is not so. But I want to say that if this motion is not passed today, it would be open for each one of us to say that members of the Liberal party are not prepared to see a similar program in Canada.

I think it is quite important that we understand our position today. The House is asking that the government consider a matter in principle. I think it is incumbent on the House when something goes to the root of a matter that can be quite important to certain areas of the community not to support it just by rhetoric but to do so by action. This can be done in private members' hour by allowing the question to be reached on Friday afternoon before five o'clock.

I caution all of my dear friends on the other side of the House not to allow the support of the government, underlined by the hon. member for Montreal-Mercier when she said that no one would oppose such an idea, to be eroded and the motion to be talked out. I am certain this matter is of interest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). We all know that the Minister of Agriculture is at odds with his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), because of his support of the little person involved in agriculture who is having difficulty with interest rates and inflation. I think there are great problems on the other side—

Mr. Cullen: On this side? Are you kidding?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —with respect to the ordinary Canadian and with respect to how the government is dealing with the monetarist approach of the Minister of Finance. I feel for members on the other side. But this is one way by which members of the Liberal party can act, if they want to put their money where their mouths are and take a step which would indicate to the government and to the country that they are really concerned about people in need, people affected by government policy. They can ensure that if they speak today, they do not speak beyond five o'clock this afternoon, at which time private members' hour concludes. In order to accommodate them now, I will sit down.

Mr. Cullen: Have you checked with your colleagues?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I shall congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North in advance for the success which has been heralded for his motion which, by the government's words today, will not be talked out.

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this bill today. I would like to mention to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that I am sure, being a fair-minded individual, he would not like to see us limited in our debate on this very important issue. Therefore, as long as there are members who have something to say, I am afraid we will be destined to speak.

We have heard quite a bit from the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) this afternoon and the hon. member from Montreal-Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette), so I will not repeat the information they have given.

I would like to talk about some attitudinal concepts which bring out the negative forces working against us in our attempt in the educational process to convince the people about what they are doing to their nutrition.

• (1640)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North is to be commended for bringing to our attention the need for continued emphasis on good nutrition and its importance to good health. It is a paradox that in Canada where we have access to an unlimited choice of wholesome food of unparalleled variety we continue to see malnutrition and poor nutrition. It continues to be apparent that having the facts is not always conducive to behavioural change. This is evident in many of the problem areas in our country today, but nowhere is it more evident than in the matter of our health, our eating habits in particular.

As an educator, I have long been aware of the infinite capacity of the human mind to resist the introduction of knowledge, but we must keep trying. We must never despair. If we could just match the promotional power of junk foods which pervades our every waking hour, if we could convince parents to make sure their children get a good start in life, and if we could convince adults to eat properly, not only would they help themselves but they would set a good example for the younger generation to follow. All of these would be good objectives, well within the possibility of attainment by our society.

I referred earlier to the promotion of foods which contribute to our state of poor nutrition. It is obvious that humans have never paid the same attention to nourishment for themselves as they have to nourishment of their animals. Many pets receive a better diet than do humans, each can or bag of feed showing a formulation which should ensure that the pet will be slim, healthy, active and with a shiny coat for life. The Canadian Veterinary Association, of which I have the honour to be a member, grants its seal of approval to pet foods which provide those foods and which attain the standards required. Recently, I observed a current television commercial promoting dog food. It stated, "Not a speck of cereal is present". Not long thereafter I saw another commercial promoting breakfast cereal, urging that it be fed to your children for that "get up and go energy". How can cereal be bad for your pet but good for your children?

It is tragedy that 800 million people live in a state of misery and desolation in the Third World. Many of them are removed from their misery by starving to death, not because they want to, but because they have no choice. How can we impress on our people that they have so many choices of pure, fresh, wholesome foods and that so often they make the wrong choices?

I take pride in my alma mater, the University of Guelph, which, through the faculty and staff of the college of family and consumer studies and department of nutrition, are dedicated to the science of nutrition and have made great contributions to the understanding of nutrition and the teaching of future teachers and scientists in that field.

It has been said, "It's too bad that youth has to be wasted on the young", but that is the way it is. There is no doubt that the greatest value in the educational program in nutrition will come from its application to this group. Many excellent school programs are now being given and the results are very positive.

I am pleased to discuss this motion regarding a national nutrition program and, in particular, a program which helps to educate children and parents as to the value of proper nutrition.

There is no doubt that the nutritional health of Canadians, particularly of children, is important to this government. We all know that during the time when a child is growing and developing from infancy to adolescence, he or she has special nutritional needs. There is a need to develop sensible eating habits which will last a lifetime. I would like to talk about some of the activities under way.

Education of children and parents about proper nutrition is a responsibility shared by many. One initiative undertaken by the federal government was a co-operative effort with the Canadian Pediatric Society to develop a position paper on breastfeeding. The paper was well received and was released in 1978 as a joint paper with the American Academy of Pediatrics. The timing was especially important because of the International Year of the Child in 1979. The Department of National Health and Welfare was represented on a national task force to promote breastfeeding established under the Canadian Pediatric Society during the International Year of the Child. The task force also included representatives from the LaLeche League, and the Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists.

A program on nutrition was established at the educational level in order to increase the professionals' awareness of good nutrition. The government assumed a leadership role in producing and distributing an information kit called "Breastfeeding—An Awareness Program", to doctors, hospitals and public health nurses across the country. Over 55,000 copies of the kit have been distributed. The kit was enthusiastically endorsed by the federal-provincial advisory committee on community health services. It has also been endorsed by the Canadian Nurses Association, and acclaimed by international bodies such as the World Health Organization and UNICEF.

A publication entitled "Learning About Breastfeeding—A Selected Bibliography and Resource Guide" was prepared and circulated to professionals for their information. This kind of program represents a foundation for national nutrition programs because it helps us work toward a common goal. In this case, the common goal is to increase the number of mothers who breastfeed. This is a healthy way to give an infant a good start in life.

I could go on and talk about nutrition. However, I will end my discussion now so that other members who have a message to bring on this very important subject may have the opportunity to continue the debate.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Question.

Nutrition

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the mover of the motion quite rightly took his 15 minutes to speak, and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), with his oratorical skills and enthusiasm, spoke a good 10 minutes on this motion. It is quite fair to claim that those of us on this side who are interested in this subject should also take some minutes in order to give their view of this motion.

● (1650)

It seems to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has brought a very fine idea to this House. Some components of his motion are being implemented in this country already. Some probably are not, but the whole thrust of his idea is more than sound, and I certainly compliment him for having taken this initiative. It is indeed a very fine one.

As just a side consideration, may I point out that in promoting the thoughts which are included in this motion, it might be helpful if each one of us in this House were to devote one newsletter to this topic when we write to our constituents. In that way we would be covering the country from coast to coast and giving impetus to some of the ideas which are inherent in the concept of a national nutrition program and in improving the quality of nutrition in Canada.

It is very timely to put forward a motion like this because we do live in a time, as a previous speaker has said, of fast food. Fast food is inexpensive, practical, can be acquired easily and certainly saves time, as the name implies.

At the same time, however, it contains additives, chemical colours and other products, the long-run effects of which we do not know. Therefore it is good for this House to stop for a moment and ponder about the trend of relying more and more on fast foods and giving up some of the good old-fashioned habits of previous times because what the second part of the hon. member's motion really implies is that we should have more faith and reliance on good old-fashioned homemade soup, homemade pasta and homemade pie and that we should rely more on milk, fresh fruit and vegetables and less on the fried food and the like which is easily available in the marketplace.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North raises a number of questions, and one of them has to do with how we can describe at the present time the health of our young people. On reviewing the information available, we find a publication produced by the Department of National Health and Welfare called "Nutrition Canada" which I suppose is available to everyone who wishes to purchase it at appropriate bookstores. It contains a study which brings out some interesting facts.

The study did not show instances of a real lack of nutrients in our eating patterns, but we do find some indicators of the fact that there is a need for improvement in a number of basic elements. For instance, the study shows that in the case of teenage girls, there is a need for improvement in their intake of iron. On a closer examination of food intake and nutrients consumed, we find that there is a need for an increase on the part of the general public in the intake of vitamin A, vitamin D, vitamin C and calcium.

Many of the nutrition and health problems today are considered to be also the result of our lifestyle. From that study we learn that cardiovascular diseases, obesity, some forms of diabetes and dental caries are examples of problems which have links to poor eating habits. It is as plain as that. These are the kinds of health problems we want to avoid. Somehow the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North addresses itself to these matters in a straightforward and positive style.

A set of nutrition recommendations for Canadians has been accepted across Canada, and they are applicable to all Canadians over the age of two.

These recommendations were designed to provide a balance between nutrient deficiencies and excesses because we also have to watch the other side of the matter. The recommendations could be summarized in the following way: we should consume a nutritionally adequate diet as outlined in the book which was mentioned by a previous speaker entitled "Canada's Food Guide". Second, we should avoid the risk of becoming overweight through appropriate food selection and increased physical activity. Third, we should limit the total amount of fat, sugar, salt and alcohol in our diets. In the case of sugar and salt there have been some frightening adjectives used by some dieticians. I do not know whether we can accept them at face value, but certainly we are being warned about excessive use of both. I found them described in a book as being the white death. I do not know why we have come to use such exaggerated descriptions. Finally, we should increase our intake of vegetables, fruits and whole grain cereals and include sources of polyunsaturated fatty acids. Apparently there is merit in our making more use in our kitchens of unsaturated fatty acids.

To improve the health of young Canadians there is evidently a need to improve the health of all Canadians. Every young Canadian eventually becomes an adult. Because there is a constant example from one generation to the next, we must talk about the total population and the total society rather than single out an individual sector in a rather unrealistic and artificial manner. To do that we must co-ordinate the activities of the federal and provincial governments, industry, professional associations and community agencies. As we all know, a child does not live in isolation. Throughout life a child is influenced by his family, friends, peers, school, what is seen on television and by other messages which are impressed upon him in his daily life.

We cannot say there is one food pattern for all adult Canadians, just as we cannot say there is one desirable food pattern for all children. Therefore, a national nutrition program is built on the need to educate people about the kinds of choices they can make for nutritional health. That is what it really boils down to. When one goes into a grocery store, restaurant or different homes, one becomes very much aware of the number of food choices which can be made.

Bringing about a change in food habits to improve health is a long and slow task. However, it can be done, and in that sense the hon. member for Winnipeg North has done us a service in demonstrating that this House also can contribute to bringing to the attention of the public the importance of this issue.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Caccia: One excellent example is the action the baby food industry took of removing salt and sugar from their products.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Watch the clock, Charlie.

Mr. Caccia: Another positive example is the fact that Canadians have increased their consumption of fruits and vegetables over the past year. Finally, one of the recent studies shows that four out of ten adult Canadians have made changes in their food patterns over the past year. The example of this age group can have a positive effect on their children as well.

Having said that, I again congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North and encourage him to pursue—

HOUSE OF COMMONS

GROWTH IN MEMBERSHIP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. For the election of 1979, 18 new members of Parliament were added to the House of Commons, increasing the total from 264 to 282. After this week's census has been completed the House will grow by another 30 members, if the provisions of the Representation Act, 1974, are left as they are now.

Since the chamber has reached the limit of its capacity, since the cost of 30 more members of Parliament will be extremely high, and because many in this chamber feel it is already difficult enough to participate fully in the Question Period and the procedures of the House, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the provisions of the Representation Act, 1974, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the government assist the committee by preparing a background paper setting out possible alternatives to the endless and unnecessary expansion of the size of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CENSUS

PRIVACY OF MARRIED WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that question No. 37 on the 1981 census form asks married women to reveal whether or not they have had children out of wedlock, and considering the fact that this information is readily available from provincial social service authorities, just as other information requested in the census form can be drawn from sources such as income tax returns, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That the Minister of Supply and Services put down his little red gun, strike out question No. 37 and all offensive and repugnant questions on this census form, try to get his act together with the provinces and federal government departments, and immediately serve notice to all census takers that extra questions on the long form should be gathered on a non-compulsory basis.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

FAIR DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH AMONG ALL NATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which may have the support of all parties in the House. It concerns the death of Dame Barbara Ward, who devoted her life to a fairer distribution of the world's resources between rich and poor nations. In view of the upcoming summit meeting in Ottawa where the North-South question might be pursued, and in view of the serious consequences that inaction will bring about for people in the developing regions of the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That this House express its renewed commitment to the cause of a fair distribution of wealth among all nations of the world.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

NEED TO BORROW MONEY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the present economic situation in Canada baffles him. He cannot understand why people keep borrowing money, with such high interest rates. Surely the Prime Minister could try to understand the problems of small business. With the high rate of inflation, high rents, wages and all other aspects of small business, it simply becomes a matter of survival. They must borrow, no matter what the rate is, in order to avoid bankrukptcy a little longer, hoping that someone in government will come to their senses and help them. But either the government does not care—and I hope that is not the case—or it does not understand small business. Assuming the latter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House direct the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to contact an organization such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen and meet with them in order to learn how it really is in small business in Canada today.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MEASURE SUGGESTED TO RESOLVE STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion is motivated by the increasing evidence of labour-management problems in the CBC, as underlined by the resignation last week of national reporter Garry Aldridge in protest over the strike-breaking tactics of CBC management. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request the Minister of Communications to reduce the salaries of senior CBC management to a level of that of its technicians, until such a time as these conflicts can be resolved.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ECONOMIC POLICY OF ALBERTA PREMIER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Despite the fact that inflation is the No. 1 problem in Canada today, the Premier of Alberta has adopted two pro-inflationary moves in the past week, the first being a cutback of oil supplies to the east and the second being his advocating loose money supply and increased spending. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield):

That this House request the Premier of Alberta to reconsider his pro-inflationary policy and join the battle against inflation by stopping his cutback of oil to the east and by ceasing to advocate inflationary spending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POST OFFICE

STEPS TO AVOID POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Once again threats of postal disruptions are being heard in Canada. At a time when the Post Office is being turned into a Crown corporation, which we are told may hopefully solve some of these problems, many small business people who rely on the postal system for their livelihood are justifiably concerned, as are millions of Canadians who are fed up with the constant labour problems connected with the Post Office. Since the labour contract expired last December and contract talks have been going on for months now, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House urge the President of the Treasury Board and the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to settle their differences immediately, thus avoiding chaos in Canada and ensuring mail delivery to Canadians who pay for and deserve continuing service.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PROCESSING OF PENSION CLAIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Veterans Administration in the United States processes pension claims, both new and appealed, within 90 days, and in Canada this same process takes up to 46 months, as stated in the Auditor General's report, and whereas the chairman of the Pension Commission has admitted that he is being hamstrung by the present veterans legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs introduce immediately amendments to the veterans legislation to remedy this despicable four-year time lag in Canada and that he appear before the Public Accounts Committee which is dealing with his department tomorrow.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON WEST COAST INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has failed to acknowledge the serious economic problems faced by the west coast fishing industry due to declining stock levels, excess fleet capacity, and haphazard management practices, together with the compounding impact on fishermen of the Liberal government's high interest rate policies, and given the fact that the government on Friday last rejected my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 calling for a special House order to authorize the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to visit the west coast during the month of June to investigate these serious problems firsthand, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House instruct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to make an immediate statement on motions outlining the steps he will take to alleviate the threat of bankruptcy and vessel seizure faced by hundreds of west coast fishermen to prevent a collapse of the west coast fishing industry.

GOVERNMENT FORM LETTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a native woman in my riding has received the ultimate form letter denying her a spouse's allowance, which letter did not explain why she was turned down, it was not dated, no name or signature was attached, no telephone number and no return address was given for the government office, and it was obviously designed not to allow space for this information, although she was asked to reply to the letter by the beginning of April, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the government review all its form letters to ensure that in addition to containing all necessary documentation, such as names and return addresses, that the reason for the refusal of the request is given and, also, that the manner of appealing the decision is explained.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, whereas the government is now considering legislation to move marijuana control from the Narcotics Act to the Food and Drugs Act, and whereas recent research indicates marijuana does have a number of serious physical side effects, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That the Minister of State and Minister of Communications in upcoming meetings with the Council of Education Ministers encourage them to co-operate with the federal government in an educational program designed to show Canada's youth both the hazards of marijuana use and the purposes of the proposed legislation.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT ANTI-INFLATION POLICIES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of any of the leading members of the government—as a matter of fact there are only 14 cabinet ministers here out of 32. Fourteen! That is how concerned they are about the events today. Fifteen! One just joined us. The Prime Minister is not here, the Minister of Finance is not here—

Some hon. Members: Where's Joe?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is to ask a question, not make a speech about who is present in the House.

Mr. Crosbie: My question, Madam Speaker, in light of this indifference of the government, is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The director of the Economic Council of Canada, Dr. Slater, spoke before the House of Commons finance committee on Friday. He said that a mix of policies is the best way to fight inflation, and that no single policy can cure inflation. He then said that Governor Bouey has been left by the government to go it alone to fight inflation with monetary policy only. The government has no other anti-inflation policy in effect.

In view of this criticism by the official economic advisory Council to the government, of the government's lack of policy, does the government plan to resign? Does it plan to ask the Minister of Finance to resign to put in a minister who will bring in policies, or does the government plan to introduce some anti-inflationary policies to help the people of this country and to help Mr. Bouey in his anti-inflation campaign?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member's question, quoting the chairman of the Economic Council, confirms that we are doing exactly what the chairman said we should do, and that is to pursue a mix of policies of an appropriate nature. This, in fact, is the approach of the government. In the last budget the Minister of Finance pointed out how, as part of an effort to restrain the forces of inflation, we are following, for example, a policy of expenditure restraint. So I think that we are doing something quite consistent with the advice of the chairman of the Economic Council, and where there are further initiatives to be announced, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will be very quick to announce them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I am glad that the minister agrees with what Dr. Slater has been saying, because Dr. Slater said the fight against inflation being waged by the government is little more than a phony war.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: That is what the director of the Economic Council of Canada thinks. That is the mix of policies that the government has, the phony war.

INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Dr. Slater said some of the policies which would be helpful would be an energy agreement on prices and revenue sharing, but there is nothing like that yet; a fiscal arrangement with the provinces which is in line with the present situation; and an investment strategy and program for the country.

The minister is supposed to be the author of the great investment strategy. We have not seen it yet. The deficit has not been reduced, though it is stated to be a plan. Can the minister tell us when are we going to have action in any of those areas which might help the battle against inflation? When? Specifically, if he cannot answer with reference to the rest, when is the minister's mighty mountain of an industrial strategy going to come mouse-like forward from the minister?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, through numerous announcements we have been making in the area of industrial policy, we are confirming that we are moving in the right directions for the Canadian economy when it comes to industrial policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!
